PASSION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mercedes-Benz, whose cars were known for precise design and an elite image, felt the market shifting. Growth lay in the lower end of the luxury car market, as a strong economy put large numbers of people in a close-to Mercedes price range. Also, luxury features formerly available only on cars like Mercedes began appearing in other, lower-priced automobiles. In reaction to these trends Mercedes broadened its market by offering more models, some at lower prices, and an updated image. The accompanying advertising campaign was unconventional enough that it met substantial skepticism within the industry when it first appeared.

Lowe & Partners/SMS's award-winning national brand campaign for Mercedes, ''Passion,'' was introduced early in 1997. The agency added to the campaign on Sunday, September 14, 1997, when ads introduced four new models. It was the company's largest retail launch in history. The 60-second ''Falling in Love Again'' television spot opened with documentary-style footage of Mercedes-Benz's earliest years. Throughout the spot Marlene Dietrichsang the song, ''Falling in Love.'' The spot continued to visually walk through the car company's history with more and more people joining the singing. Lines included: ''Never wanted to,'' ''I can't help it,'' ''Love's always been my game,'' ''Play it out I say,'' and ''I was made that way.'' The film quality of each shot reflected the era shown, with the spot changing to color in the scene set in the 1940s. At the close the viewer saw a 1997 convertible with the top going down. A couple leaned toward each other and kissed, as Dietrich sang the last line of the song and one word appeared on the screen, ''Passion.''

One of two 30-second television spots that ran for four weeks in November 1997 featured singer Robert Goulet spoofing himself while touting the great value Mercedes offered. A woman stopped her Mercedes at a toll barrier. When Goulet, as the toll taker, saw the car, he broke into singing ''It's Impossible.'' In other scenes Goulet played a biker, a mop man at a car wash, and a meter maid, always running into the same woman and her Mercedes, always reacting with the song ''It's Impossible.''

The fall 1997 60-second ''Big Show'' spot featured archival and digitally enhanced footage from a popular 1960s television variety show hosted by Ed Sullivan. Amid scenes of acrobats, contortionists, ballet dancers, and others, the Mercedes ML320performed its own driving, handling, and traction feats.

Mercedes advertised on such shows as NFL Football, Frasier, Nightline, The Tonight Show With Jay Leno, and Late Show With David Letterman. Print ads appeared in the New Yorker, Fortune, Car & Driver, Wall Street Journal, USA Today, and many other magazines and newspapers. Mercedes spent an estimated $100-110 million on ads in the U.S. market in 1998.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Independently of each other two German engineers, Carl Benz and Gottlieb Daimler, began working on the internal combustion engine in the mid-1880s. Although they lived only about 60 miles apart, it seems that they never met. By 1885 Benz had built a three-wheeled car that could circle a track at 10 m.p.h. Daimler set up a workshop in 1882, testing his first engine on a wooden bicycle. In 1900 a member of the Daimler company board outlined a type of racer he wanted built. He promised to buy 36 of the racers but asked that the car be named after his one-year-old daughter, Mercedes. The car's top speed of 30 miles per hour made it one of the fastest on the road in 1900.

The companies began coordinating some design and production work by 1924, and in 1926 they merged to form Daimler-Benz AG. The three-pointed star became the corporate symbol, reportedly to represent the three arenas where its engines dominated—air, land, and sea. The company served the Nazi regime during World War II, but in the 1950s it established itself as a luxury car manufacturer. Its appeal as a car for the wealthy, status-conscious buyer grew steadily. On January 1, 1965, Mercedes-Benz of North America opened its doors.

The 1980s brought tough times for European car makers in the United States. Japanese competition, a weak dollar, and quality problems drove Renault, Peugeot, and Fiat from the U.S. market. Volkswagen lost market share with its rust-prone Rabbit and closed its Pennsylvania factory. Then in 1989 Lexus and Infiniti, luxury brands from Japanese car makers, hit showrooms. Lexus, in particular, delivered a level of quality and comfort unmatched by any other comparably priced high-end vehicle. The global marriage of Daimler-Benz AG and Chrysler Corporation in 1998 created DaimlerChrysler, the world's second largest corporation.

TARGET MARKET

By 1994 Mercedes began reacting to a shift in the market for luxury cars. Previously, luxury cars were bought by a small number of the wealthy—often lawyers, doctors, and highly successful businessmen. A strong U.S. economy, plus the aging and growing affluence of the baby boomers, brought the prospect of buying a luxury car to the doorstep of many more, and much younger, people. Product features that had been available only in luxury cars were now being offered by manufacturers like Honda and Subaru. Many boomers passed up the Cadillac DeVilles favored by the previous two generations in favor of smaller, leaner, sportier cars like the Cadillac Catera.

Among the luxury car market a subcategory began to grow. Marketers called this segment near-luxury or entry-luxury cars. Examples included the BMW 3-Series, the Lexus ES 300and the Mercedes C280. The fall 1997 introduction of Mercedes' American-made sport-utility vehicle, the M-Class, was another example.

In 1998 Lindsay Chappell reported in Advertising Age that Mercedes had early jitters about how its brand equity might be diluted by reaching for this new, younger customer base. The early answer in 1998, based on the demand for the M-Class, was an overwhelmingly positive one. Demand outstripped supply. The New York Times wrote in December of 1997 that "Mercedes advertising has become clever—cool, even—and cars such as the C-Class sedan, the SLK roadster and the new CLK coupe are putting the three-pointed star within the grasp of younger buyers." Mercedes pegged the median age of the M-Class target buyer at 40, while the target for its high-end E-Class was age 52.

COMPETITION

BMW and Mercedes appealed to similar markets and attracted almost identical sales in the U.S. in 1997. BMW sales rose more than 15 percent in 1997 to about 122,500 while Mercedes sales rose about 35 percent to 122,265 vehicles that year. One 1997 BMW print ad was a close-up of a gear shift. Instead of the familiar lines and numbers showing the shifting pattern, the lines led to the letters "YEEEHA." A single line of copy across the bottom of the ad read "Nothing is so blissful as driving a manual transmission. That's why we offer 11 models so equipped. All of which have the ability to leave you impressed beyond words. The Ultimate Driving Machine. It's far more than a slogan." Another ad shown a car about to broadside a BMW and a headline that read "Other head protection systems may be available in

MERCEDES-BENZ U.S. SALES

1993—61,899; 1994—73,002; 1995—76,752;
1996—90,844; 1997—122,265; 1998—170,245

12 months. Ours is available in the next .0025 seconds.'' An ad for BMW's M Roadster used the tag line ''The wax can barely hang on.''

Toyota Motor Corporation founded its Lexus division in 1989 largely to compete with the likes of Mercedes and BMW. It succeeded. Lexus quickly gained a reputation for high quality and successful products. Although Mercedes remained a more popular brand name than Lexus in the United States, consumers bought 98,000 Lexus vehicles in 1997. Lexus ran a campaign with a tag line from Shakespeare's Macbeth, ''Something wicked this way comes.'' Three spots that ran on the Fox Network's The X-Files and Millennium in early October of 1997 all ended with this line. Lexus sought to attract what it called expressive buyers in their 40s. The campaign aimed to connect the Lexus GS 300and GS 400sedans with performance, fun, and excitement.

By the late 1990s Mercedes and its competition had taken their marketing efforts far beyond the traditional venues. Several car manufacturers began dueling in marketing arenas like concert sponsorships, literary events, and films. Lexus sponsored a 32-city world tour by rock musician Eric Clapton. Mercedes teamed up with the publishing company, Conde Nast, to lure magazine subscribers into fine restaurants to meet author Gay Talese. Inside the restaurants Mercedes parked one of its CLK coupes. BMW and Lexus sponsored a variety of events for subscribers of Harper's Magazine and Bon Appetit, respectively. The James Bond films Goldeneye and Tomorrow Never Dies featured BMWs, while the Mercedes sport-utility vehicle later starred in Steven Spielberg's The Lost World: Jurassic Park.

MARKETING STRATEGY

''Passion'' and other late 1990s Mercedes advertising campaigns reflected a shift away from an elite and exclusive image toward a keen, clever, and humorous approach. In the past, advertising for Mercedes seemed to imply that people should not even think about buying one unless they did not have to consider price. Television viewers got used to seeing Mercedes ads featuring German engineers in starched white lab coats talking about how well built and safe the car was. Other typical spots focused on beautiful mansions as the car pulled up front.

In 1994 this strategy changed. Since then, Mercedes ads have featured a singing baby, Johnny Carson's television sidekick Ed McMahon, former rock singer Janis Joplin, and Michael Richards, the actor who played Jerry Seinfeld's crazy television neighbor.

The company's rejection of elitism and embrace of contemporary smartness continued with ''Falling In Love Again.'' Creative director/art director Andy Hirsch said that spot was intended to get people thinking, ''Wait a minute, how did all these people sing this song before [the advent of] talking film?''

The president of Mercedes-Benz North America, Mike Jackson, said the seminal moment came in 1993 when the company decided to go for a total brand approach and deep-six all tactical activities like rebating and subsidized leases. Mercedes moved toward innovative and emotional products and toward creating aspiration rather than admiration. ''We had to define the brand in new ways that made more sense to the people we were after, which was, and is, people within our income demographic, but somewhat younger than the 50- to 52-year-old average age buyer we had at the time,'' Jackson said.

In the late 1980s Mercedes and other European auto makers had been trounced by Japanese manufacturers of less expensive, better-built cars. The Wall Street Journal Europe said Mercedes and the other European companies renewed their focus on quality and value and learned to give customers what they wanted. What they wanted were vehicles like the Mercedes M-Class sport-utility. Mercedes also equipped its cars with features the consumer wanted, even mundane features like coffee cup holders. ''Before, we were convinced we had to educate U.S. customers not to drink coffee when they drove,'' said Juergen Hubbert, a Daimler-Benz board member. ''They responded by buying the other guys' cars.'' In 1998 the $33,950 Mercedes M-Class had five cup holders.

Mercedes also decided to build a car for Americans in America. It opened its Tuscaloosa, Alabama, plant to produce the sport-utility vehicle that would compete directly with Ford Explorer and Jeep Grand Cherokee. The Alabama plant eliminated the exchange-rate risk and saved 10-20 percent in labor costs.

Another key to the strategy was a focus on building customer relationships. For example, two years before releasing its first sport-utility vehicle, Mercedes built a customer base through an eight-piece direct-mail campaign. The campaign yielded a database of more than 100,000 names of people who said they were interested in buying the new car. With each mailing Mercedes included a survey, and it dropped every prospect who did not return it. Ranging from 5 to 50 percent, the response rate ''blew us away'' said Al Weiss, director of marketing communications. Weiss called the campaign a litmus test to see if the company could maintain a dialogue with customers.

Mercedes said its relationship building extended to its Internet site, where it created an S-class preview in November of 1998. Prospective buyers were sent only information they requested. If they asked only about performance, and not about safety or features, they were sent only performance information via E-mail or regular mail. "The more we tailor the communication to the prospect based on their feedback, the more excited the customer gets at a faster pace," said Bill Hurley, manager of new media and relationship marketing.

"Before 1994, the company was communicating 'the best car,'" Jackson told Brandweek. "Since the plan was put in place, we have been trying to inspire the consumer to feel 'the best car for me.' There is a big difference . . . You have to have a certain connection. You can't sit up there on a pedestal as an icon."

OUTCOME

On Wednesday, January 7, 1998, one of the "Passion" spots, "Falling in Love Again," was named the year's best television commercial at the third annual International Automotive Advertising Awards. The spot also won an ADDY as the best single ad for automotive advertising at the 13th annual Best of New York American Advertising Awards.

In the February 9, 1999, issue of the New York Times, Stuart Elliott said Lowe's campaigns for Mercedes had been among the most honored in advertising, and sales increased substantially after the agency gained the account in November of 1993. The fall 1997 launch of the M-Class provoked a buying frenzy. Showrooms across the country reported huge crowds. Total company sales, which had increased more than 35 percent from 1996 to 1997, jumped another 39 percent in 1998.

"What was very effective was the dialogue of listening to the concerns of the people we invited to the relationship marketing, responding in a meaningful, knowledgeable way, and keeping that dialogue going through the whole process. The success of the relationship marketing program led to the situation where we have extraordinary demand for M-Class, which has been a sales success," said Jackson.

SMOOTH RIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The launch of the sport utility vehicle Mercedes M-Class ML320 represented how far Mercedes-Benz of North America had traveled in recent years from its staid, conservative base and the depth of the cultural change it was undergoing. The ML320 was a midsize luxury sport utility vehicle (SUV) targeted to compete on price, as well as on features and attributes. Its September 1997 launch was an important component of Mercedes' three-year effort to expand its U.S. market to a younger group of buyers. This multifaceted effort involved new product development and line expansion, comprehensive brand advertising, product-specific campaigns, and even the construction of Mercedes' first U.S.-based manufacturing facility. It ultimately meant, as articulated by Mercedes-Benz chairman Michael Bassermann in Automotive News, "turning from an engineer-driven to a market-driven company."

The M-Class introduction was part of an $80 million advertising initiative running from September through December for four new products, the most Mercedes had ever brought out at one time. The other three were the SLK roadster, the CLK coupe, and the E-Class E320 station wagon. Lowe & Partners/SMS of New York, Mercedes' agency of record, generated the three spots for the M-Class products.

The development of the ML320 was well orchestrated, as was the overall marketing and advertising strategy. The project took four years, cost $300 million, plus an additional $350 million for dealer upgrades, involved a million test miles, and spurred the building of a new plant in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. In fact, the product represented a number of "firsts" for Mercedes: its first U.S. manufacturing facility, its first noncar vehicle, and its first price-based targeting. The vehicle was listed at about $34,000, making it a midrange rather than a high-end SUV.

Industry response to the design and handling of the vehicle was generally positive. Sue Zesiger of Fortune summed up her response after test-driving a new ML320 for three days in the Rockies: "It is classy, classic, and . . . wholly understated. It will tirelessly protect you and tend to your needs. . . . It will chauffeur you with the elegance and smoothness to which you should be accustomed. It will schlep all your sports equipment and wine cases and kids, and still fit into a normal-sized parking place.''

Lowe had been involved in most of the marketing activities and campaigns that composed the major branding drive. For the M-Class product introduction, they produced three spots: ''Big Show,'' ''My Dad,'' and ''Smooth Ride.'' The spots incorporated humor, nostalgia with pointed cultural references, and conceptual sophistication—by that time, Mercedes had come to understand well the baby boomer target market. Mercedes' brand equity and several years of strong sales and marketing had created an ideal context in which to run these ads and undertake the launch.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From 1991 through 1996, sales growth for sports utility vehicles averaged 9.8 percent. The 1997 SUV sales through August were up 15 percent; however, the midsize models were not experiencing the stunning growth of the previous years. Ford and Chrysler both put incentives on their midsize entries, a notable shift from the year before, when the products had been selling at full price. Trucks accounted for 31.7 percent of the passenger-vehicle market in 1987; by 1997 their share had climbed to 44.5 percent. Promising as this trend seemed to SUV makers, some industry analysts predicted that it would top off at 46 percent. Nextrend, a market research group in California, reported that the proportion of buyers switching from cars to trucks dropped to 28.6 percent in 1997 from about 33 percent in 1994. Mercedes clearly was entering a maturing market. Yet with about one-quarter of Mercedes owners also owning an SUV, the company felt compelled to leverage its name and grab some of those high-profit sales—SUVs were often laden with options, making them a high-margin product and a profit center for auto makers. These factors, along with an estimated SUV market value of $42 billion, meant Mercedes could not afford to stay out of the market.

The SUV market was also getting crowded with new entrants, as Lincoln and other car manufacturers launched new sport utility vehicles. Mercedes thus needed an innovative platform for reaching the best potential customers. The company settled on selling vehicles by mail order, something it had never done before. The goal was to have the entire first year's allotment of 35,000 vehicles presold. Mike Jackson, executive vice president of marketing at Mercedes-Benz of North America, explained, ''We knew we were the more admired brand, but we needed to inspire more yearning. Besides, the world is not exactly waiting for a new sports utility vehicle from Mercedes-Benz.'' Mercedes would also use the direct mail campaign to get closer to potential buyers. The company, with direct marketing agency Rapp Collins Worldwide, obtained about 500,000 names from Mercedes' own and other, related lists. The mail campaign yielded much more than sales: it yielded valuable customer data and nurtured a relationship with customers and potential customers.

The people on the lists were asked if they would be willing to engage in a ''two-year dialogue-by-mail,'' as Forbes described it, leading up to the introduction of the M-Class. Interested potential buyers received two bulk mailings, each of which contained a detailed survey questionnaire asking about a range of preferences, including styling, conveniences, and safety features. The responses would prompt a letter from the company describing the vehicle features in which the person had expressed an interest. Respondents also had an impact on the vehicle design. This direct mail campaign exemplified the transformation underway at Mercedes toward becoming ''market-driven.''

THE MERCEDES ML320 IN A CROWDED MARKET

The ML320 ($33,950-$39,520 in 1998) competed on two fronts: the midsize, midprice SUVs, which it challenged on value, and luxury SUVs, which it challenged on price: Midsize, about $30,000 Ford Explorer Limited Jeep Grand Cherokee Toyota 4Runner Luxury Lexus LX450 ($48,700-$53,400 in 1997) Lincoln Navigator ($43,300 in 1998) Range Rover 4.6HSE ($63,625 in 1997).

TARGET MARKET

Sport utility vehicles have largely appealed to upper-income people who seldom use the vehicles' off-road capabilities but like their powerful presence on the road, their rugged styling, and their purported safety. Often, the owners have families with older children. Families with younger children tend to buy minivans, according to Takahashi of the Wall Street Journal. As the youngsters grow up, the family may switch to ''a more powerful, more stylish sport utility vehicle such as a Chevrolet Suburban or Jeep.'' After the kids leave home, the parents are ready for a luxury car. Takahashi quoted one 36-year-old owner of a Jeep Cherokee: ''Frankly, this is the age when you get a sport-utility vehicle.'' He added that he planned to buy a BMW when he hit his ''midlife crisis,'' which he projected would occur around age 45. These people were younger than Mercedes' traditional customers; they were even on the younger side for baby boomers. The ML320 is Mercedes' ''most significant attempt to attract a younger, less moneyed buyer,'' explained Zesiger of Fortune. By targeting the baby boomers, and even those slightly younger, with the relatively low price of the M-Class vehicle, Mercedes was laying the groundwork for securing the next generation of luxury car owners. If the Jeep Cherokee owner quoted above had instead owned an ML320, most likely he'd be planning to purchase a Benz rather than a BMW to soothe his anticipated midlife angst.

COMPETITION

Throughout the early 1990s, a few producers battled for the sport utility market. Ford Motor Company's Explorer held the lead; Chrysler Corp.'s Jeep Grand Cherokee, with the second-largest market share, and Cherokee, with the third, each took significant percentages. Numerous other entrants, such as the Chevrolet Suburban and Blazer, had smaller but loyal market slices. In the mid-1990s, consumer interest shifted virtually en masse from minivans to SUVs. As the sports utility market fragmented, great success for new entrants would be an ''uphill battle,'' according to Michael Davis of Gannett News Service. For example, Ford Motor Company's Lincoln-Mercury Division introduced the high-end Mercury Mountaineer in 1996. That same year, Japanese makers rushed to grab more of the hot market by putting their names on SUVs made by others: Honda Acura sold a version of the Isuzu Trooper as the Acura SLX, Toyota sold a version of the Toyota Land Cruiser as Lexus LX 450, and Nissan's Infiniti offered a version of the Nissan Pathfinder as Infiniti QX4.

By late 1997, the SUV segment was showing signs of vulnerability. Sales rose slightly from the same period in 1996, but sales for market leaders Jeep Cherokee and Grand Cherokee, Ford Explorer, and Chevy Blazer were down. The Explorer suffered the greatest loss, dropping over 4 percent from 1995 to 1996. Both Jeep and Ford put price incentives on their midsize entries, the Cherokee and Explorer, further evidence of the sales slowdown. Meanwhile, Toyota Motor Corp., which previously had never made enough of its sports utilities to meet demand, began advertising in the summer of 1997 new availability of its Land Cruisers, 4Runners, and RAV4s.

Into this fray jumped the M-Class. To the surprise of many, it targeted not so much the high-end SUVs, such as the Land Rover, but the Jeep Grand Cherokee and Ford Explorer. Mercedes was willing to sacrifice a little profit margin for volume and, more important, longer-term customer relationships. The ML320 was intended as the introductory Mercedes product for younger buyers who would eventually buy more expensive Mercedes cars. Zesiger described the move: ''The final flourish: the German haute manufacturer announced . . . that the ML320 would list for $33,950. In other words, Mercedes comfort, safety, and reliability at a middle-of-the-pack price? Move over, Jeep Grand

MERCEDES ML320 WILD DEBUT

In early 1997, Mercedes used the movie ''Lost World: Jurassic Park'' to launch the ML320. Prominent product placement in the film was leveraged with ads and retail promotions from Lowe & Partners. This promotion, along with the direct mail campaign, worked better than expected. One example was a party in September for the introduction of the M-Class. At a Silicon Valley dealership, 3,200 customers showed up. According to the Wall Street Journal, ''The gridlock outside got so bad that a nearby freeway exit had to be shut down.'' The dealership manager said that when the demonstrator models arrived ''it was like a World Wrestling Federation match. People were screaming, 'It's mine!' 'I've got it next!' '' Near-frenzy occurred at many showrooms. The M-Class had sold out in many areas, and some prospective buyers were forced to wait until spring for delivery.

Cherokee. Take that, Land Rover Discovery. Heck, the analysts are even mentioning the ML320 in the same breath as the best-selling 4x4, Ford Explorer.''

An advertising campaign by Ford to boost Explorer sales in late 1996 proved popular with consumers but only moderately successful in boosting sales. In the effort to woo affluent baby boomers, it relied on nostalgia, with a takeoff on the old television show Green Acres in one spot and the use of the cartoon Rocky and Bullwinkle in another. The spot was most effective among 30- to-49 year olds, roughly the same age group, the early forties, that Mercedes was targeting for the ML320.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The three-spot M-Class campaign created by Lowe & Partners/SMS that Mercedes launched in the fall of 1997 also made use of nostalgia to target the baby boomers with the ''Big Show'' spot featuring Ed Sullivan footage. Sullivan was part of the cultural underpinning of that generation, having introduced such groups as the Beatles and the Supremes to the baby boomers during their formative years. The ''Big Daddy'' spot spoke to the boomers' role as parents and their concern about safety, albeit in a spoofing manner.

The third spot, ''Smooth Ride,'' gently mocked the whole ''have your cake and eat it too'' mind-set of this market. While baby boomers liked to think of themselves as young and outdoorsy and vigorous, hence the image value of the SUV, they also preferred not to have their comfort disturbed. The ad spot shows the ML320 tearing across demanding terrain. Inside the car, a woman painted her nails in the front seat. In back, her daughter built a house of cards. Her son offered his grandmother a cup of fresh tea, saying ''Here's your scalding hot cup of tea.'' The family dog, a terrier, balanced a ball on its nose and several china cups on its paw. These feats were a humorous overstatement of the smooth ride. The message: don't worry, you are not overreaching; you can have it all—your swagger and your comfort.

In developing the spot, Lowe aimed to put the focus on the situation, not the characters. Thus, ''straight-looking'' people were used, which also enhanced the ''mirror value'' of the spot for the viewers. The humor, nostalgia, and whimsy in the ads were a continuation of Mercedes' ongoing strategy as enacted in its earlier 1997 brand campaign. Although presenting and marketing a specific product, these three ad spots also worked synergistically with the broader brand campaign to advance the overall brand-building initiative.

Mercedes bought ad time during the Emmy Awards for the spots and also ran the ads on its usual prime time schedule, which included Seinfeld and ER, as well as on cable, including A&E and ESPN. Print ads broke in the fall issues of Outside, The New Yorker, Forbes, and other publications.

OUTCOME

Buyers continued to pour into the showrooms after the three ad spots, ''Smooth Ride,'' ''Big Show,'' and ''Big Daddy,'' broke in the fall of 1997. Many factors may have contributed to this interest, however, including the direct mail campaign and the branding initiative. The buyers, however, were exactly the group that the ads had targeted. Along with the broader branding campaign initiated earlier in the year, these ads continued to affect the cultural shift at Mercedes from being ''engineer-driven'' to ''customer-driven.'' Part of that process was leaving behind the snob-appeal aspect of the brand while keeping—indeed strengthening—the sense of quality and substance. Certainly these ad spots treaded that fine line. No one could accuse these ads of portraying Mercedes' products as elitist or exclusive. The final answer to the question of whether the ad campaign succeeded would only come when enough time has passed to determine how many young, forty-something M-Class buyers traded up to Mercedes' luxury car models.

UNLIKE ANY OTHER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With the arrival of the brand-new SL500, Mercedes-Benz USA (MBUSA) wished to gain the number one spot in the U.S. luxury-automobile market. At the time it sat in third place, behind BMW and Lexus. MBUSA and Merkley Newman Harty & Partners (later renamed Merkley and Partners), an ad agency based in New York, believed that by simply revealing the SL500 as ''Mercedes at its finest,'' Mercedes's goal could be achieved. Thus, the 2002 ''Unlike Any Other'' campaign was launched. As it was promoting an $85,000 automobile, the campaign was not intended to appeal to the masses. Instead the goal was to remind Mercedes's customers of the SL500's automotive excellence, style, and tradition.

Debuting the week of March 11, 2002, on major network television, ''Unlike Any Other'' was seen on both local and national cable networks as well as during the Academy Awards ceremony and the NCAA basketball tournament. Print advertising, present in major newspapers and magazines, was also big-budget. Further support came through radio, outdoor, and interactive advertising, relationship marketing (in which emphasis was placed on building long-term relationships with customers), and collateral materials (such as sales brochures). The campaign's strategy involved enhancing an emotional connection consumers had with their Mercedes cars. Although MBUSA did not disclose the campaign's budget, it was known that the luxury-automobile company had spent $164 million on advertising in 2001.

The campaign's advertisements won few awards, perhaps because the focus was less on creativity than on confirming authenticity. And while the SL line of vehicles experienced a brief jump in sales in 2002, success was limited. Soon afterward sales of the SL began to weaken, and from 2003 to 2004 the number of SL-class vehicles sold in the United States declined 3.3 percent. Overall, MBUSA's sales did not fare much better, with a mere 1.3 percent increase in auto sales from 2003 to 2004. In the end MBUSA was not able to move into first place in U.S. luxury-car sales. Still, the advertisements benefited Mercedes-Benz, as they clearly demonstrated the undeniable beauty and excellence of the SL500.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since it was established in 1965 Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC, a subsidiary of DaimlerChrysler AG, had been considered the standard in automotive luxury and excellence. As a result marketing efforts for the automobile were most often targeted at a wealthy, elite group. Such was the case for the 2002 ''Unlike Any Other'' advertising campaign. Yet since its beginnings, Mercedes had grown to include more affordable automobiles in its lineup. In particular, the introduction of the C-Class in 1994 made Mercedes more accessible to some who sat outside of the elite class.

In 1995 Mercedes-Benz broke from a tradition of marketing to a mostly (older) male elite crowd with its use of the Janis Joplin song ''Lord, Won't You Buy Me a Mercedes-Benz'' in its advertising. The goal was to appeal to a generation raised on rock music in a more approachable, less sedate, manner. The new advertising strategy largely promoted the lower-priced C-Class, which then sold for as low as $30,000. It worked, and the cars sold. The marketing approach continued beyond the Joplin commercials, including those promoting the new E-Class, with a $40,000 price tag, in 1996. The promotions included extensive Mercedes catalogues spreads. With such titles as ''Inspiration,'' ''Imagine,'' and ''Dreams,'' the catalogues spread a message of approachability, value, and fun. This type of marketing approach, which focused on value, continued for Mercedes-Benz but was different from that of the 2002 ''Unlike Any Other'' campaign. The latter campaign focused less on value and more on the automobile's tradition of engineering excellence.

TARGET MARKET

Because the SL500 had a price tag of $85,000, Mercedes's target market for the car was not all that diverse. Actually, it was rather insular, especially with its focus on people's emotional connection with their Mercedeses. Such television spots as ''Reincarnation''—in which an aged Mercedes car was about to be crushed, and its ''life'' flashed before its eyes—established an emotional connection to the brand. This marketing was directed toward long-term Mercedes owners, who historically had been a loyal bunch, often sentimentally so.

RIGHT OVER THEIR HEADS

Michael McClure, the renowned Beat Generation poet, wrote "Mercedes Benz," which was released as a Janis Joplin song in 1971. With the lyrics "Oh lord, won't you buy me a Mercedes Benz? My friends all drive Porsches, I must make amends," the song was intended as a satire of materialism.

Mercedes-Benz would not always target such a small market, as was later seen in the 2004 "Portraits" campaign. That campaign, which used approximately 25 percent of MBUSA's $140 million advertising budget, announced the arrival of products for just about everyone, not simply the wealthy, with products' prices ranging from $25,000 to $450,000. But this was not the case with the "Unlike Any Other" campaign, because the SL-Class models obviously could not be attained by everyone. With this campaign Mercedes simply wished to remind those already familiar with Mercedes, and in particular the SL Class, that, because of the car's construction, power, beauty (everything that made a Mercedes a Mercedes), it was well worth the price.

COMPETITION

While Mercedes was debuting "Unlike Any Other," Audi AG, a top competitor with DaimlerChrysler (the parent company of Mercedes), launched one of the biggest ad campaigns in its history. As with "Unlike Any Other," Audi's "A8" campaign banked on people's emotional attachment to their cars. In the campaign's prelaunch phase the Audi brand, and in particular its sporty and progressive image, was portrayed emotionally through its history. Using approximately 600 people—including Audi employees, advertising specialists, producers, photographers, a symphony orchestra, composers, directors, and actors—Audi packed its entire history into a series of television commercials, while at the same time introducing a new product. At the campaign's start Audi AG's sales were about $23 billion. In the year following the campaign's debut, sales jumped to over $29 billion. By 2004 the number had exceeded $33 billion. But at the same time Audi of America, a more direct competitor with Mercedes-Benz USA, was experiencing serious declines in sales. In 2004 it sold under 78,000 cars, reflecting a 9.8 percent decrease from 2003.

A relative newcomer in the industry, Lexus (owned by Toyota) was launched in 1989 and quickly became the best-selling line of U.S. luxury cars. In 2003, however, BMW took the lead, and Lexus fell to second. But at the same time, the consulting firm Automotive Consultants Incorporated published results from a year-long study, claiming: "The Lexus LS 430 is the finest luxury sedan in America." Lexus used this data in a 2002 advertising campaign, challenging customers to think of Lexus in the same (or even higher) category as other leading luxury-car manufacturers, such as Mercedes and BMW. But any success this brought, including record sales in 2002, was not long lasting. From 2004 to 2005 Lexus sales in the U.S. dropped by 4.4 percent.

Also during the debut of "Unlike Any Other," another Mercedes competitor, BMW, was making advertising history with its release of "The Hire" short-film series. Created by top Hollywood directors such as John Woo and Guy Ritchie, the eight Internet-broadcast films starred BMW cars and actor Clive Owen, who played the driver. BMW's original goal was to have two million consumers view the eight-minute online commercials. Within a year this was very much surpassed, with more than 45 million viewers. Following the debut of the advertising films, BMW's worldwide sales grew more than steadily, from $44 billion in 2002, to $52 billion in 2003, up to $60 billion in 2004. U.S. sales also increased each year from 2002 to 2005. In 2003 BMW became the best-selling luxury car in the U.S.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In conjunction with the arrival of the newest model of Mercedes-Benz automobiles, the SL500, Mercedes-Benz USA (MBUSA) launched a major marketing campaign under the tagline "Unlike any other." The campaign launch featured four national and seven regional television spots as well as an extensive print-media campaign. Led by ad agency Merkley Newman Harty & Partners, New York, it represented the largest U.S. marketing campaign for Mercedes since the 1990s.

The SL500 represented Mercedes at its best, often inducing an emotional response from customers. According to one Road and Travel Magazine writer: "Just when you thought it couldn't get any sexier . . . Mercedes-Benz rolls out the unforgettable new 2003 SL500. . . . And once you take a look, you'll take a second one. Soon thereafter is when your jaw hits the ground, rendering you a blubbering mess of drool. Trust us. We've spent time in this car. It has that effect on people. It's simply arresting.?"

This was what MBUSA and Merkley were banking on when it launched the "Unlike Any Other" campaign. The tagline, which adorned all ads in the new campaign, was supposed to be met with nods of agreement among consumers, who would know exactly what Mercedes was talking about. Further, the campaign was intended to regain Mercedes-Benz's leadership position in the U.S. luxury-automobile industry. In 2001 Mercedes had slipped to third, behind BMW and Toyota's Lexus.

Meanwhile, the first television spot, "Timeless Ride," which aired nationally, represented an attempt to draw on people's long-standing affection for the SL model. The ad featured a woman driving different generations of the SL, in conjunction with the time period each existed. Beginning in the 1960s and ending post-2000, such images as oversized Jackie Onassis-style sunglasses, a disco ball, punk hairstyles, and so forth, coincided with those of the car's various models. With a similar theme of sentimentality, three other nationally run spots debuted: "Reincarnation," during which an old Mercedes-Benz"s" life "flashed before its eyes;" Sanctuary, "a flashback to 1950s black-and-white dramas; and" Crash Test, "which focused on Mercedes's legendary strength. Each of the four national spots ended with various twists on the tagline:" Timeless. Unlike any other,"" Soul. Unlike any other,"" Security. "Unlike any other," and last, "Built. Unlike any other."

The regional ads went a step further than the national ads. Even as they kept the strong commitment to the Mercedes brand and the "Unlike any other" tagline, the seven regional executions moved the focus into three specific areas: value, safety, and customer service. And this was done with a backdrop of humor. In "Woman," for instance, a man riding a bus used the panorama roof of the C-Class Coupe to his advantage, when he passed on his phone number to the attractive woman driver. It wound up in the glove compartment, along with many others. The spot ended with the tagline "Value. Unlike any other." In "Baby" parents out shopping for baby-proofing items realized that had they left the baby in the car. A voice-over stated, "If everything was as safe as an M-Class, you'd have a lot less to worry about," and the commercial ended with "Security. Unlike any other."

The 2002 television spots were debuted the week of March 11 on major network TV, appearing during such popular shows as The West Wing, ER, and The Tonight Show, as well on as such national cable networks as ESPN, A&E, CNN, and MSNBC. More significantly, the ads were run during that year's Academy Awards and NCAA Conference Finals, Championship, and Final Four basketball tournaments. Beyond TV, the print advertising was displayed in major papers and magazines, including the Wall Street Journal, Vogue, Fortune, and the New Yorker. The campaign's other efforts, including radio spots, outdoor and interactive ads, relationship marketing, and collateral materials, further spread Mercedes's message.

OUTCOME

While the "Unlike Any Other" campaign did not cause a sensation in the advertising world, it did win a few awards. The television commercial "Reincarnation," during which a classic Mercedes was about to be crushed, for instance, garnered an AdForum Creative Hits award (determined by users of the AdForum website) in 2002 and was shortlisted at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France in 2003. The campaign was more successful in terms of financial payoff for the company, but the SL class that was specifically promoted in "Unlike Any Other" experienced only brief and limited success.

The months following the launch of "Unlike Any Other" reflected an increase in MBUSA's sales, which peaked in July 2002, when 14,937 new vehicles were sold (causing a seven-month year-to-date sales record for MBUSA, of nearly 118,000 cars sold). Further, the SL class posted a 78.5 percent increase for the month and more than double its year-to-date volume of the same period during 2001. But by the following year the numbers were dwindling. From 2003 to 2004 the number of SL-class automobiles sold in the United States declined 3.3 percent, even as MBUSA's total sales improved 1.3 percent during the same time period. And this increase would not be enough for MBUSA to meet its goal. In the end Mercedes was not able to come close to becoming the leader in U.S. luxury-car sales.

METLIFE HELPS YOU MAKE SENSE OF IT ALL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Between 1985 and 1995 consumers came to associate Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. (later renamed MetLife, Inc.) with its animated mascots, Charles Schulz's "Peanuts" characters and especially Charlie Brown's resourceful beagle, Snoopy. MetLife, as the company was commonly called, wanted to retain this strong brand identity while adapting to societal transformation and spreading awareness of the company's changing nature (namely the fact that it offered a full range of financial services in addition to its life-insurance products). These efforts were complicated, moreover, by a wave of insurance-industry scandals headlined by an alleged MetLife scheme to swindle consumers. The company met these substantial challenges with large-scale internal restructuring efforts, and it communicated the notion of a new and updated MetLife through an advertising campaign themed "MetLife Helps You Make Sense of It All."

Crafted by the New York agency Young & Rubicam and released in September 1995, the campaign marked a strategic shift in MetLife's branding even as it continued to employ the familiar cartoon beagle with which the company was so closely identified. Whereas previous MetLife campaigns had featured Snoopy and the other Peanuts characters in fully animated commercials, the new campaign wedded the animated Snoopy to live-action scenarios featuring real people and backdrops. This conceptual shift was meant to suggest that MetLife was evolving with the times, a notion that was underlined by the content of the spots, each of which used Snoopy as a symbol for MetLife itself. One spot, for instance, illustrated MetLife's ability to rescue consumers from figurative financial jungles by showing Snoopy taming an actual tiger; another showed Snoopy dancing with a bride whose wedding had been financed with the proceeds of her parents' MetLife mutual fund. MetLife's typical annual media budget during the late 1990s was between $20 and $30 million.

After posting record profits in 1997, MetLife seemed to have emerged from its mid-1990s difficulties. Young & Rubicam's research indicated that consumer awareness of the brand increased during the campaign. Although MetLife continued to rely on the Peanuts characters to differentiate its brand from competitors, Snoopy ceased playing a starring role in the company's advertising when a new campaign was unveiled in 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In August 1993 an investigation by the Florida Department of Insurance revealed that MetLife agents had sold life-insurance policies disguised as the Nurses Guaranteed Retirement Program, a tax-deferred retirement plan. One victim of this scheme, Sherry Horton, reluctantly bought a policy from MetLife agent Mark Moser, mainly on the strength of MetLife's good name: "After all, who hasn't heard of Metropolitan Life and Snoopy?" Horton told Money magazine's Walter L. Updegrave. More than a thousand policyholders filed claims against MetLife as a result of this investigation; at the same time, Moser filed a lawsuit against MetLife claiming that MetLife had scripted the scheme. MetLife settled these suits out of court for between $40 million and $50 million. This settlement was only the beginning of a wave of revelations of market misconduct that plagued the entire insurance industry. In light of the estimated $100 million that MetLife paid in settlements and fines, the tagline "Get Met. It pays" took on new and unwelcome meaning for the company.

In 1994 the MetLife Express program was implemented, reengineering the company by strengthening its internal structure and technological capabilities in the face of stiffer competition and industry consolidations. As part of this initiative MetLife spent several million dollars to revamp the mechanisms it used for ensuring compliance with federal and state regulations; the company established an ethics and compliance committee and expanded the role of the single compliance ombudsman to an entire compliance department that answered directly to the company's president. Creative directors at Young & Rubicam developed the new platform, "MetLife Helps You Make Sense of It All," to highlight how these changes were initiated with the consumer in mind. A stronger compliance network functioned not only to explain confusing policies to clients but also to ensure against further misconduct on the agents' or the company's part.

TARGET MARKET

The market goals of the new campaign were to attract new customers and to retain current policyholders who might be tempted to seek the financial services of other companies. Both markets required the same tactic: to restore faith in MetLife's reputation through improved customer service and reinvigorated compliance with insurance regulations. Loyal MetLife customers needed to see a new face suggestive of a change in the body of the company. Because the scandal rocked the entire insurance industry, consumers could not migrate from corruption to purity. Although none of the major insurance companies had consciously conspired to deceive policyholders, all of them shared some degree of guilt, so they all had to rebuild consumer confidence. Ironically, the lawsuits ended up adversely affecting all policyholders more than the companies themselves, as the financial performance of insurance policies suffered from the scandal. MetLife's new campaign attempted to convey the message that the company was committed to shielding its policyholders from the kind of confusion that had led to the scandal in the first place.

A MAP OF THE INTERNET—YOU CAN'T GET HERE FROM THERE

United Media, which owned the copyright for the Peanuts characters, licensed the use of Snoopy and the gang to MetLife—but only for the countries where MetLife sold financial services. This became a stumbling block when MetLife and its Internet ad agency, Agency.com, wanted to feature Snoopy and other Peanuts characters on the MetLife Online website. Because computer users in countries such as Japan and Australia (where MetLife did not do business and thus did not have licensing) could access the World Wide Web, Agency.com had to devise a way to block them from viewing copyrighted characters. United Media allowed MetLife and Agency.com to try this blockout system with a 5 percent margin of error. But according to Agency.com's Chan Suh, "We tried to find a map of the Internet and, of course, we discovered there is no such thing." The companies spent two months mapping out a system to locate computers trying to connect to their site in order to block out those from restricted areas with a 99 percent degree of accuracy. Frances Katz reported in Direct magazine the relative success of this system: "Of the 18,000 hits [to the MetLife Online website] recorded on March 5, [1996,] only 60 were rejected and only two of those were from users who should have been granted access (including this reporter)."

COMPETITION

The three major players in the insurance industry—MetLife, Prudential, and New York Life—outperformed the rest of the industry in the late 1980s and early 1990s, a time when new sales throughout the industry were flat. MetLife generated growth at an astounding rate, with a peak sales increase in 1989 of 60.92 percent. Prudential crested that same year with a 41.84 percent gain, while New York Life peaked two years earlier, in 1987, with a 59.9 percent increase in sales. Combined, the three companies gained market share steadily in this time period, climbing from 7.32 percent in 1985 to peak at 16.46 percent in 1992. With the revelations of market misconduct in 1993, the three descended collectively in market share and individually in sales. By 1995 their combined market share had fallen to 11.12 percent. MetLife suffered the most individually, with sales plummeting 38.33 percent in 1994 as compared with 1993. Prudential's sales decreased 11.56 percent in 1994 and then another 22.58 percent in 1995. New York Life's sales fell 31.49 percent in 1994 but rebounded in 1995 with an increase of 36.82 percent. While the mid-1990s reversed many of the trends of the late 1980s and early 1990s, MetLife, Prudential, and New York Life competed on a level playing field—all three experienced unprecedented gains simultaneously, and all three fell from grace as dramatically.

DOING THINGS THAT SEEM IMPOSSIBLE

A visual-effects supervisor from Sight Effects of Venice, California, was on the sets for the shooting of the live-action sequences of the "MetLife Helps Make Sense of It All" commercials to help the director leave room in the frame for post-production animation. This advisor could help the director film in a way that anticipated the bluescreening and compositing that would happen later. This technique represented a whole new approach to commercial production: "Nowadays, agency creatives are designing their ads without having to think about the limitations of technology, and that's how it should be," said Sight Effects founder Alan Barnett. "Ultimately, you have to find ways of doing things that seem to be impossible."

By 1995 insurance companies had reconciled themselves to the shock of a greatly changed marketplace and were prepared to rebound by redefining their positions in that new atmosphere. In some ways the scandal helped the insurance industry by forcing them out of a comfort zone that had allowed them to fall behind the times in terms of consumers' needs and expectations.

Many of the new ad campaigns that broke in the wake of the scandal were more attuned to the contemporary advertising atmosphere that acknowledged more concrete realities. The tagline for the new ad campaign of Boston-based John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. exemplified this attitude perfectly: "Real Life, Real Answers." Prudential took a riskier approach, but one that even more accurately reflected consumers' attitudes: the "Be Your Own Rock" campaign acknowledged the shift from corporate dependence to self-reliance on the consumer's part while still asserting a role for the insurance company in helping consumers to discover their own best financial solutions. These two campaigns as well as MetLife's shifted emphasis from the institution to the individual in an attempt to redefine insurers' roles and recapture the imaginations of consumers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Over the previous 10 years MetLife had created tremendous brand identity and equity through its relationship with the Peanuts characters. During that time period, especially just prior to the new campaign, American culture at large and MetLife specifically underwent major changes, so the company wanted to redefine its relationship with the Peanuts characters to reflect those changes. Artist Bill Melendez brought Charles Schultz's characters to life through animation, but their cartoon quality put them at a remove from reality. MetLife sought to introduce the characters into reality. "We decided to refresh our advertising campaign to reflect the changing world in which we live," explained MetLife chairman and CEO Harry P. Kamen. "People are overwhelmed by the growing number of financial decisions they must face every day. Placing Snoopy in a real world setting personifies our commitment to provide solutions to help consumers adapt to this changing world."

Combining animation with live action was not new technologically (after all, Dick Van Dyke had danced with animated penguins in Walt Disney's 1964 movie Mary Poppins), but it was new strategically to MetLife. The combination of live-action with animation derived its marketing strength from its power to suggest metaphorical connections: Snoopy, personifying MetLife, helped real people overcome huge obstacles, such as jungles and cliffs, which symbolized the real financial dilemmas that policyholders found themselves confronting. Young & Rubicam's chairman and CEO, Peter Georgescu, maintained that the new approach of this campaign held more relevance for consumers; MetLife president and chief operating officer Ted Athanassiades echoed this sentiment, adding that MetLife was "re-energized and refocused to be an institution which manages relationships with consumers."

The first two commercials, scripted by Young & Rubicam and directed by Eric Saarinen from Plum Productions of Santa Monica, California, debuted in September 1995 during prime-time shows such as the CBS Tuesday Night Movie, ABC's Dateline, and NBC's Wings. In the first spot, "Tiger," Snoopy rescued a man from a financial jungle by taming a real-life tiger; at the end of the commercial a voice-over announced, "What you need is MetLife . . . to help you make sense of it all." In "Rock Climber" Snoopy scaled a cliff to save a climber who realized in her predicament that she needed help to overcome her financial challenges; concluding this commercial, the voice-over announced that MetLife "helps you to get a grip on things and helps you make sense of it all." Both 30-second commercials, which together cost $1.5 million to produce, fused live action with animation, metaphorically suggesting that MetLife (represented by Snoopy) confronted real-life situations with real-life solutions.

After these two introductory spots Young & Rubicam followed up periodically with commercials based on similar themes and also featuring live action with animation. In mid-1996 Snoopy's ears transformed into helicopter blades as he swooped down to save canoeists from tumbling over a waterfall in "River." In "Wedding," which debuted in early 1997, Snoopy danced with a real bride at her wedding, which had been financed by her parents' mutual-funds investments with MetLife. In "Floating Man," also run in early 1997, Snoopy the lifeguard saved a retired man whose raft had deflated, suggesting that MetLife could help retirees guard against the air being let out of their retirement benefits. In early 1998 "Jargon" found Snoopy sitting in front of a television, mesmerized by a show on retirement planning and befuddled by the terminology it used; in contrast, the commercial assured viewers that MetLife explained finances in understandable language. These TV spots, along with the MetLife Online website, advertised the diversity of MetLife financial services and made the company seem accessible and helpful.

OUTCOME

By 1997 MetLife had reversed its downward sales trend of the mid-1990s. In March 1998 MetLife announced record earnings for the 1997 fiscal year. Consolidated pre-tax earnings from operations totaled $1.7 billion, representing a 21 percent increase over 1996. Consolidated net income (after paying taxes and $1.7 billion in dividends to policyholders) amounted to $1.2 billion, up 41 percent from 1996. Both of these results broke company records. Additionally, MetLife increased the amount of assets it managed along with its affiliates, from $298 billion in 1996 to over $330 billion in 1997. Young & Rubicam's proprietary research showed that consumer awareness of MetLife advertising increased with the new campaign. All of these numbers painted a picture of a healthy financial-services company that had regained consumer confidence.

MetLife continued to evolve in the late 1990s, increasingly seeking to emphasize the full range of its financial services as it announced plans to make an initial public offering, a move that would change its status from that of a mutual insurance company to that of a stock company. MetLife's use of the Peanuts characters in its marketing evolved in concert with these institutional changes but also because the company had to guard against the risks inherent in its close association with a cartoon franchise that, no matter how effective it had been in establishing a unique brand identity, was beginning to show its age at the close of the twentieth century. Snoopy ceased playing a starring role in MetLife's advertising in 1999, appearing instead as a brand icon at the end of TV spots and in other company communications. MetLife went public in April 2000. Its subsequent marketing efforts were characterized by the ongoing attempt to craft an updated identity without sacrificing the brand equity it had accumulated through its long association with the Peanuts characters.

IT'S GOOD TO PLAY TOGETHER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Xbox, a video-game unit of the Microsoft Corp., was introduced in 2001, and within two years it had established its brand as a high-end video-game manufacturer. After passing Nintendo Company, Ltd., in 2003 to become the second-largest video-game manufacturer in the world, Xbox set its sights on outstripping PlayStation 2, the number one video-game manufacturer. Sony Corp. was the developer of PlayStation 2, which consisted of both the game-processing hardware referred to as the "console" and video-game software. In order to overtake PlayStation 2's 54 percent share of a $10.4 billion industry, Xbox released a campaign titled "It's Good to Play Together" that touted the "sociability" benefits of its new online gaming service, Xbox Live.

The estimated $100 million campaign, developed by advertising agency McCann-Erickson, involved print, television, radio, and Internet elements. Print ads first appeared on August 4, 2003, and television spots began airing on August 25. Initially the campaign advertised Xbox's "NFL Fever 2004," a football video game that allowed gamers to play anyone in the world by connecting their television to the Xbox console, which was connected to Xbox Live's Internet service. The first print ads appeared in gaming and lifestyle publications and featured the tagline "Nothing unites a group of strangers like pure contempt for the guy in first place." The campaign continued with a series of commercials featuring rapper Sean "Puffy" Combs, promotional events on Viacom Inc.'s Music Television, and high-stakes competitions that took place on Xbox Live.

Not only did the campaign win a Gold EFFIE Award in the Entertainment category, but it helped Xbox to increase its market share 10 percent by 2005. The campaign continued to emphasize that with Xbox Live gamers could challenge remote friends and family who subscribed to the service. "Xbox games have always had the ability to draw people in due to their looks, but increasingly it's the social elements our gamers crave, and we're giving in to them," Peter Moore, the corporate vice president for retail sales and marketing at Xbox, stated in Media and Marketing Europe.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Xbox entered the video-game market in November 2001, gamers held misconceptions, based on the Microsoft association, about the performance of its processing hardware, commonly referred to as the console. "They (jokingly) wanted to know how long Xbox took to boot and where the control-alt-delete keys were," Robbie Bach, a chief officer for Xbox, told the Financial Times. Xbox hired McCann-Erickson to develop a campaign that positioned Xbox as a serious, powerful gaming brand. In 2002, with a marketing launch budget of $500 million—more than the remaining industry's combined budget—Xbox released its "Life Is Short, Play More" campaign, which increased the brand's market share from 0 percent to 27 percent by 2003. One television spot, which was eventually banned in the United Kingdom, began with a woman giving birth. Like a cannonball, her baby soared from the birth canal and burst through the hospital's window. Flying through the air, the newborn began aging rapidly while circling the globe at what appeared to be supersonic speeds. At the commercial's end the newborn had aged into an old man and crashed into a grave. The spot ended with the tagline "Life is short, play more."

By 2003 Xbox had shifted its efforts from increasing brand credibility to heralding the online feature, Xbox Live, as the next generation of video game. Xbox gamers could now play with or against anyone who also subscribed to the service. "Before, our theme was more focused on power and the unique capabilities of the Xbox technology," Don Hall, director of Xbox brand strategy and Xbox.com, told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. "As we go to reach a broader audience, we're shifting our focus more to the consumer benefits, the experiences of playing Xbox with your friends and family." Xbox created games that were not only for multiple players but also compatible with Xbox Live. "We're actually consciously evolving our brand on the idea of gaming as a social experience—people playing together whether it's through Live, or sitting next to each other on the couch. And it also turns out to be a much broader concept," Bach explained to the Financial Times.

TARGET MARKET

"It's Good to Play Together" targeted males between the ages of 14 and 34 who enjoyed social gaming. Not only did print ads and television spots exhibit Xbox's state-of-the-art graphics, but to also attract the social gamer, they explained features such as music sharing, photo storage, buddy lists, and live chats. Print ads ran in magazines with strong male readerships, such as FHM, Playboy, and Maxim. The campaign also advertised Xbox's family-oriented products, such as Music Mixer, software that turned the Xbox console and the gamer's television into a karaoke machine. One microphone was included in every Music Mixer package.

After realizing that a high percentage of consumers who subscribed to movie channels were also likely to purchase video games, Xbox and the movie-oriented Showtime Networks partnered for a 2005 marketing tie-in. Every new Showtime subscriber received free Xbox games and an Xbox Live starter kit. By 2005 more than half of U.S. households reportedly had some type of video-game console. Analysts noted that many of the consumers who had already bought PlayStation 2 were also purchasing Xbox.

COMPETITION

In 2003 Sony's PlayStation 2 dominated more than 50 percent of the video-game market. With a yearly advertising budget of $250 million, Sony released television spots for PlayStation and promotional events with the tagline "Fun, anyone?" Original television commercials featured sample footage from PlayStation 2 games that were edited to resemble movie trailers. Eventually Sony's ad agency switched to using animated commercials to differentiate the brand from Xbox, which had begun airing similar commercials. PlayStation 2 also sponsored weekend activities, titled "PlayStation Freedom," which included musical performances from bands such as Kasabian, Jamiroquai, and Babyshambles. In London Sony allowed 40,000 gamers to sample upcoming PlayStation 2 games at a four-day event called "PlayStation Experience." After the Xbox Live service grew increasingly popular, PlayStation 2 released its own online service and began focusing on gaming sociability.

XBOX LIVE

First released in November 2002, Xbox Live was a service created for the video-game console Xbox and allowed gamers to challenge each other from remote locations over the Internet. When Xbox released "Tom Clancy's Rainbow Six 3," new records were set for Xbox Live. In a single 24-hour period gamers spent more than 250,000 hours playing the game. That was equivalent to one person playing the game incessantly for 30 years.

While PlayStation 2 and Xbox targeted the 14- to 34-year-old market, the world's third-largest console manufacturer, Nintendo, released games for younger gamers. Many games created for Nintendo's console, GameCube, were priced lower than PlayStation 2 or Xbox games and delivered content more suitable for the 8- to 12-year-old demographic. Industry insider Alex Seropian told Xbox Nation, "Nintendo has such a different character than Microsoft or Sony. They seem to be much more of a gaming company—or even a toy company—than an electronics manufacturer or a giant software house."

MARKETING STRATEGY

With print debuting on August 4, 2003, and television spots appearing on August 26, "It's Good to Play Together" first advertised Xbox's "NFL Fever 2004" football game. Print ads featured the tagline "Nothing unites a group of strangers like pure contempt for the guy in first place." Multiple gamers in remote lactations could play the same football game. Later that year television, print, and radio advertisements announced the Xbox warfare game "Tom Clancy's Rainbow Six 3." One 30-second commercial began with a man sitting in a darkened living room. Next, video-game scenes played while someone said, "I thought we were ready. The chopper came in hard and safe. The target was in our sights." When a woman turned on a light, the man from the spot's beginning was revealed to be playing Xbox Live and crying before his television. A final voice-over stated, "Rainbow Six 3: their lives in your hands. It's good to play together." The TV commercial was written and art-directed by Gary Marjoram and Rob Brown. It was directed by Christophe Williams of the production company Igloo Films. Print ads appeared in gaming magazines and in men's lifestyle magazines such as FHM and Maxim.

The rapper and music producer Sean "Puffy" Combs, also known as "P. Diddy," was paid more than $50 million to endorse Xbox games such as "NFL Fever 2004" and "Grabbed by the Ghoulies." Spots featured footage from the games, separated by scenes of gamers playing. All spots included voice-overs from Combs, such as "It's good to make the entire league beg for mercy together." Some industry experts considered it a bold move to use a music celebrity to endorse sports games. Referring to Xbox's contract with Combs, Eli Friedman, the group marketing and communications manager at Xbox, told Advertising Age, "We look at his voice as the right voice for Xbox." All spots ended with the campaign's tagline, "It's good to play together."

Xbox orchestrated other nationwide promotional events. More than 50 "A" icons were hidden inside the game "Advent Rising." Gamers who found the hidden icons were eligible for hundreds of prizes, including one grand prize of $1 million. In 2005 Electronics Boutique Holdings Corp., a video-game retailer, allowed more than 25 of its kiosks in retail locations to feature games with Xbox Live. New subscribers to the movie channel Showtime were also given free Xbox games and Xbox Live starter kits. Other promotional events were spearheaded by MTV, which released a half-hour program titled "MTV Presents: The Next Generation Xbox Revealed." During the program the actor Elijah Wood from the Lord of the Rings trilogy explored new Xbox games on-camera while rock band the Killers performed. In its monthly technology feature Playboy magazine displayed the Xbox RX2 Media Chair, designed with built-in surround-sound speakers.

OUTCOME

Despite some analysts criticizing McCann-Erickson for a lackluster campaign with an uninspired title, the campaign earned a Gold EFFIE Award in the Entertainment category in 2005. More importantly, however, the campaign helped Xbox's market share continually grow between September 2003 and January 2005. By 2005 Xbox had increased its market share by 11 points, more than any other console manufacturer. Cameron Ferroni, general manager of Xbox Live, explained in a 2004 issue of Xbox Nation, "With 20-plus million consoles sold and more than 1.5 million Xbox Live members targeted by the end of this fiscal year, Xbox is clearly resonating on a cultural level."

Besides the brand's success with console sales, three of its video games, "Halo 2," "Need for Speed: Underground 2," and "Star Wars: Knights of the Old Republic 2," were among the 10 best-selling video games of 2004. Microsoft was confident that the campaign had positioned Xbox at the forefront of online gaming, which analysts believed was the future of video gaming.

WHERE DO YOU WANT TO GO TODAY? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Microsoft Corporation, the world's largest software company, signaled a new direction for its massive branding campaign "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" in the fall of 1998, when it launched the first of three series of ads designed to burnish the company's image. Although Microsoft had used been using "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" since 1994, the company wanted to ensure that it was perceived as approachable and inspirational. Some of Microsoft's previous advertising efforts had been criticized for being cold. More significantly, an ongoing antitrust investigation by the United States Justice Department had the potential to brand Microsoft as a high-tech thug—a bloodthirsty corporation using its tremendous size to squeeze its competitors out of existence. With these new ad packages, which all explored Microsoft's role in building and strengthening various types of communities, the company sought to demonstrate its kinder and gentler side. "We want to make sure that we're communicating our values, and the benefits of our products to consumers," a Microsoft spokesperson told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

The three sets of ads all depicted how Microsoft technology enhanced the lives, work, dreams, and futures of everyday Americans. The first series of six television spots debuted on September 6, 1998, and focused on Microsoft employees talking candidly about their work at the company. These ads portrayed the gigantic corporation as a community committed to making software for both the present and the future. The initial commercial, called "Inside Microsoft Anthem," was a montage of diverse Microsoft employees, while the five subsequent ads featured one employee in each spot. The commercials connected to Microsoft's "Where Do Want to Go Today?" slogan by having each of the spotlighted Microsoft workers answer that question. "Why is our company's tag line a question?" queried the voice-over. "Well you can't make a software better till you know what people want to do with it."

In December 1998 Microsoft next rolled out a sequence of five ads set in remote Lusk, Wyoming, where—as one spot noted—"cows outnumber people 100 to 1." This speck of a town had thoroughly wired itself for future high-speed Internet connections in a fashion disproportionate to its diminutive size. Microsoft's ads included such vignettes as that of 13-year-old Dan Hanson using the Internet to research a school paper on dung beetles, and Margy Brown relying on Microsoft software to manage her beeswax hand-cream business efficiently. Again, Microsoft presented itself not as the predatory purveyor of bug-laden software but as a force for fostering communities—for helping outposts like dusty Lusk survive and indeed thrive.

A third group of community-oriented ads, which used the Maxwell Middle School in Tucson, Arizona, as a backdrop, was inaugurated in March 1999. Two commercials related how devoted teachers at the school used Microsoft products to draw their students more fully into the lessons, while a third portrayed a Mexican American boy who learned about Mexican history on the Internet. "Technology is giving Jose a way to study his heroes, and maybe someday he can be one himself," intoned the voice-over provided by actor Jeff Daniels. "We are creating tools that help people do amazing things," Eric Koivisto, Microsoft's director of advertising, told the March 8, 1999, Advertising Age, as he explained the impetus behind these new "Community" facets of the broader "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" branding campaign.

Microsoft ran these "Community" ads in heavy rotation on network and cable television. Each contained the "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" tag line. Like most of its branding efforts at the time, these spots were conceived by Wieden+Kennedy, the Portland-based firm that had inaugurated Microsoft's questioning slogan. Although Microsoft professed complete satisfaction with this latest branding installment, in 1999 the company severed its ties with Wieden+Kennedy and instead hired McCann-Erickson (which owned Anderson & Lembke, which, in conjunction with Wieden+Kennedy, had created past ads for Microsoft). The company expressed its desire to better integrate its product and branding campaigns.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1975, Microsoft came to control the global software market. In 1998 the company's annual sales had reached $14.5 billion, and 9 out of 10 personal computers ran on its Windows operating system. (Operating systems are the software that controls all the computer's functions.) Microsoft's founder, Bill Gates, had achieved iconic status, both as one of the world's richest men and as a maverick techie who had eschewed conventional business models and flourished. Beginning in 1994, Microsoft used "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" as a way to "make consumers comfortable with the personal computer and its plethora of applications," according to the Wall Street Journal on November 11, 1994. The first commercial of the campaign, which stylishly melded an array of scenes, proposed that Microsoft's products "make you powerful," as the voice-over put it. The Wall Street Journal noted in its June 27, 1994, edition, "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" was designed to "reinforce the Microsoft brand," while specific product ads (which appeared on television, in mainstream and computer trade magazines, in newspapers, and on the Internet) touted individual technologies. For example, Microsoft's much anticipated release of a new version of Windows—Windows 95—was supported by a high-profile Wieden+Kennedy campaign that used the Rolling Stones's song "Start Me Up." After an initial blizzard of advertising, the branding campaign began to impress itself into consumers' minds. Microsoft then decided to scale back the intensity of the effort and devoted more of its 1997 marketing budget to its Internet and print ads than to its flashier television spots.

The Justice Department's ongoing investigation of Microsoft's business practices, and particularly its decision to file suit against the software titan in 1998, made it imperative for Microsoft to refocus attention on managing its brand image. The antitrust trial, which began in November 1998, had the potential to damage Microsoft's reputation and therefore hurt its sales. The suit centered around Microsoft's policy of "bundling" its Internet browser, called Internet Explorer, into its Windows 95 operating system. The government alleged that Microsoft improperly required computer makers to ship Internet Explorer on personal computers loaded with Windows 95. Compaq Computer testified that Microsoft had threatened to cancel its Windows 95 license if Compaq sold computers with the operating system, but not the Internet browser. Since Microsoft had a virtual stranglehold on the operating systems market, critics claimed that the company's policies regarding Internet Explorer were intended to eradicate rival Internet browsers and effectively give Microsoft a monopoly in that sector. "This isn't about the browser. It's about trying to monopolize electronic commerce," said Ken Wasch, president of the Software Publisher Association. Although the filing of the suit had no discernable impact on consumers' attitudes toward the company—surveys taken at the time the company launched its "Community" ads indicated that consumers perceived neither Microsoft nor Bill Gates differently than before the lawsuit—Microsoft wanted to ensure that "regardless of what happen[ed] in the courts of law, the company

NOT SO WIRED

Perhaps the ultimate irony of the Lusk, Wyoming, spots was that the town's vaunted high-speed fiber-optic and coaxial cable networks remained unnetworked. Instead, the lines ended 100 feet from town, unconnected to any other source. A funding shortage and the election of a less technology-friendly mayor had caused the project to be suspended. Many of Lusk's residents hooked up to the Internet anyway, although through slower phone lines. But Microsoft's ads were not lying about Lusk. The commercials were carefully worded to express that the town wired itself "for the future of the Internet," omitting the fact that it was not presently wired. Nevertheless, after the ads ran, Lusk was bombarded with telephone calls and E-mails from urban dwellers longing to move to a small town and still stay connected.

[would] not be hurt in the court of public opinion," the Seattle Post-Intelligencer observed.

TARGET MARKET

With its "Community" ads, Microsoft attempted to reach a broad consumer audience. While computers and software had been pitched almost solely to technology-savvy users in the early 1990s, the market for personal computers was expanding every year. By 1994 one-third of all American households owned a PC. "Software buyers have evolved from a small community of technical decision makers to everyone," Microsoft's director of corporate marketing told the Wall Street Journal on November 11, 1994. "We want to encourage people to become more involved with the technology."

By casting its net so widely, Microsoft had to devise advertising that could connect with consumers of all sorts across the demographic divides. To appeal to as wide a group as possible, Microsoft presented computer users of different races, ethnicities, and lifestyles. The Microsoft employees showcased in the first installment of the "Community" ads were a friendly collection of Asian Americans, African Americans, men, and women. The Lusk, Wyoming, spots portrayed a small farming town where traditional values and hard work were still the norm. The Maxwell Middle School commercials featured a Mexican American boy connecting with his heritage. The occupations of "Community" characters ranged from an agricultural worker to a student to corporate employees to small-business owners. The campaign allowed viewers to relate to different vignettes that portrayed their realities and ideals (and, of course, the role software might play in their own lives). As the March 8, 1998, Advertising Age noted, the Microsoft users profiled in "Community" were "entirely believable people."

COMPETITION

Although Microsoft faced no real threats to its dominant position atop the software industry, several competitors each challenged provinces of Microsoft's empire. In the realm of web browsers (the software that enables a PC user to access the Internet easily), Microsoft's closest competitor was the Netscape Communications Corp. Netscape, and its Navigator browser, had been the leading browser company prior to Microsoft's foray into the field with Internet Explorer. But damaged by Microsoft's practice of bundling its Internet Explorer with Windows 95, Netscape's market share quickly dropped. The company had long relied on word-of-mouth to promote its browsers, but in 1997 it hired Salt Lake City-based ad agency Euro RSCG DW Partners to do some targeted ads. In 1998 Netscape decided it needed a higher-profile effort and teamed up with Kirschenbaum Bond & Partners to launch its first major consumer campaign. "We need to get people where they are, and to do that, we need to use a broad mix of media," Netscape's marketing director, Judy Logan, told Advertising Age on June 1, 1998. In its bid to survive Microsoft's advances in the web browser market, Netscape opted to start giving away its browser for free and to generate revenue from web-based advertising rather than product sales. With the print component of its new campaign, which consisted of eight separate pieces running in business and computer magazines, Netscape particularly wanted to reach business users.

Apple Computer, Inc. and International Business Machines Inc. (IBM) provided the most visible competition in terms of rival operating systems. Apple's Mac OS operating platform, although far behind Windows in its number of users, had a committed core of adherents. In 1997 Apple broke an image campaign called "Think Different," which was designed to reinforce Apple's reputation as a creative alternative to the scores of PC clones. This print and television campaign, which ran through 1999 (in conjunction with product ads), used striking black-and-white photos of revolutionary thinkers, leaders, and artists, to demonstrate that Apple was no mere computer company. "Think Different" proposed that Apple created the tools that enabled geniuses and rebels to work. IBM's OS/2 Warp operating system also received ad support in IBM's massive "Solutions for a Small Planet" branding campaign, conceived by Ogilvy & Mather.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In order to reach the broad consumer base it desired, Microsoft chose television as the medium to carry the message of "Community." Unlike on-line or print spots, television commercials could connect with an array of consumers with a wide range of computing abilities. The ads aired on mainstream cable and network programs that garnered large audiences. For example, the Maxwell Middle School spots debuted during the NCAA basketball championships.

Microsoft hoped to use the "Community" commercials to polish its corporate image. As with the entire "Where Do You Want to Go Today" campaign, "Community" was less intent on driving particular product sales and more set on "evok[ing] positive feelings from the target audience about [Microsoft] and [making consumers] consider being a user [of the company's products]," an industry analyst told the September 4, 1995, Advertising Age. Part of this process of building its brand involved countering the charges of arrogance and greed that had trailed after Microsoft even before the antitrust trial began. "Community" did just that, and presented a different kind of Microsoft than the one headlining the nation's newspapers. Microsoft's first objective was to distance itself from its sometimes brash and unrepentant founder, Gates, whose billionaire status made him a natural focal point. "Community" ads depicted Microsoft not as the empire of one man, but as a collection of talented employees. The six employee-centered spots emphasized that there was "more to Microsoft than its omnipresent chairman," concluded the September 7, 1998, Advertising Age.

"Community" subtly refuted the picture being painted of Microsoft by government lawyers in the courtroom in other ways as well. Perhaps because Microsoft had so often been portrayed as the 800-pound gorilla of the industry, the company chose to highlight plucky small-business users in its new round of ads. One Lusk, Wyoming, spot narrates the tale of home entrepreneur Margy Brown and her fledgling beeswax hand-cream business. While its critics often characterized Microsoft as a monopolist striving to enforce a sterile technical uniformity in pursuit of a Windows-only world, "Community" presented Microsoft in a radically different light. Far from imposing a corporate monoculture on the world, the ads insinuated that Microsoft made alternative lifestyles possible. Luskites lived outside the mainstream in their small town, fortified by Microsoft technology. Moreover, "Community" suggested that Microsoft's primary concern was people (those who made its software and those who used it), rather than profit. Each commercial reiterated that Microsoft was a tool, limited and defined by the goals and efforts of the people who used it. One Lusk spot proclaimed "Technology is a tool. Software is a tool. These are the dreams it's made for."

OUTCOME

The "Community" ads succeeded in shoring up Microsoft's reputation among consumers. The company told Advertising Age on June 21, 1999, that the commercials were "probably some of the strongest" it had run. Microsoft added that the campaign scored "near all-time highs" in terms of shaping consumer perceptions of brand attributes and that Wieden+Kennedy had delivered "a stronger and more concise Microsoft voice . . . to the outside world." In May 1999 Microsoft released a new series of "Community" ads, which focused more directly on small-business needs by showcasing the Great Harvest Bread Company, a national chain of franchised bakeries based in Dillon, Montana.

Wieden+Kennedy did not reap similar benefits from the campaign, however. Microsoft fired the ad agency (first from the Windows account and eventually from the branding campaign as well) and by June 1999 had consolidated its marketing with McCann-Erickson. The company hoped its new agency would create a "mix of brand, product, and solutions messages," as well as craft a "common template and tone for product and brand work," a Microsoft executive told the June 21, 1999, Advertising Age.

TRUST THE MIDAS TOUCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In January 2003 a new chief executive officer, Alan Feldman, took over Midas, Inc. Though possessing a well-respected brand, the company was in disarray. For years Midas had focused on muffler manufacturing and used its franchised shops as a way to move inventory. But with the introduction of longer-lasting mufflers in the 1990s, Midas's old business model showed cracks. In addition to recasting Midas as a pure franchisor, Feldman wanted to move the company farther away from its muffler heritage to make Midas muffler shops into general car-maintenance centers. But just as better mufflers had hurt specialty shops, improved quality in cars in general during the 1990s hurt everyone in the auto-repair industry, making the field extremely competitive. Midas, however, had one significant advantage in the marketplace: its well-recognized brand. Feldman awarded the $40 million-plus Midas advertising account to the Chicago office of DDB Worldwide Communications Group Inc. to help in rebranding Midas as a general car-care center that consumers could trust. Midas brought back a slogan first developed in the early 1980s, "Trust the Midas Touch," to anchor the new marketing campaign.

Relying on humor to convey their message, the campaign's television spots, in both English and Spanish, featured the honesty of Midas technicians being questioned by customers, who were assured that Midas personnel were both knowledgeable and trustworthy. The first wave of commercials helped to establish Midas's brake business, while the second promoted the chain's other services.

The "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign played a key role in Feldman's success in turning Midas around. Franchisees were pleased with the increase in business, as was Wall Street, which bid up the price of Midas stock.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Midas grew out of a muffler-manufacturing company founded in Chicago in 1938 by Nate Sherman. Believing he could make more money by selling mufflers directly to the public in repair shops, he formed Midas in 1956. He soon began franchising his muffler-shop concept, and within the first year the chain had 100 stores in 40 states. By the late 1980s the number of units totaled about 2,000, and Midas had manufactured more than 100 million mufflers. Much of the growth during this period was due to a successful marketing campaign that relied on the slogan "Trust the Midas Touch," introduced in the early 1980s. The chain enjoyed tremendous brand recognition and was the undisputed leader in the muffler-repair field. In addition Midas had branched out beyond mufflers, adding to the mix shock absorbers in 1960, brakes in 1979, and alignment in 1988. Changes in the 1990s, however, jeopardized the future of the company.

Midas had always enjoyed a steady business selling mufflers that could be expected to last about two years, resulting in regular visits from customers. But in the 1990s stainless-steel exhaust systems with a life span of 10 years or more were introduced, completely altering the muffler-repair business. Moreover automobiles were better built in the 1990s and in less need of repair, putting a crimp on Midas's other business segments. To offset declining sales Midas tried to increase the inventory flow of its franchisees by building a network of strategically located distribution centers in the late 1990s. But the cost to set up the network was great and the payoff meager. Midas also tried to expand what most of its shops had to offer, adding air-conditioning services, oil changes, and other basic maintenance and repair services. Along the way the company lost the Midas touch in terms of its marketing as well. In the mid-1990s it severed its ties with the Chicago office of Wells Rich Greene, which had held the advertising account for more than 25 years and was responsible for coining the slogan "Trust the Midas Touch." TV spots by the new agency, Euro RSCG McConnaughy Tatham, were uninspiring, prompting management to seek a more dynamic, attention-getting approach. Instead Midas reached its nadir in advertising in 2002 when it approved a television spot created by its new ad agency, Cliff Freeman & Partners. In it a Midas manager told an elderly female customer about the company's lifetime guarantee on shocks and struts. "Lifetime guarantee?" she replied. "That's great. What can you do with these?" With her back to the camera the customer then opened her shirt to the befuddled manager, who looked away and said, "There are limits to what we can do." After fielding a number of complaints from customers, the company pulled the offensive commercial. Unhappy with management on any number of fronts, the franchisees were ready to revolt.

On the brink of bankruptcy Midas in January 2003 brought in a new CEO, one well familiar with forging strong relationships with franchisees: Alan Feldman, former president and chief operating officer of McDonald's Americas. He quickly moved to exit the distribution business, which he outsourced to auto-parts retailer AutoZone, and began to convert Midas into a pure franchising operation. The plan was to retain only a handful of company-owned stores, where new prototypes and procedures could enjoy a dry run before being rolled out to the franchisees. Feldman also wasted little time in dumping Cliff Freeman and turning over the advertising to the Chicago office of DDB, with whom he had enjoyed a good working relationship during his days at McDonald's. The agency's task was nothing less than rebranding Midas, to play up the brake business rather than mufflers and to position Midas as more of a general repair shop than just a specialist.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

"Midas" was an acronym for the Muffler Installation Dealers' Association, formed in 1956 by Chicago muffler manufacturer Nate Sherman to create a chain of franchised muffler shops. In that same year the first Midas franchise opened in Macon, Georgia.

TARGET MARKET

As Midas broadened its auto-maintenance offerings, it in turn expanded its target market. In 1993 the average age of a car in the United States was 6.5 years, but by 2003 that number had increased to 8.6 years, due to higher quality cars. With so many more cars on the road operating beyond their warranties, Midas eyed an increasing amount of potential business. In fact it was estimated that drivers neglected some $60 billion worth of car maintenance each year. Midas hoped to capture a significant share of that business and regular maintenance. Its greatest advantage in entering other areas of automobile repair was its brand, which enjoyed a 90 percent awareness. In addition an estimated 40 percent of Americans had visited a Midas shop in their lifetimes. Perhaps the greatest strength of the brand, aside from sheer recognition, was its association with the word "trust." Given that the automotive-repair industry had been long tied in the minds of consumers with dishonesty and the belief that drivers with little mechanical knowledge were taken advantage of, trust would be a key element in selling Midas. The target market consisted of average drivers, especially women, who did not maintain their own cars and who, after years of feeling cheated by disreputable mechanics, would prefer a national chain that staked its reputation on honesty. Another part of the Midas target market would be the Latino community, not because they were any more vulnerable to deceitful auto-repair shops than the average person but as a testament to their growing numbers in the United States.

COMPETITION

The aftermarket repair industry was huge, valued at about $110 billion. Midas, one of only a handful of national players, was well positioned in the marketplace.

A WOMAN'S TOUCH

The slogan "Trust the Midas Touch" was coined in the early 1980s by the ad agency Wells Rich Greene, which was founded in 1966 by advertising pioneer Mary Wells. After her boss at Jack Tinker & Partners offered to pay her as president of the firm but refused to give her the title, Wells quit and, joining forces with two colleagues, became president of her own firm, Wells Rich and Greene. The agency went on to create a number of memorable catchphrases in addition to "Trust the Midas Touch," including "At Ford, Quality Is Job 1," "I Can't Believe I Ate the Whole Thing," "Try It, You'll Like It," "Flick My Bic," "Raise Your Hand if You're Sure," "The Citi Never Sleeps," and "Friends Don't Let Friends Drive Drunk."

The closest comparable competitors were Meineke Discount Mufflers (which in January 2003 changed its name to Meineke Car Care Center), operating about 900 stores in Canada and the Americas, and Monro Muffler and Brake, with about 600 stores in the United States. Midas had 1,700 domestic units. But Midas also had to contend with local competition, the mom-and-pop repair shops, as well as a different set of national players. For example, there were auto-parts retailers, including Pep Boys nationally and Strauss Discount Auto in the Northeast, that were opening supercenter formats to offer auto-repair services in very much the same way that Sears had been doing for years.

Automobile dealers' service centers, a key profit center, were also adversely impacted by improved quality in vehicles. Most of their work had been related to warranty repairs, but as they diminished in the 1990s, dealers found themselves in a difficult spot. Diminished repair sales limited the amount of money dealers were able to invest in mechanic training and service facilities. Potentially this situation could lead to a downward spiral: poor service quality leading to poor reputation, resulting in an even further erosion of sales. General Motors responded by requiring all of its 7,400 dealerships to participate in the Mr. Goodwrench program, which was revamped in 2003. A well-financed marketing campaign was then launched to drum up nonwarranty repair work. Ford Motor Co.'s Quality Care service centers provided Midas with competition from this quarter as well.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although Midas had long been associated with mufflers, DDB and the Midas marketers elected to use the chain's brake services (which accounted for 42 percent of sales) as a wedge to expand its business into other areas of auto repair. After winning the account in July 2003, DDB put together an interim campaign while it developed a more comprehensive approach to rebranding Midas. The television spots that ran in the fall of 2003 featured everyday people completing the sentence "I brake for . . ." The team agreed that in the first quarter of 2004 Midas would center its advertising on a promotional price point of $89.99 for brake work. DDB was tasked with both ensuring the success of this promotion and building the Midas brand through 15-second and 30-second TV spots (60 percent of which were of the shorter variety).

In January 2004 DDB made a creative presentation to Midas, first offering a brand-positioning statement out of which everything flowed: "Your neighborhood Midas owner is restoring trust to auto service by providing expertise, responsiveness, and the best value to every customer, every time." Storyboards for possible spots were then presented on three themes: "Popular Mechanics," "See You Down the Road," and the venerable "Trust the Midas Touch." After the meeting the themes were tested on focus groups, and after the first round of testing it was obvious that "Trust the Midas Touch," albeit long in the tooth, retained a great deal of power. According to a DDB memo reporting on the findings, "The other two themes did not play well to the test group."

In March 2004 the first commercial in the new "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign broke. (Auto-repair sales typically spiked around April in the Northeast and Midwest.) As with the other spots to follow, it emphasized brakes and portrayed Midas as trustworthy. In it a Midas repairman was hooked up to a polygraph machine and being questioned by a customer, who asked, "Will you sell me something I don't need?" "Do you do more brake jobs than anyone else?" and "Are your brake pads and shoes really guaranteed for as long as I own my car?" The first wave of these humorous spots ran for a month on prime-time and late-night television, including such sporting events as the NCAA basketball tournament.

Midas was pleased with the results of the initial thrust of the "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign. In March 2005 it launched a second phase, which continued to emphasize trust while building on the company's success with brakes to include other maintenance services. The monthlong advertising effort promoted the $29.95 "Midas Touch" maintenance package, which included an oil change, tire rotation, and a check of battery, tires, belts, hoses, fluid levels, coolant, and air filter, as well as a visual brake check. Once more taking a humorous tack, the commercials featured customers grilling mechanics with questions about the services Midas had to offer and about the chain's trustworthiness. In the spot titled "Polygraph Backrub," a mechanic was tricked into saying "yes" when asked if Midas did back rubs. The spot closed with the mechanic alternately working on a car and massaging the customer's back. In "Young Voyagers," a mechanic proved he was "one of us" to a group of Boy Scout–like Young Voyagers. In "Sworn In," Midas personnel, with hands placed on a thick parts manual, testified about the Midas lifetime guarantee of its brake work. The spots again played during the NCAA basketball tournament as well as other network and cable programming.

In addition this second phase of commercials included the first that Midas made for the Latino community. These spots aired on Univision, Telemundo, Galavision, and Telefutura. The "Trust the Midas Touch" promotion was also supported by point-of-purchase materials produced in both English and Spanish. At the same time, the Midas website (also available in Spanish) was beefed up and relaunched to support the campaign.

OUTCOME

The "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign was a key element in Feldman's effort to turn around the fortunes of Midas and shift its focus from distribution to growing the franchise system. Even as the company's commercials were selling trust to customers, Feldman and his management team were rebuilding trust with the franchisees. Due in large part to the marketing campaign, consumers responded positively to Midas shops selling tires and adding other maintenance services. The result was increasing business for franchisees and renewed confidence from Wall Street. When Feldman took over in January 2003, Midas stock was priced below $7, but during the summer of 2005 it approached $25. Although there remained more work to be done, Midas, supported by the strength of the "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, was clearly on the right track.

HARD DAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mike's Hard Lemonade Company, a Lakewood, Colorado–based subsidiary of Vancouver's the Mark Anthony Group Inc., in 1999 introduced Mike's Hard Lemonade, a sweet, malt-based alcoholic beverage vying for a place among an emerging group of products commonly called ''malternatives.'' Malternatives, or ready-to-drink alcoholic beverages reminiscent of sodas and other sweet nonalcoholic drinks, were aimed at young people who wanted the experience and cachet of drinking alcohol but who did not care for the taste of beer, wine, or hard liquor. In an effort to establish a clear brand image in the face of increased competition, Mike's Hard Lemonade enlisted Cliff Freeman and Partners, a New York–based ad agency known for producing edgy, off-beat work, and in 2001 launched a campaign called ''Hard Day.''

The ''Hard Day'' campaign, whose two-year budget was estimated at $30 million, consisted of three television commercials in 2001 and three more in 2002. It established a distinctly beer-like, masculine product image while simultaneously sending up classic notions of masculinity as presented in beer commercials of an earlier era. The first year's spots featured blue-collar workers who, after being impaled by construction materials or losing limbs, cared more about their after-work Mike's Hard Lemonade than their injuries. In the second year the slapstick execution continued but was applied to horror-movie scenarios and was used to support an additional product, Mike's Hard Iced Tea.

Amid a flurry of new malternative products, Mike's Hard Lemonade positioned itself, thanks in large part to the ''Hard Day'' campaign, as one of the few brands in the category with a clear identity. As such, it outlasted the category's initial rush of increased competition and maintained its position as the number two malternative while other brands floundered.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the late 1990s a new category of beer-like beverages hit the U.S. market. Called ''malternatives'' by their partisans and ''alcopops'' by detractors who believed that they appealed principally to underage drinkers, the beverages were malt-based (like beer and whiskey) but much sweeter than traditional alcoholic drinks. Among the first wave of these products was a lemonade-like drink called Hooper's Hooch, popular in Australia, which arrived in America in 1996. Several competing citrus-flavored brands appeared in quick succession, among them Mike's Hard Lemonade, which was launched in 1999.

As more and more companies entered the malternatives arena, widespread industry speculation began about the future of the category. Many predicted that the new wave of products would go the way of wine coolers, which, in the 1980s, similarly relied on sweetness to appeal to drinkers who did not like the taste of traditional alcoholic beverages. After generating big-budget advertising campaigns and scores of new brands, the wine-cooler category faded dramatically in the latter part of that decade. Another noteworthy beer-like alternative, the Adolph Coors Co.'s Zima, had seen sporadic market success since its 1993 launch but had in general failed to live up to expectations, despite significant marketing and promotion efforts.

TARGET MARKET

Mike's Hard Lemonade, like other malternatives, projected a beer-like image to appeal to twentysomething young adults, especially newly legal drinkers who did not have a taste for beer or other alcoholic beverages. The sweetness of the product's flavor promised a natural transition for young people used to drinking soda, and Mike's strove to create a bold, exciting sensibility in its marketing. The spots in the first year of the "Hard Day" campaign each focused on masculine toughness, thereby distancing the drink from potential charges that it might be insufficiently manly—an image problem that had haunted malternative predecessor Zima—while simultaneously sending up that very idea to appeal to irony-savvy young people. Whereas a previous generation's beer commercials had sincerely extolled hard work and endurance and had positioned particular beer brands as a man's natural reward at the end of a long day, "Hard Day" offered scenarios in which workingmen were severely maimed on the job but still looked forward, absurdly, to their end-of-day Mike's Hard Lemonade.

Critics contended that both the sweet taste and the bold image of drinks like Mike's Hard Lemonade were evidence that the true target market for the malternative category was 14- to 18-year-olds. As George Hacker of the Center for Science in the Public Interest told the New York Times, "these products are designed to disguise the taste of alcohol and are jazzed up to more resemble nonalcoholic beverages . . . Forty-year-olds don't drink this, nor do they respond to the advertising." Another advocacy group, the National Consumers League, in 2000 filed a complaint with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) regarding Mike's Hard Lemonade, claiming that it was "the perfect introductory drink for teenagers raised on soda and other sweet beverages." The FTC took no action on the complaint.

COMPETITION

After leading the malternative category in 2000, Mike's Hard Lemonade saw its competition increase dramatically in 2001, the year that "Hard Day" was launched. Its most noteworthy competitor, and the category leader for that year and subsequent years, was Diageo's Smirnoff Ice. With the rapid growth of the top-two malternatives, domestic beer giants began teaming with hard-alcohol brands to offer numerous new product entries, flooding the category in 2002. Industry estimates put malternative-related ad spending at $300–$450 million for that year.

In the first six months of 2001 Smirnoff Ice—which, despite its association with the Smirnoff Vodka brand, was malt-based, like Mike's Hard Lemonade—was the beneficiary of a national, $50 million ad campaign. Similar in tone to "Hard Day," the campaign was called "Smooth Move" and showed drinkers of the beverage going to outlandish extremes to secure their Smirnoff Ice. In one spot a young man was shown putting honey on his friend while on a wilderness fishing trip, so that the friend would be busy fending off bear attacks and therefore would be unable to drink any of the Smirnoff Ice they had brought. Not only did Smirnoff Ice benefit from its association with its hard-liquor namesake, but it was believed that advertising for the malternative lifted brand awareness and sales of Smirnoff Vodka. Smirnoff Ice sales reached $615 million in 2001; the brand sold almost twice as many cases as Mike's, its nearest competitor. Diageo anted up $100 million for a 2002 advertising campaign, and the company purchased and refurbished an old Pabst beer brewery to accommodate increased production of Smirnoff Ice.

America's leading domestic beer makers, Anheuser-Busch and Miller, were slow to enter the malternative category, presumably believing, along with many in the OUTRAGEOUS?

Cliff Freeman and Partners, the advertising agency behind "Hard Day," was known for its edgy, outrageous ideas. In addition to its Mike's Hard Lemonade work, the agency had made waves in the industry for using cannon-fired gerbils in a spot for online superstore Outpost.com. Notable flops, too, were blamed on the agency's penchant for the extreme. For instance, a commercial for Midas Mufflers that used a topless elderly woman lost Freeman the Midas account. Despite its reputation, however, the agency's résumé included some of the most prominent mainstream American advertising in recent decades, including the Wendy's "Where's the Beef?" and the Little Caesars "Pizza Pizza" campaigns.

industry, that the beverage type represented a fad unworthy of the enormous expenditures associated with product launches. As the category grew, however, the brewing giants changed course dramatically, rushing to find branding partners and introduce liquor-associated malternatives. Anheuser-Busch and Bacardi introduced Bacardi Silver with an estimated $60 million ad campaign in 2002, using the tagline "Your night just got more interesting." Miller partnered with Skyy Vodka to promote Skyy Blue, earmarking more than $40 million for the product's marketing while preparing to unveil additional malternative lines Sauza Diablo, Stolichnaya Citrona, and Jack Daniel's Original Hard Cola. Coors, which had long had a malternative product in Zima, rebranded the ailing beverage with a 2002 campaign intended to appeal to young men and launched a fruit-flavored extension of the brand called Vibe.

"Hard Day" was launched in the spring of 2001 with three 30-second television spots and an estimated budget of $15 million. The 2002 installment of the campaign ran with an equal budget and number of spots. In keeping with the brand's attempt to connect to young males in particular, the commercials aired on such cable stations as Fox Sports Net, ESPN, and Comedy Central.

In 2001 the "Hard Day" spots took the form and principles of classic beer advertising to absurd extremes, showing workers getting horrifically maimed but shrugging off their injuries at the prospect of an after-work Mike's Hard Lemonade. In one spot a construction worker was shown falling 20 stories and being impaled on a steel bar. Noticing the bar protruding from the man's chest, his foreman suggested that the injury might warrant a trip to the doctor. "Or maybe," the injured man answered, "we should get a delicious Mike's Hard Lemonade instead." As the scene shifted to a barroom, a drinking buddy was shown casually using the steel bar, still implanted in the man's chest, as a bottle opener, while a voice-over proclaimed, "A hard day calls for a hard lemonade. Make it Mike's." In another spot the same concept was applied to a lumberjack who accidentally chopped off his lower leg with an axe. Noting sadly, "My wife just bought me them boots yesterday," he retired to a bar, where he and his coworkers jovially clinked bottles, one playfully using the amputated (and still booted) foot instead of a bottle, as the voice-over delivered the "Hard Day" tagline. The third commercial, meanwhile, featured an aquarium worker who lost a hand while offering a snack to a killer whale.

As Adweek 's Barbara Lippert noted, the extreme violence of the commercials was not offensive "because the spots are so aggressively and unabashedly dumb, fake and deadpan." In addition to the obvious appeal of slapstick humor, in parodying not only traditional beer advertising but the more widespread advertising tactic of suggesting that a product could cure what ailed the consumer, the commercials appealed to the young target audience's desire to be among an exclusive, knowing group who considered themselves superior to such outdated pitches. As Bob Garfield wrote in Advertising Age, "the blue-collar-reward storylines provide perfect cover for the real message—which is not 'Yo, Joe Sixpack, here's an alternative to beer,' but instead, 'Hey, look at us! We're funny and cool, and if you get our jokes, so are you!'"

The campaign's second season marked an extension of this brand of ironic humor with a similarly deadpan treatment of outrageous storylines as well as a continuation of the "Hard Day" tagline. Rather than continuing to parody classic beer ads, however, the three spots that appeared in 2002 focused on horror-movie scenarios. In one an affectionate couple was seen loading groceries into their car, when suddenly a pack of monkey-like aliens parachuted from the sky and abducted the wife. "Wow, that sucks," a bystander said to the husband. "Looks like you could use a refreshing Mike's Hard Lemonade." After a short pause the man turned to the bystander and said, "You're on!" In the standard closing bar scene one of the aliens was shown stealing the husband's Mike's Hard Lemonade.

The other two 2002 commercials were used to promote a new product, Mike's Hard Iced Tea. In one spot a female coworker approached a downcast man at his cubicle. "What's wrong?" she asked. "I think I've grown a second evil head," he answered. Coolly surveying the evil head protruding from his collar, the woman said, "Sorry. What if we go out to get a refreshing Mike's Hard Iced Tea. Would that help?" The evil head, while ogling the woman's breasts, added, "I didn't know Mike's made a hard iced tea." In the other Hard Iced Tea spot, a man getting an ultrasound found that the stomach pains he had been experiencing were caused by a nest of snakelike fetuses. Told that he did not have long to live, the man asked the doctor if he had time enough to go out and get a Mike's Hard Iced Tea, and the doctor answered that he did not know there was such a product. "You bet!" the patient answered.

OUTCOME

Mike's Hard Lemonade managed to establish and maintain its distinct brand image in a flooded market while spending, on "Hard Day," a fraction of the amount allotted to brands backed by bigger companies. Mike's sold 13 million cases in 2001 (up from its 1999 total of 1.1 million cases) and, with Smirnoff Ice, pushed the category's share of the overall beer market to 2.5 percent, a level of success that predecessors Zima and Hooper's Hooch never approached. In 2002 Mike's sold 11.5 million cases in the face of proliferating competition, establishing itself as one of the few malternative brands with staying power. As of 2005 Mike's and Smirnoff Ice remained the top-two malternative brands, together accounting for 74 percent of the category's sales. That year Mike's Hard Lemonade Company left its Denver-area home for Seattle, a move intended to increase the company's ability to attract creative talent while bringing it geographically closer to its Vancouver-based parent, the Mark Anthony Group. The company planned to expand its operations after completing the move.

MILLER HIGH LIFE MAN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Also see essay for SABMiller.

The Miller Brewing Company, a subsidiary of cigarette maker Philip Morris, was the second largest beer maker in the United States behind Anheuser-Busch. The Milwaukee-based company brewed about 44 million barrels of beer a year and controlled approximately 20 percent of U.S. sales. Popular Miller Brewing brands included Miller Genuine Draft, Miller High Life, and Icehouse, as well as Red Dog, Meister Brau, Milwaukee's Best, and the nonalcoholic brew Sharp's. Miller Brewing owned eight breweries in seven states, including California, Texas, and its home state of Wisconsin.

In 1998, in an effort to revive interest in its flagging High Life brand (once the company's flagship brew but now its third biggest selling brand behind Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft), Miller introduced High Life's first national ads in seven years. The ad campaign, "Miller High Life Man," was created by ad agency Weiden & Kennedy, based in Portland, Oregon, and launched on April 12 during professional basketball and baseball telecasts. The tongue-in-cheek commercials, aimed at young male beer drinkers, offered bombastic salutes to duct tape, donuts, diner food, and America's debt to the French for having invented mayonnaise. Miller Brewing Company spent an estimated $5-10 million on the campaign. The well-received television ads were reinforced by new packaging featuring sleek, tall bottles and incorporating the long-retired "Girl on the Moon" symbol and the brand's erstwhile catchphrase "The Champagne of Beers."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Brewed since the beginning of the twentieth century, Miller High Life was the foundation brand for the Milwaukee-based Miller Brewing Company, which emerged as the industry's principal challenger to Anheuser-Busch. Beginning in 1906 High Life was touted in ads as the "Champagne of Bottled Beer," in an attempt to appeal to more affluent and status-conscious consumers. By the time the Philip Morris Company acquired Miller in 1969, however, the tag line had contributed to a widespread perception of High Life as a rich man's brew. One typical print ad from then-agency Mathisson & Company of Milwaukee, featured a needlepoint rendition of the bottle with the tag line "Home Is Where the Miller Is."

The brewing giant's new owners immediately ordered a change in direction. The ad slogan was shortened to "Champagne of Beers," and the decision was made to position High Life as a working man's brew. McCann-Erickson, a New York-based agency, was enlisted to create new ads for the brand. Their campaign, using the tag line "Miller Time," helped quadruple sales of High Life between 1970 and 1978. At 21.7 million barrels annually, it ranked just behind Anheuser-Busch' s flagship brew, Budweiser.

In 1979 Miller shipped nearly 24 million barrels of Miller High Life to distributors. That proved to be the high water mark for the brand, however. A precipitous sales decline ensued, attributable to several factors. The rising popularity of imported beer, together with the emergence of the ''light'' category (a trail blazed by Miller itself with its revolutionary Miller Lite brand) helped erode sales of High Life during the 1980s. Budweiser found it could gain market share by imitating High Life's strategy of pitching the brand as the workers' reward. The 1985 introduction of Miller Genuine Draft also cut significantly into High Life's business.

In 1988, in an attempt to revive High Life's sales performance, Miller changed its packaging, abandoned the ''Champagne of Beers'' slogan, and developed new ad campaigns. Its last national ad push for the brand came in 1991 and employed the tag line ''Buy that Man a Miller.'' Sales continued to decline, however, and in 1993 the brewer cut the brand's price and slashed its marketing budget. Once a major force in the premium category, where it competed with the likes of Budweiser and Coors, High Life now occupied a lower-priced segment dominated by brands like Busch.

By 1996 High Life shipments had sunk below 5 million barrels. The following year, extensive tactical discounting by the brewer helped spur sales 6.8 percent to 4.7 million barrels, making it the eighth largest selling beer in the country. The surprising reversal of fortunes prompted Miller to embark on a major new marketing push for 1998. Nostalgia-driven campaigns reviving the ''Miller Time'' tag line had already been created for Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft, so a back-to-basics approach was adopted for High Life as well.

While Miller executives did not expect High Life to reclaim its former prominence, it was expected to play an important role in making Miller competitive against lower-priced rivals. ''[Miller High Life] has a loyal base of consumers, and we want to articulate what it stands for to people who don't know,'' said Bruce Winterton, Miller's brand manager for High Life and Miller Genuine Draft, in announcing the new campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Miller High Life's ''High Life Man'' ads were targeted primarily at males aged 21 to 27. Historically the United States's most prolific beer drinkers, this group represented both a demographic challenge and an opportunity for America's brewers. While their numbers declined by about 3 million between 1990 and 1998, experts expected the population of ''entry-level drinkers,'' as they were known, to begin growing around the year 2000 and to increase 14 percent over the first five years of the new millennium.

Studies showed these youthful beer drinkers to be both highly brand conscious and notoriously lacking in brand loyalty, making them an attractive challenge for advertising professionals. ''Studies have indicated that is where we have the greatest opportunity to influence brand choices,'' commented Jeff Waalkes, Miller Brewing sales communications manager. ''Although the over-30 market comprises a large segment by volume, the fact is that brand choice is pretty well set by the time a person turns 30. Rather than attempting to get such consumers to switch at that point, we believe it's more effective to try to make Miller their first choice at an earlier period.''

People in their twenties were also known to be very ad-resistant, making them a hard group to reach with traditional sales approaches. ''They look at advertising and marketing as almost a spectator sport,'' said Steven Grasse, chief executive of Gyro Worldwide, a Philadelphia advertising agency that specialized in marketing to people ages 18 to 30. ''This is a savvy audience,'' noted Mike Johnson, brand director for Miller Lite. ''They started shopping earlier; they've had candy marketed to them; they've had Channel One in their classrooms. They've been there; they've done that; they've bought the T-shirt.''

To reach these jaded young consumers, beer companies often tried out offbeat marketing and promotion ideas. Miller's strategy was to have constantly changing television ads, to promote the theme of ''fun, fresh, unexpected, entertaining.'' Other companies relied on the kind of ''twisted childish humor'' that these consumers grew up on. According to Janine Misdom, a partner at Sputnik, a New York marketing firm, males under the age of 30 responded most favorably to the Budweiser commercials in which a talking lizard hatches a murder plot against a group of frogs. ''It's funny, it's a little bit nostalgic, and there is a little bit of the bad-boy thing,'' Misdom said. ''They've all grown up on this offbeat humor.''

COMPETITION

The beer industry remained highly competitive in 1998, with little change from the previous year in terms of market position among the major brewers. Anheuser-Busch set the pace overall in 1997, with 47.5 percent of the U.S. beer market, the same figure as 1996, according to the Maxwell Consumer Report published by analyst Jack Maxwell of Davenport & Company. Its flagship brand Budweiser was off 2 percent, which in the sluggish premium segment represented ''the best performance by the brand in six years,'' according to Anheuser-Busch officials. Miller Brewing ended the year with a total market share of 21.4 percent. Shipments were up in double-digits for Foster's, Icehouse, and Red Dog, while Miller High Life and Milwaukee's Best also showed strong increases. Bringing up the rear of the market were Coors Brewing, at 10.9 percent, and Stroh Brewery (including former Heileman products) at 7.4 percent.

After being outspent by Miller Brewing Company in 1997, Anheuser-Busch announced plans to invest more than $300 million in brand ads in both 1998 and 1999. True to its word, the St. Louis-based brewer increased ad spending 54.7 percent to $187.2 million during the first six months of 1998, according to Competitive Media Reporting. Much of the new spending went to the

TURNING BACK THE CLOCK

The Miller Brewing Company was not the only marketer looking to boost its profits by reviving a once popular brand. In fact, it was one of many companies following a growing nostalgia trend in 1998. German automaker Volkswagen, for example, hoped to tap into baby-boomer nostalgia by rolling out a redesigned version of its Beetle, a cheap compact car favored by college-age drivers in the 1960s and 1970s. And the Pepsi-Cola Company reformulated its orange Slice brand, redesigned its container, and launched commercials designed to revive interest among teens and young adults. Like High Life, Slice, introduced amid much fanfare in the mid-1980s, had not been advertised nationally in a decade.

Why revive a fading brand rather than create a new one? Because "we know something about those old brands," said Ned Levine, a marketing consultant based in Providence, Rhode Island. "You have people out there who think of something when they think of Miller High Life. If you can take the evocative nostalgic elements out of one of those brands, it's more efficient than starting from zero."

Budweiser and Bud Light brands, while Anheuser-Busch retrenched in the specialty, ice, and dry beer segments. In early 1998 Anheuser-Busch also announced plans to launch a new, contemporary campaign directed at adult drinkers. The spots featured humans, rather than the brewer's popular animated lizards and frogs. While the reptiles remained a part of the company's creative mix, ads with people allowed Anheuser-Busch to portray consumers having a good time with beer, according to Bob Lachky, vice president of brand management for Anheuser-Busch.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Miller High Life's "High Life Man" ad campaign was designed to remain faithful to the blue-collar roots of the brand, even as its humorous style attracted younger beer drinkers. The ads, directed by Errol Morris of @radical.media, all featured a shadowy figure known as "High Life Man," whose activities are commented upon by an unseen narrator. "We are trying to emphasize the simplicity, pride, and common sense that are valued by Miller High Life drinkers of all ages," said Winterton. "The High Life guy wants to eat what he wants, fix things himself, and do his own thing."

The "High Life Man" campaign blended populist themes from the 1970s "Miller Time" spots with the ironic humor popular in the 1990s. In one new commercial, "Duct Tape," a Miller High Life drinker demonstrates the power of the versatile adhesive as he places a swatch of duct tape on the door of an old refrigerator filled with bottles of High Life. "The High Life man knows that if the Pharaohs had duct tape, the Sphinx would still have a nose," a voice-over intoned.

In another ad, "Boat," a man leans on a rake as he watches his hapless neighbor attempt to back a car with a boat trailer into his driveway. "Time was a man knew how to command his own vehicle," says the narrator. "Just how far are we willing to fall? Better reacquaint yourself with the High Life, soldier, before someone tries to take away your Miller Time."

In a third ad, "Burger," viewers look on as several greasy hunks of ground beef are fried on a diner stove. "Something's not quite right," however, the voice-over informs us. Then the waitress tops a burger off with a generous dollop of butter, which elicits a pleased response: "There, now that's a sandwich... That's living the High Life. That's Miller Time." Another ad, "Deviled Egg," shows a disheveled man alone in his kitchen after a party, pondering the advisability of eating the last deviled egg left on the party platter. "Mmmm, that last egg's looking real good," says the unseen narrator. "You've had quite a few though. Maybe you shouldn't." Ultimately, however, the man decides to go for it. The narrator approves. "See there," he says. "When you have the High Life, you can live it both ways."

One ad in the campaign, "Doughnut," shows a close-up of grease on a mechanic's hand, as he flicks around a powdered doughnut. The narrator says it's not a problem if the man can't wash his hands properly, since the grease provides a "semiprotective barrier between your fingerprint and your nutrition." Grease, the voice-over concludes, is nothing but added flavor "to a High Life man."

OUTCOME

Reaction to Miller's "High Life Man" ad campaign was largely positive, although there were a few brickbats. One beer industry rival dismissed the High Life effort, calling it "too little too late" and claiming that the new ads made fun of High Life drinkers "rather than giving them joy." Perhaps echoing this sentiment, almost a quarter of respondents polled by USA Today disliked the campaign, a high disapproval rate given that the average in all USA Today polls for respondents who disliked a campaign was 13 percent. Of some consolation to High Life's marketing team was the fact that men liked the new ads more than women did. Eighteen percent of men said they liked the "High Life Man" campaign "a lot," while only 8 percent of women did.

Most advertising critics, by contrast, found the ads witty and inventive. "The direction . . . is priceless," raved the reviewer for Advertising Age magazine. "Even the subtle nuance of the off-kilter logos at the end of each spot makes the work feel at once old-fashioned yet completely contemporary." "The spots seem real," added the critics at Adweek Western Advertising News. "They feel like beer tastes. If you like beer, that's a good thing."

Wieden & Kennedy's "Miller High Life Man" campaign won a number of advertising industry awards, including three Addy Awards. At the annual One Show Awards, the agency picked up two gold, two silver, and one bronze medals. "Mayonnaise" won the Gold Pencil in the 20-second or less, single ad category and "Sally," another spot in the campaign, took the Silver Pencil in that category. The campaign's "Sally," "Donut," and "Fridge" took the Gold Pencil in the varying lengths campaign category, while "Boat," "Mayonnaise" and "Router" earned the Silver Pencil in that category. In addition, Wieden & Kennedy took the Bronze Pencil in the 30-second campaign category for "Boat," "Duct Tape" and "Deviled Egg."

MILLER LITE'S MILLER TIME CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

On January 12, 1997, during championship games of the American and National Football Conferences and on the Fox Network's The X-Files, the Miller Brewing Company introduced Dick as its new spokesperson for Miller Lite. The series of four commercials all began in the same way, with a campy 1950s beer can logo bearing the slogan "Miller Time," a familiar tag line that had not been used since the mid-1980s, followed by a picture of Dick, apparently straight out of his 1975 high school yearbook, complete with long hair and sideburns. Each spot ended with a coda to the "Miller Time" logo, Dick's signature of approval and his statement "Thank you for your time," a la Bartles and Jaymes. In between the logos Dick told viewers, "Anything can happen."

The four scenarios lived up to this promise. In "Adios, Amigos," several cowboys stood at the bar of a saloon and drained their bottles of Miller Lite, after which they filed into the bathroom, sadly serenading their beers with the title song. In "Magician" the title character played a shell game with mice and Miller Lite, making one disappear and the other appear in its place, except that the mice ended up under the armpits of his blond assistant. "Man in the Field" showed the upper half of a walking man, his bowler hat bobbing above a field of wheat, but when he stepped past the end of a row, his naked bottom half was revealed. (Dick maintained modesty with a strategically positioned bottle cap.) "Product Tester" followed the adventures of Dick's friend Jimmy, who could not seem to let go of his bottle of Miller Lite as he tested it by tossing it off high buildings and throwing it down staircases. More scenarios in the $140 million campaign followed throughout 1997.

The initial critical response to the ads tended to be negative. Bob Garfield panned the ads in Advertising Age, calling them "a smug, masturbatory sort of advertising." Rance Crain, the magazine's editor, proclaimed, "Miller Lite's new agency, Fallon McElligott, has invoked the" Miller Time" heritage—which is nothing less than sacrilege—but has come up with ads so horrendously bad that I'm ready to revoke their 1996 Ad Agency of the Year award." Not all of the publication's readers shared this response, however. One reader wrote in to say that the ads amused him, as did the critical reaction.

Miller, of course, was more concerned with the reaction of its target audience. In the decade since the "Miller Lite All Stars" had last argued the "Great Taste/Less Filling" debate, Miller Lite's market share had fallen, and Anheuser-Busch's Bud Light, the main competition, had replaced Miller Lite as the best-selling light beer. To turn the situation around, Miller Lite reduced the age at the upper end of its target market, from 30- to 38-year olds, while simultaneously adopting a more hip tone that would resonate with a younger audience. According to Mike Johnson, Miller Lite's brand director, the basic element of the new strategy was to "create a lot of talk with contemporary adult beer drinkers." Even negative reactions to the advertisements worked in favor of this goal, for people talked more about Miller Lite. People not only talked, however; they also began to buy more Miller Lite.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1975 Miller Brewing introduced a new concept when it established the low-calorie, or "light," beer category, brewed to appeal to the taste buds as well as the paunches of beer drinkers. During the previous year filming had begun on commercials for the new "Miller Lite All Stars" campaign, created by the Chicago advertising agency Leo Burnett USA. The ads featured former athletes and coaches arguing whether it was better that the new beer "Tastes Great" or was "Less Filling." The "Tastes Great/ Less Filling" tag line tattooed itself on the psyche of American popular culture through a sustained advertising campaign that ran until the cost of hiring ex-athletes became prohibitively expensive. The campaign eventually became a victim of its own success, explained Gina Shaffer, Miller's marketing communications manager, for as other advertisers followed the precedent set by Miller Lite, it drove the value of appearances by ex-athletes through the roof.

After Miller abandoned this tag line, it decided to revive "Miller Time," which had once been the slogan of its flagship brand, Miller High Life, and which had become a cultural icon. Although Miller had laid the slogan to rest in 1985, "Miller Time" maintained its currency in American culture. Jack MacDonough, Miller's chairman and CEO, spoke about the resurrection of the slogan: "We [hadn't] been talking Miller Time for the last fifteen years... But this society did. It's never gone away. In the sports pages, somebody named Miller [basketball player Reggie Miller] would do well and they'd say it was 'Miller Time' last night. The phrase continued in the popular culture, which is why it was so much fun to pick it up again."

While Miller executives made the task sound easy, executives at Fallon McElligott, the Minneapolis advertising agency that had wooed the Miller account away from Leo Burnett, approached the job with a more realistic perspective. Mary Van Note, Fallon McElligott's group planning director, recalled that "fear struck [her] heart" when she first heard of the assignment. "It's one thing to discuss how to jumpstart a brand," she said, "it's quite another to turn around one of the biggest beers in America." Such a transformation required innovation, risk, and self-confidence, all trademarks of Fallon McElligott.

TARGET MARKET

Miller wanted to redefine Miller Lite by narrowing the age span of the target audience. The lower end would remain at 21, the legal drinking age, but at the upper end the campaign would focus on those age 30, rather than extending to 38, which had been the strategy for many years. Beer drinkers typically establish their brand preference in their 20s and maintain steadfast allegiance into their 30s and beyond, thus making it very difficult for advertising to effect a switch. Fallon McElligott thus formulated the Dick campaign to appeal to those under 30 without alienating older beer drinkers.

The campaign used the character of Dick to reach Generation Xers through various media, including commercials aired during The X Files, promotional tie-ins with MTV's Singled Out, contests to win a behind-the-scenes look at the shooting of Sports Illustrated's swimsuit issue along with print ads in the magazine, and even a Miller Lite World Wide Web page, where computer users could play "Dick-tac-toe." Miller Lite had traditionally geared its advertising toward sports, and the new campaign continued to do so as a way of maintaining its over-30 base while simultaneously reaching its younger target market.

As was typical of Fallon McElligott's self-reflexive tendencies, this age division became the topic of a commercial in which Dick solicited the opinions of Miller plant workers about his ad campaign. In one commercial father and son Jimmy and Clint Nelson disagreed over Dick's campaign. Predictably, Jimmy, who had worked at Miller's Fort Worth plant for 18 years, did not like the bizarre commercials, while Clint, his bearded, longhaired, tie-dyed son, did. Critics labeled this tactic a postmodern spoof on advertising, but Fallon McElligott copywriter Linus Karlsson called it honest. "It's not spoofy... It's straightforward. This is Dick; this is what he does."

Leslie Savan of the Village Voice doubted such a simplistic formulation. Rather, she claimed, the slick postmodernism of the ads veiled their objectionable content. Savan pointed out that Dick's friend Jimmy in the "Product Tester" spot happened to be black, concluding that "commercials designed to appeal to white guys who drink beer by using a black man doing slapstick and looking stupid are in dangerous territory," bordering on blaxploitation. Miller seemed to be in safer territory when it appealed to diversity directly. It hired the Dallas-based firms Lucero Bentz and Square One to create a Spanish-language spot on the soccer rivalry between Spain and Argentina and hired Frazier Smith, a New York agency specializing in urban advertising, for a pair of rap commercials featuring Ice-T and Dr. Dre.

Miller's Shaffer defended Fallon McElligott's tactics. "We don't expect people to like every ad," Shaffer said. "You can't be meaningful to everyone at once. It's the recall. People can repeat to us, frame by frame, what the commercial is about." In order for recall to translate into retail, however, the consumer must remember the brand as well as the message. Ken Gutwillig, manager of the Press Box Sports Emporium in Tampa, said that customers found the ads "clever and interesting." But he reported that less than a third of them remembered that the commercials advertised Miller Lite.

COMPETITION

Until Bud Light introduced competition in 1982, Miller Lite dominated the low-calorie beer market it had created. In the 1990s, however, the market shares of Miller Lite and Bud Light practically flip-flopped. Miller Lite began the decade controlling 33 percent of the light-beer market, compared with Bud Light's 19 percent. By 1997, however, Miller Lite's share of the light-beer market had fallen to 22 percent, while Bud Light's had risen to 30 percent. "In the flattest of beer decades, Bud Light has been such an exception to the no-growth rule that you wonder whether it's actually a beer," stated Greg Prince in Beverage World. "For five consecutive years, the brand has added volume on an annual double-digit basis. That figure has actually increased from 1994 (10 percent) to '95 (11.5 percent) to '96 (13.9 percent)."

Bud Light overtook Miller Lite in 1995 on the strength of a series of successful ad campaigns that dated to the late 1980s when Spuds Mackenzie, the cool dog with the black eye, became a cultural phenomenon. Bud Light carried this momentum into the 1990s with the catchphrases "Yes I am" and "I love you, man." According to Bob Scarpelli of DDB Needham Chicago, Budweiser's advertising agency, these phrases "established the brand as hip, and that translates into sales." Bud Light's success stemmed largely from its strategy of targeting 21- to 30-year-old men, many of whom saw themselves mirrored in Mr. Insincerity, a character who at any opportunity that might reward him with a Bud Light would utter, "I love you, man."

In 1997 Bud Light competed against "Miller Lite's Miller Time" campaign with a new campaign—"What Do We Have Here?"—in which Bud Light drinkers discovered seemingly endless supplies of their favorite beer. The competition played itself out not only in advertising but also in ad budgets. According to Competitive Media Reporting, which tracked ad expenditures, Miller Lite outspent Bud Light by $54 million to $31 million in the first half of 1997. Notwithstanding this advantage, Miller's

THE REAL DICK

Dick was, of course, a fictional character, but the man pictured in the "Miller Lite's Miller Time" advertisements really did exist. In fact, he tended bar in Seattle and played guitar in a garage band. When asked, Gina Shaffer, Miller's marketing communications manager, would not reveal the true identity of Dick—"He wants a personal life" —but she did reveal that the photo was not a 1970s vintage shot but rather a current portrait—"That's how he looks."

Johnson maintained that "the concept is outthinking, not outspending, the competition."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Fallon McElligott's real challenge in taking on the Miller Lite account was to create a strategy for making an old brand seem new. Breweries, including Miller, had spent the previous few years introducing new products, but the failure of these new items to expand the market forced a retreat to core brands. To change the perception of a product without changing the product required sleight of hand. The creative staff at Fallon McElligott dreamed up Dick to solve this problem, with the solution amounting to the simplest of ideas—advertise the advertising. Nike had already diverted attention from its products to its message, and now Fallon McElligott took the technique a further step, circling back to draw attention to the advertising itself.

Adweek pointed out the risk of this tactic: "With armpit mice and urinating cowboys, Miller Lite advertising displayed signs of going off the deep end. What some viewed as strategic bravery, others saw as advertising suicide. What you've got is a fairly desperate client and an agency that thinks it can do no wrong. That is a recipe for either brilliance or disaster." As with all advertising, Fallon McElligott's campaign, since it could not control the audience's perception, involved a calculated risk. Through calculation, however, the agency attempted to mitigate the degree of risk. "Nothing we do is reckless," said Rob White, Fallon McElligott's director of account planning. "We know exactly what we are doing. Everything is carefully researched."

In the process of exhuming its "Miller Time" slogan, Miller decided to apply the tag line of its Miller High Life brand to its other core brands, Miller Genuine Draft and Miller Lite. The concept of "Miller Time" was also revised to fit the times. Formerly, Miller High Life advertising had defined "Miller Time" for its audience as an afterwork panacea. Miller Lite advertising allowed consumers to define "Miller Time" themselves. "Miller Time" was no longer defined by the positions of the hands on a clock, for Dick redefined "Miller Time" to describe any attitude that lent itself to the enjoyment of Miller Lite.

OUTCOME

Dick continued to create controversy, but he also continued to boost beer sales, prompting Miller to extend its "Miller Time" campaign into 1998. (In mid-1997, however, it quietly dropped Dick as its spokesperson.) The campaign won the inauspicious distinction of being named the "Most Self-Conscious Attempt to be Postmodern" in Entertainment Weekly's yearly survey of advertising. Fallon McElligott swept the awards at the competition sponsored by the Advertising Federation of Minnesota and Minnesota Art Directors/Copywriters Club, including the best of show honors for the "Product Tester" spot.

In terms of sales the numbers went up slowly but steadily for Miller Lite throughout 1997. A Nielsen Scan Track following retail sales of light beer reported an increase of 0.8 percent for Miller Lite during January 1997, while Bud Light fell by 0.1 percent. From January to June Miller Lite's supermarket sales rose 12 percent. Statistics at the end of the year showed that these trends had continued, with Beverage Marketing Corporation reporting a 1.7 percent increase in domestic shipments of Miller Lite, a healthy increase considering the competitive climate of the brewing industry.

The increases in sales did not come without a price. According to Competitive Media Reporting, Miller Lite increased its first-quarter advertising budget by $16.2 million, from $22.5 million in 1996 to $38.7 million in 1997. On the whole, however, Miller Brewing still managed to raise its volume, share, and profits in 1997, a year noted for price wars. Miller's MacDonough attributed much of the company's success in 1997 to the "Miller Time" campaigns, despite, or perhaps because of, the controversy surrounding them: "We had taken a number of calculated risks in changing our advertising and our advertising agencies and changing our strategy from introducing new products every year to let's grow what we already have to rearranging what brands we're supporting.... You would think that with all those calculated risks we would have something that didn't work. What was unusual is everything worked better than we expected. We like that."

MINNESOTA PARTNERSHIP FOR ACTION AGAINST TOBACCO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco (MPAAT) was created in 1998 with funding from that state's individual out-of-court settlement of its suit against tobacco companies. Charged with a mission of encouraging adults to stop smoking, the organization supplemented counseling, support, and education services with a statewide marketing campaign. In its early years of operation, MPAAT used ads developed for similar campaigns in other states, but in 2000 it began an agency search preparatory to launching its own original antismoking advertisements. The result was a multiyear campaign, crafted by Minneapolis agency Clarity Coverdale Fury (CCF), integrating messages about secondhand smoke with the promotion of a toll-free hotline.

The MPAAT campaign, budgeted at an estimated $5 to $6 million a year, took as its starting point the notion that adult smokers were already aware of the health risks of their habit and that an advertising message capable of encouraging smokers to quit had to provide motivation beyond the effects on the individual, no matter how dramatic. The campaign thus focused on smokers' loved ones, both by making direct reference to the relatively underappreciated perils of secondhand smoke and by showing what smokers had to lose were they to die prematurely as a result of smoking. Noteworthy TV spots included one in which secondhand smoke took the form of a ghostly hand strangling an infant; one in which a grandfather bent down to catch his newly toddling infant grandson in his arms, only to have the infant walk through him, revealing that the grandfather was a ghost; and one in which a dying woman held her infant and recorded herself singing "You Are My Sunshine" as a keepsake for the child to have after the mother's imminent smoking-related death.

MPAAT claimed immediate gains in the number of smokers who had stopped smoking in front of children, and thousands of people called the toll-free helpline established to provide support for smokers making the attempt to quit. The spot featuring the dying mother and her infant was one of the only regional commercials named among Adweek's Best Spots of 2002. CCF continued to refine and develop its secondhand smoke and helpline pitches in subsequent years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Antitobacco advertising first became effective in the late 1960s, when the Federal Communications Commission ruled that TV broadcasters must donate airtime to one antitobacco advertiser for every four commercial slots sold to tobacco companies. Organizations such as the American Cancer Society, whose marketing resources were minimal compared with those of tobacco corporations, were able to push their messages, for the first time, in front of a prime-time television audience. This era of prominent antismoking messages lasted only until 1971, however, when a congressional ban on the TV advertising of tobacco products was passed. The new law meant that donated airtime became dramatically harder to come by, and the 1970s and 1980s saw a corresponding dearth of antitobacco advertising during peak viewing hours.

This situation began to change in 1988, with the passage of a California referendum calling for a tax hike on cigarettes to be used in part to fund an ambitious media campaign aimed at denormalizing tobacco use. The campaign won wide acclaim and helped reduce California's smoking rates. Several other states followed the California model of taxpayer-funded antismoking campaigns in the 1990s, and many more states went on to launch campaigns with money from the historic 1998 settlement of tobacco lawsuits filed by 46 state attorneys general.

Minnesota reached an individual out-of-court settlement with the tobacco companies in 1998 and earmarked $202 million of its $6.6 billion total payout for the endowment of a nonprofit public interest group, the Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco. MPAAT's mission was to encourage current smokers to give up the habit and make it easier for them to do so. The organization used advertising to motivate smokers to quit, and it provided counseling and information to help them see the decision through. In its first years of existence, MPAAT ran advertising originally crafted for campaigns in other states, but in 2000 the organization began planning for an original media campaign. MPAAT underwrote focus groups to arrive at the strategic outlines of the campaign and in early 2001 selected CCF to helm the effort.

TARGET MARKET

The MPAAT campaign targeted all Minnesota residents who were smokers. Focus-group preparation for the campaign had led MPAAT to the conclusion that the campaign needed to communicate more than the health risks of smoking if it were to be effective with this audience.

FIGHTING TOBACCO ON TWO FRONTS

The Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco (MPAAT) was funded by that state's 1998 settlement with tobacco companies for the specific purpose of persuading current smokers to quit. All of the organization's advertising, therefore, targeted adult smokers. MPAAT was not the only state-sponsored antitobacco advertiser in Minnesota, however. The Minnesota Department of Health launched its own campaign, "Target Market," which was, like the MPAAT work, crafted by Minneapolis agency Clarity Coverdale Fury. "Target Market" was aimed at teenagers and encouraged them to avoid tobacco use in part by pointing out the ways in which tobacco companies manipulatively targeted underage groups.

Smokers were aware of the health risks to themselves, the agency believed, but were in need of a message that would motivate them by other means to take on the arduous task of overcoming their physical addiction. Research conducted by the Centers for Disease Control had revealed, however, that smokers had divergent attitudes toward the habit and that no single approach could be trusted to speak to the whole group. CCF thus strove to "do a comprehensive campaign," creative director Jac Coverdale told Adweek, "so that everywhere people look there's lots of different messages." Each of these messages, moreover, had to avoid belittling smokers or seeming to take the moral high ground on the issue of tobacco. Though the antismoking message had to be dramatic enough to motivate people to quit smoking, CCF recognized the difficulty smokers had in quitting and sought to honor that truth in the campaign, while placing a complementary priority on transmitting respect for smokers as people.

COMPETITION

The California Department of Health Services (CDHS) continued, during this time, to devote cigarette-tax revenues to one of the nation's most ambitious antismoking efforts, typically budgeted at more than $20 million a year. One of the most well-known CDHS marketing efforts was a 1997 billboard campaign featuring cowboys on horseback overtly reminiscent of the famous Marlboro Man imagery. CDHS put new words in the cowboys' mouths, however. Copy running with one ad read,

"I miss my lung, Bob." In 2000 CDHS changed course somewhat by launching a newly aggressive assault on the integrity of tobacco companies themselves. Commercials featuring fictional tobacco executive Ken Lane began appearing in 2001 and garnered notice not just from the advertising industry and consumers but from the tobacco industry as well. The fly-on-the-wall, documentary-like TV spots showed Lane, in discussions with his colleagues, explaining with relish the insidious business practices of tobacco companies. Two real-life tobacco companies filed a lawsuit against CDHS alleging that the Lane commercials infringed on their rights and biased potential jurors in ongoing tobacco litigation. The lawsuit was eventually dismissed, and CDHS remained committed to a large-scale media campaign.

Two other states, Massachusetts and Florida, preceded Minnesota with high-profile media campaigns meant to reduce the influence of tobacco companies and limit teen smoking. The campaigns, both called "Truth," were aimed at pointing out the supposed dishonesty of the tobacco industry. One of the early Massachusetts TV spots featured Patrick Reynolds, a grandson of tobacco-company founder R.J. Reynolds, who informed viewers about the numerous harmful chemicals added to cigarettes. Noteworthy work in the Florida campaign paired images of tobacco executives giving congressional testimony with a sitcom laugh track and showed teenagers phoning tobacco companies to ask pointed questions.

The 1998 master settlement of tobacco litigation between four companies and 46 state attorneys general resulted in the creation of a public interest group called the American Legacy Foundation (ALF), among many other changes. Funded by money from the settlement, ALF supported a nationwide antismoking media campaign of unprecedented scope and budget resources. Crafted by the agencies responsible for the Massachusetts and Florida campaigns, the ALF campaign (also called "Truth") confronted tobacco companies perhaps more vigorously than any advertising that preceded it. An early series of spots focused on the filming of teenagers leaving body bags outside the corporate headquarters of Philip Morris, but the major TV networks pulled the commercials following protests by the tobacco companies.

MARKETING STRATEGY

After the results of four Minnesota focus groups revealed that both smokers and nonsmokers in the state felt that antismoking advertising needed to go beyond warnings about the personal health risks of smoking, MPAAT presented these findings to the eight Minnesota ad agencies it was considering for the account. CCF, more than the others, successfully integrated the focus-group findings with its proposed creative work. It was CCF's belief that, while individuals might not quit smoking because of health risks to themselves, the knowledge that they were harming loved ones to an extent still widely unrecognized could provide them with the necessary motivation to kick the habit. Illustrations of the dangers of secondhand smoke and of the kinds of heartbreak resulting from early death caused by smoking thus formed the basis of the emotional appeals in the campaign. CCF and MPAAT also recognized the need to provide smokers with hope in their battle with the addiction, so a 24-hour helpline was established.

Budgeted at an estimated $5 to $6 million annually, the CCF-crafted MPAAT advertising was launched in early 2001 and continued to run through 2005 with different taglines but without significant alteration in concept, with TV, radio, outdoor, and print elements, all of which conformed to the same overall strategy. Early on CCF negotiated with TV broadcasters, radio stations, newspapers, and owners of outdoor advertising spaces, securing additional placement time for no additional charge by asking these outlets to consider the ads part of their commitment to public service initiatives. CCF thereby gained access, in the campaign's first year, to 34 percent more TV time than it paid for, as well as 76 percent more time to run outdoor ads.

Many individual executions were intended to jolt smokers unpleasantly, while others used humor to illustrate the dangers of secondhand smoke or to promote the helpline. In all of the campaign advertising, CCF took pains to avoid any hint of insult or condescension. An early TV spot portrayed secondhand smoke as a phantom hand reaching out to choke a baby, and a poster showed a pet bird killed in its cage by secondhand smoke. Another TV spot from the campaign's first year showed a grandfather crouching delightedly to hug his toddling grandson, who had just learned to walk, but the child walked through the grandfather, revealing that the grandfather was a ghost. A similarly direct radio spot featured a helpline caller whose unpleasantly coarse, croaking voice was the result of having her larynx and vocal cords removed because of throat cancer.

"Sunshine," perhaps the MPAAT effort's most arresting TV spot, appeared as the centerpiece of the 2002 installment of the campaign. The commercial showed a young woman, bald and wearing a knitted cap, setting up a home-movie camera while holding her infant daughter. Speaking to the camera, the mother said, "Hi, Emma. It's Mommy, and this is you. Emma, Mommy's really sick." Going on to explain that she wanted to give her daughter something to remember her by, the mother, all the while trying to suppress her palpable torment at the situation, sang "You Are My Sunshine'' to the obliviously curious infant. At the end of the plaintive song, text appeared onscreen reading, ''Be there tomorrow. Stop smoking today.'' The toll-free helpline number then appeared.

Other spots conveyed their antismoking message with more humor. One spot showed a man in the passenger seat of a car silently lighting a cigarette. The woman driving responded by jerking the car's wheel so that the car sped through a meadow and narrowly missed an enormous tree as the smoking passenger screamed for his life. When the driver casually returned the car to the road, she informed the man, ''You're endangering my life. I'm just returning the favor.'' Another showed a man at a dinner party being pulled out of his seat, pinned against the wall, and dragged outside of the house by an unseen force. The man then lit a cigarette and a voice-over explained, ''It's tough to fight the urge to smoke. With help, you're seven times more likely to quit.'' The helpline number then appeared onscreen.

OUTCOME

Three months after the campaign's launch, MPAAT sponsored a survey whose findings indicated that more than 70 percent of Minnesota's smokers had curtailed their smoking around children because of MPAAT's advertising. Another survey indicated that 60 to 70 percent of those surveyed recalled the advertising, and a large number of respondents had extremely specific memories of the advertising. During the campaign's first year more than 5,000 people called the MPAAT helpline to ask for help in quitting smoking. In 2002, after the TV spot featuring the grandfather who turned out to be a ghost was picked up for airing in California, a reference to the commercial as ''chilling'' appeared on the popular prime-time sitcom Friends, testifying to the spot's power and talk value, and the commercial ''Sunshine'' was chosen as one of Adweek 's Best Spots of 2002. As of 2003 more than 10,000 Minnesota smokers had called the MPAAT helpline, and more than 7,800 had sought counseling. The campaign continued to evolve in 2004 and 2005.

WAKE UP AND DRIVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mired in a slump caused by sinking sales, a dwindling market share, an anonymous image, and an ill-defined marketing drive, Mitsubishi Motors North America, Inc., (then called Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America) introduced an updated version of its midsize sedan, the Galant, in August 1998. Mitsubishi saw this redesign as an opportunity to reinvigorate the company's brand image, and it selected the advertising agency Deutsch, Inc., of New York and Marina del Ray, California, to craft a campaign that would not only distinguish the Galant from its more established rivals but that would also prove strong enough to apply to the entire line of Mitsubishi automobiles.

The resulting $50 million campaign, tagged "Wake Up and Drive," focused on TV, with supporting print, outdoor, and Internet elements. The commercials positioned the Galant as an alternative to the staid family sedan through the use of a pulsing sound track, quick-cutting footage of the Galant barreling down rural and urban streets, and flashes of text messages designed to appear as though they were emerging from the road. The text transmitted the campaign's controlling theme: that responsible adults could remain youthful at heart and choose their automobiles accordingly. As Mitsubishi began to find success with this style-focused pitch, it awarded its entire $180 million-plus U.S. advertising account to Deutsch, which set about applying the theme to the full range of Mitsubishi automobiles. When paired with its affordable compact and sports cars—the Lancer and Eclipse—in particular, the "Wake Up and Drive" pitch more openly courted younger buyers.

Mitsubishi successfully created a youthful and energetic brand identity, surpassing Volkswagen as the automaker with the largest portion of under-35 drivers. North American sales grew by roughly 80 percent over the campaign's five-year run, and in 2002 Mitsubishi predicted further growth of an additional 70 percent or more in the following five years. These predictions proved drastically off the mark, however, as it became apparent that Mitsubishi's sales gains were partly attributable to untenable lending practices. Many of the young people who had bought Mitsubishi vehicles as a result of the brand's newly youthful image began to default on their loans, and when Mitsubishi tightened its lending regulations, sales plummeted back to their pre-1999 levels.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Mitsubishi began operating in the United States in 1982. In 1994 the company sold 230,279 cars in that market and anticipated setting sales records well into the future. None followed, however, and Mitsubishi instead failed to break the 200,000-car mark again. In fact, its share of the U.S. car market dropped from 1.5 percent in 1994 to 1.2 percent in 1997. Sales for 1997 were 12.2 percent lower than in 1996, and even more disturbing was the Galant's performance, which was down 35.1 percent from the prior year. Likely contributing to the free fall was the fact that the company was rated below average in several customer-satisfaction surveys. "Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America has just about hit bottom," AutoWeek pronounced.

Mitsubishi's woes were significantly exacerbated by its image—or lack thereof. "As the market gets more cluttered, it is incredibly important for a manufacturer to have a distinct image that is easy for consumers to understand," an industry analyst told the Los Angeles Times. But when Mitsubishi quizzed customer focus groups about its brand image, they had difficulty associating the name with any of its vehicles. The campaign that its ad agency, G2 Advertising, had created, called "Built for Living," with its scenes of Mitsubishi vehicles being used in everyday situations, had done little to correct this problem. Moreover, since the company often used rebates and price cuts to drive sales for the Galant, the sedan tended to draw a customer base of bargain hunters rather than Mitsubishi enthusiasts. The company's newly appointed executive vice president and chief operating officer, Pierre Gagnon, summed up "Built for Living" as a better "corporate philosophy" than "brand statement," according to Automotive News. With the debut of the Galant looming large, a change was needed. Mitsubishi had hired Deutsch to conceive a dealer-oriented campaign in April 1998 and was pleased with the irreverent tone of the spots. Deutsch was therefore assigned the new Galant campaign as well.

TARGET MARKET

"Wake Up and Drive" sought to remedy the errors of earlier campaigns. After determining its initial target audience to be consumers under the age of 45, typically married, and with an annual household income above $55,000, Mitsubishi strategized about the best ways to reach this demographic group. The company's solution was to pitch the Galant as an antidote to the drab routines and responsibilities of adulthood. Recognizing that its chief competitors, the Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corp., were unassailable in their reputations for quality and reliability, Mitsubishi opted to present the Galant as an exciting alternative to bland family sedans. "Wake Up and Drive" delivered "a sharp jab into the restless heart of the carpool driver," the Wall Street Journal opined, and "pull[ed] hard on the last youthful cravings for excitement in sedan buyers." While its target audience shouldered the duties of marriage and parenthood, they chafed at the notion of getting old and dull. "We're talking to that youthful spirit that lives in all of us—the one that wants to look attractive, to have fun, to stay young," a company spokesperson told the Bloomington Pantagraph.

COPYCAT?

After the successful release of the "Wake Up and Drive" campaign, two ad agencies representing other car companies accused Deutsch of stealing ideas from their earlier auto campaigns. Ron Lawner of Arnold Communications and Pat Fallon of Fallon McElligott scoffed that pieces of "Wake Up and Drive" were wholly derived from their creative work for Volkswagen and BMW. "That's so comical I can't even dignify it with a response," retorted Donny Deutsch of Deutsch to Adweek. "The children should go back to their crayons."

As the "Wake Up and Drive" tagline and high-energy approach was extended to other Mitsubishi models, including the Eclipse sports car and the Lancer compact—neither of which were aimed primarily at a family market—the youth-oriented nature of Mitsubishi's brand image became more and more pronounced, tailored to the literally young rather than to the merely young at heart. The company paired its energized brand personality with financing offers that made it strikingly easy for younger consumers to qualify for loans. By late 2002, at the apex of the marketing campaign's success, Mitsubishi had bested Volkswagen as the American auto industry's leading youth brand: 42 percent of Mitsubishi buyers were under 35, compared with 41 percent for Volkswagen.

COMPETITION

As the ninth-biggest car company in the United States, Mitsubishi's decision to avoid fighting its giant rivals on their own turf was a logical one. The midsize sedan category of cars to which the Galant belonged was the largest-selling segment of the American auto market. Three of the seven best-selling cars were midsize sedans. "The segment is brutal," an industry analyst told the Orange County Business Journal. Mitsubishi faced fierce opposition from the Honda Accord, the Toyota Camry, and the Ford Taurus in its bid to gain a greater share of this sector with the updated Galant. Those vehicles perennially vied for the rank of the best-selling car in the United States. Moreover, each of these three companies had introduced updated versions of their sedans since 1996.

The Camry had topped U.S. sales charts in both 1997 and 1998. Toyota had released a redesigned Camry in 1996, supporting it with a $50 million television, magazine, outdoor, and direct-mail campaign, using the simple slogan "The New Camry. Better Than Ever." According to the June 30, 1997, Advertising Age, the ads were "as understated as the car." With the debut of its brandwide "Everyday" campaign in the fall of 1997, Toyota incorporated Camry spots into this umbrella effort. Quite the opposite of "Wake Up and Drive," Saatchi & Saatchi's campaign for Toyota glorified the mundane. Instead of presenting the Camry as an escape route, "Everyday" showcased the multiple meanings of everyday: not only was the Camry ideal for "everyday" use, it would also be there "every day." This stolid and reliable image helped Toyota control an impressive 8.1 percent of the U.S. car market.

Honda debuted a redesigned Accord in 1997 and inaugurated a campaign touting the car's new advances that same year. Created by Honda's longtime ad agency Rubin Postaer & Associates, this massive "An Accord like No Other" campaign evoked the Accord's long legacy in the United States. Like Toyota, Honda highlighted its conservative side in these sedan ads. As the Washington Times noted, "never have its cars been the most stylish or the most powerful, but always competent and with no vices. They just deliver all the features with a high degree of satisfaction, and seldom is there any item to complain about." Later Accord campaigns continued to underscore this reputation with simple, clean ads that always made the car the hero. One 1998 commercial depicted a stressed traveler finding sanctuary in her Accord. "It's not just a car. It's a state of mind," declared the tagline.

When it introduced its all-new Taurus in 1996, Ford repositioned the car as affordable and family-friendly. But over the next two years Ford changed directions in its Taurus advertising, particularly in 1997 ads created by J. Walter Thompson USA, which used NASCAR themes to emphasize that the Taurus had recently entered the racing circuit. But during the Winter Olympic Games in February 1998, Ford returned to the basics with a new brandwide campaign. These commercials, which told stories centered on various Ford products, were narrated by actor John Corbett. One spot portrayed a Taurus owner reconciling with her father. By November 1998 Ford had committed to continuing its efforts to emphasize primarily brands over individual models.

By presenting the Galant in a different light from the more traditional Camry, Accord, and Taurus, Mitsubishi strove to forge a unique brand image for its sedan. At the opposite end of the spectrum from Toyota's paean to everyday life, Mitsubishi "show[ed] itself as making its drivers look cool," explained the Orange County Business Journal. The aggressive rock songs chosen for the commercials' sound tracks implied that the Galant was no stolid "family-mobile" but rather that it was rebellious and sporty. The spots were filmed in rapidly shifting spurts, which conveyed a sense of speed and made the spots look more like music videos than traditional commercials. The accompanying captions, however, were the heart of "Wake Up and Drive." One commercial, which depicted the Galant zooming around urban streets illuminated only by a neon glow, proclaimed, "You have a family / You have a house / You have a dog / You have a pulse." Another commercial delivered an additional wry commentary: "The other soccer moms will talk." At its core, "Wake Up and Drive" poked at the raw nerve of insecurity lurking within family-oriented consumers who were not ready to declare themselves "middle-aged" or "terminally responsible." According to the Wall Street Journal, "the idea [wa]s to lure . . . soccer moms and baseball dads who don't really see themselves in a Toyota Camry or a Honda Accord."

Although the new brand personality was initially tied to the August 1998 Galant launch, Mitsubishi hoped, from the outset, that "Wake Up and Drive" would resonate among consumers to a degree that would justify adapting the platform to other models. It was "an opportunity for us to re-launch this franchise," Gagnon told the Bloomington Pantagraph. Satisfied with the initial buzz surrounding the Galant introduction, the company applied the campaign tagline and concept in November of that year to commercials for its Montero SUV. Set to heavy-metal legend Ozzy Osbourne's song "Crazy Train," the commercial was even aired during the 1999 Super Bowl—a first for Mitsubishi.

Mitsubishi expressed delight with Deutsch amid growing signs of the campaign's success, and in 1999 it awarded the agency the entire ad account for its U.S. operations, at an estimated total budget of more than $180 million. "Wake Up and Drive" subsequently became the rallying cry for the whole Mitsubishi line, and the agency continued to produce corporate-image advertising notable for its evocations of youthful energy and overt appeals to vanity. This branding strategy was particularly apparent in a 1999 installment of the campaign announcing a new redesign of the Eclipse sports car. Crafted to appeal to both young people and older men having midlife crises, as Deutsch's executive vice president and creative director Eric Hirshberg told Advertising Age, the new Eclipse commercials were characterized by an emphasis on sex appeal. For instance, the voice-over in one spot posed the following set of questions: "If you had to be stranded on a deserted island with just one other person, who would it be? A boat builder? Or a survival expert? Perhaps a fisherman? Or would it just be someone who looks really good in a swimsuit?'' The redesigned Eclipse was then shown speeding into view, and the voice-over continued, ''There are more sensible choices, but who cares?''

With sales of the Galant and Eclipse surging, in 2000 ''Wake Up and Drive'' focused on the 2001 models of the Eclipse Spyder, a new convertible, and the Montero, as Mitsubishi upped its overall advertising budget by roughly 20 percent over 1999, to an estimated $223 million. In 2001 the company again boosted spending, devoting a large portion of its budget to the U.S. launch of its Lancer compact car, which was then popular in Europe. The affordable Lancer was seen as a way of enhancing Mitsubishi's allure among young and first-time car buyers, and the spots in which it was featured incorporated music from youth-oriented rock bands such as the Barenaked Ladies. Mitsubishi's focus on the music of lesser-known and younger artists during these years made practical as well as strategic sense. The licensing fees for such songs were, of course, substantially smaller than those for mainstream hits, but also, as Hirshberg told the New York Times, ''It gives street cred to Mitsubishi and shows that they are not just a corporation with a big budget, but a brand cool enough to tell you what's new.'' Prominent Mitsubishi spots in 2001–02 focused on young people inside cars, moving to the music that had become increasingly central to the campaign.

OUTCOME

''The . . . ads are bringing people into the dealerships,'' Mitsubishi's Gagnon said in the November 2, 1998, issue of Advertising Age. ''We're getting Accord and Camry buyers, who never shopped us before.'' By September 1998 Mitsubishi had sold 4,691 Galants (compared to 2,366 the prior year), and by year's end the number had shot up to 44,202. The company's total American car sales edged closer to the 200,000 mark for 1998, thanks in no small part to the Galant launch. The 2000 Eclipse redesign, introduced in the summer of 1999, was equally successful, and surging sales of these two models helped the company achieve record-breaking sales in late 1999 and a full-year total of 261,254 cars sold in the United States. By 2002, despite the intervening difficulties presented by the economic recession and geopolitical turmoil, Mitsubishi sales in North America—the overwhelming majority of which were in the United States—approached 350,000. Mitsubishi seemed well on the road to recovery in the United States. Gagnon predicted that the automaker would annually sell 600,000 cars in North America by 2007.

In 2003, however, it became apparent that in pairing its ''Wake Up and Drive'' brand identity with easy credit deals, Mitsubishi had pushed sales among an untenable target market. So-called ''zero-zero-zero'' loan packages specifically created with young buyers in mind allowed customers to take possession of new Mitsubishi cars with no down payment, no monthly payments for an introductory period of time (often six months), and with zero percent financing once payment became due. Many of the 20-somethings who bought Mitsubishis under these terms were unable to make payments after the introductory phase of ownership passed, and as the Wall Street Journal reported, the result was ''an avalanche of defaults.'' When Mitsubishi responded by increasing its loan requirements, sales plummeted. In 2003 the company posted full-year U.S. sales losses of 25.6 percent. The following year was even worse for Mitsubishi in America: sales declined by an additional 37 percent.

MONSANTO IMAGE CAMPAIGNS

OVERVIEW

In 1994 St. Louis-based agribusiness giant Monsanto introduced Posilac, a drug designed to raise cows' milk production. Sold through the company's dairy division, formerly known as Protiva, the product was marketed to dairy farmers; yet in order to gain larger acceptance for Posilac, it became necessary to sell the public on the drug, which contained the genetically engineered chemical BST, or bovine somatotropin. The company began a limited image campaign for the product in 1994, and it used methods that by 1998 gained much wider exposure for its genetically modified (GM) food products, primarily in Europe. Concerns over GM foods both at home and abroad, where one of Monsanto's outspoken critics was England's Prince Charles, motivated the company to invest $1.6 million in its European campaign in 1998, along with an undisclosed amount on U.S. advertising. British ads were created by the firm of Bartle Bogle Hegarty and in the United States by the St. Louis office of the Sargent & Potratz advertising agency. Monsanto spent $80 million overall on consumer advertising in 1998.

Monsanto made a variety of chemical products, including Roundup, one of the world's leading herbicides; and NutraSweet, the leading artificial sweetener; and a number of pharmaceuticals, marketed through its Searle line. Monsanto products had not been without controversy, however, and that was particularly true of Posilac and GM foods. From a financial standpoint and in terms of distribution, Posilac had proven a success by the end of 1998, with Monsanto reporting that 100 million doses of the drug had been distributed since it began marketing more than four years before. But image concerns remained, suggesting an uncertain future for consumer advertising on the part of the company. Trade advertising, on the other hand, seemed relatively stable.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Despite the fact that its products were as much a part of daily life as the areas they addressed, Monsanto itself was hardly a household name. Founded in 1901 by John Queeny in St. Louis, the company's first product was saccharin, a popular sugar substitute until the advent of Monsanto's own NutraSweet. The company went public in 1927, by which time its products included caffeine, aspirin, and other chemical goods. During World War II, it supplied the first synthetic tires used by the U.S. Army.

In the 1960s and 1970s the company introduced several herbicides, the most successful being Roundup, which debuted in 1973. In the preceding year, Monsanto discontinued saccharin production, and later bought the licensing rights to NutraSweet, the brand name for the artificial sweetener aspartame. This occurred in 1985, the same year the company acquired the G.D. Searle pharmaceuticals firm.

In 1993 it enhanced its already large lawn-care line with the purchase of Ortho from Chevron.

In the mid-1990s, under the leadership of former Searle executive Robert Shapiro, the company expanded its pharmaceutical offerings, and in 1996 purchased a minority interest in DEKALB Genetics. In collaboration with DEKALB, Monsanto introduced a strain of soybean which could withstand herbicides such as Roundup. During this period, it also greatly expanded its agribusiness area, moving more and more into GM foods.

In 1994 Monsanto introduced Posilac, and after winning Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approval for the use of the bovine somatotropin product, it was required to undertake a thorough post-approval study. The company presented the results to the FDA's Veterinary Medicine Advisory Committee (VMAC) in November 1996. In a hearing to assess the study, VMAC addressed two questions, according to Food Chemical News: "whether the proposed revised label for Posilac provided adequate directions for farmers [on the use of the product] and whether the results of Monsanto's Post-Approval Monitoring Program adequately addressed the safety of the milk supply. After daylong presentations, the Food and Drug Administration's advisory committee answered yes to both questions."

TARGET MARKET

The FDA and VMAC were hardly the only barriers Monsanto had to face in gaining approval for Posilac, however; there was public opinion to consider. Technically, the consumers of Posilac had no opinion, since they were cows, not humans. As for the cows' owners, dairy farmers in the United States and Europe, a large portion were enthusiastic about a product that would enhance profitability on their farms. But there were the consumers of dairy products to consider; and as with other twentieth-century technological innovations, such as nuclear power or experiments in cloning, chemical enhancement of food production frightened many people.

Almost from the beginning, Posilac encountered criticism from consumer groups concerned about the potential side effects of using drugs to enhance milk production. The company's first response in the form of advertising came with a 30-second television commercial run exclusively in the key dairy state of Wisconsin. The company targeted the February 1994 spot for that state, a Monsanto spokesman told Robert Steyer of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, "because it's been the hotbed of activity. We thought it might get our message out better."

By 1998 Monsanto had come to increasingly position itself as a so-called life sciences company rather than as a chemical manufacturer. In so doing, it keyed in on the growing interest among the baby-boomer population in enhancing their lifestyles or, to use a variation on an old DuPont advertising slogan that fell into disfavor during the 1960s, "better living through chemistry." Stephanie Thompson reported in Brandweek in 1998 that "nutraceuticals," scientifically developed food products, were gaining acceptance among baby boomers, and Monsanto developed much of its marketing around this trend. Its food and nutrition businesses, Thompson wrote, were "all newly repositioned under the banner of 'Food, Health, Hope.'" Thus a company spokesman told her that Monsanto was well-positioned to "take the best of all areas and identify the consumer market and consumer needs that other companies aren't qualified to do."

COMPETITION

Chemicals to increase food production, or a drug that could enhance milk production by 10 to 20 percent, were bound to have their adherents, and not just among farmers. Central to the 1994 Wisconsin television spots was Dr. Ronald E. Kleinman, associate professor of pediatrics at Harvard Medical School and former chairman of the American Academy of Pediatrics's nutrition committee. In the commercials Kleinman, who reportedly received no payment for his endorsement, announced that Posilac was every bit as "safe, nutritious, and wholesome" as the milk produced by cows who had not used it. He also warned viewers, "Don't let anyone scare you into reducing milk consumption."

The primary competition for Posilac or GM foods came not from other agribusiness companies such as Archer Daniels Midland or ConAgra, but from consumer groups and others who were just as likely to oppose the efforts of those companies to create better living—and better food production—through chemistry. Taking a sardonic tone, Kirkpatrick Sale wrote in the Nation in early 1999, "The old Monsanto was a chemical company, and had been since 1901, but its chemical division was spun off into a separate company in 1997. The new Monsanto is, as it puts it, 'a life sciences company,' which means that it is interested in creating, controlling, patenting, and profiting from life." Sale went on to note that "bovine growth hormone, though it has been adopted by enough dairy farmers in the United States to make it a profitable line, is still resisted by many farmers and consumers." Much of the opposition came from the same baby-boomer population segment that, according to Thompson's 1998 Brandweek report, had become increasingly more open to the idea of scientifically enhanced food products. If ever there was a baby-

GETTING THE MESSAGE ACROSS—INSIDE THE COMPANY

Julekha Dash in Software Magazine compared the corporate culture at Monsanto's dairy division, formerly known as Protiva, to that of an Ivy League university. "Okay," Dash admitted, "so the St. Louis-based provider of agricultural and pharmaceutical goods isn't exactly Harvard University." But consultants with Renaissance, an information technologies firm, "say the atmosphere of the 150-person [division] . . . was similar to the one you find in the academic world. Employees are highly trained scientists with PhDs and specialties in areas such as biology, chemistry, and genetics. And they guard their knowledge carefully."

Naturally they guard that knowledge from Monsanto's competitors—but what happens when members of a company's brain trust keep information from each other? "That was the problem," Dash wrote. "The fiercely independent culture of this group conflicted with Monsanto's knowledge management program, a company-wide strategic initiative whose objectives necessitated that employees share information using collaborative tools." Renaissance attacked the problem by arranging regular sessions in which management explained decisions to employees and stressed the contributions of individuals to overall performance. Under the guidance of Renaissance consultants, software developers at Protiva engaged in workshops and training sessions that offered an opportunity for various professionals to gather and discuss collaboration methods. Using these and other measures, Renaissance ran a pilot phase of its new program with the objective of involving three project teams in the process. Results exceeded expectations, with a total of eight teams involved by the end of the four-week pilot phase in January 1998. "What we managed to convince" the group, a Renaissance executive told Dash, "is [that] it is their collective knowledge that brings power. That was a major milestone."

boomer-style company, it was Ben & Jerry's ice cream, which according to Sale won a lawsuit that allowed it to label its ice cream as being free of all recombinant bovine growth hormones.

In fact, Ben & Jerry's home state of Vermont passed a bill requiring that suppliers of bovine growth hormones be licensed by the state agricultural commissioner. In January 1998 Monsanto challenged the legislation with a letter to Governor Howard Dean, state agriculture commissioner Leon Graves, and members of the Vermont dairy industry. Governor Dean later indicated that he would veto the bill, but only because an apparent majority of Vermont farmers opposed it.

Monsanto faced similar challenges over genetically modified foods in Europe in 1997 and 1998. When the company hired British ad agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty to create an image campaign in 1997, the agency's Soho office was besieged by a group of naked protesters. No less a figure than Charles, the Prince of Wales, weighed in against GM foods in June 1998, saying, "We don't know the long-term consequences for human health and the wider environment of releasing plants bred in this way."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Monsanto's 1998 image efforts for Posilac in the United States were muted compared to the campaign it ran simultaneously in Britain to counter fears concerning GM foods, and indeed the latter effort illustrates much about Monsanto image advertising on either side of the Atlantic. The Bartle Bogle Hegarty ads, launched in June 1998, were "designed to be objective and considered [that is, thoughtful] rather than 'adsy' or gimmicky," according to Ruth Nicholas in Marketing, "and to provide information and present the strengths of GM foods in a measured way." A Monsanto representative told Nicholas, "We want to give people information, and we are quite comfortable with the coverage."

As part of the three-month campaign, Monsanto urged customers to call a toll-free information line, visit its website—and even obtain the views of opposing organizations. Advertising warned that in the future, foods without genetically modified ingredients would become increasingly expensive. This led to a backlash from many groups, despite the company's apparent efforts at openness. A representative of the environmental activist organization Greenpeace told Alex Scott of Chemical Week, "If you compare [Monsanto's] campaign with any previous ones, it tells an interesting story—that of ignoring consumer concern. Consumers don't need a fancy advertising campaign. They need better labeling."

Greenpeace and other activist groups were not the only forces arrayed against Monsanto's efforts to enhance the company image and educate the public concerning its scientific innovations in food production. When Monsanto's international government affairs director Marcia Hale said that "it will become very expensive for the manufacturer and the consumer'' not to use GM foods in the future, a representative of the British supermarket chain Iceland referred to this as a ''frightening'' sign of things to come. Iceland became the first retail chain in Britain to refuse to market foods with GM ingredients.

OUTCOME

In March 1999 the United Kingdom Advertising Standards Authority (ASA) upheld 6 of 13 complaints filed by the Green Party, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, and other groups of environmentalists against Monsanto. The ASA report claimed that the company had provided ''misleading'' information in the campaign. During the same month, Sale's lengthy article in the Nation noted that the image campaign had arrived in the United States, using the slogan ''Biodiversity . . . matters to Monsanto.''

In response to criticisms, the company produced and distributed a ''Report on Sustainable Development'' in late 1998. The report acknowledged that ''some of what we're doing—especially in agricultural biotechnology—raises questions in the minds of many people.'' It also promised that ''we'll continue to listen to all points of view . . . and to engage in honest and respectful communications.'' In line with the strategy of openness that Monsanto had used in its European campaign, the report even included statements from detractors such as the German Friends of the Earth, another environmental group.

Monsanto switched its U.S. advertising account in January 1999 from Sargent & Potratz, which thereupon closed its St. Louis office, to Osborne & Barr. According to the Delaney Report, the company ''is finding that its problems in areas such as pharmaceuticals and biotechnology are having a spill-over impact on how it markets its products to consumers.'' As a result, it planned to drastically cut its $80 million global consumer advertising budget. A source told the Delaney Report, ''There is a 'tomorrow' mentality at [Monsanto] right now. Marketing money for today is being put on hold while management regathers itself for the future.''

Although the company had faced a number of challenges in its image marketing to consumers, products such as Posilac continued to thrive. In December 1998 Monsanto reported that 100 million doses of the drug had been sold since its introduction four and a half years before. Furthermore, a company representative told Food Chemical News, ''Sales [of Posilac] are increasing. Our sales this year are 30 percent higher than in 1997, and sales in 1997 were up 30 percent over 1996.''

TODAY'S THE DAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Monster, formerly known as Monster.com, persevered through the tech industry downturn of early 2001 by maintaining its position as the most used job website in the world. In 2004, besides being the top online recruitment company for Germany and India, Monster held half of America's online job-recruitment market and 10 percent of America's combined online and print market. Monster offered ads for employers that were cheaper and more visible than newspaper ads. For job seekers Monster offered a free résumé-building service and job-opening alert tools, and it allowed employees to post their résumés for free. This bundle of features, along with Monster's marketing strategy, helped the company's database of résumés rise from 26 million in 2003 to 34 million by 2005. In that year Monster.com boasted 800,000 unique monthly visitors.

Often criticized for overspending on marketing expenditures, Monster's founder and CEO, Andrew J. McKelvey, spent $125 million on worldwide advertising in 2004, launching campaigns across television, radio, print, and the Internet. One $50 million campaign, "Today's the Day," originated with New-York based ad agency Deutsch, which handled Monster's creative efforts until 2005. The first 30-second spot in the "Today's the Day" campaign aired on December 26, 2003, during the College Bowl Championship Series. Two others spots were aired on February 1, 2004, during Super Bowl XXXVIII. The three spots ran in rotation on network television and national cable until the campaign ended on April 12, 2004. Targeting a wide range of skilled, salaried, and hourly job seekers as well as both national and local employers, the first spot began with a voice-over asking, "Will today be the day . . .?" It then showed ordinary people, including a man and woman lying in bed, a woman showering, a young woman applying makeup while riding the bus, and a man adjusting his tie. Unlike Monster's 1999 "When I Grow Up" campaign, which had facetiously depicted children yearning for the banal qualities of corporate America, "Today's the Day" was meant to inspire employees to further their careers and their lives.

"Over the past ten years, Monster has become one of the most recognizable global brands," Jeff Taylor, Monster.com's global director, told Adweek. "Our 2004 plan, defined by continuous advertising, a multi-faceted online marketing strategy and ongoing sponsorships, is designed to further maximize our brand recognition as the online recruitment leader." Ten months after the first spot aired Monster reported $618.1 million in revenue, far surpassing the $499.2 million earned in the same period during 2003. The campaign helped Monster to continue its domination of the online job-recruitment market over competitors such as CareerBuilder and HotJobs.com, the latter a unit of Yahoo! Inc.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Monster Worldwide, Inc., the parent company of Monster, was founded by McKelvey in 1967 as TMP Worldwide. It grew to be one of the world's largest recruitment agency networks. Monster.com, which was launched in 1994, achieved industry renown in 1999 by being the first dot-com to air ads during the Super Bowl. Created by the Mullen agency in Wenham, Massachusetts, the campaign "When I Grow Up" included three 30-second spots that aired during Super Bowl XXXIII. Costing $4 million, the ads featured children saying such things as "When I grow up, I want to file all day" or "I want to climb my way up to middle management." By late 2003 Monster had awarded advertising responsibilities to Deutsch, an agency based in New York. Bryan Black, senior vice president of Deutsch, told Shoot, "Monster felt like they had grown up a bit, and they wanted the voice to be a little bit more mature and also a bit more appropriate for the day and age we live in right now." In 2003 Monster.com was renamed Monster.

Using the inexpensive advertising capabilities and worldwide visibility of the Internet, Monster tried overtaking newspapers' market share of help-wanted advertising. The concept fanned excitement during the 1990s tech boom and helped Monster Worldwide's stock peak at $10 billion. The company, and McKelvey especially, were criticized, however, for spending too much on advertising and not enough on the development of technology. Nonetheless, Monster saw its shares skyrocket from $10 in 1998 to $85 in 2000. Monster also increased its partnerships by sponsoring the 2004 U.S. Olympic team and joining with WeightWatchers.com after 19 percent of Monster's users listed "losing weight" as their top resolution for 2004. By 2005 Monster had shifted the creative responsibilities for its advertising from Deutsch to Boston-based agency Brand Content.

TARGET MARKET

In December 2003 Taylor told Adweek, "The 'Today's the Day' campaign is alive, encouraging and hopeful. As we embark on the new year, it is these inspirational qualities that empower job seekers everywhere to take control of their careers and realize their dreams and aspirations." The campaign's broad target, according to Scott Lahde of Deutsch, consisted of "salaried, hourly and skilled, national and local job seekers and employers." The campaign also targeted the growing population of young workers who were more inclined to use a computer than a newspaper when looking for help-wanted ads. "Monster's Website reportedly has become obligatory viewing among college-grad job seekers, and others hip to the online job-hunting scene," wrote Andrew Bary in Barron's. Television spots featured mostly white-collar urbanites wearing business attire and looking hopeful about finding new jobs.

Monster wanted the "Today's the Day" campaign to be different from the deadpan nature of its 1999 "When I Grow Up" ads and to inspire viewers to achieve greater things. " 'Today's the Day' is the perfect encouragement to get people to do something to change their lives right now. Right this second," Kathy Delaney, managing partner and executive creative director at Deutsch, told Business Wire. During the campaign Monster increased its sales staff and marketing expenditures to attract blue-collar workers and small-business employers. The initial effort hurt Monster's margins, but McKelvey believed that it would pay off for the company in years to come.

In the first month of the "Today's the Day" campaign Monster released findings that 93 percent of Americans would look for a new job during 2004. By the end of 2004 Monster's self-assessment index, called the Monster Employment Index, showed that the demand for employees had risen from 134 points in July to 151 points by September. According to the index, the health-care industry reflected the largest growth throughout 2004.

COMPETITION

Monster's closest competitor was CareerBuilder, founded in 1995 and based in Chicago. It sold advertisements to employers at $100 below Monster's baseline price. In 2003 visitors to the CareerBuilder website could peruse more than 600,000 jobs and 10 million résumés. That same year CareerBuilder's sales reached $31 million. Although this was only a small fraction of Monster's $424 million, CareerBuilder posted greater sales growth during 2003, 17 percent as opposed to only 1.9 percent for Monster. Cramer-Krasselt, an agency headquartered in Chicago, launched a national ad campaign for the company in 2003, coinciding with Monster's "Today's the Day" campaign. It was reported that CareerBuilder spent $20 million on the ads, which included television spots featuring employees trying to escape the monotony of their jobs. In one commercial, for example, a bank teller pretended to rob a bank and then meekly tiptoed away. Another 30-second spot featured a blue-collar worker escaping from his factory by crawling inside an enormous teddy bear. The ads were followed by the tagline "The smarter way to find a better job," a subtle jab at market leader Monster.

In 2004 HotJobs.com, which had been acquired by Yahoo! in 2002, ranked third in the online recruitment industry, with 10 percent of the market. HotJobs promoted itself primarily through HotJobs Career Expo job fairs and directly through Yahoo!.com, the world's second most used search engine. In 2003 HotJobs expanded

TRUMP DANCES FOR MONSTER

Monster's signature mascot, Trump, the animated green monster that resembled a prehistoric toad, was redesigned for the "Today's the Day" campaign. Ad agency Deutsch hired the animation director John Kricfalusi, who had also developed the television hit The Ren & Stimpy Show, to reconstruct the mascot. The airing of the 30-second spot "Today" on December 26, 2003, was Trump's first appearance in cel animation, as opposed to his previous appearances in computer-generated animation (CGI). "He looks great in CGI, and I always thought that was an amazing piece of animation," Scott Schindler, Deutsch's vice president/associate creative director/art director, told Shoot. "But we felt this was a new campaign, and also when people do interact with Trump on the Monster site or see him in print, he is flat. He is a 2-D cartoon. So we wanted to capitalize on that and animate him so that he looked like what he does in print and on the Website."

its ad efforts with the release in the top 10 markets of 30- and 60-second television spots created by the New York–based agency Bouchez & Kent. In addition, there were print ads, and Internet ads were released across Yahoo!'s related websites. In 2004 HotJobs recruited applicants for The Apprentice, NBC's number one program, in return for brand placement, including HotJobs ads on the doors of the taxis carrying "fired" contestants leaving the show.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The initial 30-second spot in the "Today's the Day" campaign was "Today," first aired on December 26, 2003, during the College Bowl Championship Series. Edited by Hank Corwin of the film-editing company Lost Planet, "Today" featured a montage of 20- to 30-something urbanites getting ready for work. The commercial quickly moved through scenes that included a man and woman waking up in bed, a woman showering, a man exercising, and a woman applying makeup as she rode a city bus. During the montage a female voice-over asked various questions: "Will today be the day that starts the rest of the days?" "Will it be the day you put on your suit?" "Will it be the day you don't hit snooze?" The questions sometimes directly addressed the images. The spot ended with Monster's signature mascot, a bright-green and purple cartoon monster named Trump dancing beneath the words "Today's the day."

Jeff Preiss of production company Epoch Films directed "Today" in an apartment building overlooking downtown Los Angeles, along with nearby locations in Echo Park and Van Nuys, California. He strove to make the spots feel improvised by having actors repeat their lines in rehearsal before filming. He also wanted the spot to have vision and not just be "an anthem in the abstract." "We all felt like Jeff was the guy to go to," Scott Schindler, Deutsch's vice president/associate creative director/art director told Shoot. "He's amazing with casting, and we wanted something that wasn't overly designed and art directed." Preiss had worked previously with Deutsch on ads for MCI.

The format was changed slightly in the next two spots, which were aired during the 2004 Super Bowl. "Soulmates," airing during the first quarter of the game, used Robert Smith's "I Dig You," which repeated the lines "I dig you / you dig me." The spot began by showing the similar morning routines of a middle-aged executive and a young job applicant, for example, struggling over crossword puzzles and feeding their fish just before walking out their doors. The spot suggested that the two, although they were separated by age and by job positions, were compatible. The commercial ended with the two soul mates shaking hands at the start of a job interview and with the Trump mascot and the tagline "Find the one you dig." The third spot, "I Feel Love," featured a number of employees who were enthusiastic about beginning their workday and used the Blue Man Group's rendition of Donna Summer's song "I Feel Love." It ended with the tagline "Get ready for a job you love," again beneath Trump, the dancing Monster mascot.

Internet ads for "Today's the Day" appeared on websites such as Weather.com, Lycos, and About.com. Efforts also went into improving Monster's Web indexing on major search engines so that geographical and vocational keywords were more succinctly correlated with the content of Monster.com. Print ads, using "Today's the day" as the tagline, were also launched in 2004. One ad featured photographs of nine PC monitors, all sitting inside office cubicles and all decorated differently. Soon after the Super Bowl spots, Monster aired a campaign called "Portraits," which was derived from "Today's the Day." The spots featured real job seekers and recruiters explaining what they wanted out of employment. The spots aired throughout February on both network and cable television, including NBC, ABC, ESPN, VH-1, and USA.

OUTCOME

Not surprisingly, Monster saw the greatest spike of success on the days after the two ads aired during Super Bowl XXXVIII, thus reaching 143.6 million viewers. On February 2, the day after the game, 62,007 résumés were submitted on Monster.com, surpassing the 53,510 submitted the Monday after Monster's 2003 Super Bowl ads. On February 3, the second day after the 2004 Super Bowl, another 59,126 résumés were uploaded. "Once again, the Super Bowl has proven to be a rewarding venue to propel our brand and new message to millions of viewers all over the country and in almost every demographic," Taylor told Business Wire. "We're excited to build upon this momentum with the launch of a new series of ads featuring real users, the face and voice of Monster."

By October 2004 the Monster division's deferred revenue had reached a new high of $195.4 million, a 52 percent increase over the previous year. Despite the success of the "Today's the Day" campaign, however, by mid-2005 Monster had reassigned its creative responsibilities to a different ad agency, Brand Content. Explaining the shift from Deutsch, Brad Baker, chief product and marketing officer at Monster, told Adweek, "The new Monster voice celebrates the individual, their talents and aspirations. . .for employers, this means a more qualified candidate to meet their needs." Adweek suggested that the changeover resulted from disputes over fees and issues of "chemistry" in Monster and Deutsch's relationship during the 2003–2005 period. Deutsch retained Monster's media buying and planning duties, however.

CELEBRITY ENDORSEMENT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Rolex, the Geneva-based maker of ultra-high-quality and high-priced timepieces, had at one time or another sponsored the Wimbledon tennis tournament as well as the PGA and LPGA golf circuits, and its advertising made heavy use of athletes. Thus in 1997 it signed a deal with young golfing sensation Tiger Woods for a campaign that ran through 1998 and beyond, adding his name to a roster that included golfer Arnold Palmer, Olympic skier Picabo Street, and mountain climber Ed Viesturs. Rolex advertising in 1998 featured Woods, Street, and others, including quite a different category of celebrity—classical musicians. J. Walter Thompson of New York handled the account, which was valued at $9.3 million in 1996. Spending for 1998 was well over $10 million and focused primarily on magazine advertisements.

Rolex historically had tended to take a low-key approach to marketing, as befit a company whose customer base was in the top fraction of all income earners. Nonetheless, given the fact that it was known for the accuracy of its timepieces, Rolex began to market itself in connection with athletic events at least as early as the 1970s. It also established itself as the timekeeper of record for a number of international competitions. Certainly athletics was a "great leveler," bringing together people of different backgrounds, and with its 1998 advertising Rolex sent a clear message that it intended to reach a somewhat wider market with its products, particularly the lower-priced Tudor line.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Rolex was founded in 1905 by Hans Wilsdorf, a Swiss watchmaker. Central Europe, of course, had a reputation for producing some of the finest timepieces in the world, and the company quickly established a reputation as one of the best. As the Australian watch retailer Greg Alexander told Dugald Jellie of the Sydney Morning Herald, however, "It's a sales and promotion and public perception phenomenon. They're good-quality watches, but they're no better quality than any number of other brands that sell for much less."

Whether or not this was so, Rolex quickly made—and kept—a name for itself as one of the premier watch manufacturers in the world. It was the first to popularize the wristwatch. Up until the early twentieth century, timepieces had typically been worn in the pocket, attached to a man's waistcoat with a chain. But as times changed, so did watch buyers, and by the mid-twentieth century women were at least as likely to purchase watches as men, which opened up new markets for Rolex.

In addition to its men's and women's wristwatches, Rolex produced stopwatches, clocks, and old-fashioned pocket watches. With its image of precision timekeeping, the simplest Rolex retailed for hundreds or even thousands of dollars even in the 1970s, but Rolex also offered models in bronze or gold as well as its "plain" stainless steel line. Buyers with an urge to add even greater status to their wrists could also purchase varieties of Rolex encrusted with diamonds or other gemstones.

The corporate culture of Rolex was secretive, as befit its image as the maker of high-tech products for a small portion of buyers. It maintained no website, nor did its name pop up in news stories with anything like the frequency of lower-priced competitors. In an effort to gain greater control of its production, in the 1990s the company acquired Gay Freres, a European company that supplied watch straps.

As Rolex became more widely known in the 1970s and thereafter, the company had to deal with a number of imitators, counterfeit Rolexes that carried a price tag thousands of dollars lower than the real item. One way buyers could know a real Rolex from an imitator was by watching the dial: if the second hand "ticked" perceptibly as it moved between numbers, it was not a true Rolex. The genuine article, like time itself, moved smoothly, without breaks.

TARGET MARKET

There was a time when few people questioned status symbols, along with the right of a very small minority to own what was beyond the reaches of the masses. By the end of the twentieth century, however, egalitarian sensibilities had taken over in western Europe and the United States, and a product such as Rolex might have become marginalized as an expensive bauble available only to the elite. But coupled with this change in political direction was a change in the direction of marketing, and Rolex moved with the times.

The Swiss watchmaker's strategy in the late 1990s could be likened to that of another precision instrument that emerged from central Europe to capture the sensibilities of American buyers—the Mercedes-Benz. Built by Daimler Benz AG of Stuttgart, the Mercedes had long been viewed as a car available only to the upper crust, but in the 1990s Mercedes introduced new lines that would place its product within the reach of middle-class buyers. Of course this strategy came about not as the result of a newfound democratic impulse; rather, it was a sound marketing decision that greatly increased Mercedes's market share.

Rolex applied a similar idea with its Tudor line. Whereas the price tag on a typical Rolex started at $2,000 and could go as high as $180,000 or more, according to Terry Lefton in Adweek, a buyer could put a Tudor around his or her wrist for as little as $850. The high end of the Tudor line ran to $4,000, a meager price compared to that of the most expensive Rolex. Regarding Woods's endorsement for Tudor, Left on wrote that the young golfing sensation would "take the lead role in Rolex's repositioning of its Tudor line as the more youthful, accessible brand in a tiered brand-family system."

Woods's multiracial background was surely no accident either. The golfer raised eyebrows in 1997 when he declared himself a "Cablinasian," an acronym that referred to his mixed heritage: Caucasian, black, Indian, Asian. His image in Rolex ads sent the message that the watchmaker wanted to extend its appeal beyond white buyers, and the use of Yo-Yo Ma and Kiri Te Kanawa, classical musicians of Asian heritage, in Rolex advertising sent a similar message.

COMPETITION

In November 1997, Wendy Hessen of Women's Wear Daily, one of the foremost publications of the fashion accessories industries, presented the magazine's list of the top 10 brands of jewelry and watches. As Hessen noted,

WATCHING THE STATUS SYMBOL

"On a first date," wrote Dugald Jellie in the Sydney Morning Herald, "a girl once told me you could tell the quality of a man by the quality of his shoes and watch. At the time, I was wearing black R.M. Williams boots. And a Rolex on my wrist. Mind you, it was a 100 per cent faux Rolex, picked up in Hong Kong for about $7. That's the sort of bloke I am; a fake, a phony who straps on a $7 watch. But hey, it told the time. Which is what a watch is all about, plus a whole lot more."

As Jellie went on to observe, a watch was at least as much a status symbol as it was a timepiece. On the question of watches as an investment, Jellie cautioned readers never to buy a new watch, a much better strategy being to invest in a used model of proven quality. His second rule was "never invest in a woman's watch. Women buy their watches for function and because they look good. Men buy their watches as objects of mechanical design and engineering, and because they can wear them underwater to 100 metres."

Jellie also advised his readers not even to consider investing in a digital watch. These, he wrote, "remain nothing more than a flashing footnote in the history of time and keeping it. For a brief second there, it appeared they would supersede traditional timepieces with hour and minute hands, until dateline 1982, when a worldwide oversupply caused the market to crash. Digital watches—some priced at $2,000 when introduced—were being sold for $3."

"With the exception of Cartier and Rolex, most of the names on the list are broader-based or even mass-distributed brands that are more familiar to the mainstream consumer than the luxury patron." The other eight brands on the list were indeed, with one exception, familiar to most American buyers: Timex, Seiko, Bulova, Citizen, Casio, Swatch, Monet, and Swiss Army.

Although the latter was, like Rolex, a Swiss product, it appealed to buyers with far less disposable income than the typical Rolex customer. Given the high prices of Rolex, however, there was a broad market available to potential competitors such as Swatch, which had run ads with supermodel Tyra Banks to promote its new ultrathin Skin line of watches. The headline said it all: "Am I naked? Or am I not?"

In July 1998 Jewelers Circular Keystone conducted what it called an "informal survey" of independent jewelers around the United States. It found that Seiko was the brand carried by the greatest number of respondents—31 percent. This was not nearly as surprising as the fact that Rolex came in second, with 24 percent. Rolex was followed by Bulova, at 19 percent; Pulsar, with 18.5 percent, and Cyma, at 17 percent.

Inasmuch as it tied its marketing to sports and was also a Swiss company, TAG Heuer was a competitor to Rolex, although its products sold for much lower prices. The company had fallen on hard times, but it had set the pace for other watchmakers with an aggressive program of marketing, launching campaigns such as "Don't Crack under Pressure" and "Inner Strength" in both Britain and the United States.

More direct competition for Rolex came from Movado Group, the producer of Concord watches. The latter carried a price tag between $2,000 and $15,000. In October 1998, Stuart Elliott of the New York Times reported that Movado Group had assigned its $8 million advertising budget to Arnell Group, known for campaigns it had undertaken for Tommy Hilfiger, Donna Karan, and others.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Elliott noted that Movado Group's advertising choice was "an example of how marketers of premium-priced products are stepping up efforts to peddle their wares to consumers." This was certainly Rolex's strategy when, in May 1997, it signed Woods to a five-year deal that included endorsement fees and royalty payments. An advertising source told Lefton of Brandweek, "The idea is to get people in the Rolex family earlier. [Rolex] felt that Tudor will be legitimized and made more youthful by Tiger.'' Rolex continued to focus on either athletic or classical music stars, and among the figures included its advertising was Olympic skier Street, another appeal to the youth market.

The advertising was primarily in print, tied to high-end magazines. Lefton did not name any publications, although Rolex has advertised in the New Yorker, certainly a periodical whose readership was among the nation's wealthiest. Lisa Lockwood of Women's Wear Daily included Rolex, with its budget of around $10 million, among fashion ''megabrands.'' She noted, ''Today's megabrands are spending across a wide spectrum of media, heavily skewed toward magazines.''

At midyear Barbara Spector in Jewelers Circular Keystone wrote that ''the time is right for selling watches,'' and she quoted a prominent Massachusetts jeweler as saying, ''We do seem to be in the middle of a big watch boom.'' In this climate Rolex enhanced its position through careful marketing methods. Wrote Spector, ''Many jewelers say that high-end watch companies have helped them compete by limiting distribution of their products. Several specifically mention Rolex's stricter policy, adopted by the company a few years ago.'' One retailer told her, ''We increased the number of Rolex products [in our store], they reduced the number of Rolex dealers, and we sold more Rolexes. Since then, we've been very happy.'' With the new policy, the retailer continued, ''We have a totally different relationship with the salesman; he's extremely supportive and helpful.''

OUTCOME

The boom market in watches continued into 1999, and companies scrambled to make the most of it. European watchmakers, as Keith Flamer of Jewelers Circular Keystone observed, had discovered a new country, the United States, one that offered a huge potential market along with a number of obstacles. An Italian watch company executive contrasted buying patterns in the United States with those in his homeland: ''Spending $400 on a watch is a major investment here, compared to Italy, where it is an afterthought.'' Indeed, as Flamer noted, ''Watch executives say the United States is the most difficult country in which to market watches because it's heavily populated, regionally fragmented, constantly changing, and price-conscious.'' In such a challenging, yet potentially quite lucrative, market, ''consumers must be bombarded with brand messages from all directions.''

Of most watch marketing during 1998 and 1999, Flamer wrote that ''subtlety is out . . . Like a kid acting up in class, the unconventional advertising [of watch companies] is commanding attention, especially among the young.'' A Rolex ad that appeared on the back of the May 31, 1999, issue of the New Yorker, however, showed that the Swiss company's idea of letting it all hang out was still fairly conservative. The ad showed Ma, his arms spread wide, one hand on his cello. ''Yo-Yo Ma favors Italian instruments made in the early eighteenth century,'' the headline announced. ''Occasionally, however, he makes an exception.'' According to the copy, ''Yo-Yo Ma says his 1712 Stradivarius is 'like a great Bordeaux,' while his 1783 Mantagnana is 'earthier, like a Burgundy.' About a third instrument, his Rolex, he says, 'I just love it. You can use it for any occasion.' ''

Precisely because of its low-key approach, Flamer referred to Rolex—along with competitors Cartier, TAG Heuer, Movado, Omega, Raymond Weil, and Swatch—as one of ''a handful of companies whose marketing efforts stand out. They've built brand awareness with specific niches, creativity, consistency, distinctive product, appeals to the emotions, and yes, multimillion-dollar advertising campaigns.''

In April 1999 Rolex chose Olympic champion Ekaterina Gordeeva as the first figure skater to appear in one of its ads. Two other things set the Gordeeva ad apart from others. First, the photograph was staged, not a candid action shot, as was typical of Rolex advertising using athletes. And the watch on Gordeeva's wrist was her own, a gift from Sergei Grinkov, her late husband and skating partner.

AT YOUR SIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial writing of this essay Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co. shortened its name to Morgan Stanley. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

After Morgan Stanley Group Inc. merged with Dean Witter, Discover & Company in 1997, the resulting company retained Dean Witter's well-established tagline ''We measure success one investor at a time.'' With the advent of the twenty-first century, the firm toyed with new taglines, eventually settling on ''One client at a time.'' Although sounding similar in nature, the new tagline reflected a transition in the firm's marketing approach, which now emphasized a commitment to long-lasting client relationships. In 2004 Morgan Stanley and its longtime advertising agency, Leo Burnett, launched the ''At Your Side'' advertising campaign, which took the concept further, showing Morgan Stanley financial advisers acting like close family members in a series of humorous television spots. The goal was to address everyday financial needs with which the audience could relate, such as paying for a child's college education or wedding or funding early retirement.

The television spots in the ''At Your Side'' campaign, accounting for the bulk of Morgan Stanley's $80 million budget in 2004, continued to be shown in 2005. Each relied on an attention-grabbing trick: leading the viewer to believe that a Morgan Stanley adviser was a close family member. One commercial, for example, showed a couple sitting on a beach. The man—who thought he knew how to tweak the couple's investment portfolio so that a dream house could be bought—turned out to be a Morgan Stanley adviser. The real husband was napping on his wife's lap and popped his head up when he learned the good news.

The ''At Your Side'' campaign won awards and helped Morgan Stanley elevate itself above a crowded media landscape. Its success did not, however, ensure that Leo Burnett would keep the business. With the installation of new leadership at Morgan Stanley in 2005, the advertising account was put into review, and rather than participate, Leo Burnett severed a 17-year relationship with the client.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For old-line firms like Morgan Stanley, involved in selling security brokerage services to the public, the conventional marketing approach for many years had been to emphasize knowledge and competency—essentially conveying the message ''We're the experts''—while projecting a sense of trust. For many years Salomon Smith Barney employed actor John Houseman, who intoned, ''They make money the old-fashioned way. They earn it.'' Another (now defunct) firm coined, ''When E.F. Hutton talks, people listen.'' During the 1980s Dean Witter, before merging with Morgan Stanley, used the advertising slogan ''You look like you just heard from Dean Witter.'' During the 1990s it proclaimed, ''We measure success one investor at a time.'' When Dean Witter and Morgan Stanley merged in 1997, the tagline continued to be used by the combined retail business.

With the rise of Internet brokers in the 1990s, financial advertising took a dramatic turn. Newcomers like E*Trade Group and Ameritrade Holding Corporation spent heavily to establish their brands using irreverent humor and by treating stock trading as a game and mocking traditional stockbrokers. They appealed to a young, broader demographic, leaving the old guard like Morgan Stanley to appear stodgy and only interested in already wealthy customers.

In the 2000s Morgan Stanley began to adjust its approach. It tried to skew to a young demographic in the retail business while promoting its electronic capabilities, as evidenced by new advertising campaigns developed in 2000 by Leo Burnett that eschewed the ''one investor at a time'' tagline to center around a new tagline, ''Well Connected.'' The implication was that Morgan Stanley combined electronic connectivity with the insider relationships of a well-established firm. Likewise an institutional campaign launched in 2001 relied on the tagline ''Network the World.''

The bull market of the 1990s gave way to a recession, exacerbated by the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. For the past 20 years Morgan Stanley and other firms offering investment services had spent a great deal of money appealing to small investors, but that strategy no longer made sense. Cheap online transactions had taken all of the profit out of the transaction side of the industry, eliminating the executional advantage that financial firms had long held. Now the likes of Morgan Stanley found that their profits were in dispensing advice—independent, trustworthy advice.

In 2002, after five years of integrating the Dean Witter operations, Morgan Stanley decided to consolidate its advertising account at Leo Burnett, which was charged with creating a campaign that sought to present a unified message behind all of Morgan Stanley's products and strengthen the Morgan Stanley brand. A new tagline was crafted, one that would provide resonance with the firm's past while continuing to develop a new approach to reaching out to potential customers: ''One client at a time.'' The goal was to portray Morgan Stanley as a firm that despite its size cared about customers on an individual basis. The initial television spots showed Morgan Stanley advisers talking emotionally about how they helped their clients. In one commercial a couple was helped to retire to Paris, while in a second a daughter's tuition to the Julliard School was the subject. In 2004 Leo Burnett pursued similar themes using humor in the ''At Your Side'' campaign, which continued to use the ''One client at a time'' tagline.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The ''Morgan'' in Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Company refers to the legendary banker J.P. Morgan, who in the late 1800s and early 1900s was one of the most powerful men in the world. In 1935, 20 years after his death, J.P. Morgan & Company spun off its securities and investment banking businesses as Morgan Stanley & Company.

TARGET MARKET

Morgan Stanley's ''At Your Side'' campaign targeted retail customers, the focus on partnering with baby boomer parents (roughly 40 to 55 years of age), the kind of people who might be dealing with early retirement or their children's weddings. The younger investors that the TV spots of the previous two years had hoped to reach were not the primary concern, nor were people past retirement age. The new campaign, rather, centered on the needs of upper-middle-class parents, either married or single, or empty nesters looking to take the next step in their lives. These people had no illusions of becoming day traders and wanted the kind of asset-management services that a website or their local bank was unable to offer. Although Morgan Stanley no longer courted small investors, there were still plenty of potential customers. At the start of the twenty-first century, some 11 million households used professional financial advisers. That number was expected to grow to 60 million within 15 years.

COMPETITION

There was no shortage of entities hoping to carve out a share of that huge market of potential customers. Electronic brokers like E*Trade and Ameritrade remained competitors for Morgan Stanley, primarily because they spent a great deal of money on advertising, their ads were attention getting, and their marketing at the very least created a great deal of clutter in the marketplace for investment products and services. But given the kind of people the ''At Your Side'' campaign hoped to appeal to, Internet rivals were not primary concerns. Competition instead came from other quarters.

A CAST OF THOUSANDS

Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Company's longtime advertising agency, Leo Burnett, was responsible for some of the most recognizable product characters in advertising history. These included the Jolly Green Giant, Morris the Cat, Charlie the Tuna, Tony the Tiger, the Maytag repairman, the Marlboro Man, and the Pillsbury Doughboy.

Increasingly insurance companies and banks encroached on Morgan Stanley's turf, all of them attempting to provide customers with a one-stop shopping center of financial services. Mutual fund companies, such as the Fidelity Group and the Vanguard Group, also provided competition. In addition Morgan Stanley had to contend with competition from rivals in the retail/wholesale financial-management sector. They included longtime king Merrill Lynch as well as Goldman Sachs, Citigroup subsidiary Salomon Smith Barney, and Charles Schwab.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The strategy behind the "At Your Side" campaign on the consumer side was to continue the "One client at a time" theme and further position Morgan Stanley not just as a firm interested in helping clients build wealth, but as a firm whose advisers cared about customers' lives and were as committed as a member of the family in helping them realize their cherished dreams. Morgan Stanley was not alone in pursuing the partnership theme, however. Writing for U.S. Banker, Matthew de Paula quoted Bill Wreaks, publisher and chief analyst of the Journal of Financial Advertising & Marketing, who commented, "This whole notion of partnership is very evident in a lot of financial advertising. . . . What makes that different from the past, is that before it was like 'We're the experts, we know what we're doing and you should have confidence in what we're doing. But back off.' And now it's about what we can do together." According to Wreaks, "This trend came about partly because financial firms are finally clueing into what advertisers in other sectors have realized for a long time: everything starts with people." It was a lesson learned a long time ago by consumer brands, which predicated their marketing approach with people in mind, seeking to show how the product or service fit into customers' everyday lives.

To make the point that Morgan Stanley could be a partner and play a role in everyday aspects of clients' lives, Leo Burnett decided to employ humor, "not crazy or ridiculous like the E*Trade ads from years past," Wreaks told de Paula. Rather, Morgan Stanley opted for "light humor, fun and subtle." The creative team also adopted a misdirection ploy, coaxing the audience to believe one thing, then pulling a surprise to get their attention. The Morgan Stanley television spots led the audience to believe that a friendly Morgan Stanley financial adviser was a family member. For example, in one commercial a woman was shown cheering wildly for a child in a soccer game, berating the referee, and urging other players to pass the ball to "her" kid—leading the viewer to see her as a typical soccer mom. A bystander then asked her which child was hers, only to learn that she was in fact the financial adviser of the child's parent. The implication was that she cared as much about the child as the client, that she shared the client's dreams. Another spot showed a couple sitting on the beach. The man said that if some adjustments were made to their investment portfolio, they could afford their dream home. The wife then asked her husband what he thought, at which point another man (her husband) sat up. He had been hidden all this time because his head was on his wife's lap. Once again the viewer was tricked into thinking a Morgan Stanley adviser was a close family member. In another spot an adviser at a ribbon-cutting ceremony was confused with a CEO, and in a fourth an adviser shared personal stories of a child at a graduation party as if he were the father of the honored child.

The "At Your Side" spots were clearly not attempting to be believable. Rather, they were intended to be symbolic. Some viewers accepted the commercials' premise and played along with the humor, while others took a more literal approach and regarded the fictional advisers as little more than disturbed stalkers. The spots—loved, hated, or merely tolerated—were at the very least memorable.

OUTCOME

From Morgan Stanley's perspective the "At Your Side" commercials were very successful. According to Scott Spry, executive vice president of brand advertising and brand analytics for Phoenix Marketing International, quoted in a May 2005 Investment News article, "The campaign generates extremely high recall, and it breaks through the clutter." Unlike advertising that talked about the company, which fared poorly in the Phoenix survey, the Morgan Stanley spots were the top rated among both "general" and "affluent" investors. Beth Allan, president of Phoenix's advertising and brand analytics division, explained that "people like the relevant scenario. They can see themselves in the situations that the Morgan ads portray, like a wedding and early retirement. People want to know what a company can do to help you do well. The core notion is that the consumer is in charge, not the company.''

Leo Burnett's work on the ''At Your Side'' campaign was also recognized by the advertising industry. It won the Corporate Image award in the annual Financial Communications Society Portfolio Awards. In addition ''At Your Side'' garnered a Silver in the Financial Services/Image category of the 2005 Effies, presented by the New York American Marketing Association to honor the year's most effective advertising campaigns.

Neither awards nor a 17-year relationship guaranteed that Leo Burnett would retain the Morgan Stanley account, however. In June 2005 Morgan Stanley changed chief executive officers, unseating Philip Purcell, whose connection with Leo Burnett dated back to his days with Dean Witter well before the 1997 merger. As part of the changes that came with the installation of new leadership, Morgan Stanley's $80 million account was put into review. Leo Burnett was invited to participate, but in August 2005 it decided to resign as the advertising agency of record.

IT PAYS TO DISCOVER REVISITED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial writing of this essay Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co, shortened its name to Morgan Stanley. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1999 the San Francisco ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners won the $90 million account of Discover Financial Services Inc. and its Discover credit card operation, which was owned by the investment bank Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co. Although it was the fourth-leading credit-card brand—trailing only Visa, MasterCard, and American Express—and boasted the largest independent card network in the United States, the Discover credit card was regarded as an also-ran in the industry. Its primary competitive advantage over the years had been what was called the ''Cashback Bonus.'' This program was the focal point of the company's marketing for more than a decade, as reflected in the tagline ''It pays to Discover.'' As the Discover card tried to move beyond its one-note advertising pitch, Goodby dropped the tagline. Two years later, however, the agency brought back the venerable tagline and once again concentrated on the Cashback Bonus feature.

The new campaign featured both television and print advertising, along with other elements that included the sponsorship of a NASCAR race car. In addition to pursuing the rebate theme, the campaign also promoted a new product, the Discover 2GO card, a minicard encapsulated in a protective coding that was suitable for attachment to a key chain.

The campaign, which began in June 2002, ran through 2004, at which point Discover asked for new ideas from Goodby and competing ad agencies to move away from its cash-back program. The campaign had succeeded in growing the Discover card business but not enough to take it to the next level and establish the card as a serious competitor to the top three brands. Nevertheless, Goodby's work was well received, and the agency retained the account.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Discover card was launched by Sears, Roebuck & Company in the 1980s and soon established itself in the credit-card industry. Although it would become a cash cow for its eventual owner, Morgan Stanley, the Discover card was very much an also-ran compared to rivals American Express, MasterCard, and Visa. Its only significant advantage was the Cashback Bonus rebate offered to cardholders based on how much they used their cards. This facet was the keystone of the tagline ''It pays to Discover,'' coined in 1988. A major obstacle preventing the growth of the Discover card was its inability to issue cards through banks, which had become the exclusive preserve of MasterCard and Visa. The task of going it alone became even more difficult in the 1990s following a wave of bank mergers, which resulted in ever-larger entities issuing MasterCard and Visa cards. Large banks were capable of using economies of scale to offer better terms and services and, in turn, to attract more customers.

Led by a new management team, the Discover card tried to fight back in the late 1990s. It issued a platinum card, which was backed by the bulk of the company's marketing budget, in hopes of gaining business in new market segments, while the Bravo and Private Option cards were dropped. But the creative approach was muddled, and in late 1998 the advertising account was put up for review. Considered something of a long shot, Goodby emerged the winner in early 1999, despite having developed only one minor campaign in the financial-services area in its history. Nevertheless, Discover was banking on the San Francisco agency's sterling reputation for producing award-winning advertising for clients across a wide range of industries. The Discover card's vice president of advertising and communications, Catherine Davis, told the press, "We are confident that Goodby will provide a new perspective and fresh approach that will help Discover Card reposition itself."

The company particularly wanted to dispel the notion among consumers that the Discover card had a low merchant-acceptance rate and offered nothing more than rebates, a feature the company believed had lost some of its luster since the industry had begun to copy the idea of cash-back bonuses. Discover did not necessarily want to drop its longtime tagline, "It pays to Discover," but it did want to change its message. "It the past we had focused on 'no annual fee' and 'cash-back bonus,' but the industry over the last five to seven years has copied that, so it's not as unique as it used to be," Davis told Miriam Kreinin Souccar, writing for American Banker. When the first Goodby campaign opened in the fall of 1999, it featured a new tagline, "There's always something more to Discover," the card's first marketing effort to focus on something other than the cash-back feature. Instead, the ads promoted a broader spectrum of card benefits. After two years, however, further research revealed that the "It pays to Discover" tagline retained resonance with consumers. In a Credit Card Management article Kate Fitzgerald wrote, "According to an insider at Discover, the vast majority of consumers still immediately recalled that line, inked in 1988, while employees at the company struggled to remember the credit card's more recent themes." Deciding to take advantage of the lingering power of the discarded tagline, Discover reprised the "It pays to Discover" theme in a broad new campaign launched in June 2002 in which, once again, the card's cash-back program was front and center. In addition, the company also promoted its new 2GO card, the first card in the industry small enough to attach to a key chain.

IT PAYS TO REMEMBER

The Discover card grew out of a diversification effort of Sears, Roebuck & Company, which in 1981 acquired the securities firm Dean Witter Reynolds Inc. In 1985 Sears launched the Discover card as a combined credit and financial services card that also offered savings accounts through Greenwood Trust Company, a bank that had been acquired by a Sears subsidiary. Financial difficulties forced Sears to spin off Dean Witter and the Discover card in the early 1990s. Then, in 1997, Dean Witter, Discover & Co. merged with Morgan Stanley Group Inc. to create the Discover card's corporate parent, Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co.

TARGET MARKET

The Discover card's core market was described by David Robertson, publisher of the credit-card industry newsletter Nilson Report, as "meat-and-potatoes, blue-collar, middle of the road." The new "It Pays to Discover" campaign not only wanted to maintain a connection with this middle-market audience but wanted to reach out to other consumers as well. Edgy humor would be used to promote the new 2GO minicard to the highly coveted segment of adults between the ages of 18 and 40, people who were cost-conscious but who led active lifestyles. Moreover, research indicated that these consumers were likely to use the minicard in fast-food and convenience stores, venues that generally experienced a low volume of credit-card use. It was also thought that the 2GO card, a technological innovation in the staid credit-card landscape, would be an advantage in pitching Discover to a new generation of users entering the marketplace.

COMPETITION

When the new campaign was launched in June 2002, Discover was firmly entrenched as the number four brand among credit cards. According to Credit Card Management and research conducted by Brandweek, its $93.3 billion in total sales in 2001 was well ahead of the $12.4 billion generated by number five Diners Club, making Discover the largest independent credit card network in the United States. But the Discover card also trailed the top three brands by a considerable margin: American Express recorded total sales in 2001 of $224.5 billion, followed by MasterCard's $518 billion and category leader Visa's $916 billion. The amount of money the top brands spent on advertising in 2001 also reflected their standing. Discover spent $82.1 million in advertising, compared to $251.3 million for Visa, $197.3 million for MasterCard, and $153.9 billion for American Express. Diners Club spent a mere $8.8 million.

Aside from the hefty budgets they had at their disposal, the Discover card's larger rivals had either carved out clear niches or had honed highly effective marketing appeals. Historically American Express played on its exclusivity, as reflected by the memorable tagline "Membership has its privileges," which was dropped in the 1990s as the culture changed. Nevertheless, American Express was able to continue to pursue a successful niche strategy of appealing to high-end consumers. MasterCard and Visa fought it out to gain business in a much broader market, and both were able to develop effective ad campaigns. Visa scored with its "Everywhere you want to be" tagline, while MasterCard effectively exploited its "Priceless" campaign.

One of the disadvantages of the Discover card was that it could be used only in the United States, and even there it was not as widely accepted as its three larger competitors. For many consumers the card was thus relegated to second-class status. Part of the problem was not being able to distribute the cards through banks, although that provided a competitive advantage as well; since Visa and MasterCard could not make specific claims on their products or services, they could not guarantee that the banks would honor them. In addition, according to a 2002 Brandweek article, "Discover Card edged out MasterCard, Visa and American Express on the category's most crucial driver. Fees and rates used to be a point of differentiation. But not these days, when interest rates are down low enough to make them meaningless. Discover indexed higher than the ideal and competitors because it gives money back."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Given the results of market research, Discover decided to play to its strengths in the new campaign, reviving the "It pays to Discover" tagline and once again emphasizing its rebate program. At the same time it promoted the new 2GO card, along with merchant alliances, exclusive sponsorships, and other perks and privileges available to card members. The broad campaign included television spots and print ads as well as other elements.

The first phase in the new "It Pays to Discover" campaign featured three television spots, two of which highlighted the Cashback Bonus program, with the third focusing on the 2GO card. The most memorable was titled "First Date," a 30-second spot that recorded a series of first-date experiences by a young, single male lawyer, each one starting out promising but ending up a disaster. One of his dates hated lawyers, another asked if he liked to shop, and a third thought that he was "kind of boring," while yet another woman was quick to ask, "Where do you think this thing is going between us? Because my clock's kind of ticking." The silver lining in this dark cloud was that, by using his Discover card to pay for his bad dates, the man accrued a Cashback Bonus award of $160. A final date with another lawyer offered some hope, as a voice-over commented that the man might someday use his Cashback Bonus to help pay for an engagement ring. This was followed by the tagline "Discover Card's New Cashback Bonus Program, where you get paid for the things you buy anyway." The ads began airing on June 2, 2002, during a NASCAR telecast, and they continued throughout the rest of the year during early morning news programs and prime-time shows as well as on syndicated programs and on cable networks.

To provide continuity with the new television commercials, the ongoing print campaign in magazines, which focused on the Discover card's many merchant relationships and its growing acceptance among retailers across the United States, also adopted the "It pays to Discover" tagline. A $5,000 shopping spree promotion was launched with Lucky, a magazine devoted to shopping. Furthermore, the company promoted itself in other novel ways. It sponsored a NASCAR car for six races, including the race on which the new television spots had their debut. Discover acquired the naming rights to an Atlanta-area shopping mall, which became Discover Mills and where card members could take advantage of exclusive offers and promotions. The Discover card also beefed up its website, where card members could redeem Cashback Bonus awards as well as pay their bills and take advantage of other customer-service activities.

The Discover card continued to pursue the "It Pays to Discover" campaign in 2003 and 2004, releasing a new wave of television commercials. One 2003 effort, titled "Sporting Goods," featured a father who spent a great deal of money buying sporting equipment for a son who was not athletic. In the end he used his Cashback Bonus to help the boy pursue success with chess. Other 2003 television spots used off-the-wall humor to promote the 2GO card. In one a man used the card to pay for lunch, but as he left the restaurant, he was assaulted by ninjas. The man tried to fend them off with his 2GO card, prompting the comment from a voice-over "Discover 2GO. Convenient. Innovative. Not good for ninja fights." Other spots featured a woman trying to use her 2GO card as a paddle in a ping-pong tournament and a man attempting to use the card to cut a tangled fishing line. In 2004 Discover offered a 10 percent Cashback Bonus in a two-month push to encourage members to buy groceries with their cards. One television spot in this effort, titled "10," used a variety of everyday items that appeared side by side to form the numeral 10, such as a long package and a wreath, a baguette and a hat, and a quart of milk and a melon. The idea was successful with both merchants and card members, leading to a similar campaign with restaurants in the fall of 2004. By then, however, Discover had decided once again to move away from its cash-back program and, as the account was put up for review, asked Goodby and other ad agencies to present new ideas.

OUTCOME

The marketing campaign revisiting the "It pays to Discover" tagline was successful on several levels. According to an October 2004 article in Credit Card Management, Discover, because of its marketing and other initiatives, was at the top of the list of "comeback of the year" stories in the credit-card industry. "But competitors have adopted both rewards and minicards, making Discover a seeming also-ran." Indeed, the landscape was experiencing a significant change. In October 2004 a U.S. Supreme Court ruling allowed Discover to form partnerships with banks as well as with other companies, such as Wal-Mart and General Electric Consumer Finance.

In addition, although the prospects appeared to be improving for the Discover card, Morgan Stanley came under pressure from investors to spin off the business. Investors argued that the card's middle-market clientele was a poor fit with Morgan Stanley, failing to offer synergy with a corporate parent whose core investment-banking business targeted far wealthier consumers and corporations. After initially indicating, during a period of internal dissent, that it would unload Discover, Morgan Stanley announced in August 2005 that it would keep the business. Goodby also prevailed in the account review for the Discover card and looked to build on the work accomplished in the "It Pays to Discover" campaign.

MAKE A STATEMENT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Dean Witter, Discover & Company became a unit of Morgan Stanley. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

The Discover card burst onto the scene in 1986 with something no other card offered—a year-end cash bonus equal to 1 percent of purchases. The cash-back feature, coupled with no annual fee, made a lot of sense to value-conscious consumers who were accustomed to paying for the convenience of using a credit card. In its first six years alone, Discover had already put $355 million back into the pockets of its cardholders. It was not long, however, before competitors began issuing their own rebate and no-fee cards, which eroded Discover's once sure hold on the "value" market. Convincing consumers to use one card over another became an increasingly tough sell. In addition, most credit card companies issued multiple, targeted cards for different market segments. An American Express spokeswoman explained the trend to American Banker by saying, "If we have fifteen different products we can offer you, if you call in and don't qualify for one card, we can give you a different one instead." Despite the industry shift toward specialized cards, Discover held to the notion of being the card for everybody. William Hodges, Discover executive vice president and general manager, told Brandweek, "When everyone else is offering every flavor, maybe it's better just to have the best vanilla anybody is selling."

Over the years the company had built up a respectable merchant network that was nearly on a par with the Visa/MasterCard duopoly. Doubt about Discover's acceptance, however, remained a thorn in the company's side. While its merchant network had grown and the card was accepted at some 90 percent of U.S. locations that took bankcards, public perception remained that it was not as well received as other cards. Consumers were particularly reluctant to use Discover at upscale retail stores and restaurants. The "Make a Statement" campaign, which showed celebrities using their Discover cards in trendy places, was developed to remedy this image problem. The campaign was a departure from past campaigns, which had driven home the message of value and functionality. Debuting in August 1996, the commercials downplayed the cash-back rebate and implied that Discover was hipper than consumers might have previously thought.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Sears, Roebuck launched the Discover card in 1986, it offered value-conscious consumers a revolutionary combination of features: no annual fee and a cash award of up to 1 percent of yearly purchases. At a time when other cards charged annual fees of $20 or more and interest rates of 19.8 percent, Discover's introduction made a newsworthy splash in the industry. Naysayers, however, claimed that there was no way Discover could make a profit and said that retailers would not want to go through the process of setting up a payment system with Discover.

Discover proved the critics wrong by flourishing. A consumer survey in 1989 showed that 27 percent of those households whose members carried credit cards named Discover as their favorite. In 1991 Discover cards were in the wallets of almost 40 million consumers. By charging retailers lower fees than its competitors, Discover also readily gained merchant acceptance. Business Week heralded the card's growing success with the headline "The Discover Card Is No Longer a Joker," and a headline in American Banker proclaimed, "Sears' Discover Card a Weakling No More."

But during the 1990s Discover's once unique features became widely imitated by other credit card companies. Some cards actually beat Discover's rebate, offering a 5 percent rebate toward airline tickets or purchases of automobiles. Meanwhile, Discover did not alter its offerings. Industry experts criticized Discover for its reluctance to develop new products and services, such as platinum or affinity cards. "You could either say that they have been slow to respond to the leading trends or have chosen not to follow," said Shelly Porges, a credit card consultant. In 1995 Discover's new parent company, Dean Witter, recognized that the Discover card alone did not have the breadth to capture a vast market share. It chose not to dilute the Discover card brand image and instead launched a series of niche cards under the Novus Services brand. While Discover successfully continued expanding its merchant network under the Novus label, the card still lagged in the travel and entertainment sector and was not accepted internationally. By 1997 the card had not wholly shed its underdog status. Among the four major credit cards in the United States, Discover still finished in fourth place.

TARGET MARKET

During Discover's early years it was marketed as a card for the masses. In 1991 Thomas R. Butler, Discover's president, told American Banker that the company was "targeting every creditworthy cardholder in the whole damn U.S. marketplace. We are really going after the broad cross section of everyone." This initial marketing thrust had been effective in getting the card into as many people's wallets as possible, but times had changed, and most consumers now had multiple cards to choose from. While plenty of people had maintained their Discover card accounts, only one-half to two-thirds of those people regularly used the card. The emphasis in 1997 shifted to getting Discover cardholders actually to pull the card out and use it.

"People don't always think of Discover as a card they can use at an upscale merchant; we want to uplift that image," Robert E. Wood II, executive vice president of Discover-Novus marketing, told Credit Card Management. With the "Make a Statement" campaign the target market for Discover changed from everyman and everywoman to a slightly more upscale audience, including younger cardholders who were less concerned with counting their pennies. The campaign capitalized on the public interest in celebrities' lives, as evident in the success of magazines like People and In Style and television shows like Entertainment Tonight.

COMPETITION

According to Credit Card News, Discover's 1996 charge volume in the United States was $53.6 billion, compared to $131 billion for American Express, $220.6 billion for MasterCard, and $393.1 billion for Visa. One of the things that hurt Discover's ability to expand was its lack of international presence. The U.S. market was already flooded with cards. Within the United States, Discover had issued 40 million cards, and 29.6 million American Express cards, 164.5 million MasterCards, and 240.7 million Visa cards were in circulation. While other issuers put out a variety of cards for the segmented marketplace, Discover offered only one. It did not have a platinum card, for instance, one popular way that other cards were competing for upscale consumers. Discover was also late to market another niche product, cobranded cards. In 1997 the company finally decided to move into cobranding, issuing cards linked to the Smithsonian Institution, Universal Studios, and the game show Wheel of Fortune. "The long-term perspective is characteristic of our company," Hodges explained in Promo magazine. "We think a lot about what we're getting into, because we're in it for the long haul."

Because of saturation, the U.S. credit card market was not expected to grow significantly. "All you have to do is open your mailbox to see that the marketplace is much more competitive and fragmented than it has been historically," Gail Wasserman, an American Express spokeswoman, told American Banker. Advertising proved a key weapon in the battle for companies hoping to get consumers to choose their card over another. Of the four major cards, according to Competitive Media Reporting, Visa topped the chart for spending on advertising in 1997, with an estimated $242 million, followed by American Express at $195.9 million. MasterCard spent $109.3 million, and Dean Witter, Discover came in fourth at $99.2 million.

Visa's "Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign was still going strong after 13 years and continued to generate new business. Meanwhile, American Express fanned the flames of its longtime rivalry with Visa by running ads during the Visa-sponsored Olympic Games to make consumers aware that other cards were accepted in the city hosting the games. American Express also ran its stylish "Do More" campaign, which gave consumers a broad look at the company's product line of credit cards, travel services, and financial planning. In 1997 MasterCard hired a new advertising agency to embark on a repositioning of its card. Over an eight-year span the company had tried three different ad themes—"Master the Moment," "Smart Money," and "The Future of Money"—all of which had fallen flat with consumers. "Priceless" was the theme of the new campaign that emerged late in 1997. It positioned MasterCard as the credit card that made life's precious moments happen. One spot, for instance, put a dollar value on the tickets and snacks at a baseball game that opened the door for a father to have a priceless real conversation with his 11-year-old son.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Discover card's earliest advertising campaigns drove home the message of value. Commercials showed money pouring from the sky or dropping in bags and used the tag line "It pays to Discover." But with so many other cards coming to tout the same attributes of no annual fee and a cash rebate, Discover needed to find a way to distinguish itself from the pack. It needed to shake the blue-collar image inherited from its former parent company, Sears, Roebuck, without alienating loyal users. Discover's Hodges told American Banker, "I think we're shifting emphasis a little bit more toward a focus on the brand and the brand name, and a little bit less in terms of delivering the functional features of the cards. The emphasis is a slight change—it's not like we're abandoning what we do."

The campaign, which focused on notable people using their Discover cards, was created by DDB Needham Chicago. One of the celebrities featured in the first group of television commercials was John Lithgow, star of the popular prime-time comedy 3rd Rock from the Sun. The spot showed Lithgow using his Discover card to buy camping equipment, flowers for his wife, and a wet suit for himself. "The toughest thing about buying a wet suit," he said, "is trying it on." Liz Torres, singer, stand-up comedienne, and actress, was shown in another commercial using her card for purchases at antique shops, at a Cuban restaurant, and "little things that make a girl sing." Tennis pro Michael Chang's Discover card statement included "tons of tennis balls" as well as charges for groceries, travel, tropical fish, and a cash advance for recreation. Bill Nye, star of The Science Guy, talked in one commercial about Discover card's partnership with the Smithsonian Institution. According to Brandweek, the campaign's eclectic mix of personalities were chosen to help upgrade Discover's down-market image to a middle-tier position. DDB Needham managing partner Ray Gillette said, "We had the card in a lot of wallets, but we wanted to make people feel better about pulling it out. 'If John Lithgow used it, then it is certainly good enough for me.'"

Creatively produced with quick-cut editing and interesting camera angles, the spots deftly sidestepped some of Discover card's weaknesses: the fact that many restaurants did not accept it and its lack of an international network. Stephen Drees of Strategic Marketing Services commented in Brandweek, "The positioning is sort of 'everywhere you want to be' for the middle class, which is smart because they will never be a travel and entertainment card, and only a very small percentage of people leave the country and have to deal with the fact they aren't accepted outside the U.S."

The television campaign began on August 13, 1996, on both prime-time network and cable programs. Network radio advertising began in late September. Print advertising appeared in October issues of magazines such as Rolling Stone, People, Sports Illustrated, Entertainment Weekly, Glamour, Hispanic Business, and Hispanic Magazine and in various college newspapers. A second group of television commercials featuring other notable people began on February 16, 1997. This group featured Gregory Hines, tap dancer on Broadway and in motion pictures; Paula Poundstone, stand-up comedienne; Sheryl Swoopes, basketball player in the professional women's league; Kurt Vonnegut, author of Slaughterhouse Five; and Trisha Yearwood, country singer. These spots ran through the remainder of 1997 and into 1998 and were complemented by radio and print ads.

OUTCOME

Discover's marketing strategy did not help the company gain ground, as overall market share slipped from 7.9 percent in 1996 to 6.7 percent in 1997. The company's Hodges told Brandweek, however, that a better measure of the campaign's effectiveness was Discover's direct-mail response rates, which were more than twice the industry average.

According to USA Today 's Ad Track, the "Make a Statement" campaign was somewhat effective among consumers but was not popular. With only 7 percent of those questioned saying that they liked the campaign a lot, it ranked among the 10 least popular ads ever measured by Ad Track. In contrast, other credit card campaigns ranked among the 20 most popular. Of those asked about a Visa campaign starring basketball stars Hakeem Olajuwon and Scottie Pippen, 30 percent liked the ads a lot, and 32 percent asked about American Express ads with comedian Jerry Seinfeld said the same. Discover card's choice of racially diverse stars and its media placements paid off with minorities, however. Compared with 19 percent of all consumers, 30 percent of black consumers found the ads very effective.

Reception of the campaign among industry insiders was also lukewarm. In an April 1997 critique in the trade publication Card Marketing, the panel questioned Discover's decision to downplay its cash rebate, one of the card's most recognizable features. It noted that the campaign was "not terribly original." In February 1998 Card Marketing again took the series of celebrity spots to task. The panel criticized Discover's decision to continue running the campaign, saying that, while there was little to fault with the "solid and workman-like" commercial, there was little "sizzle" or reason to pay attention. The campaign, the panel said, paled in comparison to other celebrity commercials for credit cards, such as the American Express spots featuring Seinfeld.

Some marketing experts commented that the campaign, while a departure from the benefits-driven approach of the past, was still too familiar. Consumers were looking for newer benefits than the tried-and-true cash-back bonus. "It may be time for Discover to come up with some breakthrough offers for existing users," wrote Lisa Holton in Card Marketing. "This also might help them attract new ones."

TOW TRUCK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Known as Lombard Brokerage, Inc., until Morgan Stanley Dean Witter (later shortened to Morgan Stanley) purchased and renamed it in 1996, the discount brokerage firm Discover Brokerage Direct, Inc., was a direct competitor with other online brokerages, such as Ameritrade and E*TRADE Financial Corp. In the late 1990s online trading flourished; E*TRADE, for instance, reported a profit increase of 300 percent a year. The worldwide access of the Internet allowed any consumer, for a minimal fee, to profit from the seemingly unstoppable stock market surge during the latter half of the decade. Hoping to target responsible, self-directed American investors—not the very wealthy or the risk-taking speculator—Discover Brokerage released its "Tow Truck" marketing campaign.

In 1997 Discover Brokerage Direct, Inc., hired Black Rocket, a young advertising agency in San Francisco, to handle its $20 million advertising account. Black Rocket created a print and television campaign that used humor and atypical characters and settings to make the point that investing was not just for the rich or the reckless but was for everyone. The first commercial in the campaign, aired on television beginning in September 1998, was "Tow Truck." In this 30-second spot a businessman whose BMW was being towed commented on a copy of Barron's lying on the seat of the truck. It turned out that the tow-truck driver read the magazine and that he invested online with Discover Brokerage. As the conversation unfolded, viewers found out that the driver not only had made enough from online investing to retire but that he also owned his own island. "Tow Truck" ran until March 1999, after which five more television spots in the same vein were introduced, all featuring regular-looking people who turned out to be successful online investors.

Discover Brokerage's parent company, Morgan Stanley, reported a 14 percent sales increase in 1999. From an ad-industry perspective, the "Tow Truck" spot was a success, having been nominated for several Emmys. According to USA Today 's survey Ad Track, "Tow Truck" was the most liked commercial released by any online company in 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Investors had traditionally paid a commission to brokers for financial advice and to have brokers conduct transactions on their behalf. Online investing through the Internet was a phenomenon of the 1990s, and although it started out small, within a few years it had created waves in the financial-services industry.

In late 1996 Dean Witter, Discover & Co. bought Lombard Brokerage, Inc., a small but well-respected San Francisco firm. Dean Witter renamed the unit Discover Brokerage Direct, Inc. (In May 1997 Dean Witter merged with Morgan Stanley Group Inc. to create Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co.) Discover Brokerage claimed to be one of the first to offer online investing, which it began to do in August 1995. According to Dow Jones News Service, it was planned that Discover Brokerage would offer Discover cardholders a variety of online financial services, such as balance lookups, portfolio evaluations, and consolidated financial statements, in order to draw them in as clients. In addition, the Web-based unit could be used to generate additional business for its more traditional parent company.

In the late 1990s the Internet brokerage business mushroomed. In February 1999 BusinessWeek called it an "exploding phenomenon," reporting that in 1996 online trading "was an almost invisible blip. Two years later, it was hard to miss." The magazine went on to report, "The Net poses the most serious threat to the established industry's economics and primacy since the unfixing of commissions on May Day, 1975, when deregulation created the discount-brokerage business, threatening, but not vanquishing, a cozy oligopoly."

SEC CRITICISM OF ONLINE ADS

It was reported in May 1999 that the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) was concerned about the advertising of online brokerages. In fact, SEC chairman Arthur Levitt remarked in a speech before the National Press Club that some of the advertising resembled commercials for the lottery. Two of the spots he mentioned were "Tow Truck" and a spot for Ameritrade. In the latter, two mothers discussed their differing fortunes, with one elated because she had made $1,700 from online investing while the other bemoaned her decision to put her money into a mutual fund.

David Eckstein, speaking on behalf of Discover Brokerage Direct, Inc., said that the company fully supported the idea of "an informed investing public who are aware of the risk and rewards of investing." But the idea of including detailed disclaimers with the ads was resisted by John Yost of Black Rocket, who said that consumers deserved credit for being intelligent: "They realize that just because you suggest one guy's been wildly successful, they understand risks inherent in investing. They understand the joke."

Critic Barbara Lippert put it a bit more bluntly when she wrote in the May 1999 issue of Adweek, "Hello? It's known as advertising, which exaggerates reality in a comedic and entertaining way to make an impression, to get your attention. Did the Man from Glad really arrive from the sky by pontoon? . . . I find [Levitt's] criticism amazing, if not downright ironic."

TARGET MARKET

Discover Brokerage's advertising, starting with "Tow Truck," was targeted toward the everyday, hardworking Joe or Jane. According to Glenn Tom, senior vice president of marketing, it was an attempt to "reach the responsible self-directed investor through humor." Advertising Age described Discover Brokerage's target market as "middle Americans." Liz Seade, an account supervisor at Black Rocket, said in a June 1999 interview that Discover Brokerage sought "to open up the power of Wall Street to Main Street," aiming for business among those somewhere in between the rich guys with the big cigars and the "riverboat gambler" type of investors.

COMPETITION

A plethora of Web-based brokerage companies emerged during the late 1990s. In February 1999 BusinessWeek reported that, since 1996, online firms had gone from "'an insignificant technological curiosity' . . . to a band of more than a hundred online brokers." Discover Brokerage was a relatively small player and, according to Credit Suisse First Boston Corp., ranked ninth among its competitors, with 3.8 percent of the market (based on trades per day) in the second quarter of 1998. The rest of the top nine split the market as follows: Charles Schwab & Co. had 29.7 percent; E*TRADE Securities LLC, 11.5 percent; Fidelity Personal Investments and Services Group, 9.2 percent; Waterhouse Securities Inc., 9.2 percent; Datek, 8.5 percent; Ameritrade Holding Corp., including Accutrade Inc. and Ameritrade Inc., 6.9 percent; DLJdirect Inc., 4.3 percent; and Fleet Financial Group Inc., including Quick Sz Reilly Inc. and Suretrade Inc., 4.2 percent.

Nonetheless, Discover Brokerage was rated number three among online brokerage services by Gomez Advisors, a research outfit founded in 1996 that provided information to banks, brokerages, and other financial institutions wanting to offer Web-based financial services. Wall Street & Technology said of Discover Brokerage that users were "particularly impressed" with its customer service, which one user believed would help distinguish it from the competition. According to the article, "Given that the online brokerage market is already maturing and becoming a 'commodity' market, two factors—price and value-added customer service—will become critical. The big Wall Street players have the resources, but the race will favor the creative.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

The decision by Morgan Stanley Dean Witter to choose Black Rocket to handle the Discover Brokerage advertising was reportedly made without a review and in the wake of the resignation of the company's previous agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, which gave up the account because of a conflict with new client Merrill Lynch & Co. The decision represented a coup for Black Rocket, which only a month before had landed a $2 million account with Wired and which could boast billings of more than $50 million after getting the Discover Brokerage account.

When the ad agency first advanced the idea for the ''Tow Truck'' commercial, Discover Brokerage executive vice president Tom O'Connell had reservations. After Black Rocket executives presented the script, O'Connell ''wasn't sure if it was good or not. . . I went back to them the next week and said, 'We need a couple more ideas, so we can choose one.' They said, 'We've looked at all our ideas, and that's the best we have.'" O'Connell noted, however, that by the time the commercial was being filmed ''it was pure trust and total magic.''

The campaign was part of a general trend in the financial-services industry toward changing the traditionally stodgy tone of its advertising. ''Shots of suspender-clad brokers and white-columned edifices are fading from view,'' reported the Dallas Morning News. ''In their place are Lily Tomlin, Don Rickles and Peter Lynch for Fidelity Investments. On-line broker E-Trade tells potential customers it 'kicks butt.' Discount broker Charles Schwab features the top stock picks of real customers.''

The ''Tow Truck'' spot, which was filmed in the California desert, opened with a burly workingman named Al towing a BMW, its businessman owner riding with him in the truck. The businessman spied a copy of Barron's on the seat and asked, ''You, uh . . . read Barron's?'' ''Oh yeah, all the time,'' Al replied. He went on to tell the businessman that he invested money online through Discover Brokerage, mentioning that it had been Barron's top-rated online broker for the previous three years. He said that he had retired but continued to drive a tow truck anyway because he liked helping people. When the dumbfounded businessman noticed a photograph of an island attached to the visor, he asked if it was a vacation spot. Al sheepishly admitted, ''Actually, it's a picture of my house.'' ''That's a . . . that's an island,'' the businessman stammered. ''Well,'' Al said affably, ''technically, it's a country.''

AWARD-WINNING PRINT ADS

In addition to the television campaign, Discover Brokerage Direct, Inc., and Black Rocket received acclaim for their print advertising. ''You Are the CEO of Your Life,'' ''Look Out Wall Street. Here Comes Main Street,'' and ''Filthy Stinking Rich'' won awards for best print campaign in the area of consumer retail given by the Financial Communications Society. The ads, all making the point that Discover Brokerage was for the middle-class investor, were done in black and white with eye-catching headlines. In ''Look Out Wall Street. Here Comes Main Street,'' for example, the headline was placed next to a picture of a lower-middle-class neighborhood. ''You Are the CEO of Your Life'' showed a young woman holding her baby. Black Rocket partner Bob Kerstetter said, ''We wanted to make a bold and simple look for these ads. We wanted the ads to have some craft and credibility to them, especially because the strategy is bigger than just a price/value message.''

The campaign used humor and irony to make the point that online investing was for everyone, not just businesspeople. Bob Garfield of Advertising Age noted that the last example of humorous ads for investment companies he could think of went all the way back to the E.F. Hutton commercials of the late 1970s (''When E.F. Hutton talks, people listen''). Garfield thought that the Discover Brokerage ads were ''straight to the point. It's just a jokey way of saying 'Discover's about making money.'"

The commercial also challenged the stereotype of the successful investor, presenting him as a regular person. As John Yost, a principal with Black Rocket, put it, ''The ad is saying, 'This is the online brokerage for the rest of us.' It's humor that touches an honest emotion in people.'' Ken Harris, a marketing consultant with Cannondale Associates, said that the spot ''appeals to the workaday guy who feels he doesn't get respect from people who are condescending to him. But it doesn't offend the people who might be more affluent.''

Bob Kerstetter, another partner of Black Rocket, contrasted Discover Brokerage's approach with those of other online trading companies: ''E-Trade's positioning is 'Screw your broker.' Charles Schwab is safe but boring. Discover believes everyone should be empowered to trade on line. They want to demystify it.''

The campaign continued with five more spots, titled "Airplane," "Bartender," "Cab," "Waiting," and "Teenager." They featured middle-class people who had become millionaires by trading with Discover Brokerage. "Teenager," which was the most praised spot second to "Tow Truck," featured two parents waiting for their 18-year-old son to return home. When the stern parents asked where he had been, he pleaded, "I had to drop Jenny off in Cleveland, and Steve lives in Miami." His unappeased father restricted his son's use of Discover Brokerage for one week. The punch line of the spot came when the father told his son not to park his helicopter in the front yard. The helicopter had apparently been earned from investing with Discover Brokerage. The campaign ended on February 9, 2000, after Discover Brokerage changed its name to Morgan Stanley Dean Witter Online and released its "Know Your Source" campaign. The brokerage would shorten its name to Morgan Stanley in 2002.

OUTCOME

According to USA Today, "Tow Truck" was one of the most popular commercials tested in its Ad Track poll. Of 165 adults who saw the spot, 46 percent said that they liked it "a lot," with only 9 percent of respondents indicating that they disliked it.

In May 1999 Discover Brokerage and Black Rocket won Best of Show for "Tow Truck" at the annual Portfolio Awards of the Financial Communications Society, a nonprofit organization dedicated to improving professional standards in financial communications. The commercial was selected from more than 300 entries from banks, securities firms, exchanges, mutual funds, investment advisers, and accounting and insurance firms throughout North America and Europe. Black Rocket also received a San Francisco Ad Club Cable Car Award for the commercial. In addition, the campaign was named the best off-line campaign by "Adweek IQ," the interactive portion of Adweek magazine, and it won an ADDY. Further, Advertising Age gave its Bobby Award for Best Actor to the hapless businessman, played by Larry Cedar. Travis McKenna, who played the good-natured tow-truck driver/millionaire, was also nominated.

According to the Dallas Morning News, it was not clear exactly what effect the spots had on Discover Brokerage's business. "While I may enjoy the ad, I have not received any compelling reason to move my business," said Charlene Stern, head of Stern Marketing Group, a company that helped financial-services firms such as Discover's rival Ameritrade compete in the market. Black Rocket disagreed, calling humor in advertising a "time-tested" way to get business. Discover Brokerage's market share continued to hover between 3 and 4 percent, according to the Wall Street Journal, although Black Rocket's Seade indicated in June 1999 that since the campaign's launch new accounts had grown fivefold. There was no doubt, however, that the company's commercials had made a favorable impression on the industry and on television viewers.

DRUNK DRIVING'S A SERIOUS CRIME. LET'S TREAT IT THAT WAY. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The campaign "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way" was originally created in 1997 for the Connecticut chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD). It was deemed so effective, however, that it was later adopted by chapters around the United States. At no charge, advertising agency Pagano Schenck & Kay of Boston created a television commercial and four posters, approximately 13 by 16 inches, designed to look like warning or safety signs. Each poster compared the lenient sentences drunk drivers sometimes received with the tougher sentences handed out for much less serious offenses. All of the incidents cited in the campaign were true. In a nutshell, the campaign argued that the punishment for drunk driving did not fit the crime, that, in fact, the absurdly light sentences often given to drunk drivers trivialized the crime.

"Warning," a silent, stark 30-second television spot, showed white text rolling against a black screen. "Warning[,] this program is intended for public viewing," it began. "Unauthorized reproduction and exhibition many result in up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Which is a far greater punishment than what a drunk driver got after his car rammed into 18-year-old Mary Sanders[,] crushing her. The drunk driver spent three months in jail. Mary Sanders went into a coma. And died. Mothers Against Drunk Driving. It's a serious crime. Let's treat it that way."

Under the headline "NO GRAFFITI," one of the posters read, "Convicted persons may serve six months in jail. That's two months more than what a drunk driver served after smashing her car into 14-year-old Eric Zimmerman. Eric's head was pierced by a chain-link fence, which killed him." At the bottom appeared the line "Mothers Against Drunk Driving. It's a serious crime. Let's treat it that way."

A second poster used the headline "Keep Off the Grass." The copy read, "Punishable by a fine of up to $99. That's $99 more than what a drunk driver paid after crashing into the car carrying 15-year-old Kerry Dunlop. The drunk driver got off scot-free. Kerry's neck broke and she died." Another poster pointed out that a $50 fine for not curbing a dog was more severe than the punishment given to a drunk driver who smashed into Julia Coppola and her two daughters. The final poster said that shoplifters could be imprisoned for up to one year, which exceeded the time served by a drunk driver who slammed into Russ Gordon and Michael Albert, both 26 years old. The drunk driver received eight months, while "Russ and Michael received death."

There was an initial printing of 5,000, with MADD distributing the posters to all Connecticut police and state trooper departments. They also were sent to high schools and colleges, as well as to shopping malls. To introduce the campaign, MADD held an event on the state capitol steps to acknowledge Crime Victims Rights Week (April 13-19, 1997). Family members of each victim mentioned presented oversized posters to MADD representatives.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Candy Lightner founded Mothers Against Drunk Driving in California in 1980 after a drunken man with multiple convictions for driving while intoxicated ran down and killed her 13-year-old daughter. The man had been released from jail two days earlier for another hit-and-run drunk driving crash. By 1998 the national organization had an annual budget of $50 million and 600 chapters.

MADD worked to stop drunk driving and prevent underage drinking through new legislation, stronger enforcement of current laws, increased public awareness, and assistance to victims. The organization considered one of its major accomplishments to be the raising of the national drinking age from 18 to 21 in 1984. As a nonprofit organization, MADD did not produce paid advertising, but the national headquarters and its chapters sometimes produced public service announcements (PSAs) for print, radio, and television. One of its most widely known programs was the "Tie One On for Safety" red ribbon project.

Pam Bingman, the assistant traffic manager at the Pagano Schenck & Kay advertising agency, had lost her brother to a drunk driver, and she and her family found out firsthand how lenient the sentence for drunk driving could be. When Bingman encouraged her employer to become involved, the agency agreed to offer its services to MADD's Connecticut chapter, of which Bingman was a member. "Our pro bono efforts have tended to revolve around education and youth and this seemed to fall nicely into that area," said Woody Kay, the agency's chairman and executive creative director. Thus was born the "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime" campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Every person who could drive, drink, and vote was considered part of the potential audience for the "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime" campaign. Otherwise, the campaign did not seek out any particular demographic groups. Janice Heggie, executive director of the Connecticut chapter, said that the people most likely to read the posters were social drinkers, community leaders, responsible parents, and young people just beginning to understand the relationship between alcohol and driving. But Mothers Against Drunk Driving also hoped to reach people of influence, those in the state legislature or those who would contact state legislators with its message.

MADD MARKS FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF PRINCESS DIANA'S DEATH

In 1998 the national headquarters of Mothers Against Drunk Driving distributed a public service announcement to the media and its chapters with the headline "On August 31, 1997 the world was victimized by another drunk driver." The copy continued, "Mothers Against Drunk Driving mourns the loss of Princess Diana as well as the other estimated 250 victims killed in our country over the Labor Day weekend. Isn't it time we say enough is enough?"

COMPETITION

Organizations with messages similar to that of Mothers Against Drunk Driving, such as Students Against Driving Drunk (SADD), were allies, not competitors. "The most important work that we have learned to do is to partner with as many in the community as we can to stop drunk driving. I don't chose to promote competition against anybody," said Heggie. "We are trying to educate the liquor lobbyists. We are trying to educate our state legislators. There are many legislators who work with us to toughen the drunk driving laws that we have."

The beer and alcohol industry and the establishments that sold alcohol were not considered to be competitors. "Beer and alcohol distributors don't make people drive and drink. There isn't one beer company that wants people to drink their product and then drive," Heggie said. MADD also sought to assure people that it was not against the consumption of alcohol by those 21 and older. Thus, the competition was not any particular group of people or organizations but rather what could best be described as irresponsible drinking or ignorance of the effects of drinking and driving.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The charge of the Connecticut chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving to the ad agency was a general one: to increase awareness of the problem of drunk driving. What the "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime" campaign ultimately attempted to do was to change attitudes and to make people aware of drunk driving and of the lenient sentences that were often handed down in drunk driving cases. "Drunk drivers are literally getting away with murder," said Amy Swearingen of Pagano Schenck & Kay. "Too often, the sentences given convicted drunk drivers are more suited to people who have torn labels off mattresses than to criminals who have killed innocent victims or destroyed their lives."

As the agency became involved in building the campaign, it was shocked by the lack of punishment for drunk driving. Staff members spent many hours talking to the families of the victims of drunk drivers. What always came up in these conversations was the fact that the families had a loved one who had either been killed or maimed while the perpetrator had received a minor sentence or none at all.

Talking to the victims' families was a natural move for the agency. To advertise a product, the agency would talk to the people who bought that product. To create advertising for MADD, the agency talked to the people the organization sought to serve. Dylan Lee, the copywriter for the campaign, and Carla Mooney, the art director, both spent many hours interviewing victims' families, whose names had been supplied by MADD. In addition, since Bingman had brought MADD to the agency's attention because she was the member of a victimized family, it was natural that the agency would look at the project through the eyes of the victims' families. "We were really trying to burst some bubbles," Kay said. "So many of us, including many of us here at the agency, are sort of living in a bubble when it comes to this. We don't realize that people are literally getting away with murder when it comes to drinking and driving." The depth of the commitment of the employees of Pagano Schenck & Kay to the campaign was significant. Lee, for example, came to feel so strongly about MADD and the campaign that he donated his annual bonus to the Connecticut chapter.

Pagano Schenck & Kay hoped that the campaign would motivate people to put pressure on their state legislators to increase the penalties for drunk driving violations. Although there was an ongoing debate about whether or not severe punishment helped to reduce crime, in this case MADD was pointing out that the issue was often a matter of not punishing lawbreakers at all. The campaign did not promote any specific punishment or even harsh punishment; rather, it used facts to demonstrate the disparity between the crime and the punishment.

One conversation Lee had with a mother inspired the direction the campaign eventually took. The mother, whose daughter had been killed by a drunk driver, had just returned from court. She was extremely upset because the driver had gotten off with a light sentence. To take her mind off her anger and frustration, she put a video into her VCR. When the standard warning about the punishment for illegal use of the video came on the screen, the mother was overcome. She realized that by copying the video she could receive a much heavier sentence than the person who had caused the death of her daughter.

There were a number of reasons the agency chose to make posters the main component of the campaign. Public service announcements tended to receive airtime on television in the early morning hours or at other times when viewership was low. In addition, it was difficult to get any radio time for PSAs or to get them placed in print media. MADD told the agency that, if it produced a series of posters, the organization would make certain they were distributed.

This led Pagano Schenck & Kay to think about the many signs that were displayed in schools and in businesses and other workplaces. Office walls, for example, were often covered with signs on safety, government regulations, or company policies for employees and visitors. The signs were sometimes required by the government or were a part of company training. The agency concluded that, because employers displayed such signs, they might be willing to display a strong message about an issue as important as drunk driving.

OUTCOME

The television spot and four posters garnered the top prize in the 1997 Hatch Awards, New England's largest advertising show, and first place in the 1998 John O'Toole Public Service Advertising Awards, hosted by the American Association of Advertising Agencies. The campaign also won a Clio and awards at the One Show and from Communications Arts. The Connecticut chapter's campaign was so well received that the national headquarters sold the posters for use across the United States.

Boston Business Journal reported that for every 1,000 arrests of people driving while they were intoxicated, 347 offenders were put in jail or placed on probation in 1997, compared to 151 in 1986. The treatment of offenders appeared to have changed, although there was no firm evidence of the role the campaign had played in this development.

INTELLIGENCE EVERYWHERE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Motorola, Inc., began by selling radio accessories in the 1920s, but by 2000 mobile phones were Motorola's highest-grossing product. Even though Motorola was the world's second-largest mobile-phone company behind Nokia, Inc., it was brutally affected by the tech industry's downturn in 2001. Motorola's stock price had plummeted nearly 70 percent in just 12 months. The company also announced thousands of layoffs during the same year. Executives at Motorola believed that the best way to prevail in the new decade was to lead the telecommunications industry with innovative products. In 2001 the company released its "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, which hinted at what the future would look like with Motorola products.

Motorola awarded its advertising account to the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather New York in 2000. After debuting Motorola print ads at trade shows during March 2001, Ogilvy & Mather launched its estimated $150–$200 million print campaign nationwide in May of that year. The first nationwide advertisement was an eight-page spread that appeared in the Wall Street Journal. Each ad featured different appliances communicating to each other with products not yet invented. One ad showed a parking meter sending a message to a Motorola customer whose meter was about to expire. Another featured a refrigerator sending its milk order to a supermarket. One print ad showed an image of a Chihuahua with the copy "I'M LOST." The image of a personal digital assistant (PDA) adjacent to the Chihuahua announced, "I'LL FIND YOU." The ad suggested that Motorola would locate lost pets by using Global Positioning System (GPS) technology.

Motorola reported $30 billion in sales for 2001, a disappointing drop from the $37 billion it had posted in 2000. Other mobile-phone companies experienced a similar decline. Motorola sales dipped to $26 billion in 2002. The company did not post a sales increase until 2003. Advertising critics still praised the "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign for revitalizing Motorola's antiquated image. Others criticized it for catering to "dreamers" and advertising a product that did not yet exist.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1928 Paul Galvin founded Galvin Manufacturing, which sold components that allowed radios to use household electrical currents instead of batteries. After the success of the company's motorcar radios, in the 1940s Galvin changed the company name to Motorola. structure hardware, and mobile phones. The company's advertising account was spread across several ad agencies, and its phones were advertised with an array of taglines, including "W/O Wires," "The Heart of Smart," and "Digital DNA."

Hoping to reproduce the success that International Business Machines Corporation (IBM) had experienced after it consolidated its advertising account to one agency, Motorola awarded its entire account in 2000 to Ogilvy & Mather, which had been creating IBM's advertisements since 1994. "I am impressed by the way IBM was able to reposition its company," Motorola CMO Jocelyn Carter-Miller said to Brandweek. She added that Motorola's future positioning would center on "making things smarter and people's lives better." Because of waning sales, Motorola slashed its advertising budget by 70 percent just six months after signing it over to Ogilvy & Mather.

Between 2000 and 2001 Motorola was forced to reduce its workforce by tens of thousands. Corporate executives believed that the most effective way to increase sales was to release innovative products. As Ogilvy & Mather prepared to launch the "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, Motorola was planning the release of its A830 mobile phone, which would be the world's first wireless phone to browse the Internet at speeds comparable to that of a cable modem.

Ogilvy & Mather dropped Motorola's "W/O Wires" and "The Heart of Smart" taglines in order to replace them with something more innovative. Also, Motorola did not want the upcoming campaign to contain the word "wireless," which the company considered outdated. As Motorola chief brand officer Geoffrey Frost explained to Steven Burke, a reporter for CRN, "We don't refer to the [early] auto industry as 'horselessness.' Eventually, wireless networking will be second nature."

TARGET MARKET

"Intelligence Everywhere" targeted a demographic of consumers who were interested in how future technologies would affect their daily lives. The ads implied that Motorola would provide the product-to-product communication hardware for futuristic appliances. Discussing the ads with the New York Post, Milosz Skrzypczak, an analyst with the market research firm the Yankee Group, said, "We're talking sci-fi here." Skrzypczak, who was 28 years old, explained that the products featured in the campaign probably would not be available in his lifetime.

The campaign was released simultaneously with premium Motorola phones that were loaded with state-of-the-art features. The Motorola A760 was equipped with Bluetooth wireless technology that could send images and even small multimedia files from phone to phone. "Today, there are more than 1.2 billion mobile handset users—and there is plenty of opportunity for more growth through both new users and those who want to replace or upgrade their handsets. We are focused on building momentum," Tom Lynch, president of Motorola's Personal Communications Sector, said to PR Newswire. "This means winning across all price points by working with wireless operators to innovate, create, and deliver 'must have' products and 'gotta-do' mobile experiences."

Other advertising analysts, such as Mary Huhn of the New York Post, criticized the campaign for limiting itself to "dreamers." The print ads suggested that Motorola products could help appliances such as washing machines read the handling labels on clothes. Unfortunately, the availability of such appliances was not expected for decades, and critics were skeptical about whether consumers would pay a premium price to save a few seconds of their time even if such technologies did become available.

LITIGATION EVERYWHERE

When the mobile-phone division of Motorola began using the tagline "Intelligence Everywhere" for a 2001 advertising campaign, database-software company MicroStrategy filed a complaint with the U.S. District Court. The Virginia-based MicroStrategy claimed that it had been using the tagline "Intelligence Everywhere" in advertising since 1998. A federal judge later decided to allow Motorola use of the tagline.

COMPETITION

Just before "Intelligence Everywhere" was released, Nokia held 30 percent of the global mobile-phone market, which was twice the amount that Motorola held. The Finland-based Nokia attributed success to its stylish phones that were easy to use and to its straightforward brand campaigns. The market researcher Interbrand rated Nokia as one of the top five brands of 2000. In Europe Nokia was rated highest in Reader's Digest 's "Trusted Brands" survey. "They built their business on great design and an excellent interface which made the phones very easy to use. They combined that with the brand and I think the brand itself is associated with and perceived as providing the best products," Ben Wood, senior analyst for the research and analysis firm Gartner Europe, told Ad Age Global.

Nokia had been using the tagline "Connecting People" since 1993. By 2001 advertising accounts for Nokia were spread across several different advertising agencies. Grey Worldwide EMEA was responsible for Nokia's advertising for Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. Advertising in the United States was created by the ad agency the Richards Group. TBWA\Chiat\Day Canada handled Nokia's Canadian account. Most of the campaigns released for Nokia were straightforward and direct. One of the brand's most repeated images was that of two hands reaching for each other. The ad featured Nokia's logo and the tagline "Connecting People." Referring to Nokia's advertising strategy, Caroline Carter, the president of Grey Worldwide EMEA, explained in Ad Age Global, "They have a clear view that it's not about the technology, it's about what the technology does for people."

MARKETING STRATEGY

At the start of 2001 the first print ads for the "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign appeared at the CeBIT trade show in Hanover, Germany. They surfaced again at the Cellular Telecommunications Industry Association trade show in Las Vegas. With an estimated $150–$200 million budget, the campaign was released nationwide in May 2001 and first appeared as an eight-page spread in the Wall Street Journal.

The campaign was Ogilvy & Mather's first execution for Motorola since winning its advertising account in September 2000. The agency developed the tagline "Intelligence Everywhere" to suggest that future appliances and objects everywhere would use Motorola technology to benefit people's lives. "It is about capturing the knowledge that's around us and using it wisely to develop products that offer real solutions to the challenges faced by real people," Bob Growney, Motorola's president and chief operating officer, was quoted in Business Wire.

The campaign's ads depicted future technologies at work in home, office, car, and personal-life situations. Each ad was separated into two panels. The left panel featured a single object communicating to an object in the right panel. For one of the campaign's most remarked-upon ads, the left panel featured a carton of milk with the copy "I'M SPOILED." The refrigerator on its right responded, "I KNOW." The ad implied that refrigerators of the future would automatically sense milk's expiration date. Another print featured a sweater beside the copy "BE GENTLE." The washing machine in the right panel replied, "I WILL." Other print ads featured mobile phones communicating with vending machines, computers talking to PDAs (personal digital assistants), and televisions talking to schools.

"Sometimes technology is on a faster curve than the market is ready for," Rachelle Franklin, director of corporate brands at Motorola, said to the New York Post. "What we're trying to express is, 'We'll be ready with relevant technology when you're ready for it.' That's key. It's all about timing."

Another print ad featured a Chihuahua beneath the copy "I'M LOST." On the ad's right panel a PDA resembling a Palm Pilot answered, "I'LL FIND YOU." The ad suggested that future Motorola products could find lost pets using GPS technology. Criticizing the ad, Nancy Gohring, a senior writer with Interactive Week, wrote, "Personally, I think it's kind of weird. How much of a monthly fee will people pay to track pets?"

Motorola executives wanted "Intelligence Everywhere" to convey Motorola's dedication to a future of seamless mobility, meaning that consumers would be connected wirelessly to conventional objects. Motorola's CEO, Ed Zander, explained the concept of seamless mobility to investors at the company's Merrill Lynch Global Communications Investor Conference in 2004. As a theoretical example, Zander explained that if someone was wakened by a song on his or her radio alarm clock,

MOTOROLA MUSIC

In 2004 the mobile-phone division of the company Motorola unveiled a technology that allowed automobiles to connect wirelessly with home Internet connections. The technology transferred digital music that resided inside a home computer to a car's stereo.

the song could follow the consumer throughout his or her house on a home stereo system. The music would eventually be transferred "seamlessly" to the customer's car stereo.

Without giving specifics, Dan Burrier, executive creative director at Ogilvy & Mather, explained to Brandweek how Motorola contributed to seamless mobility. "If Motorola becomes the leader of Intelligence Everywhere, then things like Motorola phones become your key into it," Burrier said. "If phones become part of a larger dialogue, then that is an honorable, smarter place to be."

OUTCOME

The "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign enjoyed some advertising success, including a 2002 One Show award, but many advertising critics lambasted the campaign for advertising a technology that did not yet exist. Sales for Motorola in 2001 plummeted $7 billion below its sales figure for 2000. Instead of blaming the "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, critics cited other factors, such as a widespread slump in the technology sector, Motorola's reduced advertising budget, and the Motorola brand falling out of favor with consumers. Motorola's sales did not improve until Ogilvy & Mather released a subsequent campaign that abbreviated the company's name to "Moto." That campaign would resonate so well with younger consumers that competitor Nokia would be forced to alter its time-tested advertising strategy.

Some ad critics commended "Intelligence Everywhere" for initiating Motorola's transformation into a more stylish and contemporized brand. Creatives at Ogilvy & Mather would use the simplistic messaging of "Intelligence Everywhere" in later Motorola campaigns. "Technology is in a panic mode," Chris Wall, co-chief creative officer for Ogilvy & Mather, said to MC Technology Marketing Intelligence. "People got fat and happy in the late '90s [from the Internet], but now they've written off technology as being a leprosy. Ultimately, what technology has to have is real value. I think simplicity wins."

MOTO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1995 Motorola, Inc., dominated the mobile-phone market with 54 percent of the global market share. Over the next few years, however, Motorola was accused of losing sight of its customers' needs and designing unsightly phones with overly complex features. By 2000 Motorola had surrendered much of its business to Nokia, Inc., a company renowned for creating stylish mobile phones with an easy-to-use functionality. To salvage its brand Motorola hired Tim Parsey, who had worked previously at Apple Computer, to head a team to design a new line of premium, stylish Motorola phones. Once the new phones were completed, Motorola released its "Moto" campaign to rebrand Motorola as a fun, creative company with a cutting-edge product line.

In 2000 Motorola had selected the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather New York to handle its advertising. Creatives at the agency's Taiwan office noticed that the local youth, who were unaccustomed to the r and l syllables, referred to their Motorola phones simply as "Moto." Ogilvy & Mather used the moniker to construct the brand's new quip, "Hello Moto," which first appeared in January 2002 for the campaign's Asian debut. The campaign continued in more than 200 countries and included outdoor ads, print ads, and television spots. Spending for the campaign was estimated at $100 million. Initially it targeted 20-something trendsetters. Later the target was expanded to include a much younger demographic. Instead of touting phone features, the "Moto" spots blended contemporary music with fashion to build Motorola's new stylish image. More than 80 print ads were created. Each featured a different "Moto-ism," such as "BANGBANGMOTO," "METALMOTO," and "DIVAMOTO," to convey a new attitude that was surrounding Motorola. The campaign continued until 2005.

Advertising and technology critics praised the campaign for giving Motorola's brand a much-needed revitalization. During the fourth quarter of 2002, "Moto" and the contemporized Motorola phones helped Motorola sales outperform Nokia sales for the first time in four years. In 2005 Motorola's market share had grown more than 5 percent over its market share in 2000.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the 1990s Motorola products consisted primarily of semiconductors, telecommunication infrastructure hardware, and mobile phones. The latter, the company's most lucrative product, was derided by technology critics for being overly focused on engineering and not attending to the needs of customers. Motorola phones between 1995 and 2000 were criticized for their bulky, unattractive design. "Motorola is a company that listens more to its engineers, while Nokia listens more to its customers," Stefan Daiberl, the director of brand valuation at the consultancy group Interbrand, was quoted in Reuters News.

Motorola executives made decisions between 1999 and 2001 that would eventually improve the company's market share and resurrect the Motorola brand. In 1999 Motorola hired Nike Inc.'s global director of advertising, Geoffrey Frost, to lead Motorola's marketing department. Frost formulated a two-year plan that involved hiring designer Tim Parsey, who had previously served as design chief at Apple Computer, to create a stylish line of Motorola phones. Taking its cue from International Business Machines Corporation (IBM), which had met with success after consolidating its advertising account with Ogilvy & Mather in 1994, Motorola awarded its entire account to that agency.

Ogilvy & Mather first released a print campaign in May 2001 titled "Intelligence Everywhere," which featured objects of the future communicating to each other with the help of Motorola. One ad featured an image of a milk carton below the copy "I'M SPOILED." The refrigerator appearing on the adjacent page responded with the copy "I KNOW." The particular ad implied that refrigerators of the future would automatically sense milk's expiration date. Even though "Intelligence Everywhere" received little praise from the advertising community, critics cited the campaign as a turning point for Motorola. In early 2002 Tim Parsey's line of Motorola phones were ready for market. Motorola needed a campaign that not only matched the stylish look of Parsey's phones but also updated the corporation's antiquated image.

TARGET MARKET

The "Moto" campaign initially targeted trendsetters in their mid-20s who, as the creatives at Ogilvy & Mather explained, were always searching for the best phone. The ad agency hoped that if the initial spots resonated with such trendsetters, the perception of Motorola as a young, hip brand would spread into other demographics. Before they were available to the public, new Motorola phones were given to celebrities such as British actress Helen Mirren and Lord of the Rings director Peter Jackson. The new V70 Motorola phone was also released when the "Moto" campaign began. Ogilvy & Mather assumed that the $400–$500 price tag for the V70 would deter younger mobile-phone users. After V70 sales tripled Motorola's original expectations, the campaign's target expanded to include younger consumers, businesspeople, and even the young sales associates in phone retail outlets.

"Until last year [2002], Motorola had no brand image," Chris Ambrosio, an analyst for the telecommunications research firm Strategy Analytics, explained to Brandweek. "It was a mom's handset or a dad's handset. In 2002, they corrected that. They solidified their core offerings and 'Moto' really took off in the U.S.," Ambrosio concluded. The campaign targeted younger consumers by airing commercials with popular electronic music artists, such as Paul Van Dyke and Felix da Housecat. Commercials ran across networks popular among youths, such as MTV. Promotional material was given to the young sales associates working in phone retail stores. Expanding the campaign's target proved effective. The consultancy company Gartner Group noted in 2003 that, within retail outlets, Motorola phones were two of the top three most recommended handsets.

COMPETITION

Motorola's two major competitors were Nokia, a company based in Finland, and Samsung, a South Korean mobile-phone company. In 2001 Nokia's market share was 30 percent—twice that of Motorola. Nokia was known for its stylish and user-friendly phones, and it

GEOFFREY FROST

In 1999 Geoffrey Frost left his position as global director of advertising at Nike to help the electronics company Motorola improve its archaic image. Frost soon hired a former design chief of Apple Computer, Tim Parsey, to design a new line of Motorola phones. Many considered Frost to be the mastermind of Motorola's rebound during the successful 2002 "Moto" campaign. Just after his promotion to executive vice president and chief marketing officer for Motorola, Frost died of natural causes on November 17, 2005. Although he remained elusive about his actual age in interviews, it was later reported he was 55 years old at the time of death. Remembered for his booming laugh and love for pop culture, Frost told Advertising Age just before he died, "I'm 17 forever."

relied on straightforward ad campaigns with the tagline "Connecting People," which it had used since 1993. In an interview with Ad Age Global, Caroline Carter, president of Grey Worldwide EMEA, one of Nokia's ad agencies, explained, "[Nokia has] a clear view that it's not about the technology, it's about what the technology does for people."

Samsung Electronics North America, the North American branch of the South Korean company Samsung Group, spent $200 million on marketing its product range with a global campaign titled "DigitAll Experience." In 2002 Samsung was the world's third-largest mobile-phone manufacturer, behind Nokia and Motorola. "DigitAll Experience" used Internet ads, print ads, and television spots to promote Samsung products that included personal digital assistants (PDAs), flat-screen computer monitors, plasma-screen televisions, DVD players, and even Samsung's Homepad Internet Refrigerator. The latter featured an embedded computer that recorded and displayed digital photos, browsed the Internet, and even captured digital video.

Marketing executives at Samsung hoped that, by promoting all of the premium products at once, Samsung's entire brand would be bolstered. "If you see ads for our DVDs [players], [the ads] will help us sell refrigerators, and the refrigerator ads will help us sell other product. We want to reach anyone who has ever purchased a Samsung product before," Peter Weedfald, vice president of North America strategic marketing and new media at Samsung, said to the Delaney Report. The campaign was developed by the ad agencies Foote Cone & Belding and Chiel Communications America.

Print ads displayed sleek product images with the tagline "DigitAll" and Samsung's logo. Television spots showed consumers enjoying a wide range of Samsung brand electronics. Internet advertising consumed the brunt of the campaign's resources. In early 2002 the price per Internet ad impression—also known as the single display of an Internet ad—was estimated at $2.50, a historical low for online advertising. Samsung took advantage of the bargain prices and released ads across 57 of the Internet's most popular websites, including Forbes.com, Yahoo.com, Fortune.com, BusinessWeek.com, and CRN.com. Several online ads included a sweepstakes offering a $5,000 shopping spree at Sears, which was also one of Samsung's retailers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Creatives at the Taiwan office of Ogilvy & Mather first took notice of Taiwanese youth, who were unversed in the English r and l syllables, referring to their Motorola phones as "Moto." The agency's New York office liked the abbreviation so much that it constructed Motorola's estimated $100 million campaign around it. The campaign first surfaced in January 2002, when Ogilvy & Mather hired a graffiti artist to leave keyhole-shaped designs on the pavement within Hong Kong's trendy Lan Kwai Fong nightspot area. The shapes resembled Motorola's new V70 phone. TV commercials aired across Asia during the same month. In March print ads and television spots were released in North America and Europe. The campaign's lead spot, "Hello Moto," was backed by electronic music and copy that conjoined the word "MOTO" with words that reflected Motorola's new image. In the spot businessmen were shown talking on phones, and the word "MEETINGMOTO" appeared. The phrase "MOTOHIP/MOTOHOP" was then juxtaposed over an image of a club scene; and the spot ended with a male voice-over stating, "Hello Moto." The phrase referred to the website www.HelloMoto.com, which provided Motorola phones and accessories.

The campaign's print ads featured varying "Moto-isms" superimposed over images of individuals that represented the "Moto-isms." "GIZMOMOTO," "ALPHAMOTO," "BANGIN'MOTO," "BANGBANGMOTO," and more than 80 other words were created for the ads. One of the most commented-upon print ads, "DIVAMOTO," featured a beautiful 20-something woman wearing a black feather stole and holding a Motorola clamshell phone. "We're trying to create a new culture around our products," Jacquie Amacher, director of brand communication for Motorola North America, said to the Chicago Sun-Times.

During the campaign's initial weeks, advertising critics considered the strategy a gamble because it excluded information about the phones' features. Instead the ads relied entirely on stylish and fashion-conscious content to attract customers. Ad critic Lewis Lazare of the Chicago Sun-Times wrote, "This startlingly different ad campaign could backfire badly if Motorola doesn't prove at heart to be the kind of company the advertising so dramatically suggests it is in the process of becoming."

As the campaign proved to resonate not only with 25-year-old trendsetters but also with the youth culture, Motorola extended the campaign's life span past its initial November 2002 completion date. The campaign's target was also expanded to include a younger crowd. During the 2003 MTV Video Music Awards, three television spots featured different electronic-music artists and the new mixable ring tones (which allowed users to assign different sounds to specific callers) for the Motorola C350 phone. One spot began with DJ Felix da Housecat, who received a phone call inside a bar. DJ Felix began humming the phone's catchy ring tone, which was later hummed by everyone who came in contact with the jingle. The spot ended with the previous campaign's tagline, "Intelligence Everywhere," followed by a voice-over saying "Hello Moto." Another spot featured cars that started bouncing up and down after a phone rang with a song by DJ Colette. The third spot depicted city lights pulsing to the beat of a ring tone created by DJ Paul Van Dyke. The campaign ended in 2005.

OUTCOME

Advertising analysts attributed the revitalization of the Motorola brand largely to the "Moto" campaign, along with Tim Parsey's new design for Motorola. But strong advertising and sleek design were not the only contributors. In order to improve sales and distribution, Motorola had also strengthened relationships with carriers such as the Sprint PCS Group. Matt Baker, Motorola's senior director of North American marketing, explained to Brandweek, "We started to leverage relationships we hadn't in the past. There was growth in the Verizon business and deeper conversations with the Best Buys and Circuit Citys of the world."

Motorola outperformed Nokia in sales for the first time in four years during the fourth quarter of 2002. For 2003 Motorola posted its first annual sales increase in three years. Two years later Motorola's global market share was estimated at 16.8 percent, a substantial improvement from the company's 11 percent in 2000. Adweek Magazine's Technology Marketing gave Ogilvy & Mather its 2003 Ad Agency of the Year award for creating the "Moto" campaign and other high-profile campaigns, such as IBM's "Gizmo." The head of Motorola's global marketing, Geoffrey Frost, was named one of Brandweek magazine's Marketers of the Year in 2005. The October 10 Brandweek article praised Frost by stating, "Once known for unfashionable phones and clunky advertising, Motorola now has probably the hottest phone on the market [RAZR], a deal with Apple's iTunes, and a hipper image thanks to its catchy 'Moto' ads."

REAL PEOPLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in 1998 by a pair of California-based software entrepreneurs as a way to mobilize like-minded liberal activists for political causes, MoveOn.org became a driving force in funding, organizing, and promoting Democratic platforms and candidates during the 2004 U.S. presidential election, and it was the most successful independent political-action group to do so exclusively through the Internet. In the summer of 2004 MoveOn hired the Academy Award-winning documentary filmmaker Errol Morris to produce a series of television and print ads of his own devising. Morris proposed to film ''real people'' speaking directly to the viewer about why they were planning to vote for Senator John Kerry and not President George W. Bush. The hope was that this direct, one-to-one approach would help to convince the influential demographic of undecided voters to follow suit.

With MoveOn's backing, Morris set out to film interviews with ordinary citizens speaking in their own words, completely unscripted and unprompted, which he then edited into individual 30-second television spots. MoveOn initially earmarked $3 million for the campaign, with plans to run both TV and print advertising in late August to coincide with the Republican National Convention. Filmed against a plain white background with soft, even lighting, each person spoke frankly into the camera. In one ad, for example, a 26-year-old business analyst from New Jersey said, ''We don't have, you know, universal health care, we've cut benefits for veterans, No Child Left Behind is a joke—we can't afford another four years of George Bush. It would be disastrous.''

While the ads won critical accolades from industry insiders, incumbent Bush was reelected by a narrow margin. On the whole, however, MoveOn played an influential role in mobilizing both liberal donors and volunteers in the year leading up to the election. And while it did not achieve its goal of preventing a second term for President Bush, it continued to use the Internet to raise money and mobilize its members to promote liberal causes at both the local and federal levels.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Historically, because presidential candidates were often reluctant to have negative, biting, or derisive ads directly associated with their own campaigns, few ''person-on-the-street'' advertisements proved to be decisive factors in elections. Notable exceptions were the ''Confessions of a Republican'' spot run by the Lyndon Johnson campaign in 1964 and the Gerald Ford commercials attacking Jimmy Carter in 1976. Both of these spots featured people on the street, or supposedly real people, talking honestly of their concerns about the rival candidate. The

Johnson spot actually used an actor in a studio and was scripted, although it was meant to appear authentic, while the Ford attack ads used street interviews with residents of Georgia, Carter's home state, explaining why they were not going to vote for their own governor as president. Both of these spots and others like them were in the category of "common people talking common sense," advertising aimed not directly from the candidate to the voter but from peer to peer in an attempt to convince people on either side to vote accordingly.

While political ads on television, from hard-hitting attack ads to feel-good slices of Americana, had changed little in tone and approach since the medium's inception in the 1950s, what did change dramatically in 2004 was how such ads were funded and targeted. MoveOn.org, more so than any other group inside or outside the political mainstream, embraced the relatively new technology of the Internet as both a fund-raising tool and a sounding board for its creative ideas. It even used its member base to help create ads, through calls for entries on its website. MoveOn repeatedly sent E-mails to its more than 2 million members and in many cases was able to raise hundreds of thousands of dollars literally overnight. And in the case of the spots directed by Morris, MoveOn was able to ask its members to vote for their favorites. This participatory process not only kept MoveOn's support base engaged but also shaped the group's decisions about which ads to air, based on popularity and efficacy.

TARGET MARKET

The 2004 presidential election may be remembered as the election that cemented the term "swing voter" in the minds of the American public. In this case swing voters were those undecided or uncommitted citizens capable of "swinging" their votes either from Republican to Democrat or vice versa, regardless of their traditional party affiliation. The poll numbers suggested that these voters represented the largest block of undecided voters and that they could decide the election. It was no surprise, then, that both the Bush and Kerry campaigns searched for ways to attract this demographic, as did an increasing number of independent political-action groups, MoveOn.org chief among them.

MoveOn's own base of supporters and volunteers was hardly undecided. The group did not shy away from taking risks or unabashedly wearing its liberalism on its sleeve. In fact, in late 2003 MoveOn sponsored a series of political ads attacking both President Bush and his policies. Its most widely known ad, "Child's Play," was never actually aired. The ad, the winner of a "Bush in 30 Seconds" contest sponsored by MoveOn, featured a series of images of young children working in menial jobs with the tagline "Guess who's going to pay off President Bush's $1 trillion deficit?" CBS refused to air the ad during the 2004 Super Bowl, but the ensuing media coverage of the controversy helped promote MoveOn's cause to a wider audience.

THE RISE OF 527 GROUPS

So-called 527 groups had been around for decades, but they came to prominence only after the McCain-Feingold campaign-finance reform bill was signed into law in 2002. The law banned unlimited donations to candidates, political parties, or campaigns, limiting contributions to $2,000 from any individual or group. The law did not, however, restrict donations to nonprofit political groups that operated independently of a candidate's campaign. The number "527" referred to section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code, under which these organizations filed for their status as independent political groups. As such, the groups were able to receive unlimited donations so long as they were not in direct contact and did not coordinate their efforts with any political party or campaign. MoveOn.org, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, America Coming Together, and the Media Fund were the largest and best funded of these groups during the 2004 election.

As the election neared, MoveOn realized that galvanizing its liberal support base was one thing, while influencing the outcome of the election was another. In enlisting the work of Morris, the group hoped to change the minds of undecided voters with a more mannered, heartfelt approach.

COMPETITION

While no other piece of political advertising used such a direct, one-on-one approach to target undecided voters, the ad campaign run by the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, a 527 group (or independent political organization), was effective in directing voters' attention away from the MoveOn.org ads and their message. This group, spearheaded and funded in part by John O'Neill, a longtime critic of Kerry and himself a Vietnam veteran and former Swift Boat commander from the same unit, moved quickly to produce a series of ads directly calling into question the legitimacy of Kerry's war record. The ads specifically cast doubt on the circumstances in which Kerry had received his war medals, notably one of his Purple Hearts and his Bronze and Silver Stars. In addition, the Swift Boat Veterans used testimony given by Kerry in 1971 before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as fodder for the attack ads. In his testimony, given shortly after his tour of duty, Kerry adopted an antiwar stance and described atrocities committed by U.S. soldiers against Vietnamese citizens, atrocities that he claimed were perpetrated with the full knowledge of the commanders in the field. While the Swift Boat Veterans ads were initially poorly funded and aired in smaller markets, the media attention they received gave them instant notoriety and national publicity, which led to additional financial backing from a number of wealthy Texas conservatives.

The commercials from the Swift Boat Veterans featured overlapping snippets of a series of vets talking about Kerry's conduct in Vietnam. In just one ad alone, titled "Any Questions?" veterans appearing in the ad collectively used the words "lied" or "lying" in relation to Kerry four times, the word "betrayed" twice, and the phrase "not been honest" twice. While much of the media coverage of the ads called into question their veracity—many of the men who spoke in the ads had not served with or been on active duty concurrently with Kerry—the damage was done. While the impact of a single campaign was difficult to measure, it was widely accepted that the Swift Boat Veterans ads, which ran for most of August and up until the election, had the greatest effect of any political ad campaign during the period.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Morris approached the Kerry campaign in the spring of 2004 with his idea for "switchers" ads, that is, ads designed to persuade those who were undecided to vote for Kerry. The Kerry campaign was interested in the concept but in the end felt that the ads would be too controversial to bear the imprimatur of the candidate. It was at this point that MoveOn.org became involved. Morris took the idea for the ads directly to Wes Boyd, the cofounder of MoveOn. Boyd was immediately supportive, and he agreed to fund the production and to buy the television time and the newspaper space for the ads. Morris had conceived of ads featuring real people, notably Republicans who had voted for Bush in 2000 but who intended to vote for Kerry in 2004, talking in their own words about why they were making the switch. This was in the wake of producing the "Switchers" campaign for Apple Computer, Inc., in which Morris had filmed people explaining their decision to switch from Windows PCs to Macintosh computers.

Morris felt that his political ads would be a powerful way to talk directly to swing voters in an unmitigated fashion. As he told the New Yorker, "It isn't pollsters talking through actors. It isn't longtime Democrats talking to themselves. It's thoughtful Republicans . . . saying it's not us who are abandoning Bush; he's abandoned us." The ads were designed to be as simple and unadorned as possible. Each featured a single person against a plain white background talking directly into the camera in his or her own unscripted words. Morris used a device of his own invention, the Interrotron, to record the interviews; through a series of two-way mirrors Morris's face was projected across the camera lens as he talked with the subjects. This kept the subjects relaxed and comfortable while they looked and spoke directly into the camera. In essence the interviewees were looking a virtual Morris in the eye as they responded to his questions.

The subjects were culled from an E-mail questionnaire sent to MoveOn's more than 2 million members. Of the more than 20,000 people who responded to the E-mail, at least 500 fit the profile. In the end 41 were selected to be interviewed. The final group was diverse. It included military personnel, housewives, a financial advisor, a former U.S. ambassador, a medical transcriptionist, a college professor, warehouse workers, and Christian evangelicals. Morris interviewed each person for nearly an hour, eventually cutting the footage from each session to fill a 30-second television spot. He did not prepare the subjects for the interviews or ask them warm-up questions; he wanted the interviews to be open-ended and as uninfluenced by the process as possible.

As diverse as the participants were, they were united in one thing: they had voted for Bush in 2000 but were voting for Kerry in 2004. "The underlying idea is that the election is going to be decided by a very small group of voters," Morris told the Boston Phoenix. "What about these so-called undecideds? How do you reach them? I'm not particularly interested in just simply creating ads that make Democrats feel better. I'm interested in creating ads that will have some influence on that group." That influence, Morris decided, would come best from ordinary people talking directly to others without any motive other than explaining their own decisions to switch.

Morris and MoveOn's plan was to begin to air the ads—both as television spots and as full-page newspaper ads featuring photos of the interviewees with quotations from their testimonies as captions—during the Republican National Convention in New York City at the end of August. This would give the ads the greatest exposure to Republican voters in the hope that some, like the people featured in the ads, were not yet cemented in their voting positions. A full-page ad featuring nine of the people ran in the New York Times on the day the convention began.

OUTCOME

In the end MoveOn.org did not spend the full $3 million budgeted for the ads or follow through with its plans to air them in all of the "battleground" markets, as originally intended. According to Barbara Lippert in Brandweek, "MoveOn.org funded production, but in the end, for reasons unclear, three ran only once on Fox, and one ran in Ohio. That effectively neutered them." Perhaps because the competition stepped up the viciousness of its own ads in the three months leading up to the election, MoveOn chose to go with harder-hitting negative ads rather than milder ads produced by Morris.

"MoveOn didn't, ultimately, help the Democrats capture the White House or even pick up any Congressional seats," wrote Todd Wasserman in Brandweek, "but it used the Internet in a way that had eluded other nonprofits and major political parties." Measured in terms of achieving its political goals, MoveOn's success was limited. But in terms of using a relatively new medium to maximum effect, MoveOn was a force to be reckoned with. As Amanda Griscom noted in Rolling Stone magazine, "MoveOn is the 800-pound gorilla left of center. There's no competing organization right of center that can exercise the same leverage, influence and muscle." Most importantly MoveOn tapped directly into a vast liberal base of supporters through the Internet, "galvanizing grass-roots activists in a way that hasn't been seen since the 1970s," according to Tara McKelvey in the American Prospect.

WATCH AND LEARN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the 1990s and early 2000s MTV Networks Company's MTV was the leading trendsetter among American youth. Though initially it solely aired music videos, MTV had evolved into a network focused on the projection of a stylish, youth-oriented brand identity rather than on the exclusive promotion of music. The tone of its programming was established primarily by a stable of popular reality shows. Additionally, part of the network's branding had always been accomplished through distinctive on-air promotional material that typically appeared between programs. Starting with the universally famous "I want my MTV" slogan and continuing through the bizarre, critically lauded "Jukka Brothers" campaign, MTV's commitment to unconventional branding work was already well established by 2003, when the network became aware of an independent art project then running in art galleries and on the Internet. The project, called "Instructoart," was created by Matt Vescovo, an advertising freelancer and graphic artist, and it used the format of airline safety pamphlets to offer facetious visual instruction in a variety of mundane daily rituals and behaviors.

MTV contracted Vescovo to produce animated versions of his "Instructoart" illustrations for an on-air station-identification campaign named "Watch and Learn." Using a minimal budget, Vescovo worked with design shop Hornet to create an initial series of eight spots. All were under 20 seconds long and premiered during the August 2003 MTV Video Music Awards. The spots, which adopted Vescovo's "Instructoart" concept exactly, enlightened viewers about such matters as the three-second rule regarding dropped food and the relative sex appeal of a range of musical instruments. They used minimal movement and music. With their quietness, the "Watch and Learn" spots stood out from MTV's boisterous programming, and the offbeat social commentary they offered meshed well with the network's desire to maintain a unique, unpredictable image.

"Watch and Learn" won numerous awards in 2004, and MTV commissioned another series of the spots that began running that year. Vescovo likewise extended the "Instructoart" franchise with further art-gallery shows and with book versions of the pieces. MTV remained one of the world's most distinct and envied consumer brands as well as the top forum for advertisers seeking to connect with America's youth.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

MTV's name, Music Television, was a literal description of its programming upon its launch in 1981 and for its first several years on the air. MTV was a 24-hour music video network, the world's first, with blocks of videos hosted by so-called VJs (video jockeys) but with minimal original content otherwise. The format caught on quickly, but as the network matured, it increasingly sought to offer long-form programming. Such shows, which kept audiences' attention for a half-hour or more, appealed to advertisers, whereas three- and four-minute videos made it difficult to know when a particular audience would be tuning in or out. In the mid-1980s MTV began offering long-form programming such as the original game show Remote Control and the style-conscious dance show Club MTV.

In the 1990s the network further developed its programming with notable shows that included the cartoon Beavis and Butthead and TV's first reality show, The Real World. By the turn of the millennium MTV rarely played music videos at all, and it relied on a heavy rotation of reality shows, the most successful of which included The Osbournes, featuring former Black Sabbath singer Ozzy Osbourne and his family, and Newlyweds, which followed the lives of just-married musical celebrities Jessica Simpson and Nick Lachey. By the early 2000s MTV had long been regarded as perhaps the single most influential force in American youth culture and as the premier forum for advertisers seeking to connect with adolescents and young adults.

Throughout MTV's evolution its own on-air promotions played a significant role in shaping the brand image. Most of this work ran on the network itself and was generated by in-house creative personnel. The early "I want my MTV" slogan permeated pop culture in the 1980s. To maintain the network's edgy image, subsequent branding work used odd, unpredictable content, including spots featuring hippie spokesman Randee of the Redwoods and, later, rants delivered by the then-little-known comedian Denis Leary. In 1999 the network turned to advertising agency Fallon McElligott (later called Fallon Worldwide) for its award-winning "Jukka Brothers" campaign. It featured four Finnish brothers whose only contact with the world beyond their homestead in the Scandinavian backcountry was MTV, which they watched in an outhouse.

MTV: LIVING THE DREAM

Matt Vescovo, the freelance creator of the MTV "Watch and Learn" spots, had spent more than a decade in the advertising industry, working full-time for such agencies as Fallon Worldwide and Cliff Freeman and Partners in addition to freelancing for numerous other top agencies. In an Adweek interview, Mae Anderson asked Vescovo about his dream assignment, and he replied that the MTV "Watch and Learn" project was it. "I feel like they just let people do what they know how to do," Vescovo said. "They don't really meddle. I've shown them 15 promos, and they haven't changed a frame yet. I'm waiting for something to go wrong, because it doesn't seem like it should be like this."

TARGET MARKET

MTV's target audience was 12- to 34-year-olds, with a particular emphasis on teens and young adults. MTV was also television's number one destination for viewers aged 18 to 34, a prime demographic for advertisers. The network's clear focus on its target audience had always been integral to its success. By staying in touch with the lifestyles and desires of teens and young adults and crafting its network personality accordingly, MTV had become much more than a simple source of entertainment for young people. Members of the so-called "MTV generation" presumably consulted the network for ideas on music, fashion, and social behavior. Further, pop-cultural literacy mandated a working knowledge of each season's MTV program offerings.

While the debate over the exact nature and extent of the network's influence on young people proved insoluble and ongoing, it was generally accepted that MTV powerfully informed the lives of many young people. "Watch and Learn" thus made implicit reference to the network's reputation for mind control. The trivial nature of the lessons presented in the "Watch and Learn" spots poked fun at the idea that young people turned to MTV for life instruction. At the same time the spots were intended to be entertaining in their own right, and their peculiarity served the purpose, in the network's view, of communicating MTV's consistently adventurous and unorthodox personality, a key attribute in its enduring appeal among young people.

COMPETITION

Because the average TV viewer in the 2000s had access to hundreds of channels, brand definition had become particularly important for cable networks. In many ways MTV, with its clear brand identity and focused target audience, was the model for cable networks, positioned as it was to survive in an increasingly specialized and competitive cable marketplace. Among cable networks, ESPN, which focused on sports, had similar strengths and was, during this time, attempting to bolster its brand image further with a major television advertising campaign. Networks whose programming had traditionally been aimed at more general audiences, such as TBS Superstation, were meanwhile trying to sharpen their brand images through a combination of new programming strategies and advertising.

ESPN, an all-sports network launched two years before MTV, had similarly grown into a television giant as a result of its successful targeting of a specific audience. In the first two decades of its existence ESPN built a dedicated base of 18- to 34-year-old male viewers, for whom the sports network was an essential component of everyday life. In 2002 the network sought to reinforce the idea that it was virtually synonymous with sports through a TV campaign that asked viewers to consider a world without sports. ''Without Sports'' focused on everyday scenarios that showed the many ways in which sports and life were intimately and often humorously bound together. During the course of its multiyear run the campaign became a critically acclaimed award winner.

TBS Superstation, whose roots also extended to the early days of cable TV, was primarily known among consumers for rebroadcasts of movies and for live coverage of Atlanta Braves baseball games. Amid the proliferation of cable channels, however, in 2004 the network began to brand itself more rigorously, with a focus on comedy. After buying the rights to syndicated reruns of sitcom hits, including Sex and the City, Friends, Seinfeld, and Everybody Loves Raymond, TBS launched a campaign positioning the network as an arbiter of what was funny. Called ''TBS. Very Funny,'' the campaign centered on a fictional hotline phone desk, where TBS representatives advised callers as to whether events they had witnessed were funny or not.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Watch and Learn'' concept originated as the art project of an advertising freelancer, Matt Vescovo. A former creative director at high-profile ad agencies Fallon Worldwide and Cliff Freeman and Partners, Vescovo began focusing, in his spare time, on simple codes and rituals that shaped daily life. Borrowing the visual style of airline safety manuals, he created an initial set of 11 graphic-design images that would purportedly ''teach'' people about a variety of commonplace subjects. The project, collectively called ''Instructoart,'' advised people, for example, on the appropriate techniques for removing hair from a bar of soap, doing the hokey pokey, and pretending to hold an elevator door for someone while letting it shut in his face. The ''Instructoart'' pieces were shown at art galleries in Asbury Park, New Jersey, and in New York in 2003, and Vescovo posted the so-called lessons on a website, http://www.instructoart.com. The website included tongue-in-cheek personal information and an artist's statement in which Vescovo jokingly expressed an interest in adapting ''Instructoart'' for MTV station-identification spots. As it happened, MTV liked the idea and contracted Vescovo to adapt several of his pieces for television. Vescovo enlisted design shop Hornet to assist with the job, and the still illustrations were turned into live animation lessons.

Running under the tagline ''Watch and Learn,'' and with a budget described only as minimal by MTV, an initial group of eight animated ''Instructoart'' pieces premiered during the MTV Video Music Awards on August 28, 2003. The Video Music Awards, presented as a brash alternative to conventional awards shows, typically drew the network's biggest yearly viewing audience. The first eight spots ran in programming breaks that night and through the next year, at lengths of 15 to 20 seconds, and they served as calm interludes amid the network's typically noisy and high-energy programming. The animation was intentionally flat, maintaining the look of airline-safety pamphlets. With figures that moved only minimally, the spots were free of dialogue and generally quiet. Kitschy music ran at the conclusion of each spot along with the MTV logo and the ''Watch and Learn'' tag.

Individual spots in the campaign included ''Three-Second Rule,'' an illustration of the child's rule for eating food that had been dropped on the floor. One woman was shown picking up her food within the three-second span, eating it, and then continuing on her way. A second woman hesitated after dropping her food and thus violated the three-second rule; after she popped the bite in her mouth, she collapsed in pain with her hands on her stomach. ''Musical Instruments'' ranked, in descending order, various instruments—the electric guitar, the drums, the trumpet, the flute, the accordion, and the tuba—according to a meter labeled ''sex'' that appeared on one side of the screen while figures playing the instruments appeared on the other side. ''Gay/Straight'' showed one man patting another's buttocks while wearing normal clothing; the scenario was labeled ''Gay.'' Then the same act was repeated, only the participants were wearing baseball uniforms; this time the scenario was labeled ''Straight.'' Other memorable spots showed viewers how to produce impolite bodily noises with the underarm and how to hide male-pattern baldness with the universal ''comb-over'' technique.

OUTCOME

''Watch and Learn'' won numerous advertising-industry honors during the 2004 awards season. These included a Golden Pencil at the One Show Awards in the Consumer TV Campaign (Under:20) category, a Silver ANDY for media campaign, a Bronze ANDY in the interactive category (for the instructoart.com website, which continued to run throughout the MTV campaign and incorporated the MTV spots), and the "Best Low Budget Campaign" honor at the London International Advertising and Design Awards. The campaign was also awarded top honors in the "Best Use of Humor" category of the 2005 Viral Awards, and it was a runner-up for that competition's grand prize, the "Most Infectious North American Viral Campaign."

MTV enlisted Vescovo to craft another round of "Watch and Learn" spots in 2004, and Vescovo continued to expand the "Instructoart" franchise beyond the network. In February 2004 Instructoart: The Book was released, and the "Instructoart" pieces made the rounds of international art galleries in subsequent years. Two more book versions of "Instructoart" were published in 2004 and 2005. MTV remained one of the world's strongest brands and the top TV destination for young people.

LABELS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Even with a $13.5 million operating budget and one of the largest contemporary art collections in the United States, the Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles (MOCA), toiled to draw crowds in 2001. Competing against a variety of entertainment destinations in Los Angeles County that ranged from beaches to baseball games, along with other museums, MOCA's recently appointed director Jeremy Strick wanted to surpass the previous year's 500,000 MOCA visitor count. Hoping to boost awareness of the museum throughout Los Angeles County, MOCA released ''Labels,'' the largest advertising campaign in its 21-year history.

The $1 million campaign, created by the Los Angeles office of ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day, first appeared on January 1, 2001. The core of the campaign consisted of 61 billboards across Los Angeles County that featured black copy on white backgrounds. The billboards' copy parodied the description labels that appeared beside artworks in museums. Each billboard featured a message relevant to its surroundings. Above a restaurant's valet parking service, for instance, one billboard's title read, ''Men Running with Keys, 2001.'' Below the title it listed the ''medium'' as ''Restaurants, thick-soled shoes, paper tickets with red ink / Collection of the Museum of Contemporary Art.'' Similar advertisements appeared across Los Angeles newspapers, outdoor posters, dry-cleaning hangers, and radio spots. The campaign's three television spots featured titles such as ''Husband and Wife on a Sofa, A Study of Still Life, 2001,'' ''Remote Control, 2001,'' and ''The Demise of Culture, 2001.'' The campaign lasted for six months.

Some critics felt that the billboards' message was misunderstood and required too much reading; others disliked them completely. As Los Angeles Times writer Christopher Knight explained, ''Artists tell me that they hate the MOCA campaign.'' Nonetheless, the advertising community showered it with praise. Advertising Age's Creativity awarded ''Labels'' with one of the magazine's annual Creativity Awards in 2001. The campaign was one of the most awarded entrants for the 2001 annual International ANDY Awards, where it collected a Gold ANDY and 10 Silver ANDYs.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1999 Jeremy Strick was appointed the director of MOCA, one of America's largest contemporary-art museums, with a staff of 130 people, 13,000 paying members, and an annual attendance of 450,000. Because Strick had only been a curator at his previous post at the Art Institute of Chicago, many critics denunciated the new director for his lack of administrative experience.

To establish himself as an apt leader, in 1999 Strick opened a MOCA retrospective exhibition of the commercial artist Barbara Kruger's work. Kruger was famous for printing pithy comments such as "I shop therefore I am" upon images of women. Not only did the Kruger exhibition generate wide acclaim, but Los Angeles critics were also impressed by the show's attendance. The show also led to the addition of 1,700 new MOCA members. Strick strategically asked Kruger, whose résumé included working as head designer for Mademoiselle magazine, to create the show's advertising. "She developed print ads with us and also radio ads," Strick was quoted by the Los Angeles Business Journal: "We see this as a way of both getting the word out about MOCA and the exhibition and bringing art into new and different public spheres . . . The show's been well attended and people seem very aware of the campaign. It's stirred up some interest and a little controversy, too. That's great."

According to the Washington Post, in late 2000 Strick approved the allocation of $1 million to brand the museum as "something new, something fresh" to do in Los Angeles County. Just six days before "Labels" was released, the Los Angeles Business Journal quoted Strick explaining, "MOCA is all about creativity and inspiration. The unique gift we bring to Los Angeles is to showcase the creativity of cutting-edge artists from throughout the world, in the hope that it will in turn inspire our visitors."

TARGET MARKET

The "Labels" campaign targeted creatively minded 25- to 34-year-old Angelenos, the nickname for inhabitants of Los Angeles County. Suzanne Evans, a writer for the Los Angeles Business Journal, described the campaign's target as a "wary, advertising-bombarded youthful audience that is sometimes difficult to reach." Strick explained in the New York Times that Angelenos were often more leery of blatant advertising than the residents of cities such as Chicago and New York City. Instead of merely advertising the museum's logo or full name on billboards, "Labels" hoped to recreate the contemporary-art-museum experience within Los Angeles so that the target could engage with the community as an outdoor museum. Billboards suggested that the audience reflect on normally mundane objects such as restaurants, stoplights, and freeways in the same way that museum visitors reflected on art inside MOCA.

Some Los Angeles art critics pointed out that the campaign not only alienated its target market, including longstanding MOCA members, but also actually embittered the museum's featured artists. Doug Harvey, an art critic for LA Weekly, described the billboards as "unfathomable condescension" and "second-rate '60s conceptual art." Los Angeles Times critic Christopher Knight wrote, "The museum, with its conceptual commercials, appears to be usurping the role of artist, and bad artist at that."

COMPETITION

Not only was MOCA competing against two other contemporary-art museums within Los Angeles city limits, but it was also contending for visitors to larger art museums such as the Los Angeles County Museum of Art and

CAMPAIGN, 2001

In 2001 the Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles (MOCA), released 61 billboard ads throughout Los Angeles that mimicked the description tags commonly found beside its works of art. To increase awareness about MOCA in the Los Angeles community, the campaign attempted to recreate the same reflective thinking needed to understand contemporary art. One billboard ad above a street crowded with car washes and tiny Mexican restaurants read, ''Car Washes and a Couple of Taquerias, 2000.'' Courtesy of the Museum of Contemporary Art. Drawing its pithy campaign back to the museum, MOCA sold coffee cups in its museum gift shop that read, ''Habit, 2001: Coffee in glazed ceramic. On loan from the Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles.'' the wildly successful J. Paul Getty Museum. With the exception of the latter, most of Los Angeles's museums were struggling financially. Having to compete against the city's other attractions, such as beaches, concert halls, theater houses, sporting events, and movie theaters, the museums struggled to remain profitable. The Latino Museum of History, Art, and Culture was forced to shut down in August 2000 after sinking $500,000 in debt. According to the Washington Post, Maya Rao, the TBWA\Chiat\Day copywriter for the ''Labels'' campaign, explained, ''Why do museums need to advertise? Well, there is a lot of competition for eyeballs in this town.''

With small advertising budgets, museum directors had to market their museums creatively in 2001. In Chicago the Museum of Contemporary Art's (MCA) director, Robert Fitzpatrick, began his new position by getting the museum's guards ''out of those awful paramilitary costumes,'' Fitzpatrick was quoted in the Chicago Sun-Times. The MCA spent $17,500 on new uniforms that Fitzpatrick had ordered from the Banana Republic retail store. Fitzpatrick also commissioned Chicago artist Dan Peterman to construct benches outside of the MCA to provide seats for businesspeople to eat their lunches. Different farmers' markets were brought to the MCA plaza as well. Free admission days were increased from once a month to once a week; and Fitzpatrick decreased the price of the museum's self-guided tour AcoustiGuides from $3.50 to $1. ''It's not just advertising, but it's about being accessible,'' Fitzpatrick further explained in the Chicago Sun-Times. ''Are you going to spend $7 here, as opposed to a movie? It's not a choice you force them to make, it's a choice that you invite them to make, by being inviting.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

For the months prior to January 2001, TBWA\Chiat\Day copywriter Maya Rao and art director Moe Vergrugge traversed Los Angeles in search for billboard locations that they could use for their upcoming MOCA campaign. What resulted was Los Angeles's largest site-specific billboard campaign in history. After writing more than 80 possible executions, 61 billboards were chosen. All of them advertised MOCA for at least six months. In addition to appearing on the billboards, the campaign's copy was placed on dry-cleaning hangers, paper coffee-cup bands, buses, free postcards distributed at bars, newspaper ads, and gas-pump handles. Radio and television spots were released as well. With more than 150 media placements, the ''Labels'' campaign was, according to the Los Angeles Business Journal, one of the largest ever released by a Los Angeles museum.

Every advertisement appeared as a label, similar to those describing artwork in a museum. One of the more provocative billboard titles, which was placed above a strip club, read, ''Nudes 2001.'' Below the title the copy explained, ''Bodies, dimensions variable. A study of First Amendment rights, entertainment, and business, all acting in concert to provide a debate among lawyers, politicians, and the general public. On loan from the Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles.''

TBWA\Chiat\Day took a risk with the amount of copy used on each billboard. According to Melanie Axtman, the group media director at TBWA\Chiat\Day, an advertising-industry guideline for outdoor advertising was that billboard copy should be limited to eight words or less. The ad agency justified breaking the guideline because the ''Labels'' billboards were placed in heavily congested areas where people were afforded more time to read the message. Some critics disagreed. The senior editor for National Public Radio, Andy Bowers, joked on the radio program All Things Considered that the billboard above a shopping plaza that read ''People in designer labels buying more designer labels'' should have instead read ''People in designer labels ignoring billboard.'' Bowers later added, however, that once onlookers understood that the billboard was commenting on their surrounding environment, they became instantly fascinated by the advertisement.

Although the campaign's copy required more reading comprehension than most billboards, MOCA officials believed the campaign still befit Angelenos. According to the Washington Post, Strick explained, ''People are used to seeing labels in museums and we liked the idea of labeling the city—extending out to the city the museum experience . . . Billboards are an L.A. institution. It's the way people communicate here, driving as much as we do, and so we asked what happens if you look at the city with the same attentiveness you look at art in a museum?"

Three television spots aired as public-service announcements across local TV stations in Los Angeles. The commercials featured titles similar to the billboards, such as "Husband and Wife on a Sofa, A Study of Still Life, 2001," "Remote Control, 2001," and "The Demise of Culture, 2001." The campaign included screensavers and computer-desktop wallpaper that could be downloaded from MOCA's website, www.Moca.org.

OUTCOME

The "Labels" campaign collected some of the advertising industry's most coveted awards. In 2002 it garnered a Gold EFFIE Award in the "Culture and the Arts/ National or Regional" category. Advertising Age's Creativity magazine awarded the campaign one of its 2001 Creativity Awards. "Labels" also earned one Gold ANDY and 10 Silver ANDYs at the 2001 annual International ANDY Awards, making TBWA\Chiat\Day the most-decorated advertising agency of the ANDYs that year.

Despite the campaign's positive fanfare at awards shows, MOCA only attracted 315,000 visitors during 2001, a major reduction from the 500,000 visitors it recorded in 2000. Some analysts attributed the decline to the museum's dwindling donations and to budget cuts made by the California Arts Council, which provided a large portion of the museum's funding. MOCA's operations budget dropped from $20 million in 1999 to $13.5 million in 2001. Besides reduced funding, the nationwide recession and the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, had affected all of Los Angeles County's museums. Jay Aldrich, director of tourism and publications at the Autry Museum of Western Heritage, explained in the Los Angeles Business Journal, "Attendance was in decline in every Southern California attraction in 2001 due to 9/11."

IT'S COMING BACK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1999, 19-year-old Shawn Fanning achieved celebrity status as the file-sharing industry's founder when he created www.Napster.com, a website that facilitated the sharing of music across the Internet. Napster's members could freely download other members' songs onto their own computers, an innovation that sent the music industry into a panic. As other file-sharing applications surfaced, the music industry singled out Napster and forced it to shut down by 2001. Two years later digital music firm Roxio, Inc., purchased Napster's assets, formed licensing agreements with recording studios, repackaged Napster as a Web space from which to legally download music, and renamed Roxio "Napster, Inc." The "It's Coming Back" campaign was launched in 2003 to attract older, paying customers without alienating the former Napster members.

Roxio spent $6.4 million to relaunch Napster in 2003 and awarded its advertising budget to agency Venables, Bell, and Partners (VB&P). The "It's Coming Back" campaign surfaced on June 30, 2003, when VB&P changed the website www.Napster.com to www.NapsterBits.com, a title hinting at Napster's rebirth. Four months later nine short Internet-based films, three of which became television spots, aired with a character that VB&P had created from Napster's "kitty" logo. The films, if watched consecutively, formed a loosely connected storyline that metaphorically told Napster's fall and hopeful rise. The first Internet spot showed the Napster "kitty" repelling from a prison window, only to be sniped on his way down. Next, the "kitty" recovered inside a hospital until he was strong enough to approach a skyscraper filled with cutthroat music moguls. After collecting the signature of a music-industry executive, the "kitty" left to promote hip-hop, metal, reggae, blues, techno, country, folk, and indie music genres. All Internet spots, as well as a 15-second television-only spot titled "Old School," were constructed with Flash, a software language that animated images similar to cartoons.

Sales between March 2004 and March 2005 grew 53 percent, reaping $46 million for Napster. The campaign gave Napster a second chance in the industry it had once created. "It's Coming Back" also snagged two Gold Cyber Lions at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, the Bronze Pencil at the One Show Interactive Awards, and a Silver Cube at the Art Directors Club Awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Using only word of mouth at its conception, Napster maintained its title as the world's top file-sharing application until 2001, when the Recording Industry Association of America and other music-industry giants forced Napster to shut down on grounds of copyright infringement. Soon afterward Bertelsmann AG (a book, movie, and music retailer) purchased Napster's brand, which was later purchased by Roxio. Roxio then acquired Pressplay, a service similar to Napster, and changed its name to Napster, Inc. Hoping to imitate the success Apple Computer had had with iTunes, an application that allowed the legal download of music at 99 cents per song, the revived Napster surfaced in 2003 with more than one million songs available, all accessible to subscribers who paid a monthly service fee. As with iTunes, Napster members could also pay per song.

In 2003 Venables, Bell, and Partners (VB&P), an agency based in San Francisco, pitched its advertising concept to Napster, believing that Napster should be branded in conjunction with music, but not free music. "We're going to pitch business with them as appropriate," agency partner Paul Venables told Adweek. "We like to have them in from the get-go, figuring out how digital work can play a role." After winning the account the agency set out to build the campaign around Napster's previous brand awareness. "It's the only pure music brand in that space," a VB&P agency representative told the San Francisco Chronicle, "and the brand still has ninety percent-plus awareness. It still resonates with people in a big way."

In 2003, before the official "It's Coming Back" campaign launched, VB&P released what they called "teasers." Napster placed its logo, usually without copy, in print and outdoor advertisements. "The idea is to tease, period. Not as part of the bigger campaign, not as a glimpse of what's to come. That, we feel, would be too perfect a communication, therefore too corporate," Venables told Advertising Age's Creativity.

TARGET MARKET

According to VB&P, the campaign targeted "the music-loving 30-something corporate overachiever who holds down a $75,000 job by day, and goes to see live music at night. In short, we wanted the real music lovers and those who had more money than time." This target deviated from Napster's earlier member base. Referring to the Napster users between 1999 to 2001, Scott Steinberg, senior vice president of marketing for Napster, told the Asian Wall Street Journal, "The youth-pirate university culture definitely has more time than money." The "It's Coming Back" campaign refocused on an older demographic with an inverse time-money relationship.

When the campaign first appeared, Napster walked a fine line to maintain its hip image while not appearing as a sellout for negotiating music-licensing agreements. "We wanted to stay cool with the cool crowd," Venables told the Asian Wall Street Journal. To maintain its antiestablishment tone, VB&P played up Napster's outlaw image with ten funny and occasionally graphic short films to be played on the Internet and on TV. The Napster "kitty" was shown breaking out of jail and then recovering from a gunshot wound. The "kitty" later weathered the bloodbath of a music-industry business meeting, complete with caricaturized executives attacking each other with paperclips, ink pens, and staplers. Next, the Napster "kitty" performed for an indie-music crowd, grooved to hip-hop music, rocked out to blues music, danced with Rastafarians, and postured with a heavy-metal band. The spots sometimes poked fun at the music genres, but they always maintained, according to analysts, a strong connection to contemporary music. Except for the spots focusing on blues, indie, metal, and reggae music, the films were primarily scored with hip-hop music.

Bob Garfield, an ad critic for Advertising Age, wrote, "Unlike much of the rich media that passes for online creativity, these ads don't overtake your screen and grab your attention by force. Instead, they rely on wit and storytelling to seduce you, suck you in and cultivate whatever dormant seed of Napster affection is still buried within you."

NAPPY SHAWN FANNING

Shawn Fanning created the first version of Napster when he was a Massachusetts college freshman in 1999. Amazed at how many hours his roommates spent searching the Internet for obscure rap music, Shawn set out to create a program that allowed the sharing of music between computers connected online. Shawn released his own beta version of Napster on June 1, 1999. The name "Napster" was taken from Shawn's own nickname, a title he earned in college for his nappy hair.

COMPETITION

At the dawn of legally downloadable music, Apple's iTunes Music Store dominated with a 70 percent market share and 125 million downloads in less than two years after appearing in 2003. Early iTunes advertising stood on the shoulders of Apple's iPod "Silhouette" campaign, which showed black silhouettes dancing to the music of pop groups such as the rock band Jet and the hip-hop group Black Eyed Peas. The spots, designed by TBWA\Chiat\Day, Los Angeles, ended with copy directing people to the iTunes website. Convincing users to pay 99 cents per song was initially difficult for iTunes Music Store, since music fans could download songs for free, although illegally, from peer-to-peer file sharing applications such as Altnet, Inc.'s KaZaA. Sales, however, steadily grew for iTunes, which made it easy to download music onto an iPod, Apple's digital music player.

iTunes' success spurred competitors to release a surge of other legally downloadable music applications. For $160 million Yahoo! Inc. purchased Musicmatch, an online music store and Internet-radio service provider. The site allowed users to purchase and download single songs or entire albums. RealNetworks, Inc., the creator of RealPlayer, a digital music and video player, would occasionally sell songs at 49 cents apiece to undercut iTunes. Microsoft Corp. also joined in by creating MSN Music, an application that started with half the song selection of Napster and iTunes. ''Every time there's a new technology, it starts at its broadest base, but eventually must narrow down to be segmented based on consumer needs,'' Steven Flanders, president of Icon Entertainment, an entertainment-marketing firm, told the Asian Wall Street Journal.

Napster attempted to capture the iTunes market by offering an unlimited song subscription. After the ''It's Coming Back'' campaign ended, Napster created in-house ads with the tagline ''Do the math.'' It claimed that a user could fill the iPod's 10,000-song capacity with Napster's $9.95 monthly subscription fee, a thrifty alternative to iTunes' 99-cents-per-song pricing.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Before the ''It's Coming Back'' television spots appeared on October 15, 2003, VB&P released what it called ''teasers'' in outdoor and print ads. One teaser involved dividing Napster's logo, the ''kitty'' head, into three different billboards and displaying them along L.A.'s Sunset Strip. Venables explained to Advertising Age's Creativity that the spots were ''complete teasers for the 'influencer' music consumer,'' referring to trendsetting music consumers. In major cities VB&P also pasted fake sappy poster ads with stickers depicting the Napster ''kitty'' slapped over the ads' faces. ''The fact that the stickers were a separate element and that they looked like guerrilla Xeroxes—not perfect, colorful logos—was key,'' Venables continued in Advertising Age's Creativity.

For the ensuing ''It's Coming Back'' campaign VB&P built on Napster's headphone-wearing, white cat-face logo by furnishing it with a body as well as a personality. Faced with the challenge of preserving Napster's hip image, the campaign's Internet and television spots were designed with Flash, a cutting-edge software language that animated images much like a cartoon. Commenting on the use of Flash, Venables told Advertising Age's Creativity, ''I don't think there's ever been another company that's created something using the tools of the web, and then exported it to their mainstream broadcast campaign.'' VB&P continued giving Napster's brand a never-before-seen, stylized look. ''If we went out with the mechanics of a traditional packaged-goods campaign, we would have put the brand back in the grave,'' Steinberg explained to the Asian Wall Street Journal.

The short Internet films first appeared on Napster.com and NapsterBits.com in the summer of 2003. On October 15 one 15-second television spot, ''Old School,'' aired across cable channels such as Comedy Central, MTV, and ESPN. ''Old School'' featured the Napster ''kitty'' break-dancing to hip-hop music, followed by text stating, ''Old School'' and then, ''Get it at Napster.com.'' Varying from the colorful Flash commercials, one charcoal-colored print ad showed the Napster icon carved into a tombstone above a recently vacated grave. The ad's only copy stated, ''Go to Napster.com.'' It appeared in magazines such as Entertainment Weekly.

Continuing with the feline metaphor, the campaign's short Internet films told the story of Napster's transition from a file-sharing lawbreaker to a legitimate downloadable-music service. The first Internet spot, ''Jailbreak,'' showed the Napster ''kitty'' escaping through the window of his jail cell only to be sniped on the way down by a guard. Next the ''kitty'' was shown recovering with a weakened pulse in the spot titled ''EKG.'' After recovering, the ''kitty'' collected a needed signature from a music-industry executive that enabled him to promote different genres, including heavy metal, reggae, hip-hop, blues, and indie music. The final spot, ''Reunion,'' rushed through a montage of more musical tastes, such as trance, country, and folk. The story climaxed when the Napster ''kitty'' bounced off a diving board and soared above a swimming pool surrounded by onlookers. The text ''Napster.com'' flashed just before the ''kitty'' sank into the pool. Three of the Internet spots eventually aired as television commercials.

OUTCOME

The "It's Coming Back" campaign helped Napster successfully bounce from a two-year remission period into an industry that was blossoming. A month after the television spots first aired, www.Napster.com registered 3.2 million visitors, surpassing iTunes' 2.7 million. During the last quarter of 2003 Napster had more Web traffic than any other music-shopping website. By crafting a campaign that told the story of Napster's struggle against the music industry, VB&P helped Napster rebrand itself with music rather than the free music for which it had previously been known. "Napster has incredible name recognition," Lee Black, a music-industry analyst with Jupiter Research in Connecticut, told Adweek. "Everybody knows what it was. It was the classic David and Goliath anti-establishment case."

By following the music industry's rules and paying for permissions, the new, legal Napster achieved more profit than its earlier version ever did. Sales between 2004 and 2005 jumped 53 percent and collected $46 million, an impressive figure considering Roxio only spent $6.4 million to launch the service. Besides bottom-line success, the "It's Coming Back" campaign also earned two Gold Cyber Lions (awards that recognized an advertisement's excellent use of the Internet) at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, the Bronze Pencil at the One Show Interactive Awards, and a Silver Cube at the Art Directors Club Awards.

LISTED ON NASDAQ CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nasdaq, the world's first electronic stock market, was flying high in the late 1990s, its advertising proclaiming it to be "The stock market for the next 100 years." All but synonymous with the Internet-focused "New Economy" and heavy with technology companies, the Nasdaq was dealt a severe blow when the tech sector collapsed in 2000, compounded a year later by an economy in recession. The Nasdaq's image was severely tarnished, leading to a change in advertising agencies in 2001. McKinney & Silver, an agency based in Durham, North Carolina, was hired to restore some luster to the brand. The resulting "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign was intended to reassure the investment community, especially high-level corporate executives, that Nasdaq was still a great place to be listed for both tech and non-tech companies alike.

The Nasdaq spent approximately $30 million a year on the campaign, which broke in August 2002. The campaign's television and print ads featured CEOs from prominent companies listed on the Nasdaq, including Microsoft's Steve Ballmer, Staples's Tom Sternberg, and Starbucks's Howard Schultz. In the television spots their inspiring comments were intercut to portray the Nasdaq as a progressive and innovative stock market.

The "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign won a 2005 EFFIE Award. It also succeeded in restoring confidence in the brand without also driving up the ratings of the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE), a first in Nasdaq advertising history. In addition, the campaign helped to stem the flow of company defections to the NYSE as Nasdaq regained dominance in initial public offerings of stock. The campaign ran into 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Nasdaq was launched in 1971 as the world's first electronic stock market, it was considered a "bridge" exchange, a stepping stone for companies looking to eventually gain a listing on the American Stock Exchange or the New York Stock Exchange. Later major corporations, including Microsoft and Dell, opted to stay on the Nasdaq because they preferred its electronic market-making concept (matching buyers and sellers using computers instead of specialist brokerage firms), and in the 1990s Nasdaq become the natural home for high-tech companies, most of which, when they grew large enough to qualify for a listing on an old-guard exchange, preferred to stick with the Nasdaq. As a result the Nasdaq enjoyed tremendous growth during the economic boom of the late 1990s, prompting its marketers to craft the tagline "The stock market for the next 100 years." It appeared to be an accurate statement at the time, given that between 1990 and 1995 the index grew from 416 to 755, and that in the second half of the decade it soared to an incredible peak of 5049 in March 2000.

As the Internet companies (the so-called New Economy) that had fueled much of the Nasdaq's growth began to fail in what was dubbed the bursting of the "dot-com bubble," the Nasdaq saw the bottom fall out of its market in 2000. All but equated with the New Economy, the Nasdaq's reputation was tainted, and the exchange found itself besieged from all angles, from the NYSE on one side and the electronic communications networks (ECNs)—which eliminated third parties in the trading of stocks in a purely electronic environment—on the other. To make matters worse, the economy slipped into a recession in 2001. According to Paula Dwyer and Amy Borrus writing in BusinessWeek, a poor economy created a vicious circle for the Nasdaq: "Wall Street firms retrench, leasing few NASDAQ trading terminals. As companies falter, their stocks are delisted, cutting NASDAQ's fee revenue. When listings decline, the market receives fewer quotes from market-makers and ECNs and can't collect as much from reselling the data. As fewer shares trade, transaction fees shrink." In essence, Nasdaq was soon fighting for its very survival, far from certain that it would be around in one year, let alone 100.

After a shake-up at the top ranks of management, in April 2001 Nasdaq brought in a new marketing head, Denise Benou Stires, who expressed confidence in the exchange's chances of rebuilding its image with investors and the public in general. "I feel like I've inherited one of the most extraordinary brands in the world," she told Mercedes M. Cardona of Advertising Age. "I'm not sure you could find a reasonably affluent Mongolian shopkeeper who doesn't know Nasdaq." She quickly put the $30 million advertising account into review, looking for a fresh approach after 12 years with the New York ad agency Messner Vetere Berge McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG. The agencies that participated all had Nasdaq-listed corporate parents, an intentional consideration. In August the winner emerged: North Carolina–based McKinney & Silver of the Havas Group.

TARGET MARKET

Although the "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign would reach the general public, especially through television spots, the target audience was really the investment community, particularly corporate chief executives and other top-level officers who played key roles in deciding where a public company chose to be listed. The campaign sought to assure these executives that Nasdaq was more than the market for failed Internet companies and was a suitable home for both tech and non-tech companies alike. More important than attracting new listings, however, was the need to prevent defections. Stires admitted to Alicia Griswold of Adweek that "Our messaging has to appeal to the chief officers of our listed companies so that they feel re-affirmed by choosing us." Only on a secondary level did the "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign target investors.

A MOUTHFUL

NASDAQ is an acronym for National Association of Securities Dealers Automated Quotations.

COMPETITION

Having merged with the American Stock Exchange in 1998, Nasdaq's only major exchange competitor was the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE). While Nasdaq may have harbored dreams of luring away NYSE companies with the "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, in truth only one company in 30 years had ever made the switch. A more realistic goal was to stem the flow of defections from the Nasdaq to the NYSE and regain its share of IPOs (initial public offering of stock). Should the Nasdaq lose sufficient strength, it also faced the loss of business to small regional exchanges, such as the ones in Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco (the Pacific Exchange), and Philadelphia.

A more immediate threat was the ECNs (electronic communications networks), which, unlike the Nasdaq, did not rely on market makers (specialist firms that bought stock and for a commission matched up sellers and buyers). Rather, ECNs merely coordinated buy and sell orders electronically for a fee, acting more as matchmakers than market makers. Arguably, Nasdaq only had itself to blame for the rise of ECNs, which had grown out of a Nasdaq price-fixing scandal in the mid-1990s. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) responded by encouraging the growth of ECNs, some of which were backed by Wall Street firms. By the time the new campaign broke, ECNs had captured nearly half of the trading volume in Nasdaq-listed stocks, roughly two-and-a-half times as much as Nasdaq was able to do through its own trading system. Competing against the ECNs was no easy task, because they were also Nasdaq's customers, and should Nasdaq create its own ECN it would also compete against other customers, the dealers. Nasdaq tried to launch its own ECN, SuperMontage, in 2001, but ECN complaints to the SEC forced a two-year delay in the rollout of the system. What was eventually unveiled suffered from so many compromises along the way that it was no match for the ECNs on their own turf.

THE BUTTONWOOD AGREEMENT

The auction system for selling stock dates back to 1792, when two dozen brokers, who often met informally under a buttonwood tree at 68 Wall Street in Manhattan, signed an agreement to trade only with one another. This two-sentence document, signed under the tree, became known as the Buttonwood Agreement and would lead to the creation of the New York Stock Exchange in 1863.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In preparation for the ''Listed on Nasdaq'' campaign, McKinney & Silver conducted research with a number of people in the target group. The agency asked them where the computer companies Microsoft, Apple, and Intel were listed, and invariably the answer was the NYSE, the assumption being that any companies that large and successful were out of place on the Nasdaq. The subjects were then presented with list of three Nasdaq-listed companies—Costco, PETsMART, and Starbucks—and once again the subjects believed that they were listed on the NYSE because they were not technology companies. As a result of this research, it was clear that even highly knowledgeable people like top corporate executives harbored misperceptions about the Nasdaq that the campaign would have to address.

The goal of the ''Listed on Nasdaq'' campaign was to restore credibility to the brand while making some subtle changes to common views about the Nasdaq. Instead of ''high tech'' Nasdaq wanted to be seen as ''progressive,'' and rather than ''high risk'' it preferred to be known as ''innovative.'' The Nasdaq also wanted to draw a distinction between itself and the NYSE by making the point that a large percentage of Nasdaq-listed companies were led by their founders, who McKinney & Silver would portray as visionaries. To accomplish these ends the agency decided that, rather than promote Nasdaq the institution, the advertisements would feature some of the visionary CEOs of Nasdaq-listed companies, including both tech companies and other kinds of companies. It would be in this context the Nasdaq was to be positioned as progressive and innovative.

McKinney & Silver filmed interviews with 20 CEOs for the ''Listed on Nasdaq'' campaign and then put together commercials that each featured three of the executives. The media strategy for airing these spots centered on the tendency of the investment community to be voracious and particular consumers of news as well as to be highly literate. Hence, commercial time was mostly bought on select cable news channels, including CNN, MSNBC, and Bloomberg. The print component of the campaign was focused on mainstream business and finance publications, including Forbes and Fortune, as well as more highbrow fare such as the New Yorker.

The ''Listed on Nasdaq'' campaign broke in August 2002 with four television spots. The CEOs profiled included high-tech stars, such as Steve Ballmer of Microsoft, John Chambers of Cisco, Michael Dell of Dell Inc., and Craig Barrett of Intel, as well as heads of non-tech successes, including Staples' Tom Sternberg and Starbucks' Howard Schultz. Excerpts of their comments were intercut with each other to fashion the spots. Highlights included Chambers's comment: ''I would hope that people would think about Cisco in terms of changing the way the world works, lives, plays and learns''; Dell revealing, ''At first my parents were pretty upset with me when I dropped out of college, but after a while they got over it''; and Ballmer recalling, ''When I first came to Microsoft, my father asked what software was. My mother asked a more interesting question: why would a person ever need a computer.'' The tagline for the spots was ''Visionaries. Listed on Nasdaq,'' followed by the featured CEOs announcing the name of their companies and one of them proclaiming, ''Listed on Nasdaq.'' A second round of spots premiered in December 2002, and the CEO interviews were also used to create a long-form video that Nasdaq used when meeting with prospective listed companies.

In the print portion of the campaign Starbucks was also featured along with such companies as eBay and Nasdaq's largest banking company, Fifth Third Bank. The ad for Fifth Third Bank, as an example, showed a signed Post-It note from CEO George Schaefer. His message: ''There are 86,400 seconds in a day. On your mark, get set, go.''

OUTCOME

The ''Listed on Nasdaq'' campaign was successful on many levels. In 2005 it garnered McKinney & Silver a Gold EFFIE Award (Financial Services/Image category), given out annually by the New York American Marketing Association in recognition of the year's most effective advertising campaigns. More importantly, the campaign, according to McKinney & Silver, helped to restore confidence in the Nasdaq brand. In a write-up for the EFFIE Awards, the agency maintained that measures of confidence in the brand and its positioning had improved dramatically, ''driven by proven recall of the campaign.'' It added, ''This is the first time that advertising improved perceptions of NASDAQ without improving

NYSE ratings.'' McKinney & Silver also claimed that the campaign helped to stem the flow of defections to the NYSE and that Nasdaq had regained its dominant share of IPOs. The agency noted that, 16 months after the campaign had begun, the Nasdaq grew 76 percent, or twice the rate of the Dow Jones Industrial Average (an market index that tracked the growth of high-cap companies), which grew 38 percent during the same period. The agency then commented, ''It would be foolish to take credit for this rise. Then again, traders will tell you that psychology moves markets . . .''

HOW BAD HAVE YOU GOT IT? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR) saw its popularity dramatically increase between the 1970s and the 1990s. Long considered a sport followed chiefly by blue-collar males in the southern United States, NASCAR's audience had in reality evolved considerably since its early days. With a growing base of middle- and upper-income fans of all ages and both genders scattered across all parts of the country, NASCAR set out in 2001 to expand its audience even further. Explicitly targeting families and departing from previous campaigns in which intense racing footage was used to appeal to hardcore fans, NASCAR's ad agency, Young & Rubicam of Chicago, crafted a campaign meant to inspire new fans to greater devotional heights without alienating the faithful.

"How Bad Have You Got It?" was budgeted at an estimated $25 to $30 million a year, and it was launched in February 2001 to coincide with that year's 10-month racing season. The TV spots depicted a seemingly ordinary family—the same one in all eight executions—whose ordinary activities were dramatically colored by an obvious obsession with NASCAR. For instance, one commercial showed the family station wagon parking in front of a diner, whereupon all four members exited the car via the windows, after the fashion of NASCAR drivers. Another spot showed the husband and wife unable to sleep, presumably because of the revving engine noise outside. The husband rose and opened the window, and, soothed by the louder engine sound, the couple quickly fell into a peaceful slumber. The campaign's run was extended through the 2002 racing season, with new content and slight alterations in strategy.

The campaign received favorable critical attention on its way to winning a Bronze Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival and a Gold EFFIE from the New York American Marketing Association. NASCAR's television audience and fan base both continued to grow rapidly in subsequent years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

NASCAR was formed in 1948 by William France, Sr., and Ed Otto as a means of formalizing rules and procedures for the racing of "stock" cars, or cars that had not been modified outside of the factories that produced them. The first NASCAR race was held at the Charlotte Speedway in North Carolina on June 19, 1949. By the mid-1960s the cars were no longer true stock cars; they had bodies similar to ordinary factory-produced cars but were actually built specifically for racing. NASCAR expanded throughout the next several decades, but its fan base remained localized in the southeastern region of the country, where, prior to 1970, all tracks but one (Riverside Raceway in Riverside, California) were located.

The year 1972 marked the beginning of the modern era of NASCAR, characterized by a new competitive structure that included a point system and a series of races called the Winston Cup, sponsored by the R.J. Reynolds cigarette brand of the same name. In the mid-1970s portions of NASCAR races began to appear on television, and the first full telecast of a race from beginning to end was the 1979 Daytona 500. This race proved effective in introducing mainstream America to the drama of stock car racing: the lead cars, driven by Cale Yarborough and Donnie Allison, crashed during the final lap, and Richard Petty won. The excitement continued after the race, when Yarborough, Allison, and Allison's brother immediately engaged in a fistfight on national television.

By the early 2000s NASCAR had grown well beyond its home base in the Southeast. Its regular-season television ratings were second only to the National Football League among pro sports, with weekly telecasts attracting more than 20 million viewers. A 2001 brand study conducted by market-research firm Ipsos-Reid put the number of devoted NASCAR fans at 40 million. Corporate branding played an integral role in NASCAR races—cars as well as drivers were closely identified with, and decorated with the logos of, their sponsoring brands. Because of this and the related perception that NASCAR fans were the most brand-loyal of any sports fans, the sport was an increasingly attractive venue for Fortune 500 sponsorship. A 2001 deal with television networks NBC, TNT, FOX, and FX regularized the broadcasting of NASCAR races and allowed for further expansion of the sport's audience.

NASCAR did not do any national advertising until 1998, when it introduced the "This Is NASCAR" tagline. Primedia of Atlanta served as NASCAR's marketing agency during the late 1990s, handling licensing, media buying, and other strategic matters while subcontracting the creative work for national advertising. TV spots typically focused on dramatic race footage and the personalities of drivers, in a style described by freelance creative director Cleve Wilcoxon in Adweek as "a fastball down the middle." The campaign's yearly budget was estimated at $7.5 million in 2000.

TARGET MARKET

"How Bad Have You Got It?" coincided with a change in demographics among NASCAR's fan base. NASCAR's appeal had transcended its regional beginnings, though the largest and arguably most dedicated group of fans was still to be found in the South; and stereotypical notions holding that the sport was the province strictly of blue-collar men were likewise outdated. NASCAR increasingly drew fans from middle- and upper-income brackets, and in preparing for the campaign, Young & Rubicam uncovered an important but largely unrecognized aspect of stock-car racing: its appeal to families. "Families travel together for weekends to see the sport," Young &

DEADLY THRILLS

For NASCAR fans part of the thrill came from the risk that drivers took in traveling at such speeds and in such dangerous proximity to one another. Many fans openly acknowledged that they attended races hoping to witness car crashes. In 2001, however, just as the "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign was getting underway, one of the sport's most traumatic accidents occurred. Dale Earnhardt, sometimes referred to as the Michael Jordan of NASCAR, was killed in the final lap of the Daytona 500 on February 18, 2001. The violent end to his career, which spanned more than 25 years, led many in the media to call for stricter safety standards for NASCAR races, but fans, observers noted, considered death an inevitable part of the drama that drew them to the sport. Perhaps supporting this notion was the fact that NASCAR saw significant ratings jumps for the 2001 races following Earnhardt's death.

Rubicam creative director/art director Jon Wyville told Shoot. "It's not just dad going to the races . . . whole families are into it."

While the agency had no choice but to take the changing nature of NASCAR fandom into account, its creative team recognized the necessity of appealing to the sport's longtime core fans as well. These fans tended to be extremely knowledgeable about the intricacies of the season-long points system and rules governing individual races, and they could be more clearly associated with NASCAR's regional past. Many newer fans, however, had little concern for NASCAR's regional affiliation and little knowledge of the sport's procedural details. They were drawn simply by the excitement and drama of the races.

Young & Rubicam thus had to calibrate its message so that it would speak to both kinds of NASCAR fans. "How Bad Have You Got It?" attempted to do so by focusing on the fans themselves, featuring intentionally ordinary-looking families in suburban neighborhoods with no regional or geographic markers. These families were defined by the one characteristic uniting NASCAR fans across cultural boundaries: their obsession with the sport.

COMPETITION

The National Football League (NFL) was the dominant sports league at this time, far outranking other pro sports in terms of U.S. popularity. The NFL, however, was not immune from the effects of the 2000–01 economic downturn, which decreased ad revenues during game broadcasts. In an effort to combat this trend as well as declines in ratings, in 2001 the NFL enlisted an outside advertising agency for the first time, choosing the New York office of the same agency NASCAR had recently engaged, Young & Rubicam. The resulting campaign, released in the fall of 2001, was meant to encourage casual NFL fans to become more devoted followers of the sport. Whereas previous campaigns had used the tagline "Feel the power" along with high-energy, collision-focused game footage to appeal to ardent fans, the new campaign, tagged "This Is What It's All About," was built upon the idea that casual fans had less appreciation for the collisions and athletic feats that thrilled devotees of the sport. The NFL and Young & Rubicam believed that these casual fans watched NFL games for social reasons, enjoying the camaraderie surrounding the broadcasts and the conversations about games at work each Monday during football season. In a move that was similar to NASCAR's new marketing strategy, the campaign's TV spots thus focused on fans rather than game footage. One commercial juxtaposed a fan's pregame activities with those of star Tennessee Titans running back Eddie George, while another depicted a fan's game-time backyard barbecue as a high-stakes "NFL experience" in its own right.

In 2001 the National Basketball Association (NBA) was struggling to generate the ratings it had enjoyed prior to the 1999 retirement of Michael Jordan, arguably the greatest basketball player in the league's history. This was Jordan's second retirement. As a means of countering sagging U.S. viewership, the NBA emphasized international markets in a campaign that was launched contemporaneously with "How Bad Have You Got It?" The campaign's TV commercials featured still photographs that transformed into live action, and they showcased a new generation of NBA stars, including Shaquille O'Neal, Vince Carter, and Tim Duncan. Producer Joe Chodosh of NBA Entertainment (the in-house department responsible for the campaign) told Adweek, "Because of the beauty of the moment captured in still photos, viewers are able to see a lot more in these images than when they normally watch basketball." The campaign aired in 207 countries. In the fall of 2001 Jordan announced that he would once again return from retirement. This complicated the league's marketing of younger stars but promised dramatic ratings increases. Jordan retired for the last time after the 2002–03 season.

MARKETING STRATEGY

NASCAR budgeted an estimated $25 to $30 million for marketing in the 2001 racing season, a dramatic increase over previous years that was in keeping with the sport's growing popularity and the new network-broadcast arrangements. "How Bad Have You Got It?" consisted of eight different TV spots, each of which focused on the same NASCAR-obsessed family. The spots aired on the stations with newly minted broadcast rights to NASCAR races: NBC, TNT, FOX, and FX. Print ads echoed the theme of a family's obsession with the sport and ran in NASCAR race programs and other in-house publications as well as in USA Today. The campaign's launch on February 18, 2001, was timed to coincide with the start of that year's 10-month racing season.

The campaign had its genesis in the advertising review NASCAR had conducted in 2000. As part of its pitch to win the NASCAR account, Young & Rubicam had sent to the organization's executives a video depicting agency employees who could not contain their enthusiasm for racing. One segment, for instance, showed an employee using a toilet lever as though it were a gearshift while making revving sounds. The agency's pitch for the account also included the family-oriented strategy, which resonated with the organization's sense of its changing audience. The move away from the focus on racing footage that had grounded the previous three years' TV spots was also partly determined by the nature of the other advertising that appeared during NASCAR telecasts. Because sponsors typically included racing footage in their advertising, NASCAR needed a different formula if it hoped to build further brand equity within that environment.

The "How Bad Have You Got It?" TV spots each revealed the intensity of the subject family's NASCAR addiction by showing how it altered otherwise ordinary situations. For instance, "Tire Swing" showed the father changing out his daughter's tire swing as though he was the member of a racing team's pit crew. "Diner," meanwhile, focused on the family's wood-paneled station wagon as it pulled into a restaurant parking space; rather than exiting through the car doors, the family members simultaneously climbed out through the windows, mimicking stock-car drivers' mode of entry and exit. "Badminton" opened with a shot of the family's children playing badminton; the camera then cut to a shot of the father replacing the car windows with netting from the badminton set to duplicate the look of stock-car windows. "Neighbor" introduced the commonplace scene of a husband and wife in bed, unable to sleep because of a noisy neighbor—a neighbor who was, significantly, revving an engine. When the husband rose from bed, viewers were meant to anticipate a verbal confrontation or an attempt to mute the sound; instead, the husband opened the window wide. The commercial then cut to a scene of husband and wife sleeping peacefully, lulled by the roaring engine in the background.

Print ads used imagery in keeping with the family-focused NASCAR obsession dramatized in the TV spots. For instance, a man was shown on a riding mower with an image of a racetrack scored into the lawn beneath him. Another print ad showed a child's crayon portraits of racetracks affixed to a refrigerator.

"How Bad Have You Got It?" was extended into the 2002 racing season, but the concept was tweaked to avoid repetition, which had become a slight problem the year before because the same eight spots had continued to run for the entire 10 months of the season. "We needed to throw a new element into the campaign," Roger Vandersnick, NASCAR's director of brand and series marketing, explained to Adweek. This included an expansion of the cast of characters to include not just racing fans but also NASCAR stars. The overall concept, as well as the avoidance of extensive racing footage, remained in place. Young & Rubicam provided viewers with further variety in the middle of the 2002 season by unveiling a subcampaign in which a news anchor opened spots by asking fans to compare their own NASCAR fever to that of other comically devoted fans.

OUTCOME

"How Bad Have You Got It?" won a Gold EFFIE Award and garnered a Bronze Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 2002. The NASCAR television audience increased substantially during the campaign's run, though the streamlined TV broadcasting arrangement brokered in 2001 was also a significant factor in these increases. NASCAR's fan base continued to grow. In 2002 NASCAR initiated an ad-agency review, soliciting ideas from DDB Chicago and the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia, but the organization decided that its interests would be best served by continuing to work with Young & Rubicam. "We have been impressed by the quality of work we have seen [from the contending agencies]," Vandersnick told Adweek, "but believe wholeheartedly that Y & R remains the agency for us."

NFL PLAYOFFS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s and early 2000s the National Football League (NFL) began to visualize itself as an entertainment megabrand along the lines of Viacom and Disney, with an imperative to compete not just with other sports leagues but with all other entertainment options on television. In addition to launching a magazine and cable TV station, the league began to market itself more aggressively during telecasts of its games. It partnered with New York agency Young & Rubicam (Y & R) for a successful joint NFL/United Way public-service campaign, and then it enlisted the agency for a branding campaign called "This Is What It's All About," designed to strengthen the league's image among casual fans. In 2002 the league further commissioned Y & R to craft a campaign promoting its slate of postseason playoff games.

The "NFL Playoffs" campaign, launched to coincide with the 2002–03 postseason, used the "This Is What It's All About" tagline and attempted to create excitement around the series of games leading up to the Super Bowl. Having seen ratings for playoff games decline during the 1990s, the league particularly targeted fans of specific teams that had not made it to the playoffs. The individual spots featured the acclaimed actor Don Cheadle speaking of NFL players and past postseason games in passionate, reverent monologues typically paired with dramatic game footage. Cheadle's monologues frequently focused on individual words, phrases, or proper nouns whose meaning had allegedly been changed by events in NFL playoff games. The mythologizing tone of the spots suggested that viewers would miss out on defining cultural events if they did not watch the NFL playoffs.

The campaign was well received by NFL fans and advertising-industry observers, and it won numerous awards, including a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival and a Gold EFFIE. In subsequent years it was reintroduced without significant alteration in preparation for the NFL postseason.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

After its launch in 1920 the National Football League (NFL), America's premier organization of professional football teams, struggled to attain the cultural prominence of college football or professional baseball, then the country's most popular sports. But in the 1950s the NFL became increasingly popular, thanks in large part to the fact that games began to be televised. The 1960 introduction of a rival organization, the American Football League (AFL), was a measure of the sport's burgeoning popularity, and after several years of heated competition for star players and the attention of fans, the NFL and the AFL merged in 1966, paving the way for the modern NFL, in which AFL teams played in the American Football Conference (AFC) and teams from the original NFL played in the National Football Conference (NFC), with the champions of each to meet in the NFL championship, otherwise known as the Super Bowl. The Super Bowl was the culmination of each conference's playoff system, in which teams that had been successful during the regular season faced off against one another to qualify as their conference's representative in the big game. In the latter decades of the twentieth century NFL football became far and away the country's most popular spectator sport, and the Super Bowl was the equivalent of a national holiday.

Beginning in the late 1990s the NFL began to focus its marketing and other communications programs on the development of the league not simply as an organization of teams but as a brand competing in the wider entertainment world for an audience and advertisers. Setting its sights on such heavyweight media brands as Viacom and Disney, the NFL devoted more resources to branding advertisement and for the first time began to work with an outside advertising agency. The NFL's first involvement with New York agency Young & Rubicam came in the form of cobranded public-service commercials for the United Way, one of America's leading charity organizations, with whom the league had long maintained a high-profile partnership. The new United Way campaign, released in 2000, poked gentle fun at prominent NFL players, marking the first substantial use of humor in either a United Way or NFL advertisement. The campaign's warm reception led the NFL to tap Y & R to craft an additional branding campaign on the league's behalf. Called "This Is What It's All About," the campaign began in 2001 with the intention of extending the NFL's appeal beyond its core fans.

Given the drop-off in viewership and advertising revenue in the late 1990s and early 2000s, the branding imperative made further sense for the NFL. This decline was attributable to a number of factors, including a softening U.S. economy and the fragmentation of TV audiences caused by the proliferation of cable programming options. Within the larger context of shrinking audiences and ad revenues, the NFL had seen marked declines, dating from 1992, in TV ratings for its postseason playoff games. Because postseason games regularly generated the drama that drew fans to football in the first place, telecasts of these games served as an ideal forum for NFL branding. In 2002 the NFL charged Y & R with the task of developing a campaign on behalf of playoff game broadcasts.

TARGET MARKET

Like other professional sports leagues, the NFL drew its most consistent fans from the over-34 male population. At the same time the NFL routinely made special efforts to reach out to males 18 to 34, one of the most coveted and difficult-to-reach demographics for marketers. In the late 1990s and early 2000s the league had put a particular emphasis on marketing to women and casual fans. The 2001 introduction of "This Is What It's All About," for instance, saw NFL branding take a newly inclusive turn, as that season's commercials were designed to appeal not to hard-core loyalists of the sport but to those who watched football for social reasons.

The "NFL Playoffs" campaign had the specific goal of appealing to fans across demographic borders who had lost or were likely to lose interest in the playoff games because their favorite teams had been eliminated from competition. The campaign emphasized the drama of the playoffs, attempting to remind these fans of the momentousness of past playoff games and to suggest that they were likely to miss similarly unforgettable occurrences if they failed to tune in to the current series of playoff games.

DON CHEADLE

The star of the "NFL Playoffs" campaign, Don Cheadle, rose to prominence thanks to his roles in films such as Devil in a Blue Dress, Boogie Nights, Traffic, Ocean's Eleven, and Hotel Rwanda. After the warm reception afforded the first season of the "NFL Playoffs" campaign, Cheadle was tapped to direct spots in the campaign's second and third seasons.

COMPETITION

TV ratings for National Basketball Association (NBA) games during the 1990s and early 2000s were strongly tied to the on-again, off-again approach to retirement of Michael Jordan, commonly considered the greatest player in the game's history. Jordan first retired at the peak of his career in 1993 and then returned in 1995. When Jordan retired again in 1999, presumably for the last time, the NBA began focusing its marketing efforts on a new generation of marquee players—including Tim Duncan, Shaquille O'Neal, and Vince Carter—and on an expanded international target market. TV commercials featuring these young stars aired in 207 countries in 2001 before Jordan announced, shortly after the September 11 terrorist attacks of that year, that he would return to basketball yet again and donate his 2001–02 salary to victims of the atrocity. Though Jordan's return promised improved ratings for the league, the effort to market a new generation of basketball greats was complicated by his return. After Jordan's final retirement in 2003, the league again found itself faced with declining fan enthusiasm and no clear marketing answers to this dilemma.

During the 1990s and early 2000s the National Association of Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR) experienced a surge in viewership and saw its fan base consequently evolve. Some estimates as of 2001 placed the sport second behind the NFL in its total fan base and in its TV audience numbers. Having transcended its roots as a blue-collar sport enjoyed primarily by men in the southeastern United States, NASCAR released the most substantial marketing effort in its history in 2001, timed to coincide with that year's 10-month racing season. Tagged "How Bad Have You Got It," the campaign focused on a suburban, NASCAR-obsessed family whose everyday behavior was comically influenced by their love of stock-car racing. A lack of geographical specificity in the commercials as well as a focus on the commonality uniting all NASCAR fans—their love of the sport—allowed the campaign to speak both to core NASCAR fans and to newer fans. The family-oriented commercials also reflected a little-known fact about NASCAR: families frequently attended or watched telecasts of races together.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "NFL Playoffs" campaign was introduced in late 2002 to build enthusiasm preparatory to and during the 2002–03 postseason, culminating with the Super Bowl. In following years the campaign was likewise timed to coincide with the unfolding of the postseason. The commercials ran during network telecasts of NFL games and on sports-focused cable outlets such as ESPN and the NFL Network.

The spots, created by Y & R and produced by NFL Films, attributed mythological weight to events that had happened and would presumably continue to happen in NFL playoff games, as a means of convincing viewers that missing the broadcast of a playoff game might mean missing a defining cultural and historic moment. Representative commercials featured the acclaimed actor Don Cheadle performing this mythologizing function via spirited monologues. He argued that the meaning of a common word or phrase had been changed by postseason events in years past or by the players who would be competing in the current year's playoff games. Cinematic, often slow-motion footage of dramatic football plays was intercut with the monologue to aid Cheadle in his argument.

In "Crazy," for instance, Cheadle began by saying, " 'Crazy.' The word defines itself. 'Crazy' knits a sweater for a hamster. 'Crazy' spends 10 minutes yelling at a plant for not growing . . . But that was before football, before this season, before 'crazy' became an art form." A succession of noteworthy plays from the preceding football season ran on-screen as Cheadle continued to talk, pointing out the superlative "craziness" of each play or player shown as a means of supporting his concluding contention that "Only football can turn 'crazy' into 'crazy.' " Similarly, in the commercial "Joe," Cheadle argued, "The phrase 'average Joe' was coined for a reason. 'Joe' is the guy who wears a shirt that says 'Joe' on it. 'Joe' doesn't steal the girl, he's the guy you pal around with. But not since the playoffs." Footage from football legend Joe Namath's career then appeared onscreen, and Cheadle narrated the ways in which Namath's playoff performances changed "everything." In Namath's wake, Cheadle argued, "Fathers expect more from a kid named Joe. That's how big the playoffs are. They took the name 'Joe' and made it 'Joe.' " Cheadle subtly made the second "Joe" sound more substantial.

Other spots altered the premise slightly. In "The Catch," for instance, Cheadle mused on an alternate course of football history that might have taken shape had "The Catch," one of the most famous touchdown receptions in football history (made by San Francisco's Dwight Clark in the 1982 NFC playoffs) not taken place. "Dante Hall," meanwhile, pitted the Kansas City Chiefs wide receiver of that name against Cheadle in a footrace. Cheadle noted at the commercial's outset that he and Hall were very similar in physical size, and the two appeared side by side onscreen in football gear. As soon as the race began, however, the supposedly equitable matchup became a rout, with Hall leaving Cheadle far behind. "And I'm kind of fast," Cheadle said at the end of the race. Each spot closed with an NFL playoff logo and the tagline "This Is What It's All About."

OUTCOME

The campaign was greeted with substantial enthusiasm by NFL fans and the advertising industry. Creativity said of the commercials, "These make dedicated followers proud to be so, while inspiring lackadaisical sideliners to get their asses back in the game." The spot "Crazy" won a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 2003, and "Joe" won a Silver ADDY that same year. The campaign as a whole won numerous awards in 2003, including a Gold ADDY and a silver award for best copywriting at the New York Festivals. The campaign also won a 2004 Silver EFFIE Award. The 2002–03 playoff telecasts posted ratings numbers that were among the best the league had enjoyed in the preceding five years, including an overall 16 percent ratings increase among men 18 to 34. That year's Super Bowl became the most watched television program of all time.

LIFE ON ACELA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the late 1990s the National Railroad Passenger Corporation, popularly known as Amtrak, was ready to embrace high-speed rail transportation. High-speed trains had been in operation for years in Europe and Japan, and Amtrak had come off poorly in comparison with those systems. The initial Amtrak high-speed trainsets (consisting of high-speed engines and redesigned coaches) were to run in the Northeast Corridor, between Boston and Washington, D.C., the area in the United States where train usage was heaviest. The new trains, named Acela (pronounced a-cell-a), were to replace the diesel and electric Metroliners, which had served customers for years. In 1998 Amtrak chose the ad agency DDB Needham to handle the rebranding and market the new trains to the public.

The rebranding campaign had an initial annual advertising budget of $20 million. The Acela rebrand actually encompassed all of the Northeast rail service, not just the high-speed trains. The initial advertising campaign for the new trains, dubbed ''Life on Acela,'' emphasized the comfort and amenities on the new passenger cars in addition to the convenience of shorter traveling times on the express and regional trains. The first four spots began appearing in Northeast movie theaters on June 4, 1999; they were run prior to feature films with the purpose of familiarizing the public with the Acela name. Those initial spots were coupled with Star Wars: Episode I—The Phantom Menace. One of the commercials, titled ''Unwind,'' featured a man suddenly relaxing amidst the rush-hour crush. The tagline was ''Find a better place. Life on Acela.'' The theater spots were followed by posters placed at heavily trafficked sites—including airports—in Boston, Manhattan, and Washington, D.C.

Because of a number of delays in rolling out the trainsets themselves, gauging the effectiveness of the ''Life on Acela'' campaign proved difficult. By the time the Acela trains did begin running (the Regional in January 2000 and the Express the following December), passengers were aware of the new brand, though it often caused confusion because the Acela name, which many associated with high-speed rail travel, was used for the entire spectrum of Northeast rail service.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

There were a number of factors that influenced Amtrak's decision to adopt the Acela service. First and foremost was the success of the European and Japanese high-speed trains, which reached speeds in excess of 150 miles per hour. Because railway stations tended to be more conveniently located than airports, these bullet trains had been trumpeted as the modern, comfortable mode of travel for the savvy customer. Americans had endured slower trains for years with a resultant falloff in ridership.

BREAKING THE RECORD

On October 11, 1999, during testing in Rhode Island, a high-speed Acela train set a new U.S. train-speed record of 168 miles per hour. Back in March 1999 an earlier version of the Acela also reached a speed of 168 mph, but that was on a closed test track. The October record was reached on a stretch of track between Warwick and Kingston, Rhode Island. The previous record, set by a Metroliner during testing decades earlier, was 160 mph.

The second reason for Amtrak's decision to convert to Acela was far more quotidian: finances. Since its establishment on May 1, 1971, Amtrak had never achieved the ideal of financial self-sufficiency. In fact, despite receiving ever-increasing annual federal subsidies, it continued to lose money. After U.S. Congress passed a law in 1997 that would end the federal operating subsidies by 2003, Amtrak hoped to win back riders with a new, improved service—at a higher cost for travelers.

Huge investments were made to upgrade not only the trains but also the tracks themselves, especially the stretch of tracks from New Haven, Connecticut, through Providence, Rhode Island, to Boston, where diesel engines had previously been running. The tracks were electrified as part of the changeover to Acela service. Tracks along the less popular routes in the Northeast remained unelectrified, however.

TARGET MARKET

The target market consisted of travelers in the northeastern United States. The Northeast was chosen because it had the highest daily train ridership in the country and thus was potentially the most profitable. This market was divided into three segments. The primary segment consisted of business travelers going back and forth between Boston, New York, and Washington, D.C. As Judith Schoolman reported in the New York Daily News, Amtrak's share of business travelers between Washington and New York was already competitive with airlines. It lagged far behind the airlines, however, in transporting business travelers between Boston and New York. In October 1999 Amtrak also announced tentative plans to extend the express service to Richmond, Virginia.

The second segment of Acela's target market was regional travelers—those traveling within a given region of the Northeast, such as southern New England or the mid-Atlantic states. Regional ridership in the Northeast had been increasing throughout the 1990s, a trend that was expected to continue once Acela was installed. The final segment of the Acela target market consisted of daily commuters. Because Acela ticket prices would not be competitive with prices for existing commuter trains, this was the least profitable and most problematic group.

COMPETITION

Amtrak faced stiff competition from airlines, interstate bus companies, regional train companies, and another important in the compact Northeast, America's car culture. Each of these modes of transportation posed a different stumbling block to Amtrak's goal of financial independence. Though more expensive than trains, airlines cut traveling time greatly between the major cities along the Northeast Corridor. Interstate bus companies and local and regional train services (such as Metro North and New Jersey Transit) offered lower rates than Amtrak. In the case of the latter, the trains often ran on the same tracks as Amtrak trains. Automobiles offered the double bonus of less expense and the convenience of door-to-door service.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The name Acela was developed by the design company IDEO in conjunction with Amtrak managers. According to Brent Oppenheimer, creative director of IDEO, the word was a combination of the words "acceleration" and "excellence." The name "Acela" was one of 400 original possibilities, but the short list came down to three. Of the other two words, one retained the "metro" prefix—already in use for Amtrak's Metroliner—while the other suggested relaxation. Before it was chosen as the new rebrand, "Acela" passed three hurdles: focus-group tests, Amtrak officials, and whether or not it had negative connotations in other languages. As to the latter, some pointed out that, though it was simply a neologism, "Acela" seemed etymologically related to the Spanish verb acelerar (to accelerate).

Airlines lured customers—business travelers in particular—with short hops between Boston and New York City. A person could conceivably fly to a business meeting in one city in the morning, a second meeting in another city in the afternoon, and return home by evening. Not even the fastest train could match that.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To counteract the competition's various selling points, DDB devised the "Life on Acela" campaign. The first task for DDB and Amtrak was to overcome customer unfamiliarity with the brand. This was done initially through movie-theater spots, which began airing in June 1999, and the subsequent poster campaign. The idea was to familiarize people with the new brand name, Acela, which played off the word "accelerate."

The campaign also needed to make consumers aware that Acela was actually two different services that served three segments of travelers. Acela Express, with a top speed of 150 miles per hour, had all-new cars and amenities and catered primarily to business travelers, while the Acela Regional, which also ran on the electrified tracks at a top speed of 125 miles per hour, was intended to serve commuters and occasional travelers.

In a 1999 article in the New York Times Stuart Elliott interviewed Barbara Richardson, who was then Amtrak's executive vice president for marketing. Describing the philosophy behind the campaign, she said, "It's not just about a train ride. Acela is a big departure for us, representing a really new change in direction. . . . The campaign is meant to signal to people who have not considered us previously that we offer a service they perhaps had not expected from us previously."

In that same article Abigail Kolodny, an account planner at DDB, explained the campaign's approach vis-à-vis the competition, noting, "Travelers for the most part said that travel by car or plane interrupts their lives. But Acela lets you continue your life while traveling, working, eating, meeting." The "Life on Acela" campaign thus argued that Acela trains met the traveler's needs better than other modes of transportation. The Acela Express trainsets featured redesigned coaches. The new amenities included larger windows, chairs that swiveled, conference tables for conducting business, bistro-like café cars with improved menus, and a quiet car where cell phones were not allowed.

The posters, which appeared in June 1999, employed what Elliott described in his article as "surreal imagery" coupled with pithy slogans that alluded to Acela travel for businesspeople. These included "Arrive at a decision," "Be productive. Do nothing," "Brainchild on board," "Find lost time," "Return your mind to its upright position," and "Transfer between left and right brain." Discussing the posters, Ken Shuldman, group creative director at DDB, explained to Elliott, "What we intentionally tried to do was to create an Acela 'language,' visual and verbal, to interpret this new mindset of traveling. It's very optimistic, reflecting the feeling of what the train means to Amtrak." He further commented, "At the heart of the campaign is the human benefit of travel . . . You can walk into a meeting and say something intelligent because the ride didn't dehumanize you."

In late summer 1999, because of delays in starting up the Acela service, the campaign's emphasis shifted slightly. Amtrak had originally scheduled to begin the yearlong phase-in of Acela before Christmas 1999, but during tests in Colorado it was discovered that there was a problem with the suspension system, which caused the wheels to wear down quicker on curves. The initial Express service was rescheduled for spring 2000. As reported by Russell Garland in the Providence Journal-Bulletin, Amtrak officials themselves were taking to the road to promote the delayed Acela service, reinforcing the Acela brand to 40 major corporations in Providence alone. Among those officials was then-president of Amtrak's Northeast Corridor, Stan Bagley, who declared that the Acela Express would sell itself once regular service began between Boston and Washington, D.C.

In an article by Sharon Klahr in Advertising Age's Creativity, Steven Landsberg of DDB pointed out that the campaign's "real focus is on creating anticipation of Acela's arrival. Rather than taking a more conventional approach and talking about speed and how it minimizes the time, we wanted to talk about how Acela maximizes time. It's a really smart, subversive way to look at it.''

OUTCOME

Not everyone responded positively to the Acela advertising campaign, especially the posters. Some thought the message was lost in the strangeness, prompting Joseph T. DiVincenzo, a senior vice president for marketing at Amtrak, to come to ads' defense. ''We want people to stare at it and question it and scratch their heads and say, 'What is this?' '' he told Chip Jones of the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

In fact, public awareness and anticipation (though some of it was cynical) grew in the months during the delay of the first Acela trains. Thus, when the Acela Regional made its debut on January 31, 2000, there was much fanfare. The train departed from Boston's South Station heading for New York City by way of Providence and New Haven. Because of the electrification of the lines between New Haven and Boston, the trip was ''seamless''; there was no change of locomotives in New Haven from diesel to electric. Furthermore, the electric train ran faster than the diesel, cutting travel time between New York and Boston from about five hours to slightly less than four.

In mid-March Amtrak reported that 43,028 riders had boarded the four Acela Regional trains in operation during the first month of service. This represented an approximately 50 percent increase in ridership compared to February 1999. Amtrak also noted that Acela's on-time rate was 85 percent during its first month. Once the bloom was off the Acela Regional, the percentage increase shrank. Nevertheless, by October 2000 ridership was up 11 percent, and revenues had increased by 22 percent.

Meanwhile, the much-anticipated, $1.7 billion Acela Express was delayed yet again. And despite the effort of the ''Life on Acela'' campaign, the focus of the Express was still on the high-speed aspect. As Amtrak lobbied Congress for $10 billion for high-speed rail improvement, critics began to question whether the high-speed aspect would be enough to make rail service competitive with air travel.

An inaugural run of the Acela Express took place on November 16, 2000, and regular service began on December 11, 2000. The first regular Acela Express left Washington, D.C., at 5 a.m. and arrived at New York City's Penn Station at 7:47 a.m., just three minutes behind schedule. The run from New York to Boston was 12 minutes behind schedule.

Even before the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, which briefly grounded and then extensively crippled airlines, Amtrak ridership in the Northeast was on the increase. For the third quarter of 2001 Amtrak's share of the Washington–to–New York market was 53 percent. The company also saw its share of the New York–to–Boston market increase to 35 percent. Amtrak as a whole fared worse. By the end of 2004 it still had not reached self-sufficiency and in fact posted a net loss of $1.3 billion for the year, with sales and employee growth each down more than 10 percent. Furthermore, Amtrak was never able to resolve the confusion engendered by the Acela rebrand for Regional as well as Express services and dropped the Acela name from the Regional service in 2003.

1998 PRINT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Billing itself as ''the centerpiece of the historical renaissance of Negro Leagues baseball throughout the nation,'' the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum (NLBM) opened in Kansas City, Missouri, in January 1991. The museum was housed in small quarters in the Lincoln Building in the 18th and Vine Historic District but in the fall of 1997 moved into a new facility nearby. The museum's collection covered the leagues' entire history—from the earliest days of organized baseball after the Civil War through the final days of all-black baseball in the 1960s, preserving the history of the Negro Leagues for both baseball fans and social historians.

In 1998 the NLBM commissioned the Martin Agency, a Richmond, Virginia, ad agency, to create a print campaign. Hal Tench served as creative director for the campaign, with a creative team consisting of art director Christopher Gyorgy, copywriter Chris Jacobs, and print producer Paul Martin. Photographs for the print ads were culled from the museum's archives.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When organized baseball began in the middle of the nineteenth century, whites and blacks played the game together. After the Reconstruction period that followed the Civil War, however, segregation permeated most aspects of American life, including baseball, and by the turn of the century, blacks had been effectively banned from the game. They joined together and formed teams and, eventually, leagues of their own. At a meeting at Kansas City's Paseo YMCA in 1920, Rube Foster, then owner of the all-black Chicago American Giants, founded the Negro National League with other independent black professional organizations. Three years later the Eastern Colored League was formed. Both leagues operated successfully until 1932 when financial difficulties during the Great Depression caused their collapse. A second Negro National League was formed the next season, followed by the Negro American League in 1937. Both thrived until baseball's color barrier was broken when Jackie Robinson, a former Negro Leaguer, joined the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1947.

The re-integration of baseball was a major civil-rights victory for African Americans, but it spelled doom for the Negro Leagues. Stars such as Willie Mays, Hank Aaron, Ernie Banks, Roy Campanella, and Satchel Paige followed Robinson into the majors and left the Negro Leagues without any marquee players. Other great performers of the Negro Leagues era included Ted ''Double Duty'' Radcliffe, Josh Gibson, Buck O'Neil, Buck Leonard, and James ''Cool Papa'' Bell.

In its early days the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum was short on both space and money. Much of the memorabilia remained in boxes because a lack of display space in the cramped, 2,500-square-foot Lincoln Building facility. The responsibility for the rent was passed each month among the museum's founding members. Eventually enough money was raised to allow the NLBM to move into a larger, state-of-the-art facility.

The museum's opening gallery exhibited uniforms, caps, and other paraphernalia of notable Negro Leagues teams such as the Kansas City Monarchs, the Cuban X-Giants, the Baltimore Elite Giants, and the Indianapolis Clowns. The walls were covered with posters, broadsides, pennants, photos, and other ephemera documenting the excitement of the games and the grind of the barnstorming road shows. A mock locker room featured uniforms and other memorabilia of the dozen Negro Leaguers enshrined in the Hall of Fame at the National Baseball Museum and Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, New York.

Once established, the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum began to actively market itself to the public through special events and promotions. In 1995, to celebrate the 75th Anniversary of the founding of the Negro Leagues, the museum held a reunion, bringing more than 200 veterans of the Negro Leagues to Kansas City. In 1997 the museum unveiled a new logo commemorating the 50th anniversary of the breaking of the color barrier in Major League Baseball.

That same year the Coors Brewing Companybecame the first official sponsor of the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum. Coors and the museum embarked on a three-year partnership to enhance the national exposure opportunities for the museum and to assist in its membership campaign. Program elements included a national Black History Month advertising and merchandising program, support of a Black Entertainment Television (BET) classroom cable program featuring Negro Leagues baseball history, and other fundraising elements to assist with the museum's overall efforts. Another tactic that the NLBM used to promote the story of the Negro Leagues was through the sale of apparel and other merchandise through its own licensing program. These specialty items—sold in the museum's gift shop—proved very successful in drawing people into the mission of the museum. "People can come and buy active wear and historically based items, learn about the history and look good as well," said Raymond Doswell, curator of the NLBM. "But the main focus for us is to really use those items to draw people into the larger story, the larger issue of black entrepreneurship, freedom in an oppressive society for African Americans. That's what the story is all about."

The museum relied on cooperative initiatives with educational institutions to promote its mission of raising public awareness of the Negro Leagues. In 1999 the NLBM announced a partnership with Kansas State University's College of Education and the a local school district. Specific projects covered under this joint effort included the creation of websites allowing the museum to connect and interact with students, researchers, and fans worldwide; creation of a book series dealing with the established themes of the museum (leadership, economic self-sufficiency, race relations, and preservation of local cultural heritage); the development of a curriculum series; and the establishment of virtual and traveling museums.

A PLACE FOR THEIR STUFF

Acquiring materials for the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum's collection was both "easy and difficult," according to curator Raymond Doswell. The history of the Negro Leagues was well-chronicled through photographs, and pictures made up a majority of the exhibit. Other memorabilia proved more difficult to collect; much of it was squirreled away in basements or attics and later thrown away. Some items of immense historical value were lost in this fashion, including the last set of uniforms worn by the Kansas City Monarchs. Stored in the basement of the team's former owner, the uniforms were discarded after a flood.The museum expanded its collection through the generosity of the surviving players and the families of others. "A lot of people had things in the basements or attics that their grandfather or great-grandfather had," said the museum's honorary chairman, former Negro Leagues player Buck O'Neil. "We started advertising, and people started looking around and recalling things they had." A number of key artifacts were in the hands of private collectors, many of whom made donations to the museum. Some items were on auction markets, however, and the museum lacked the necessary funds to compete in that area.

TARGET MARKET

Print ads in the 1998 Negro Leagues Baseball Museum campaign appeared in a number of national and local publications, including the Missourian, Chicago magazine, the Sporting News, and Baseball America. The campaign was targeted toward adult baseball enthusiasts and presented the NLBM as a potential vacation destination. Special emphasis was placed on the African-American community, with ads placed in such prominent black publications as Jet, Ebony, and Vibe. The aim was to fulfill the museum's continuing mission to raise awareness of the contributions blacks made to America's national pastime—even before the days of integrated baseball. Don Motley, the museum's executive director, explained the need to target this audience during a 1998 interview: "A few months ago, a group of black high school kids visited our museum, and I asked them who was the first black ballplayer in the major leagues. They said Babe Ruth! So do you see why our facility is necessary?"

COMPETITION

The Negro Leagues Baseball Museum was one of many baseball museums across the United States and Canada. Many of these institutions appealed to visitors on a regional basis; for example, the Indiana Baseball Hall of Fame commemorated the heritage of baseball in the state of Indiana. The Negro Leagues Baseball Museum was one of two baseball museums that attempted to serve a more national or societal educational mission. The other was the National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum. Established in 1935 by Major League Baseball, the National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum sought to honor the game's great players, owners, managers, umpires, and innovators—including Negro Leaguers. Like the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum, the National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum collected, through donation, baseball artifacts, works of art, literature, photographs, memorabilia, and related materials that focused on the history of the game and its players.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Martin Agency agreed to create the 1998 Negro Leagues Baseball Museum print campaign on a pro bono basis owing to the lack of funds available to the nonprofit museum. The project captured the look and feel of filmmaker Ken Burns's 1994 PBS documentary Baseball. The deliberate echo of Burns' style was no coincidence; Burns served on the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum's board.

The Martin Agency produced three full-page newspaper ads and a television spot for the campaign. Burns granted the Martin Agency permission to use a rendition of "Take Me Out To the Ball Game" from the Baseball soundtrack. Many of the same rare photographs and film footage Burns used of Gibson, Paige, and other Negro League stars from the 1920s and 1930s also were employed. "We knew we didn't have the money for new photography, so that was out of the question," Gyorgy said. "But it really wasn't needed, as there was a wealth of existing photos to draw from. This is a real piece of Americana."

In developing the print campaign, Gyorgy and Jacobs drew on their own sense of wonder upon discovering the depth of the subject. "[The museum] provides a wonderful glimpse of how the leagues provided something for the communities to rally around," Gyorgy said. "Since little is known about Negro Leagues baseball our ads feature a lot of copy and are designed to educate people about the importance of the leagues and the impressive caliber of the players."

The print portion of the campaign consisted of mock newspaper ads and three fundraising posters. The copy pointed out that the quality of play in the Negro Leagues was as good, maybe better, than that of Major League Baseball during the time the sport was segregated. One headline read: "Just Because They Weren't in the Same League as Babe Ruth and Ty Cobb, Doesn't Mean They Weren't in the Same League as Babe Ruth and Ty Cobb." Another, highlighting great long-ball hitters, asserted: "420 Feet is 420 Feet, No Matter What the Color of Your Skin Is." A third mock newspaper ad posed the question "Was Josh Gibson the Black Babe Ruth?" with the subhead reading, "Or Was Babe Ruth the White Josh Gibson?" "The campaign really captures the essence of what we are about an what we are working to achieve," Doswell said.

OUTCOME

For 1998 the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum saw attendance increase by 12 percent. Its membership rolls also received a boost from the ad campaign, swelling by 15 percent for the year. Merchandise sales remained brisk, with preliminary figures indicating an increase over the previous year, according to official museum figures.

The campaign captured numerous awards. At the annual Richmond Show, a production of the Advertising Club of Richmond, the Martin Agency snared six golds, including four from its work for the NLBM. The agency also scored significant wins at the annual Art Director's Club of New York awards. The NLBM campaign was awarded the prize for Distinctive Merit in the category of advertising posters and billboards, public service or nonprofit/educational. The campaign also received an award in the category of newspaper, public service/nonprofit, full page or spread.

INCREDIBLE DOGS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Ralston Purina was acquired by Nestle USA. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

With the ''Incredible Dogs'' marketing campaign—a broad effort that included advertisements, an essay competition, and canine athletic events—Ralston Purina Company encouraged consumers to purchase Purina Dog Chow and Purina Puppy Chow to help their pets attain an exceptional level of health and energy. An advertisement in Reader's Digest in November 1998 showed a man in a business suit prone on the sidewalk in front of his house. A large puppy stood on the man's chest, regarding him inquisitively. In the door of the house was a hole shaped like the outline of a puppy, implying that the dog had burst through and tackled his owner outside. The headline read, ''It's gotta be the Puppy Chow.'' The text said that Purina Puppy Chow offered appealing taste and the perfect nutritional formulation—including calcium and protein but no artificial colors—for puppies to develop strong bones and muscles. The ad included the slogan ''Incredible puppy food. Incredible puppies'' beside a picture of the product. The ''Incredible Dogs'' campaign was developed by the Fallon McElligott advertising agency. It ran through 1998 and into 1999 in print and broadcast media.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Ralston Purina was founded as the Robinson-Danforth Commission Company in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1894 by William H. Danforth, George Robinson, and William Andrews. The enterprise began by marketing feed for horses and mules and expanded into hot breakfast cereals, including Purina Whole Wheat Cereal. The name was derived from the company's slogan, ''Where purity is paramount.'' The product was later called Ralston Whole Wheat Cereal when it was endorsed by Dr. Albert Wester Edgerly, a widely recognized health advocate commonly known as ''Dr. Ralston.'' In 1902 the business was renamed Ralston Purina Company. During World War I Danforth served as YMCA secretary for troops in France, where he noticed that soldiers responded eagerly to the word ''chow.'' After the war he changed the word ''feed'' to ''chow'' on all of his company's livestock and poultry feeds. In 1986 Ralston sold its animal feed business, Purina Mills. The divestiture allowed Ralston Purina to concentrate on pet food and other consumer packaged goods.

In 1998 Ralston Purina was the world's largest maker of dry dog food and dry and soft-moist cat foods.

Its dog food brands included Dog Chow, Puppy Chow, Fit & Trim, Grrravy, Mainstay, Butcher's Blend, and a premium product named Purina O.N.E. The company also made Purina Biscuits, Beggin' Strips, and T Bonzpet treats; Cat Chow and Meow Mixcat foods; Tidy Cats cat litter; and Eveready and Energizer batteries. Rural Purina dealers had been selling food for hunting dogs and working farm dogs since 1926, but the company's dog food was not available at grocery stores until 1957. Purina spent five years researching and formulating pressure-cooked Purina Dog Chow, a nutritious and palatable brand designed specifically for grocery outlets. The product gained popularity so quickly that for a time the company could not manufacture enough to keep up with demand. By January 1958 Purina had 14.8 percent of the dry dog food market, and by the following August Dog Chow was the most popular brand in the nation, a position it held for the next 40 years.

Dog Chow was first advertised with an "eager eater" theme that focused on its appealing flavor. An advertisement in Good Housekeeping in 1990 continued that tradition by showing a dog with its head and front end buried in a sack of Purina Dog Chow as it ate food straight from the bag. The text said that, although they were unaware that the product contained real meat, bone meal, whole grains, and 43 nutrients, dogs loved it because it tasted good. The ad included the slogan "All you add is" and a heart-shaped graphic to represent the word "love." That slogan had been in use since the 1960s, but it was replaced during the 1990s as the company worked to revive interest in the brand. An advertisement that ran in Country Living in 1997 showed a dog trotting up to a sack of Purina Dog Chow and crawling inside to eat from the bag. The ad said that dogs could not resist the product's taste. "It's packed with quality ingredients for the unsurpassed, scientifically balanced nutrition you expect from Dog Chow," said the text. The tag line was: "Purina. Bring out the champion in your dog."

UNDERSTANDING THE TARGET MARKET

In 1996 Fallon McElligott won a Grand Effie Award, a top honor in the advertising industry, for the "Purina Dog Chow Every Day" campaign, which advised consumers to buy only Purina Dog Chow to provide their pets with a consistent, nutritious diet. Fallon McElligott developed the campaign after research indicated that consumers who usually purchased Dog Chow realized that dogs did not need variety in their diets. In contrast, consumers who frequently switched brands thought that dogs, like humans, needed various types of food. The advertising campaign emphasized the fact that dogs tended to develop stomach problems or become finicky eaters when they were given assorted brands of dog food.

TARGET MARKET

In 1996 there were at least 54 million dogs and 59 million cats in the United States. More than half of the nation's households owned pets. One survey in the late 1980s indicated that most dogs lived with people who owned homes in small communities. Households with dogs—especially those with purebreds—were usually larger and had more money than those without dogs. Dog owners tended to be 35 to 54 years old, and their children were most likely to be 6 to 17 years old. People considered their dogs to be part of their families, often treating them as if they were children or regarding them as best friends. About 6 percent of the average dog owner's grocery bill went for dog food. In 1996, with sales of $7.5 billion, the pet food market was larger than the market for juice, baby food, and pasta. Since people felt strong affection for their dogs and wanted them to live as long as possible, they usually shopped for the best pet food they could buy. They wanted manufacturers to consult with veterinarians and breeders to develop highly nutritious pet food.

The "Incredible Dogs" campaign emphasized that Ralston Purina used scientific research to formulate healthful products. Since it included athletic competitions, the marketing effort appealed to consumers who enjoyed extreme dog games, one of the fastest growing activities for people and their pets. In these sports competitions dogs performed spectacular feats such as leaping off ramps into water, executing acrobatic routines, and racing through obstacle courses. Some participants in events sponsored by Purina had first qualified by winning competitions hosted by regional chapters of organizations such as the North American Flyball Association, a group that promoted the popular sport of dog flyball.

COMPETITION

Purina Dog Chow had remained the nation's top brand of dry dog food since 1958, although its market share had slipped to about 10 percent by the early 1990s. According to Pet Food Industry magazine, Purina Dog Chow led the category in 1993 with sales of $245 million. Purina Puppy Chow was second with sales of $140 million, and Meal Time (made by Kal Kan, the pet food division of Mars, Inc.) was third with sales of

DISTINCTIVE TRADEMARK

The red-and-white "checkerboard" logo of Ralston Purina Company was based on a textile pattern that one of the company's founders, William H. Danforth, remembered from his childhood. He had noticed that it was easy to identify the children of a certain family in his hometown because their mother made all their garments from one bolt of cloth. One year she used gingham with alternating red and white squares, a design that Ralston Purina later incorporated into its trademark to give its products a distinctive, unified look. In 1921 the company introduced one of the first animal feeds in pellet form, a product line known as "Checkers." In 1933 Admiral Richard Byrd brought Ralston Purina Dog Chow Checkers along to feed the sled dogs that accompanied him on his expedition to the South Pole, a celebrity endorsement that helped publicize the brand.

$100.5 million. By the end of 1998 Ralston Purina had 15.4 percent of the U.S. pet food market, according to Feedstuffs magazine. The Friskies PetCare division of Nestlé S.A. was second with 12.4 percent, and the Heinz Pet Food division of H.J. Heinz Company was third with 12.3 percent.

In 1998 Mars continued its effort to achieve global consistency among its products by changing the name of Pedigree Select premium dog food to Cesar Select Dinners. The Cesar name had been used in Europe and Asia but was new to the United States. Aimed at small dogs, the product was promoted with print ads that showed a diminutive pet dragging its owner out of bed by the leg of his pajamas. The tag line was: "What do you feed the head of the household? Only the best." Meanwhile, Friskies PetCare advertised its Alpo brand with the tag line, "A great dog deserves Alpo." Other primary rivals included premium brands such as Iams Natural, made by Iams Company, and Hill's Science Diet, made by Hill's Pet Nutrition, Inc. "What vets feed their pets," said the headline in an ad for Hill's Science Diet. The text added, "There's nothing better for your best friend."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Incredible Dogs" campaign was a broad marketing effort that included advertisements, contests, and performances by canine athletes. Designed around the theme "Incredible dog food. Incredible dogs," the Internet site for Purina Dog Chow featured information about events related to the campaign. The Fallon McElligott agency developed advertisements to emphasize that with nutritious food and proper care, any dog had the potential to show exceptional qualities and live a long, healthy life. According to Advertising Age, Purina spent $89.9 million to advertise all its pet foods in 1998, up 19 percent from $75.6 million in 1997. Of that amount, $58.6 million went for television commercials and $30.6 million for print advertisements.

One magazine advertisement showed a boy in a basketball uniform watching a small dog balance a spinning basketball on its nose. The headline said, "It's gotta be the Dog Chow." The text added that Purina had used advanced scientific knowledge to develop a product with the perfect amount of omega fatty acids to make a dog's coat grow thick and lustrous and to ensure proper immune function. The ad concluded with the tag line "Incredible dog food. Incredible dogs" beside a picture of a bag of Purina Dog Chow. Another magazine advertisement showed an airborne boy gripping a stick. Below, a puppy holding the other end of the stick was apparently lifting the boy high off the ground. The text explained that the highly digestible product had been reformulated to help puppies build strong bones, muscles, and immune systems. The ad included the headline "It's gotta be the Puppy Chow" and the tag line "Incredible puppy food. Incredible puppies."

Early in 1998 Purina became the sponsor of Lou "Mack" McCammon's traveling animal act, which had been touring the country for a decade. The act was renamed the Dog Chow Incredible Dog Team. Dressed in spangled costumes that featured the Purina logo, the energetic canine stars of the show performed impressive acrobatic feats such as jumping over obstacles, leaping into the air, and catching flying Frisbee disks. McCammon wore a costume that featured the Purina logo, and the insignia was displayed on signs, on a piece of artificial turf where the animals performed, and on coupons and flying disks that were given to spectators. The dogs performed on television programs and at state fairs, amusements parks, sporting events, and corporate gatherings, primarily in the West. The dogs were of assorted breeds, and some had been adopted from animal shelters. One of them, Scooter the Wonder Dog, was the official mascot of the San Francisco 49ers sports team. Purina's sponsorship of the show was intended to demonstrate that any dog had the potential for incredible achievements if its owner gave it good care, exercise, and proper nutrition.

In 1998 the company also sponsored the first Purina Dog Chow Incredible Dog Challenge, an extreme sports event for canine athletes. The competition was publicized via a national public relations campaign, local radio advertising, point-of-purchase promotions at supermarkets, and coverage on the ESPNcable television network. Several thousand spectators and more than a thousand dogs attended the competition, which was part of the annual Purina Pet-Pourrievent at Purina Farmsin St. Louis. Participants included a beagle that had learned to jump hurdles by watching a team of Labradors in training, a dog that won a diving competition by leaping into water from a height of 20 feet, the River City Flyers team of border collies and one terrier, and a formerly homeless dog that had been adopted by a stranger and eventually toured with Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey Circus.

Another contest, the Purina Dog Chow Search for America's Most Incredible Dog, was in its third year in 1998. Competitors submitted photographs of their dogs along with brief essays describing the qualities that made each animal incredible. Contestants were not judged on appearance or breeding but on endearing qualities such as loyalty, companionship, and playfulness. The winner in 1998 was Keisha, an abused German shepherd that had survived two euthanasia attempts, was rescued, and blossomed into such a lovable companion that she inspired the friends of her new owner to adopt other pets from rescue organizations. The dog and her owner, Melissa Osburn, received a $10,000 cash prize, a lifetime supply of Purina Dog Chow, a medallion, a tour of Washington, D.C., and a stay at the luxurious Willard Hotel. Senator Bob Dole was the master of ceremonies at a celebration in honor of the winner and four other finalists in the contest.

OUTCOME

Advertisements in the "Incredible Dog" campaign continued to run during 1999 as other facets of the marketing effort attracted large numbers of participants and spectators. In 1999 the winner of the fourth annual Purina Dog Chow Search for America's Most Incredible Dog was Harley, a Jack Russell terrier from Bridgeport, Connecticut. Events in the second annual Purina Dog Chow Incredible Dog Challenge were conducted at locations throughout the United States. Participants competed for $75,000 in prize money in contests that included sled dog sprinting, racing through agility courses, diving, catching flying disks, high jumping, cross-country racing with human partners on skis, and rescuing avalanche victims. The promotion received 12 hours of national coverage on ESPN.

Advertising Age reported that while the U.S. market for canned dog food was flat to declining in 1997 and the first quarter of 1998, sales of dry dog food in food, drug, and mass merchandise outlets increased by 8.4 percent to $2.38 billion. Ralston Purina had sales of $4.7 billion in fiscal year 1998, up from $4.5 billion in 1997. Sales in its Pet Products division increased 12 percent to $2.58 billion. In 1999 Ralston Purina announced that it would spin off its Eveready Battery Company, Inc., subsidiary into a separate business to enable the parent company to concentrate on dog food and other core products.

MULTIPLE STRENGTH FOR MULTIPLE CATS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Tidy Cat was the established U.S. leader among cat-litter brands in the 1990s, but a new wave of product innovations claiming to enhance the odor-controlling properties of cat litter resulted in market gains for competitors while leaving Tidy Cat without any defined product advantages beyond its low price. Aiming to position the brand for sustained dominance, a project that required changing consumers' perceptions about its odor-controlling power, owner Ralston Purina (which was acquired by Nestlé S.A. in 2001 and grouped with that company's pet-related product lines under the Nestlé Purina PetCare Company banner) decided to relaunch Tidy Cat as a litter specifically designed for households with multiple cats. This was partly accomplished through alterations in packaging and product variety as well as through a change in name from Tidy Cat to Tidy Cats. The company enlisted agency Berlin Cameron & Partners (later renamed Berlin Cameron/Red Cell and then Berlin Cameron United) to communicate the newly branded product's image in a campaign that was launched in July 1998.

Budgeted at $10 to $15 million a year and running for many years, the Tidy Cats campaign was called "Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats." Most of the campaign's spending was on TV spots, and the controlling idea behind the commercials did not change over the course of the campaign's long run. Building on a research-driven understanding of multiple-cat owners' views of their pets, the spots showed groups of talking cats with distinct personalities who commented on the attributes of Tidy Cats while fooling humans into believing that they were just cats. The cats were aided in a variety of misdeeds and corresponding cover-ups by the odor-controlling power of Tidy Cats, which enhanced the cats' innocence in the minds of their owners.

According to a 2004 study conducted by marketing-research firm Millward Brown, the Tidy Cats relaunch successfully convinced consumers that the brand was synonymous with multiple-cat litter-box effectiveness, and it dramatically rehabilitated perceptions of Tidy Cats' odor-controlling capabilities. Tidy Cats sales grew each year during the campaign without any investment in new technologies or the development of product advantages beyond the brand's newly crafted image.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Tidy Cat, first introduced in the 1960s, had been the longtime market leader among cat-litter brands in the United States when, in the 1990s, its market share began to erode. This was primarily a function of the arrival of new products claiming innovations, such as litter varieties that clumped for easy scooping or that boasted odor-control features activated by the cat's movements. The promise of even slight relief from what was usually an unpleasant household chore drove consumers to embrace the brands that had supposedly improved upon the standard formula for basic clay cat litter. As the uncontested category leader, Tidy Cat had invested neither in research that might allow it to unveil its own technological breakthroughs nor in marketing meant to differentiate the brand by virtue of any product advantages. Tidy Cat's main brand attribute was its low price; consumers did not perceive it as the most effective litter for controlling odor.

This situation threatened to make the erosion of Tidy Cat's market share an ongoing phenomenon, and Ralston Purina solicited ideas for a new marketing campaign that would remake the product's image among consumers. As of 1997 Tidy Cat's advertising, featuring the tagline "If it's anything less than Tidy Cat, you'll know," was handled by Fallon McElligott Berlin (FMB), the New York office of the Minneapolis-based agency Fallon McElligott (which later became Fallon Worldwide). FMB principal Andy Berlin, however, had recently enlisted that agency branch's core creative personnel in the establishment of a new entity, Berlin Cameron & Partners. After a review of multiple agencies in 1998, Ralston Purina selected Berlin Cameron to craft the new Tidy Cat campaign.

Among various Tidy Cat litter varieties, sales of its product intended for multiple cats had been growing throughout the 1990s at double-digit rates, while sales of the brand's other formulas remained flat. It became apparent that consumers believed that Tidy Cat Multiple Cat Formula offered greater odor control. This facet of a cat-litter brand's image being far and away the most important one, Ralston Purina decided to pitch Tidy Cat as a litter specializing in multiple-cat-strength odor control, thereby creating a distinct identity that no other cat-litter brand could claim. Ralston Purina thus staked the brand's future on a risky move: a product relaunch of a brand that was already number one in its category. This consisted of a package redesign, a realigning of product offerings, and even a renaming of the brand (albeit a slight one). Each of the product variants was now marketed as intended for multiple cats. That fact was prominently showcased on the new packaging, and the product's name was changed from Tidy Cat to Tidy Cats.

TARGET MARKET

Owners of multiple cats composed the target market for the "Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats" campaign. Half of cat owners owned more than one cat, and these owners bought 70 percent of all cat litter. If Tidy Cats could recast itself as the only brand formulated to satisfy this portion of the cat-owning public, all other competitors would be left with a target market consisting only of single-cat owners, who purchased less litter per capita. Meanwhile Tidy Cats would not necessarily be losing the business of single-cat owners, because multiple-cat strength was equivalent, in the eyes of many consumers, with greater odor-controlling power. This, of course, was what all cat-owners wanted in a cat-litter brand.

There were no key demographic factors that unified multiple-cat owners, but Berlin Cameron had found, over the course of intensive research into the cat/owner relationships in such households, that these consumers had a different attitude toward their cats than did owners of only one cat. Because cats' idiosyncrasies stood out by contrast with one another, multiple-cat owners usually valued the unique personalities of their cats more intensely than single-cat owners did. A lone cat in a household often established a relatively calm atmosphere. In contrast, a multiple-cat home was more likely to produce entertaining and dramatic scenes resulting from the interaction of cat personalities. The people who presided over these households tended to relish the eventful tableaux enacted by their cats, even when the result was disorder or slight property damage. Many multiple-cat owners, Berlin Cameron further found, suspected that their cats communicated with one another.

MULTIPLE-STRENGTH DIATRIBE

Not everyone was sold on the Tidy Cats relaunch strategy. Writing critically of the decision to recast the brand through packaging, changing the product lineup, and altering the name of the product—previously called Tidy Cat—Laura Shanahan remarked in Brandweek, "Yeah, babe, very necessary, that 's' on the end . . . but anyway, that's not the problem. See, there's three—count 'em, three—new formulas under the new 'n' improved pluralized name and I don't see a dime's worth of difference between 'em." Noting that the Tidy Cats stable included formulas for "Immediate Odor Control," "Long Lasting Odor Control," and "Antibacterial Odor Control," Shanahan wondered why one litter could not provide all three forms of odor control, as she had assumed was the case with the original Tidy Cat product. "If you were a betting man, which would you choose?" she asked. "I chose another brand."

"Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats" built on this understanding of multiple-cat owners and attempted to show them that Tidy Cats alone understood their relationship with and appreciation of their pets, while also convincing them of the rational benefits of the brand.

COMPETITION

At the time of the "Multiple Strength" launch, Tidy Cats' leading competitors were First Brands' Scoop Away and Clorox's Fresh Step. First Brands had recently introduced the industry's first cat-activated charcoal litter, one of the technologies that threatened Tidy Cats' market share. A new arrival on the industry scene also brought a category-wide threat. In 1997 Church & Dwight, the corporate parent of universally known freshness product Arm & Hammer Baking Soda, introduced Arm & Hammer Super Scoop, a litter that included baking soda and thereby leveraged consumer trust in the older, extremely well-established product.

In a category not known for its use of humor in marketing, Fresh Step had meanwhile launched a campaign that, like "Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats," was noteworthy for its reliance on a comic concept. Tagged "Fresher with Every Step" and budgeted at an estimated $8 million, the campaign broke at the same time as "Multiple Strength" and attempted to showcase Fresh Step's supposed superiority over less expensive cat-litter brands, presumably including Tidy Cat(s). "Fresher with Every Step" showed cats discarding packages of cheaper litter when their owners were not looking, so that the owners might be more readily encouraged to buy Fresh Step.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Multiple Strength" campaign was launched in July 1998 and ran for a number of years. Its annual budget was estimated at $10 to $15 million, the overwhelming majority of which was allocated to TV spots. The campaign was meant to work with the package redesign, the product lineup changes, and the alteration in product name to establish Tidy Cats as the one and only litter for multiple-cat households. The chief obstacles to the campaign's success included the inherent limitations of the cat-litter industry. Unlike other pet products, cat litter had little emotional resonance for pet owners. Associated with a chore that most people dreaded, cat-litter brands had a difficult time inciting consumer affection. Berlin Cameron needed to demonstrate the brand's knowledge of the multiple-cat owner's bond with his or her pets, and it needed to enliven the product's image to make emotional connections with consumers. At the same time the agency had to transmit the practical, odor-control message that would provide a rational basis for purchasing Tidy Cats.

The agency set out to accomplish these tasks with a humor-based narrative concept that remained the same throughout the campaign's multiyear run. Each of the TV spots employed the conceit of talking cats in multiple-cat households. Litter naturally found a place in the cats' conversations, and the supposed effectiveness of Tidy Cats, making for a decrease in litter-box odor, gave the cats increased credibility with their owners and with other cats. This translated into increased freedom to misbehave and live fully. In general the cats in the commercials were shown to have exaggerated versions of the communicative resources and distinctive personalities that multiple-cat owners, according to Berlin Cameron's research, believed their cats to possess.

The campaign's first TV spot, for instance, featured a pair of cats discussing the new Tidy Cats litter that had been put into their litter box. One cat said, "It is specially designed for multiple cat households," and the other retorted, "Or one cat with a very large bladder." When humans approached, one cat said to the other, ''Quick, act like cats!'' and the cats darted off in different directions. As the campaign progressed, the conceit of cats living sophisticated lives behind their owners' backs was extended and made more elaborate. For instance, a 2004 spot showed cats behaving like secretive teenagers and throwing a wild party when their ''parents'' were away from home. The spot's backdrop was a richly detailed, decadent cat party, featuring cats leaping on and off furniture, cats swatting at aquarium fish, a cat ''scratching'' a record on a turntable, and a generalized cat-party roar of laughs, exclamations, catcall whistling, and even a belch on the sound track. The instigator of the party, a cat named Max, was shown talking with an impressed, naive female cat. ''Great party,'' the female cat told Max, ''but won't you get caught?'' ''Nah,'' Max said coolly, ''I have them all the time.'' ''How do you get away with it?'' ''Tidy Cats,'' Max answered. The sound of his owners arriving home led Max to shout, ''Everyone out!'' A human couple walked through the door to find the house silent except for the sound of Max and his two compatriots purring together in a pet bed on the floor.

OUTCOME

A tracking study undertaken by marketing-research firm Millward Brown indicated that Tidy Cats had accomplished its goal, between 1998 and 2004, of building the consumer perception that it was the single brand of cat litter ''specially formulated for multiple cats.'' By fall of 2004 Tidy Cats was recognized by more than 60 percent of consumers as owning this brand attribute, up from 30 percent before the brand relaunch in 1998. The Millward Brown study discovered a corresponding rise in the consumer perception that Tidy Cats was an effective odor-controlling litter. Overall, Millward Brown ranked Tidy Cats as the top-scoring product in 18 key areas that the firm used for rating consumer perceptions of cat-litter brands. Tidy Cats' sales increased every year between 1998 and 2004, even though the Tidy Cats formula offered no new technologies or innovative chemical advantages to compare with other growing brands. The repositioning of the brand, entirely a work of image crafting rather than product substance, seemed the only explanation for such sales growth.

MADE LIKE NO OTHER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Given a European-sounding name by its American creator, Reuben Mattus, Häagen-Dazs reigned as the United States' top-selling superpremium ice cream during the 1980s. The ice cream's success partially resulted from its pure, unaltered ingredients and also from its decadent reputation. In the 1990s Häagen-Dazs's popularity waned as consumers identified it as an antiquated brand from the previous decade. Häagen-Dazs's fastest-growing competitor, Ben & Jerry's Homemade, marketed its superpremium ice cream as a product for everyone. Nestlé S.A., the owner of Häagen-Dazs, purchased 67 percent of Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings in 2003 and then allowed Dryer's to manage the Häagen-Dazs brand. To shed the ice cream's 1980s stigma of elitism and tout the product's all-natural ingredients, Dryer's released the "Made Like No Other" campaign.

The $5 to $10 million Häagen-Dazs advertising account was awarded to the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners in 2003. The agency broke the "Made Like No Other" campaign's first 60-second TV spot, "Anthem," in May 2004. The commercial displayed copy such as "There is a school of thought that less is more" upon minimalist images of landscapes. Further copy read, "Elegance is simplicity. This is how we make our ice cream." Two 30-second commercials, "Strawberry" and "Vanilla," aired in June 2004 with similar copy and imagery. All three spots featured the same soothing piano music and ended with the Häagen-Dazs logo above the campaign's "Made Like No Other" tagline.

The "Made Like No Other" campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005 in the Snacks/Desserts/Confections category. The campaign's debut spot, "Anthem," also collected a 2005 Bronze Clio Award for the Original Music category. The campaign's success was not limited to the advertising industry. According to the campaign brief written by a Goodby, Silverstein & Partners representative, "the advertising spurred a dramatic turnaround: sales and market share swelled as old and new audiences were won over—reminded why they loved Häagen-Dazs once more."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

With his parents already in the ice-cream business, Reuben Mattus spent his youth formulating an ice cream made from premium, all-natural ingredients. After creating his first three flavors, vanilla, chocolate, and coffee, in 1961, Mattus named his new ice-cream brand Häagen-Dazs, a fabricated word adorned with a Germanic umlaut. Even though Häagen-Dazs's ownership shifted from the Mattus family to the Pillsbury Company during the 1980s, Häagen-Dazs sales soared and eventually spearheaded the new superpremium-ice-cream category.

In the 1990s, to fuel the brand's notoriety as a luxury item, advertisements for Häagen-Dazs employed such taglines as "Just perfect." The ad agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty created three-dimensional bus-shelter advertisements to introduce new flavors such as the Häagen-Dazs Malibu flavor. In 1999 Nestlé Ice Cream Company was created as a joint venture between food company Nestlé and Pillsbury, the latter being the primary owner of Häagen-Dazs. In 2002 Häagen-Dazs's advertising account was awarded to the ad agency J. Walter Thompson.

Propagating Häagen-Dazs as an ice cream reserved for the rich, in 2002 J. Walter Thompson released the "Pure Pleasure" campaign, which included the 30-second commercials "Brownies" and "Cookie Dough." Nestlé purchased 67 percent of Dreyer's stock the following year, making itself into a $1.4 billion ice-cream titan. After the stock purchase Dreyer's was still allowed to manage products with the Dreyer's name. Nestlé also relinquished Häagen-Dazs's management duties to Dreyer's. To gain back market share that Häagen-Dazs had been losing to Ben & Jerry's for more than 10 years, Dreyer's awarded the Häagen-Dazs advertising account to its own longtime ad agency, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The agency began crafting a campaign that ignored Häagen-Dazs's posh reputation and focused solely on the ice cream's pure ingredients.

In an interview with Adweek, Albert Kelly, the associate creative director at Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, explained the pretension that was associated with the Häagen-Dazs brand two decades earlier. "The name brought up cheesy luxury, and [people] thought of snobby hedonism in the '80s, like the guy in the ascot leaning against the Bentley. The image had become outdated."

TARGET MARKET

Goodby, Silverstein & Partners tailored the "Made Like No Other" campaign for an expansive demographic of ice-cream enthusiasts. In 2005 the campaign partnered with cable TV network Showtime for a promotion in which new Showtime subscribers would receive 12 free pints of Häagen-Dazs ice cream. Rick King, Showtime Networks' vice president of promotions and partnership marketing, explained the campaign's target market to the PR Newswire. "Almost everyone loves ice cream, so we felt this campaign would appeal to even the most difficult to reach consumer."

During the 1980s middle-class consumers were more likely to purchase cheaper ice cream from brands such as Breyers Ice Cream, owned by Kraft, or Edy's Grand Ice Cream, owned by Dreyer's. With a marketing strategy that greatly differed from that of Häagen-Dazs, the superpremium ice-cream brand Ben & Jerry's began expanding its presence to middle-class consumers in the 1990s. "It's hard to find two competitive brands neck-and-neck that are so very different in consumers' minds," Walt Freese, chief marketing officer for Ben & Jerry's, said to Advertising Age. He stated that Häagen-Dazs was assumed to be "for the chosen few" but that Ben & Jerry's was generally identified as a "super-premium for the people."

"The everyday consumer has morphed into a connoisseur in the pursuit of affordable indulgence," Joan Steuer, one of America's foremost authorities on chocolate and a leading expert on new products and food trends, explained to PR Newswire. "It is the attention to detail, the fine craftsmanship and all natural ingredients that allow Häagen-Dazs to turn a treat like ice cream into the everyday luxury consumers are demanding."

ICE CREAM SOCIOLOGY

Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings, Inc., the company that managed the superpremium ice cream brand Häagen-Dazs, conducted research to gain a better understanding of its core customer. One of Dreyer's surveys revealed that men preferred to eat four or more scoops of ice cream, while most women enjoyed only two. After eating the scoops, men also preferred to lick the bowl more than women did.

COMPETITION

Ben & Jerry's, which became Häagen-Dazs's most threatening competitor in the 1990s, branded its superpremium ice cream around fun and irreverence. It also used a large percentage of its advertising budget to sponsor socially conscious events. The strategy proved effective. From April 2003 to April 2004, Ben & Jerry's boosted its sales by 15.9 percent, while sales for Häagen-Dazs dropped 16.5 percent. Ben & Jerry's brand manager Dave Stever explained to Advertising Age that the brand's television spots had proven "inconclusive" during the 1990s. "The amount of lift or volume increases necessary to make those [TV] buys pay off is quite substantial," he said.

Instead of using TV commercials, Ben & Jerry's sponsored events such as the Rock the Vote bus tour in 2004. The tour involved musical artists performing across America and encouraging 18 to 24 year olds to vote. Ben & Jerry's also released an ice cream flavor called One Sweet Whirled, which referenced the song "One Sweet World" by the popular Dave Matthews Band. On April 27, 2004, Ben & Jerry's distributed free ice cream at Rock the Vote events in hope of increasing voter registration. In 2004 the ad agency

ROCKY ROAD

With its beginnings in a California ice-cream parlor, Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream was the brainchild business of William Dreyer and Joseph Edy. The two men created the world's first Rocky Road ice cream flavor during the Great Depression. The flavor's name commented on the financial troubles of the time.

Amalgamated, New York, created print advertisements for Ben & Jerry's that included cartoonish illustrations of the ice cream's ingredients.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Goodby, Silverstein & Partners focused on the quality of Häagen-Dazs ice cream rather than on its upper-class connotation or falsely assumed foreign heritage. The brunt of the campaign's $5 to $10 million budget went toward airing three television spots. This strategy intentionally capitalized on Ben & Jerry's resistance to making television spots. Burt Flickinger, managing director at the business consultancy Strategic Resource Group, validated the approach in Advertising Age. "Häagen-Dazs is taking the correct strategy by going to TV," Flickinger explained, "where the category has been uncharacteristically dark, especially in premium [ice cream] positioning."

The campaign's first 60-second television spot, "Anthem," first aired in May 2004. The commercial began with a white square floating before an off-white background. Dreamy piano music played while the copy, "There is a school of thought that less is more," appeared across the square image. Eleven orange umbrellas on a beach were then shown; all opened at the same time as the copy read, "that elegance is simplicity." Further tranquil images followed: one of rain falling in a puddle and another of a perfectly still pond. The copy continued, "and simple can be beautiful." The commercial then showed a shiny spoon slowly scooping into vanilla Häagen-Dazs ice cream. Text reading "This is how we make our ice cream" appeared, and the image changed to that of green plants growing beside a field of red dirt. "A composition in cream and vanilla," the spot continued, "a blueberry haiku." Similar images continued with copy that stated, "The beauty of Häagen-Dazs is what we put in but also what we leave out." The commercial did not feature any voice-overs, only the melodic piano score. It ended with the Häagen-Dazs logo appearing above the tagline "Made Like No Other."

Häagen-Dazs had originally asked its new ad agency to contemporize the brand. Jeff Goodby, the principal and co–creative director at Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, explained to Adweek that his agency's goal was to update Häagen-Dazs's past image. Previously campaigns had, he said, a "Donald Trumpish, golden-brown boudoir feeling to it. And the advertising reinforced it. Our job was to reestablish it as a terrific product."

The campaign's three spots were filmed in Spain and Malaysia. The later two 30-second spots, "Strawberry" and "Vanilla," started airing in June 2004. The first began with black-and-white images of a strawberry farm. As rain began falling upon the strawberry plants, the plant's colors began to appear. As more colors replaced the black-and-white imagery, copy read, "flavor enhanced by nature alone." The spot ended with Häagen-Dazs's logo above the campaign's tagline. The "Vanilla" spot featured a woman harvesting vanilla beans in a rainforest. The spot's copy stated, "start with the finest vanilla add nothing but cold."

OUTCOME

Prior to the campaign, according to Advertising Age, ad executives outside of Goodby, Silverstein & Partners were skeptical about the resurrection of the Häagen-Dazs brand. The magazine quoted an undisclosed executive as claiming, "Like Porsche, Häagen-Dazs has become associated with those who use the product and not the product itself." Goodby, Silverstein & Partners believed that the "Made Like No Other" campaign did in fact revitalize the Häagen-Dazs brand. Sales for Häagen-Dazs began to increase compared to the previous year. The campaign also won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005 in the Snacks/Desserts/Confections category. The 60-second commercial "Anthem" was awarded a Bronze Clio in 2005 for the Music-Original category.

After "Made Like No Other" helped the sales of Häagen-Dazs to increase, members of the advertising industry began to view the ice-cream brand more optimistically. In mid-2004 Gary Koepke, a cofounder of the Boston ad agency Modernista!, praised the campaign in the Boston Globe. "I like the new Häagen-Dazs ad with the tagline 'made like no other.' It shows umbrellas opening on an empty beach and rain falling on a pond. It takes me by surprise. They're not showing the typical scoop of ice cream. The ad makes ice cream precious like a reward or a setting sun. It's just nice. It's different."

NEW BALANCE THUNDERSTORM, STAIRS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in 1906, the Boston-based company New Balance Athletic Shoe, Inc., had become the third-largest manufacturer of athletic shoes in the United States by 2003. Long catering to the serious athlete, New Balance prided itself on creating a quality product in a wide range of specialty sizes—a rarity in the athletic-footwear world. In 2002 New Balance launched two television commercials: "Thunderstorm" and "Stairs." Running under the larger, long-running "Achieve New Balance" umbrella campaign, both spots focused on products for female athletes—the former on women's running shoes and the latter on women's cross-training shoes. Both commercials were developed by New Balance's longtime ad agency, Messner, Vetere, Berger, McNamee, Schmetterer (MVBMS).

The commercials, a central feature of the company's $19 million marketing effort for 2002, premiered in March on several cable networks and continued throughout the year. They were aimed at 21- to 55-year-olds, a slightly broader demographic than New Balance's traditional target of 35- to 50-year-olds. The campaign also included magazine ads in such publications as Shape, Cooking Light, Condé Nast Traveler, Runner's World, and Fitness. A companion set of spots for men's running and cross-training shoes debuted at about the same time. John Donovan, New Balance's marketing services manager, explained to Chris Reidy of the Boston Globe that the commercials were about "how important exercise is for citizen athletes trying to balance the stresses of life."

Both spots were widely acclaimed by the advertising industry; "Stairs" was applauded for its dead-on depiction of what made a female athlete tick, and "Thunderstorm" won praise for its witty special effects. "Thunderstorm" was named one of the best commercials of 2002 by Adweek magazine.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For fiscal year 2003 New Balance's sales topped $910 million; they were down from $1.16 billion in 2001 but were enough to maintain the company's third-place rank, between Reebok and adidas. In a market dominated by Nike, New Balance had deliberately steered clear of high-profile advertising campaigns that targeted the urban-youth market by featuring superstar athletes and musicians. Additionally, New Balance's strongest category had always been running shoes, which made running a natural choice for its new television campaign.

New Balance had never advertised heavily on television. For years the company had preferred a more grassroots approach that allowed it to zero in on its best customers. To this end, most of its advertising budget went toward sports magazines and sponsorship of semiprofessional sporting events. Since 1989 New Balance had been a major sponsor of the Susan G. Komen Race for the Cure, a national event dedicated to raising funds to fight breast cancer, and since 1995 the company had been a major sponsor of the International Modern Pentathlon, an Olympic sport consisting of a single day of competition in five events: shooting, fencing, swimming, equestrian jumping, and running. The company's choice to sponsor these events highlighted its dedication to serving both female athletes and sports events that rewarded personal excellence.

TARGET MARKET

In a market dominated by youth, New Balance was a rarity: a footwear manufacturer that catered to middle-aged runners. "They have been after me for years to make more shoes for 14- to 15-year-olds. I don't want to do it," CEO Jim Davis told Daren Fonda of Time magazine. Unusual also was the fact that the company manufactured much of its product in the United States, years after most companies had outsourced that work to Asia. These factors worked to the company's advantage. Older consumers were very brand-loyal, and New Balance's U.S. facilities allowed the company to "respond more quickly to fashion cycles and requests from retail customers than overseas sneaker factories with long lead times," wrote Reidy in the Boston Globe.

Despite its satisfaction with its market niche, New Balance had always sought growth. By 2002 the company had enjoyed double-digit growth for several years, in part because of its acquisitions of Dunham boots, a "brown shoe" competitor to Timberland, and P.F. Flyers, a vintage brand with nostalgic appeal to baby boomers. In addition, New Balance "trail shoes" enjoyed a brief vogue among 20-somethings in the late 1990s, which further propelled sales figures. By 2001 the company's sales had topped $1 billion. But Davis, a runner himself who bought the company on the day of the Boston Marathon in 1972, had no intention to shift his main focus away from top-end athletic shoes. "We're going to continue to do what we know how to do, and we'll be gaining little bits of market share on an annual basis," he told Mark Sullivan of Sporting Goods Business.

In 2001 New Balance's $20 million advertising budget concentrated on television spots targeted at runners over the age of 45—a narrow demographic, but one easily reached through magazines such as Working Mother, Men's Journal, Prevention, and Outside. Though not as glitzy an approach as that of their competitors, targeting this niche made great business sense, according to New Balance marketing vice president Paul Heffernan. He told Hilary Cassidy of Brandweek, "We keep seeing studies that show the largest segment of the population is over 50, so we're spending some money there, and we don't think our competition is thinking about that group."

THE CHALLENGE OF FILMING IN ICELAND

New Balance's "Thunderstorm" spot was filmed in Iceland by director Agust Baldersson, though the storm that taunted the runner was computer-generated and on-site props consisted of rice and polystyrene. Real rain, in fact, preempted filming several times during the weeklong shoot. Fortunately, August in Iceland meant nearly 24 hours of daylight—plenty of time to get it right.

COMPETITION

New Balance also faced competition from industry leaders Nike and Reebok, mainstays adidas and Puma, and "boutique" brands such as Saucony and Brooks. In 2001 adidas announced plans to increase its marketing budget by 25 percent in a direct bid to leap over New Balance and take the number three spot behind Reebok. Adidas's ads highlighted a new technology called ClimaCool, which was used in its cross-training and basketball shoes to increase air circulation through the shoe.

In addition, adidas launched T-MAC, a new basketball shoe endorsed and named for Orlando Magic star Tracy McGrady. In response New Balance also introduced a new line of basketball shoes, endorsed by no one and aimed at the 15- to 21-year-old market. "Play to Live" was the tagline, and its grassroots "Hoop Troop" campaign included company appearances at local basketball courts to introduce the product directly to consumers. New Balance also sponsored the NBA's Hoop-It-Up tour, which featured 3-on-3 tournaments in 40 cities.

Whereas Nike dominated the field of high-tech shoe cushioning field with its tremendously popular Shox shoes, New Balance promoted its own Abzorb cushioning as the centerpiece of its superior technology. In 2004 adidas attempted to gain ground on New Balance with the $300 Adidas 1, which boasted a computer chip that automatically adjusted the shoe's cushioning level for maximized performance.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Unlike its primary competitors, Nike and Reebok, New Balance had long practiced an advertising strategy defined as "endorsed by no one," meaning it did not build marketing campaigns around top-name athletes. Likewise, "Thunderstorm" and "Stairs" were designed to appeal to goal-driven athletes who valued personal achievement over trendiness. "We don't want to be perceived as doing anything gimmicky,'' Stuart Babb, head of the company's running division, told Reidy of the Boston Globe.

New Balance's 2002 television spots deftly illustrated two modes of athletic perseverance with which its potential customers could identify. In ''Thunderstorm'' a runner made her way down a deserted highway as ominous storm clouds closed in on her. When the storm unleashed heavy rains, she took cover beneath a freeway overpass. As soon as she did, however, the rain stopped, taunting her with the suggestion that it was waiting for her to try to outrun it again. The voice-over asked, ''What keeps you going?'' and the tagline ''Achieve New Balance'' appeared. Shot in a similarly artistic black-and-white style, ''Stairs'' followed a woman as she ran up a stairway on a seaside cliff. At the top she rewarded herself with a treat—a single piece of chocolate. She continued again, down the stairs and up, to win another.

'' 'Conspicuous' is not in the New Balance dictionary; 'low profile' is,'' wrote Davis in an editorial for the Boston Globe. Indeed, not only were the athletes in these commercials ''low profile'' (they were exercising alone), but they also demonstrated discipline and fortitude, qualities that typified the ideal New Balance customer.

''New Balance sneakers are still basically known for their technical aspects, comfort, stability—and dowdiness,'' Fonda commented in Time. That did not seem to bother Davis. ''If we hit on fashion, that's fine . . . but our shoes are really designed to run up hills.'' Indeed, New Balance's reputation for creating a quality product, particularly for people with hard-to-fit feet, had won it many influential customers, among them podiatrists, chiropractors, and serious runners. Nevertheless, market analyst Matt Powell told Natalie Zmuda of Footwear News, ''I think the consumer still sees them as the noncorporate brand.'' That seemed to suit the company just fine. ''Technical customers are consistent, even in difficult times, and that makes them more predictable,'' Nick Richino, global apparel operations manager for New Balance, explained to Rosemary Feitelberg of Women's Wear Daily.

OUTCOME

Writing in Fast Company, Randall Rothenberg named ''Thunderstorm'' the ad of the month for September 2002, calling it ''gorgeous to look at'' and praising its high production value, which he said brought to mind both The Wizard of Oz and the cult film Run, Lola, Run. Rothenberg also applauded the commercial's ''subtle playfulness'' as a refreshing antidote to the ''humorlessness'' of many athletic-shoe commercials aimed at women.

The ''Achieve New Balance'' campaign, of which the spots were a part, was revised in 2003 into the ''N Is for Fit . . . N Is for Performance'' campaign, which featured new print ads and television spots and emphasized the technical construction of New Balance shoes more than the previous years' advertising had. Also, subsequent campaigns focused on promoting New Balance's basketball shoes; despite Nike's dominance in that area, New Balance officials believed that it was a big enough market that the company could grab a slice of market share without a splashy star-driven campaign.

As Ann Davis, the company's executive vice president and the wife of CEO Jim Davis, told Katie Abel of Footwear News, the ''spirit of perseverance has been one of the company's defining characteristics throughout the past 30 years.'' The commercials ''Thunderstorm'' and ''Stairs'' epitomized that spirit, which was verified by the attention the spots garnered from the advertising world. ''New Balance chooses to celebrate everyday athletes who set their own performance goals,'' wrote Jim Davis in the Boston Globe. ''We don't pay celebrities to sell our product. We believe our product sells itself.''

IF I HAD A MILLION DOLLARS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In October 2001 the New York State Lottery unveiled a new advertising campaign promoting its flagship Lotto game. The campaign embodied a sense of fun and community and was embraced by the state's residents. The new television and radio spots featured everyday New Yorkers singing along with the bubbly pop song "If I Had a Million Dollars." The fact that the participants were consistently off-key only added to the charm of the spots. A second part of the campaign used real New Yorkers musing on camera about what they would do with a million dollars, while the jingle played in the background.

Conceived by the New York branch of ad agency DDB Worldwide Communications Group, the campaign was intended to reacquaint people with Lotto and encourage those who had stopped playing to give the game another try. By promoting Lotto, the New York State Lottery also hoped to increase the sales of its instant and other jackpot games. In addition to the television and radio spots that relied on real people singing, there were print ads under the headline "If I Had a Million Dollars" that included pictures of people with text saying what they would do with the money.

While it was difficult to determine if Lotto sales had increased because of the "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, there was an abundance of anecdotal evidence that indicated the ads were effective. And though the spots won no major awards, the New York State Lottery was pleased with the work done by the agency. The campaign continued until the spring of 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

With profits earmarked for the state's education fund, the New York State Lottery was launched in 1967 as a raffle-style game. At the time, other than racetrack betting and church bingo, there was no legal gambling on the East Coast, leaving the New York State Lottery to compete against illegal numbers games and bookies. Then in 1971 the New York City Off-Track Betting Corporation, billing itself as the "New Game in Town," launched operations to allow people to bet on horse races at off-track betting shops. Casino gambling arrived in Atlantic City later in the 1970s, followed by gaming run by Native Americans in Connecticut. With the increase in competition, the New York State Lottery introduced its flagship product, the twice-weekly pick-six Lotto, in 1978. After a slow start it gained in popularity during the 1980s when large jackpots, in New York as well as in other states, received a great deal of news coverage. But state lotto games were increasingly jackpot driven, and without a large payout at stake the game became stale to players. Moreover, big jackpots became less newsworthy over time, eliminating much of the free publicity the games had previously enjoyed.

In response the New York State Lottery introduced a number of other games, including instant scratch-off and daily games and even one, Quick Draw, that held a drawing every four minutes. New York did a better job than most states at holding the line on diminishing Lotto sales and more than made up for the drop in Lotto revenues with increased sales from new games. While smaller states banded together to create a super lotto game, Powerball, in New York Lotto remained very much the key product, with its promotion benefiting the other games. The success of the New York State Lottery during a time when many businesses were chasing scarce entertainment dollars was to a large extent explained by the efforts of its ad agency, DDB, as well as its large marketing budget. In 1995 the state spent about $42 million on television commercials alone, and with $3 billion in sales New York's lottery was the largest in the country.

DDB won the New York State Lottery account in 1988. As mandated by state law, the contract ran for three years, with the possibility of three one-year renewals. DDB held the account for the next decade, during which time the agency coined several memorable themes, including "All You Need Is a Dollar and a Dream." Even more successful was the award-winning "Hey, You Never Know" campaign. Humorous spots showing how people would change their lives if they won the Lotto included a tollbooth operator who paid everyone's fare. In the opinion of some, however, the ads fostered false expectations and did not deal frankly with the true odds of winning an instant fortune. Also coming under fire was the introduction of Quick Draw, a fast-paced game that many thought was open to abuse by problem gamblers. In a move that critics called hypocritical and an effort to gain a political advantage, Governor George E. Pataki insisted that the New York State Lottery amend its approach because "[it] fostered false expectations with bold promises of easy money," according to Raymond Hernandez in a New York Times article from August 21, 1996. "Hey, You Never Know" was shelved in favor of "New York Lottery, It Makes Us All a Little Richer," which was more in the line of a public-service announcement. Fantasies were replaced by depictions of modest winners and praise for the Lottery's contributions to the state's education system.

As required by law, in 1998 the New York State Lottery account was put up for review. DDB lost out to Grey Worldwide, an agency headquartered in New York, not because the Lottery was disappointed with the work DDB had done over the previous decade but because of Grey's low bid. Grey continued to focus on the more modest aspirations of winners in its "Will You Be Ready If It Happens to You?" campaign. At the time DDB lost the business, art director John Staffen had proposed the idea of using an upbeat song by the Canadian rock group Barenaked Ladies, "If I Had a Million Dollars," in an

A LONG WAY TO THE TOP

The song that anchored the "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign for the New York State Lottery was written by the rock band Barenaked Ladies in the 1980s. Not until it had built a following through incessant touring was the Canadian group signed by a major record label, Reprise Records, in the mid-1990s. "If I Had a Million Dollars" was their first single released by Reprise.

advertising campaign. He had to file the plan away for three years, until 2001, when the New York State Lottery account was again put up for review. In DDB's pitch the "If I Had a Million Dollars" idea was one of three submitted in the agency's successful effort to regain the lottery business. The two parties then agreed to pursue a campaign promoting Lotto based on the song.

TARGET MARKET

The finalists for the New York State Lottery account were asked to demonstrate how they would "increase awareness and consideration of the lottery among lapsed players." Thus, according to DDB management supervisor Mary Collopy in a 2005 interview, the intention of the "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign was not necessarily to drum up new players. Rather, the hope was either to motivate people to play more often or to encourage people who had formerly played Lotto to try it again.

COMPETITION

The New York State Lottery faced direct competition for people's gambling dollars from a number of sources, including the lotteries of neighboring states; off-track betting; casinos in Atlantic City, Connecticut, and upstate New York; and unregulated gambling on the Internet. But indirectly the New York State Lottery was vying against all forms of entertainment, with everyone trying to gain a share of the limited amount of money consumers were able to spend to amuse themselves. As a result, the state was forced to spend huge amounts of money to promote Lotto and its other games to remain competitive.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign was designed to appeal to people on a number of levels. It tapped into what had made earlier DDB campaigns successful, encouraging people to daydream about what they would do if they won the Lotto jackpot while steering clear of the excesses of previous campaigns. As Staffen explained to Stuart Elliott in the New York Times, the song had "such simple charm and innocence, begging you to dream, without getting to the rational side: 'How much would that new house really cost? How much would the maintenance be?' " Just as important, wrote Elliott, "the trappings of wealth described in the lyrics are far more down-to-earth than evocative of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous' . . . 'It's about what you'd do for others, not for yourself,' [worldwide account director Leo J.] Mamorsky said, which helps diffuse any perceptions of the song—and the campaign—as paeans to greed . . . For instance, the singers proclaim that the windfall would enable them to 'buy you furniture for your house (maybe a nice chesterfield or an ottoman)'; or 'build a tree fort in our yard.' " It was expected that the marketing of Lotto, the flagship product, would then drive sales of the state's other games of chance.

More than the charm of the catchy pop song was the use DDB made of it, filming everyday New York residents, from upstate to the streets of the Bronx, singing the lyrics delightfully off-key. Once the right to use the song on television and radio and on the Internet was acquired from Reprise Records, Barenaked Ladies' record label, DDB hired the New York production company @radical.media to travel across the state to film anyone willing to sing. Elliott wrote in the New York Times, "People were stopped without notice at sites ranging from barbershops and town squares to diners and farms. The film of the resulting spontaneous performances—some accompanied by dancing, hand gestures and even a warbling dog—was edited as it was shot in a mobile facility on a laptop computer." According to Collopy, DDB made minor changes to the song: "It was basically the 'needle drop.'" A few of the volunteer singers, however, offered up their own lyrics, which found their way into the spots.

As the "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign neared its launch date, the terrorist attacks occurred on September 11, 2001, forcing a postponement. Like all marketers, DDB and officials at the New York State Lottery had to reassess how to advertise in the new climate. In the first week of October the campaign was presented to focus groups, asking people to sing along with the song as if they were going to appear in the commercials. The results were highly positive according to lottery officials, who said that to the participants the campaign suggested community, fun, and entertainment. As Mamorsky explained to Elliott, "The Lottery is part of the fabric of New York . . . To me, this campaign really helps reinforce that the spirit of New Yorkers, from Buffalo to Montauk, is strong and alive."

TALK OF THE TOWN

Dana Fisher, one of participants in the "If I Had a Million Dollars" print ads, became the subject of a "Talk of the Town" piece in the New Yorker. A visiting scholar at Columbia University studying global climate change, she firmly believed that automobiles were the main cause of global warming. When she stopped at a Lottery table while shopping, she wrote down that if she had a million dollars she would start a foundation to deal with global environmental issues. Weeks later Fisher was told by a number of people at Columbia that her first name and picture were displayed on a bus shelter ad exclaiming that if she had a million dollars she would "buy a car and a cute driver to go with it." Given that she was about to sign a contract at Columbia and receive a grant from the Earth Institute, she was dismayed that her appearance in the ad was being spread by E-mail throughout the school. Fisher complained to DDB, which then made a sticker with her actual quote to paste over the offending line.

The "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign was introduced on October 30, 2001. In addition to the television spots, DDB produced radio commercials, billboards, and signs for use in bus shelters and subways. The print ads that appeared in New York City were developed by stopping people on the street with the offer of a free lottery ticket and a drink. Their pictures were taken, and they were asked to write down what they would do if they had a million dollars. Participants signed waivers and were promised that, if they appeared in a Lotto ad, they would be paid $200.

The campaign was well received on all fronts. At worst New Yorkers perceived the jingle as a pleasant annoyance in their lives. Several weeks later DDB built on the campaign's success by working in a second phase, which was introduced on February 25, 2002. Instead of singing along, people were asked in impromptu interviews what they would do if they had a million dollars. The music to "If I Had a Million Dollars" played in the background, providing continuity with the first phase of the campaign. Because they were not asked to sing, more people were willing to participate, resulting in a great deal of material. The agency ultimately had 17 rough cuts to choose from in crafting what were mostly 15-second TV commercials.

OUTCOME

The "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign ran for 18 months. According to Collopy, DDB believed that Lotto enjoyed an increase in sales as a result of its effort, but this could not be firmly established. In 2002 the New York State Lottery became part of the multistate Mega Millions game, and as a result sales were combined, making it virtually impossible to determine what part the campaign played in growing lottery sales. The ads did not win awards, but at the very least the agency's reputation was enhanced. In reviewing the year in advertising for the Wall Street Journal in 2001, Suzanne Vranica and Vanessa O'Connell wrote that the campaign catapulted the New York office of DDB "into the same league as DDB's gifted Chicago branch that masterminded the original 'Whassup' commercials on behalf of Anheuser-Busch Cos."

9,000 SHOTS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Of all of the commercials Michael Jordan had done for Nike, Inc., he was most proud of the 1997 spot that took a glimpse at his humanness. The commercial, filmed in a nine-hour shoot at Soldier Field in Chicago, showed a well-dressed Jordan exiting his limousine and strolling past banks of fans, humbly acknowledging the custodians and security workers along the way. Amid these outward signs of success, Jordan's voice-over revealed his inner thoughts: "I've missed more than 9,000 shots in my career. I've lost almost 300 games. Twenty-six times I've been trusted to take the game-winning shot—and missed. I've failed over and over and over again in my life." Such self-doubt seemed unthinkable from perhaps the greatest basketball player ever, until the camera showed Jordan heading into the locker room and the voice-over added one last thought: "And that is why I succeed."

Jordan began his relationship with Nike in 1985, his rookie season with the Chicago Bulls in the National Basketball Association. He carried with him extraordinary fame dating to "the shot," his game winner as a freshman when the University of North Carolina captured the 1982 National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) title against Georgetown. David Falk, Jordan's agent, invited shoe companies to court his client. Nike was struggling at the time, but Jordan fit the strategy on which Philip Knight had founded his company—to market products in the glow of the limelight surrounding maverick sports stars. Nike offered the 22-year-old Jordan the largest basketball endorsement to that time, $2.5 million plus royalties over five years. In a compromise over the brand name, Nike fused the company's new technology with the player's high-flying reputation, resulting in Air Jordan. The investment proved to be a wise one, as the Air Jordan line of athletic shoes and apparel garnered $130 million in revenues within its first year, stabilizing Nike and in fact turning the company around to take back the lead from Reebok in the sporting shoes market by 1990.

Nike's marketing of Jordan became legendary and transformed the mechanics of advertising. The creative directors and writers at Wieden & Kennedy in Portland, Oregon, redefined advertising techniques with several risky but ultimately successful strategies. They experimented with black-and-white commercials; they diverted attention from the product itself, focusing instead on the image the product could create for its owner; and they employed renowned and expensive directors like Spike Lee. They even created such widespread brand recognition that they eventually removed the company name from the ads, replacing it with one of their trademarks—the Nike swoosh, an air-bound silhouette of Jordan, or the Nike credo "Just Do It."

Jordan's inaugural commercial for Nike featured a slow-motion shot of a jump from the foul line for a dunk, accompanied by a sound track of a jet taking off.

Nike also advertised in this heroic vein with its "Frozen Moment" spot, which shifted back and forth between stills of Jordan in flight toward the basket and stills of faces in the crowd, their jaws agape in awe at his apparently superhuman skill. Jordan admired the "9,000 Shots" spot because it humanized him, sending the message that his fallibility was an inherent component of his success. Air Jordans could not endow their wearers with Jordan's abilities, but "9,000 Shots" pointed out that anyone could achieve success by accepting failure.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Knight had founded Nike on the vision of a Michael Jordan. In a 1998 speech Knight traced the company's genesis to the trunk of his Plymouth Valiant, from which he had distributed imported track shoes made by the Onitsuka Company of Kobe, Japan, for a $254 profit in 1964. Even then, Knight imagined that the magical aura surrounding star athletes could be transferred to the equipment they wore. Of the factors that made athletes great—talent, skill, timing, dedication, hard work—equipment alone was a commodity. Consumers could access sports greatness by outfitting themselves as their heroes did.

Knight had hit upon a version of what psychologists called "spontaneous trait transference." When a speaker discussed the traits of a thing or a person, in an act of transference the listener attributed the traits to the speaker. Knight shifted this equation, relying on the transference of the spokesperson's traits onto what was being described, namely, Nike shoes. University of Oregon track star Steve Prefontaine acted as Nike's first sports star spokesperson, handing the torch to other Jordan precursors, including tennis stars John McEnroe and Andre Agassi and basketball star Charles Barkley.

In Jordan, Knight discovered the embodiment of his dreams. He was a sports icon who combined exemplary play with extraordinary character, who established his individualism without resorting to radicalism—an "outlaw with morals," to quote the formula that consultant Watts Wacker helped Knight to hone. By 1990 Jordan's unbelievable abilities, including a penchant for flight and a quick wit, helped catapult Nike, with revenues of $2.24 billion, over Reebok, with revenues of $2.16 billion. At the same time, Nike spent several million dollars promoting Air Jordan within the first years of the line's existence, creating unlimited exposure for Jordan. The situation created a positive feedback loop, what economist Tyler Cowen called the "mutualism of endorsements," whereby the more Nike promoted Jordan, the more famous he became, enabling him to sell ever more products while simultaneously enhancing his own image, visibility, and worth.

STATS

Wieden & Kennedy's Jamie Barrett wrote the script for "9,000 Shots" from his personal knowledge of Michael Jordan's career. Off the top of his head he knew Jordan's career points and his approximate shooting percentage, and, applying simple math, he estimated about 8,000-9,000 shots missed. When he later researched the numbers, his guesstimate turned out to be on target. He took more liberty with the number of times Jordan had missed game-winning shots, since such statistics were not recorded. Barrett had to choose between watching every game in Jordan's 13-year career or simply surmising that Jordan had failed to shoot the game winner about twice a season. He opted for the latter. In a press conference a few days after "9,000 Shots" first aired, a reporter pressed Jordan on the statistic. Jordan admitted that he could not be sure, but in typical fashion he confidently responded, "It sounds about right to me."

TARGET MARKET

Males under 18 years of age accounted for a quarter of all athletic footwear sales in the United States, and the "9,000 Shots" campaign involved the effect on young people's self-esteem of advertising Jordan's inimitable success. Jordan explained the concept of the commercial to Henry Louis Gates, Jr., for a profile published in the June 1, 1998, New Yorker: "The idea [was] to tell young kids, 'Don't be afraid to fail, because a lot of people have to fail to be successful—these are the many times that I've failed but yet I've been successful.'" Wieden & Kennedy's Jamie Barrett wrote the commercial without a specific target market in mind. He trusted his gut instinct instead of allowing demographics to determine his angle. The idea he hit on happened to resonate particularly with teens, those in the throes of defining themselves and their personal definitions of success and failure.

Nike avoided targeting specific markets, preferring to broaden its appeal across boundaries of age and social status. In this instance Nike realized that insecurity over success continued past the age of 18. Most adults considered their lives less successful than Jordan's, and so this commercial spoke to them too. Jordan specifically wanted the commercial to turn introspective, revealing his motivations and moods. Barrett responded by comparing Jordan's accomplishments to his defeats, thus urging viewers not to compare their failures to Jordan's successes but rather to consider their failures in light of their own successes.

While "9,000 Shots" implicitly targeted the adult market, its companion commercial, "Challenge Me," targeted adults more directly. This spot also humanized Jordan, addressing aging, an issue absent from his commercials but foremost in the minds of the majority of his audience. "Challenge me. Doubt me. Disrespect me. Tell me I'm older. Tell me I'm slower. Tell me I can no longer fly. Go ahead, I want you to," Jordan narrated. Although the audience varied slightly between these two spots, the message was consistent. Jordan was indeed human. What made him seem superhuman was his determination.

COMPETITION

Nike's late 1970s climb to control the U.S. market in athletic shoes was fueled by the jogging craze, which slowed in the mid-1980s. Reebok, a British line of white leather women's shoes, took advantage of the next craze in athletics—women's aerobics. By 1987, with $1.4 billion in revenue, Reebok had catapulted past Nike. Nike rebounded by diversifying into new markets, specifically confronting Reebok in the women's market. At the same time, Reebok diversified into Nike's traditional markets of men's sports. By the 1990s the two companies competed head-to-head for control of the market in sports shoes. In 1994 Nike earned $299 million on $3.79 billion in revenue as compared to Reebok's $254 million on $3.28 billion in revenue. That year the two companies combined controlled 50 percent of the U.S. market and 40 percent of the global market, with Adidas having 10 percent.

In an attempt to regain market dominance in the early 1990s, Reebok duplicated Knight's marketing strategy by assembling a team of superstars to endorse its products: Michael Chang in tennis, Frank Thomas of the Chicago White Sox in baseball, and Emmitt Smith of the Dallas Cowboys in football, to name a few. It was not until 1992, however, that Reebok entered the endorsement competition in earnest, signing Jordan's counterpart, the Orlando Magic's seven-foot rookie Shaquille O'Neal, to a five-year, $15 million contract. "It was the signing of Shaq, really, that marked the start of the war between Nike and Reebok for the hearts, minds, and feet of the American public," commented Kenneth Labich in the September 15, 1995, issue of Fortune.

Both Jordan and O'Neal were called "human billboards," in part because of the excessive number of endorsements each maintained but also because their every action carried the potential to support (or mar) their endorsements. In this highest level of corporate endorsements, competition entered every imaginable arena. The actions of the so-called dream team, the U.S. basketball squad in the 1992 Olympics, illustrated this point well. Reebok sponsored the team, supplying warm-up suits for the medal ceremony. As the team climbed the podium to receive their gold medals, Nike endorsers obscured their Reebok logos, with Jordan and Barkley going so far as to wrap themselves in American flags in allegiance to their country and their brand.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Wieden & Kennedy originally conceived the "9,000 Shots" commercial as a follow-up to the Air Jordan commercials directed by Lee, and for it they planned to use another famous Hollywood director, Oliver Stone. Jordan balked. "I had to fight the agency about it, because they had wanted to have me work with Oliver Stone," Jordan revealed to Gates in the New Yorker, "...and Oliver Stone was going to go through that process of trying to figure out why my game is my game. And I said, 'Oliver Stone don't know shit about basketball. Why don't you just show the actual situation? Let the people see exactly what's happened over the twelve years of my career.'" Jordan retained this degree of creative control over the marketing of his image. Just as Nike and Jordan mutually bolstered each other's success, so, too, Jordan had put Wieden & Kennedy on the map of ad agencies. Jim Riswold, Wieden & Kennedy's creative director, respected Jordan's input and responded by streamlining the campaign.

In an interview with Elliot Harris of the Chicago Sun-Times, Erin Patton, Nike's director of product marketing for Jordan basketball, revealed the intentions of the "9,000 Shots" commercial. "I think the objective was to take an introspective look at Jordan's passion for the game of basketball and how he prepares himself emotionally and physically to continue to raise his level of performance.... It's almost like we wanted to peel down all the layers and just give you Michael and get inside of his mentality. You turn on the TV and you see Michael score 55 points against the Washington Bullets, but the part that you don't see is what we're trying to deliver in this ad." "A glimpse into Jordan's soul?" Harris asked. Patton replied, "It's a soul that thrives on challenges and constantly challenges himself to get better."

Rarely did commercials attempt to examine the soul, but Jordan's persona belonged to the public domain in that so much of his life was devoted to public performance. The subject of his commercials was not so much Air Jordan as Michael Jordan. His personage earned so much revenue for corporations that the value of his image increased exponentially. Strangely, this became its own kind of endorsement. Simply combining Jordan with a product suggested to the consumer that such a vast expenditure on the manufacturer's part must mean that the product was worth such an investment. In this sense Nike marketed its marketing in order to sell its products.

OUTCOME

Others besides Jordan appreciated the "9,000 Shots" commercial. USA Today voted it, along with ads for HBO and Altoids, the best campaign of 1997. "No marketer spins perspiration into ad inspiration like Nike," judge Dottie Enrico explained. The campaign also gained international attention as the first foreign-produced commercial to win the grand prize in the All Japan CM Festival, which was sponsored by the All Japan Radio & Television Commercial Council.

The ad, however, also coincided with further accusations of human rights abuses in Nike's international labor practices. Because much of Jordan's value derived from the unfathomably high wages he was paid and from his integrity, he became the lightning rod for criticism of Nike. Both Frederick L. McKissack, Jr., of Progressive Media Project and Kevin Clarke of U.S. Catholic magazine wrote scathing critiques. Ironically, Jordan found his least likely defender in Jesse Jackson, whose Operation PUSH had been boycotting Nike since 1990. Jackson supported Jordan's apolitical stance and lent it credence. "Why is it expected of a ballplayer or a boxer to be an astute sociopolitical analyst?" Jackson asked. "The issue of trading with Indonesia without regard to human rights or child labor is fundamentally a matter that United States trade policy must address. It isn't right to shift the burden to him because he's a high-profile salesman."

Chris Zimmerman, Nike's U.S. director of advertising, confirmed this division of responsibility, with the role of Nike's marketing being to develop advertisements that promoted products in the most creative ways possible. While some in the media placed blame on Jordan for Nike's reported dehumanization of its overseas workers, the commercial itself represented a maturation in the marketing of Jordan's image, humanizing him and grounding his myth in the realities of sweat and disappointment. The controversy and praise surrounding the "9,000 Shots" campaign demonstrated the influence Jordan wielded in his culture.

HELLO WORLD AND "I AM TIGER WOODS" CAMPAIGNS

OVERVIEW

Tiger Woods was one of the most acclaimed golfers in the world before he ever took a single swing as a professional. Nike, Inc., the footwear and apparel giant known for its industry-defining advertising campaigns featuring superstar athletes, bet the future of its golf product lines on this emerging star in 1996, signing the young phenom to a five-year, $40 million endorsement deal just after he announced that he would be turning pro. Woods's appeal to advertisers was manifold: he was said to be the most gifted golfer in the sport's history, he was handsome and articulate, he was young, and he was multiracial. The initial Woods-centered campaign and its immediate successor, both developed by ad agency Wieden+Kennedy, proved to be among the most noteworthy Nike advertising efforts in recent memory.

"Hello World," released to coincide with Woods's turning professional, combined a three-page spread in the Wall Street Journal with a commercial aired on ABC's Monday Night Football as well as on other networks. The TV spot offered a provocative message contrasting Woods's unprecedented accomplishments as an amateur golfer with the fact that there were still golf courses in the United States where he would not be allowed to play because of his skin color. This introductory campaign was immediately followed up by a more affirmative nod to Woods's ethnicity, the "I Am Tiger Woods" campaign. TV spots showed people from a wide range of ethnic backgrounds saying, "I Am Tiger Woods," a statement that, thus repeated, suggested the inspirational nature of Woods's entry into a sport previously assumed closed to nonwhite Americans.

Woods attracted legions of new fans to golf, and the grandstands at tournaments in which he competed began to appear more youthful and ethnically diverse. This, of course, created vast new markets for a sport that had traditionally appealed to a select audience, and Nike benefited greatly from its association with Woods. Sales of Nike golf shoes and apparel skyrocketed, and Woods quickly became the most sought-after product endorser in the world.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Nike entered the golf market in 1983, four years before that market exploded, with a line of footwear (it later added a line of shirts). The move took Nike outside its traditional realm of running and beyond the sports of basketball, baseball, and football. Nike maintained consistency, however, with its core marketing strategy being to sign well-known athletes to endorsement contracts that would raise the visibility of the company name within the sport as well as with a more general audience. Among golfers Nike first signed Peter Jacobson, and it then gained marketing strength with the names of Curtis Strange and Nick Price. In 1994 Nike's "Golf Is an Invitation" campaign with Price won numerous ad-industry awards, helping to solidify the brand's positioning amid a category boom. According to the National Sporting Goods Association, consumer expenditures on golf equipment rose by 113 percent between 1987 and 1997, from $1.8 billion to $3.9 billion.

In August 1996 Tiger Woods won his third straight U.S. Amateur Championship at Pumpkin Ridge Golf Club in Cornelius, Oregon, just 15 miles away from Nike headquarters. Three days later Woods announced that he was turning professional. Three days after that he signed a $40 million, five-year agreement with Nike to endorse its Nike Golf line of footwear and apparel. Neither Nike nor Woods's agent, Hughes Norton of Cleveland-based International Management Group (IMG), had ever heard of an athlete landing such a lucrative contract, much less a 20-year-old who had yet to earn a single dollar in his sport. Woods represented a unique marketing opportunity, however, because the visibility of his extraordinary talent was compounded by his appearance, for he was a young, handsome multiracial man breaking into the ranks of a nearly all-white sport. Woods called himself Cablinasian, an acronym he had invented to describe his Caucasian, black, American-Indian, and Asian heritages.

TARGET MARKET

Chris Zimmerman, Nike's director of U.S. advertising, explained the highly effective marketing style developed by the company. Traditionally, demographics determined target markets, with advertisements created to appeal to specific age and social brackets. Nike altered this formula by determining its target markets by what Zimmerman called psychographics. The company developed a psychological profile of consumers who appreciated Nike's philosophy, thus targeting a mind-set rather than a certain age or social status. Furthermore, according to Zimmerman, Nike's advertising promoted gender and racial equity within the world of sports. Woods's image fit perfectly into this psychographic formula, while simultaneously taking advantage of demographic shifts that were occurring in golf in response to his popularity.

Nike's existing classic line of golf apparel and footwear catered to a traditional market, those in their mid-20s to mid-40s. The "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns introduced a new line geared toward a younger consumer, with less conservative styling and bolder colors, such as Woods's signature black and red. This younger orientation coincided with one of the fastest-growing demographic groups in golf, those under 18 years of age. Nike thus retained its traditional positioning while actively attracting this new, growing market.

Just as Woods developed an affinity for golf because of his early exposure to the game (Earl, his father, had placed a putter in his hands at 10 months), so, too, did children develop brand loyalty. Nike was not blind to this trend. One spot featured kids chanting "I Am Tiger Woods," and children who saw the commercial in Saint Louis, for example, responded by swamping a local chain specializing in children's athletic footwear with requests for Woods's shoes. Nike also was not blind to the appeal of Wood's multiculturalism, and the company targeted specific markets on this basis. "In Asia, the next great sports market, he is thought of as one of their own,"

''GOLF'S NOT HARD, WITH TIGER WOODS''

With its subsequent campaign, ''Golf's Not Hard, with Tiger Woods,'' Nike lightened up on the player's image. In all four spots Woods offered seemingly simple advice, with the punch line hinging on the impossibility of even the best golfer re-creating his feats. In ''Golf Swing'' Woods first gave three easy-to-follow tips but then added a barrage of technical jargon accompanied by sophisticated computer graphics. In ''Bunker Shot'' he told golfers to hit the ball 300 yards, no more and no less, from a sand trap and then demonstrated with ease: ''Next week, basic tips on difficult shots.'' In ''Slice'' Woods demonstrated his practice technique of lining the gallery with spectators, preferably women and children, leaving only a narrow strip of daylight through which to tee off, but when Joe, the less-than-average golfer, attempted the technique, he overcompensated for his slice and hooked the ball into the cardboard heads of an old lady and man. Finally, in ''The Drive/Revised,'' Woods revealed his secret for long drives; he teed the ball just above the head of his driver, swung, and then waited the remaining 25 seconds of the spot for the ball to land. Simple as that!

observed James F. Sweeney in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. In response to his popularity, Nike ran a subtitled version of the ''I Am Tiger Woods'' campaign in Thailand, homeland of his mother Kultida. In the same vein, to grace Woods's own official line of clothing, Nike designed a multicolored jewel symbol as a logo representing his ethnic blending.

COMPETITION

Nike's foremost competitor was Reebok, a company that emulated Nike's strategy of signing highly visible sports stars to endorse its products. In golf the charismatic Australian player Greg Norman had signed a lifetime agreement with Reebok, a commitment that was rare in endorsements. The company was so confident of Norman's value that it had deleted the Reebok logo from his line of clothing, thus highlighting Norman's shark logo. When Nike dedicated a line of golf clothing to Woods in 1998, it thus competed directly with Reebok and Norman's Shark brand.

Although endorsements remained a key to success, the golf market differed significantly from other markets. Robin Carr-Locke, Nike Golf's director of marketing, explained that competition varied according to the sales venue. Sales of golf clothing and equipment occurred in four distinct places: at department stores, in sporting-goods stores, in off-course golf stores, and on the grass at golf courses. The main difficulty in determining the competition in this market was that, depending on the venue, Nike competed with different brands. On the course, for example, Nike footwear competed against Etonic and Foot-Joy golfing shoes, whereas in department stores Nike apparel competed with brands like Ralph Lauren's Polo collection.

This diversity of competition made it almost impossible to develop specific competitive strategies. Historically, however, Nike had focused less on keeping up with the competition and more on developing its own strategies in anticipation of market shifts. Nike sought to define its markets, not react to the competition. In 1992, for example, Nike had recognized the vast potential of the golf market it had yet to tap, but at the time there were no rising golf stars who fit the mold of maverick Nike endorsers, the formula that had created such success for the company in other sports. Hence, Nike diverted its strategy from endorsements by individual golfers to a tour endorsement, buying out the flagging Ben Hogan Tour and renaming it the Nike Tour. This kind of ingenuity had become a trademark of Nike.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Jim Riswold, creative director and partner at Wieden+Kennedy, first conceived the Woods campaigns, he immediately decided against focusing on what he called ''shoeness.'' He decided instead to use the advertising as an opportunity to expose and crystallize what was on everyone's mind—the issue of color. Woods was a sensation regardless of his race, but the very color of his skin called into question the degree of racial prejudice that persisted in golf and, by extension, in American society in general. Rather than divert attention away from this issue, Riswold harnessed its power to Nike's advantage.

''We obviously had to tell [Woods] what we were thinking,'' Riswold said, ''and he felt it was time to talk about that issue.'' Contrary to suggestions that Nike exploited him, Woods had creative input. ''Golf has shied away from [racism] for too long,'' said Woods. ''Some clubs have brought in tokens, but nothing has really changed. I hope what I'm doing can change that.'' Woods envisioned himself as an ''ambassador of change'' for golf, opening the way for minorities and young people. His father went further, suggesting that Woods would "transcend the boundaries of golf [by] using golf as a vehicle to do that," in the same way that Muhammad Ali had transcended boxing and Michael Jordan basketball.

The TV spot that headlined the effort accordingly featured captions alongside retrospective clips from Woods's career as an amateur: "I shot in the 70s when I was 8. / I shot in the 60s when I was 12. / I won the U.S. Junior Amateur when I was 15. / I played in the Nissan Open when I was 16. / I won the U.S. Amateur when I was 18. / I played in the Masters when I was 19. / I am the only man to win three consecutive U.S. Amateur titles." The last captions read, "There are still courses in the U.S. I am not allowed to play—because of the color of my skin," and "I've heard I'm not ready for you. Are you ready for me?" The print ads used the same provocative concept.

Critics pointed out that earlier athletes who had been civil rights activists, such as Jackie Robinson and Arthur Ashe, had become agents of change through their achievements, not through campaigns to change their sports. Further, they had to maintain their integrity and conviction in the face of intense opposition. Nike's Merle Marting responded by pointing out that Woods already had significant achievements, thus qualifying him to comment on issues that concerned him. "If you look at the ad, it's basically a celebration of what Tiger has accomplished and what he's about," said Marting. Woods also stood in a different position than Robinson or Ashe, partly because they and others had already made significant progress toward racial equity that Woods could build on and also because society had changed in the intervening years.

The "I Am Tiger Woods" campaign replaced the "Hello World" campaign after its initial weekend run. This second campaign broadened Nike's message to celebrate multiculturalism with commercials depicting people of all races and ages declaring, "I Am Tiger Woods." Whereas "Hello World" focused on Woods's personal achievements and challenges, "I Am Tiger Woods" focused on how others related to him, both through his diverse racial background and through the quality of his character and play. In conjunction with the spots Nike sold T-shirts emblazoned with the words "I Am Tiger Woods." In April 1997 Nike relaunched the "I Am Tiger Woods" campaign on the momentum he had created with his Masters victory, and in June Charlie Sifford and Lee Elder joined Woods to pay homage to African-American golfers in a commercial titled "I Won't Forget."

OUTCOME

The "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns created sales increases in almost every section of the golf market. Carr-Locke's expectation of a 60 percent increase in Nike Golf sales was exceeded, as sales of the clothing line doubled after Woods signed on. In fact, because of the backlog of orders, some stores could not get Woods's official line of clothing when it came out in the spring of 1998, while others could not restock the line on their quickly depleted shelves. As it turned out, the genius of the "I Am Tiger Woods" campaign was that everyone wanted to be Woods. He quickly became the most successful Nike representative, proving the wisdom of the company's formula of advertising successful sports stars in a way that made consumers want to own a piece of the person.

Comparative statistics provided a sense of the phenomenon created by Woods. Nike Golf generated $43 million in 1994; in 1996, when Woods joined Nike two-thirds of the way through the year, sales increased to $120 million. Sales for 1997 rose to $210 million. Woods also created spikes in sales. In response to Woods's Masters victory, for example, sales of Nike footwear jumped 80 percent in the second quarter of 1997 as compared to the second quarter of 1996. Woods's successes—winning four tournaments, including the Masters, in his first year as a pro, being named Sports Illustrated 's Sportsman of the Year for 1996 and the Rookie of the Year and Player of the Year on the PGA Tour in 1997, and being selected as one of Time magazine's 25 most influential Americans in 1997—further bolstered Nike's success, with sales increasing 177 percent in the U.S. market, 67 percent in Asia, and 25 percent in Europe after his signing.

In the first year that the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences gave an Emmy for the best commercial, the "Hello World" spot was nominated. The success of the campaigns helped draw attention to the Tiger Woods Foundation, an initiative to help inner-city kids to learn golf as a means of opening up their lives to broader opportunities. Nike's PLAY (Participate in the Lives of America's Youth) foundation cosponsored Woods's workshops, in part to advance a worthy cause but also to develop brand loyalty in this growing market.

Woods became the advertising world's most sought-after brand endorser. In subsequent years his endorsement deals included, among many others, contracts with Buick, Rolex, American Express, Wheaties, Tag Heuer, Titleist golf equipment, Golf Digest magazine, and Electronic Arts video games. Nike, however, remained the brand most closely associated with Woods, thanks to his initial connection to the brand as well as his ongoing appearances in Nike advertising. One of the most talked-about TV commercials of 1999, for instance, was a Nike spot in which Woods was shown effortlessly bouncing a golf ball on the face of his club, keeping it aloft for a full 28 seconds—sending it behind his back and between his legs, and even catching it on his club twice—before striking it, while it was still in the air, with the calm confidence of an ordinary golf shot.

In late 2000 Woods extended his endorsement deal with Nike for another five years, effective in September 2001. A possible measure of Woods's value to Nike was that the company more than doubled the record-breaking amount it had paid him for his first five-year deal, agreeing to a compensation package worth $85 million. As the New York Times noted, however, each of the companies then paying Woods to endorse their products was getting a bargain: "He's now . . . the most recognizable sports figure on the planet. And when it's time to renegotiate the contracts, all those companies will find, as Nike did, that he'll be more expensive next time. Much more expensive."

MEET THE LEBRONS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002, before ever playing an NBA game, basketball prodigy LeBron James had secured a $90 million endorsement deal with the world's largest athletic company, Nike, Inc. The Zoom LeBron basketball shoe was born at Nike's Beaverton, Oregon, headquarters in the hope that LeBron could pick up the marketing mantle of retired superstar Michael Jordan and his industry-changing Nike Air Jordan shoes. By 2005 James had been named Rookie of the Year, thus living up to expectations. Nike featured him in introductory print and TV advertisements that played off the nickname "King James" that was often used in the press. James as a personality still had not broken through to the greater public. With that goal in mind Nike released a new TV-centered campaign called "Meet the LeBrons" in late 2005.

Using a portion of Nike's $170 million that was allotted for advertising that year, Portland, Oregon, agency Wieden + Kennedy was responsible for the off-beat television commercials that depicted James as four different versions of himself, all living in the same upscale household. Each spot was meant to be a spontaneous look at the family. Wise LeBron, an old-timer, bickered with the slick All Business LeBron. Kid LeBron bounced around with earphones on, while Athlete LeBron practiced his athletic moves. A tag at the end of each spot directed viewers to www.nikebasketball.com, an elaborate "Meet the LeBrons" section of the Nike website.

The "Meet the LeBrons" campaign generated plenty of buzz in the press and online, even spawning action figures of the four characters. In 2005 Nike footwear sales were up a healthy 11 percent over the previous year, and the company's annual report for 2005 stated that it had been a record year for sales and profits. James flourished on the court, being named to the All-Star team for that season, and off the court endorsement money from a variety of companies continued to flow in his direction.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Nike, Inc., began as Blue Ribbon Sports, a modest joint venture by accounting student Phil Knight and his former University of Oregon running coach, Bill Bowerman. In 1962 Knight had the idea to bring low-priced, high-quality Japanese athletic shoes to the U.S. market to compete against an industry dominated by German footwear. He and Bowerman became partners that year and began importing Onitsuka Tiger shoes from Japan. Soon Knight and Bowerman started producing their own shoe under the Nike moniker. Within 30 years Nike developed into the largest sports and fitness company in the world.

Nike initially set itself apart through innovation. In 1979, for instance, former NASA employee Frank Rudy invented the air cushioning that would rock the world of athletic shoes. Technical innovation came first, but athlete endorsements and savvy advertising promotion ultimately set Nike up to conquer the world. The record-setting runner Steve Prefontaine was the first world-class athlete to wear Nikes and consult on their design. Nike joined forces with Michael Jordan in the mid-1980s. The promising Chicago Bulls basketball rookie endorsed a line of shoes and apparel called Air Jordan, consulting on shoe design and ultimately catapulting Nike into dominance in basketball. Other apparel collections followed, including a John McEnroe line for tennis and a Bo Jackson line for football. Nike built campaigns around the personalities of athletes. In 1987 its groundbreaking "Revolution" television spot broke in support of the Air Max shoe. The black-and-white commercial, set to the Beatles' song "Revolution," showed quick cuts of regular athletes interspersed with the likes of Michael Jordan and John McEnroe in play. There was an outcry from rock purists, and the Beatles band members themselves sued. The spot was a huge attention-getter for Nike and put it on the cutting edge of advertising.

In 1988 Nike made a lasting impression on American culture with the first "Just Do It" commercial, created by Portland agency Wieden + Kennedy. The slogan spoke to personal as well as athletic goals. In a huge television and print blitz consumers were encouraged to disregard their excuses for not exercising and "Just Do It." The slogan worked its way thoroughly into the national lexicon. Air Jordan's "Jumpman" logo and the Nike "swoosh" logo also became apparel must-haves in the urban and youth markets as well as essential wear among the growing hip-hop music scene.

By the year 2000 Nike was nearing its 30-year anniversary. The legendary Michael Jordan line continued on after his retirement, but Nike was on the lookout for a next-generation athlete. In 2003 the company gave high-school phenom LeBron James, frequently referred to as just LeBron, a $90 million shoe contract before he had stepped on an NBA court. Nike was banking on James to replace Jordan as the next great professional-basketball juggernaut. His first television commercial was understated, showing him nervous under the pressure of expectations before his first NBA game and then smiling as he blended into the rhythm of the game. A later TV spot included comedian Bernie Mac turning the court into a church revival meeting of sorts. The spot played on the idea of James as the "chosen one," or "King James," as he was sometimes called in the press, but then asserted that the young rookie just wanted to be a team player. Posters and billboards were less humble in nature: one image showed James seated on a throne with lions at his feet. In 2004 a campaign titled "The Chamber of Fear" made James the star of a highly stylized commercial spoofing kung fu movies. In battling multiple enemies with names like "Complacency," "Self-Doubt," and "Haters," his only weapons were his athletic ability and his new Nike shoes. The spot, banned in China because censors deemed it offensive to the state, was memorable, but it still did not do enough to advance the LeBron persona in the United States. A new campaign, "Meet the LeBrons," followed in 2005.

TARGET MARKET

In the late 1980s and 1990s sports attire became increasingly acceptable among Americans as casual wear. At the same time NBA basketball was reaching an all-time high in popularity. Also during this period urban hip-hop music culture was growing fast, and recording artists wore basketball apparel in their videos and during other appearances. These influences combined to make Nike athletic gear, especially shoes, the thing to wear for the trend-conscious city-dwelling consumer. Teenage boys and men in their early 20s, who made up the vast majority of recreational and amateur basketball players, were a particular focus for shoes. These young men tended to be loyal consumers, aligning themselves with a player and sportswear brand. Sports attire had become a status symbol in youth culture. LeBron James himself was

KNIGHT HANDS OVER NIKE REIGNS

In 2005 Phil Knight, the visionary leader and cofounder of Nike, Inc., stepped down as CEO but retained his position as chairman of the board. Knight handpicked William Perez, president and CEO of consumer-products company S.C. Johnson, to be his successor. Perez was viewed as a surprising choice. He had overseen S.C. Johnson's $6.5 billion stable of worldwide brands, but aside from an enthusiasm for running, he had no footwear experience. Perez immediately slashed the Nike advertising budget, a move that clashed irrevocably with Knight's marketing philosophy, and in January 2006 Perez resigned.

barely out of his teen years. An all-around player who was able to execute from any position on court, he was living up to the pre-NBA hype, which would ensure that the Zoom LeBron shoe series would appeal to the coveted market of young males from high-population centers.

In addition to courting the core male youth audience, Nike was looking to be more inclusive with its "Meet the LeBrons" commercials, which showed four versions of the athlete at different stages of life. Peter Stern of Strategic, a sports and entertainment consulting firm, evaluated the spots in the January 10, 2006, edition of the Wall Street Journal, saying that Nike was "showing the athlete in a different light that might appeal to someone who's more fashion-conscious or image-conscious versus someone who wants to wear the shoe to jump higher or score more."

COMPETITION

Founders Knight and Bowerman created their shoe company in response to a German stronghold on the athletic-shoe market. Within 30 years of its inception Nike had surpassed German company adidas as the largest athletic-shoe maker in the world. Still, Nike continued to take adidas very seriously. In 2003 Nike spent $153 million on advertising, compared to adidas's $34.3 million. Much of that ad money was directed toward Nike's new star, LeBron James. Ironically, adidas had a relationship with James first and was considered the likely sponsor for the NBA-bound high schooler before Nike swooped in with a $90 million, seven-year deal.

Adidas won a few battles in the ensuing years. The German company beat out Nike for sponsorship of the 2008 Olympics in Beijing, China. This was a particularly harsh blow given the LeBron James "Chamber of Fear" commercial debacle, which had weakened Nike's position in the immense Chinese market. The spot depicted James vanquishing a dragon, a traditional symbol of the Chinese state, and it was banned by the government. Nike lost NBA player Yao Ming, also hugely popular in China, to Reebok, which was soon acquired by adidas for nearly $4 billion. The sale of Reebok to adidas prompted Nike to spend more time looking over its shoulder. Once combined, adidas and Reebok captured about 20 percent of the U.S. market, making inroads to Nike's enviable 36 percent. As 2005 came to a close, adidas released a campaign featuring basketball star Kevin Garnett of the Minnesota Timberwolves that was remarkably similar in tone and purpose to "Meet the LeBrons." It centered on a television spot that depicted Garnett in a five vignettes to represent the many sides of his personality: a general on a battlefield, a superhero, a kid playing tag, a gladiator, and even a comic.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By the time LeBron James was signed as a Nike spokesman, Wieden + Kennedy had been creating advertising for Nike for many years. James was an unknown quantity when his first Nike advertisements appeared in 2003. He won NBA Rookie of the Year his first season, and in two short years the Cleveland Cavaliers player had proven himself a major force in basketball. Nevertheless, by 2005 the public at large was just getting to know James, and Nike needed to help that process along. Its agency devised a campaign called "Meet the Lebrons," which included television commercials, cinema spots, and online banners as well as an extensive website, all introduced in December 2005. The cornerstone of the campaign was composed of four quirky TV spots featuring James as different characterizations of himself. The four characters were Wise LeBron, the cranky old-timer; All Business LeBron, slick and self-absorbed; Kid LeBron, a headphone-wearing, basketball-obsessed youth; and finally the serious but good-natured Athlete LeBron, who barely spoke. This oddly constructed family inhabited a sleek and expansive modern residence, with Wise LeBron's tiny, ancient-looking TV set occasionally featured in the background showing on-court footage of LeBron James. In one commercial the LeBrons danced to Rick James's funk anthem "Superfreak." In two others they bickered at the dinner table, and in the one called "New Shoes" they finally referred to the actual product when Wise LeBron told All Business LeBron, "It's not about you. It's about the shoes." The spots had no tagline except a modest "nikebasketball.com" at the bottom of the screen.

The website destination listed in the spots was an interactive trip to the LeBrons' house, where visitors could explore their home to get a better view of the pineapple on the kitchen counter or zoom in on the luxury car in the driveway. There were bios for each character, ads to view, wallpaper to download, and Zoom LeBron shoes for sale. Nike wanted to make fans comfortable in the LeBron James pseudoworld. Ralph Green, the U.S. basketball brand director for Nike, described the purpose of the campaign to the Wall Street Journal. "We were aware of elements of LeBron's personality that had not been seen by most of our consumers. . . . So our goal was to give consumers a peek at these varied elements of the LeBron persona but to do so in a subtle, figurative, and humorous manner." The actual budget for the costly campaign was not revealed, but according to research firm TNS Media Intelligence, it probably took up a significant portion of the $170 million that Nike spent on advertising from January through November 2005.

OUTCOME

The "Meet the LeBrons" campaign resonated with consumers. As a result of the popularity of the campaign, action figures of the characters were created for sale by Upper Deck, a sports-memorabilia company. Nike, ever confident in James, planned a special edition Zoom LeBron shoe specifically for the 2006 NBA All-Star Game. More importantly Nike's annual report for 2005 reflected healthy footwear sales, with revenues up by 11 percent over the previous year, making fiscal 2005 a record year for sales and profits. Wieden + Kennedy's reputation was enhanced as well, perhaps contributing to its growing client list in 2005 that included new accounts from mega-advertisers Coca-Cola Company and Procter & Gamble. James himself continued to reap the rewards of widening positive exposure; by the end of 2005 he had five corporate sponsorships in addition to Nike, including Powerade and Sprite.

MOVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nike Inc., based in Beaverton, Oregon, and the world's leading manufacturer of athletic footwear, premiered its "Move" television spot in early 2002 during the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, Utah. A lyrical homage to physical activity, the 90-second sequence featured athletes and nonathletes alike, all engaged in the actions of their sports. From swimming to skateboarding, to video golf and gymnastics, each person's movements were coordinated with the next person's, creating a seamless paean to physical activity. Though passing images of Nike's famous "swoosh" logo appeared in the spot, the commercial did not promote a specific product. Instead, it capitalized on the emotional nature of the Olympic Games and equated the Nike brand with the same feeling of goodwill.

The "Move" commercial was created by Nike's longtime advertising agency, Wieden+Kennedy (W+K), and directed by filmmaker Jake Scott. Although the 90-second spot had its premiere during NBC's coverage of the Olympics, 60-second and 30-second versions later ran briefly on other television networks. The games, with their huge ratings over a two-week period, offered advertisers a rare opportunity every two years to launch new products or to redefine brands by creating commercials that capitalized on the games. In the case of "Move," the tie-in was represented by cameo shots of famous Olympic athletes, including skier Picabo Street and speed skater Apolo Anton Ohno. Shots of these stars were intercut with shots of "ordinary" people, beginning with a boy running down a suburban street and ranging from the simple (a toddler playing on a bed) to the thrill seeking (a BASE jumper leaping from a bridge). The commercial's message was clear: No matter how you do it, just move.

Nike did not make the cost of the commercial public, and by the spring of 2002 the company had moved on to other, more product-focused campaigns. "Move" continued to attract notice, however, and it won the 2002 Emmy Award as the outstanding commercial from the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences and a Gold Lion at the 2003 Clio Awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

At the time of the 2002 Winter Olympics, Nike's annual revenues totaled well over $9 billion, more than triple that of its nearest competitor, Reebok. The company's advertising prowess, guided for years by W+K, was legendary. Nike's swoosh logo and its indelible motto, "Just Do It," had long since joined the pantheon of advertising's greatest campaigns. In 1993 Nike became one of the first three companies, along with Coca-Cola and Absolute Vodka, inducted into the American Marketing Association Hall of Fame.

Over the years many individual Nike television commercials, including the Michael Jordan spots directed by Spike Lee and the "Bo Knows" campaign featuring Bo Jackson, had garnered attention, spawned catchphrases, and won awards. "Move" continued in that tradition. But with such fame came an equal amount of notoriety. Partly because of the company's position as the industry leader, by the 1990s Nike had become embroiled in controversies regarding its overseas labor practices and its marketing tactics in the United States. The company was accused of underpaying foreign workers and of indulging in "ambush" marketing, whereby it co-opted publicity during sporting events it did not sponsor.

Nike's so-called ambush marketing tactics had angered sponsors of previous Olympic Games, who had each paid a hefty sum for the privilege of using the Olympic logo in its advertising and of associating itself with the games. Nike had never paid such a sponsorship fee but had circumvented the official rules so effectively that polls showed many people erroneously identifying Nike as an Olympic sponsor. Most famously, in 1992 Nike pitchman and "Dream Team" member Jordan accepted the gold medal for basketball in Barcelona, Spain, after covering up the Reebok logo on his uniform. In the 2002 Boston Marathon, sponsored by adidas, Nike stole its rival's thunder by blanketing area subway stops with advertisements and by spray painting swooshes on the pavement at the finish line. Nike defended its tactics, however. Simon Pestridge, Nike's brand manager, told a reporter for MSNBC that "Nike likes to come at things from a different angle . . . We play inside the rules and we bring a different point of view that's true and authentic to sport."

Nike always retained its high advertising profile no matter what public relations fiasco might be playing out at the time. Running spots that aimed to increase brand identification rather than promote specific products had been part of that strategy for years. With "Move," Nike sought to improve its global image by identifying itself with the type of international fellowship featured at the Olympics, even though the company was not an official sponsor.

TARGET MARKET

The 2002 Winter Olympics were broadcast on NBC, which struggled to attract the 18- to 45-year-old demographic that was coveted by advertisers. Prior to 2002, the Olympics had tended to attract older audiences, but the introduction of newer sports, such as snowboarding and the skeleton, helped NBC reverse the trend by appealing to younger viewers, such as those who had made ESPN's X Games so popular. Nike even aided in the endeavor by producing a 30-minute promotional show that aired on January 26 and that featured lesser-known Olympic athletes teaching NBA star Charles Barkley and Olympic champion runner Marion Jones about winter sports. This cross-pollination effort sought to attract Nike's customer base—both Barkley and Jones had recently been featured in high-profile Nike campaigns—in addition to the Olympics' traditional audience, which included hefty numbers of viewers who were more interested in the athletes' personal stories than in the sports themselves. The "Move" spot also catered to this demographic by concentrating on everyday people "just doing something" as well as featuring professional athletes who epitomized the "Just Do It" ethos.

The Winter Olympics aired a week after Super Bowl XXXVI, the year's other high-profile television advertising event. The Super Bowl had the distinction of offering the most expensive airtime of the television year, roughly $2 million for a 30-second commercial. The Winter Games were less expensive, about $600,000 per 30 seconds, and had the advantage of airing over a two-week period. Nike elected not to advertise during the Super Bowl, instead concentrating its efforts on the Olympics. Ironically, Nike had no major competition. As with the Super Bowl, the biggest advertisers at the Olympics tended to have nothing to do with sports or sporting goods. Xerox, Bank of America, and AT&T all had a sizable presence, with Nike being the only sports-related advertiser to air commercials.

One explanation for this was that Nike was primarily a retail company, and the Olympics often catered to business-to-business advertisers. "Advertisers believe that the size of the audience, the global exposure and the duration of the event combine to provide a powerful opportunity to reach their target audience," wrote Kate Maddox in B to B magazine. In this light Nike's "Move" commercial was nontraditional in that it was aimed squarely at the consumer. Yet in terms of not promoting a specific product, Nike was right in line with the trend. "Twenty to 30 years ago, it would have been branding advertising. Advertising today has probably become more strategic in use," Rick Burton, the executive director of the Warsaw Sports Marketing Center, told Jane L. Levere of Salt Lake City's Deseret News.

A 10-DAY SHOOT FOR 90 SECONDS OF FILM

Nike's Emmy-winning "Move" spot was shot over a period of 10 days by director Jake Scott, the son of Oscar-nominated film director Ridley Scott. Finding a skateboarder to launch himself off the roof of a building onto a ramp proved difficult. The first two candidates refused to attempt the stunt, and the task finally fell to a young local volunteer. The most harrowing part of the shoot took place in Auburn, California, where professional BASE jumper Lottie Aston and a cameraman repeatedly hurled themselves off the Foresthill Bridge. Despite the inherent danger in the jump, Nike spokesman Scott Reames said, "It's young, it's edgy . . . You can't deny the coolness factor."

COMPETITION

The Olympics were "a bellwether for advertisers," wrote Michael Dumiak of Financial Services Marketing. Toward that end many advertisers created special campaigns that capitalized on the emotions the games engendered in their viewers. Bank of America, McDonald's, and Visa all produced spots specifically for the games. "The Olympics represent what is pure and good about sports," Mark Vogel, executive vice president of brand management for the Osborn & Barr consulting firm, told Thomas Lee of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, "and these companies want their brands associated with that." Nike was the only major sporting goods company to buy substantial airtime. Though the company did not release budget figures for the commercial, Monster.com, another major Olympic Games advertiser, spent more than $10 million on nearly 200 spots for the games, and Samsung spent more than $15 million. Nike's nearest competitor, Reebok, did not advertise during the games but did garner publicity for its Reebok Human Rights Award, which was given in a ceremony in conjunction with the Olympic festivities.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Move" opened with a long shot of a boy running down a suburban street. As he looked over his shoulder, the scene cut to a matching shot of a hockey player. In turn others were shown moving as well—a man rotated his legs around a pommel horse, a basketball player shot to score, a jogger ran in place at a red light, a tennis player swung a backhand. Shots of professional athletes Street, Vince Carter, Lindsay Davenport, and Landon Donovan were intercut with shots of everyday athletes engaged in their pursuits. The sports varied in intensity, from the speed of the hockey player and the long-distance jumper to the more languorous underwater splash of the high diver and the gentle descent of the parachuting BASE jumper, resulting in a rhythm that rose and fell with the music and the pace of the editing. Three-quarters through, the words "just do it" were superimposed on an underwater shot of a high-diver plunging into the blue swimming pool. The commercial eventually ended with a continuation of the scene of the boy running down the street, and it concluded with an understated swoosh in the center of the screen. All of the action was presented in real time, "lovingly choreographed," according to Advertising Age, without the slow-motion effect so common in sports advertising.

The spot proved inspiring, both visually and musically. With the variety of people and activities—from children to seniors, basketball players, swimmers, golfers, and skiers—chances were that every viewer found an image with which he or she could identify. Nike even reached beyond its own interests in athletic footwear to include athletes in bare feet and ice skates. As W+K's Hal Curtis explained to the Web-based Boards magazine, "Nike is perceived as a core sport brand for football, basketball, baseball and soccer. Showing other sports and stretching that is a good thing strategically."

Critics applauded the understated elegance of the spot. " 'Move' quietly breaks through the clutter due to its refreshing realness," wrote Christine Champagne in Shoot, and a writer for Creative Review called it a "luscious" expression of "how movement can translate from one sport to the next." Adam Bonislawski of Shoot praised the way in which "each detail flows naturally from the ones that precede it."

Many people singled out the music as a major factor in the spot's appeal. While Nike commercials often included rap or techno music with a strong, fast beat, "Move" was different. A gentle piano score composed by Jonathan Elias especially for the spot accompanied the real-time images, creating an uplifting, inspiring mood as opposed to a hard-driving, competitive feel.

OUTCOME

Curtis told Champagne that with "Move," "we wanted to show that sport is a shared experience, whether you're a kid on a skateboard or a pro like Vince Carter playing an NBA game." It worked, Champagne declared. "The mix of professional and amateur athletes, the real and natural production, and the music combined helped to create an ad that would appeal to anyone who watched the Winter Olympics—not just to hard-core athletes and thrill-seeking teens," she wrote.

"Move" won several awards, including a Gold Lion at the annual Clio Awards in South Beach, Miami, Florida, and a 2002 Emmy Award from the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences for outstanding commercial. Apart from the recognition of the advertising industry, the spot also pleased filmmakers. "The commercial attains that great aesthetic Holy Grail," wrote Adam Bonislawski in Shoot, "the seamless integration of form and content." A writer for Adweek called it a "visual and aural masterpiece."

PLAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

"Just Do It" became one of the most recognizable catchphrases in advertising. It belonged to Nike Inc., the Oregon-based company that dominated the athletic footwear and sports apparel industry beginning in the 1980s. Long known for its television and print ads featuring superstar athletes who personified the "just do it" ethos, Nike conceived its "Play" campaign to appeal to the opposite demographic—those who preferred a more lighthearted, less strenuous approach to fitness. Toward this end the advertising agency Wieden + Kennedy, based in Portland, Oregon, created a series of television spots to promote Nike shoes as being ideal for everyday life. The soft-sell strategy focused on the brand rather than a specific product, as witnessed by the subtle placement of the Nike "swoosh" logo above the word "Play" at the end of the spots.

Consisting of a series of three television spots, the $25 million "Play" campaign was launched in August 2001 with "Tag," "Shade Running," and "Tailgating." In "Tag," for example, a man dressed for work emerged from a subway staircase, coffee in hand, and was tapped on the shoulder by a stranger. With a slight sigh the man understood that he had just been tagged "it." People on the street scattered in all directions as he looked around for someone to pursue. Everyone abandoned their commute in favor of playing the game.

The "Play" campaign was a success on all fronts. "Tag" won the Grand Prix for television commercials at the 49th International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, in 2002, with "Shade Running" taking a Gold Lion and "Tailgating" a Bronze Lion. Nike's profits for the quarter following the campaign rose 8.3 percent, despite the fact that sales in the United States fell 2 percent, likely because of the economic fallout following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Because the campaign was not product specific, however, and because Nike ran many campaigns simultaneously, it was hard to pinpoint exactly how the "Play" ads affected sales. The short-lived campaign ran through Labor Day 2001.

PLAYING TAG IN TORONTO

The Nike "Tag" commercial, which featured an urban rush-hour crowd spontaneously breaking into a childlike game of tag, was filmed in Toronto, Ontario, with 400 extras. The city's locations were available only during weekend mornings. Director Frank Budgen's careful planning fell by the wayside when the weather failed to cooperate, forcing crews to shoot in three locations simultaneously. The award-winning result relied as much on happenstance as on the script. For instance, the man chased in the subway by the person designated "it," after everyone else had safely escaped onto a train, was recruited off the street right before shooting began.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

With sales figures in 2001 more than triple that of Reebok, its nearest competitor, the biggest hurdle Nike had to overcome was its own reputation. The success of "Just Do It," a phrase dreamed up by Dan Wieden, founder of Wieden + Kennedy, in the early 1980s, represented a "tough love" approach to fitness and sports. Recognizing that not everyone appreciated the no-excuses sentiment, however, Nike officials decided to soften its image by portraying working people dispensing with obligation in order to enjoy a moment of frivolity. "'Just Do It' is supremely motivating, no question about that," wrote Bob Garfield in Advertising Age, "because it brooks no excuse for sitting on your fat ass a moment longer. But that campaign is also a bit on the, um . . . harsh side. A little grim, you know?" Focusing on a more lighthearted nature of play, which harked back to the school playground, Nike wanted to reach out to potential customers who were not athletic in the traditional sense.

Previous legendary Nike advertising campaigns had featured the biggest sports celebrities of the day, from Jimmy Connors to Michael Jordan to Lance Armstrong, a tactic that usually lured young people, teenagers in particular, to the brand. With the "Play" campaign the focus was on the urban world of work and the fantasy of escaping from it for a moment. The strategy seemed to signify an attempt to attract slightly older consumers and those who had not been previously influenced by Nike's strong alliance with world-class athletes.

TARGET MARKET

Historically most Nike commercials were fairly transparent when it came to their target audiences. Ads featuring star athletes attracted fans of that athlete, particularly young people. The bigger the star—Tiger Woods or Lance Armstrong, for example—the bigger the target. The "Play" campaign, however, strayed from that strategy, instead focusing on "everyday" people going about their business. The message was clear: Nike shoes were not just for the basketball court or the track or any other sport. They were perfect for the street or for the office. A person did not even have to like sports; he or she just had to like a good challenge.

Nike coyly denied, however, that it targeted a specific demographic with the "Play" campaign or, for that matter, with any of its other campaigns. Andy Mooney, Nike's vice president of global brand management, told

Dick Silverman of Footwear News that "people . . . get way too focused on age and demographic segmentation. Sports fans are sports fans, no matter what." Tom Clarke, president of Nike, agreed with Mooney. "If we were trying to sell computers or something else, I think maybe a more fine-tuned demographic focus would be in play," he told Silverman. "But I think sports as an inspiration point gives you a lot of access into individuals and a pretty broad array of ages." Dave Larson, Nike's director of brand initiatives, told Sarah J. Heim of Adweek, however, that the "Play" campaign targeted teens but that it also aimed "to reach a psychodemographic: anyone who is youthful in attitude and spirit." The idea worked. "Nike has shown a softer, more engaging side," wrote the editors of Campaign magazine in a review of the ads.

COMPETITION

Nike's nearest rival was Reebok, based in the United Kingdom, whose annual sales in 2001 were dwarfed by Nike's. Nike also outspent Reebok on marketing efforts, however, dedicating $130 million for the year as opposed to Reebok's $52 million. But in the summer of 2001, after years of taking a beating from Nike, Reebok announced the launch of its RBK line of shoes and sportswear with two aggressive marketing campaigns. In an effort to reach women, Reebok advertised heavily during the reality show Survivor, the year's top-rated program among female viewers of all age groups. The commercials featured notable female athletes, such as Venus Williams, as well as several Survivor cast members. Concurrently RBK's urban credentials were established with a series of ads featuring NBA star Alan Iverson; musicians Jadakiss, R. Kelly, and Missy Elliott; and street basketball players from Harlem, the likes of which Nike had just featured in its "Freestyle" campaign. Richard Linnett of Advertising Age called Reebok's new RBK campaign "a bold move onto Nike's turf."

Nike lost further ground to Reebok when the British company signed a 10-year deal to provide uniforms and warm-up apparel for the NBA, a commission Nike had held for years. The turnabout attracted much media attention. "For one thing," wrote Ron Stodghill II in Time magazine, "it means that if Michael Jordan returns to the game, no matter what he wears on his feet, he'll be wearing a Reebok logo on his back." Adam Helfant, Nike's director of global sports marketing, was not concerned. Reebok's $50 million NBA deal, he told Stodghill, amounted to "two months' worth of Jordan business for us." Stodghill concurred with Helfant. "Nike's path to the future has shifted from building brand awareness . . . to gaining a stronger foothold in growth markets like soccer and golf," he wrote.

Adidas, the number three athletic-shoe manufacturer in 2001, was never much of a threat to Nike but vowed to increase its share of the U.S. market from 10 to 20 percent, according to David Goetzl of Advertising Age. New Balance, a company that specialized in running shoes, showed substantial market growth during the year, however, up more than two 2 percentage points, to 9.6 percent. Also encroaching on the athletic-shoe market were makers of "brown shoes," such as Timberland hiking boots, which continued to increase in popularity in the early years of the decade.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Along with the "Tag" spot, the "Play" campaign featured two other commercials, "Shade Running" and "Tailgating." In "Shade Running" a woman went for a run through the streets of Manhattan, making sure to stay in the shade at all times. Viewers saw her cross the street in the shadow of a moving crane and use the shade of other moving targets, such as a truck, to guard her path through the crowded city. "Tailgating" showed a businessman with a briefcase being followed down the street by a man dressed for a game of basketball. He dribbled the ball ominously close to the businessman, who tried to ignore him. Finally the businessman flung his briefcase aside and pivoted to confront his "tailgater." The pair faced off in a game of one-on-one in a city alley. What all three spots had in common was a distinctly urban feel, with crowded city streets and acres of pavement that were transformed from infrastructure into a playing field. In essence the world became a playground.

Though the campaign was a departure from Nike's heralded "Just Do It" slogan, "Play" was not a rejection of it. As Larson told Heim of Adweek, "play" was just a different aspect of "doing it." "Play emphasized why you should just do it," he told her. Coincidently the campaign tapped into an idea that other companies were exploring for themselves. Jennifer Carofano of Footwear News noted that the "Play" campaign, along with the "Champagne" spot for Microsoft's Xbox, which featured the tagline "Life is short. Play more," represented a new trend in advertising. "The newest batch of print and television ads promote childhood games and pre-adolescent innocence as the ultimate goal for consumers of all ages," she wrote.

According to Monica Rigali, a Nike spokesperson, the campaign was a matter of art imitating life. "We are seeing people, especially young people, doing sports in a totally new way, just kids hanging out in their neighborhood playing games," she told Carofano. Mike Byrne, copywriter for Wieden + Kennedy told a writer for Adweek that "play is the mother of all sports . . . A kid gets interested because he falls in love with the movement: throwing, running, catching." In addition, Hal Curtis, creative director for Wieden + Kennedy, told Adweek that "it doesn't matter if a person's big or small" when playing tag. Such was the message imparted to viewers. As Curtis said, "We wanted to . . . bring people back to their youth and garner an emotional reaction."

Emotions aside, the campaign was convincing in its message that Nike made shoes for everyone. Jeff Goodby, the Cannes jury president, told Eleftheria Parpis of Adweek that "Tag" was subtly persuasive in conveying the point that Nike shoes "weren't just [an] athlete's shoes, but something you can use in everyday life." It was meant to convey this idea even if a person's morning commute did not break out into a four-block game of tag.

OUTCOME

The "Play" campaign was launched on August 1, 2001, with "Summer of Play," a star-studded party held at the Niketown store in Beverly Hills, California. The party was essentially a promotional event for a promotional campaign, an illustration of the synergy between Hollywood and Nike. The attendance list, which included Snoop Dogg, Leonardo di Caprio, and Tobey Maguire, helped Nike maintain its image as the go-to company for footwear for the rich and famous. Even though the commercials aired for less than a month, as had been the plan, they were yet another stellar addition to Nike's considerable repertoire of advertising, one that had made it the overwhelming industry leader for years. While most U.S. retailers saw their profits suffer after September 11, 2001, Nike's sales slumped only 2 percent, and the company ended the fiscal year with sales up by 5.5 percent.

"Play" was deemed one of the most creative and successful campaigns of the year by leaders in the advertising industry. In addition to winning the top awards at Cannes, Nike was named Advertiser of the Year at the 2002 Clio Awards, based on Wieden + Kennedy's work for the company. As for peer reviews of the spots, Laurel Wentz and Stefano Hatfield, writing in Advertising Age, called the "Tag" spot "a beautifully directed TV commercial with perfect timing." Garfield was similarly impressed. He called the "Tag" commercial "breathtaking in its conception, its choreography, its wry sensibility, and—beneath its exceedingly complex production—its sheer simplicity."

PRODUCT ASSAULT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Going into the summer of 1997, Nike gave its advertising firm, Portland, Oregon-based Wieden & Kennedy, an "emergency assignment," according to Jimmy Smith, a copywriter for the agency. The "Product Assault" campaign "wasn't even budgeted for the summer, and we had to turn it around quickly," explained Smith in Kathy DeSalvo's August 1997 Shoot article. "Nike wanted to do something to let people know that these cool shoes are out there. After we received all the background information on them, we looked at them and [decided] that they're really cool-looking shoes, so why not just show them?" Nike advertising director for North America Chris Zimmerman expounded further on the strategy behind the campaign: "These ads are really about showing that the product speaks for itself," Zimmerman explained after asserting in Andrew Ross Sorkin's July 1997 Portland Oregonian article that "every shoe has a story to tell."

The resulting print and outdoor advertisements focused visually on the sneakers themselves, but the ads also included minimal copy that promised more to the story. For example, the ad for the Air Foamposit

I featured what most people would recognize as an E-mail address—in this instance, penny@breakudown.com. Sports-savvy consumers could decipher the references embedded in the address: "penny" referred to the guard for basketball's Orlando Magic, Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway, and "breakudown" referred to his speed in wearing out his opponents.

By suggestion, the ads prompted Internet users to send E-mail messages to the given address; Nike's computer server then bounced automated responses back to the sender. For an E-mail sent to penny@breakudown.com, the response read, "Hey, thanks for the email. So you've seen the new Air Foamposit I, also known as Penny's new space boot. Pretty cool, huh? You probably haven't had a chance to really study 'em cuz Penny's always moving so fast, so check out http://www.breakudown.com." This address led Internet surfers to the World Wide Web, where Nike had devoted a website to telling the more complete story of the new shoe. "We don't think of them as Web sites so much as we think of them as 'sitelets,' all linking back to Nike" through the corporate home page, http://www.nike.com, explained Nike's Zimmerman in Sorkin's article. "This is really the first time we have ever done anything like this," continued Zimmerman, summarizing the overall strategy of this integrated campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Outdoor advertising, since it was an oversized medium that amplified the visual spectacle of the new shoes, served as the centerpiece of the campaign that also included print advertising as well as television and radio spots, though these latter two media were lacking the E-mail component of the campaign. Besides directing the television spots, photographer Dan Winters of bicoastal X-Ray Productions also shot the pictures for the campaign, ensuring that the photos would retain their quality when enlarged. At the time, outdoor advertising, which included billboards, phone kiosks, and bus shelters, was experiencing a resurgence in popularity. For example, the billboard company Outdoor Systems Inc. went public on the New York Stock Exchange at about the same time Nike launched this campaign, in 1997. Over the next two years the price of this stock rose about 1,500 percent, putting its growth on par with rapid-growth Internet stocks such as Yahoo! and Amazon.com and enticing Infinity Broadcasting, a subsidiary of media giant CBS Corp., to buy out Outdoor Systems for $8.3 billion in stock and assumed debt. "We seem to be in a golden age with the world's oldest medium, even in the Internet age," said Brian McLean, president and chief executive of Canadian-based Mediacom Inc., a subsidiary of Outdoor Systems, in John Mahler's Toronto Star article on billboard advertising.

Doug Linton of the Toronto-based ad agency Ambrose Carr Linton & Carroll sang the praises of outdoor advertising in the same article: "It's the ultimate precis. You have to have it down in eight words or less . . . It's like working without a net. You're not surrounded by editorial copy or competing with a TV program. You're out there on your own." Whereas McLean and Linton suggested that outdoor advertising gained its strength as a medium isolated from other media, Nike sought to enhance this singular strength by integrating other media into the mix. In essence, Nike walked the high wire of outdoor advertising while also unfurling a net—specifically, the Internet.

Nike had used a similar interactive strategy in a campaign dating back two years, except instead of featuring E-mail addresses superimposed over the photographs focusing on the sneakers, the shoe-centered ads listed toll-free telephone numbers. Those who called simply listened to prerecorded conversations between celebrity athlete endorsers and Nike employees talking about that particular shoe model. This strategy relegated the caller to a passive role in that, after dialing, the caller merely listened. The new campaign forced more active interaction, though the Internet user remained essentially a recipient of information as opposed to engaging in a dialogue about the shoe. A fully interactive campaign would require more human intervention—this campaign utilized technology to draw the consumer into as much of an interactive experience as possible.

TARGET MARKET

Mediacom's McLean continued to discuss in Mahler's article how outdoor advertising reached target audiences more efficiently than other media did: "People aren't home all night on the Internet, despite what some might think. They're driving, shopping, going to arenas, travelling on subways, waiting for buses . . . And we want to catch them when they're out and about, when they're making the choice to purchase." Instead of separating these targeting techniques, Nike combined them to target consumers on the go while simultaneously enticing computer-proficient consumers to extend their interaction with the advertising on the Internet. Nike's youth-oriented targeting dovetailed perfectly with this strategy, as the younger generation grew up with computer technology. If anything, Nike used the print advertising as a gateway to reach this core target market of youths. "The cool thing is when grownups look at the ads, and don't know what it means," explained Wieden & Kennedy's Smith. "They aren't supposed to know. If they were getting it, then we'd be in trouble."

COMPETITION

In May 1998 a print advertisement appeared on the back cover of ESPN Magazine featuring a picture of an athlete

LIKE THOSE RAVE UNDERGROUND PARTIES

When asked why Nike's "Product Assault" campaign forced consumers to take the extra step of sending E-mail to receive the World Wide Web addresses for each shoe model instead of simply including those URLs in the ads, Nike advertising director for North America Chris Zimmerman explained that this more involved process was "more interactive." Wieden & Kennedy copywriter Jimmy Smith expounded further on this strategy in Kathy DeSalvo's Shoot article. "As far as the e-mail addresses, we just wanted a fully integrated campaign," Smith said. "We kind of thought of it as being like those rave underground parties, where you have a number that you call and then that takes you somewhere else. So you send e-mail to these addresses, and then it sends you back a message where to go to get to these other Nike web pages."

in running gear replicated 6,000 times. The advertiser went unidentified except for what appeared to be the address for a website, http://www.97005.com. Most consumers would not recognize the number as the zip code of Nike's corporate campus in Beaverton, Oregon. The website itself featured the same picture as the print ad, accompanied by a window containing the message "Learn," in addition to a box prompting viewers to enter their own E-mail addresses. Seemingly, this integrated ad extended Nike's existing campaign. But as it turned out, this was a teaser ad created for Nike's archrival, Reebok International, by Mindseye Technology. The campaign launched in earnest by sending announcements revealing the identity of the advertiser as Reebok to all of the E-mail addresses gathered by the teaser ad. The teaser website then transformed into a full-fledged ad for Reebok urging runners to "break out" of the mold that had become generic through overproliferation, a swipe at Nike's ubiquitous marketing, and instead to express individuality by wearing Reebok gear.

Nike's other main competitor, Fila USA, which doubled its sales between 1993 and 1997 to enter third place in the athletic shoe category behind Nike and Reebok, consolidated its $20 million advertising account under Arnell Group Brand Consultancy, New York, which had held $7 million of Fila's account. Despite award-winning creative work from Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, Fila awarded the entire account to Arnell for its expertise in building "corporate identity, branding and image development," according to Fila's vice president for advertising Howe Burch in Jeff Jensen's August 1997 Advertising Age article. Specifically, Fila was attempting to reposition itself as more of a performance brand without losing its identity as a fashion brand. Arnell's first assignment involved the November 1, 1997, launch of the Hill IV, a basketball sneaker named after professional player Grant Hill, which would retail for $90 after the previous model, the $100 Hill III, underperformed sales-wise. The campaign would appear in print, outdoor, and television advertising, as well as being pushed at the point of purchase, and ran into 1998.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Besides Hardaway, Nike's "Product Assault" campaign featured numerous other prominent athlete-celebrities with self-descriptive E-mail addresses endorsing specific shoe models: Alonzo Mourning of the Miami Heat (zo@bangonu.com) endorsed the Air Metal Force; boxer Roy Jones, Jr. (rjones@ringyobell.com), cross-trained in the Air Ubiquitous Max; Seattle Supersonic Gary Payton (gpayton@dyoazzup.com) flew in the Air Hawk Flight; Green Bay Packer Reggie White (rwhite@goodgawd) posed for the Air Cover Max; Detroit Lion Barry Sanders (bsanders@madeumiss.com) endorsed the Air Super Zoom; Olympic decathlete Dan O'Brien (dobrien@trynkeepup.com) ran in the Air Max; and Indiana Pacer Reggie Miller (rmiller@makeitrain.com) jumped in the Air Total Max. E-mail sent to these addresses received messages back from the address Email@webmail.nike.com.

Copywriter Tina Hall, in conjunction with the rest of the Wieden & Kennedy team—art director Gary Koepke, creative directors John Jay and Dan Wieden, and management supervisor Karen Brown—used spoken language in the reply messages, employing sports slang and everyday vernacular to make the messages sound authentic. For example, messages sent to O'Brien received the reply "Bet you were out running and you saw the new Air Max, right? Probably didn't get a real good look at it, though, because you just whizzed right by it, clipping off those sub-five-minute miles, huh? That's what we thought, so take your time checking out Dan O'Brien's new Air Max at http://www.trynkeepup.com." A message sent to Miller's address received the reply "So you've seen Reggie Miller's new Air Total Max, huh? Now when you finish practicing your jumpers, go check out http://www.makeitrain.com and witness the ultimate ride for sinkin' threes."

While the print ads ran on billboards as well as in consumer magazines such as Sports Illustrated and Rolling Stone, the campaign also included radio and television spots that ran on ESPN and MTV. In one television commercial the camera centered on a Nike Air Hawk Flight basketball sneaker resting on the dashboard of a car passing through a tollbooth while a radio broadcast of a Seattle Supersonics basketball game featuring the shoe's endorser Payton played on the car radio. Director Winters synchronized the play-by-play announcements to correspond with the car's progress through the tollbooth. As Payton "drives down the lane" of the basketball court, so too did the car with the shoe ornament drive down the tollbooth lane; when the car driver tossed the coin into the hopper to open the tollgate, the radio announced excitedly, "He's got it! Nothing but the bottom of the cup!" as if announcing the driver's coin toss instead of Payton's layup.

OUTCOME

Sorkin reported in his Portland Oregonian article that "interacting with the ads can be tedious." Indeed, the ads required much more patience than consumers were accustomed to in an age of instant gratification. Nike and Wieden & Kennedy, a team that had defined many of the marketing trends of the 1990s, trusted that consumers were oversaturated with advertising that did all the work for them and instead yearned for interactive advertising, especially as consumers became more and more adept at traversing the Internet. In fact, the technical knowledge required by the ads amounted to the most simple of Internet activities—sending E-mail and accessing websites. Furthermore, most advertising did not require any commitment from consumers, as they remained passive recipients of stimuli urging them to purchase the advertised products. This traditional form of advertising left a gap between the viewing of the ad and the purchasing of the product. Nike and Wieden & Kennedy sought to fill in this gap with interaction. If potential buyers entered the gateway of sending the E-mail message, then they had started the process of interaction with the product. This kind of commitment was more likely to lead to a purchase than passive viewing of the product.

Nike's Zimmerman summed up the campaign's strategy with his assessment in DeSalvo's Shoot article: "We're always looking for new and interesting ways to present our product . . . I think that as much as anything else, we thought that this was a very simple, honest and hopefully intriguing approach. In our marketing, we're passionate about a lot of things—sports, athletes." Zimmerman continued, "We want to show consumers how passionate we are about our products. I think [the 'Product Assault' campaign] was a fairly arresting approach visually."

WHAT IF WE TREATED ALL ATHLETES THE WAY WE TREAT SKATEBOARDERS? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nike, Inc. launched its first national advertising campaign portraying skateboarders in 1997. The three television ads that made up the effort used a pseudo-documentary style to depict the tribulations skateboarders suffered when they tried to practice their sport. "Running," "Golf," and "Tennis" showed participants in these three mainstream sports being derided and harassed simply for engaging in their chosen activities. Each spot closed with the tag line that served as the campaign's title: "What if we treated all athletes the way we treat skateboarders?" Created by San Francisco-based advertising agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, the campaign sought to "develop a relationship between the brand and the skaters, and change how [skaters] view[ed] Nike in skateboarding," a Goodby representative told Adweek.

Revamping its image among skateboarders would be no easy task for Nike. Nor was it an unimportant one. Nike's sales were falling, and the brand had lost some of its popularity with teenage consumers—the most profitable segment of the market for athletic footwear and apparel. Once the paragon of hip in youth footwear, the company had fallen into the ranks of the hopelessly uncool and could only watch as smaller rivals captured an ever greater share of the market. Nike had introduced a line of skateboarding shoes and clothing, but consumer reaction had been tepid. Nike hoped "Skateboarders" would boost the popularity of its offerings and drive sales, but the underlying purpose of the campaign was to change perceptions of the company within the youth market. Therefore, "Skateboarders" was conceived less to push a specific product than to gain the respect of the trendy skateboarding community and with it the loyalty of a new generation of consumers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When former track athlete Phillip Knight founded Blue Ribbon Sports in 1964 and began selling shoes out of his car, few would have believed he was laying the foundation for the rise of one of the world's great mega-brands. But in 1972 Knight rechristened his company Nike, after the Greek goddess of victory, and set out to take the athletic shoe industry by storm. Before that time most firms just offered simple and inexpensive sneakers designed for multipurpose use. Nike, by contrast, began to make shoes for specific athletic endeavors and heavily touted the technological advances of its products. This strategy, coupled with Nike's development of a stable of superstar athlete endorsers, catapulted the Oregon-based firm to the top of the industry. In the 1990s alone athletes ranging from Michael Jordan to Tiger Woods donned the Nike swoosh and helped reinforce its association with elite athleticism and excellence. Despite the fact that market research showed that the vast majority of Nike consumers were more likely to hit the mall than the playing field in their new shoes, the brand's advertising drenched itself in sweat and athletic prowess and the company thrived. "We're in the sports business, not the shoe business," a Nike vice president told Time magazine. Between 1995 and 1998 Nike's average annual growth rate was 39 percent, and by 1998 it had seized nearly half the U.S. athletic shoe market.

By the late 1990s, however, cracks began to show in the seemingly impregnable Nike facade. Its footwear sales had dropped 18 percent in 1998, forcing the company to lay off 250 employees at its Beaverton, Oregon, headquarters. Most troubling for Nike was its poor image. While it had once cultivated an outsider image, Nike was increasingly lambasted in the media as a corporate marauder. Critics cited its labor practices in Asia as especially galling. In an effort to change these negative opinions, Nike dropped its famous "Just Do It" campaign in January 1998 in favor of the gentler "I Can," which celebrated everyday athletes more than the superstar professionals. The company also diversified into sports equipment, designing products ranging from baseball cleats to snowboards. As Time explained, "Nike is reassessing everything, from the way it sells to retailers to the number of times the famous swoosh appears in products and in advertising."

TARGET MARKET

Nike's efforts to shake its slump were hindered by a generational changing of the guard. While its athletic shoes had captivated both baby boomer and Generation X consumers, Nike proved to be less popular with the so-called Generation Y, or "echo-boom," generation—those consumers born between 1979 and 1994. It was this demographic group that Nike courted with the "Skateboarders" campaign. Generation Y was an essential market for Nike to reach. These children of the baby boomers numbered 60 million, three times the size of Generation X. They commanded an estimated total annual disposable income of between $82.1 and $108 billion, according to the New York Daily News, and exerted considerable influence over family purchases ranging from electronics to groceries. Since "Nike's best customers" were teens, as Time explained, the brand's sinking image was an obstacle to the company's continued success. Business Week confirmed that "Nike's sneaker sales are tumbling as the brand sinks in teen popularity polls."

In its effort to shore up its status among young people, Nike turned to skateboarding. According to the Wall Street Journal, 6.5 million skateboarders rolled across America's streets in 1998 alone. That number was expected to triple by 2001. Even more important was the fact that skateboarding was a tremendously popular sport among teens. As the Journal noted, extreme sports—which included snowboarding, skateboarding, and street luge, among others—"appeal to Generation

THEY DID IT

The resistance Nike initially faced in the skateboarding community was quite strong. Prior to the campaign many skaters had taken to wearing "Don't Do It" buttons, an unflattering reference to Nike's long-running "Just Do It" campaign.

Y . . . because they aren't the [sports] their parents grew up playing." Moreover, "boarding tend[ed] to have a dangerous edge parents view as rebellious, which is just fine by teenagers."

This was not the first time Nike had tried to get out on the cutting edge of youth fashion. In its basketball shoe advertising of the early 1990s, the company had stylishly portrayed the gritty culture of inner-city basketball and featured spokespeople such as outspoken bad boy Charles Barkley. These ads were designed to appeal particularly to the urban youths who acted as trendsetters for the rest of the teen and 20-something market. The strategy worked, as the popularity of Nikes among urban youth quickly translated to suburban success for the company. In the late 1990s skateboarders—much maligned by authority figures for their clothes, hair and piercing styles, and perceived rebelliousness—had partially taken over this fashion-setting role and played a large part in shaping the shoe buying patterns of the youth market. Nike hoped to repeat its earlier success by improving its cachet among this group.

Nike had some heavy baggage to overcome, however, before skateboard aficionados would accept the company. Nike's traditional formula of slick national advertising laden with superstar athletes was ineffective with echo-boomers, who were less prone to worship basketball, football, and baseball icons than previous generations. Although skateboarding was an Olympic exhibition sport in 1996, many potential participants—the heroes of Generation Y—spurned the competition because of the Games' burgeoning corporatism. Moreover, as a gigantic global conglomerate, Nike was loathed by many professional skateboarders who "regard[ed] corporations and organized communications as evils," explained the San Francisco Examiner. While the flashiness of a Jordan spot might not win over a teen consumer, that group did respond to "humor, irony, and the (apparently) unvarnished truth," reported Business Week. Nike made sure that its "Skateboarders" spots were imbued with these attributes.

COMPETITION

As Nike's popularity was waning among teens, niche brands were becoming trendy. Since skateboarding was becoming the activity of choice for many Generation Y consumers, companies that produced hip skateboarding apparel and shoes saw their market share rise. Athletic footwear companies who designed products for skaters enjoyed annual sales gains ranging from 20 to 50 percent, even though the total U.S. sneaker market was growing at a paltry 2 percent a year in 1996 and 1997. According to the Wall Street Journal, hitherto inconsequential brands captured 7.3 percent of the market in 1997. Foremost among these was Vans. Launched in 1966, Vans had spent most of its history struggling vainly against Nike in the basketball and running shoe realms. But the company radically changed its approach in 1995. After noticing that its clothes and shoes were popular street wear—especially among skaters—Vans committed to focusing on this segment of the market. In addition to sponsoring alternative sports events such as the Vans World Championships of Snowboarding and the Vans Triple Crown of Surfing and Skating, the company signed a roster of endorsers that truly resonated with teens. Daniel Franck, an elite snowboarder, was only one of 236 athletes who further enhanced Vans' credibility among the extreme sport-crazed echo-boomers. Vans' efforts were rewarded when its 1997 sales increased 26 percent to reach $159 million. "The fastest-growing sports are in extreme sports, and our target market, some 78 million strong, plays them," Vans' vice president of marketing told Advertising Age.

Another hip skating brand was Airwalk, which tripled its television ad budget in 1998 when it launched the "Airwalk: The Musical" campaign. With ad agency Lambesis, Airwalk created two commercials that ran on MTV and ESPN, as well as during Comedy Central's popular animated show South Park. The spots spoofed The Sound of Music in their portrayal of extreme athletes engaged in daring stunts. Airwalk also attempted to make its products more mainstream. To reach a broader audience, it expanded its print campaign to include general interest magazines, along with more youth-oriented mountain biking, snowboarding, and skateboarding publications.

Nike's effort to reinvigorate its brand image also confronted more familiar challengers, as Nike was not the only established athletic shoe company to covet the Generation Y market. Adidas, Nike's German rival, met with great success in 1998, when its sales increased 94 percent, making it the third best-selling brand in the United States. Perhaps because Adidas was viewed as less of a behemoth than Nike, it found greater acceptance in the youth segment of the market. In 1999 Adidas introduced its "Forever Sport" campaign, which presented both elite and everyday athletes. In one commercial 18-year-old tennis phenomenon Anna Kournikova hit a tennis ball as the words ''Take Control of the Stadium'' appeared on the screen. In another ''Take Control of the Streets'' flashed across the screen while a skateboarder jumped over various obstacles. Adidas also signed on as an official sponsor of the X Games, an annual extreme sport competition that was tremendously popular with echo-boomers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As predominantly an image-rather than a product-driven campaign, the component ads of ''Skateboarders'' did not need to focus particularly on the actual business of buying and selling. Nike, therefore, was able to avoid the pitfalls of other youth-oriented campaigns that tried (and generally failed) to portray images of Generation Yers to themselves in a way that would actually resonate with those consumers. Instead, Nike strove to connect with its audience emotionally. Mindful that echo-boomers were highly skeptical of glossy marketing efforts, Nike sought to instill ''Skateboarders'' with as much authenticity as possible.

Goodby, which employed two veteran skateboarders on the campaign's creative team, used firsthand interviews with skaters to map its strategy. They discovered that skaters were often harassed by passersby, hounded by the police, and derided as being nonathletic. Goodby opted to turn ''skaters' experience inside out'' and use this concept as the campaign's foundation, an agency spokesperson told Adweek. Through a clever inversion, the three commercials vividly refracted the experiences of skaters. In ''Running'' two joggers were abused in the street. A women screamed at them, and an elderly man denounced them as crazy while drivers hurled garbage at the hapless pair. In ''Golf'' two players were arrested on the green simply for trying to play, while ''Tennis'' depicted the obstacles tennis players might encounter: after meeting stealthily for a midnight game, a security guard interrupted them and chased them away. In all these ads the implications of Nike's message were clear: skaters should be taken as seriously as other athletes, rather than treated as loitering delinquents.

Goodby realized that the spots' visuals would be as important as their message in reaching echo-boomers. Therefore, the spots were shot to look grainy and ''low-budget.'' ''[A] lot of skateboarders film themselves,'' Shoot noted, so the homemade feel contributed to the aura of authenticity Nike hoped to project. Moreover, the popularity of television programs featuring home videos had skyrocketed, especially among Nike's target audience. Shows ranging from When Animals Attack to Scariest Police Chases garnered a considerable audience on network television. Movie directors even adopted the faux-realist technique. ''Kids,'' a bleak tale of alienation and despair among Generation Yers, used this same style to powerful effect. Nike designed its spots to be at home in this milieu.

Nike ran the campaign on a broad array of programs in order to connect with as wide a swath of its target audience as possible. But a cornerstone of the media strategy was the campaign's heavy rotation on ESPN and ESPN 2 during those networks' coverage of the X Games, which captured the exact demographic group Nike sought to reach. ''The X Games has done a virtual full court press around males aged 12-to-34,'' the Washington Post reported. ''According to ESPN, the Summer X Games delivered more viewers in that age group than any other sporting event, including the Super Bowl.''

OUTCOME

Nike declared that ''Skateboarders'' succeeded in its attempt to reach younger consumers. The company told the San Francisco Examiner that it received scores of favorable letters, one of which praised Nike in the language of Generation Y: ''Right on, dude.'' A Goodby spokesperson explained to Adweek a more subtle positive outcome of the campaign. Prior to the debut of the three commercials, Nike's massive size was its chief liability in the eyes of skating culture. They ''viewed Nike as the ultimate big company—a corporation that, they suspected, didn't know anything about skateboarding.'' The ''Skateboarders'' ads made Nike's size seem beneficial. The spots ''actually became a PR campaign for skateboarders with the general public, rendering Nike's 'bigness' a good thing,'' the Goodby spokesperson noted. Skateboarders played the ads in court as a defense against anti-skateboarding tickets. One skating magazine told the story of a cop who told skaters, ''I agree with the Nike ads,'' and decided not to fine them. A skater wrote to the company that ''Nike brought skateboarding something no one else could.''

The campaign also won critical acclaim. ''Skateboarders'' was awarded the Grand Prix (the top prize) at the renowned International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. Agency head Jeff Goodby expressed his theory about the campaign's true achievement to the San Francisco Examiner: ''It was about something that is true. The best advertising, like the best of anything, resonates as something that is true.''

WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nike, Inc., the sports-shoe manufacturer whose use of celebrity athletes as endorsers had helped it become the dominant American brand in its category, began focusing an increasing amount of its marketing resources on women in the 1990s. By the mid-1990s Nike's women's shoes and apparel accounted for over a quarter of its total U.S. sales, and in 1995 the company released its highest-profile women's commercials to date. These early spots were among the first examples of what became known as "empowerment advertising." Nike experimented with other approaches in its women's-products advertising, and at times the brand's paeans to female athleticism were greeted with skepticism, but regardless of Nike's motives, in these campaigns the company consistently sought to address issues that were important to American women.

Among the early empowerment spots—created by longtime Nike advertising agency Wieden+Kennedy of Portland, Oregon—was one that pointed out the dramatic social, health, and psychological benefits that girls derived from participation in sports. Another equated a girls' sports team with a pack of wolves. In 1997–98 Nike, with spots created by San Francisco's Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, moved away from the empowerment message to focus on the emotional drama of a fictional high-school girls' basketball team during a championship season. Spots featuring female Olympic athletes also ran in 1998, and a similar focus on the U.S. women's soccer team prevailed in 1999, before Goodby was relieved of its duties.

Nike lost market share during this period, but it effectively laid the groundwork for a sustained emphasis on women's products, which promised more possibilities for future growth than any of its other lines. Wieden+Kennedy's work for Nike at the start of the new century included a return to empowerment-themed advertising.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

As early as the 1980s Nike began to extend its marketing specifically to women, but these efforts were not especially effective since most of the company's energy was directed to its high-profile men's advertising. By 1990, however, the company, under prodding from some of its own women executives, woke up to the potential of the women's market and began to address it seriously in its advertising. By 1992 Nike was seeing substantial sales gains in the category. Having started by redesigning the shoes for women's different bodies and patterns of use, the company recognized that its advertising, too, might need to take a different approach if it was to have a positive impact on women. Following a series of women-centered campaigns created largely by women at Wieden+Kennedy, Nike was widely praised for its progressive, proactive stance.

The changes in Nike's marketing of women's sports products came after 20 years of changes in the way U.S. educational institutions treated girls' sports programs in general. The passage of Title IX in 1972—the same year Nike was founded—marked a turning point for women's athletics because it barred sex discrimination by any institution receiving federal funding. Furthermore, the new law required schools to offer sports programs for males and females based on their proportional enrollment numbers. The result was a steady increase in the number of girls participating in school sports, from 1 in 27 at the high-school level in 1972 to 1 in 3 in the 1990s, according to the Women's Sports Foundation. Nike spokeswoman Kathryn Reith saw the changes that had overtaken the category of women's athletic footwear as cumulative. "From my perspective," she observed, "there's been evolution, not revolution. Most of the greatest growth probably occurred in the '70s."

During the 1980s Nike stuck to building its reputation as the premier maker of high-performance men's shoes and apparel. The bulk of the women's market was left to Reebok, L.A. Gear, Avia, and others, all of whom tended to downplay technical features in favor of the more traditional appeal of fashion. It was not until the 1990s that Nike began to see women as a vast, largely untapped market for high-tech, high-performance footwear and apparel. Many pointed to the generation that came of age under Title IX as the most significant factor in this development. Suddenly girls who had grown up playing team sports like basketball, volleyball, and soccer were reaching the national stage. Nowhere was this more apparent than at the 1996 Olympic Games in Atlanta, Georgia, where many of the biggest winners for Team U.S.A. were women. Nike signed basketball player Lisa Leslie and soccer player Mia Hamm to endorsement contracts. With more than a quarter of its sales coming

NIKE ACCUSED OF EXPLOITING WOMEN

In 1997 Nike's positive reputation as a leader in advertising to women was undermined by the revelation that it used cheap labor—most of it women and young girls—in the Asian factories it contracted with to make many of the company's products. A coalition of women that included Congresswoman Maxine Waters of California, author Alice Walker, and the National Organization of Women (NOW) wrote to Nike's CEO, Phil Knight, to say, "While the women who wear Nike shoes in the U.S. are encouraged to perform their best, the Indonesian, Vietnamese and Chinese women making the shoes often suffer from inadequate wages, corporal punishment, forced overtime and/or sexual harassment." Ironically, the message and tone of the company's earlier commercials seemed to inflame the situation even more. Elizabeth Toledo, vice president of NOW, commented, "when companies try to make their products into a feminist statement, they had better back it up by corporate policies."

from women's products, the company was now convinced of the financial wisdom of marketing to women.

TARGET MARKET

Nike's natural demographic profile for the campaign was young women ages 18 to 34 who had an interest in athletics. This was the Title IX generation, those who had grown up participating in team sports at their schools and who found athletic activity a natural part of their lives. It was also an age group that was actively concerned with brands in defining its identity and that had disposable income to spend on premium-priced athletic shoes. In Nike's early print advertising to women, the messages spoke directly to women living on their own for the first time and addressed the issue of separating their own identity from that of their families. One headline typical of the campaign said, "You do not have to be your mother," with the ad going on to address its audience in the intimate, conversational manner of a close friend. As a corollary, the market also included teenage girls who would be entering the primary group within five years, the girls specifically featured in Nike's "If You Let Me Play" commercial. Yet the spot spoke to their parents as much as to the girls themselves. Empowerment in this case had to include the financial decision makers. In 1996 Nike sponsored Sports Illustrated's special Sports Illustrated for Kids editions as a way of getting in front of this important demographic segment during the years when children were first forming brand loyalties.

COMPETITION

Nike had long dominated the athletic-shoe industry it had helped to shape. In 1996 Sporting Goods Intelligence estimated Nike's share of the market at 37 percent, with second-place Reebok trailing at 21 percent. Nike was three times as big as number three Fila and number four adidas combined. Yet in the women's segment of the market the situation was quite different. Nike had long seemed locked into its male-oriented market position and even appeared uncomfortable when attempting to reach out to women. One ad during the late 1980s sounded as if Nike's agency, Wieden+Kennedy, were trying to talk to women in the same way it talked to men. "It wouldn't hurt to stop eating like a pig, either," accused a copy line. During the 1980s Nike had been beaten by rival Reebok in the marketing of women's aerobic shoes. Misjudging the potential size of the market for comfortable exercise footwear for women, Nike had stayed out, allowing Reebok to gain a dominant share. Other rivals, including Keds, L.A. Gear, and Avia, also took advantage of Nike's absence to establish their own sizable market shares. Therefore, when Nike began to take the women's market seriously in the 1990s, it faced the prospect of competing against companies that had been talking to women for years. As it launched its first serious campaigns aimed at women, most of the company's competitors immediately stepped up their own marketing efforts as well.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The empowerment advertising exemplified by "If You Let Me Play" and the other spots in Wieden+Kennedy's 1995 television work for Nike's women's division was addressed at least as much to parents as to the girls themselves. It recognized that the parents of Title IX girls were themselves of a generation that had grown up accepting social change. Now they were the parent coaches, the school-board members, and the teachers who were making many of the key decisions concerning girls' sports programs. Nike spokeswoman Vizhier Corpus noted, "Our message, which is directed to parents, is that sports [are] no less valuable to girls than to boys. If you are a parent interested in raising a girl who is physically and emotionally strong, then look to sports as a means to that end."

One often-noted spot presented young girls speaking over a montage of powerful women athletes. In somber yet unsentimental tones, they spoke of the advantages to their physical and psychological health of being allowed to play sports: "If you let me play I will be 60 percent less likely to get breast cancer"; "I will suffer less depression if you let me play sports"; "I will be more likely to leave a man who beats me." Such statements were typical of the messages. Although some critics thought that the spot did not empower girls so much as put them back into the supplicant's role, the commercial was received mostly positively by its target market, the parents of young girls as well as the girls themselves. Another spot in the series compared a girls' sports team to a pack of wolves ready to pounce, breaking with the stereotype of girls as less aggressive athletes.

Despite mostly positive response to the spots, Nike reassigned its women's advertising early in 1997 to the San Francisco agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, which changed the tone of the advertising from empowerment to a more performance-oriented message. (Nike retained its long-term affiliation with Wieden+Kennedy, its marketing partner since 1982, but announced that the agency had been reduced to equal status with Goodby.) Goodby, a more research-friendly agency than Wieden+Kennedy, discovered that the empowerment message was beginning to wear thin with the market, and Nike, in the midst of corporate soul-searching brought on by public criticism of its labor practices as well as by falling profits, decided that it was time to address the market directly. The result was a documentary-style series of nine spots focusing on a fictitious high-school girls' basketball team, the Charleston Cougars. Called "A Championship Season," the campaign was introduced in late 1997 and ran through the first half of 1998. Individual spots captured specific moments in the Cougars' march toward their championship, and as a whole the series was meant to transmit an insider's sense of the ups and downs, anguish, joy, and drama inherent in school sports. Avoiding even a tagline or logo, much less a direct sales pitch, the commercials lingered only long enough on the girls' shoes to identify the Nike brand. A company representative noted, "The Wieden spot was aimed more at parents, while this work talks to the girls themselves." Goodby also crafted a series of Nike commercials that aired during the 1998 Winter Olympics; they featured poems written at Nike's request to celebrate female U.S. Olympic athletes.

In 1999 Goodby focused on the U.S. national women's soccer team, favorites to win that summer's Women's World Cup. The campaign, tagged "We Will Take On the World as a Team," used humorous exaggeration of the superstar players' devotion to their teammates. For instance, one spot showed a young man arriving for a date with one of the team's players, Tisha Venturini, only to find that her teammates Mia Hamm, Brandi Chastain, Briana Scurry, and Tiffney Milbrett would be joining them for the evening. Another spot showed a group of uniformed players in a dentist's office, kicking a ball around aimlessly to the off-camera sound of a dentist's drill. Brandi Chastain then emerged into the waiting room and told her teammates that she had just gotten two fillings. Mia Hamm stood and requested two fillings. "But Mia," the dentist said. "I just examined your teeth. They're perfect." Hamm insisted on submitting to the same treatment as her teammate, and the rest of the players followed her lead, each insisting that she would have two fillings as well. The spirit of teamwork proved so potent and contagious that the dentist's receptionist stood and announced that she, too, wanted two fillings.

Chastain went on to provide Nike with an unexpected boost when, upon kicking the penalty shot that gave the U.S. team the World Cup championship, she celebrated by removing her shirt on live TV. Underneath her uniform Chastain was wearing a Nike Inner Actives sports bra, a product that the company was then readying for launch. Though presumably unrelated to Chastain's act, the Inner Actives print campaign mounted soon after the World Cup similarly tweaked societal conventions regarding the female body. One noteworthy ad featured a frontal view of a woman's bare upper body with text reading, "Exercise and tone every muscle in your body, except the one in your breast."

OUTCOME

The print campaign for the Inner Actives line would be Goodby's last for Nike; in late 1999 the company consolidated its entire advertising account once again with Wieden+Kennedy. "We were hired during hard times for the client in order to offer a different perspective and shake things up," Goodby creative director and cochairman Rich Silverstein told Adweek. "I think we did our job." Similarly, Nike maintained that the move had more to do with streamlining its brand advertising than any dissatisfaction with the Goodby work.

Ironically, Nike's past successes made it vulnerable to a backlash from those who saw the company's very dominance as reason to choose other brands that spoke more directly to a woman's individuality. In that case, the company would have to look beyond marketing to its own corporate philosophy. An Adweek editorial in January 1998 questioned, "Has the brand become so big that sporting a baseball cap with a swoosh now says more about the power of Nike than it does about the person wearing it? If so, Nike is vulnerable. . . . Cutting-edge advertising may not be enough to keep Nike on the cutting edge." Even as the company consolidated its advertising at Wieden+Kennedy again, it remained unclear how the megabrand would deal with this challenge in the years to come.

Wieden+Kennedy's first women's effort after resuming responsibility for this portion of the Nike account came during the 2000 Summer Olympics, and it did not resonate in the way the agency had hoped it would. The spot showed Olympic runner Suzy Hamilton being pursued through her house and into a forest by a masked, chainsaw-wielding man. Hamilton's speed and endurance were too much for the villain, who was shown dropping his chainsaw and walking away, as onscreen text appeared, reading, "Why sport? Because you'll live longer." Although the commercial was meant to spoof horror-film conventions, many felt that it made light of violence against women, and NBC, the network broadcasting the Olympics, pulled it from the programming schedule after the first few days of its intended run.

In 2001 Wieden+Kennedy changed tactics in its work for Nike's women's lines, relying on depictions of ordinary women for whom fitness was a way of life, rather than using celebrity athletes with whom female athletes were expected to identify. This shift marked a partial return to the focus on empowerment that had initially raised Nike's profile among women. Nike increasingly pinned its hopes for future growth on the women's market for sports apparel and footwear, which was then growing much more rapidly than the men's market for such products.

MASS MARKET INITIATIVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nikon Corporation, well known for its high-end cameras embraced by professional photographers and advanced amateurs, faced an increasingly challenging marketplace in the final years of the twentieth century. The market for film cameras was saturated, and the emerging digital-camera market was crowded with competition. In addition to such old-line rivals as Canon, Minolta, and Olympus, Nikon had to contend with well-heeled newcomers, including Hewlett-Packard and Sony. Starting in 2000 Nikon and its ad agency, Minneapolis-based Fallon Worldwide, made a concerted effort to extend the Nikon brand to the mass market.

Nikon introduced a number of new products geared toward the general consumer, and the company scored a hit in 2001 with the Coolpix 775, a best-selling camera during that year's holiday season. The campaign reached a peak in 2002 with the airing of the first Nikon television spot in eight years. The spot, titled "The Search," supported the launch of the Coolpix 2500, the first camera to feature a swivel lens. Although there was no announced budget for the campaign, Nikon had steadily ratcheted up its advertising budget, which grew from $11.7 million in 2000 to $18.2 million in 2001 and to almost $20 million in 2002.

While Fallon made some progress in positioning Nikon in the mass market, the two parties experienced creative differences. In October 2002 Nikon severed its business with Fallon, and the mass-market campaign came to an end.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded as an optical glass company in 1917, Nikon did not make its first camera until 1946, following the lead of two other Japanese companies, Canon and Minolta. Japan at the time was occupied by U.S. forces, who bought the Japanese cameras in post exchanges and brought them home. The Nikon cameras were especially well regarded because of their high quality. During the Korean War, U.S. combat photographers asked Nikon to produce lenses that would fit their German Leica cameras, and soon professional photographers of all types were singing the praises of Nikon lenses and cameras. By the mid-1960s photographers for such major magazines as Life and National Geographic relied on Nikon cameras, which had become accepted as professional-grade while also attracting the interest of advanced amateurs. While Canon and Minolta branched off into making office equipment such as copiers and printers, Nikon remained focused on high-end cameras. In 1983 it gained a foothold in the low end of the market with the introduction of its successful One-Touch camera. But by then the camera business was mature and offered few opportunities for sustained growth.

In the 1980s Nikon placed more emphasis on other optical equipment—such as binoculars, eyeglass lenses, and sunglasses—and diversified into consumer electronics, developing scanners and printers. During the 1990s the camera industry underwent a major upheaval, as digital-camera technology came into its own and quickly surpassed traditional film cameras. The digital revolution also brought with it a new batch of competitors, including Hewlett-Packard, Nokia, and Samsung, electronics companies with no reputation in the photography field but with the advertising muscle to carve out shares in the digital-photography market. In 1997 Nikon introduced the Coolpix line of consumer-priced digital cameras. The first product, the Coolpix 300, was a disappointment. Despite a sleek design it produced poor pictures. Nikon made steady progress on the Coolpix line, albeit enjoying more success on the high end of the market.

As the 1990s came to a close, Nikon possessed a brand with an excellent reputation among professionals and camera enthusiasts, but it still faced a challenge in extending the brand to the mass market. Ever since Nikon hired Minneapolis-based ad agency Fallon McElligott in 1994, the mandate had been to extend the brand. In 2000 the agency (renamed Fallon Worldwide that year) at last launched an intense effort to establish Nikon in the mass market and to promote the company's new line of less-expensive digital cameras. To become more accessible Nikon also moved beyond its traditional channels of specialty photo stores and catalogs and added mass-market retailers such as Target to its distribution network.

TARGET MARKET

Most digital-camera makers concentrated on the huge family market, targeting women in particular. According to studies roughly three-quarters of all family pictures were taken by women. Wives and mothers were also the stewards of family memories and the maintainers of the photo albums. It was understandable that the likes of Kodak and Fuji Film would focus on this large slice of the market. Nikon opted instead to target a different demographic of the amateur-photography market: younger people—25 to 35 years of age, 45 at the outside—who were more technologically savvy and likely to be impressed by Nikon's innovations. The company further reasoned that these consumers would also be attracted to Nikon's reputation for quality.

COMPETITION

Nikon continued to compete on the high end of the photography market with longtime rivals Minolta, Canon, Olympus, and Kodak. It fought for market share on the lower end with these companies plus a range of newcomers who had arrived on the camera scene as a result of the switch from film to digital technology. These companies included Hewlett-Packard, Nokia, Samsung, and Sony. Because they all possessed other successful product lines in consumer electronics, they had already established the distribution channels needed to sell digital cameras at a mass-merchandising level. Moreover the digital entrants all had the kind of financial backing needed to launch aggressive advertising campaigns and to essentially buy credibility in the market. Their combined marketing heft was also instrumental in the rapid rise of digital technology, which supplanted film cameras at a faster-than-expected pace. Two traditional camera companies, Kodak and Fuji, were especially caught off guard because they had been reluctant to give up the highly profitable sale of film and fully embrace digital photography.

Cameras, which were not especially profitable, were actually of secondary importance to many of Nikon's competitors. Most of the companies instead jockeyed to control the output side of the business: the print market. While the competition was developing home printers and self-service kiosks, Nikon remained focused on cameras, but it was not certain that its cachet with professionals would carry over to the mass market, where price was a key factor. In 2000 about two-thirds of digital cameras sold for $69 or less, placing a heavy burden on Nikon's marketers to convince customers to spend the extra money on a Nikon camera, the least expensive of which, the One-Touch, cost $129.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2000 Nikon introduced a number of new 35-millimeter digital cameras geared toward the mass market, including the One-Touch Zoom 90QD and the Light-Touch Zoom 120ED/QD. In May of that year Nikon ran the

CREATIVE DIFFERENCES

Nikon's "The Search" was the first U.S. television spot for its South African director, Kim Geldenhuys, who had to cut both 30- and 60-second versions. "I found it very frustrating to have to do a 30-second spot and put so much into it," he told Adam Remson of Shoot magazine. "It is a new discipline for me because we've always been able to do sixty-second spots [in South Africa]. And if not a sixty, we could do a fifty or a fifty-five or a forty-five. We have got these really strange lengths that we can make commercials over here."

first ads for these products in consumer magazines, making the point that Nikon cameras were not just for professionals. But Nikon also did not neglect the high-end digital market, introducing the $1,000 Coolpix 990, which was promoted in photo and computer magazines with ads aimed at the "discriminating digital camera user," according to a Fallon spokesperson.

All told Nikon spent $11.7 million on advertising in 2000, but as the company made a greater push to enter the mass market, its ad budget rose to $18.2 million in 2001. The primary digital camera it promoted was the Coolpix 775, listed at $399, a price at which consumers were willing to stretch to buy a Nikon product and one that afforded a profit in a low-margin field. Todd Wasserman of Brandweek quoted market research analyst Michelle Slaughter as saying the Coolpix "was a very strong product for [Nikon] at a very competitive price point." It was one of the best-selling digital cameras during the 2001 holiday season. The supporting advertising campaign featured actress Kim Cattrall (from Sex and the City) as a spokesperson. Her endorsements consisted of hosting promotional events and appearing with the Coolpix 775 during interviews. Nikon also conducted a guerilla-marketing van tour across the United States to offer consumers a chance to try out the Coolpix 775.

In 2002 Nikon launched another product in the Coolpix line, the Coolpix 2500, priced on store shelves at $379.99. It was in support of this product that Nikon's mass-market push reached its culmination and resulted in the production of Nikon's first television commercial in eight years. The spot, called "The Search," evolved from the experience of Fallon's creative team with the camera. "It's not like picking up a normal camera," Fallon's group creative director Bruce Bildsten told Aaron Baar of Adweek. "It has a quality to it. You just want to pick it up and play with it." The defining feature of the Coolpix 2500 was an inner swivel lens, which allowed the user to take a self-portrait or a picture of the sky, among other things, without tilting the camera. According to Baar, "as Bildsten and his team worked on ways to target young, digitally aware consumers, curious passersby took a fancy to a prototype of the camera. . . . That idea, coupled with Nikon's target of 25- to 35-year-olds, suggested a party where the camera gets passed around the crowd."

For the commercial "The Search," Fallon chose the award-winning South African director Kim Geldenhuys, who had directed spots for BMW in European markets. Fallon was BMW North America's ad agency, so it was already familiar with the director's work. Because it was much less expensive to work in South Africa, the spot was filmed there. It was done in 18-hour days, during which Geldenhuys attempted to create a nonstop party, hiring a DJ and urging the actors to mingle during their downtime. As a result several improvised moments made their way into the commercial.

In "The Search" a gawky 20-something man at a party took a picture of himself against a sunset, drawing the attention of two attractive women, who asked to look at the camera and then took it inside. The young man chased the camera throughout the crowded party. When he finally caught up to it, it was in the possession of two different women. To determine if the camera really was his, the women scrolled through the camera's memory of pictures, finally coming across an embarrassing one of him. Highly amused by what they saw, they handed over the camera and left him to offer the awkward defense, "It's just a hobby." The spot's concluding line was "The one that swivels." The nature of the embarrassing picture and the man's "hobby" were left to the audience's imagination. "For all we know, it could be him wearing an engineer's hat, just playing with model trains," Bildsten told Baar. "The Search" was aired for the first time in late April 2002 during The Late Show with David Letterman. Afterward it was shown on a variety of network shows and national cable channels. For 2002 Nikon increased its advertising budget to nearly $20 million, most of which supported the company's strategy of gaining a foothold in the mass market.

OUTCOME

While Fallon's mass-market initiative met with some success, especially with the Coolpix 775 in 2001, it was not enough to overcome the creative differences that had developed between the agency and client. Six months after the "The Search" premiered, Nikon and Fallon terminated their relationship, the client stating in a press release that "the time was right to explore new creative options in our advertising activities." For its part Fallon was tight-lipped, merely saying, "We've been proud to represent this highly revered brand, and we wish them every success in the future." According to Adweek 's Baar, however, "Nikon's conservative, retail-oriented ad approach clashed with Fallon's desire to craft brand-image ads. The client wanted to use an actor in its ads; the agency didn't." Shortly after the split, in fact, Nokia turned to its retail-marketing agency, Source Communications, and created a spot that featured actor Val Kilmer.

THE NIKON SCHOOL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nikon Corporation, one of the leading manufacturers of professional photography equipment, ran an advertising campaign in 1997 to invite photographers of all skill levels to participate in the Nikon School, a seminar that traveled to cities across the United States. The advertisements ran exclusively in print media, including numerous photography magazines. One spot, "Tip #5," featured a close-up photograph of a cat and a small dog looking at each other. Below them, a mouse crouched on a dinner plate and nibbled at a piece of food as if oblivious to the larger animals looming over it. The caption read, "Tip #5: Some photo opportunities only last a second." A block of smaller text continued, "For some reason, we feel compelled to open by mentioning the lunch that comes with our 8-hour class. But more importantly, our expert instructors will teach you everything from basic composition to advanced exposure techniques. You also get the 157-page Nikon School Handbook, all for a mere $95." Nikon's tracking studies revealed that inquiries about the school increased sharply after the ads ran, and in many cases attendance at the seminars was higher than the company had anticipated. The campaign was developed by Fallon McElligott, which had been named advertising agency of the year in 1995 by Advertising Age.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Nikon, a global company based in Japan, was established in 1917 when three optical manufacturers merged. By 1997 the company was making many types of optical equipment, including cameras and other photography products, microscopes, binoculars, electronic imaging equipment, eyeglasses, and surveying instruments. It was one of the few companies that handled all the steps in the manufacturing of optical equipment, from making glass to shaping, polishing, and assembling lenses. Optical technology by Nikon was used in the radiometer with an optical sensor that produced visible, near-infrared light for the Advanced Earth Observing Satellite called Midori, which had been launched in 1996. The company also produced a large objective mirror for astronomical telescopes, and its research into the properties of the spectrum was being applied to fields such as astronomy, biotechnology, and the making of semiconductors. In response to demand for high-quality equipment for professional photographers, the company began manufacturing camera lenses in 1932, selling more than 24 million by 1997. It made 35mm format cameras since the 1940s and was one of five companies that cooperated to develop the Advanced Photo System (APS), an alternative to 35mm cameras and film that was introduced in 1996. Nikon's share of the worldwide photographic products market had varied over a five-year period, with 6.8 percent of the market in 1997, 3.6 percent in 1996, 1.3 percent in 1995, 8.5 percent in 1994, and 4.1 percent in 1993.

Because Nikon photographic equipment was used extensively by professionals, the company's advertising had frequently used technical language to describe the quality and versatility of the products. One ad in a photography magazine in 1993 consisted of an impressive landscape photograph and a picture of a Nikon camera surrounded by fourteen paragraphs of text full of highly technical information such as: "By adding the Nikon SB-24 AF Speedlight, you can automatically balance the flash illumination with ambient background light without calculating fill-flash ratios." The ad featured the tag line Nikon had used for years, "We Take the World's Greatest Pictures." In 1994, at the suggestion of ad agency Fallon McElligott, the tag line was expanded to "We Take the World's Greatest Pictures. Yours." The addition of the one word made the company's products seem more relevant and accessible to the average consumer without alienating the professional photographers who had been Nikon's biggest customers.

The Nikon School was established in 1993 to help amateurs, semi-professionals, and professionals improve their skills in 35mm photography. Its intensive, one-day sessions replaced a similar program that had featured two-day sessions. Each year the courses were offered on weekends in cities across the United States. Using lectures and slide shows, the school's instructors covered topics such as composition, flash photography, and photographing natural phenomena such as rainbows and sunsets. Because students had a broad range of skill levels, the Nikon School had to be interesting enough for advanced students but not too difficult for novices.

TARGET MARKET

Many of Nikon's advertisements in 1997 targeted the general public. In that year the company ran the "Nikon School" campaign and also a series of simple, uncluttered

PROMOTIONAL VIDEOTAPES

The Nikon School was also publicized through the ''Nikon Masters Series,'' a video collection of some of the world's best photographers working in their fields of expertise. The series featured interviews, documentary footage, and photography on location. Along with an inside perspective on professionals at work, the videos showed how accomplished photographers used Nikon equipment. The series covered photojournalism, wildlife photography, portraits, action shots, and the use of light to make exceptional pictures. Beginning in August 1997 the videotapes were available from Nikon dealers and directly from Nikon Corporation.

spots for its photographic equipment. Ads from two or more of the company's campaigns frequently appeared in the same issue of magazines such as Popular Photography. One camera advertisement featured a snapshot of a young man swimming beneath the words, ''You point it. You shoot it. You frame the sucker.'' Smaller text added, ''When we say the N50 is easy to use, we don't mean 'easy for people who've won Pulitzers for Photography.' We mean seriously simple, as in, hand it to an average dad and say, 'push here.' In Simple Mode, you can literally point the N50, shoot it, and capture frame-worthy, SLR-quality images like this. The camera is positively foolproof. Or more to the point, dad-proof.'' The ad concluded with the new tag line ''We Take the World's Greatest Pictures. Yours.''

Although Nikon had broadened its marketing efforts to appeal to the average consumer, the company had not abandoned the professionals who had always been its core customers. One magazine advertisement in 1997 invited photographers to visit Montana with their cameras. Positioned next to spectacular pictures of mountains in Glacier National Park was text explaining why a professional photographer had used Nikon equipment to make the images, how he had composed them, the type of lenses he had chosen, the aperture settings, and the shutter speeds he used. The language was simple enough for an amateur to understand, but it provided details of interest to more advanced photographers.

By explaining the basics of photography along with advanced techniques, the Nikon School appealed to consumers with a broad range of skill levels, but most considered themselves amateurs or advanced amateurs. Some had recently purchased a sophisticated, single-lens-reflex camera, and they wanted to learn how to use it effectively. Some simply wanted a better understanding of photography in general. Others had studied photography in the past but needed a refresher course that would inform them about the latest equipment and techniques. Some had attended previous sessions of the school and knew how valuable the classes could be. ''Repeat visitors to the school treat the experience as if it were a pilgrimage. They are seeking inspiration and renewal for their craft. And they know from prior experience that they will get it,'' said Tom McEnery, management supervisor with Fallon McElligott.

COMPETITION

In 1997 some of Nikon's competitors also ran magazine advertisements that featured photography tips for readers. A two-page spread for Fuji Photo Film U.S.A. (commonly known as Fujifilm) in the March issue of Popular Photography was timed to coincide with the airing of the magazine's cable television program Freeze Frame: Switzerland. A team of still photographers using Fujifilm products had traveled throughout Switzerland with cinematographers from the Travel Channel, taking pictures on assignment for Popular Photography and providing tips for viewers who wanted to improve their travel shots. The magazine advertisement featured a large background photograph of Europe's largest glacier filling a valley between jagged mountains. Smaller photographs of Swiss scenery and the television program's participants were superimposed over the large picture, along with explanatory text. The captions outlined the content of the program, listed the dates and times at which it could be seen on television, provided tips for taking photographs like those in the ad, and told which film and equipment made by Fujifilm had been used to make each image.

Another competitor, Sigma Corporation of America, ran a series of magazine advertisements that showed how professional photographers used the company's products to take spectacular pictures. One ad featured a large photograph that had been shot through the railing of a bridge on the Thames River in England. The caption read, ''For this assignment, I went back to this familiar bridge on the Thames and made some fresh discoveries. The Sigma lens I chose is light, compact, and easy to operate.'' The text went on to explain some of the advantages of that lens, along with the aperture and shutter speed used to make the photograph. Another advertisement was dominated by a photograph of an unusual, rounded structure with a metallic exterior. The caption read, ''Amid buildings and sites stamped in history, at the south bank of the Thames, you suddenly come upon futuristic scenes. The Sigma lens I chose to photograph this scene responded accurately to my design.''

Another series of advertisements promoted the New York Institute of Photography's correspondence course. A two-page ad in Popular Photography called the institute the "world's oldest and largest photography school" and said, "We guarantee you'll be a better photographer! Send for free booklet to learn how NYI will bring out your hidden talent. For well over 80 years NYI has helped promising amateurs become successful photographers. Now our new 'Century 2000' Method makes learning at home easier and more enjoyable than ever." The ad explained that the course included lessons on videotape and audiotape, an illustrated textbook, and audiotaped critiques of each student's work. It included a coupon that the reader could fill out and mail for more information, along with the company's Internet address.

In contrast, much of the advertising by several of Nikon's other competitors in 1997 promoted the Advanced Photo System (APS), a new type of equipment and film that made photography easier for consumers. These ads typically focused on the products instead of featuring how-to tips. APS had been developed jointly by Nikon, Canon U.S.A., Minolta Corporation, Eastman Kodak Company, and Fujifilm. All five companies made their own brands of APS cameras, but only Kodak and Fujifilm made APS film. Although each company had advertised the launch of the new system in 1996, Kodak had spent by far the most—about $80 million worldwide—to publicize its Advantix brand. According to Advertising Age, the total spent by all advertisers to promote APS products in 1996 was $115 million. In 1997 Kodak's worldwide advertising budget for Advantix was about $100 million, with about $60 million allocated for advertising in the United States. Kodak's new advertisements for 1997 explained what APS was and familiarized the public with the Advantix brand name. Each spot featured Kodak's general corporate signature "Take Pictures. Further." Canon promoted its ELPH brand of APS products with the tag lines "It's So Advanced . . . It's Simple" and "ELPH: The Big Name in the Advanced Photo System." The tag line for Fujifilm's advertising was "Isn't It About Time Taking Pictures Made Everyone Smile?" Minolta marketed its Vectis brand with the catch phrase "Big Bang Technology." The five companies ran some co-op advertisements, including one that read, "The Nikon Pronea 6i Advanced Photo System camera takes many different lenses. And Kodak Advantix film." In addition to the Pronea brand, Nikon offered the Nuvis brand of APS compact cameras.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By featuring Nikon equipment at the seminars and offering expert instruction in the latest photographic techniques, the Nikon School helped the company convey an image of professionalism without blatantly promoting the brand. Likewise, the advertising campaign took a low-key approach to publicizing the company's products. Although the Nikon name was prominently displayed in the ads, the company's logo and general tag line, "We Take the World's Greatest Pictures. Yours," were not included. Each advertisement caught the reader's eye with a large photograph above two rectangles, one solid gold and one black. The gold block framed a caption, and the black one framed the words "The Nikon School" in reverse type.

In one advertisement a group of firefighters posed in front of a building with flames and smoke billowing out the windows. The caption said, "Tip #34: Remember to compensate for backlighting." The accompanying text added, "Before snapping a photo, it's a good idea to take a gander at what's happening in the background. Just one of the topics covered in our eight-hour class, where you'll learn everything from basic composition to advanced exposure techniques. You also get the 157-page Nikon School Handbook and a lovely lunch, all for $95." Another advertisement showed a tiny dog looking intimidated by the unusually tall fire hydrant towering over it. The caption read, "Tip #44: To get animals to hold still, give them something to focus on." The smaller text said, "We can all feel a tad overwhelmed now and then, and photographers are certainly no exception. Which is exactly why we recommend taking our eight-hour class, where you'll learn everything from basic composition to advanced exposure techniques." A third ad featured a photograph of two tombstones with the names "Knock" and "Knock." The caption said, "Tip #52: Try a slower film for motionless objects."

Because each ad focused on one aspect of photography, the campaign helped show that the school offered instruction in many subjects, such as how to choose the best lens for each picture; how to measure light; how to choose the best film speed, shutter speed, and aperture; how to use flash lighting; how to recognize and compose an effective photograph; and how to master close-up photography. The advertisements addressed problems that photographers of all skill levels commonly encountered, and they promised that students would find answers and access to knowledgeable professionals at the Nikon School. Each ad included a telephone number to call for more information, and some provided the company's Internet address and a list of cities where the school was scheduled to be offered that year. The advertisements ran only in print media, particularly photography magazines.

OUTCOME

One of the "Nikon School" campaign's primary objectives was to boost attendance by reaching out to creative amateur photographers who wanted to improve their craft. According to McEnery of Fallon McElligott, the advertisements succeeded in generating enthusiasm for the school and conveying the key message that the classes could help photographers who wanted to be better than "good enough." Another objective was to encourage consumers to call for more information. McEnery said the campaign clearly achieved those goals. "The 1997 Nikon School season has been one of the most successful ever. Anticipated ticket sales were exceeded on a regular basis. Given our limited schedule of insertions, Nikon was able to track the spike in mail and phone calls following each ad. And we had concrete proof of those conversations; approximately a third of attendees in several sites stated in their exit survey that they learned about the Nikon School through advertising," McEnery noted.

DO YOU SPEAK MICRA? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s, after nearly a decade of declining sales, Japan's Nissan Motor Company, Ltd., flirted with bankruptcy. The 1999 arrival of Carlos Ghosn as Nissan's CEO, however, marked the beginning of one of the automotive industry's most striking turnarounds. Within a few years Ghosn moved Nissan out of debt and into a new era of profitability, thanks to dramatic cost-cutting measures and a renewed emphasis on innovation in car design. The European automotive market remained a tough one for Japanese brands, but Nissan was counting on a 2003 redesign of its subcompact Micra model to drive growth across the continent. To announce the redesign, Nissan and its agency, TBWA\G1 Europe, created an integrated advertising campaign called "Do You Speak Micra?" which suggested that the supposedly groundbreaking Micra redesign required the invention of a new descriptive language.

"Do You Speak Micra?" combined TV, cinema, print, outdoor, and online elements, among other assorted marketing platforms, and it spanned 19 European countries and multiple languages, at a price tag of more than 20 million euros. The idea of "speaking Micra" was first circulated by a January 2003 television and cinema spot in which a set of mysteriously disembodied blue lips intoned invented words, such as "modtro" (a combination of "modern" and "retro"), to describe the new Micra. This spot also ran online courtesy of an arrangement between Nissan and Yahoo!, and print and outdoor ads used the same concept and imagery. As the 12-month campaign matured, individual country-specific variants of the "Do You Speak Micra?" message were implemented.

In 2003 Micra sales grew by 70 percent compared to 2002, outperforming Nissan's ambitious precampaign goals. Unaided, spontaneous awareness of the Micra model grew considerably, as did consumers' willingness to consider purchasing a Micra. The campaign won a French EFFIE in 2003 and a bronze Euro EFFIE in 2004 in the automotive category.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

After a production peak in 1989, Japan's Nissan Motor Company saw its sales decline steadily throughout the 1990s, so that by 1999 the automaker was on the verge of bankruptcy. That year, however, France's second-largest automobile manufacturer, Renault, purchased nearly 37 percent of Nissan's public shares and set the Japanese company on the road back to solvency by providing a much-needed infusion of cash and by installing Carlos Ghosn as CEO. Ghosn instituted the Nissan Revival Plan, mandating a return to profitability by 2001, an increase in operating margin (the percentage of revenue remaining after a company had fully paid its production costs but before it paid interest or taxes), and a dramatic reduction of its debt load in the coming years. Ghosn was able to meet these benchmarks ahead of schedule, thanks to measures that included an aggressive diet of job cuts and a streamlining of the company's supply chain. By early 2002 Nissan had officially recovered from its near-death experience and could focus again on future growth. At the same time Renault increased its Nissan holdings to 44 percent, paving the way for an increasingly vital partnership.

In the European market Nissan was particularly counting on a 2003 update of its subcompact-class Micra, which had not been redesigned since 1992. Not only did the Micra redesign offer aesthetic value and new technological features, but it was also priced lower than the Micra had been in previous years. Nissan was able to offer the Micra at a lower price partly because of its alliance with Renault—the new Micra and a Japanese version of the same car, the March, shared a chassis codesigned by Nissan and Renault, which allowed the companies to purchase parts in greater volume at substantial savings—and partly because Nissan changed its parts-buying patterns for the Micra, purchasing outside of the United Kingdom (where the Micra was built) when necessary in order to cope with fluctuating exchange rates.

Historically, Europeans had been much more hesitant to embrace Japanese auto brands than Americans had, vastly preferring cars produced in Europe. As of 2002 Japanese brands accounted for only 11.5 percent of the 15 million cars sold annually in Europe; in contrast, 30 percent of autos sold in the United States were Japanese.

TARGET MARKET

"Do You Speak Micra?" targeted European professionals between the ages of 25 and 34 and with moderate to high incomes. The small size of the Micra made it a selection that was most natural for those who did not yet have children and for those who lived in urban areas. The campaign ran in Austria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, the Slovak Republic, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

Nissan and TBWA set campaign goals of generating a 2003 Micra sales increase of 60 percent compared to 2002, which necessitated an appeal that would draw consumers who were previously loyal to other automotive brands. Additionally, Nissan hoped to establish an iconic, enduring market presence for the Micra among young people. Although the Micra had an established reputation in Europe, TBWA and Nissan used the dramatic redesign as an opportunity to relaunch the model and imbue it with a new, captivating personality. The campaign's various executions were accordingly bold, positing the idea that an effective description of the radically redesigned Micra required the invention of a new language.

CORPORATE HERO

Carlos Ghosn, the CEO who orchestrated Nissan's dramatic turnaround beginning in 1999, became a folk hero of sorts in Japan because of what he did for the company. "The Japanese public sees in Nissan a company that is representative of problems that many Japanese corporations face," Ghosn told Forbes. "The fact of turning Nissan around in a clear, neat way is a strong message of hope in Japanese society. People stop me in the street and say gambatte [go for it!] and wish me luck."

COMPETITION

Among Europeans, Japanese cars historically had a reputation for lackluster styling and handling, and as of 2000, according to BusinessWeek, Toyota alone had managed to crack this stereotype. The model with which Toyota had done so, the Yaris, was a subcompact positioned directly against the Micra. Designed with European tastes in mind, the Yaris's "distinctive grill and curvaceous dashboard," as BusinessWeek put it, displayed "the sort of pizzazz Europeans expect from Volkswagen, Fiat, or Renault." The Yaris was the best-selling Japanese car in Europe, and among Japanese automakers in Europe, Toyota was the top seller by a comfortable margin, with 800,000 vehicles sold in 2002, a far cry from the 470,000 that second-place Nissan sold in Europe that year. Toyota's sales grew by 14 percent in Europe in 2002, even though the European automobile market as a whole was down 4 percent. Sales were again down industry-wide in Europe in 2003, but that year Toyota sales increased by more than 10 percent. By early April 2004 Toyota's market share in Europe was 5.4 percent, greater than that of such stalwart European brands as Audi and BMW and approaching that of the Italian carmaker Fiat.

Honda Motor Company was the third-best-selling Japanese brand in Europe. Although it had been losing market share regularly since the late 1990s, Honda rallied in 2002. The recent introduction of a redesigned Civic hatchback and a new subcompact, the Jazz, drove a European sales increase of 17 percent that year. The Jazz, positioned to compete with the Micra and the Yaris for young consumers, was Honda's first subcompact car to be sold in Europe since the discontinuation of the Logo in the 1990s, and it represented Honda's most promising appeal to younger Europeans in recent memory.

Foremost among European subcompacts was the Volkswagen Golf. The Golf accounted for 15 percent of all cars manufactured by Volkswagen, but Golf sales were in decline worldwide and in Europe. The first new Golf redesign in seven years was unveiled in late 2003, threatening the renewed strength of the Micra's market positioning in the wake of the "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign. Golf sales in 2004 did not meet Volkswagen's expectations, however, forcing the company to offer incentive programs that undercut its profits. In light of the increasing European success of Japanese brands such as Toyota and Nissan, many analysts saw Volkswagen's difficulties as symptomatic of a larger shift in the European automotive market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Do You Speak Micra?" was created by TBWA\G1 Europe and then adapted by various European branches of the TBWA Worldwide network, depending on the country and language used, as the campaign evolved over its January–December 2003 run. TV, cinema, outdoor, print, online, and interactive placements were used to build consistent mainstream awareness across the campaign's geographic range, and supplementary executions were developed according to each country's individual demands. The campaign's total budget was in excess of 20 million euros.

The campaign was defined by suitably unordinary imagery, most prominently a single striking image of surreally disembodied, shiny, blue, female lips. This image was introduced in a TV and cinema commercial directed by the famously offbeat American film director David Lynch, known for cult classics such as Eraserhead and Blue Velvet and the TV series Twin Peaks. The English-language version of the spot showed the glistening blue lips hovering mysteriously over a noir-inflected nighttime cityscape, intoning the words "modtro," "simpology," and "spafe" against visuals of the redesigned Micra in motion on the streets below. After the lips pronounced each word, onscreen text informed viewers of its meaning: "modtro" was a combination of "modern" and "retro," "simpology" an amalgamation of "simple" and "technology," and "spafe" a fusion of "spontaneous" and "safe." Although the imagery remained consistent in non-English-language versions of the spot, the neologisms and their root words varied depending on the language used. The spot concluded with the paired images of the blue lips and the new Micra, as the lips asked, "Do you speak Micra?"

Print and outdoor ads recycled the image of the lips as well as images of the Micra itself, and each ad typically focused on one particular neologism. Nissan also partnered prominently with the online company Yahoo! to extend the buzz surrounding the TV and cinema spots, presenting the Lynch-directed commercial for online viewing at the Yahoo! music channel LAUNCH (http://launch.yahoo.com). Free Micra-related gifts were also offered to those Yahoo! users who, having previously opted to receive promotional information from the company, responded to an E-mail offer to test-drive the new Micra.

Country-specific advertisements included a print series in France that was more explicitly geared toward female members of the target market. One such ad showed images of the new Micra paired, according to color, in mathematical equations with images of various outfits of female clothing; each combination of Micra color and outfit was said to equal one of the French neologisms used in the campaign. For instance, a dark-gray Micra, when paired with a red halter top, black jeans, and high heels, was said to equal "aggressuelle," a combination of the French words for "aggressive" and "sensual." One of the more noteworthy U.K.-specific elements of the campaign was a guerilla effort targeting those who drove competitors' cars. Informational packets about the Micra, including a reply mailing to request a test drive as well as a questionnaire to be returned for a chance to win a free vacation, were attached to the side mirrors of parked cars manufactured by Nissan's competitors.

OUTCOME

Nissan surpassed its precampaign goal of increasing Micra sales in 2003 by 60 percent over the preceding year; the 2003 sales increase reached 70 percent in Europe. Micra sales accounted for 42 percent of Nissan's total European sales that year, and Micra's market share in the small-car segment increased by 62 percent during the campaign's run. The campaign also substantially increased awareness of the model. According to a tracking study, spontaneous awareness of the Micra model increased by 69 percent as a result of the relaunch campaign, and the number of consumers willing to consider purchasing a Micra increased by 88 percent. The campaign won a 2003 EFFIE Award in France and a bronze 2004 Euro EFFIE. The Euro EFFIEs were the European counterpart to the prestigious EFFIE Awards that were sponsored by the New York American Marketing Association.

Despite the fact that European auto sales were down overall, 2003 was a growth year for Nissan as well as other Japanese brands in Europe. By the end of 2004

Europe's resistance to Japanese cars began to seem a relic of history, as Nissan and Toyota, among other Asian automakers, continued to increase their market shares at the expense of their European counterparts.

ENJOY THE RIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Nissan launched the biggest marketing effort in its history, the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign, in August 1996. The $200 million budget was four times the previous budget and placed Nissan behind only General Motors in spending on advertising. "Enjoy the Ride" was designed as a brand identity campaign. Its intent was to remind consumers of Nissan's deep heritage and love of cars and to convince potential customers that the company's cars were fun to buy and drive. Nissan also wanted to persuade customers that their feedback and car-buying experiences were important.

The campaign encompassed the gamut of marketing. Spots appeared on network as well as cable television, on syndicated shows, and on televised sporting events. An extensive outdoor and print campaign ran in tandem with the television ads, with advertisements appearing on buses, billboards, benches, and other places. The campaign, which ended in late 1997, boasted more than a dozen television spots with various Nissan automobiles and included the unveiling of the 1998 Nissan Altima.

Each ad starred an elderly Japanese man with a Jack Russell terrier. The character, intended to symbolize Nissan's heritage, was inspired by Yutaka Katayama, president of Nissan from 1965 to 1975 and known as Mr. K. Katayama's personal philosophy was "Love people. Love cars. Love life," and this was the philosophy behind the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Historically, automobile advertising in the United States was not innovative. Most television commercials showed a new car driving down a scenic road, with a narrator describing the car's features. Research indicated that many viewers disliked the typical car ads, which motivated Bob Thomas, at the time the president and CEO of Nissan's U.S. operations, to strive for something unconventional and different. Rob Siltanen, a creative director at TBWA Chiat/Day, Nissan's advertising agency, told Adweek, "We discovered that consumers hate car advertising . . . They said it's all the same—shiny cars driving down roads. They could smell them coming. As soon as they saw the car, they flipped the channel." In USA Today, Tom Orbe, Nissan's vice president of marketing, agreed, "If you asked someone if they'd rather see a car ad or get a root canal, they'd say they'd rather get a root canal."

Nissan decided to gamble on its brand identity rather than on individual models of cars and hoped to present its brand image in an innovative fashion. Thomas asserted that, because many automobile manufacturers produced good cars, "a good product is no longer good enough" in the industry. He stated, "We at Nissan are on a mission to put sales prospects and Nissan owners first. Ultimately, this will increase sales retention rates and generate potential owners who actively seek out our brand, not our lowest sale price.'' The brand image Nissan hoped to convey was the love of life, cars, and driving.

The campaign was launched in August 1996 with the two-minute spot ''Dream Garage,'' which appeared during the closing ceremonies of the Olympics. The spot introduced the Mr. K. character in a dreamlike garage filled with classic Datsun and Nissan models. It ended with the tag line ''Life is a journey. Enjoy the ride.'' The spot was designed to cement Nissan's brand identity in viewers' minds and to evoke the thrill of car ownership.

Nissan followed up ''Dream Garage'' with ''Toys'' in November 1996. This animated spot featured a GI Joe-type character who drove off in a Nissan convertible with a Barbie character, leaving a Ken look-alike pouting in the background. The ad was set to the song ''You Really Got Me'' by Van Halen. The spot was immensely popular and received awards as the best commercial of the year from USA Today, Rolling Stone, Adweek, and other publications.

Encouraged by the positive response, Nissan continued the ''Enjoy the Ride'' campaign into 1997 and hoped that sales would follow. Although 1996 sales fell 2.7 percent from 1995, Thomas told the Los Angeles Times that a Nissan survey revealed that brand awareness had risen by 30 percent and that the brand's likability had gone up by 100 percent.

TARGET MARKET

According to Nissan, its primary target market included college-educated, upscale individuals who typically purchased new import automobiles. Because this consumer group invariably disliked car commercials, Nissan sought to connect with potential buyers by presenting a fun and quirky marketing campaign. Chiat/Day's Siltanen told the New York Times, ''... auto advertising is No. 1 least liked. So you give them [viewers] things that delight them, that reward them, for watching a commercial and treat them as if they have brains.'' Nissan's Orbe elaborated on the idea behind the campaign by saying, ''No running footage. No performance specs. In order to reach our audience and effectively invite it to like us, as a car company, we had to create commercials that were 'bigger' than that.'' Nissan bet that the campaign would convey the message that Nissan cars were both reliable and unique, built for people who embraced life and loved cars and driving. If the viewers liked Nissan, it was thought, they would then visit a Nissan dealer.

One of the hurdles Nissan needed to overcome in its marketing campaign was to convince the target market that its cars were on a par with those of rivals Toyota and Honda. In USA Today Ron Pinnelli, an auto analyst with AutoData, stated, ''People's perception is that [Nissan's] quality is not up to the level of Toyota and Honda... They have really not gotten their quality message across.'' In fact, there was evidence confirming the quality and reliability of Nissan's cars. A 1997 study by the research firm J.D. Power and Associates indicated that in the first 90 days of ownership the Nissan Altima had the fewest number of reported complaints among midsize sedans. Nissan needed a method for conveying this information to would-be consumers in a convincing, effective manner.

MR. K.

Some observers questioned the decision to use a Japanese character to convey the spirit of Nissan. Japanese corporations were generally wary of promoting their cultural heritage, partly because of the 1992 ''Buy America'' campaign that had promoted the big three U.S. automakers—General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler.

COMPETITION

The 1990s were a difficult period in the U.S. automobile market as U.S. manufacturers became more competitive and Japanese makers introduced strong models. Although Nissan held steady with its popular Altima and surpassed Honda in 1993, the company was not as competitive as it wished to be, and Nissan's market share began to dwindle. According to Business Week, in 1996, the year the ''Enjoy the Ride'' campaign began, Nissan's market share dropped from 5.2 percent to 5 percent. The Los Angeles Times reported that Nissan's sales had risen 8.4 percent in January 1997, but competitors Toyota and Honda enjoyed increases of 52.8 percent and 21.7 percent, respectively. In comparison, Nissan's increase seemed insignificant.

Some observers attributed Nissan's slip in market share to the fact that the company was not manufacturing new models or offering popular styles, such as sports utility vehicles. Toyota and Honda both had new sports utility vehicles on the market, but Nissan's newest model lagged more than a year behind. While Toyota and Honda's midsize sedans had become roomier in order to compete with the popular Ford Taurus, the Nissan Altima had not. In addition, Nissan did not introduce a new car for an entire year after it launched the ''Enjoy the Ride'' campaign.

Nissan's main competitors in the U.S. market were fellow Japanese companies Honda and Toyota. The Nissan Altima was in the same class as the Toyota Camry and Honda Accord, and each had a luxury line to cater to the high-end consumer. Also prominent in the car market were American manufacturers General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler. According to Market Share Reporter, in 1996 these three U.S. automakers had market shares of 32.1, 25.1, and 15.9 percent, respectively. Other Japanese companies with U.S. models included Mazda, Subaru-Isuzu, Mitsubishi, and Suzuki, but because their market shares were considerably less, they were not considered as serious competition to Nissan.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Despite declining sales in 1996 that, in part, led to the announcement in early 1997 that Nissan would reduce its workforce by 450 jobs in sales and marketing, the company forged ahead with the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign. In Advertising Age Nissan's Thomas affirmed, "Our research confirms that our brand campaign has had a huge impact on the awareness and imagery of the Nissan brand . . . It's inarguably a huge success." It was believed that because "Enjoy the Ride" was a long-term brand-building campaign, it would take time for sales to follow.

Nissan yielded, however, to dealer complaints that the spots were unsuccessful in generating sales and dealership traffic by adding regional spots that focused more on the product than the brand. These ads ran in tandem with the "Enjoy the Ride" spots and featured a cameo appearance by the Mr. K. character. Nissan spokesperson Gerry Spahn told Newsday, "They're going to focus more on the product, on the technical specifications and on the pricing . . . Basically, they're going to be more traditional ads."

"Enjoy the Ride" started out 1997 with two spots that premiered during the telecast of Super Bowl XXXI, assuring an estimated 140 million viewers. Nissan's Orbe stated, "We've worked hard to break through the commercial clutter, giving consumers innovative advertising that not only entertains, but also reinforces Nissan's image as a creative company offering cars that are fun to drive." The first spot, "Doggie Mind Control," showcased the Nissan Pathfinder and featured a dog and its entranced owner cruising the neighborhood in the middle of the night. The dog drove and picked up dog friends until there was no more room in the car. They then left the owner standing in the street. The song "Low Rider" by War played in the background. The second spot, "Pigeons," showed a flock of pigeons in bomber jackets chasing and "attacking" a just washed Nissan Maxima.

In mid-July 1997, Nissan unveiled its 1998 Altima with three new spots that featured the tag line "Have you seen it?" Prior to the Altima's launch, Nissan initiated an introductory campaign that included advertising on billboards, posters, and bus wraps and shelters, all with the Mr. K. character asking, "Have you seen it?" It was the first new product to be introduced since the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign started, and Nissan had high hopes for the Altima. "People have told us how much they love our campaign and its character," said Orbe. "And as everyone has come to know, wherever the magical man is, wonderful things happen. Now, with the launch of a new Altima, we're telling everyone we have something special worth checking out." One of the spots, "Farmer," showed the transformation of a grim-faced farmer when he traded in his old pickup truck for an Altima. He returned from the dealership singing to the Monkees' "I'm a Believer" and speedily driving in circles. "Witness Protection" portrayed a man getting ready to start his new life in a witness protection program. He was issued an Altima, which then attracted the attention of passersby, a far cry from the low-key image he wished to adopt.

The final spots in the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign debuted in November 1997 and featured the 1998 Frontier pickup truck with the motto "Dogs love trucks." As Chiat/Day's Siltanen explained, "People trust their dogs, and because the majority of truck owners are dog owners, we used dogs to call attention to the Frontier's features." One of the spots, entitled "Chair," showed a dog taking its slumbering owner on a joyride through the city streets on a recliner. They overcame obstacles such as cars and pedestrians, and at one point they went under a semi truck in the reclined position. The chair stopped in front of a Nissan agency, the owner woke up, and the two drove home in a new Frontier.

OUTCOME

Many of the 1997 "Enjoy the Ride" spots earned accolades equal to the prizewinning 1996 ads "Dream Garage" and "Toys." Advertising Age voted "Chair" the third best television spot for 1997 in the automotive category and named TBWA Chiat/Day the 1997 U.S. agency of the year, in large part because of its innovative work on the "Enjoy the Ride" campaign. Ad Track, USA Today 's poll that tabulated the popularity and effectiveness of ad campaigns, ranked "Enjoy the Ride" as the third most popular campaign it reviewed in 1997. Of those surveyed, 35 percent stated that they liked the ads. The effectiveness rating was just above average.

Advertising Age published results from CNW Marketing/Research that reported the awareness of Nissan increasing from 15 percent before the campaign to 42 percent in January 1997. And while Nissan made it onto only 4.2 percent of the shopping lists of potential buyers before "Enjoy the Ride," in January 1997, 11.8 percent stated that they were considering purchasing a Nissan. The Mr. K. character was also well known, with 78 percent of those in one survey recognizing him as the Nissan spokesperson.

Despite positive affirmations from Nissan's Thomas regarding the effectiveness of the brand campaign, sales failed to reach expectations, with USA Today reporting that Nissan's U.S. sales had fallen by $580 million in 1997. Chiat/Day's Siltanen confessed to the New York Times, "The backlash to the 'Enjoy the ride' campaign kind of caught us by surprise, . . . because everybody said, 'This is great advertising.' We were riding and smiling all the way, then people said it wasn't working." As a result Thomas left the company in October 1997. Michael Seergy, who was promoted to vice president and general manager of Nissan's U.S. division, indicated that the company would alter its marketing strategies, and he told USA Today, "We were focused on the brand. Everything was the brand. We didn't tell people anything about the product. Now we will."

NISSAN QUEST MINIVAN LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2004 Nissan North America, the North American subsidiary of Japanese automaker Nissan Motor Co., Ltd., introduced a redesign of its Quest minivan. Originally a joint project with the Ford Motor Company, the Quest was selling only about 30,000 units per year by that time, and it was felt that the vehicle needed to be radically reconceived in order to compete with other minivans. Imports had risen to 34 percent of all minivan sales, meaning there was a solid market for the Quest to tap into. In an effort to make gains in this market, Nissan introduced the redesigned Quest in 2003 and 2004.

Since the new Quest was a bold, sleek-looking minivan, it was decided to market the vehicle as the minivan of choice for what Nissan termed "Sexy Moms"—younger, hipper, financially successful suburban mothers and families that wanted the interior space of a minivan but were uncomfortable with the segment's dowdy image. The ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day Los Angeles was brought in to handle the $20 million campaign, which featured a major television spot, print ads, and billboards. The TV spot featured young, hip women going out at night in the city or loading musical instruments and surfboards into their Quests. It closed with the tagline "Moms have changed, shouldn't the minivan?" The message was that the Quest was a car for independent, image-conscious drivers. Nissan also sponsored events, such as a fashion show during New York's fashion week, in an effort to reach an audience that might not have been familiar with the earlier version of the Quest.

The campaign succeeded in attracting a younger, wealthier consumer than the original Quest and received a 2005 Gold EFFIE Award from the New York American Marketing Association. The median age for Quest drivers during the relaunch was 47, the youngest in the minivan segment, and the typical Quest buyer had an income of approximately $98,000. Sales of the new Quest were, however, below expectations overall. This was blamed more on the minivan's radical design than on the marketing strategy.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Nissan Quest began as a joint project between Nissan and Ford's Mercury division. Initial models of the car were all but indistinguishable from the Mercury Villager. Both were smaller minivans meant to serve as an entry into the lucrative minivan market for each company. The vehicles were designed by Nissan and built around Nissan engines but were actually constructed by the Ford Motor Company. The collaboration was not a particularly successful one. In 1998 Nissan only moved about 30,000 units of the Quest, while competitors such as the Dodge Caravan sold more than 300,000 units.

The Quest's failures were emblematic of company-wide shortcomings. By 1999 Nissan was nearly $22.9 billion in debt. A new CEO, Carlos Ghosn, was brought in to stem the tide of red ink that year. Ghosn immediately instituted the Nissan Revival Plan, requesting a $5.2 billion cash infusion from French company Renault, which owned more than 36 percent of Nissan stock in 2004, to help the brand revitalize its fleet. The plan also included a new emphasis on deficit reduction, improved vehicle performance, increasing the company's revenue flow, and working closely with parent company Renault. A key part of this plan was the decision to focus on building a smaller number of vehicle lines. Model quality, not quantity, would be the order of the day.

During the revitalization, Nissan and Ford agreed to discontinue the Quest/Villager project, ending with the 2002 model, even though the program was originally slated to continue for another three years. Ford decided to cancel the Villager line altogether after the 2002 model. Nissan, however, had other plans. In the short term the line was to be suspended for one year so that its design could be reworked.

The new Quest had an aggressive style, likened by some to the Renault's Scénic, a sleek, compact European multipurpose vehicle, similar to an American minivan. To give it a sleeker look than its competitors, it featured a longer wheelbase (the distance between the front and rear axle) than most minivans. The minivan's central control stack, located in front of the driver, was designed to look like a table, giving the interior a unique appearance. Nissan also emphasized performance. The car's second and third rows of seats both folded flat into the base of the vehicle, allowing for extra storage space, and side-impact airbags were meant to appeal to safety-conscious drivers.

The relaunch was planned for model year 2004.When he became CEO in 1999, Ghosn vowed to make sure every Nissan automobile would be redesigned by 2004. As a result Nissan had a number of major new projects emerging in the mid-2000s, including a redesign of its popular Maxima, Xterra, and Altima lines. The company was also introducing a new sport-utility vehicle (SUV) line, the Murano. The Quest would be Nissan's major effort to break into the minivan market. From 1997 to 2004 imports had risen from 9 percent of the minivan market to 34 percent. Nissan hoped the Quest would be able to capitalize on this trend.

SUPERHERO CEO

In 1999 Nissan Motor Company, Ltd., was struggling financially. It was $22.9 billion in debt and was widely viewed as a company in decline. That year Nissan entered into an alliance with French company Renault. Renault gained more than one-third of voting stock in Nissan and worked to strengthen its partner almost immediately. The most visible part of this strengthening was the appointment of Renault's Carlos Ghosn as Nissan's chief operating officer later that year. Within two years Ghosn would become the global CEO of Nissan. Born in Brazil to Lebanese parents and later educated in France, Ghosn had an international outlook that had served him well during previous stints with Michelin and Renault.

Upon joining Nissan, Ghosn instituted a major initiative called the Nissan Revitalization Plan. He put the company's survival first and bypassed the keiretsu system (a Japanese practice in which certain established suppliers received special treatment) in favor of pursuing the lowest-priced supplies and materials. Ghosn also pledged to have every vehicle in the Nissan fleet redesigned by 2004. To foster better cooperation among Nissan's divisions, he instituted Cross-Functional Teams, groups put together from different divisions of the company.

The Nissan Revitalization Plan was wildly successful, and within five years the company was out of debt and turning a $7 billion profit. Ghosn's success gave him a high profile internationally. In Japan he was memorialized in an anime comic book that presented the businessman as a kind of superhero. He was even encouraged by some to run for president of Lebanon.

TARGET MARKET

With a sticker price of about $25,500, the Quest was geared toward middle-class car buyers. Like previous Quest models, the new version was particularly aimed at young suburban families interested in a sportier minivan. Nissan saw the introduction of the new Quest as an opportunity to redefine the minivan market with a bold new design. This separated Quest from the pack in the minds of image-conscious consumers. As with all minivans, interior space was key, and the new Quest featured three rows of seating to accommodate larger families. But the rise of SUVs had created a demand for a larger exterior as well.

In particular, Nissan aimed the new Quest at female suburban mothers whom they called ''Sexy Moms,'' more affluent, image-conscious car buyers. Nissan was looking for individualistic mothers who would be enticed by its splashy new look.

COMPETITION

With competitors building ever-more-spacious minivans, such as Honda and its Odyssey model, Nissan decided that the Quest's relatively compact size was a liability. The Quest had traditionally matched up against smaller minivans such as the Dodge Caravan, but the Quest had never been able to cut into Dodge's market share, with the Caravan posting a 10 to 1 sales advantage in 1998 alone.

In an effort to revitalize the Quest line, Nissan made it bigger. The Quest became a midsize minivan, sized about halfway between the old Quest and large minivans like the Dodge Grand Caravan and the Toyota Windstar. Now the Quest's primary competition would be the Honda Odyssey and the Toyota Sienna.

The minivan market was rife with already successful vehicle lines, such as the Toyota Caravan, with strong name recognition and loyal drivers. Nissan saw an opening, however, in the relative blandness of many of these competitors. Unlike SUVs or sports cars, minivans were seen by many as a more practical automobile, and as a result few vehicles in the class were designed as boldly as the Quest. In a way the Quest would be an avant-garde minivan, attracting younger, hipper buyers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Nissan hoped drivers would see the Quest as a ''sexy'' minivan. This was a departure, because minivans were almost always sold on their practicality and utility, not their design. In an effort to show off this sexiness, the company put a major push behind the North American relaunch. There was a major television campaign orchestrated by TBWA\Chiat\Day Los Angeles, along with magazine and newspaper ads and billboards, also designed by TBWA. The total budget exceeded $20 million.

Nissan's goals included tripling pre-launch sales volume, attracting newer and more affluent consumers, and making design a key motivation for purchasing the vehicle. Because so many minivans emphasized reliability and safety in their commercials, it was felt that this strategy was no longer effective at reaching consumers. Therefore a focus on the design advantages of the new Quest had practical value as well. Nissan was aiming the Quest at drivers who might not own a minivan, people who may have been put off by the segment's conservative image. Nissan and TBWA\Chiat\Day called these drivers ''Sexy Moms,'' a play on the ''Soccer Moms'' who were widely seen as the minivan's usual target market.

To reach ''Sexy Moms'' print ads ran in such progressive publications as Organic Style and Yoga Journal. In addition Nissan sponsored a number of untraditional events to reach new customers. One of the most notable of these was a fashion show at the Altman Building in New York City during Fashion Week 2003. The company also sponsored the National Women's Show in Toronto, Canada, in November 2003, to coincide with the launch of the 2004 model. The show functioned as a kind of public trade exhibit for various health and beauty companies.

The center of the campaign was a 30-second television commercial. Set in a trendy urban environment, it showed a group of young women piling into a Quest for a fun night out in the city. The spot also featured women loading musical instruments and surfboards into their Quest, with a voice-over that asked, ''Moms have changed, shouldn't the minivan?''

OUTCOME

Results of the campaign were mixed. Critics loved the commercials. In 2005 the campaign won the prestigious Gold EFFIE Award in the Automotive and Vehicles category. Presented by the New York American Marketing Association, the EFFIE honored the strong progress the campaign had made in increasing consumer awareness of the vehicle among targeted demographics. The campaign was credited with helping the Quest achieve a median buyer age of 47, the lowest in the minivan segment. Nissan also reached its goal of tapping into the affluent-driver market: the average annual household income for Quest buyers was approximately $98,000. Efforts to promote the look of the Quest also appeared to have succeeded, because customers who bought the Quest listed ''exterior styling'' among the top five reasons for their purchase, a rarity in the minivan segment.

Overall, however, sales of the new Quest were disappointing. Nissan had hoped to move 80,000 to 85,000 units annually. First-year sales topped out at 30,448, well below what was anticipated. The numbers were barely better than pre-launch sales and were significantly behind the old Quest's 1995 sales peak of 54,050 units. Fortunately for Nissan, this disappointment came amid other success: the Nissan Revival Plan produced a $7 billion profit by 2004, with the company clearing itself of debt. The automaker remained positive about the Quest, though some blamed its restyling for the lower-than-anticipated sales numbers.

The automaker itself admitted that the style might have been too forward looking. Shiro Nakamura, Nissan's design director, told reporters that the new Quest was just "too cutting edge." The company believed the basic design would still work in the long run and planned to tweak the model a little to get sales back on track. It was considering dropping some of the Quest's bolder innovations, such as the vehicle's centrally located instrument gauges, in an effort to make the car more "warm."

OWN ONE AND YOU'LL UNDERSTAND CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the 1970s and 1980s the luxury component of the U.S. auto market stayed relatively immune from the threats of Japanese competition, which was able to zero in on the budget and mid-priced segments of the market because of complacency in the American auto industry. The high-end segment remained divided between American and European auto producers, both with their own loyal customers and identity, as had been the case for years.

Honda introduced its high-end Acura, the first Japanese luxury line, to the U.S. market in 1986. Then Nissan introduced the Infiniti line in 1989, the same year that Toyota presented the Lexus. These Japanese luxury cars swiftly gained market share as well as acclaim for their quality and reliability. The widespread belief that no one would pay more than $20,000 (where the "luxury" segment began at that time; this baseline rose to about $35,000 by 1997) for a Japanese car was decisively put to rest.

Nissan created a separate division with its own showrooms, the Infiniti Division, to market and sell the Infiniti line. Its flagship sedan, the V-8 powered Q45, was one of the biggest, most powerful, and most expensive—priced at around $38,400—Japanese cars sold in the United States when it was introduced. The smaller M30, with a price tag of $23,500, was introduced at the same time.

The early 1990s were ripe for the new entrants into the luxury auto market. Baby boomers were hitting their prime earning years, and many of them were new luxury car buyers. They did not necessarily have allegiance to the entrenched American and European brands. Moreover, they had positive experiences with lower-end Japanese cars, making them more receptive to the new Japanese luxury models.

It took a long time for Infiniti to get its advertising footing. Since its early minimalist campaign that featured rocks and trees, Infiniti struggled to communicate a clear brand message and information about its product. At the end of 1996 Infiniti turned to the agency TBWA Chiat/Day, of Venice, California, to "start from scratch and do another breakthrough campaign," explained agency chairman and chief creative officer Lee Clow to AdWeek; the mandate was to "push luxury car advertising to a new level the way we did for Nissan." The result was the $80 million "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, which featured an ongoing series of television spots illustrating Infiniti owners' unwavering devotion to their cars. One, called "Half," showed a man having second thoughts about his impending divorce when he realizes he might have to give up his Infiniti. The ads brought Infiniti renewed media and consumer attention and played a part in the brand finally turning the corner to strong sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the late 1980s the luxury car market experienced change and expansion. "Mystique and ostentation" were "no longer the main attraction," according to Alex Taylor III of Fortune magazine. Even status-conscious shoppers sought value, quality, and durability, in part because the one luxury they did not have was time. For many of the newly affluent baby boomers, these were fundamental values—part of the way they defined themselves.

By early 1989 Honda had already sold more than 70,000 Acura Legends. On the other hand, the European car makers were being hurt by the weak dollar; their sales had fallen 26 percent in two years. It was largely the buyers of European luxury cars that Infiniti targeted—for about $40,000, the Q45 was designed to offer comfort, performance, and technology equal to that of European cars costing far more. Cadillac-long considered the premiere American luxury car—generally stayed away from this sophisticated younger market; after flirting with it briefly with the short-lived Cimarron and the Italian-made Allante, Cadillac returned to targeting the male, 60-something crowd. The typical Lincoln purchaser also was male and in his 60s. On the other hand, the typical Acura buyer was 45, earned $88,000 annually (in 1989 dollars), and had already owned Japanese cars. These were exactly the consumers the European auto makers had been targeting and winning.

Infiniti employed a $60 million new-age-flavored campaign to introduce its cars. The 1989 campaign, from Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, featured rocks, meadows, gulls, trees, and water, but no cars—no product shots whatsoever. Although the campaign won praise from some marketing consultants, other analysts such as Taylor of Fortune considered it ''perplexing.'' Others ridiculed it; Time magazine dubbed Infiniti ''Most Mysterious New Car.'' The campaign did not give the Infiniti line the needed lift among consumers. Other factors also contributed to the slow start, however, including 15 fewer showrooms opened by the target date than planned. In 1990 Nissan sold only 7,161 Infinitis in the United States.

A new, more elegant and stylish series of commercials turned the camera on the product. TBWA Chiat/Day used British actor Jonathan Pryce to demonstrate features of the car with simple props against a stark white background. Pryce would become the spokesman for Infiniti for the next five years.

By 1994 Infiniti, along with Lexus and Saturn, ranked as top-scoring brands the third year in a row in a survey of quality and design engineering by market researchers J. D. Power and Associates. That year Infiniti began a concerted effort to reach more women consumers. Forty-three dealers participated in an event in which speakers addressed women—mostly executives and professionals—about topics related to business or lifestyle but not directly related to cars. The aim was to get women into dealerships in a non-sales atmosphere and increase their familiarity with the product. Newsday reported that Infiniti ended up selling cars to 12 percent of the women who attended a forum.

Infiniti developed a new tag line, ''Thinking of You,'' which aired in 1996 with a campaign designed to evoke emotional response. But concrete news about price cuts was drowned out by the emotional impact of the spots. Infiniti abandoned the campaign after several months. Through 1996 Pryce continued to speak for Infiniti. One spot, ''That Jazz,'' had him in a jazz club where Nancy Wilson was singing. As he leaves the club he extols the virtues of Infiniti over a soundtrack of Dave Brubeck and Paul Desmond's rendition of ''Take Five.''

The advertisements had gotten more down to earth than the initial approach, and they directly addressed the car's features, but they retained an esoteric edge that shortchanged Infiniti's potential to become a truly popular luxury car. Sales remained below their targets and potential as well, and in late 1996 Infiniti marketing vice president Tom Orbe gave Chiat-Day a clean slate to create a campaign that would break new advertising ground for Infiniti.

TARGET MARKET

Roughly 8 percent of the car-buying population could afford to buy an Infiniti in the mid-1990s. Of this population, Infiniti targeted baby boomers. This group was both expanding the market for luxury cars and bringing new characteristics to the luxury auto market. They had been buying their first cars when the American auto industry was making some of its worst cars ever. Thus, their relationship with the American industry was soured by their formative experiences with cars of questionable quality. Moreover, being a post-World War II generation, they did not shy away from buying Japanese and German products as the previous generation had. Given their ingrained suspicion of American car quality, they were far more likely to turn to European and Japanese brands when they purchased their first luxury car. Here the Japanese had an edge because many boomers had owned lower-priced Japanese cars at least once and experienced their quality and dependability. Known as the ''have it all'' generation, baby boomers found these attributes particularly attractive because they simply had very little time for tasks like car maintenance.

COMPETITION

Infiniti's competition fell into three main categories, decided largely by geographical location: American producers, European producers, and Japanese producers. The Americans, primarily Cadillac and Lincoln, targeted consumers in their later 50s and 60s. The Europeans, primarily BMW and Mercedes-Benz, targeted the traditional middle-aged, high-end consumers but also started to go after the aging boomers, many of whom were just entering the high-end market. Among the Japanese producers, Lexus presented the most direct and daunting challenge. Its tag line, ''The relentless pursuit of perfection,'' initiated in 1989 and used throughout the 1990s, was no exaggeration. Toyota had already achieved the largest market share among baby boomers, so a large portion of potential consumers was open to the appeal of trading up from a Toyota to a Lexus.

A particular challenge for Infiniti in relation to Lexus was product differentiation. In 1997 the Lexus LS 400 was priced at $46,225; the Infiniti Q45 at $44,241. They both featured state-of-the-art technology, superior dealer service, and dependability. They were often mentioned in the same breath to represent Japanese technical or corporate prowess—for example, Bob Garfield's 1995 comment in Advertising Age, ''Lexus and Infiniti have changed perceptions of what constitutes automotive luxury and prestige.'' Although Lexus had been on top in sales volume and customer surveys, in 1996 Infiniti surpassed Lexus in J. D. Powers & Associates' annual customer satisfaction report. It was the first time Lexus fell to number two on the much-watched index. Shortly after that, Lexus shifted its advertising style to a less pretentious, more ''funky'' approach that was exemplified by Infiniti's ''Own One and You'll Understand'' campaign. During the 1990s Lexus ads had presented a sophisticated voice. In the fall of 1997 (about four months after the new Infiniti campaign was launched), Lexus introduced a campaign from Team One in El Segundo, California, that unabashedly celebrated the slightly wicked pleasures of its 300-horsepower V-8 GS, ''the fastest automatic sedan in the world.'' The imagery, inspired by the grotesque and eerie work of cartoonist Charles Adams, was accompanied in each spot by the tag line ''Something wicked this way comes.'' While the commercials were visually arresting and fun to watch, the tag line ultimately failed to communicate a substantive message about Lexus.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although the number of Infiniti owners was not as large as Nissan might have wanted, those owners nevertheless had voiced vigorous appreciation for the vehicles since the inception of the division in 1989. This customer feedback was the origin of the ''Own One and You'll Understand'' campaign. It reflected the devotion Infiniti owners felt to the brand. The challenge for Nissan was to get those who had never driven an Infiniti, or even a Toyota, to want to experience this satisfying ownership.

Nissan had performed market research that revealed that consumers of luxury vehicles in the 1990s were not as self-consciously highbrow in their tastes as traditional luxury-item consumers; rather, they were ''regular people'' who happened to have high annual incomes. ''There is a myth out there that upscale consumers only enjoy upscale media and entertainment,'' explained Infiniti marketing vice president Orbe, ''but the reality is, they enjoy shows like ER and Seinfeld. Baby boomers are the first generation to grow up in mass entertainment culture. If we want to reach them, we've got to entertain and engage them.''

The consumer of luxury products in the 1980s had been far more status-conscious and ostentatious than those in the 1990s. While the boomers of the 1990s appreciated excellence and ''the finer things,'' they were less interested in status symbols. Trying to balance professional lives, family, and recreation, boomers had little spare time for television viewing, making them selective about what they did watch; they tended to do less channel surfing. Advertising had to be highly engaging to hold their attention and avoid being ''muted'' with the remote. Orbe described the unique Infiniti personality as ''youthful, smart, innovative,'' not coincidentally the core attributes baby boomers seemed to value in themselves and others.

When the new campaign was assigned to Chiat-Day at the end of 1996, there was much speculation about whether Pryce would continue to serve as Infiniti spokesman. ''There's no mandate for Pryce to be in or out,'' said agency chairman Clow. ''If we think there's a fun twist, we'll do it.'' But rumors proved correct; Pryce was out, definitive proof that the snob factor was dropped.

"Own One and You'll Understand" was a brand promise of sorts. It reached beyond entertaining the viewers to engaging them in a potentially meaningful experience. The campaign had a two-pronged goal: to arouse non-owners' curiosity about the Infiniti, and to reinforce current owners' pride of ownership. In achieving these two goals, the campaign also would provide Infiniti its own strong identity and differentiate it more strongly from Lexus.

The various television spots, directed by Joe Pytka (his first for Chiat-Day in 20 years), used dark humor. One was set at a funeral and showed an elderly man being buried with his Infiniti. In another a man scrambles through an airport for a set of keys to his Infiniti. In the third spot, "Half," a man is served divorce papers. He is informed that his wife wants half of everything, and he goes into a rage. "She gets half? I'll give her half," he snaps. Then he maniacally takes a chain-saw and cuts in half all his possessions, including a piano, furniture, pool table, and artwork. Next, he grabs an acetylene torch and moves to the garage. But he stops when he comes to his Infiniti. "On second thought, maybe we can work this out," he mutters. The viewers did not learn much about Infinitis, but the message at least was clear: Infiniti owners had a real passion for their cars.

The television campaign covered all geographic areas where Infiniti retailers were located and ran on top prime time and cable network programs. It continued to run through 1997 and into 1998.

OUTCOME

In mid-1996 Infiniti dealers were less than happy with the franchise. A significant part of this displeasure was caused by confusion in the advertising message. But by the end of 1997 sales had climbed 17.1 percent to 65,552 units, a record. Dealer profits were higher than ever before. The division overall finally became profitable and recouped its original investment in the United States. The "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign could be credited with a major role in the turnaround.

Indeed, Infiniti saw the campaign as key to its new success; the company extended the campaign into the summer of 1998, with the plan to shift some of the focus from story lines to product features. The lack of such focus had drawn complaints from some critics. "If you don't own one, the ad doesn't steer you to why you should," commented the Los Angeles Times. Bob Garfield of Advertising Age criticized "Half," saying that it had "an anticlimactic ending to a broad, obvious, and derivative commercial."

Nevertheless, simplifying seemed to have worked for Infiniti. Gone were the stuffy English accents and tuxedos. Given the sales data after the campaign began running, the company had successfully leveraged the simple fact that Infiniti owners loved their cars.

MAKE ROOM FOR SHOES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

According to Forbes magazine, Internet and catalog shoe shopping was a $2 billion business in 1999. Clothing retailer Nordstrom, Inc., which had launched an Internet subsidiary—Nordstrom.com—in 1998, quickly discovered that selling shoes online could be big business. By the end of that year shoes accounted for 30 percent of all Nordstrom's online sales. In response to growing consumer interest in shopping online for shoes, and armed with its history as a shoe store and its reputation for offering a wide selection of footwear, Nordstrom.com spun off a new website, Nordstromshoes.com. The site's inventory included 20 million pairs of shoes from some of Nordstrom's most popular brands and promised consumers that it was the world's biggest online shoe store.

Nordstrom enlisted ad agency Fallon McElligott Minneapolis to create a marketing campaign, estimated to have a budget between $15 million and $17 million, to support the launch of the shoes-only website. Although the new site offered a selection of shoes for women, men, and children, the campaign, titled "Make Room for Shoes," targeted women, who were most likely to be passionate about footwear. It began in November 1999, ran for 60 days, and included television spots, billboards in selected markets, and print ads in fashion, business, and entertainment magazines.

"Make Room for Shoes" was well received by the advertising industry and consumers. Among the awards presented to Fallon for its efforts were two Bronze Clios and multiple Cannes Lion awards for the print ads and an MPA/Kelly Award for the fact that the campaign exceeded all expectations and drove consumer traffic to the new website. In addition, Fortune magazine rated the shopping experience on the Nordstromshoes.com website above par compared with other Internet shopping sites. The Gunn Report, which listed results of all the major advertising award contests each year to establish a worldwide guide of top-winning ads for the advertising industry, ranked the Nordstromshoes.com print ads among the year's most awarded. Nordstrom also reported that its July 2000 online sales increased 700 percent compared to the same period the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When John W. Nordstrom opened his first store in 1901 in Seattle, Washington, the only merchandise he offered was shoes. The business grew, becoming the largest independent shoe-store chain in the United States by 1960. In the mid-1960s the retailer expanded its offerings to include women's clothing. Men's and children's apparel were added to the product mix in 1966. The chain eventually grew to 103 stores in 23 states. For people who were unable to shop in one of its stores, Nordstrom offered a mail-order-catalog business. In 1998, responding to growing consumer interest in Internet and online shopping, Nordstrom launched Nordstrom.com as a subsidiary of the company. The company's new e-commerce presence was focused on expanding its retail business both online and in catalog sales.

Nordstrom.com and its merchandise selection appealed to consumers. Following the launch of its website in 1998 the company reported that Internet sales, along with catalog purchases, accounted for $200 million of the company's $5 billion in overall sales. And shoes were a big seller. According to company records, 30 percent of its Internet sales were shoes, with footwear accounting for 7 of the top 20 best-selling items online. Based on the success of shoe sales through its website, in 1999 the company launched Nordstromshoes.com. The new site was a subsidiary of Nordstrom.com and focused entirely on shoes. It offered a selection of 20 million pairs of shoes and featured products from 40 of Nordstrom's top shoe brands for everyone in the family, including Cole-Haan, Dr. Martens, and Stride Rite, as well as its private-label brands Classique and Preview. Nordstromshoes.com also returned to the retailer's roots as the largest independent shoe-store chain in the United States, but now Nordstrom tagged its new website as the largest shoe store in the world. At the time of Nordstromshoes.com's launch, company copresident Dan Nordstrom told Business Wire that Nordstrom's 100-year history as a shoe retailer combined with the technological skills of the team behind Nordstrom.com would help develop "one of the most exciting fashion destinations on the Internet."

TARGET MARKET

Fallon's research prior to the creation of its "Make Room for Shoes" campaign indicated that, while not all women were passionate about shoes, many women considered it impossible to own too many pairs of them. That idea became the basis for the campaign to introduce Nordstromshoes.com. Although the site offered shoes for men and children as well as women, the campaign took a humorous approach to the passion that a large cross section of the female population had for shoes. It targeted busy professional women who wanted to buy shoes but who had little time to shop in traditional brick-and-mortar stores. It was also aimed at younger, hipper consumers who perceived Nordstrom as a store for more mature shoppers. In addition, Fallon hoped to convince consumers that it was possible to purchase shoes without trying them on first and that buying them online was a good alternative to buying them in a traditional store.

WIN SHOES FOR LIFE CONTEST INTRODUCES SHOPPERS TO NEW NORDSTROM WEBSITE

To attract shoppers to its new website, Nordstromshoes.com, Nordstrom launched its Make Room for Shoes contest, in which five grand-prize winners would receive new shoes for life. The prize had an estimated retail value of $15,000. In addition, 25 first-prize winners would each receive new shoes for one year, with a retail value of up to $1,000. The contest ran from November 1 through November 30, 1999, with a winner drawn weekly beginning November 7. Winners selected their prizes from the Nordstromshoes.com inventory of more than 20 million pairs of men's, women's, and children's shoes.

COMPETITION

In 1999 Nordstrom was not the only company venturing into the online shoe business. A long list of retailers—both brick-and-mortar ones such as Nordstrom as well as businesses specifically created for the Internet—were selling shoes on their websites. Among the sites were bluefly.com, which offered discounts on Prada stilettos, Dr. Scholl's sandals, and everything in between; candies.com, which sold its own brand of footwear for teens; 81shoes.com for kids or preteens; MVP.com, offering athletic shoes for everyone; magnumboots.com, with a selection of work boots designed for men and women with jobs in construction, law enforcement, and the postal service; and kennethcole.com for fashion-minded women. Two online stores that went head-to-head with Nordstromshoes.com were Zappos.com and onlineshoes.com.

Zappos.com shared two things in common with Nordstromshoes.com: it was launched in 1999, and it billed itself at the world's largest online shoe store. The company competed with Nordstromshoes.com by allowing consumers to shop for shoes using a variety of criteria, such style, size, and price, and it offered a selection of shoes from 125 brand names as well as a personal-shopper service. It also reportedly had 90,000 styles and 2 million pairs of shoes in stock. By July 2000, one year after its launch, Zappos.com was named the highest-ranking footwear e-tailer by PC Data Online, ahead of Nordstromshoes.com.

Onlineshoes.com was an old-timer by Internet retailer standards. The company had been selling shoes online since 1996, and like Nordstromshoes.com, it was an Internet spin-off of its brick-and-mortar parent company, the shoe-store chain Gerler & Son, based in Seattle, Washington. Its website promised, ''All the Shoes, All the Sizes, All the Time.'' According to the company, its Internet business plan followed the model of a traditional retail company. It also stated that it planned to promote its business primarily through advertising on the Internet, supplemented by ads in magazines and newspapers. To encourage consumers to shop for shoes at its site, onlineshoes.com offered a 30-day money-back guarantee on all of its merchandise.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Nordstrom decided to launch an online shoe store, the company enlisted Fallon McElligott Minneapolis to create a marketing campaign that would introduce the new website to consumers. According to Peter McHugh, Fallon's group creative director, consumer research—which included interviews with women who seemed to agree that a woman could never have too many shoes—led to the idea for the campaign's theme, ''Make Room for Shoes.'' Working from the original idea, Fallon developed three television spots that showed women making room for their shoes. The $15 to $17 million, 60-day campaign also included print and outdoor advertisements.

The ''Make Room for Shoes'' television spots, titled ''Moving Van,'' ''Crush,'' and ''Doorstep,'' used humor to portray the passion many women had for shoes and the extremes they might go to in their attempt to make sure they had plenty of room for new additions to their footwear. Spots appeared during prime time on network and cable channels and aired during some of television's most popular programs aimed at women, including Ally McBeal, The Practice, and Frasier. In ''Moving Van'' a young couple was shown driving down a highway in a moving van loaded with their possessions. Suddenly struck by the need to make room for more shoes, the woman began throwing their belongings from the van. Lamps, a sofa, and her husband's motorcycle were all tossed out onto the highway. ''Crush'' depicted a middle-aged woman arriving at a junkyard in a shiny, fully restored 1957 red Cadillac. After a brief conversation with the junkyard's owner, the woman watched as the car was lifted onto a crushing machine and flattened. A scene shift then showed the woman's husband at home opening the garage, ready to wash his prized Cadillac, only to find the flat car propped against the wall. His wife, too, had made room for more shoes. The final spot, ''Doorstep,'' pictured a woman stopping her car in front of a moonlit home. She got out of the car and struggled to carry her sleeping husband, dressed only in his boxers, to the home's front door. She quietly set the still-sleeping man down on the porch and attached a note to him that read, ''Please take care of my husband.'' This woman had thus also made more room for her shoes.

Print ads appeared in newspapers that were typically read by women professionals, such as the Los Angeles Times, USA Today, and the Wall Street Journal. Print ads also ran in fashion, entertainment, and business magazines, including Allure, W, InStyle, Entertainment Weekly, and Fast Company. Billboard ads were strategically placed in Chicago, New York, and San Francisco to target women commuting to and from work. One print ad showed a picture of a smiling couple in which the man had been ripped out. Another pictured a child's bedroom with everything removed except the curtains and a pink mylar balloon floating near the ceiling in one corner. The text read, ''Make room for shoes. Get rid of everything else. Nordstrom has the world's biggest shoe store.''

OUTCOME

Fallon's ''Make Room for Shoes'' campaign was well received by both the advertising industry and consumers. Following the campaign's 1999 launch, the 2000 Gunn Report, an annual industry publication that listed the award-winning campaigns from the top international and national creative competitions, named Fallon the third-most-awarded advertising agency in the world. The report also placed Nordstromshoes.com at number 18 on the list of most-awarded print ads.

Among the awards given in 2000 that led to Fallon's ranking in The Gunn Report were two Clios for the Nordstromshoes.com print ads ''Public Transportation'' and ''Kid's Room,'' Bronze Cannes Lions awards for the print ads ''Kid's Room,'' ''Closet,'' and ''Screw Cooking,'' and a Magazine Publishers of America (MPA) Kelly Award for the entire campaign. The MPA/Kelly Award noted that the campaign exceeded expectations in encouraging consumers to visit the Nordstromshoes.com website and in showing that the retailer understood women's passion for shoes. In addition, the Advertising Women of New York, which recognized agencies and clients for their positive or negative portrayals of women in advertising, honored the campaign. During the organization's annual ''The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly'' awards event Fallon received several Good awards, including the Grand Good for the Nordstromshoes.com television spot ''Moving Van.''

As consumers faced the hectic holiday season, one of the websites they turned to for shopping was Nordstromshoes.com, which opened for business in November 1999. A review of 50 shopping websites conducted during the holidays for Fortune magazine by Columbus, Ohio–based Resource Marketing rated the shopping experience at Nordstromshoes.com above par. Rating criteria included the ease with which orders were placed, on-time delivery of orders, and the helpfulness of each site's customer-service staff. Further, according to Nordstrom officials, July 2000 sales at the company's online sites Nordstrom.com and subsidiary Nordstromshoes.com increased 700 percent over July 1999 sales.

REINVENT YOURSELF CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2000 Nordstrom was an aging retailer with an identity crisis. Its core customers—baby boomers—continued to rely on the chain's classic merchandise and top-of-the-line customer service that often included employees writing thank-you notes following a purchase and staffers willing to carry an overloaded customer's packages to her car. Younger consumers, however, considered the department store, which typically served as an anchor in a suburban mall, as a place where their grandmothers shopped. In 1998 Nordstrom undertook a series of surveys and focus-group studies of customers and noncustomers, employees, and stockholders. The results indicated that Nordstrom's steadily declining sales, particularly in women's apparel, were due in part to the perception that its stores were stuffy and its fashions boring and outdated.

In 2000 Nordstrom began the process of reinventing itself, including opening new stores with more contemporary decor—such as one on Chicago's Michigan Avenue—remodeling existing stores, and stocking trendier merchandise. At the same time, with the help of its Minneapolis-based advertising agency, Fallon Worldwide, Nordstrom launched a national marketing campaign encouraging customers to reinvent themselves as well. The $40 million campaign, appropriately themed "Reinvent Yourself," began in early 2000 and included spots aired during hit television shows such as Friends and Ally McBeal. Print ads appeared in major magazines, and billboards ads were placed in key markets, including New York City's Times Square. The print ads depicted new takes on traditional stereotypes; for instance, the girl next door, who was expected to be dressed in a dotted dress and pigtails, was instead showed dressed in nonstereotypical orange spike-heeled boots paired with red slacks.

Despite earning accolades and awards from the Advertising Women of New York for the campaign's positive portrayal of women, and although the campaign resonated with younger consumers, it alienated the baby boomers that made up Nordstrom's core customer base. Nordstrom's sales continued to drop following the campaign's launch, slipping 24 percent in the first quarter of 2001. In response, the chain pulled the campaign and backpedaled on its merchandising strategy.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Nordstrom opened for business in 1901 in Seattle, Washington, as a shoe store. Over the years the company built a devoted customer base on its business philosophy of providing exceptional service, selection, quality, and value. Eventually the company grew to eight stores, and by 1960 it was the largest independent shoe-store chain in the United States. Its offerings gradually expanded to include apparel. The company went public in 1971 and by 1973 had passed the $100 million sales mark.

In 1998 Nordstrom expanded its six-year-old catalog business and ventured onto the Internet. It launched Nordstrom.com with the goal of building its flagship business and focusing on what had given the chain its start: selling shoes. Breaking from its tradition of using regional marketing with a focus on newspaper print ads, in 1999 the chain launched its first-ever national advertising campaign. The $15 million campaign, developed by Fallon McElligott, was designed to promote Nordstrom's subsidiary, www.Nordstrom.com, and it especially emphasized the company's wide selection of high-quality shoes, sold on the new site www.NordstromShoes.com, which was touted as the "world's biggest shoe store." Tagged "Make Room for Shoes," the campaign included print and television advertising as well as a national sweepstakes with a grand prize of a lifetime supply of shoes (valued at $15,000). But despite shifting to a national approach for its marketing, in 2000 the aging retailer found itself on a downward slide. To try and reverse the trend and to entice younger consumers away from the middle-of-the-mall boutique-style shops and into its department stores, Nordstrom decided to run another national marketing campaign and enlisted Fallon to develop it. The resulting "Reinvent Yourself" campaign was launched in 2000.

TARGET MARKET

With its high-quality, classic clothing offerings and reputation for catering to customers' needs, Nordstrom was a shopping haven for baby boomers, both men and women. But in an effort to shake its stodgy image and lure younger customers into its stores, Nordstrom updated its merchandise and aimed its advertising at younger urban consumers. Not wanting to alienate the older suburban shoppers who were used to the chain's informal, easygoing approach to customer service, Nordstrom also wanted to aim the advertising at middle-aged, middle-income, suburban women. Additionally, the company hoped to shatter cultural stereotypes such as soccer moms, women who shuttled their kids from one activity to another, the girl-next-door, and high-energy career women. All women were encouraged to reinvent themselves and their way of thinking about how they expressed their individuality. Nordstrom did not neglect men with the "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, either. The campaign encouraged men—from recent college graduates starting their careers to experienced professionals—to rethink everything from business suits to casual wear.

COMPETITION

While Nordstrom worked to reinvent its stores and update its merchandise to attract new, younger customers while keeping its core customers, Federated Department Stores, Inc., the largest upscale department-store retailer in the United States, was facing similar challenges. Although Federated, which owned the department-store chains Bloomingdale's and Macy's, reported record-high profits in 1999, in 2000 its goal was to attract younger customers, who perceived department stores as places

TEENS ON NORDSTROM'S MARKETING RADAR

Using computers and software technology, Nordstrom launched a marketing campaign in 2000 designed to attract teen shoppers. The retailer partnered with Teen People magazine to produce an interactive CD, called "BP-ROM," that promoted Nordstrom's junior department, the Brass Plum. Featured on the CD were spring fashions, accessories, and beauty products, clips from music videos, and select scenes from WB Network television shows. Selling to Kids magazine stated that the campaign fit with the high-tech lives most teens lived and that the promotion meshed perfectly with Nordstrom's "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, which was developed to dispel common stereotypes about the high-end retail department store, including that the store was out of sync with contemporary shoppers.

where their grandmothers shopped. With a reported annual employee turnover rate of 60 percent in some stores, another concern for Federated was hiring and keeping staff. Federated's strategy included testing several revamped junior departments in its California and Florida stores, introducing a private-label brand of apparel and accessory items for kids and teens, and increasing efforts to hire young talent through its recruitment website for college students, www.retailology.com.

The number three department-store chain in the United States—behind Federated and Saint Louis, Missouri–based May Department Stores Company—was Dillard's, headquartered in Little Rock, Arkansas. It faced its own unique problems in 2000. Dillard's reported that earnings for its second quarter in 2000 were down 74 percent from 1999, and adding insult to injury was an article published in Forbes magazine that questioned every aspect of the company's management, from the Dillard family's iron-fisted rule to its refusal to provide business-related information to investors, analysts, and the media. The article stated that, while Dillard's had once been a first-class retailer, it had fallen to perhaps the nation's worst. Looking for ways to improve its profit margins, Dillard's turned to one of Federated's tactics: private label brands. But problems, including negative press, continued to hinder Dillard's. In 2001 the company pulled its commercials from CBS television affiliates following a 60 Minutes segment alleging that Dillard's practiced racial profiling to target shoplifters. According to a report in Advertising Age, Dillard's stated that 60 Minutes had treated the chain unfairly in its broadcast, allowing it only a few seconds of a 13-minute story for a response.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Nordstrom's $40 million national marketing campaign, "Reinvent Yourself," was reportedly the biggest ever undertaken by the company. The campaign was based on extensive consumer research conducted by Nordstrom that made it clear that Nordstrom's reputation for offering classic clothing in a prim and proper shopping environment no longer resonated with shoppers. Instead there was a strong preference for searching for trendy merchandise in a hip environment. In addition, customers perceived the stores as outdated and difficult to shop in. Nordstrom took the surveys to heart and began a major remodeling project at its stores and revamped its merchandise offerings. To support the effort Nordstrom launched its "Reinvent Yourself" campaign. Developed by Minneapolis-based agency Fallon Worldwide, it featured ads in print and on billboards as well as television spots. The campaign was designed to convince consumers that Nordstrom was listening to what customers were saying and that the company was determined to meet their needs by updating its stores and restructuring its women's apparel divisions, among other efforts.

"Reinvent Yourself" kicked off in February 2000 with TV spots that ran during network shows, including Friends, Ally McBeal, and The Practice, as well as on cable channels such as VH-1 and A&E. The spots suggested a variety of ways that viewers could reinvent themselves or aspects of their lives, much as Nordstrom was reinventing itself. One black-and-white TV spot, titled "Doorway," portrayed a young man standing outside a closed door under an umbrella in the rain, waiting to meet his date. When the beautiful woman opened the door, it was clear from the man's expression that he was impressed. The spot closed with the tagline "Reinvent the compliment."

In a break from Nordstrom's tradition of running its ads in newspapers, print ads for the campaign appeared in glossy national magazines, including Elle and Vanity Fair. Ads published in the magazines Essence and Latina reached out to minority shoppers. The marketing also encouraged consumers to think outside of the box and used humor to address cultural stereotypes. One print ad portrayed a middle-aged woman dressed in glittery red slacks and a black cardigan along with the slogan "Reinvent soccer mom," and another suggested "Reinventing the heirloom" and pictured a shapely young woman's abdomen with a diamond stud in her navel. Ads aimed at men included one that pictured a businessman lounging in a reclining chair with a legal pad and pencil in hand but dressed in an unbuttoned oxford shirt and khaki shorts. The slogan exclaimed, ''Reinvent the power suit.''

OUTCOME

Evidence that the company seemed to be reaching its target audience of younger consumers was revealed in comments made by shoppers in a Detroit-area Nordstrom. A 30-year-old, stay-at-home mother referred to the store's designer fashions department when she told the Detroit Free Press, ''This section used to be so grandmothery, and now it's fun.'' A 23-year-old college student said of the updated store and merchandise, ''I love it. I've noticed there's a lot better selection for my age group. The prices appealed to me, too.'' The ''Reinvent Yourself'' campaign was also recognized by the Advertising Women of New York for its positive portrayal of women in its television spots. During its ''The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly'' awards ceremony the organization presented two of the spots with ''Good'' honors.

Despite the company's ''Reinvent Yourself'' campaign and Nordstrom's efforts to update stores and push more trendy merchandise, many customers and industry insiders still perceived the aging department store as old fashioned and dull. An unidentified retailer told Women's Wear Daily, ''Generally the merchandise has become boring. They've been flat for too long.'' Others noted that the campaign seemed to cater to 20-something consumers, resulting in the loss of the store's core customers: baby boomers.

Further, while Nordstrom's ''Reinvent Yourself'' campaign achieved some of its goals, it was not enough to produce positive results. In the first quarter of 2001 Nordstrom reported that its profits had dipped 24 percent and that same-store sales had fallen 3.7 percent. Following the continued drop in sales, a complete shakeup at the upper levels of the chain—including pushing out company chairman and chief executive Jack Whitacer—eventually returned full control of the business to Nordstrom family members. Additionally, because the ''Reinvent Yourself'' campaign had alienated the company's core customers, Nordstrom reversed itself and pulled the campaign. By July 2001 Nordstrom appeared to be back on track, reporting that sales were up 1.8 percent from the same month in 2000. The company also reported that sales in the women's category, the one that attracted baby-boomer shoppers and that accounted for 36 percent of total sales, had shown increases for the previous six months.

NORELCO REFLEX ACTION RAZOR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Norelco Consumer Products Company introduced the Reflex Action Razor in 1996. The product launch, backed by an unusually large advertising budget and an aggressive marketing campaign, helped revitalize the stagnating electric shaver category. A strategy of wooing wet-shaver users, especially young men, led Norelco's advertising agency, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles (DMB&B) of New York, to create several animated ads that made shaving with a wet razor look about as safe and soothing as using a hungry crocodile to perform the same task. Electric shavers, however, typically required a period of adjustment before they did not irritate the skin, so the Gillette Company, far and away the leader in the wet-shaving market, sued Norelco and won an injunction that prevented Norelco from claiming that its electric shavers were less irritating than wet-shaving systems.

To meet the legal requirements DMB&B created a series of ads in which young men were asked to shave with the Reflex Action Razor for 21 days and then decide whether to toss their conventional wet razors. The series included the popular "Hockey" spot, which featured players from the Hartford Wolfpack minor league hockey team who were initially skeptical about the electric shaver. The players were eventually won over, however, and their clean-shaven faces garnered comments such as the following from an opposing team's mascot: "Look at you, pretty boys. So smoooooth." The mascot was then slammed into the boards by the beard-free Wolfpack players. The campaign was a success, and the electric shaver category saw growth in its aftermath.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Philips Company was founded in 1891 as a lightbulb company in the Dutch town of Eindhoven by a young engineer, Gerard Philips. Gerard's brother Anton joined the company in 1895, and it was he who encouraged Professor Alexandre Horowitz to develop the company's rotary electric shaver. During the Great Depression Philips sales lagged, and the company began searching for products to expand its market reach beyond the lightbulbs and radios for which it had become known. A Philips executive traveling in the United States collected a number of electric shavers, which had been developed by American Jacob Schick in the 1920s. Horowitz showed interest in the electric shavers and created his own shaving system, which, unlike Schick's reciprocating-cut shavers, used rotating cutters. The Philishave was first sold in 1939 in Europe, just as World War II was breaking out. American GIs returning home from the war in Europe who had used the Philishave created a demand for the product in the United States. Philips began marketing shavers in the United States under the Norelco name in 1948. Norelco's first product was a man's rotary razor, which was an immediate success. Norelco led the electric razor category from that time forward.

The company expanded over the next several decades and increased its product line to include hundreds of household items. In the late 1980s, however, Norelco scaled back and cut by 50 percent the number of products it was selling, leaving some markets altogether in order to focus on shavers, coffeemakers, steam irons, and air-filtering machines. Norelco also decided to focus its marketing efforts on high-end products for which consumers would be willing to pay a premium. For years the company's razors were advertised with special Christmastime ads that showed an animated Santa Claus sledding over snowy hills on a Norelco shaver and the tag line "Norelco—even our name says 'Merry Christmas.'" The ads, although long-running, neither boosted electric razor sales nor converted blade users; instead, they promoted the notion that Norelco was a toy company. The ads were dropped in 1986, and Norelco began a high-tech campaign with DMB&B emphasizing models with features such as the company's patented lift-and-cut system, rechargeable batteries and charge meters, and ergonomic design. "We made close comfortable" was the tag line.

From 1986 to 1989 sales of Norelco's razors soared from $100 to $160 million annually, as did the company's advertising budget. When DMB&B signed on with Norelco in 1987, the ad budget was reported at $10 million annually. Over two years the budget grew to $30 million, enabling the company to buy year-round advertising, rather than its traditional limitation to fourth-quarter ads.

By the mid-1990s sales in the industry had flattened out. Research showed that users of electric razors tended to stick with them, but that wet-razor users—younger men in particular—rarely switched over to electric systems. In the mid-1990s Norelco began an aggressive marketing campaign for its razors. Norelco's Reflex Action Razor enjoyed a historically large advertising budget and was joined in competition by Braun, Remington, and other razor companies trying to reinvigorate the category.

TARGET MARKET

Loyal male electric razor users, most in the 35-plus age range, were known to update their products occasionally. With the launch of the Reflex Action Razor, however, Norelco looked to broaden the market for its electric systems by appealing to younger men and expanding the target consumers to include 18-to-34 year olds. Norelco president Pat Dinley told Advertising Age in 1996, "Long-term, the big opportunity is in converting people who use blades to electric." DMB&B account director Robert Easley explained to the same Advertising Age reporter the correlation between blade users and youth: "Blades are more heavily developed in the younger segments. They view conventional blade shaving as the norm."

SURPRISE PLAY

The hockey players and cadets who eventually starred in Norelco ads did not know at first that they might wind up doing them; they were simply given a free shaver and asked to test it for three weeks. Some of those who liked the shavers were asked to work in the ads, and after the ads had run, a number of the men expressed surprise at their newfound fame. "We didn't think it would be that big," a Wolfpack member told the New York Daily News. "So many people have called the house and said, 'I can't believe it, but I just saw you on TV.' It came out great. It's on all the time. It's unbelievable. The whole team was out at dinner the other night and there was a game on and the commercial came on and everybody starting hooting and hollering."

COMPETITION

Norelco dominated the men's electric shaving category, with a reported 50-plus percent market share throughout the 1990s. Remington Products Corporation held the number two spot, and Gillette's Braun was third in sales of electric shavers. Competition among these companies heated up after Norelco introduced the Reflex Action Razor in 1996. Remington launched the Dual Microscreen in 1997, with a sleek design, a beefy advertising budget (up 40 percent from the year before), and the tag line "Built to shave incredibly close." In 1998 Remington rolled out the Microscreen 3. At the same time Braun was pushing its Flex Integral electric shaver to young men and women. All three companies backed up their campaigns with promotions and flashy new packaging.

Perhaps more intense than the competition among electric shaver manufacturers was the war between Norelco and Gillette, the overwhelming leader in the wet-shaving category. Among the first ads for Norelco's Reflex Action Razor was a series of animated spots with names such as "Fire Breathing Razor" and "Twin Blade

Serpent'' that depicted wet razors as nasty creatures, biting, stinging and burning men's faces. The ads carried the tag line, ''Anything closer would be too close for comfort.'' Although the ads did not name a specific brand of wet razor, Gillette sued Norelco for maligning wet shaving and for falsely advertising that electric systems were pain-free. Norelco asserted that its ads were not intended to impugn a specific brand or product, but Gillette spokespeople were widely quoted as saying, ''When you disparage wet shaving, you are disparaging Gillette because we are the clear leader in the industry.''

Gillette was on somewhat shaky legal ground when it took the Norelco ads personally. But it had a stronger case on its allegation of misleading advertising. It was not common knowledge that electric shavers could irritate skin for up to three weeks on first use and that there was usually a period of adjustment before they provided a thoroughly comfortable shave. Gillette charged that Norelco did not adequately warn consumers about this risk and that the ads showing wet razors as greater irritants were thus deceptive. In December 1996 a judge ruled that Norelco could not claim its own product was less irritating than wet-razor systems, but the judge did not bar the company from portraying wet razors as vicious, and the lawsuit continued. In 1998 a federal court rejected a majority of Gillette's claims (a few points continued in litigation), although by then Norelco had adjusted its advertising to make clear the fact that electric razors might not provide the best shave before a three-week acclimation period.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1997 a DMB&B executive was quoted in Advertising Age, ''You've got to fish where the fish are, and wet razors have great penetration among 18-to-34-year-olds. We're trying to change the perception of electric razors as old-fashioned.'' To lure younger consumers Norelco designed the Reflex Action Razor to include cutting-edge razor technology that allowed for various shaving angles, an LCD display, and an appealing choice of colors. In its advertising Norelco positioned wet razors as harsh and irritating and showed electric shavers as a less fraught alternative. The ads were intended to reach young men—a group in which about half self-identified as having sensitive skin—and the tag line for the launch campaign of the Reflex Action Razor was, ''Anything closer would be too close for comfort.'' Ads were bought in publications such as Men's Fitness, GQ, and Men's Health and on both network and cable television.

To back up its ads Norelco invested in direct mail to about three million consumers, in-store displays, and various promotions including a sweepstakes with a car as one of the prizes. Don Imus, a nationally syndicated radio show host, was convinced to take the ''21-day test drive'' on the air, and consumers were offered a money-back guarantee if they took the test and found the Reflex Action Razor did not satisfy their needs. Norelco also bought a sponsorship with the National Hockey League, whose viewers were predominantly young and male. For Norelco's sponsorship the NHL created a ''Face Off'' award, tracking individual and team face off statistics. While shaving sponsorships were not new to the world of professional sports, the NHL sponsorship was particularly notable because Norelco had not invested much in such promotions previously.

Norelco spent more on its launch of the Reflex Action Razor than it had on any previous campaign. According to Brandweek, ''[Norelco] normally outspends the rest of its competitors combined on advertising and spent $30 million on the intro of its Reflex Action Razor.''

OUTCOME

The electric shaver market grew a modest 3 to 4 percent per year during the mid- and late 1990s. Retailers attributed the growth both to advertising and to improved packaging that made the shopping experience easier for the consumer. The ads themselves were a hit, and the ''Hockey'' commercial garnered an Adweek award for one of the top spots of 1998. Sportswriters favorably compared the ads to the NHL's own marketing, and Sherry Ross of the New York Daily News noted that ''one of the most amusing sports-themed advertisements on television [portrayed] hockey players as personable and human, something the NHL has failed to do.''

Following on the success of the Reflex Action Razor ads, Norelco continued its use of the 21-day trial period concept with new products such as the Advantage Razor, attempting to further penetrate the blade-users market. The Advantage was a hybrid electric unit, dispensing shaving lotion and intended for use with water. Advertising for the Advantage challenged consumers to take the 21-day test drive, at the end of which they could get their money back if they had not made the razor part of their daily routine. In one ad for the Advantage, a gritty Hartford Wolfpack player likened the action of Norelco's newest product to that of an ice-smoothing Zamboni machine.

Another set of 21-day-trial ads for the Advantage Razor employed Virginia Military Institute (VMI) cadets. The Roanoke Times reported that the ''inspection-dreading cadets'' of America's military schools were chosen because they must ''have a close shave all of the time.'' Four of the cadets who tried the Advantage were chosen to star in the spot, which was a campy send-up of military life. For instance, after using the Norelco razor for three weeks, one cadet was seen smearing camouflage makeup on his face for woods maneuvers when he had the revelation that he had gotten a really close shave from the Advantage. The stars were paid $450 per day during the three-day filming of the ad, and VMI was paid $12,500 for use of the site. Although VMI accepts women, none were asked to participate in the exercise.

CUSTOM LURES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Based in Minnetonka, Minnesota, Normark Corporation was the exclusive U.S. distributor for Rapala, a Finnish-made fishing lure that was the leader in its market segment. Normark had long worked with Carmichael Lynch, a Minneapolis-based advertising agency noted for its many accounts with makers and distributors of sports-related merchandise. Over the years Carmichael Lynch turned out a number of significant print and television ads for Normark, but the company's 1998 advertising was much more limited. By far the most prominent piece was a small—but highly effective—ad that ran in World Traveler, the in-flight magazine of Northwest Airlines, late in the year. Budget for the ad, or that of Normark's overall 1998 advertising, was not disclosed.

Rapala was a family-owned business whose founder developed a unique lure in the 1930s. It entered the U.S. market in the early 1960s with the founding of the company that would become Normark and gained great exposure thanks to a 1962 article in Life magazine. Rapala lures became so popular with U.S. anglers that competition was not a significant factor.

The 1998 promotion marked a new and interesting strategic direction for Normark, whose World Traveler ad offered businesspeople the opportunity to purchase custom lures engraved with their corporate logo. The latter, Normark suggested, would make great promotional gifts. ''What we found,'' a company executive stated in a news release, ''is many of these companies looked at our fishing lures as a unique way to bond with their customers or show their sales force a sign of appreciation, rather than giving them another golf ball or paperweight.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Rapala founder Lauri Saarinen, better known as Lauri Rapala, was born in central Finland in 1905. While working as a commercial fisherman, Rapala hit upon the idea of developing a lure that imitated the movement of minnows, which were eaten by larger fish. In 1935 he fashioned his first lure from cork. Because he did not have much money, Rapala had to use common materials that he could find in the village where he lived. He used tinfoil from cheese packets and chocolate bars to make the lure shiny, and he melted used photographic negatives to coat the surface. Rapala's first lure is still on display at the company's Vaaksy, Finland, headquarters: black on the top, gold along the sides, and white on the bottom, it is the same color as the minnows that swam in Lake Paijanne, where Rapala fished.

The lure proved enormously successful, and with it Rapala was able to catch 600 pounds of fish a day. While serving in the Finnish army during World War II he began to interest his comrades in the lure. They were using a much cruder method to catch fish, dynamiting a lake, and Rapala proved to them that he could catch more fish with his lure than they could with their dynamite. After the war, the Rapala family—Lauri, his four sons, and his wife Elma, who worked as bookkeeper—founded the Rapala company and began manufacturing the lures.

TARGET MARKET

Rapala had a huge business among U.S. anglers through Normark, the company that held exclusive distribution rights to Rapala lures in the United States. That company was founded by Ron Weber and Ray Ostrom, two Minnesotans impressed by the quality of Rapala lures. Weber discovered the product by chance in 1959 when a friend received a Rapala lure from a relative who worked at the U.S. embassy in Helsinki. Enthusiastic over his new find, Weber wrote to the company requesting 500 lures, and Rapala's international business was born. A year later the company that would become Normark set up shop in the basement of Ostrom's Marine & Sporting Goods Store.

The Rapala product held instant appeal for fishermen seeking more lightweight lures, and its ability to catch fish made it an instant winner despite its relatively high price. When Weber and Ostrom first went into business—they initially called their enterprise the Rapala Company and later Nordic Enterprises before settling on Normark in 1965—typical lures sold for 99 cents, and many anglers balked at Rapala's $1.95 price tag. When they saw what it could do, however, they quickly began buying the lures in large quantities.

The name Normark was meant to symbolize the northern United States, and indeed Normark did much of its business among anglers—a group that is largely, though not exclusively, male—fishing in that area. Minnesota itself was known as the "Land of 10,000 Lakes," and many small bodies of water surrounded the Great Lakes region. But the appeal of Normark equipment extended throughout the nation, and its lures became as much a part of fishing in other areas as they were in the north.

COMPETITION

Another Minnesota company, Lindy-Little Joe, made lures in the 1990s, and indeed, Dennis Anderson of the Minneapolis-St. Paul Star-Tribune lamented the fact that large companies such as it and Normark dominated the field. "Long gone are the times when small, independent firms could hand-stamp a few lures a day and expect to make a profit," he wrote. "Onetime notable manufacturers such as National Bait Company of Minneapolis and the Paul Bunyan Bait Company of the Twin Cities

A SPORTING AGENCY

Carmichael Lynch, the Minneapolis advertising agency that handled Normark's Rapala lure and Blue Fox tackle accounts, was "unofficially known as the master of pastimes," wrote Kathy DeSalvo in SHOOT, "due to its fishing, boating, biking, and in-line skating related accounts." In addition to Normark, Carmichael Lynch's other sporting clients included Stren Fishing Lines, Polaris snowmobiles and watercraft (Polaris moved to Martin/Williams in 1998), Schwinn Cycling & Fitness, Rollerblade, and Harley-Davidson Motor Company. "In fact," DeSalvo noted, "it's probably the only agency with Harleys parked in its lobby." President and executive creative director Jack Supple told her, "For a long time, people thought it was, like, a motorcycle gang here."

DeSalvo described a Rollerblade spot by Carmichael Lynch, directed by Eric Young of Young & Company: "A beautiful young woman, 'Colette,' walks down her front steps and chucks a bouquet of roses. The footage is intercut with shots of a letter written by a suitor, explaining he'd wanted to 'stop by' but couldn't because 'the hill's too steep.' We learn that the unrequited lover's skates lacked the patented AVT brakes, 'the easiest way to stop from the company that got it all started.' " Supple explained his agency's appeal: "It isn't just fishing or hobby accounts; it's any 'enthusiast' account—even if that's stretched as far as a bank or a turkey. It can be 'enthusiasm' as well; that's what you should feel in the work."

It was perhaps no accident that Supple himself was a fishing enthusiast, as reported by Doug Smith in the Minneapolis-St. Paul Star-Tribune. "I mix business and pleasure," he told Smith. "You see, Rapala is one of our accounts. What better way to develop ideas for lure advertisements than by going fishing?" To judge from Supple's easy handling of fishing lingo, he spent plenty of time on the lakes: describing one fishing adventure, he said, "It was bluebird sky and lots of sun, and you don't really want that. We were throwing black Vibrax bucktails out . . . . On the next cast, I was figure-eighting (swirling the lure in a figure-eight at the side of the boat), hoping [the fish] would come back, when all of a sudden, this 51-incher came out of nowhere. It was cool."

are now absent from the scene. So is the Preston, Minn., firm that once produced the Lazy Ike. Actually, the Lazy Ike—which today is produced by Pradcoin Fort Smith, Ark.—was once manufactured by two companies, one in Decorah, Iowa, and one in Preston, Minn. As one might expect, a court battle ensued over rights to the name, and the Iowa firm . . . ultimately prevailed."

Clearly a great many of Rapala's would-be competitors had been consigned to oblivion, their names known only to enthusiasts and scholars of fishing arcana such as Anderson. Though it was certainly not the only maker of lures and other fishing equipment, Rapala did not face any stiff competition. Noting the 60th anniversary of Rapala lures in 1996, Outdoor Life magazine called them "the most popular lure of all time." By that point Rapala was turning out some 15 million lures a year, with plants in Finland and Iceland, and selling its product in more than 120 countries. Revenues had reached $100 million, with annual growth at a staggering 15 percent. It was an impressive achievement for a company that had started with a penniless fisherman, and many years after Lauri Rapala's death in 1975, the company remained in the hands of his family.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Rapala's U.S. advertising perhaps had its beginning with an August 17, 1962, story in Life magazine. The cover featured Marilyn Monroe, who had just died, and inside was a small article entitle "A Lure Fish Can't Pass Up." This, of course, was the best kind of advertising—unpaid and unrequested—and it had phenomenal results. Lauri Rapala's grandson, who became the firm's CEO in 1989, told John Steinbreder of Outdoor Life, "People wanted my grandfather's plugs so badly they were renting them from tackle shops for $5 a day. With a $25 deposit! And that was at a time when the lures were selling for only a dollar apiece."

With Carmichael Lynch in the 1980s and 1990s, Rapala pursued a much more scientific advertising strategy, using print ads and carefully targeted spots on cable television. "I don't think there is anything more targeted than the fishing category," Rapala's Tom Mackin told William Spain of Advertising Age. "We can buy a saltwater fishing show or a walleye fishing show or a bass-fishing show" on networks such as ESPN and TNN. Such networks, Mackin said, "are a very targeted and efficient way to reach [Rapala's] audience. There is no waste involved. It is buying TV with the same strategy we would buy print."

Among notable earlier print advertising Carmichael Lynch did for Normark's Blue Fox line was a television and print campaign in the 1980s, "One Drop Is Powerful Magic," to promote its Dr. Juiceline of scents, which were designed to draw fish to a lure. A low-cost 1988 spot for the Foxee Jig proved highly effective, as did an August 1995 print ad. Of the latter, Lambeth Hochwald in Sales & Marketing Management wrote: "To achieve Normark's goal, using large type that nearly filled a two-page spread, the ad 'shouted' that if the product didn't reap a reward, customers [should] stop fishing and find a new hobby—in this case, golf." Hochwald singled out this ad, along with four others by other agencies, as an example of exciting advertising.

Carmichael Lynch's work for Normark in 1998, by contrast, was much less prominent. Only one piece gained notice, and then only some time later, but it was worth the wait. Described in a Normark news release as "a little, half-page ad," the advertisement ran in World Traveler, Northwest Airlines' in-flight magazine, late in the year and promoted the idea of fishing lures as unique promotional gifts for use by businesspeople. Rapala offered to print a corporate logo on the side of the lure, thus making it an unusual and memorable gift to exchange as a means of sealing deals between businesses.

OUTCOME

It was a simple idea, but it caught on, according both to Rapala's own news release and to a small article that appeared in the Arizona Republic in May 1999. Mackin, Rapala's vice president of marketing, said that within days of the ad's publication, the company received requests from an array of large corporations, including Coca-Cola, Merrill Lynch, 3M, Volkswagen North America, Cargill, Michelin/Uniroyal, and Northwest Airlines itself. As of May 1999, Normark had sold more than 60,000 of the specially imprinted lures.

"I think we really tapped into something," Mackin said. "We initially placed the ads as a test. We saw it as a way to extend our business to a new segment of the market, selling direct business-to-business." The Normark news release also quoted Barbara May, executive director of Sales and Marketing Executives International in Alexandria, Virginia. "As business becomes more cutthroat, sales and marketing executives are exploring opportunities that help them bond better with their clients," May said. "The response to the Rapala fishing lure doesn't surprise me. Companies are focusing harder than ever on one-to-one relationships with customers. To do that, they sometimes need to give mementoes with meaning." Though it planned "to move forward with other marketing tools to fuel this promotion," at the time of the news release, Rapala had no plans for any follow-up advertising to support the lure offer.

BRING ON THE DAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Pepsi and Starbucks joined forces in 1994 to create the North American Coffee Partnership (NACP) to market cold ready-to-drink coffee products under the Starbucks name and using the Pepsi distribution network. The joint venture's first product, Frappuccino, quickly dominated the category. It was positioned as an afternoon drink, but research indicated that there was also a market for a cold coffee drink in the morning, leading to the introduction in 2002 of a second product called DoubleShot, an espresso drink. NACP provided some advertising dollars to launch the new brand, but after two years DoubleShot had failed to achieve much brand recognition. The 2004 "Bring On the Day" campaign, developed by ad agency Fallon of New York, sought to rectify this problem, create a buzz around the brand, and build sales.

While the campaign included some radio spots and DoubleShot giveaways at ski resorts and music events, the entire success of the campaign hinged on a single television spot, "Glen." It featured a young man drinking DoubleShot and getting ready for work. While he did so, he was serenaded live by the 1980s rock band Survivor singing their hit song "Eye of the Tiger," but with lyrics that commented on Glen's workaday world. The campaign was budgeted at $5 million to $10 million.

"Glen" was a hit with the target audience and was widely acclaimed, garnering an Emmy nomination and a Bronze EFFIE Award in 2005. It was also pirated on the Internet and became a subject of conversation on blogs and online forums. More importantly, the campaign, which ended in September 2004, dramatically increased brand awareness, increased the conversion rate from mere awareness to actually trying the product, and increased sales in DoubleShots' main distribution channels, supermarkets and convenience stores.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1994 Starbucks Coffee Company and PepsiCo, Inc., forged a joint venture, the North American Coffee Partnership (NACP), its goal to marry the Starbucks brand with Pepsi's massive distribution system to produce and market cold, ready-to-drink coffee products for grocery and convenience stores and other outlets. Two years later NACP introduced Frappuccino, a bottled version of Starbucks's popular combination of ice, milk, and coffee, available in half a dozen flavors. Frappuccino became so dominant that it achieved generic name status for all ready-to-drink (RTD) coffees, in a manner similar to the way Kleenex was associated with facial tissues. By the early 2000 this 800-pound gorilla in the RTD coffee category controlled 82 percent of the grocery channel and 75 percent of the convenience channel. In truth, Frappuccino had no serious rival.

NACP positioned Frappuccino as an afternoon drink, essentially a reward or pick-me-up drink. Overall, the RTD category represented a tiny percentage of coffee consumption, the vast majority of which took place in the morning. Research revealed that consumers would be receptive to a cold Starbucks' morning product, albeit one a bit lighter in milk. Sensing a opportunity to carve out morning sales in the RTD market, NACP introduced a new product in 2002: DoubleShot, a single-serve, 6.5 ounce can of espresso blended with nonfat milk, cream, sugar, and caramel color. The name was a reference to the way customers at Starbucks phrased their orders. The spring rollout was supported by an introductory advertising campaign, developed by Fallon Worldwide's New York office, featuring a pair of television spots as well as print and outdoor advertising that positioned DoubleShot as an invigorating drink "to get you going" in the morning. In-store merchandising and targeted sampling efforts were also included. The 2003 campaign introduced the tagline "Bring on the day" and featured a television spot in which a man who did not want to go to work was chased around his apartment by his business suit until a drink of DoubleShot braced him for the day ahead and he finally prepared for work.

After two years in the marketplace, DoubleShot had not succeeded as well as NACP had hoped. According to a write-up on the 2004 "Bring On the Day" campaign that Fallon produced for the EFFIE Awards, as of 2003 DoubleShot had still "never quite made it into the front ranks of on-the-go morning beverages." It went on to explain that this was because "not enough people have heard of DoubleShot, and not enough people get that it can really change how you experience your morning.... So our plan was to tap into the 'pain of mornings' and make Starbucks DoubleShot famous as Liquid Motivation for the day ahead."

TARGET MARKET

Greg W. Prince of Beverage World explained that NACP viewed the target market for DoubleShot to be different from the one for Frappuccino. Whereas the latter appealed to a broad age range of 18 to 49 years old, DoubleShot was aimed at the younger side of that spectrum. But the target market was characterized more importantly by something that cut across age: a certain attitude toward life assumed by a type of person that the marketers dubbed an "Intensity Hunter." These were described as passionate people who sought out new and exciting experiences; they were consumers of sports drinks, specialty coffees, and energy bars. "But two things really stood out for us about Intensity Hunters," wrote Fallon in its brief of effectiveness for the EFFIE Awards. "They index highly for listening to music (they're the iPod crew) and they're desensitized to 'marketing'—they know a shill when they see one, and they run a mile to avoid it."

CALL ME ISHMAEL . . . AND NO FOAM, PLEASE

When friends Gordon Bowker, Jerry Baldwin, and Zev Siegl founded Starbucks in Seattle in the late 1960s as a single shop, they mined Herman Melville's great American novel, Moby Dick, for a name. They found it in the coffee-loving first mate of the Pequod: Starbuck. For a logo the partners devised a two-tailed mermaid-siren. The image, appropriate for the 1960s, was modified over the years, becoming less sexy and more stylized.

COMPETITION

DoubleShot faced limited competition in the RTD coffee category that its sister brand, Frappuccino, dominated so thoroughly. Because of the backing of Pepsi's distribution network, both brands operated from a position of strength that only Coca-Cola could challenge. Coke acquired Planet Java, a bottled coffee, to test the waters, but after a few months it pulled the product, concluding that the size and scale of the market did not meet Coke's financial criteria. Nestlé also made a stab at the market, only to make a hasty withdrawal.

While Coke remained interested and waited for the market to grow—and risked allowing its rival Pepsi to gain an insurmountable foothold in RTD coffee—other players stepped forward. A distant second in the category was the Arizona brand of iced coffee. Folgers, backed by parent company Dean Foods Company, introduced Jakada, the first chilled coffee beverage to be sold in single-serve HDPE (high-density polyethylene) plastic bottles. But NACP did not view Jakada as a threat, believing that it would actually grow the category to the benefit of Frappuccino and DoubleShot Another newcomer was Wolfgang Puck Gourmet Lattes, and while it benefited from the name of the famous chef, it had limited distribution and did not seek to challenge Frappuccino and DoubleShot. Rather, it too wanted to grow the category and carve out its own slice. Other small players in the category included private-label iced coffees and regional brands such as New Jersey's Cappuccino Havana; California's Espresso Coffee Soda; Brooklyn, New York's Espresso Coffee Soda produced by Manhattan Special; and Extreme Coffee's Shock brand, marketed in California, Arizona, Alaska, Minnesota, and Wisconsin.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The 2004 "Bring On the Day" campaign had four goals: to increase brand awareness; to create brand fame through entertaining ads; to push consumers actually to try DoubleShot; and to increase sales by at least 10 percent. Reaching a target market that was jaded by a lifetime of exposure to advertising was a daunting challenge, however. In essence the creative team wanted to demonstrate to that audience how to drink the product (i.e., as a morning jump-start), but in an amusing fashion. Because the target audience included hard-core music fans, it made sense to lean heavily on music. According to the EFFIE write-up, "A music-based approach would allow the advertising to act as a metaphor for the drinking experience . . . After all, what's more motivational than a pumped-up, charging piece of music?"

Out of this strategic thinking came the idea to made use of one of the best known motivational songs, "Eye of the Tiger," by the band Survivor. The song had been used in the 1982 film Rocky III, helping to motivate boxer Rocky Balboa to become a champion again. The idea of the resulting television spot called "Glen" was to rewrite the lyrics of "Eye of the Tiger" and apply it to an everyday member of the target demographic as he began his day, in effect turning the pop song into a mock-heroic ballad. To take the idea to the next level, the creative team enlisted the services of Survivor itself not only to help rewrite the song but also to actually sing it to Glen in the commercial.

The 30-second spot opened with Glen drinking a can of DoubleShot in his apartment kitchen, with the sound of traffic in the background. Survivor was then heard singing "Glen! Glen, Glen, Glen" to the power chords that launched "Eye of the Tiger." The band itself was shown serenading Glen in his living room. As he shaved, the band crowded into his bathroom to continue the song: "Glen's the man. Goin' to work. Got his tie, got ambition." Next, Glen walked to the bus stop with Survivor tagging along, the drummer and his kit towed on a platform. The group continued to sing to him on the bus: "Middle management is right in his grasp. It's a dream he will never let die. Glen's the man of the hour, he's the king of his cube! Status quo reports have finally met their rival." They rode up the elevator with him and kept singing until the door opened and he walked off to his cubicle: "Burning the candle at both ends on his way to the top, he knows one day he just could become . . . Supervisor!" A picture of the Starbucks logo was accompanied by a voice-over: "Starbucks' DoubleShot espresso drink. Bring on the day." As a final twist, a young man walked past the open elevator door and Survivor began to follow him, starting the song over again: "Roy! Roy, Roy, Roy."

Modestly budgeted between $5 and $10 million, the campaign aired "Glen" on national cable television channels that offered what the target audience liked: music, pop culture, and sport. Hence, spots appeared on MTV, MTV2, Fuse, ESPN, ESPN2, and Spike. The 2004 campaign also included radio spots and sponsored regional sampling events at a number of ski resorts and music venues, but the centerpiece of the campaign was "Glen."

OUTCOME

The "Glen" spot was a hit from the very beginning, achieving the marketers' goal of creating buzz about the DoubleShot brand. A wide variety of newspapers and magazines—including the New York Times, USA Today, Creativity, and Adweek —published articles that praised the commercial. Moreover, "Glen" developed a grassroots following on the Internet, where the video was pirated and viewed by countless people. It was also widely discussed on websites, blogs, and forums. Starbucks posted the spot on its website, where it was viewed 3,000 times a week for the next few months. "Glen" received a nomination for an Emmy Award, and the "Bring On the Day" campaign was awarded a Bronze EFFIE in 2005 at the prestigious EFFIE Awards, presented by the New York American Marketing Association.

More important than accolades was the fact that the 2004 "Bring On the Day" campaign increased brand awareness by nearly 50 percent. Furthermore, the number of people who went from becoming aware of the brand to actually trying the product more than doubled. During the time that "Glen" aired on television, from May 2004 to September 2004, gross volume sales increased nearly 60 percent in convenience stores and almost 40 percent in grocery stores, with no distribution gains that could account for the change other than the advertising.

HERITAGE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 the North Carolina Division of Tourism, Film and Sports Development, previously known as the North Carolina Division of Travel and Tourism, continued an advertising campaign (''Heritage'') undertaken in 1997 by Loeffler Ketchum Mountjoy (LKM) of Charlotte. The campaign's primary focus was the state's heritage, and it stressed historic events that had occurred in North Carolina, as well as natural resources and cultural sites of interest in the state. Prominent among the advertising was a print ad celebrating the Civil Rights movement with a black-and-white photograph of a formerly segregated lunch counter and the caption ''Here, four brave people refused to move. What they did moved an entire nation.'' Television advertising, along with some radio and public relations work, accompanied the print ads. The tourism division's annual advertising budget was estimated to be between $2.5 million and $3 million.

Advertising played up North Carolina's varied heritage, and a number of ads focused on its significance in African American history. The state made a strong push for overseas visitors, particularly business travelers from Great Britain, and under the leadership of Gordon Clapp, the tourism division greatly expanded its offerings. In July 1998 North Carolina's efforts paid off with a prestigious award from the nation's tourism directors. ''When 50 people in the advertising community recognize your work,'' LKM creative director Jim Mountjoy said in a press release, ''it tells you that your work has hit the mark creatively. But when the top 50 people in the tourism industry single you out, it tells you that strategically you are dead-on.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Outsiders have been coming to North Carolina since a group of settlers sent by Sir Walter Raleigh established the first English colony in North America on Roanoke Island in 1585. That first settlement ended after just 10 months and was replaced by a second colony in 1587. But this colony, where Virginia Dare became the first child of English parents born in the New World, was ill-supplied: when reinforcements arrived from England in 1590, they found Roanoke deserted. Thus began the legend of the famous ''Lost Colony.''

Of course the English were not the first people in North Carolina. For centuries the state had been inhabited by a number of Native American tribes, most notably the Cherokee and Catawba. Thus when twentieth-century novelist Thomas Wolfe set out to create a fictionalized version of North and South Carolina, he called them Old and New Catawba. Carolina was named after King Charles II in 1663 and officially separated into North and South Carolina in 1712.

The Revolutionary War added new legends to North Carolina history. There was the so-called Mecklenburg Declaration, a statement of rights and independence from Great Britain supposedly created by the citizens of Mecklenburg County in May 1775, though its authenticity was doubtful. North Carolina was the site of a battle on February 27, 1776, at Moore's Creek Bridge, which has been dubbed the "Lexington and Concord of the South." On April 12 of that momentous year, North Carolina's Provincial Congress adopted the Halifax Resolution, authorizing its delegates to the Continental Congress in Philadelphia "to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency." Thus North Carolina became the first of the 13 colonies to issue an explicit directive calling for independence.

In 1861 North Carolina threw its lot in with a less successful independence effort, and though the Civil War left it much less battle-scarred than neighboring Virginia, slavery and segregation created scars of their own. By the mid-twentieth century, however, North Carolina had emerged as one of the more cosmopolitan southern states, and television's popular Andy Griffith Show—not to mention its many spin-offs—celebrated the state's easygoing way of life. The late twentieth century saw an increase of business, education, and scientific interest in the state, particularly in the "Research Triangle" formed by the capital at Raleigh and the neighboring cities of Durham and Chapel Hill.

North Carolina also had a growing film industry, placing it third in the nation after California and Florida. Partly for this reason, the North Carolina Division of Travel and Tourism changed its name in 1998 to the North Carolina Division of Tourism, Film and Sports Development. By then, the tourism division had worked with several advertising agencies. In July 1976 a relationship with the firm of Loucheim, Eng and People, Inc., had ended badly, with a legal action in which the state attempted to recover $145,000 in damages. According to its claim, the state had been overcharged for costly print ads and television spots that barely mentioned North Carolina. McKinney & Silver of Raleigh won the account later in 1976 and held it for 15 years, until LKM became the agency of record.

TARGET MARKET

The state of North Carolina and its tourism division made a number of efforts targeted to specific market segments; for instance, in 1994 the state spent some $8 million to attract British visitors. American Airlines had recently established direct service between Raleigh/Durham and London's Gatwick Airport, and this, combined with British Airways' service to Charlotte, spurred on the campaign. Cellet Travel Services in Great Britain handled the marketing initiative.

Harry Hoover, vice president of public relations for LKM, told Barbara J. Mays of Travel Weekly in March 1997, "Our new research shows that our visitors expect a restful, relaxing vacation and beautiful natural scenery." Hence tag lines such as this one, promoting the barrier islands along the coast: "Out here, we haven't burned our bridges with the 20th century. We just never built them." Another ad, promoting remote retreats in the mountains of western North Carolina, asked, "Remember how, when you were a child, you had your own secret hiding place?"

The principal thrust of North Carolina's 1998 tourism marketing was heritage. Along with its "four brave people" ad, celebrating four black Greensboro Colleges students who in 1960 refused to leave a segregated lunch counter, the state drew attention to its rich African American history. Advertising promoted sites such as the Mattye Reed African Heritage Museum, the Hayti Heritage Center in Durham, and that city's Parrish Street. The latter was known as "the Black Wall Street" because of the many successful African American businesses that started there during the 1920s, among them the largest black-owned enterprise in the United States, the North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance Company.

COMPETITION

Clapp told Jim Osterman and Katy Eckmann of Adweek in 1996 that North Carolina faced "stiff competition right in our own region." A number of neighboring states, in particular Tennessee and Virginia, had much larger tourism budgets, and indeed Virginia was the home of what was undoubtedly the most successful state tourism campaign of the twentieth century: "Virginia Is for Lovers." Created by Martin & Woltz of Richmond in 1969, the campaign proved to be enormously popular during the 1970s, and though Virginia later tried to replace it with other efforts, the classic slogan kept coming to the fore. In 1999 Virginia celebrated the campaign's 30th anniversary with renewed promotion.

North Carolina's advertising budget of $2.5 to $3 million was certainly a modest one, given the fact that a single North Carolina county devoted about as much—$2.5 million—to its own tourism advertising. This was Buncombe County, site of Asheville, a city in the mountains of western North Carolina with a thriving arts community and tourist attractions such as Biltmore Estates, the Thomas Wolfe house, and the luxurious Grove Park Inn. Of course promotion for Buncombe County and other areas within the state could only

PEN PALS ACROSS NORTH CAROLINA

In October 1998 the North Carolina Division of Tourism, Film and Sports Development launched a program to match up young pen pals across the state of North Carolina. Formed in cooperation with the state's Department of Public Instruction, the program began with some 1,400 fourth-graders, and organizers planned for greater expansion in coming months.

According to a press release accompanying the launch, Division of Tourism, Film and Sports Development director Gordon Clapp said, "This program encourages students to learn about their home state and what is has to offer. By sharing . . . experiences across the state, young people can gain fresh perspectives while reinforcing what they learn in the classroom."

North Carolina elementary schools received a "Pen Pal package," complete with recommendations on how to best implement the program. The packet included a brochure on North Carolina, suggestions of topics on which youngsters might correspond, a list of related websites, and other material. "We have already matched up several fourth-grade classes," Clapp said, "and will continue to do so as we receive more information from interested teachers."

benefit North Carolina, and for that matter, competition between states often gave way to cooperation. Thus in 1999 Clapp told Travel Trade Gazette UK & Ireland that the state was working with South Carolina and Virginia to set up a network of "heritage trails."

Clapp organized the January 1999 Travel South Marketplace, a convention that brought together the tourism divisions of 12 southern states, along with buyers from all over the world. Included were Alabama, which in the late 1990s had a $5 billion-a-year travel industry; Arkansas, which had devoted considerable sums to the renovation of sites in Little Rock and Hot Springs; Florida, always one of the nation's top vacation spots; Georgia, then in the process of adopting recommendations from a study called "A Vision for Georgia Tourism 2000 and Beyond"; Kentucky, which offered visitors a Great Kentucky Getaway Guide; Louisiana, which celebrated its 300th birthday in 1999; Mississippi, where tourism was growing on the strength of gambling and riverboat tours; South Carolina, which had recently published a guide called South Carolina Adventures—Nature-Based Packages; Tennessee, a state with an $8 billion-a-year tourism budget; Virginia, where the commemoration of the 200th anniversary of George Washington's death coincided with the "Virginia Is for Lovers" anniversary; and West Virginia, which had recently launched its "West Virginia: Full of Wonder—Plenty of Wild" advertising campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

One of the complaints North Carolina lodged against Loucheim, Eng in 1976 was the fact that the firm's advertising for the state was loosely targeted. The legal action cited, for instance, a four-page ad in Glamour magazine featuring models in expensive designs from Sax Fifth Avenue, with only peripheral mention of North Carolina. The agency had also spent $22,000 on two 30-second spots and a billboard during the 1975 Peach Bowl football game—more wasted money, in the state's view.

Efforts by McKinney & Silver and its successor, Loeffler Ketchum Mountjoy, were much more successful. In fact, agency president John Ketchum started with McKinney & Silver, where he had worked on the state account before leaving the firm in 1988. In the five years between the time North Carolina hired LKM in 1991 and the time of an agency review in 1996—state law required a review after five years—LKM's advertising had earned several Addy Awards, along with recognition from the Kelly Awards and The One Show.

In April 1996, after LKM bested three other agencies to retain the account, Clapp announced that the advertising effort in coming years would address two major areas, in the words of Osterman and Eckmann in Adweek: " 'heritage' tourism, which promotes the state's history and its natural and cultural resources; and stepped-up tourism awareness programs, particularly in public relations."

Though the 1998 tourism campaign included electronic media, the primary thrust was print, with black-and-white artwork. In fall 1985 a pair of studies reported by Gilbert R. Yochum in the Journal of Travel Research found that black-and-white newspaper advertising was more effective than the same sort of advertising in magazines. Both studies showed that newspaper ads tended to draw tourists who spent more money than those attracted by magazine ads; by comparison, a radio campaign in Virginia Beach, Virginia, proved to be less effective than either variety of print advertising. Nonetheless, North Carolina's 1998 campaign included ads in the magazines Southern Living, American Heritage, and Smithsonian, as well as spots on the Arts & Entertainment network (A&E) and Cable News Network (CNN). These moves, according to Mark Harrison of LKM, were targeted to potential tourists who would spend the most money in the state.

Print ads, most of which LKM introduced in 1997 and continued in 1998, stressed both the historical and the natural heritage of the state. One ad, referring to the famous Lost Colony, was headlined "The first English settlers vanished into the mists of history here. We've been looking for them ever since." Other advertising promoted Kitty Hawk, where Wilbur and Orville Wright launched the first airplane in 1903; and Fort Macon, site of an important Civil War battle. One of LKM's most prominent print ads noted that "according to geologists, North Carolina was once connected to Africa"—thus promoting the many exotic species at the North Carolina Zoo in Asheboro.

OUTCOME

Clapp won praise from Susan J. Young of Travel Agent in mid-1998 for "significantly enhanc[ing] the look and feel of the state's tourism product." Among his most notable undertakings was the adoption of the "Heritage" theme, complete with a network of historic sites linked by "heritage trails"—some actual hiking trails, some driving routes—between Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The heritage trails program, Young noted, would be fully operational by 2000.

"It's a whole new way of promoting North Carolina," Clapp told her. "One of the gratifying rewards is bringing together diverse groups of people who thought they had nothing in common, such as environmentalists, economic development representatives, and cultural resource people. It's exciting." Later in 1999 the state would introduce garden tours throughout North Carolina, and Clapp expressed an interest in creating African American and Native American trails as well.

Meanwhile, LKM promoted North Carolina's hiking trails with an ad headlined "Colossal upheavals, landslides, and brutal glaciers make for darned fine hiking trails." Seven of its ads, which "focused on North Carolina's scenic beauty and relaxing atmosphere," according to a July 1998 press release, won the agency and the state the "best print advertising campaign" and "best individual print ad" at the annual conference of the National Council of State Tourism Directors in Palm Springs, California.

E-TICKET CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With the "E-Ticket" advertising campaign Northwest Airlines, Inc., the largest subsidiary of Northwest Airlines Corporation, encouraged consumers to try its electronic ticketing system on the Internet instead of purchasing paper tickets via telephone or at an office such as a travel agency. The new service streamlined the process of booking a flight, checking in at the airport, and boarding the plane, and it eliminated the possibility that the ticket would be lost or stolen. Advertisements for Northwest E-Ticket began running in print media soon after the service was introduced in 1996 and continued into 1999. The campaign was developed by two Minneapolis agencies, Hunt Adkins and Valentine McCormick Ligabel.

An advertisement in Fortune magazine in 1998 illustrated the connection between a customer's computer and an airplane flight with three graphic elements: a man using a computer mouse, a binary pattern that formed an image of a Northwest jet's tail fin, and an ascending airplane. The headline read, "The Information Runway." The text read: "Select a flight and purchase a ticket from your computer with Northwest Airlines. We've taken travel planning to new heights of ease and convenience. Just hop on the Internet and jet over to WorldWeb, the Northwest Airlines web site at www.nwa.com. You can review flight schedules, check availabilities, book a seat and even purchase a Northwest E-Ticket, the convenient and paperless way to travel. With a few clicks of the mouse, you're ready to fly. It's that simple. But don't stop there. Discover all the great ways in which WorldWeb can make your travel planning a breeze. Explore vacation ideas. Save money with exclusive CyberSaver fares. Book your car rental and make hotel reservations. Verify departure and arrival times. Check your WorldPerks account and more." The ad concluded with the company's red-and-white logo above the slogan "Some People Just Know How to Fly" and a toll-free telephone number to call for more information.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Northwest Airlines was created by mergers among numerous airlines. The first was Northwest Airways, founded by Colonel Lewis Brittin in 1926 at Speedway Flying Field, which later became Minneapolis/St. Paul International Airport. The company initially delivered mail to Chicago and the Twin Cities but soon began carrying passengers and expanding its service regionally. Its name was changed to Northwest Airlines, Inc., in 1934. Other carriers that eventually became part of Northwest were Wisconsin Central Airlines (later known as North Central Airlines), Southern Airways, Hughes Airwest (formed by the merger of Hughes Air Corporation and Air West), Pacific Airlines, Bonanza Airlines, and West Coast Airlines (formed by the merger of Zimmerly Airlines and Empire Airlines). Through a later merger Northwest and KLM Royal Dutch Airlines became subsidiaries of a holding company named Northwest Airlines Corporation. By 1998 Northwest was one of the largest airlines in the world, serving 21 countries and transporting more than 51 million passengers.

Northwest began using computers to keep track of tickets and reservations in 1973, but consumers were not able to make travel arrangements via the Internet until two decades later. Instead the customer telephoned the airline or booked the flight through a travel agent. A paper ticket was issued and, if the reservation was made by telephone, the ticket usually had to be delivered to the buyer. Without a ticket in hand the traveler could not board the airplane. In the mid-1990s airlines began offering electronic tickets. This innovation could save a company $25 million annually in recordkeeping expenses, since the cost of handling an electronic ticket was $1 compared to $8 for a paper ticket. An electronic ticket could be purchased through a travel agent, but typically the consumer used a computer to visit an airline's home page on the World Wide Web, booked a flight there, and paid by credit card. Northwest designed its Internet site to explain the advantages of electronic ticketing and other programs, to show customers how to use the services, and to offer discounts and perks. Advertisements to publicize E-Ticket also encouraged consumers to spend time exploring the company's home page.

CYBERSAVERS

Consumers often saved 20 percent to 30 percent by shopping for discounted airline fares on the Internet. In 1998 Northwest Airlines stimulated interest in on-line reservations with a program called "CyberSavers." Every Wednesday the company announced substantially reduced fares to specific destinations. The offers expired on the following Saturday. Consumers could request weekly E-mails that listed the latest special offers. After booking a flight on-line the customer received confirmation of the reservation by E-mail and then received an itinerary receipt by U.S. mail. The flights could also be booked by telephone, but customers who purchased these fares over the Internet received an additional $20 discount.

TARGET MARKET

Northwest E-Ticket was a popular option because paper tickets could be lost or stolen, and they were not always delivered in time for the customer to depart on schedule. In addition, people with electronic tickets were usually able to board the plane faster than other passengers. Those who booked an E-Ticket received customer itinerary receipts via E-mail and U.S. mail. At the airport these customers needed only photo identification along with either their itinerary receipts or their last names and flight numbers. Travelers with E-Ticket could check in at the ticket counter, the gate, or at one of Northwest's Electronic Service Centers. The service was particularly popular among business travelers because it eliminated the cost of overnight delivery services and the expense of replacing lost tickets. Northwest's Internet site included a search engine that could quickly find the lowest coach fares available for any round trip. Customers could also use the site to reserve hotel rooms and car rentals and to redeem frequent-flyer miles. The computer system stored data to build a profile of each customer, making note of details such as whether the person liked to sit near the aisle or a window and which individuals would require a vegetarian or kosher meal. Frequently customers could pick the exact seats they preferred for their flights. Advertisements for E-Ticket explained these advantages and emphasized that the service was quick and easy to use, a modern convenience that made air travel more pleasant.

COMPETITION

According to Aviation Week & Space Technology, United Airlines, Inc., led the U.S. segment of the industry in 1998; American Airlines was second; Delta Air Lines, Inc. was third; Continental Airlines, Inc., was fourth; Northwest was fifth; and US Airways Group, Inc., was sixth. One of the first airlines to use electronic ticketing was ValuJet, a regional carrier based in Atlanta that began operations in 1993. In January 1995 Southwest Airlines Company began offering the service, and within eight months nearly a third of its customers were making reservations electronically. Delta also began testing electronic tickets on a few flights in April 1995. Vying with Continental to be the first carrier to feature the option throughout the country, United tried electronic ticketing in selected markets in the spring of 1995 and began offering it nationwide in September. Promotions for United and Southwest discussed electronic ticketing that year, with United's ads promising "ease of use and ease of mind."

In 1997 United discontinued its long-running "Come Fly Our Friendly Skies" slogan and introduced the straightforward "Rising" campaign, which ran through 1998. The new ads acknowledged that traveling by plane was not always pleasant, and they promised that United would rise to the challenge of improving its services. In a print advertisement the words ''Your Flight is Delayed'' were spelled out in a bowl of cereal. ''Does the truth really need to be sugarcoated?'' the text asked. The ad promised that customers would receive an honest explanation when there was a problem with a flight. Another advertisement in Travel & Leisure in 1998 simply showed a Hawaiian beach and palm trees below the headline ''Fly United Airlines to Kapalua.'' The ad displayed the United logo above the word ''RISING'' in a lower corner. According to Advertising Age, United spent $63.6 million on total measured advertising in 1998 (down from $67.2 million in 1997 and $75.2 million in 1991) with $27.8 million going for television commercials and $33.6 million for print advertisements.

In second place, American Airlines advertised its electronic ticketing, ''AAccess,'' by emphasizing that the service allowed customers to know all the details about their flights and to make better choices based on that information. An advertisement in Newsweek showed one traveler who knew nothing about his flight to Los Angeles except that he would be aboard the airplane. Another traveler profiled beside him knew the flight number, the type of plane, when and where the flight originated, its arrival time, his seat assignment, which in-flight movie he would see, and how many frequent-flyer miles he would earn from the trip. Advertising Age reported that American spent $70.7 million on measured advertising in 1998 (compared to $64.6 million in 1997 and $115.9 million in 1991), with $20.4 million going for television commercials and $47.7 million for print advertisements.

Meanwhile, Delta's surreal ''On Top of the World'' campaign noted that travelers had ''millions of reasons to fly today; only one that matters to you.'' The fantasy advertisements showed Delta employees striving to meet the individual needs of passengers and to show the comfortable conditions in Delta's new transatlantic business class of seats. In January 1999 Delta added a $2 surcharge for all tickets that were not purchased electronically through the company's Internet site. Beset by angry telephone calls from consumers, Delta withdrew the fee.

In 1998 Delta and United discussed but ultimately abandoned a marketing and code-sharing alliance that would have given them nearly 39 percent of U.S. air traffic. American and US Airways considered a similar alliance to control 25 percent of the market but reduced the proposal to a reciprocal frequent-flyer plan. During 1998 Northwest and Continental began forming a partnership that would have about 16 percent of the market, a slightly smaller share than the percentage held by each of the three leading airlines. Delta had considered merging with Continental in 1997, and early in 1998 Continental received takeover proposals from both Delta and Northwest, but no agreement was reached by the end of the year.

TRADEMARK DESIGN

Since 1948 Northwest had been known for the red tail fins on its airplanes, a design that was often included in advertisements near the company's red-and-white logo.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Since electronic ticketing was a new service, the E-Ticket campaign cited the advantages of paperless tickets, explained how to buy them, and invited consumers to visit Northwest's Internet site for more information. An advertisement called ''Planet Zortron,'' which was developed by Hunt Adkins and ran in travel agent publications throughout 1997, showed a UFO hovering against a cloudy, purple sky. The ad described ''Plan A,'' in which tickets were booked through a travel agent who gave them to a delivery driver. En route to the customer, the driver stopped to repair a flat tire, had to escape from an evil clown who commandeered the truck, was abducted by aliens and taken to the planet Zortron, and finally delivered the tickets one minute after the customer's flight had departed. In ''Plan B,'' the travel agent booked a Northwest E-Ticket, and the customer boarded the flight without incident. The text explained: ''With Northwest Airlines' E-Ticket, there are no flight coupons to print or tickets to deliver, and you can change reservations quickly and easily without having to reissue a ticket. All of which saves you a considerable amount of both time and money. E-Ticket is now available throughout the U.S. and to Canada (sorry, not yet available to planet Zortron).''

Advertisements created by Valentine McCormick Ligabel promoted E-Ticket and Northwest's Internet site during 1997 and 1998. One magazine ad showed a sailboat, a blue-green ocean, and a sandy beach below the headline, ''You're Virtually There.'' The text read: ''On-line Vacation Planning With Northwest Airlines. Explore a whole new world of vacation planning. Fly across the Internet to WorldWeb, the Northwest Airlines web site at www.nwa.com. You can explore exciting destinations, browse the WorldVacations specials and review flight schedules. Once you pick a vacation spot, you can book your flights on-line and even purchase a Northwest E-Ticket, the convenient and paperless way to travel. While you're touring WorldWeb, take in all the other great ways in which our web site can make your travel planning a day at the beach. Verify departure and arrival times. Cruise our exclusive, money-saving CyberSaver fares. Book your car rental and make hotel reservations. Check your WorldPerks account and more.'' The ad showed a computer pointer clicking on the word ''Vacation'' in large type. It concluded with the slogan ''Some People Just Know How to Fly'' below Northwest's red-and-white logo.

Several times during 1998 Northwest awarded free WorldPerks Bonus Miles (frequent-flyer credits) to customers who booked E-Ticket flights. In October consumers who purchased a ticket on-line at regular rates were invited to bring a companion on a subsequent trip for only $99. Advertisements for E-Ticket ran in trade publications for travel agents, in business magazines, and in other print media. Advertising Age reported that Northwest spent $66.7 million on total measured advertising in 1998, up from $48.2 million in 1997, $49.1 million in 1992, and $35.5 million in 1991. The company budgeted $9.2 million for television commercials in 1998 (up 135.9 percent from $3.9 million in 1997) and $52.5 million for print advertisements (up 32.6 percent from $39.6 million).

OUTCOME

In 1997 about 10 percent of airline reservations were booked electronically. By March 1998 almost 30 percent of travelers used electronic tickets, and by June 1998 about 40 percent of Northwest's passengers were using them. By October 1998 more than 2 million consumers were visiting WorldWeb Reservation each day. ''E-Ticket has been one of the most popular and rapidly adopted programs ever offered by Northwest. People appreciate E-Ticket's convenience and speed,'' said Al Lenza, the company's vice president of distribution planning. By the spring of 1999 Northwest's site on the World Wide Web was generating approximately $220 million in annual revenues, which amounted to 2 percent of its total sales, compared with $275 million in revenues (2 percent of sales) for United and $225 million (3 percent of sales) for Delta. In 1999 Business 2.0 Magazine listed Northwest Airlines among the top 100 companies making the best use of the Internet. In 1997 Northwest's WorldWeb site was named Best Airline Web Site by Internet World magazine, and Northwest ranked second on Fortune magazine's list of the world's most admired companies. The Northwest website received awards from Advertising Age, Internet World, Inside Flyer International, and other publications and organizations. In 1998 the airline generated more than 95 percent of its parent company's operating revenues, but the corporation lost $224 million during the third quarter because of a pilot strike that lasted from June to September. The corporation had revenues of $10.2 billion in 1997 and more than $9 billion in 1998.

TUMMIES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

At the turn of the millennium pharmaceutical giant Novartis AG of Switzerland boasted a wide range of products, including one of the industry's most promising stables of prescription drugs awaiting government approval. The drug Zelnorm, indicated for women suffering from Irritable Bowel Syndrome (IBS) with constipation, was poised to become one of the company's biggest sellers upon winning the approval of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA), but amidst controversy surrounding another IBS medication, Zelnorm's application for approval was denied in 2001. A surprise FDA reversal in 2002 brought Zelnorm to the U.S. market, and Novartis enlisted New York–based agency Deutsch, Inc., to craft a direct-to-consumer ad campaign on the drug's behalf.

Called "Tummies," the campaign broke in late 2003, following up Zelnorm's 2002 introduction to the market. The direct-to-consumer spots were meant to help women identify their symptoms as components of the little-understood condition of IBS and to encourage them to ask their doctors about Zelnorm. Superimposing symptom lists over images of female abdomens in television, print, and online advertisements, "Tummies" offered a memorable tutorial on IBS while indicating that Zelnorm offered relief. The slim female bellies likewise helped downplay the stigma associated with intestinal distress while clearly identifying the drug's target market.

The "Tummies" campaign swept the first annual Medical Marketing & Media Awards in 2004 and won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005. Novartis reported that growing numbers of women were asking their doctors about Zelnorm and that awareness about both IBS and the Zelnorm brand were dramatically increasing. Although the FDA offered new warnings about side effects in 2004, it also approved Zelnorm for a second condition, chronic constipation, broadening the drug's market considerably. At a European conference of gastroenterology professionals, a Novartis executive projected that Zelnorm would, with the opening of European markets and the approval of further uses, eventually reach $1 billion in annual sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

At the turn of the millennium Swiss pharmaceutical giant Novartis AG's portfolio included wide-ranging generic-drug, over-the-counter, and consumer-products divisions, and the company had one of the industry's most enviable pipelines of prescription drugs awaiting government approval. Novartis had especially high hopes for Zelmac, a pill designed to treat Irritable Bowel Syndrome. Only one other prescription drug was approved to treat the condition in the United States, and it was believed that the unmet need for an IBS treatment could translate into $400 million to $1 billion a year in sales for Novartis, should Zelmac be approved. As part of the approval process Novartis was asked to rename Zelmac in order to avoid confusion with the drugs Zantac and Zyrtec, and the company settled on the revised name Zelnorm, believing FDA approval to be imminent. Novartis geared up for a blockbuster launch, enlisting another multinational pharmaceutical company, New York–based Bristol Myers-Squibb, as Zelnorm's co-marketer.

Novartis, like other drug companies at the time, had been capitalizing on a 1997 relaxation of FDA policy regarding the advertising of prescription drugs. The policy shift immediately changed the nature of prescription-drug advertising, as pharmaceutical companies, long reliant on the almost exclusive marketing of prescription drugs to physicians and other medical professionals, now began to advertise their products directly to consumers, much as other consumer goods had always been advertised. Though restrictions remained regarding the disclosure of side effects, and though most companies continued to submit their advertisements for FDA approval before airing them, direct-to-consumer pharmaceutical advertising quickly became ubiquitous in America, increasingly putting patients, rather than their doctors, in the position of deciding which drugs might best satisfy their needs.

In late 2000 the existing available Irritable Bowel Syndrome drug in the United States, Glaxo Wellcome's Lotronex, was pulled from the market by its manufacturer after safety concerns prompted the FDA to order prohibitively strict guidelines for its prescription. This initially seemed to bode well for Zelnorm, in that it left the IBS market uncontested, but in June 2001 the FDA officially denied Zelnorm approval, citing concerns over the drug's links to an increased incidence of abdominal surgery. Bristol Myers-Squibb dropped out of the agreement to co-market Zelnorm, and Novartis faced the prospect of staging new clinical trials, which would have delayed the approval process for several years. The company launched a creative review for a future Zelnorm campaign in the summer of 2002. Then, in June 2002, the FDA reapproved Lotronex (with restrictions on its marketing and prescription) after sustained appeals from patients; and in July of the same year patient pleas likewise resulted in a surprise FDA about-face regarding Zelnorm. In November of that year Novartis hired New York–based ad agency Deutsch, Inc., to helm the estimated $80 million dollar Zelnorm account.

TARGET MARKET

Up to 45 million Americans, according to some estimates, suffered from IBS, and two-thirds of those were women. Because of the variance in symptoms from one patient to another—and because there was neither a single identifiable cause nor, in the past, a single effective treatment—the condition had not always been recognized as a specific, treatable ailment. IBS patients usually suffered from either constipation or diarrhea, but some complained of an alternation between the two. Other symptoms included abdominal pain and bloating; a variety of psychological and emotional complaints, such as sleeping problems and tension, were also common.

Because doctors could find no physical source for IBS, the condition had, in the past, been attributed to stress or other psychosomatic causes. As the New York Times reported, however, recent studies had found that the interaction of the brain and the colon might be responsible for the syndrome. ''The brain and bowels are wired with a series of nerves,'' gastroenterologist Brennan M.R. Spiegel told the New York Times. ''If you have IBS, you're wired up in a slightly different way, and that can cause diarrhea, constipation or pain.'' Serotonin, which in the brain was thought to influence mood, in the colon worked to regulate the contractions called peristalsis. Irregularities in colon serotonin levels were believed to be at least partially responsible for IBS, and Zelnorm worked on serotonin receptors, stimulating them in order to spur peristalsis and relieve constipation. Lotronex, Zelnorm's main competitor in the IBS market, worked in the opposite fashion, relieving diarrhea by blocking serotonin receptors.

Zelnorm was thus approved to treat IBS with constipation, whereas Lotronex was intended to treat IBS with diarrhea. Zelnorm clinical studies had used women as subjects, and the FDA's approval of the drug specified women as candidates for treatment. The ''Tummies'' campaign accordingly targeted women suffering from IBS with constipation as a primary symptom. The Deutsch-created ads catered to this target market by spreading awareness of IBS and helping to destigmatize it, making it possible for the large number of women suffering from the condition to ask doctors about Zelnorm.

COMPETITION

While Lotronex was still in clinical trials, its manufacturer, Glaxo Wellcome, began trying to spread awareness of IBS. Glaxo helped fund an international conference designed to establish protocols for the diagnosis of the condition, and it backed a survey that gauged the breadth of IBS's reach among the population as well as the degree to which it was misunderstood. Glaxo also partnered with Nancy Norton, an IBS sufferer who had started the International Foundation for Functional Gastrointestinal

DIFFERING PERSPECTIVES

Controversy surrounded the introduction of both Lotronex and Zelnorm as treatments for Irritable Bowel Syndrome (IBS). Consumer groups accused Glaxo Wellcome and Novartis, the drugs' respective manufacturers, of downplaying side effects and overselling the drugs' effectiveness relative to placebos, as discovered in clinical trials. Some doctors, meanwhile, wondered whether IBS, which was not life threatening, should be treated by drugs whose potential side effects included life-threatening conditions. Women who suffered from IBS, however, often had a different perspective. As IBS sufferer Cynthia Huschle told U.S. News & World Report in a story about Lotronex's volatile introduction to the market, the form of diarrhea-based IBS with which she was afflicted had forced her to quit her job of classroom teaching and become a home-based reading specialist, and it made her incapable of doing simple things like shopping for groceries, because she had to have constant access to a restroom. During Lotronex's short-lived initial period on the market, Huschle said, she "had begun to dream again."

Disorders, an organization that offered reliable information for those afflicted and that sought to attract more attention to the condition.

Lotronex first went on sale in March 2000 as the first prescription treatment specifically approved to treat IBS. Limited in its approval to women suffering IBS with diarrhea, Lotronex was used by an estimated 300,000 women in the United States before being taken off the market less than a year after its launch. The move was prompted by FDA-ordered restrictions stemming from at least 70 reported cases of severe side effects. In clinical trials Lotronex's use had resulted in extreme constipation among a quarter of participants and in potentially fatal intestinal ulcers for four participants. Consumer advocates accused Glaxo of downplaying these numbers, while patients' groups and Glaxo emphasized the large number of suffering women who had, because of Lotronex, been able to resume the normal lives that they had believed lost to IBS. In June 2002 Lotronex went back on sale after the FDA placed new conditions on its marketing and prescription.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Many doctors were still hesitant about IBS medications after the highly publicized problems with Lotronex, and consumer watchdog groups raised similar questions about Zelnorm, contending that the possible side effects outweighed potential benefits. Sidney Wolfe, director of the Health Research Group at the Washington, D.C.–based advocacy organization Public Citizen, for instance, told the Wall Street Journal, "There's no evidence to show it works better than Metamucil." Many test subjects had experienced extreme diarrhea as a result of taking Zelnorm, and there was a less frequent incidence of more dangerous intestinal problems.

This measure of negative attention notwithstanding, one of Novartis's other primary obstacles in the marketing of Zelnorm was the mainstream public's lack of knowledge about IBS. The "Tummies" campaign, which broke in 2003, was meant to help people understand that the symptoms they were experiencing were indications of IBS and then to encourage them to ask their doctors about Zelnorm as a treatment for the condition.

Beginning with an onscreen list of the common symptoms of the variety of IBS treatable with Zelnorm—abdominal pain, bloating, and constipation—the campaign's 60-second television spot then superimposed the words "abdominal pain," "bloating," and "constipation" onto trim, attractive female stomachs. Not only did the attractiveness of the "tummies" serve to counteract the stigma associated with the symptoms listed while simultaneously specifying the medication's target market, but the visual technique of combining symptoms with stomachs also provided an efficient and memorable description of IBS. The spot likewise indicated that Zelnorm offered relief from those symptoms and directed viewers to an informational website.

Print ads used the same concept, featuring the text of symptoms written in black marker on women's stomachs, together with the copy, "If you are one of the millions of women living with these symptoms, you may have IBS with constipation. And now there's help." Print insets provided more detail about the condition by using the "tummies" imagery with diagrams of normal and abnormal intestinal functioning. The tagline was "Be yourself again." Online ads likewise used the Zelnorm name, together with the image of symptoms written on female stomachs. A clickable button labeled "Learn about relief" directed consumers to an informational page about IBS and Zelnorm.

OUTCOME

According to the magazine Medical Marketing & Media, prescriptions for Zelnorm increased by 68 percent in the campaign's first year; unaided awareness of IBS as a condition rose to 38 percent of consumers; and the Zelnorm brand was recognized by 53 percent of consumers, up from a figure of 3 percent prior to the campaign. At the 2004 United European Gastroenterology Week conference in Prague, Czech Republic, a Novartis executive predicted that Zelnorm was on its way to being a billion-dollar-a-year earner for the company. Deutsch and Novartis swept the first-ever Medical Marketing & Media Awards, held in 2004, with the "Tummies" campaign winning Best Total Integration Program, Best TV Campaign, and Best Product Launch Ad in Consumer Press. The campaign also went on to win Gold at the 2005 EFFIE Awards, given out by the New York American Marketing Association.

The Zelnorm launch was not without its setbacks, however. In April 2004 the FDA added new warnings for Zelnorm users, publicizing the drug's links with severe diarrhea and more dangerous problems whose initial symptoms included fainting, rectal bleeding, bloody diarrhea, or worsened pain. The "Tummies" ads were revised accordingly, offering additional information about these side effects.

In 2004 Zelnorm was granted FDA approval as a treatment for a second condition, chronic constipation, which increased the drug's target market to include both men and women, and the "Tummies" concept was adapted accordingly in 2005, with script superimposed on both male and female stomachs. Novartis was trying to win European approval for Zelnorm and was engaged in research that it hoped would establish the drug as a treatment for upper gastrointestinal disorders, which would open up an additional, extremely large market for the drug.

WHAT YOU NEED. WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 Office Depot, Inc., prided itself as the world's largest seller of office furniture and second-largest supplier of office supplies after Staples, Inc. In addition to having a stronghold on the office-furniture market, the retailer sold art and engineering supplies, computer hardware and software, and printing and copying services. Except for the fact that it touted its office furniture slightly more than the competition, Office Depot's marketing strategy paralleled the rest of the office-supply industry. Office Depot, Staples, and OfficeMax relied heavily on back-to-school sales. To first attract parents who needed school supplies for their children and later to draw in small businesses, Office Depot released a campaign titled "What You Need. What You Need to Know."

The "What You Need. What You Need to Know" television, radio, and print campaign was created by BBDO New York in 2001. The campaign's budget was undisclosed, but according to the market research firm Nielsen Monitor-Plus, Office Depot spent $25 million on advertisement for the fourth quarter of 2002. The campaign initially aired television commercials suggesting that parents could improve their children's school success with the proper back-to-school supplies. After research showed that 80 percent of Office Depot's customers were purchasing supplies for small businesses, the campaign shifted in September 2003. Four new television spots told the stories of office workers whose work lives improved thanks to Office Depot. Near the end of 2003 the campaign also advertised Office Depot's exclusive line of Christopher Lowell office furniture. The campaign ended in December 2004.

Although some within the advertising community criticized it for not differentiating the Office Depot brand from its competition, the campaign helped Office Depot's sales outperform Staples in 2002, during which it posted $11.4 billion in sales. By 2004 Office Depot had again slipped behind Staples, which had become the world's largest supplier of office supplies. Although other campaigns contributed to the ad agency's success, "What You Need. What You Need to Know" helped BBDO earn "Agency of the Year" in 2002 from Shoot magazine.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The first Office Depot opened in Lauderdale Lakes, Florida, in 1986. By the end of 1987 the office-supply store had opened nine more stores. After growing at breakneck speeds, the Florida-based chain had a nationwide presence in the early 1990s. Created by the ad agency Gold Coast Advertising, one of Office Depot's first campaigns was titled "Takin' Care of Business." The tagline was taken from the title of a 1974 song by the rock band Bachman-Turner Overdrive. In 1996 Office Depot awarded its estimated $67 million account to the Chicago office of J. Walter Thompson USA, a unit of the WPP Group. J. Walter Thompson elaborated on the previous campaign's theme with the tagline "This is where I take care of business." The campaign was intended to make Office Depot every business' first choice for office furniture and office supplies.

In 1996 Staples tried to purchase Office Depot for $3.4 billion, but the government stopped the acquisition on antitrust grounds the following year. Undaunted by the decision, Office Depot moved forward with store expansion and a nationwide advertising campaign. The cartoon-strip character Dilbert was used for a $30 million campaign that first aired on Thanksgiving Day in 1997. The following year Office Depot released a campaign targeting parents of schoolchildren and starring Dilbert's canine sidekick, Dogbert. The cartoon dog appeared in two 30-second television spots that aired in August 1998. In the commercials the bespectacled Dogbert touted Office Depot as the best place for school supplies. The $10 million campaign included a sweepstakes in which 40 different people were eligible to win a $5,000 Office Depot shopping spree. The campaign included a Supporting School Values program that provided discounts for PTA members and teachers.

TARGET MARKET

When the campaign broke in 2001, it targeted the parents of children returning to school in the fall. Commercials suggested that if parents truly wanted their children to succeed, they should outfit them with the proper school supplies, which could be found at Office Depot. That same year Staples conducted a survey that two years later would affect how Office Depot defined its target market. Staples discovered that business customers accounted for 90 percent of its profits. Following Staples' example, in 2003 Office Depot shifted the campaign's target from parents to small businesses. During the second half of 2003 Office Depot still held large back-to-school sales, but it spent much of its 2003 budget on four commercials aired in September 2003. The spots featured office workers trying to improve their work environments with Office Depot products. More than 40 percent of Office Depot's sales were also generated by the company's business-services group, which delivered office products to medium and large businesses.

The shift of the campaign's target market led to a two-pronged strategy that involved not only the advertising campaign but also the Office Depot store interiors. Whether shopping as executives or employees, women made up 60 percent of Office Depot's customer base, according to a New York Times interview with Bruce Nelson, Office Depot's CEO. To cater to the female majority, store interiors were decorated in pastel colors, which supposedly resonated more with women than men. In order to shed the warehouse stigma of a typical office-supply store, Office Depot also began selling premium office furniture and displaying products in a way that modeled non-warehouse retailers.

DESKS, CHAIRS, AND FILE CABINETS

Between 2001 and 2003 the office-supply company Office Depot ran an advertising campaign titled "What You Need. What You Need to Know." During the campaign Office Depot reigned as the leading retailer of office furniture. Desks, chairs, and file cabinets were Office Depot's best-selling furniture items.

Executives at Office Depot believed that if small businesses and entrepreneurs were more prosperous, Office Depot sales would subsequently improve. Part of the campaign involved a partnership between Office Depot and Florida Atlantic University's Small Business Development Center (SBDC). SBDC business analysts spoke at two-hour seminars at Office Depot stores that could be attended free of charge by Florida's local business leaders. "For years, we provided small businesses with the tools they needed to run their business," Monica Luechtefeld, the executive vice president who headed Office Depot's online business, said to the Palm Beach Post. "Today those tools tend to be information as much as products. A large part of our customer base is small business and the small business entrepreneur. As they become healthy, that obviously creates a healthy customer for us."

COMPETITION

In 2001 Staples reigned as the world's largest office-supply store. Starting in the mid-1990s Staples advertised under the slogan "Yeah, we've got that." The campaign ended in 2003, when Staples severed its eight-year relationship with the ad agency Cliff Freeman & Partners and gave its account to Martin/Williams of Minneapolis. Martin/Williams's first campaign for Staples, which was released with an estimated $50–$70 million budget, featured the tagline "That Was Easy" to emphasize the ease of shopping at Staples. The office-supply store also shifted from advertising in Sunday circulars to mailing ads directly to businesses. The first of two TV spots for

OFFICE DEPOT RETAIL GIANT

In 2003 the office-supply company Office Depot was the world's second-largest online retailer. It was also the sixth-largest furniture retailer in the United States.

''That Was Easy'' featured two executives trying to lead a business meeting with ridiculously misprinted handouts. The second spot featured an office-supply store calling out printer cartridge numbers as if they were number-letter combinations in Bingo. At the spots' conclusions a voice-over explained how the shopping experience at Staples was less stressful than at the competition. ''Our job is getting people to drive by Office Depot and OfficeMax and go to Staples instead,'' John Karlson, senior vice president for strategic development at Martin/Williams, said to the New York Times. ''The way to do that is by making it easier to get through the store, within the format of the large superstore.''

In conjunction with the ''That Was Easy'' campaign's theme of convenience, Staples also began advertising products unique to its stores. Staplers that allowed consumers to staple giant stacks of paper with one finger were featured in direct mailers. Combination locks that used scrambled words instead of numbers were pushed with the ''That Was Easy'' campaign. ''We want our brand to stand for ease and innovation,'' Ronald L. Sargent, the chief executive of Staples, told the New York Times.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''What You Need. What You Need to Know'' television, radio, and print campaign was created by BBDO in 2001. Over its four-year lifespan, the campaign's strategy morphed as its target market changed. The first TV spots targeted the parents of children returning to school in the fall of 2001. These commercials suggested that if parents wanted their children to succeed, the children should be equipped with the proper school supplies. Several months later, in 2002 Office Depot aired one 30-second spot to announce its sponsorship of the Winter Olympics. In a $2 million Super Bowl spot titled ''Don Barcome, Curling Expert,'' a man watching the Olympic sport of curling on television wondered aloud, ''What is that?'' No one answered. Then the copy ''But, if life was like Office Depot . . .'' appeared. Now, with a life ''like Office Depot,'' the same man asked, ''What is that?'' The ice curling champion Don Barcome suddenly appeared and explained, ''Curling, an ancient Scottish ice sport, played with a 42-pound stone.'' The same man who had asked, ''What is that?'' next appeared shopping inside an Office Depot. The spot ended with the Office Depot logo, the Olympics logo, and the tagline ''What you need. What you need to know.'' During the same week a similar spot featured the figure skater Tara Lipinski explaining the lutz ice-skating jump.

The campaign also partnered Office Depot with Florida's SBDC. Executives at the office-supply company believed that if small businesses and entrepreneurs improved their businesses, the success would equate to higher sales for Office Depot. Throughout 2002 speakers from SBDC were hired by Office Depot to speak at stores in Miami and Coral Springs, Florida.

In 2003 the campaign stopped airing commercials related to the Olympics and created spots that targeted small businesses. The change came after an Office Depot survey discovered that 80 percent of the store's customers were buying for their small businesses. Office Depot's largest competitor, Staples, had successfully targeted small businesses earlier. From September until the end of November, four spots suggested that Office Depot products could improve the lives of small-business employees. ''The strategy builds on what we did for back-to-school about owning your kids' success,'' explained BBDO senior creative director Adam Goldstein in Adweek. ''This is about owning the success of your small business.'' The first spot featured a worker who received a raise after Office Depot helped her choose an ink cartridge. The next spot, ''JoAnn,'' lampooned reality television shows with a small-business owner who needed to ''update her look'' with Office Depot products. The third featured adults running after an Office Depot van as if it were an ice-cream truck. The final spot showed an Office Depot ''ringer'' helping a business win its corporate softball game.

Near the end of 2003 Office Depot advertised its exclusive Christopher Lowell line of office furniture. Executives at Office Depot hoped that the furniture would differentiate Office Depot more from its competitors. The tagline ''What you need. What you need to know'' was used until December 2004.

OUTCOME

The campaign's first full year helped Office Depot outperform Staples. When Staples posted $10.7 billion in global sales for 2002, Office Depot led the industry with $11.4 billion. The following year, however, Staples became the leader with $11.6 billion in sales. Analysts within the office-supply sector explained that Staples had surpassed Office Depot by placing stores in more preferred locations. Office Depot CEO Bruce Nelson also attributed the change in supremacy to international currency exchange rates. With 16 percent of Office Depot's locations existing outside of North America in 2002, the deflated U.S. dollar sent Office Depot's operational costs skyrocketing.

The "What You Need. What You Need to Know" campaign was one of many campaigns that earned BBDO "Agency of the Year" from Shoot magazine (an ad-industry publication focusing on commercial production) in 2002. In regards to Office Depot's future advertising campaigns, ad critics pointed out that "What You Need. What You Need to Know" successfully defined a preferred target market of small-business owners and entrepreneurs for Office Depot. The retailer's exclusive Christopher Lowell office furniture further promoted Office Depot as an office-furniture leader. With the inside of its stores decorated to appeal to women, Office Depot separated itself even more from the warehouse-style interiors of OfficeMax and Staples. Advertising critics agreed that, after struggling to define its brand throughout the 1990s, Office Depot had finally differentiated itself during the span of "What You Need. What You Need to Know."

EARLY INTERVENTION YOUTH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In late 1998 advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather was put in charge of the "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign, charged with curbing drug use in teenagers. The original emphasis was on prevention, aimed at 12 and 13 year olds, but some research indicated that the advertising was counterproductive, kindling a curiosity about drugs in young people and actually leading to increased usage. The campaign raised the target age to 14 to 16 year olds, and a new effort was developed, the "Early Intervention Youth" campaign, which sought to convince teens to urge friends with alcohol and drug problems to seek help.

The $37 million campaign broke in early 2004 and ran through the rest of the year. The primary media vehicle was television spots on network and cable TV, although radio also played a major role. To a lesser extent print, Internet, and out-of-the home advertising where teens gathered was also used. In addition the advertising sought to drive traffic to the freevibe.com website, where teens could learn more about the deleterious effects of drinking and drugs and the importance of intervention, as well as ways to accomplish it.

Ogilvy statistics indicated that the "Early Intervention Youth" campaign met its primary objectives of increasing awareness of the intervention concept with the target market, convincing teens that intervention was a good thing, and stimulating an increase in the number of visits to the website. Nevertheless, it was difficult to determine the effect the campaign had on the ultimate goal, curbing alcohol and drug use among the target audience. What was certain was that the "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign soon changed direction and crafted a new message rather than build on the "Early Intervention Youth" effort.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) was established in 1988 by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act, the goal of which was to create a "drug-free" America. One component of that effort was the use of advertising. Hired in late 1998, advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather was put in charge of the "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign, responsible for evaluating ads produced by several ad agencies and buying media. According to Vanessa O'Connell, writing in the Wall Street Journal in 2002, the campaign included more than 212 TV commercials featuring such performers as the Dixie Chicks and hip-hop singer Mary J. Blige, as well as actors posing as drug users. The campaign, developed by some of the best-known agencies on Madison Avenue, was "considered a novel step in public health advertising because it was aimed directly at children." But in 2002, as the campaign was up for reauthorization for five more years, the anti-drug effort and Ogilvy came under fire. The new U.S. "drug czar," John P. Walters, claimed that not only had recent anti-drug advertising failed but it might have actually inspired young people to experiment with marijuana. O'Connell wrote, "Mr. Walters suggested that the ads' messages were 'too indirect' to have an impact, and speculated that the commercials might be doing more harm than good. 'If an ad answers a question that a child doesn't have, there's a chance you'll incite his or her curiosity,' he said." According to Advertising Age's Rance Crain, Walters believed that eliminating the source of drugs was a more effective approach: "Before he became drug czar, Mr. Walters said an anti-drug campaign aimed at teens is a 'lazy man's way of trying to appear that they're doing something.' "

To complicate matters further, Ogilvy had come under fire for its billing practices, including allegations that agency employees altered time sheets and billed ONDCP for items not permitted under government contracts, leading to criminal and civil fraud probes. Early in 2002 Ogilvy settled the civil claims, and eventually five Ogilvy executives would either plead guilty or be convicted of fraud charges. To the surprise of most observers, Ogilvy was retained in 2002 as the lead ad agency in the "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign. ONDCP maintained that it would work with Ogilvy to refine the campaign and make it more "hard-hitting."

One problem all public-health advertising aimed at teens had to contend with was the natural rebelliousness of youth. The "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign tried to promote the concept of the "anti-drug," natural ways to get high, such as hang gliding or kayaking. The advertisers tried yet another new approach in its 2004 campaign, called "Early Intervention Youth," which sought to keep the anti-drug motif alive yet move the campaign from prevention to intervention, to leverage peer pressure and convince teens to convince other teens that their drug use was a problem that required attention.

TARGET MARKET

In the first few years of the "National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign, the target audience was 12 to 13 year olds. After Ogilvy retained the contract with ONDCP, the focus shifted to 14 to 16 year olds. The "Early Intervention Youth" campaign targeted youths in this age group who had close friends who used drugs (primarily marijuana) or alcohol. These teens tended to be tolerant of the choices their friends made and were reluctant to urge them to change their behavior. While they believed that they should intervene only if the drug or alcohol use became a problem, what constituted a problem was open to interpretation. Some teens considered experimentation itself to be a problem, while others only viewed drug and alcohol use as a problem if it became dependency or, worse yet, grew self-destructive or destructive of their friendship. In order to address the widest segment of 14 to 16 year olds with close friends who used drugs, the campaign elected not to define when use became a problem. Instead it hoped to allow teens to receive the intervention message on their own terms.

ANY ANSWERS?

Perhaps the most famous anti-drug television commercial ever produced showed a man frying an egg in a sizzling pan. He commented, "This is your brain on drugs. Any questions?" Sponsored by the nonprofit organization Partnership for a Drug-Free America, the scare-tactic spot became the fodder for comedians. It became an object lesson for advertisers on how not to influence a target audience about drug usage.

COMPETITION

No other group was encouraging teens to intervene with friends who had problems with drugs or alcohol. And if there had been such a group, it would not have constituted relevant competition but rather would have been viewed as an ally in the effort. The opposition, in this case, would be the forces encouraging drug use among teens.

There was no competing advertising urging 14 to 16 year olds to take drugs, although some would argue that the media glamorized the activity. The real competition came from other teens. Just as the "Early Intervention Youth" campaign planned to use peer pressure to urge teens to stop using drugs and alcohol, other teens of their own volition were urging their friends to start drinking and using drugs and to continue using them. Popular teens who drank and did drugs offered the same message on an indirect level, serving as peer role models. Moreover, the campaign had to contend with sheer curiosity and the rebelliousness of the age group.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The strategy behind the "Early Intervention Youth" campaign was to motivate the teen who would serve as the person intervening with a friend who had a drug or alcohol problem. First a case had to be made about the negative consequences of a friend's drug or alcohol use, whether it related to health concerns or the harmful impact on their friendship. Second the messenger had to be motivated to act. This was to be accomplished by portraying the situation as a moral obligation, bolstered by examples of teens taking the step—or not—to intervene with friends. But fulfilling this strategy remained a tricky transaction. In a write-up of the campaign for the EFFIE Awards, a prestigious advertising industry competition, Ogilvy explained, "While this campaign intended to instill in youth a sense of moral responsibility for intervening with friends who are developing patterns of use, it was imperative that executions guide youth to this conclusion, without dictating their 'responsibilities' to them directly. It was vital that teens feel their decision to intervene is one they have come to themselves, and not one being forced on them to accept, otherwise they will disregard the message."

The "Early Intervention Youth" campaign established three objectives. It sought to increase awareness in teens that they had a responsibility and an ability to help friends with alcohol and drug problems. Second the campaign wanted to educate youths about the dangers of drug and alcohol abuse, thus empowering them when they intervened. The final objective was to drive traffic to the campaign's website, freevibe.com, where teens could find more information on the importance of intervention and ways to achieve it.

The campaign used a mix of media in order to reach the largest percentage of the teen population. Television was the primary media vehicle, accounting for nearly half of the $37 million budget, almost all of which was spent on network and cable TV. Spot television, time bought on local stations as it became available at attractive rates, was also used in the top 25 markets where drug use was concentrated. Another 9 percent of the budget was spent on the Channel One daily television newscast shown to middle, junior high, and senior high school students. Network radio was the next most important media component, representing nearly a third of the budget. Spot radio was also purchased on top teen stations. In addition the campaign spent about 4 percent of the budget on ads in teen magazines and 2 percent on out-of-home advertising, such as signage at malls where teen congregated.

Typical of the campaign's television spots was "Lake," which first aired on the hit television show Survivor following the Super Bowl telecast in early 2004. In the spot a teenage girl cried for help as she was drowning in a lake, while on a nearby wharf another girl watched, hands in her pockets, doing nothing to help. The voice-over of a young woman then said, "If your friend was in trouble, you'd help them. Wouldn't you?" The girl on the wharf turned her back on the drowning friend, then the commercial cut to title cards that read, "If a friend has a problem with drugs or drinking, do something. Friendship. The anti-drug. freevibe.com."

OUTCOME

According to Ogilvy's EFFIE summary, the "Early Intervention Youth" campaign succeeded on a number of levels. Regarding the first objective the agency claimed that after just one month the campaign achieved 68 percent awareness among the target audience, an impressive showing given that new product introductions that last as long as six months reach comparable awareness levels. In terms of educating and empowering youths, according to Ogilvy data, teens exposed to the advertising were significantly more likely than other teens to say that they should get involved if a friend was having a problem with drinking or marijuana or that they would feel good about intervening in such a situation. Finally traffic to freevibe.com increased by an average of 108 percent each month after the launch of the campaign, a significant increase over same-month traffic from the prior year.

WHAT'S YOUR THING? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

OfficeMax Inc., the third largest chain in the office supplies superstore category, faced the difficult task of differentiating itself from larger rivals Staples, Inc., and Office Depot, Inc. In late 2003 OfficeMax and its new advertising agency, DDB Chicago, launched the "What's Your Thing?" campaign to help mold a distinct image.

The campaign was mostly driven by television spots. One of the three spots in the initial phase featured an Afro-sporting African-American, the Rubberband Man, who delivered supplies from a souped-up pushcart to his office colleagues while dancing to the Spinners' 1970s hit song "The Rubberband Man." The character became a hit with consumers and led to a back-to-school television spot, as well as a commercial that parodied a vintage stop-motion holiday special. More Rubberband Man spots followed in 2005.

The first Rubberband Man spot won an Emmy Award nomination, and all of the spots featuring the character were repeatedly downloaded from the OfficeMax website. Sales improved dramatically, and the company was so convinced that the Rubberband Man provided the point of difference it was looking for that it built its marketing around the popular character.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1986 three office supplies superstores were launched in different corners of the United States: Staples in Massachusetts, Office Depot in Florida, and Office Club in California. Two years later another chain, called OfficeMax, Inc., was established (in Cleveland, Ohio). Along with Staples and Office Depot, OfficeMax became one of the fastest growing companies in the rapidly consolidating office supplies category that had been revolutionized by the superstore concept. By virtue of their size these retailers could leverage their buying power and eliminate traditional middlemen in the industry to offer small businesses and general consumers a wide variety of items at lower prices. Although it started late, OfficeMax emerged as the second largest player (trailing Office Depot) by 1995. At that point OfficeMax was larger than Staples. In the second half of the 1990s, Staples surged, however, taking over the top spot, leaving OfficeMax as the third largest office supplies chain.

At the start of the 2000s OfficeMax was challenged on a number of fronts. As the U.S. economy lapsed into recession, sales sagged, leading to losses and the closing of stores. OfficeMax also faced an image problem. The company's vice president of marketing, Scott Williams, told Suzanne Vranica of the Wall Street Journal in an August 2004 interview, "We found customers had difficulty in differentiating the office supply brands. They saw similarities between colors and the name. They didn't see differences in messaging. There was a lot of confusion with the brands . . . We wanted to break out. There was a lot of awareness, but we wanted to make sure OfficeMax was known for a unique and different experience.'' The pressure to hone the OfficeMax identity was further intensified after the Boise Cascade Corp. agreed to pay $1.3 billion for the chain in a deal that closed in December 2003. At the end of the month, the company and its new advertising agency, DDB Chicago, unveiled the ''What's Your Thing?'' campaign to address the image problem.

INSPIRATION CLOSE TO HOME

The popular Rubberband Man character in the OfficeMax television spots was conceived by DDB Chicago creative director Don Pogany. He didn't have to look far for inspiration; he modeled the character after the ad agency's service center coordinator.

TARGET MARKET

The target market shifted as the ''What's Your Thing?'' campaign evolved. Initially the audience was the small business customer, which back in the 1980s had made the office supplies superstore concept viable. Many major corporations at that time had slashed their workforces, and a rising number of small businesses emerged to take up the slack in the economy. The distribution of office supplies was controlled by six major wholesalers, which then sold the goods to office supply dealers and stationery stores. In turn the dealers supplied large corporations and the stationers sold to small businesses and individuals. Superstores were able to eliminate these middlemen and offer much lower prices than the stationers could. As a result small business customers became a mainstay for OfficeMax. With the rise of home computers and home offices, the number of individuals buying paper, ink and toner, and other supplies also increased. After the initial phase of the ''What's Your Thing?'' campaign was completed, and the Rubberband Man character had connected with the general public, OfficeMax focused on these individuals. It launched a back-to-school campaign targeting parents and teachers shopping for school supplies. This mass market was next targeted in a holiday campaign that positioned OfficeMax as a place to buy gifts.

COMPETITION

When OfficeMax appealed to a wider market in its back-to-school push and holiday gift-buying pitch, it encountered competition from the likes of Wal-Mart and other retailers, but at its core the company's competition was Staples and Office Depot, both larger in size. According to an analysis conducted by Credit Suisse First Boston, Staples led the way in sales, posting $7.8 billion in 2003, followed by Office Depot's $5.7 billion, and OfficeMax's $4.7 billion. OfficeMax also trailed its larger rivals in the amount of money it could spend on advertising. In terms of measured media, in 2003, according to TNS Media Intelligences/CMR, Office Depot outspent Staples $89 million to $73 million, while OfficeMax spent $49 million. Other competition in the office supplies arena were mom-and-pop stationers and retailers that carried offices suppliesmdash;Wal-Mart, drugstore chains, and larger supermarkets. There were also warehouse clubs like Sam's Club and Costco to contend with, as well as companies that sold by catalog or online, such as Quill Corp., which operated as an independent Staples subsidiary.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The initial three television spots developed for the ''What's Your Thing?'' campaign tried to spice up the office supplies category, the advertising for which was not known for its creativity. OfficeMax commercials in the past had shown people shopping for a single product in a store setting. ''Ads in stores set up certain limits to what you can do creatively,'' Tom Russell, director of marketing for OfficeMax, told Theresa Howard of USA Today. ''People know OfficeMax has stores. We said, 'Let's get out of the store.' That opens up a world of possibility for you.'' And while the category might be mundane, Russell also noted that the marketers learned that consumers were actually passionate about office supplies: ''We found whether it's a notebook, pen, highlighter or organizing system, they have to have a certain one.''

In one of the new offbeat television spots, two office friends plotted to get out of work by faking an illness. They colored their faces with highlighters to affect a sickly hue, which worked well for the one who chose yellow but aroused the suspicion of the boss for the one using pink. A second spot featured a pair of mountain climbers in a fight over who forgot to bring the food. A candid still photograph of the tussle made it seem as if they were actually helping each other up. The picture then appeared as part of a poster positioned behind a motivational speaker rallying a group of employees.

It was the third commercial, called ''Rubberband Man,'' that caught the attention of the public and overshadowed the other two spots. The Rubberband Man

SEXY IS AS SEXY DOES

Actor Eddie Steeples, who had never done a commercial and rarely worked before landing the part as the Rubberband Man, became something of a minor celebrity. His rise to prominence culminated in him being named one of People magazine's Sexiest Men of 2004. "It's very flattering," he told Adweek. "At the same time, I just don't understand who decided that."

character, a lanky African-American with a large Afro hairstyle, was identified by a large spinning disco ball of multicolored rubber bands on his pushcart, which itself was replete with fat tires and side mirrors. He danced and grooved and thoroughly enjoyed his job dispensing office supplies to his coworkers while in the background played "The Rubberband Man," the 1976 hit song by the Spinners.

The song was selected first, and then the creative team held a Los Angeles casting call and auditioned about 100 people of all types, both whites and African-Americans, goofballs and hipsters. One actor stood out—Eddie Steeples, a 30-year-old actor who had never done a commercial and only auditioned at the urging of a friend. "He had the right combination of looks and maneuvers, and the key thing for us was he grasped how varied the character could be," DDB's creative director, Don Pogany, told Mae Anderson, writing for Adweek. "The random items in the cart, he was thinking about each and every one. The other guys were a bit more superficial with it." Steeples described his character to Anderson as "kind of a happy guy going along, doing his thing. In my eyes, he's sharper than most people, especially more than most people give him credit for being. At the same time, he makes everybody happy." In the commercial the character was seen issuing supplies even before people realized they needed them. For example, a new desk chair was slipped under an employee to replace a broken one, and a woman with a messy office received a new desk organizer.

The upbeat "Rubberband Man" spot with its catchy feel-good tune first aired shortly after Christmas 2003. Soon the OfficeMax website began receiving E-mails from people raving about the commercial. The company made the spot available on its website, and within two days it was downloaded 15,000 times. The marketers realized that the Rubberband Man had touched a chord with consumers and began making plans to exploit the character and center the marketing around him. A website was developed for him, offering outtakes from the TV spot and downloadable images. In-store signs featuring the Rubberband Man were designed, and he would also play a prominent role in catalogs and direct marketing. In June 2004 the Rubberband Man was featured in three half-page ads in the issue of Rolling Stone that celebrated the 50th anniversary of rock and roll. Moreover OfficeMax received a great deal of free publicity, as the spot was parodied on the Tonight Show, and Katie Couric and Matt Lauer of the Today show raved about it.

The follow-up to the original "Rubberband Man" spot was a back-to-school effort called "The Party's Over," which began airing in July 2004. The 60-second spot showed the Rubberband Man out of the office, merrily delivering school supplies from his pushcart to children (who were less than enthusiastic about going back to school) at summertime venues, like a beach and a ballpark. This spot continued to use the "What's Your Thing?" tag.

The creative team then began brainstorming about a Rubberband Man ad for the upcoming holiday season. They recalled the stop-motion holiday specials they watched as children and decided to turn the Rubberband Man into a clay figure in a spot with the style and look of an old stop-motion show. Since the character, like Santa, enjoyed giving out things, he was in his element giving out the kind of items OfficeMax sold that were suitable as gifts, such as a glue stick to keep Santa's beard in place, a new paper cutter to carve a roast, and a stepladder to help a short man kiss a woman beneath some mistletoe. Steeples, although not appearing in person, was filmed as part of the animation process.

The "What's Your Thing?" campaign and its star continued to flourish in 2005. A pair of Rubberband Man ads called "Lost" and "Found" were developed. The first promoted OfficeMax color ink and toner supplies as the character plastered an office with flyers and handed out other copies, announcing that his brightly colored ball of rubber bands was missing. The "Rubberband Man" song, minus the lyrics, played in the background. The "Found" spot opened with more somber music as the character glumly made his rounds, dumping products haphazardly. A "found" poster then caught his eye. After being reunited with his ball, the Rubberband Man was once again strutting down the hallway as the Spinners' song kicked in.

OUTCOME

The "What's Your Thing" campaign was a success on all levels. The Rubberband Man spots were highly popular and were downloaded repeatedly from the OfficeMax website, and the character helped to distinguish OfficeMax from Office Depot and Staples. Increasingly the company built its marketing around the Rubberband Man. Writing in Advertising Age, James B. Arndorfer noted, "Some question whether OfficeMax should pour marketing resources into a character that might be phased out after a couple years or so. Unlike some marketers who need to constantly change tactics to reach a changing customer base—brewers, athletic-wear marketers—OfficeMax is targeting a stable market." The strategy appeared to be working, as reflected by increasing sales for OfficeMax. In 2004 sales grew by more than 60 percent to $13.3 billion and net income soared to $173 million. While it was difficult to determine how much credit for the success was due to the advertising, there was no doubt that the campaign played a significant role. The Rubberband Man also reached iconic status, providing a boost for OfficeMax that money simply could not buy. Rather than avoid the spots, consumers actually sought out the Rubberband Man commercials. Although the campaign did not win any major advertising industry awards, the first Rubberband Man ad received a highly coveted nomination in the Emmy Award competition for commercials in 2004.

'70S RETRO TV CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The valued-focused Old Navy apparel brand was an immediate hit when it was introduced in 1994 by San Francisco parent company and national clothing retailer Gap, Inc. Old Navy made a name for itself with eccentric television commercials that featured an array of offbeat celebrities extolling the virtues of Old Navy products on campy artificial sets. The kitschy look and tongue-in-cheek humor, which remained a component of all the company's ad campaigns, reached a climax in 2002 with a series of spots parodying the 1970s TV shows The Brady Bunch and Green Acres.

Two similar commercials spoofing The Brady Bunch and titled "The Rugby Bunch" began airing in the summer of 2002. They showed an imitation Brady family wearing colorful Old Navy rugby shirts. To emphasize a cross-generational appeal, the spots recreated the nine-square divided screen that had become the iconic image from the opening credits of The Brady Bunch. The words "The Rugby Bunch" were superimposed over Brady-like actors of all ages. These commercials were followed in the fall by a spot that referenced the show Green Acres and highlighted painter pants. Both spots featured longtime Old Navy pitchwoman Morgan Fairchild, a distinctive blond television actress famous in the 1980s. The shows' theme songs were adapted with lyrics celebrating rugby shirts, painter pants, and Old Navy in general and were sung, sometimes quite badly, by the commercials' actors. The cost of these three spots was included in Old Navy's media budget of $133 million in 2002.

The spots aired from August until the end of October. They were the first in what would become for the next two years a recurring retro-television motif used by Old Navy Marketing, the company's in-house advertising unit. The impact of the '70s retro TV commercials was reflected in fiscal 2003 sales numbers, which revealed that Old Navy was responsible for $6.4 billon in sales, nearly 40 percent of the $15.8 billion taken in by Gap, Inc., that year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Retail giant Gap, Inc., began in 1969 with one San Francisco store. Doris and Don Fisher wanted to make it easier for young customers to find a hugely popular clothing item: jeans. It eventually expanded into one of the world's largest apparel chains. The San Francisco–based company introduced a new brand to the retail world with the opening the first Old Navy store, in Colma, California, in 1994. The mission was, according to one of Old Navy's most successful past taglines, to make "shopping fun again" with low prices for trendy clothes. Old Navy quickly made money—and history—becoming the first retailer to achieve $1 billion in sales in fewer than four years.

From Old Navy's inception, advertising was an inside job. Its in-house ad agency, Old Navy Marketing, set about creating commercials that would stand out from the rest of the pack. It recruited 1970s–80s television vixen Morgan Fairchild to tout hip clothing to a generation that may not have even known who she was. The highly stylized Old Navy look continued in the fall of 1997 with commercials that featured a legendary fashion writer, Carrie Donovan, then in her late 60s. She was a figure certainly unfamiliar to the teen audience, but celebrity identification was not the objective. The spots were bright and campy, with a low-budget feel. The aforementioned celebrities were attention-getters because of their unforgettable and sometimes over-the-top looks. Donovan did not even wear Old Navy clothes. Her signature look was that of a midcentury New York professional woman. In the commercials she donned her usual black suit, white pearls, and thick, round-rimmed glasses and extolled the virtues of the latest Old Navy clothing or accessories. She became known as the "Old Navy Lady" and appeared in 42 spots, including one that featured her piloting an airplane with another frequent Old Navy commercial cast member, a dog named Magic. Other celebrities, including quirky actress Fran Drescher and rapper Lil' Kim, lined up through the years to help sell the hip but value-priced merchandise.

The often-wacky Old Navy commercials were either loved or hated by media watchers, but no one could deny their effectiveness. The in-house advertising team, helmed by creative director Dennis Leggett, was responsible for these memorable nostalgia-oriented campaigns until Leggett's retirement in 2004. That year Old Navy hired Deutsch Los Angeles, making it the first outside agency to handle the company's advertising.

TARGET MARKET

While it offered clothing for all ages and both sexes, Old Navy's most reliable consumers had always been girls ranging in age from 8 to 18. In a successful attempt to better serve the retail needs of the mothers of those core customers, the retailer expanded to offer baby, maternity, and plus sizes. The summer 2002 television push for the coming school year took into account a broader spectrum of potential customers—both kids and parents. The commercials spoofing 1970s television classics were meant to create good feelings on the part of adults, who would remember the shows from their childhoods. As an acknowledgement of the ever-present generation gap, the spots were also campy enough to provide a requisite mocking of the past, a quality that appealed to teens. These kids thus might be willing to shop at the same store as their parents, but for very different reasons.

Painter pants, which first gained popularity in the 1970s, were the central product in the "Green Acres" commercial. This product was an ideal crossover from generation to generation. The aim of the spot was to make moms and dads take notice when the unmistakable melody of the Green Acres theme song began. The spot featured Old Navy mainstay Morgan Fairchild singing, "Old Navy you're the pants for me . . ." to the tune of the original song. The desired result was that parents would make the trip to Old Navy brimming with nostalgia for the pants they loved as teens—and of course bring their kids along as well. Once in the store the whole family would have plenty of fresh, trendy products to chose from.

COMPETITION

When Gap, Inc., created the value-oriented Old Navy brand, it may have also generated more competition than it bargained for. "Over the past 10 years, Old Navy's concept quickly became part of how America shops," said Old Navy president Jenny Ming in a 2004 PR Newswire press release. "We brought something to

OLD NAVY GETS A STYLISH NEW SISTER

Over the decades since it was founded, Gap, Inc., grew to include a stable of retail specialty stores that were among the world's most recognizable brands: Gap, Banana Republic, and Old Navy. In August 2005 a long-awaited Gap, Inc., expansion occurred with the introduction of a new chain, Forth & Towne. A women's store designed to combine department-store variety with the service and intimacy of a boutique, Forth & Towne made its debut in West Nyack, New York, and was the antithesis of Old Navy. Forth & Towne promised a figure-friendly fit in high-end clothes at more reasonable prices. Four more stores followed in the Chicago area that same year. The company hoped to entice women over the age of 35, a group responsible at the time for 39 percent of women's-apparel spending.

shoppers that didn't exist when we started—affordable fashion.'' Old Navy's successful strategy of emphasizing the look of low-cost clothes as more desirable than a designer label resulted in a glut of surprising competitors for the chain. Department stores Sears and J.C. Penney, as well as mass retailers such as Target, took advantage of a trend—largely attributed to Old Navy—that made discount shopping cool. These companies' ad campaigns began to focus on the teen market, specifically teenage girls, who had long been the core of Old Navy's customer base.

Old Navy had to hold its own against the growing popularity of the Kohl's chain, which by 2003 was reporting $10.2 billion in sales, according to Adweek. To attract the fashion-savvy consumer, chains such as Kohl's produced, under their own labels, affordable knock-offs of trendier, more expensive clothing lines. As the stigma of value shopping continued to fade through the end of the twentieth century, low-budget megastores K-Mart, Meijer, and Wal-Mart began to pursue a wider audience for their apparel departments. One common tactic that emerged was to make deals with reputable designer brands to manufacture a more value-conscious clothing line to be carried only in their stores. Target was successful in partnering with such designers as Isaac Mizrahi, Liz Lange, and Mossimo to increase sales. To keep consumer dollars away from competitors, Old Navy had to strengthen and constantly renew its brand presence in the national consciousness.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2002 Old Navy's answer to the increasing number of entrants into the cool-clothes-for-less territory it had once ruled was a new television campaign that sought to bring a wider variety of shoppers into the fold. Old Navy Marketing creative head Dennis Leggett shepherded in three parody commercials of retro television shows from the 1970s. The spots saturated the airwaves in the summer and fall of 2002. Hyperglamorous blond actress Morgan Fairchild was once again front and center as the mom in the two spots titled ''The Rugby Bunch,'' a Brady Bunch spoof. These were the first retro-TV-flavored commercials, which would become a running advertising device for the next two years. The 30-second spots, directed by Gap and Old Navy veteran Matthew Rolston, used a replica of the original show's set and a reworded theme song—''Here's the story of a shirt named rugby . . . ,''—to bring the Brady Bunch's good natured naïveté into the service of selling striped shirts for the whole family.

Old Navy's take on Green Acres focused on painter pants (an updated version of the multipocket work pants once worn only in the painting trade), with Fairchild as a pseudo-replacement for the series' original female lead, Eva Gabor. This spot aired through the end of October 2002 on a wide variety of cable channels as well as during television-ratings giants such as Friends, Everybody Loves Raymond, and The West Wing. The comedy of Everybody Loves Raymond was firmly rooted in exploring parental and marital struggle. An hour-long political drama, The West Wing had a decidedly adult audience demographic. A commitment to the expensive advertising sponsorship of these two shows reflected how intent Old Navy was on capturing the interest of an older consumer.

To promote new products, Old Navy used mass-mail flyers and print inserts, but concentrating on television spots for greatest exposure had been an Old Navy tactic from the outset, and thus the lion's share of the advertising budget went toward TV spots. Old Navy's media spending in the period between January and November 2002 was reported to be $133 million by TNS Intelligence/CMR, a leading provider of marketing and advertising information. Parodies of The Love Boat and The Dating Game continued through the company's 10th-anniversary commercial, as did the use of 1970s TV actors, including Sherman Hemsely of The Jeffersons. Dennis Leggett reflected on the retro TV campaigns in a March 2003 issue of Brandweek, saying, ''The challenge is to create something memorable that drives customers to the stores.'' He added, ''We're doing that.''

OUTCOME

The result of the 2002 retro TV campaign was a sales increase in fiscal 2003. Old Navy was responsible for generating $6.4 billion in sales in 2003, leading a rebound for parent company Gap, Inc., which boasted a second-quarter profit in 2003 of more than three times that of the previous year. The Old Navy retro TV commercials in particular were credited with spurring an 11 percent increase overall for Gap, Inc., in same-store sales, which took into account store openings and closings. The TV-spoof spots also appeared consistently in high positions on the Ad Age/IAG Top Spots list. This top-10 list, assembled by Intermedia Advertising Group and Advertising Age magazine, measured viewer recall and thus the success of new ad campaigns. Other companies even followed suit. Chevy, ING, and American Express Blue all launched commercials using retro TV show themes or parodies to sell their own products. In the 10 years since its first store opened in 1994, Old Navy played a significant role in the success of Gap, Inc., contributing to revenues listed in 2004 as $16.3 billion.

DESTINATION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In only its second year of national television advertising and its fourth year in existence, Old Navy clearly announced its arrival as a major marketer by securing a spot on the final episode of the decade-defining sitcom Seinfeld. The 30-second spot, entitled "Woof," featured some of the many stars experiencing career revivals thanks to Old Navy, including Joan Collins and Morgan Fairchild, as well as Old Navy ad staples Magic the Dog, the company's mascot, and Carrie Donovan, the 70-year-old former New York Times fashion editor who donned her signature oversized black-rimmed glasses and classic Chanel cuffs. The departure of Seinfeld from prime time on May 14, 1998, amounted to a Super Bowl of advertising, as NBC charged $1.7 million per 30-second slot, surpassing the NFL Super Bowl with its airtime rates of $1.3 million per 30-second slot. The campy atmosphere of Old Navy advertising dovetailed well with the quirkiness of the sitcom. "The retro-ness and Dada-esque quality of the commercials has an off-the-wall camp component, one 'that maybe a fifth of the audience may understand as camp,'" said Old Navy public relations director Joe Enos in Cynthia Robins's 1998 San Francisco Examiner article. "But like the brand, these spots are approachable, fun and friendly," Enos continued.

"Woof" was one of a trilogy of ads in Old Navy's "Destination" campaign, which set all three spots on a vintage 1970s-era airplane. The Seinfeld slot represented a departure from the norm, as Old Navy concentrated the majority of its media buy on cable television, a scheme that allowed the company to marry its commercials to complimentary programming. In fact Old Navy, which produced the spots not through an ad agency but rather in-house, tied into programming that it sponsored and placed its products on personalities appearing on shows during which Old Navy ads ran. Strategies such as these created a brand image that remained consistent across the board, as explained by advertising critic Barbara Lippert in her Adweek column: "The tone of the ads, the look of the store, the merchandising and design of the clothing, even the shopping experience itself is consistent with the whole."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Donald G. and Doris F. Fisher founded Old Navy's parent company, the Gap, in 1969, naming the store after the generational schism prevalent at the time. They sold discount records and tapes to woo in customers to buy the uniform of the counterculture, Levi's jeans. At the time Levi Strauss did not allow discounting of its products, so the Gap's profit margins soared until 1976, when the Federal Trade Commission ruled against this monopolizing practice, forcing the Gap to discount Levi's and shift to private-label apparel. In 1983 Don Fisher hired Mickey Drexler to vertically integrate the Gap, and Drexler promptly whittled down the private labels to one—the Gap. Drexler repositioned the Gap from a chain store into a brand, and in the 1990s Drexler further revamped the Gap formula to mimic the ubiquitous success of Coca-Cola. It was Drexler's vision to dominate consumers' wardrobes by simplifying the shopping experience.

Drexler, president of Gap Inc. since 1987 and CEO since 1997, happened upon the name "Old Navy" on the marquee of a bar in Paris in the early 1980s. A decade later he was on the verge of opening a new venture under the name Gap Warehouse when he remembered passing that bar in Paris. Just before the 1994 opening of the new enterprise, Gap lawyers bought the rights to the name from the French bar owner. Old Navy would fill out the Gap's portfolio of retail apparel stores, with Banana Republic, purchased in 1983, catering to high-end consumers, the Gap appealing to mid-level shoppers, and Old Navy representing the bottom rung, reaching the mainstream, mass market through discounting. Drexler, however, could not afford to jeopardize the Gap's reputation for quality by replicating the formula of most discounters selling cheap goods at a cheap price. He and his colleagues sought to distinguish Old Navy.

"When we started Old Navy, we sat around and we talked about what we didn't like about discount stores—poor quality, colors that are always just a hair off. We really thought, 'What do we not want to be?' and just took it from there," recalled Jenny Ming, Old Navy's executive vice president for merchandising, in Nina Munk's Fortune magazine article. By maintaining quality standards and injecting whimsy into the discount shopping experience, Old Navy managed to grow extremely quickly. The company boasted that it was the first apparel retailer to reach sales of $1 billion in just four years, with about 300 stores. "This is a feat that's unmatched in the history of specialty apparel retailing," said analyst Marcia Aaron of BT Alex. Brown Inc. in Michael J. Pachuta's Investor's Business Daily article.

At first Old Navy relied on advertising in newspapers, magazines, and spot television and radio. Old Navy commenced its national television advertising in 1997, spending the majority of its $160 million advertising budget, which represented 2.5 percent of sales, on cable television. That year's fall back-to-school campaign demonstrated the potential success of Old Navy's marketing techniques. Advertising in support of a sale on cargo pants was scheduled to run three weeks, but near "the end of the second week, we were asked to turn off national cable, because cargo pants were no longer available in stores," recounted Pam Marcus, vice president and director of national broadcast at Deutsch Inc., which executed the campaign alongside the Old Navy's internal production company. "We effectively sold out their merchandise," Marcus continued in the 1998 Brandweek article.

TARGET MARKET

Old Navy's success stemmed in part from its broad appeal. In a narrow sense it targeted middle-income families, but its appeal eclipsed this categorization. The timing of Old Navy's inception coincided with a pervasive trend back to bargain shopping and away from the ostentation of the 1980s. "There was a time, not so long ago, when people who shopped at department stores wouldn't shop at Wal-Mart—that was declass,," said Kurt Barnard of Barnard's Retail Trend Report in Munk's 1998 Fortune magazine article. "Then it became chic to shop downscale, to shop for a bargain. People used to pay $10 and they said they paid $20. Now they pay $20 and say they paid $10." Munk then continued, "Old Navy captures this trend brilliantly. It's discount shopping with an edge, discount shopping that appeals to people who can afford Gucci."

Old Navy bridged the gap between bargain and brand shopping by creating a trustworthy brand backed by the reputation of the Gap. As with its parent company, Old Navy appealed to consumers transgenerationally. Low prices particularly appealed to parents, while their kids appreciated the fashionable styling of Old Navy clothes. The challenge for Old Navy advertising consisted of reaching these diverse demographic segments. Old Navy solved this problem by concentrating its media buys on cable television, where the brand could deliver its message to different constituents on different networks that targeted specific segments. "The beauty of cable TV was that we could get younger target prospects to find us on MTV, males on Comedy Central and moms on Lifetime," said Walter Coyle, vice president and associate media director at Deutsch Inc., in a 1998 Brandweek article.

COMPETITION

Whereas the Fishers founded the Gap on sales of Levi's, after the 1976 FTC intervention led to private labeling the Gap competed fiercely against the company it previously supported. The inception of Old Navy opened up another front to attack the original American outfitter, from below in terms of price. Old Navy benefited from the vertical integration of the Gap Inc., which controlled every aspect of the business, from production to

I'D BE AWFULLY GOOD ON TV

In 1994 Old Navy hired fashion doyenne Carrie Donovan to write a 45-word mock columnette that appeared every Friday on page A-4 of the New York Times, the newspaper from which she retired in 1990 as fashion editor. The ad appeared to be a memo from Donovan reporting on the "merch," as she called it, or merchandise about to hit the shelves at Old Navy stores. When Donovan still worked for the Times, she appeared on Good Morning America, the Today Show, and CBS This Morning. Tom Brokaw once commented that she was a natural for television, and years later, when Donovan was talking with Old Navy executives, she joked, "Oh, I'd be awfully good on TV." Old Navy took the joke seriously and began featuring her in its television commercials. They did not take her too seriously, though, as her gogglelike glasses lent levity to the spots.

distribution to inventory to retail sales. Levi's, on the other hand, was primarily a manufacturer. It entered the retail business on the coattails of the Gap but could not translate the success of the Gap's cohesive retail execution. Nevertheless, Levi Strauss sales soared throughout the 1990s, mostly on the strength of the cool image it promoted as the quintessential jean.

Levi sales plummeted 13 percent in 1998, however, down to $6 billion. Peter Arnell, chairman and executive creative director of Arnell Group Brand Consulting, ascribed this decrease to Levi's redirection away from brand building on the strength of its own heritage, as Levi's positioned itself in contrast to its competition. "The moment they start trying to compete with other brands, they don't do very well," Arnell commented in Miles Socha's WWD 1999 article on Levi's. 1998 Levi's campaigns included the tag lines "Tommy Wore Them," "Ralph Wore Them," and "Calvin Wore Them," referring to designers Hilfiger, Lauren, and Klein respectively, as well as the tag line "Our Models Can Beat Up Their Models," featuring Marilyn Monroe and James Dean in Levi's. Besides referring to the competition, these ads copied the Gap's successful "Who Wore Khakis?" campaign that featured famous personalities such as Dizzy Gillespie, Miles Davis, Ernest Hemingway, and Pablo Picasso in everyday, Gap-like clothes.

Gap Inc. risked competing with itself in opening Old Navy, though surprisingly little cannibalization of sales occurred, according to a report on the World Wide Web site "The Motley Fool." Old Navy proved to be the tier with the broadest appeal, however, as evidenced by fourth quarter comparable-store sales, which increased more than 30 percent at Old Navy while increasing more than 20 percent at Banana Republic. The Gap experienced an increase in the high single-digit percentage and GapKids in the low single-digit percentage. Old Navy grew by shifting sales away from discount department stores such as JC Penney, Target, and Kmart, which could not match the hip styling and atmosphere of Old Navy.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By focusing on campaigns around specific items such as cargo pants, drawstring pants, and fleece jackets, Old Navy advertising created demand, as these very items became hip in the youth culture. Old Navy created and then supported these trends by enlisting television personalities to wear Old Navy clothing during programming that featured Old Navy advertising. MTV's Mike Davis appeared on "Winter Lodge" dressed in Old Navy clothing, and MTV devoted a segment called "Magic Moments" to the musical taste of Old Navy's mascot, Magic. Fashion model Markus Schenkenburg, outfitted in Old Navy garb, hosted MTV Jam, which segued into an Old Navy commercial featuring Schenkenburg at a mock fashion show presided over by Magic and Donovan and featuring a shunned Jerry Hall, the fashion model.

"In each case the program acted as a wrap-around for the ads," said Walter Coyle, vice president and associate media director at Deutsch Inc., in a 1998 Brandweek article. "There is tremendous value in having regular commercials subtly supported by visual and verbal in-program reminders. You simply won't—or can't afford to—match that degree of flexibility on conventional network television," Coyle continued. Old Navy also made itself visible as a sponsor of program blocks on Comedy Central, a top 10 countdown on VH1, and a Christmas party on Nick-at-Nite, as well as making an appearance during a fashion segment on E! Entertainment TV.

Besides outfitting personalities familiar to the youth culture, Old Navy revived the careers of stars from the 1960s, '70s, and '80s. Old Navy commercials featured the likes of the Smothers Brothers, Dr. Joyce Brothers, and Isabelle Sanford and Sherman Helmsley from the television show The Jeffersons. These appearances generated the retro feeling that Old Navy supported in-store with vintage 1952 navy Chevy pickups parked in the middle of the warehouse retail space and utilized as product displays. These appeals to a glorious past both generated and drove the retro trend.

OUTCOME

Adweek advertising critic Lippert noted the extremity of Old Navy advertising, pointing out that ''anything that extreme is polarizing—people tend to love it or hate it.'' In a Los Angeles Times survey of viewers' reactions to commercials, Courtney Evans stated that the spots ''actually made me swear never to buy the product.'' Critical response in the advertising community, however, was much more positive. ''Gap and sister company Old Navy have been responsible for some of the most innovative retail advertising to come down the aisle in recent years,'' said Holly Haber and Sharon Edelson in their WWD article. Lippert echoed this admiration for Gap Inc. advertising of its three chains. She singled out Old Navy advertising as particularly noteworthy and effective with her interpretation of how it functioned: ''Old Navy advertising imposes a superstructure of hip superiority—graphically riotous, in-the-know fun—that overrides any residual feelings of being a loser at a bargain basement.''

GOLDSPOT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1994 a new British mobile-phone operator, Orange S.A., debuted in the wake of Britain's more established operators, such as Vodafone Group and BT Cellnet. Orange grew quickly by offering the United Kingdom's first mobile-phone service that billed according to the seconds of talk time instead of rounding up to the next minute. Nine years after Orange's debut, telecommunications analysts predicted that the maturing U.K. mobile-phone industry was reaching a saturation point. Realizing that the population of new subscribers was dwindling, in 2003 Orange released its "Goldspot" cinema campaign to draw customers away from the competition.

"Goldspot" was created by the ad agency Mother Ltd., which had won Orange's estimated $75 million account in 2002. The campaign claimed its title from the nature of its placement: the commercials appeared during the 60 seconds after movie trailers but before the start of the main feature. This advertising slot was commonly referred to as the "goldspot" in the United Kingdom. Nearly every campaign spot featured a real-life Hollywood figure pitching his or her film idea to actors playing Orange executives. In one spot featuring the director Spike Lee, the director asked Orange to finance a movie about the baseball legend Jackie Robinson, the first African-American to play Major League Baseball. After listening to Lee's heartfelt pitch, the executives audaciously suggested that Robinson's story be altered to advertise Orange's services. One executive suggested that in the movie Robinson should play instead for the San Francisco Giants, whose team colors were orange, unlike the colors from Robinson's actual team, the Brooklyn Dodgers. Similar suggestions prompted Spike Lee to leave the meeting prematurely. "Goldspot" commercials ended with the text "Don't let a mobile phone ruin your movie. Please switch it off." The campaign continued into 2004.

"Goldspot" helped Orange retain its position as one of the largest mobile-phone providers within Europe. The ad-industry publication Campaign named three "Goldspot" commercials as the best Cinema Ads of 2004. The campaign also collected a Gold Lion for Commercial Public Services at the 2004 Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Orange was founded in 1994 by the Hong Kong company Hutchison Whampoa Limited, through its Hutchison Telecommunications subsidiary. It was the fourth mobile-service provider to appear in the United Kingdom and was considered an underdog by telecommunications analysts. By not imposing fees that were unnecessarily enforced by the larger providers, Orange outgrew most of its competition. In 1994 Orange's network only covered 50 percent of the United Kingdom.

Two years later it covered 90 percent of the United Kingdom and claimed 25 percent of the nation's digital-mobile-phone subscribers.

The London ad agency WCRS Group helped launch Orange in 1994 with one-word posters featuring the words "laugh," "cry," or "listen" printed in orange letters on a black background. The agency also released an estimated $1.6 million television spot titled "Better Place," directed by Ridley Scott, whose film-directing credits included the Blade Runner (1982) and Gladiator (2000). Other advertisements featured the tagline "pay for what you say" to tout Orange as the first British mobile-phone company to charge customers by the second instead of by the minute. After claiming that its ad work had increased Orange's market value by an estimated $480 million, WCRS was awarded an IPA Effectiveness Award. WCRS's later work for Orange included an approximately $20 million campaign that broke in mid-2000. One spot, titled "Hold Up," featured a man sitting inside a bar and listening to the sound of a siren outside. The outside police chase then materialized into small miniature cars racing along the bar's countertop. A voice-over explained that Orange subscribers could use their phones to receive current news regardless of their location.

After partnering with the mobile-service provider through strong subscriber growth and a series of award-winning Orange campaigns, WCRS executives were shocked when Orange awarded its advertising account to the ad agency Lowe & Partners in 2000. According to Campaign contributor John Tylee, after the Orange brand was acquired by France Telecom SA in 2000, Orange needed an agency with a larger scope. Lowe's relationship with Orange was short-lived. After a string of high-level resignations within Lowe and a release of what Orange executives considered to be weak advertisement, Orange's new marketing director, Jeremy Dale, awarded Mother Ltd. the advertising account in 2002. The agency began formulating a humorous campaign to lure customers away from the competition.

TARGET MARKET

"Goldspot" targeted the competitions' customers. Research conducted by Orange before the campaign revealed that two-thirds of British mobile-phone subscribers felt confused and apathetic about their service contracts and never reviewed their mobile-phone plans. The cinema-themed spots also aimed to encourage existing Orange customers to use their text and voice features more often. The campaign released a minimal amount of information about Orange's services and focused more on Orange's brand image than its features.

CELEBRITY FAMILY

Carrie Fisher, the actress who played Princess Leia in Star Wars, was featured in a commercial for the U.K. mobile-phone operator Orange in 2003. Even though she first became widely known for her 1975 performance as Lorna in Shampoo, fame was not foreign to the young actress. Her parents were the singers Debbie Reynolds and Eddie Fisher, both of whom were pop icons in the 1950s. Eddie Fisher married the actress Elizabeth Taylor in 1959.

Advertisers historically regarded cinema spots as the best medium for targeting 15- to 34-year-olds, but the medium had expanded its scope during the 10 years preceding the launch of "Goldspot." According to Campaign, the surge of period films, comedy dramas, and remakes of Hollywood classics were attracting older and more mature audiences to movie theaters. In 2004 Campaign reported that 71 percent of the U.K. population over the age of 45 went to the cinema, which was 300 percent greater than the same age group's attendance in 1994.

"Goldspot" targeted U.K. movie audiences with cinema-themed humor. Not only were the Orange executives featured in the spots made out to be buffoons, but the actors chosen for the spots were also parodied for their previous movie work. In one spot the actress Carrie Fisher, who played Princess Leia in Star Wars, pitched her film idea for a nineteenth-century romance. The Orange executives stated that they would only finance the film if she could somehow incorporate text messaging into the movie. Steve Davies, chief executive for the British Producers Association, explained to Brand Republic that British audiences enjoyed watching celebrities be self-deprecating. "The British public doesn't like big-headed celebrities," he said.

COMPETITION

Vodafone, which outperformed Orange in revenue but not in quantity of subscribers, released a campaign in 2004 that featured billboard and bus-shelter ads with the mobile-phone text message "FAN C A" followed by an image of a shag carpet. If read aloud, the message asked, "Fancy a shag?" which in the United Kingdom meant "would you like sexual intercourse?" This advertisement, along with a billboard that featured the word "NICE" above two watermelons, was stopped by the U.K.

SPIKE

Spike Lee, the director of controversial movies such as Malcolm X and Bamboozled, was featured in an advertising campaign for the mobile-phone operator Orange in 2003. The award-winning director was actually born Shelton Lee in 1957. His mother gave him the nickname "Spike" because of his tough nature at an early age.

advertising watchdog the Advertising Standards Authority (ASA). Vodafone released a television spot in 2004 that was also criticized. It featured a teenage boy clothed in nothing but fruit and whipped cream. He used a mobile phone to photograph himself and sent the image to his girlfriend. Some of the commercial's harshest critics accused Vodafone of encouraging pedophilia. After a review the ASA deemed the spot suitable for mature audiences.

The prominent British entrepreneur Richard Branson, founder of Virgin Records and Virgin Atlantic Airways, introduced the mobile-service operator Virgin Mobile Telecoms in 1999. Although it was dwarfed by its competition, much as Orange had been five years earlier, Virgin Mobile grew quickly by emphasizing prepaid mobile phones and airing provocative television commercials. To warn against the competition's long-term contracts, Virgin Mobile released its estimated $9 million "Be Careful What You Sign" campaign in late 2002. The campaign was created by the London ad agency Rainey Kelly Campbell Roalfe/Y&R. One spot featured the rapper Wyclef Jean, who thought he was signing an autograph but instead signed a contract that condemned him to a mobile-home park. Jean escaped the park but was soon arrested and placed in prison. Inside the prison's group-shower area, Jean stood beside a giant man who dubiously told Jean, "Hey Superstar, pass the soap." The spot ended with the tagline "Be careful what you sign," Virgin Mobile's logo, and a voice-over explaining the freedom of prepaid calling plans.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Goldspot" cinema commercials first appeared in spring 2003 during movie theaters' "goldspot," a U.K. advertising term that referred to the 60 seconds just before the beginning of the featured film. Each of the campaign's first four spots featured a different Hollywood celebrity pitching his or her film idea to the Orange Film Commission, a fictional panel of executives that decided what movies Orange would finance. The spots featured Carrie Fisher from Star Wars, the X-Men 2 star Alan Cumming, the Jaws star Roy Scheider, and the director Spike Lee. After each celebrity pitched his or her film concept, the executives adulterated the pitch with possible opportunities for Orange advertisement. In one spot Lee explained the relevance of his movie idea about Jackie Robinson, the first African-American to play for a Major League Baseball team, the Brooklyn Dodgers. Lee believed that the movie should "tell the world" that some causes were worth the fight. The director was interrupted by an Orange executive who suggested that Jackie Robinson should, instead, "text the world." In the spot starring Alan Cumming, the Scottish actor explained that his film would be "a rites-of-passage movie," at which point the head Orange executive yawned, "Seen it."

Leon Jaume, an executive creative director for WCRS, anatomized the campaign's humor in the business publication Marketing. "The glaze on the cherry is the unbelievable stroke of casting the clients as Philistines, regarded with contempt by their expensively hired stars," wrote Jaume. "Let's just pause to consider the implications. First, you invest heavily in a campaign reminding people how annoying your product can be, then you agree to be portrayed as a character so crass it makes [British director] Michael Winner look humble and gifted." Each spot ended with the text "Don't let a mobile phone ruin your movie. Please switch it off."

The campaign continued into 2004 with spots featuring Sean Astin, who had starred in Rudy and the trilogy The Lord of the Rings. Other spots featured Verne Troyer, who played Mini Me in Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me. One spot even included the character Darth Vader from the Star Wars trilogies. After Darth Vader entered the Orange Film Commission boardroom, the head executive asked, "Darth, thought you were dead, what can I do for you?" Vader pitched his concept for another film about fellow "Sith lords and their dominance over the universe." The executives ridiculed Vader's pitch by suggesting that he join the "Orange side" instead of the "Dark side"—a reference to the Star Wars trilogies.

The commercials sometimes mentioned mobile features such as text messaging, but they relied more on their self-deprecating humor, which the British enjoyed, according to some advertising analysts. "The marketing strategy [of Orange] has always been to put the customer at the heart of everything we do," Orange's Jeremy Dale explained in Marketing. "It's always been about being straightforward and honest and friendly. One of the challenges we are solving at the moment is making sure the services we bring to the market are what customers genuinely want. It's about changing consumers' behavior; helping them understand the benefits of the technology, not shouting at them about technology."

OUTCOME

The "Goldspot" campaign helped Orange remain competitive with other U.K. mobile-phone operators. Determining which of the top five U.K. operators dominated the industry varied by what statistics were evaluated. Although Orange led with the most U.K. subscribers in 2003, Vodafone reported slightly higher revenue by charging more per customer. Other competitors, such as Virgin Mobile, T-Mobile International AG, and O2 plc, trailed closely behind. In the campaign's first three years, sales for Orange leapt from $17.9 billion to $26.8 billion.

From an advertising standpoint, "Goldspot" collected some of the industry's greatest awards. At the 2004 Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival the campaign won a Gold Lion for the Commercial Public Services category. Campaign rated the spots starring Alan Cumming, Sean Astin, and Verne Troyer as the best cinema commercials for 2004. The commercial starring Spike Lee earned a silver award at the 2004 British Television Advertising Awards in the category of spots that were made specifically for the cinema. Advertising critics praised the campaign not only for its self-deprecating humor but also for creating a cinema-themed message in the 60 seconds before movies started. Drawing more praise from advertising critics was the fact that the spots ended with a public service announcement requesting that mobile-phone ringers be silenced before the start of the movie.

OCEANS, MOUNTAINS, FORESTS, FEAR. WHICH DO YOU CONQUER FIRST? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The originator and once undisputed leader of outdoor wilderness courses, Outward Bound USA saw enrollments plunge and its visibility dim in the early 1990s. The nonprofit corporation reacted slowly to the need to battle its ever-increasing number of competitors. It struggled to update its image and set a clear marketing direction. Too many people thought of Outward Bound (OB) as a once-in-a-lifetime training and educational experience in wilderness survival when what they wanted was an exciting adventure where they could meet like-minded friends.

Ogilvy & Mather (O&M) earned the task of increasing awareness of OB as a challenging outdoor adventure and generating inquiries to its toll-free phone number and website. The New York agency responded with a national public service announcement campaign that first appeared in October 1998. Consumer print publications and websites carried the ads. Since Outward Bound was nonprofit and did not pay for advertising, the ads ran whenever a publication or site had available space.

The first ad in the series, ''Rock Climber,'' placed a shopping-mall-style ''You Are Here'' sign next to climber's ropes dangling down a vertical rock wall. A black piece of climbing equipment at the bottom of the ad contained the Outward Bound compass logo next to the tag line, ''Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First?'' The only other copy was Outward Bound's toll-free number and website address.

The campaign evolved away from the tag line but continued the same visual approach and theme. An April 1999 ad showed a climber upside down crossing a deep ravine on ropes. A sign on a rock ledge above the climber read, ''Pay Toll Ahead.'' The new tag line, ''Same World. Different Place.'' was supported by a small line of additional copy, ''Backpacking, Rafting, Mountaineering, Dog Sledding—Adventures That Take You Someplace Different.'' White-water rafters in a third ad passed a warning sign: ''Caution: Management Not Responsible for Lost or Stolen Articles.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The name ''Outward Bound'' derived from a nautical term for leaving home port for the adventure of the open seas. In 1941 educator Kurt Hahn, a German refugee in Britain during World War II, developed a program in Wales for young sailors. Its mission was to help British merchant seamen learn how to survive on the high seas after German submarines torpedoed their vessels. The men learned how to dangle from ropes, a must for sailors being transferred from sinking ships to lifeboats. They learned how to climb up and down their ships' 40-foot-high smooth steel walls. Acquiring these and other skills also instilled a "can-do" spirit in the men and, most importantly, increased their survival rates. A ropes course and a wall course later became staples of every OB program. The courses became known for "solos," 24- to 72-hour periods at the end of each course when participants had to survive on their own in the wilderness.

The first Outward Bound school in the United States opened in Colorado in 1961. By then OB had adapted to peacetime conditions, placing its emphasis on wilderness survival. The philosophy and activities of OB meshed fashionably with the 1960s and 1970s emphasis on personal growth. People wanted to be more self-reliant and prove to themselves that they could survive outdoors under difficult conditions. In the 1980s the nonprofit hit full stride, buoyed by a spirit of egocentricity in the country. This was the wilderness organization's heyday.

Growth in the 1980s was also fueled by many corporations jumping on board. Xerox, General Foods, Burger King, and other high-profile companies sent their managers and executives to Outward Bound to learn teamwork, confidence, and self-reliance through tasks such as building rafts without tools, pulling each other up vertical walls, and walking across rope bridges while blindfolded. Celebrities added to OB's allure and visibility. NBC news anchor Tom Brokaw and former President Jimmy Carter were among the personalities who participated in Outward Bound treks.

After consistent U.S. growth throughout the 1970s and most of the 1980s, the nonprofit organization's enrollments began declining. Annual enrollment in its 750 wilderness treks and outings plunged from 13,325 in 1986 to about 9,000 in 1997, according to the Wall Street Journal. Young people chose more extreme experiences. Revenues remained flat at about $38 million from 1995 to 1997. One of the nonprofit's own internal surveys showed that many young people, its core customers, did not know the Outward Bound name.

Even among its own participants, Outward Bound faced criticism. One 19-year-old, a two-time OB course participant and the daughter of one of the organization's instructors, announced in a front-page national newspaper article in July 1997 that she preferred the National Outdoor Leadership School (NOLS). She claimed that NOLS offered more practical survival skills while Outward Bound emphasized personal growth.

During this period the wilderness organization's advertising sometimes emphasized the toughness or the rite of passage aspects of its courses. One 1996 ad showed a variety of leaves with one-word labels for each: "single-ply," "quilted," and "2-ply." A pine cone was labeled "extra strength." Another 1996 ad featured a silhouetted backpacker on top of a mountain with an asterisk next to him. Down below, the explanation of the asterisk read, "May Be Subject To Change." Body copy continued: "When you return from an Outward Bound Wilderness Experience, you'll look the same. But you just might be a different person."

By 1998 the nonprofit outdoor wilderness education group offered hundreds of annual courses in sailing, canoeing, sea kayaking, dog sledding, rock climbing, desert backpacking, and other activities at five U.S. wilderness schools. OB also had two urban education centers and 25 base camps in the United States. Courses were designed to inspire self-esteem, self-reliance, concern for others, and caring for the environment. The cover of OB's 1999 catalog carried the statement, "To Serve To Strive And Not To Yield." That catalog listed five core Outward Bound values: (1) adventure and challenge, (2) compassion and service, (3) learning through experience, (4) personal development, and (5) social and environmental responsibility. The nonprofit operated in more than 24 countries, but the United States remained the source of more than half the organization's business.

TARGET MARKET

Historically Outward Bound programs targeted young adults. About 75 percent of OB's open-enrollment students were young people between the ages of 14 and 21. But by 1998 the company had expanded into specific programs for college age, adult, educators, and instructors. A few courses targeted other groups such as women, couples, families, and parent/child pairings. College-age courses were longer and more technical. Adult courses were built to provide more renewal and reflection. People interested in a career in wilderness education could take the instructor courses.

Still, "Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First?" sought first to reach moderately fit and athletic young people ages 16 to 24 in middle- to high-income households. Adults age 25 and older were a secondary target. Not only might adults want to go on an Outward Bound expedition themselves, they might be paying for one or more children to take one.

COMPETITION

Although Outward Bound was the oldest and largest outdoor wildness education group, by the 1990s it found itself in a crowded, competitive marketplace. Several regional companies began offering a range of outdoor courses similar to those provided by OB. Other

OTHER APPROACHES

One print ad in a series used previously to the "Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear: Which Do You Conquer First?" campaign had readers looking nearly straight up at a rock climber. The headline read: "Our Instructors Teach You. You Test Yourself." Body copy continued, "Instead of a grade, you'll earn respect for yourself, others and the environment through courses in dogsledding, canoeing, and more." The tag line was, "The Adventure Lasts A Lifetime."

competitors specialized in one area—white-water rafting, canoeing, backpacking, or another.

Calling itself "The Leader in Wilderness Education," the National Outdoor Leadership School of Lander, Wyoming, offered 50 courses that attracted more than 2,800 students a year by 1998. Other competitors included Northern Wilderness Adventures of Ontario, Canada; Trails Wilderness School in Kelly, Wyoming; and the Team Leadership Center of Door County, Wisconsin.

Another set of competitors included the specialty camps where young people spent a week or two learning a sport, doing community service, participating in the arts, or doing one of numerous other activities. Soccer, tennis, basketball, baseball, and football camps all had gained followers. A 1997 Los Angeles Times article listed Outward Bound as one choice among 39 summer programs ranging from exploring architecture to classes at a police academy to enhancing study skills. Ogilvy & Mather also saw the entertainment industry as a competitor. Amusement and theme parks, resorts, and vacation destinations provided alternatives to the OB experience.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Outward Bound provides outstanding expeditions in spectacular wilderness settings for thousands of everyday teens and young adults across the country," said Rolf Linder, vice president of marketing for OB in a news release. That wasn't the message the organization's key markets were hearing. "Outward Bound is suffering from a lack of punch," said John Green, admissions dean at St. Paul's School in Concord, New Hampshire, in an article in the Denver Post. In the same article the dean of admissions at the University of Pennsylvania added, "We're more impressed with someone who went off to help rebuild a village somewhere than with someone who climbed a mountain to find himself."

Before developing its marketing strategy Ogilvy & Mather decided to conducted some research. The agency delved particularly into the opinions of young people between the ages of 14 and 21. It discovered a low awareness of OB. Only 5 percent of those surveyed knew and understood what OB offered. The study groups had a negative impression of Outward Bound as a place for problem kids. They did not hear much about the organization, they did not really know what it was, and what they did hear came by word of mouth. Overall Ogilvy & Mather's research showed little enthusiasm for OB and a general feeling that "it's not for me."

The perception that OB was for people with problems seemed fed by communications emphasizing self improvement and leadership skills. O&M said those attributes had little relevance or appeal to the young audience OB strove to attract. The self-improvement message caused many of those surveyed to think of OB as a program for the underconfident and weak. Losers took an Outward Bound course to get a sense of achievement. The antisocial went there to learn how to get along with other people. Some OB prospects felt the wilderness course was a way for people from the city to experience nature. Other young people thought of it as "survival courses for kooks and weirdoes," O&M said. They assumed OB taught how to live off the land through exhausting, unnecessary hardship and pain.

A second portion of O&M's research identified the types of communications that would appeal to young people. What the study groups found appealing were: trying things for the first time; doing something completely different; thrill and excitement; friendships; remote, unspoiled locations; and challenges. O&M said people interested in Outward Bound wanted to step outside their normal lives. They wanted to do something that would put a stamp on their individuality, something other people only talked about. They did not want an experience that seemed "manufactured" or "glossy," but one that would be a lasting memory.

The research further asked how OB should be described. Expedition was a good word to use, according to the survey responders, because it had credibility and implied heritage. The study groups warned against words like "course" or "program" because they made OB sound too much like sitting in a classroom and had a zero thrill or excitement factor. Likewise, research indicated that OB should not talk about introspection, nor should it tell people what they will get out of participating in a course.

Most people responded with surprise when they learned about the places they could go with Outward Bound. They liked the fact that OB could take them to remote, unspoiled places like Nepal, the Utah desert, Costa Rica, and Alaska. ''This audience is looking for exciting things to do during summer break or summer vacations,'' said Kevin Scully, account executive at Ogilvy & Mather. ''They aren't motivated by the educational aspects of Outward Bound, but rather the sense of adventure, the opportunity to meet new people, and the chance to do something different, something unique in their peer group.''

With people over age 24, Ogilvy & Mather wanted to change old perceptions. Agency research indicated that many people in this secondary target market had a 1960s or a 1970s perception of Outward Bound. The campaign needed to update what was often a perception of OB as a purely educational survival skills course to one of a challenging adventure.

Outward Bound also identified the perception of its courses as a once-in-a-lifetime experience as a concern. Alumni did not come back in large numbers. The marketing strategy included tailoring more expeditions to specific age groups and promoting them as ongoing education, not single-event rites of passage. ''Essentially, the campaign was designed to suggest that OB will take you outside the boundaries of your everyday life,'' Scully said. ''Rather than put forth the rational argument that OB is an educational encounter, we believed that the emotional approach is of greater interest and a more powerful motivator to get people to contact OB for more information.''

Besides changing perceptions the campaign sought to enlarge Outward Bound's media reach and presence. Previously the nonprofit's ads had only appeared in print publications. Creating versions of the ads for websites opened a new marketing channel rich with people in Outward Bound's target market.

FRESH TELEVISION FOR WOMEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Oxygen Network was the centerpiece of Oxygen Media, an entertainment company that catered to an exclusively female audience via television and the Internet. The network's 2000 introduction had not been as successful as the company had hoped, and by 2002 it was languishing behind industry leader Lifetime, the most popular network in all of cable TV, with a 2.0 rating share and access to more than 80 million households. Oxygen hoped that 2002 would be the start of a major turnaround. That year the company partnered with AOL Time Warner to integrate Oxygen's Web content with that of AOL. The deal also helped Oxygen break into Time Warner Cable's coveted market of New York subscribers, which would give Oxygen access to an additional 10 million households.

To help attract viewers in this new market, Oxygen contacted the Wenham, Massachusetts, agency Mullen, which had developed a critically acclaimed spot for the network's initial launch. Mullen's new campaign for 2002 consisted of a television spot that was cut into 30- and 60-second versions. The spot started at a beauty pageant in midcentury America in which a contestant was asked what she would do to make the world a better place. The spot cut into her answer to jump forward though other beauty pageants, each one taking place in an ensuing decade, such as the 1960s and the 1970s, until the final "answer" to the question, given in the present, was a call for more accurate depictions of women in the media. The satirical spot closed with the tagline "Fresh Television for Women."

While Oxygen was too far behind Lifetime to entirely close the gap, the spot did help the network acquire some forward momentum. By 2005 it had gained access to more than 55 million households, and Oxygen Media was generating advertising revenue in excess of $46 million per year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Oxygen Network was an independent cable station owned by Oxygen Media, a company founded by former Nickelodeon CEO Geraldine Laybourne and a group of highly successful partners, including TV personality Oprah Winfrey and Microsoft cofounder Paul Allen. The network was introduced in 2000 with a highly praised spot aired during Super Bowl XXXIV. At the time Oxygen was only available in about 6 million homes. The cable network was designed to be integrated closely with the company's website, oxygen.com. The website was intended to serve as the lynchpin of Oxygen Media's e-commerce business. Unfortunately, the telecommunications industry crash in 2000 and 2001 damaged Oxygen Media's Internet business, and it quickly had to drop its e-commerce operations.

The Oxygen network also fell on tough times, a result in part of its odd mix of programming. It featured talk shows, syndicated reruns, animation, fashion programming, and game shows. This hurt its efforts to forge an identity against specialized cable stations such as the Game Show Network, the Cartoon Network, and more established female-oriented networks, such as Lifetime. Oxygen Media also experienced a financial crunch after spending $75 million to develop original programming for the network, only to see most of those programs, like the critically reviled magazine show Pure Oxygen, fail to find an audience.

Oxygen Media hoped that 2002 would signal a turnaround. In September of that year the Oxygen Network was scheduled to begin broadcasting reruns of the popular Oprah Winfrey Show. The program, hosted by one of the network's key supporters, was the most popular daytime talk show in the United States and had helped make Oprah Winfrey one of the most famous people in the world.

More importantly, the network was able to access new markets. Oxygen Media partnered with AOL Time Warner in 2002, allowing AOL to handle advertising sales on oxygen.com. This helped the network break into Time Warner Cable's New York market. By April 2001 the network was still only available in 13 million homes, not enough to compete with Lifetime or WE, the other two major women's networks. The addition of 10 million households via Time Warner Cable, including more than 1 million viewers in New York City itself, meant that by the end of 2002 Oxygen would be available in 30 million homes. The network wanted to hit the ground running with a new national campaign. In effect Oxygen would be relaunching itself for its new viewers.

TARGET MARKET

Oxygen's core demographic was 18- to 49-year-old women, especially those who were career-oriented. Some of the company's detractors felt that this demographic was too broad for the world of cable television. Many cable stations were narrower in focus; for example, MTV zeroed in on 13- to-18-year-olds. Oxygen's wide reach was blamed for its occasionally scattered programming.

The network's biggest draw in the early 2000s was reruns of the syndicated program Xena: Warrior Princess, a campy show that attracted teenagers and gay men in addition to women. This audience differed greatly from the middle-aged women who tuned in to watch reruns of the 1980s and 1990s sitcoms, such as Cybill and Kate and Allie, that the network also aired.

To help find its voice, Oxygen started including more original programming. Its morning exercise program Inhale featured yoga; in contrast, competitors such as Lifetime offered more traditional aerobics fare. It was hoped that this would help the network draw a younger audience than Lifetime and other competitors. After focus groups indicated that the network was too "preachy," Oxygen made an effort to infuse its programming with wit and flare. It introduced a fashion talk show hosted by the comedian Tracey Ullman and another talk show starring the well-known (and colorful) fashion designer Isaac Mizrahi. Such light and irreverent fare was part of the attempt to forge the identity of the Oxygen Network.

The network also wanted people in the ad-buying industry to see that Oxygen was a company on the rise and a potentially strong partner for advertisers. Thus, the network's new availability in New York City gave it the opportunity to connect with another audience: the ad buyers who lived and worked in Manhattan. Oxygen's presence in the United States' largest television market was seen as a major step in becoming an industry player.

OPRAH WINFREY

In 2000 Oxygen Media introduced the Oxygen Network, a television network dedicated to women-centered programming. Though Oxygen was faced with strong competition from Lifetime, an established women-centered cable network known for its original movies, the network felt that it had a secret weapon: the support from talk show host Oprah Winfrey.

The Mississippi native first rose to prominence in 1984 when she became host of the struggling AM Chicago, a local program in Chicago. In 1985 the show was renamed The Oprah Winfrey Show and began to be syndicated nationally. Within a year it was the most popular daytime talk show, besting such established stars as Phil Donahue. Oprah achieved even more fame after her successful acting performance in the 1985 film The Color Purple.

By the early 2000s Winfrey was one of the most famous people in the world, prompting Time magazine to name her one of the 100 most influential people of the twentieth century. Her talk show's "book club" was highly influential, introducing wide audiences to the work of authors such as Toni Morrison. She owned a successful production company, Harpo, and was a partner in Oxygen Media. In 2003 Forbes magazine disclosed that she was the first African-American woman to become a billionaire.

COMPETITION

Oxygen was faced with a crowded marketplace. Several additional networks were aimed at the same female audience. The most important competitors were the Lifetime and WE (Women's Entertainment) networks. Access to the New York market was essential, because it boosted Oxygen's availability to 30 million homes. This brought it closer to WE, which was available to 44 million households by the early 2000s. Neither network, however, was able to match the availability of Lifetime, which had access to more than 80 million homes.

Lifetime was introduced in 1984, and by 2002 it had become the gold standard for women's television. The network had a good pedigree, as it was a joint venture by two successful entertainment conglomerates, the Walt Disney Company and the Hearst Corporation. In fact, with a 2.0 average daily Nielsen rating, Lifetime had been the most-watched cable network in the entire United States since 2001. Lifetime's ratings were still climbing by up to 18 percent per year. It had even managed to spin off a successful sister network, the Lifetime Movie Network. Lifetime's calling card was its original films that focused on women's issues, some of which drew praise from such organizations as the women's-rights advocate NOW (National Organization for Women).

In contrast to Oxygen, Lifetime had a specific focus on families and sensational "victim" stories (movies about, for example, women in abusive relationships or fighting breast cancer). This helped it form a cohesive identity for viewers. Lifetime also had the advantage of being the first female-oriented network. As a result it was earning more than $500 million per year in advertising by 2002; in comparison, Oxygen had about $20 million in ad sales. This had the effect of making Lifetime's Web portal more successful as well, enabling lifetimetv.com to draw major advertisers, including General Motors.

Meanwhile, WE, which had previously shunned advertising, was looking to offer up-front commercial time to advertisers for the first time in 2002. Although commercials would be limited to about eight minutes every hour, this would still dilute the potential advertising base for Oxygen.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Oxygen hired the Mullen advertising agency to develop a new commercial that would help the network reach new viewers. Mullen, based in Wenham, Massachusetts, had also handled the company's first television spot. That original spot had featured a maternity ward where the newborn girls rejected the pink caps that the hospital had placed on their heads. This was meant to show that Oxygen would not cater to female stereotypes.

Mullen's new spot would convey a similar message, but because the network was now more mature, it would require new imagery to do so. The new commercial focused the action on a beauty pageant. Such pageants, with their strict codes of traditional femininity, were an obvious foil for Oxygen, which wanted to appeal to career-oriented women. The spot would subvert this beauty-pageant femininity with a more feminist message designed to bolster the network's image.

The commercial began at a pageant in post–World War II America. A young contestant was asked what she would do to make the world a better place. After she began to answer, the spot cut to a pageant set in the 1960s. After allowing that contestant to expand on the answer, the spot cut again to a 1970s pageant, and again to the 1980s, and then the 1990s. The final answer, after each decade's contestant had added to it, was: "I'd do my very best to make sure that every time you ever witness a woman in the media it would be sure to reveal her true complexities, not just the same old stereotypes that do an incredible disservice to all humanity.'' The spot closed with the tagline ''Fresh Media for Women.'' Both 30- and 60-second versions of the spot were developed.

The spot underscored several points Oxygen wanted to make about itself. The first and most important was that Oxygen was a network for women, free from the stereotypes found on other networks. This somewhat feminist message would help the network reach out to the career-oriented young women that Oxygen wanted as viewers. It also showed some of the network's humor: the spot was clearly a satire on the traditional ''femininity'' put forth by beauty pageants, which often reduced women's worth to their appearance. Finally, the spot's passage through time gave the impression that Oxygen was a hip, modern network—not one stuck in the past like its competition. This was also important in attracting the younger demographic that Oxygen sought.

OUTCOME

The ''Fresh Media for Women'' campaign was on balance a success. Critics loved the spots, and Oxygen's ratings continued to improve. While Lifetime remained the top network on cable, Oxygen began to draw more of an audience. In the wake of its access to the New York market, the network experienced an increase in its number of subscribers, and by 2005 the network was available in more than 55 million households nationwide.

Though none of Oxygen's shows became a breakout hit in the way that Lifetime's original movies were, combined advertising sales from the Internet and network were a healthy $46.5 million by 2004. The network broadened its talk-show offering to include the Emmy-winning program The Ellen DeGeneres Show, the The Tyra Banks Show, as well as a call-in show about sex and sexuality, Talk Sex. The partnership with AOL Time Warner paid especially big dividends for the website, which by 2003 had more than 200 advertisers and generated greater revenue than the network itself.

REMEMBER RAINIER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Rainier beer, a longtime staple in the Pacific Northwest, had, like many local beer brands in America, seen its fortunes decline substantially in the 1970s and 1980s as giant national brewers flattened smaller competitors. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, however, a new niche-marketing trend emerged in the beer industry. A number of local and national blue-collar beer brands found a new consumer base among authenticity-seeking young people. Rainier owner Pabst Brewing Company enlisted Seattle agency Cole & Weber/Red Cell to craft a 2004 campaign thus reestablishing the brand among young people in its regional market.

''Remember Rainier,'' with a campaign budget of a mere $400,000, made direct use of Rainier's heritage in the Northwest while pushing brand awareness in unorthodox ways. The re-airing of vintage Rainier commercials from the 1970s and 1980s was embedded within a larger fictional framework developed in an 11-episode series of 30-minute comic talk shows called RainierVision. The shows, featuring a pair of fictional Rainier fanatics (Tim and Chuck), ran Sundays at 1 a.m. on the Seattle affiliate of a major cable network. Supplementary online campaign material worked to further fill in the larger Rainier storyline while also providing product information, and guerilla-marketing stunts featuring Tim and Chuck took the ''Remember Rainier'' story directly to Seattle residents. The campaign's buzz-generating power was further heightened by a bizarre turn of events involving a real black bear found passed out in a resort area after clawing his way into three dozen cans of Rainier.

The campaign helped Rainier to its first sales gains in nearly two decades, and it won numerous industry awards, including a Gold Clio and a Best of Show ADDY honor. Tim and Chuck were featured in a short film that premiered in 2005, and the integrated marketing effort continued to evolve.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Rainier beer brand was first introduced to Pacific Northwest consumers in the 1880s, when the Sweeney Brewery in the Georgetown area of Seattle, Washington, opened for business. After a merger with two other local brewers, the company became the Seattle Brewing and Malting Company, and its leading product, Rainier, was popular across the West and in Alaska. Prohibition came to Washington state in 1916, four years before it was a federal mandate, and the Rainier brand was bought in the meantime by a California brewery. After the law's 1933 repeal Fritz Sick and his son Emil bought the rights to the Rainier name in the Northwest. The Sicks eventually took full control of the Rainier brand and enlarged the original Georgetown brewery, leading Rainier beer back to the top of the regional market. A giant red R perched atop the brewery became a Seattle landmark.

The 1970s and 1980s, however, saw the rise of megabreweries like Anheuser-Busch, Miller, and Coors, which pushed most local American beer makers out of business. Rainier survived but suffered consistent sales declines during these decades, despite a popular, offbeat TV advertising campaign that ran regionally in the 1970s and 1980s. The 1990s presented Rainier with yet another obstacle, as the trend toward craft and microbrewed beers, which was particularly pronounced in the Pacific Northwest, left little market space for low-priced, unassuming brands like Rainier. During these decades Rainier had been bought and sold by a succession of corporate parents, none of which could revive the brand.

In the late 1990s, though, marketers of Pabst Blue Ribbon (whose corporate parent, Pabst Brewing Company, became Rainier's owner in 2000) noticed that sales of its similarly outdated classic brand had begun picking up among authenticity-seeking young people. Other national brands with a similar down-market profile, like Miller High Life, also experienced a measured resurgence after being adopted by urban hipsters who valued the beer's simple and straightforward image. The trend seemed at least partly a backlash as well, not only against mainstream beers and their blockbuster marketing campaigns but also against the high prices and pretensions of microbrews.

LOCAL?

Though the "Remember Rainier" campaign was a direct appeal to nostalgia surrounding the brand's Seattle roots and Northwest heritage, Rainier was no longer brewed in or near Seattle. It was, in fact, brewed by Miller Brewing (owned by SABMiller plc), one of the corporate giants from which Rainier was attempting to differentiate itself by rebuilding a homegrown image. Miller brewed most of the beers for Rainier's owner, Pabst Brewing Company, which had become a holding company rather than a brewer—an owner of various beer brands but a brewer of none. Pabst, closely associated with its hometown of Milwaukee, had in 1996 moved its company headquarters to San Antonio, Texas.

TARGET MARKET

Rainier was thus naturally positioned, among consumers in the Northwest, as an alternative to these two groups of competitors, and its history in the region served as its chief marketable attribute. By asking beer drinkers in and around Seattle to "Remember Rainier," Cole & Weber's creative team was establishing the brand's authenticity and appealing to consumers' nostalgia in ways specific to the region. Neither mainstream brands nor microbrews could compete with Rainier on these terms.

Rainier's successful relaunch depended, like the sustained success of most alcohol products, on winning the loyalty of young men aged 21 to 34. Though men in this age group obviously had not been Rainier drinkers in the 1970s and 1980s, Cole & Weber expected many of them to recall family members drinking Rainier and to remember the zany Rainier TV commercials that ran during those decades. The old commercials, which Cole & Weber re-aired as a key component of the new campaign, capitalized on widespread nostalgia for the Pacific Northwest of yesteryear, as contrasted with a new, gentrified Northwest of upscale coffee shops and computer-industry professionals. The RainierVision series of TV shows, meanwhile, took the campaign beyond the simple rehashing of retro commercials. By embedding the commercials within the larger storyline of a Rainier-centric talk show hosted by two young, over-the-top brand loyalists, Cole & Weber was able to leaven the overt appeal to nostalgia with ironic humor suitable to the target market's sensibilities. The "Remember Rainier" website further tied the effort together, while partnerships with Seattle bars and the circulation around town of a pickup truck towing the locally famous red R further spread brand awareness, in unique and unpredictable ways, among the local target.

COMPETITION

Rainier was part of the so-called subpremium category, which comprised beers costing less than mainstream brands like Budweiser, Bud Light, Miller Lite, and Coors Light. The surprising resurgence of several beers in this category in recent years had created a new marketing niche, in which seemingly out-of-date products like Miller High Life, Pabst Blue Ribbon, and blue-collar local beers similar to Rainier found themselves able to capitalize on the perception that they were more authentic than mainstream beers, whose success seemed largely fueled by slick, expensive ad campaigns. As these newly desirable brands began trying to spread their individual messages of authenticity, however, they had to take pains to avoid marketing styles that would call that authenticity into question.

In 1998, after seeing modestly encouraging sales spikes in isolated markets, Miller High Life unveiled its first national TV campaign since the mid-1980s.

Directed by acclaimed documentary filmmaker Errol Morris, the High Life campaign successfully delivered the same message for many years: America was suffering an epidemic shortage of masculinity, and it was up to those select few diehards, the ''High Life men,'' to reinvigorate the country. Intentionally over-the-top without ridiculing the High Life men, the campaign managed to appeal simultaneously to young hipsters and Miller High Life's long-established blue-collar market. The campaign won many awards and was credited with significantly raising the profile of a nearly defunct brand.

Pabst Blue Ribbon (a corporate sibling of Rainier's) had, like High Life, the aura of an unpretentious, workingman's beer and had similarly fallen on hard times in recent decades. When PBR executives noticed inexplicable sales spikes in the Portland, Oregon, area in the 1990s, they investigated the phenomenon and came to the surprising discovery that, unaided by any advertising, an urban subculture of bicycle messengers and their peers had become champions of the PBR brand. Seeing an opportunity for a PBR comeback but recognizing that traditional marketing tactics might alienate a young audience craving the authentic aura surrounding the brand, PBR's marketers dispatched on-the-ground brand representatives to selected urban markets. These people were charged with building buzz about the brand in ways that were unobtrusive; therefore they spent time appearing simply to hang out in locales frequented by its young, antiestablishment target.

Rheingold beer, a regional brand sold primarily in New York City, was not, for geographic reasons, a competitor with Rainier at this time, but it was in the midst of a resurgence thanks to a marketing strategy strikingly similar to Rainier's. Having noticed a desire for simple, authentic products among hip, downtown New Yorkers, and having further observed that there was no New York–centric beer that satisfied such a product profile, a group of investors relaunched Rheingold, which was once New York's most popular beer, to fill this niche and, ultimately, to reclaim its spot at the top of the city's beer market. Utilizing the same miniscule budget as Rainier ($400,000), and mindful of its target audience's aversion to mainstream marketing, Rheingold staged an unconventional guerilla marketing effort combining in-bar promotions with cryptic billboard placements and the revival of the Miss Rheingold beauty pageant, which had been extremely popular in the 1950s and 1960s.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Given the $400,000 budget available for advertising, Cole & Weber by necessity had to stage an unconventional campaign for Rainier. The fact that Rainier's biggest asset was its regional heritage dovetailed with the limited budget, as the re-airing of old advertisements proved an economical way of pitching the ''Remember Rainier'' message. The old ads themselves, created by Seattle agency Heckler and Bowker in the 1970s and 1980s, proved suitable for contemporary tastes. Whereas Budweiser and Miller advertising of that era focused on sincere appeals to hard work, Rainier ran ads that relied on humor and quirky premises. In ''Motorcycle'' a biker voiced the words ''Rainier beer'' in a way that mimicked the simultaneous revving and gear-shifting sounds of his motorcycle's engine as he accelerated on an open highway. In ''Crossing'' a family on a rural road slowed down at a ''Beer Crossing'' sign; their caution was rewarded with the sighting of two giant bottles and a can of Rainier walking across the road.

Cole & Weber felt that the re-aired ads alone, however, would not be enough to reignite Northwesterners' interest in Rainier. ''We needed something bigger,'' the agency's executive creative director Guy Seese told Creativity. ''We needed a talk show.'' The talk-show idea became RainierVision, an 11-episode series of half-hour talk shows devoted to the beer. Hosted by Tim and Chuck, two fictional Rainier-obsessed, 20-something Seattle residents, and modeled after Wayne's World (the Saturday Night Live spoof of a public-access cable show that became a successful movie), RainierVision ran Sundays on a local UPN affiliate at 1 a.m. Taking as its premise the idea that Tim had come across videotapes of old Rainier commercials in a thrift shop and decided, with Chuck, that the world needed to see them, the talk show integrated the vintage spots with sketch-comedy adventures featuring recurring characters and Rainier-related ephemera.

The cross-platform integration of the ''Remember Rainier'' campaign did not stop with RainierVision, however. A website, http://www.rememberrainier.com, further established the overarching story behind Tim and Chuck's television mission, while filling in gaps in viewers' knowledge of the show's content and providing other campaign- and product-related information. Additionally, as Tim and Chuck became known commodities in Seattle, the actors who played them were dispatched to selected bars in the city, where, in character, they further spread the word about their passion for Rainier. They also drove a pickup around Seattle, towing the giant red-neon letter R, a mock-up of the one that had stood on top of the Rainier Brewery and been a Seattle landmark in decades past.

As RainierVision ran a freak occurrence that made local headlines gave the campaign an unexpected boost. A two-year-old black bear, having wandered into a campground at the Baker Lake Resort area in Washington state, was found unconscious next to a group of 36 empty Rainier beer cans, which he had clawed open and consumed. Further investigation by wildlife agents revealed, moreover, that the bear had first raided a stash of Busch beer but had drunk only two before moving on to the brand that was presumably better suited to his palate. The astounding event was given a further marketing-friendly twist when the wildlife agents attempted to capture the bear, which had returned to the campground after his initial binge, by using a trap set with doughnuts, honey, and two open cans of Rainier. A delighted Cole & Weber immediately incorporated the incident into the campaign, first by running an online contest to name their new "spokesanimal" (the winning name was Brewtus) and then by incorporating a beer-drinking, bear-suit-wearing character into four original 30-second spots that also featured Tim and Chuck.

OUTCOME

"Remember Rainier" was credited with spurring the brand's first sales gains in 17 years, at a time when the beer market overall was flat. The campaign was likewise a big winner on the 2005 advertising-industry awards circuit. It won a Gold Clio, a Gold ADDY, and the ADDY Best of Show award, and it was a Gold winner at the New York Art Directors Club awards. It was named the Yahoo! Big Idea Chair winner, and it won the Grand Prize at the first annual ANA/AICP Battle of the Brands event, besting much larger contest entrants like Burger King, Sega, and ESPN.

The success of "Remember Rainier" led to the continuation of Tim and Chuck's adventures in 2005. The Rainier fanatics were featured in a short film that included many of the recurring characters from the previous year's RainierVision shows, and new episodes of RainierVision entered production. The cross-platform nature of the campaign remained in place, as the online, film, TV, and print executions all worked together as parts of an integrated Rainier storyline.

FAST. IT'S CORPORATE POLICY. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Hoping to capitalize on the tail end of the mountain bike and bicycle motocross (BMX) craze of the late 1990s, Schwinn Cycling & Fitness purchased GT Bicycles for $170 million in 1998. The resulting company was named Schwinn/GT Corp and was later purchased by Pacific Cycle, Inc., which now operates Shwinn as a brand. Relying on word of mouth and a century-old brand name, Schwinn typically partitioned only a small amount of its budget for advertising, usually executed by Carmichael Lynch, Inc. By 1999, however, the $5 billion American bicycle industry was waning. Schwinn was rapidly losing market share from its antiquated mode of selling bicycles through independent dealerships. In a last-ditch effort to keep from filing bankruptcy, Schwinn launched the "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign to tout the speed of its new GT Bicycles. Prior to its acquisition by Schwinn in 1998, GT Bicycles handled all advertising internally.

Executed with the help of Carmichael Lynch, "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." was primarily spearheaded by Miami-based Crispin Porter + Bogusky, which named the campaign and designed its print ads, the campaign's sole medium. With a budget of $1 million, the campaign hoped to depict GT Bicycles as the "most advanced, fastest, human-powered vehicles on the planet." Within an industry that typically ran print ads of sponsored riders, Crispin Porter + Bogusky tailored the campaign around GT Bicycles employees and their obsession with speed. Print ads showed employees injuring themselves from running too fast through the office. One of the campaign's more risqué ads, "Sex Bicycles," showed an employee triumphantly raising his arms beside his girlfriend. Reclining in the back of a company van, both were covered in blankets. The ad suggested they had just finished having sex. The employee's girlfriend, looking much less satisfied, lay beside him. The tagline "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." appeared below the photograph.

Continuing through 2000 the campaign garnered two Clios along with seven Gold Lions at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival. GT Bicycles was also the only industry brand to report a market share gain (up 6 percent) in 2000. Because of Schwinn/GT's unwillingness to branch outside of its 1,900 independent dealerships, however, the corporation filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in mid-2001.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For more than half of the twentieth century, Schwinn dominated America's bicycle industry. The first major sign of the company's inability to change with consumer trends occurred during the 1970s when Americans gravitated toward light-framed European road bikes. Schwinn continued manufacturing its larger, bulkier models.

Schwinn again dismissed the 1980s popularity of the BMX and mountain bike. After losing considerable market share, the family-owned Schwinn business filed for bankruptcy protection in 1992 and was later purchased by an investment firm. Even with new owners Schwinn continued relying on its brand identity and exclusive bicycle retail stores to rally back. Around the time "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." appeared, about 250 individual retailers still had "Schwinn" in their name. Industry analyst Ray Keener told Hoover's, "That doesn't sound like a lot, except that Trek is second with one dealer—the Trek factory store—and no one is in third."

Previous to its relationship with Crispin Porter + Bogusky, Schwinn outsourced advertising to Carmichael Lynch, which developed successful television spots such as "The Ride." Adweek deemed this Schwinn commercial a "top spot" in 1993. Schwinn's advertising budget was small, only reaching $1.3 million in 1998, even though the company's overall expenditures reached $37.3 million. To ward off its second bankruptcy of the 1990s, Schwinn bought the popular BMX and mountain bike brand GT Bicycles for $170 million. Previous to the acquisition GT Bicycles executed all advertising in-house and sponsored professional BMX riders such as Stephen Murray, who held the record for the longest jump.

After acquiring GT Bicycles in 1998, Schwinn/GT wanted to aggressively market the brand to overtake competitors like Cannondale Bicycle Corp., Specialized Bicycle Components Inc., and Trek Bicycle Corp. In regard to previous GT Bicycles ads, Gregg Bagni, Schwinn/GT's marketing vice president, told Adweek, "The GT ads were funny . . . [but] Schwinn is about escape and freedom. We're constantly looking for new ways . . ., to look at biking from a fun standpoint." Even though Crispin Porter + Bogusky was named agency of record for the "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, Carmichael Lynch contributed as well to position GT Bicycles as the fastest bike in the industry.

TARGET MARKET

"Fast. It's Corporate Policy." created humorous and sometimes salacious print ads to attract younger extreme sports enthusiasts. Ads portrayed young GT Bicycles employees engaging in day-to-day life events with the same speed and vigor of a BMX rider. Bill Smith, Huffy's vice president of marketing, told SportStyle, "Unlike the adult bike market which continues to soften as baby boomers mature and buy fewer mountain bikes, there is an uptick in kids' and BMX bikes which derives from the popularity of extreme sports."

The campaign's print ads deviated outside of traditional BMX advertising, which typically displayed photographs of sponsored riders performing stunts with the brand's product. Crispin Porter + Bogusky strove to brand GT Bicycles with speed and humor by making every employee at GT Bicycles appear obsessed with doing things fast. Focusing on the product instead of the brand was something the bicycle industry was often criticized for, especially inside the actual IBDs (individual bicycle dealers). "Many IBDs come from an enthusiast background—they're bike geeks and it's hard for them to let go of that," Marshall Hannum, manager of Poison Spider Bicycles, told SportStyle. "The result is that we get businesses that look more like car garages than like Nordstrom's, and most people would rather shop at Nordstrom's."

CANYON GANG

A group called the Canyon Gang is commonly credited for inventing the mountain bike. The group's four members—Robert and Kim Kraft, John York, and Tom Slifka—began riding heavy-framed Schwinn bicycles down mountain trails within California's Marin County. The members would take the wide-tired bikes, which they called "ballooners," to the peak of 2,600-foot Mount Tam and ride down trails, braking as little as possible. Schwinn, ironically, dismissed mountain bicycles as a passing fad and never designed mountain bikes during the 1970s or '80s.

COMPETITION

During the late 1990s three brands—Huffy, Roadmaster, and Murray—reigned over 65 percent of the American bicycle market by manufacturing bikes in China and retailing them through Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. and the Kmart Corporation. The faster-growing high-end bicycles accounted for the market's other 35 percent and retailed primarily through individual bicycle dealers.

The Texas-based Trek Bicycle Corporation, America's largest manufacturer of high-performance bicycles, first sponsored three-time Tour de France winner Greg Lemond and then later seven-time Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong. Besides making road bikes Trek also produced mountain, BMX, children's, recumbent, and police bikes. Brand promotion was accomplished through the sponsorship of athletes and races. Much of Trek's success inside a struggling industry was attributed to the corporation's savvy sponsorships, great customer service, greater affordability, and sleek design. "It's easy to make a few missteps in this business but you can't argue with the quality of their bikes,'' Mark Sani, editor of Bicycle Retailer, an industry trade journal, told Capital Times. ''They're basically blowing everybody else out in terms of lower cost, customer service and great delivery.''

Unlike many of its competitors, Trek also manufactured its bicycles in America, finding the cost comparable to Asian manufacturing. ''Our growth is even more amazing when you consider the fact that the bike business itself hasn't been growing,'' Tom Albers, Trek president and CEO, told Capital Times. ''We've been growing because we've been taking market share from our competitors.''

Cannondale Bicycle Corp., another high-end American bicycle manufacturer, advertised by cosponsoring bike racing teams. The company struggled much as Schwinn/GT did in the late 1990s and eventually sold assets to the private equity firm Pegasus Capital Advisors. ''It's a price game. It's a commodity market. And it's very difficult to make a profit,'' Jay Townley, a former Schwinn vice president, remarked on the bicycle industry to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. ''Ask anybody who's done business with Wal-Mart.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

To slow the diminishing of its market share, Schwinn in the 1990s made restructuring decisions like purchasing GT Bicycles in 1998 and focusing advertising on the newly acquired brand's BMX and mountain bikes. ''We've come back, hit the mountain bike market, dropped down into BMX, and are looking at pushing the road bike market,'' Schwinn BMX market manager Geoff Hannen told SportStyle. ''But we will continue efforts in BMX because we've already seen amazing growth there and [the category] holds tomorrow's mountain bike buyers.''

In 1999 Schwinn awarded Crispin Porter + Bogusky a majority of its $1 million advertising budget. Creatives from the agency then met with Schwinn/GT Bicycles representatives to discuss the campaign. ''We did a planning exercise with them to get to what their core attributes were,'' Jeff Steinhour, partner and director of account service at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told Adweek Southeast. ''They'd never been through something like that, and by the end of the second day, we were down to seven to ten words. The one that kept coming up most often was 'fast.' '' The agency then went on to produce humorous print above the tagline ''Fast. It's Corporate Policy.''

Crispin Porter + Bogusky's Ari Merkin wrote the print's copy. Alex Burnard was responsible for the campaign's art direction. Until the end of 2000 the campaign's sole medium, print ads, appeared in popular bicycling magazines, the magazine Outside, and the Men's Journal. One print ad, titled ''Sex Bicycles,'' showed a young, blanket-covered couple lying in the back of a GT Bicycles company van. The young man raised his arms in victory above the tagline ''Fast. It's Corporate Policy.'' His less-than satisfied girlfriend was rolling her eyes beside him. Below the ad was a small picture of a GT Bicycle. Another ad showed GT Bicycles employees who accidentally knocked each other unconscious after running through their office. ''We felt we needed to leverage 'fast' into a compelling consumer message that invites people in,'' Steinhour told Adweek Southeast. Another ad, titled ''Speeding Tickets Bicycles,'' showed a parking lot filled with GT Bicycles employees, each receiving a speeding ticket from a different highway patrol officer.

Erik Proulx of the agency Brokaw explained in Advertising Age's Creativity that Crispin Porter + Bogusky's strategy was to simply exaggerate ''the bejeezus'' out of the product's benefit. The same could be applied to, as Proulx stated, dish detergent. The tagline would be ''Maybe we make dishes a little too sparkly.'' The ad critic continued to say, ''After all, what is 'Fast. It's Corporate Policy,' for GT bikes other than 'Maybe we make bikes a little too fast' by another name?''

OUTCOME

The ''Fast. It's Corporate Policy.'' campaign saw Schwinn/GT Bicycles maintain $400 million in sales for both 1999 and 2000. During the campaign's last 12 months, GT Bicycles also gained 6 percent market share, the largest gain within the entire bicycle industry. The campaign collected two Clios and later seven Gold Lions at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival.

Despite its success in 2000 Schwinn/GT Bicycles filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in July 2001. Analysts cited the corporation's neglect of the 1970s road bike trends, along with the 1980s BMX and mountain bike trends. Also Schwinn was criticized for its insistence on selling bikes exclusively through Schwinn's 1,900 independent dealerships. Others cited flaws in the pricing mind-set of the entire industry's retailers. ''A bike is the only product with 100-plus parts that can be bought for under $100. There's something wrong with that picture,'' bike industry consultant Bill Fields of Fields Associates told SportStyle. Schwinn/GT Bicycles' assets were eventually divided and sold to competitors.

WHAT A RIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Schwinn Cycling & Fitness was acquired by Pacific Cycle Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1997 Schwinn Cycling & Fitness Inc. launched a print campaign designed to entice the masses of mountain bike enthusiasts while altering the company's image as an out-of-touch dinosaur. Schwinn dominated the U.S. bicycle market from the 1950s to the 1970s but hit the financial skids in the 1980s, in part due to the company's dismissal of the mountain bike craze of the late 1970s and early 1980s as nothing more than a passing trend. Sales of mountain bikes climbed and by 1992 amounted to nearly two-thirds of all bicycle sales. Schwinn was left in the dust and lost $25 million in 1992. The company's market share plummeted, and Schwinn was more than $80 million in debt when it finally limped into bankruptcy court in October 1992. The Schwinn brand, once a revered American icon, teetered on the edge of extinction.

Scott Sports Group purchased Schwinn in early 1993 and implemented some major changes, including moving Chicago-based Schwinn to Boulder, Colorado, the mecca of outdoor enthusiasts. Scott cut the headquarters' workforce by more than half, hired new management familiar with the cycling industry, infused money into the company, and introduced new and redesigned models of bicycles. Also on the priority list was the task of pumping new life into the brand image. The Schwinn brand had become passé and to zealous mountain bikers was considered sedate and ''uncool.'' A marketing executive with mountain bike manufacturer Cannondale told USA Today in 1995: ''When I was a kid, if you had a Schwinn you were the luckiest kid in the world. . . . Ask a college kid now and they'll say, 'Oh, Schwinn? They're toast.' ''

To remedy the image problem, Schwinn engaged the help of Minneapolis-based advertising agency Carmichael Lynch. Early advertising campaigns were aimed at the high-end mountain biking crowd, including biking fanatics and bike shop employees who influenced many customer purchases. Schwinn hoped for a trickle-down effect; but the trickle was slow, so Schwinn kicked off the ''What a Ride'' campaign to chase down the masses, namely midrange consumers. Eye-catching color print ads relating the postride musings of mountain bikers appeared in national magazines. Careful not to neglect the high-end riders, ''What a Ride'' also included a black-and-white print effort geared toward specialized cycling magazines. All the ads boasted a hip, slightly irreverent attitude and spoke specifically to mountain bike enthusiasts. As Gregg Bagni, Schwinn's vice president of marketing, told Advertising Age, "We're trying to stop readers dead in their tracks."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Before its downfall, family-owned Schwinn ruled the bicycle realm, commanding as much as 25 percent of the U.S. market. By 1995, the year Schwinn celebrated its 100th anniversary, Schwinn's market share had dropped to 5 percent of the $2.5 billion annual market, according to USA Today. Despite the company's struggles, however, its sales, attitude, and brand image were much improved since the Scott buyout, and by 1996 Schwinn was back near the top: in terms of units sold, Schwinn ranked second in U.S. bicycles sold through the independent-dealer marketplace.

Advertising forays following the company's resurrection sought to change Schwinn's tarnished image. Carmichael Lynch, which had a good track record of working with companies returning from the brink of death, suggested a campaign showing a new side of Schwinn, one with an attitude and an edge that would appeal to biking zealots. Most considered Schwinn products archaic and associated them with an older generation, and thus Schwinn desperately needed to convince consumers that the company knew and understood the customer and the product, that it was "cool," and that it was capable of manufacturing technologically progressive bicycles. To accomplish these goals, Schwinn targeted the crowd that lived to ride—bicycle shop employees, professional racers, and fanatics obsessed with mountain biking. Schwinn found that this group influenced more than 60 percent of all mountain bike purchases and thus hoped to win their approval.

The first campaign included a print ad of a bicycle messenger riding down a busy urban street. The copy stated, "Read Poetry. Make Peace with All but the Motor Car," and continued, "Schwinn is red, Schwinn is blue, Schwinn is light and agile too. Cars suck." The ad was a far cry from the polite, traditional Schwinn of old, and Bagni met with resistance when he sought the go-ahead from management left over from the prebankruptcy Schwinn days, specifically the former chief operating officer Ralph Murray. Murray found the ad offensive and nixed the campaign, but Bagni ignored Murray's complaints and ran the ad. Bagni explained his tactics to Reputation Management, saying that "once you're in this business you have to get to know the customer, you have to understand the culture. This was a guy who'd never been on a bike in his life." Bagni also asserted that the old Schwinn "was a marketing-driven company, not a market-driven company. A marketing-driven company will try to sell a warehouse full of yellow bikes. A market-driven company will determine what the customer wants first." Schwinn's plans paid off—the company's high-end bicycle sales per units sold increased 10.4 percent since the campaign began.

TARGET MARKET

Schwinn critically needed to win over the high-end mountain biking crowd to begin rebuilding its image, and the company was not shy about its intent. Tom Stendahl, Scott and Schwinn's CEO following the buy-out, told Industry Week: "Our objective was to go after the top notch and make sure that the high-end consumer of mountain bikes would realize that we made a damn good product and could be proud to own a Schwinn again. Our second stage was to go after the whole middle market." The "What a Ride" campaign represented this second stage.

To become relevant to the high-end group, Schwinn produced cutting-edge bicycles in the $1,500 to $5,000 range. As a result, Schwinn exceeded its high-end bicycle sales goals in the mid-1990s. Low-end products that sold for less than $500 also fared well, but buyers who sought bicycles in the $500 to $1,500 range, who constituted a large percentage of the market, felt Schwinn did not offer products appropriate for their lifestyles or budgets. Schwinn's hope was to dispel these opinions and increase sales among midpriced mountain bikes with the "What a Ride" campaign. Specifically, Schwinn's target group consisted of affluent male bicyclists ranging in age from 28 to 42 who rode habitually but were not obsessed with bicycling. These active males desired reliable, technologically sound products and enjoyed the challenges of mountain biking. These consumers had seen Schwinn jump from manufacturing no mountain bikes to producing top-of-the-line bikes and were unconvinced that Schwinn could cater to, or even understand, their needs.

While Schwinn hoped to sway the masses buying in the midpriced bicycle range with "What a Ride," the company did not abandon its preliminary target—serious bicyclists. These high-end riders continued to have an impact on purchase decisions, and Schwinn felt it was important to maintain a strong brand identity among this group to help increase awareness and sales in the midrange market.

COMPETITION

When Schwinn entered the mountain bike market, the company faced an uphill struggle. Companies including Trek Bicycle, Specialized Bicycle Components, Cannondale, and Giant had established themselves as mountain biking leaders, enjoying tremendous growth through the 1980s and early 1990s as mountain biking surged in popularity. Trek, the market leader, sold 950,000 units in 1995 to earn approximately $300 million in revenue, according to USA Today. Schwinn, in contrast, reportedly sold about 480,000 units in 1995, up from U.S. annual sales of around 300,000 during the time of Scott's takeover, as noted in Industry Week. Schwinn's market share sagged under the 5 percent mark in 1995, but by 1996 the company had worked its way into the number-two position in terms of units sold and was striving to improve. Bagni summed up Schwinn's turnaround in Rocky Mountain News: "Considering that the patient was bleeding to death and having a heart attack simultaneously when we [new management] came on board, we've come a long way, and now we want to go to the next level.... We're not comfortable with No. 2."

Schwinn may have chosen a challenging time to launch its growth campaign, since the bicycle market

SCHWINN DEALERSHIPS

In Schwinn's heyday independent dealers across the country sold Schwinn bicycles exclusively. This lock on the market began to crumble in the late 1980s as dealers began to stock several brands. Suddenly customers faced choices, and Schwinn products did not always win the sale. When bankruptcy hit, many dealers were stuck with unwanted inventories of Schwinn products, and thus they were reluctant to reestablish relationships with Schwinn after the Scott takeover. Schwinn found itself convincing dealers, as well as consumers, of how much the company had changed.

had begun to shrink, dropping 5 percent in 1996. Mountain bikes continued to dominate the market, selling 68 percent of the total units sold through the independent dealer network, but sales fell 9 percent from 1995 and had been declining since mountain bike sales peaked in 1993.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Considering that the bicycle market was in decline and Schwinn's image among the target group was shaky, Schwinn's goals for the "What a Ride" campaign were high. Schwinn chose to produce ads that spoke directly to mountain biking enthusiasts, using appropriate terminology and focusing on specific product features and components to prove Schwinn's understanding of mountain biking. The campaign consisted of two print efforts—one geared toward the mass audience and one targeted toward the high-end crowd. The first included several color ads and appeared in mainstream publications such as Outside, Rolling Stone, and Men's Health for maximum exposure. Black-and-white ads aimed for the serious cyclists were published in specialty magazines, including Velo News, Bike, and Mountain Bike. Mountain biking conveyed an image of adventure and individuality, and the ads incorporated these traits to spark the attention of readers.

Schwinn's provocative color ads included "Nose," "Sock," and "Shower," and each features a close-up view of the subject of its title, accompanied by comments regarding various parts of the close-up. For instance, "Shower" provides a shot of a shower drain. Various objects—remnants of a postride shower—lay scattered by the drain, each coupled with commentary. Human hair, a bloated tick, a leaf, toxic sewage, and candy corn are among the objects. The text for the toxic sewage reads: "Toxic sewage. Thanks to your lightweight butted Cro-Moly frame, you hydroplaned through this glowing, putrid cesspool before your legs were melted to stumps." The text is humorous yet demonstrates Schwinn's knowledge of technology and components specifically of interest to the target group.

"Sock" displays a dirty sock that has just been worn on a ride. A fly, lizard tail, corn kernel, and some athlete's foot fungus are among the debris stuck to it. The text for the fly reads: "Fly. Rock Shox (front and rear) let you fly down jawbreaking bluffs while other riders barbecued brake pads. Dreaming of rodeo stardom, this tiny bronco-buster held on for the ride of his life." Again, the elements of humor, irreverence, and technological insight sought to convince consumers of Schwinn's shared passion for riding. "Nose" shows a close-up shot straight up a pair of nostrils. The ad points out a missing nose hair, a ruptured capillary, a hummingbird feather, swamp bacteria, and more. The caption for the missing nose hair states: "Your Epicenter seat stays gave you such braking power, you stopped dead. This inertia-driven follicle uprooted from nasal membrane and drove like a nail into a sapling. Ouch!" A shot of a Schwinn mountain bike along with the tag line, "What a ride," appears in the lower right-hand corner of each ad.

The black-and-white ads are simpler and subtler than the color ads, but the messages are just as strong. The minimalist design of the ads and their antimainstream attitude conveys the target group's single focus on mountain biking as a way of life. "Veal Stall" shows two identical diagrams of a stall-like room. The first diagram is labeled, "Veal Stall," and the second, "Office Cubicle." The message to biking enthusiasts is clear—having an office job provides as much freedom as being a calf confined to a veal stall. Another ad displays a peace sign labeled "Peace" and underneath a diagram of a bicycle wheel with spokes labeled "Love." A third ad shows two triangles. One states, "Hierarchy of Needs," and within the triangle "Food," "Clothing," and "Shelter" are listed. The second triangle depicts a snow-capped mountain. The label reads "Hierarchy Revised." This ad cleverly illustrate the priorities of mountain bike zealots who live not for the basic necessities but for riding.

OUTCOME

Schwinn exceeded its goals for the "What a Ride" campaign and continued to produce ads with the "What a ride" tag line through 1998 based on the success of the campaign. The company's market share, according to Rocky Mountain News, increased to 14 percent in 1997, while competitor Trek's share dropped to 19 percent. Schwinn continued to fare well with the high-end group, selling out of all high-end mountain bike models and increasing sales by 25 percent. Schwinn also sold out of all models of Moab mountain bikes, Schwinn's mid-priced line, and sales jumped 50 percent over 1996. Overall, Schwinn's unit sales increased 16 percent in 1997 from 1996, successfully tripling Schwinn's original sales goal of 5 percent, an impressive feat considering the mountain bike market declined 9 percent during the same period. Charles Carlson, general manager of Boulder's University Bicycles, explained to Rocky Mountain News: "Schwinn is kicking butt right now. They have an awesome bike. Two years ago we said 'There is no way we would ever sell a Schwinn mountain bike.' Now they're responsible for about one-third of our annual sales." Schwinn hoped to continue gaining momentum in the mountain bike industry to once again become the brand coveted by everyone.

GOIN' TO WORK. EVERY NIGHT. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After their run of two consecutive championships in 1989 and 1990, the Detroit Pistons of the National Basketball Association began a decline that lasted into the early years of the twenty-first century. The team suffered through numerous losing seasons, and attendance fell drastically. To reverse at least the latter trend, Palace Sports & Entertainment, the parent company of the Pistons, enlisted Minneapolis-based agency Olson & Company to create an advertising campaign that would stir up fan interest throughout the region. The campaign, titled "Goin' to Work. Every Night," began with the 2001–02 season and was designed to identify the team with the hard-working culture of Detroit.

The campaign sprang from an earlier one titled "Every Night," which emphasized the team's commitment to playing hard. But "Goin' to Work. Every Night" broadened the focus to include the fans. It consisted of television, radio, direct mail, print, outdoor signage, and an online interactive component. This was accomplished on an initial budget of less than $500,000. The players themselves and even workers at the Palace of Auburn Hills (where the Pistons played their home games) reinforced the ad campaign. In its early stages two local entertainers were hired to appear in humorous television spots that emphasized the role of the fan in helping the Pistons turn things around. The spots were popular enough that the entertainers themselves gained minor celebrity status in the Pistons' television-viewing area as the "Pistons Lady" and the "O Guy." As the campaign progressed through the years, the fans' involvement continued to be reinforced.

Because of the effectiveness of the "Goin' to Work. Every Night" campaign in surpassing its three major goals for the 2001–02 basketball season—increase the rate of season ticket renewals, increase attendance, and double the number of sellouts—it was recognized with a 2003 Gold EFFIE Award. The campaign became the pivotal theme of all Pistons activities. Indeed, after Detroit captured its third NBA championship by defeating the Los Angeles Lakers in the 2004 NBA Finals, one of the team's stars, Richard Hamilton, proclaimed to the fans, "We've been goin' to work. Every night." This certainly resonated with the local audience.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Detroit Pistons joined the National Basketball Association (NBA) during the 1957–58 season and after years of struggle became the league's premier team, winning consecutive championships in 1989 and 1990. Those championship teams were branded the "Bad Boys" because of the no-nonsense, hardscrabble style of play that contrasted with the rival Los Angeles Lakers'

"showtime" style. In the years following the championships, however, the Pistons fell in the standings, which accelerated the erosion of its fan base. The faltering economy of the early years of the twenty-first century also affected season-ticket sales. Because of corporate cutbacks, season-ticket sales for the 2000–01 season fell to about 7,000. These figures were poor enough to rank Detroit 22nd in attendance in the NBA.

Two other problems that team officials faced were the lack of team identity and the fact that team outreach to the community had declined. The Pistons no longer projected the gritty image that had defined them in their championship years and that the city of Detroit had taken to heart. Nor were players as accessible in promoting the team or community affairs. Both of these factors had an impact on the decline in fan support and the apathy of many of those who did show up.

The Pistons made the first step in correcting the situation in 2000, when the team named Joe Dumars as director of player personnel (later promoted to team president). Dumars had been a star of Detroit's 1989 and 1990 championship teams and had been known for bringing a solid work ethic to the game. In his administrative capacity he began drafting and trading for players who shared his work philosophy. Dumars was also astute in choosing coaches for the Pistons. The next step was to get the word out to the community that the Detroit Pistons were serious about turning the team around and reconnecting with their fans.

TARGET MARKET

The target market for the "Goin' to Work. Every Night" campaign was divided into two segments. The primary segment consisted of the season-ticket holders. During the 2000–01 season the number of season tickets sold was approximately one-third of the capacity of the Palace of Auburn Hills. The second segment consisted of those fans who attended games on a more casual basis. In the "Brief of Effectiveness" it submitted for the 2003 EFFIE Awards, Olson & Company stated that the focus within these two groups was males aged 18 to 54 but that "we were still cognizant of others and avoided alienating other groups."

COMPETITION

Over the years the competition for sports dollars had gotten stiff, especially in a working-class city like Detroit. The economic downturn of the early years of the twenty-first century exacerbated the problem, and, of course, the team's poor on-court performance also placed the Pistons at a disadvantage. The Pistons' main competition came from the Detroit Red Wings of the National Hockey League—the professional basketball and hockey seasons were practically concurrent. The Red Wings were riding a wave of success in which they had won the Stanley Cup (awarded to the league champion) in 1997, 1998, and 2002, and they had been highly competitive during the years between championships. The basketball season also overlapped with the baseball and football seasons, so the Pistons also competed for viewers with the baseball team the Detroit Tigers and football team the Detroit Lions. Further competition for fans came from the University of Michigan and Michigan State University. With myriad nonsports entertainment choices—ranging from hundreds of television channels to movies, theater, concerts, and clubs—the Pistons and Olson & Company clearly had a tough job ahead.

TWO CHAMPIONS

The Pistons' 2004 NBA championship marked the second championship in two years for Detroit and Michigan basketball fans. The Pistons brought the Larry O'Brien Trophy—emblematic of the NBA championship—to the Palace of Auburn Hills, and in 2003 their counterparts in the Women's National Basketball Association (WNBA), the Detroit Shock, were the WNBA champions. The Shock's motto was "Bring It." To show the teams' appreciation of their fans throughout the state, both trophies were on display at various locations in Michigan from early July to mid-September 2004. While the 2003–04 Pistons were coached by the legendarily peripatetic Larry Brown, the Shock's championship team was coached by local favorite and former Pistons "Bad Boy" Bill Laimbeer.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Despite a small budget, Olson & Company devised an inventive campaign. In the "Brief of Effectiveness" it submitted for the EFFIE Awards the agency stated, "We couldn't promise what we couldn't deliver, wins or All-Stars, so we established an idea that made fans a part of the NBA grind." The brief also described the "social contract with the players and fans. The players promised to go to work if the fans went to work [going to the games and cheering]." This last sentence echoed the sentiments of Joe Dumars, who had major input into the campaign's message. It also showed that the hard-work philosophy went beyond the players on the court to encompass the entire organization, right down to the arena staff—ushers even wore work shirts.

In a 2004 Brandweek article by Hilary Cassidy, Pistons CEO Tom Wilson pointed out, "In Detroit, we're so blue-collar, even white-collar people from here think they're blue-collar." Cassidy quoted John Olson, CEO of Olson & Company, as explaining, "No matter where you are on the [income] spectrum, you consider yourself a member of this hardworking, gritty town . . . We can take that idea and leverage it for the team." Part of that leverage, Cassidy noted, was that "the team stepped up promotions with more than 30 gift nights . . . Previous high-tech laser shows were scrapped for player intros in the form of low-key video showing the guys at home leaving for the Palace."

Both traditional and new advertising media were employed to get the word out. In the campaign's first season, which won an EFFIE Award, two new television stars were born: local blues singer Thornetta Davis as the grouchy "Pistons Lady" who would not stand for any slacking off, and actor and college instructor Greg Trzaskoma as a zealous fan dubbed the "O Man" because of the o in the word "Pistons" painted on his stomach. One of the signs of the success of the spots was that it was viewers who gave these characters their names. Julie Hinds of the Detroit Free Press wrote, "Although their combined point average for the season is zero, Davis and Trzaskoma scored big in other ways. Their efforts have spread the word on the team's new work ethic. Fans love them."

Because of budgetary constraints Olson & Company had to be innovative when it came to promoting the campaign. In addition to using conventional advertising, the agency reinforced the hard-working approach and fan involvement in four unique ways. The first involved the actual season tickets, which were designed to look like time cards. Ticket holders punched in, so to speak, every time they attended a game. The second tactic involved the season-ticket renewal program, one of the ad campaign's key goals. The renewal brochure itself was in the form of a Detroit Department of Labor annual report that, according to the agency's EFFIE "Brief of Effectiveness," "reviewed fans' 'work statistics' in a solemn yet humorous manner." The other two tactics involved six metal "help wanted" signs positioned in the arena and a dedicated website for an online contest in which fans voted for Detroit's hardest-working fan.

In her article Hinds also quoted Craig Turnbull, vice president for brand management for Palace Sports & Entertainment, who pointed out that the campaign was not designed to be quickly replaced by another. "This isn't a one-hit, one-year campaign," he said. "It's our promise as an organization.'' The Pistons carried through on that promise. They not only rolled the campaign over each year but also found new ways to include the fans. In August 2003 the team announced a casting call to hire 75 fans to serve as extras for television spots for the 2003–04 version of the campaign.

OUTCOME

The ''Goin' to Work. Every Night'' campaign was a success by any measure. It reinforced throughout the entire Pistons organization the hard-work ethic that culminated in another championship in 2004. Also, from the very beginning it connected on a deep level with the fans. The 2003 EFFIE Award was recognition for the campaign's success, but statistics revealed the full story; the team exceeded all three of the goals set for the ad campaign during the 2001–02 season. One of the goals was to increase attendance by 15 percent to an average of approximately 16,000 per game. The actual average Pistons attendance for the 2001–02 season was 18,556; this amounted to a 32 percent increase over the previous season, when attendance was 14,070 per game. Another challenge was to increase the renewal rate for season-ticket holders; it had been 60 percent during the 2000–01 season, and the objective was to reach 80 percent for 2001–02. That season the renewal rate for season-ticket holders exceeded expectations by jumping to 90 percent. The final goal was to double the number of sellouts from the 2000–01 season, going from three to six. Instead the Pistons recorded 15 sellouts for the 2001–02 season. Building on the 2004 championship and 2005 NBA Eastern Conference Championship, by January 2006 the Pistons had recorded more than 100 consecutive sellouts.

The success of the Pistons on the court attracted sponsors and increased attendance and merchandise sales, but Pistons CEO Tom Wilson emphasized the value of marketing. In the Brandweek article Hilary Cassidy quoted Wilson's summation of the campaign: ''We systematically created a belief in our fans in our approach to the game and they got caught up in it. . . . They became the hardest-working fans in sports, showing up in hard hats, carrying signs. It all went together. You can win more games when you have 20,000 people going crazy than when you have 14,000 people sitting there staring.''

LIFE IS CALLING. HOW FAR WILL YOU GO? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Peace Corps was signed into existence by President John F. Kennedy in 1961 as a federal organization designed to improve education, community development, health care, and environmental services in undeveloped countries. The organization received a steady flow of recruits throughout the 1960s and '70s, but by 2002 the number of new Peace Corps volunteers was dwindling. According to the ad agency BBDO Atlanta, the Peace Corps' image had grown outdated. Also, it had become increasingly difficult to convince recent college graduates, who were eager to begin their careers, to volunteer for a 27-month, low-paid Peace Corps commitment. To increase by 20 percent the number of applications it received over a one-year period, the Peace Corps released its "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign.

The campaign began on September 25, 2003, after the business-development firm Threespot Media released a new Peace Corps website that included online applications and a plethora of information about the Peace Corps. Soon afterward BBDO released television spots with the tagline "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" Some commercials featured an English voice-over from the American actor Matthew McConaughey; others used a Spanish voice-over by the Latino actor Eduardo Verástegui. Print, billboard, and radio advertising ensued. Before the campaign's release, BBDO updated the Peace Corps' target demographic, which had previously consisted of recent college graduates. The new campaign targeted personality types that BBDO dubbed "Unfulfilled Idealists," abstract-thinking optimists who believed life was to be lived as a constant search for fulfillment.

In 2005 the campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award in the Recruitment Advertising category. It also helped catapult the rate of submitted Peace Corps applications by 20 percent in just nine months. The Peace Corps' website traffic increased by 73 percent over the previous year, and total website, E-mail, phone, and mail inquiries increased 47 percent. By 2004 the total number of Peace Corps volunteers had reached 7,733, more than the agency had reported in 29 years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1960, while John F. Kennedy was still a U.S. senator, he spoke to students at the University of Michigan who would eventually become the first Peace Corps advocates. Kennedy suggested that if Americans volunteered in underdeveloped countries, they might encourage international peacekeeping in conjunction with enhancing America's image. After Kennedy was elected president of the United States, he created the Peace Corps on March 1, 1961. The new agency required volunteers to submit to an intense three-month training period that was followed by two years of service in an underdeveloped country. Six months after the Peace Corps was created, the first group of its volunteers arrived in Ghana, West Africa, to start their mission.

Before the "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, much of the Peace Corps' advertising used facts to attract volunteers. In 2000 the Peace Corps released advertising under the tagline "How far are you willing to go to make a difference?'' Copy from a print ad stated, ''No 401k, no profit sharing, no stock options, yet you won't find a better place—better benefits anywhere: the Peace Corps.'' The ads targeted all college-educated adults.

Despite the Peace Corps' attempts to empower college-educated Americans to volunteer for the 27-month commitment, Peace Corps application submissions were in decline. Peace Corps director Gaddi Vasquez explained his organization's antiquated image to the Orange County Register. ''We have found anecdotally and through our research that people have high regard for the Peace Corps,'' Vasquez said, ''but in many instances they talk about it in the past tense. A lot of people think it ceased to exist some years ago because it's kept such a low profile.'' In 2003 the Peace Corps hoped to rebrand itself as a viable organization and to increase its application submissions by 20 percent. President George W. Bush had also encouraged the Peace Corps to double its volunteers between 2004 and 2008.

DANGER OF PEACE

Serving the Peace Corps, a government organization that sent volunteering Americans to underdeveloped countries for humanitarian assistance, was considered dangerous business. During the Peace Corps's first 43 years, an average of one Peace Corps volunteer was killed every two months. Out of the total killed, 20 were murdered. Seventy percent of all Peace Corps assault victims were women.

TARGET MARKET

Instead of targeting a demographic of college-educated young adults, as the Peace Corps had been doing for more than 40 years, ''Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?'' targeted a personality type. It consisted of what ad agency BBDO referred to as ''Unfulfilled Idealists,'' or optimists with an expansive worldview and a belief that life was a constant search for fulfillment. BBDO redefined the Peace Corps' target audience after the agency's own research revealed that ''Unfulfilled Idealists'' composed more than 80 percent of Peace Corps volunteers. By targeting a personality type, the campaign's scope could expand past the education limitations placed on the previous target.

In 2003 Vasquez also pledged to diversify the Peace Corps by targeting older Americans, couples, community-college students, and more ethnic minorities than the agency had reached in the past. ''We are definitely emphasizing greater diversity from retirees to ethnic [groups],'' Vasquez told the Washington Times. ''We want the volunteers to represent a cross section of America.'' Later in the article Vasquez stated, ''We want to break the stereotype that [the] only people who serve in the Peace Corps are younger.'' The campaign also fostered partnerships with Historically Black Colleges and Universities (HBCU) and Hispanic Serving Institutions (an association of American colleges and universities committed to Hispanic higher education). Spanish voice-overs for some television spots were provided by the Latino actor Eduardo Verástegui. To reach older ''Unfulfilled Idealists,'' the Peace Corps also partnered with the Retired Teachers Association and the American Association of Retired Persons. Although a minimum age of 18 was required to join the Peace Corps, the organization did not post an age maximum. The Peace Corps had historically recruited individuals as old as 85 years of age.

COMPETITION

After the invasion of Iraq began on March 19, 2003, the United States Army spent the majority of its $200 million advertising budget on its ''Army of One'' campaign, developed by the ad agency Leo Burnett. In order to attract new enlistees the campaign touted the Army's range of combat technology. Television spots resembled video-game advertisements and attempted to lure new recruits by showing off the Army's war gadgetry. When the campaign yielded few results and the Army needed to quickly increase its active duty population from 482,400 to 512,400, a series of reality-based television spots were released under the new tagline ''2400/7.'' The updated commercials featured the real-life situations of new recruits and the Army infantry. ''All of our advertising is based on real-life stories,'' explained Colonel Thomas Nickerson, director of strategic outreach for the U.S. Army, to Advertising Age. ''If you look at our '2400/7' series, it demonstrates what soldiers are doing in their jobs. It's reality TV. We don't use actors. Our research tells us that these kids want to know what the deal is. They want to know what the experience is before they purchase it.''

In 2004 the U.S. Marine Corps, notorious for attracting thrill seekers, continued its longtime advertising message about the Marines' commitment to courage, honor, and pride. The WPP Group's ad agency J. Walter Thompson, Atlanta, had created advertising for the Marine Corps since World War II. ''The Marines have always been the warrior class of all the services,'' Jay Cronin, managing director of J. Walter Thompson, explained to Advertising Age. ''All its advertising has always been true to that message. We have tweaked it, but we have not altered it.'' In 2004 the Marines Corps aired television spots with the tagline ''The Few. The Proud. The Marines.''

PEACE WAGES

The Peace Corps, a U.S. government agency dedicated to assisting underdeveloped countries, paid its American volunteers the wages earned by a native working in the same profession. The volunteers' vaccinations, immunizations, and travel tickets were paid for. During his or her 27 months of service, each American volunteer in 2004 also received a stipend of $225 per month.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?'' campaign began with the release of a new Peace Corps website on September 25, 2003. Designed by communications firm Threespot Media, the new site not only allowed the Peace Corps to measure increased Web traffic during the campaign, but it also added a plethora of new features, including an online application form. According to PR Newswire, David Belman, one of Threespot Media's founders, explained, ''With the new site, prospective applicants, current applicants, former Peace Corps volunteers, educators, students, donors, and members of the media, among other groups, can all find precisely what they're looking for quickly and easily.''

BBDO tailored the campaign's television, print, radio, and billboard advertisements to target ''Unfulfilled Idealists.'' Prior to launching the campaign in September, the ad agency analyzed the communication styles and decision-making processes of ''Unfulfilled Idealists.'' Then, hoping to package the 27-month-long commitment with the Peace Corps as an opportunity for personal growth, BBDO released advertising that mimicked the target audience's communication style. The actor Matthew McConaughey provided the voice-over for a television spot titled ''Life Is Calling,'' which first showed images specific to a prospering society, such as freeways and commercial jets in flight. The spot ended with images such as people pulling fishing nets onto a beach and other scenes from underdeveloped countries. During the 60-second commercial McConaughey asked, ''How far would you go to help someone? Would you go to the end of your driveway? Would you cross a street? Would you cross an ocean? To a place 6,000 miles from home? And how long would you go... Would you go for a week? A month? A year? Would you go for two years? Would you go if you could use your knowledge to teach someone and, in the process, maybe learn something yourself? Life is calling. How far will you go? Peace Corps.''

The campaign tried to deliver its message as if from a kindred spirit of the ''Unfulfilled Idealist.'' Commercial dialogue and ad copy mimicked the metaphoric language that BBDO had observed among ''Unfulfilled Idealists.'' Print ads featured the Peace Corps logo above the image of a sunrise and the copy ''Never have to start sentences with 'I should've...'' Print ads targeting an older audience included the copy, ''Do people tell you you're over the hill? What if you were? Over the hill, over a stream, and over an ocean. To another continent.'' The Emmy-winning actor Forest Whitaker was featured in a radio advertisement titled ''Paths,'' during which Whitaker suggested that listeners should take the path less traveled by joining the Peace Corps. ''Could you explain that helping the people of Peru improve their community would also have an effect on your own?'' he asked. ''Or assisting an entrepreneur in Ukraine to launch her small business? Or creating a support group in Malawi for children orphaned by AIDS?''

The campaign appeared in 27 American advertising markets, including Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, San Francisco, Detroit, and Atlanta. The campaign's TV spots aired across cable networks on donated media. Outdoor posters also appeared on Metrorail and Metrobus signs in the Washington, D.C., area.

OUTCOME

Not only did ''Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?'' earn a Gold EFFIE Award in the Recruitment Advertising category in 2005, but the campaign also helped increase the number of submitted Peace Corps applications by 20 percent in nine months. The Peace Corps' retrofitted website, which started accepting online applications at the beginning of the campaign, saw a 73 percent surge in activity over the previous year.

Even though the campaign's application submissions increased 20 percent, the number of volunteers accepted into the Peace Corps increased very little. As a result of limited funding, the organization only expanded by 277 volunteers between 2003 and 2005. When the Peace Corps requested an annual budget of $359 million from Congress at the start of the campaign, the organization was only granted a little over $300 million. The U-Wire quoted Anne-Michelle Reilly, an advocacy intern for the Peace Corps, as explaining, ''the Peace Corps is a great organization that is grossly under-funded. They are one of the few U.S. Government organizations that is respected worldwide, mostly because the goal of the program is to present to the world a positive view of America.'' Reilly continued, ''[President George W.] Bush promised to double the number of volunteers to 14,000 and he proposed a budget increase of 20 percent last year, but Congress reduced that significantly.''

CODE RED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 PepsiCo's Mountain Dew was the fourth-best-selling soft drink on the U.S. market. Even so, since the 1990s soft-drink sales overall had been seriously declining. While Mountain Dew's sales growth had often been in the double digits since the 1970s, by the turn of the century, growth had trickled to around 2 percent. To revive sales Pepsi introduced a bright-red version of the original called Mountain Dew Code Red. The new cherry-flavored beverage was to be marketed in a different direction than the original Dew. While Mountain Dew's target market had long been young, white males interested in extreme sports, Code Red's market was to be ethnically diverse and urban.

Working with ad agency BBDO New York, Pepsi introduced Code Red slowly, beginning within the target market of the original Dew instead of the new target market. Prior to placing the product onto store shelves, PepsiCo offered samples to extreme-sports enthusiasts at the February 2001 X Games and established a Code Red game on the Mountain Dew website in April 2001. A month later Code Red was finally distributed to stores. A "teaser campaign" accompanying the launch consisted of print ads and radio spots with an urban, multicultural focus. Television commercials were added in October 2001. The initial spots featured NBA stars Tracy McGrady and Chris Webber as well as singer and actress Macy Gray. These spots ran through 2003, when two new television commercials, "Mascot" and "Football Court," were introduced.

By September 2001 Code Red had become the fifth-best-selling soft drink in convenience stores. PepsiCo's overall third-quarter 2001 net income jumped an astonishing 22 percent, largely because of Code Red. Advertising awards for the campaign included a Gold EFFIE Award, one of the most prestigious honors in the ad industry. But the success did not last. By 2002 Code Red sales numbers had begun to dwindle, and in 2003 its sales volume dropped 37 percent. The problem was that sales of soft drinks were declining as consumers chose healthier beverages such as bottled water and juice.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Tennessee's Tri-City Beverage became the first Mountain Dew franchise in 1954, and by 1958 it had adorned the bottle with Mountain Dew's first logo. The old red-and-white labels featured a hillbilly shooting at a government agent fleeing an outhouse. The agent represented a revenuer, one whose job was to stop bootlegging. Slang for moonshine, and invented in the Tennessee hills in the 1940s, Mountain Dew was originally used as a mixer with whiskey. The label, as well as the drink itself, embodied the moonshiner days of 1920 through 1933, when Prohibition made the use of alcohol illegal in the United States.

In 1964 PepsiCo bought the franchise, bringing Mountain Dew into the national marketplace. Two years later Pepsi introduced its first nationwide Mountain Dew advertising campaign, "Ya-Hoo, Mountain Dew!" The catchy phrase helped Pepsi establish recognition of its new soft drink. In 1973, when advertising agency BBDO took over the Mountain Dew account, advertising for the brand began to focus on a target market of young, active people who enjoyed the outdoors. It also emphasized Mountain Dew's high caffeine content. The 1973 and 1974 advertising campaigns, "Put a Little Ya-Hoo in Your Life" and "Hello, Sunshine, Hello, Mountain Dew," represented early shifts toward this focus. By the 1980s, although Mountain Dew sales were climbing, a trend toward healthier eating and drinking habits was emerging. In response PepsiCo introduced Diet Mountain Dew in 1986. By this time Mountain Dew had become the industry's sixth-biggest brand, and the growth continued. From 1984 through 1993 Mountain Dew's volume doubled, bringing in $2.2 billion in sales in 1993. But meanwhile the healthy-eating trend had spread. Mountain Dew's reaction was aggressive.

The 1993 "Do the Dew" campaign was enormous, accounting for a 44 percent increase in ad spending from 1992 to 1993. The "Do the Dew" debut included 28 TV spots, which appeared on nine television networks. During the campaign's launch the ad schedule involved an astonishing 14 minutes of advertising per night. With "Do the Dew" Mountain Dew's sales continued to grow, even when soft-drink sales were in serious decline. In 1999 Mountain Dew's sales, while not matching the double-digit growth of the past, grew by 7.1 percent. In an attempt to reclaim the huge sales growth of years prior, PepsiCo created a new product in 2001: Mountain Dew Code Red.

CAFFEINE JOLT

Pepsi and other soft-drink distributors long claimed that the caffeine added to soft drinks provided a bitter taste that was needed to balance the predominant sweetness. But in a study conducted by Johns Hopkins University in 2001, four out of five tasters could not tell the difference between a cola with an average amount of caffeine (35 mg) and one without any caffeine. When the researchers doubled the amount to 70 mg, however, more than half the tasters could detect it. A 20-ounce bottle of Mountain Dew (containing 55 mg of caffeine) contained about the same amount of caffeine as a strong cup of brewed coffee.

TARGET MARKET

When ad agency BBDO took over the Mountain Dew account in 1973, the brand's target market was defined as the young and active. Since then the focus had zeroed in on extreme sports. With the "Do the Dew" campaign that began in 1993, this focus was obvious. The commercials featured four adventurous young men performing such thrilling stunts as jumping from a cliff and boogie-board waterfall diving. As noted in a 1993 PR Newswire article, Mountain Dew's focus was on young, energetic males. In particular, Mountain Dew sought 20-somethings who represented a "vibrant, adventure-seeking group that is 40 million strong and spends $125 billion each year." Mountain Dew's well-known high caffeine content helped to retain these customers.

Code Red's target market differed in two ways from the original drink. The target age was younger, and the target socioeconomic group was more diverse. Code Red, with the same 55 mg of caffeine as its predecessor, targeted teens. Still, this teen was similar to the 20-something targeted by the original Mountain Dew. He was a male, thrill-seeking adrenaline addict. As Gary Rodkin, then PepsiCo CEO, told the New York Times, the target consumer was "a kid with his hair on end, his eyes bugging out. He's a little bit on edge." Next, while Mountain Dew appealed most directly to nonurban white males, Code Red was marketed to urban, minority populations. In its research Mountain Dew concluded that a large percentage of people from minority groups had historically chosen soft drinks with sweet, fruity flavors. Code Red, with its red color and cherry flavor, fit the bill.

COMPETITION

In response to Pepsi's success with Mountain Dew, top Pepsi competitor Coca-Cola introduced citrus-flavored Mello Yello in 1964. Like Mountain Dew, Mello Yello boasted higher than normal caffeine amounts, 53 mg per serving. In marketing the product Coke first connected the drink with urbane jazz, thus portraying its "mellowness." But once Mountain Dew became the drink for extreme-sports enthusiasts, Mello Yello followed suit, introducing the tagline "There is nothing mellow about it." To reinforce the point, Coke plastered Mello Yello packaging with images of people engaging in extreme sports. Nevertheless, by the 1990s Mello Yello was still far behind Mountain Dew in sales and popularity. While Mountain Dew had climbed to the number four spot in total U.S. soft-drink sales, Mello Yello, with only 0.5 percent of the market in 1996, was nowhere near the top-10 list. In 1997 Coke introduced Surge, which sold 69 million cases in the first year but flopped soon afterward. But Coke was far from quitting the game.

With a plan to phase out Surge, Coca-Cola returned its focus to Mello Yello, introducing a big-budget advertising campaign, ''Mello Yello: It's Smooth,'' in 1999. The campaign's target audience closely resembled that of Mountain Dew: boys in their late teens. With heavy advertising on TV stations Fox and WB as well as a saturation of the evening and late-night radio waves, the campaign was an enormous hit. ''Mello Yello: It's Smooth'' won a plethora of advertising awards, including an EFFIE, an award that was among the most prestigious in its category. Even more substantial were the financial results. For two years following the campaign's start, Mello Yello experienced double-digit growth in the United States. But the success did not last. Mountain Dew's introduction of Code Red helped to burst the Mello Yello bubble. In 2004 Mello Yello launched its own red version: Cherry Mello Yello. But the beverage flopped so badly, Coke began pulling it off shelves within a year.

Mello Yello never made it to the top-10 list, but another Coca-Cola product, Sprite, did. By 2003 Sprite sales, at $57 million, had surpassed Mountain Dew's $54 million. But this followed two consecutive years of losses for both soft drinks. The sales decrease may have been connected to Code Red sales, which reportedly stole market share from the others. As such, in 2003 Coke introduced Sprite Remix, which added tropical flavors to the original drink. The new Sprite, however, could not fully compete with Code Red for two reasons. With zero caffeine, Sprite Remix's market was different than Mountain Dew's. Further, Sprite, unlike Code Red, did not focus on the inner-city market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By 2000 Mountain Dew, one of the soda industry's fastest-growing brands ever, was slowing in sales. In 2001, in an attempt to revive sales, Pepsi released Mountain Dew Code Red, a wild-cherry version of Mountain Dew. Code Red, unlike regular Mountain Dew, was to be aimed at a minority, urban population. Hiring ad agency BBDO New York to handle the account, Pepsi was in no hurry to start a big television campaign for the new product. Instead, largely in response to the challenge of pursuing a new target market, Pepsi wanted to first spread word of the product slowly and steadily. It began marketing the new drink with subtlety and within the core Mountain Dew target market.

The unveiling of Code Red occurred in February 2001, at the X Games in Mount Snow, Vermont, an event focused on young extreme-sports enthusiasts. Next Pepsi sent Code Red bottles to approximately 3,000 core Mountain Dew users, including extreme-sports athletes, disc jockeys, and musicians. In April 2001 an online Code Red car-racing game was introduced on the Mountain Dew website; approximately 1,500 winners of the online game won samples of Code Red. At this time advertising of the product was made more evident, and posters with the headline ''Prepare to Get Your Swirl On'' were hung in urban centers. Mountain Dew Code Red entered the marketplace on May 2001, but only in single-serve 20-ounce and one-liter plastic bottles. A television campaign was still months off. Instead, a ''teaser campaign'' was launched, with print ads appearing in Vibe, Source, XXL, and Slam, magazines with large ethnic readerships. In addition, a billboard appeared in May 2001 in New York City's Times Square; it featured the headline ''Crack the Code.'' A radio spot, ''On the One Twos,'' in which rappers Busta Rhymes and Fatman Scoop offered a Code Red jingle, was also introduced at this time.

In October 2001 Code Red aired its first television spot, ''Hoops.'' The commercial, which portrayed an inner-city basketball game, was far from ordinary. For the spot BBDO sent NBA stars Tracy McGrady and Chris Webber to an outdoor court to initiate a pickup basketball game without revealing their identities. Within seconds a crowd gathered, oohing and aahing over the jumping, the swishing, the incredible ball-handling skills, a dunk. One spectator gave a play-by-play of the action over his cell phone. To create the commercial, 10 hidden cameras captured the action. With this spot BBDO seemed to accomplish Mountain Dew's goal perfectly. Or, as Advertising Age critic Bob Garfield put it, ''So comes now this brand extension of Mountain Dew, the caffeine-spiked Code Red, and—lo and behold—the scene is an inner city playground where large numbers of Target-Audience Americans are shooting hoops and spectating.'' Another television spot, ''Macy,'' starring female African-American singer/actor Macy Gray, also appeared in 2001. When Pepsi was trying to regain momentum for Code Red in 2003, it aired two new television spots, ''Mascot'' and ''Football Court,'' as well as a new radio spot, ''High Noon.'' Print advertising also expanded at this time. The 2003 advertising budget for Code Red was reportedly $6.3 million (in comparison, $18 million was allotted for advertising the core Mountain Dew brand). Between 2004 and 2005 no new TV commercials were introduced for Code Red, although one radio spot, ''Street Legends,'' as well as a print ad called ''Legends,'' appeared in 2004.

OUTCOME

While the marketing of Mountain Dew Code Red began slowly, momentum for the product was immediate and massive. Even before Code Red hit the shelves, the press wrote about it, and consumers could not wait to have a taste. Thus, Pepsi was optimistic about the product. As Dave Burwick, then Pepsi's vice president for marketing, told the New York Times, "Today's marketing environment is so hypersaturated it's hard to get noticed. But this one will float seamlessly above the noise." And from the start, Code Red did exactly that. Within five weeks of its May launch, Code Red reached its initial 34-week sales goal of 17 million cases. Further, within three months of entering the market, without even a television campaign, Code Red became the fifth-best-selling soft drink in convenience stores. These figures were good news for PepsiCo, which had been suffering from a lag in soft-drink sales for the past decade. In October 2001 PepsiCo's third-quarter net income jumped 22 percent; Pepsi granted Code Red half the credit for this feat (its Aquafina bottled water was credited for the other half). Advertising awards also followed. Most notably, in 2003 the Code Red campaign as a whole won a Gold EFFIE Award (Carbonated Soft Drink category) from the New York American Marketing Association. The EFFIEs were among the most prestigious in advertising awards.

Sales, meanwhile, began to drop. In 2003 Code Red's sales volume declined 37 percent. In response to slowing sales Mountain Dew introduced the orange-flavored Mountain Dew LiveWire around Memorial Day 2003. But within months it became clear that the new flavor was not going to repeat the instant success of Code Red. It also seemed that Code Red may have hit its performance peak in a market of consumers seeking beverages that were healthier than soft drinks. Further, Mountain Dew's high caffeine content was losing its edge in a market that was becoming saturated with relatively new energy drinks (which offered even more caffeine than Mountain Dew as well as other ingredients—such as B vitamins and ginkgo—that had energizing properties). In 2004 PepsiCo introduced the grape-flavored Mountain Dew Pitch Black. But this time Mountain Dew recognized trends from the past. Pitch Black was thus available only during a 10-week period surrounding Halloween. Meanwhile, although Pepsi continued to sell Code Red, it returned its focus to the original Dew. In 2004 it initiated a "Dew U" continuity program, a major push in the long-standing "Do the Dew" advertising campaign. "Dew U" included three television spots as well as radio and online advertisements; these were Mountain Dew's only major advertising focus that year.

DO THE DEW CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mountain Dew, a lemon-lime flavored, highly caffeinated soft drink, became a prominent national brand for PepsiCo, Inc., in the 1980s, posting double-digit annual sales increases. Many observers expected the brand's growth to level off in the next decade, but Mountain Dew continued to grow. Its annual volume increased at least 10 percent every year between 1993 and 1995, surpassing even Diet Pepsi as the parent company's second-highest seller. By 1996 the citrus drink had displaced Dr Pepper as the top-selling noncola product in the United States. In 1997 the brand released a campaign with the tagline "Do the Dew" to solidify the youth-focused marketing strategy that had so effectively driven sales since the early 1990s.

"Do the Dew," budgeted at $30–$40 million annually in the late 1990s and at $50–$70 million between 2000 and 2005, was able to establish and maintain a Mountain Dew brand identity while remaining on the cutting edge of an ever-changing youth culture. One of the hallmarks of the campaign was a close association of the brand with extreme sports. As exemplified by the X Games (the "X" stood for extreme)—an alternative Olympics consisting of daredevil events such as sky surfing and street luge—this trend appealed to young people's high energy and sense of adventure. Mountain Dew commercials featured "Dew Dudes" participating in extreme sports as well as celebrity endorsers who, either through tongue-in-cheek humor or athletic prowess, could be effectively associated with the "extreme" brand image that the drink was nurturing.

Mountain Dew sales outpaced those of all other full-calorie soft drinks during most of the time that "Do the Dew" ran. The brand did not grow at the double-digit rates that it had known in the 1980s and early 1990s, but the campaign firmly established the product as the number four soft drink in the United States, behind Coke, Pepsi, and Diet Coke, while managing to retain Mountain Dew's aura of daring, youthful edginess. Although its formula of appealing to young men through an association with extreme sports and similarly bold brand imagery was frequently imitated, few marketers in the United States were as effective in making their brands synonymous with youthful exuberance as Mountain Dew was between 1997 and 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Mountain Dew in its earliest incarnation was developed in the 1940s by A.A. "Ollie" Hartman, a Tennessee bar owner, to serve as a mixer with whiskey. The product was named after the illegal moonshine that was said to be as plentiful as early morning dew on the mountain. The original marketing of Mountain Dew failed, but the product stayed alive in one form or another until Bill Jones, a manager at the soft-drink company Tip Corporation developed the drink's now-famous high caffeine formula in order, he said, to help people combat the fatigue that generally occurred at around 2:30 in the afternoon. Jones began selling the product in 1961 using a simple marketing campaign that attempted to put the drink in as many hands as possible. Mountain Dew was a huge success (Tip Corporation was selling more than 10 million cases annually), and by March 1964 a number of national corporations, including PepsiCo, were contacting Jones asking to purchase the formula.

In August 1964 the board of directors of PepsiCo approved a plan negotiated with Jones to acquire the rights to Mountain Dew. The sale made news around the world. Mountain Dew swiftly became PepsiCo's second-best-selling drink, providing the soft-drink giant with a tool to compete successfully in the so-called flavor market. In 1965 PepsiCo launched its inaugural ad campaign for Mountain Dew with the tagline "Yahoo Mountain Dew... It'll Tickle Your Innards." That tagline was used for five years until it was replaced by "Get That Barefoot Feelin' Drinkin' Mountain Dew" in 1969.

PepsiCo stuck with a hillbilly theme for the product until 1972, when it shifted its advertising and graphics package toward action-oriented scenes. This switch was exemplified by the soft drink's new slogan for 1973, "Put a Little Yahoo in Your Life." Sales jumped appreciably. Two years later the "Hello Sunshine" campaign was launched. This campaign remained intact for almost six years, although the tagline was modified in 1979 to "Reach for the Sun, Reach for Mountain Dew." In 1981 it was succeeded by "Give Me a Dew," which gave way to "Dew It to It" in 1983.

The rustic theme that had marked the early years of the brand's marketing was reintroduced in 1986 with the slogan "Dew It Country Cool." This remained in place for almost a decade, at which point a move was made toward more youth-oriented marketing. In 1995 Mountain Dew sponsored the Grammy Awards and used the jaded tagline "Been There, Done That, Tried That." That same year tennis superstar Andre Agassi signed a deal to promote Mountain Dew in the United States.

Piggybacking on the cultural trend toward extreme sports and activities, the brand's innovative commercials featured an actor dressed as James Bond snowboarding, Agassi bungee jumping, and pop vocalist Mel Tormé (known as "The Velvet Fog") free-falling from the roof of a Las Vegas hotel. In 1996 Mountain Dew launched a massive beeper network called "The Mountain Dew Extreme Network." The "Do the Dew" tagline was unveiled the following year.

TARGET MARKET

With its youth-oriented campaign, the Mountain Dew brand was aimed at 13- to 29-year-old consumers and became the most popular soft drink among teenagers. More than any other Pepsi brand, Mountain Dew was directly targeted at young people, or what the company called "Generation Nexters with more edge." To nurture this relationship, the brand relied on focus groups of young consumers and conducted extensive sampling.

The youth market was targeted increasingly in the 1990s as youth spending skyrocketed. According to a study conducted by Texas A&M University, in 1997 consumers under the age of 18 spent $172 billion. In addition, young people were indirectly responsible for $300 billion in spending by their parents.

Research had shown that brand preferences were formed at an early age. With teenagers making up the largest segment of soft-drink consumers, appealing to this market became critical for brand success. Mountain Dew was one of the best-selling soft drinks at convenience stores, which, according to industry analysts, were the most popular point of sale for younger consumers.

COMPETITION

Mountain Dew's principal challenge in the carbonated-citrus-soft-drink sector came from industry giant Coca-Cola. But Coca-Cola had mixed results trying to

AN EXTREME SACRIFICE

Commercials that appealed to extreme-sports enthusiasts of necessity demanded extreme risks on the part of their participants. In 1996 one skydiver paid the ultimate price when he died filming a spot for Mountain Dew.

Rob Harris, a 28-year-old stunt diver and veteran of ESPN's X Games competition, plummeted to his death during the filming of a Mountain Dew commercial spoofing James Bond movies. The shoot called for Harris to dive from an exploding plane at 5,000 feet, the kind of daring stunt he had performed in a dozen TV spots since 1993. This time, however, his parachute lines got tangled, and his reserve chute failed to open in time.

PepsiCo officials considered scrapping the spot but ultimately decided to ask Harris's parents for permission to use footage of their son taken before the fatal jump. The grieving family reluctantly agreed, and Harris's friends and fellow skydivers were treated to the eerie spectacle of watching commercials featuring their late friend. In perhaps a more fitting tribute, one of Harris's best friends later released a sachet of his ashes into the sky during a sky-surfing competition.

overshadow the success of Mountain Dew. Coca-Cola's first foray into the so-called heavy citrus market was in 1979, when it introduced Mello Yello, a drink named after a song by the 1960s pop star Donovan. In 1994 the brand was marketed with a NASCAR racing tie-in and featured the slogan "Make Some Noise." But it failed to generate more than a whimper with consumers, and the product was retired in all but a few markets.

In 1996 Coca-Cola introduced a new citrus product, Surge, with a mandate to take a chunk out of Mountain Dew's market share. "The Coke system has been looking for a Dew killer for quite some time," Michael Bellas of Beverage Marketing Corp. told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. "This is the most direct attack against Dew, a head-on offensive with some massive advertising behind it." With the tagline "Feed the Rush," Surge spots debuted during the telecast of the Super Bowl on January 26, 1997. The company spent a total of $60 million on an advertising blitz to promote the product. By contrast, PepsiCo spent only $27.5 million to advertise Mountain Dew in the first nine months of 1996.

By the end of 1997 the new drink was available in 90 percent of the U.S. market and had achieved a loyal teen following. But the increased competition seemed to spur Mountain Dew on to more sales, as the market leader continued to enjoy vigorous growth of its own. "There have been a wide array of wannabes that have tried and failed to put a dent in Dew," commented PepsiCo spokesman Brad Shaw.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Mountain Dew's "Do the Dew" campaign was not a radical departure from what had gone before it. "It's always been an outdoor, active drink," Bill Bruce, a copywriter on the account, told Beverage World magazine. "We wanted to bring it up to date and try to do things people hadn't seen before."

One of the new elements the campaign introduced was the "Dew Dude" persona, a young person with a passion for extreme sports like street luge and in-line skating. Mountain Dew deemed these commercials "aspirational," meaning that even those who did not participate in these dangerous sports could relate to the spirit of adventure behind them. Expanded to encompass "Dewdettes" in 1997, the characters represented a natural evolution from previous campaigns that had featured young people engaged in outdoor activities. The consistency of its message helped Mountain Dew maintain a strong brand identity despite changes in youth culture. "When you have a basic consistent core selling proposition for a brand," remarked PepsiCo's vice president of flavors Dave Burwick to Beverage World, "no matter how you dress it up and how you communicate it and how you execute it to your consumer, it needs to vary over time, because your consumers change over time, particularly when you're talking about teens whose tastes change less than yearly."

As the campaign progressed, the "Dew Dude" persona remained consistent even as it evolved to refer more to a daring state of mind than to literal participation in extreme activities, and later "Do the Dew" commercials used comedy to convey the brand's essence. A 2000 Super Bowl spot, for instance, illustrated a young man's fearless athleticism as well as his attachment to the product by showing him chasing down a cheetah that had stolen his Mountain Dew. Similarly, a 2001 commercial featured the same young man engaging in a head-butting match with a ram in order to retrieve a Mountain Dew that the animal was guarding.

Another component of the "Do the Dew" campaign was the judicious use of celebrity endorsers. Humor was employed in some of these television spots, such as a commercial in which crooner Mel Tormé was shown falling from the top of a Las Vegas hotel. Another spot, produced by the agency BBDO, featured martial-arts superstar Jackie Chan performing a series of death-defying stunts. At the end of the spot Chan encountered the spirits of the "Dew Dudes," who encouraged him to "see the Dew, be the Dew, do the Dew." The ironic humor was part of a strategy to appeal to teens who might ordinarily be turned off by big-name spokespersons. "If you talk down to teens," observed senior brand manager Ron Coughlin to Beverage World, "they'll see it right away and they'll punish you." Not all of Mountain Dew's celebrity endorsers were subject to such tongue-in-cheek treatment, however. Star athletes such as the professional football quarterback Brett Favre and the Olympic runner Michael Johnson were used in spots that tied the bold nature of their athletic talent with the "extreme" brand image.

Among the most effective ongoing components of the "Do the Dew" campaign was Mountain Dew's sponsorship of the X Games, the annual extreme-sports competition telecast by the cable sports network ESPN. The sports featured in the games often figured prominently in Mountain Dew commercials. "There's no better stamp of authenticity for the X Games than Mountain Dew," ESPN's Judy Fearing told Beverage World.

Mountain Dew, like other soft-drink brands looking for renewed energy during what became a protracted industry downturn (a result of growing consumer preference for bottled water, teas, and other alternative beverages), pursued brand growth via new products beginning in 2001. That year's introduction of Code Red, a cherry-flavored version of Mountain Dew aimed chiefly at urban African-American and Hispanic youth, was the most successful of the new products. Advertisements in Code Red's first year included a teaser launch campaign tagged "Do the New Do," a rap jingle called "Crack the Code" (performed by Busta Rhymes and Fatman Scoop), and graffiti-cartoon print ads in hip-hop-influenced magazines such as Vibe and the Source.

In 2004, after four years of sliding sales, PepsiCo shifted most of its Mountain Dew marketing resources back to the core brand. In addition to the ongoing weakness of the soft-drink market as a whole, Mountain Dew also had to contend with the aging of its initial Generation X target. PepsiCo continued to emphasize a mix of extreme sports, celebrity endorsers, and humor in its Mountain Dew advertising, but the company was also aware of changing behaviors and tastes among the rising generation of prospective Dew Dudes. Among the new extensions of the highly durable "Do the Dew" positioning, therefore, was an effort to increase the brand's visibility among "gamers," or video-game players, who spent more time engaged in that activity than watching extreme sports on TV.

OUTCOME

Mountain Dew's consistently distinct brand identity, as communicated through "Do the Dew," was widely credited with sales growth that—though it slowed from the double-digit gains of the mid-1990s—outpaced virtually all other soft-drink products during the last several years of the twentieth century. In 1999 Beverage Digest publisher John Sicher told the Los Angeles Times that the drink was "one of the two or three strongest brands in the beverage industry today"—in sales volume it ranked fourth behind Coke, Pepsi, and Diet Coke—and that "Pepsi has done a masterful job of marketing Mountain Dew." Every year from 2000 to 2003 the core Mountain Dew brand posted modest sales declines of between 0.5 and 4 percent, but these were attributed primarily to the changing beverage marketplace, as bottled water, teas, and blended-juice beverages gained in popularity. The Mountain Dew spin-off brand Code Red performed well between 2001 and 2003, but its success was believed to have come at least partially at the expense of the core brand. In 2004 Mountain Dew returned to form, outpacing all other full-calorie soft drinks with sales volume growth of 1.5 percent.

"Do the Dew" remained vital and effective at maintaining Mountain Dew's brand image regardless of the vicissitudes of the beverage industry. In 2003 Adweek columnist Barbara Lippert reflected on the cultural significance of the preceding 10 years of Mountain Dew advertising, noting that the brand had debuted its "dude-centric" approach "before the Dumb and Dumber guys and a half-generation pre-Jackass . . . when Ashton Kutcher was learning cursive and the Dell dude was wearing a night brace . . . And the campaign has remained fresh and imaginative through all those wild, nature-defying executions." Although numerous marketers attempted to replicate the Mountain Dew formula for appealing to youth, none was able to make itself as synonymous with an enduring set of youth values as Mountain Dew did through its seemingly timeless "extreme" positioning.

DRINK MORE WATER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2004, when PepsiCo and advertising agency BBDO New York released the Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, Aquafina was the best-selling bottled water in the United States. With "Drink More Water," Aquafina highlighted the pure fun of water, straying slightly from its long-established focus on the young athlete. Still, the campaign embodied Aquafina's dismissal of the pretentious bottled-water image of the past. It was also intended as a means to maintain Aquafina's number-one position in the U.S. bottled-water market. Since its 1999 launch, Coca-Cola's Dasani water in particular had been infringing upon Aquafina's market.

The campaign debuted to 30 million viewers on July 13, 2004, during the broadcast of Major League Baseball's 75th All-Star Game. The initial spot, "Drink Up," helped to create a connection between water (in particular, Aquafina water) and happy fun. It depicted a barroom scene with an unusual twist: the happy, singing crowd, all gathered in a Bavarian-style beer garden, was not, in fact, guzzling beer. Instead, all were toasting with water. "Make your body happy," said a voice-over, "Drink more water!" BBDO released another television commercial, "I Feel Pretty," for the campaign in 2004 as well as two more in 2005. All the spots followed the happy and fun theme of "Drink Up." Print ads that ran in major magazines as well as on billboards also hyped up water's pure fun. PepsiCo did not disclose the campaign's budget.

The "Drink More Water" campaign found widespread success. A number of advertising awards and recognitions rolled in, including a WIN (Women's Image Network) Ad Award, a bronze New York Festivals Advertising Award, and a nomination for an Emmy Award for best commercial. There were also financial benefits. In 2004 Aquafina sales grew in the double digits. In the first quarter of 2005 the bottled water experienced a 25 percent growth in sales. For PepsiCo, whose cola sales had been dwindling for more than a decade, this was good news. In the summer of 2005, one year after the start of "Drink More Water," PepsiCo reported its biggest quarterly gain in sales in more than three years. Aquafina (along with Gatorade sports drinks and Lipton tea) were credited for this growth.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

By the 1990s consumers nationwide were increasingly purchasing healthier beverages, such as teas, fruit drinks, sports drinks, diet colas, and bottled waters. In response soda companies rushed to diversify their beverage varieties. Bottled water, for one, caught the attention of such companies. From 1976 to 1986 U.S. bottled-water consumption rose by more than one billion gallons (from 354 million gallons to 1.366 billion gallons) per year. Within the following decade the number increased dramatically, to nearly 3.5 billion gallons a year. In 1994 PepsiCo jumped on board, launching its first bottled-water brand, Aquafina.

The 1994 release of Aquafina was small and local, beginning in Wichita, Kansas. Though full national distribution of the product did not occur until 1997, larger marketing efforts soon evolved. In May 1995 Aquafina cosponsored the third All-Star Benefit Concert, a charity concert and auction to benefit the Pediatric AIDS Foundation. The event's auction took place online, becoming accessible to 30 million subscribers worldwide. This, plus the large celebrity presence at the event, generated the first widespread recognition of the Aquafina name. Further promotional efforts followed, and in July 1997 Aquafina began its first national print and radio ad campaign under the tagline "Take Me to the Water." The campaign, which cost Pepsi $8 to $10 million in the first year alone, was intended to change bottled water's image as stuffy and overpriced. It initiated Aquafina's long-term association of its water with healthy young adults, in particular athletes. As such, "Take Me to the Water" centered on a trio of sports sponsorships: the Association of Volleyball Professionals, U.S. Soccer, and the Professional Golfers' Association.

In 1999 Aquafina reaffirmed its connection with athletes when it became the lead sponsor of the All-American Soccer Stars Victory Tour. Aquafina's first national television campaign, which had the tagline "Every part of your body needs pure water," was introduced in 2000. The campaign continued Aquafina's focus on a young-adult target market. Success followed, as sales of Aquafina jumped by an astonishing 59.4 percent from 2000 to 2001. In 2003 Aquafina launched what was then its biggest national campaign, "Aquafina

Pure Luck.'' The campaign doubled as a rewards program, offering consumers a chance to win cash prizes for being spotted with Aquafina products. By 2004, when ''Drink More Water'' was released, Aquafina had become the U.S. bottled-water business's first billion-dollar brand as well as the nation's top-selling bottled water.

TARGET MARKET

''It wasn't long ago [that] bottled water was considered an oddity, an affectation, a pretentious luxury good. Who drank only bottle water? Snobs . . . effetes . . . Hollywood phonies.'' So said BevNet.com writer Greg Prince. For a long time this had been the predominant image of bottled water. Over the course of the 1990s the image began to change. The shift coincided with the growth of an active and health-conscious population, especially among those in the young-adult age group. Full-calorie soft drinks were going out of style; healthy, low-sugar, low-calorie beverages were in. And what could be lower in calories, and more beneficial to health, than water? The problem was that tap water could contain contaminants, and more often simply did not pass the taste test among drinkers. Thus, a lucrative bottled-water market emerged.

Right away Aquafina identified its target drinkers: healthy, active adults aged 25 to 39. By 1997, the year it began national distribution, Aquafina had become the official sponsor of three professional athletic organizations: the Association of Volleyball Professionals, U.S. Soccer, and the Professional Golfers' Association. Thus, its image and its target market were immediately carved into consumers' minds. And it was a very different target market from that of the luxury bottled water of years prior. Aquafina did not hesitate to point this out. In television spots that aired in 1998, Aquafina, alluding to Evian's pricey brand and pretentiousness, mockingly referred to its competitor's water as ''Envie.'' Aquafina's then-tagline, ''Pure water. No additives. No attitude,'' along with a lower price, further reinforced its unpretentious image, thus directly appealing to the young-adult market. By focusing on the all-inclusive fun of water, the ''Drink More Water'' campaign diverted slightly from the young athlete. Still, Aquafina's target market remained the same.

COMPETITION

Coca-Cola entered the U.S. bottled-water scene a little late, in 1999, with the introduction of Dasani. Coca-Cola, like PepsiCo, was well aware of the consumer trend toward healthier drinks, including water. Yet Coke was hesitant to jump into the bottled-water market, as it continued to hold optimism that the trend would reverse and that consumers would return to their beloved sodas. But in 1998, a year prior to Dasani's launch, the bottled-water industry was up to $4.3 billion, reflecting a nearly 10 percent increase from the previous year. As such, Pepsi's main rival was drawn in. Though late to the game, Dasani found immediate success. In 1999, with only a half a year of distribution, Dasani jumped to the number-five spot in U.S. bottled-water sales.

In 2000 Coca-Cola released a $15 million national ad campaign for Dasani. ''Life Simplified'' focused on the busy and stressed-out woman, revealing how her life could be simplified by drinking Dasani. Dasani's target market consisted of women ages 25 to 49. The marketing approach worked. Soon after ''Life Simplified'' was presented to the public, Dasani climbed its way to the number-two U.S. bottled-water distributor spot, with nearly $150 million in sales. That number, however, lagged far behind Aquafina's $203 million. In response Coca-Cola switched marketing gears. While Aquafina was promoting ''Drink More Water'' in 2004, Dasani was infringing upon the athletic market with its ''Go for Six'' campaign. The latter campaign teamed up with Tour de France bicycling champion Lance Armstrong as a way to reinforce Dasani's tagline, ''Can't Live without Dasani.''

Food giant Nestlé found tremendous success in the U.S. bottled-water market. Nestlé's water offerings had grown to include 10 separate brands, which, when accumulated, made Nestlé the top-selling bottled-water distributor in the United States. In 2003 Nestlé had three of the top-five-selling U.S. bottled-water brands (Poland Spring, Arrowhead, and Deer Park) as well as six among the top ten. That year Poland Spring, holding 7.8 percent of market share and $649 million in sales, sat at number three. In its marketing Poland Spring reminded customers that its water was true ''spring water,'' from deep in the Maine woods (as opposed to the top-two brands, Aquafina and Dasani, which both used filtered municipal water). Or, as Poland Spring's longtime slogan claimed, its water represented "What it means to be from Maine."

DIRTY WATER

In 1999 the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), a top U.S. environmental-action organization, completed a comprehensive four-year study on the quality of bottled water. After testing more than 1,000 bottles of 103 brands of bottled water, the NRDC disclosed that approximately one-third of waters tested contained levels of contamination. The NRDC's findings did not seem to affect bottled-water sales. By 2002 wholesale U.S. bottled-water sales had reached 7.8 billion. By 2003 the number had increased to 8.3 billion.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Aquafina, with ad agency BBDO New York, debuted its "Drink More Water" campaign on July 13, 2004, during the broadcast of Major League Baseball's 75th All-Star Game. To the 30 million viewers who tuned in, Aquafina revealed an entirely new kind of "watering hole." The "Drink Up" TV spot opened at a city intersection, empty except for a lone male accordion player and his dog. The reason that the streets were empty was quickly revealed: everyone was at a local Bavarian-style beer garden, singing and carousing. "Drink! Drink! Drink!" they sang. "To eyes that are bright as stars when they're shining on me!" Then came the final twist. The patrons were not toasting beer, as one might expect. Instead, each and every glass, bottle, and jug was filled with (Aquafina) water. The spot concluded with a voice-over stating, "Drink to your health; because the more water you drink, the better you'll feel. So make your body happy. Drink more water!" For 60 seconds the viewer was transported to pure fun. Or, as ad critic Lewis Lazare of the Chicago Sun-Times put it, the commercial hit the viewer "like a giant burst of energy unlike any we've experienced in television advertising in quite some time." The spot ran through the end of 2004 and continued in 2005.

A theme of pure musical fun continued with the release of the "I Feel Pretty" television commercial in 2004. In this fast-moving spot various ordinary-looking people—from an old man on a lawn mower to a city cabdriver to a pig farmer—flashed on the screen, smiling and drinking Aquafina, while the West Side Story tune "I Feel Pretty" played in the background. The commercial's voice-over said, "Drinking water. Makes you feel better, look better, and your whole body more beautiful. Make your body happy. Drink more water. Aquafina." The spot continued to air into 2005. Also in 2005, two additional television commercials were added to the campaign: "On Top of the World" (which used the Carpenters' tune of the same name) and "Man and Woman."

In addition to the television spots, Aquafina's "Drink More Water" involved large-scale print and billboard advertising. The print campaign ran in the 2004 year-end issues of People, Sports Illustrated, and Time magazines. To celebrate the 2005 New Year, Aquafina put up its first-ever billboard in New York City's Times Square. In a spirit much like that of the "Drink Up" television commercial, the billboard urged consumers to drink water in order to celebrate and have a good time. "Make your body happy, drink more water," the sign read. A similar billboard appeared at the New Year's 2005 celebration at the intersection of Hollywood and Vine in Los Angeles. Last, to further reinforce a connection between Pepsi's bottled water and New Year's celebrations, Aquafina became the official water of MTV's "Iced Out New Year's 2005."

OUTCOME

Aquafina and BBDO's "Drink Up" television commercial gained widespread recognition in the advertising world. Advertising critic Lewis Lazare said, "Aquafina has decided just to hit hard on the fact that water makes your body happy, so it's smart to drink lots of it. The message is smart. But more importantly, it's being delivered in a commercial that engulfs us with bliss . . . How refreshing." Others also took notice. In 2004 "Drink Up" was given a WIN (Women's Image Network) Ad Award. The award honored creatively excellent advertising that portrayed women as empowered. The winning of this award suggested that Aquafina, indeed, had reached its female target market. The commercial was also nominated in 2005 for an Emmy for best commercial and was a finalist for a Clio Award. The Emmy and Clio had come to represent the epitome of positive advertising recognition. "I Feel Pretty" was also admired and won a bronze at the New York Festivals Advertising Awards.

Consumers liked the advertisements as well. In a poll that Pepsi conducted about the Aquafina brand, most respondents stated that they found the campaign effective in communicating a memorable message. Aquafina's 2004 sales grew in the double digits; in the first quarter of 2005 sales grew by 25 percent. In the larger picture, Aquafina's success helped to improve PepsiCo's sales, even at a time when sales of the company's signature cola had been slipping. In the summer of 2005, for instance, PepsiCo reported its biggest quarterly gain sales in three and a half years. This increase was attributed to three of Pepsi's noncarbonated beverages: Gatorade sports drinks, Lipton tea, and Aquafina water.

GENERATION NEXT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For more than 30 years PepsiCo, Inc. has been courting younger consumers, and youthful cola drinkers have formed a major battleground for Pepsi and its number one rival, Coca-Cola. The struggle for this demographic was especially contentious because teenagers made up the largest group of soft drink consumers in the United States.

The PepsiCo Inc.'s 1997 advertising campaign, featuring the theme slogan "Generation Next," was unveiled during the national telecast of professional football's championship game between the Green Bay Packers and the New England Patriots. The new commercials were created by Pepsi's longtime agency BBDO. A new Pepsi "globe" logo was introduced at that time as well. For the far-reaching "Generation Next" campaign, PepsiCo Inc. forged powerful marketing alliances with Major League Baseball and the international pop group the Spice Girls. These complex promotions were touted by the soda maker's marketing officials as vital forms of outreach to the global youth culture. By and large, consumers responded favorably to these initiatives. By 1998, however, PepsiCo's executives and bottlers were beginning to rethink a strategy that was focused on only one segment of a large and diverse soft drink market.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

PepsiCo Inc. was founded in 1965 through the merger of Pepsi-Cola Company and Frito-Lay, Inc. By the 1990s it was the second-largest maker of soft drinks in the United States and among the most successful consumer products companies in the world, with annual revenues of more than $20 billion and about 140,000 employees. PepsiCo had achieved a leadership position in each of its two major packaged goods businesses: beverages and snack foods. The company was a world leader in soft drink bottling and the world's largest producer of snack chips. PepsiCo's brand names were some of the best known and most respected in the world.

Pepsi-Cola provided advertising, marketing, sales, and promotional support to Pepsi-Cola bottlers and food service customers, and its advertising was among the world's most recognized. Traditional features of Pepsi advertising included humor, an emphasis on youth, and the use of storylines.

As early as the 1960s Pepsi signaled its intention to win over young consumers with its tag line "Pepsi—For Those Who Think Young." In 1963 the soda giant unveiled its "Pepsi Generation" tag line, created by agency BBDO. This long-running campaign was replaced by "The Choice of a New Generation" in the 1980s and revised in 1997 as "Generation Next."

On January 21, 1997, PepsiCo Inc. launched a new advertising campaign designed to stake the company's claim to the global youth culture. "Generation Next" commercials began airing in markets worldwide shortly thereafter. Pepsi, which had purchased ad time during the previous 12 Super Bowls, secured a total of four commercial minutes before, during, and after the 1997 Super Bowl. A total of six Pepsi spots were aired during the championship contest, three of which can be summarized as follows. "Shaq/Shaft" featured gargantuan NBA superstar Shaquille O'Neal in a takeoff on the 1970s blaxploitation classic Shaft starring Richard Roundtree. New music was recorded for the spot by Oscar-winning Shaft composer Isaac Hayes. In "Bears" a computer animated gaggle of grizzlies called the "Village Bears" danced to the Village People chestnut "YMCA." In perhaps the most enduring ad, supermodels Cindy Crawford, Tyra Banks, and Bridget Hall blew kisses to "Norman Pheeny," an infant fresh out of the maternity ward, while they were drinking Pepsi. The accompanying voice-over dubbed Pheeny a "Pepsi drinker for life."

In March 1997 PepsiCo, Inc. and Major League Baseball announced a broad five-year marketing alliance that sought to expand the bonds between Pepsi's youthful "Generation Next" consumers and America's national pastime. As part of this deal, PepsiCo Inc. agreed to advertise heavily on national television broadcasts of baseball games. The soft drink giant also agreed to produce a series of baseball-oriented television ads for airing during the 1998 season. The deal also made Pepsi the official soft drink of Major League Baseball and gave the soft drink giant exclusive rights to use Major League Baseball's trademarks, including postseason event logos (such as the World Series), the All-Star Game logo, and collective use of Major League Baseball team marks, in advertising, packaging, merchandising, and promotions.

The Spice Girls, an international all-female pop music combo, forged their own alliance with the soda maker in May 1997. The first details of this relationship were leaked to the press via London Music Week magazine. The massive promotional relationship easily eclipsed Pepsi's previous music sponsorship deals with such artists as Michael Jackson, Tina Turner, Madonna, and Lionel Richie.

TARGET MARKET

Pepsi officials repeatedly defined the target market for "Generation Next" in one word: youth. "There is an identity at Pepsi which is timeless," observed Brian Swette, executive vice president and chief marketing officer for Pepsi-Cola North America. "Essentially, it's about being eternally youthful. Youth means innovation and optimism—with a sense of humor and just a little cynicism. That's what being youthful is about, and that's the character of the brand."

Young consumers, who form their brand preferences early in life, responded favorably to Pepsi's efforts to gear its advertising toward them. According to one market study, Pepsi ads ranked number two in popularity with children aged 6 to 17. The soda maker's shrewd use of rock music performers, sports stars, and whiz-bang special effects have often been cited as the reasons for this strong showing.

An emphasis on youth and youth culture informed many of the marketing initiatives undertaken by Pepsi with its "Generation Next" campaign. High-profile promotional deals with the Spice Girls and Major League Baseball seemed designed to enhance Pepsi's image with the youth demographic. By and large Pepsi's marketing partners benefited from the newly forged relationships as well. "This association is great for baseball," crowed Allan H. "Bud" Selig, chairman of the Major League Baseball executive council. "Pepsi is uniquely qualified to infuse the game with contemporary youthfulness and help reconnect baseball with America's kids and teens, one of our key goals."

COMPETITION

In the competitive soft drink market, Pepsi's volume gains lagged behind Coca-Cola's through much of the 1990s. From 1994 through 1997 Coke's share of the U.S. soft drink market grew from 41 percent to 43.9 percent, while Pepsi's slipped from 31.2 percent to 30.9 percent, according to Beverage Digest/Maxwell data.

To stem this tide, PepsiCo Inc. decided on a new advertising and marketing strategy. In mid-January 1997 PepsiCo Inc. executives huddled with the company's bottlers in New Orleans, where top officials—including CEO Roger Enrico—outlined Pepsi's "Generation Next" initiative. Insiders expected the number two ranked soft drink giant to introduce global themes designed to improve the performance of its overseas divisions. A more aggressive approach on pricing and store displays, in response to successful Coke initiatives in these areas, was forecast as well.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The tag line for PepsiCo's 1997 campaign, "Generation Next," represented something of a return to the company's roots. Replacing the two-year-old theme "Nothing Else Is a Pepsi," the new theme echoed one of Pepsi's most memorable campaigns of previous years, which featured the tag line "Choice of a New Generation." Both themes were concocted by the New

"GENERATION LESS"

The "Generation Next" campaign is considered a failure by most industry analysts, but another of the cola giant's moves of 1997 won instant accolades from its shareholders. In January of that year PepsiCo Inc. announced that it was spinning off its restaurant subsidiaries into a separate company. The decision was taken to allow Pepsi to concentrate on its core packaged food businesses.

The restaurant unit—comprising the popular chains KFC (formerly Kentucky Fried Chicken), Pizza Hut, and Taco Bell—would thereafter have its own management and corporate structure. PepsiCo retained direct control over its other two units, Pepsi (soft drinks) and Frito Lay (snack foods), businesses it believed were of a distinctly different dynamic than fast food.

Wall Street responded enthusiastically to the change. When the news came down, PepsiCo Inc. stock surged by 11 percent in the first day alone. Market analysts believed that investors would respond favorably to the spin-off in the long term as well.

York ad agency BBDO. The "Generation Next" campaign was designed to leverage Pepsi's "generation" equities of humor and humanity while positioning Pepsi and its drinkers as looking in anticipation to the future. The new spots encompassed a diverse swath of themes and characters but retained traditional Pepsi features like the storyline approach.

One of the spots, entitled "Move Over," employed original music and images to depict how "Generation Next" reflected the lives of contemporary youth—their likes, their language, and their attitude. A series of other storyline spots offered a mix of Pepsi-style humor, irreverence, and attitude. The humor this time was a bit edgier than in past campaigns, with a more concerted focus on youth. The entire campaign was linked together with a new brand icon: a spiraling Pepsi globe bearing the legend "Generation Next." "Generation Next is an ageless, borderless idea that defines Pepsi and its drinkers with style, wit, and attitude," remarked Brain Swette, PepsiCo's executive vice president of global marketing. "And in today's global youth culture—where styles and attitudes aren't limited by languages or boundaries—the time is right to unleash this idea on the world."

The campaign relied heavily on big-name celebrity endorsers like gargantuan NBA star Shaquille O'Neal and supermodel Cindy Crawford. In addition, Pepsi unveiled a massive promotion tied to Lucasfilm's re-release of the popular Star Wars movie trilogy. But the most far-reaching marketing partnerships were those forged with Major League Baseball and the Spice Girls, respectively.

The baseball partnership included a number of innovative marketing initiatives. For starters, the new relationship gave Pepsi exclusive rights to Major League Baseball's All-Star balloting program. The soft drink purveyor then used the balloting effort to execute a nationwide promotion tying together 6,000 7-Eleven stores and a Fox TV watch-and-win sweepstakes program. Baseball fans were able to vote online via the Pepsi Internet web site. As part of the All-Star Game festivities, PepsiCo Inc. participated at the annual All-Star Fanfest, held in 1997 at the Cleveland Convention Center. The synergy here was fortuitous because Pepsi served as the official soft drink of the Cleveland Indians and Jacobs Field, the park where the 1997 All-Star Game was played.

A baseball component was also added to PepsiCo Inc.'s popular "Pepsi Stuff" giveaway program, which provided free youth-oriented merchandise to loyal Pepsi consumers. The 1997 edition of Pepsi Stuff featured New York Yankee shortstop Derek Jeter in more than 100 million catalogs distributed across the United States. A new wrinkle to Pepsi Stuff was the inclusion of a special "fantasy prize" in which a lucky fan was awarded the opportunity to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at Game Two of the 1997 World Series between the Cleveland Indians and the Florida Marlins.

Pepsi's effort to reach out to young baseball fans was not limited to the traditional marketing avenues, however. Nontraditional initiatives included the placing of postings on Major League Baseball's official World Wide Web site. Pepsi also pledged to sponsor the MTV cable network's "Rock 'n' Jock" and "Pepsi All-Star Softball Games," as well as activity on the Channel One educational classroom network.

The partnership with Major League Baseball cemented PepsiCo Inc.'s longtime involvement in America's national pastime. In the late 1990s the soft drink maker also served as the official soft drink of the Chicago Cubs, Seattle Mariners, and Kansas City Royals, as well as the 1998 expansion teams, the Arizona Diamondbacks, and Tampa Bay Devil Rays. Pepsi also maintained relationships with almost half of America's minor league franchises.

With the Spice Girls, a Europop supergroup, Pepsi was sailing into uncharted waters, establishing a relationship with an up-and-coming entity in the hopes of tapping into the worldwide youth market. The cornerstone of this partnership was the release of a new Spice Girls song, "Step to Me," to be made available only through a Pepsi promotion and not through traditional record retailers. Tickets to the only Spice Girls concert of the year, in Istanbul, Turkey, were made available solely through a Pepsi offer as well.

The Spice Girls also agreed to appear in commercials for Pepsi. The first of these, a 30-second spot featuring the group wailing the Pepsi theme "Move Over," was screened on television and in movie theaters during the summer of 1997. A second commercial promoted the Spice Girls single and concert offers. The promotions were made available to consumers in 78 countries in Europe and Africa, and the spots were screened worldwide, including in North America, the Far East, and Australia.

Pepsi also hooked up with other bands, like 3T and Shaggy, featuring them in promotional advertising offering prizes of concert tickets and merchandise. The soda maker limited the use of these musical groups to the countries in which they were popular. In another bid to capture the youth market, Pepsi contracted with MTV to offer tickets to the cable channel's Video Music Awards in September.

OUTCOME

Public reaction to Pepsi's first batch of "Generation Next" commercials was largely favorable. USA Today's instant Ad Meter found that both the dancing bears and the Norman Pheeny spots won over consumers as their favorite commercials aired during the Super Bowl telecast. A second survey taken the next day found the Pepsi commercials were recalled by more than half of the respondents polled. Anheuser-Busch was a distant second with only a 36 percent recall score.

Industry analysts were split in their judgment on the new commercials, however. Advertising Age magazine rated the Pepsi Super Bowl spots "profoundly disappointing," claiming the spots fell "flatter than a two-liter bottle left uncapped overnight." The Florida Times-Union took the opposite tack, placing the Pepsi commercials as a group among its Super Bowl "hits." The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel seemed to call it both ways, declaring that Pepsi's "lame 'Generation Next' slogan didn't do it" but conceding victory in the ad wars to the soda maker on the strength of its commercials.

Ultimately, "Generation Next" failed to win favor with the most important audience of all: PepsiCo itself. The campaign's commercials elicited sharp criticism from Pepsi bottlers and top brass at the company's annual convention in January 1998. The spots were lambasted for failing to address a wide enough audience and not effectively showcasing Pepsi's new globe icon. Increasingly bottlers complained that the edgier, more youth-oriented spots were alienating important audience segments. In 1998 its lead agency was asked to retool a portion of the campaign, which retained the "Generation Next" tag line. The soda giant was also reportedly examining a possible consolidation of its $170 million U.S. media planning and buying efforts for Pepsi and Frito Lay.

THE JOY OF PEPSI CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2001 PepsiCo, Inc., had long been suffering the effects of consumers' quest for healthier beverages. Though the company's offerings of Gatorade, Aquafina, Propel, and Tropicana Orange Juice, as well as its diet sodas, were experiencing growth, PepsiCo's signature cola sales had been on a steady decline. Yet PepsiCo was far from giving up on its star drink. The company turned to a multimillion dollar campaign, "The Joy of Pepsi," that enlisted megastars Britney Spears, Beyoncé Knowles, and Shakira. Replacing "The Joy of Cola," the new campaign, which was created by advertising agency BBDO New York, represented a major attempt to appeal to customers' tastes, especially those in the younger age brackets.

"The Joy of Pepsi" had its premier with a television spot, "Testimonial," that ran during the 2001 Super Bowl. The intention of the spot, which starred former U.S. Senator Bob Dole, was to represent youthfulness despite age. Nearly 80 at the time, Dole claimed that Pepsi helped keep him young. Later in the campaign a younger and hipper group of spokespeople were used to persuade consumers of the youthful side of Pepsi. Spears, as seen in her debut Pepsi ad, "Britney Rooftop," embodied this approach. In the television spot, which was first aired during the 2001 Academy Awards ceremonies, she performed what was billed as her new "hit," titled "The Joy of Pepsi." Before its debut on television, the spot was given a major buildup, which included online viewing. In all, 14 television spots, as well as extensive print and online advertisements, were included in "The Joy of Pepsi."

"The Joy of Pepsi" was extraordinarily popular, especially among its target market of teens and young adults. For example, an incredible 2 million viewers saw "Britney Rooftop" online before it appeared on television. The campaign also won a number of honors from the advertising industry. But all this did not mean that it succeeded in increasing the sales of Pepsi. During 2003 Pepsi actually suffered a drop in sales of more than 5 percent. Over the longer term, from 2000 to 2003, sales of Pepsi dropped approximately 12 percent. PepsiCo did not throw in the towel, however, although it did change its advertising strategy. The "Pepsi. It's the Cola" campaign, which replaced "The Joy of Pepsi" in 2003, took a more direct and practical approach to selling the drink. Instead of relying on celebrities, who were expensive and who sometimes stole the show from the product, the new campaign highlighted the various foods that tasted good with Pepsi.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pepsi was first introduced in 1893 under the name "Brad's drink." Created by Caleb Bradham, a pharmacist, the beverage was made of carbonated water, sugar, vanilla, various oils, pepsin, and flavoring from cola nuts. It quickly became the most popular drink in the pharmacy. In 1898 Bradham renamed the beverage Pepsi Cola, for the pepsin and cola nuts used in the recipe, and further success followed. But the company manufacturing the drink suffered a series of bankruptcies, including one in which Bradham lost control of the firm, before it finally became stable. Under the ownership of the Loft Candy Company, beginning in 1931, Pepsi had huge success when it introduced a 12-ounce bottle for five cents, which had formerly been the price of a 6-ounce bottle. ''Nickel Nickel,'' the first advertising jingle ever broadcast nationwide on radio, was introduced in 1940 and was later recorded in 55 languages. The firm's stability was established, and in the following year it became a public company.

Early Pepsi advertising campaigns played off the ''Nickel Nickel'' jingle with such slogans as ''Twice as Much'' and ''Why Take Less When Pepsi's Best?'' Then, with a 1953 campaign called ''The Light Refreshment,'' Pepsi shifted its focus from lower prices to a lower caloric content. Soon thereafter, however, teens and young adults began to emerge as Pepsi's main consumers, and the marketing focus shifted once again. The 1958 tagline ''Be Sociable. Have a Pepsi'' represented the first major targeting of youth. During the 1960s the ''Now It's Pepsi, for Those Who Think Young'' and ''Pepsi Generation'' campaigns continued the company's concentration on young consumers. The latter campaign went a step further, however, focusing not only on youth but on their lifestyle as well. For a number of years the company maintained this marketing approach. At the same time it never lost enthusiasm for advertising jingles, thus setting the stage for later campaigns that relied on music.

COKE'S LOST OPPORTUNITY?

In 1931 Charles Guth, president of the Loft Candy Company, asked the Coca-Cola Company to give him a discount on the soda he bought in huge quantities for the approximately 200 stores he operated. After Coca-Cola had refused, he purchased the firm manufacturing Pepsi. Later, however, when sales of Pepsi remained flat, Guth was desperate enough to approach his old rival with an offer to sell. But Coca-Cola would not even make a bid. Then Guth began selling 12-ounce bottles of Pepsi for the 6-ounce price, sales skyrocketed, and Pepsi became a longstanding competitor of Coke.

TARGET MARKET

The 2001 campaign ''The Joy of Pepsi'' was the latest in a long line of advertising efforts from PepsiCo, beginning with ''Be Sociable. Have a Pepsi'' in 1958, that targeted young people. The previous campaign, ''The Joy of Cola,'' which dated to 1999, had strayed somewhat from this focus by attempting to reach both younger and older consumers. In this campaign spokespeople like Marlon Brando and Aretha Franklin, as well as the 1970s heavy metal band KISS, had turned the focus toward an older customer base. Even so, PepsiCo did not neglect younger consumers with ''The Joy of Cola.'' The company, for example, undertook a promotional tie-in with the film Star Wars: Episode 1, which was extremely popular with teens.

Thus, ''The Joy of Pepsi'' was in a sense an updated return to the focus on a youthful lifestyle. The company wanted young consumers to identify personally with Pepsi, as they had done in the past with the help of campaigns that used such celebrities as Kirk Cameron, Michael Jackson, and Gloria Estefan. It was with this in mind that Spears was chosen to promote the product. The effort was reinforced in 2002 when Pepsi signed on Knowles, another illustrious pop star, as part of ''The Joy of Pepsi.'' But the new campaign did not entirely neglect those in older age brackets, especially consumers who longed for a return to youth. Thus, the television premier of ''The Joy of Pepsi'' starred the far-from-young Dole, who was approaching 80, as its spokesperson. In the spot, which was titled ''Testimonial,'' the World War II hero and former U.S. senator from Kansas who had run for president in 1996, touted Pepsi as a fountain of youth, even ending the spot with a back flip on a beach.

COMPETITION

The rivalry between Pepsi and Coke had begun in 1931 when Charles Guth, head of a chain of candy stores, became angry with the Coca-Cola Company for what he felt was their overcharging for syrup. To get even, Guth purchased Pepsi, setting the stage for what was to develop into one of the biggest corporate rivalries in history. The rivalry pitted an image of heritage (Coke) against one of taste (Pepsi). In blind taste tests among consumers Pepsi repeatedly beat Coke. Nonetheless, in worldwide sales Coke remained number one among carbonated soft drinks. Largely in response to a consumer base that continued to become more conscious of health issues, the two companies eventually moved well beyond colas to include additional types of soft drinks, as well as orange juice, bottled water, other beverages, and various snack foods. Sales of PepsiCo's soft drinks, which included Mountain Dew and Slice, fell behind Coca-Cola's, but at the same time the company's Tropicana Orange Juice, Frito-Lay snacks, and Aquafina bottled water were at the top in their respective categories.

While Spears was promoting Pepsi in the campaign ''The Joy of Pepsi,'' such celebrities as Penelope Cruz and Courtney Cox were advocating the "real" side of Coke. Other competitors were also using celebrities to help sell their products. Cadbury Schweppes, for instance, used the actor and comedian Orlando Jones as "the 7 UP guy." There were significant differences in the fortunes of these companies, however. In 2002, for example, Cadbury Schweppes, which offered a long line of beverages and chocolate products, had sales of $8.5 billion. On the other hand, Coca-Cola's sales in 2002 were $19.5 billion, while PepsiCo's topped the group at $25 billion. Two years later sales for Cadbury Schweppes had increased to $13 billion, for Coca-Cola to $22 billion, and for PepsiCo to $29 billion.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the 1990s sales of Pepsi, like the colas of other companies, began a steady decline. In response PepsiCo tried a number of things to improve the image of its beverage, including the signing of a variety of celebrities for its advertising campaigns. Thus, the 2001 campaign, "The Joy of Pepsi," used celebrities that appealed to young people, including Spears, Knowles, and Shakira. The campaign represented a return to a focus on youth, something the company had begun a half century earlier. But the campaign did not entirely exclude older generations, for "The Joy of Pepsi" also wanted to remind older consumers that they, too, could feel young.

Under the guidance of the BBDO agency in New York, "The Joy of Pepsi" made its debut during the telecast of the 2001 Super Bowl and did so with someone who was not a persona of youthfulness. In the television spot "Testimonial" former politician Dole offered a spoof of his earlier commercial for Viagra, a drug used to treat erectile disfunction, which claimed that the little blue pill had returned him to a feeling of youth. In the "Testimonial" spot Dole once again made the connection between a feeling of youthfulness and a "faithful little blue friend," this time referring to Pepsi. The 60-second spot ended with Dole doing a back flip on a beach.

In all, PepsiCo aired eight television spots during the first year of the campaign. These included the "Britney Rooftop" spot, which had its premier during the telecast of the 2001 Academy Awards ceremonies. It was the first in a series of spots starring the teen idol Spears, and the build-up to its debut was extensive. In conjunction with Yahoo!, online viewing of the full commercial was allowed for two hours before it had its debut on television. More than 2 million viewers watched Spears perform the song "The Joy of Pepsi" online. In addition, PepsiCo purchased all of the advertising space available on the Yahoo! home page for the entire weekend of the 2001 Academy Awards. It was the first time that Yahoo! had sold all of its ad space to a single company.

"The Joy of Pepsi" maintained its momentum throughout 2002. In an extended spot, the 90-second "Now & Then," Spears gave consumers a brief tour of the history of Pepsi advertising while performing an updated version of her song "The Joy of Pepsi." This blockbuster spot, which had its premier during the telecast of the 2002 Super Bowl, reached millions of viewers. In addition, BBDO created three shorter versions of "Now & Then." Titled "Diner," "Beach," and "Modern Day," all starred Spears. Later that year the new pop sensation Knowles replaced Spears in the campaign. Knowles appeared in four television spots for "The Joy of Pepsi," including one in 2003 titled "Tango" in which the ardent singer danced with the nerdy employee of a convenience store. This commercial was one of three aired in 2003 that marked the end of the campaign. In addition to the television spots "The Joy of Pepsi" was supported by an extensive print and online advertising campaign. In 2003 "Pepsi. It's the Cola" replaced "The Joy of Pepsi." Like its predecessor, this new campaign stressed youth, but it took a more practical approach to advertising the cola. Instead of starring celebrities, the ads in the new campaign emphasized all of the foods that would go with a Pepsi.

OUTCOME

Both among the public and in the advertising industry "The Joy of Pepsi" was an incredibly popular campaign. Millions of fans watched Spears perform "The Joy of Pepsi" online and on television. The premier of the Spears spot on Yahoo! was chosen by Adweek as the Best Online Event of 2001. In 2002 "The Joy of Pepsi" won an EFFIE, and in 2003 Spears's Super Bowl spot won adage.com's Bobby Award as the best performance by a celebrity. In addition, the campaign added to Pepsi's status as a leader in multicultural advertising, and in 2002 PepsiCo received its second Corporate Mosaic Award from the American Advertising Foundation Center on Multiculturalism. "The Joy of Pepsi" also contributed to PepsiCo's overall reputation for advertising success. In 2003 PepsiCo and BBDO New York won the American Advertising Federation's first-ever Grand Addy Award for their outstanding creative endeavors over the previous two decades, and in the same year PepsiCo was honored for continuous advertising excellence at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France.

The popularity of "The Joy of Pepsi" and its success in the world of advertising did not mean, however, that the sales of Pepsi grew. During each year the campaign ran sales of Pepsi actually declined. In 2003, for example, sales dropped by more than 5 percent. During the period 2000 through 2003, sales of Pepsi dropped by approximately 12 percent. Some critics claimed that stars like Spears and Knowles may have overshadowed the product, creating greater recognition for the performers than for the cola. It was thought to be more likely, however, that the cause of the decline lay in the decade-long trend away from high-calorie sodas. For example, rival Coca-Cola, the leader in the cola business, was also suffering. From 2000 through 2003 sales of Coke dropped by approximately 9 percent.

As a result of falling sales and the continuing trend away from colas, PepsiCo increasingly invested in healthier beverages. In 2003, while "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign was ending on a financially unhealthy note for the cola, PepsiCo enjoyed double-digit growth in its lines of healthier beverages, which included Gatorade, Aquafina, and Propel. The company's Tropicana Orange Juice also experienced growth and maintained its number one spot in the market. But this did not mean that PepsiCo planned to abandon its signature cola. In 2005 the "Pepsi. It's the Cola" campaign was going strong, with humorous new commercials highlighting Pepsi and the foods that could accompany it. In one, for example, two "sumo chickens" wrestled each other for the honor of going home with the guy who had the Pepsi. The commercial was a hit, especially among young consumers, although it was not known whether it made them run out and buy a Pepsi.

THE NOT-SO-VANILLA VANILLA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For beverage manufacturer PepsiCo, Inc., the second half of 2003 was a time of transition for the brand identity of its signature soft drink, Pepsi. Not only did it unveil a new slogan for its core beverage, Pepsi-Cola, but a new product was also in the offing. Pepsi Vanilla was created in direct response to the successful introduction of Vanilla Coke by Pepsi's longtime rival Coca-Cola the year before. Cola volume, which had peaked in 1988 with 68 percent of the carbonated-soft-drink market, was down to 60 percent by 2002. In reaction, cola companies were expanding their soft-drink varieties to keep appealing to increasingly choice-driven consumers. BusinessWeek quoted David Burwick, chief marketing officer of Pepsi-Cola North America, as saying, "The era of the mass brand has been over a long time . . . It took our category longer than most to accept that." Within six months of that statement, Pepsi was set to go head-to-head against Coca-Cola in the battle for vanilla market share.

The "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, created by advertising agency BBDO New York, led the charge as Pepsi Vanilla and its low-calorie counterpart, Diet Pepsi Vanilla, hit store shelves in August 2003. It had an estimated budget of $25 million. The campaign, which implied that Vanilla Coke's taste was overbearing and behind the times, was wide-reaching. The Pepsi Vanilla brand sponsored the National Football League's season-kickoff event. Ads directed at the younger population or those seeking variety were everywhere, from print to outdoor to online. Unlike in previous personality-driven Pepsi campaigns, the product was front and center. Television spots such as "Trucks," which featured a musical duel of sorts between a hip, hyper-customized Pepsi Vanilla truck and a mundane, older Vanilla Coke vehicle, succeeded in capturing critical and consumer attention.

The bulk of Pepsi's "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign was concentrated in the first two months of the product's introduction. Immediately following the campaign launch, Pepsi Vanilla enjoyed increased sales and dug into Vanilla Coke's market share, thereby accomplishing one of its primary goals. The campaign also won a number of ad-industry honors, including a Gold EFFIE Award.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The name Pepsi-Cola, coined by its creator, a druggist named Caleb Bradham, was meant to suggest a relationship to pepsin, which was used for medicinal purposes. Bradham patented his drink and founded the Pepsi-Cola Company in 1902, and Pepsi began to find its way into the marketplace as a health-promoting refreshment. Bradham sold the company under threat of bankruptcy in 1923 to Craven Holding Company, which did not fare much better. Growth stagnated further under the guidance of the next owner, the Loft Candy Store chain. Loft's acquisition of Pepsi in 1931 was the cola company's first jab at Coca-Cola. Sales were deathly slow until president Charles Guth made one bold last-ditch effort. He decided to offer his Depression-era consumers 12-ounce bottles, instead of the 6-ounce units sold by competitors, for the bargain price of a nickel each. Sales took off, and within a few years Pepsi was working its way into the national market.

Pepsi proved to be a cutting-edge self-promoter early on in the company's history, always with a youthful consumer in mind. The late 1930s and early 1940s saw the advent of popular cartoon characters Pepsi and Pete, a pair of Keystone Kop imitators who promoted Pepsi with the slogan "Cost small! Liked by all! Bottle tall!" in Sunday comic strip form and an animated short film. In this era, with Walter Mack at the helm of Pepsi, media usage was becoming a key tool. It was then that Pepsi became a radio-jingle pioneer with the hugely successful "Pepsi-Cola Hits the Spot," which soared to the top of the popular-music charts.

Many memorable slogans and campaigns carried the Pepsi banner since then, all with a similar mission to make each new generation a "Pepsi generation." In the sixties, under Pepsi marketing chief Alan Pottasch, the decision to acknowledge the widening gap between old and young consumers was made, and the BBDO agency won the Pepsi account. Lifestyle had always been a component in Pepsi ads, but under BBDO creative director Phil Dusenberry youth beach culture and fun-centered activities were featured. These sentiments were put forth in the slogan "for those who think young" and folk jingles such as "You've got a lot to live, and Pepsi's got a lot to give." In the 1970s "Join the Pepsi People, Feelin' Free" was an even more obvious reference to the political mood of America's youth. The 1980s and 1990s saw the rise of celebrity-focused campaigns. Pepsi spent millions to align its self with the music and media stars of each decade, most notably pop icon Michael Jackson, actor Michael J. Fox, and later, supermodel Cindy Crawford and teen sensation and singer Britney Spears.

The year 2003 marked an advertising shift for Pepsi's signature brand, Pepsi-Cola, which adopted a fresh slogan, "Pepsi, It's the Cola." Pepsi Vanilla would follow suit with its "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign. Youth was still king, but the celebrity-driven ads of the previous two decades were scaled back to reflect a new product-centered advertising philosophy. Catchy jingles would not play a primary part in the Pepsi Vanilla campaign either. Music was a background element or part of a storyline. In a November 2003 Wall Street Journal article Dave Burwick, chief marketing officer of Pepsi-Cola North America, said, "It's time we shined the light on the product itself."

TARGET MARKET

By early 2000 variety-seeking consumers had caught the attention of cola companies. Market share lost to bottled water and non-cola soft drinks was threatening the strength of flagship colas such as Pepsi. Product spin-offs were seen as an opportunity to regain fading cola sales volume, bolster signature brand identity, and retain traditionally loyal consumers whose diverse tastes might lure them in a competitor's direction. Pepsi Vanilla was created to address all these concerns.

Pepsi traditionally aimed its marketing at the youth demographic, with 25 year olds as the center of the age range, and its target audience for "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" was no different. This young consumer would, Pepsi surmised, have a taste for variety and might even have a Vanilla Coke in the refrigerator. Pepsi wanted to convince these consumers to become loyal Pepsi Vanilla drinkers. Pepsi also hoped to encourage existing Pepsi drinkers to diversify their tastes and give Pepsi Vanilla a try.

COMPETITION

Throughout both their histories Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola were locked in a battle dubbed "the cola wars" for the hearts, minds, and dollars of beverage consumers. In 2003 the market-share leader was still Coke, with Pepsi trailing in second place. Pepsi was also facing competition from the third-largest beverage maker, Cadbury Schweppes, whose Dr Pepper was cited in Beverage Digest as the number one performing brand in its 2002 Top 10 listing. Dr Pepper's success was yet another indicator to Pepsi that consumers were willing to stray from the century-old mainstays and choose from a wider array of beverages.

In May 2002 the beverage industry witnessed the successful introduction of Vanilla Coke and Diet Vanilla Coke into the marketplace. It was Coca-Cola's first major successful new drink since it introduced Diet Coke some 20 years earlier. Coca-Cola's hope for its vanilla offerings was to gain market share among the teen market. The company implemented a major marketing push to promote the products, including television spots featuring actor Chazz Palminteri. In the commercials Palminteri's

PEPSI BLUE

One day prior to the introduction of Vanilla Coke in 2002, a surprise announcement came out of the Pepsi camp. It would launch a line extension of its own called Pepsi Blue, a berry-flavored cola with a strong bluish tint. While Vanilla Coke sales soared, Pepsi Blue proved to be a misstep. Pepsi Blue, developed with significant input by teens, may have been too narrowly focused and soon went the way of such ill-fated spin-offs as Crystal Pepsi, Pepsi AM, and Pepsi Max from a decade before.

imposing, tough-guy character caught teens in somewhat mischievous situations, such as sneaking looks through peepholes, and rather than punishing the teens, he commended them on their "youthful curiosity" and rewarded them with Vanilla Cokes. The launch and the campaign were successful, and Vanilla Coke quickly gained recognition and market share. Within half a year Vanilla Coke was among the top 10 brands in the highly competitive convenience-store arena.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Pepsi sought to emulate Coca-Cola's success with Vanilla Coke. It used the fact that it was the second vanilla-flavored cola to its advantage by seizing on some critiques that Vanilla Coke was too sweet and heavy tasting. The product and the "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign were designed to take on Vanilla Coke directly and exploit a perceived weakness. Pepsi Vanilla wanted everyone to know that its product was lighter and more refreshing, an improvement in taste and a younger approach to flavored cola. CNN/Money writer Parija Bhatnagar reported that the number two beverage maker was confident at launch time, quoting Pepsi marketing chief Dave DeCecco as saying, "We're doing vanilla our way. If consumers want Pepsi Vanilla, they can have it now, and we want a share of the market."

Coke may have created the vanilla-cola category, but Pepsi was determined that it not only could do vanilla better but also could woo the variety seekers by equating Pepsi Vanilla with youth culture. Youthful appeal had always been a Pepsi advertising hallmark. BBDO devised "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" to acknowledge that Coke's product was first while disparaging it as old-fashioned and too sweet. To specifically address this, a two-part television commercial made its debut during the MTV Video Music Awards, a highly youth-oriented program. In both ads two young men were stymied in their quest to buy a Pepsi Vanilla when the vending machine kept going on and off, preventing them from making a purchase. There was a Vanilla Coke machine nearby, but the men made it clear that the other brand was not an option. Later it was revealed that two mischievous shop workers across the street were causing the machine's malfunction. The spot's focus played to a youthful audience, referring in part to popular prank shows of the time while also positioning Vanilla Coke as an unthinkable beverage choice.

An approximately $25 million dollar advertising budget was allotted for the introduction of Pepsi Vanilla, matching in spending the Vanilla Coke launch budget from the previous year. Pepsi Vanilla's comprehensive campaign featured print, outdoor, and online advertising as well as product placement, but the highest visibility came from four television spots, only one of which featured a celebrity, singer Beyoncé Knowles. The real standout of the four was called "Trucks" and debuted in mid-August. The commercial began with a Vanilla Coke truck stopped at an intersection alongside a Pepsi Vanilla truck. The Vanilla Coke driver challenged the Pepsi driver by cranking up a 1970s rock classic by REO Speedwagon on his radio. The confident but cool Pepsi driver was then shown flicking a switch, which converted his truck into the ultimate low-rider, blasting hip-hop music, to the delight of the young New York City onlookers. The bested Vanilla Coke driver said, "That was awesome." The voice-over that followed said, "There's a new vanilla in town. Introducing Pepsi Vanilla. The perfect blend of cola and vanilla . . . that's not so vanilla." The "Trucks" spot represented the kind of good-natured swipe against Coke that Pepsi had worked to refine over the years.

At launch time media saturation was key. A concentration of print ads appeared daily in USA Today four weeks running, while inserts were placed in carefully selected magazines, such as Rolling Stone and Sports Illustrated. Television spots appeared during season premieres of such highly rated shows as ER, Law & Order, and Third Watch. Outdoor ads were installed in densely populated urban areas, and online efforts included a large presence on Yahoo! as well as E-mails sent to Pepsi loyalists. Sponsorship of the one-hour National Football League Kickoff festival on September 4, 2003, was also key; the phrase "presented by Pepsi Vanilla" was even included in the title of the event. It was broadcast live on ABC, prior to the season's opening game, and featured a variety of musical acts, including Aerosmith, Britney Spears, Mary J. Blige, and Aretha Franklin. The event, conceived in coordination with the U.S. Department of Defense as a tribute to troops abroad and those in public service at home, also aired on the American Armed Forces Radio and Television Service. A sweepstakes was another part of this promotion.

OUTCOME

Pepsi's attempt to steal the thunder of the slightly older brand Vanilla Coke was successful. USA Today's Ad Track weekly survey confirmed that the television spots had done their job; it reported that 25 percent of consumers polled liked the Pepsi Vanilla spots "a lot," which was above the Ad Track average of 21 percent. Ad agency BBDO also reaped the benefits of the campaign's success by winning a Gold EFFIE Award, an industry award for marketing efficacy.

Within the first two months of the campaign's introduction, sales of Pepsi Vanilla were brisk, and the product earned a market share of 1.4 percent in the convenience-store category and 1.6 percent in the mass-market channel, surpassing the company's goal of 1 percent. To Pepsi's delight, Vanilla Coke's market share dropped by approximately 1 percent immediately following the launch of Pepsi Vanilla. Sales remained strong the following year. In April 2004 the New York Times cited a new quarterly report by the Pepsi Bottling Group stating a 28 percent profit increase, specifically attributing a portion of that growth to Pepsi Vanilla.

ORIGINS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 PepsiCo merged with the Quaker Oats Company, giving the soda king rights to the $1.5 billion-a-year brand Gatorade. Pepsi already had its own sports drink, All Sport, but it had become clear that Gatorade's 35-year history in the market made it a formidable opponent. As such, Pepsi sold All Sport and invested heavily in the marketing of Gatorade. In 2002, after polls concluded that 60 percent of consumers had no idea where the name "Gatorade" originally came from, Pepsi had advertising agency Element 79 Partners create the Gatorade "Origins" campaign.

In 2002 Pepsi launched the first "Origins" television commercial with the straightforward desire to educate consumers about Gatorade's humble beginnings. In a style resembling a documentary, the spot showed the 1965 football field at the University of Florida, where Gatorade was invented to help the college's football team, the Florida Gators, combat dehydration. The commercial also featured a player who was on the team, the inventors of the drink, an announcer, and a sportswriter, each of whom confirmed the drink's role in the Gators' success. In 2003, with a spot called "Origins 2," the campaign moved to the NFL field, where Gatorade had also proved an early hit. In a 2005 television spot, "Testimonial," triathlete Chris Legh provided a personal account of the drink's benefits. The "Origins" campaign, which carried the ongoing "Is it in you" tagline, also included print ads with the Gator mascot, Albert, as well as retired Gator players. Throughout the "Origins" campaign, Pepsi also continued to run Gatorade's splashier campaigns featuring big-name athletes such as Michael Jordan.

While "Origins" was underway, Gatorade increased its market share from 78 to 81 percent in a sports-drink market that was rapidly growing. Gatorade's multitiered marketing approach spread the credit for such success in various directions, but "Origins" was acknowledged as an important factor. Additionally, whereas the famous-athlete ads gained more immediate attention, "Origins" offered greater long-term possibilities. It directly added authority and sincerity to the Gatorade name. "Origins" also gained attention in the advertising world, winning "Best Spots" awards from Adweek magazine in both 2002 and 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Gatorade was invented in 1965 by a University of Florida professor of medicine, Robert Cade, to aid the university's football team. The mixture of water, salt, sugar, and lemon juice immediately helped to reduce dehydration in, and improve the endurance of, the athletes. The team's performance improved dramatically that season, even helping the Florida Gators to make it to their first-ever Orange Bowl. The overnight success drew little attention from the business world, and in 1967 the Indianapolis-based food-processing company Stokely-Van Camp bought the rights to Gatorade for just $30,000.

Gatorade's first nationwide advertising campaign was released in 1969, costing Stokely-Van Camp $4 million. At the time Gatorade's sales were in the hundreds of thousands. But sales soon rose dramatically, attracting the interest of several U.S. food giants. In 1982, with Gatorade's annual revenues at $90 million, Stokely-Van Camp became the target of an aggressive bidding war. The following year the Quaker Oats Company acquired the company for $269 million, winning full rights to the Gatorade brand. Quaker further immersed Gatorade in the sports world; in 1984 it launched the Gatorade "Thirst Aid" advertising campaign and in the meantime connected the drink brand to several professional sporting leagues, including Major League Baseball, NASCAR, the NBA, and the Olympics.

By 1990, with an approximate 90 percent share of the $635 million annual U.S. sports-drink market (which had been worth $220 million in 1985), Gatorade's advertising media budget was up to $31 million a year. Soon a significant amount of this exorbitant budget was thrown in one direction: Michael Jordan. In 1991 Gatorade signed a $13.5 million, 10-year contract with the basketball superstar, creating the "Be Like Mike" advertising campaign. Meanwhile, the U.S. sports-drink market continued to expand rapidly, to $800 million in 1992 and to $940 million in 1994. Of the latter figure, Gatorade claimed nearly $800 million. By 2000, when the U.S. sports-drink market was up to an incredible $1.9 billion—of which Gatorade accounted for 78 percent—another aggressive bidding war for Gatorade was underway. In the end, PepsiCo's $13.4 billion bid to merge with Quaker won it the rights to Gatorade. Within a year Pepsi, with its 2002 Gatorade "Origins" advertising campaign, helped the 35-year-old sports drink make its history known.

TARGET MARKET

Gatorade had been used for a variety of purposes, including hydration for athletes; relief for women in labor; a cure for the common cold, menstrual cramps, diarrhea, and hangovers; and roach-trap bait. This made Gatorade's target market incredibly diverse. Nonetheless, since its 1965 beginnings, in which Gatorade was invented to help the University of Florida's football team, Gatorade's primary focus had been on athletes.

After Quaker Oats acquired Gatorade in 1983, the drink's connection to professional athletes was fixed. In 1984 and 1985 Gatorade became a corporate sponsor of several high-profile sporting organizations, including Major League Baseball, the Olympic Track & Field Trials, NASCAR, and the NBA. The 1991 "Be Like Mike" television commercials, in which NBA superstar Michael Jordan promoted Gatorade, provided final confirmation of Gatorade's connection with serious athletes. By the time PepsiCo merged with Quaker in 2001, Gatorade had become the most-recognized drink of athletes. Gatorade's 2002 "Origins" advertising campaign reflected this focus by taking the consumer through Gatorade's history, and in particular, through its long-time connection with sports.

WHAT IS DEHYDRATION?

Before Gatorade was invented, it was widely believed that athletes should abstain from drinking anything, even water, during games, because drinking might have caused cramps and nausea. The 1965 assistant Gator football coach, Dwayne Douglas, helped to change this perception when he asked a University of Florida professor of medicine, Robert Cade, why his players never had to urinate during games. Cade concluded that the players were sweating so much they had no fluids left to urinate. And in that moment, the idea of Gatorade was created.

COMPETITION

When Quaker Oats bought Stokely-Van Camp Co. for an astounding $269 million in 1983, it was clear that Gatorade brought the possibility of big earnings. Skeptics were omnipresent, but Gatorade sales rose dramatically. Within a decade the sports drink was bringing in $700 million a year. By that time big beverage distributors wanted in on the lucrative sports-drink market, and by 1992 both PepsiCo and Coca-Cola had introduced their own lines of sports drinks. PepsiCo's All Sport fell into the number three spot in the market, where it became stuck. Even its initial big-budget national advertising campaign, featuring the immensely popular basketball superstar Shaquille O'Neal, could not move the product up the ranks. For the next decade, while All Sport sales improved, it became clear to Pepsi that, while it might be possible to overcome Coca-Cola's Powerade, it would be nearly impossible to surpass Gatorade, which controlled approximately 80 percent of the market.

In a 2001 deal costing $13.4 billion, PepsiCo merged with Quaker, allowing the soda company to take control of Gatorade. And in a strange twist to the deal, Pepsi's All Sport was sold to the root-beer distributor Monarch Beverage Company, thus turning All Sport into a Pepsi competitor. It proved to be an insignificant opponent, however. At the time of its sale All Sport held 4.4 percent of the sports-drink market. By April 2002, no longer under Pepsi ownership, All Sport's market share had dropped to 1.3 percent. In response to the slump, Monarch announced a major sponsorship with the United States Postal Service Pro Cycling Team, the only American cycling team to have won the Tour de France. Consumer promotions of the sponsorship included a grand prize trip for two to the 100th Tour de France in 2003. In a further attempt to gain market share, in 2004 Monarch introduced two low-carbohydrate versions of its sports drink. But by that year All Sport's market share had decreased to under 1 percent, making it clear that the sports-drink market, at least for the moment, would be dominated by two main competitors: Pepsi and Coke.

Coca-Cola had also attempted to acquire Gatorade, offering a bid for Quaker in 2000. But the deal did not pan out. With 15 percent of the $1.9 billion sports-drink market, Coca-Cola was far from out of the game, however. After Pepsi secured the Quaker deal, Coca-Cola was ready for battle. In 2001, while Pepsi was preparing to launch the Gatorade ''Origins'' campaign, Coca-Cola was aggressively marketing Powerade. First it slashed prices of the drink, making Gatorade the more expensive choice. Next Coca-Cola secured a Powerade promotional deal with the cable sports network ESPN. At the same time Coke completely overhauled Powerade's packaging and promotional materials. The total marketing push reportedly came at a $60 million price tag. In 2001 Powerade gained 2.5 percent market share. The following year Powerade achieved another feat, becoming the new official sports drink of NASCAR, a promotional position that Gatorade had previously held. Coke kept up the momentum in 2003. While Pepsi was promoting its ''Origins 2'' advertising campaign (a sequel to its 2001 ''Origins''), Coke's sports drink, too, was involved in a sequel. Powerade became a major sponsor of the 2003 movie The Matrix Reloaded, a sequel to the 1999 box-office hit The Matrix. Still, none of Powerade's efforts were enough to hurt Gatorade's dominant market share. By 2004, when the sports-drink market grew to an astonishing $5 billion, Powerade controlled just 14 percent of the market, compared to Gatorade's 81 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

After it acquired Gatorade in 2001, PepsiCo conducted a poll that revealed that few consumers knew anything about Gatorade's origins. Some thought, for instance, that it was an invention of someone named Mr. Gator, while others believed it to be a concoction of alligator juice. In response, Pepsi hired ad agency Element 79 Partners of Chicago to develop a marketing campaign that would paint Gatorade's history. In June 2002 the 60-second ''Origins'' television commercial disclosed Gatorade's University of Florida football roots. The spot opened with a Florida Gator football player standing before a row of urinals and telling the camera that, before Gatorade, the team's coach had no idea why none of the players urinated during games. A Florida newspaper sportswriter followed, providing first-hand testimony of the team's dramatic improvement after the players started drinking Gatorade. Last, veteran sportscaster Keith Jackson was featured to add credibility to the success story. The campaign included print ads with the Gator mascot, Albert, and 54-year-old former Gators linebacker, Chip Hilton, who also appeared in the ''Origins'' commercial. The campaign, which incorporated the existing ''Is it in you?'' Gatorade tagline, was also used to celebrate Gatorade's 35-year anniversary.

In July 2003 Pepsi and Element 79 Partners followed up ''Origins'' with a sequel named ''Origins 2.'' Whereas the first ''Origins'' concentrated on Gatorade's Tallahassee roots, the ''Origins 2'' TV spot took the viewer to the NFL playing field, and in particular, to the field of the Kansas City Chiefs. The Chiefs, as the commercial pointed out, was the first NFL team to use Gatorade. The 60-second spot illustrated how the journey from Gators to Chiefs helped to secure Gatorade's position as the beverage choice of athletes. The ''Is it in you?'' tagline continued, as it would in the next installment of the campaign, which arrived in January 2005. As the entire history of Gatorade had already been disclosed in the first two commercials, a new angle had to be explored. This time Gatorade zoomed the lens in on one particular athlete, Australian triathlete Chris Legh. Legh seemed a perfect candidate to make an argument for Gatorade, as he had collapsed from severe dehydration, just yards from the finish line, at the 1997 Ironman Triathlon World Championship. The ''Testimonial'' commercial revealed how Gatorade came to the rescue, helping Legh to win the 2004 Ironman competition.

Although the campaign's budget was not disclosed, PepsiCo reportedly spent nearly $130 million on Gatorade advertising from 2001 through October 2004. But during this time, the ''Origins'' campaign was not the only Gatorade advertising endeavor. Other big-budget campaigns coincided with ''Origins,'' including the New Year's Day 2003 launch of the Michael Jordan tribute television commercial, in which cutting-edge technology allowed the basketball legend to compete against himself on the court.

OUTCOME

Except for a couple of Adweek ''Best Spots'' awards, the ''Origins'' advertising campaign did not win advertising awards. Ad critic Lewis Lazare wrote negatively of the campaign, stating, ''As an infomercial, 'Origins' works OK. But as a compelling and entertaining sales tool, it falls short of the mark.'' Perhaps the commercials were overshadowed by splashier Gatorade ads starring such athletic greats as Mia Hamm, Derek Jeter, and Michael Jordan.

Besides educating consumers, ''Origins'' contributed to the tremendous sales growth Gatorade experienced during the campaign. From 2002 through 2005 Gatorade increased its market share from 78 to 81 percent; in a sports-drink market worth $2 billion in 2002 and $5 billion by 2005, the earnings proved incredible. Such numbers generated fierce competition in the market. In particular, longtime Pepsi rival Coca-Cola aggressively marketed its Powerade against Gatorade. Although it was the second-best-selling sports drink in the United States, Powerade was a far distant number two (holding 14 percent of the market in 2005). Gatorade and Powerade both boasted nearly identical benefits for athletes, including reducing dehydration and improving endurance, and both were promoted by huge-budget corporations. Yet Powerade was unable to catch up with Gatorade, largely because the latter had the longer history, not only in the marketplace, but also—and more importantly—on the athletic field. The ''Origins'' campaign successfully reinforced Gatorade's strongest advantage by establishing the brand's history in the minds of consumers.

PEPSI. IT'S THE COLA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the early 2000s the cola wars were as hot as ever with number two brand Pepsi-Cola battling to catch up with the top brand, Coca-Cola. But things were not going well for any of the cola brands, including Pepsi. In 1999 Pepsi Cola's market share fell 0.03 percent to 14.2 percent, while Coca-Cola Classic remained flat with 20.8 percent, as consumers turned to other beverage choices. Sales continued on a downward spiral, and during the first nine months of 2003 sales of regular Pepsi Cola dropped 5.5 percent, and Diet Pepsi's sales fell 3.6 percent. Pepsi's mission became reversing the slip of its brands in the marketplace.

Pepsi closed out 2003 by launching a new marketing campaign, ''Pepsi. It's the Cola.'' The new theme replaced the slogan ''The Joy of Pepsi,'' which the company had used since 2000. The new campaign also shifted the company's advertising focus from the brand and back to the product. Pepsi's longtime advertising agency BBDO New York created the campaign, which kicked off with a series of three television commercials followed by outdoor ads displayed on billboards and bus shelters located near restaurants and fast-food establishments. Radio, print, and online advertising was also part of the campaign. The ads were humorous and drove home the campaign's message that Pepsi and food go together. One television spot featured comedian Dave Chappelle being attacked by a robotic vacuum cleaner determined to grab his Pepsi to go along with the Doritos chip it had just sucked up off the floor. A billboard ad showed a veggie wrap sandwich hugging a glass of Pepsi.

The campaign resonated well with consumers, particularly young adults, and based on sales it was a success. At the end of 2003, following the campaign's launch, Pepsi reported that sales of all its beverage brands had increased 0.4 percent to 31.8 percent. The company also morphed the successful campaign into one for Diet Pepsi: ''Diet Pepsi. It's the Diet Cola.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Pepsi turned 100 years old in 1998, John McDonough, writing for Advertising Age, said that Pepsi defined itself against its rival, Coke, ''through the wizardry of the slogan, the jingle and the storyboard.'' Describing the cola wars as having little to do with cola, McDonough wrote that for Pepsi the cola wars were about ''beating Coke, and the weaponry [was] not cola but advertising.''

Throughout the highs and lows of Pepsi's early years, concerns focused more on the company's survival than advertising, but McDonough wrote that by 1936 Pepsi had an ad budget of $500,000, and by 1938 that budget had doubled, with most money earmarked for newspaper ads and signage. (Radio advertising was still too costly.) During the 1939 New York World's Fair, Pepsi took its marketing to the sky with a skywriting campaign over the fair's grounds.

From a comic-strip format that ran in newspapers and featured Keystone Kop–like characters named Pepsi and Pete to radio spots that featured the famous ''Pepsi-Cola Hits the Spot'' jingle, the company's advertising continued to evolve and its budget to grow. McDonough said that following World War II Pepsi had an advertising budget that approached $4 million. Pepsi pushed for a more glamorous image in the 1950s with themes such as ''More Bounce to the Ounce,'' which McDonough said was a veiled reference to a well-known television actress of the time who favored low-cut necklines and plenty of exposed cleavage, and ''Reduced Calories,'' before diet drinks were the rage. The tagline ''Say Pepsi Please'' was introduced in 1957 and lasted through the end of the decade. In 1960 BBDO took over Pepsi's advertising.

Under BBDO's creative direction the tagline ''For Those Who Think Young'' became Pepsi's theme. The ''Pepsi Generation'' and the ''Come Alive . . . You're in the Pepsi Generation'' campaigns followed. Other campaigns, including ''Taste That Beats the Others Cold, Pepsi Pours It On'' and ''Join the Pepsi People, Feelin' Free,'' were designed to maintain the original ''Pepsi Generation'' idea. Shifting its focus from the baby boomer ''Pepsi Generation'' to younger consumers, the marketing theme in 1984 became ''The Choice of a New Generation,'' followed by the long-running ''Generation Next'' campaign. According to Advertising Age the ''Generation Next'' theme was scrapped in 1998 as too narrowly focused for mass appeal and was replaced with ''The Joy of Cola.'' The new campaign was well received by consumers when it was unveiled in 1999, but in 2000 the theme morphed into ''The Joy of Pepsi.'' The company dropped its ''Joy of Pepsi'' theme with the introduction of ''Pepsi. It's the Cola'' in 2003.

WHAT COLA WARS? NEW BATTLEFRONT IS LEMON-LIME

Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola drew a new line in the so-called cola wars in 2003, and the new front had nothing to do with cola and everything to do with citrus fruit—lemon-lime, to be exact. Reporting for Advertising Age, Hillary Chura wrote, ''Two new lemon-lime soft drinks are hitting the market, including the first extension of [Coke's] Sprite, called Sprite Remix, and PepsiCo's national rollout of Sierra Mist.'' With the introduction of the two new products, Cadbury Schweppes jumped into the fray with its noncola beverage 7 UP. John Sicher, editor of Beverage Digest, told Chura, ''The three-way face-off this year among Sprite, 7UP and Sierra Mist is going to be a very heated battle.'' Charlee Taylor-Hines, PepsiCo's brand manager for Sierra Mist, told Chura, ''I see this summer as the lemon-lime wars . . . We'll see each brand try to create a niche for itself in marketing.''

TARGET MARKET

Pepsi's target market was ''so broad it's hard to narrow it down, but the focus is teens and young adults,'' said company spokesman Dave DeCecco. He added, ''Consumer research showed people were drinking Pepsi with foods anyway,'' so the new campaign was a way to remind them to enjoy a Pepsi with their meal. Katie Lacey, Pepsi's vice president for colas and media, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that research revealed people drink colas but not as often as they did in the past. The variety of other beverage choices was cited as one of the reasons for declining cola sales. The ''Pepsi. It's the Cola'' campaign hoped to convince consumers of all ages that Pepsi is the perfect beverage to drink with meals or anytime food is being eaten and enjoyed.

COMPETITION

In the ongoing cola wars the brand to beat was number one Coca-Cola, and in 2003 the company consolidated its $350 million media planning and buying account to maintain its competitive edge. Reporting for Advertising Age, Kate MacArthur wrote that Coke's consolidation was ''another step toward enabling its plan to create the 'experienced-based, access-driven marketing' '' the company's president and chief operation officer had mandated. MacArthur continued, ''With the cola wars officially escalated, [Coke's] under intense pressure to connect with consumers.'' Coke attempted to connect with consumers when it launched its new ''Real'' campaign, which relied on consumers' nostalgia for the company's 1970s "The Real Thing" theme, according to Bob Garfield in Advertising Age. He noted that Coke's new campaign was more contemporary and hip than many of the company's previous campaigns, most of which had lacked a youthful flair. Garfield stated that despite its hipper appeal the new campaign repeated the mistake of earlier efforts and failed to focus on the product. And like Pepsi's "It's the Cola" campaign, Coke's campaign was created to convince consumers its beverage was great with food. Garfield commented that Coke also was great with food, "which, if we're not mistaken, is the real reason people buy the stuff."

Rather than a cola the number three soft drink behind Coke and Pepsi was 7 UP, owned by Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages. Instead of following the lead of Coke and Pepsi and launching a new ad campaign, Cadbury Schweppes chose to stay with its successful, award-winning "Make 7 UP Yours" campaign. John Clarke, chief advertising officer for Dr Pepper/Seven Up, told PR Newswire, "Entering into its fifth year, the 'Make 7 UP Yours' campaign continues to be a favorite among consumers, positively impacting both advertising and brand awareness." The company reported that product awareness had more than doubled since the "Make 7 UP Yours" campaign was introduced in 1999. In addition the campaign resonated particularly well with 12- to 24-year-olds, 7 UP's target audience.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although past campaigns had been high on star power, the "Pepsi. It's the Cola" campaign took a different approach: keep it simple. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution's Scott Leith wrote, "Pepsi will dispense with the kind of flashy ads it has used in the recent past—think Britney Spears—and instead pitch itself as a food-friendly cola." Pepsi's chief marketing officer and senior vice president Dave Burwick said of the campaign, "This is a different approach for us. It's not the diva-of-the-year kind of thing." Besides a simpler theme the campaign took a different approach with its launch date. Pepsi typically released new campaigns in January, but "Pepsi. It's the Cola" debuted in November to take advantage of the upcoming holiday season, a time when people typically celebrate with family and friends and good food.

Working with the food and fun theme, Pepsi's agency, BBDO, created a series of commercials designed to showcase the product. The campaign launched with three television spots aired during NFL games and other programming that attracted a large viewing audience, such as the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade. Radio, print, online, and outdoor advertising was also part of the campaign.

The first television spot, titled "Summer Job," showed a young woman dressed as a giant hot dog handing out flyers to passersby, inviting them to visit a nearby restaurant. Following repeated rejections by people who didn't want the flyers, the woman, alone and dejected, moved down the sidewalk, where she encountered a soul mate—a young man dressed as a can of Pepsi. The two walked away hand in hand as a voice-over stated, "Hot dogs love Pepsi. Pepsi loves hot dogs. It's the cola." A second television spot featured Chappelle, who had gone to his girlfriend's apartment to pick her up for a date. While waiting Chappelle was attacked by the girl's robotic vacuum cleaner, which was after his can of Pepsi. The last in the series of three TV commercials was set during a pre–football game tailgate party in which a can of Pepsi was sent sailing through the air in slow motion. Outdoor ads, which were posted on billboards and bus stop shelters, included pictures of a veggie wrap sandwich hugging a glass of Pepsi and a strand of spaghetti roping a Pepsi cowboy style.

OUTCOME

During the first nine months of 2003, Pepsi's U.S. sales dropped 5.5 percent. Following the launch of the "Pepsi. It's the Cola" campaign in November, Pepsi's market share began a slow climb. In March 2004 the company reported an increase of 0.4 percent to 31.8 percent as it took away business from its competitors, including Coke. In addition the new campaign seemed to resonate with at least one consumer group: young adults. From the perspective of college students in Boston, Pepsi was a hit. One student quoted in the Boston Herald said, "Pepsi's advertising is probably attracting more of the population. The only Coke ads I can think of are the polar bears ads around the holidays." Another student added, "I think Pepsi is aimed more toward a younger crowd. Coke seems more old-fashioned." As further evidence that Pepsi was pleased with the campaign's results, for the 2004 Academy Awards the company launched a modified version of the campaign for another of its brands, Diet Pepsi. The new campaign was themed "Diet Pepsi. It's the Diet Cola." Burwick said, "People drink both Pepsi and Diet Pepsi with food and while they're having fun, so the same strategy applies to both brands."

QUAKER–WARMS YOU, HEART AND SOUL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Quaker Oats Company was acquired by PepsiCo and functions as a unit of its parent company. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

For years the Quaker Oats Company had promoted the health-related benefits of its oatmeal products, and so its 1998 "Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign was not a departure from established strategy. Indeed, a 1997 federal ruling gave increased strength to the claim, but along with this ruling came a rising firestorm of criticism from public-interest groups, such as the Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI). The television spots, created by Foote, Cone & Belding (FCB), showed residents of a Colorado town who took Quaker's "Smart Heart Challenge": 98 out of 100 participants, the commercials indicated, lowered their cholesterol levels by eating one bowl of Quaker Oatmeal a day. In 1997 Quaker Oats spent $35 million on advertising its oatmeal, and the figures for 1998 were reportedly much higher. The campaign included print advertising and promotion on Quaker's packaging, but the primary thrust was on television.

"Spotlighting a town and the voices of its everyday people is unprecedented in Quaker's advertising campaigns," Sally Kroha, director of oatmeal advertising for the company, told Judann Pollack of Advertising Age in 1998. As Pollack noted, however, other companies had used similar themes in recent years. Campbell Soup Company, for one, had used the tag line "Good for the Body, Good for the Soul." Nor was it new for Quaker to cite the health benefits of its cereal, a strategy it had applied as early as 1899, with an advertisement in the Saturday Evening Post that stated "How foolish to keep on eating meat to the exclusion of Quaker Oats when dietary experts agree that Quaker Oats is more nourishing and wholesome."

But while Quaker remained the nation's leading brand of hot cereal, with a 60 percent share of a $618 million industry in 1996, much else had changed in a century. Quaker had grown into a vast corporation with $4.8 billion in annual sales during 1998, a total which included such significant brands as Gatorade and Cap'n Crunch cereal, as well as its hot cereals. And while consumer interest in healthy eating had increased, so had consumer skepticism about advertising claims, an attitude that was reinforced by the work of CSPI and other groups.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Quaker Oats trademark, depicting a smiling Quaker gentleman, was born in 1877. Two of the four men who organized the Quaker Mill Company in Ravenna, Ohio, claimed credit for the trademark, one of the world's most famous. William Heston later said that he got the idea from a picture of Pennsylvania founder William Penn; on the other hand, Henry O. Seymour asserted that he came upon the idea after seeing an entry on Quakers in an encyclopedia, which inspired him with "the purity of the lives of the people, their sterling honesty, their strength and manliness." In any case, the trademark has nothing to do with the actual Quaker religious sect, formally known as the Society of Friends, although in fact Heston was a Quaker.

The company underwent a series of changes, assuming its present name in 1901. Along the way, it established itself as a seminal entity in what were then almost entirely new and undiscovered fields: packaging, advertising, and marketing. Quaker was, quite simply, the first nationally advertised food brand, but its historical significance goes deeper than that: it was one of the first brands, period, and proved to be one of the most enduring.

When Quaker Oats first went on the market in the late 1800s, grocers typically sold their products unpackaged, from large barrels, which often was unsanitary. By selling its product in cardboard packages, Quaker could promote the advantage of safety. The use of cardboard packages decorated with the Quaker logo had the further advantage, of course, of making the brand highly recognizable. Then there was advertising, which at the time was considered an unseemly activity for businesses, since most advertising promoted patent medicines and other so-called miracle cures. By the 1890s, however, Quaker was advertising its name on billboards and streetcars.

By the time other companies caught on to the idea of advertising in the twentieth century, Quaker was already an established master of the art, employing leading celebrities of the 1930s and 1940s, such as Roy Rogers and Babe Ruth, to make endorsements. The midcentury also saw a rising interest in the health benefits of oatmeal. So when scientists in the 1930s discovered that oats contained a significant dose of the vitamin B-1, Quaker's sales increased by 35 percent almost overnight.

TARGET MARKET

Since its early days Quaker had claimed health benefits for its products, and it was a combination of public interest in the advantages of oats, along with the company's savvy marketing, that transformed oatmeal from a niche product to a staple of American households. Originally, Quaker's principal consumers were German, Irish, or Scottish immigrants; by contrast, mainstream Americans considered oats a food fit only for animals. By the early twentieth century, however, most people in the United States considered oatmeal a good, solid breakfast. Of course, oatmeal was far from fashionable—until the 1980s. By that time, Quaker's sales had been in a long decline, which began with the widespread introduction of ready-to-eat cereals following World War II. But revenues soared again as studies showed a link between oatmeal consumption and lowered cholesterol. During the 1980s Quaker promoted its product with the tag line "It's the Right Thing to Do" in ads featuring actor Wilford Brimley. Later, the tag line became "Every Day Should Feel This Good."

Until 1997, however, the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) regulations prohibited companies from making specific claims about a link between their products and a reduction in heart disease. Stephen Ink, director of nutrition at Quaker's research laboratories, had been working to establish such a link for his brand since 1975, and late in 1996, as Quaker prepared for a favorable ruling, he told Stephanie Thompson of Brandweek, "In the past, health claims have required generic language like, 'fruits, grains and vegetables carrying dietary fiber may limit the risk of heart disease,' but we couldn't specifically say oatmeal"—much less Quaker Oatmeal. According to Thompson, "Quaker Oats hopes to start a new oatmeal and oat bran craze, pending a much-anticipated FDA ruling on Quaker research regarding the benefits of its core products. The firm plans to make the health pitch a major focus of new packaging and advertising by year-end."

Late in January 1997 the ruling came down, and as Janet Raloff reported in Science News, "even Quaker was surprised by the scope of the FDA's ruling." Ink admitted that although research had shown a possible link between oat bran and lowered cholesterol, this had not been proven conclusively. Nonetheless, on the heels of the ruling, the company ran a full-page ad in the Washington Post that showed the famous Quaker man portrayed in the logo along with the headline "Now he has another reason to smile. The FDA confirms the first food-specific health claim: Soluble fiber from oatmeal, as part of a low saturated fat, low cholesterol diet, may reduce the risk of heart disease."

COMPETITION

Quaker was not the only company that benefited from the FDA ruling. Raloff noted that, for instance, General Mills' Cheerios, a ready-to-eat cereal, was also covered, and indeed General Mills ran its own newspaper ads, accompanied by a television spot, which appeared before a Quaker commercial with a voice-over reporting the results of the FDA ruling. The FDA's ruling was welcome news to cereal giant Kellogg as well: earlier, the company had been required to change the name of its Heartwise cereal to Fiberwise because the FDA held that the brand name could be deceptive.

Technically, the only major competitor for Quaker as a hot cereal was Nabisco Foods Group's Cream of Wheat; but with its strong position in the category—and its offerings in other areas—Quaker was prepared to take on larger game. In January 1998 it launched a $20 million campaign, primarily on television, with spots created by FCB touting its Quaker Fruit & Oatmeal Cereal Bars as superior to Kellogg's Nutri-Grain Bars. In terms of the cholesterol claims in advertising for Quaker Oatmeal, however, the true competition came in the form of CSPI and other critics outside the industry.

In November 1996, just before the FDA ruling, Bruce Silverglade of CSPI told Thompson, "Instead of permitting claims for single foods, we have urged the [FDA] to include information on the benefit of oats within the existing claim on all foods high in soluble fiber." CSPI would become much more vocal about Quaker's advertising in 1998, but consumer groups were not the only critics. In December 1998 the Wall Street

THE LEMON AWARDS

On January 14, 1999, representatives of a coalition of public-interest groups, led by the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI), gathered to present the 14th annual Harlan Page Hubbard Lemon Awards, which were presented each year to companies that, in the coalition's opinion, ran misleading ads. CSPI nominated Quaker Oats for its 1998 commercials about the link between lowered cholesterol levels and consumption of Quaker Oats, but Quaker did not "win". That honor went to Telecom, USA, which advertised the 10-10-321 and 10-10-220 long-distance services. According to Becky Sachs of the Telecommunications Research & Action Center, "Commercials tell consumers that 10-10-321 can save them money, but what they don't tell consumers is that a call has to last at least 10 minutes for the discounts to kick in."

Other candidates for the "Lemmie" award included Miller Beer, which according to United Press International ran a commercial "showing a young man playing with a puppy, then a can of beer, and the graphic 'man's other best friend' "; the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Company, "which promot[ed] the cool, menthol taste [of an unnamed cigarette brand] without mentioning that the numbing effect of menthol in cigarettes has not been fully studied"; and the First USA credit card, which "offer[ed] low-interest checks to consumers . . . while closer inspection of fine print reveals buried 'transaction finance charges'." Several other brands and companies were cited; it should be noted, however, that the statements represent the opinions of the public-interest groups who participated and do not necessarily reflect the views of consumers or advertisers.

Journal speculated that although advertising by Quaker and other companies might initially draw in more consumers, the higher costs of heart-smart products—not to mention people's tendency to lose interest in a healthy eating regimen—might limit the chances of success.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1997 Quaker dropped longtime advertising agency Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, which had handled its campaigns during the 1980s, in favor of FCB. A distinguished agency of long standing, FCB had fallen on hard times in the early 1990s, but with the Quaker account and others, analysts predicted renewed strength for the firm. Its first ads for Quaker, in 1997, used the song "Heart and Soul." During most of 1998, FCB and Quaker concentrated on Quaker Oats Fruit & Oatmeal, as well as Quaker's Dino Eggs. The Dino Eggs, a brand extension for children whose introduction was tied to Universal Pictures's release of a new film in the popular Land Before Time series, were marketed in the shape of eggs. When hot water was added to them, they "hatched" into brightly colored dinosaurs.

In the late summer and early fall, however, FCB and Quaker presented the "Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign. Television ads included a 30-second spot and six 15-second spots, and the company supplemented these with a single print ad, as well as packaging changes. The campaign centered around the town of Lafayette, Colorado, where 100 residents were recruited to take the Quaker "Smart Heart Challenge," eating a bowl of Quaker oatmeal every day for 30 days. They were monitored by the Boulder, Colorado, Community Hospital, which reported that at the end of the month-long trial, 98 of the 100 participants had lowered their cholesterol levels by an average of 24 points.

Eleven of the participants appeared in the television spots, and pictures of six of the participating residents were on special packages of Quaker Toasted Oatmeal, Quaker Toasted Oatmeal Squares, and Quaker Instant Oatmeal. One television spot, for instance, showed Dan, a Lafayette police officer, standing in front of a sign showing a 30-mile-per-hour speed limit; as Dan explained, he had lowered his cholesterol by one less point, 29. In other spots, Lafayette residents appeared with a variety of numbers, including bingo signs and price markers that signified the amount of points by which they had lowered their cholesterol. The print ad showed the entire group seated on bleachers at Lafayette's high school.

OUTCOME

The "Warms You" campaign, Pollack reported in Advertising Age, was to be the "baseline effort supporting all Quaker's other hot cereals," beginning with its introduction in August 1998. Pollack noted that sales had not increased in the two years following the favorable FDA ruling. It remained to be seen whether the cheerful, folksy ads would activate Quaker's sales; in the meantime, the company faced renewed attacks from CSPI in 1999.

CSPI nominated the Quaker spot for the Harlan Page Hubbard Lemon Award, given annually for advertising that the consumer advocacy group and other public-interest lobbyists deemed the most "misleading, unfair, and irresponsible ads." Bonnie Liebman of CSPI pointed out that on the Quaker Web site, consumers would learn that the Lafayette study participants had combined their consumption of Quaker Oats with a program of exercise and fat reduction, but "the ads never mention [that], just the 'powerful oatmeal'." In late January 1999 CSPI demanded that the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) force Quaker to take the commercials off the air. "Quaker's ad implies that oatmeal is a 'magic bullet' that can cause impressive drops in blood cholesterol with little effort," CSPI stated in its petition. Margaret Kirch Cohen, a spokesperson for Quaker, told Food Labeling News that "the results of the Smart Heart Challenge were completely consistent with nearly 40 years of scientific studies that have demonstrated the cholesterol-lowering benefits of oatmeal." She added, "I think we took a very conservative approach to our advertising campaign and selected a wide range of individuals whose experiences varied."

SECURITY CAMERA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

From humble beginnings in a North Carolina pharmacy a century ago, Pepsi-Cola grew to become one of the best-known products throughout the world. The company behind it grew as well, to become one of the top marketers of beverages in the world. In 1965 Pepsi-Cola and Frito-Lay merged to form PepsiCo, Inc. In the years since then PepsiCo has become one of the world's largest consumer product companies. Remarkable for a company of its size, PepsiCo has also remained a growth company, increasing its sales and its return to investors every year since its founding. Pepsi-Cola beverages were available in more than 190 countries and territories, and the company used its advertising and high-energy promotions to maintain the brand's "young" image.

"Security Camera" was the second in a series of story line spots created for Pepsi by its longtime ad agency BBDO. In the first spot in the series, which debuted during the telecast of Super Bowl XXIX in 1995, actor Joe Bays played a Coca-Cola deliveryman who refused to give back a Pepsi to a driver in a diner. The second spot, "Security Camera," was aired during NBC's telecast of Super Bowl XXX in 1996. Shot in black and white to resemble the video feed from a surveillance camera, the commercial continued the saga, as the same Coca-Cola driver was shown loading up a convenience store cooler with his product. Then, glancing up and down the aisle to make sure that no one was watching, he slipped his hand into the nearby Pepsi shelves to filch a can of the competitor's soda. Complications ensued when the shelf collapsed, sending dozens of Pepsi cans crashing to the floor around him. As a crowd of gawkers arrived, the sound track played Hank Williams's country chestnut "Your Cheatin' Heart."

"Security Camera" was consistently rated by viewers as one of the most effective and memorable spots shown during the Super Bowl telecast. It went on to win numerous industry awards and was considered one of the most successful commercials of the 1990s. Observers gave it high marks for its humor, refreshingly low-tech approach, and use of old-time music.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Pepsi story began at the turn of the century, a time when the drugstore soda fountain was a popular place for people to gather for a refreshing drink. Pharmacists experimented with various mixtures of coca leaf and kola nut—thought to have extraordinary health benefits—in making their drinks. The soft drink industry was born when some of these "cola" drinks became so popular that their recipes were patented and trademarked for mass distribution to other drugstores.

During the 1890s Caleb Bradham concocted a new fountain drink in his drugstore in New Bern, North Carolina. His creation was a unique mixture of kola nut extract, vanilla, and rare oils that he named Pepsi-Cola.

He advertised it as being ''exhilarating'' and ''invigorating'' and claimed that it aided digestion. Sales began to grow, and in 1902 Bradham launched the Pepsi-Cola Company in the back room of his pharmacy and applied to the U.S. Patent Office for a trademark. At first he mixed the syrup himself and sold it exclusively through soda fountains. But he soon realized that there was a greater opportunity in bottling Pepsi-Cola so that people could drink it anywhere. Business boomed until the postwar years of 1917–18, when sugar jumped from 5.5 cents a pound to 22.5 cents a pound. For Pepsi-Cola, which was retailing at a nickel per bottle, this development spelled disaster. After collapsing into bankruptcy, the company changed hands four times before winding up in 1931 as a subsidiary of Loft Incorporated, a large chain of candy stores and soda fountains.

By the mid-1950s Pepsi was enjoying an extended period of growth and expansion. Product innovation continued, and in 1958 a distinctive new ''swirl'' bottle was introduced. That same year, a new advertising campaign, ''Be Sociable, Have a Pepsi,'' was launched. It was the first Pepsi-Cola campaign to focus on young people as the brand's major target and was soon followed by another youth-oriented campaign, ''Now It's Pepsi, for Those Who Think Young.''

In 1965 the Pepsi-Cola Company merged with the successful Dallas marketer of salty snacks, Frito-Lay, to form PepsiCo, one of the largest consumer products companies in the United States. Industry analysts began to observe that Pepsi, an upstart, aggressive company, was challenging the dominant soft drink company, Coca-Cola, with increasing success, and the media dubbed the competition the ''cola wars.'' In the 1970s ''The Pepsi Challenge,'' a landmark marketing strategy, was born when consumer tests confirmed that many people found Pepsi's taste to be superior to Coke's. ''The Pepsi Challenge'' used filmed taste tests to translate the results into advertising. The campaign was periodically reintroduced to new generations of consumers.

Throughout the 1980s a long list of stars lent their endorsement weight to Pepsi, including pop music icons Lionel Richie, Tina Turner, and Gloria Estefan and sports greats Joe Montana and Dan Marino. The actor Michael J. Fox appeared in a series of Pepsi and Diet Pepsi commercials, including the classic ''Apartment 10G.'' Michael Jackson starred in the first ever episodic commercial, ''Chase,'' which became the most watched commercial in history.

The 1990s ushered in a new generation of award-winning Pepsi advertising. Supermodel Cindy Crawford helped introduce a new package design, and Pepsi reminded people to ''Be young, have fun, drink Pepsi.'' Basketball star Shaquille O'Neal carried on Pepsi's tradition of youth-oriented ads, and by the middle of the decade Pepsi advertising was pointing out that ''Nothing Else Is a Pepsi.'' The period was an era of high-tech, effects-driven commercials, with the use of big-name celebrity endorsers de rigueur for spots aired during Super Bowl telecasts. It thus came as something of a surprise when Pepsi scored its biggest splash in years with the decidedly low-tech, celebrity-free ''Security Camera.''

TARGET MARKET

The Super Bowl, the annual National Football League championship game, was a chance for major U.S. advertisers to reach the largest captive audiences ever assembled. The telecast, which attracted an audience of more than 138 million viewers worldwide in 1996, was one of the few times a television set was watched by dozens of people in the same room.

Fortunes were sometimes spent on producing a single spot for the Super Bowl, and vast sums went toward buying time on the telecast. In 1998 the rate for a 30-second spot was about $1.3 million, up from $1.2 million in the previous year. The ultimate cost of airing a failed Super Bowl spot could be much more than the amount spent for air time or the millions spent to produce it. A flop could cost an ad agency business, force a marketing overhaul, and—at least temporarily—destroy a marketer's image.

On the other hand, well-done spots could be an effective way to get consumers to remember a product. This was especially true for young consumers, who in the 1990s showed an increased willingness to spend money on products like soda, chips, and candy. Thus, it was not surprising that teenagers were the target of many Super Bowl pitches from, among other products, Pepsi and Frito-Lay.

COMPETITION

Pepsi was often cited for the consistency of its message, and in the 1990s its advertising profited from the example of its closest competitor. In the 1980s Coca-Cola, stung by Pepsi's growth and prominence, had abandoned its century-old Coke recipe in favor of a new product formulated to taste more like Pepsi. Consumers, however, quickly rejected the new Coke, and in short order Coca-Cola was forced to reinstate the original product under a new name, Coca-Cola Classic.

After that debacle Coca-Cola concentrated on nurturing its brand identity. Introduced in 1994, its ''Always Coca-Cola'' theme succeeded by hammering its image-building message home to consumers. Clearly learning from the example of its rival, Pepsi strove for a similar consistency in its ''Nothing Else Is a Pepsi'' campaign. ''Security Camera'' was one in the second generation of Pepsi ads to end with this tag line. The ad effectively

BIRTHDAY BASH

Nowhere was the birthday of Pepsi-Cola more festively celebrated than in its birthplace of North Carolina. The state's celebration began on New Year's Day in 1998, 100 years after the pharmacist in New Bern had put the finishing touches on his unique concoction. The company sponsored special events and projects throughout both North and South Carolina as a way of acknowledging the region's support of the brand from its beginning.

"Generation Next" was given a special part in the anniversary. Pepsi bottlers in the two states gave one share of company stock to the first baby born at participating hospitals on New Year's Day. In addition, special packages containing such items as Pepsi baseball caps, bibs, and refrigerator memo boards were delivered to all New Year's Day babies and their parents. Nearly 135 hospitals participated in the project. Other activities included a commemorative poster contest, an art competition, a parade, a flotilla, a fireworks display, historical tours, and the exhibit of memorabilia called 100 Years of Pepsi.

blended humor with image building to contrast the styles of the two brands. "The campaign helps Pepsi's trademark, because Pepsi's trying to stay young and paint Coke as gray," said Tom Pirko, an industry consultant.

In 1995 Coca-Cola spent $125.7 million to advertise its regular and diet colas. By contrast, Pepsi's ad spending that year topped out at $122.9 million. Marketing experts were divided over which company was getting the most bang for its buck. Some pointed to above average sales increases by both regular brands and declared a stalemate. Others felt that Pepsi was winning the marketing battle in the United States, with Coke edging ahead in foreign markets.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Pepsi and Anheuser-Busch were the biggest advertisers for Super Bowl XXX, with four minutes of spots each. For Pepsi the telecast was the kickoff for its 1996 ad campaigns. Pepsi spent $5 million to create its ads and another $11 million or so to air them. The outlay represented 10 percent of Pepsi's 1996 television ad budget for its flagship brand.

"Security Camera" was the fruit of an unusual brainstorming session at BBDO. Michael Patti, executive creative director, and Don Schneider, senior creative director/art director, were conceptualizing a new Pepsi campaign when chief creative officer Ted Sann poked his head into the office and said, "Security camera." It was not the first time that, in the middle of creative discussions, Sann had thrown out a word or phrase that later came to form the essence of a campaign. "Ted will always come up with something valuable," Schneider told Shoot magazine, "whether it's the germ of an idea, adding to the idea or killing an idea that doesn't make sense."

As originally presented to Pepsi, the commercial had a different ending. In the original the Coca-Cola driver found himself caught by an old woman in his attempt to snatch a Pepsi from the display case. The gag ended with the guilty-faced deliveryman sneaking back later to retrieve the can. After shooting the commercial in this form, Patti and Schneider decided to go in a different direction. The new slapstick ending had the driver accidentally bringing down a torrent of Pepsi cans in his effort to steal a beverage for himself. Instead of having the driver slink back to grab a Pepsi, the new denouement, improvised by actor Bays, had the deliveryman putting a lone Pepsi back on the empty shelf before fleeing the scene of the incident. According to Sann, the success of the commercial lay in its use of showing, rather than telling, its story line. "Ads that depend on visual puns tend to be more successful," he observed.

"Security Camera" was the latest in a long line of quirky, humorous Pepsi ads, most of them created by BBDO. Pepsi's traditional reliance on humor dovetailed nicely with a growing trend in advertising. The increasing complexity of contemporary society was often cited as the reason viewers wanted to be amused by television commercials. During the first eight years that USA Today's Ad Track survey measured viewer response to Super Bowl ads, only one nonhumorous spot made it into the annual list of five top-rated ads. The success of commercials like "Security Camera" represented a victory of the new thinking in advertising over what had been the conventional wisdom in past decades. "For years, Madison Avenue was deathly afraid that humor would reflect badly on their products," observed comedian Marty Ingels. "But today, you have automatic product acceptance if you can make people laugh."

OUTCOME

USA Today's Ad Track rated "Security Camera" the number one commercial of the 1996 Super Bowl telecast. In fact, the Pepsi spot came within 2 percentage points of topping the Budweiser frogs as the most popular of all campaigns rated by Ad Track since 1995. About 45 percent of respondents reported that they liked the new campaign a lot. There was, however, a difference in the response of women and men, with 51 percent of women as opposed to 39 percent of men reporting high favorability.

"It's great because Pepsi confronts Coke," said 24-year-old Erich Peters, one of 60 randomly selected volunteers who used handheld meters to chart their second-by-second reactions to the commercials. "They acknowledge that Coke is there, but Pepsi shows why they are better." Perhaps more importantly, the spot was remembered by a majority of those who watched it. Creative Marketing Consultants of Southfield, Michigan, called 493 Super Bowl viewers after the game and asked them which companies or products they remembered being advertised during the telecast. Pepsi's "Security Camera" came out ahead, with almost 60 percent of survey participants saying that they recalled the spot.

Newsday assembled a panel of seven advertising and marketing executives to review the more than four dozen commercials aired during the Super Bowl telecast. Four of them chose "Security Camera" as their favorite spot. "It was simple and it wasn't overproduced," said David Angelo, executive vice president of Cliff Freeman & Partners.

Ad reviewers responded favorably to the spot as well. "It was true and it was good," Adweek magazine's critic wrote of the use of Williams's "Your Cheatin' Heart." Another reviewer dubbed the spot "comic genius," saying that it offered a "precious glimpse of humanity in black and white, reminiscent of Candid Camera." Advertising Age magazine named the "Security Camera" spot a category winner in its annual awards. "Coca-Cola better can that guy before BBDO and Joe Pytka strike again," the magazine's editors wrote.

BBDO was awarded a 1996 gold Clio for "Security Camera." At the 1997 New York Festivals, which honored television and cinema advertising and public-service announcements, BBDO won the award for best campaign for its work on "Security Camera" and two other Pepsi spots, "Frozen Tundra" and "Goldfish." The campaign was also honored as the best soft drink series. "Security Camera" took the gold as the best soft drink commercial, for best art direction, and as the best humorous spot.

THAT'S BRISK, BABY! CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

PepsiCo, Inc., entered the ready-to-drink tea market in 1991 when it joined with the Thomas J. Lipton Company (which later became part of Unilever) to form the Pepsi-Lipton Tea Partnership to market, produce, and develop tea-based drinks. Two ready-to-drink Lipton brands defined the partnership: Lipton's Brew (later renamed Lipton's Iced Tea), a bottled, hot-brewed tea; and Lipton Brisk, a lower-priced tea manufactured after the fashion of soft drinks and sold in aluminum cans. In 1996 Pepsi began backing the latter product with a high-profile campaign dubbed "That's Brisk, Baby!" Created by ad agency J. Walter Thompson, it featured model-animated versions of pop-culture icons.

Each of the TV spots hewed closely, throughout most of the campaign's seven-year-run, to a simple story line in which a downtrodden or exhausted celebrity (living or dead) was able to revive himself dramatically by drinking Lipton Brisk. Those figures made into latex-covered puppets for Pepsi's benefit included Frank Sinatra, Sylvester Stallone, Bruce Willis, Elvis Presley, James Brown, Willie Nelson, and Coolio, among others. In 2000 integrated print and online components each assumed a substantial role in the campaign, but the surreal TV spots were the centerpiece. The budget ranged between $7 million in 1996 and $21 million in 2002.

"That's Brisk, Baby!" was a hit among consumers—especially young adults—and among ad-industry critics. Lipton Brisk increasingly dominated in the ready-to-drink tea market through 2000, but its market share and sales volume began to erode in that year. Although PepsiCo allotted more advertising money to the brand in 2002 than in any previous year, Lipton Brisk posted a record 14 percent sales volume decline. The campaign was phased out, and the brand did little advertising in 2003 and 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The 1990s cola slump was attributed partly to the health consciousness of the decade. Baby boomers, now in their 40s and 50s, were rejecting traditional colas for more wholesome concoctions. Snapple Beverage Corporation pioneered a new kind of soft drink and inspired both Pepsi and Coke to improve the taste of ready-to-drink tea. According to an article in Marketing by Joshua Levine, the "so-called new age sodas" were expensive, with no preservatives or additives. In the 1990s, wrote Levine, "That's the highest kind of praise." The ready-to-drink tea market increased by 50 percent in 1991, and experts predicted that it would increase at least that much more over the following several years. In comparison cola sales increased just 1.5 percent in the same year. The market value for cola, however, was $34 billion, compared to a modest $600 million for tea. Still, both Pepsi and Coke were looking to the future when they began marketing tea in 1992.

Within a few years the tea market had exceeded expectations. By 1994 sales of ready-to-drink tea had reached the $1 billion mark, and on February 1, 1994, PepsiCo announced that earnings from its U.S. beverage division had risen by 17 percent to more than $900 million. Part of the increase was credited to the streamlining of packaging and to a cost-effective restructuring in which Pepsi eliminated 1,800 people from middle management and shifted them into sales. But according to analysts, the increase had more to do with PepsiCo's quest for new products.

According to a December 1992 article in Fortune, this hunger, nothing new for Pepsi, stemmed in part from a "pressure to catch up." In addition to Frito-Lay products, PepsiCo operated three profitable fast-food chains: Pizza Hut, KFC (formerly Kentucky Fried Chicken), and Taco Bell. CEO Wayne Calloway, who headed Pepsi from 1984 until 1996, regularly pushed managers to "rethink business." Under Calloway's leadership Pepsi started marketing All Sport in 1993 and testing a carbonated juice drink, Splash, in 1994. According to BusinessWeek, approximately two-thirds of Pepsi's volume growth in 1993 came from noncarbonated beverages. By 1997 Pepsi was marketing other alternative drinks, including Aquafina, a bottled water, and Frappuccino, a ready-to-drink coffee beverage created in partnership with Starbucks Coffee.

By the mid-1990s marketing experts feared that Pepsi had overextended itself with so many products that it could not concentrate on marketing its soft-drink syrup, which still constituted the bulk of its sales and profits. In 1997 PepsiCo made a decision to spin off its restaurant chains into a separate business entity so that, as BusinessWeek said, it could "focus on its core beverage and snack food business."

TARGET MARKET

In the "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign the Pepsi-Lipton Tea Partnership targeted consumers between the ages of 18 and 39. This was the age bracket that drank the most iced tea, said Jon Harris, public relations manager for the Pepsi-Lipton Tea Partnership. "However, when we do spots, we're appealing to all," he added. Mickey Paxton of the J. Walter Thompson agency described the campaign as having a lot of what he called "breadth." "We threw out a huge net," Paxton said. "Tea is not what you drink when you're 14, 15, 16 years old. You're not as concerned about health at that age. When you're 20 to 25, though, it's totally different."

The campaign was designed to appeal to those 20- and 30-somethings that Paxton believed were looking for truthfulness. "They are very sophisticated and cynical, and you need to put it in a package they can appreciate. 'Don't treat me like an idiot' is their message," he said. "At the same time, the campaign needed to be universal. Sinatra's music is appreciated by everyone, even the 20-somethings." Harris agreed: "The Lipton Brisk campaign matched the intelligence of today's young adult. It's about talking with them, not down to them."

The campaign was, in fact, especially popular and effective with younger consumers. In a poll of 356 adults conducted by Advertising & Marketing and USA Today's Ad Track, close to 40 percent of consumers aged 18 to 29 said that they liked the ads a lot, and 21 percent called them very effective. In contrast, 23 percent of consumers age 30 to 49 said that they liked the ads a lot, while 15 percent in that age bracket rated them as very effective. No one at the Pepsi-Lipton Tea Partnership was surprised by the success of the campaign. They had expected the target audience to react "very well," said Harris, "and we exceeded our expectations."

COMPETITION

Lipton Brisk's major competition was Coca-Cola's Nestea Cool, produced by Coca-Cola Nestlé Refreshment. While PepsiCo led the market in sales of ready-to-drink ice tea, Coke commanded the beverage industry overall, outselling Pepsi both in the United States and elsewhere. According to BusinessWeek, in North America in 1997 Coke had about 45 percent of the market share compared to Pepsi's 30 percent. In other countries Coke's lead was even greater. In Europe Coke had 45 percent of the market compared to PepsiCo's 15 percent, and in Latin America 55 percent to 18 percent. While Coke earned $3.9 billion on $18.5 billion in sales in 1996, PepsiCo's beverage department reported earnings of $582 million on $10.5 billion in sales during the same year.

I HEAR VOICES

Joe Piscopo, actor and stand-up comic, provided the voice for Frank Sinatra in the "Backstage" TV commercial. Piscopo's Sinatra imitation had been part of the performer's stand-up act for several years and was seen periodically on NBC's Saturday Night Live. Billy West played the part of Sinatra's rather eccentric agent. Sinatra's wife, Tina Sinatra, approved both the script and the voice for the commercial.

The following year, when Sylvester Stallone continued the campaign, he did his own voice. "Once we got Sinatra, Stallone was interested," said the campaign's creator, Mickey Paxton of the ad agency J. Walter Thompson. According to Paxton, being in the same category as Sinatra carried a certain amount of respect, and Stallone wanted to be a part of the series and the reputation it was earning. In "The Babe," the campaign's third commercial, Reggie Jackson and Yankees owner George Steinbrenner did their own voices.

By 1997 marketing experts believed that PepsiCo had renewed a commitment to give Coca-Cola a run for its money, much as it did during the 1970s with its "New Generation" campaign. The decision to spin off its fast-food operations indicated one step in that direction. "Shedding its restaurants will . . . give PepsiCo an opportunity to boost sales of its soft-drink syrups to other restaurant chains, which have been reluctant to sell Pepsi products because it . . . put money in their competitor's pockets," wrote Ken Sheets in Kiplinger's Personal Finance Magazine. In 1997 PepsiCo introduced a new logo (a globe) and color (blue), evident on the Lipton Brisk can. Both were part of PepsiCo's efforts to create "a corporate icon that's as powerful as Coke's script," wrote Nicole Harris in Business Week.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By 1996 Lipton Brisk commanded the number one spot in the ready-to-drink tea market. "We had the number one tea and we wanted to identify with the number one pop culture icons," Jon Harris, public relations manager for the Pepsi-Lipton Tea Partnership, said. "The biggest challenge of the campaign was deciding which icon to go with." Because Lipton Brisk was sold and distributed as a soda, the partnership felt that it needed a campaign that would appeal to the soda crowd. Marketing experts, in fact, felt that the campaign was successful because Lipton Brisk was marketed as a soda, not a tea. Tea was usually marketed for taste, quality, and processing. "Because we're competing in the soda-drinking category, we needed something that was fun and breakthrough," Paxton said. "People watching and being entertained and liking it." He added that "the whole idea was to go beyond cool, all the way to brisk. Cool people are flawed. People identify with them. And Frank Sinatra was the coolest person we could think of."

Paxton's belief that the younger consumers of the late 1990s were intelligent and high-tech led him to choose the sophisticated technology of stop-frame model animation, a method used in the feature-length films James and the Giant Peach and The Nightmare before Christmas. Each frame of the film was shot separately, with 24 frames every second. The actors were miniature latex figures. The only thing in color in the commercials was the blue Lipton Brisk can. "The black-and-white technology adds a bit of class," Paxton said.

The campaign's first spot, which debuted on June 17, 1996, showed the miniature animated Sinatra figure performing to a packed house of screaming fans, only to be too tired to do an encore. After a backstage swig of Lipton Brisk, the crooner burst out with "Ahhhh, that's brisk, baby!" and was ready to sing all night. A year later, in the week of May 8, 1997, a second commercial aired during the National Basketball Association Playoffs. This spot featured a model-animated figure of Rocky Balboa, the boxing hero of the 1976 film Rocky starring Sylvester Stallone. In the spot Rocky came up a winner because he drank Lipton Brisk tea at the 11th hour, which gave him the edge he needed to knock out his opponent.

In the spring of 1998 the campaign focused on legendary New York Yankees players and coaches of different eras, as an exhausted Babe Ruth was given an ice-cold Brisk by Reggie Jackson. Invigorated, Ruth hit the winning run. Yankees Billy Martin, Mickey Mantle, and George Steinbrenner made appearances in the spot.

The parody of pop-culture figures in a 1999 update of "That's Brisk, Baby!" was somewhat more pointed. One spot, released during that year's Oscar Awards broadcast, showed model-animated versions of the characters George and Louise Jefferson from the 1970s sitcom The Jeffersons accosting the actor Bruce Willis at a Planet Hollywood (a chain of celebrity-themed restaurants that the real-life Willis co-owned). "Willis," George Jefferson said, "you gonna put a George Jefferson display at Planet Hollywood, or what?" "Sorry, pal," Willis replied. "Stopped movin' on up in the '70s." The Jeffersons attacked Willis, and the action-movie star was able to vanquish them, after downing a Brisk, by causing a model whale to fall from the ceiling on top of them. Another 1999 spot showed the martial-arts movie star

Bruce Lee facing off with the fictional martial-arts hero the Karate Kid from the 1984 movie of the same name.

In 2000 Pepsi and J. Walter Thompson turned their attention once again, as in the campaign's introductory Sinatra spot, to the world of popular music. In the new commercial figures from different eras and genres—Elvis Presley, James Brown, Willie Nelson, and Coolio—sang and danced to a hip-hop version of the Presley hit "Jail House Rock." A series of four print ads, one devoted to each of the musical stars featured in the TV commercial, also ran that year, marking the campaign's first significant extension into print media. Internet became an increasingly important part of the "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign in 2000 as well, as J. Walter Thompson's interactive unit, Digital@JWT, won the campaign's Web duties away from online specialists Agency.com, whom Pepsi had initially chosen for the work. Banner ads on popular websites were used, while TV spots and print ads directed consumers to a Lipton Brisk website where the TV spot as well as behind-the-scenes features were available for viewing.

The most significant 2001 addition to "That's Brisk, Baby!" was an online trivia contest targeting 18- to 24-year-olds, in which the model-animated James Brown and Rocky figures served as hosts of a "Total Refresh Tour." The virtual tour consisted of pop-up ads placed on five websites popular among the target group; consumers had to answer trivia questions on each of the five sites in order to qualify for the promotion's grand prize, a Ford Focus automobile. In 2002 Pepsi phased out the model-animated concept by means of an elaborate in-joke. A spot that aired during that year's Super Bowl featured an animated model of the actor Danny DeVito leading a protest of Lipton Brisk's decision to fire its puppet-spokespersons because a reformulated version of the drink "tastes so good it sells itself." A second 2002 spot showed DeVito and James Brown revenging themselves on the brand by vandalizing a parked Lipton Brisk truck, destroying boxes and cans of the product with crowbars and bats.

OUTCOME

The campaign was well received by consumers and highly lauded within the advertising industry. It won several prizes in the creative category, including Clio, British Design and Art Direction, and ADDY awards. J.J. Jordon, executive vice president of J. Walter Thompson, said, "It's different than anything on the tube." The campaign was seen by its creators as honoring things that America's heroes stood for, and they hoped to align Lipton Brisk with that kind of image. "These are forever icons," said Jon Harris, "and so is Lipton tea." The puppets became celebrities in their own right. For instance, the NBC show Dateline commemorated Sinatra's 1998 death with footage of the model-animated Sinatra from the Lipton Brisk commercials, and Sylvester Stallone appeared on The Tonight Show with the puppet version of himself in hand.

"That's Brisk, Baby!" also played a substantial role in Lipton Brisk's sales success during these years, though that success slowed substantially toward the end of the campaign's run. During the seven-year life of the campaign, Lipton Brisk helped redefine the ready-to-drink tea market, which had previously been dominated by premium-priced, hot-brewed, bottled teas such as Snapple and Arizona. By 1999 the brand was firmly at the top of the ready-to-drink tea market, and many analysts credited the youth appeal of "That's Brisk, Baby!" for spurring consistent growth. In 2000, however, Lipton Brisk's sales volume began to decline, and these declines continued in subsequent years. In 2002, when Pepsi spent more to market Lipton Brisk than it had in any previous year—an estimated $21 million—the brand's sales volume declined by 14 percent. In 2003 and 2004 Lipton Brisk's marketing profile plummeted dramatically; aside from small-scale promotions targeting urban teens, Pepsi did little to advertise the brand.

THIS IS DIET? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Since the first diet soft drink was introduced in the 1960s, the diet category has been a vital part of the beverage industry worldwide. Diet Pepsi is PepsiCo's second-biggest trademark, a $3 billion brand. Yet this important brand has been at the mercy of cultural trends that have seen low-calorie sodas go in and out of style as Americans think and rethink the merits of a healthy lifestyle.

Throughout the 1980s diet soft drinks enjoyed robust sales, with the explosion of the exercise and health food industries. Diet sodas eventually cornered some 30 percent of the soft drink business. The biggest players in this category were the two giants, Diet Pepsi and Diet Coke, which together controlled about 75 percent of the soft drink business. Diet Coke invariably vied for market share on the basis of taste. Its signature slogan, "Just For the Taste of It," began running in 1982. The idea was to convince consumers that they did not have to sacrifice full cola enjoyment in their pursuit of a low-calorie soft drink. By contrast, Pepsi ads appealed to the confidence and self-image of the consumer, in what has been termed a "lifestyle" approach. The benefits of drinking Diet Pepsi were stressed with little mention of its taste. In the 1990s, however, those marketing strategies, and the fortunes of the diet category as a whole, changed dramatically.

By the middle of the decade, the diet category had been dealt a blow by the rising popularity of bottled waters and alternative soft drink flavors. Soft drink manufacturers also had lagged in their efforts to promote diet brands, perhaps in anticipation of the Food and Drug Administration's pending approval of new artificial sweeteners. Some cultural observers even blamed the declining sales on the emergence of a new hedonist ethic in American society, as abstinence, asceticism, and calorie counting went out and cigar smoking and sensual gratification came back in. The major players in the diet soda category had to rethink their marketing approaches with this new cultural move toward self-indulgence.

In April 1997 PepsiCo launched a massive creative campaign for Diet Pepsi, complete with a new tag line, packaging, and a co-promotion with Pepsi-owned snack chip manufacturer Frito-Lay. The new slogan, "This Is Diet?," heralded a national repositioning of the brand's look and image. The company introduced a colorful new bottle, which it termed "sophisticated and assertive, with classic good looks."

For the first time PepsiCo was selling its diet brand on the basis of its taste. A major confrontation with rival Coca-Cola was avoided only because Coca-Cola changed to a more lifestyle-oriented advertising strategy. This curious switch amused many industry observers, who wondered aloud whether consumers would even notice the change. As Diet Pepsi's sales continued to fall through 1998, it became increasingly clear that consumers had not noticed and that the "This Is Diet?" campaign alone would not suffice to turn around Diet Pepsi's market fortunes.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

During its first 65 years the Pepsi-Cola Company sold only one product—Pepsi. With the post-World War II baby boom, however, the way the nation thought of soft drinks changed along with other changes in the population. For many people, soft drinks had to be not just refreshing but also a complement to diet habits. So in 1963 the company developed a new low-calorie drink that carried the Pepsi-Cola name: Diet Pepsi.

First advertised alongside Pepsi, Diet Pepsi later took on an identity of its own. One of its earliest campaigns, "Girlwatchers," was built around a catchy jingle that became so popular it was released as a commercial record and hit the Top 40 list. The diet craze soon spawned other beverages as well. In 1975 Pepsi Light, with a distinctive lemon taste, was introduced as an alternative to traditional diet colas. In 1982 Pepsi Free and Diet Pepsi Free, the first major brand caffeine-free colas, were introduced.

In 1984 Diet Pepsi was reformulated with a new artificial sweetener, aspartame, which was marketed under the trade name NutraSweet. PepsiCo also ran a series of popular television spots to advertise the new formulation. Geraldine Ferraro, the first woman to run for the office of vice president of the United States, starred in a Diet Pepsi spot following her election defeat in 1984. In 1986 Diet Pepsi's television commercial "Apartment 10G," featuring actor Michael J. Fox, was widely hailed as the commercial of the year and became an instant classic. This superbly edited commercial forced Fox to defy rain, traffic, and a menacing gang to fetch a soda for his beautiful female neighbor. Pepsi was so thrilled with the response that the Family Ties star got a reported $2 million a year deal to star in three more spots. The same year saw the unveiling of a new Diet Pepsi logo.

In 1987 another Diet Pepsi commercial, "Mustang," became the first advertisement ever to appear on a movie video. In 1990 the singer Ray Charles joined Diet Pepsi campaign veterans Billy Crystal and Michael J. Fox in a new campaign called "The Right Ones." In 1991 the slogan for Diet Pepsi was modified as Ray Charles—backed up by the Uh-Huh Girls—starred in one of the most popular advertising campaigns of the time, "You got the right one baby, uh-huh!" That catch phrase remained in place until the launch of "This Is Diet?" in 1997.

Diet Pepsi sales remained stable despite fluctuations in the diet cola market. But market share sluggishness forced PepsiCo to reexamine its marketing strategy. In 1996 Diet Pepsi sales rose by 1.6 percent while overall volume in the soft drink market rose by 3.6 percent. Diet Pepsi's market share dropped from 5.8 to 5.7 percent, and the brand plummeted from fourth to seventh in brand rankings.

TARGET MARKET

Market research conducted by Coca-Cola in 1997 in preparation for its revamp of Diet Coke advertising shed light on the types of market groups targeted by both Diet Coke and Diet Pepsi. The three "attitudinal groups" of consumers were identified as "Fit and Confidents," "Reluctant Dieters," and "Aggressive Dieters." According to Coca-Cola company documents, "Fit and Confidents" were men and women in their 20s who kept their weight down but drank diet colas anyway to stave off unwanted weight gain. "Reluctant Dieters" were men and women in their 30s who were also known as the "Big Mac and Diet Coke" group because they watched their weight but valued taste as well. Finally, the "Aggressive Dieters" group was comprised of women over 35 who put a high value on staying in shape.

But diet cola drinkers who fit into those categories formed only part of the target market for Diet Pepsi. With dieting declining in importance on Americans' list of priorities, and with many more beverage options open for those who do prefer a low-calorie alternative, Diet Pepsi's marketing strategists faced the difficult task of persuading new consumers to try their drink. They decided that the best way to appeal to these consumers was on the basis of taste. The phrase "This Is Diet?" was crafted to appeal primarily to those who would not normally opt for a diet cola but who might do so if pleasantly surprised by its taste.

Not that PepsiCo gave up on dieters entirely. It hoped to win over health-conscious consumers by convincing them to drink Diet Pepsi rather than a competing beverage, whether that beverage was another diet soda, fruit juice, or bottled water. But in a climate of declining diet sales, the battle for new customers had become even more imperative than usual. Advertising, merchandising, and giveaways were all ways in which Diet Pepsi fought to persuade more Americans to start drinking its diet cola.

THIS IS SKUNKY?

One of the reasons PepsiCo was in such a rush to win FDA approval for its new artificial sweetener acesulfame potassium (also known as Ace K) was to provide an alternative for consumers turned off by aspartame, the sweetener used in Diet Pepsi. For years Diet Pepsi drinkers have complained about a certain "skunky" quality in the beverage when it has been left on the shelf for a while.

Some dismissed the skunkiness as a figment of peoples' imaginations. But studies have indicated that NutraSweet—the trade name of aspartame—can begin to taste bad in a relatively short period of time. Apparently, diet soda made with NutraSweet does not age well. In fact, as time goes by, the sweetener decomposes, allowing the other "flavor notes" in cola—mostly sour acids and bitter caffeine—to become more pronounced because they are no longer balanced by the sweetness.

Some health experts also have claimed that aspartame breaks down into chemicals that may be harmful to humans. They cite studies by the National Cancer Institute and the Washington University School of Medicine. But both the U.S. government and the manufacturer maintain that aspartame is safe and say there is no scientific evidence that it causes any health problems, even when it breaks down.

To deflect public criticism until Ace K could be introduced, Diet Pepsi began putting freshness dates on its cans. Consumers were informed that the quality of aspartame-sweetened products deteriorates within 60 to 90 days. The warmer the temperature, the quicker the deterioration. Consequently, experts recommend that diet sodas containing aspartame be stored in a cool place.

COMPETITION

While Diet Pepsi's market share slipped from 5.8 percent to 5.7 percent in 1995, Diet Coke was having its own problems. It too lost a percentage point off its share, though it remained fixed atop the market at 8.7 percent.

With the launch of the "This Is Diet?" campaign in April 1997, Diet Pepsi focused on the taste of the drink in a marketing campaign for the first time. A week later Coca-Cola announced that Diet Coke was dropping its 15-year-old tag line "Just For the Taste of It" in favor of the lifestyle-based "You Are What You Drink." A number of industry observers pointed out the irony of the two soft drink giants essentially flip-flopping their marketing positions in the course of a month.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"This Is Diet?" represented the biggest new campaign for Diet Pepsi since its "You've Got the Right One Baby, Uh-Huh" campaign in the early 1990s. PepsiCo's national repositioning of its Diet Pepsi brand was designed to emphasize what the company called Diet Pepsi's "refreshing great taste." The national ad campaign kicked off with two new commercials, "Interrogation" and "Wedding," that began running the week of April 15, 1997. Both spots were created by longtime PepsiCo Inc. ad agency BBDO Worldwide, New York, and were aired in 30- and 60-second versions.

In "Interrogation" NYPD Blue actor Dennis Franz played a tough cop questioning a suspect who is tied to a chair. He holds a cup of Diet Pepsi while he tries to intimidate the suspect, and eventually he tosses it in the man's face. The second spot, "Wedding," featured a young bride who had been left at the altar on her wedding day. In an effort to comfort his tearful daughter, the bride's father offers her a can of Diet Pepsi. Both commercials close with a moment of ironic humor as the refreshing taste of Diet Pepsi surprises the recipients, who then pose the brand's tag line question, "This Is Diet?"

In Great Britain the ads were given a distinctly British gloss. Three spots were created by Abbott Mead Vickers BBDO, doing creative work for Diet Pepsi in the United Kingdom for the first time since 1993. The spots featured a girl so swept away by the taste of her Diet Pepsi that she remains oblivious to all sorts of disasters taking place around her. The ads, which retained the "This Is Diet?" tag line, were an attempt to win over cynical British audiences who might not have related to the "Americanized" versions airing across the pond.

To further support its repositioning efforts, PepsiCo designed new packaging and logos for both Diet Pepsi and Caffeine-Free Diet Pepsi. The word "Diet" appeared in script in red and silver on Diet Pepsi cans, which had previously listed both words in blue block letters. The new logo was intended to be more contemporary and eye-catching, with new graphics that built on the brand's former look, adding depth to the design and creating a three-dimensional effect.

A Frito-Lay co-promotion was also part of the marketing effort. Beginning in late April 1997, Pepsi offered consumers savings on what it termed its "better for you" beverages and snacks. On specially-marked Diet Pepsi 12- and 24-pack cases, consumers received coupons for savings on low-fat snacks from Frito-Lay. Likewise, Frito-Lay also featured coupons on specially-marked packaging, offering savings on two-liter bottles of Diet Pepsi and on 12- and 24-pack cases. The campaign was supported with "This Is Diet?" point-of-purchase materials.

OUTCOME

"This Is Diet?" failed to stem the tide of declining sales for Diet Pepsi. As a sign of what has been called "cola fatigue," Coca-Cola Classic, Diet Coke, Pepsi-Cola, and Diet Pepsi all lost share to flavored drinks in 1997. Although Diet Pepsi's sales fell 1 percent, the other colas did post modest volume gains. Coca-Cola Classic's sales rose 2.5 percent, and Diet Coke's sales increased 0.9 percent, while Pepsi sales inched up 0.5 percent.

The "This Is Diet?" campaign also brought PepsiCo and the brand some unwanted publicity. The Dennis Franz "Interrogation" spot created controversy when the NBC network refused to air it on the grounds that it promoted rival ABC's series NYPD Blue. The commercials failed to win any industry awards and were generally deemed below the standards met by Pepsi and BBDO in previous campaigns.

A long-term solution for Pepsi's diet cola problems may have finally come in 1998 with the Food and Drug Administration's approval of acesulfame potassium, an artificial sweetener known more commonly as Ace K. The new sweetener, which has a longer shelf life than aspartame, was rushed quickly to market in a new low-calorie cola product, Pepsi One. The new drink scored higher among consumers than any new product PepsiCo had ever launched. Industry response was swift and favorable. "The diet segment has long needed a healthy dose of news and excitement," commented John D. Sicher, publisher of Beverage Digest. "I'm sure Coke is going to take a long, hard look at this."

NOW ARRIVING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For many years chicken has been a staple of the American dinner table. And one of the leading companies to produce and market poultry has been Perdue Farms Inc. of Salisbury, Maryland. The beak-like visage of its chairman and chief spokesman, Frank Perdue, had come to symbolize freshness and quality in the minds of many poultry consumers. In the 1990s, however, increased public awareness of food safety—spurred on by highly publicized outbreaks of food poisoning—threatened to erode the image of Perdue chickens as wholesome, healthful foods. Changes in federal food safety regulations enacted in 1996 were only part of the solution to this problem. Perdue took the health scare as an opportunity to reinforce the core image of its brand as one of ''golden yellow'' freshness. A series of print and television ads hammered home this message in whimsical, then alarmist fashion.

The television commercial ''Now Arriving'' was crafted in May 1997 by Perdue's longtime agency Lowe & Partners/SMS. It shows company president Jim Perdue—Frank's son and new company spokesman—being greeted in an airport by a Hare Krishna who offers him a marigold. Marigolds being an integral part of a chicken's diet, Perdue harangues the mendicant at length about the healthy feed regimen of Perdue's poultry.

Then in August 1997 Perdue took out full-page ads in major newspapers questioning the safety of its competitors' poultry products. ''Warning! Before You Buy Another Chicken, Read This!'' announced the banner headlines on the ads, which touted the chicken giant's policy of requiring its birds to ''pass 65 quality inspections, 22 more than the government's so-called Grade A standards.'' The attention-grabbing print ads were designed by R. C. Auletta & Company and signed by Jim Perdue. This and the Hare Krishna ad both addressed a specific market problem—the food safety concern. They also attempted to build brand value in a manner consistent with two decades of Perdue advertising. Most industry observers rated them a success on both fronts.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the late 1990s Perdue Farms was the second-largest poultry producer in the United States. Its branded chicken and turkey products were sold in retail supermarkets, grocery stores, and butcher shops in a market area comprising almost 40 percent of the nation's population. Perdue's food service chicken and turkey products were sold nationwide, and the company's products were exported to more than 30 countries. Sales for all operations exceeded $2 billion annually.

Founded as a table-egg poultry farm in Salisbury, Maryland, by Arthur W. Perdue in 1920, Perdue did not hire a second associate until 1930. In 1939 Arthur Perdue's 19-year-old son, Frank, joined the company as its third employee. In 1950 Frank assumed control of the company. Incorporated in 1953, the company began the process of vertically integrating its operations by constructing hatcheries, feed mills, and storage facilities. By the late 1960s this process was complete. Perdue Farms now had complete quality control of its poultry products.

In 1968 the Perdue brand was born as the company entered the highly competitive New York City broiler market. A limited radio ad campaign was launched, emphasizing the quality of the Perdue brand of broilers. That same year Frank Perdue assumed the role of lead company spokesman. Three years later Perdue Farms embarked on its first national advertising campaign, commissioning the fledgling New York ad agency of Scaly, McCabe, and Solves. Relying on the tag line "It Takes a Tough Man to Make a Tender Chicken," the print and television ads played off Frank Perdue's owlish persona. Scaly, McCabe, and Solves would oversee the Perdue account for the next 15 years.

The following year Perdue ads introduced another of the signature themes that would come to define the brand. In commercials that debuted in the Philadelphia, Providence, and Boston markets, the company compared its own fresh chickens to competitors' frozen birds in order to emphasize Perdue's trademark "yellow" freshness. A decade later the freshness and healthfulness was still front and center in the minds of company marketers. In 1983 Perdue became the first poultry processor to provide nutritional labels on its products. That same year Jim Perdue, son of Frank, joined the family business as a management trainee in quality control at the Salisbury plant.

In its pursuit of quality control Perdue initiated the Quality Improvement Process in 1985. An official Quality Process was also adopted at that time. Responding to the needs of health-conscious consumers, Perdue's feed researchers in 1986 implemented a new diet that substantially reduced fat in chickens. And a 1990 television commercial had Frank Perdue driving a nail into a birdhouse with a competitor's frozen chicken to highlight Perdue's freshness.

In 1991 Jim Perdue took over from his father. He was named chairman of the board of Perdue Farms, with Frank Perdue designated chairman of the board's executive committee. In one of his first moves, Jim Perdue green-lighted the launch of the "Fit 'n' Easy" line of skinless, boneless chicken and turkey products. Additional nutrition initiatives included expanded nutritional labels and a series of "Guides to Nutrition" for consumers. And when a drive to enhance safety capabilities was spurred by outbreaks of E. coli and salmonella in various parts of the United States, Perdue Farms capped its efforts in this arena with the establishment of a new microbiology laboratory in 1993.

The mid-1990s proved to be a period of important changes at Perdue. In 1993 ad agency Scaly, McCabe, and Solves merged with The Lowe Group to form Lowe & Partners/SMS. A concerned Frank Perdue expressed reservations about such a large agency paying sufficient attention to his account. After assurances from Lowe & Partners/SMS executives, the poultry scion agreed to stick with the reconfigured ad house.

In 1994 Perdue did some reconfiguring of its own. The poultry giant acquired Howell Farms, purveyors of the Cooking' Good chicken brand, as well as a processing plant in Milford, Delaware. Perdue Farms was now the second-largest poultry farm in the United States. That same year Jim Perdue made his commercial debut in a series of local television spots with his father Frank. The "Third Generation" spots eased the transition for Perdue to take over the role of company spokesman.

In the late 1990s Perdue's television spots continued to emphasize freshness and food safety. A 1996 spot showed Jim Perdue scolding one of his chickens for eating pizza instead of Perdue's own premium feed. These advertising initiatives were backed up by a highly publicized food safety information campaign. In 1996 Perdue began to implement the HACCP (Hazard Analysis Critical Control Point) program. The company also introduced a free educational booklet for consumers, "Perdue Guide to Safe Handling of Chicken and Turkey Products," and invited members of the press on food safety tours.

TARGET MARKET

"I think about germs," Terri Savage of Oklahoma City told USA Today in 1997. "I'm very aware of them. There are all kinds of little buggies you can get that get misdiagnosed as flu and what you've got is food poisoning." Savage was part of a growing number of American consumers who worried as much about food safety as good taste when they cooked. With the increased incidence of food poisoning in the 1990s, this group became a market that Perdue Farms wanted to sell itself to.

Accordingly the poultry giant's 1997 ads addressed the American consumer's legitimate fears about food safety. Polls showed that more than 65 percent of American consumers had some trepidation over food safety, with chicken one of the major areas of concern. Poultry sold in supermarkets is safe to eat if properly handled once it departs the production facility. But the birds must be thoroughly cooked, and any surface or utensil that comes in contact with the uncooked poultry should be washed with soap and hot water. With the

LIKE FATHER LIKE SON

Perdue Farms marked a milestone in 1994 when chairman Frank Perdue introduced his successor as chief company spokesman—his son Jim. In the initial television spot Frank described Jim as "a little project I've been working on for the past 45 years."

It was not the first time that two generations had crossed paths in the world of advertising. Bespectacled popcorn patriarch Orville Redenbacher began appearing in commercials with his grandson shortly before his death in 1995. And Frank Perdue himself once appeared in a print ad with his own father, company founder Arthur Perdue. But there are always risks when the baton is passed from a successful spokesperson to an unknown quantity.

Initially reluctant to try to replace his father, Jim Perdue was swayed by company research showing that consumers liked the idea of knowing who is behind a product. "It turned out it was very important," said the younger Perdue. "It's certainly the heritage of our company. And it's something that the consumer's having a harder time finding today. So that's why we decided to go ahead and try it."

In making the switch from father to son, Perdue's ad partners wisely decided not to try to transplant Frank's personality. "Jim is a little bit softer than Frank," said Sam Scaly, deputy chairman of Lowe & Partners/SMS. "He's not as hard-nosed." So out went the tag line "It Takes a Tough Man to Make a Tender Chicken." And in came the Hare Krishna's. The torch had most assuredly been passed.

overwhelming balance of its business in chicken, Perdue looked to reassure these customers about the freshness and safety of its products.

COMPETITION

The year 1996 was one of record growth for Perdue Farms. The company's acquisition of Howell Farms in January was the second-largest merger in poultry industry history, and the purchase of ConAgra's Milford, Delaware, processing plant vaulted the company to number two in the poultry sector behind Tyson Foods. The two industry leaders had always competed on chicken quality. But the food safety concerns of the mid-1990s gave Perdue a unique opportunity to exploit its advantage on freshness. Emphasizing this point of difference between the two brands was given further impetus due to a series of health scandals that bedeviled Tyson in 1997.

Just days before July 4th—one of the biggest barbecuing days of the year—U.S. Department of Agriculture inspectors found severe problems with chicken heading to consumers from the Tyson slaughtering and processing plant in Cumming, Georgia. Some birds had black machine grease on them, according to reports filed by inspectors. Others had infections under their skin or had been stored in temperatures favorable for bacterial growth. In what one Tyson employee contended was "an act of God," chickens spewed from a machine onto a broken conveyor belt too quickly for workers to handle, and birds were falling onto the floor and piling up. The birds that fell into the plant's drain water were destroyed. The others were reportedly cleaned up and sold. Inspectors classified those deficiencies as "critical," meaning the meat heading to the market was contaminated and, if eaten, would be certain to harm the consumer. The previous year Tyson Foods had accumulated 311 "critical" citations at its Cumming plant, which processes about 1.3 million birds a week.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Now Arriving" television ad, in concert with the surrounding print campaign, was what industry analysts considered the rarest of advertising creatures: a brand value spot that also addressed a specific market concern in an effort to build sales. The ads emphasized the traditional Perdue brand themes of freshness and nutrition while countering a growing public perception that commercial chickens may pose a health hazard. In an era when many creative shops seemed to opt for the offbeat and surprising in order to grab the attention of the public, the long-term, big picture thinking implicit in a brand value strategy sometimes got short shrift. As a result companies saw growth in short-term sales without adding any long-term value to their brand.

Novel or dramatic approaches in advertising often can be effective, but usually only if there is some element that reminds consumers what the brand is and what it represents. Often this is a long-term process in which a brand message is hammered into public consciousness repeatedly until the market gets the message. Marketing professors often explain this approach to students by asking them to explain their brand in a single word or phrase. In this way American consumers have come to understand that the Nike brand translates into athletic achievement, BMW is "the ultimate driving machine," and, in this case, Perdue stands for freshness and safety. If the ultimate goal is to get the customers to call up this word or phrase when asked what a brand represents, the first goal is get everyone in the marketing department to agree on this proposition. Unfortunately many creative shops never even bother to ask the question; consequently, a sense of continuity from one campaign to the next may be lost, and that which made the brand famous to begin with is the first casualty.

Every brand has a history—a personality profile in a sense. All brands also possess certain practical advantages that can be used as selling points to the consumer. But most analysts agree that advertising, if it is to be effective in the long as well as the short term, must do more than just lay out the product's pros and cons. A whimsical or offbeat ad is fine as long as its message is drawn from the brand's core identity in order to build the value of the brand.

Brand identity carries with it all sorts of benefits, attributes, and emotional associations. The brand's identity in the final analysis is what sets it apart from all other brands in its category; often called the sustainable point of difference, it is the one thing that customers seem to desire most. Companies that have isolated this "one thing"—in Perdue's case, freshness—and stick to it in their ads usually enjoy a long and healthy life. They can then use whatever gewgaws their creative agencies come up with to attract consumer attention and address specific market concerns, like food safety.

Perdue's print ad, which ran in newspapers in every major city east of the Mississippi, was designed to address consumer concerns (some apparently fostered by other poultry companies) that commercial chickens such as Perdue's were not safe. The testimonial, signed by Jim Perdue, read in part: "Every chicken we sell is raised on a strict, all-natural diet, full of things like corn, soybeans, and marigolds. And no hormones. Our fresh birds have always been fresh, never frozen." The ad failed to mention the fact that many supermarkets froze Perdue chickens once they arrived at the store, but this was tangential to the purpose of the ad, which was to reassure the public that Perdue meat was fresh.

In the television spot entitled "Now Arriving," the same message is relayed in a more humorous manner. Genial Jim Perdue—clearly helped by his physical resemblance to his father—reminds viewers of the healthiness of his poultry products by detailing their macrobiotic diet to an airport Hare Krishna. The fact that the Hindu mendicant flees Perdue and his accordion of chicken snapshots only reinforces the notion that Perdue is almost obsessive about the health of his chickens. The birds' golden yellow color is mentioned three times as a visual cue for consumers who will associate yellow Perdue packaging with healthiness and nutrition the next time they go shopping.

OUTCOME

Perdue's print and television ads of 1997 retained two essential elements from previous Perdue advertising: the use of the company spokesman and the emphasis on freshness, specifically the all-natural diet. In this way the ads remained consistent with the brand identity already established through years of successful advertising. "Perdue is fresh," the ads essentially said, and, concomitant with that, "Perdue is run by a nice man who would not allow you to eat anything that was not good for you." At the same time, however, the ads reacted to a specific consumer concern that threatened to affect chicken sales. In this rare case building long-term brand value and addressing short-term sales concerns went hand in hand.

THE POWER OF ZYRTEC CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Pfizer Inc. emphasized the strength of Zyrtec, a prescription antihistamine, with surreal advertisements that showed people fleeing from allergy-inducing animals and flowers, then taking Zyrtec and resuming their normal routines. ''When allergies are a nightmare, remember Zyrtec for fast relief,'' said one print ad. Since its U.S. launch in 1996, Zyrtec had experienced dynamic growth. This was due in large part to changes in the way that prescription drugs were marketed. After the U.S. Food and Drug Administration began allowing pharmaceutical companies to advertise prescription medications directly to consumers, demand for allergy drugs increased dramatically. Early promotions for Zyrtec and its rivals had mystified consumers, because marketers were not allowed to name a drug and specify what ailment it was designed to treat in the same ad. In August 1997 the guidelines for television commercials were revised, and drug companies began airing spots that described their products, their purposes, and possible side effects in more detail. ''The Power of Zyrtec'' campaign was developed by the Lyons Lavey Nickel Swift advertising agency and the New York office of Health Medical Consumer Advertising & Marketing. The campaign ran in print and broadcast media throughout 1998 and into 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pfizer was founded in Brooklyn, New York, in 1849 when Charles Pfizer began producing chemicals such as citric acid to add flavor to food. Because the company had difficulty obtaining limes and lemons from Italy during World War I, a way was invented to extract citric acid from molasses. The spacious vats used in that process were perfect for making large quantities of penicillin to treat the ill and wounded during World War II. By 1998 Pfizer was manufacturing dozens of drugs, which accounted for 85 percent of its sales. Its prescription medications included Norvasc for hypertension, Zoloft for depression, Zithromax for infection, Viagra for erectile dysfunction, Lipitor for elevated blood cholesterol, and Aricept for Alzheimer's disease. Pfizer also made nonprescription products such as Visine and OcuHist eyedrops, Unisom sleep aids, BenGay muscle rub, Plax mouthwash, Bain de Soleil sunscreens, and medicines for animals.

Zyrtec, first marketed in the United States in 1996, had been sold in other countries since 1987. Available in tablet form and as a fruity syrup, it was designed to be taken only once a day to provide relief from allergies for 24 hours. Ads for Zyrtec emphasized that the product was easy to use and caused only ''mild to moderate'' side effects, but because of restrictions imposed by the Food and Drug Administration, the brand's first television commercials did not state that Zyrtec was an allergy medication. One spot that aired early in 1997 featured a businessman scaling a rock wall. The camera rose to provide a bird's-eye view, revealing that the wall spelled out the brand name. A three-page print advertisement published in the spring of 1997 was equally surreal but less mystifying. It showed a man in a business suit using a rope to climb a giant sunflower. A headline on the second page said, ''Big Allergies. Big Relief.'' The text promised ''BIG relief'' and ''BIG value—lowest cost/day of widely prescribed branded antihistamines.'' The third page listed the drug's potential side effects in smaller print. ''The Power of Zyrtec'' campaign continued to emphasize the product's strength, but it focused on the word ''power'' instead of using size to convey that message.

PRODUCT DEVELOPMENT

Pharmaceutical companies often spent hundreds of millions of dollars to bring a drug to market, but only 30 percent of drugs approved by the federal government generated sufficient sales to make a profit. To increase the probability that a product would be successful, Pfizer's marketing team had an unusual amount of influence over which drugs the company would develop. When a new product was under consideration, the marketing staff ran complex cash flow models to predict how factors such as the drug's side effects might increase or decrease sales. If the analysis indicated that the company was unlikely to recoup its development costs, the drug was seldom placed on the market. Pfizer also employed more than 5,000 sales representatives to distribute free samples of its products and to discuss a drug's efficacy with doctors.

TARGET MARKET

Demand for pharmaceuticals in general increased dramatically after drug manufacturers were allowed to advertise their prescription products directly to consumers. The advertisements were part of a larger marketing effort in which sales representatives visited doctors and pharmacists to deliver free samples and discuss the results of clinical trials that measured the performance of each drug. Although doctors and pharmacists were targets of the advertisements, another primary audience was patients who would see the ads, realize that medication appropriate for their health problems might be available, and ask their health care professionals about the drugs. Of 40 million to 50 million U.S. consumers who suffered from seasonal allergies, an estimated 12 percent consulted doctors to alleviate their misery. About 18 percent endured the symptoms without taking any medication, while others relied on over-the-counter remedies available without a prescription.

Seasonal allergy attacks were the body's response to outdoor irritants such as mold spores and pollen from trees and weeds, which caused problems only during certain times of the year. Perennial allergy attacks were typically caused by dust mites, house pets, and other indoor irritants. The body produced a chemical called histamine to counteract the irritants, which caused sneezing, itching, watery eyes, swelling, and other unpleasant symptoms. Market research indicated that people with allergies were most interested in a strong product that would quickly relieve their symptoms. Zyrtec and other remedies known as antihistamines worked by blocking the release of histamine, but the drugs sometimes led to side effects such as rapid heartbeat, headache, or fatigue. Most advertisements for antihistamines explained briefly how the drugs worked, then mentioned the possible side effects as required by law. Ads for Zyrtec and its two major competitors emphasized that they were less likely than many other antihistamines to cause drowsiness. Zyrtec was effective against both indoor and outdoor allergens and could also be used to treat chronic itching and hives. In May 1998 Zyrtec became the first leading prescription antihistamine approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration for use by children two to six years old.

COMPETITION

In 1998 the leading brand in the $2 billion U.S. market for allergy drugs was Claritin, made by Schering-Plough Corporation, with U.S. sales of $1.1 billion. Claritin's sales of $908 million in 1997 were more than twice its 1995 revenues. Zyrtec was second with U.S. sales of $355 million in 1998 and $250 million in 1997. Allegra (made by a German company, Hoescht AG) was third in 1998 with U.S. sales of $324 million, up from $201 million in 1997 and $22 million in 1996. Flonase (an antiallergy nasal spray manufactured by a British company, Glaxo Wellcome PLC) had U.S. sales of $207 million in 1997. As sales skyrocketed, companies significantly increased their advertising budgets. The industry's direct-to-consumer advertising totaled $595.5 million in 1996, $843.9 million in 1997, and more than $1 billion in 1998, according to Competitive Media Reporting.

Schering-Plough spent $69 million to advertise Claritin in 1997, up 21 percent since 1996, with $31.2 million going for network television commercials.

Launched in the United States in 1993, Claritin had worldwide sales of $1.73 billion in 1997 and was the most popular antihistamine in the world by 1998. At that time it controlled more than 50 percent of the U.S. market. Schering-Plough was one of the first pharmaceutical companies to run advertising campaigns aimed at consumers, and Claritin was the first prescription product advertised on prime-time television after the Food and Drug Administration revised its direct-to-consumer advertising guidelines in 1997. Some of the brand's advertising in 1998 included appearances by Joan Lunden, host of the television program Good Morning America. These were the first direct-to-consumer advertisements in which a celebrity was allowed to endorse a prescription product.

Claritin's extensive promotional program included the "Blue Skies" campaign of print advertisements and television commercials, introduced in August 1997. An advertisement in Money magazine in March 1998 showed a profile of a woman's face gazing serenely at a powder-blue sky where a Claritin tablet hovered like the sun, complete with a pink and blue halo and white rays radiating outward. The headline read, "Escape the limitations of seasonal allergies." The ad urged consumers to ask their doctors about Claritin, a drug that would not make them drowsy and could be taken just once a day. The text emphasized that Claritin was the leading prescription antihistamine, that it caused few side effects, and that it was available only by prescription. The ad included the company's Internet address, a toll-free number to call for more information, and the tag line, "Nothing but blue skies from now on."

The third most popular prescription antihistamine, Allegra, was promoted with television commercials in which people exclaimed, "Ah, Allegra!" Ads for Allegra emphasized that the medication could enable allergy sufferers to experience outdoor adventures even during allergy season. Whimsical television commercials showed people wind surfing through a wheat field, snorkeling through a field of flowers, and skiing through a meadow in the summertime. Like Zyrtec, Allegra was introduced to the United States in 1996, three years after Claritin's launch. In 1997 Hoechst spent $64 million to advertise Allegra, a 220 percent increase since 1996, with $17.2 million going for network television commercials. Allegra had worldwide sales of $215.1 million in 1997, up from $17.3 million in 1996.

Hoechst also made Seldane but voluntarily discontinued that popular allergy medication early in 1998 because it caused serious heart problems if consumers took it with certain other drugs. Seldane had been launched in 1985 and was one of the first major prescription drugs promoted with direct-to-consumer advertising. After the Food and Drug Administration proposed in 1997 to remove Seldane from the market, Hoechst spent more than $20 million on advertisements that invited consumers to try its other antihistamine, Allegra, "a seasonal allergy medicine with the relief of Seldane but with more freedom." Meanwhile, the makers of Claritin ran two-page newspaper advertisements that said, "Seldane may no longer be an option. Claritin is a clear choice."

Zyrtec also competed with numerous nonprescription allergy drugs such as Nasalcrom, made by Pharmacia & Upjohn, Inc. A headline in a 1998 magazine advertisement said, "The best way to stop suffering is don't start!" The ad explained in detail that Nasalcrom could "flat-out prevent allergies" within a week of continual use, and the product caused no drowsiness or other unpleasant side effects. The text added, "It's so safe you can buy it without a prescription, at full prescription strength, and use it through the whole allergy season." The tag line was "Allergy prevention pure and simple."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In August 1997, when the Food and Drug Administration revised the guidelines that governed television commercials for prescription drugs, pharmaceutical companies were allowed to expand the content of their advertisements. Pfizer could move beyond its vague references to Zyrtec's "big relief" and discuss in some detail the product's effectiveness as an antihistamine. The Food and Drug Administration dictated that television commercials for prescription drugs had to explain some of the major risks that could result from taking the drugs. In addition, the commercials had to inform consumers where they could obtain more information regarding who should take the medication, how it would affect them, and what side effects it might cause. Because of the complexity of the regulations and the brevity of television commercials, most spots promoting prescription drugs were so-called "reminder" ads that did not go into much detail. Instead, they were designed to familiarize the public with the brand and encourage consumers to ask for it by name when they visited their health-care providers. Print advertisements were required to describe the uses, benefits, and risks of each drug in much more detail. They often included a second page of small type that provided much of the same information typically inserted into the drug's package for use by doctors and pharmacists.

Like earlier ads for the brand, "The Power of Zyrtec" campaign featured intriguing, surreal images. One television commercial used special effects and computer graphics to show a man opening his front door and facing the "nightmare of allergies." Pollen-producing vines and flowers grew in seconds from the cracks in his brick walkway. Dogs and cats joined the looming, threatening plants as they chased the man through his house. He ran into his bathroom and found a package of Zyrtec. The nightmarish plants and animals ran back outside, and the man went on with his day, protected by "the power of Zyrtec." The campaign included extensive print advertisements. One magazine ad featured a photograph of a man fleeing through his house, pursued by a dog, cat, flowers, and a vacuum cleaner. The headline read, "When allergies are a nightmare, once-a-day Zyrtec starts working fast." A smaller photograph showed the man hugging the same dog after taking Zyrtec. Another television commercial showed a woman encountering a poodle and then sneezing. A mob of animals came running from numerous doorways as she fled down a corridor. She rushed into a room, slammed the door behind her, and swallowed a Zyrtec tablet. In great relief, she went outside and met a woman carrying a poodle. The poodle sneezed, and the allergy sufferer smiled.

Direct-to-consumer advertising and other promotions for Zyrtec were handled jointly by Lyons Lavey Nickel Swift (a unit of Omnicom Group) and the New York office of Health Medical Consumer Advertising & Marketing. In 1997 Pfizer spent $103 million to advertise its prescription drugs directly to consumers, according to Competitive Media Reporting. Its advertising budget for Zyrtec was $53.5 million that year, with $4.5 million going for network television commercials. During the first five months of 1998, Pfizer spent more than $12.3 million to advertise Zyrtec, Schering-Plough spent $11.1 million to advertise Claritin, and Glaxo Wellcome spent $7.3 million to advertise Flonase, according to Scott-Levin's Direct-to-Consumer Advertising Audit.

OUTCOME

In February 1999 "The Power of Zyrtec" campaign won Health Medical Consumer Advertising & Marketing first place in the International Mobius Competition's pharmaceutical category. In September 1998 a nationwide survey of 2,000 physicians found that when patients asked for a drug by its brand name, they most often requested an allergy medication. Zyrtec, Claritin, and Allegra were among the four brand-name drugs requested most often. Three years after its introduction to the United States, Zyrtec was the second most popular prescription antihistamine in the United States. It had worldwide revenues of $416 million in 1998, up from $265 million in 1997 and $146 million in 1996. Forbes magazine reported that the wholesale drug market in the United States generated record revenues of $81 billion in 1998, an increase of more than 60 percent since 1994. Pfizer's pharmaceutical sales increased three times faster than the industry average. In 1998 the company had overall revenues of $13.5 billion, including $12 billion in drug sales, an increase of 26 percent since 1997. For the second consecutive year Fortune magazine included Pfizer on its list of the world's most admired companies. Forbes magazine named Pfizer the "Company of the Year" in January 1999. Chief Executive magazine listed the board of directors at Pfizer among the top five in the nation. At the end of 1998 Pfizer was the third largest pharmaceutical enterprise in the world, up from thirteenth in 1990.

SCHICK TRACER FX ADS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Warner-Lambert was acquired by Pfizer Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1995 Schick, a unit of the Warner-Lambert Company since 1970, introduced the Tracer FX, a permanent razor that was designed to alleviate shaving irritation. The product was targeted at young men with sensitive skin and was positioned against the Gillette Company's Sensor Excel, which incorporated a number of high-tech safety and comfort features. To launch the Tracer FX, the J. Walter Thompson advertising agency created a campaign that showed the model Magali shaving her face and flirting with male viewers. The ads were a hit, but the Tracer FX itself did not live up to consumers' expectations, and once the launch campaign had run its course, Schick shifted its marketing focus to other products.

By mid-1997, however, the Tracer FX was back in the spotlight as Warner-Lambert launched a $100 million global campaign to burnish the overall Schick image among younger consumers. J. Walter Thompson developed the new campaign, highlighted by slick television spots relaunching the Tracer FX with the tag line "The Feel of Smart Design." The spots featured hard-hitting sound tracks and male athletes using high-performance equipment—a pitch to the consumer who it was hoped would choose the Tracer FX. Schick also continued its ongoing association with the National Basketball Association (NBA), focusing particularly on rookie players. By 1998, in an intensely competitive and growing shaving market, the Tracer FX was enjoying a significant increase in sales worldwide.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From 1923 on, the Gillette Company was the leading manufacturer of razors, holding steady at about 65 percent of the wet-shaving market throughout the twentieth century. Schick was consistently a distant second to Gillette in razor sales, historically with about 15 percent of the overall market. And while Gillette was a product innovator, Schick was a follower, albeit a fast one.

In the mid-1970s the Bic Corporation shook up the shaving market with its introduction of the disposable razor. Gillette quickly developed its own disposable razor, a move that Schick followed. By the late 1980s disposables represented 60 percent of all razors sold, and because the profit margin on these units was low, shaving product companies began looking to create alternative sales with permanent razors. In 1990 Gillette introduced the Sensor, a high-tech, premium-priced razor with two independently suspended blades that were designed to give a "contoured" shave. The company took a risk by spending large sums to develop the product. It then increased its marketing budget by more than 40 over the previous year, throwing nearly all of its advertising behind the Sensor and abandoning its advertising for disposable razors. The strategy worked as men picked a closer shave and a higher price over cheaper convenience. As Lawrence Ingrassia reported in the Wall Street Journal in 1990, "Gillette says it sold 20 million Sensor razors in its first eight months on the market, which was its original goal for the entire year." The shaving wars of the 1990s had begun.

Schick saw the wisdom of selling an appealing, premium permanent razor, and in 1991 the company came out with the Tracer, a variation on the Sensor and an attempt to capture some of Gillette's market. The Tracer was described as a razor with blades that adjusted "to follow the unique contours of your face"—terms that essentially paraphrased the description of the Sensor—and it was aimed at what Schick called "young, active, risk-takers." Schick put a reported $12 million toward advertising for the Tracer and an additional $17 million into waves of hard-hitting promotions that included product samples, coupons, and rebates. Bruce Cleverly, a marketing vice president for Gillette, told the Wall Street Journal that his company was "delighted" that Schick was introducing a new permanent razor system, as it "reinforces the success of our business strategy." Meanwhile, Gillette countered Schick's move with coupons of its own and stepped up its ad campaign with the tag line "Gillette: the best a man can get."

By late 1993 Chain Drug Review was stating that "retailers say that in general men are demonstrating heightened interest in their appearance and a greater willingness to broaden the range of grooming products they buy. Manufacturers have responded with line extensions and a slew of value-added promotions." Manufacturers did indeed respond. In 1994 Gillette introduced the Sensor Excel, which had a rubber strip and other innovations that promised a closer, safer shave. The item was a tremendous success and was often credited with driving an overall boost in sales of shaving products during the 1990s. Schick's Tracer FX followed in 1995. Like the Sensor Excel, the Tracer FX also represented a product upgrade with advanced technology. But rather than focus on technological superiority and safety as the Sensor advertising did, Schick chose to pursue the niche of men with sensitive skin. Mediaweek quoted a Schick senior product manager as saying that the improvements on the Tracer answered "an important consumer need."

The razors themselves featured flexible blades, a skin-conditioning strip with aloe and vitamin E, a rubber skin guard, and an ergonomically designed handle. These attributes, while similar to the Sensor's, were used to distinguish the Tracer FX as the only razor designed specifically for sensitive skin. At the same time the brand's high-tech name and special packaging put it in direct competition with the design advancements of the Sensor Excel. In addition to capitalizing on a niche market and competing with the Sensor Excel, the Tracer FX also afforded Schick more shelf space in retail outlets. Too, the Tracer FX's packaging and marketing were used to distinguish the brand from other, less expensive Schick products.

For the Tracer FX launch in 1995, Schick ran the Magali ads. After an initial surge, sales dropped off, however, and Schick discontinued the campaign. Then, in 1997 the Tracer FX was relaunched (with a slightly revised design) as part of an overall master branding effort, this time carrying the tag line "The Feel of Smart Design." The $100 million Schick put toward its overall campaign in 1997 and 1998 represented a tremendous increase in spending on advertising, which in the previous year had been estimated at approximately $70 million.

TARGET MARKET

The same brand of razors was typically not marketed to both men and women, and the initial target for the Tracer FX was men with sensitive skin. Men in general accounted for about 70 percent of razor sales in the United States, and Schick's research found that more than 50 percent of men felt that they had sensitive skin. Those identifying themselves as having sensitive skin skewed slightly younger than average—18 to 34.

For its branding campaign Schick used the relaunch of the Tracer FX to position itself as hipper and trendier than the broad-based Gillette and to draw in younger men. In 1997 a Warner-Lambert vice president explained to Stuart Elliott of the New York Times, "Our target has been more of a general audience of males 18 to 54. Now we are focusing on a younger target audience, 18 to 24."

COMPETITION

In the world of razors Gillette was the name marketers had to contend with. In fact, Gillette's preeminence in the market was so complete that in some countries the very name had become synonymous with "razor." Gillette built its dominance by aggressively anticipating trends and constantly developing high-quality products in all niches of the shaving market. The company's research and development of products was a model for the industry, and Gillette often spent many years and millions of dollars before introducing a new item. In the 1970s Gillette shrewdly began protecting its ideas by designing products that required complicated machinery for their production and thus were difficult for competitors to copy.

When the Sensor—with its independently suspended blades—was introduced in 1990, it had gone through a decade of development and had cost Gillette $200 million, including the equipment needed to manufacture it. Schick later won rights to the Sensor patent but was unable to replicate the product because the company did not have the laser-welding machinery needed to reproduce the Sensor technology. Although Schick captured some market share with the Tracer and Tracer FX, its premium-priced products never caught up with Gillette's Sensor and Sensor Excel.

BETTER ADVERTISING THAN TECHNOLOGY

When the Tracer FX was originally launched in 1995, it was positioned to appeal to shavers on the basis of skin sensitivity rather than on the technological advancements around which the rival Gillette Company touted its Sensor products. The television spots showed 19-year-old French fashion model Magali lathering up her face and shaving it as she teased male viewers about their shaving woes. Magali purred lines like "You guys are so sensitive." Or, as she shaved under her chin, she asked, "Is this the sensitive part, right here?" The voice-over interspersed bits of information about the razor's design "for a smooth shave with less irritation." Magali finished the ads by wiping water from her upper lip and saying, "Are you the sensitive type? I like that."

The Magali campaign was considered a success in launching the Tracer FX. The ads generated media attention, and trial sales of the handle and initial blade were good. Manufacturers realized their greatest profits in repeat sales of blades, however, and because the product did not perform especially well, the Tracer FX failed to win over long-term customers. A J. Walter Thompson executive said, "The advertising worked, but the technology didn't."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Following the Magali campaign, Schick conducted extensive research and found that younger men were dissatisfied with the shaving products available to them. These men were more than willing to try alternatives and were even seeking new products. With the opportunity open to build brand loyalty among a group still forming its shaving habits—men 18 to 24—Schick relaunched the Tracer FX with an image campaign. "The Feel of Smart Design" was reflected in the ads, which dispensed with the traditional man-at-the-sink shaving spots. Instead, a high-performance sports image was employed to appeal to the target audience and to draw a link to the improved control offered by the new product.

Sports popular with younger men formed the motif for the campaign. The artistic, stylized television ads, which showed athletes windsurfing, skateboarding, skiing, golfing, and performing other feats, were fast paced. They had techno-rhythm music in the background and a dark contemporary look. J.J. Jordan, a J. Walter Thompson vice president, told the New York Times, "There are hallmarks of great, functional design, especially for men, in the world of sports," and the Schick ads "clearly communicate" that spirit. For instance, a diver bouncing off a board into a pool paralleled the "flexing action" of the Tracer FX. Jordan also explained that the ads conveyed the idea that the product was "distinctive, [looked] cool and [had] a smart reason for being that way." Since good design was a central concept of the campaign, it was thought that older customers would not be put off by the spots and might even find them appealing.

In tandem with the advertisements, Schick continued its ongoing sponsorship of the NBA Rookie Game and recruited spokesmen from among the players. The company also became the premier sponsor of the NBA's website and launched a website for Schick separate from the Warner-Lambert site. Special promotions, such as a package of Tracer FX razors and a free can of another company's shaving gel, helped sales in 1998 as well.

OUTCOME

Schick's overall branding campaign was considered to be a success, with the Tracer FX in particular catching consumers' attention. In a review of shaving products, a writer for the Los Angeles Times said that the "smooth Tracer FX handles like a Porsche on the Grande Corniche." Throughout 1998 sales of Schick's Tracer FX system and refills grew. In addition, the introduction of the Schick Protector bolstered the brand's market share. The Protector, with a new technology of wire-wrapped razors and a striking, curvy red handle, was touted as a product for sensitive skin and was intended to compete with Gillette's forthcoming MACH3. By 1999 Drug Store News was reporting that "though Gillette dominated the refill razor category, Warner-Lambert's Schick showed strong increases for 1998, a performance attributed to relaunches and strong ad support." Shaving systems generally were Warner-Lambert's best-performing category for 1998.

Despite these successes, however, Gillette's 1998 introduction of the MACH3 overshadowed all other developments in the shaving category. Gillette spent a reported $750 million to develop the MACH3's ultra-thin, diamond-carbon-coated blades. The investment paid off. Launched in mid-1998, the MACH3, which was more expensive than the Sensor or Tracer lines, ranked third in sales for the year.

SEE YOU LATER, ALLIGATOR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Warner-Lambert was acquired by Pfizer Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1990 the Warner-Lambert Company began an advertising campaign that starred eye-catching alligators to illustrate the beneficial properties of its product, Lubriderm Hand and Body Lotion. The campaign, which continued throughout the 1990s, featured the reptiles walking or swimming near beautiful women who had soft, moisturized skin. To emphasize that the alligators were metaphors, the J. Walter Thompson ad agency used stark settings with white backgrounds that symbolized the clean feeling of Lubriderm lotion. Because most other advertisements for hand and body lotion centered on women applying the product to their skin, the unusual alligator campaign set Lubriderm apart from its many competitors. The ads emphasized the therapeutic and cosmetic properties of the brand by contrasting the scaly skin of alligators with the smooth skin of the women using Lubriderm, and they created an icon that would make consumers think of Lubriderm when they needed a moisturizer. The company credited the ad campaign with helping to heighten customer awareness of the brand and increase sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Lambert Pharmaceutical Company had been established in 1881, and Warner Drug Company had been founded in 1886. The two companies merged in 1955. Warner-Lambert became one of the world's largest marketers of prescription drugs, consumer health products, and confectionery. In 1997 the company's products included Listerine mouthwash, Trident and Dentyne gum, Certs breath mints, Benadryl antihistamine, Sudafed nasal decongestant, and Schick shavers. The original Lubriderm hand and body lotion had been developed in 1946 as a compounding base for dermatologists, and in 1950 Warner-Lambert began marketing the product to pharmacists in the United States. Lubriderm was first marketed to the general public in 1980. During the next two decades, the company introduced several line extensions including a body bar, a loofah bar, a bath and shower oil, a moisturizing gel cream, and a lotion for sensitive skin. Some of those products were subsequently discontinued.

Because the first ads for Lubriderm had been aimed at dermatologists, they had focused on its therapeutic value as a remedy for dry skin. Later, when the product was sold directly to consumers, advertisements mentioned its cosmetic value as a lotion that could improve the appearance of skin, but the fact that it was recommended by dermatologists was still an important element in the marketing strategy. Advertising campaigns helped publicize each line extension as it was introduced. The basic Lubriderm formula was upgraded in 1996, new graphics were designed for the product's packaging, and new advertisements were developed in 1997 to promote the reformulated base lotion.

TARGET MARKET

Lubriderm was sold primarily to women 18 to 49 years old, but a line extension was being developed for launch in 1998 for women slightly older who were concerned about the aging effects of the sun's ultraviolet rays. A large percentage of the general population suffered from some degree of dry skin, and more than 80 percent of women in the United States used hand and body lotion once or twice daily. Consumers wanted a long-lasting product that would soothe and moisturize without leaving a greasy residue that would rub off on their clothing.

PHARMACEUTICAL INNOVATION

During the 1800s William R. Warner, one of the founders of Warner-Lambert Company, invented sugar-coated pills to mask the bitter taste of medicines. In 1879 the company's other founder, Jordan Lambert, developed the first surgical antiseptic, which saved the lives of many patients undergoing medical operations. By 1997 the product had become the world's most popular mouthwash, Listerine Antiseptic.

By emphasizing that Lubriderm was the brand of skin and body lotion most often recommended by dermatologists, Warner-Lambert called attention to the product's therapeutic, healing qualities. The ads also pointed out Lubriderm's cosmetic benefits by showcasing beautiful models with smooth, radiant skin. The campaign assured women that the lotion would feel clean, not greasy or clammy, and many of the ads mentioned water or showed photographs of it to emphasize Lubriderm's ability to hydrate the skin.

COMPETITION

Traditionally, mass-marketed lotions had been advertised with an emphasis on their cosmetic benefits—such as making skin soft and attractive-while premium lotions that sold for a somewhat higher price had stressed their therapeutic, healing properties. Lubriderm products had 5.6 percent of the premium market in the United States, putting the brand in third place in the hand and body lotion category. The top-selling lotion was Vaseline Intensive Care, made by Chesebrough-Pond, a division of Unilever. In second place was Jergens, made by Andrew Jergens Company, a subsidiary of Kao Corporation. Other major competitors included Suave Skin Therapy Lotion, made by Helene Curtis, Inc., another division of Unilever; Curel, made by Bausch & Lomb, Inc.; and Nivea, made by the Beiersdorf Company. Annual revenues in the hand and body lotion category totaled $808 million.

The Procter & Gamble Company's Oil of Olay brand led a related category, facial skin care, with a market share of 24.5 percent. L'Oreal's Plenitude brand had 17.1 percent, and Unilever's Pond's brand had 14.7 percent, according to Information Resources, Inc. The world's best-selling brand of skin care products was Nivea, but in the United States the brand's top line extension, Nivea Visage, was ranked sixth with only 4.5 percent of the facial skin care market. In 1997 Beiersdorf ran a $20 million campaign on television and in print media with the tag line "Nivea Brings Your Face to Life. Nivea Brings Your Skin to Life." Samples of the product were distributed in conjunction with the ad campaign. After the ads ran, Nivea's annual sales were $21.5 million, an increase of 5.2 percent.

Another facial skin care brand, Revitalift, was promoted in 1997 by a $25 million ad campaign. The antiaging cream, which was part of L'Oreal's Plenitude line, had led the category in 1996. The corrective, antiwrinkle cream category had been pioneered during the early 1990s and was the most rapidly expanding segment of the skin care market. It served primarily women who were at least 40 years old. Also in 1997 L'Oreal Plenitude FUTUR.e, a moisturizer that contained vitamin E, was launched with a $20 million advertising campaign on television and in print media.

The top-selling hand and body lotion, Vaseline Intensive Care, was publicized in March 1997 with Chesebrough-Pond's sixth annual "Skin Awareness Month." The $6 million promotion featured advertisements in the magazines Better Homes & Gardens, Woman's Day, Family Circle, Good Housekeeping, Reader's Digest, and TV Guide. A toll-free consumer hotline, referrals to dermatologists, and displays at retail outlets were also included. Other advertisements for the brand used sandpaper to represent the feeling of dry skin. Products in the Vaseline Intensive Care line had been reformulated in 1995, the brand's packaging had been redesigned, and its advertising budget had been increased to $25 million, up from about $8 million previously. In addition to hand and body lotion, Chesebrough-Pond offered a line extension called Vaseline Intensive Care Moisturizing Body Wash.

Commercials for the second-place brand in the hand and body lotion market, Jergens, focused on the touchably soft skin of a mother and her daughter. The company also offered line extensions in closely related market categories. The company had invigorated the $158 million liquid body cleanser market with the introduction of Jergens Refreshing Body Shampoo in 1994. The next year it launched Jergens Naturals with Baking Soda Deodorant Skin Care Bar. For consumers who preferred products that cleansed and moisturized at the same time, Jergens had introduced a water-activated gel called Shower-Active Moisturizer. The company had also restaged Jergens Aloe & Lanolin and Vitamin E body wash bars.

Another competitor, Procter & Gamble, led the body wash category in 1996 with a market share of nearly 30 percent, thanks largely to its Oil of Olay 2-in-1 Moisturizing Body Wash. Its $50 million marketing plan revolved around the tag lines "You May Never Need a Body Lotion Again" and "Moisturized Skin No Bath Bar

PROFESSIONAL RECOGNITION

In 1997 the advertising industry bestowed an ADDY Award for excellence on "Smart Woman," a print advertisement in the "See You Later, Alligator" campaign for Lubriderm hand and body lotion.

Can Touch." During 1997 Procter & Gamble continued its Marketing Breakthrough 2000 program, which had been launched in 1995 in an attempt to lower marketing costs from 25 percent to 20 percent of net sales. For the fiscal year ended June 1997, the company's marketing costs were 24.3 percent, up from 24.1 percent in the previous year. By the end of 1997 Procter & Gamble had abandoned the program, but it was still cutting costs, including its advertising budget.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Like many of its competitors, Warner-Lambert had developed line extensions of its original hand and body moisturizer over the years. But in 1997 the Lubriderm bath and shower oil, body bar, and loofah bar were discontinued, and marketing efforts concentrated on the basic skin therapy lotion, which had been upgraded in the previous year. A campaign budget of $16 million was allocated for television and print advertisements in the United States. "Big Drop," the only television spot that aired during 1997, began with a woman's face reflected in a drop of water while she asked, "What exactly is clean moisture? Well, it's what you'll find in a new, even better Lubriderm." The drop of water reflected the words "New, Clean Moisture Formula" and the Lubriderm logo on a bottle of lotion. The camera panned across the woman running her hands over her arms, legs, and shoulders while she continued, "And it's best defined by a feeling. A feeling that's almost invisible on your skin. One that feels distinctly less greasy, even though it's working every bit as hard as always. So it's recommended by dermatologists even more than before. New cleaner-feeling Lubriderm." The drop of water reflected more words from the Lubriderm bottle and the woman's face, and finally the drop fell into an alligator's eye. As the reptile strolled away, the woman's voice concluded, "See you later, alligator. Hello, clean moisture." The commercial aired primarily on network television during the day and during prime time, but it also ran on cable and syndicated television.

During 1997 several print ads also ran in magazines with large female readerships, such as Better Homes & Gardens and Cosmopolitan. One ad featured a model in a pose that emphasized her bare arms and legs as she lounged beneath the words, "Moisturizers and dieting. Live by the same rules. If it's greasy, stay away." Another ad read, "Your moisturizer shouldn't make you feel clammy all over. That's what first dates are for." A third said, "Some moisturizers act like your ex-boyfriend. A little too clingy." In each ad smaller type at the bottom read, "Lubriderm's clean moisture formula is a hardworking, fast-absorbing lotion that helps get rid of dry, ashy skin without feeling greasy or clingy. That must be why it's the #1 leading moisturizer recommended by dermatologists." Each print ad featured a picture of a bottle of Lubriderm lotion next to the tag line "See you later, alligator," but none actually showed the alligator.

The company developed at least one new spot each year in the "See You Later, Alligator" campaign, and there had been variations on the central theme since the advertisements were introduced in 1990. One of the first television commercials had featured attractive women swimming underwater with live alligators. Another showed models and alligators in surroundings that looked like glamorous bedrooms. All the spots referred to the alligator in some way, but by 1997 the creature had become a signature at the end of some television spots instead of the central figure it had played in earlier commercials. In some spots the alligator made only a brief appearance, walking away as the tag line "See You Later, Alligator" was spoken. Other spots featured the alligator throughout.

The idea of using alligators as an eye-catching visualization for rough, scaly skin had originally been suggested by a copywriter at J. Walter Thompson. Alligators are frequently thought of as being dry, rough, and scaly. In addition, "See you later, alligator" is a familiar phrase, an informal way of saying good-bye. Therefore, the tag line invited the consumer to say good-bye to dry skin by using Lubriderm. In developing the advertisements, the challenge was to achieve a highly stylized tone yet deliver a message to which consumers could relate. The simple white backgrounds of the ads helped emphasize the clean, nongreasy nature of Lubriderm lotion, and the campaign emphasized that Lubriderm was the brand most often recommended by dermatologists. "Lubriderm always tries to stand for the highest standard of therapeutic moisturization. We're not the housewife in the kitchen talking about dry elbows," said Wendy Trees, an account executive with J. Walter Thompson. Because the ads were strikingly different from those of Lubriderm's numerous competitors, they helped the brand stand out and created a memorable image that would make consumers think of Lubriderm when they thought of relieving dry skin.

OUTCOME

It took time for consumers to become accustomed to the alligator ads and to associate them with Lubriderm after the campaign was launched in 1990. But the company stayed with the same advertising theme, and eventually the alligator became Lubriderm's signature. ''Consumers love the alligator. Our sales have increased since we've been using it. It's highly effective,'' said Trees. In a 1997 survey by USA Today's Ad Track, 22 percent of respondents said the ads were effective, although only 11 percent said they ''liked the ads a lot.'' Respondents 18 to 24 years old gave the campaign higher scores; 36 percent said it was effective, and 26 percent said they liked the ads. Only 8 percent of men liked the ads, compared to 13 percent of women. Nearly half of the 1,002 respondents recalled seeing the ads at least three times.

Warner-Lambert reported record income in 1997, including a 1 percent increase in its $1.4-billion U.S. consumer health care operations. That segment of the company had grown 3 percent in 1996. The company's worldwide sales were $8.2 billion.

SUPER FANS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Warner-Lambert was acquired by Pfizer Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

With a budget estimated at $20 million and a campaign overseen by J. Walter Thompson USA of New York, the Warner-Lambert Company in mid-1998 launched a series of television spots for its Rolaids brand antacid tablets. The campaign, Rolaids' first since 1996, focused entirely on television as opposed to print, and it represented a return to traditional themes for the brand, including an emphasis on sports. Hence the title ''Super Fans.''

Recent years had seen a number of changes in the highly segmented category of digestives, including an increased emphasis on the calcium content of antacids. Much more portentous for antacids, however, had been the introduction of histamine 2, or H2, acid blockers. Whereas antacids neutralized acids in the stomach, H2 blockers actually stopped the production of stomach acid. According to Advertising Age in 1996, industry experts believed that sales of H2 blockers alone would reach nearly $2 billion by 1998.

With the advent of this innovative over-the-counter treatment for heartburn, Rolaids and its traditional competitors had struggled to keep up with a changing market. ''Rolaids is such a classic brand,'' Christina Villante of J. Walter Thompson told Michael Wilke in Advertising Age at the outset of the 1998 campaign, ''but got lost in the last couple of years with the H2 blockers, which really changed the game. Everyone in the category was re-evaluating their advertising, and that cost them equities. But if you ask consumers about Rolaids, they remember the spelling and the sports, so it's a natural to go back to that.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The word ''spelling'' was a reference to Rolaids' classic advertising campaign from the 1970s, ''How do you spell relief?'' As millions of TV viewers during that decade learned, the proper spelling was ''R-o-l-a-i-d-s.'' Spots dramatized this in numerous ways, for instance with a waitress scrawling the seven-letter name on an order pad or a coach in a locker room spelling it out on a chalkboard. Indeed, the themes of food, sports, and tension repeatedly came together in the heyday of Rolaids advertising, as they would again with the 1998 ''Super Fans'' campaign.

Warner-Lambert introduced Rolaids in 1954 with a single flavor, peppermint. In 1988 it extended its line to include assorted fruit flavors, but from the beginning its emphasis was on scientific claims rather than on taste. Hence the much-touted promise that ''Rolaids consumes 47 times its weight in stomach acid,'' illustrated in television ads with a dramatization using a simulated Rolaids tablet and a bucket of colored water. The company backed up the claim with detailed information regarding clinical testing and research.

In the mid-1980s, as competitors touted the calcium content in their products, Warner-Lambert let it be known that Rolaids had always contained limestone, which included calcium. The company also touted other health factors in its product, including the fact that Rolaids was aspirin-, cholesterol-, and fat-free.

TARGET MARKET

Assessing the market for H2 blockers and antacids in 1997, Al Heller of Drug Store News could as easily have been citing the potential for the resurgence of antacids when he noted "the ongoing high-stress lifestyle of Americans, which makes stomach remedies as essential a personal accessory as a pen, pager, or credit card. Digestive diseases impair more than 2 million Americans and result in 200,000 absences from work each day, according to the Glaxo Institute for Digestive Health, Digestive Disease National Coalition. As a nation, we experience 32 million new cases of frequent heartburn each year, another 20 million of irritable bowel syndrome and gallstones, and 4 million ulcers."

Warner-Lambert itself conducted a study, the results of which it reported in October 1998. In line with its use of sports imagery in the "Super Fans" campaign, the company undertook what it called the "Rolaids Fanatical Fan Sports Ritual" survey, which found that one of every six sports fans had at some time experienced acid indigestion, heartburn, or sour stomach. The survey found that, of some 100 million sports fans in the United States, one in five described themselves as "fanatical fans" who would "do practically anything to support their favorite teams."

To an extent the survey was tongue-in-cheek, but it also presented a number of realities that served to indicate the target market for Rolaids. A press release announcing the survey results indicated that "fanatical fans" typically experienced the worst indigestion when their teams lost, of course, but win or lose, "the foods that baseball fans traditionally enjoy in large quantities—such as hot dogs and other fatty foods—are also associated with heartburn. During the 1998 baseball season, it was predicted that a record 26 million hot dogs would be eaten in the nation's 30 stadiums."

The somewhat humorous portrayal of sports fans called to mind a popular Saturday Night Live skit from the early 1990s in which comedian Chris Farley and others conducted a talk show devoted exclusively to the Chicago Bears football team and the Chicago Bulls basketball team. In the midst of talking about "Da Bearce" and "Da Bullce," as they called them, Farley and company consumed vast amounts of fatty foods and alcohol, which led to regular "heart attacks" in the middle of the talk show. Ironically, the 33-year-old Farley's own unhealthy lifestyle caught up with him in December 1997, when he was found dead in his Chicago apartment.

HOW DO YOU SPELL ACCOUNT?

In October 1998 former advertising sales representatives of Turner Broadcasting held a 20-year reunion. Among them were Larry Diveny of Comedy Central, Lou LaTorre of Fox Sports Net, and Harvey Ganot and John Popkowski of MTV. Because of another commitment, Ted Turner himself could not attend the reunion, which was held at Denim & Diamonds in New York City, but as Bradley Johnson speculated in Advertising Age, "Ted stories no doubt will abound." Johnson relayed a particularly popular anecdote concerning Turner and Warner-Lambert, makers of Rolaids.

At the time the many sales alums had gone to work for Turner Broadcasting in the late 1970s, Turner was already a well-known millionaire man-about-town in Atlanta, but he was far from the billionaire he would become. There was no Jane Fonda, no CNN, no Turner Classic Movies; indeed, there were few of the fixtures that would come to characterize the Turner legend. Turner's broadcast "empire" consisted of little more than flagship station WTCG (later WTBS) in Atlanta, and cable TV itself was struggling at the fringes. Nor could the industry count on Turner's magnetism to increase its exposure, since Turner himself was not the national celebrity he would later become. But he was well on his way.

WTCG desperately needed the advertising dollars of consumer products giant Warner-Lambert, and Turner managed to get a meeting with the top brass at the company. On the date of the appointment, however, he showed up looking ill, holding his stomach and moaning. He did this until one of the Warner-Lambert executives asked him what was wrong, whereupon Turner—no doubt with a sly smile—said, "I need a Rolaids." He got the account.

The participants in the putative talk show looked like a portrait of Rolaids' target market: middle-aged men who lived a high-tension lifestyle. Of course, Rolaids was also marketed to women, but the greater presence of male figures in commercials suggested a heightened focus on men. Age was also a factor, for as Heller noted, future increases in the digestives market would "be fueled by the continued aging of baby boomers, who have greater needs for the products as they cross the 50-year threshold."

COMPETITION

Perhaps it was fitting that in a market in which sales were motivated in part by physical and mental tension among users, competition itself was tense. Among Rolaids' many competitors were the liquid antacids Maalox, produced by Ciba-Geigy, and Procter & Gamble's Pepto-Bismol. Even more direct competition came from SmithKline Beecham's Tums, like Rolaids a chewable antacid.

When the calcium craze hit during the 1980s, Tums took advantage of the new trend not by changing its product—which already contained calcium—but by touting that fact aggressively in its marketing efforts. This led to a staggering 50 percent increase in sales during 1985, knocking Rolaids out of first place among antacids. Warner-Lambert responded by producing a sodium-free version of Rolaids and by introducing calcium supplements, but its marketing placed much less emphasis on calcium content than did the advertising for Tums.

A decade later, not only Rolaids but all traditional antacids were reeling from the introduction of entirely new competitors: H2 blockers, led by SmithKline Beecham's Tagamet HB. As Leon Jaroff of Time wrote in 1995 in describing Tagamet's forceful marketing, "Suddenly a roar issues from the TV set. On the screen, a giant tongue of flaming gases erupts from the sun, and one bold statement after another is superimposed on the solar surface: 'The idea behind it led to the Nobel Prize in Medicine,' reads the first, followed by, 'It's the most prescribed medication of its kind.' . . . Then, against the glowing corona of a totally eclipsed sun, 'And now it's available without a prescription.' "

Introduced in 1977, Tagamet enjoyed patent protection for 17 years, and during the 1980s it became the first drug ever to earn $1 billion in a single year. But as the end of the patent approached in the early 1990s, SmithKline Beecham applied for and received federal approval for an over-the-counter version. Around the same time Johnson & Johnson/Merck presented Pepcid AC, and British pharmaceutical company Glaxo Wellcome introduced Zantac 75. Warner-Lambert held U.S. marketing rights for the latter, but at the same time it also began to market Rolaids more aggressively.

By 1996, when Warner-Lambert launched a new advertising campaign for Rolaids, the fortunes of the once-powerful brand had fallen greatly. Having fallen from first place a decade before, it now held just 4.6 percent of the $1.45 billion digestives market, placing it 10th after Pepcid AC, Tums, Mylanta (McNeil Pharmaceuticals), Tagamet, Imodium (McNeil), Pepto-Bismol, Zantac 75, Maalox, and Alka-Seltzer (Bayer). Of the growth in H2 blockers, a Warner-Lambert executive told Chain Drug Review, "I can't think of any one category that has grown like this."

MARKETING STRATEGY

During the late 1990s still more H2 brands entered the market, and antacid manufacturers in 1996 spent a total of $55 million in advertising to shore up their brands by "setting them apart from the many acid blockers," as Wilke wrote in Advertising Age. A brand manager for Maalox told him, "It's self-preservation from the OTCs [over-the-counters] against the H2s." Of that $55 million, Warner-Lambert devoted a hefty portion—$14 million—to a new Rolaids campaign orchestrated by J. Walter Thompson.

Rolaids, which had recently added magnesium to its product, used advertising to highlight quick relief and acid absorption. Still sales declined, and by early 1997 Rolaids had less than a 4.4 percent market share. Worse news appeared on the horizon in early 1998 when Pepcid introduced chewable H2 tablets, thus "targeting loyalists of roll antacids such as Tums and Rolaids," according to Tan Sheet.

Hence the change of advertising strategy by Warner-Lambert in mid-1998. The company increased media spending for Rolaids by $6 million, to $20 million, and as Wilke reported, "look[ed] to the brand's past for its first new campaign since 1996." Once again, Rolaids advertising would contain the tag line "R-o-l-a-i-d-s spells relief" and would emphasize sports. The thrust of the advertising would be different, however. The 1970s spots for Rolaids had included sports figures such as then Los Angeles Dodgers manager Tommy Lasorda, whereas the 1998 campaign would poke gentle fun at sports fans themselves. As always, the focus would be on television, with no print ads planned.

Thus in October 1998, when Warner-Lambert reported the results of its "Rolaids Fanatical Fan Sports Ritual" survey, the company noted that "'fanatical [sports] fans' seem to already be fans of Rolaids, as represented in the current Rolaids ad campaign that personifies the fan in action—body painted, cheering, and finding relief from acid indigestion in Rolaids."

OUTCOME

At the time of Rolaids' return to the roots of its classic campaign, Paul Kelly of Silvermine Consulting told Wilke in Advertising Age, "I'm surprised they're abandoning the quick relief message already, since from a marketing standpoint that's how everyone is dividing out." The last phrase presumably referred to the fact that, just as the growth in H2 blockers had tapered off, the decline in antacid sales had leveled off as well. In spite of this settling in the market, however, Rolaids sales had dropped still further by the middle of 1998, when the company adopted its new campaign.

The results of the campaign had not materialized by mid-1999, and the lack of reporting on the subject made it difficult to discern the future direction of Rolaids. As early as mid-1997, when the market was still decidedly bullish on H2 blockers, one industry analyst had suggested to Heller that Rolaids still had a well-defined and assured niche: "There is still a place for conventional antacids in the convenience part of the [digestives] market. It's easier to carry with you a roll of Tums or Rolaids in that form than it is to carry individual doses of Tagamet, which are tablets but not chewables. This is still an important aspect."

Although the advent of chewable Pepcid AC had placed even that aspect of Rolaids' appeal in jeopardy, the time-honored brand enjoyed the support of a company with a long history of marketing consumer products and substantial resources to devote to that marketing. The $20 million Warner-Lambert put into Rolaids in 1998 said volumes concerning how the company felt about its 42-year-old chewable antacid brand.

VIAGRA LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In March 1998 Pfizer Inc., the world's largest research-based pharmaceutical company, won FDA approval of its anti-impotency drug, Viagra. Because of the nature of the condition it was meant to treat, Viagra came to market that April amid a frenzy of publicity, much of which mocked impotency and its treatment. Though the publicity helped Viagra to reach record-setting sales figures before any advertising appeared on behalf of the drug, Pfizer wanted to exert control over the Viagra image. After waiting for the media buzz to wane, the company, along with health-care advertising agency Cline, Davis & Mann of New York, broke its first ads supporting the drug's launch in late June 1998.

The first series of ads, having an estimated price tag of $25 million, were branded print spots featuring older dancing couples and the tagline "Let the Dance Begin." These were followed, in the spring of 1999, by a television commercial featuring former senator and presidential candidate Bob Dole speaking frankly about his experience with erectile dysfunction, as impotence came to be known. The Dole spot, which did not mention Viagra, was complemented by TV versions of the "Let the Dance Begin" ads, which, though they used the Viagra name, included no dialogue or explanation of the product's use. By sidestepping a full explanation and identification of Viagra in these two different ways, Pfizer was able to avoid an FDA-ordered listing of the drug's side effects. The cost of the 1999 television campaign was estimated at $35 million, and the TV spots were supported by the ongoing print segment of the campaign.

Viagra sold extremely well both before and after the advertising campaign's debut, and its introduction, along with the initial advertising behind it, was credited with helping to destigmatize impotency. The focus on elderly people in both the dancing spots and the Dole spots, however, risked alienating younger men. In following years Pfizer attempted to appeal to a broader age range of men by enlisting younger sports celebrities as Viagra spokesmen.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Started by immigrant cousins Charles Pfizer and Charles Erhart in 1849, Pfizer helped usher in the age of modern medicine by answering the U.S. government's call, during World War II, to devise a process for mass-producing penicillin. During the early 1960s Pfizer was the primary North American manufacturer of the Salk polio vaccine, and during the 1970s and 1980s an increased commitment to research and development led to the discovery of major medicines and fueled the company's global expansion. During the 1990s the pharmaceutical giant launched blockbuster drugs Zoloft, Lipitor, and Norvasc, among others.

In 1997 the U.S. Food and Drug Administration relaxed its policies regarding the television and radio advertising of prescription drugs, and drug company advertising expenditures increased dramatically as a consequence. Long reliant on marketing drugs primarily to physicians and other medical professionals, pharmaceutical manufacturers now began to advertise their products directly to consumers, much as other consumer goods had always been advertised. Though restrictions remained regarding the disclosure of side effects, and though most companies continued to submit their advertisements for FDA approval before airing them, direct-to-consumer pharmaceutical advertising quickly became ubiquitous in America, putting patients, rather than their doctors, increasingly in the position of deciding which drugs might best satisfy their needs.

In March 1998 the FDA approved Pfizer's anti-impotency drug Viagra, the first easily administered treatment for an affliction widely assumed, until then, to be essentially untreatable. Viagra's groundbreaking and controversial nature, unaided by any consumer advertising, made it an immediate pop-culture phenomenon upon its April launch.

TARGET MARKET

Pfizer allowed the initial media buzz to abate somewhat before launching its first advertisements on behalf of Viagra in late June 1998, a delay which likewise allowed for FDA approval of the ads. Some questioned the necessity of advertising a drug that seemed fully able to sell itself, but Pfizer, enlisting agency Cline, Davis & Mann, wanted to exert control over the Viagra image in the face of widespread, often uncomplimentary commentary about the drug. The primary audience in the campaign's early stages was older males. Among males over 65, the incidence of impotence ranged from 15 to 25 percent.

Pfizer's use of focus groups to prepare for the first Viagra campaign led to the conclusion that, as company executive David Brinkley told Advertising Age, "people want a positive message, they don't want to be reminded of their dysfunction and already know how devastated they are by it." Individuals in the focus group likewise "responded to the 'connectedness' the drug helped them feel with their partners." The first branded print ads, using the tagline "Let the Dance Begin," conveyed this positive, dignified message of connectedness, positioning Viagra as the answer to the romantic problems impotence can cause, through photos of mature couples dancing cheek to cheek alongside an image of the distinctive diamond-shaped blue pill.

The campaign's television launch, in the spring of 1999, brought to center stage, through the figure of former senator Dole, the message that erectile dysfunction was a condition to be taken seriously rather than dismissed or stigmatized. The unbranded Dole spot, which had a print counterpart, took the form of a public-service announcement and did not even mention Viagra, with the elderly senator speaking frankly about his own erectile-dysfunction experience and urging afflicted men to seek treatment. Branded 15-second TV spots, again featuring the dancing couples and using no dialogue or voice-over, broke soon after, reinforcing the image of Viagra as a path back toward romantic union.

COMPETITION

Viagra was preceded to the anti-impotency treatment market by a variety of less effective therapies and drugs that could be delivered only via injection. The first treatment not requiring injection—a urethral suppository named Muse, manufactured by VIVUS, Inc.—debuted in January 1997 and generated 17,000 prescriptions a week as well as a rapid increase in the price of VIVUS stock in its first year. The 1998 Viagra launch, however, proved devastating for VIVUS. Muse prescriptions dropped to 3,000 a week, the company lost $80 million, and VIVUS stock fell from its peak price of $40 per share to $2.

For five years Viagra remained the only impotence treatment available in pill form. As such it established a virtual sales monopoly in its category beginning at the time of its launch, but in late 2003 two new rivals touting advantages over Viagra entered the market behind high-profile launch campaigns.

DOLE'S OTHER "LITTLE BLUE FRIEND"

For the 2001 Super Bowl, Pepsi and BBDO New York used Bob Dole in an ad that directly parodied Dole's work for Viagra. The spot showed Dole on a beach with a golden retriever, mimicking imagery associated with pharmaceutical ads. Dole said, "I'm eager to tell you about a product that put real joy back into my life . . . What is this amazing product?" The product was Dole's "faithful little blue friend" Pepsi, of course. After cutting to a store interior in which a man told viewers to "ask your local convenience-store clerk" if Pepsi was right for them, the camera returned to Dole, who was shown doing backflips on the beach and saying, "I feel like a kid again."

Bayer AG and GlaxoSmithKline plc teamed up to market Levitra, which was touted as a faster-acting alternative to Viagra and which could be, unlike Viagra, taken with food. The partner drug companies anted up $6 million a year for a three-year Levitra sponsorship of NFL football, as well as an additional $10 to $15 million in media buys, and enlisted former Chicago Bears and then-current New Orleans Saints coach Mike Ditka as Levitra's spokesman. The resulting TV, print, outdoor, and promotional campaign, dubbed "Tackling Men's Health," broke in time for the fall 2004 football season. Within four months of its launch, Levitra had amassed a 14.4 percent market share.

After winning FDA approval for Cialis in late 2003, Eli Lilly and Company partnered with ICOS Corp. to comarket the drug. The Cialis launch campaign cost an estimated $100 million and broke during the broadcasts of the two NFL conference championships on January 18, 2004, before Cialis joined Levitra as an advertiser on that year's Super Bowl broadcast. Cialis distinguished itself from competitors by touting its 36-hour window of effectiveness, compared with the four or five hours promised by Viagra and Levitra. In order to make this claim in its "Bathtubs" television ads, Cialis broke with Viagra and Levitra to run spots featuring not only the product name but also an explicit explanation of its use. This was seen as a risky move because of FDA requirements calling for a corresponding focus on a long list of side effects, which could negatively affect viewers' perceptions of the drug. Cialis likewise targeted a key portion of its target market with a 2004 sponsorship of the PGA Tour. By October of 2004, Cialis was the number two anti-impotency drug, with an estimated 17.8 percent market share, compared with Viagra's 68.9 percent and Levitra's 10 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The unprecedented media attention generated by Viagra's April 1998 launch was both a help and a hindrance to Pfizer as it set out to define the brand on its own terms in July of that year. On the one hand, as Pfizer executive Brinkley said, "It became OK overnight to talk about erectile dysfunction." Moreover, as consultant Al Ries of Ries & Ries told Advertising Age, "Publicity created the credentials for the brand before the advertising ran, so when you saw the ad you were already convinced that if you took one of the pills, you'd see a bodily reaction." On the other hand, much of the publicity was negative. Viagra and impotency became prime material for late-night monologue jokes, making Pfizer worry that many men, seeing that the condition had been dismissed as trivial, might yet remain unwilling to seek treatment.

A month after Viagra's launch, while Pfizer and Cline, Davis were still planning the drug's first advertisements, former senator Dole, as a guest on CNN's Larry King Live, revealed that he had participated in clinical trials for Viagra after prostate surgery and that he considered it "a great drug." Pfizer and Cline, Davis were surprised by the conservative icon's readiness to speak about such a sensitive matter, and they approached the former senator about doing an awareness campaign to supplement the ads then in production. He agreed to the proposal.

The consumer campaign broke in late June 1998 with the reserved, relationship-centered "Let the Dance Begin" print ads as well as educational spots, which appeared in magazines including Newsweek, Time, Life, and U.S. News & World Report. Then in March 1999 the Dole spot marked Viagra's television launch. It was supported by branded 15-second Viagra advertisements as well as the ongoing print portion of the campaign. The branded TV spots used the concept of dancing couples from the initial print campaign and included no dialogue, voice-over, or text explaining Viagra's function. Because of the early publicity Pfizer could count on consumers knowing the Viagra name and its intended use, so the branded spots needed no explanation and therefore could forego any FDA-mandated listing of side effects.

The Dole commercial likewise was informed by the early publicity and was, in a different way, able to steer consumers toward Viagra without having to mention any side effects. Though Dole directly addressed the condition of erectile dysfunction, there was no mention of the Viagra brand. The spot was framed, instead, as a public-service announcement in which Dole, against a stately senatorial-looking office backdrop, urged men suffering from erectile dysfunction to learn about all available treatment options. Viagra was, however, the only treatment then available in pill form, and its universal brand recognition made it the logical beneficiary of the pitch.

Dole opened with the word "courage" and then explained, "When I was diagnosed with prostate cancer, I was primarily concerned with ridding myself of the cancer. But secondly, I was concerned about postoperative side effects." Dole acknowledged, after introducing the previously little-known term "erectile dysfunction" in place of the less palatable "impotence," that "it's a little embarrassing to talk about E.D., but so important to millions of men and their partners . . . and there are many treatments available." Dole also referred viewers to an 800 number for the American Federation of Urological Disorders hotline.

OUTCOME

Before the advertising campaign broke, Viagra had already set a prescription-drug launch record by amassing $182.2 million in sales in its first two months on the market. In its nine months on the market in 1998, Viagra's total sales reached $788 million, and in following years its sales topped $1.5 billion. It became one of the most well-known brand names in the world, changing "pharmaceuticals as a business by virtue of the rapidity and degree to which it was absorbed into popular culture," according to Pfizer marketing executive Pat Kelly.

The advertising that supported Viagra's launch, particularly the Dole commercial, was credited with helping to destigmatize the condition of impotence, but both the branded spots and the Dole spot were blamed for attaching an "elderly" image to the medical condition and brand, thereby threatening to alienate younger men. In 2000 Pfizer began to phase out the Dole work as well as the branded spots, in favor of a "Faces of ED" theme, which featured men from a range of age groups. In 2001 Pfizer enlisted NASCAR driver Mark Martin, then in his early 40s, as a Viagra spokesman. A TV spot showing Martin's Viagra-sponsored car making laps around a track ended with Martin, on-screen, taking off his helmet and asking, "Who'd you expect? Bob Dole?" In 2002 Pfizer continued to run advertising that appealed to a broader range of men than the initial campaign had, using then-38-year-old baseball player Rafael Palmeiro in TV spots for the drug.

TRUSTED BY THE ONES YOU TRUST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In January 1998, Pharmavite launched a $17 million national television, print, and radio campaign for its Nature Madeline of vitamins and nutritional supplements. Created by Leo Burnett, the campaign featured the tag line "Trusted by the ones you trust" in order to highlight the brand's endorsement by the American Medical Women's Association (AMWA), an organization of female doctors and medical students that lobbied for women's health issues. The "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign was Pharmavite's largest marketing effort ever, necessitated by the increasingly crowded field in the natural care market of vitamin and herbal supplements.

Although Nature Made was the leading supplement brand in terms of retail sales, several major pharmaceutical companies announced their entry into the sector in 1997 and 1998. Private-label brands produced by chain stores such as Wal-Mart were also growing in popularity and profitability. Moreover, as aging consumers became more interested in using herbs and vitamins as alternatives to conventional therapies for the treatment and prevention of disease, the vitamin industry underwent significant changes. The most popular products previously had been multivitamin supplements designed to boost overall health. By the late 1990s, however, consumers began to seek out individually packaged vitamins and minerals that were believed to address specific ailments or body systems. Pharmavite hoped that the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign would defend Nature Made's position in this lucrative but shifting market.

In two television spots Pharmavite set out to make sure that consumers were aware that the AMWA had conferred its seal of approval upon the company's offerings. Since the natural care market was still struggling for legitimacy, a medical endorsement such as this was a major boon for Pharmavite. Both spots depicted the AMWA helping underprivileged people. One spot was set in the period after World War I, while the other used an Appalachian mining town in the 1930s as a backdrop. By linking its image to the AMWA's "emphasis on patient self-care," Pharmavite sought to strengthen the brand, according to the Tan Sheet. The company felt that the campaign helped increase both sales and consumers' awareness of the Nature Made line.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The supplement industry had once been predominantly a niche market, embraced more by a minority of so-called health nuts than by mainstream consumers. But a number of political, scientific, and social developments during the 1990s served to broaden the market tremendously. After much heated debate, the U.S. Congress passed a law in October 1994 that granted makers of dietary supplements greater freedom to make claims about their products' health benefits. Prior to this legislation, the Food and Drug Administration had forbidden supplement manufacturers from asserting that a vitamin or herb acted on a specific body part. In the wake of the loosening of supplement labeling laws, however, companies could correlate their products specifically with the health and well-being of consumers. For instance, Nature Made was able to tout its chromium tablets as "help[ing] regulate glucose metabolism," its lycopene supplement "as a key antioxidant," and its vitamin E products as "essential for normal growth and development . . . [and] protect[-ing] tissues (cells) against damage caused by free radicals." At the same time that supplement companies were making more medical claims on their product packaging, several key studies about the efficacy of vitamins and herbal products received a great deal of attention in the media. Consumer magazines such as Newsweek and Time devoted feature articles to such remedies as DHEA (a hormone that some claimed could slow the aging process) and melatonin (which was praised by some for regulating sleep cycles). This sort of coverage enhanced the perceived legitimacy and efficacy of nutritional supplements.

According to Time, sales of natural foods and supplements grew 20 percent each year between 1990 and 1997. By 1997 total vitamin sales had reached $2.35 billion, up almost 15 percent from the year before. Pharmavite was in an ideal position to capitalize on this explosion. Founded in 1971 by two young entrepreneurs, the company introduced its Nature Made vitamin line the following year. Although Pharmavite initially sold its wares mostly at independently owned drugstores, it quickly built a sophisticated distribution network that incorporated chain drugstores and food stores. After being acquired by Otsuka Pharmaceutical Company, Ltd., in 1989, Pharmavite had the backing of a major corporation, which afforded it the resources to grow further. Fortuitously, just as Pharmavite expanded its distribution network, supermarkets and mass retailers like Wal-Mart and Kmart began to recognize the profits to be made from supplement sales and therefore gave the products more shelf space and more in-store promotional support. Nature Made quickly became a leading supplement product at these stores.

Pharmavite was aware of the important role brand building and marketing could play in the industry. In 1996 the company inaugurated a $10 million campaign for Nature Made conceived by the San Francisco-based agency Hal Riney & Partners. Like the ads in the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign, these earlier ads strove to play up the brand's medical legitimacy. Each spot claimed that Nature Made supplements were "recommended by pharmacists more than a thousand times everyday." Although the campaign did well, Pharmavite opted to change ad agencies in 1997, and it teamed up with Leo Burnett in an effort to bolster its national consumer advertising presence.

TARGET MARKET

A key factor fueling the growth of the supplement industry was the aging of baby boomer consumers. It was this main audience that Nature Made sought to reach with the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign. In their quest for a "natural alternative to prescription drugs," baby boomers ingested the largest quantity of supplements of any demographic group in the United States, explained Chain Drug Review. This population was interested not only in treating an illness after its onset but also in preventing disease in the first place and in counteracting the natural effects of aging. "Consumers are searching for the elusive fountain of youth, and certainly vitamins are a very big part of this," an industry analyst told Discount Merchandiser. This new trend was fueled in part by changes in the health care industry. As price-conscious health maintenance organizations limited patients' access to physicians, consumers looked for new ways to remedy medical complaints. "The comfortable paternalistic relationship—the doctor has all the answers, the patient obediently follows directions—is slowly disappearing," the Wall Street Journal averred on October 19, 1998. In fact, noted the paper on November 23, 1998, "Older Americans—long members of the 'see your doctor club'—are seizing upon nontraditional remedies."

Baby boomers were an ideal market to target. Not only were they massive in their sheer size, but they were also growing wealthier as they reached the peaks of their careers and earning power. As Discount Merchandiser succinctly concluded, "Vitamins cater to the aging, yet very affluent, older generation." Moreover, as baby boomers continued to age, "the incidence of chronic conditions [would] increase correspondingly," Chain Drug Review observed on February 3, 1997. Pharmavite anticipated that these consumers would seek supplements to treat such conditions. All indications were that vitamin usage was on the rise among older adults. By 1997, 43 percent of all households had at least one adult taking vitamins, up from 40 percent in 1996.

Women of the baby boomer generation were an especially important group for supplement sales. Women over 35 were drawn to natural products in search of "healthy" ways of dealing with menopause. In fact, according to Chain Drug Review, women bought approximately two-thirds of all natural care products. The "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" ads therefore particularly targeted women between the ages of 35 and

WAS IT A MAN'S WORLD?

Although companies such as Pharmavite had long ago introduced soy-based supplements designed for women, it was only with the sector's explosion in the last 1990s that male-specific herbal and vitamin remedies (such as one intended to keep the prostate in good working order) entered the marketplace.

64, explained the June 23, 1997, issue of Chain Drug Review. The emphasis on the AMWA's endorsement was the primary method by which the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign sought to reach this audience. As Pharmavite said in a company press release, "To educate women on the value of supplementation, Nature Made's campaign [focused on] AMWA's commitment to improving women's health and in support of its Nature Made products." The AMWA had established itself as a respected advocate for women's health issues, such as breast and cervical cancer. The spots not only mentioned the AMWA's approval, but they also were linked to the organization's history and activism.

COMPETITION

Nature Made was not the only company to take note of the money-making opportunities afforded by the natural care market. By 1998 the industry was experiencing "a growing trend toward bigger, more aggressive marketing efforts," according to the Tan Sheet. Although it was already a competitive market, large pharmaceutical companies entered the fray in 1997 and 1998. Warner-Lambert launched its Hails Zinc Defense in 1997 and backed it with a substantial marketing effort featuring actress Lauren Hutton. Within a few weeks SmithKline Beecham introduced a line of German herbals dubbed Abtei, and American Home Products prepared to debut an array of herbal products that would be marketed under the well-known Centrum brand name. In February 1998 the Feeling Fine Company also released a line of vitamin and nutritional supplements. To distinguish itself in the increasingly crowded arena, the brand commissioned Dr. Art Ulene of NBC's Today show fame to market and promote the company's Nutrition Boost multivitamin and mineral formula.

Established industry participants were not willing to let new market entrants poach unopposed on their turf. In 1999 Bayer introduced a campaign for its One-A-Day Specialized Blends. The commercials featured actress Annie Potts and portrayed her facing everyday challenges such as keeping up with an energetic toddler. Each spot closed with the tag line "Help your body help itself with One-A-Day Specialized Blends . . . just what you need to feel your best." One-A-Day also offered specialized multivitamins that targeted distinct audiences, such as One-A-Day 50-Plus and One-A-Day Men's Formula. In 1997 White-Hall Robbins also expanded its efforts to reach aging consumers by spending nearly $33 million to advertise Centrum Silver, which the company had originally introduced in 1990. This campaign, which pictured glowingly healthy older folks engaging in active pastimes such as canoeing, used the tag line "Life is an adventure because you're over 50 and still exploring." Centrum Silver became the second best-selling vitamin brand in 1998. Nature Made's other close competitor, Rexall Sundown Inc., tried to differentiate its supplements from its numerous competitors by incorporating "high-potency" formulas into its Sundown line. For a part of 1997 Sundown became the top-selling retail vitamin brand, but Nature Made reclaimed the distinction in 1998.

Private-label brands were another growing threat to Nature Made. Many retail chains, such as Safeway and Long's, produced their own versions of natural care products. In 1998 these brands controlled 15 percent of the market, but they were expected to continue to grow. Unlike their branded competitors, the private-label products incurred few marketing expenses and were therefore able to draw consumers by their lower prices as well as in-store support.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Television was the essential element of Pharmavite's strategy for Nature Made. Prior to the early 1990s, most single-element vitamins and almost all herbal supplements were sold at health food stores rather than major retailers. The suddenness of the supplement sector's boom and its arrival in the mainstream meant that most consumers had not yet formed strong brand allegiances. Before pharmaceutical corporations entered the market in 1997, most of the companies fighting for market share operated on low advertising budgets, but this was soon to change. Pharmavite used the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" ads not only to increase vitamin sales during the campaign's tenure but also to build the Nature Made brand, so that consumers would specifically seek it out at retail stores. To bring the message of the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign to its target audience, Pharmavite ran the ads on a range of network and cable television programs. Among these were Good Morning America, Today, Inside Edition, American Journal, World News Tonight, and daytime CNN shows, and the ads ran on CNN Headline News, Discovery, Lifetime, and USA, all venues that were popular with the baby boomers the company wanted to reach. Advertising on news programs was an especially important component of Nature Made's strategy. "We have found that single vitamin consumers are very focused on news and information programming," a company spokesperson told the June 23, 1997, issue of Chain Drug Review. "They respond to clinical studies; they respond to press reports." Print ads, which also prominently displayed the brand's affiliation with the AMWA, ran in major consumer magazines as well.

Trust was the core theme of the campaign, and it was also the basis upon which Pharmavite intended to bolster the Nature Made brand. While the supplement industry was growing exponentially each year, only about half of the adult population were regular supplement users by 1998. Market research revealed that those consumers who eschewed natural care products often did so because they lacked crucial information about items, had safety concerns, or did not have "a recognizable brand name they knew and trusted," explained Chain Drug Review. By highlighting Nature Made's relationship with the AMWA, Pharmavite hoped to assuage consumers' concerns. Moreover, a majority of consumers polled by the magazine stated that "they would be most likely to consider [a supplement] purchase after receiving information from pharmacists, nutritionists, friends, or relatives." Nature Made hoped that by trumpeting the AMWA endorsement it could imbue its products with this aura of authority.

The company also aimed to get pharmacists—a crucial link between consumers and products—more involved in the supplement category. In addition to circulating Nutrition Report, the company's bimonthly publication detailing the latest clinical information about supplements, to many pharmacists, Pharmavite provided them with product information to give consumers. Even more innovative was the company's Drug Induced Nutritional Deficiency Program, which strove to inform pharmacists about nutritional deficiencies that resulted from the use of certain prescription medications. Upon filling such a prescription, the pharmacist could then recommend the appropriate supplement—which the company hoped would be the Nature Made brand—to address the problem.

Pharmavite augmented this multifaceted strategy with sophisticated in-store advertising. Instead of adding Nature Made bottles to the slew of brands already crowding shelves, Nature Made often opted for a dedicated display to create a more eye-catching effect for its products. This "wall of yellow labels," reflecting the company's packaging design, would "take advantage of [Nature Made's] strong brand recognition and the popularity of individual products," Marshall Fong, the company's brand manager, told Chain Drug Review on June 29, 1998.

OUTCOME

Pharmavite expressed satisfaction with its advertising efforts. A phone survey completed shortly after the "Trusted by the Ones You Trust" campaign broke indicated that 82 percent of consumers who regularly took supplements were aware of the Nature Made brand. "That's about 50 points higher than any other broad line supplement line," Nature Made's Fong proclaimed to Chain Drug Review. "People recognize Nature Made as a credible brand name." In the spring of 1998 Pharmavite continued to expand Nature Made's product line with the addition of nine new supplements.

Sales figures in 1998 reflected a positive year for Nature Made. The company had an 18 percent share of the vitamin E market, compared to its rivals' shares of about 3 percent each. "Our sales are growing faster than the category because of our advertising and contact with customers," Fong crowed to the Chain Drug Review. Content with what the campaign had accomplished, Pharmavite dedicated most of its advertising budget in late 1998 and early 1999 to promoting its Nature's Resource line of herbal remedies.

GETTING BETTER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The third-largest manufacturer of consumer electronics, the Dutch company Koninklijke Philips Electronics N.V. was a well-known and respected firm in many parts of the world. The maker of such diverse products as televisions, telephones, compact disc (CD) players, medical imaging systems, semiconductors, appliances, and light bulbs—the company was the global leader in the lighting industry—Philips marketed its goods in 150 countries in the late 1990s. Unlike other electronics companies, such as Sony and Panasonic, Philips did not have a brand name that was easily recognized in the United States, where Philips Electronics North America Corp., the U.S. branch of the Dutch company, developed and sold products under such brand names as Philips, Philips Magnavox, Marantz, and Norelco. To increase Philips's worldwide brand recognition, the electronics company released its ''Getting Better'' campaign.

The print and television effort was released in September 1998 and became the largest advertising campaign in the history of the 107-year-old company. Although the campaign was designed to elevate the brand's image around the world, the company hoped especially to penetrate the U.S. market. With an estimated $100 million to spend on U.S. advertising alone, the New York–based ad agency Messner Vetere Berger McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG developed the ''Getting Better'' campaign to position Philips as a cutting-edge company offering the most technically progressive and advanced products. Commercials featured young, hip individuals whose lives were ''made better'' by Philips's products and featured a cover version of ''Getting Better,'' a song written by Paul McCartney and John Lennon of the Beatles. The campaign concluded on June 20, 2001.

Ed Volkwein, executive vice president of global brand management for Philips in the United States, announced in a prepared statement, ''We are focused on generating high levels of brand awareness and preference for Philips in the U.S. We are determined to make Philips a well-recognized U.S. brand.'' Four months after the campaign began, Philips's brand recognition within the United States leapt from 39 to 56 percent, according to American Demographics.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in the Netherlands in 1891 as a lamp factory, Philips soon diversified into other categories and became a powerful authority in the European business world. Hoping to increase its presence in the United States, the company made a number of acquisitions in the 1970s and 1980s, notably Magnavox in 1974 and Westinghouse in 1983. Despite such key gains, however,

Philips made a series of marketing and business errors in the late 1980s and early 1990s that signaled a loss of direction. Although Philips developed such innovative breakthrough products as the audiocassette, the videocassette recorder (VCR), and the CD, the company allowed others, namely Japanese electronics firms, to mass-produce the items and make enormous profits. Philips also miscalculated consumer desires; the company neglected to grasp the importance of new technologies such as mobile telephones yet heavily promoted such items as the compact disc-interactive and the digital audiotape, which failed to ignite interest or sales.

In order to survive in the quickly changing consumer-electronics industry, Philips underwent major restructuring during the first seven years of the 1990s. In 1996 a new chairman, Cor Boonstra, was brought on board to stave off further losses. Boonstra recognized the importance of elevating the Philips brand and began injecting additional funds into the marketing budget. Boonstra also intended to position Philips as a technology innovator and to increase brand awareness in the United States, a crucial market for new high-tech products and an area in which the Philips image was weak. In 1996 Philips combined its well-known Magnavox name, which was the third-best-selling brand of television in the United States, with its lesser-known Philips name to create Philips Magnavox. It then spent more than $40 million to sear the new brand name into the memories of consumers. The campaign, Euro RSCG's first U.S. effort for Philips, promoted budding technologies such as the Internet and combined the corporate tagline, "Let's Make Things Better," with the phrase "Philips Magnavox. No matter how you say it, it will change the way you see and hear forever." Philips continued its push in the United States in 1997 with a $50 million campaign for DVD players. According to Philips's Volkwein, the efforts paid off. "[Ninety] percent of our target customers in North America on an aided basis recognize the Philips-Magnavox brand," Volkwein said in HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network. "The goal," Volkwein continued, "is to have consumers associate the Philips name with digital products." Philips seemed to be moving closer to its goal. Volkwein indicated that brand awareness jumped 50 percent in 1997, compared to 1996, with 20 percent of its global sales in 1997 (about $8 billion) attributed to the United States.

TARGET MARKET

To position itself as an innovative and a high-tech leader, Philips targeted those most accepting and aware of new technology—young adults aged 25 to 35. Philips selected this rather narrow audience through a detailed study conducted at the end of 1997. A total of 14,000 individuals aged 13 to 65 and representing 17 countries were asked about their feelings toward and expectations of technology, as well as about their lifestyles and values. The results of the study showed that those familiar with the Philips brand considered it reliable and trustworthy but that they were often not aware of the brand's high-end products. The research also indicated that, while many were fearful of technology, those in their late 20s embraced innovation. Philips's director of global consumer and market intelligence, Elissa Moses, explained to American Demographics that this age group was considered by the general public to be the most knowledgeable about technology because "they take it for granted . . . It's almost an extension of their arms and legs."

To appeal to this particular group, labeled by Philips as "the Philips Generation," the company felt the need to focus its advertising efforts on state-of-the-art, high-end products, which the firm chose to call "star products." These items, which included the flat-screen television, the audio CD recorder, and the DVD player, would particularly appeal to the 20-something audience of well-educated, confident, and motivated consumers who kept current with the latest innovations. A prepared statement by Philips explained that, although the advertising would be geared toward the so-called Philips Generation, the campaign's appeal would spread to others through that group. "The group represents what many people see as 'the best years of our lives,' when we're most independent and carefree. Through the attitudes and lifestyle of this group, Philips aims to develop a brand personality that's 'human, imaginative . . . and somehow seductive.' "

COMPETITION

Since the 1950s Japanese companies, along with the European players Philips and Thomson S.A., had led the consumer electronics market. In the 1990s Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. Ltd., maker of such brands as Panasonic, Technics, and Quasar, dominated the fiercely competitive $385 billion global consumer-electronics category, followed by Sony Corp. and Philips, respectively. In the realm of color televisions, Philips dominated the market, while Matsushita, France-based Thomson S.A., and Sony followed. As these companies entered the 1990s, however, they faced an entirely new battle—that of the digital revolution—and all clamored for top status in the mind of the consumer. Joseph Clayton, executive vice president of Thomson Consumer Electronics, Inc., the U.S. subsidiary of Thomson S.A., declared in Electronic Engineering Times in 1996, "I believe now is the time to declare this . . . year the true beginning of an age that will change the direction of the consumer-electronics industry."

BUILDING THE BRAND

In addition to the large-scale "Getting Better" campaign, Philips undertook numerous promotional activities to elevate brand awareness in the United States. The company sponsored Motown Live, a musical variety program, was a promotional partner for the major motion picture Austin Powers, sponsored a NASCAR racing team, and managed to get an athletic stadium named for the company—Philips Arena became the home for the Atlanta Hawks basketball team.

Much of the campaign for digital dominance was played out in the United States through intensive marketing. As DVD players began to trickle onto the marketplace in late 1996 and early 1997, companies readied their advertising assaults. Philips promoted DVD extensively as "technology for the heart, spirit and imagination," targeting a broad audience. Other companies focused primarily on print advertising and on those most interested in new technology. Panasonic Corp., for instance, released a high-tech television commercial that pushed DVD as "the next thing in home entertainment," and Sony limited its efforts to magazines geared toward high-end users of audiovisual equipment. Beginning in 1998 electronics companies shifted focus to spotlight digital television, or high-definition television (HDTV), sets. Mitsubishi Consumer Electronics America, a division of Mitsubishi Electric of Japan and the maker of the best-sellers among large-screen televisions, used the theme "True HDTV" and emphasized the technical advantages of Mitsubishi HDTV sets. Panasonic, in its biggest U.S. campaign in eight years, focused on the spectacular features of HDTV. In the Wall Street Journal in late 1998 Panasonic's Bill Mannion explained the importance of promoting the new technology aggressively and of setting up early leadership: "In the next two years, the industry is redefining who will be the leaders for the next 10 years."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The goal of the "Getting Better" campaign was to reach 95 percent of Philips's target consumer an average of 55 times during the first year. Philips's senior director of marketing, Gérard Dufour, who was responsible for global brand management, explained in a prepared statement the strategy of spotlighting the high-end, so-called star, products that many would find unattainable. "The result [of the advertising] is that the Philips name is linked with leading edge, sophisticated products, whose 'halo' extends to the company's mainstream products," he said. "Although many consumers might not buy the 'stars,' " Dufour continued, "they'll be eager to own other Philips products to get some of the reflected star attraction."

The branding campaign was described by the company as featuring "wry, humorous ads that portray young, clever, motivated consumers finding ways to improve their everyday lives with the help of Philips's products." The print ads appeared in a wide variety of magazines, including those in such categories as sports, science, entertainment, travel, business, lifestyle, and food. The television spots, which starred members of what Messner called the Philips's "tribe," 20-something individuals comfortable with technology and aware of how it enhanced their lives, aired on prime-time network TV during entertainment and sports programs as well as on cable channels such as MTV, USA Network, and E! Entertainment Network. The television commercials featured a cover version of "Getting Better" performed by the up-and-coming British band Gomez. Philips's Moses explained in American Demographics that Gomez was selected to give the three-year-old corporate tagline, "Let's Make Things Better," a new life. "It really brought to life what we felt our products were going to do for people in a way that was both comforting—because you've heard the song before—but contemporary, because it's somebody new singing it," Moses said.

In the spot "Everything Fits" three young people prepared to furnish a modern-looking beach house. The house was oddly shaped and extremely narrow. The friends first brought in a narrow orange sofa, followed by a 42-inch flat-screen television, which they hung on the wall. The three plopped onto the couch, pointed the remote control, and the television show Flipper appeared, much to their delight. The music, "Getting Better," then played briefly as the screen read, "Presenting Flat TV from Philips." The spot finished with the Philips logo and tagline. Another spot, "The Gift," showcased the Halogena, a halogen light bulb that came with a two-year guarantee. The first commercial in 10 years for the lighting division, it made its debut in November during the telecast of a National Football League game. In the spot a young man arrived home at his apartment only to discover that his light bulb was out. With a groan, the man began piling up pieces of furniture to reach the bulb in the high-ceilinged room. As he climbed on his furniture with a replacement bulb in his mouth, a neighbor caught sight of his plight through a window. He rushed to the man's apartment with a Halogena bulb, stating, "Check this out." The man mumbled, "But I've got a bulb," to which the neighbor replied, "But this'll last you two years. Guaranteed." The man then compared the two and replied, "Cool." The spot ended with "Getting Better" and the Philips tagline.

Philips began 1999 with invigorated sales and a new television spot that debuted during the Super Bowl. It was the company's first time advertising in that high-profile venue. The commercial, which showcased the new Philip. 64-inch high-definition projection television, retained the "Let's Make Things Better" theme. Three of the campaign's final 2001 spots featured young adults furbishing their high-ceilinged lofts with a selection of Philips's premium electronics. In one spot a woman passed on the opportunity to take home a puppy in favor of a Philips flat-panel television. Although the final three commercials appeared to take place inside an apartment building, they were actually filmed in an abandoned mental hospital in Cape Town, South Africa.

In late 2000 Philips announced that it was parting ways with Euro RSCG, and it assigned its global account to two agencies. DUB Worldwide was given duties for Philips's consumer-electronics and corporate accounts, and the roster shop D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles was chosen to advertise Philips's lighting and medical systems. "Getting Better" ended in June 2001.

OUTCOME

Philips considered the "Getting Better" campaign a success. Volkwein told USA Today, "We've seen a tremendous upsurge in awareness . . . We feel the campaign is working extremely well." Immediately following the 1998 release of "Getting Better," Philips enjoyed a brief sales increase and even longer-lasting brand awareness in the United States. According to American Demographics, Philips's brand-recognition rating in the United States jumped from 39 to 56 percent four months after the campaign began.

According to Ad Track, the USA Today poll designed to determine a campaign's popularity and effectiveness, 23 percent of consumers surveyed indicated that they liked the campaign "a lot." Those in Philips's target audience especially enjoyed the campaign, with 38 percent of people aged 18 to 24 saying that they enjoyed the commercials. Brandweek writer Tobi Elkin praised the campaign as well and stated, "[It] scored strong results and raised the firm's profile in less than a year. Philips's focused campaign is a model for its competitors." "Getting Better" shifted Philips's focus away from product advertising and toward brand advertising. In a prepared statement, Dufour explained, "A product is replaceable; a brand is what consumers buy and keep on buying." Citing creative differences, Philips ended its 10-year relationship with Euro RSCG in early 2001. "Getting Better" officially concluded on June 20, 2001.

VESPA REINTRODUCTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Vespa motor scooter gained worldwide fame when one was ridden by actress Audrey Hepburn in the 1950s film Roman Holiday. Manufactured by Italian company Piaggio & C. SpA, the Vespa became an international cultural icon, known primarily for its style. By the mid-1980s, however, the scooter had failed to keep up with engine design and failed to meet more stringent U.S. emissions standards. Rather than update the engine, Piaggio simply pulled out of the market. Fifteen years later Vespa was able to meet emissions levels and once again eyed the United States, where scooters were enjoying a resurgence. In 2000 the scooter was brought back to the United States, and Piaggio USA launched a marketing campaign to reintroduce Vespa to the country.

The Vespa reintroduction was a free-form effort in many ways. Dealers were allowed to develop their own ads and sell to whatever market looked most promising to them. The first advertisements began running in 2002. Regardless of region, however, the ads were often sexual in nature, playing off of the scooter's Italian image. At the national level Piaggio mostly worked cross-marketing deals with other companies and succeeded in placing the Vespa in many of these companies' advertisements. There was no announced budget for the campaign, much of which was funded locally with contributions from Piaggio.

The reintroduction of Vespa came to a close at the end of 2004, when Piaggio began seeking an advertising agency to implement a national branding strategy. Vespa had staked out its claim in the marketplace, distinguishing itself from the competition on the grounds that it was more than a scooter and instead represented a lifestyle that many people found appealing. Some of the ads also received recognition from the advertising industry. The newspaper ads that Mullen Advertising created for the campaign won a bronze at the 2003 One Show awards, hosted by the One Club in New York City.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Launched in Italy shortly after World War II by Piaggio, the stylish Vespa motor scooter soon became a cultural icon. It was immortalized in the 1950s when Audrey Hepburn rode one in the film Roman Holiday, and its stylish reputation spread when it appeared in the Italian movie La Dolce Vita (1960) and was taken up by the Mods in Britain in the 1960s. An entire subculture developed around the Vespa in Europe and North America. In the mid-1980s, however, the Vespa faced new, more stringent air-emissions standards in the United States. While always a fashion leader, the Vespa still relied on 30-year-old technology: a two-stroke engine that spewed liberal amounts of pollutants into the air. Rather than reengineer the bike and refit its Italian factories, Piaggio opted to abandon the North American market and to continue to sell its high-emission scooters in Europe and Asia.

Piaggio's strategy worked well for about a decade, but eventually other countries began tightening their emissions standards as well, and Piaggio was forced to install a cleaner, modern engine in the Vespa. As the century came to a close, there was no longer a reason to avoid the U.S. market. In fact, America presented an excellent opportunity for Piaggio, as scooters were regaining favor in that market. According to the Motorcycle Industry Council, about 12,000 scooters were sold in the United States in 1997, but that number had begun to grow at a 20 percent clip each year. In addition, the successful launch of the new Volkswagen Beetle in the late 1990s—as well as general nostalgia for the 1960s—bode well for the Vespa's return to the United States. Piaggio also discovered that the Vespa had been anything but forgotten. "In the mid- to late-1990s, when the Internet exploded, the most amazing thing happened," wrote Doug Sarti in Vancouver's weekly newspaper Georgia Straight. "Scooterists reconnected, and it became clear that although Vespa culture had gone underground in North America, it was alive and well."

In 2000 Piaggio began exporting new Vespas to the United States, after which Piaggio USA began a long-term marketing campaign to reintroduce the Vespa to America. It relied a great deal on the initiative of dealers but also included the use of national promotional tie-ins with other companies' products.

THE WASP TAKES WING

The company that manufactured the Vespa, Piaggio & C. SpA, started out in the 1880s outfitting ocean liners. Over the years it became involved in trains and cars, but prior to World War II the family business made the mistake of adding passenger airplanes and bombers to its expertise. Because it manufactured planes for the Axis war effort, Allied forces bombed its factories, eventually destroying them completely. After the war the founder's son, Enrico Piaggio, revitalized the company by looking to serve the transportation needs of everyday Italians. The result of the company's engineering efforts was a scooter that relied on airplane technology. It featured a front fork reminiscent of an airplane's landing gear and a sleek steel chassis. When Piaggio saw the prototype, he exclaimed, "Sembra una vespa!" (It looks like a wasp). The name "Vespa" stuck, and a cultural icon was born.

TARGET MARKET

According to Christopher Montgomery of the Dayton Daily News, Piaggio sought to market Vespas to two main demographic groups: "twenty-somethings that want to zip around college campuses and big cities; and middle-aged consumers nostalgic for the scooter heyday of the 1950s and '60s." Hence, the age demographic ranged from 16 to 70.

But there were other potential customers aside from students and retirees. Given the high costs of automobiles and the rising price of gasoline, many people began to consider the scooter an economical mode of basic transportation. Wealthier people, on the other hand, viewed the Vespa as a weekend toy. Unlike motorcycles, which were overwhelmingly marketed to men almost to the exclusion of women, scooters—especially style-conscious ones like Vespa—found a receptive market among women. Almost 40 percent of the new scooter buyers were women, and they were more likely than men to pay extra to personalize and accessorize their scooters. Because this meant extra profits for Piaggio, the company catered to the female customer. There was one other market for scooters, one that was less interested in fashion and that Vespa did not aggressively pursue: people who had lost their driver's license after a DUI (driving under the influence) conviction. In some states residents did not have to register a scooter that had a 50cc engine, nor did they need to possess a license to drive one. In such circumstances a scooter became known as a "liquorcycle."

COMPETITION

As Americans' interest in scooters was rekindled, so too was competition between scooter manufacturers. Piaggio had an Italian rival in Aprilia Group, the second-largest seller of scooters in Europe behind Piaggio. During the course of the Vespa reintroduction campaign, that threat was removed in 2004, when Piaggio acquired Aprilia.

Vespa's most serious challengers in the U.S. market were three Japanese companies: Honda, Yamaha, and Suzuki. Until the mid-1980s Vespa, along with another Italian scooter, the Lanbretta, had dominated the world scooter market. Then Honda introduced the Elite, and Yamaha created the Riva; these plastic upstarts offended the sensibilities of scooter purists but were reliable and inexpensive and found a mass audience. Once Piaggio left the U.S. market, the Japanese were able to build up their dealer networks and dominate the scooter business. Honda became the dominant force, because it was able to leverage its 1,200 dealerships to control the U.S. scooter market. In cases where the company believed dealership sales would not be adversely impacted, Honda also sold its scooters through multiline scooter shops. Yamaha, the second largest in terms of U.S. market share, carved out its own niche primarily based on price. Yamaha would also attempt to take on Vespa directly by introducing its Vino Classic, a bike that not only mimicked Vespa's look but also was positioned as having Italian flair with the slogan "Can you say ciao bella?"

Heading the list of secondary competitors was Suzuki, which branched into scooters in 2003 and found its own niche by focusing on the increasingly popular category of maxi-scooters, which offered greater comfort and a more powerful engine. There was also a pair of Taiwanese-made scooters with which to contend: Kymco, a former Honda licensee, and MZ, an offshoot of Germany's MZ Motorcycle Company. China offered the TN'G, establishing a beachhead in the U.S. market through a distribution deal with the warehouse-club chain Costco and later setting up its own dealer network. A pair of scooter manufacturers in India, LML and Bajaj, also offered competition. In addition Vespa was anticipating the entrance into the U.S. scooter market of two French rivals, Peugeot and MBK.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Shortly after Vespa was reintroduced to the United States in November 2000, Piaggio's president, Giancarlo Fantappie, told BusinessWeek, "We're selling a lifestyle, not just a scooter." The Vespa mystique alone was able to generate sales; a seven-month wait for the bikes soon developed. Hence, at this stage there no need to push sales aggressively, and marketing was kept low-key. Vespas were awarded to the winners of the New York City Marathon, but no major media blitz ensued. According to BusinessWeek, Piaggio was content to "sell its 'recreational toys' through the Neiman Marcus Christmas catalogue, as well as in 'Vespa boutiques' in trendy spots like East Hampton, [New York], and Palm Beach, [Florida]." More than 40 more of the boutiques, which also sold Vespa clothing and accessories such as helmets and riding gloves, were slated to be opened within the next year.

Piaggio gave the dealer groups a great deal of latitude in handling Vespa's marketing, and the first wave of advertising began appearing in 2002. Wenham, Massachusetts–based Mullen Advertising produced a series of three newspaper ads. An example of the shop's humorous take was the headline used in one ad: "A hog for you temporary-tattoo types." The agency Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners created three billboards in San Francisco employing a sexy approach to promoting the Vespa. Each execution showed a woman grasping a male driver, either with her hands, arms, or legs. In Denver in 2002 the first TV spot was aired for the Vespa. Created by the agency Viewpoint Studios (later renamed Viewpoint Creative), it combined humor and sex to make its point. A young man apparently addressed a woman reclining in a lawn chair. In an Italian accent, he praised her curves and figure, saying, "Your petite but powerful body will purr with excitement when we are together." As he said, "I will mount you now," the camera panned to reveal that he was talking to a Vespa scooter.

Writing for Dealernews, Shay Moftakhar explained Piaggio's national marketing strategy; it devised "an ingenious marketing program that incorporates 'viral' advertising in many major campaigns. Scooters are seen in ads for products ranging from Washington State apples to cell phones to laptop computers, all serving to ingrain scooters in the consumer subconscious." Moftakhar also pointed out that Piaggio had increased Vespa awareness in retail venues through cross-promotions with Target and the Sharper Image. In addition, Piaggio succeeded in placing Vespa in ads for the likes of American Express, McDonald's, Starbucks, and JetBlue Airways. Hearkening back to its motion-picture heritage, Vespa was featured in a remake of Alfie, starring Jude Law. The Vespa had also appeared in the original 1966 film.

In 2003 Piaggio introduced a more powerful scooter, the Vespa Grand Turismo, and to help with the launch the company hired R.C. Auletta & Company to handle national public-relations responsibilities for what was to be Vespa's top-of-the-line model and an important money maker. National coordination began to take on greater importance, because Vespa seemed to be marketed to a different audience depending on the region. Amanda Schupak wrote in Forbes, "In Denver the gay crowd has embraced the brand. In Boston Vespa is coveted by coeds. Celebs and hipsters ride the scooters in Los Angeles and New York. And in San Francisco Vespa dealer Walter Dawydiak is pushing the fashionable bikes, which get 70 miles to the gallon and run up to 70 miles per hour, on the San Francisco Police Department." The reintroduction of Vespa had succeeded by the end of 2004, at which point Piaggio began searching for an advertising agency to develop a national branding strategy and take Vespa to the next level.

OUTCOME

Although uncoordinated in many ways, the marketing campaign to reintroduce Vespa to the United States succeeded. Sales in 2004 reached $25 million, an 80 percent increase over the previous year that was largely a result of sales of the Grand Turismo. The brand also reconnected with its legions of fans after a 15-year absence from the U.S. market, and in addition to selling scooters, Piaggio succeeded in selling Vespa apparel and other items; as of May 2003 there were 62 Vespa boutiques in the United States. Rising gas prices made scooters appealing to an even wider market, and Vespa's winning lifestyle image, which made it stand out from the competition, promised to attract a new and broader set of customers.

What little advertising that was done in support of Vespa was also well received. In 2003 the newspaper ads created by Mullen Advertising won a bronze at the One Show, the annual advertising awards sponsored by the One Club, a New York–based nonprofit organization established to promote excellence in advertising.

IT'S YOUR MORTGAGE. KEEP IT HERE. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003 Piedmont Federal Savings and Loan Association was composed of 10 branches, making it the third-largest financial institution in North Carolina. Piedmont Federal operated as a "portfolio lender," meaning it lent only its money and kept all mortgages in-house. This time-tested method of financing provided greater security for homebuyers but usually resulted in higher interest rates. In order to unbind their capital, Piedmont Federal's competition usually sold mortgages to third-party institutions. Though the interest rates were cheaper, the competition's customers were usually unaware of who actually carried their mortgages. Between 2000 and 2002, 29 percent of Piedmont Federal's customers left for banks, credit unions, and mortgage brokers offering lower interest rates. To restore Piedmont Federal's customer base and accentuate its safer method of financing, the bank released a campaign titled "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here."

Based in Winston-Salem, which was also home to Piedmont Federal's headquarters, the advertising firm the Woodbine Agency launched the "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign in January 2003. Costing less than $500,000, the campaign used television and radio spots as well as print, direct-mail, and online ads. The advertisements never mentioned interest rates, something Piedmont Federal's competition focused on, but instead touted Piedmont Federal's safer mortgaging. One of the print ads featured the copy "Separation anxiety shouldn't apply to your mortgage." Hoping that realtors would recommend Piedmont Federal as a preferred lender to homebuyers, the bank's loan officers distributed house-hunting kits to local realtors. After running for 18 months, the campaign ended in June 2004.

"It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." claimed a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005 for the Financial Services/Products category. It also helped Piedmont Federal rebuild its customer base. The bank originated 21 percent more mortgages during the campaign than during the 18 months prior. According to Market Perspectives, a marketing research and consulting firm, 49 percent of those surveyed in the Winston-Salem area said that they were "more likely to use Piedmont Financial Services because of advertising."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Ever since Piedmont Federal opened in 1903, it had been relying on quality customer service and mutual trust to attract customers. It was one of the few institutions during the Great Depression that not only retained all of its depositors' cash, but also continued paying interest on depositors' investments. "We have been committed to being a hometown savings and loan throughout our history, and that has been our biggest strength and competitive advantage,'' Nick Mitchell, Jr., the president and chief executive of Piedmont Federal, told the Winston-Salem Journal. ''Our average employee has been here 17 years, which provides a consistent face to the community. We've had a branch presence in most of the communities we've served for three or four decades.''

With little advertising Piedmont Federal grew from one branch to ten over the course of a century. By 2000, however, Piedmont Federal's customer base had begun to wane. Many of its older customers were paying off their mortgages. Other home owners were switching to outside lenders that could refinance their homes at lower interest rates. The competition also increased their marketing expenditures 39 percent in 2002, while Piedmont Federal's advertising remained relatively miniscule. Between 2000 and 2002 its customer base dropped 29 percent. Piedmont Federal also financed all of its own mortgages, while the competition was quickly selling mortgages to institutions outside of Winston-Salem's Forsyth County. Jim Lambie, the former cochairman of the Downtown Winston-Salem Partnership, an economic-development organization, stated to the Winston-Salem Journal, ''[Piedmont Federal] has always been a source of community admiration because of its commitment to remaining local when there were opportunities to expand in a major way outside Forsyth.'' Because Piedmont Federal could not compete with the competition's interest rates, its ad agency, Woodbine, decided to advertise from an emotional platform that boasted of the bank's familiarity and loyalty to the Winston-Salem area.

CATERING TO THE ELDERLY

In 2002 Michael Sullivan, cofounder of the marketing consulting firm 50-Plus Communications Consulting, offered suggestions for marketing to the elderly in America's Community Banker. First, he recommended that when bankers greeted individuals over 60 years old, they should gently shake their hands. Most senior citizens suffered from arthritis, making a firm handshake uncomfortable. Second, he suggested that bankers display patriotic symbols such as American flag pins, because the older demographic tended to be more patriotic. Third, because 80 percent of Americans over 60 years old had grandchildren, bankers should display pictures of their children around the office. Pictures would suggest to the elderly that the banker shared their values. Finally, Sullivan suggested that bankers not use the term ''senior citizen.'' People over 60 generally admitted to feeling 15 years younger than they actually were and preferred not to be reminded of their actual age.

TARGET MARKET

''It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here.'' targeted two separate demographics. Woodbine named the first the ''Cul-de-Sac Crowd,'' which consisted of 25- to 39-year-olds outgrowing their starter homes. The second target, ''New Affluents,'' was composed of 35- to 49-year-old professionals looking to refinance their current home and possibly purchase a second. Although these two groups shared little in common, the campaign catered to the targets' similar hopes for the Winston-Salem area. According to Woodbine, which was also based in Winston-Salem, both groups had gone to school in the area and planned to stay there. Also, both were classified as cautious spenders who preferred to keep their money within the local economy. The ''Cul-de-Sac Crowd'' and the ''New Affluents'' also wanted to preserve hometown traditions and improve the area for future Forsyth County generations.

According to the Winston-Salem Journal, Thad Woodard, the president of the North Carolina Bankers Association, remarked early on in the 2003 campaign that Piedmont Federal's customers were ''probably a little more gray-haired'' than those at commercial banks. To shed its stigma as a bank just for the elderly, Piedmont Federal retrofitted its system to include online banking before the 2003 campaign was released. The ''Cul de Sac Crowd'' and the ''New Affluents'' included consumers that fell within Generation X, the generation of Americans born between approximately 1965 and 1976. According to Karen Ritchie, author of Marketing to Generation X, the Generation X banker ''goes into branches the least often of any generation, but they actually interact with the bank the most often, either through phone, ATM or online.'' Ritchie also wrote, ''Gen Xers are worrying about their retirement plans at the age when baby boomers were worrying about Bob Dylan going electronic.''

COMPETITION

Southern Community Financial, another community bank in Winston-Salem, released a newspaper and billboard campaign in 2003 that featured images of a Great Dane looming over a Chihuahua. In an approach that was similar to that of Piedmont Federal, Southern Community boasted that its smaller size afforded the bank more flexibility and friendlier service than larger institutions. Southern Community's campaign was an obvious jab at the Wachovia Corporation, a North Carolina–based bank that was acquired by the much-larger First Union Corporation. Suggesting that larger banks had a one-sided relationship with their customers, one ad's copy read, ''They bark. You roll over. Not a very healthy relationship.'' Another print ad asked, ''How much bank is too much bank?'' The Bloom Agency created the campaign for Southern Community, which in 2003 had eight branch locations.

Doug Lebda founded LendingTree, LLC, in 1997 after his own attempt to secure a mortgage proved ''disempowering, hard to sort through and difficult to understand,'' according to Mortgage Banking magazine. LendingTree, based in Charlotte, North Carolina, allowed future homeowners to visit its website to request mortgage quotes, which were usually available within 10 minutes. The service submitted a customer's loan request to a plethora of lenders, who competed for the lowest interest rate. Between 1997 and 2004 LendingTree facilitated more than $74 billion in loan funding. Lenders used the service because it generated leads cheaper than anyone else. According to Mortgage Banking, home owners enjoyed the service because it turned the mortgage process upside down. No longer were consumers pleading with banks to be approved for mortgages. Lenders had to compete with each other to provide consumers the best possible lending rates. In 2004 the company spent $70 million on advertising, which included television spots and print ads.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Prior to the campaign's January 2003 release, Woodbine interviewed existing and possible Piedmont Federal customers, who said that they would take loans with higher interest rates if it meant keeping their mortgages within Forsyth County. Those interviewed said that not only did they prefer to have their money benefit the local economy, but they were also frustrated with the amount of paperwork that ensued after their mortgage was sold to an outside institution. Based on this feedback, Woodbine developed a campaign with two different phases. The first part would create uneasiness amongst Winston-Salem home owners about their mortgages being sold to outside institutions. The second part would assure the community that Piedmont Federal would never sell their mortgages. The message was summed up in the tagline, ''It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here.''

For the campaign's first phase, one radio commercial simulated a call between a frustrated North Carolina resident on the phone with an out-of-state bank. During the commercial an out-of-state customer service representative mocked the North Carolina customer for using the Southern word ''y'all.'' Print ads suggested that large cities such as New York, Chicago, and San Francisco were a ''great place to visit, but are they really where you want to send your home mortgage payments?'' Billboard ads featured the copy ''Separation Anxiety Shouldn't Apply to Your Mortgage.'' One Winston-Salem billboard read, ''You live here in Boone, NC. So why is your mortgage in Boonesville, TX?''

The second phase of the campaign featured print and radio advertisements that used ''hometown pride,'' as a Woodbine representative put it, to attract Winston-Salem customers. ''It's your hometown. It's your home mortgage. Keep It Here.'' was the copy for one newspaper advertisement. Woodbine was aware that Piedmont Federal would fail if it entered the price wars between competing lenders, so none of the advertisements mentioned interest rates. Instead the advertising targeted areas that Woodbine perceived as ''points of pride'' among the ''Cul de Sac Crowd'' and the ''New Affluents.'' Promotions during local high school football games included Piedmont Federal posters, ads in program books, and radio spots. In 2003 Piedmont Federal purchased newspaper ads that celebrated the bank's 100-year anniversary in the Winston-Salem community. Radio spots were aired during University of North Carolina and Wake Forest University football and basketball games. Full-page newspaper ads that warned of mortgages being sold to out-of-state institutions were placed adjacent to the competitions' ads.

The campaign hoped to stoke Piedmont Federal's reputation as a supporter of the Winston-Salem community. As suffering tobacco, furniture, and textile businesses were forced to lay off local residents, Piedmont Federal wanted to reinforce its dedication to Winston-Salem's prosperity. ''We don't sell off our loans to create extra revenue because we remain prudent and fiscally conservative with our portfolio,'' Mitchell explained to the Winston-Salem Journal. ''Those loans stay at home, and customers who have a question about their loan or want to purchase or move up in housing can talk directly to us.''

Understanding that realtors heavily influenced which lender a homebuyer selected, Piedmont Federal created 1,200 house-hunting kits for Winston-Salem realtors in the hopes of being recommended as a lender. The bank inserted maps, a mortgage calculator, a notepad, and a pen into a Piedmont Federal–branded binder. The kits were then used as ''handshake pieces'' by Piedmont Federal loan officers who met with local realtors. ''It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here.'' ran for 18 months, ending in June 2004.

OUTCOME

In 2005 ''It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here.'' earned a Silver EFFIE Award (Financial Services/Products category) from the New York American Marketing Association. The award also made Woodbine one of only two North Carolina advertising agencies ever to place in the EFFIE Awards. During the campaign's 18-month run Piedmont Federal originated 1,688 mortgages, which was 21 percent more than during the 18 months before the campaign. Market Perspectives, a marketing research and consulting firm, also concluded that 36 percent more consumers would choose Piedmont Federal to finance a loan after they viewed the campaign's advertisements than if they had not viewed them. Woodbine asserted that the campaign transformed Piedmont Federal's reluctance to sell mortgages to outside institutions from a weakness into a strength. As "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." drove the message that Piedmont Federal strongly supported the local economy, Winston-Salem's lenders were forced to rethink loans as more than just a commodity sold at the lowest price. Forsyth County residents were beginning to choose lenders based on the lender's commitment to the local economy, which was suffering from recession.

BIG NEW YORKER PIZZA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Pizza Hut distinguished itself from its competitors in part because of its proactive approach to product development and marketing. Beginning with the original thin-crust pizza first served in 1958, Pizza Hut made continuing efforts to refine its products and to develop new products suited to every consumer's taste. In January 1999 the Dallas-based chain introduced the Big New Yorker Pizza. The new pizza was hand-stretched to 16 inches and featured a more savory, sweeter sauce and toppings baked on top of 100 percent real cheese. The Big New Yorker was cut into eight foldable slices and was priced starting at $9.99 for one topping.

The Big New Yorker Pizza was the largest new product introduction in Pizza Hut history and was backed by an $80 million advertising and marketing campaign created by BBDO Worldwide. The campaign included television, radio and print ads as well as in-store promotional materials such as counter cards, window clings, banners, and pennants. The Big New Yorker was also featured on the newly designed Pizza Hut website. Ads for the Big New Yorker debuted on January 28, 1999, during NBC's Thursday "Must See TV" lineup, and they continued on ABC's "T.G.I.F." lineup. Celebrity ads featuring New Yorkers Spike Lee, Fran Drescher, and Donald Trump debuted on the Fox network on January 31 during the Super Bowl telecast.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pizza was introduced to Americans on a wide scale in the 1940s, when returning World War II servicemen who had served in Italy began opening pizzerias serving the traditional tomato pie. Pizza Hut began in 1958 when two college students from Wichita, Frank and Dan Carney, were approached by a family friend with the idea of opening a pizza parlor. The brothers quickly saw the potential of such an enterprise, and after borrowing $600 from their mother, they purchased secondhand equipment and rented a small building at a busy intersection in their hometown. The results of their entrepreneurial efforts were the first Pizza Hut restaurant and the foundation for what would become the largest and most successful pizza chain in the world.

In 1965 Pizza Hut unveiled its first television commercial, with the musical jingle "Putt-Putt to Pizza Hut." Three years later the chain entered the international market by opening its first restaurant in Canada. In 1969 the first Pizza Hut restaurant was opened in Mexico, and construction also began on outlets in Germany and in Australia. In that same year the distinctive red roof was adopted for all of its restaurants.

By 1971 Pizza Hut had become the number one pizza chain in the world in both sales and number of restaurants, and expansion continued throughout the decade. Within two years the company had opened units in Costa Rica, Japan, and England. Product innovation proceeded apace, and in 1975 a new variety, Thick 'N Chewy, was introduced. A Super Supreme pizza was introduced in the United States in 1977. In the same year Pizza Hut stockholders overwhelmingly approved a merger with PepsiCo, Inc., for an undisclosed sum.

The Sicilian Pan Pizza was introduced in 1979, and it proved so popular that by 1983 the Personal Pan Pizza, guaranteed to be ready in five minutes, was introduced throughout the system. Two less successful menu items, Priazza and Calizza, were rolled out in 1985. Perhaps reflecting the end of consumers' fascination with pan pizza, the Hand-Tossed Traditional Pizza was introduced throughout the system in time e for Pizza Hut's 30th anniversary in 1988.

By the beginning of the 1990s Pizza Hut sales had reached $4 billion, and the chain continued to develop new products. A lunch buffet was introduced in 1,800 units in 1992, and the next year the chain rolled out its Bigfoot Pizza—two square feet of pizza cut into 21 slices—as well as the Chunky Style Pizza. By the end of the year Pizza Hut was leading the entire restaurant industry in growth and was setting new company records for sales and profits. Continued robust growth attracted celebrity endorsers to the brand, with soccer legend Pelé becoming one of the first when he kicked a ball through the door of Pizza Hut restaurant number 10,000, in Sao Paulo on April 13, 1994.

In 1995 Pizza Hut launched a new ad campaign featuring the tag line "You'll Love the Stuff We're Made Of." That same year, Buffalo Wings—spicy chicken wings served with dipping sauce—were added to the menu. And in one of the most successful product introductions in the chain's history, Pizzeria Stuffed Crust Pizza immediately set company sales records. The following January, Pizza Hut aired its first-ever ad during the Super Bowl. In May 1996 the chain introduced two varieties of chicken-topped pizza, Italian Chicken and Chicken Supreme.

In 1997 Pizza Hut unveiled "Totally New Pizzas," a quality initiative that put fresh sliced vegetables and meatier meats on its pizzas. Later that year The Edge, a specialty pizza without a crust, was crafted to appeal to what were called "extreme" tastes among consumers. There were more product introductions in 1998 to mark Pizza Hut's 40th anniversary year. The Sicilian Pizza, which had garlic, basil, and oregano baked into the crust, was a precursor of the back-to-basics approach later embodied by the Big New Yorker. The new pizza was accompanied by an ad campaign that used the tag line "The Best Pizzas under One Roof." As of 1999, Pizza Hut offered its customers five major products: Pan, Thin 'N Crispy, Hand-Tossed, Stuffed Crust, and Big New Yorker.

TARGET MARKET

"We are targeting this toward the heavy pizza user," explained Mike Rawlings, chief concept officer of Pizza Hut, of the Big New Yorker Pizza. "That may be a large

YO SOY BIG NEW YORKER!

In February 1999, shortly after the national rollout of the Big New Yorker Pizza, Pizza Hut announced plans to expand the campaign into Latin America as well as to target the large and growing Latino community in the United States. To help in this effort, the Dallas-based pizza giant joined forces with the recently crowned Miss Venezuela, Carolina Indriago. The curvaceous Indriago was tapped to star in Spanish-language television spots to be aired throughout the United States and Latin America. The spots, which costarred actor David Norono, were designed to give millions of Spanish-speaking Americans their first opportunity to see and hear the beauty pageant winner and to learn about Pizza Hut's New York-style pizza.

"This is a tremendous honor to be a part of Pizza Hut's largest ever new product introduction effort," said Indriago. "I enjoyed the opportunity to be a part of the campaign, [and] as a Latina I am pleased to see such a large company address the Hispanic community as a consumer and a viable resource."

family that is looking for a great value, or it may be teen-agers or young adults who need money to spend on other things."

In fact, the term "heavy pizza user" could be applied to many Americans. According to a survey conducted by the National Association of Pizza Operators, Americans ate 100 acres of the food every day. The appetite for pizza made it a $30 billion industry. As of 1999, about 17 percent of all restaurants were pizzerias, and the industry was continuing to grow. Pizza was especially popular with young consumers, and a Gallup poll conducted in 1996 discovered that among children aged 8 to 11 pizza was the most popular thing to eat.

COMPETITION

Pizza Hut, a division of the multinational PepsiCo, Inc., was the dominant player among pizza chains. As of 1999, Pizza Hut, with 7,132 stores, controlled 22 percent of the market, while its main competitor, Papa John's, had only one-fourth as many stores and controlled less than 5 percent of the market. Nonetheless, competition between the two chains remained fierce, largely because, between 1993 and 1999, for every point Pizza Hut lost in market share Papa John's gained a point. The battle was especially pitched since, during the same period, pizza sales rose just 3.6 percent a year. Analysts did not forecast that sales would grow much faster in the future, and thus Pizza Hut and Papa John's had no choice but to try to win over each other's customers.

During the 1990's Pizza Hut tried numerous strategies to slow Papa John's growth. It revamped its pizzas by using better ingredients. It increased its advertising budget to an estimated $150 million. And it rolled out a veritable arsenal of designer pizzas: the Triple Deckeroni Pizza, with 90 pieces of pepperoni and a six-cheese blend; the Bigfoot, with two square feet of pizza; the chicken-topped line, which promised to deliver "the uniqueness and unexpectedly great taste of chicken-topped pizza to Americans everywhere;" and the Fiesta Taco Pizza, with a bean sauce and chopped lettuce toppings. Papa John's, by contrast, maintained just two items in its arsenal: a thin-crust pizza and a regular-crust pizza. Its ad slogan was commensurately simple: "Better ingredients. Better pizza."

Complicating the marketplace battle was the presence of a third major pizza delivery chain, Domino's, which, in the words of Pizza Hut's Rawlings, "has more tenure and saliency in the consumer's minds than any of the rest of our competition." Nevertheless, since 1993, while Papa John's was steadily growing, Domino's could not manage to grab even one additional point of market share. In 1998, however, Domino's did make a dent in consumer consciousness with the introduction of heat-retaining delivery bags known as HeatWave pouches, which allowed pizzas to be delivered with the cheese still hot and the crust still crisp. Sparked by the success of the pouches, Domino's in 1999 revamped the recipe for its hand-tossed pizza. For the first time in nearly a decade, taste rather than delivery was made the central theme of the chain's advertising.

Prompted in part by this initiative and by the inroads made by Papa John's, Pizza Hut responded with the introduction of the Big New Yorker in 1999. The competitors reacted with predictable aplomb to the roll-out. "We view this as another phase of Pizza Hut's constant new-product strategy—pizza of the month if you will," observed Papa John's vice president of communications Chris Sternberg. "Their strategy is to do new product rollouts that are supported by heavy marketing spending with the goal of creating trial. Certainly, when you spend $70 [million] to $80 million on a new product rollout, you will get the phone to ring. But while they will probably have some trial in the short term, we don't expect it to have a long-term impact on our sales."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The marketing campaign introducing the Big New Yorker Pizza was designed to build on Pizza Hut's competitive strategy of providing "variety, value and quality for consumers.'' The product itself was crafted to attract consumers seeking a traditional-style pizza similar to those found in local mom-and-pop pizzerias. Market research conducted by the chain indicated a desire on the part of consumers for a bigger, more savory pizza. ''America associates great pizza with New York-style pizza, in fact, they crave it,'' said Pizza Hut's Rawlings. ''However, until [the] introduction of The Big New Yorker Pizza, only one-third of the population actually ever tried a true New York-style pizza. The Big New Yorker Pizza gives consumers a slice of New York right in their own home.''

In order to illustrate the fact that its new product was an authentic New York-style pizza, Pizza Hut enlisted three archetypal New York celebrities to appear in its television commercials. Filmmaker Lee, actress Drescher, and real estate developer Trump were defined in company press releases as ''big New Yorkers.'' Each of the 30-second commercials highlighted one of the celebrities in an environment that fit the person's personality. The commercials were the celebrities' tongue-in-cheek presentation of their personalities and of the grand personality of New York. The spots debuted during the pregame segment of the most-watched television event of the year, the Super Bowl, a placement designed to influence the halftime meal decisions of the sports fans assembled.

The first commercial, directed by Lee and produced by his company, 40 Acres and a Mule, starred the filmmaker and other New York residents, including an artist, street performers, basketball players, and a police officer, in real-life roles. The Drescher spot put the whining comedienne in a variety of New York locations, including Fifth Avenue and the skating rink in Central Park and atop a skyscraper. The Trump ad highlighted his role as a business tycoon by showing footage of the developer in Times Square, riding in a limousine, and meeting with an architect on a new building project.

The rollout of the Big New Yorker Pizza was supported by a national marketing campaign designed to promote the city of New York. Mayor Rudolph Giuliani attended the press conference launching the new pizza. ''We needed to introduce this New York-style pizza in a big way,'' quipped Pizza Hut's Rawlings. ''What is bigger and better than having the mayor of New York City help us launch the pizza?'' Rawlings added that, while New York made no financial contributions to the campaign, the city allowed the chain to put its apple logo on the pizza boxes. The new boxes also included New York's official website address, and Pizza Hut agreed to link its website, which received at least 30,000 visits per month, to the New York City site. The cross-promotional campaign helped to generate 100 million website impressions for New York tourism per month.

OUTCOME

Critical response to the Big New Yorker Pizza television ad campaign was largely favorable. When the Los Angeles Times asked three advertising employees to critique commercials shown during the Super Bowl telecast, the Big New Yorker spots were singled out for high praise. ''Not only are these spots funny and beautifully produced,'' the panelists concluded, ''they wisely take advantage of what only a Super Bowl telecast can do—make 200 million customers instantly aware of your product.''

Despite generating high interest in a new product, the Big New Yorker campaign seemed to be doing little to help Pizza Hut in its battle against Papa John's. Comparable store sales for the challenger continued in the high single-digit range in the first quarter of 1999 despite bad weather and the fact that Pizza Hut was spending $80 million on its Big New Yorker.

THE NEW AMERICAN MOTORCYCLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 Polaris Industries, Inc., best known as a manufacturer of snowmobiles, introduced the Victory Motorcycle, the first new American motorcycle to be introduced in 60 years. Although it was part of the cruiser category dominated by Harley-Davidson, Victory was not intended to challenge the icon of the industry. Rather, Polaris looked to find its own niche in a large and growing category, hoping to play off its American roots to take sales away from Japanese companies Honda, Yamaha, Kawasaki, and Suzuki. To help establish Victory in the marketplace, Minneapolis-based advertising agency Martin/Williams launched a major marketing campaign in the summer of 2000.

The campaign, estimated at $2–4 million, centered on print ads that appeared mostly in the leading motorcycle magazines. To a lesser degree Polaris spent money on television spots that ran on national cable channels and in some local markets on a spot basis. Some local radio advertising was also done. The main objective was to convince potential customers to visit their local Victory dealer, where they could pick up promotion materials but more importantly could take a Victory motorcycle for a test-ride. The motorcycle itself was expected to close the sale.

"The New American Motorcycle" campaign ran until Martin/Williams gave up the account in the spring of 2004. By that time Victory had enjoyed a steady increase in sales, had established a niche in the marketplace, and was well positioned to enjoy strong growth in an expanding category.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The manufacturer of Victory Motorcycles, Polaris Industries, Inc., was best known for its snowmobiles, a vehicle the Minnesota-based company had pioneered in the 1950s and popularized in the 1960s. Over the years Polaris suffered through some tough times and looked to diversify, moving into producing all-terrain vehicles in the 1980s and personal watercraft, such as jet skis, in the 1990s. Later in the decade Polaris sensed an opportunity in heavy-cruiser motorcycles (the largest bikes on the market), a category that competitor Harley-Davidson ruled.

Harley-Davidson had reached cult status that extended beyond motorcycles. The owners of its "hogs" would tattoo the name on their bodies, and people who had never ridden a motorcycle in their lives would wear a Harley-Davidson leather jacket as a fashion statement. A number of companies like Polaris in the mid- to late 1990s sensed there was room in the heavy-cruiser class for a new American bike. The famous Indian brand, last seen in 1953, returned with the newly formed Indian Motorcycle Company, as did Excelsior-Henderson Motorcycle Manufacturing Company of Minnesota. They were joined by startups such as Big Dog Motorcycles of Sun Valley and a number of smaller shops. Many of them made the fatal error of trying to challenge Harley-Davidson head-on. Polaris, on the other hand, sought to offer something different than Harley: more contemporary styling along with advanced technology, such as electronic fuel injection, overhead camshafts, and premium brakes. The result was the Victory motorcycle, which first rolled off the line in July 1998, becoming the first new American cruiser-class motorcycle to be introduced in 60 years. It was positioned as more of a compatriot of Harley-Davidson than a threat.

Two years after its introduction Victory had enjoyed only modest success, ranking a distant sixth in sales, behind Harley-Davidson and the Japanese imports. In December 1999 Polaris awarded the reported $2 to $4 million Victory Motorcycles advertising account to Martin/Williams, a Minneapolis agency that was already handling the company's snowmobiles and personal watercraft. In July 2000 Victory Motorcycles launched a new marketing campaign under the banner of "The New American Motorcycle."

TARGET MARKET

In general the campaign targeted men between the ages of 35 and 54 with annual incomes of at least $65,000. More specifically, the marketers hoped to appeal to former motorcycle owners who had given up their bikes for family life or other reasons and now had the time, money, and inclination to resume their interest in motorcycles. Some of them, hopefully, would opt for a forward-looking American-made cruiser instead of the Harley or Japanese models. Polaris also wanted to appeal to consumers who already owned a Harley, had a passion for riding, and would buy a Victory as a second bike. Harley referred to many of these consumers as "Rolex" riders, a clientele wealthy enough to indulge their interest in motorcycles by buying more than one brand. To a lesser degree Polaris also wanted to appeal to younger, first-time buyers who might prefer the Victory style and technology over what Harley had to offer. Built lower to the ground than a Harley, the Victory also became an option for women interested in buying an American cruiser-class motorcycle.

COMPETITION

Founded in the early 1900s, Harley-Davidson was a survivor, outlasting scores of other motorcycle companies to emerge in the 1950s as the "king of the road." The bike also gained an outlaw image, due in no small measure to the Marlon Brando movie The Wild One, in which Harley-riding renegades terrorized a community. While the company was not entirely pleased with the motorcycle-gang connection, it benefited from the subculture

DUE NORTH

The parent company of Victory Motorcycles, Polaris Industries, Inc., was founded in 1945 in Roseau, Minnesota, closer to Manitoba, Canada, than to Minneapolis. It started out producing custom-made farm machinery under the name Hetteen Hoist & Derrick, and it was not until the 1950s that it sold its first snow-going vehicle. The company began making the transition from fabricating farm equipment to snowmobiles, in the process changing its name. Drawing on the Latin name for "north star," it became Polaris Industries in 1954. At the time, several years before Alaska became a state, Polaris was one of the northernmost companies in the United States.

that developed around the brand. The introduction of the larger, throaty superbikes in the form of the Sportster model in 1957 only added to the Harley mystique. Although the company had long ago vanquished its American competition, during the 1960s it received a fresh challenge from Japanese companies such as Honda, Suzuki, Yamaha, and Kawasaki, which offered bikes in all categories, including heavyweight. Harley suffered through the recession of the early 1980s but made a strong comeback later in the decade, and by 1990 it held a 62.3 percent share of the U.S. heavyweight-motorcycle market.

Although the Victory Motorcycle campaign poked good-natured fun at Harley-Davidson in some of its advertising, Polaris did not want to directly compete against the icon of the class. Moreover, Harley-Davidson continued to bring out a good product and could match anyone in spending on development and marketing. Instead Polaris wanted to play up the Victory's combination of nostalgia and technology in order to compete with Harley while emphasizing its American roots in order to take on the Japanese bike makers Honda, Kawasaki, Suzuki, and Yamaha. All of them were well-established brands with the financial resources necessary to maintain market share. In addition, Victory had to contend with a number of domestic upstarts also trying to establish themselves as the American alternative to Harley-Davidson: the likes of the legendary Indian brand, Excelsior-Henderson, and Big Dog Motorcycles. There were also scores of local shops offering custom-built cruisers that competed for the disposable income of motorcycle aficionados.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The marketing team attended bike rallies, such as the major events held at Sturgis, South Dakota, and Daytona Beach, Florida, and talked with people in the target demographic. They learned that indeed there was an opening for an American-made alternative in the cruiser-motorcycle category. Consumers said that they would be interested in a bike that was modern yet had classic lines. The original Victory, however, lacked curb appeal, that aesthetic quality that provoked an emotional purchase.

Out of the conversations with the target market, Victory and Martin/Williams settled on "The New American Motorcycle" positioning. To make the case for Victory Motorcycles, the agency focused on the print medium. The core market was comprised of extreme motorcycle enthusiasts who wanted to know what was new. Hence, in July 2000 Victory Motorcycle ads began to appear in leading motorcycle magazines, including American Motorcycle, Cycle World, American Iron, and American Rider. In addition the company advertised in other publications that reached the right audience, such as Popular Mechanics and North American Hunter.

Despite the intention not to compete directly with Harley-Davidson, one of the first ads made an amusing allusion to Harley-Davidson, the copy reading, "No, the motorcycles gods will not strike you down." In many ways "The New American Motorcycle" campaign helped the marketers to refine their approach, the allusions to Harley giving way to a pure focus on Victory.

The later ads gave the audience what it wanted to see: the bike itself. To emphasize the positioning of the brand, its American essence, the bike was photographed in iconic American settings such as the West. But to connect it to its hardworking audience, the motorcycle was also displayed in industrial scenes. In other ads the bike was set in urban nightlife scenes to suggest that the Victory was a motorcycle for the city as well as the open road. The text was spare, with the print ads mostly relying on the tag "The new American motorcycle." Victory later redesigned its catalog to include new images of the bikes, a lesson it learned from this initial campaign.

Because the campaign's budget Polaris only did a limited amount of television advertising for the Victory, but it was an important medium because it provided potential customers with the sound of the bike—and the roar of a heavyweight bike was a major part of its appeal—while showing the lines of the Victory in motion. The company produced one or two 30-second TV spots a year over the next four years. They were shown on select national cable channels, such as the Speed Channel, ESPN, and TNN. The company also did some limited local radio advertising.

The goal of all the advertisements was to persuade potential customers to visit their area Victory dealership. There the company provided brochures and posters, and most importantly people were able to test-ride a Victory Motorcycle. The company believed that if it succeeded in getting someone in the saddle of a Victory, it had a good chance of selling one.

Gradually customers began to accept the Victory brand. In 2002 the company launched a new set of print ads that played with the tagline "That is my Victory" and featured testimonial letters from customers expressing what the Victory motorcycle meant to them. Although the advertising played a key role in growing the brand, perhaps of more importance were changes that company made on other fronts. In 2002 Victory introduced the Freedom engine to greatly improve performance. Another significant development was the introduction of the Vegas model, the styling of which finally gave Victory a distinctive look, one that met with approval from motorcycle enthusiasts. Four of the major motorcycle magazines named the Vegas the "best cruiser of the year" in 2003. Victory also enjoyed success with a limited-time Custom Order Program that allowed customers to design their dream bike online. As a result Victory Web traffic increased sevenfold in 2003.

OUTCOME

During the time it ran its "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, Victory experienced a steady gain in sales. Although Victory had a small market share (about 2 percent) in the cruiser category, the company was confident that it had successfully established itself in the marketplace. Much of that success, granted, was based on anecdotal evidence, such as the sight of a Victory motorcycle riding side-by-side with a Harley through the streets of Sturgis and reports of bikers with Victory tattoos. "Victory is very, very strong," Mark Blackwell, general manager of Polaris's Victory division, told Powersports Business in 2004. "We've reached critical mass. Three years ago, people were asking, 'Who is Victory? Are you the guys from Minnesota who are bankrupt?' Last year, people were asking about the Vegas and now people are pretty well informed; they know we're part of Polaris." According to Motorcycle Industry Council data reported in September 2005, Victory Motorcycle was the fastest-growing brand in the industry, with retail sales increasing at a rate of about 50 percent. Although difficult to quantify, the spadework done by Martin/Williams's "The New American Motorcycle" campaign played a significant role in that growth.

RIDE THE BEST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Minneapolis, Minnesota-based Polaris Industries Inc. continued "Ride the Best," a long-standing campaign, to promote its personal watercraft (PWC) in 1998. The campaign, handled by Carmichael Lynch of Minneapolis, had been in effect for much of the time since Polaris introduced its PWC in 1993 and was used primarily in magazine advertising. During 1998 Polaris spent an estimated $7 million on advertising, $5 million on snowmobiles and watercraft, both handled by Carmichael Lynch until October 1998. At that point the company was the world's leading snowmobile maker and one of the leading producers of personal watercraft.

The big story regarding Polaris's watercraft advertising during 1998 was not so much the advertising itself as it was the swirl of events surrounding that advertising. After a 15-year relationship with Carmichael Lynch, Polaris undertook an agency review in September 1998, and after considering a number of agencies and raising much speculation regarding what its ultimate choice would be, the company selected Martin/Williams of Minneapolis. Accompanying the change of agencies would be a change of focus, with a greater emphasis on television advertising as opposed to magazines.

As to what prompted the switch, Polaris did not make any explicit statements, and the suddenness of the review seemed to catch Carmichael Lynch off guard. In any case, by early 1999 Polaris and Martin/Williams were ready for a new push and some fine tuning of strategy—though the "Ride the Best" campaign would stay. Polaris also made all-terrain vehicles (ATVs) and the Victory motorcycle; advertising for both was handled by Associates and Stahl of Minneapolis and was not affected by the review.

Coupled with the changes in Polaris's advertising lineup was a continued choppiness in the world of maritime recreational equipment. On the one hand, a strong economy and the lower prices of personal watercraft compared with boats gave Polaris an advantage over boat manufacturers; on the other hand, PWC sales had not been explosive either. But things were looking up for Polaris as 1998 went on, and by the end of the year profits were looking up as well.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Around the end of World War II, Edgar Hetteen and David Johnson earned a living doing welding and repair work for neighbors and by making custom machinery for farmers in rural Minnesota. Hetteen and Johnson formed Hetteen Hoist & Derrick in Rousea, Minnesota, in 1945, and a few years later Johnson developed a gas-powered sled. The latter evolved into the snowmobile, which Hetteen Hoist & Derrick began producing under the Polaris brand name in 1954.

By the late 1950s the company—now named Polaris Industries Inc.—was selling some 300 snowmobiles a year. Eventually Hetteen left after a dispute with some of the company's investors and went on to form Arctic Enterprises (later Arctic Cat Inc.), maker of the Arctic Cat snowmobile. The latter would prove to be one of Polaris snowmobiles' most significant competitors in years to come. Meanwhile, Hetteen's brother Allan became Polaris's president, and in 1968 the company was acquired by Textron, which also owned Bell helicopters, Schaefer pens, and Talon zippers. Also in 1968 Polaris began what would turn out to be a long relationship with Fuji Heavy Industries of Japan, with an agreement whereby Fuji became the exclusive manufacturer of the engines used in Polaris snowmobiles.

Initially, Polaris had sold its snowmobiles purely as utility vehicles, which meant that its customer base was confined to persons in extremely cold northern states who could justify the expense for their work. If the company wanted to expand its customer base, it would have to begin marketing snowmobiles as recreational vehicles, which it did in the 1960s. By 1971, however, recreational snowmobile purchases had risen as high as they ever would, with Polaris selling almost 500,000 units in that year. A decade later Textron was ready to close the doors at Polaris, but company president Hal Wendel led a buyout by management.

One of Wendel's greatest contributions to the company was in the area of diversification. For a number of reasons—not least of which was the fact that people in most places could only use snowmobiles for part of the year—Wendel recognized the need to develop a supplementary product line. This appeared in 1985 in the form of the ATV, and again Polaris approached the product as a utility rather than a recreational vehicle. Soon it had become the world's No. 2 ATV maker, after Honda, and in 1991 it emerged as the leading snowmobile company.

With the introduction of personal watercraft in 1993, Polaris extended its offerings even further, and in 1994 it made an initial public offering of its stock. Three years later Polaris announced an extraordinary initiative: it would become the first American company in half a century to enter the motorcycle market. By that point all American motorcycle manufacturers with the exception of Harley-Davidson had shut down, forced out of business by cheaper and more efficient Japanese models. Nineteen ninety-eight saw the rollout of the first Victory motorcycles.

RIDING HIGH ON LAKE TAHOE

Primarily because of the reportedly higher rate of danger associated with personal watercraft, a number of lawmakers in the United States during the 1990s sought to restrict if not ban the use of personal watercraft on public waterways. This effort reached all the way to Capitol Hill, where the House of Representatives reviewed a number of ultimately unsuccessful initiatives intended to put brakes on what some perceived as careless use of personal watercraft. Then in May 1999 the Tahoe Regional Planning Agency (TRPA) at Lake Tahoe, Nevada, achieved what Washington seemingly could not: as a means of protecting the lake's environment, if not for the purposes of safety, it established regulations prohibiting virtually all personal watercraft from the Lake Tahoe area.

So why would Polaris Watercraft want to announce this fact, in triumphant tones, in a May 28, 1999, news release? The TRPA prohibited virtually all models of watercraft—"except one," as Polaris proudly noted: "The new direct fuel injection system of the Polaris Genesis FFI is the only technology available that has unrestricted permanent usage rights on Lake Tahoe." According to Jim Baegte, TRPA executive director: "Lake Tahoe is a unique natural resource and national treasure. Because it is also a popular recreational destination, we must constantly search for balance so people can continue to enjoy activities such as boating without causing further harm to the sensitive environment. We are pleased that manufacturers like Polaris have responded in such a timely fashion to the call for finding that balance by developing cleaner watercraft engine technology."

TARGET MARKET

"In less than a decade," wrote Susan Feyder in the Minneapolis-St. Paul Star-Tribune, "personal watercraft have established a beachhead on the water sports scene." According to research conducted by the National Marine Manufacturers Association, unit sales of personal watercraft more than tripled between 1991 and 1996. By 1996, when 191,000 units were sold in the United States, PWCs made up 37 percent of all powered watercraft sold in the nation—as opposed to just 20 percent five years before.

Personal watercraft typically drew a younger buyer than did boats. This was true for several reasons, one of which was price. As Feyder noted, personal watercraft ranged from $4,000 to $8,000, whereas a boat buyer most likely would have to spend more than $10,000 to acquire a good powerboat. "With personal watercraft, you're appealing to a different kind of buyer," an industry analyst told her. "This is either someone who wouldn't buy a boat, or an existing boat owner who buys [a personal watercraft] to have one more toy."

Feyder noted the contrast between the image of the boating industry as opposed to that of personal watercraft as reflected in advertising: An ad for Genmar Wellcraft powerboats featured in the Saks Fifth Avenue Christmas catalog showed a well-heeled couple enjoying the pleasures of boating with a headline announcing "The Gift of Style." "Compare that to the way personal watercraft makers promote their products with ads picturing daredevils recklessly churning up spray and jumping waves," Feyder said. "There's the ad for the Arctic Cat Tigershark that reads, 'There's powerful. And then there's staple-the-sunglasses-to-your-head powerful.' " She went on to cite a Carmichael Lynch print ad for Polaris "featuring a rotund buyer sitting on his Polaris SL650offering this testimonial: 'Take my word for it, this thing hauls some serious butt.' "

COMPETITION

Irwin Jacobs would not have found this the least bit funny. Jacobs was the owner of Genmar Holdings, makers of the Wellcraft and other boats, from the $850 Crestliner fishing boat to the $9.2 million Hatteras yacht. Typical Genmar offerings carried a five-figure price tag. "In Jacobs's mind," Feyder wrote, "the interests of the boating and personal watercraft industries are so at odds that he doesn't consider personal watercraft to be boats at all."

Quite aside from boat manufacturers such as Jacobs, Polaris had to compete with the other leaders in the personal watercraft market. Leading the pack was Bombardier Inc., a Canadian company that produced the ultra-popular Sea-Doo and enjoyed a 49 percent market share. At a distant second came Yamaha with 18 percent, followed closely by another Japanese company, Kawasaki, which held 14 percent of the market. Fourth in line, and top among American manufacturers, was Polaris, holding a 13 percent share. Far below it was its only American competitor, Arctic Cat Inc., with just 5 percent of the market. All remaining personal watercraft manufacturers made up the last 1 percent of sales.

All was not rosy in the personal watercraft category. Brunswick, a Chicago company with a $2 billion marine division that produced powerboats and engines, had flirted with the personal watercraft market in 1996 before deciding to make a retreat. "In our view, it is not a growth market," a company spokesperson told Feyder. More significant was the fact that industry leader Bombardier had been forced to make cutbacks. But Polaris and Arctic planned to maintain their production force at about the same levels as they had been the previous year.

Discussing the move by Brunswick into yachts and away from personal watercraft, investment analyst Jill Krutick of Smith Barney told Feyder: "Given the crowded field in personal watercraft and slower growth there, it's turned out to be a savvy move. You've got a potentially big market from baby boomers with wealth they've accumulated in the strong stock market." This did not stop Jacobs from sounding a sour note with regard to personal watercraft: "Through glitz and marketing they've created a glorified environment over something that is a nuisance and dangerous," he said. And Phil Keeter of the Marine Retailers Association of America, Feyder noted, was not convinced by watercraft manufacturers' claims that they were not hurting boat sales. He had seen a jump in the number of personal watercraft at the lake where he did his boating, and said, "I think they're keeping people from trading up to another boat."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In July 1999, when new agency Martin/Williams unveiled its first campaign for Polaris, Aaron Baar in Adweek described the work of Carmichael Lynch, which had lost out in the fall 1998 agency review: "Carmichael's last work for Polaris showcased its watercraft with humorous artwork and copy that stressed the benefits of the vehicle's engine." Typical of this advertising was the ad showing the overweight man and the "serious butt" caption. On the other hand, Baar wrote that Martin/Williams's campaign "addresses the bond between man and machine." In contrast to Carmichael Lynch's humorous approach, that of Martin/Williams was much more tongue-in-cheek. One constant remained, however: the tag line "Ride the Best."

In September 1998 Polaris inaugurated the agency review that led to the switch. Naomi Teske, the company's marketing communications manager, told Adweek that Polaris was undertaking the review in order to "make sure we're with the right agency." Along with the review came a change in leadership at Polaris, with Wendel stepping down to be replaced by Thomas Tiller as CEO.

According to Baar in Adweek, Polaris had sent out feelers to about a dozen agencies before cutting the number in half by late September. As for incumbent Carmichael Lynch, agency spokesman Stephen Dupont told Tim J. Johnson of Minneapolis-St. Paul City Business in early October that the agency had not been invited to take part in the review. "Until we got the word a couple days ago, we didn't know ourselves," he said regarding Polaris's final choice. As for why the company had decided to switch agencies, he said: "We're really disappointed in the decision, but we know that a lot of companies, especially ones that have worked with an agency for a long time, simply want a change. We understand that."

OUTCOME

Perhaps another possible cause for Polaris's decision to conduct an agency review may be found in an April 6, 1998, story by Baar in Adweek. According to Baar, Carmichael Lynch was "working on undisclosed projects for Outboard Marine Corp.," a Waukegan, Illinois, company that produced boats, engines, and boating accessories. Two weeks later a Polaris news release indicated that the company had reduced its personal watercraft production as a response to a decrease in demand across the industry. In such an environment, it may have considered Carmichael Lynch's work for Outboard Marine an indication of divided loyalties.

Whatever the case, Polaris announced the choice of Martin/Williams in October 1998, and later that month Baar reported that the new agency's "first task will be to develop a campaign and collateral materials for the company's 2000 model year snowmobiles." Mike Gray of Martin/Williams told Baar, "Over the longer term, [Polaris] wants to look at what [its] brand means across all categories."

By June 1999 Delaney Report announced that "Agencies should keep an eye on Minneapolis-based Polaris Industries, which is gearing up for a big marketing offensive." The following month Polaris and Martin/Williams launched a campaign for snowmobiles and personal watercraft. Headlines of print ads read: "It's only engineering until you get on. Then it's all chemistry." The company also prepared, for the first time in several years, to run television spots.

I-ZONE/JOYCAM/ STICKY FILM TEEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Polaroid Corporation, manufacturer of one of the premiere brands of cameras for more than 50 years, faced a crisis in the 1990s as the rise of new technologies, in particular digital cameras, negated the company's edge in the instant delivery of prints. After putting its account in review in 2000, Polaroid selected a new advertising agency, Leo Burnett Worldwide, to help rekindle the brand's sagging fortunes. The focus over the next three years was on taking advantage of the successful launch of the small I-Zone and JoyCam cameras and the small adhesive-backed "sticky film" they used. The company's target was teens, in particular 15- to 17-year-old girls.

Because the marketers were playing to an audience that normally rejected typical hard-sell appeals, they attempted to be innovative and engaging while subtly urging teens in both television spots and print ads to buy the cameras and apply the "sticky pics" to whatever surface struck their fancy. For example, one television spot featured a young woman jumping up and down on her bed, slapping Polaroid pictures on the ceiling. A print effort included an insert of pictures that could be applied as a form of commentary to an accompanying fake advertisement, and teens were encouraged to "hijack" real ads with their own sticky pics.

Over the course of three years Leo Burnett succeeded in many ways. Much of the work received industry awards, and Polaroid enjoyed sales spikes. The added revenue did not, however, stave off bankruptcy for the company, which never approached spending the $150 million the account was worth when Leo Burnett took over. Instead it was estimated that Polaroid, short on cash, spent only about $70 million a year. When the account was again put up for review in 2003, Leo Burnett opted not to participate, leaving the task of rebuilding one of the great brands in American history to others.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Polaroid Corporation grew out of the polarization research conducted by Edwin Land beginning in the 1920s. After developing a polarizing material he struggled to find a commercial application, initially finding success with the sale of sunglasses. On Christmas Day 1943, in a flash of inspiration, Land conceived of a camera and self-developing film utilizing his polarizing material. With Polaroid on the verge of financial ruin by 1946, Land placed all his hopes on the development of his instant camera. It was introduced into the market a year later with a great deal of fanfare and was an immediate hit.

During the 1950s the company grew rapidly and became a marketing success story. In the camera industry

Polaroid played Pepsi to Kodak's Coca-Cola. Much of Polaroid's success was due to its creative approach to advertising. It was quick to take advantage of the rising popularity of television, enlisting early stars of the medium, like Tonight Show hosts Steve Allen and Jack Paar, to demonstrate Polaroid cameras in live television commercials. According to Stuart Elliott, writing for the New York Times, in the 1970s Polaroid introduced "a series of popular spots featuring James Garner and Mariette Hartley, whose relaxed, playful banter led millions of viewers to think they were married. As recently as the late 1990s, a comic Polaroid campaign carrying the theme 'See what develops' won numerous awards."

The proliferation of one-hour photography developing shops and the increasing popularity of digital photography dramatically changed the landscape for Polaroid during the 1990s. To counteract declining revenues in its core instant film business, Polaroid cut costs while attempting to diversify into such areas as medical imaging (a major failure), flashlights and batteries, and graphic arts. By the end of the decade, however, Polaroid decided to once again turn to the consumer market, this time focusing on a younger demographic market with the I-Zone Instant Pocket Camera, a slim camera producing small instant pictures, and the JoyCam, a smaller, lower-priced version of the company's standard instant camera. Both were introduced in the second half of 1999. Polaroid also looked to expand its business in Europe and the Pacific and as a result dropped its advertising agency, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, in favor of Leo Burnett, which had global reach as a part of the Publicis Groupe. After taking over the Polaroid account, at the time worth about $150 million, in the spring of 2000, Leo Burnett launched a marketing campaign to promote the I-Zone and JoyCam following their successful introduction.

TARGET MARKET

While the I-Zone and JoyCam were aimed at the 18-to-25 demographic, the cameras' core users were girls aged 15 to 17, and it was this audience that the ensuing campaign targeted. But it was a tricky population to address, given the marketing savvy possessed by contemporary teens, who from the cradle had been bombarded by advertising. They knew when they were being marketed to and were especially resistant to corporate, hard-sell approaches. Polaroid knew its advertising would have to be innovative, witty, and engaging if it were to reach the mark. The goal was to make the I-Zone and JoyCam must-have items for teenage girls. Moreover the marketers wanted to establish I-Zone and JoyCam as enduring brands in the market, rather than mere fads soon to be abandoned by fickle teens. On all levels it was a tall order for Polaroid's marketers.

ON SECOND THOUGHT

Polaroid Corporation was established to produce polarizing material, which it initially attempted to sell to automakers for nonglare car headlights and windshields, but Detroit showed no interest. At the 1939 New York World's Fair, Polaroid wowed the public with a three-dimensional film that required special filtering glasses. This time it was Hollywood's turn to pass on Polaroid's innovative technology.

COMPETITION

Historically Polaroid's strength in the photography field was the instant delivery of photographs. That edge eroded with the emergence of new technologies, however. Conveniently located photo shops and counters in mass retailers offering one-hour development cut into Polaroid's market share, as consumers proved willing to trade off instant development of a single shot for the quick delivery of prints plus the film's negatives in order to make multiple copies of favorite shots. Even more devastating to Polaroid was the introduction of digital photography and its rapid acceptance with mainstream consumers. Not only did digital cameras offer instant gratification, but poor shots could be immediately discarded and favorite ones transferred to home computers, from where they could be printed on ink-jet printers or sent by E-mail to friends and family.

The players in the new digital photography field included old-guard rivals Canon, Olympus, Fuji, Minolta, and Kodak, although the latter, like Polaroid, was not as nimble as the other companies to embrace digital photography. In addition Polaroid had to contend with a new breed of entrants in the field, including corporate giants like Hewlett-Packard, Nokia, and Samsung. What they may have lacked in track record in photography, they made up in large advertising budgets. Their combined marketing heft promoted digital photography, superseding traditional photography at a pace that took the likes of Polaroid and Kodak by surprise. Kodak was much larger and better diversified than Polaroid and had at least been a pioneer in digital photography, holding a number of key patents. It could always change its focus to digital technology, a step the company took in the 2000s. But Polaroid faced a far more serious crisis: how to survive in a marketplace that seemed to have passed it by.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Leo Burnett launched a marketing campaign in the spring of 2000 to promote the I-Zone and JoyCam to

WAIT UNTIL THE PRICE COMES DOWN

When Polaroid Corporation introduced the first instant-developing camera in 1947, it was priced at $89.75. The sepia-toned film cost $1.75 for eight exposures.

younger consumers, in particular 15- to 17-year-old girls, the objectives were clear but difficult to achieve. The marketers wanted to increase sales of both the cameras and the film they used, but at the same time they hoped to establish the brands and avoid the trap of becoming a passing fancy. The goal wasn't to be on teens' must-have list for just this year but rather for many years to come. The strategy of the campaign was to appeal to the target audience's sense of fun, to encourage them to take pictures with I-Zone and JoyCam cameras and to play with the images. A key feature of the new cameras was their sticky film, which allowed users to apply the small pictures they took to any surface.

Both television spots and print ads in the campaign followed the same game plan. According to Shoot magazine's Fred Cisterna, "the high-energy ads show hip young adults having fun with the new cameras and with the Sticky Film." For example, the television spot titled "Ceiling" opened with the tease of a young woman jumping up and down out of the frame. Next the audience saw that she was jumping on her bed and with each leap was sticking a small Polaroid picture on her bedroom ceiling. In another ad, "Pasties," featuring a teen boy, the audience first saw two photos moving back and forth in time to a techno track of drums and bass. The payoff, as revealed in a widening shot, was that the pictures were stuck to the chest of a young man watching himself in a mirror and moving to the music.

Polaroid attempted to build on the campaign in 2001. The JoyCam was positioned as a social lubricant to consumers in their 20s in an adverting effort themed "It Only Comes Out at Night." Unlike the typical ads selling cameras or film that showed only appealing pictures, this series featured unflattering candid shots of partying young people. Again the marketers hoped to nudge the target audience not only to buy Polaroid's small cameras but to take more pictures, thereby generating increased revenues. In 2001 Polaroid also launched an advertising campaign to promote its core product, introducing a new tagline, "Click, Instantly," which suggested that Polaroid pictures had the ability to bring people together in such a way that they clicked, helping to transform a boring party or mend fences between feuding couples. The company's attempt on the one hand to forge a relationship with teens and on the other to remind an older demographic audience that it still had emotional relevance could not overcome the financial hole Polaroid had slipped into, however. In October 2001 Polaroid filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The company had no choice but to continue to spend money to promote its products or risk becoming virtually irrelevant in the marketplace, but because of its debts Polaroid would only be able to budget a fraction of the $150 million global account Leo Burnett thought it had won in 2000.

The campaign to pitch the I-Zone and JoyCam to the teen market continued in 2002. The most innovative work during the year came in the second half when Leo Burnett developed the concept of "hijacking." The inspiration came from copywriter Eric Routenberg, who one day spotted a Polaroid photo stuck on a bumper of a parked car. He told Aaron Baar of Adweek, "That car stopped being a car, and it was an ad for an I-Zone." Out of that experience grew a somewhat subversive, interactive print campaign that the agency hoped would appeal to teens. In several teen magazines Polaroid placed an insert of 32 sticky pics, of a scuba diver, a monkey face, and a man's hairy chest, among others. On the next page was a fake print ad, which the users could comment on by affixing some of the stickers. The goal of these ads was to reengage the core market, to reacquaint people with the I-Zone product and urge them to use their own imagination in finding ways to make a statement using sticky pics—to in essence hijack ads and other images for their own purposes. A more practical objective for Polaroid was to simply increase much-needed sales in the fourth quarter of the year.

OUTCOME

The work Leo Burnett did for Polaroid promoting the I-Zone, the JoyCam, and sticky film was successful in a number of ways. When the campaign broke in 2000 Polaroid experienced an immediate jump in sales, and research indicated that the target market liked the products a great deal, suggesting that they would not fade away like many fads. Leo Burnett also received industry recognition for some of the work it did over the course of two years. It received a 2001 Effie Award from the New York American Marketing Association. In 2002 the agency was a finalist for a Magazine Publishers of America Kelly Award and, among other distinctions, received the Best of Show and Award of Excellence in the Chicago Windy Awards, the Art Director's Club of New York 2002 Merit, and Gold and Silver ADDY Awards, given out by the American Advertising Federation. Leo Burnett's hijacking work in 2003 was also an MPA Kelly finalist.

Despite the success of the marketers, Polaroid continued to struggle. In July 2002 the company was bought out of bankruptcy and taken private. Polaroid simply did not have the cash it had once budgeted for advertising. According to press accounts the company was now spending about $70 million a year, less than half of the $150 million the account was estimated to be worth in 2000. When the account was put up for review in 2003, Leo Burnett opted not to participate. Euro RSCG Worldwide then took over the task of reviving the fortunes of one of the truly great brands of the second half of the twentieth century.

SEE WHAT DEVELOPS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 1995 Polaroid Corporation was perceived as a brand and a company whose time had passed. Disposable and 35mm cameras were less expensive than instant ones, their film was much cheaper and could be developed in an hour, and they produced better-quality photos. Polaroid sales had been declining steadily over the years, and the brand had largely faded from view. Although the company had no new products to tout, it began attempting to rebuild its brand in the United States through marketing. Polaroid tapped the San Francisco advertising agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to craft a campaign that would create positive buzz around the brand while reminding consumers of the unique characteristics of instant photography.

"See What Develops" ran from 1996 through 1998. The campaign leveraged an estimated annual budget of between $30 million and $35 million and included TV as well as print components. The campaign's first series of executions specifically touted the advantages of instant photography, whereas the second installment, unveiled in 1998, focused on human behavior peculiar to the instant-photography experience. For instance, an early TV spot showed a businessman who opened his briefcase to find a surprise photo placed there by his wife as an incitement to come home for lunch, and a later TV spot gently pointed out the absurdity of consumers' insistence on shaking or blowing on Polaroid photos as though to help them develop.

The campaign was well received within the advertising industry, and it initially drove substantial sales increases in Polaroid cameras and film. Polaroid's long-term outlook for recovering its spot atop the U.S. camera industry remained bleak, however, and 1998 saw the company post a 16 percent sales decline versus 1997.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

On February 21, 1947, Edwin H. Land announced his invention of one-step photography at a meeting of the Optical Society of America. Since that time the Polaroid Corporation, Land's company, had been synonymous with instant photography. There was an explosion of popularity in the 1970s, when instant cameras became simple to use and the shooter did not have to wait weeks for 110 or 35mm film to be developed. By the 1990s, however, instant photography was perceived as a relic of the past, and so was Polaroid.

TARGET MARKET

There was a broad target audience for the "See What Develops" campaign. Polaroid wanted to reach out to current users, lapsed owners, and those who had never owned an instant camera. According to a Goodby report, this included "men, women, parents, single adults, African Americans, Latinos and Caucasians, people in their 20s and people in their 40s." They also knew that groups such as realtors, contractors, and insurance agents used the cameras in business. Goodby wanted to influence those users while they were away from their jobs—watching TV at home—to reinforce the need for instant pictures and Polaroid.

NO ACROSS-THE-BOARD INTEGRATION PLAN DEVELOPED

Goodby did not plan an extensive integration effort in the "See What Develops" campaign. There were few direct-mail and in-store promotions. There was, however, a successful seasonal camera promotion that was publicized during the holidays in late 1996 and spring 1997 to encourage buyers of the basic One Step camera to mail in a $10 rebate form. This promotion was tied in with 15- and 30-second TV spots that ran during that time. The "See What Develops" campaign themes also were used by Polaroid's public relations department on the company website and on a promotional van tour.

COMPETITION

Increased competition from disposable and easy "point-and-shoot" 35mm cameras, along with one-hour film-processing centers, had made Polaroid's instant photography increasingly irrelevant, and the company had lost its positioning in the market over the years. There was no perceived need to take a Polaroid picture when 35mm photography produced images that were cheaper, could be developed quickly, and had better quality.

Since 1990 the company's retail sales had decreased approximately 3 percent a year. The public was not using Polaroids anymore. The cameras were in the backs of closets in many households. Owners used the past tense if they talked about the brand at all. According to Goodby research, people felt like " 'it was state-of-the-art twenty years ago . . . my dad had one . . . we used to use it all the time for parties . . . it was so clunky . . .' And the only advertising they seemed to recall clearly for this 'cultural relic' was the old James Garner and Mariette Hartley campaign from the 1970s."

In addition to the brand's image problem, Polaroid's chief rival, Kodak, planned to buy $108.8 million in advertising time in 1996. Polaroid's ad budget of $33.7 million for the same period was less than a third of Kodak's.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1995 Polaroid did not have a new product to release. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners and its client decided that "the advertising would have to bear the responsibility for changing perceptions and attitudes about the Polaroid brand," according to one agency report. They had three objectives—to get people thinking and talking about Polaroid, to make instant photography relevant again and reestablish the uniqueness of Polaroid, and to increase sales of Polaroid cameras and film.

Goodby consumer research indicated high negatives when Polaroid was compared to 35mm cameras and when it was perceived as an ordinary camera for taking pictures for photo albums. Those questioned repeatedly mentioned the poor quality of Polaroid pictures compared to 35mm and that the film was expensive. The ad agency knew it needed to avoid direct comparisons with other cameras. Focus-group participants were given Polaroid cameras and film, and they were asked to bring the pictures they shot to the next meeting. Goodby wanted to discover how instant cameras could become attractive again to camera buyers. As expected, most of the returned photos were of friends, pets, and family—typical photo album pictures. But the agency discovered in the focus groups that the shots that made the price of a camera and film worth it were the shots that would not be put in albums. For example, one man reported that he had taken a picture to send to his insurance agent of his car's damage from an accident. A woman had used the camera when she was trying on sunglasses to show her husband at home how the glasses looked on her.

The research that drove the creative team was the concept that taking a Polaroid picture was only the first step. Goodby determined that the photo should be used as "an instant solution to a problem, an instant tool to make something happen. There should always be a purpose, the picture should always set off a chain reaction . . . something should always happen next." From that concept the "See What Develops" campaign was born.

The agency produced a series of print ads for magazines as diverse as People, Rolling Stone, and Time. Most of the print ads it designed were very simple, consisting of a Polaroid photo, a comment, the Polaroid logo, and the tagline "See What Develops." For instance, one ad featured a photo of the front of a business with a neon sign above it saying MOM. A letter was next to the photo on WOW Productions letterhead, addressed to the Hung-Rite Sign Company. The text simply read "You moron." The picture, the letterhead, and the logo and tagline made the point succinctly. Another print ad featured four shots of a toilet with the seat up. Below each picture was handwritten the day of the week and the time. The text read, "Honey, you always do that. No, I don't. Yes you do. No, I don't. Wanna bet?" followed by the logo and tagline.

The media plan included television spots on shows such as NYPD Blue, Seinfeld, Melrose Place, and ER, which were characterized by Goodby as "hip, high 'talk-value' programming.'' The aim was to get people talking about Polaroid, to create some ''buzz.'' Because Polaroid had less money to spend than Kodak, the creative team decided to employ a—that is, focus placement entirely in the 6:00 to 9:30 p.m. time slots and run the commercials for a shorter number of weeks than usual to have more impact. The strategy resulted in an average of 133 gross rating points each week for 14 weeks, according to the Competitive Media Report.

Almost $3 million in additional media time was obtained by working with the major TV networks to link upcoming shows with Polaroid and ''See What Develops.'' For instance, a typical program teaser was ''See What Develops next week on Melrose Place.'' Mediaweek honored Polaroid for the best media plan for a campaign spending more than $25 million.

The new television spots, while complicated visually, still conveyed the simple message that sometimes a Polaroid photo was the only thing that would work. ''The Architect'' was a 30-second spot that featured a group of people in a meeting, heatedly discussing solutions to a crisis. The phone rang, and a man with architectural drawings on his desk indicated to his wife on the line that he was too busy to go home for lunch. She asked him to check his briefcase. The man took out a Polaroid picture and with a delighted and surprised intake of breath, involuntarily said, ''Ooohh.'' He then said he would be home in 10 minutes. A shot of the logo and tagline ended the commercial. The image he saw was left to the viewer's imagination. In ''Dog and Cat,'' another 30-second spot, there were quick shots of a spilled kitchen trash can, a woman scolding a dog as a cat looked on, the dog later watching as the cat approached the trash container, the dog thinking back to the scolding, then picturing his options—a rolling pin, a cleaver, a Polaroid camera. Cut to the logo and tagline. The dog, with a picture in its mouth of the cat in the trash, then greeted the owner at the door, who said, ''Oh, dear.''

As the campaign matured, Polaroid and Goodby focused on documenting humorous Polaroid-influenced human behavior rather than on explicitly pointing out situations in which instant cameras might be necessary. For instance, in 1998 one documentary-style spot focused on three different adults at a party, each of whom detailed the trademark poses that he or she relied on when instant photos were taken at such events. Another spot poked fun at the unnecessary rituals, such as blowing and shaking the photo, that Polaroid users frequently engaged in as a way of ''helping'' the image emerge. The season's third TV spot focused on the embarrassment that an otherwise dignified bank manager felt about a Polaroid taken of him at a party.

OUTCOME

Campaign objectives were initially met and exceeded. Three months after the release of ''See What Develops,'' a tracking study showed that there was a ''buzz'' about Polaroid. Goodby cited tracking study data when it explained, ''unaided brand awareness among ou[r] 18–49-year-old target increased from 31 to 39 percent. Unaided ad awareness rose from 11 percent to 22 percent.''

The campaign also got attention from publications besides the advertising press—''something Polaroid's advertising hasn't gotten since the days of the well-liked Garner-Hartley campaign,'' one Goodby report stated. The report cited articles in Newsweek, USA Today, Time, and the Los Angeles Times Magazine and added that one of the print ads had been talked about by Tom Snyder on the Late Late Show.

The objective of redefining the relevancy and uniqueness of Polaroid instant photography was also exceeded in the early stages of the campaign. Prelaunch Goodby and Polaroid qualitative research in 1995 and 1996 had found that focus-group members who had negative attitudes about Polaroid before the meeting would leave the session feeling enthusiastic after having viewed the campaign. Goodby reported that the group members said that ''they now wanted to buy a Polaroid camera, how they saw all these new ways of using it, how it could still do things no other camera could do.'' According to the ad agency, copy tests had revealed that 60 percent of Polaroid owners said that they would buy film after seeing the spots, versus 30 percent for the control group.

The qualitative research done before the campaign began was proven correct. The tracking study determined that consumer intent to purchase a Polaroid camera rose from 9 percent before the campaign to 13 percent three months later. Goodby explained, ''we had given consumers a new way of looking at 'old Polaroid,' and it made them reconsider buying Polaroid cameras and film.''

The objective of increasing Polaroid camera and film sales was also met. Partial year A.C. Nielsen data for 1996 indicated that camera sales increased by 13 percent. Film sales, which had been declining 3 percent a year for a long time, increased 1 percent—a turnaround of 4 percent.

In addition to the Mediaweek award, Goodby and Polaroid received a Silver EFFIE. Polaroid's long-term prospects, however, failed to improve significantly after the campaign's initial effects wore off. ''See What Develops'' continued to win accolades within the advertising industry, but Polaroid's total sales for 1998 declined 16 percent, dropping to $1.8 billion from a 1997 total of $2.1 billion.

In 1999, although Goodby had unveiled a new theme, "Right Now," for its Polaroid branding work, the company abruptly pulled that tag, reportedly in response to high-level executives' displeasure about the fact that the same slogan had been used on behalf of a Pepsi product a few years earlier. "See What Develops" was thus resurrected to serve as the tagline for a set of three TV spots that ran in the spring and summer of that year. In the fall of 1999 Polaroid introduced a line of products already popular in Japan and China rather than any that had been developed specifically for the United States, a move that some analysts considered a desperate tactic to spur growth by any means necessary. These products—a pocket-sized camera that produced passport-sized instant photos with adhesive backs and a disposable instant camera—were marketed in the United States as the Polaroid I-Zone line and targeted a previously untapped market of 6- to 17-year-olds. A Goodby-helmed I-Zone launch campaign resulted in fourth-quarter sales gains of 20 percent, boosting Polaroid's total 1999 sales by 7 percent, to $1.97 billion.

In 2000, however, Polaroid reshuffled its advertising duties to reflect its need for global rather than U.S.-specific marketing platforms, awarding the U.S. account to Chicago's Leo Burnett, an affiliate of Polaroid's European agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty of London and of the Japanese agency Dentsu, which had been simultaneously enlisted to take over the brand's advertising in that country. This reorganization did little to forestall the continued decline of Polaroid's fortunes. Yet another photographic innovation, the digital camera, was becoming increasingly popular among consumers, and its numerous advantages over previous technologies included precisely the capability to offer instant gratification that had been Polaroid's chief marketable advantage over other camera brands. Polaroid filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on October 12, 2000.

CAYENNE LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Well known for its pricey sports cars, German automaker Porsche AG and its American subsidiary, Porsche Cars North America Inc., began to change directions following a sales slump in the early 1990s. It successfully launched a less expensive two-seater, the Boxster, and in 1998 announced that it would enter the luxury SUV market early in the next century. To many it seemed a questionable decision, one that threatened the exclusive nature of the Porsche brand. But the company correctly surmised that the luxury market was moving toward SUVs and the timing for the launch of its SUV entry, the Cayenne, proved fortuitous. In 1999 the company hired a new advertising agency, Minneapolis-based Carmichael Lynch, well known for its work on Harley-Davidson motorcycles, to begin the spadework necessary to promote the new vehicle.

For three consecutive autumns Porsche launched advertising campaigns that attempted to expand on the brand's audience. The TV spots and print ads emphasized the fun and thrill of a Porsche and showed a wide variety of people enjoying Porsche cars. In the background the company also began conducting a direct-mail program to build a database of potential customers, which was also augmented by Web elements and a dedicated website. By the time actual spots for the Cayenne ran on television and ads appeared in magazines, three months before the vehicle went on sale, Cayenne was already enjoying a brisk pace of orders.

When the $15 million main campaign came to a close in the fall of 2003, it had been clearly successful. Porsche enjoyed record sales and profits despite a significant drop in the sale of its sports cars. Also of importance was that only one in five Cayenne buyers were already Porsche owners, meaning that the campaign had succeeded in creating a wider audience for Porsche.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Long dependent on the U.S. market to buy its expensive sports cars, Porsche was severely wounded by the recession of the early 1990s. Car sales bottomed out around 14,000 cars in 1993, a far cry from the 50,000 cars Porsche had sold seven years earlier, of which two-thirds were sold in the United States. New leadership was installed, Japanese manufacturing techniques were introduced to improve efficiency and cut costs, and in 1996 Porsche introduced a new sports car, the Boxster, which found a receptive market for its $40,000 price tag. It was a move that made the brand available to a wider number of potential customers, especially younger buyers. Two years later the German automaker decided to venture even more mainstream, announcing that it would join forces with Volkswagen to jointly develop a new sports utility vehicle, which would be called the Cayenne, scheduled to go on sale by the year 2002. Although research indicated that 45 percent of Porsche owners also owned an SUV, it was a risky decision. According to Gail Edmondson, writing for BusinessWeek, "Porsche aficionados cringed. Even the Porsche family shareholders balked, fearing the company's sports-car tradition and exclusive brand name didn't befit bulky off-roaders." Because the SUV market was most mature in the United States, the marketing effort to launch the Cayenne would primarily fall on the shoulders of Atlanta-based Porsche Cars North America.

In years just preceding the Cayenne's launch, Porsche had spent most of its advertising budget on print ads in car-enthusiast magazines, while television was mostly limited to spots run on regional TV in the top eight markets for the brand. In order to prepare the ground for the Cayenne launch, Porsche hired a new advertising agency in 1999, turning over the $15 million account to Minneapolis-based Carmichael Lynch, which had earned a solid reputation for the work it did for Harley-Davidson motorcycles over the previous 20 years. The agency would develop a pair of interim campaigns to promote Porsche while broadening the brand's appeal in advance of the Cayenne launch. In particular the company wanted to expand its advertising in lifestyle magazines and also increase its direct-mail efforts. Porsche's chief operating officer Richard Ford explained the greater challenge to Jean Halliday of Automotive News: "The key is maintaining our core business and expand without disrupting our core buyers and without losing our brand image."

TARGET MARKET

Porsche, because of its price tag and emphasis on performance, had always appealed to an older, monied male market. That changed somewhat with the introduction of the Boxster, but the target driver, aged 34 to 54, still had an annual income of at least $150,000. And about 80 percent of Boxster buyers were men. The interim campaigns did little to change these sales numbers, but the marketing brought the brand to a wider audience and made it more appealing to them. For the campaign that directly promoted the Cayenne launch, the target market was 42- to 47-year-olds, and because the price range was $52,000 to $75,000, the income of the target market was again high, at least $225,000 a year. Because the SUV was more utilitarian than a two-seat sports car, it was expected to appeal to more women, who could accept it as a family vehicle. Nevertheless Porsche expected that about 70 percent of Cayenne owners would be men.

COMPETITION

The Cayenne competed in the luxury SUV category, which boasted a deep and varied field. The first luxury SUV, the Acura SLX, was introduced by Honda Motor Company in late 1995 and was soon emulated by other automakers, and the concept was embraced by car buyers. Many of the luxury models were simply upgrades of an existing SUV platform: the Cadillac Escalade was a luxury version of the Chevrolet Tahoe; the GMC Yukon Denali depended on the GMC Yukon; the Lincoln Navigator was beholden to the Ford Expedition, as was the Lexus GX 470 to the Toyota 4Runner and the Infiniti QX56 to the Nissan Pathfinder Armada. A pair of vehicles with military roots, the Hummer H1 and the Mercedes-Benz G-Class, also entered the already crowded field. The Cayenne was one of a group of vehicles designed from the start as luxury SUVs, including the Mercedes-Benz M-Class, the Lexus RX 330, and the BMW X5.

By the time of the Cayenne launch, the luxury SUV category was a key to the growth of all luxury brands, with only Rolls Royce and Jaguar electing to remain on the sidelines. According to Chris Isidore, CNN/Money senior writer, "Luxury car executives say that their SUVs are a choice for both traditional SUV buyers moving up in brand and traditional luxury car buyers looking for more room. But data from CarsDirect.com shows that most luxury SUV buyers are comparing those vehicles to other SUVs, including the lower-priced models. Most are not shopping among luxury cars. Thus the SUV is becoming the key to bringing new customers to

A PAST NOT BY DESIGN

Porsche AG was founded in 1931 as an engineering and design consulting firm by Dr. Ferdinand Porsche, who had previously served as technical director for German automaker Daimler. Porsche's work in designing high-quality cars soon caught the attention of a rising politician: Adolf Hitler. When he came to power Hitler enlisted Porsche to develop the Volkswagen and fulfill his vision of an inexpensive car that the average German could own. Later in the 1930s, with Hitler's blessing, Porsche designed a sports car to compete in Grand Prix races. Because of his ties to Hitler and the Nazi party, Dr. Porsche was briefly incarcerated following World War II.

the luxury dealerships.'' The decision by Porsche to develop its own entrant, therefore, proved prescient.

Porsche touted Cayenne's superior performance as a point of difference. Able to reach a top speed of 165 miles per hour, it became the fastest luxury SUV on the market. The vehicle also boasted a suspension with six settings for driving on and off roads and was capable of towing as much as 7,700 pounds. Porsche considered its primary competition to be the BMW X5, the Mercedes-Benz M-Class, and Ford Motor Company's new Land Rover SUVs.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the fall of 1999 Carmichael Lynch unveiled its first campaign for Porsche, which continued to appeal to sports-car enthusiasts and essentially positioned Porsche as a brand to covet. In one TV spot, for example, a suspicious woman learned that a phone number in a man's pocket was actually for a Porsche dealer. While Porsche owners, research indicated, were quick to grasp the brand message, others were not. A year later the agency crafted a campaign that was less cerebral, extended to a broader market, and better suited to the task of setting the stage for the Cayenne launch. The television spots took more of a storytelling approach, featuring characters who did not look like fashion models. The premise of the two spots, fleshing out the theme ''It's a thrill like no other,'' was the length that people would go in order to drive or ride in a Porsche. In one spot set in Ireland two older men argued in a pub about which one of them should be the designated driver that night, while in the other spot a girl intentionally missed the school bus in order to catch a ride in her father's Porsche. The campaign also included five new print ads that attempted to associate fun with the brand. In one ad, for example, a yellow Boxster was shown driving through a field of sunflowers. The headline read, ''What a dog feels like when the leash breaks.''

The fall 2001 TV and print campaign continued to build on the ''It's a thrill like no other'' theme. In one of the two new spots, three traffic controllers caused a Porsche driver to stop at three straight traffic lights just so they could check out the car from every angle using their surveillance cameras. In addition to this brand-building work, Porsche also began to directly promote the Cayenne. In 2001 the company made a direct-mail pitch for the vehicle to approximately 70,000 owners of luxury SUVs and sedans. The response rate was in the 8 to 9 percent range, significantly better than the response Porsche had received in previous direct-mail efforts. Part of the success was due to the vehicle, but a great deal of credit was due to improved targeting techniques, model econometrics, which allowed Porsche to better target people similar to its existing buyers. All told, half a dozen mailings would be made before the Cayenne went on the market. Porsche also made use of its website to build up its database of prospects, as Web banner ads and print ads drove people to the site. People were also added to the database by calling a toll-free telephone number.

More groundwork was done in the Cayenne launch in the fall of 2002, again emphasizing the fun and thrill of driving a Porsche. In one TV spot a man at a business lunch and a woman at a meeting took cell-phone calls that apparently brought bad news and forced them to leave. The man, behind the wheel of a Boxster, was then seen waiting for the woman as they sped off and a voice-over suggested that Porsche was ''perhaps the perfect getaway car.''

The Cayenne promotion began in earnest in January 2003 when TV spots and print ads were run for three weeks and then returned in March when the vehicle went on sale. The advertising introduced the line ''Pure Porsche in an unexpected form.'' Two TV spots, which premiered during NFL football telecasts, anchored this phase of the Cayenne launch. In one a man had a cab follow a Cayenne off the highway and into rough terrain. By the end of the journey the cab was all but wrecked while the Cayenne was unscratched. In the second spot a man driving a motor home passed a Cayenne waiting to enter the highway. He left the wheel and ran to the back of the motor home while his wife slept in order to get a better look at the Porsche. He then watched it through the side windows as he worked his way to the front, took up the wheel again, and longed for the Cayenne, now out of sight. A second pair of 30-second spots began running in August 2003. In one a man revved the engine of his Cayenne in his driveway to the confusion of his neighbors, then stepped out of the car, picked up a cell phone on the ground, and said to a listener, "Is that cool or what?" In the second spot a young boy pretended he was driving a car with his green beans and mashed potatoes, only to have his father explain how to accelerate through a corner. A representative print ad showed a Cayenne at night. The text read, "Do you really need 450 HP to pick up diapers? You ever run out of diapers?"

OUTCOME

The buildup to the Cayenne launch was so successful that the vehicle was selling well through orders before the direct advertising even began. In a year that saw Boxster sales fall off 40 percent and the more expensive 911 model dip 14 percent, Porsche was able to post record sales in fiscal 2003 and a 22 percent increase in net profits to $684 million, all due to sales of Cayenne. Moreover, only about a fifth of Cayenne buyers were already Porsche owners, reflecting the campaign's success in broadening the automaker's customer base. Sales of the luxury SUV continued to grow in 2004, when Porsche introduced a less expensive V6 version of the Cayenne (capable of exceeding 130 miles per hour), a move that opened up the brand to an even wider audience.

TROUBADOUR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1996 entrepreneur Jay Walker came upon a startling statistic: every day airlines flew with an average of 500,000 empty seats. The revelation spurred Walker to create priceline.com, a website that encouraged travelers to set their own price for airfare. If the customer's bid on an unused ticket was at least 70 percent of the ticket price, the customer usually received the discounted ticket. Priceline.com's concept of ''name-your-own-price'' was different from that of the competition. Travelocity.com and expedia.com, for instance, allowed consumers to compare prices from competing airlines. By 2000 priceline.com had expanded its services to include purchasing cars, financing homes, booking hotels, and even buying groceries. To increase consumer awareness about its growing spectrum of services, priceline.com released its ''Troubadour'' campaign in 2000.

''Troubadour'' starred William Shatner, the actor who had played Captain James T. Kirk on the popular Star Trek series. The ad agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos (often called Hill Holliday) created more than 20 ''Troubadour'' commercials that used priceline.com's $60 million advertising budget. First airing on January 1, 2000, the campaign also included print and radio spots. The commercials featured Shatner crooning off-key to songs such as ''The Age of Aquarius,'' ''Freebird,'' and ''I Want You to Want Me.'' Lyrics were modified to advertise airfare and other services from priceline.com. Although Shatner later admitted that his performance was meant to be a self-parody, some critics mistook Shatner's deadpan delivery for earnestness. The campaign ended in late 2000.

The campaign's ''We Gotta Get Out of This Place'' spot was awarded one of Adweek magazine's ''Best Spot'' rankings in 2000. During the first quarter of 2000, priceline.com sold 43 percent more airline tickets than in the same quarter in 1999. Just days after the campaign debuted, priceline.com set a one-day sales record of $3 million.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1997, one year after Jay Walker discovered that airlines flew with more than 500,000 empty seats daily, the entrepreneur started the website priceline.com so that customers could bid on unused seats. Walker assumed that airlines would be eager to reduce their losses and that consumers would appreciate the discounted tickets. The ad agency Heater of Boston first created advertisements (radio spots and print ads) for priceline.com in 1998. The agency's creative director, Bill Heater, explained to the Boston Globe that the first priceline.com advertisements did not follow a particular strategy. Later the agency wanted a celebrity spokesperson that would ''get cheap awareness for a new and complex service.'' Two actors were suggested: Bill Cosby and William Shatner. Priceline.com chose Shatner, hoping that his Star Trek fame would add a futuristic quality. After weeks of negotiations, Shatner agreed to the role in exchange for future company stock.

The first Shatner advertisement broke in 1998 and only used radio spots and print ads. Not only did Shatner star in the radio spots, but he also helped edit some of the dialogue. "I wrote the line about how Priceline was going to be 'big—really big,' and Shatner put his own spin on it," Heater recalled in an interview with the Boston Globe. "It sounded so good it became the tagline."

In a decision that was considered controversial in the late 1990s, priceline.com's chief marketing officer, Paul Breitenbach, refused to advertise his Web-based company with banner ads on websites. He said to Advertising Age, "Online advertising's got a long way to go before it's a part of the [media] mix for me." After priceline.com announced its 1999 public offering, the company outgrew the scope of Heater. That year priceline.com awarded its advertising account to a larger agency, Hill Holliday. The new agency kept using the 68-year-old Shatner and released a campaign to herald the website's expanded features.

SHATNER THE SINGER

In 1968, when the television series Star Trek was at its zenith, William Shatner recorded an album titled The Transformed Man. He created unlikely medleys, such as combining Bob Dylan's folk hit "Mr. Tambourine Man" with recitations of lines from the play Cyrano de Bergerac. Shatner believed that both sources shared themes of personal loss. Even though he could not carry a tune "beyond three notes," according to Adweek, he crooned for the travel website priceline.com's 2000 "Troubadour" campaign. In the commercials, as on his debut album, Shatner sang with a distinctive stop-and-go delivery that was similar to his performance as Captain Kirk on Star Trek.

TARGET MARKET

When priceline.com emerged in 1997, executives believed that its core customer would consist of low-income consumers who could not afford to travel without discounted airfare. Instead the website attracted a demographic of price-conscious consumers from multiple income brackets. According to a company spokesperson, when "Troubadour" was released, most priceline.com customers were Web-savvy, college-educated, upper-income travelers. Also, Breitenbach explained to Advertising Age, "We really see ourselves as serving two markets, the marketers who have unsold inventory and the consumer who wants to save money . . . We're not going to serve one at the expense of the other."

"Troubadour" ran throughout 2000, a tumultuous year for the technology industry. Nearly 50 percent of the 2000 Super Bowl advertisers were dot-coms, companies that existed mostly on the Internet. Ad critics praised the humor of most dot-com commercials but condemned them for rarely connecting the message to what was being sold. Hill Holliday hoped that its "Troubadour" target market would remember priceline.com because of Shatner's campy rendition of songs that referenced priceline.com services. The target consisted of various age groups. Hill Holliday selected Shatner partially for what was considered a multigenerational appeal. In some of the campaign spots Shatner was accompanied by contemporary rock musicians popular with college-age and 20-something consumers, such as Lisa Loeb, Ben Folds Five, and members of Fishbone. To target baby boomers the songs that Shatner sang were hits from the 1960s and 1970s.

Speaking with Internet World, Barbara Callihan, senior vice president and group account director at Hill Holliday, explained the campaign's effect on the target: "They break through the clutter," she said. "And not in an over-the-edge way to shock or turn people off. They make people talk—'Have you seen the new Shatner stuff?'—but it entertains more than the first time you see it. People enjoy seeing them again and again, and enjoying new nuances. It makes you tune in more."

COMPETITION

Priceline.com was one of the first websites that allowed consumers to choose an airfare from among competing airlines. One year before priceline.com was available, expedia.com was created as a joint venture between the Microsoft Corporation and American Express Company. A similar site, travelocity.com, which became another leader in online travel, was created by American Airlines, a subsidiary of the AMR Corporation. Priceline's competitors refrained from letting consumers set their own airfare. When one company, expedia.com, attempted to do so in 1999, allowing consumers to "name-their-own" hotel prices, priceline.com sued Microsoft for patent violation. Thus, competitors instead listed the discounted prices of all competing airlines.

Travelocity.com released two television spots in 2001 that were created by the Richards Group ad agency.

TREK-OR-TREAT

William Shatner, who played Captain James T. Kirk on the popular Star Trek series, starred in a series of television commercials for priceline.com, a travel website that allowed visitors to set their own price for various services. With a sense of humor that surfaced during the commercials, Shatner described to the Washington Post a joke he had played one Halloween. When he took his children trick-or-treating, he dressed as Captain Kirk and wore not one, but two masks of his Star Trek character. ''They'd open the door, and there I was,'' Shatner explained. ''I'd take off the first mask, and it was Captain Kirk! And I'd take off the second mask—and it was Captain Kirk!''

Both spots focused on the pleasure of travel rather than touting Travelocity.com as a low-price leader. ''In the early days we concentrated on the control we offer our customers of shopping and buying,'' Jason Pruismann, Travelocity director of advertising and promotions, said to Adweek. ''But we learned people are more into the experience of traveling rather than going from point A to point B. We wanted to take the high ground with this campaign, show that we can offer the experiences that are most special to people.'' One 30-second spot featured a couple bicycling up a volcano on Maui. Another showed a couple watching the tribal dance of Native Americans near Vancouver, British Columbia.

In the United Kingdom Travelocity.com released a print and television campaign that was created by the London ad agency St. Luke's. The campaign emerged after one study revealed that British employees worked harder than those in any other European country. One spot exaggerated a worker's hectic, overworked lifestyle. It concluded with the copy ''YOU WORK TOO HARD'' and then ''YOU NEED A HOLIDAY.'' The spot's final image was of a tropical beach.

MARKETING STRATEGY

William Shatner starred in more than 20 spots for priceline.com's ''Troubadour'' campaign. Hill Holliday hired the crew from the music network VH1 to create a lounge stage similar to the one used on the performance program VH1 Storytellers. In each commercial Shatner covered a popular song from the 1960s or 1970s, such as Lynyrd Skynyrd's ''Freebird'' and Cheap Trick's ''I Want You to Want Me.'' Occasionally he referenced more recent material, such as the rapper Young M.C.'s 1990 hit ''Bust A Move.'' One spot featured Shatner rapping in a taupe suite about ''fly'' rental cars and ''dope'' airfares. ''You want some of this?'' he asked an audience of 20-somethings. ''Bust a move!'' During another television spot Shatner shouted, ''If saving money is wrong, I don't want to be right.'' In an unscripted move the Star Trek icon grabbed a band member's guitar and smashed it on the stage. In another spot he gave a deadpan monologue: ''Everybody knows somebody who's saved money using Priceline.com. A grandmother, a nephew . . . a lover.''

Shatner's straight-faced delivery of campy dialogue was so convincing that ad critics debated whether they were laughing with Shatner or at him. Shatner later revealed that he had purposely blended parody and realism to keep his audience guessing. Explaining to Adweek why this technique was more appealing, Shatner said that if his performance was exaggerated, ''You would say, 'He's not serious.' That would be easy. But this is more interesting.''

Ten spots were filmed for the January 1, 2000, campaign launch. Thirteen more were shot in a day and a half at New York's Sony Studios in April. Hill Holliday cast contemporary musicians to play onstage with Shatner, such as guitarist/singer Carrie Brownstein of Sleater-Kinney and guitarist/singer Mary Timony of Helium. Real musicians were used to make the humor more subtle. The director of the ''Troubadour'' spots, Phil Morrison, explained to Shoot, ''We didn't want, 'Oh, isn't that funny that he's got an eighteen-year-old guy with green hair playing with him?' ''

The campaign, created using priceline.com's annual $60 million advertising budget, lasted throughout 2000. Some spots announced new services offered by priceline.com, such as home financing and a long-distance phone service. Jackie Stern, director of advertising for priceline.com, told Brandweek that the company was in the midst of figuring out how specifically it needed to market each of the services it was adding. ''If it's mortgages, then which TV and radio stations profile high for mortgage customers, or is that product an E-mail strategy or an online strategy? It comes down to juggling all these products and making ourselves heard on each one of them.''

To advertise priceline.com's new long-distance phone service, print ads appeared in 10 university newspapers. One headline read, ''Rental Car, Ski Jump, Lake,'' above the copy ''With one hour free long distance, now you can tell the whole story.'' Radio spots, which typically cost less to air than television spots, featured Shatner's exact audio from the commercials. Stern believed that this technique would make consumers feel like they had seen the commercials more.

OUTCOME

Adweek selected the campaign's commercial "We Gotta Get Out of This Place" as one of its "Best Spots" of 2000. While many ad critics praised the campaign for its quirkiness, others considered Shatner's off-key crooning to be little more than buffoonery. Nonetheless, even those lambasting the campaign acknowledged that the spots were memorable. Hill Holliday president Fred Bertino noted to the Boston Globe, "In every [newspaper] story about Priceline.com, Shatner is always mentioned somewhere in the first three paragraphs."

The NBC program*Saturday Night Live* lampooned Shatner's onstage "Troubadour" performances. Other network shows, such as The Today Show and Entertainment Tonight covered the campaign as well, earning what USA Today estimated to be $40 million of free publicity. Total sales for priceline.com were $1.2 billion in 2000, a significant amount over the $482 million posted in 1999. Once priceline.com allowed digital versions of the "Troubadour" spots to be downloaded from its website, traffic on the site increased 4,000 percent. Unfortunately, priceline.com's high expenses caused the company to post an overall loss for 2000. It was not until the next year that priceline.com would report its first annual profit. In 2002, when priceline.com's stock had greatly depreciated, it ended its relationship with Hill Holliday and drastically reduced ad spending.

THE BEST PART OF WAKIN' UP IS FOLGERS IN YOUR CUP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

During the 1970s Procter & Gamble (P&G) helped establish its Folgers line as one of the two leading ground-coffee brands in the United States, along with General Foods' Maxwell House. By 1998 Folgers held the lead over Maxwell House in the $3.1 billion instant- and ground-coffee industry. For ground coffees, a $2.0 billion segment, Folgers held a 29.4 percent share in 1997, compared to 21.1 percent for Maxwell House. As the coffee market expanded, fueled by emerging competitors such as Starbucks, both companies faced new challenges.

To build its Folgers brand and drive business, in the 1960s Procter & Gamble turned to strong television advertising with a campaign created by the New York firm of Cunningham & Walsh that featured the advice-dispensing Mrs. Olson. In the mid-1980s Cunningham & Walsh introduced a new campaign built around the theme "Wakin' Up." By 1987 P&G had moved its Folgers account to N.W. Ayer. In 1998 Folgers continued to use the jingle "The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers in Your Cup" in its radio and television advertising, which was supplemented with print ads. Although P&G kept a close watch on company information, the fact that it spent $136.1 million on Folgers's advertising in a 20-month period during 1996 and 1997 suggested that the budget for the 1998 campaign was high.

The success of its "Wakin' Up" campaign led P&G to keep both the theme and its familiar jingle into the first years of the new millennium, despite changes in its advertising agencies. In 1999 the Folgers account was moved from Ayer to the agency's sister, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. That agency was closed in 2002 by its new owner, Publicis Groupe, and the Folgers account was shifted to Publicis shop Saatchi & Saatchi. The campaign was updated by Saatchi & Saatchi to introduce each Folgers line extension, including the launch of its Folgers Café Latte, an instant coffee designed to appeal to latte-drinking younger consumers and to take on upscale coffeeshops such as Starbucks.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1850, during the California gold rush, James A. Folger began selling coffee beans to miners. Eventually he established J.A. Folger & Company, which during the next century began to spread eastward throughout the United States. With the 1960 merger of its San Francisco and Kansas City divisions, each of which had operated almost as separate companies, Folgers began to take the Midwest by storm. By 1963, when it became a subsidiary of Procter & Gamble, it had annual sales of $160 million.

During the mid-1960s P&G battled with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which questioned its purchase of Folgers as a possible antitrust violation. P&G eventually obtained FTC approval of the purchase, but as early as 1962 it was clear that a few large companies were becoming dominant in the industry; in that year the top five coffee producers controlled a combined 62.9 percent share of the market.

Folgers began to expand into large Eastern markets, aided by the Mrs. Olson commercials, which ran from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s. These spots featured an attractive elderly woman played by actress Virginia Christine, who appeared with a seemingly endless array of young couples. Although the commercials never developed much of a backstory for Mrs. Olson, her name and accent suggested she was Swedish American, and her role was that of an advisor to the almost interchangeable newlyweds under her tutelage. The solution to all problems, to judge from Mrs. Olson's advice at least, was Folgers.

The Mrs. Olson years saw numerous changes in the coffee industry, among them a sharp increase in prices brought on by poor Brazilian harvests and other world events during the mid-1970s and the rise of decaffeinated coffee during the late 1970s and early 1980s. Although Folgers responded to these changes, its market share slipped somewhat, from 27.3 percent in 1979 to 24.9 percent in 1983. By the mid-1980s P&G had adopted a new strategy with the "Wakin' Up" campaign.

TARGET MARKET

The switch to "Wakin' Up" arose from a realization among P&G executives that, despite the effectiveness of Mrs. Olson at one stage, that campaign was no longer effective in reaching younger consumers. The youth market, although it was the segment least inclined to drink coffee, also represented the best area for future sales. During the mid-1980s, as consumers increasingly moved away from coffee and toward soft drinks and other beverages, P&G made the switch to ad agency NW Ayer and developed the "Wakin' Up" theme, which centered on images of morning and newness. Eventually this evolved into the "Best Part of Wakin' Up" jingle, which started to get heavy exposure during the early 1990s.

At the same time a surprising thing happened in the marketplace. Suddenly, coffee, long considered the drink of one's parents or even grandparents, was perceived as a fashionable beverage. It had appeared for a time that coffee would go the way of its old companion, cigarettes—marginalized as an unhealthy, antisocial product—but by the early 1990s coffee had emerged as a new favorite among consumers under 35. Leading the trend were coffee bars, a phenomenon that first sprouted on the West Coast and then, like Folgers itself, spread eastward. In contrast to cigarettes, coffee now seemed decidedly healthy, part of an active lifestyle, and coffee bars appeared as a positive alternative to old-fashioned alcohol bars.

This new trend offered great promise for established brands like Folgers, but it also presented new challenges. It was true that the much-sought-after youth market was drinking coffee in great numbers, but they were buying it from retail chains such as Starbucks. In response to the trend, P&G in the mid-1990s stepped up promotion of Millstone, a specialty blend sold in stores. Millstone offered buyers the opportunity to make the kind of coffee they would normally buy at coffee bars, but to do so at home. As for Folgers, in 1998 it introduced its own whole-bean coffee line alongside a heavy advertising campaign orchestrated by NW Ayer.

COMPETITION

In 1990, before the coffee-bar phenomenon exploded, Bill Saporito in Fortune described the fierce competition between Folgers and Maxwell House in these terms: "Think of two large men competing to see who can keep his hand in a pot of scalding brew the longest. For more than ten years," Saporito wrote, the nation's two leading brands had been "locked in an often profitless struggle to dominate the market, warring with blasts of advertising, perpetual rounds of price cutting, and millions upon millions of cents-off coupons." Although Folgers held the lead among all brands, Saporito reported, General Foods had a larger overall share through its control of the Yuban and Sanka brands, along with Maxwell House.

Taster's Choice was a brand produced by the Nestlé Beverage Corporation that exceeded both Folgers and Maxwell House in the instant-coffee category, a segment accounting for nearly $600 million in annual sales by 1994. Since 1991 Taster's Choice had been running commercials that created more buzz than those of either of its large competitors. These spots revolved around the "Taster's Choice Couple" as their romance built over cups of Taster's Choice. Successive installments in this saga offered ever more intriguing details, "from their first meeting as neighbors to the surprise visit of a young man calling the woman 'Mom,' " as Leah Rickard wrote in Advertising Age. At the end of the next spot, which aired during the highly popular CBS program Northern Exposure on June 13, 1994, Rickard reported, "Viewers will find out the young man is [the woman's] son, Jeremy, who is home from college. Later that evening after meeting with her son, the woman calls her suitor on the phone to tell him how much Jeremy liked him. He asks, 'Is there anything else you forgot to tell me?' The spot ends with her answer: 'Volumes.' " Industry analyst

WE SUBSTITUTED INSTANT FOLGERS...

During the 1980s Folgers ran a television spot that, although it never attained the notoriety of the famous "Mrs. Olson" spots, nonetheless proved memorable. The commercial, for Folgers instant, showed diners at a fine restaurant being served coffee at the conclusion of the meal. As a voice-over informed viewers, the restaurant's patrons did not know it, but the staff had substituted Folgers instant for their regular brand. The climactic point of the commercial came when several of the restaurant customers, informed that they had been drinking Folgers instant, proclaimed it every bit as good as the restaurant's usual brew.

"If you're at all skeptical," wrote Caroline Knapp in Boston Business Journal, "you probably assumed the whole thing was a scam... Well, food snobs and cynics, guess again." In fact the responses were real, although the diners themselves had been carefully selected during five months of marketing research. It was an elaborate process, but one to which Folgers's parent company Procter & Gamble had become well accustomed in its many years as a leading marketer of consumer brands.

With the help of New York–based Tom Dale Market Research Company, P&G had carefully whittled down a large sample of survey respondents in the Boston area. The interview subjects had no idea that coffee was the focus of the study. According to P&G spokesman Don Tasone, in order to "throw respondents off, we ask[ed] them about everything—what airline they fly, how often they go to movies, that kind of thing." Eventually the group of respondents had been narrowed to just 50, who in exchange for their time were invited to dinner at one of Boston's most upscale restaurants, Maison Robert. On the appointed night, 36 of them showed up in a restaurant that—unbeknownst to them—had been equipped with a one-way mirror, microphones, and hidden cameras. After the dinner, the maitre d' went from guest to guest, serving them chocolate truffles and coffee and chatting with them. Ultimately he worked the conversation around to the subject of the coffee they were drinking, and from a series of discussions, the company pulled three particularly glowing appraisals for the commercial. Participants who signed interview release forms were given gratuities of $50 each.

Ronald Morrow told Rickard, "It's a very effective advertising campaign. The campaign is part of the reason why Taster's Choice has increased market share."

By 1997 all traditional coffee brands faced a new and fierce competitor: Starbucks, which began test-marketing specialty coffees in supermarkets. The retail chain, Alice Z. Cuneo reported in Advertising Age, "expects to surpass P&G's category-leading Folgers in [supermarket] sales. Indeed, Starbucks—which predicts it will have $1 billion in coffee revenue this fiscal year—already claims to be the leading brand, thanks to its retail outlets and alliances with United Airlines, Nordstrom, and other partners. But the new thrust is intended to tap the store shelves from which 80 percent of the nation's coffee is purchased, a venue now dominated by Folgers and Kraft's [General Foods' parent company] Maxwell House."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Folgers had much to fear from new competitors in the late 1990s, but it also had plenty of advantages on its side, thanks to its parent company. A survey conducted by Shopper Report in early 1997 revealed that "a very high number of P&G brands"—including Folgers—"popped up in response to our request to name the best value products on the market this year." These results suggested "that advertising, coupled with high performance, continues to play a major role in brand value perception." Folgers's advertising had long won acclaim. In 1998 advertising executive Harry Beckwith cited a 1980 spot for Folgers freeze-dried coffee as an example of what Walter J. Schruntek in Foodservice Director called "a study in superior brand positioning... and a lesson for today's 'brand-reinventors.' "

To an extent, Folgers's "Best Part of Wakin' Up" commercials had reinvented coffee advertising with the contributions of French-born medical anthropologist G. Clotaire Rapaille, whose work with autistic children in Europe had resulted in a concept he dubbed the "mental imprint." Applying this principle to Folgers marketing, Rapaille had urged that the company emphasize aroma over taste, because, in the words of the Wall Street Journal's Jeffrey Ball, "aroma invokes feelings of home." Thus many variations of the "Best Part" jingle mentioned aroma, as in "the aroma wakes him up." An example was a spot in which a young soldier, home from the army, entered the family kitchen and put on a pot of Folgers. As Ball noted, "Its aroma wakes up his mother, who senses immediately that her son has returned."

To compete more directly with Starbucks and other premium lines, in late 1997 Folgers introduced Folgers Select Whole Bean coffee to test markets in Massachusetts and Wisconsin. This was accompanied by an N.W. Ayer campaign that offered a variation on the "Wakin' Up" theme: "Wake Up to a Whole New Folgers—Folgers New Whole Bean." The campaign continued to evolve each year. One 1998 spot used the singing talents of the a cappella group Rockapella for the Folgers jingle, while another capitalized on interest at the time in Gaelic dancing as popularized by the Riverdance Broadway show.

By the middle of 1999 Folgers was introducing its Whole Bean brand extension throughout the nation. A massive campaign involving print, broadcast, coupons, direct mail, shelf takers, and in-store sampling accompanied the launch. Folgers also moved into the new field of high-definition television (HDTV) with a spot titled "Crew Morning," first broadcast on July 15, 1999. In late 1999 P&G introduced another Folgers brand extension, instant Folgers Café Latte, which, like its whole-bean variety, also sought to compete with coffeeshops such as Starbucks and to target young, hip consumers who patronized coffee bars. Additionally, new spots for traditional ground Folgers were released on network television. While continuing to use the long-running "Best Part of Wakin' Up" theme, the commercials were more contemporary. One holiday spot featured a group of friends who were prepared to cut down a Christmas tree, only to change their minds when they saw how beautiful the tree looked in the snowy forest.

To celebrate the 150th birthday of Folgers, Procter & Gamble sponsored a competition in 2000 for which the prize was a chance to sing the familiar "Wakin' Up" jingle in a new television commercial. The winning group, Indiana-based funk hip-hop band Zambow, joined the ranks of other music stars who had performed the song in commercials since 1984, including Aretha Franklin, who starred in a Folgers commercial in 1988.

OUTCOME

Throughout the late 1990s P&G concentrated on gaining market share in the growing areas of specialty and whole-bean coffees. This it did in part through Millstone, to which it devoted increasing advertising dollars, and through Folgers Whole Bean. Folgers extended advertising to the Internet and continued to wage war with Maxwell House. The two brands still dominated the market, with one or the other assuming first place, only to be overtaken by its competitor.

Clearly changes were afoot in the world of coffee marketing, and Folgers—thanks to heavy advertising campaigns built around the "Wakin' Up" theme—continued to weather the changes and hold its place at or near the top end of the segment. In 1999 the brand's marketing was moved from N.W. Ayer to sister shop D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles (DMB&B). Another agency change happened in 2002 when DMB&B was closed by its new owner, Publicis Groupe. At that time the Folgers account was moved to Publicis shop Saatchi & Saatchi. Despite agency changes, shifts in the industry, and evolving consumer tastes, the "Wakin' Up" campaign followed the path of the long-running "Mrs. Olson" campaign and remained a constant. Twenty years after its 1985 introduction the campaign was still going strong, as evidenced by a visit to the Folgers website (www.folgers.com), where the promise "The best part of wakin' up is Folgers in your cup" was still prevalent in 2005.

CLEANER CLOSE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003 the Procter & Gamble Company felt that its Daz laundry detergent, the number four brand in its category in the United Kingdom, had become outdated, thanks in no small part to a long-running advertising campaign perceived as artificial and old-fashioned. Procter & Gamble (P & G) thus charged advertising agency Leo Burnett's London office with the task of dramatically redefining the Daz brand in the United Kingdom and Ireland. With an eye toward attracting a younger generation of homemakers, Leo Burnett crafted "Cleaner Close," a series of commercials that was modeled after, and that openly spoofed, a television soap opera.

The TV spots began appearing in March 2003 during the top U.K. soap operas of the time, mimicking the conventions of the genre with a cast of recurring one-dimensional characters interconnected chiefly by sexual infidelity and intrigue. Each commercial, however, hinged on the cleaning capability of Daz. For instance, an adulterous husband hiding in a closet was, in one episode, literally sniffed out by his wife because of the "beautiful . . . citrus . . . unmistakable" smell of his underpants, the only article of clothing he was wearing. In another commercial a mother reprimanded her son's "grubby" taste in women after finding a dingy white bra in his room; she exhorted his girlfriend to use Daz, only to find out that the bra in question was not the girlfriend's. Storylines involving these and other characters evolved in characteristically absurd fashion over the campaign's subsequent years. Supporting print ads featured characters from the TV spots, and Daz packaging provided ministories related to the ongoing melodrama. Consumers could likewise visit the Daz website to view all of the "Cleaner Close" episodes and to fill in their knowledge about the series as well as the brand.

Conflicting data about Daz sales during this time obscured the campaign's practical impact on the laundry-detergent industry, but the campaign won two Gold Euro EFFIEs in 2004, suggesting that P & G had achieved its primary goal of reinvigorating the Daz image.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cincinnati-based Procter & Gamble was founded by brothers-in-law William Procter and James Gamble in 1837 as a candle and soap company. Though the market for candles declined precipitously with the invention of the lightbulb, P & G did extremely well in the soap business, introducing the iconic Ivory brand in the 1870s while selling numerous other varieties of soap in smaller numbers. Branching out in the early twentieth century, P & G launched another American product that became a household name, Crisco vegetable shortening, and 1930 saw the company expand geographically, making its first entry into Europe with the acquisition of England's Thomas Hedley & Sons, the makers of the Fairy Soap brand. In the following decades P & G continued to expand its range of products and move into new product categories, while progressively establishing its global network of companies. Tide detergent, Prell shampoo, and Crest toothpaste were among P & G's top new products at midcentury. The company also acquired Charmin Paper Mills and entered the market of toilet tissue, napkin, and paper towel products. P & G continued to build a stable of products central to modern life—Downy fabric softener, Pampers diapers, Folgers coffee—and to expand at a rapid pace across product categories and national borders. In 1980 the company's annual sales topped $10 billion; by 1993 sales had reached the $30 billion mark. In 2002 P & G owned 12 brands that generated more than $1 billion apiece in annual revenue; with the 2005 acquisition of Gillette, P & G added five more billion-dollar brands to its portfolio.

A familiar brand in the United Kingdom since its midcentury debut, P & G's Daz, that country's number four brand of laundry detergent, had an outdated image by the start of the twenty-first century. This was at least partly the result of a decade-long advertising campaign that was seen as anachronistic and artificial. Known as the "Doorstep Challenge" campaign, the effort depicted lower-tier celebrities arriving, as if randomly, at the homes of ordinary housewives and then demonstrating the superior cleaning attributes of Daz. At the campaign's close in 2003, the Sunday Times noted that the doorstep challenge commercials had once been voted the most annoying spots on TV and asked sardonically, "If a week is a long time in politics, what's 10 years in commercials? Answer: about eight years too long." P & G acknowledged that younger consumers in particular were unmoved by the doorstep-challenge scenario, perceiving it as an overtly fake, old-fashioned marketing stunt. The company asked Daz's agency, the London office of Leo Burnett, to rethink the brand's advertising dramatically.

TARGET MARKET

Daz's traditional target in the United Kingdom was value-conscious homemakers, but the brand's image, as communicated with the "doorstep challenge" commercials, had alienated women at the younger end of this target group's age range. The "Cleaner Close" campaign was meant to correct this problem and endow the brand with an energized personality while still transmitting Daz's traditionally down-to-earth image and attributes such as good value, whitening capability, and honesty. Because Leo Burnett believed that younger women had been alienated by Daz's image, it specifically targeted 25- to 34-year-old homemakers who used competing brands of detergent.

Leo Burnett determined that TV soap operas were extremely popular among this target group, and the agency accordingly created a series of mini soap-opera spoofs set in an area dubbed "Cleaner Close." Using the "soap" television format for commercials on behalf of actual soap was, in Leo Burnett's view, a fun and offbeat way of communicating the populist values of the Daz brand. The agency felt that the concept had the potential to energize the target group's interest in the product; the campaign thus had the feel of a brand relaunch.

IMITATING THE IMITATION

Although Daz's "Cleaner Close" series of mini–soap operas overtly poked fun at actual soap operas, its creators in the London office of advertising agency Leo Burnett apparently mastered the conventions they set out to parody. The first episode of "Cleaner Close," in which a mother confronted her son and his girlfriend in a local pub after finding a dingy white bra in his room, appeared in March 2003, and approximately two months later the popular BBC soap opera EastEnders, set in a working-class London suburb, recycled the commercial's plot almost exactly. In the actual soap opera the mother-son relationship was changed into a half-sibling relationship, and the bra in the Daz commercial became a pair of "knickers" in the EastEnders episode. But the half sister's encounter with her half brother took place in a pub, as in the commercial; the girlfriend with whom the half brother was sharing a drink responded to the half sister's comments by saying that the knickers were not hers, as in the commercial; and the actual owner of the knickers, present in the pub at the time of the confrontation, dropped her glass in response to the girlfriend's admission, as in the commercial.

COMPETITION

The United Kingdom's leading laundry detergent brand during this time was Persil, owned, in an uncommon corporate arrangement, by Lever Faberge (which took the Unilever name in late 2004) in the U.K. and Henkel in Germany. (Each company had, over the years, tried unsuccessfully to buy the brand outright from the other. To complicate matters further, the detergent formula branded as Persil in the U.K. was sold by Unilever as Omo, Skip, and Ala in other markets.) Despite these brand anomalies, Persil's U.K. roots ran particularly deep: launched in 1908, the brand became in 1955 the country's first laundry detergent to advertise on TV in the U.K., and it had maintained a consistent marketing profile in the years since, balancing an appeal to young people with more traditional messages relating to cleaning power and maternal caring. Persil shifted marketing tactics significantly in 2005, when it adopted a "Dirt Is Good" theme. The message that children should be encouraged to get dirty, and that Persil could handle the fallout of such a parental attitude, was uncommon in an industry whose advertising tended to focus on dirt as a problem to be solved.

P & G's own Ariel was the United Kingdom's second-best-selling laundry detergent. One of the brand's defining advertising campaigns focused, in the late 1970s, on the testing of Ariel versus a competitor's brand in the cleaning of two fishmongers' soiled aprons; the person judging whose apron was cleaner was their mother, an archetypal motherly perfectionist in the matter of laundry. This maternal-themed, product-attribute pitch gave way in the 1990s and the decade that followed to messages that reflected changing gender roles while acknowledging that women remained the primary target market for Persil. For instance, a 1997 TV spot showed another mother-son relationship, but this time the teenage son, returning from a rock festival with a soiled shirt, was told by his mother that in her day they did not wear clothes at such events. A 2002 spot was likewise irreverent, showing a man in his underwear who, while attempting to do his own laundry, was forced to ask his wife, "What load do I put it on?" The wife, who was sitting and talking to a female friend at that moment, said, as though making reference to her husband in his underwear, "Small load." The two women laughed, while the man remained oblivious to the comic substance of the exchange.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Cleaner Close" referred, in a British usage uncommon in the United States, to a housing development that served as the mini–soap opera's setting. The British pronunciation of the word "close," used in this sense, rendered the soap opera's title a homonym of "cleaner clothes." As in a real soap opera, the "Cleaner Close" series of commercials featured recurring characters whose schemes and love affairs brought them into absurdly melodramatic conflict with one another. In "Cleaner

Close,'' however, each episode ultimately hinged on Daz detergent. The openly unrealistic nature of ''Cleaner Close'' and the soap genre as a whole was acknowledged not just in the tone and staging of the commercials but in the campaign tagline, which appeared at the end of each episode: ''Daz: the soap you can believe in.''

The first ''Cleaner Close'' spot, which appeared in March 2003, opened with a scene of a mother, Maureen McGrath, cleaning her young-adult son's room. Finding a bra under his bed, Maureen marched indignantly outdoors and through the streets with it and then entered a pub where her son was sharing a drink with his girlfriend. ''If you're going to play around in my house, Sean McGrath,'' Maureen said, waving the bra in front of her son, ''don't play around with a grubby girl.'' Maureen then proceeded to lecture her son's girlfriend about the cleaning properties of Daz, which would render the ''grubby'' bra as white as Maureen's own blouse. Maureen handed the bra to the young woman, who said, ''But that's. . .not my bra.'' A barmaid in the corner dropped the glass she had been holding, and the camera focused on her nervous expression as she backed away into another room, implying that the bra was hers.

The series, as in an actual soap opera, relentlessly focused on infidelity, and Episode 3 introduced another set of characters whose sexual lives uncomfortably intersected. The voice-over informed viewers, ''Pat's convinced she's finally caught [her husband] Mick with Jackie Strong,'' and showed Pat bursting into Jackie's bedroom and asking, ''Where's Mick?'' Pat then pulled a box of detergent from her shoulder bag and said, ''Have you heard of new Limited Edition Daz Citrus Blast?'' As Pat described the ''beautiful . . . fresh . . . unmistakable citrus fragrance'' of the product, it became clear that she smelled that very fragrance in Jackie's apartment. Pat then said, authoritatively, ''Out you come, Mick,'' and Mick emerged from a closet wearing nothing but white underwear. ''Brilliant white, aren't they, Jackie?'' Pat asked. ''Or hadn't you noticed?''

The series continued to evolve over the course of 2004, 2005, and 2006. Episode 8 showed Pat, having left Mick, at the altar with Steve Grey. Mick interrupted the wedding, however, to point out how much whiter his own shirt was than Steve's, effectively reestablishing himself as the right man for Pat. Maureen McGrath's death, meanwhile, yielded new plot developments in Episode 9. At the reading of her will, it emerged that she was a multimillionaire, but to her son Sean's frustration, she had left her fortune to ''her beloved Daz,'' and the money had been converted into Daz coupons. Another plotline focused on Jackie Strong's husband, Vince, recently released from prison, and his relationships with former lover Pandora Packer, with his current (male) lover Rick Daniels, and with DC Strange, the police detective determined to catch him in a criminal act. When Vince was ''blasted'' by lemon and lime in Episode 13, consumers were directed to consult packages of Daz to determine who was responsible for the misdeed.

The commercials ran primarily during major U.K. soap operas—in keeping with the insights about the target market that dictated the creative strategy—and were supported by print ads that focused on the characters introduced in the TV spots. ''Cleaner Close'' story snippets appeared on Daz packaging, and the Daz website, www.dazwhite.co.uk/, was also integrated into the campaign. Consumers could visit the site to view the TV commercials, read biographies of the ''Cleaner Close'' characters, and find a variety of campaign- and product-related information.

OUTCOME

According to P & G, as a result of the ''Cleaner Close'' campaign Daz's market share increased for the first time since 1996, growing from a precampaign figure of 6.5 percent to 8.2 percent after the campaign's first year. Marketing, however, reported that Daz sales declined 15 percent between 2002 and 2004. Leo Burnett pointed to research indicating that ''Cleaner Close'' was the best-known laundry-detergent campaign of its time in the United Kingdom and Ireland and that the new advertising approach had effectively updated the Daz brand. The campaign won two Gold Euro EFFIE Awards in 2004, one in the ''Household'' category and one in the ''Brand Revitalisation'' category.

GOT THE POWER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Procter & Gamble created the disposable-diaper market in 1961 when it introduced its Pampers brand. Despite being the first successful disposable diaper, by 1985 Pampers was falling behind competitor Kimberly-Clark's Huggies brand, which was introduced in 1968 but was not rolled out nationally until 1977. The Pampers brand continued to slip in the market, and by 2001 Pampers' market share had fallen to more than 14 percentage points behind Huggies. The relaunch of Pampers in 2002 with the introduction of Baby Stages of Development disposable products, which included a line of training pants for toddlers, helped narrow the gap between Pampers and Huggies. To help push Pampers further ahead, the company introduced a new disposable training pant for toddlers, called Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers, that was designed to help make toilet training easier.

To rebuild consumer awareness of the Pampers brand and to support the introduction of the Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers, the company contracted advertising agency Saatchi & Saatchi New York for the creation of a marketing campaign. The new campaign, themed "Got the Power," began in August 2004, at a time when many parents were trying to get their toddlers toilet trained before entering preschool. No specific amount for the campaign's cost was available, but estimates placed it at more than $20 million. "Got the Power" included television spots set to the 1990 hit song "The Power" by Snap. The campaign also employed print ads that appeared in national consumer magazines and "Potty Power" training kits that were sold through national retail outlets.

Within weeks of the campaign's launch it became clear that both it and the new training pants were a hit with parents of toddlers. According to a report in Advertising Age, Procter & Gamble's market share in training pants jumped to 30 percent in September, and by October 2004 Pampers had closed the gap, with Huggies falling behind by three points. The campaign won a Bronze EFFIE Award in 2005 for successfully increasing awareness of the Pampers brand and for encouraging consumers to try the Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers with their toddlers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Procter & Gamble Company was founded in 1837 by William Procter, a candle maker, and James Gamble, a soap maker. By 1859 the company was thriving; it reached $1 million in sales that year. During the Civil War it had a contract to supply candles and soap to the Union Army. Procter & Gamble introduced Ivory Soap to consumers in the 1880s. As electricity became more common, in the 1920s the company stopped making candles and focused its attention on a diverse variety of consumer products, including Crisco shortening, Prell shampoo, and Tide laundry detergent. In the 1950s chemical engineer Victor Mills, a Procter & Gamble employee, took an idea developed in 1946 by Marion Donovan—a mother tired of leaky cloth diapers and the rashes her babies often got from wearing wet diapers—and built on it. The idea, disposable diapers, evolved into Procter & Gamble's Pampers brand.

The new product was introduced to consumers in Peoria, Illinois, in 1961, followed by launches the next year in Sacramento, California, and two years later in Saint Louis, Missouri. Pampers diapers went on sale nationally in 1970. Busy parents appreciated the convenience of the disposable diapers, and as demand grew, Procter & Gamble kept improving on the product. Changes included adding tape fasteners, switching from creped tissue to fluff pulp for the diaper's base, and adding new products to the diaper line, such as Luvs, which had a better fit for older babies, and smaller diapers for newborns. The line continued its growth with the addition of diapers specifically designed for girls (extra padding in the back) and boys (extra padding in the front).

Although Pampers had created the disposable diaper and built a market for the product, by the 1990s the brand had fallen behind Kimberly-Clark's Huggies brand, which was launched in limited markets in 1968, some seven years after Pampers. Kimberly-Clark expanded the Huggies line to include Pull-Up disposable training pants for toddlers in 1989. Pampers did not introduce its own disposable training pant for toddlers until 1993, four years after competitor Huggies, leading Pampers' market share to drop further behind its competitor. Getting the jump on Huggies, in 2002 Pampers introduced its Toddlers Transition line of products, which included First Steps disposable absorbent pants, designed for pulling on while a child was standing, and Easy Ups for toddlers who were not fully potty trained but ready to pull their underwear on by themselves. The new products helped improve Pampers' standing in the market. In 2004 Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers, designed to assist in the potty-training process by letting the toddler feel wet and learn to stay dry by going to the bathroom, was added to the line. To promote the new product and increase brand awareness, the company launched its "Got the Power" campaign.

TARGET MARKET

"Got the Power" had two target audiences: the toddler who was going through toilet training, and the parents, typically mothers, who were helping with the process.

Based on research by potty-training coaches, parents thought that potty training a child would take about five months, when in fact the process usually took eight to ten months. It was also found that during that time the toddler would have accidents and parents could not always prevent them. Parents could not make their children learn to use the toilet or master the skill faster; rather, the toddler was best off if he or she was allowed to move through the process at his or her own pace, with encouragement and support from parents.

The marketing challenge was to reach both working and stay-at-home mothers 25 to 34 years old and to convince them that Pampers' new Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers could help them and their children in the toilet-training process. The campaign targeted mothers on an emotional and intellectual level. Emotionally, moms could see that the trainers enabled them to be cheerleaders for their toddlers' successes. Intellectually, moms could recognize that the trainers allowed them to empower and motivate their toddlers to go to the bathroom and use the toilet on their own. A side target market was day-care centers and preschools, which were believed to have a strong influence on parents and their decisions about child training.

PAMPERS BRAND INTRODUCES KANDOO PERSONAL HYGIENE LINE FOR TODDLERS

After giving kids the power to master the potty with its line of training pants, Pampers took toilet training to the next level by introducing a line of personal-hygiene products just for kids. The new products—flushable wipes and hand soap—were designed for kids aged two to seven. To ensure that the products helped youngsters learn bathroom basics, the Kandoo wipes and soap came in fun scents and easy-to-use, kid-friendly packages. The new product line was the first venture by Pampers' parent Procter & Gamble into toiletries for kids. Kandoo's launch was supported by a national marketing campaign with a cartoon spokescharacter called the Kandoo Frog and a new website, www.kidskandoo.com.

COMPETITION

In 1968 Kimberly-Clark Corp., best known for its paper products, such as bathroom tissue, paper towels, and feminine-hygiene products, introduced Huggies disposable diapers. The product put the 125-year-old paper company in direct competition with Procter & Gamble's Pampers. By 1985 Huggies had passed Pampers to become the number one disposable diaper in the United States. In 1989 Huggies introduced the first disposable training pants for toddlers, called Pull-Ups. From the mid-1990s and throughout that decade Huggies was the market leader in disposable diapers and training pants, pushing ahead of Pampers by more than 14 points in the third quarter of 2001. Kimberly-Clark also took on Johnson & Johnson, the leading maker of toiletries for babies, when it introduced its own 20-item baby-care product line under the Huggies brand in 2004. Prior to the new line, Huggies had only offered two baby-care products, a basic wash and disposable washcloths. The new toiletries included shampoo, lavender-and-chamomile and shea-butter lotions and baby washes, diaper-rash cream, and liquid baby powder. To promote the new product line the company employed direct mailings, promotions attached to packs of Huggies diapers and Pull-Ups training pants, and television spots and print ads produced by the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather New York.

F. Carlyle Harmon, who joined Johnson & Johnson in 1947 and soon thereafter became head of the company's fabric-research department, developed the nonwoven, highly absorbent material used to make disposable diapers. Johnson & Johnson produced Chux disposable diapers in 1948; eventually, however, the company discontinued the diaper and shifted its focus to what went on the baby's skin before the diaper. The company was best known for introducing Johnson's Toilet and Baby Powder in 1890. While the company never expanded into the disposable-diaper market like its competitors Kimberly-Clark and Procter & Gamble, it slowly evolved into the market leader for baby-care toiletries. In the 1920s it introduced baby cream. Johnson & Johnson's baby powder held 60 percent of the market share in 2004, and its baby shampoo held a 70 percent share. To promote its products and show consumers that the company understood the needs of new parents, Johnson & Johnson launched its "Having a Baby Changes Everything" campaign, developed by Lowe & Partners Worldwide New York. In 2004 the campaign, which included print ads and television spots, won a Gold EFFIE Award for strengthening the company's already strong brand image.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Pampers introduced its training-pants product Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers in 2004, it charged its advertising agency, Saatchi & Saatchi New York, with the job of creating a marketing campaign that would achieve several goals. Besides the primary challenge of quickly building brand awareness for the new product, the campaign was also expected to increase market share for the new training pants and to support Pampers' overall product brand. Timing of the campaign's release was crucial. It had to reach parents whose toddlers were getting ready to start preschool and who faced the dreaded no-diaper rule enforced in most preschools (which meant that children who were not toilet trained could not be enrolled in classes). The "Got the Power" campaign began in August, toilet-training crunch time for millions of parents and toddlers.

The campaign, estimated to cost at least $20 million, was a multifaceted marketing blitz that included Pampers naming August as "national toddler 'We Can Do It' month." Saatchi & Saatchi created television spots with "The Power," an upbeat 1990 hit by the dance-music group Snap, playing in the background. The TV spots kicked off in August. Print ads ran in publications beginning in September to coincide with back-to-school activities. The ads featured cute toddlers at play in various situations, but with surprised looks on their faces. The copy read: "Uh-oh, here comes that gotta go feeling again."

Also supporting the campaign were "Potty Power" training kits, sold at national retailers such as Wal-Mart, Target, and Safeway, that included toilet-training tips and suggestions for parents, reward stickers for kids who made it to the toilet in time, and a CD of potty songs based on traditional children's songs such as "Twinkle, Twinkle Little Star." It also included the theme song from the television spots, "The Power." For parents who were anxious to motivate their toddlers, press-and-play sound chips were available that could be attached to the toilet lid. When the little one did his or her job, he or she could press the chip and hear words of praise from cartoon characters Dora the Explorer or Spider Man. The characters also embellished the training pants: Dora on girls' pants and Spider Man on boys'.

OUTCOME

Signs that the campaign resonated with its target market, parents of toddlers, included studies that indicated a 52 percent brand recall among consumers who were surveyed following the launch of "Got the Power." In addition, the campaign helped Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers capture 10 percent of the training-pants market, and within nine weeks of its launch the product shipped 31 percent of the planned one-year goal, far surpassing shipment expectations. In addition to consumer recognition, the campaign earned honors from the advertising industry. In 2005 "Got the Power" was awarded a Bronze EFFIE from the New York American Marketing Association for achieving the goal of increasing consumer awareness of the new training-pants product.

HABITS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

According to a survey by National Clothesline, a trade publication for garment-care professionals, approximately two billion items were cleaned each year by dry cleaners. In an effort to offer a cleaning alternative for nonwashable items and garments, Procter & Gamble (P&G) created a new product and a new market category: home dry-cleaning kits. In 1997 the company began test-marketing the kits in a limited area, and in 1999 it introduced its home dry-cleaning kit, Dryel, nationwide.

To support Dryel's launch, help build the brand's newly created category, and quickly establish the product as the category leader, Procter & Gamble's ad agency, Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, created a marketing campaign with a budget estimated at more than $20 million and themed "Habits." The campaign embraced its challenge: changing consumers' long-standing habits by convincing them that they could turn their home clothes dryer into a dry cleaner without damaging their clothes or other dry-clean-only items. Included in the campaign were teaser ads that appeared in newspapers and on billboards beginning in late 1999. Ads included the tagline

"Suddenly, 'Dry Clean Only' Isn't." In 2000 television and radio spots began airing. Another part of the campaign was a $15 million field-marketing effort called the Dryel National Mall Tour, which hit the road in September 2000.

The "Habits" campaign produced mixed results. Consumers were willing to try Dryel, resulting in $45.7 million in sales in the first six months that it was on the market. The product also earned a Good Housekeeping "Good Buy" endorsement. The campaign was named one of Promo magazine's 50 Best Promoted Brands of 2000, and it won a 2000 Silver EFFIE Award. On the downside, the International Fabricare Institute, which represented dry cleaners, filed a complaint against Procter & Gamble with the Federal Trade Commission alleging the campaign made "false and misleading" claims about Dryel. Sales of Dryel failed to meet P&G's first-year goals of selling more than $100 million, and as sales began to slip further at the end of 2000, a new series of television spots and print ads was released.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since the introduction of Dreft laundry detergent in 1933, which was followed by industry-leading Tide laundry detergent in 1946, Procter & Gamble had built a reputation for helping consumers take care of their washable clothes in their own homes. But there was an untapped niche in the home-laundry market: dry-clean-only garments. Those articles of clothing, such as wool sweaters, silk blouses, and satin dresses, among others, could not be cleaned in the home washing machine without risk of fading or shrinkage or colors running. To fill the gap in the home-laundry market and offer consumers the option of eliminating regular trips to the dry cleaners, Procter & Gamble developed the Dryel Fabric Care System. Not only was Dryel a new concept in the home care of clothing, but it also created a new product category.

P&G began test-marketing Dryel in 1997 in Columbus, Ohio. In July 1999 the product hit stores nationwide, and six months later the product had recorded $45.7 million in sales. The national launch was supported by a marketing campaign created by ad agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago; it consisted of print ads and billboards with the tagline "Suddenly, 'Dry Clean Only' Isn't." Despite the early sales success, consumers were intimidated by the new alternative to dry cleaning and worried about tossing their expensive garments into the home clothes dryer. Further, competitors such as the Clorox Company quickly jumped into the market, releasing their own versions of home dry-cleaning kits. In 2000 Dryel's marketing effort was expanded to include television and radio spots. The campaign also included a shopping-mall tour to give consumers an opportunity to see Dryel at work firsthand. The expanded campaign was themed "Habits," based on its idea of changing consumers' deeply entrenched dry-cleaning habits.

TARGET MARKET

According to the information provided by Leo Burnett in the brief it submitted for the EFFIE Awards outlining the Dryel "Habits" campaign, more than any other demographic, professional career women were the most likely to buy and wear dry-clean-only clothes, from sweaters and slacks to dresses and suits. Additionally, because of their busy schedules working women were usually inconvenienced when forced to fit into their hectic days trips to the dry cleaners to drop off or pick up clothes. With working women accounting for some 60 percent of those using dry-cleaning services, Leo Burnett created the Dryel "Habits" campaign to appeal to women. More specifically, the campaign targeted working women aged 18 to 54. Leo Burnett further described the campaign's target consumer as "the clothes lover that's inconvenienced by the dry cleaner."

COMPETITION

In March 2000 the Clorox Company, best known for its bleach products, introduced its own home dry-cleaning kit, called FreshCare. To promote its new product and entry into the emerging home dry-cleaning category, Clorox turned to advertising agency DDB Worldwide, San Francisco. FreshCare's national marketing campaign, estimated to cost between $15 million and $20 million, included television and radio spots and print ads that ran in consumer magazine such as People and Good Housekeeping. Despite heavy promotion, in September 2001 Clorox reported that it was discontinuing FreshCare. According to Advertising Age, a Clorox spokeswoman stated that one reason for the decision was that the home dry-cleaning category "wasn't as big as projected." The company reported that FreshCare registered sales of $11.6 million for the 52 weeks ending July 15, 2001, compared to Dryel's $50.6 million in sales during the same period.

Also jumping into the home dry-cleaning market was the Dial Corporation (producer of, among other things, Dial and Coast soaps) with its 1999 purchase of the Custom Cleaner home dry-cleaning section of Creative Products Resource, Inc., a company based in Fairfield, New Jersey. Creative Products had introduced Custom Cleaner in 1996 as its main product offering. Partnered with Dial in the purchase was the German consumer-products company Henkel. At the time that Dial/Henkel acquired Custom Cleaner, the product's annual sales amounted to $10 million. In

PROCTER & GAMBLE'S LAUNDRY SPA

Despite being known for its home laundering products, including Tide and Cheer detergents, Febreze fabric freshener, and Dryel home dry-cleaning kits, in 2001 Procter & Gamble began test-marketing a home-laundry valet service dubbed the "Laundry Spa." The service's actual name, Juvian, was being offered in suburbs in and around Atlanta, Georgia, and included picking up dirty laundry at the customer's home, cleaning the items, and returning them to the customer. The service cost $17 per bag, which was the equivalent of two loads of dirty laundry. Extras included "aromatherapy" treatments for $5 per bag and "hue and tone preservation," also $5 per bag. The service was not limited to dirty clothes. Customers could also send their shoes in for repairs and shining or draperies, bedding, and rugs for cleaning.

2001 Dial/Henkel reported that sales of Custom Cleaner had reached just $12 million for the 52 weeks ending July 15 and that the company was discontinuing the dry-cleaning kits.

With both Clorox's FreshCare and Dial/Henkel's Custom Cleaner home dry-cleaning kits off the market, the only competition remaining for Procter & Gamble's Dryel brand was Dry Cleaner's Secret, which was introduced by Dry, Inc., of Portland, Oregon, in 2000. The start-up company was headed by Scott Heim, a former executive for Kimberly-Clark Corp. and DowBrands. Supporting the new product's launch were television and radio spots created by ad agency Bates Southwest of Houston, Texas. The campaign targeted consumers in 17 U.S. markets and touted the benefits of the product compared to the competition, such as a lower cleaning cost per garment and not requiring that clothes be placed in a bag before tossing them into the dryer. Although Dry Cleaner's Secret reported sales of just $2.5 million in the 52 weeks ending July 15, 2001, Dry, Inc. was not ready to throw in the towel. The company anticipated increased growth in its sales with the exit of FreshCare and Custom Cleaner from the market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Leo Burnett began planning its marketing campaign for Procter & Gamble's new product, Dryel home dry-cleaning kits, the challenges included changing the long-standing habits of consumers specific to how they cared for their dry-clean-only clothing. The campaign also had to help consumers overcome their reluctance to try a unique new product, and it had to respond to their skepticism about the product's effectiveness. Additionally, the campaign's goals were to help create a new product category and assure that Dryel would establish itself as the brand of choice, because it was assumed that competitors in the category would soon follow Dryel's lead.

With those goals and challenges in mind, Leo Burnett developed the "Habits" campaign. It included teaser ads prior to the product's launch as well as traditional advertising methods, including television and radio spots and print ads in consumer magazines and newspapers. No specific budget was available, but the agency noted that it was more than $20 million. Teaser ads appeared in print and outdoor executions such as on billboards and included the tagline "Suddenly, 'Dry Clean Only' Isn't." Another ad showed a "Dry Clean Only" label with a slash mark through it. Television spots that followed explained to consumers that they could clean dry-clean-only clothes at home with Dryel rather than taking them to a dry cleaner. The first TV spot in the campaign was released in 2000 and featured a woman frustrated when she arrived at her dry cleaner after hours and so was unable to pick up her clothes. A follow-up spot showed a woman who tried to wash her sweater rather than take it to the dry cleaner. The result was a sweater shrunken to doll size. In early 2001 a new series of print ads was introduced that portrayed women dressed in professional business attire doing atypical jobs, such chopping down trees. Another ad showed a woman wearing an evening gown while milking a cow.

Based on research indicating that 85 percent of all dry-clean-only clothing was purchased at shopping malls, the campaign included a tour of malls to demonstrate the product directly to consumers and give them hands-on experience with Dryel. The field-marketing effort, called the Dryel National Mall Tour, began at the Mall of America in Minneapolis, Minnesota, in September 2000. The tour was planned to continue through March 2001 and appear at 275 malls in the United States and Canada. Included were demonstrations that featured working clothes dryers and Procter & Gamble representatives showing consumers how Dryel worked to clean and freshen clothes. Also appearing were guest speakers helping to promote the product, including actress Alison Cuffe from the daytime soap opera General Hospital and Cathy Turner, an Olympic-gold-medal-winning speed skater.

OUTCOME

Although Procter & Gamble's Dryel home dry-cleaning kits were met with mixed reviews from consumers and industry watchdogs, its marketing efforts were well received. Within one year of the start of the campaign, Dryel sales had reached $115 million, and Good Housekeeping magazine named Dryel one of seven new products to win its "Good Buy" award in 2000. The award was based on the product's ingenuity, value, and exceptional performance. On the flip side of the consumer coin, following the introduction of the new product CBS television consumer reporter Herb Weisbaum stated during a CBS This Morning broadcast that, while Dryel had its uses in "limited circumstances," he would not give up his dry cleaner. In addition the International Fabricare Institute (IFI), a dry-cleaning trade organization based in Silver Spring, Maryland, ran Dryel through a series of scientific tests at the request of Procter & Gamble and found that the product came up short of its advertised promises. In December 1999, based on its test results and Dryel's teaser advertising, the IFI filed complaints with the Federal Trade Commission and the National Advertising Council of Better Business Bureaus against Procter & Gamble, alleging that the Dryel campaign made "false and misleading" claims about the product.

The campaign received accolades from Promo magazine, which listed Dryel as one of its 50 Best-Promoted Brands in 2000. As further recognition, in 2001 the "Habits" campaign earned a Silver EFFIE Award (in the New Product or Service Introductions category) for successfully educating consumers about the product and helping change entrenched habits about how to clean dry-clean-only clothes. Procter & Gamble reported that the Mall Tour effort reached more than 1.5 million consumers in malls. An additional five million consumers requested product information.

INGENIOUS PROTECTION FOR INGENIOUS WOMEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Procter & Gamble Company (P&G) acquired the Tampax tampon brand in 1997 when it purchased the parent company, Tambrands Inc., of White Plains, New York, in a deal valued at nearly $2 billion. Tampax tampons had been sold to women since the mid-1930s, and at the time of the acquisition by P&G they were the number one brand in the tampon segment of the U.S. market for feminine hygiene products. But by 2002 the Tampax brand was losing market share to other brands, including its closest competitor, Gentle Glide tampons, made by Playtex Products. In an effort to reverse the decline, P&G introduced Tampax Pearl tampons. The new product featured a plastic rather than a cardboard applicator and thus was in direct competition with Playtex's Gentle Glide tampon, the number one selling plastic applicator tampon.

To support the introduction of the Tampax Pearl tampon, an aggressive marketing campaign was created by the brand's agency, Leo Burnett USA. The campaign, with an estimated budget of between $30 and $40 million, included television spots and print ads that used the tagline "Are you a Pearl girl?" It also raised the ire of Playtex, which quickly filed two lawsuits against P&G. One lawsuit, based on the design of the Tampax Pearl plastic applicator, cited patent infringement. The second lawsuit alleged false advertising for P&G's claims that the "Pearl girl" product was superior to Playtex's Gentle Glide tampon. In 2003, ruling that there were enough differences between the Tampax Pearl and the Gentle Glide plastic applicators that no patent infringement had occurred, a court dismissed the first lawsuit. P&G lost the battle in the false advertising lawsuit, however, and was ordered to pay $2.96 million in damages to Playtex and to cancel all Tampax Pearl advertising that claimed it was a better product than the Gentle Glide tampon. Complying with the ruling, the ''Pearl girl'' ads were pulled, and Leo Burnett revamped the campaign. In 2004 the campaign was relaunched as ''Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women.''

The new campaign appeared to have success in achieving its goals of increasing awareness of the new Tampax brand product and of expanding the sales of Tampax Pearl tampons. In addition, the campaign was honored with a 2005 Silver EFFIE, and Tampax Pearl was named one of Advertising Age's 2005 Marketing 50 for product creativity and marketing innovation.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

P&G entered the tampon market in 1975 with the introduction of its Rely brand. The company recalled Rely tampons and discontinued their production in 1980, however, after use of the product was linked to toxic-shock syndrome, a sometimes fatal disease that usually affected women using tampons. P&G reentered the tampon market in 1997 when the company acquired Tambrands Inc. and its Tampax brand. At the time of the acquisition, Tampax had been sold to consumers for more than 60 years and was the number one tampon brand in the United States. Following completion of the $1.85 billion purchase, P&G assigned the Tampax account to the Chicago advertising agency Leo Burnett. By 2002, although Tampax was still the brand leader, its market share had dropped from 45 to 40 percent of the overall tampon segment. In an effort to reverse the brand's declining sales, P&G introduced Tampax Pearl, the first Tampax product to use a plastic applicator rather than the standard cardboard, in 2002. A marketing campaign, estimated to cost between $30 and $40 million, supported the new product. Created by Leo Burnett, the campaign used the tagline ''Are you a Pearl girl?'' and included television spots and print ads.

Before Tampax Pearl tampons ever reached retail stores, however, rival Playtex filed a lawsuit against P&G, alleging that the new tampon's design infringed on the patent Playtex held for the plastic applicator used in Gentle Glide tampons. Despite the lawsuit, in September 2002 P&G proceeded with the introduction of Tampax Pearl tampons and the supporting advertising campaign. Soon after the new campaign was launched Playtex was back in court, claiming that the P&G Tampax Pearl ads made false claims about Playtex's Gentle Glide tampons.

In 2003 the court dismissed Playtex's claim of patent infringement against P&G, ruling that the Tampax Pearl did not violate the patent because its plastic applicator had rounded surfaces as opposed to the flat surfaces of the Playtex plastic applicator. In the same year, however, a judge ruled against P&G in the suit alleging that its advertising made false claims about rival Playtex and its Gentle Glide tampons. P&G was ordered to pay Playtex $2.96 million in damages and to withdraw its advertising campaign for Tampax Pearl. A P&G statement published in USA Today said that the company had begun to comply with the judge's orders to stop making advertising claims that Tampax Pearl offered ''superior wearing comfort and superior protection versus Playtex Gentle Glide.'' In response to the court's orders, Leo Burnett revised its campaign for Tampax Pearl tampons, and in 2004 the ''Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women'' campaign was launched.

TARGET MARKET

The average woman experienced 12 to 13 monthly periods annually for 35 to 40 years, or until she reached the beginning of menopause in her early 50s. This created a large and ongoing market for feminine hygiene products. According to the industry, the market was also divided by three specific categories of use: age, personal needs, and financial resources. Research by P&G indicated that women made up 80 percent of the customers for the company's range of products. Further, young women in their 20s and 30s were the largest market for tampons. Thus, when P&G added Pearl tampons to its Tampax line, the product's design and packaging were created with the 20- to 30-something age group in mind. A strand of pearls was pictured on the box, and a window in the front allowed consumers to see the product inside. Tampax Pearl also targeted girls in their teens, those just entering the feminine hygiene market. Efforts included wrapping individual tampons in noncrinkle plastic so that teenage girls could discreetly use the product in public bathrooms. Also targeted were women with the resources to buy higher-end feminine hygiene products with a higher price point, which included Tampax Pearl tampons. The new tampon was about 30 percent more expensive than other brands, including traditional Tampax with cardboard applicators.

COMPETITION

Playtex Products, Inc., based in Westport, Connecticut, had introduced the first tampon with a plastic applicator, the Gentle Glide tampon, in 1968. In 2001 Playtex's Gentle Glide brand was the leading seller in the plastic applicator tampon segment. The brand was also entrenched in the number two spot in the overall tampon

PROCTER & GAMBLE USES INTERNET TO EDUCATE WOMEN ABOUT FEMININE HYGIENE

The Procter & Gamble Company used two websites to educate women about the firm's feminine hygiene products and how to choose the correct products for their individual needs. The Tampax.com site included a section on frequently asked questions about tampon use. Through an "Ask Iris" link women were able to address personal questions about menstruation, reproduction, and health to Iris Prager, the North American education manager for Tampax. Another link, "Help Me Choose," helped women decide which feminine hygiene products were best for them. The BeingGirl.com website targeted younger girls and offered lifestyle advice for teens (for example, on the importance of cliques and on inappropriate crushes), health advice (on preparing for a first visit to a gynecologist), and other information, as well as articles on popular celebrities and an "Ask Iris" link.

segment and was winning market share from the number one brand, P&G's Tampax, which had been the tampon segment leader for years. At the end of 2001 the market share for Playtex's Gentle Glide tampons had climbed to 21.7 percent. The situation changed in 2002, however, when P&G added a tampon with a plastic applicator to its Tampax line. This new product, Tampax Pearl, went head to head with the Playtex Gentle Glide tampon. Following the introduction of the Tampax Pearl, sales of Playtex's Gentle Glide tampons dropped 7.4 percent, while the sales of the Tampax brand grew 9.4 percent. In response to the new product and its marketing, Playtex filed two lawsuits against P&G, one for patent infringement and the other for false advertising. In 2003 Playtex's patent infringement lawsuit against P&G was dismissed, but its false advertising claim was upheld in court. Despite winning a battle, Playtex appeared to be losing the war. Playtex reported that its feminine care segment posted a drop in net sales to $48.8 million in the first quarter of 2003, compared to $61.1 million for the same period during the previous year. According to an article in Nonwovens Industry, "Playtex executives attributed the income decline, in part, to the extensive spending in the tampon category, in response to the launch of Procter & Gamble's Tampax Pearl plastic applicator tampon." At the end of 2003, however, the company reported that its tampon segment had stabilized, with 26 percent of the market share, and a new product—Beyond tampons—was set to be introduced in January 2004.

Although Kotex, made by the Kimberly-Clark Corp. of Irving, Texas, was the number one feminine care brand in the United States, its Security tampons were a distant third in the tampon segment, with a market share of 12.7 percent in 2001. To reach younger women and to update its brand image, the company launched its "Red Dot" advertising campaign in 2000. Created by Ogilvy & Mather Chicago, the campaign took an approach to advertising feminine care products that was more honest than usual, with the red dot symbolizing women's periods. It was described in PR Newswire as taking a "frank, you-go-girl tone." Kotex was the only brand that offered products in all three feminine care sectors—sanitary pads, pantiliners, and tampons—and the campaign emphasized that the products and packaging made women feel special. In 2003, responding to the changing tastes of women, Kotex introduced an improved line of products and packaging, including updated packaging for its Security tampons that was designed specifically to appeal to younger women. At the end of 2003, the sales of Security tampons, while still in the number three spot, had inched up 2.8 percent, to $74.2 million, compared to sales during the previous year. Kotex's "Red Dot" campaign evolved in 2004 to give a better portrait of the world of young women, encompassing all major aspects of their lives and not just the times of their monthly periods.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When P&G introduced its new Tampax product, Pearl tampons, in 2002, the brand's agency, Leo Burnett USA, created an aggressive marketing campaign using the tagline "Are you a Pearl girl?" to support the product. In 2004, responding to a 2003 court order requiring P&G to pull all of its Tampax Pearl advertising that included claims of the product's superiority to competitor Playtex's Gentle Glide tampon, Leo Burnett revamped the campaign. The new campaign, "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women," included television spots and print ads. Similar to the original campaign, the new ads had a fashion look and were designed to resonate with contemporary women. Using humor, the ads also helped remove the stigma often associated with women's monthly periods, while encouraging them to be proud of their intelligence and ingenuity.

The television spots were aired on cable channels, including MTV, and on national networks during programming that typically attracted a female audience, such as Law and Order. In one spot, titled Leak, a happy looking couple were shown drifting on a lake in a small boat. When the boat suddenly began to leak, the man panicked, uncertain about what to do. His ingenious female companion saved the day when she pulled a Tampax Pearl tampon out of her day pack and quickly plugged the leak. The spot used the new tagline, ''The one. The only.'' In another spot, ''Embarrassment,'' an attractive woman dressed in white caused the heads of passengers in a passing bus to turn as she walked down the street. As she continued to walk, a man sitting in a café turned to look at her. The attention was not because she was beautiful but because, as she noticed when she checked herself in a mirror, the hem of her skirt was caught in her panties. The tagline was ''Embarrassment happens. Leaks shouldn't.''

Print ads appeared in national publications that were read by young women, including Seventeen. The ads were heavily shaded in blue, the color of the Tampax Pearl box. One full-page ad, for example, featured a woman skin diving in the depths of a deep blue ocean while a shark swam toward her. The text read, ''A leak can attract unwanted attention.'' In the bottom right-hand corner of the page was a picture of a Tampax Pearl box with the tagline ''The one. The only.'' Another ad pictured a young woman, dressed in blue slacks and sweater and wearing a pearl bracelet and ring, cuddling a pudgy puppy in her lap. The puppy looked guilty, and the text read, ''Certain leaks can be forgiven.'' Again, the Tampax Pearl box appeared at the bottom of the ad, with the tagline ''The one. The only.''

OUTCOME

The ''Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women'' campaign achieved or surpassed its goals of building buzz about P&G's Tampax Pearl tampons and of increasing product share within the feminine hygiene market. The company reported that following the launch of the campaign in 2004, shipments of Tampax Pearl tampons to retailers increased 74 percent and that market share increased six points over the same period in 2003. The campaign won a Silver EFFIE in 2005 for its unique advertising that connected with young women. The TV spot portraying a woman with the hem of her skirt caught in her underwear was included on Advertising Age's Top 20 list for likability. In addition, Advertising Age recognized Tampax Pearl as one of its 2005 Marketing 50, cited for attracting consumer interest in the product through the use of innovative marketing, creative product design, and other outreach efforts.

SHARING AND CONNECTING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1995, after two years of testing, the Procter & Gamble Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, was ready to introduce a new product: Febreze, which eliminated odors in fabrics. Not only was Febreze a new product, it was also the pioneer brand of an entirely new category for Procter & Gamble and the marketplace in general. Because of that the launch campaign was more difficult than most. In addition, there was a natural skepticism on the part of consumers that Febreze would bear out the advertising claims. Procter & Gamble's advertising agency, Grey Advertising of New York City, created a campaign whose two primary objectives were to educate consumers about the new product and to drive purchases of it.

The campaign, which began in July 1998, was titled ''Sharing and Connecting.'' It cost approximately $65 million and included television spots and print ads.

Each of the initial spots was 45 seconds long and consisted of a montage of people discussing Febreze's uses. The product's identity was reinforced with the tagline "Febreze cleans bad smells out of fabrics. For good."

The "Sharing and Connecting" campaign was successful all around. Not only did sales of Febreze exceed Procter & Gamble's expectations, but Febreze was also one of the top 10 best-selling new consumer packaged goods of 1998, even though it hit stores in midyear. The campaign ended in 1999 and won a 2000 Silver EFFIE Award in the New Product category.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1837 by two Cincinnati businessmen, candle maker William Procter and soap maker James Gamble, the Procter & Gamble Company by the end of the twentieth century had become a global leader in home-cleaning products. Nevertheless, many (as much as 75 percent) of the household surfaces that needed regular cleaning were fabrics, and most of the dry-cleaning of these fabrics was done to remove odors, which odor-fighting products had at best only been able to mask.

In the mid-1990s Procter & Gamble began testing a product that the company hoped would capture an as-yet-unidentified market. In fact the new product, which was named Febreze, created a whole new category for the company: fabric refresher. Quoted in a 1998 Proctor & Gamble press release published by PR Newswire was R. Kerry Clark, president of North American laundry and cleaning products at Procter & Gamble: "With Febreze, we're expanding beyond our core franchise of laundry and cleaning products. Now we can offer a broader range of home fabric and textile care . . . [Consumers] will be able to permanently eliminate odors from a wide variety of fabrics, including upholstery, carpet, and clothing." It was not the first time that Procter & Gamble had broken new ground, but in an age when consumers had become savvy and hence skeptical, the introduction of a new product required careful preparation. Thus, Febreze had gone through testing and test-marketing well in advance of its national release.

TARGET MARKET

Initially Grey Advertising and Procter & Gamble had pinpointed the primary target market for Febreze as specifically as possible. In the Brief of Effectiveness that the agency submitted in consideration for an EFFIE Award, this target consumer was described as a woman between the ages of 18 and 49 and who had children. Furthermore, because Febreze was expected to be an ideal low-cost alternative to dry-cleaning, the average income of individuals in this group was less than $30,000 per year. Test-marketing and in-store sampling broadened the target market. Also, brand and advertising commentators saw the product as appealing to young professionals whose after-work club hopping would of course make their clothing smoky.

THE SCIENCE BEHIND FEBREZE

The basic hows and whys of Febreze were revealed by Rachel Ross in an October 2003 Toronto Star article. Breaking the science down into simple terms, she discussed the main active ingredient in Febreze, cyclodextrins. Cyclodextrin molecules, which contained a minimum of six dextrose units, were ring-shaped. As the water from the spray solution evaporated, cyclodextrin became molecular crystals, and the odor molecules bound to the inside of the ring, which neutralized the smell. There were various types of cyclodextrins, Ross further explained, some of which were allowed in food, while others were "used in a wide variety of products, including AIDS drugs and lipsticks."

COMPETITION

Almost from the beginning competing companies jumped into the fray, bringing out their own products within a year of Febreze's introduction. In fact, before the "Sharing and Connecting" campaign had ended, companies such as Reckitt & Colman, Clorox, and Bioshield Technologies were preparing to launch their own brands: Resolve Fabric Freshener, Fresh Care, and OdorFree, respectively. Meanwhile Unilever and S.C. Johnson were also readying their own fabric-refresher products. Christine Bittar noted in a March 1999 Brandweek article, "Priced in the same range as Febreze, the new products are expected to perform similarly by 'lifting' odors out of fabrics rather than merely masking odors." Earlier that year the car-care products company Turtle Wax had introduced Odor-X, an odor eliminator and deodorizer for the upholstery and carpets in cars.

In the second half of 1999 Reckitt & Colman released an approximately $15 million advertising campaign for Resolve, while Clorox spent about $25 million on advertising for Fresh Care in early 2000. Bioshield Technologies began with a regional campaign to promote OdorFree in Texas in April 1999 but had enlarged the campaign to a national one by the end of the year. The cost of the OdorFree campaign was approximately $20 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

For two years prior to its national launch in 1998, Febreze went through a series of marketing trials in Phoenix, Salt Lake City, and Boise, Idaho. These early trials did not go as well as expected, forcing Procter & Gamble and Grey Advertising to refocus the marketing of the product. Early on the product was described as an odor neutralizer, which may have caused some consumers to think that it merely masked odors. Also, during the early testing it was marketed solely as a way of removing cigarette-smoke odors. After conducting extensive interviews with people who liked Febreze but were putting it to different uses, Grey Advertising devised a series of 45-second television spots in which satisfied consumers discussed Febreze and the various ways they used it. Later in the campaign 30-second spots were employed. Procter & Gamble also redesigned the packaging of Febreze. By the time of the national release in July 1998 more than half a million people were familiar with the product.

After the launch Procter & Gamble also used in-store sampling to broaden consumer awareness of Febreze. Richard Turcsik, in a 1998 article published in the Brand Marketing Supplement to Supermarket News, quoted Drake Stimson, who at the time was Febreze brand manager. ''What we have learned with these 'new-to-the-world' categories,'' Stimson said, ''is that there are two critical objectives: educating consumers and creating an in-store presence.'' Stimson also mentioned that Febreze had to overcome heavy consumer skepticism and that live presentations were the best way to do that. Turcsik clarified that, because Febreze was a new product, shoppers had not yet made it a regular item on their shopping lists. He also noted that in-store sampling of Febreze had occurred at every retail level, including club stores, drugstores, supercenters, and supermarkets.

Although Febreze was made available in stores in the United States in March 1998, the actual national launch of the product, with the supporting advertising campaign, came in July of that year. The 52-week ''Sharing and Connecting'' campaign began with television spots and introduced print advertising in consumer magazines six months later. As Grey Advertising explained in its EFFIE Brief of Effectiveness, this approach was used in order to create a maximum awareness of the new product.

In their depiction of common household conditions for which Febreze would be needed, the television spots were intended to inform the public about the product and make it seem excitingly relevant. The choice of actors for the spots was considered crucial, since they had to be able to impart the new information and at the same time connect with consumers. The agency believed that the latter trait would play an important part in overcoming consumers' initial skepticism. In order to emphasize that the product was not just another masking spray, the campaign used the tagline ''Febreze cleans bad smells out of fabrics. For good.''

The campaign received a boost before it had even begun when Febreze was awarded the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval. Toward the end of its run the campaign was further bolstered by a June 1999 Consumer Reports article that gave Febreze good performance marks. The unsigned article stated, ''In our tests, it [Febreze] got rid of heavy cigarette odors and the smell of sautéed onions and garlic from lightweight draperies, nylon carpeting, and wool sweaters in a matter of hours.''

There was one glitch during the campaign, and that was an Internet rumor that claimed that Febreze was harmful to pets. The Consumer Reports article touched on this issue by mentioning that the National Animal Poison Control Center was investigating the allegations and had not found any problems by the time the magazine had gone to press. Nevertheless the rumors persisted. Good Dog! Magazine also decided to investigate the rumors. The magazine contacted both Procter & Gamble and the National Animal Poison Control Center. Spokespeople for the former related the chronology of the rumors as they knew them, while an official statement from the National Animal Poison Control Center contradicted the rumors. Still, they remained, causing more of a public-relations headache than an advertising problem.

OUTCOME

Febreze was a success from the start. The campaign achieved both of its objectives: informing consumers about the new product and driving trial and consumption of it. This was borne out by statistics that the agency supplied for the EFFIE Brief of Effectiveness, in which it noted that Grey Advertising and Procter & Gamble had set a benchmark of getting 4 percent of consumers to make a trial (i.e., first) purchase in the first three months of the national launch, but in fact Febreze achieved 9 percent. The agency also noted that, by the end of one year on the market, the product had achieved a 40 percent trial-purchase rate and a 30 percent repurchase rate. The ''Sharing and Connecting'' campaign was awarded a 2000 Silver EFFIE from the New York American Marketing Association; the EFFIE Awards was one of the most prestigious award programs in the advertising industry.

Six months after the campaign began, Procter & Gamble was claiming that Febreze had become one of the country's top 10 laundry and cleaning brands. Quoted in a March 1999 issue of MMR, Mike Jensen, Procter & Gamble's director of research and development, said, ''People are really impressed with the product's versatility. We have found that once people use Febreze, they find more and more uses for it.''

By the time the ''Sharing and Connecting'' campaign ended in July 1999, a number of competitors had entered the fabric-refresher category. Febreze, however, was the category leader by late summer 1999. In fact, with approximately $107 million in sales for 1998, Febreze ranked seventh on the list of top-selling new consumer packaged goods for that year. Because of its later release the product was only on the market for 36 weeks in 1998. For comparison purposes Febreze was placed in the rug/upholstery-cleaner category, where it was the best-selling brand for the 52-week period ending January 31, 1999. The number two brand was category competitor Resolve. Procter & Gamble noted that Febreze was the most successful product launch in the company's history (and that included such venerable name brands as Ivory soap, Tide detergent, Crest toothpaste, and Mr. Clean floor cleaner).

Because the ''Sharing and Connecting'' campaign and its product were so successful, Procter & Gamble did not hesitate to make Febreze available in other markets worldwide. It was introduced into the United Kingdom in February 1999. By the end of 1999 Febreze was available in 18 markets in Latin America, Europe, Australia, New Zealand, and Asia.

Febreze not only created a category that other manufacturers rushed to fill but also became a successful Procter & Gamble product line of its own. By 2006 the original fabric refresher was available in five different scents, and there were an additional four specific solutions. There was also Febreze Air Effects, which used the same technique to eliminate odor molecules in the air. A second Febreze air-freshener product was Febreze NOTICEables. Plugged into a wall socket, each Febreze NOTICEable had two scents that alternated. There were five different pairs of Febreze NOTICEables on the market by 2006. The final Febreze product was by far the most technologically advanced and a natural progression from the plug-in. Febreze Scentstories were disks that gave off scents when played on a special player. Marketed as being similar to a scented candle, though longer lasting, Scentstories was available in six scents.

SINK BOY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Pert Plus, a combined shampoo and conditioner, was a major seller for the Procter & Gamble Company in the 1980s and early 1990s and prompted other companies to produce competing brands. Later in the 1990s, however, the convenience of two-in-one products was apparently offset by the problem, real or perceived, of residues these products left in one's hair. Usage had reportedly dropped off among women in particular, though the company maintained that the product still had a strong following among men.

Procter & Gamble reformulated Pert Plus to include a water-based conditioner, eliminating any oils or waxes. In order to inform consumers (particularly women) about the change, the company decided to use an advertising campaign that would evoke the product's lightness without overwhelming users with detailed information. Leo Burnett USA of Chicago created the Sink Boy character based on the established man- (or woman-) on-the-street concept that had been used successfully in previous Procter & Gamble advertising in the United Kingdom and the United States. In the first television spot, run in late fall 1998, Sink Boy roamed the streets of South Beach, Florida, with a portable sink, scoping out volunteers to demonstrate the new Pert Plus. While the general concept of the campaign was old, it incorporated elements of flippant humor and took the nontraditional turn of directly criticizing the old product and describing why the new product was better. The campaign ran on television, in print, outdoors, and on the Internet. Sink Boy went on to appear in other commercials at locations around the country.

The campaign was a hit with consumers. A Sink Boy fan club (composed mostly of women) sprang up, and members urged the traveling hair-care demonstrator to come to their towns. Sink Boy's website also appealed to consumers. Procter & Gamble reported that, in the week's following its launch, an average user visited the site 1.9 times and lingered about six minutes each visit. Sink Boy was put on hiatus in December 2000. In 2002 Sink Boy was shelved for good, and plans for a new Pert Plus campaign were announced.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pert Plus was reportedly created almost as an afterthought. Procter & Gamble scientists spent years developing the formula for a new two-in-one shampoo and conditioner, only to get a cool reception from top executives, who were more focused on other brands in the mid-1980s. When they got around to figuring out what to do with the new formula, company managers were cautious. Because the shampoo market was so competitive and consumers could be fickle, the company decided not to launch a new brand but to incorporate the formula into an existing product. Pert, a brand introduced in 1981, was practically washed up, with barely 2 percent of the U.S. shampoo market. The company reformulated the product and called it Pert Plus. The company test-marketed the product with relatively low expectations, but it quickly realized it had a hit when results came in. Within a year Pert Plus was made available throughout the United States and then expanded into overseas markets. The product was reported to be one of the fastest-growing hair-care brands in the country during the late-1980s, and in January 1991 Pert Plus was the best-selling shampoo worldwide. The product's phenomenal success prompted other companies to develop and market competing two-in-one brands.

During the 1990s, however, shampoo/conditioner combos fell out of favor, and sales of Pert and similar competing products dropped. One explanation offered by Bob Garfield of Advertising Age was that the ''convenience of 2-in-1s sent the category skyrocketing . . . but the heavy, gummy residue eventually turned consumers, especially female consumers, way off.'' In a bid to revive the brand, Procter & Gamble changed the formula to eliminate waxes and oils, but the company still faced the task of communicating the change to consumers, particularly women. In late 1998 Procter & Gamble ran a television campaign developed by advertising agency Leo Burnett USA in Chicago geared toward changing people's minds about Pert Plus.

A SHAMPOO BY ANY OTHER NAME . . .

When Procter & Gamble was planning to launch Pert Plus in the mid-1980s, one problem the company had to deal with was the name. While Pert Plus was acceptable in the United States, in some other countries it was too similar to other products already on the market or it violated trademarks. So Procter & Gamble departed from its usual strategy of using one name for a product around the world and sold it under various names in different countries.

According to the December 6, 1990, issue of the Wall Street Journal, the shampoo was known as Rejoy in Japan and Rejoice in Singapore. It was also sold under a Vidal Sassoon label in Germany and Britain. The Journal reported that marketing one brand under different names would not necessarily hurt its sales. One observer noted that the two-in-one product's launch might have been faster if the company had used one brand name, but that by using different names Procter & Gamble ended up with many successful lines instead of just one.

TARGET MARKET

Although the new advertising campaign was targeted at both men and women, the company had a particular interest in persuading women to reconsider using Pert Plus. A company spokeswoman said that Pert Plus still had a strong following among men. In May 1999 Brandweek reported that 55 percent of Pert Plus users were men. The company sought to reach consumers through print media, television, outdoor advertising, and the Internet.

COMPETITION

Drug & Cosmetic Industry reported in September 1998 that the hair-care market had been declining steadily since 1994 and that this was a result in part of a saturated consumer base. The market was highly competitive, with products being deeply discounted to increase market share. The shampoo segment was reported to be the largest category worldwide, however, and shampoos had $1.83 billion in retail sales in the United States in 1997.

Procter & Gamble held almost one-third of the mass-market shampoo category, based in large part on the success of Pantene, according to the February 1, 1999, issue of Advertising Age. Pantene held the top spot among shampoos with 14.3 percent of the market. Procter & Gamble products made up 30.6 percent of the market during the quarter that ended September 30, 1998, while Unilever held 18.5 percent with its Suave and Finesse brands. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. held a 14.4 percent share, buoyed by the continued success of Clairol Herbal Essences and the launch of the Daily Defense line.

The intense competition prompted shampoo marketers to revamp existing brands or issue new ones, often aimed at niche markets or highly specialized needs. Bristol-Myers Squibb's Daily Defense brand was being pitched as a shampoo with ingredients that helped protect hair from pollution, excess heat, and other environmental stress factors. Revlon Inc. expanded its ColorStay line of shampoos and conditioners for tinted hair to include color-specific products. The Pantene Pro-V line was expanded with four new products: heat-activated conditioner, antidandruff shampoo, and eight formulations of two different brands of hairspray. In October 1998 Procter & Gamble announced that it was "restaging" Pantene Pro-V with a new name (Pantene Ultra-V), new formula, and new package. In addition, Chain Drug Review reported in March 1999 that Procter & Gamble planned an overhaul of the Vidal Sasson line to include a texturizing shampoo, conditioner, and a two-in-one product called Ultra Care, and intended that each product be offered in one of four versions: voluminizing, body building, moisturizing, and for color-treated hair. Alberto-Culver Co., in an ambitious move, was budgeting $300 million for reviving its decades-old VO5 line.

Amid this vast and ever-changing array of specialized hair-care products, Pert Plus occupied the middle of the pack among the top 10 best-selling shampoo brands, ranking fifth in dollar sales and sixth in unit sales, as reported by Chain Drug Review in March 1999. Two of the brands that beat it out, Pantene and Head & Shoulders, were owned by Procter & Gamble.

PUTTING SPARK IN THE DULL, LIFELESS SHAMPOO COMMERCIAL

Procter & Gamble was not the only company trying to liven up its shampoo commercials. The Globe and Mail in March 1999 noted a number of brands that were getting away from the old formulaic approach, in which a model bemoaned some problem with her hair, used the shampoo, and ended the spot by triumphantly flipping her tresses.

In particular, companies favored edgy humor, usually geared toward female viewers. A Lever Pond's commercial for Salon Selectives showed a young woman reading a magazine article titled "Is he right for you?" In a brief fantasy, her boyfriend transformed into a hunk, but the dream ended when he belched. The voice-over said, "If only you could customize a man like you customize with Salon Selectives." Clairol Herbal Essences was relaunched with a campaign that drew inspiration from Meg Ryan's fake orgasm in When Harry Met Sally. It featured women using the product and exclaiming, "Yes, yes!" after which sex therapist Dr. Ruth Westheimer showed up and added, "If you think that's great, the new conditioner is really intensive." While some thought it was "a different approach" that seemed to work, other industry observers though it was "kind of in poor taste."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Leo Burnett developed an advertising campaign based on an old idea from its London office, which had done advertising for Procter & Gamble's Daz detergent. In those commercials a mock television news team would go door-to-door, offering to do the household wash with Daz. This approach was later used in Gain detergent commercials in the United States. According to the Rose Sheet, the strategy was also similar to one Procter & Gamble used to sell Sure antiperspirant, in which people on the street were asked to use Sure and compare it with their current brand. Leo Burnett once again used the man-and woman-on-the-street approach and developed the campaign around Sink Boy or Sink Guy, who walked the streets with a portable sink offering to wash people's hair. Sink Boy was described by the company as a "goofy, offbeat" character who did the "unpredictable." The campaign invoked quirky humor and, in a departure from the norm, dealt candidly with the perceived shortcomings of old Pert Plus. Actor Michael Collins was hired to play Sink Boy in the television commercial, which was filmed in South Beach, Florida.

The 60-second spot opened with Sink Boy saying, "Hi! We're in Miami. We've got a sink, new Pert Plus with 'clean conditioning.' We're washin' hair and we're changin' minds." The commercial then proceeded, by way of on-the-street interviews, to discuss the problems with the old product. Sink Boy asked passersby, "Have you ever used one of those shampoo and conditioners in one?" and they responded with remarks like "Didn't like it," "I hated them," "Kinda . . . uhhgh," "Limp and dead,'' and ''Weighs your hair down.'' Sink Boy said, ''We're 0-for-4, my friend,'' then offered to wash their hair with new Pert Plus, explaining that the company ''redid it, it's been revolutionarily, like, redesigned with a water-based conditioner. There's no oil, no wax, so your hair's gonna feel clean, clean.'' When he was finished, the participants' comments were ''Wow!'' ''It feels light,'' and ''It does seem lighter.'' The lightness of the commercial's tone was meant to reflect the lightness of the product. The spot ended with the tagline ''If we can wash your hair, we can change your mind.''

After the original South Beach spot aired, Sink Boy commercials were filmed in other locations, including Las Vegas, New Orleans, and Chicago. According to Brandweek in May 1999, the television commercials were ''all ad hoc, based on real customer reactions, without reliance on storyboards or scripts.'' The new campaign was supported with in-store displays, point-of-entry marketing, and a toll-free number. In accordance with the trend toward offering specialized products, the reformulated Pert Plus was launched in four different versions—normal, dry/damaged, fine, and oily.

The concept behind the campaign was the desire to ''get people to rethink and retry'' the product, according to Kevin Burke, Pert Plus brand manager. To do this, Burke said, the company needed to overcome ''a predisposition against 2-in-1 products,'' but to do so without inundating consumers with information. The ''Sink Boy'' campaign attempted to reach people with tongue-in-cheek humor, as well as its upfront discussion of the old product versus the new and a kind of in-your-face spunkiness in the character of Sink Boy. Although Procter & Gamble had generally favored conservative advertising, it tried a different approach with this campaign. According to Procter & Gamble spokeswoman Stefani Valkonen, ''What we wanted was to really establish a new image . . . we wanted it to be looked at as more contemporary and more fun.''

OUTCOME

As Brandweek reported in May 1999, the Sink Boy television spots became ''the cornerstone of an integrated marketing effort, one component of which was the introduction of Sink Boy into on-line society.'' The Sink Boy website, developed by Giant Step, a Leo Burnett-owned interactive agency, was considered a ''natural extension'' of the more traditional forms of advertising. According to Pert Plus brand manager Burke, a ''light bulb went off'' when the company and the advertising agency saw how ''adaptable'' Sink Boy was on television, and ''we challenged Leo Burnett to turn it into more than TV.'' Giant Step reportedly intended to ''further explore the [Sink Boy] character, building on the TV commercials.'' Mark Rattin, director of creative development at Giant Step, said, ''We'll probably extend the understanding of [Sink Boy] . . . allowing some interesting personality facets to come out online and using those humor instances to allow users to interact with some relationship components.''

The Sink Boy website reportedly drew substantial interest, with the average user visiting the site 1.9 times during the six weeks following the site's launch and spending an average of six minutes viewing the site. Brandweek reported that Sink Boy ''is apparently warming some hearts. Providing users the chance to write back has created a devoted Sink Boy fan club made up mostly of women, according to Burke, who says they seem to want to get to know the character. Some have even invited them to set up a hair-washing stall in their hometowns.'' Brandweek noted that, since the.

Burke said in May 1999 that Procter & Gamble was looking at other places to send Sink Boy, based on the mail that was coming in for him. The company did not plan at that time to set up chat rooms or bulletin boards, relying instead on consumer-to-consumer contact to promote Web traffic. The company did intend to include occasional product news updates on the website. Brandweek also reported, ''The site will . . . be updated to reflect the evolution of the traditional advertising campaign, incorporating some new Burnett ads that Rattin says are 'even crazier.' ''

Despite the Sink Boy campaign's success, in December 2000 it was put on temporary hold. As competition from other brands, such as Unilever's discount-priced Suave shampoo, began chipping away at Pert Plus sales, in 2002 Procter & Gamble announced a complete makeover of the product. Rather than revise the Sink Boy campaign, it left it on the shelf permanently and planned a new campaign that was also developed by Leo Burnett.

STRANGE BUT TRUE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2004 the Procter & Gamble Company's Gain detergent brand had been available to consumers for nearly 38 years. Gain was best known for its distinctive citrus scent, which many consumers embraced but which was considered a generic fragrance by others. Although Gain was the number-two brand of powdered laundry detergent in 2004, its sales had dropped 4 percent from the same period in 2003. That slip came after an 11.9 percent drop from the same period in 2002. With Gain's sales on a steady decline, Procter & Gamble charged ad agency Leo Burnett Canada with pushing Gain ahead of the competition, increasing sales, and turning Gain's fragrance into an important element of the brand experience.

Leo Burnett approached the challenge from the aspect of Gain's fragrance. But rather than tell consumers what they already knew—how the detergent smelled—the agency asked them to consider how the fragrance made them feel when they smelled it on their freshly laundered clothes. From that idea the "Strange but True" campaign evolved. The campaign, released in 2004, entailed television spots based on the "strange but true" love stories told by Gain users.

The campaign achieved its goals of increasing market share, improving brand identity, and driving consumer awareness of the product. Six months after it began, Gain's share had jumped 10 percent. The campaign also succeeded in increasing consumer awareness as people logged on to the product's website to share their own Gain detergent "love stories." In addition, the campaign's television spots earned praise from the ad industry. Adweek described one of the spots as "sophisticated." The campaign also won a 2005 Bronze EFFIE Award.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Procter & Gamble built a reputation for getting laundry clean, first with its Dreft detergent, introduced in 1933 as an improvement over the washing-machine-clogging, fabric-dulling soap flakes that consumers had used since the 1920s. Tide brand, introduced in 1946, took laundering another step forward, cleaning not just lightly soiled laundry as Dreft did, but tackling heavily soiled clothes. By 1964 Tide laundry detergent had been through 22 transformations, with each change improving the product. In 1966 Procter & Gamble started selling a new detergent brand, Gain, which featured a distinctive green color and a unique citrus scent. In response to changing consumer preferences Gain liquid was introduced in 1993.

Ten years after its initial introduction Gain had acquired a loyal following of consumers, who loved its cleaning power and fresh scent. The powdered variety of Gain was the number-two powdered laundry detergent in 2003 with a 13.8 percent market share, but it trailed far behind the number-one powdered detergent, its big brother Tide, which claimed a 46.9 percent share of all powdered detergents sold. In the liquid detergent category liquid Gain came in even further down the list, ranking fifth. As Gain's unique qualities—especially its fragrance—were gradually getting lost in a market saturated with laundry-detergent choices, in 2004 Procter & Gamble's ad agency Leo Burnett Canada created a new marketing campaign designed to help boost brand identity, increase sales, and push Gain ahead of the competition.

TARGET MARKET

Although the EFFIE Awards website summarized the "Strange but True" campaign as the stories of all fanatics who loved the scent of Gain, the typical user of laundry detergents was women. Women were also the ones usually found in supermarkets buying the product. But Procter & Gamble also targeted another market with its Gain detergent: Hispanic consumers. According to a report in the Cincinnati Enquirer, "Gain is a symbol of the company's success in targeting certain brands to consumers in certain ethnic groups." In the United States the text on each box of Gain appeared in both English and Spanish. Further, consumers in target communities received direct-mail offers printed in Spanish. The report in the Cincinnati Enquirer also noted that in 2003 Procter & Gamble spent $80 million on marketing that targeted Hispanics, an increase of 15 percent from the previous year. As a result of such targeted efforts, sales of Gain to the Hispanic market increased notably, surpassing the brand's U.S. sales in general. And although Gain's scent was described in the EFFIE summary as a "hedonistic experience" for all consumers, the fragrances were particularly important to Hispanic consumers. A BusinessWeek Online article noted that Procter & Gamble had added a new scent to its Gain line after a study found that 57 percent of Hispanics liked to smell their product purchases before buying.

PROCTER & GAMBLE'S ACQUISITION OF COLGATE-PALMOLIVE EUROPEAN DETERGENT BRANDS

With its U.S. laundry-detergent market reaching saturation and sales leveling off, Procter & Gamble in 2003 announced plans to acquire Colgate-Palmolive's European detergent business. Included in the acquisition were Colgate's Axion and Gama, sold in France; Dynamo, sold in Denmark; Ajax, sold in Sweden; and Dinamo, sold in Italy. According to a report in Chemical Week, combined European sales of the Colgate-Palmolive products was $100 million. Prior to its acquisition of the Colgate-Palmolive detergent line, Procter & Gamble was the number-three detergent producer in the European market, falling in behind number one Unilever and number two Henkel.

COMPETITION

The company name Church & Dwight Co., Inc., may not have been familiar to consumers, but one of its brand was: Arm & Hammer. The Princeton, New Jersey–based company, founded in 1846, was the number-one producer of baking soda, but it also offered a variety of products with the Arm & Hammer label, including laundry detergents in both powder and liquid forms. Instead of relying on advertising, Church & Dwight strengthened its detergent brands through acquisitions. In 2001 the company acquired USA Detergents for $120 million. The addition of USA Detergent's brand Xtra—which was ranked the number-six liquid laundry detergent in the United States that year—was expected to boost Church & Dwight's sales. The acquisition also pushed Church & Dwight into the number three laundry-detergent spot, with sales of powdered and liquid brands combined hitting $400 million (an 8.8 percent market share). Unlike its competitors, including Procter & Gamble, Church & Dwight reportedly had no immediate plans to gain customers by expanding into foreign markets. In 2004 Arm & Hammer detergents were given a new fragrance and redesigned packaging. Despite such efforts, for the 52 weeks ending October 31, 2004, Arm & Hammer brand's powdered-detergent sales slipped 13.6 percent to about $55.2 million, and it was ranked number four in the U.S. powdered-detergent category. During the same period the brand's liquid-detergent sales dropped 2.3 percent to about $107.6 million, putting it in eighth place among liquid detergents.

Unilever, based in London, England, offered U.S. consumers a variety of laundry detergents, including All and Wisk, but its market share was as varied as its products. With $246 million in U.S. sales (a 10.1 percent share) for the 52 weeks ending October 31, 2004, the company's All brand liquid detergent claimed the number-two spot in the liquid-detergent category in the United States. This meant that it ranked just behind Procter & Gamble's giant seller, Tide, and well ahead of Procter & Gamble's Gain. But with $15.3 million in sales, the powdered version of All ranked near the bottom of its category for the same period, claiming just a 1.8 percent share. Also during that period Unilever's Wisk liquid laundry detergent fell in at number six among liquid detergents, with sales of $124.7 million (a 5.1 percent share).

To give its brands a boost in the U.S. market, in 2004 Unilever switched creative responsibilities for its All brand from Lowe Worldwide to Bartle Bogle Hegarty. Creative for the Wisk brand remained with Lowe. Both brands also launched marketing efforts in 2004. The All brand released two campaigns, "Look on the Bright Side" and "Small Chef—Big Mess Challenge." The "Look on the Bright Side" effort encouraged consumers to find the humor in life's small mishaps, such as red wine spilling or freshly washed clothes being dropped on the ground. The "Small Chef—Big Mess" campaign featured a cooking contest for children in which the winner would receive a $25,000 scholarship and a chance to cook with Food Network chef Rachel Ray, known for her cooking program 30 Minutes Meals. Both campaigns also promoted All's promise that it could get 99 top food stains out of clothes.

Unilever's fading Wisk brand was best known to consumers for its 1960s advertising that portrayed an embarrassed housewife whose husband had "ring around the collar." The first stage of the 2004 campaign featured television spots with the theme "Go Ahead, Get Dirty." Subsequent ads appeared on billboards, and a website was created that allowed moms to chat online about dirt and getting it out with Wisk. Signed on as spokesperson was Baltimore Orioles shortstop Cal Ripken, Jr., famous for his get-dirty style of play.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Leo Burnett Canada created the "Strange but True" campaign for Procter & Gamble's Gain laundry detergent, the challenge was to push a product identified with its fragrance to the forefront of a market crowded with laundry products that were promoted by their scents. According to the campaign summary that the agency submitted for the 2005 EFFIE Awards, its goal was to turn Gain's "generic scent into a unique brand experience." In developing television spots for the campaign, Leo Burnett used true stories about consumers' individual experiences with Gain detergent.

One spot that first aired in early 2004 told the true story of a 20-something man, Adam, whose girlfriend left one of her freshly laundered dresses at his apartment when she went on a two-week vacation. The woman's little white dress had been washed in Gain, and based on the young man's response to the garment, its smell was irresistible. Consoling himself in the absence of his love, Adam was shown talking to his girlfriend's little white dress, napping with it, and eating dinner with it. Eventually Adam put the dress on a life-size cardboard cutout of Sylvester Stallone in his Rocky persona. With the Patsy Cline song "Crazy" playing in the background, Adam took the Stallone cutout in his arms and danced around the living room. The spot ended with Adam's girlfriend returning home and seeing in the apartment window the silhouettes of her boyfriend and the cutout dancing. A voice-over stated: "Adam, yeah, I hope your relationship lasts as long as the fresh scent of Gain."

In a follow-up spot, a group of five guys were shown watching a sports event on television. The man hosting the get-together said in a voice-over, "Recently my wife started using Gain detergent. I really like the fresh scent, but I didn't believe her when she said even the guys would notice the difference." When the group's favored team scored, the guys jumped up, cheering, slapping high fives, and hugging each other. In an awkward moment, one of the guys clung to the host in a bear hug, burying his nose in his friend's Gain-fresh T-shirt. The voice-over said, "Now I believe her. Gain. Making believers out of everyone, even the guys." During the spot text appeared on the screen noting that the commercial was "based on an actual letter from a Gain lover."

Each of the campaign's spots ended with a shot of a bottle of liquid Gain and the tagline "The smell says clean." On-screen text also directed viewers to a website, www.ilovegain.com, that enabled consumers to post their own personal Gain-related "love stories" or to read stories posted by other Gain lovers. Those who posted personal stories on the site included one consumer who told of putting powdered Gain in the vacuum-cleaner bag so that the smell would fill the house. The author of the anecdote stated, "Now I love to do laundry and to vacuum." Another wrote, "Gain gets rid of any stink on my clothes, and it makes my bionic nose happy." One woman said that she was so entranced by the Gain smell that she no longer cuddled with her husband, preferring to hug his freshly laundered shirts. Kids were not excluded from the Gain lovefest. A youngster wrote that when his mom bought Gain, she worried about him because he disappeared for hours. But she worried needlessly, because the child was "in the laundry room smelling."

OUTCOME

Leo Burnett's "Strange but True" marketing effort for Gain detergent was a success on several levels. In the six months following its launch, the campaign resulted in a 10 percent growth in market share for Gain. Overall, Gain powder claimed a 14.9 percent market share, or $126.2 million in U.S. sales for the 52 weeks ending October 31, 2004. Gain liquid sales climbed 24.5 percent to $167.7 million for the same period. Consumers, driven to the ilovegain.com website by the campaign, logged on to read the stories of others who had shared their experiences with Gain detergent or to post their own Gain "love stories." The campaign earned praise from Adweek when its critic Barbara Lippert described one television spot as a "breakthrough" and "sophisticated." She wrote that the spot "motivates the viewer to buy the stuff, if only to figure out just how 'dirty' clean can get." Further recognition came when the campaign was honored with a 2005 Bronze EFFIE Award for surpassing the campaign's share-growth goals by 263 percent and for successfully encouraging consumers to take part in the brand experience.

TASTING IS BELIEVING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The 1998 advertising campaign for Fat-Free Pringles potato chips, involving an investment of $30 to $40 million in television, radio, print, and in-store promotions, was actually part of a much larger effort by Procter & Gamble (P&G) to market a fat substitute called Olean. The latter was its brand name for olestra, developed at a cost of some $500 million and 30 years of research, which promised fat-free eating without the fat-free taste. Fat-Free Pringles contained Olean; hence, the principal tag line of Pringles 1998 campaign, created by Grey Advertising in New York, was "Tasting Is Believing."

P&G also had an advertising campaign for Olean, handled by another agency, with the tag line "Fat-free Olean. A good place to start." In fact Olean, though not yet marketed directly to consumers (P&G certainly hoped to do so in the future), was a product unto itself and placed P&G in the unusual position of selling to a competitor. Thus Fat-Free Pringles in 1998 went up against a chip manufactured by competitor Frito-Lay, owned by PepsiCo, which also contained Olean.

The idea behind Olean was an intriguing one: a substitute that contained all the taste and richness of fat but that, because of its chemical makeup, would not be absorbed by the body. Instead, it would be expelled—and that fact created a problem, because many participants in Olean studies complained of diarrhea.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

If ever there was a company with the resources for the kind of extensive and in-depth research required to develop a product such as Olean, it was Procter & Gamble. Founded in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1837 by candle maker William Procter and soap maker James Gamble, the company's growth over the next 161 years had been explosive. By 1998 it had worldwide sales of $37.15 billion, with profits of $3.78 billion.

Equally impressive was the array of P&G products lining grocery store shelves: Crest toothpaste, Tide laundry detergent, Pampers disposable diapers, Scope mouthwash, Cascade automatic dishwasher detergent, Charmin bathroom tissue, Clorox bleach, Head & Shoulders shampoo, NyQuil cough formula . . . the list went on and on and was not limited to nonedible consumables. Although P&G was not typically associated with food in the popular mindset, the consumer products giant manufactured a wide variety of foods and food-related items. Topping the list was Crisco shortening, which in 1911 became its first food-related product. The 1956 purchase of Duncan Hines greatly added to P&G's food offerings, and although the company sold Duncan Hines in 1998, its food lineup was impressive, including Folgers coffee, Jif peanut butter, Eagle Snacks, and Pringles.

Pringles, of course, were perhaps best known for their packaging, a cylindrical can about the same size as the ones in which tennis balls were sold. Pringles cans contained a neat stack of potato chips, seemingly so precise in their placement that it was almost as though the grooves of one chip fit neatly into those of the chip below it. For years P&G sold Pringles on the basis of taste; but with the advent of Olean, a new and intriguing idea presented itself: what if Pringles could offer the same flavor, without any of the fat? Hence Pringles ran an ad campaign, which ended in February 1998, whose tag line played on the famous Pringles packaging: "Can you get great taste in a fat-free chip? Yes, you can."

TARGET MARKET

In 1968, when P&G researchers began the experiments that would ultimately yield olestra and Olean, Americans—motivated both by concerns over appearance and health—were just beginning to turn to low-fat and fat-free products. Some of the first low-fat and fat-free products, of course, tasted awful by almost everyone's standards, but with time it appeared that consumers did not have to sacrifice taste for low calories. Yet for all the efforts of science to enhance the flavor of low-fat and no-fat foods, it was easy enough to taste the difference. A September 1997 report by Laurie Freeman in Advertising Age spoke volumes concerning feelings about fat and flavor. "It's not that Americans have lost their taste for no-fat, low-fat, reduced-fat foods," Freeman wrote. "After all, retail sales of reduced-fat foods in the U.S. totaled $23.8 billion in 1996, and will grow at a compounded annual rate of 5.8 percent through 2001, reports [consumer research firm] Find/SVP. What is emerging is a growing sense that consumers are beginning to balk at reduced-fat foods because of texture or the lack of flavor. Consumers may as well be saying: if the products don't taste like the real thing but still deliver high calories, then hand over the rich food.''

It was up to P&G, then, to reinvigorate interest in fat-free eating. In a February 1998 press release announcing the rollout of fat-free snacks with Olean, the company noted that the average American ate 21 pounds of salted snacks, containing 6 pounds of fat and more than 22,800 calories, each year. ''If only 10 percent of these people ate Olean snacks instead of full-fat snacks,'' the P&G press release went on, ''Americans would avoid 77,400 tons of fat and more than 600 billion calories a year. If a person who eats one ounce of full-fat potato chips every day were to substitute chips fried with Olean, he or she would avoid eating eight pounds of fat a year.''

SCARCE AS HENS' TEETH

Fortune had been good to Procter & Gamble. Indeed, in the Cincinnati-based consumer products giant's repertoire, failed products were scarce. On that short list was an item called Crush, a soft-drink line purchased by P&G in 1980 and sold nine years later after it had failed to perform. Of course P&G did not create Crush, but it did create some other questionable products, including Fit, a wash designed specifically for fruits and vegetables. As of mid-1998 the company was still trying to figure out how to market it.

A product of much earlier provenance was Radar, a men's hair dressing that included a plastic scalp stimulator. Then there was Abound, like Radar developed at some point in the past decades: the hair conditioner never caught on with women, perhaps because it was sold in the form of coated sheets to be rubbed on the hair, rather than in the usual liquid form. More notorious were Rely tampons, which P&G removed from store shelves in 1980 after researchers found that use of Rely was linked to toxic shock syndrome.

COMPETITION

Those were some impressive *if*s, but P&G faced some equally impressive challenges over Olean, challenges that threatened the success of Fat-Free Pringles. That threat did not come from traditional competitors, since in fact Pringles' fiercest competition bought its Olean from P&G. In mid-1998 Frito-Lay introduced olestra versions of its Doritos tortilla chips and Ruffles and Lays potato chips under the Wow! label. Frito-Lay projected $900 million in retail sales; thus, its management had every reason to wish for the success of Olean, if not the success of Fat-Free Pringles.

Instead, leading the charge against Olean was the Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI), a Washington, D.C., advocacy group known by detractors as ''the food police.'' In 1996 Dr. Michael Jackobson of the CSPI held a press conference to introduce a new anti-olestra commercial. The spot featured a close-up of a slowly revolving dog food can. ''As the can rotated,'' wrote Alicia Mundy in Mediaweek, ''it revealed the contents, including Olean, and the possible side-effects of that oil: loose stools, cramps. 'If this were a can of dog food, would you feed it to your dog?' queried a voice-over. 'Then why would you eat it yourself?' the voice asked.''

Jacobson held another press conference in 1997, claiming that test-marketing of Olean in Columbus, Ohio, and other areas had caused massive outbreaks of diarrhea. Indeed, some 300 persons who tried Olean products filed complaints with the CSPI, which had in turn demanded that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and Federal Trade Commission (FTC) require P&G to add a stern warning on products—including Fat-Free Pringles—that contained Olean. The CSPI's recommended wording would have a notice that the product ''may cause abdominal cramping and loose stools.'' According to Terry Kinney in Fort Worth Star-Telegram, P&G had ''asked the FDA to rewrite the label, suggesting this phrase: 'Because it is not digested, olestra may cause discomfort or a laxative effect.' The FDA rejected the idea.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

On the one hand P&G ran a standard promotional campaign for Fat-Free Pringles; on the other hand it also had to undertake a defensive campaign for Olean as olestra came under attack from the CSPI and others. This it did with the tag line ''Fat-free Olean. A good place to start,'' created by Grey Advertising, and with commercials that aired on February 21, during the Winter Olympic Games.

A key strategy in the Olean campaign was the identification of olestra with P&G's first food-related product, Crisco. In the words of Tara Parker-Pope in the Wall Street Journal, the Olean Winter Olympics commercial ''shows wholesome scenes from an American farm to remind consumers that olestra is made with soybeans. . . . Amid scenes of golden fields, tractors, and a family gathering on the farm, a soybean farmer tells viewers that 'the folks who make Crisco' are now using soybeans to make a 'new kind of cooking oil.' " In P&G's February 10, 1998, press release announcing the introduction of fat-free snacks, chairman and CEO John E. Pepper stated that "At the start of this century, Crisco was a good idea for healthier eating. On the eve of the next century, a fat-free, calorie-free cooking oil from the makers of Crisco is an even better idea, and snacks are a great place to start."

The first thrust in the Fat-Free Pringles campaign came on the heels of its test marketing efforts and used many of the same methods—primarily distribution of free samples at lunch hour in many large cities. On February 2, Judann Pollack and Chuck Ross reported in Advertising Age that P&G expected to roll out the actual product nationally on October 1, but by late February stores in selected Ohio cities were already selling the new Pringles. P&G gave away some 3,000 samples of Pringles to lunchtime crowds in Cincinnati on February 27, a date Mayor Roxanne Qualls had proclaimed "Fat Free Pringles Day." It did the same in other Ohio cities. In early March P&G hung out a 100-by-32-foot banner, covering nine stories on one of the twin towers of its Cincinnati headquarters, to advertise Fat-Free Pringles.

Using the tag line "Yes I can!," P&G introduced Fat-Free Pringles nationally starting on June 15. TV spots showed adults in a variety of locations—a party, a sporting event, in their homes—holding cans of Fat Free Pringles in one hand and regular Pringles in the other. In addition, P&G ran commercials for Pringles featuring young adults and targeted to that market. New Pringles packaging proclaimed its "amazing taste," but also contained a warning concerning abdominal cramping.

Parker-Pope in the Wall Street Journal reported in June that lunchtime sampling, conducted in 20 major cities such as New York, Minneapolis, and Atlanta, was a major part of the new "Tasting Is Believing" campaign. New commercials, which began appearing in July, according to Parker-Pope, "Focus on the fact that consumers will be pleasantly surprised by the taste of Fat-Free Pringles. A second execution will target consumers who have stopped eating snacks to avoid fat." Pringles marketing manager Casey Keller told Parker-Pope that the latter ads would send the message that "You can have fun again, and you can get back into snacking."

OUTCOME

As the "Tasting Is Believing" campaign continued into the second half of 1998, so did advertising for Olean, this time featuring a young woman in jeans walking around what she claimed was the family farm and again referring to Olean as a product in the Crisco tradition. The commercial promised, "You know a good thing when you see it." By mid-1999, however, many industry observers had begun to have doubts concerning the success of olestra from a business standpoint. P&G had produced only 35 percent of the Olean it had projected to manufacture during the first fiscal year of the product's sale, and purchases were down accordingly.

In May 1999 Pamela Sherrid reported in U.S. News & World Report that "olestra is a long way from achieving mainstream status." Ironically, one of olestra's most impressive success stories was Pringles competitor Frito-Lay, which sold $350 million of Wow! brand snacks in its first year of sales. Sales for Pringles, by contrast, had not captured a great deal of attention. "But P&G has staying power," Sherrid observed. "It stuck with languishing Pringles for 20 years before the brand finally took off in the early 1990s." P&G and Pringles had enjoyed less than glowing results in one round of the olestra battle, but the fight was far from over.

WHEN YOU'RE STRONG, YOU SPARKLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Procter & Gamble's Secret deodorant had been a leading product among women consumers for nearly 50 years. Through years of improvements of the product and extensions of the brand, Secret had remained the number one deodorant for women. But by 2003 sales were slipping for all established brands in the antiperspirant and deodorant categories, including Secret. The only products experiencing growth were newcomers to the category. To reverse the negative trend, the company introduced its own new product, Secret Sparkle, a deodorant designed to appeal to women 16 to 24 years old, who had been abandoning the aging brand in large numbers.

To increase brand awareness among its target audience and to support the launch of Secret Sparkle deodorant in 2004, Procter & Gamble's Chicago-based ad agency, Leo Burnett USA, created a campaign themed "When You're Strong, You Sparkle." The campaign included animated television spots and print ads in national magazines typically read by girls in the target demographic. In addition, Procter & Gamble turned to the Internet for part of its marketing. A brand-themed website, SecretSparkle.com, was created by imc2, a Dallas-based interactive advertising agency. A test promotion on MySpace.com, a social-networking website heavily used by young women, ran for one month. In 2005 the company expanded Secret Sparkle to include a body spray for girls 7 to 12 years old. The marketing was expanded as well with the launch of an Internet blog site, SparkleBodySpray.com.

Following the campaign's launch, overall dollar and volume shares of the Secret brand increased 4 percent and 3 percent, respectively. Teen dollar shares jumped 40 percent. "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" also received a 2005 EFFIE Award for successfully turning around the Secret brand's business. The campaign experienced negative consequences, however, regarding the body-spray marketing that targeted girls under age 12. According to the Children's Advertising Review Unit (CARU) of the Council of Better Business Bureaus, the program violated CARU's guidelines, so Procter & Gamble agreed to cancel that portion of the campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Procter & Gamble introduced Secret deodorant in 1956, the product was a cream that women applied with their fingertips. In 1958 Secret became available as a roll-on; the spray version was introduced in 1964, followed by the solid in 1978. Besides innovations in the product's application methods, Secret was offered in a changing variety of scents that reflected women's lifestyles of the time, from Powder Fresh and Spring Breeze in the 1980s to Ambition, Genuine, and Optimism in 2001. The company was also working to improve its Secret deodorant formulas to provide better protection from perspiration and odor for longer periods of time. By 2002 the antiperspirant and deodorant category had become enormous, with some national retailers such as the Walgreen's drugstore chain offering a selection of as many as 300 varieties. According to the retail-business-tracking company Information Resources, in 2002 Americans spent more than $1 billion on antiperspirants and deodorants. Procter & Gamble's Secret brand held the number one spot that year, with sales of $389 million.

Despite holding the top position in its category, the Secret brand was aging along with its core consumers, women who had begun using the product in their late teens and early 20s and who were loyal to the brand. By the 2003–2004 fiscal year Procter & Gamble had reported three straight years of declining sales. To reverse the slip, it introduced several new products in the Secret line, including Secret Platinum in invisible solid and clear gel forms. In 2004 the company introduced Secret Sparkle, a new Secret deodorant line designed to appeal to young women. A marketing campaign themed "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" was created to support the launch of the new product.

TARGET MARKET

According to Procter & Gamble, 80 percent of its products were purchased by women, and based on that information the company's marketing for most of its products specifically targeted women. The age of the women targeted varied based on the item being promoted. When Procter & Gamble introduced its Secret Sparkle deodorant in 2004, the product and its marketing were designed to reach young women 16 to 24 years old. Dave Knox, Procter & Gamble assistant brand manager, explained during an interview with Advertising Age, "If you don't target the consumer during her formative years, you're not going to be relevant through the rest of her life." Knox further noted that girls were beginning to use deodorant products at a younger age than in the past. With that in mind, in 2005 Procter & Gamble expanded its Secret Sparkle line to include body sprays and increased its marketing to target girls 7 to 12 years old. Because the younger girls had experienced body sprays at chain stores such as Bath & Body Works, they were familiar with the products, making them the ideal target market for the new Secret body spray.

NEW PROCTER & GAMBLE DEODORANT TARGETS YOUNG MEN

As the men's grooming category expanded to include body deodorant sprays similar to those used by teen and 20-something women, Procter & Gamble expanded its Old Spice brand in 2003 to appeal to younger men. The new product, Old Spice Red Zone, offered new fragrances (Glacial Falls and Aqua Reef), contemporary packaging, and a formula that was designed to stop odors before they started. Besides both invisible and soft solid deodorants, the line included a body spray and a body wash. Signed on as spokesman for the Red Zone line was Chicago Bears football linebacker Brian Urlacher.

COMPETITION

Unilever, based in the Netherlands, offered a variety of personal-cleansing products under the Dove brand, including a beauty bar introduced in the 1950s. The brand was eventually expanded to include skin moisturizers and hair-care products such as shampoos and conditioners, and in 1999 Dove deodorant was added to the mix. In 2004 Unilever added Radiant Silk antiperspirant to the Dove deodorant line and became the first brand to combine underarm odor and wetness control with skin care. Dove deodorant's popularity with its target market, women aged 18 to 34, was evident in the sales numbers. Within four years of its introduction Dove deodorant had grown to the number five brand based on sales. From January 2003 to January 2004 Dove reported a sales gain of 11.9 percent, to $58.5 million. In October 2004 a new global branding campaign was launched with the theme "Dove's Campaign for Real Beauty." It included all products with the Dove label and was designed to broaden the definition of beauty beyond physical attractiveness. Print ads featured women who were not models and who ranged from a plus-sized woman to a 96-year-old proudly showing off her wrinkles.

Andrew Jergens Company's market share for all of its personal-care products was on a downward spiral in 2002. At the end of that year the company reported a 3.5 percent drop in retail sales of its products, to $102 million. The report did not include sales at retail giant Wal-Mart, which were expected to give the sales numbers a 20 percent boost. To help execute a business turnaround, in 2003 Jergens began updating its existing products and added several new items, including skin-care products specifically designed for African-American women. In addition, to support its product efforts the company boosted its advertising budget 20 percent for 2003. Among existing products getting an update was Ban deodorant. In 2000 Jergens acquired the 50-year-old Ban brand from Chattanooga, Tennessee–based Chattom, Inc., which produced over-the-counter medications and skin-care products. After three years of work by Jergens scientists to improve Ban's formula, the deodorant got new packaging with a more contemporary and feminine look. A marketing campaign to support the new and improved Ban was launched in 2004 with a target market of young women aged 17 to 24. The campaign's target market put Ban in direct competition with category leaders Dove and Secret. It had the tagline "We'll take care of sweat and odor. The rest is up to you."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2004 Procter & Gamble's Secret deodorant brand had been on a three-year decline, with most of the volume and dollar share losses reported in the teen and college-aged-women market. In an effort to generate renewed interest in the brand among younger consumers, the company introduced a new Secret line, the Secret Sparkle collection, which was geared toward teens and young women. To support the launch of the new product line, Procter & Gamble's longtime advertising agency, Leo Burnett USA, created the "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign. It included national television spots aired during programming that attracted an audience of teens and young women, such as MTV's Laguna Beach and Fox network's The O.C. Print ads also appeared in magazines read by the teen-to-24-year-old demographic, including Teen People and Cosmo Girl.

Each print ad highlighted one of the new product's four fragrances: Pear Illusion, Peach Shimmer, Violet Dazzle, and Moonlit Rose. The tagline, "When you're strong, you sparkle," was printed across the top of the ads. The ads were heavily illustrated and featured a beautiful woman in the center of a fairy-tale setting with images of twinkling stars, birds in flight, unicorns, flowers, and sparkling gems. The print ads were so appealing to young women that many visited the brand's website, where copies of the ads could be downloaded and printed as posters. Television spots were animated and used a magical theme similar to that of the print ads.

Recognizing that its target audience typically spent as much time online as it did watching television or reading magazines, Procter & Gamble also pursued a new approach to market its Secret Sparkle brand by turning to the Internet. Besides launching a website for the brand, SecretSparkle.com, Procter & Gamble arranged a promotional deal with MySpace.com, a social-networking website favored by young women. The MySpace.com home page featured a profile of singer Hilary Duff and included logos for Secret Sparkle deodorant. Internet surfers who viewed the singer's profile could enter Secret's contest "Discover the Secret Strength of Today's Hottest Rising Music Stars." The MySpace.com promotion ran for the month of December 2004 and included ads for Sparkle as well as links to other musicians popular with the target age group, such as the Donnas and Bonnie McKee.

In 2005, when Secret Sparkle Body Spray was added to the Sparkle product line to appeal to an even younger group of girls, those aged 7 to 12, Procter & Gamble again turned to the Internet for its marketing. The company released its first Web log marketing program for the Secret brand: SparkleBodySpray.com. Set up to look like the Web logs (or blogs) of each of the Secret Sparkle Body Spray characters (such as Rose and Peach), the site was interactive, with games and downloads. Dallas-based interactive advertising agency imc2, which had created the SecretSparkle.com website, also developed the body spray's blog site. The new site was designed to appeal to preteen girls as well as to enhance the television and print campaign created by Leo Burnett.

OUTCOME

The campaign was well received by the teens and young women who composed its target audience. Following the launch of "When You're Strong, You Sparkle," Procter & Gamble reported that the Secret brand, overall, increased in both dollar and volume sales share. Increases were especially notable in the teen market, with dollar share growing 40 percent. The campaign also won a 2005 Silver EFFIE Award in the Beauty Aids category.

On a negative note, although the advertising was a success, in 2005 Procter & Gamble agreed to stop advertising its Secret Sparkle Body Spray to girls 12 years old and younger. According to a report in Advertising Age, a ruling by the Children's Advertising Review Unit (CARU) stated that Procter & Gamble's marketing program violated the agency's guidelines. CARU, a division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus, was the children's unit of the advertising industry's self-regulation program. Its guidelines read, "Products inappropriate for use by children should not be advertised directly to children." The Secret Sparkle Body Spray carried the warning "Keep Out of Reach of Children." After pulling the advertising, Procter & Gamble said that it believed the program had adhered to CARU's guidelines and noted that the company had not received any reports of misuse of the product by children.

BE YOUR OWN ROCK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When Elizabeth Krupnick arrived at Prudential Insurance Company of America in June 1994 to take over as chief communications officer, she inherited advertising that she called "mediocre at best." She also inherited one of the most identifiable icons in advertising: the rock. Her mission, as she conceived it, was to modernize Prudential's advertising without abandoning the equity it had invested in the rock. "Only an idiot would give up one of the world's most powerful icons," she said. She intended to distinguish Prudential from typical insurance advertising, which she thought tended to be "staid, corny, and jingoistic."

In 1995 Prudential chose an ad agency whose reputation was the antithesis of typical insurance advertising. Fallon McElligott of Minneapolis had established a name for itself on the success of its calculated risk taking. Insurance companies generally wanted to reduce risk to a minimum, but Krupnick wanted to push the envelope with advertising that was riveting and attention getting. With its renowned creativity, Fallon McElligott was perhaps the most appropriate choice to fulfill this goal. Bill Westbrook, Fallon's creative director and president, fulfilled Krupnick's mission of updating Prudential's image without losing its heritage by transforming the tired tag line, "Get a piece of the rock," into "Live well; make a plan; be your own rock." Krupnick called the transformation a piece of genius.

In another bold move, Westbrook and his associates sought out real Prudential clients who illustrated the new tag line instead of using actors in the commercials. After a lengthy nationwide search, they ended up with a handful of mavericks over 50 years old who had lived according to the principles of the new campaign. The finished spots, which began running during the 1996 Super Bowl, were six commercials featuring, among others, a former prima ballerina with the Israeli Ballet, a retired jazz musician from Connecticut, a former senator from South Carolina, and a holistic doctor from Colorado who mused in the commercial, "Somehow, on some deeper level, we're responsible for what happens to us."

The campaign, however, suffered a premature demise when Prudential hired Roger Lawson as executive vice president of marketing. As a result of Lawson's decision to create an in-house agency to handle advertising, Krupnick resigned her post, and Fallon resigned its account. Both Krupnick and Fallon regretted the lost opportunity to witness the "Be Your Own Rock" campaign run its course, but observers respected their decisions to maintain their professional integrity and creative independence.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Prudential had devised its traditional tag line "Get a piece of the rock" to be an assurance of stability and security for its customers. Prudential's vice president of corporate advertising Mary Lou Sack explained the history behind the tag line switch: "Our stance was always: lean on us, rely on us. We're still there for people, but people are really wanting to take more control for themselves of their finances, their life choices, of everything." In the 1990s a pervasive distrust of large institutions developed, especially the insurance industry. In the mid-1990s the insurance industry was the target of major lawsuits by several companies charging market misconduct, which affected not only their bottom lines but their entire corporate culture, including their advertising.

At Prudential the scandal had its origins in three distinct arenas. At the center was the Direct Investment Group of Prudential Bache Securities, which had been selling billions of dollars worth of dubious investments. More peripheral was a churning scandal, whereby Prudential agents convinced policyholders to refinance smaller policies into larger policies for higher dividends without informing them of the inherent glass ceiling. Finally, whistle blowers within Prudential filed suits charging that they were disciplined and even fired when they tried to point out Prudential's wrongdoings—such as churning—to their supervisors. In October 1994 Prudential Securities avoided criminal indictment by admitting fraud. Lawyers representing approximately 10.7 million policyholders claimed more than $1 billion in damages and in the end negotiated an open-ended settlement wherein Prudential agreed to pay the policyholders more than $410 million. The three largest life and health insurers—Prudential, Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and New York Life Insurance Company, or the "Big Three," as they were called—paid a combined $575 million in settlements. Lost business due to flagging consumer confidence cost these companies even more money than the price of the settlements; they fell short of their projected sales of $198.57 billion by approximately $72.46 billion in 1995.

Prior to this scandal, insurance companies could safely assume that people would seek their services as a matter of course, and thus they could afford mediocre advertising. Traditionally, in fact, insurance advertising used two strategies that relied on negation instead of affirmation: it either patronized consumers or made them feel guilty. After the scandal, insurers scrambled to recover from the impact of the suits, both internally by restructuring their businesses and externally by redefining public perception through more aggressive and memorable marketing. At Prudential Krupnick decided to redirect consumers' distrust by focusing on how the company could help them achieve their own financial goals.

TARGET MARKET

Prudential's spot entitled "The Grandfather" depicted the 78-year-old former South Carolina senator looking out of place on the beach in a business suit while his grandchildren buried him in sand up to his neck. The joyousness of the kids' actions contrasted with the somberness of the mock act of burial. The soundtrack heightened this sense of contrast, as the senator's serious contemplations on his financial philosophy were accompanied by a lighthearted reggae beat, trumpeter Baba Brooks' 1965 recording of "Teenage Ska." These contrasts helped bridge the gap between the message—securing a retirement, which one associates with old age, and the target market, thirty- to fifty-year olds still young enough to plan for their future. Fallon McElligott's senior producer Bruce Wellington defined the challenge of the "Be Your Own Rock" campaign: to get "thirtysomethings to think that planning for their future can be cool." Fallon capitalized on the mood of ska music—a precursor to reggae with a much faster beat—by saddling its hip, upbeat sounds onto what otherwise would have been a very morbid theme. This music would have fallen on deaf ears if it had been targeted at an older audience, but most 30- and 40-somethings appreciated the ska style, even if they didn't recognize the song itself.

Krupnick explained the efficacy of this strategy of portraying happily fulfilled and successful older people as a means of appealing to those younger in life. "The surprising thing was that these ads tested exceptionally well among young people, better than they did among old people. They looked at these older people as rocks, as role models. They are people who have survived into retirement and are living fun, joyful lives." With life expectancy rising, insurance consumers in their middle years worried less about dying too soon and more about outliving their own assets and Social Security. Scare tactics thus seemed less effective to Westbrook than a more positive approach to financial planning. "Let's make it a joyful campaign," Westbrook suggested.

While fear of death spoke primarily to those actively contemplating their advancing years, the idea of enjoying life spoke to a much broader audience. Krupnick defined Prudential's target market much more broadly than Wellington's "thirtysomethings." Since Prudential maintained over 50 million clients—which amounted to one in five Americans—Krupnick half joked that Prudential targeted "anyone with a pulse." This comment seemed less of a jest taking into account that the commercials were not life insurance ads but rather brand advertising meant to raise the visibility of Prudential as a whole, with all of its services that covered financial concerns "from the cradle to the grave."

COMPETITION

The other two members of the so-called Big Three—Met Life and New York Life-were Prudential's main competition.

DIRTY SCOTCH

Fallon McElligott's president and creative director Bill Westbrook personally interviewed the people who were profiled in the six "Be Your Own Rock" commercials. Since the interviews involved a lot of reflection and retrospection, emotions ran high and stories frequently ended in tears. Having developed a deep level of intimacy with his subjects, Westbrook cried along with them as they recounted moments with pride or regret. One man described his main vice—"dirty scotch," a combination of milk and scotch whiskey. When this conversation got too emotional, the man suggested that he and Westbrook take time out for a dirty scotch.

Between 1987 and 1990 all three posted significant increases in sales: New York Life peaked in 1987 with a 59.9 percent increase in sales, while both Met Life and Prudential peaked in 1989 with sales increases of 60.92 percent and 41.84 percent, respectively. The market misconduct scandal, which first surfaced in August 1993 when a group of Florida nurses charged that Met Life agents sold them life insurance in the guise of retirement plans, hit all of the Big Three in 1994. That year Met Life's sales plummeted 38.33 percent compared with the previous year, while New York Life's sales fell 31.49 percent and Prudential's dropped 11.56 percent. These decreases continued in 1995 for Met Life and Prudential (which fell another 22.58 percent); New York Life, which did not admit any wrongdoing as Prudential and Met Life did, recouped its lost ground with a 36.82 percent gain in 1995.

Insurance companies reacted to the scandal by setting up new departments devoted to complying with stricter regulations. At the same time, their marketing strategies reflected a transformed approach in response to a transformed marketplace. Advertising campaigns exited the realm of the abstract and firmly grounded themselves in the pragmatic. Met Life's new tag line promised to help in "making sense of it all," while John Hancock Life Insurance Company grounded its approach in "real life" with "real answers." While the scandal created hardship for both the insurers and the insured, one positive outcome was the reevaluation and revitalization of an industry where changes were long overdue, especially in terms of marketing.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Krupnick decided to take a considered approach to revising Prudential's faltering image after the scandal. Internally she implemented a sweeping campaign to simplify the language and look of the company, from reducing the use of jargon to clarifying the names and functions of subsidiary arms of the company to consistent use of an updated rock logo on company literature. This simplification and updating carried over into the advertising. Before brainstorming for new marketing ideas, Prudential and Fallon McElligott conducted extensive market research to assess both the damage done by the scandal and the attitude toward insurance companies. Surprisingly the research suggested that the scandal had done far less damage to Prudential's name than suspected; however, the scandal did solidify consumer's attitudes, which had been shifting away from reliance on external support such as insurance policies and toward self-reliance. Consumers no longer wanted to lean on institutions that they felt they could not fully trust, but they did realize that they could not be fully self-sufficient—they would still require the services of institutions such as the insurance industry, but on their own terms, not the industry's.

Westbrook captured the spirit of the self-reliance trend with the transformation of the tag line into "Be your own rock." This move alone could not reestablish consumer trust; all aspects of the campaign would have to reflect a commitment to integrity. Hence, the decision to cast actual customers instead of actors. "Insurance agencies in the past have used actors and passed them off as real people, but you know they're actors," Bill Westbrook explained. "And historically when using real people, concepts in this category have been intimidating and scary." Westbrook tried a different approach, taking a chance on finding older people who illustrated his tag line. Several casting directors interviewed over 200 candidates nationwide, narrowing the field down to 12 before making the final decision on the six youthful older people to be profiled in the commercials.

Fallon enlisted the services of director Jeffery Plansker of bicoastal/international Propaganda Films, who supported the use of nonactors to stress Prudential's integrity. Using nonactors represented more risk, but that risk paid off. Westbrook explained, "We wanted a chance for magic and were willing to take the risk in order to create some chill bumps, and something we'd never seen before." Plansker echoed Westbrook, adding that their strategy allowed for "unexpected surprises." This unpredictability enhanced the sense of candor in the spots, which supported Prudential's goal of creating trust through truth telling.

OUTCOME

The "Be your own rock" campaign did not live long enough to produce quantifiable results. Krupnick was prepared to follow multiple indicators to track the success or failure of the ads, but she didn't have the opportunity to gather sufficient data. In the absence of quantitative research results, Krupnick reported "fabulous" qualitative and anecdotal evidence; Prudential executives and agents alike reportedly loved the campaign. In 1997 two spots from the campaign were chosen as television finalists by the One Show. A group of advertising and marketing executives chosen by Newsday to evaluate ads broadcast during the 1996 Super Bowl were divided over the Prudential spots—some found them "refreshing," while others found them "confusing." When asked what work he was most proud of, Fallon McElligott cofounder Pat Fallon replied, "The work we did for Prudential. When you think of how difficult that was to sell through the process and how strategically brilliant it was and how well it was executed, that's awesome." Walking away from the Prudential account in 1996 was a devastating experience for Fallon, but the assertion of creative integrity may have compensated for the loss in revenues in the long run. Largely on the strength of the "Be your own rock" campaign, Fallon McElligott was named agency of the year in 1996 by Adweek and Shoot, two of the major advertising trade magazines.

BE MORE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS), the nonprofit U.S. media organization, was owned by 349 member television stations with an audience of more than 100 million viewers per week. Despite the efforts of CEO Pat Mitchell to "reinvent" PBS with newer, updated shows, including segments directed by Martin Scorsese, Clint Eastwood, and Robert Redford, the broadcaster was reeling from a 23 percent drop in ratings over the previous 10 years. To continue branding PBS as a resource that educated, inspired, and empowered its viewers, the organization released its "Be More" campaign in 2002.

PBS awarded its $15 million advertising budget to longtime partner Fallon Minneapolis, a division of Fallon Worldwide. On July 22 Fallon launched the first four television spots of the "Be More" campaign. Two of the spots were directed by Alfonso Cuarón, the director of such films as Y tu mamá también and Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban. The other two spots were directed by François Girard, director of the film The Red Violin. Cuarón's "Fish" spot, which won the greatest number of awards for the campaign, featured a computer-generated image (CGI) of a goldfish watching salmon swim on television. Inspired by the salmon, the goldfish leaped from its bowl and then flopped, jumped, and free-fell its way into a river. The spot ended with the goldfish migrating upstream with the salmon. The spot's tagline was "Be More Empowered." Other variations on "Be More" continued into 2005, with all of the spots airing exclusively on PBS.

Despite garnering an Emmy Award as the best commercial, a Bronze Clio, and two AICP Show honors, the "Be More" campaign was not accompanied by increasing PBS income, which came from underwriting, member fees, grants, product sales, royalties, and license fees. Between 2002 and 2003 total income slipped $35 million. Further, the audience base for PBS continued to migrate to higher-end programs on cable networks like the Discovery Channel and the History Channel. Although the broadcaster was losing viewers, its website (www.pbs.org) remained the most popular dot-org website in existence, with an average of 12 million visitors a month. In addition, PBS's TeacherSource website (www.pbs.org/teachersource/) was used by 250,000 teachers every month.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

PBS was created in 1969 as a government-subsidized organization to provide cultural and educational programming for the public. Because PBS was intended to be noncommercial, the U.S. Federal Communications Commission (FCC) prohibited the use of commercials. What was called "underwriting" became the only advertising allowed on PBS. Underwriters were allowed to mention their corporations or brand names between programs but were not allowed to promote products or services. In the 1980s, because of dwindling funds for PBS, the FCC allowed some underwriters to purchase what were called "enhanced underwriting acknowledgments," which to critics appeared to be the same as advertisements on commercial networks. The acknowledgments were restricted by the FCC, however, and underwriters did not have the greater freedom offered to sponsors by the commercial networks.

In 2000 PBS hired Fallon to launch a $25 million ad campaign titled "Stay Curious" that attempted to reshape the perception that the broadcaster catered to an "elite" audience. The campaign won several honors, including an Andy and an Emmy Award. Besides the campaign there was another significant development in 2000. Pat Mitchell, who had worked as a cable executive, was hired as the CEO of PBS. The organization was already floundering when she took on the job, however. As A.J. Frutkin expressed it in Media Week, "Viewers often equate PBS programming with spinach. It may be good for them, but they don't want to eat it."

Mitchell approached her job at PBS with the mantra "keep the best, reinvent the rest." Major changes included an updated version of The Forsyte Saga, the BBC series based on the novels of John Galsworthy, and Ken Burns's documentary series on the Civil War. In 2003 she engaged Martin Scorsese to produce The Blues and Robert Redford to produce Skinwalkers, the latter a series based on Tony Hillerman's mystery novels. In one of her most controversial moves, she replaced Louis Rukeyser, who for 32 years had been the popular host of Wall Street Week. Among other daring moves were including a lesbian couple in an episode of a children's television show and creating the Latino drama American Family.

Despite Mitchell's innovations in programming, financial problems continued to haunt PBS. The perpetual catch-22 was that to attract the talent PBS wanted the broadcaster needed corporate sponsorship, but corporate sponsors expected 30- to 60-second commercial spots. Lack of funds hindered PBS from selecting from the talent pool it wanted. John Wilson, senior PBS vice president, told Media Week, "When we say yes to something, we say, 'Yes, and here's a third of your money. So now let's spend the next 18 months looking for the other two-thirds.' "

TARGET MARKET

The target market for PBS included the 18- to 49-year-old viewer who craved literate, informative, high-quality programming. Preferring to target a psychographic, a group with specific attitudes and values, rather than a strict age demographic, PBS was successful during its first decades in capturing an audience. The aim of the "Be More" campaign was to retain the PBS audience, especially between programming segments. Because PBS did not air commercials, the credits and station breaks between programs ran from two and a half to three minutes. This was the time, research showed, that PBS viewers changed over to networks like TLC, Animal Planet, and the Travel Channel. Frutkin wrote in Media Week, "Whereas PBS's often heady subject matter can intimidate the average viewer, cable programs like the Discovery Channel's Walking with Dinosaurs have made dry topics viewer-friendly. Call it PBS Lite."

Some advertisers saw the value of underwriting PBS's "upscale" programming. In addition, compared to commercial broadcasters, there was less clutter on the PBS airwaves. "The maximum number of messages you'll compete with is two," Guy McCarter, senior vice president and director of entertainment marketing at OMD USA, told Media Week.

"We are not ratings-driven. That's not the mandate of PBS. But we do want to expose our programming to the widest possible audience," Jacoba Atlas, a senior vice president, told the Washington Times. One market segment that remained loyal to PBS, especially with the onslaught of satellite television, was made up of those viewers who relished local shows. Other than local news, the commercial networks tended not to air community programming except for the "occasional once-a-week, low-budget, no-resources program in an undesirable time period," wrote Bob Sirott of the Chicago Sun-Times. PBS often satisfied this need. Nonetheless, although PBS claimed more than 100 million viewers per week in 2002, the audience had dropped to 90 million by 2005.

FRANK ZAPPA

"Puppets," the spot Scott Hicks directed for the Public Broadcasting Service in 2003, was filmed in Melbourne, Australia, over a period of two days. The spot featured two marionettes, one a hero and the other a villain, fencing inside a puppet tent until the hero liberated himself by cutting off his strings. Australian puppeteers, not actors, were featured in the spot. Fallon's art director, Gerard Caputo, told Shoot that the villain marionette was whimsically named Frank: "We called him Frank because he looked like Frank Zappa."

HIV-POSITIVE MUPPET

The decision of the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) to create a HIV-positive Muppet character for the South African version of Sesame Street incited a U.S. congressman, Billy Tauzin of Louisiana, to warn PBS not to re-create the character for American programming. Mitchell complied, saying that Sesame Street and PBS did not plan to release the character in the United States. Executives at PBS and Sesame Street felt, however, that the Muppet was an appropriate character for South Africa, where, in 2003, 21.5 percent of the population was living with AIDS.

COMPETITION

''In many ways, PBS is competing for the same dollars that a cable network like A&E wants. But it can't deliver what A&E can,'' Laura Caraccioli, vice president/director of Starcom Entertainment, told Media Week. Arts and Entertainment Television Networks (A&E), which was established in 1984, claimed 85 million subscribers by 2003. In 1995 A&E launched the History Channel with a million subscribers, a number that steadily rose to 85 million by 2003. Quality programming, such as the flagship Biography and Law and Order series, even though the latter was subsequently acquired by Turner Network Television (TNT), greatly attributed to A&E's success. A&E also forged shrewd advertising partnerships, especially with Barnes & Noble, which featured A&E's Biography videos in its stores in exchange for on-air promotions. In comparison with PBS, which relied on a composite of ratings, reviews, and Internet responses, which were dubbed its ''point of impact,'' A&E could dazzle advertisers with its ability to quote hard data on the numbers of people who viewed particular ads. In 2002 A&E posted $550 million in sales.

In the mid-1980s John Hendricks, the founder and CEO of Discovery Communications, Inc. (DCI), was struggling against bankruptcy, with only $5,000 in cash and with $1 million owed to the BBC. By 2003, however, he had turned DCI around with the Discovery Channel and claimed subscriptions in more than 85 million households. In that same year DCI also operated 170 retail stores. DCI launched its successful Discover.com website in 2000 to sell games and science and nature videos. Subsequent channels launched by DCI included the Travel Channel, TLC, and Animal Planet, all of which helped the company earn a whopping $1.7 billion in sales by 2003. DCI's market had swelled to 1.2 million subscribers worldwide by 2005, overshadowing both A&E and PBS, and it had $605 million in revenue.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cuarón filmed the first 60-second PBS spots, ''Fish'' and ''Naked Emperor,'' in Prague over a period of 10 days. ''The shoot itself was radically under-funded and considerably ambitious, given the number of scenes we had to do, and [the fact that we had] to make them work exactly in time,'' Mark Sitley, the producer, told Shoot. ''Fish,'' the campaign's most ambitious spot and an award winner, featured a CGI goldfish that, after being inspired by a program on salmons, escaped from its fishbowl. ''Naked Emperor,'' playing on Hans Christian Andersen's ''The Emperor's New Clothes,'' featured an eastern European-type dictator marching through his bleak, repressed empire. Except for black boots and socks, and momentarily a hard hat, the emperor was stark naked. After passing legions of saluting soldiers and admiring adults, the emperor reached a hallway full of children. ''Hey, you're naked,'' one of the boys blurted out to laughter and the emperor's embarrassment. The tagline ''Be More Honest'' then appeared.

Because of his Harry Potter commitment, Cuarón declined to work on project when Fallon initially approached him. After reading some of the scripts, however, Cuarón reconsidered the offer. ''It was not about selling or convincing anybody to buy anything,'' he told Shoot. ''It was about two beautiful concepts done in an amazing storytelling kind of way. The moment I received them I said, 'I have to do these.' ''

After Fallon had approached Girard to direct ''Birds'' and ''Orchestra,'' the agency met with him in Montreal for 10 days to discuss the project. ''As soon as I looked at the boards, I knew I wanted to do them,'' Girard told Shoot. He filmed both spots in Santa Monica, California. ''Birds'' featured the well-known Canadian composer Walter Boudreau struggling at the piano with ''writer's block'' until he looked out a window, where he found inspiration in five telephone wires populated by birds, a scene resembling sheet music. The spot ended with the tagline ''Be More Inspired.'' ''Orchestra'' featured a sextet interpreting a work by Johannes Brahms, with one cellist performing with Jimi Hendrix-style bravado. It closed with the tagline ''Be More Passionate.'' Girard commented to Shoot, ''The spots were perfect for a director. They're such smart ideas. Plus it's a noble cause; everyone wants to support PBS because of the brilliance of its programming.''

In 2003 Girard filmed two more spots for the ''Be More'' campaign, ''Aura'' and ''Hot Potato.'' Two later spots, "Skunk" and "Puppets," were directed by the Oscar-nominated Scott Hicks, the director of the films Shine and Snow Falling on Cedars. Fallon staff members met with Hicks in Australia, where he preferred to work, and filmed the two spots with the Academy Award-winning cinematographer Dion Beebe.

Particular attention was given to the word that would follow "Be More" in each spot. Mike Gibbs, the Fallon art director, told Adweek, "Picking the right words was a considerable struggle. We were trying to find things that fit the best, that feel like they come from PBS."

OUTCOME

By the third year of the "Be More" campaign, it seemed clear that the efforts of PBS to hold on to its viewers were not working. Although more than 100 million people watched PBS weekly in 2002, the number had dropped to 90 million by 2004. CEO Mitchell tried making program changes to coincide with the launch of the "Be More" campaign, for example, introducing reality shows like The 1900 House and Frontier House, but audience numbers continued to decline. In addition, PBS continued to suffer financially. Between 2002 and 2003, for example, the broadcaster's income dropped from $533 million to $498 million.

Some analysts pointed fingers at the confusing sales process at PBS, whereby the broadcaster's top producers, such as WNET in New York and WGBH in Boston, approached sponsors who were then later also solicited by local stations and producers. Other analysts attributed the decline of PBS to the restrictions on corporate commercials. The resulting lack of funding caused talent that PBS would have had to drift during the 1980s to toward wealthy cable networks like DCI and A&E. Despite the continued drift of PBS, Mitchell remained steadfast on the matter of maintaining the broadcaster's policy on sponsorship. She told Media Week, "If we stay the course as the only one not pandering to the lowest common denominator, it's going to pay off."

The "Be More" campaign did strike gold within the ad industry, however. It won a number of awards, including a Bronze Clio, two AICP Show honors (including one in the category of visual effects), and an Emmy for best commercial, the second Emmy for the Fallon-PBS collaboration.

BABY BOB CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the end of 2004, Quiznos, a chain of sub sandwich shops run by parent company Quiznos Master LLC, had grown to more than 2,500 restaurants and had hit the $1 billion sales mark. In addition, Quiznos had established a brand identity through a four-year run of over-the-top advertising campaigns, featuring everything from the company's cofounder making sandwiches in his underwear to guitar-strumming, singing rodents. But the company wanted to move in a new direction by distancing itself from the fast-food label of other sub sandwich shops and joining the ranks of the rapidly expanding niche of fast-casual restaurants, which were associated with higher-quality food. Quiznos also hoped to increase consumer awareness of its products—fresh, made-to-order sandwiches on toasted breads—by introducing a new tagline, "Mmmm . . . Toasty."

In 2005 Quiznos launched a new marketing campaign created by Los Angeles-based ad agency Siltanen & Partners that featured the talking infant "Baby Bob" (former star of a 2002 sitcom of the same name) as spokesman. The eight-month-old genius spoke in an adult voice, lip-synching via computer animation. Estimated, according to Adweek, to be worth as much as $60 million, the campaign kicked off with a spot in which Baby Bob told viewers that he would love to eat a Quiznos sandwich but that he had no teeth. While his mother enjoyed the sub, Bob was fed strained peas. "I love the gal, but that's just wrong," Baby Bob said. The campaign was expanded to include the Internet and radio along with additional television spots.

"Baby Bob" was a hit with most consumers, with the ads rating in the top 10 for recall and likeability four out of the five months following its launch, according to Advertising Age. Further, by using a spokesman described as a 40-year-old man trapped in a baby's body, the ads maintained the edginess that Quiznos had created with its earlier campaigns, albeit toned down to appeal to an older, more sophisticated audience. By the third week into the "Baby Bob" campaign, Quiznos had reported a 9 percent increase in same-store sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1981 Quiznos was a single restaurant serving sub sandwiches in Denver, Colorado. By 2000 the chain had grown to 1,000 restaurants and was secure in the number three spot behind Subway (number one) and Blimpie International, Inc. Hoping to attract consumers looking for more than a traditional cold sandwich, Quiznos began making efforts to distinguish itself in the submarine sandwich shop arena and to convince consumers it was no ordinary fast-food restaurant. Instead, Quiznos planned to position its restaurants in the growing field of fast-casual foods, alongside chains such as Boston Market and Noodles & Co. John Hamburger, president of Franchise Times Corp. (publisher of news for the franchising industry), told the Denver Post, "Fast-casual has been winning customers because of food quality, not price. If Quiznos is going down that route, they're going to distinguish themselves from the Subways, Blimpies and about 50 other sub chains out there."

To create name recognition for its expanding chain, beginning in 2000 Quiznos launched a series of sometimes controversial or bizarre marketing campaigns depicting quirky characters in unconventional situations. One spot featured a man grabbing a sandwich from his dog, which had pulled it off the kitchen counter. The man was then shown on the floor eating the sandwich. In another spot a man and a woman were walking down the street when the woman spotted an empty Quiznos sandwich wrapper in the trash. She pulled the wrapper out of the garbage, then licked the wrapper clean. Those spots were followed three years later by commercials featuring Quiznos cofounder Jimmy Lambatos, nicknamed "Chef Jimmy," who was so obsessed with making the perfect sandwich that he forgot to put on his pants. In another TV spot a woman was shown comparing sub sandwiches in a competitor's test kitchen. When she chose a toasted Quiznos sub rather than the untoasted sandwich the tester was pushing, she was stuck in the neck with a dart by the tester. Another featured a businessman eating an untoasted sub; he was asked if he "was raised by wolves," the implication being that to eat such a sandwich was uncivilized. He was then shown in a flashback nursing from a female wolf. In 2004 came the "Spongemonkeys," strange, rodent-like, guitar-playing creatures screeching the praises of Quiznos subs.

The ad campaigns worked. While not all comments were positive, awareness of the brand had been created; people were talking about Quiznos. It was time to shift focus from branding to the product itself. The company began airing food-focused television spots and introduced the theme "Mmmm . . . Toasty." In 2005 the company started using a new spokesman, Baby Bob, described by the company as "a 40-year-old man trapped in a baby's body" who would love to eat the subs but lacked the molars. Baby Bob had been created in 1997 by Siltanen & Partners as spokesperson for a series of commercials directing consumers to a website, freeinternet.com (which later went off-line). In 2002 the child prodigy appeared in a short-lived television show, "Baby Bob," that aired on CBS.

OFFBEAT ADS CREATE BUZZ FOR QUIZNOS

Quiznos was known for its quirky, sometimes over-the-top advertising, from "Chef Jimmy," who was so excited about his Quiznos sub that he failed to notice that his pet parakeet had died, to a woman getting stuck in the neck with a dart when she chose a toasted Quiznos sub over a cold sandwich offered by the competition. The ads drew plenty of attention, not all of it good. "Chef Jimmy" raised the ire of animal lovers, including one who complained in a letter to the chain's ad agency, "Do you realize that the sight of a dead bird can be very traumatic to bird lovers?"

Despite the buzz created by the offbeat ads, none of the chain's marketing efforts attracted attention equal to its television spots featuring the computer-generated "Spongemonkeys." Response to the tone-deaf, rodent-like creatures was phenomenal; Quiznos received 30,000 E-mails, phone calls, and messages during the month following the launch of the campaign, most of them complaints about the use of rat-like creatures to sell food. After a seven-month run, the company canceled the "Spongemonkeys" and shifted its focus to its products.

TARGET MARKET

Early marketing campaigns for Quiznos were aimed at men between the ages of 18 and 24—typical fast-food customers—and were designed to make the brand seem cool to that audience. While still slightly offbeat, the "Baby Bob" campaign focused on the quality of the chain's product to attract older, more sophisticated consumers as well as families.

To further connect with families, Quiznos introduced a special Mother's Day promotion through its website that enabled people to E-mail personalized greetings from Baby Bob to their moms. Trey Hall, chief marketing officer for Quiznos, said to Business Wire, "Due to the popularity of the Quiznos ads that feature Baby Bob, we developed a fun, easy way for people—young and old—to send Mom a special, personalized message from her favorite 'spokesbaby.'"

COMPETITION

In 2005 Subway sandwich shops boasted 18,000 locations, significantly more than the 3,000 restaurants owned by Quiznos. Subway was, however, feeling the pressure of competition from Quiznos. Technomics, a restaurant consulting firm based in Chicago, noted that in 2004 Subway's sales grew 10 percent, while those of Quiznos grew 37 percent. In what Thuy-Doan Le, writing for the Sacramento Bee, described as the "battle of the buns," Subway responded to upstart Quiznos's push for market share by introducing its own line of toasted subs. Le wrote, "While burgers and fries have long been the staple of America's carryout lunch, their dominance is waning. And scrambling to lure those bored or bothered by burgers are sandwich chains." A Subway spokesman told Le that it considered its key competitors to be large chains such as McDonald's and Burger King. Subway stated further that it did not consider itself to be in direct competition with Quiznos, but rather that when a Quiznos opened a shop near a Subway, it was in fact an advantage because it helped direct consumers' attention away from typical fast-food fare. "If someone starts thinking sandwiches, instead of burgers and fries, they eventually could be our customer," the spokesman explained.

While Subway and Quiznos battled the submarine wars, Blimpie International, Inc., founded in 1964, recognized that trouble had arrived when Quiznos overtook Blimpie to claim the number two spot in the sub sandwich market. In 2005 Blimpie announced plans to reinvigorate its brand with redesigned restaurants, an updated logo, and new menu offerings such as panini-grilled sandwiches. The chain also unveiled a new slogan, "It's not just a sandwich—it's a BLIMPIE." According to PR Newswire, Mark Mears, the company's chief marketing officer, said, "We have always been an innovator in menu concepts . . . Now our brand reflects this forward thinking positioning, transforming Blimpie from its heritage as a traditional neighborhood sub shop to a more consumer-driven, contemporary deli."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Quiznos was aggressively gaining ground in the submarine sandwich wars. With its warm, crispy rolls and television and radio spots that proclaimed, "Mmmm . . . Toasty," consumers were increasingly aware of the chain and what it had to offer. The aggression carried over into Quiznos marketing with advertising that included offbeat humor to capture the attention of consumers. According to Quiznos, the "Baby Bob" campaign was created to stand out from other advertising on television. But the company had shifted from push-the-envelope marketing, such as its short-lived and sometimes controversial "Spongemonkeys" campaign, which was designed to create name recognition, to entertaining but less edgy product-focused advertising. Company executives explained that the goal in the new marketing was to make consumers be more aware of the food it offered than of the spokescreatures promoting the product. Having a cuddly, eight-month-old baby genius talking about Quiznos sandwiches, his mouth moving in time with the words by way of computer animation, achieved the company's goals of maintaining quirky humor in its ads while focusing on the food.

Television spots, which debuted during the hit shows Desperate Housewives and 24, had Baby Bob in a variety of situations involving a tasty Quiznos sub that was just out of his reach; but given his lack of molars he could not have eaten the sandwich anyway. In one spot to promote the chain's line of Real Deal sandwiches (which offered prices comparable to other chains' value menus), Baby Bob was perched on a director's chair talking to the camera about how much he would love to eat a Quiznos sandwich but that he had no teeth. "But, when my molars grow in, I'm all over the stuff," he announced in the deep voice of a 40-year-old man. In another spot, which promoted the Chicken Milano Chicken Sub, the precocious infant was in Italy being driven around in a motorcycle sidecar by a gorgeous model. Of the sandwich, he stated, "It's not quite like riding around Milan with an Italian supermodel, but it's close." For another spot Bob took a seat on a park bench to talk about the great Angus steak subs his dad was always bringing home from Quiznos. He concluded, "One day when the old man's not looking, Sayonara." All the ads end with the tagline, "Mmmm . . . Toasty."

OUTCOME

In a press release the company described "Baby Bob" as "a genius . . . his brains and infinite knowledge are both a blessing and a curse." The clever child who started talking at three months old turned out to be a blessing for Quiznos's marketing. While many of the chain's earlier campaigns resulted in negative feedback, following its launch "Baby Bob" consistently ranked among the top 10 commercials for likeability and consumer recall in four of its first five months, and it ranked first in January, according to Advertising Age. In addition, Quiznos reported a 9 percent increase in same-store sales within three weeks of the first "Baby Bob" television spots. The company also reported that the number of visits to the Quiznos website reached record numbers, and E-mails from fans who loved the "Baby Bob" commercials poured into company headquarters. The campaign was so successful that it continued into 2005 with a new batch of television spots.

TERRY TATE, OFFICE LINEBACKER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003 Reebok International Ltd. was the second-largest maker of athletic shoes and fitness apparel in the United States. With profits approaching $1.5 billion, the Canton, Massachusetts–based company enjoyed a small lead over competitors New Balance, adidas, and Puma, although it was well behind market leader Nike, Inc. Several years of steady growth had, however, put Reebok in a good position to launch its most successful television campaign ever, the award-winning "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker."

Developed in conjunction with Reebok's ad agency, the Arnell Group, the first "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" commercial premiered in February 2003, as a 60-second, $4 million spot aired during Super Bowl XXXVII. It introduced fictional retired National Football League (NFL) linebacker Terrible Terry Tate (played by actor Lester Speight, also known as the Mighty Rasta), sporting shoulder pads and a Reebok football jersey, as an employee of Felcher & Sons, a typical bustling corporate office. Tate's job as "office linebacker" was to tackle and reprimand employees who violated company protocol, or at the very least threaten that his "pain train" was heading their way. Tate's action sequences were intercut with the staid Ron Felcher—the fictional company's CEO and appointed talking head—explaining how Terry had made a positive impact on the company's bottom line. The slapstick humor of a hulking football player diving on top of defenseless coworkers crosscut with Felcher's dry irony proved irresistible to fans, who rated "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" the most popular Super Bowl commercial of 2003. In the week following the commercial's premiere, it was downloaded from the Reebok website more than 1.2 million times.

The spots ran through 2003 and 2004, but by 2005 Reebok had announced Terry Tate's "retirement." The unusual campaign boosted awareness of the Reebok brand and earned the Arnell Group a Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 2003. In addition, in 2003 Adweek magazine named Reebok the Interactive Marketer of the Year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Beginning in 2000 Reebok awoke from a decade-long slump in sales and market share with the return of Paul Fireman as the company's CEO. Throughout the 1990s Nike had dominated the athletic-shoe market with its high-profile product launches and multimillion-dollar deals with the biggest names in sports. Reebok responded in 2002 with the launch of RBK, a line of hip-hop-inspired shoes and clothing. The line quickly gained prominence through Reebok's exclusive licensing deals with the NFL and the NBA, territory that had once been Nike's domain. Further good luck followed when Nike severed much of its business with Foot Locker, the world's largest athletic-footwear retailer, over a retailing dispute. Reebok quickly filled the void with its "Above the Rim" displays of RBK merchandise at Foot Locker stores throughout the country.

With these bold moves Reebok was determined to take a substantial portion of market share away from Nike. The launch of the "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign was the company's coup de grâce—a commercial as memorable as any of Nike's most celebrated campaigns from the 1980s and 1990s. Better still was the fact that "Terry Tate" did not limit its appeal to fans of a particular sport. Though "Terrible Terry" was an NFL player, the spots' humor transcended sports altogether through its deft send-up of both professional sports and the business world.

TERRY TATE, CALIFORNIA GOVERNOR?

"Save Our State—Vote Terry Tate" was the rallying cry in 2003, when Reebok sought extra publicity for its "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign by filing papers to declare Tate a candidate for governor of California during the state's recall election. Unfortunately, the actor who played Terry Tate, Lester Speight (also known as the Mighty Rasta), did not qualify to run for office, which put an end to a campaign that promised to "tackle white-collar crime" and "end partisan gridlock by knocking some fiscal sense" into government officials.

TARGET MARKET

Reebok's decision to premiere the "Terry Tate" spot during the Super Bowl was telling. With a 60-second spot costing $4 million, it was the most expensive air time of the year. In return for their investment, advertisers were guaranteed a huge audience and post-game buzz in many major media outlets. Not only would they attract sports fans—obviously Reebok's choice customers—but they would also attract a wider audience of those who tuned in to the game because others were watching it, or for the half-time entertainment, or simply for the commercials themselves.

After the initial launch Reebok became more selective in airing the spots. Millions in their target market—young, sports-minded people who liked to think of themselves as part of the cutting edge—had already found the longer Terry Tate films on Reebok's website and signed up for a mailing list, which enabled the company to engage in a form of direct Internet marketing virtually for free. In essence, the television spots became a promotion for the website, which offered long-format films, Terry Tate screen savers, and bobblehead dolls. "The Web allows for a more intimate and more seductive and longer-lasting relationship with our consumers," Peter Arnell of the Arnell Group told Ann Mack of Adweek, "So we use the Web to manage relationships, as well as portray the brand and product."

COMPETITION

In 2003 Nike held 39.1 percent of the athletic-shoe market, compared with Reebok at 12 percent, which was followed closely by New Balance at 11.6 percent and adidas at 9.6 percent. With Reebok's sales rising 70 percent over the previous year, however, the company seemed poised to close the gap with Nike. Yet Fireman acknowledged that the increase had less to do with the "Terry Tate" campaign and more to do with Reebok's introduction of signature shoes endorsed by rappers Jay-Z and 50 Cent and NBA star Allen Iverson. Fireman stated that his goal was to increase the company's market share from 12 percent to 20 percent within a few years. "I view this as a renaissance, a complete regrouping, a complete rebirth," he told Tracie Rozhon of the New York Times about the business turnaround fueled by the "Terry Tate" spots.

Yet Reebok was aware that "Terry Tate" alone could not close the gap with Nike. The company needed other elements, such as a logo as indelible as Nike's "swoosh" and a tagline as unforgettable as "Just Do It." To that end Reebok had recently launched other campaigns to highlight its vector logo and to promote the tagline "Wear the Vector, Outperform." "Reebok is still looking for a logo that rivals that of Nike," wrote Rozhon. "We need our own swoosh," Fireman told her. "We need a recognizable symbol, something that gives the kid at the gym an emotional attachment."

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Terry Tate" began as a short film written and directed by independent filmmaker Rawson Thurber in 2000. Later it was picked up by the film company Hypnotic, which showed it to Peter Arnell, head of the Arnell Group, Reebok's advertising agency, who thought it would make a great commercial. Reebok executives agreed and gave Thurber additional millions to produce more short films.

Four long-format "Terry Tate" films were produced for Reebok's website: "Terry's World," "Terry Tate,

THE ''PAIN TRAIN'' RUMBLES THROUGH THE BOSTON MARATHON

Reebok took its ''Terry Tate, Office Linebacker'' campaign to the Boston Marathon in April 2003, when 500 college students were hired to wear temporary tattoos on their foreheads that read ''Reebok . . . the pain train is coming.'' Many of the students, who were placed at strategic points throughout the route, also wore red Reebok jerseys with Tate's number, 56, on them. The actor who played Terry Tate, Lester Speight (also known as the Mighty Rasta), appeared at the event. The official sponsor of the marathon was Reebok's rival, adidas.

Sensitivity Training,'' ''Draft Day,'' and ''Office Athlete of the Century.'' Each four-minute film was also condensed into 30-second edits, which ran as television spots. In addition, two other short spots were filmed: ''Terry Tate, Vacation'' (a 30-second spot promoting the Scrimmage shoe) and ''Terry Tate, On the Field'' (the spoof of Nike's ''Streaker'' commercial). All incarnations featured the overzealous Tate, clad in his red jersey, tackling unsuspecting coworkers and dressing them down with his rhyming, shame-inducing couplets (''You kill the joe, you make some mo''''; ''You can't cut the cheese wherever you please''). No infraction was too small to escape his notice: long-distance phone calls on company time, playing solitaire on the computer, and walking away from a paper jam in the copier. All resulted in reprimands of a physical nature, culminating in his trademark battle cry, a victorious ''Whooooo.''

Throughout the spots, the boss, Ron Felcher, defended Tate to the harassed employees, declaring that profits were up 47 percent since Tate was hired. Felcher pointed out that Tate was a team player, and subsequent shots showed Tate wearing a party hat and presenting a birthday cake to a coworker, giving a multimedia boardroom presentation, and waving a friendly greeting to a coworker in the middle of pummeling another. Another sequence dramatized a knee injury Tate sustained from an accident with an office mail cart. Coworkers rooted for him as he underwent physical therapy and returned to work.

With the exception of the sole spot for the Scrimmage shoe, the ''Terry Tate, Office Linebacker'' campaign did not promote a specific product. Indeed, the Reebok name was not even noticeable in the spots. The most obvious connection was that Tate's red jersey sported the vector logo. ''The ultimate thing we are striving for is not brand recognition,'' Fireman told Jennifer Carofano of Footwear News, ''but how people perceive us. Our goal here is not only to reinvent the brand, but to counter a lot of the staleness in the industry.'' The tactic paid off in terms of increased Web traffic. ''It caused a huge pop culture tremor, and the Web is the best place to manage pop culture tremors,'' Arnell told Mack.

This ''pop culture tremor'' was extended by other inexpensive but highly effective guerilla marketing tactics that garnered Reebok additional—and invaluable—publicity. Hundreds of college students sporting Terry Tate temporary tattoos on their foreheads were hired to infiltrate the adidas-sponsored Boston Marathon, and in August 2003 Terry Tate filed papers to run for governor of California. Arnell told Stuart Elliott of the New York Times that these ''tactic[s] [are] known as borrowed interest, marketers seeking to gain attention by associating themselves with news events that consumers are following closely.'' In addition, Reebok sponsored a ''Take Terry to Work'' sweepstakes that offered entrants the chance to see Terrible Terry Tate in action on their home turf.

The campaign went head-to-head with rival Nike when Reebok officials commissioned Thurber to star in a spoof of Nike's January 2003 ''Streaker'' spot. The Nike commercial was itself a humorous vignette based on the British phenomenon of streaking at soccer matches. Filmed to look like real news footage, a naked man wearing Nike shoes eluded capture on a soccer field. In Reebok's ''Terry Tate'' streaker spot the same scenario was recreated, with the added twist of Tate appearing seemingly out of nowhere to tackle the streaker to the ground. Reebok officials lauded the commercial not only for its timeliness but also for its symbolic pummeling of Nike.

In July 2003 Tate was back on cable television promoting Reebok's Scrimmage shoe in a spot called ''Training Camp,'' which showed the office linebacker fending off office-worker dummies and dodging filing cabinets. By the end of the year downloads of the Terry Tate spots from Reebok's website had surpassed 20 million. For the 2004 Super Bowl, however, Reebok pulled out of the high-stakes television game and premiered a new short film on its website, which was promoted on MTV in 15-second spots and in E-mails to more than a million registered users of the website TerryTate.com.

OUTCOME

According to some, even though Reebok's sales increased 70 percent in the fourth quarter of 2003, those gains were attributable more to the company's rap- and sports-star endorsements than to Terry Tate's ''Pain Train.'' ''As a sales catalyst,'' wrote Rich Thomaselli in Advertising Age, ''Terry Tate seems to be as flat as the office workers he leaves in his wake.'' Others agreed. Stuart Elliot, writing in the New York Times, reported that ''some critics have said the ads ought to make a more direct link between Reebok and the character to make a better case for the performance credentials of Reebok sportswear and footwear.''

Nevertheless, the ''Terry Tate'' spot garnered the most buzz of all the Super Bowl commercials, which added a priceless word-of-mouth component to the campaign. In addition to becoming one of the cultural touchstones of 2003, ''Terry Tate, Office Linebacker'' was voted the third-most-liked commercial in the Advertising Age Top Spot poll, and the spots were downloaded more than 20 million times from Reebok's website. The spot won a Golden Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival and was voted ''Most Likable Ad of 2003'' by USA Today. Adweek named Reebok the Interactive Marketer of the Year for using the Internet ''to build upon—rather than merely maintain the momentum of—an offline campaign, and for its recognition that the Internet should play a significant part in an integrated campaign,'' according to Adweek writer Ann Mack.

RHEINGOLD BEER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Rheingold beer, originally produced by the Liebman Brewery of Brooklyn, New York, had enjoyed a several-decades' stint at the top of New York City's beer market in the middle of the twentieth century. It had also earned a place in the minds and hearts of multiple generations of New Yorkers, thanks to ubiquitous advertising slogans and jingles and to the "Miss Rheingold" competition, an enormously popular, citywide beauty pageant staged in the 1950s and 1960s. The rise of national brewing powerhouses Anheuser-Busch, Miller, and Coors, however, pushed countless local brands, including Rheingold, out of business in the late 1960s and 1970s. After more than two decades of dormancy, Rheingold was brought back to the New York market by a group of investors, and the new enterprise was called the Rheingold Brewing Company. Initial attempts to reintroduce the beer in the late 1990s were unsuccessful, but in 2002–2003 the branding agency Powell of New York unveiled a guerilla campaign that was intended to make Rheingold the beer of choice among denizens of the city's hippest neighborhoods.

Limited by a campaign budget of $400,000, Powell had no choice but to eschew traditional strategies of mass-media messaging, but its target group of authenticity-craving hipsters was notoriously resistant to such marketing tactics anyway. The Rheingold beer campaign instead chose 15 key bars in select New York neighborhoods to serve as staging grounds for the brand's rejuvenation. A series of promotional events, including an updated version of the "Miss Rheingold" pageant, supported the word-of-mouth buzz created by cryptic billboard placements, a sales force drawn from the hipster target market, and other untraditional means of spreading awareness.

The campaign ran through the end of 2003 and was considered an enormous success. Rheingold, initially available in only seven New York City bars, spread to 2,000 locations within a year. The campaign won two Gold EFFIE Awards in 2004. Rheingold and Powell continued to seek out untraditional means of winning back its place at the top of the New York beer market.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Rheingold brand was introduced in 1883 by Joseph, Henry, and Charles Liebman, whose father, Samuel, a German immigrant, had successfully established the Liebman Brewery in Brooklyn, New York, a generation earlier. Prior to the outbreak of World War I more than 700,000 barrels of Rheingold were being produced annually, but the company's success was hindered by the anti-German prejudice surrounding the war effort as well as by the onset of Prohibition in 1920. After surviving Prohibition by producing nonalcoholic products, including "near beer," Rheingold enjoyed monumental success in its primary market of New York City during the subsequent decades. For nearly 30 years, beginning in the mid-1930s, Rheingold was New York's best-selling beer, and the brand's advertising slogan (''Rheingold Extra Dry'') and radio jingle (''Rheingold, the dry beer—think of Rheingold whenever you buy beer'') became midcentury cultural touchstones for millions in the city. Additionally, the ''Miss Rheingold'' beauty pageant, whose winner was selected by bar patrons citywide each year, was an enormously popular local event. At its peak in the 1950s and early 1960s, the promotional contest was decided by more than 20 million ballots, a number almost equal to the turnout of U.S. presidential elections of the time.

In the mid-1960s, however, Rheingold's fortunes declined along with those of other local beer brands across the United States, who could not compete with emerging megabreweries such as Anheuser-Busch, Miller, and Coors. The Liebman brewery was shuttered, and the Rheingold brand seemed to have become part of history by the late 1970s. In the late 1990s, however, a team of investors enlisted a member of the Liebman family and embarked on a plan to reestablish the Rheingold brand. An initial strategy of targeting suburban grocery stores, traditional area restaurants, and sports fans did not effectively rejuvenate the Rheingold brand. During this time, though, a surprising beer-drinking trend emerged, particularly in urban centers across the country: so-called subpremium brands such as Pabst Blue Ribbon and Miller High Life were being reclaimed by 20-something hipsters, as were other nearly defunct local brands similar to Rheingold. Rheingold executives decided on a change of course for the brand's relaunch.

HE WENT THAT WAY

Among the many unpredictable ideas developed by advertising agency Powell of New York for the Rheingold beer campaign was a strange flier that began appearing on lampposts in the city during the summer of 2003. The flier, printed on fuchsia paper and lettered in black marker, said, ''Help! Have you seen this beer?'' and offered an extremely specific description of the Rheingold that had been ''lost.'' A working Manhattan phone number was provided as a contact. When staff members of the magazine Adweek called the number, they got an answering machine. The voice on the recording was that of a desperate woman who was not home because she was looking for her Rheingold.

The woman was, in reality, a marketing director from Powell, Sarah Riddler, and she told Adweek that the flier generated upward of 130 phone calls within a week. Among the responses were calls informing Riddler that her Rheingold had been seen fleeing by bus and others claiming that they were holding the beer for ransom.

TARGET MARKET

Powell's Rheingold Beer campaign centered on a particular group of New Yorkers that the agency identified as ''downtown culture drivers,'' residents of Manhattan's Lower East Side and East Village as well as of Williamsburg, Brooklyn. These neighborhoods harbored a high concentration of the city's most self-consciously hip, creative young people, ''young Lou Reeds and Patty Smiths,'' as Powell phrased it, whose tastes frequently defined tastes throughout the city and, by extension, in large portions of the United States. Not coincidentally, this audience was roughly the same age as the overall beer industry's prime target market, 21- to 27-year-olds, who consumed far more beer per capita than other Americans. Rheingold's downtown target drank more than a quarter of New York's beer and tended to stay out later than other residents of the city.

These consumers favored presumably authentic and simple brands like Levi's jeans, Marlboro cigarettes, and Converse shoes, and Powell observed that they had rejected high-end microbrews, which had been extremely popular in the 1990s, as part of a larger rejection of ''all things fancy and pretentious.'' In the beer world this attitude had translated into a return to such nationally distributed beers as Pabst Blue Ribbon and Miller High Life, but Rheingold and Powell saw that their target market might be susceptible—especially in the climate of affection for the city following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001—to a New York beer that measured up to the approved standards of simplicity and authenticity.

Rheingold thus attempted to position itself as ''100% New York by Volume,'' a ''macro-brew'' that shared the city's ''bold, dirty, electric, up-till-dawn, bad-ass independent'' spirit. It could not, however, communicate this message using traditional advertising tactics, for two reasons: its target was notoriously skeptical of all overt marketing appeals, and the minimal campaign budget would not allow for such an approach. Powell accordingly crafted a guerilla-marketing effort that depended largely on word-of-mouth buzz and the participation of owners of neighborhood bars.

COMPETITION

Miller High Life was, during this time, one of the national brands that had experienced a revival partly driven by consumers similar to those Rheingold was targeting. Beginning in 1998 Miller unveiled the first national TV campaign on behalf of High Life since the mid-1980s. The campaign both celebrated and poked fun at retro notions of manhood by defining the ''High Life man'' as someone who solemnly trusted the power of duct tape, ate hamburgers topped with hunks of butter, and scorned neighbors who could not effectively handle their motorized vehicles. The commercials' combination of nostalgia and irony allowed them to appeal not only to High Life's traditional market of older, blue-collar males but also to its newly minted hipster consumer base, who presumably prized the aura of authenticity conjured by the brand and its emphasis on old-school values. The TV campaign won numerous awards and ran for many years.

Pabst Blue Ribbon, similarly, had long been considered an affordable workingman's beer. In the 1990s, though, the brew's marketers noticed a spike in sales in the Portland, Oregon, area. The Pabst Blue Ribbon team found that the beer had been adopted among the city's bicycle-messenger subculture and that the brand's authentic image was fueling word-of-mouth buzz among young, hip drinkers. Believing that such an audience might be alienated from the brand by a traditional marketing approach, Pabst hired on-the-ground marketers, who traveled to several U.S. cities in order to stoke further interest in Pabst Blue Ribbon simply through conversation. These representatives not only spoke to wholesalers and bar owners but also frequented the gathering places of its target consumers, such as tattoo shops, local music clubs, and bike-messenger races, dropping off cases of Pabst Blue Ribbon and talking to those present. Print ads, which were carefully calibrated not to offend the Pabst Blue Ribbon target's antimarketing sensibility, ran in music magazines and alternative publications.

There was no single leading candidate for the title of New York's favorite beer, a designation that summed up Rheingold's long-term goal beyond its relaunch. The sheer number of retail outlets and bars made for enormous fragmentation of the beer market, and the United States' leading beers—Bud Light, Budweiser, Miller Light, and Coors Light—had less traction among the city's fickle consumers than among America's beer drinkers at large. Local brands, such as those produced by the Brooklyn Brewery, founded in the mid-1980s, had identified themselves as quintessentially New York beers, but Brooklyn Brewery and its local competitors were upscale microbrews with limited marketing resources.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Rheingold and its investors charged Powell, a boutique agency, with the tasks of creating instant sales results and building long-term brand equity, all on a miniscule budget of $400,000. Powell thus focused narrowly on its target of so-called ''downtown culture drivers'' and selected 15 bars to serve as staging grounds for the brand's revitalization. Rather than hire conventional beer reps to talk the brand up among bar owners, Rheingold and Powell assembled a sales force drawn from its target demographic and trained them to be billboards not just among proprietors but also among customers themselves. The agency signed Rheingold on as a sponsor of the CMJ Music Marathon, an indie-rock festival frequented by large numbers of the target audience, and distributed free Rheingold beer to the press, the bands, and festival attendees.

Rheingold promotional events in the 15 core bars continued to spread word-of-mouth awareness, and Powell bought placements on two billboards at Houston Street and Avenue B, ''the gates of the Lower East Side,'' to run photographs that were in keeping with the brand's desire to associate itself with the mystique of rock music. The grainy black-and-white photographs, which were taken at the CMJ festival, were placed side by side; one showed a rock musician, and the other an audience. No Rheingold logo or any other advertising cues ran with the images. ''We wanted to go up 'naked,' with no branding,'' Powell chief Neil Powell told Adweek, ''to sort of tease the images and also just to sort of give the Lower East Side some beautiful pieces of art.''

As buzz began to build, Powell brought back the ''Miss Rheingold'' pageant but updated the spectacle to suit its downtown market's sensibilities. Powell selected the winner from among the bartenders at the 15 drinking establishments that had been so central to the campaign thus far. The winner was photographed, during a shoot at the classic bohemian haunt the Chelsea Hotel, revealing her beauty secret: she was shown lounging in a bathtub filled with Rheingold, empty bottles littering the floor around her. This image appeared on the Houston Street billboard space as promotional events surrounding the pageant began.

Meanwhile, a concurrent Powell strategy of sending cases of Rheingold to various prominent New York organizations and institutions, and even to a pair of squatters on the Lower East Side who had recently made headlines, paid off when a reference to the beer was made on Saturday Night Live. The plug came as a surprise to Rheingold and Powell and was both a boon to the ongoing marketing effort and a measure of how successful it had been.

OUTCOME

Between the end of 2002, when the guerilla campaign began, and the end of 2003, Rheingold's distribution base went from 7 New York City bars to more than 2,000, and the company claimed a one-year sales increase of 2,500 percent The campaign attracted a significant amount of admiring national and international press coverage, was included in a Marketing Concepts class at NYU's Stern School of Business, and won two Gold EFFIE Awards in 2004.

Rheingold and Powell continued to use untraditional methods of communication in the attempt to recapture the title of New York's favorite beer. In 2004 the "Don't Sleep" campaign included paintings by edgy local artists; they were done on the aluminum security nightshades covering storefronts after business hours in Rheingold's target neighborhoods, the first-ever known use of the nightshades as advertising billboards. The guerilla marketers also flirted with the mainstream that year, running TV spots on local stations, but these commercials managed to generate antiestablishment buzz despite their format. In ridiculing facets of contemporary life in New York that interfered with its downtown consumers' lifestyles, such as a newly enacted ban on smoking in bars, Rheingold attracted an immediate critical response from Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who publicly questioned the brewer's authority to speak on behalf of the city.

YES/NO BALLOT BOX CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Rock the Vote, a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization, encouraged the young electorate to vote since its founding in 1990. Two years after its conception, Rock the Vote was credited for the second largest 18- to 24-year-old turnout in America's voting history. For the next few years, however, the young electorate steadily decreased. To engage America's youth in political topics they might otherwise show no interest in, Rock the Vote launched its "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign before the 2000 presidential election.

Launched across various media, including print, radio, outdoor billboards, television, Internet, and even E-mail, "Yes/No Ballot Box" did not use typical partisan rhetoric but presented provocative issues that would appeal more to youth. One ad displayed a chilling photo that looked down a revolver's gun barrel. The young, out-of-focus child holding the gun seemed barely strong enough to take aim at the camera. To the right of the photo, a short paragraph explained both sides of the contemporary gun-control issue. "Yes" and "No" check boxes rested at the bottom of most Internet ads. Whichever box was clicked, the selection's opposite stance opened up. "Yes" or "No" boxes appeared at the bottom of other key-issue images, such as an electric chair, a clear-cut forest, a fetus, and a gay couple, all attempting to spark interest within young voters. Mario Velasquez, executive director of Rock the Vote, told Business Wire, "Rather than using just words and images, we are using innovative new media to engage young people in the political process." With a budget of $35,000 to $40,000 per television spot, the campaign was conceived by the advertising agency Collaborate.

Despite the campaign's ad industry success, only 28.7 percent of 18- to 24-year-olds voted in the 2000 election, which was considered to be one of the closest elections in history. This was a significant drop from the 32.4 percent who voted in 1996. According to analysts youth were interested in key issues but not necessarily in who was elected president. Also according to analysts, as well as Rock the Vote organizers, 2000's presidential candidates did not invest much interest in the youth vote as compared with President Bill Clinton's campaigns during the 1990s.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Concerned that politicians would censor some of their best-selling music, members of the recording industry started the nonprofit organization Rock the Vote in 1990 to protect freedom of speech and artistic expression rights. "Censorship Is UnAmerican" was the tagline for the first campaign, which featured a series of public service announcements from Woody Harrelson, the Red Hot Chili Peppers, and Iggy Pop. In 1991 Madonna, draped in an American flag, urged young people to vote on MTV but was later criticized for not even being registered at the time. Despite some early criticism Rock the Vote and MTV's 1992 "Choose or Lose" campaign saw a 38 percent voter turnout for 18- to 24-year-olds, the highest turnout since the voting age was lowered in 1972. Rock the Vote also helped pass the National Voter Registration Reform Act, or "Motor Voter Bill," which in 1993 gave voters more rights and retrofitted the voting system.

During nonpresidential election years Rock the Vote used celebrity endorsements and MTV's free donation of airtime to address other political issues. In 1993 President Clinton signed another Rock the Vote–sponsored bill, the National and Community Service Trust Act, which encouraged political volunteerism. In 1995 Rock the Vote helmed "Out of Order: Rock the Vote Targets Health," a series of award-winning short films, which starred Giovanni Ribisi, Cuba Gooding, Jr., Joey Lauren Adams, and Amy Smart. The films focused on health-care issues and won Rock the Vote a Peabody Award.

Despite the organization's awards, young voter turnout decreased every year after the incredible 38 percent turnout in 1992. Rock the Vote organizers believed the decrease resulted from a mutual apathy between presidential candidates and the younger electorate. Robin Raj, Collaborate's creative director, explained to Adweek that the "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign was an attempt to "provoke and confront kids with issues that might ordinarily turn them off."

MOTOR VOTER BILL

In 1991 Rock the Vote supported the National Voter Registration Reform Act, also called the "Motor Voter Bill." Vetoed in 1991 by President George Bush, the bill forced all voting jurisdictions to use the latest technology to maintain a statewide voting database. The Election Review Commission was also created by the bill to educate voting officials about updated voting technologies. The Voter's Bill of Rights, to which voting officials had to comply, was designed for the entire electorate. Among the rights included were "If you make a mistake or spoil your ballot before it is submitted, you have the right to receive a replacement ballot and vote" and "If you are in line at your polling place any time between 7:00 a.m. and 8:00 p.m., you have the right to vote." President Bill Clinton later approved the bill in 1993.

TARGET MARKET

"Yes/No Ballot Box" targeted the 18- to 24-year-old unregistered electorate who were not interested in politics but were intrigued by provocative social issues. Democrat and Republican candidates in 2000 were accused by many journalists of demonizing young voters in order to win points with the larger, older electorate. Joe Lieberman, Al Gore's running mate and selection for vice president, was criticized for pandering to religious groups by moralizing the "vulgarity" in pop culture, such as Eminem's music and even the television show Friends. In the wake of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Democrats, according to analysts, steered away from anything young, hip, or provocative. Henry Bindbeutel, the twenty-one-year-old heading Libertarian J. Fred Staples' campaign for the U.S. House of Representatives, told the Portland Press Herald, "They talk about drugs and teen smoking and violence in schools. It is all targeted at this vision of the young being in some way corrupt."

To draw younger voters to the polls in 2000, "Yes/No Ballot Box" avoided political banter and focused on youth-centric issues. "Young people have their own set of priorities and it's important for them to see how the candidates respond to them," said Stephen Koepp, executive editor of Time, to PR Newswire. "They care particularly about higher education, about civil rights and personal privacy, about violence they encounter in real life, not in the movies. They know a thing or two about these issues because they affect their lives right now."

The Garin Hart Yang Research Group polled 600 people aged 17 to 24 in October 1999. The survey showed that only 30 percent would vote in the 2000 election. The top issues for that same demographic, according to MTV, were education (58 percent), violence and crime (50 percent), jobs and the economy (46 percent), drugs (44 percent), and health care (38 percent).

COMPETITION

"Youth Vote 2000," launched by Youth Vote Coalition, was the largest nonpartisan campaign urging young people to vote in 2000. It was composed of organizations such as Campus Green Vote, Black Youth Vote, League of Women Voters, and Rock the Vote. Volunteers placed phone calls and went door-to-door, targeting the electorate under age 30 in college communities of New York, Colorado, and Oregon. Post-analysis showed that the young voters called were 5 percent more likely to vote than voters not called. And the individuals targeted by the face-to-face campaign were more likely to vote by 8 percent. A comparison of the campaign's cost with the final youth-voter turnout showed the cost per vote averaged between $10 and $12.

The World Wrestling Federation (WWF) launched its "Smackdown Your Vote" campaign in 2000. Also partnered with "Youth Vote 2000," "Smackdown Your Vote" featured guest appearances by wrestling personalities such as the Rock and Chyna at the National Republican and National Democratic conventions. "We wanted to find a way that we could use our popularity to highlight activities which affect our fans and our communities," Gary Davis, WWF vice president of communications, said in the Grand Rapids Press. "We've already registered close to 120,000 new voters in the past two months and the response has been great." This number was significantly fewer than the 565,000 of "Yes/No Ballot Box." "Smackdown Your Vote" also focused on familiarizing children under the age of 18 with the election process. Thomas Patterson, an investigator with the Vanishing Voter Project at Harvard University, told the Sunday Patriot-News Harrisburg that people between the ages of 18 and 19 were three times more likely to know who won the Super Bowl than the Republican primaries. Paula Case, a Kids Voting USA project manager, remarked, "The reason to start so young is so the voting place becomes a familiar place, not a scary place, so voting becomes a habit."

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Yes/No Ballot Box" in 2000 marked a new turn in Rock the Vote's 10-year-old approach to enticing youth to the polls. In the past the organization had focused its main efforts on approaching celebrities to make public appearances or television public service announcements. Collaborate wanted to market the 2000 campaign differently. "Our feeling was kids had been there, done that. Rock stars presenting the message of 'vote' is important, but it is only one tactic and wasn't enough to break through the cynicism," Raj told Adweek. The online portion of the campaign launched September 25, 2000, and the broadcasts began October 7. The entire campaign continued until Election Day (November 7).

"Yes/No Ballot Box" pooled work from several different agencies. Collaborate oversaw the creative aspect, while Pandemonium and Western Images supplied the resources. "Yes/No Ballot Box" also partnered with MTV's "Choose or Lose" campaign, along with the Youth Vote Coalition. Because more than 10 media agencies were involved, one challenge was to make "Yes/No Ballot Box" execute seamlessly. "The team worked together to facilitate a convergent production that ensures that concepts not only look the same, but also act the same as people interact with them," Tommy Means, Pandemonium's director of convergent production, told Business Wire.

Collaborate designed the Internet advertisements, which played something like an interactive television commercial. Powered by Unicast's proprietary technology, the Web ads preloaded into the viewer's browser so that when the ads were clicked they played immediately. Each Web ad lasted an estimated 20 seconds and took the form of an interactive debate. Advertising space was donated by websites like AltaVista.com, BlackVoices.com, and E!Online.com. Different issues were conveyed by different images, such as an overflowing ashtray appearing beneath the copy "Ashes to ashes" for the smoking issue. Viewers could click on either "Yes" or "No" depending on their stance regarding the smoking issue. Whatever choice was clicked, the opposing argument was then displayed on the website. Eventually the ad directed the audience back to Rock the Vote's website, where they could register to vote, read more information about key issues, or send the ad's content by E-mail to a friend.

Other key issues were abortion (conveyed by the image of a fetus), capital punishment (an electric chair), hate crimes (a burning cross), and the legalization of marijuana (cannabis leaves). Five different 15-second television spots broadcast the same "Yes" or "No" ballot boxes transposed over similar images. Also 8 million E-mails were sent. "This effort is based on confrontation. Confrontation to create interaction. Maybe that will get more kids to register and vote," Raj told Business Wire. "Contrary to the conventional wisdom that people don't care about issues, we find people, and especially young people, are more engaged on issues than rhetoric."

OUTCOME

The "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, even though it did not draw more young voters in 2000 than voted in 1996, was still successful from an ad industry and Web marketing standpoint. The overall campaign registered 168,000 voters online; Rock the Vote registered 565,000 total. The campaign reached 20 million viewers and earned Collaborate the Interactive Media Andy Award in 2001, along with a Silver Effie in 2002. Hilary Fadner, Unicast's director of corporate communications, said in Electronic Advertising & Marketplace Report that the ad's "click-through rate [was] six times the current average for banners."

Most analysts did not attribute the decrease in young voters to a weakness in campaigning but to the youth's disinterest in the 2000 election. Some journalists speculated that both parties assumed the youth would not vote and therefore simply ignored them. The youth, in turn, ignored the election. "George W. Bush and Al Gore may be the human equivalent of Sominex to most young people," Bruce Horovitz wrote in USA Today. "But one thing appears to have cut through teen boredom with the presidential contest: Rock the Vote."

THE LAST HONEST PIZZA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 1998 Round Table, an employee-owned chain based in Walnut Creek, California, that offered an upscale line of gourmet pizzas, had used the same advertising tag line, ''The last honest pizza,'' for 15 years. The campaign continued throughout much of the year, enhanced by television commercials such as a series called ''The Adventures of Gary Garlic,'' created by Butler, Shines & Stern of Sausalito, California. But by the fall of 1998 Round Table Pizza, with an advertising budget estimated between $8 and $10 million annually, had canceled the campaign, which also included radio and magazine advertising, the latter handled by Tom Geary & Associates. It also ended its two-year relationship with its advertising agency and signed with Wieden & Kennedy of Portland, Oregon. By the spring of 1999 a new campaign was under way.

Round Table Pizza had already changed advertising agencies twice in eight years before abandoning Butler for Wieden late in 1998. Throughout that time, however, and for many years preceding, the chain had maintained its tongue-in-cheek ''Last Honest Pizza'' campaign. The advertising featured an intrepid character named Bill, who challenged fate in a variety of ways, and later spots included a sidekick called Gary Garlic, created by Butler. But as Jeff Manning and Cesar Diaz reported in the Portland Oregonian in September 1998, ''After two years of sales as flat as a cheese pizza,'' the company was ready to consider a new strategy.

The change in advertising agencies and campaigns mirrored larger strategic changes in the chain, which in 1998 had some 530 franchised operating units and $365 million in sales. Although the company intended to stick with—and indeed enhance—its gourmet-style menu, it had begun to look at new ways of serving customers, in part through ''delco'' (delivery and carry-out only) establishments. Furthermore, with facilities in eight western states, Round Table had begun to look eastward, toward a much larger share of the more than $22 billion U.S. pizza industry.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1959 businessman William Larson borrowed $2,500 to establish the first Round Table Pizza restaurant in his hometown of Menlo Park, California. At that time pizza, which had first gained popularity in the United States after World War II, was starting to take hold among the U.S. population, and by 1962 Larson was in a position to begin selling franchises.

Despite the fact that gourmet-style pizza would not really come into vogue until the late 1980s and thereafter, from that early stage Larson had determined to build a better pizza, and he developed strict standards for franchisees to follow. Among the facets that made Round Table unique was the fact that all of its ingredients were fresh, including dough made daily from scratch, freshly grated cheeses, and fresh sauces.

The chain grew rapidly on the West Coast, an area where consumers were inclined to look for and accept extraordinary culinary ideas. In 1979, 17 years after Larson began franchising, Round Table had expanded to include more than 150 units. It was in 1979 that an investment group purchased Larson's company, and four years later the new owners launched "The Last Honest Pizza" campaign, which focused on the quality ingredients and pizza-making methods used at Round Table.

The first of several advertising agencies hired by Round Table Pizza in the 1990s was San Francisco-based Goldberg Moser O'Neill. This relationship lasted from 1990 until late 1993, when the firm was replaced by California ad agency Bertram Wooster. By February 1996, Round Table was ready for another change, at which point it took on Butler, Shines & Stern. At that point its advertising budget was valued at $7 to $8 million, with 50 percent dedicated to television and the remainder to a mix of radio, magazines, and other formats. The changes in agencies primarily affected electronic media, as Round Table had continued throughout much of this time with the firm of Tom Geary & Associates for its print advertising, while EH&Y Media Services of Santa Barbara took care of media buying.

As of mid-1992, Round Table ownership passed to its employees, who on June 1 of that year purchased the company. In later years there would be disputes over advertising between the Round Table Owners Association and franchisees who refused to contribute to its cooperative advertising fund. An agreement between the Owners Association and some 120 renegade franchisees in February 1998, in fact, helped open the way for the chain's planned expansion into the eastern United States and a variety of marketing venues.

(COMMUNITY) SERVICE WITH A SMILE

In June 1999, Round Table Pizza honored 11 franchisees who had provided outstanding service to their communities. Among those cited for their record of community service was a franchisee that organized local resources to raise $20,000 for a woman and her children after the husband and father had been killed in an automobile accident. Another Round Table operator was recognized for assisting special-needs students with vocational training, and promotion of community service on a website earned kudos for yet another franchisee.

According to company president Jim Fletcher, in 1998 Round Table franchisees supported some 1,000 youth sports teams, either by purchasing uniforms, assisting in fund-raising, or helping in some other way. Estimated giving to community needs by Round Table restaurant owners reached $2 million in 1998, with efforts including companywide sponsorship of a summer reading program that involved some 100,000 students in the San Francisco Bay Area. "Our operators look for the best ways to make a difference in their communities," Fletcher told Nation's Restaurant News. "In emergencies and on a daily basis, Round Table franchisees are there, lending a hand."

TARGET MARKET

By the late 1990s Round Table had franchise locations in seven western states besides its home base of California: Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Alaska, and Hawaii. It also had facilities in six nations in the Middle East and in East Asia. With well over 500 locations and more than $300 million in annual sales, the company prepared for a massive expansion intended to carry it into new geographical areas and new operating venues, where it would serve new products to a widening range of buyers.

Joan Voight of Adweek noted in April 1996 that the company was "looking to zero in on the health-conscious [baby] boomer market by 'making our product line more upscale,' " the latter according to vice president of marketing Diane Waitkus. This would, in Voight's words, "give the restaurant a more contemporary feel and set it apart from its rivals peddling inexpensive, high-fat products." Yet like some of those more down-to-earth competitors, Round Table had begun by mid-1998 to move increasingly toward delivery and carryout facilities, in addition to its sit-down units.

Hand in hand with the growth of these delco units—and with a broader-based strategy of expanding into unusual venues—was a move in the direction of eastward growth. John Klacking, one of Round Table's leading franchisees, told Amy Zuber of Nation's Restaurant News in June 1998 that the company's new corporate team "has more of a mind to expand eastward and be more aggressive." Nonetheless, the company had a long-standing regional identity. "If you grew up on the West Coast, you ate Round Table Pizza," Klacking said. "It is a tradition." Because of his own western background, Klacking suggested, "I didn't have an interest in opening a Pizza Hut or a Domino's."

The eastward expansion was still in its opening stages in 1998, but much further along was a move to place Round Table franchises in unusual locations, at least one of which would aid the geographical expansion in an innovative way. Ontario International Airport in California might not be the first place one would think of for pizza, but for hungry travelers the airport Round Table was a welcome addition. "One of the terminals where we are located," Round Table chief financial officer Rob McCourt told Zuber in November 1998, "has flights coming in and out from all over the country. That gives us a unique opportunity for national exposure, and it will help us support our expansion."

COMPETITION

By 1998 the U.S. pizza industry accounted for $22 billion in sales, meaning that Americans spent more on pizza than the entire gross domestic product for the nation of Bolivia during that same year. It was an impressive figure, and Round Table began to aggressively go after a larger portion of this growing industry.

At the top in terms of sales was Pizza Hut, a Dallas-based chain owned by the gigantic foods conglomerate PepsiCo. Second in total sales, and first in delivery sales, was Domino's, a chain whose facilities were entirely delco units. Next was Little Caesars, followed by Papa John's, based in Louisville. Round Table stood just outside the big four of the industry, above other chains such as the upscale California Pizza Kitchen and the much more utilitarian Pizza Inn.

Many of the larger pizza lines had begun to take an interest in gourmet-style pizzas at least as early as the mid-1990s. Thus Pizza Hut, which in 1995 had sales of $7.9 billion, in 1996 introduced a number of specialty items such as Italian Chicken pizza, which included a garlic-flavored white sauce rather than the traditional tomato-based sauce. Papa John's, which advertised with the tag line "Better ingredients, better pizza," created by the Richards Group of Dallas, had begun to emphasize thin-crust pizzas. Even Pizza Inn, a chain that had begun expanding through express stores in gas stations, began offering a flavored crust in the mid-1990s.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Round Table hired Butler, Shines & Stern in February 1996, Voight suggested in Adweek that, although "Butler is expected to put its own imprint" on Round Table advertising and its character of Bill, advertising would nonetheless "focus on the chain's gourmet pizza selections and a fresh line of healthful menu offerings." This was in line with established strategy, since "Round Table has maintained its position . . . over the years by concentrating on the quality of its food and sticking to a steady diet of attitude and humor in advertising."

The first series of Butler ads, which appeared in the late spring of 1996, consisted of about a dozen TV spots built around the tag line "Round Table. The last honest pizza." One ad, for instance, promoted specialty pizzas with unusual ingredients such as Chinese chili sauce or cashews and showed the pudgy pizza guy Bill taunting a biker at a stoplight. The intimidating biker reacted not by throttling Bill but simply by shaking his head in consternation. "Some days you just feel more adventurous," the voice-over suggested. According to Round Table's Waitkus, "We decided to show Bill in familiar, humorous, very '90s situations. By portraying the frailties of Everyman, Bill can defend the brand in a fun way."

In March 1998, Butler unveiled a 30-second TV spot featuring Bill along with the time-honored tag line and a new sidekick, Gary Garlic. The latter was the creation of M-5 Industries in San Francisco, the firm also responsible for the Penny Hardaway puppet used in Nike commercials. In "The Adventures of Gary Garlic," one of more than a half-dozen Round Table commercials undertaken by Butler over the course of the year, Gary Garlic and Bill—a.k.a. Bill Bonham—promoted Round Table's new Roastin' Toastin' Garlic Pizza.

Jane Irene Kelly in Adweek compared Gary Garlic to Mr. Bill, the hapless claymation character featured on Saturday Night Live in the late 1970s and early 1980s. "Naive, but dedicated to his dream," wrote Kelly, "Gary is roasted with a blowtorch, thrown in a food chopper, crushed by a falling artichoke and cleaved in half—all at the hands of [Bill] Bonham." Butler, Shines & Stern principal and creative director John Butler told Kelly that Bill was glad to have a cohort, since for many years he had been the one "endur[ing] all the stunts. This time it's Gary . . . but he always bounces back."

"In typical cartoon fashion," Kelly observed, "Gary's deadly encounters leave him undaunted. Each spot ends with him flying away on an angel's wings, cheerfully calling, 'Bye, everybody!' " Then, of course, there was the tag line "The last honest pizza," intended to signify the quality of Round Table's product. Although Gary was a new addition, the high-spirited style of the ads featuring him was not significantly different from that of the "Some Days You Just Feel More Adventurous" spot two years earlier.

OUTCOME

After 15 years of "The Last Honest Pizza," Manning and Diaz reported in the Portland Oregonian in late September 1998, "Neither the company nor the ad campaign had much of a hold on the public imagination." Their observation was the result of research conducted by Wieden & Kennedy, the company's new advertising agency. Round Table had recently dismissed Butler, Shines & Stern in favor of the Oregon agency, best known for its Nike "Just Do It" ads.

Manning and Diaz indicated that the first new Round Table ads would appear in March or April, and on March 8, 1999, the company issued a press release in which it proclaimed the "Round Table Pizza Bill of Rights." The latter, the press released noted, "is the foundation for the campaign developed by Wieden & Kennedy." Five new television spots, along with radio ads, would "feature various animated characters [designed by underground cartoonist Peter Bagge] celebrating the Bill of Rights." One of these was "Steam Dance," a 15-second spot illustrating Article 7 of the 33 articles in the Bill of Rights: "The right to size up your fourth slice while you're still working on your third."

Another spot featured a sleepy rooster trying to wake up in the morning. A cold slice of Round Table pizza brought him to life, thus giving a visual image to Article 16: "The right to eat pizza for breakfast." In addition to the "Bill of Rights" campaign, which featured the tag line "If you love pizza, we love you," Round Table in mid-1999 ran a promotion in which it offered to host block parties—including 15 large pizzas, a large salad, and soft drinks for 50 people—for 33 winners of a random drawing. The promotion and the new ad campaign made note of Round Table's 40th anniversary, which the company celebrated throughout 1999.

DARIN' CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company is the parent company of Dirt Devil. The essay refers to the Dirt Devil division, as that company was responsible for the campaign profiled.

In September 1998 Dirt Devil, Inc., a subsidiary of Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company, introduced the Swivel Glide Vision, a bagless upright vacuum with a unique see-through container. A new television campaign was created for the launch, the product of a collaboration between Bennett, Kuhn & Varner of Atlanta and the Wolf Group of Cleveland. Inspired by the movie Toy Story, the six commercials featured a child's toy that came to life in the form of a computer-generated daredevil character called Darin'. They were directed and produced by Strom Magallon Entertainment of Los Angeles, which used technical wizardry to showcase the vacuum's features and capabilities in a way that was thought to be more compelling for viewers than a typical product demonstration.

On August 10, a month before the launch of the product, the company aired two direct-response television spots that showed Darin' being sucked into the vacuum and taking a thrill ride inside it. The viewer saw the inner workings of the Vision vacuum through Darin's eyes. Thanks to the product's see-through canister, Darin' was eventually found and rescued. On September 14 the direct-response ads were replaced with a 15-second and a 30-second retail spot that showed Darin' playing cat-and-mouse games with the vacuum. These two ads, titled "Thrill Ride," were intended to demonstrate the product's power, bagless design, and ease of use. Again, the daredevil was swept inside the vacuum but later retrieved and returned to the toy box. The campaign continued into 1999 when a second set of two retail spots, titled "Thrill Seeker," were unveiled, in which Darin' tried to outdo the Vision vacuum on a toy motorcycle, giving a visual display of the product's maneuverability.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The parent of Dirt Devil, Inc., was Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company, said to be the oldest maker of vacuums in the world. Royal began in 1905 as the P.A. Geier Company, named for the man who founded the business in a backyard garage in Cleveland. Geier started out making metal cleaners by hand. The business grew, moved into a four-story building, and began to diversify into other consumer goods, including mixers, hair dryers, and washing machines. Vacuum cleaners continued to be its main product, however, and the first handheld vacuum, the Royal Prince, was introduced in 1937.

In 1953 the Walter E. Schott Organization bought the company and renamed it the Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company but quickly lost interest in the business. In 1954 Royal was acquired by Stan Erbor and a group of employees. The company began to grow again, relocated to new headquarters in 1969, and expanded its operations. Erbor remained active in the company until his death in 1981. In that year the company changed hands once more, this time going to a group of Cleveland investors headed by John Balch. The new regime came in with a fresh sales and marketing approach that transformed Royal into a major contender in the vacuum cleaner market. According to the company, Royal's sales grew from just under $5 million in 1981 to about $286 million in 1996.

One of the most significant developments was the redesign of Royal's handheld metal vacuum. In 1984 the product began coming out in red plastic, which was both cheaper and flashier than the old model, and it was renamed the Dirt Devil. The new hand vacuum not only had eye-catching styling, but it also featured a revolving brush, a large capacity, and a power cord for plugging into an electrical outlet. Further, at $30 it was relatively inexpensive. The new ownership began an aggressive marketing strategy. Whereas Royal had traditionally relied upon small mom-and-pop outfits to sell its products, the company now began marketing through national retail chains such as Kmart, Wal-Mart, and Target. To assure that purchasers were satisfied, Royal established an unconditional 30-day return policy, set up a customer satisfaction computer network, and printed its toll-free telephone number on each vacuum, prompting thousands of customers to call each month. The company also began to advertise more heavily. Previously, as more and more domestic cleaning came to be done by household members rather than hired help, sales had risen without advertising. When the steady growth of the market tapered off, however, Royal looked for ways to boost sales, including the use of consumer advertising on television beginning in the early 1990s.

The Dirt Devil soon became a leader in the market for handheld vacuums, and by 1992 the company had sold more than 4 million. Royal used its dominance in the handheld market to work its way into other market segments, and it relied heavily on outside sources to make product components, giving it flexibility to meet consumer demands more quickly. Royal brought out the Dirt Devil Broom Vac in 1987 and a canister model in 1988. In 1990 the company introduced its first upright vacuum, going head to head with competitors like the Hoover Company, Eureka Company, and the Regina line made by Philips Electronics. Despite the competition, Dirt Devil increased its market share from 2 percent in 1990 to 7 percent in 1992.

Royal ran into various problems in getting its uprights on the market, however. In the early 1990s one upright model failed to pick up dirt because of a design flaw. Although the company fixed the problem, the damage was reflected in a steep drop in its market share in upright vacuums, from 24.3 percent in 1992 to 17.2 in 1993. Royal also became embroiled in litigation with upright vacuum leader Hoover, alleging that the latter's use of a so-called Cleaning Efficiency Rating was "misleading advertising" and asking the court to force Hoover to recall all advertising and promotional material related to the rating and to take it off its products. Hoover claimed that Royal was the false advertiser and accused it of defamation and interference with business relations. Royal was also named in at least four class-action lawsuits brought by shareholders. Despite these difficulties, the company continued to dominate the handheld market and managed to work its way into the upright segment.

TARGET MARKET

The traditional target market for housecleaning products was women in the 25- to 54-year-old age bracket. As in previous years, Dirt Devil products in 1998 were targeted to the mass market and were sold primarily through

AN ADVERTISER'S BEST FRIEND

RCA, Polaroid, Kodak, Nissan, and Dirt Devil had at least one thing in common on the marketing front: at one time or other all had used dogs or puppies to sell products.

Dirt Devil started using golden retriever puppies in its advertising in 1991. The long-haired pets turned out to be effective mascots for the company's marketing effort. USA Today reported in December 1996 that its Ad Track poll found Dirt Devil's holiday advertising, featuring three mischievous but cuddly pups, to be "very popular and very effective with consumers." Of those polled, 37 percent thought that the ads were "very effective," and 31 percent said that they "liked the ads a lot." Further, out of 46 ads measured in the previous 12 months, the Dirt Devil campaign made the top 10 for popularity and effectiveness.

Apart from the puppies' cuteness, Dirt Devil had a practical reason for using man's best friend in its advertising: it illustrated the product's ability to suck up pesky dog hair. "Dogs are always popular in ads, but any company that can use them to show a product's practical uses is at an advantage," according to Diane Cook Tench, director of the Ad Center at Virginia Commonwealth University.

major retailers (for example, Kmart, Wal-Mart, and Target), electronic chains (Best Buy, Circuit City, and Service Merchandise), warehouse clubs (Sam's Club), regional chains, and department stores. Royal reported in its annual filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) that in 1998 Wal-Mart (including Sam's Club), Target, and Kmart made up 31.6 percent, 14.1 percent, and 13.4 percent, respectively, of its net sales and that these were the only retailers who accounted for 10 percent or more of its sales in 1997 and 1998.

Royal continued to use television, print, and cooperative advertising to market its Dirt Devil products and to obtain shelf space from major retailers. Some of the advertising and promotion was tied to holidays and to specific promotional activities of retailers. Royal indicated in its SEC filing that its business was highly seasonal and that it believed many of its products were given as gifts and therefore sold in higher volumes during the Christmas shopping season.

COMPETITION

In the market for handheld vacuums Royal's principal competitors were Hoover and Eureka, along with Black & Decker Corp. In fact, Black & Decker created the handheld vacuum market when it introduced its cordless DustBuster in 1979. The Dirt Devil came out five years later, allowing Royal to take advantage of the booming replacement market for hand vacuums. With its low price and attractive features, the Dirt Devil sold 50,000 units in 1984 and soon became the market leader. A couple of years later, Dirt Devil held two-thirds of the handheld vacuum market and was selling more than all of its competitors combined.

By the early 1990s the competition had begun to challenge Dirt Devil on features and price. In 1991 Black & Decker introduced a revolving brush, corded model. At the same time Dirt Devil's market share in the handheld segment was slipping, and it continued to decline during the next two years. Meanwhile, third-place Hoover began to capture more business from Dirt Devil and Black & Decker. Dirt Devil remained dominant, however, and it began advertising on television in 1991, putting pressure on its rivals to develop new products and to increase their own advertising. By 1998 Royal held the number two share of the upright vacuum cleaner market, with uprights constituting about 55 percent of the company's business. In 1999 Royal maintained that the Dirt Devil was the largest selling handheld vacuum in the United States.

MARKETING STRATEGY

According to Deborah Holtkamp, Dirt Devil's director of advertising and sales promotion, the first two ads were aired before the product was available in stores in order to "raise awareness and generate excitement around the Vision's introduction; and to educate the consumer on the product's unique features and benefits." Holtkamp said that "it's in these spots that Darin' has his first encounter with the new Vision and unexpectedly gets the ride of his life. " In the ads, after a child had left Darin' lying outside the toy box, he was accidentally scooped up by the vacuum. Viewers rode along with Darin' to get a firsthand look at the inside of the new product. "This story is not only relevant to our target consumer, but also sends a powerful message about the product design," Holtkamp said. "Darin' would have been lost forever if he had been swept into a traditional vacuum that uses a bag, but thanks to the Vision's clear, removable dirt container, he is able to go on to future adventures."

In the first retail commercials Darin' played a cat-and-mouse game with the vacuum. As he attempted to outdo the Vision's power, he was foiled each time and got sucked into the vacuum, but he was spotted through the clear container and safely returned to the toy box. Holtkamp said that the ads not only showed the product's power and unique bagless design but also how easy it was to empty the vacuum.

OUTCOME

In March 1999 Royal ran a second round of retail commercials in which Darin' attempted even greater feats of daring on a toy motorcycle. Along with the vacuum's other features, these ads emphasized its maneuverability. According to Holtkamp, as Darin' zoomed around the floor, "his swift moves on the bike mirror those of the vacuum as it maneuvers around furniture. He's in effect showing the consumer how easy it is to push and turn the Vision with its unique swivel caster wheel design." As in the previous set of commercials, Darin' ended up inside the Vision but was rescued.

The company used focus groups in Cleveland, Atlanta, and Chicago to get feedback about the new product and its advertising campaign. Holtkamp said that, "based on feedback from consumers, we believe that bagless uprights are a huge opportunity in the marketplace. We're very excited about the Vision introduction and its sales potential."

FRED ASTAIRE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company is the parent company of Dirt Devil. The essay refers to the Dirt Devil division, as that company was responsible for the campaign profiled.

Dirt Devil, Inc., a subsidiary of Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company, generated free publicity for itself with its innovative and controversial "Fred Astaire" advertising campaign. In the mid-1990s Jim Holcomb, vice president of marketing and strategic planning at Royal Appliance, successfully created product awareness and informed the consumer public about Dirt Devil products even before they hit the retail market by using direct response television advertisements. Using the direct response ad strategy boosted sales of several Dirt Devil products, but the company saw even more impressive results after the 1997 Super Bowl, the "stage" where the newest and most innovative ads are seen. Holcomb aired three 15-second spots featuring Fred Astaire dancing with three of Dirt Devil's newest products: the Broom Vac, the Ultra Hand Vac, and an upright vacuum called the Ultra MVP.

Manufacturers pay top dollar to air their product advertisements during the Super Bowl. For the Super Bowl 1997, Fox Network received an average of $1.2 million dollars from each of approximately 25 advertisers. Advertisers are willing to pay such large sums of money because the Super Bowl has the highest viewer ratings of any television program. Super Bowl Sunday is also a widely studied phenomenon—the information obtained, such as the ratio of male/female viewership, the age of viewers, the socioeconomic status of viewers, and which commercials are the most favored, provide useful data for marketing specialists.

The ads for the "Fred Astaire" campaign that aired during the 1997 Super Bowl took more than one year to create and contained film footage from two of Astaire's best-known movies, Royal Wedding and Easter Parade. To produce the ads, identical movie sets needed to be reconstructed "down to the screw heads." An experienced dancer, dressed in a special green suit, copied Astaire's original dance steps while holding a Dirt Devil appliance. The dancer needed to perform specific routines from the

FRED ASTAIRE: WHISKING YOU AWAY

Before Darin' was created, Dirt Devil had another highly innovative, and controversial, marketing effort in a 1997 campaign that featured the late Fred Astaire. The 15-second spots, created by Meldrum & Fewsmith Communications (later acquired by the Wolf Group) and produced by Strom Magallon Entertainment, included re-creations of dance scenes from the Astaire movies Easter Parade and Royal Wedding. The commercials, which took more than a year to make, required a painstaking reconstruction of the movie sets "down to the screw heads." A dancer was hired to re-create Astaire's original dance steps while holding a Dirt Devil. The dancer wore a green suit and performed on a matching green set. With the magic of computers the Dirt Devil images from the green set were combined with original footage so that the finished commercials showed Astaire dancing with various Dirt Devil vacuums.

Although the actor's daughter, Ava McKenzie, was upset over the ads, Astaire's widow approved the use of the images. In a January 1997 interview aired on National Public Radio's All Things Considered, Robyn Astaire admitted that her role in creating the ads had made her the focus of criticism. Her response was that "the fact is that Fred danced with a mop in the '30s, swabbing the deck of some ship. A prop is a prop. The bottom line is I know Fred would have approved this, and that is my only concern."

movies in a special set that matched his green suit. The Dirt Devil images were then lifted from the green film footage by an advanced computer hardware/software program called Inferno, and another type of electronic technology called Animotion placed the Dirt Devils into the original footage. The new film footage was adjusted in several ways to match the old footage, and the end result was Astaire holding a Broom Vac instead of a coat rack in the Royal Wedding footage. In the other ads Astaire danced up a wall and on the ceiling while holding an Ultra Hand Vac to demonstrate the ease of reaching ceiling fixtures, and he danced up the stairs with an Ultra MVP to demonstrate the key feature of the appliance: an extra long cord.

The ''Fred Astaire'' ads, created by the Cleveland advertising agency Meldrum & Fewsmith Communications, were covered as news by such major publications as the New York Times, USA Today, and Entertainment Weekly. The ''Fred Astaire'' ads were also covered by CNN Headline News, CBS Evening News, and ABC's Good Morning America television programs. The ads received this publicity for several reasons. The ads were a departure from Royal's past campaign ads, which featured Golden Retriever dogs, and the technology used to produce the ''Fred Astaire'' ads was extremely time consuming and complex. Fred Astaire's daughter was critical of using his image and tried to prohibit their use, whereas his widow, Robyn, supported their use as long as she had significant input and Royal would donate money to the Arthritis Foundation.

The ''Fred Astaire'' campaign for Dirt Devil was the first time Robyn Astaire allowed advertisers to use her husband's image since his death in 1987. She agreed because, as she said, ''he was always receptive to new proposals. He would have used a vacuum cleaner in a minute. Why, he used a mop in the 1930s.'' In a quote included in a press release from Royal Appliance, Mrs. Astaire stated, ''My husband was often trying innovative things in his movies—dancing with props, in unusual settings, or up a wall and onto the ceiling. In considering Dirt Devil's concept, it was important to me that Fred's original performances remain intact, without alteration.'' Mrs. Astaire continued, ''From the beginning, Dirt Devil maintained the integrity of his work, and at the same time, used new technology in a way Fred would have approved. I'm happy with what we've achieved because I know his wishes have been respected.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The first Royal vacuum was made in 1905 by the P.A. Geier Company in Geier's garage, making Royal Appliance, the direct descendent of the P.A. Geier Company, the oldest vacuum cleaner manufacturer in the world. In 1937 the P.A. Geier Company made the first handheld vacuum cleaner. The company was purchased in 1953 by an investment group called the Walter E. Schott Organization and was renamed Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company. Soon after, in 1954, Royal was sold to a group of employees headed by Stan Erbar. Under Erbar's leadership the company thrived and was able to expand its operations during the late 1960s. Erbar remained very active in the company until 1981, when he was 80 years old. The company was then sold to a small group of investors who were eager to use new and innovative marketing strategies to increase sales. Advertising in the industry had been minimal because vacuum cleaner sales over several decades had risen without it. As more households installed wall-to-wall carpeting (which replaced area rugs that were taken outdoors, hung over the fence or on a clothesline, and cleaned with a rug beater), more vacuums were being sold. As society and the economy changed, more households were performing the housecleaning tasks themselves instead of hiring others to do the job. Vacuum cleaners, especially those with attachments, made housecleaning easier, and they practically sold themselves. As this steady growth in the market tapered off, however, Royal looked for ways to increase sales. It became one of the first floor care companies to bring consumer advertising to television in the early 1990s.

Since 1981 Royal had distributed its products into such mass retail outlets as Kmart and Wal-Mart. By the time Fred Astaire appeared during the 1997 Super Bowl, dancing across the screen with a Dirt Devil, consumers already knew about several Dirt Devil Products.

TARGET MARKET

Traditionally, the target market for housecleaning products is women between the ages of 25 and 54—the ages that parents or caregivers, particularly women, are actively raising children and are subsequently more active in keeping the home clean and organized. The "Fred Astaire" ad campaign attempted to expand the traditional market by appealing to a larger consumer market, including both males and females and consumers of a greater age range. According to Denise Gellene of the Los Angeles Times, "Dead celebrities allow advertisers to tap into feelings of nostalgia about times spent gathered around the television watching classic shows—an emotion that reverberates with baby boomers in particular." A large part of the U.S. population, baby boomers were in their prime money-earning years; also, the number of aging Americans was growing rapidly. In addition, during the 1990s, the "cocooning decade," more households were focusing on the home environment. The combination of these factors presented the perfect marketing climate for an ambitious ad campaign. The "Fred Astaire" campaign was indeed timely. Michael Merriman, president and CEO of Royal Appliance, commented, "Fred Astaire lit up the silver screen with his elegant dance steps and made the impossible look easy. His performances were amazing yet appeared effortless and fun, qualities we aspire to at Dirt Devil."

When Dirt Devil launched what HFN, the weekly newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, called "the most aggressive campaign to date," Robyn Astaire and Royal also entered into a long-term partnership with the Arthritis Foundation. Together they sponsored "quality of life" programs and funded arthritis research. Dirt Devil also made a commitment to provide ongoing fund-raising efforts for the Arthritis Foundation. Royal strove to design lightweight, portable, and easy-to-use cleaning appliances that would be easier to use for those who are physically challenged. For example, the Broom-Vac is a rechargeable, cordless broom that sucks up the dirt, eliminating the need for a dustpan. Because it is easy to use, one does not have to bend over to plug it in or pick up the dirt. The Dirt Devil Ultra Hand Vac has a powerful motor, a built-in stretchy hose, and an extra-long cord—one can have all the cleaning power of a full-sized vacuum without the heaviness or inconvenience. The Ultra MVP also has an extra-long cord and a built-in stretchy hose.

SUCCESS FOR MELDRUM & FEWSMITH

Meldrum & Fewsmith, the advertising agency that was involved in making the "Fred Astaire" ads, received a lot of favorable attention after the ads appeared—so much so, that soon after the 1997 Super Bowl, the firm was acquired by The Wolf Group, the parent company of Wolf Winterkorn Lillis Advertising, Inc. The acquisition made The Wolf Group one of the largest advertising firms in the Great Lakes area.

COMPETITION

Royal's oldest competitors were Hoover, which became a division of Maytag, and Eureka, which was bought by Electrolux. By 1927 Eureka was supplying one-third of all vacuums cleaners in the United States. Other rivals in the 1990s included Oreck and companies mainly associated with the electronics industry, such as Panasonic and Sanyo. Early vacuum cleaners could be purchased at department stores, through catalogues, or from door-to-door sales representatives, and ads for vacuum cleaners were typically seen in newspapers or heard on the radio. After Royal began advertising on television in 1991, it held the most market share, but the competition developed new products and increased their advertising efforts.

Royal did not drastically increase its advertising budget to produce the "Fred Astaire" campaign. The ads cost $1.8 million for 45 seconds of air time—each spot cost $250,000 to produce. Only 16 percent of Dirt Devil's annual $16 million advertising budget was used for the "Fred Astaire" ads. Hoover and Eureka spent approximately $20 million per year on advertising. According to Jim Holcomb, the "Fred Astaire" campaign was developed "to make our core line advertising dollars work harder."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Using celebrities, alive or dead, to sell products was not new and had shown variable results. The "Fred Astaire" ads appeared during a time when Jackie Gleason was seen with a hand mixer made by Braun Appliance Company and John Wayne was seen popping into the local saloon to swill some Coor's beer. The "Fred Astaire" campaign was multilayered and caused many issues to be addressed.

Many people were bothered by the "Fred Astaire" ads. Obviously, the film footage used for the commercials was used without his consent, which raised the question of who, in an instance such as the "Fred Astaire" spots, is the primary artist of the old film footage? Was it the dancer Fred Astaire, the director of Royal Wedding and Easter Parade, the producer, or the studio who provided the finances?

Before the 1997 Super Bowl the public relations firm Robert Falls and Company launched a public relations campaign in conjunction with the ad campaign created by Meldrum & Fewsmith. DWJ Television shot behind-the-scenes footage of the commercials being edited and demonstrated the technology used to create the commercials. DWJ also videotaped interviews with Robyn Astaire, the CEO of Royal Appliance, and the creative team who made the commercial. It then combined these pieces with excerpts from the "Fred Astaire" commercials, from some of Astaire's films, and from a press conference to make a video news package. Placement specialists from DWJ "pitched" the story to news producers and "fed" the news package to stations across the country three times: just before a press conference, the day of the press conference, and the day of the 1997 Super Bowl. The campaign package was seen by an estimated 53 million viewers and was aired a total of 164 times. Of all the segments included in the video package, the behind-the-scenes footage was used the most.

In addition to the three Super Bowl spots and the partnership with the Arthritis Foundation, Royal also developed a "Scratch & Win-Match & Win" contest, in which consumers could win five dollars, ten dollars, or one million dollars by matching numbers from a newspaper insert with the UPC code on a newly purchased Broom Vac.

OUTCOME

To determine the popularity of commercials run during the Super Bowl, a national polling organization, Gordon S. Black, chose 139 adult volunteers in two cities. The volunteers used handheld meters to register how much or how little they liked a particular spot. The "Fred Astaire" commercials did not make the top ten or the bottom five, and they did not qualify as favorites according to gender, age (under 40), or income (under $40,000). The top-scoring commercial during the 1997 Super Bowl was a Pepsi ad of bears dancing to a tune by The Village People, which scored 8.22 points out of a possible 10 points. The lowest score went to Janus Funds at 4.84 points. The "Fred Astaire" spots ranked as follows: Broom Vac with fancy footwork scored 6.05 points, Ultra Hand Vac with Astaire dancing on the walls and ceiling measured 5.51 points, and Astaire dancing on the stairs with an Ultra MVP also measured 5.51 points.

Although the "Fred Astaire" commercials were not among the most popular, in the three weeks that the spots ran, starting with Super Bowl Sunday, the volume of Dirt Devils sold tripled. Sales went up 4 percent, while industry sales were down 6 percent. In comparison, sales during the first quarter of 1998 showed a net loss, a decrease of 11.5 percent compared with the first quarter in 1997. Of course, these numbers were influenced by several factors. CEO Michael Merriman stated, "Although sales of Dirt Devil products to consumers, through our major retailers, increased in the first quarter over last year, retail ordering patterns and inventory reduction by certain of these large retailers negatively affected our shipments in the first quarter 1998. Additionally, January shipments related to last year's successful Super Bowl advertising campaign were not duplicated in January 1998 . . . The company's gross margin in the first quarter of 1998 declined due to this lower sales volume coupled with higher consumer returns following much higher fourth quarter shipments than in recent years. I view these issues as principally timing in nature. We fully expect to be profitable in 1998. We are encouraged by the higher retail point-of-sale sell-through in the first quarter, especially where we have gained marker share."

GET OUT THERE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s Miami-based Royal Caribbean Cruises Ltd. began repositioning its namesake brand, Royal Caribbean International. After campaigns meant to market the brand as an alternative to resort vacations as well as to other cruise companies, in 2000 Royal Caribbean undertook a more ambitious recasting of its image. Amid industry-wide increases in fleet size, Royal Caribbean attempted to attract new customers by appealing to baby boomers and Generation Xers, in addition to the industry standby market of retirees. To accomplish this goal, Royal Caribbean charged the Boston-based agency Arnold Worldwide with the task of changing consumers' stereotypical notions of the cruise ship experience.

The resulting multiyear integrated campaign, called "Get Out There," drew on an estimated $80 million annual budget and included television and print as well as online and promotional components. Television commercials depicted cruise vacations as action-packed avenues for acquiring exotic life experiences, with dramatic, fast-moving imagery synchronized to the high-energy rhythms of the Iggy Pop song "Lust for Life." Print ads supported the message of the cruise as an adventure, and innovations in the Royal Caribbean website played an important role in the brand's desire to appeal to a younger market.

The campaign substantially increased Royal Caribbean's awareness relative to other cruise lines, and the "Get Out There" tagline as well as the song "Lust for Life" became closely associated with the brand. The campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2002 and a Silver EFFIE Award in 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Royal Caribbean Cruise Line came into being in 1968 as a partnership between three Norwegian shipping companies: Anders Wilhelmsen & Company, I.M. Skauge & Company, and Gotaas Larsen. The line's first vessel, Song of Norway, made its maiden voyage in 1970, and the company added two more ships in the early 1970s. The late 1970s and 1980s saw cruise ships and the industry as a whole grow in size, and in the 1990s Royal Caribbean expanded beyond the tropical destinations referred to in its brand name, offering trips to various parts of Europe, including Scandinavia and Russia. The company went public in 1993 and continued to expand its fleet and its geographic range. In 1997 the brand name was changed from Royal Caribbean Cruise Line to Royal Caribbean International, a reflection of its increasingly global reach and aspirations.

At around this time Royal Caribbean also began repositioning itself to compete not just against other cruise lines but against vacation resorts as well.

Television and print advertising, running under the tagline ''Like no vacation on earth,'' began to focus increasingly on off-ship possibilities for adventure at the various destinations frequented by Royal Caribbean vessels. In the late 1990s the company added new ships almost yearly, steadily increasing its passenger capacity and planning further such increases well beyond the new millennium.

Spurred by a booming U.S. economy, Royal Caribbean's competitors were likewise dramatically increasing their carrying capacity during these years. Still, only about 10 percent of Americans had been on a cruise vacation. Though the expanded occupancy numbers mandated that Royal Caribbean and its competitors correspondingly expand their consumer base, the industry's most consistent customers were older and retired couples, and Americans tended to associate cruise vacations with inactive forms of sightseeing and unexciting onboard activities like shuffleboard and all-you-can-eat buffet dinners. In 1999 Royal Caribbean entrusted its mainstream advertising duties to Arnold Worldwide of Boston and charged the agency with expanding its appeal beyond the traditional cruise market.

TARGET MARKET

Building on the findings of the market research firm Yankelovich Partners, Arnold pinpointed a target market for the ''Get Out There'' campaign that was united by a mind-set more than age or other demographic divisions. Arnold dubbed this group ''Explorers,'' adults of all ages with a thirst for adventure. As Pam Hamlin, the agency's executive vice president and group account director, told American Demographics, the so-called Explorers ''might be 30 or 70, but [they] . . . don't want to be sightseers or lounge-chair potatoes. Sure, they want a pina colada at the pool at some point, but they also want to go bike riding in Copenhagen or swimming with dolphins.''

Though portions of this group fell into the traditional 50-plus age bracket that had long made up the industry's core consumers, the fact remained that adults looking for excitement and adventure on their vacations were naturally clustered in younger portions of the American population. On average, therefore, Arnold and Royal Caribbean were targeting a significantly younger crowd than any cruise line had in the past. Baby boomers, aged 36 to 54 at the time of the launch of ''Get Out There,'' were a particularly important part of the newly envisioned Royal Caribbean target. In Arnold's view baby boomers tended to approach aging with a different attitude than had previous generations of mature adults, placing a high priority on continuing to experience new things and enrich themselves personally through travel and adventure. ''They are going to be much younger—in their minds—than the elderly population has ever been,'' Arnold group creative director Pete Favat told Advertising Age. ''This generation is trying to stay as young as possible as long as they can.'' Members of Generation X, too, were as old as 35 at this time, and Royal Caribbean hoped that its pitch would resonate with them as well.

''LUST FOR LIFE''

The energetic beat and affirmative message of Iggy Pop's ''Lust for Life'' no doubt seemed to many consumers a good fit for the ''Get Out There'' campaign, which sought to encourage the perception that cruise vacations were stimulating and adventure oriented, and indeed over the years the song became closely associated with the Royal Caribbean brand. Not surprisingly, only a selected portion of the song was played during the TV spots, so that consumers might not have been aware of any disconnect between the song and its commercial use. As many observers noted, however, Pop was an unlikely spokesperson for a cruise line. Often called the ''Godfather of Punk,'' he was a key influence on the notoriously misanthropic practitioners of 1990s Seattle grunge. ''Lust for Life'' was itself a song about one of Pop's several recoveries from heroin addiction and was prominently featured, a few years before the debut of the Royal Caribbean campaign, on the sound track to the movie Trainspotting, a dark comedy about Scottish heroin addicts.

COMPETITION

The industry's leading company, Carnival Cruise Lines, was, like Royal Caribbean, headquartered in Miami, associated primarily with Caribbean cruises, and, beginning in the late 1990s, actively expanding its fleet. After retiring a long-running ad strategy of using celebrity spokesperson Kathy Lee Gifford in campaigns positioning itself as the company of ''fun ships,'' Carnival tried markedly different approaches in two campaigns, both directed by Cooper HMS Partners (later Cooper and Hayes). A campaign launched in early 2000 took a reality-based approach. Amateur actors were sent on Carnival cruises and then interviewed after the fact. The results of the interviews were culled to create spots focusing on the highlights of the onboard cruise experience, which the interviewees in general claimed they had not expected to enjoy as much as they ultimately did. The campaign targeted a traditional cruise industry audience and hoped to dispel cruise vacation stereotypes by having the actors address such matters in the spots. As agency chief executive and copywriter Ric Cooper told Adweek, ''We wanted people with preconceived ideas about this kind of vacation . . . Fifty percent of this business is repeat customers.'' A 2002 campaign, by contrast, resurrected the company's positioning as the ''fun'' cruise line in spots that evoked the romance of cruising and used lively pop music in the hope of enticing first-time cruisers.

The third largest cruise company during this time was Princess Cruise Lines, whose Southern California–based fleet had built its reputation on cruises to Mexico and Alaska and on one of its ship's role as the setting for the popular 1970s and '80s TV drama The Love Boat. A significantly smaller line than either Carnival or Royal Caribbean, Princess had in the late 1990s positioned itself as a cruise brand offering a more personal, customized experience than its better-known competitors. After the turn of the century Princess began pursuing fleet expansions, in keeping with the rest of the industry, and both Carnival and Royal Caribbean competed to purchase the smaller line. In 2002 Carnival prevailed, adding Princess to its increasingly diverse roster of cruise brands.

MARKETING STRATEGY

''Get Out There,'' which was launched on January 16, 2000, was an integrated TV, print, direct-mail, and promotional campaign, with important tie-ins to the company's website beginning in late 2000. The budget for the complete effort was an estimated $80 million annually, roughly half of which was allotted to the media campaign. Though ''Get Out There'' was the campaign theme from its inception, the phrase did not become the official tagline until 2002.

The campaign's goals were ambitious: to change consumer perceptions of an entire industry as a means of expanding Royal Caribbean's market. Rather than focus on the onboard experience—associated in the popular consciousness with passive recreational options deemed suitable for the elderly—the new 30- and 60-second TV spots featured fast-moving imagery of, for instance, the Egyptian pyramids, Italy's Amalfi Coast, rock climbers, and vacationers on bicycles in Copenhagen. The quick editing of the commercials was synchronized with the propulsive, up-tempo Iggy Pop song ''Lust for Life,'' which became the brand's theme song over the course of the long-running life of the campaign.

The print portion of the campaign, which ran in national magazines and in newspapers in selected markets, kicked off in February 2000. Dramatic natural and architectural scenery was used in concert with questions and statements meant to stimulate the desire for travel and adventure. The copy for one ad read, ''Yeah, you've seen ice sculptures made by a chef. Ever seen the ones made by God?'' Another ad informed consumers, ''Among the things you'll learn biking in Sardinia: In Italian, even 'my cuff is caught in the chain' sounds romantic.''

In May 2000 Royal Caribbean unveiled a redesigned website (www.royalcaribbean.com), which for the first time allowed consumers to make cruise reservations online. This was a significant step toward the brand's goal of attracting younger consumers, who tended to be more Internet-savvy than their elders, and another addition to the website prior to the 2001 installment of "Get Out There"—the creation of an online "virtual" cruise experience—further positioned Royal Caribbean to grow its market among the increasing number of Americans who made travel reservations online. The "Get Out There" TV spots in 2001 were little different from their predecessors the year before, except that they directed viewers to royalcaribbean.com, where Web users could experience the activities shown in the commercials as though test-driving the vacation. For instance, users could see the streets of Copenhagen from the vantage point of the cyclists who appeared in one popular TV spot, or they could duplicate the experience of swimming underwater with stingrays.

In late 2001 the "Get Out There" concept was adapted to an Alaska-specific pitch. One noteworthy TV spot in this portion of the campaign opened on what appeared to be a dramatic mountain-climbing scene. Two men struggled as though barely able to continue an attempt at the summit, but a female voice then interjected, "If you guys don't quit it, I'm going to miss my massage." The opening chords of "Lust for Life" began playing, followed by quickly intercut images of action-oriented adventure, the trademark of the campaign, before a voice-over proclaimed, "Somewhere between the glacier hiking, the dogsledding, the train tours, and the rock wall, it hits you: this is way more than a cruise. See for yourself at royalcaribbean.com, and get out there."

A 2002 print portion of the campaign likewise adapted the larger advertising strategy to pitch a specific branch of Royal Caribbean's offerings, using images of the Sistine Chapel and the Louvre, among other marquee European destinations. Copy promoted the complementary benefits of tourist activities and cruise ship luxury. Otherwise, in subsequent years the campaign retained its signature visual look and sound track on TV spots.

OUTCOME

The first several years of the "Get Out There" campaign were marred by the steep declines in tourism related to depressed economic conditions and a widespread fear of traveling following the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001. Nevertheless, Royal Caribbean managed to significantly affect consumers' perceptions of cruise vacations and build a brand image that was directly associated with the new, more dynamic idea of such travel. As of 2005, Royal Caribbean's unaided brand awareness had climbed 33 percent above its 2000 level, and it had become the cruise line most often recommended by travel agents. Royal Caribbean's online bookings increased dramatically in the years following the debut of the website, and the company's stock price had increased more than 100 percent by 2005. The campaign's effectiveness was honored twice with EFFIE awards. The overall campaign won a Gold EFFIE in 2002, and the Alaska portion of the campaign won a Silver EFFIE in 2003.

LIFE IS NOT A SPECTATOR SPORT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Saab Cars USA, Inc., was the American affiliate of the Swedish company Saab Automobile AB, which was in turn owned by the General Motors Corporation, a Detroit-based corporation that was the largest automaker in the world. Saab was in a difficult financial situation in 2002; it lost $504 million worldwide that year alone. This came on the heels of mediocre sales throughout the early 2000s, both worldwide and in the United States, Saab's biggest market. Saab hoped that the introduction of its new 9-3 Sport Sedan would help it turn things around. The company was prepared to spend $70 million on marketing all of its lines in the United States, with the desire of sparking a rise in sales that could help the company become profitable again.

Boosting sales would be a significant challenge for the Lowe Group, whose Swedish affiliate Lowe Brindfors (Saab's longtime European agency) was assigned Saab's U.S. portfolio in 2001, giving the Lowe Group full responsibility for all of Saab's marketing. Lowe introduced the new 9-3 Sport Sedan to the U.S. market with a commercial that had already run in Europe. Set during the World Cup, it featured a young man joyriding through Barcelona, and it closed with the tagline "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport." This was followed by a series of other television, print, and radio initiatives that ran throughout 2003.

The 9-3 Sport Sedan helped Saab post its best sales year in 47 years of doing business in the U.S. market. The company moved 47,914 units of its automobile line, up from only 35,062 units sold the year before. This took Saab closer to its stated goal of doubling its U.S. sales within five years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Saab's name began as an acronym, SAAB, for Svenska Aeroplan Aktiebolaget (Swedish Aircraft Company). As the name indicated, the company began by manufacturing aircraft. In 1946 it started exploring the possibility of manufacturing cars as well. In 1949 the Saab 92 became the first Saab automobile available to the public. The aircraft portion of Saab, Saab AB, later separated from the automotive manufacturer to form a second, fully independent company.

On December 15, 1989, Saab-Scania AB and General Motors announced an agreement to form Saab Automobile AB as a joint venture. This led to the creation of Saab Cars USA, Inc. Prior to GM's investment the brand had spent little on marketing in the United States, leading Saab to develop a reputation as a niche brand. Following the agreement Saab achieved modest but consistent U.S. sales. By the late 1990s, however, sales seemed to be picking up. In 1999 Saab sold 39,366 units in the United States, making that country the company's largest single market, even larger than that of its native Sweden. This was a significant improvement from the 30,516 units the automaker sold in the U.S. in 1998. In 2000 GM took complete control of the Swedish automaker, hoping to build on those gains.

In 2002, however, Saab's development costs were getting out of hand, and a weak dollar kept Saab prices (which were pegged to the stronger Swedish kronor currency) high in the United States, creating a drag on sales. The company was expected to lose $504 million in 2002 alone. One problem was the decision to construct expensive brand centers, owned outright by Saab, which would serve as high-class showrooms for its vehicles. These showrooms, designated for major cities such as San Francisco and Chicago, had to be canceled by Saab's parent, GM, after costs spiraled out of control.

Saab's international sales division was organized into two regions: one was Europe and the Americas, and the other handled Asian/Pacific markets. The company saw itself as an international organization. And internationally, sales were weak. By November 2002 the company was only on pace to move about 125,000 units for the year, well short of the 140,000-unit goal set by the automaker.

Saab CEO Peter Augustsson began to design an 18-month recovery plan to pare down costs and boost sales. Despite the major gains seen in 1999, U.S. sales in the first couple years of the 2000s were flat, with only about 37,000 units sold for 2001. The company wanted to turn things around in a hurry. Much of its hopes were pinned on the new 9-3 Sport Sedan, a high-performance vehicle that featured a smaller engine. The 9-3 had a sleeker, more "American" look than many other Saab vehicles. The company hoped that the 9-3 Sport Sedan would help lead the way to a doubling of U.S. sales within only five years.

TARGET MARKET

Saab's cars were high-performance luxury vehicles, and the 9-3 Sport Sedan was no exception. Although the car was priced competitively at about $30,000, it was aimed at young premium-car buyers. The driver's seat had a cockpit feel to appeal to these consumers. The company viewed its cosmopolitan, European reputation—which was enhanced in part by the fact that the company was not ubiquitous in the United States—as an important asset. With such features as Saab Active Head Restraints (seat-based restraints that protected the driver in a crash) and side airbags, Saab also appealed to safety-conscious consumers.

THE (ADVERTISING) PROFESSIONAL

Saab Cars USA, Inc., had a lot riding on the introduction of its 2003 9-3 Sport Sedan. The company's advertising agency, Lowe Brindfors, had a secret weapon to help the vehicle crack the U.S. market, however: a Saab spot called "Big Match" that had already aired to acclaim in Europe. Befitting an international campaign, the spot was directed by international director Luc Besson.

Besson was a French director who had made the rare transition from the French film industry to blockbuster Hollywood action films. He achieved success in his homeland with the international hit La Femme Nikita, which eventually inspired a U.S. television series. He came to the attention of American cinephiles with his first English-language film, The Professional (1994; also known outside the United States as Léon), which featured the debut of Natalie Portman.

Later he directed the major science-fiction picture The Fifth Element (1997). The film starred Bruce Willis and Chris Tucker and was admired for its unique visual palette. After his ambitious 1999 film The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc failed to find a wide audience, Besson stepped away from directing films for a time, turning his attention to writing and producing movies and directing commercials such as "Big Match."

COMPETITION

Saab's primary competition came from other European automakers, including Mercedes-Benz, BMW, and Audi. Its biggest competitor was Volkswagen. Volkswagen was Europe's largest automaker and was the parent of Audi. There were several other sport sedans on the market in 2003. The entry-level luxury sport sedan segment was crowded with established stars, such as the BMW 3-Series and the Mercedes C-Class. These fellow European automakers were making vehicles that offered a similarly high-performance ride. Saab needed to distinguish itself in order to succeed. The Acura 3.2 TL was another strong contender in this segment.

One thing that helped Saab stand out from these competitors was its customer service. Saab's customer-service record also attracted buyers. In 2003 the influential marketing-information firm JD Power and Associates ranked Saab seventh in its Customer Service Index, making it the highest-ranking European automaker, ahead of competitors BMW (number 10) and Volvo (number 11).

MARKETING STRATEGY

In May 2001, not long before the 9-3 Sport Sedan campaign began, Saab hired a new advertising agency, Sweden's Lowe Brindfors, part of the Lowe Group, to develop and implement its marketing campaigns. Lowe also operated a U.S. division based in New York, which would handle the U.S. component of Saab's campaigns. The Martin Agency, Saab's previous U.S. advertising agency, was retained to handle direct advertising in that country. Saab consolidated its worldwide advertising with one organization as part of an effort to make its marketing efforts more efficient. Lowe was already handling Saab's non-American campaigns, and it was becoming too complicated and costly to coordinate the efforts of two different agencies.

Saab was having trouble in the U.S. market, in part because of the Swedish krona's strong standing against the dollar, which raised Saab prices in the United States. To help shore up its sagging prospect, Saab earmarked a massive $70 million dollars for media advertising, nearly doubling its previous expenditures. The 9-3 would be a major focus of this advertising. In January 2002 Saab kicked off the year by introducing the new vehicle. It would close the year by touting the 9-3 to American car buyers in a new advertising campaign.

It was decided to import a successful Lowe Brindfors spot from Europe to be the center of the campaign, which began in the fall of 2002 to coincide with the introduction of the 2003 9-3 Sport Sedan. Called "Big Match," the spot had premiered in Europe in the summer of 2002, during the World Cup soccer tournament, the world's biggest sporting event. It was directed by Luc Besson, a French director known to American audiences for Hollywood films such as The Fifth Element. The commercial was set in Barcelona, Spain, during the World Cup. While everyone was at home watching the day's big soccer match on TV, a man snuck out and took his Saab 9-3 on a joyride through the city's empty streets. But he still got back in time to see the game's big goal. The spot closed with the tagline "Life is Not a Spectator Sport," before urging viewers to "Experience the All New Saab 9-3 Sport Sedan."

"Big Match" was a vivid demonstration of why Saab wanted to consolidate its worldwide marketing effort. The commercial had already been well received in Europe, so it was less of a risk bringing it into the United States. While the spot was edited for the U.S. market, most of the work was already done on the original spot, meaning that it cost far less than developing an all-new television campaign. For a company struggling with costs, this was especially appealing. Also, the European streetscape reinforced the company's sophisticated, cosmopolitan image.

Throughout 2003 Saab built on the "Big Match" spot through a print campaign geared at upscale readers, using publications such as GQ, Gourmet, and Condé Nast Traveler. Ads also ran in major newspapers, including the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times. Finally, the company reached out to its target market by becoming an official sponsor of National Public Radio.

Lowe developed a series of television campaigns to run throughout 2003. They mainly aired on national cable stations such as ESPN, Bravo, A&E, and CNN. Beginning in May 2003 Saab ran five spots featuring the tagline "Welcome to the State of Independence." These spots also primarily focused on the 9-3, though some featured other vehicles as well. One spot purported to show the behind-the-scenes process of designing new Saabs. As the 2003 line of Saab cars was shown, a series of rhetorical questions was asked, such as "What if innovation were the official currency?" Each spot closed with the new tagline. The idea was to capitalize on Scandinavia's reputation as a freethinking, open-minded society, implying that the Saab 9-3 was a car for freethinking, open-minded drivers.

OUTCOME

The campaign to launch the 9-3 Sport Sedan was a success. By January 2003 sales were increasing across the board at Saab. Saab USA moved 2,551 units that month, up 62 percent from January 2002. The 9-3 Sport Sedan was a major component of that success, selling 1,427 units. That meant that more than half of all Saabs sold in January 2003 were 9-3 Sport Sedans. As the campaign continued, Saab's sales numbers kept growing. Saab Cars USA's first quarter in 2003 saw the company move 10,885 units. This was the best sales quarter in Saab's 47 years selling vehicles in the United States and constituted a 19 percent sales increase over the previous year's first quarter.

Saab moved 4,967 units in April 2003, for the best single month to that point in terms of U.S. sales. Once again, the 9-3 Sport Sedan was primarily responsible, selling 2,768 units that month. The previous monthly sales record had held since 1986. Saab's momentum continued after the second phase of the campaign—featuring the "Welcome to the State of Independence" spots—began in May. By November Saab had already posted its best yearly sales record in 16 years. The company had broken the 40,000-unit threshold, something it had not done since 1987. By the time the year was over, Saab had broken its yearly sales record by moving a total of 47,914 units, a significant improvement over the 35,062 units the company sold in 2002.

LOW CARB CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Also see essay for Miller Brewing Company.

In 2002 South African Breweries bought the ailing Miller Brewing Company from the Phillip Morris Companies, took the name SABMiller, and set about trying to bring America's second-largest beer maker out of a decade-long slump. The brewer's leading product, Miller Lite, had been struggling to regain its spot at the top of its category since 1994, when Anheuser-Busch's Bud Light first overtook it, but its recent advertising campaigns had, without exception, failed to move product. A diet craze then sweeping the United States, however, provided Miller Lite the opening it needed to challenge its competitors and reverse the market-share losses of the past years.

Capitalizing on a variety of diets calling for drastic reductions in carbohydrate intake, and taking its cue from Anheuser-Busch's own low-carb offering, Michelob Ultra, Miller Lite launched an advertising campaign (whose price tag was estimated at more than $20 million) comparing its carbohydrate count to that of mainstream rivals Bud Light, Coors Light, and Michelob Light. Pairing the numerical carbohydrate comparison with the simple image of beer being poured into a glass, the brewer and its agency, Ogilvy & Mather, at long last established a clear reason for consumers to prefer Miller Lite to its competitors.

The campaign not only arrested the seemingly permanent slide in Miller Lite's market share, but it resulted in the beer's first sales gains in nearly five years, gains that outpaced Coors Light as well as Bud Light, a brand that had been accustomed to double-digit percentage increases. Building on the success of its direct challenge to competitors, Miller Lite took aim at Bud Light in future campaigns, and the brand's revival continued.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Introduced in 1975, Miller Lite was America's first light beer. The low-calorie product was initially seen as a risk in a beer-marketing era defined by overtly macho appeals to hard work, such as the classic "Miller Time" and "This Bud's for You" campaigns. To offset any unmanly associations with the idea of light beer, Miller and its agency at the time, McCann-Erickson, enlisted retired professional football players for its advertising and had them engage in heated debates over whether Miller Lite's chief attribute was that it "Tastes Great" or was "Less Filling." The campaign was a huge success, and the product category Miller Lite created irrevocably changed the beer industry in America.

Anheuser-Busch, maker of Budweiser beer, ventured into the low-calorie category with Bud Light in 1982, and in the mid-1980s Bud Light hit its marketing stride, leveraging its parent's deep pockets to churn out consistently strong advertising amid a growing consumer preference for reduced-calorie beer. Bud Light's market share increased exponentially, while Miller Lite sales peaked in 1990. Bud Light surpassed its older rival in 1994 on its way to becoming, by 2001, not simply the top reduced-calorie beer but the most popular beer in America, knocking its sibling Budweiser, "The King of Beers," off its pedestal. Meanwhile, Miller Lite was surpassed by Coors Light and fell to number three in the category it had pioneered. Miller Lite's woes greatly compounded the declining fortunes of Miller's other main brands, Miller High Life and Miller Genuine Draft. The brewer saw its market share fall from 23 percent in 1995 to 19.4 percent in 2002. South Africa Breweries in 2002 bought the ailing Miller portfolio from Phillip Morris with the intent of turning the ailing American powerhouse around. The new company was called SABMiller.

A significant factor in Miller's sharp declines, according to industry observers, was inept advertising behind its leading product. From the mid-1990s through the early years of the new millennium, Miller Lite struggled to establish any clear brand identity. A high-profile, offbeat campaign called "Dick," featuring absurdist vignettes dreamed up by a fictional advertising copywriter, was lauded for its creativity but harshly criticized for its failure to connect to the product's virtues and thereby translate into increased sales. Later attempts to mix humorous advertising with a focus on product quality faltered, and as sales continued to slump, Miller Lite in 2003 unveiled an intentionally sensational advertising campaign, via agency Ogilvy & Mather, called "Catfight." Resurrecting the "Tastes great, less filling" debate but using a wrestling match between nearly nude women to decide the outcome, the campaign generated a high volume of mostly negative publicity while scoring well with 21- to 34-year-old males. As with other recent Miller Lite campaigns, however, "Catfight" had no effect on sales.

At this time, additionally, a developing diet trend was cutting into beer sales industry-wide. Diets such as the Atkins and South Beach programs, in which carbohydrate intake was drastically curtailed while protein and fat sources were recommended, increasingly became the preferred weight-loss method for Americans. The demand for pasta and bread products declined sharply, and food manufacturers of all types developed low-carb lines or relabeled existing products to capitalize on the trend. In 2002 Anheuser-Busch made the beer industry's first direct play for the low-carb dollar, introducing Michelob Ultra, a brew boasting a mere 2.6 grams of carbohydrates per 12-ounce serving.

BEERS IN COURT

During the intensifying beer wars of the summer of 2004, a rallying Miller made light of Budweiser's "King of Beers" slogan, as well as its trademark Clydesdale horses, in the "President of Beers" campaign. In response, Anheuser-Busch ran a print ad reiterating its status as "King of Beers" and calling Miller Lite the "Queen of Carbs," while pointing out that Miller was (in contrast to the patriotic theme of its "President of Beers" campaign) owned by South African Breweries.

SABMiller took America's top brewer to court, claiming that the "Queen of Carbs" insult was misleading and that the South African Breweries claim was untrue: although SABMiller's roots were in South Africa, its headquarters were now in London; moreover, there was no longer any entity called South African Breweries (the name had been retired when the merger with Miller took place). A U.S. district judge issued a preliminary injunction stating that Anheuser-Busch could no longer refer to Miller as "owned by South African Breweries" but that it could call Miller "South African–owned." A decision on the "Queen of Carbs" issue was postponed until a later hearing.

TARGET MARKET

In touting Miller Lite's own low 3.2 grams of carbs per serving, SABMiller displayed its awareness of the extensive mainstream and cross-generational appeal of the low-carb diet programs. Among the beer industry's core audience of men aged 21 to 34, Ogilvy & Mather and SABMiller described their ideal target, according to a brief filed for the 2005 EFFIE Awards, in the following way: "[The] consumer is confident, growing and dynamic . . . Single, possibly in his first job, he's optimistic, diverse but mainstream in background and interests . . . He's much more concerned with staying fit for physical appearances than necessarily for health reasons." The brewer and its agency likewise expected the "Low Carb" spots to register with the over-35 drinker who was "Much like the pack, but a bit older . . . As he enters mid-life he has put on a few pounds, the spare tire, and is looking for ways to watch what he eats without giving up the things he loves."

COMPETITION

Bud Light's advertising prior to the launch of Miller Lite's "Low Carb" campaign had been characteristically noteworthy. One of the brand's most lauded marketing efforts ever, a radio campaign called "Real Men of Genius,'' had made the leap to television, and three of the TV spots won Gold Lions at the 2004 Cannes International Advertising Festival. The campaign poked fun at classic beer advertising with mock paeans to such ''men of genius'' as ''Mr. Really Really Really Bad Dancer.''

As the Miller ''Low Carb'' campaign began running, however, it became clear that the direct comparison of Miller Lite's carbohydrate count with Bud Light's was causing a negative impact on the latter's sales. Anheuser-Busch reacted by making the rare move of using its advertising to respond to a competitor. Anheuser-Busch used the ''Real Men of Genius'' concept to mock ''Mr. Over-the-Top Carb Watcher,'' and it ran ''Bud Light Institute'' spots in which the fictional scientific group created devices ''to burn off the ridiculously low carbs'' in Bud Light. The devices included a treadmill for fingers and a workout machine for toes. Another series of Bud Light spots argued that all light beers were low in carbs and advised consumers to ''choose on taste.'' Miller Lite retorted to this advertisement with a spot thanking Bud Light for the endorsement, the obvious implication being that Miller Lite was the better-tasting beer. Thus began one of the more bitter installments in the ''beer wars.''

One complexity in Anheuser-Busch's position relative to the low-carb craze was the fact that its own brand, Michelob Ultra, had been responsible for the carb comparison among beers in the first place, and, indeed, for part of the fall-off in Bud Light's growth. Anheuser-Busch estimated that up to 50 percent of Bud Light's sales were lost to Michelob Ultra during the new brew's popularity peak. Also, as Anheuser-Busch tried to argue that Bud Light's slightly higher carbohydrate count relative to Miller Lite was no cause for concern, it risked decreasing demand for Michelob Ultra, whose primary appeal was that it had an even lower carb count than Miller Lite.

The Adolph Coors Company, a distant third in the American beer wars, increased its market share in the late 1990s, and its leading product, Coors Light, had by 2001 surpassed Miller Light to become the country's third most popular beer (and second most popular light beer). Recent Coors Light branding work included spots featuring doctored footage of legendary actor John Wayne as well as youth-targeted ads featuring musician Kid Rock. Like Bud Light, Coors Light found itself forced to respond to the Miller Lite ''Low Carb'' commercials. One spot asserted that the carbohydrate difference between Miller Lite and Coors Light was so miniscule that the amount could be burned off during a slow dance. Coors also introduced a low-carb beer, Aspen Edge, in 2003.

MARKETING STRATEGY

An assumption driving domestic light-beer advertising had long been that, since consumers recognized no significant difference in product quality among the mainstream brands, the focus of marketing campaigns should be on establishing an approachable and fun brand identity. Anheuser-Busch's Bud Light had successfully done this since the 1980s, whereas Miller Lite had, since the product-quality emphasis of its early ''Tastes Great, Less Filling'' campaign, struggled to rival its much-larger competitor's branding work. Anheuser-Busch, in confronting the low-carb diet craze directly with the introduction of Michelob Ultra in 2002, simultaneously exposed a weakness in the positioning of its other brand, Bud Light. As carb-conscious drinkers abandoned Bud Light for Michelob Ultra, Miller Lite saw an opening that would allow it to challenge Bud Light by returning to a product-quality focus.

The Miller Lite ''Low Carb'' ads were extremely simple. As Bob Garfield of Advertising Age put it in an approving review of the campaign, ''The creative concept is . . . well, there is no creative concept.'' Instead, the campaign's spots put the focus entirely on the product and its comparative carbohydrate content. A close-up of beer being poured into a glass was the sole visual element in TV spots, aside from on-screen type that followed the lead of a voice-over as it revealed that Miller Lite had half the carbs of Bud Light, 1/3 fewer carbs than Coors Light, and 70 percent fewer carbs than Michelob Light. As the campaign continued, only one other idea was added to the low-carb message: that Miller Lite tasted great, too.

The phrasing in the 15-second spots was subject to minor adjustments as the campaign evolved. Most notably, after Bud Light responded to Miller Lite's ''Low Carb'' spots with its own commercials claiming that consumers should ''choose on taste,'' Miller Lite aired ''Endorsement,'' in which the voice-over thanked its competitor for suggesting Miller Lite. Holiday versions of the commercials added to the low-carb/rich taste message with lines like, ''the turkey will be the only thing that's stuffed.'' Radio, print, and outdoor advertising similarly focused directly on the message of Miller Lite's carbohydrate count and taste relative to the competition. After the low-carb theme had been clearly established, taste became the campaign's central focus, positioning the brand for further growth beyond the inevitable waning of the dieting trend.

The ''Low Carb'' campaign broke in August 2003, and the TV spots targeted high-profile programming that appealed to its male target, relying especially on broadcasts of National Football League and Major League Baseball games. The campaign ran heavily on cable networks such as FoxSports, ESPN, and VH-1, with supporting buys on TBS and TNT. In addition to airing with sports and music programming, the spots ran during male-oriented movie broadcasts. Print ads ran in national sports and lifestyle magazines with a large male audience, including Maxim, ESPN, and Rolling Stone, and outdoor ads targeted important urban centers. The radio spots ran primarily on rock, contemporary hit radio, urban, R&B, and album-oriented rock stations. The campaign cost more than $20 million and ran into 2004.

OUTCOME

The ''Low Carb'' campaign exceeded Miller Lite's goal of the preceding decade: to reverse the seemingly unstoppable erosion of the brand's market share. Thirteen weeks into the campaign's run Miller Lite had already seen its first sales gains in nearly five years. For the first eight weeks of 2004 Miller Lite sales were up 15 percent compared with the same period of the previous year, while both Bud Light and Coors Light lost market share. In-house as well as external media analysis of Miller Lite's turnaround attributed the success almost solely to the brand's low-carb positioning. The campaign won a Bronze EFFIE Award in the Beverages/Alcohol category from the New York American Marketing Association in 2005.

As the peak summer selling season approached, SABMiller remained on the offensive, continuing its attacks on Anheuser-Busch with an election-themed campaign (coinciding with the 2004 U.S. Presidential election) created by Portland (Oregon) ad agency Wieden+Kennedy, in which a candidate-like spokesman argued from a podium that there was no place for monarchy in the United States (a reference to the longstanding Budweiser slogan, ''King of Beers'') and that beer drinkers should elect Miller ''President of Beers.'' Anheuser-Busch fought back with print ads that called Miller Lite ''The Queen of Carbs'' (presumably suggesting that carb-counting was not a masculine activity) and that drew attention to its South African ownership (the implication being that Miller's patriotic stance was fraudulent). Miller Lite continued to take aim at Bud Light with a campaign centered on blind taste tests in bars, the results of which allegedly indicated an overwhelming preference for Miller Lite. Miller Lite's market share continued to grow at higher levels than Bud Light's, and the brew's advertisements kept boasting about its supposedly superior taste. In 2005 Miller Lite outsold Coors Light to reclaim the number two spot in its category. By this point the low-carb diet craze had begun to wane.

MILLER HIGH LIFE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For much of the twentieth century Miller High Life had been the flagship brand of the Miller Brewing Company (which became SABMiller plc in 2002) and one of America's best-selling beers, but during the 1980s, as light beers exponentially gained in popularity, High Life's sales declined sharply. Miller stopped supporting the brand with national advertising, focusing its attention instead on its leading products, Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft, and in 1993 the company downgraded High Life's pricing to subpremium, taking it out of competition with leading full-calorie beers like Budweiser. In 1998, as Miller struggled to make up market share against industry-dominating Anheuser-Busch, it repackaged Miller High Life in bottles with a retro look and labeling and initiated a national television campaign positioning the beer as the embodiment of no-nonsense American masculinity.

The ''Miller High Life'' campaign, created by Wieden+Kennedy (W+K) of Portland, Oregon, and directed by documentary filmmaker Errol Morris, played on nostalgia for an earlier era while employing 1990s irony. The TV spots featured men with straightforward appetites and values and used deadpan voice-overs to bemoan the state of present-day manhood while celebrating the virtues of such throwback staples as buttered hamburgers and duct tape. The combination of blue-collar values and postmodern irony allowed High Life to appeal not just to its traditional audience of older drinkers but also to a niche group of hip, younger consumers. Launched with a first-year budget of approximately $5 million, the campaign's price tag grew, as a result of increasing sales, to more than double that amount in later years.

A clear sales boost was attributed to the campaign, exceeding Miller's initially modest expectations. The campaign also attracted significant critical acclaim and numerous awards during its long run, during which time Miller raised the brew's profile among its stable of beers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Miller Brewing Company started in 1855 as the Plank Road Brewery in Milwaukee. In 1903 the company introduced Miller High Life, and in 1906 the slogan "Champagne of Bottled Beers" was attached to the brew. By the 1960s the slogan had given the brand the aura of a rich man's beer, but the rich alone did not provide Miller with the consumer base it needed to increase its market share. Philip Morris bought the brewery in 1969, edited the slogan to "Champagne of Beers," and hired McCann-Erickson of New York to market Miller. The agency helmed the classic "Miller Time" campaign of the 1970s, which positioned High Life as a workingman's beer and paved the way for booming sales in the 1970s. By 1978 Miller High Life, with sales of 21.7 million barrels, was a close second to Budweiser.

Soon thereafter, however, the light-beer category, which was invented by Miller with Miller Lite, began to cut into High Life's sales, and during the 1980s Miller's flagship beer rapidly lost market share. In 1985 Miller introduced Miller Genuine Draft, which eventually replaced Miller High Life as the company's leading full-calorie beer, and in 1988 Miller High Life's packaging was updated and the "Champagne of Beers" slogan dropped entirely. New advertising campaigns did nothing to halt the brand's free fall, and in 1993 Miller discounted High Life to subpremium pricing and drastically cut advertising on its behalf. Miller had meanwhile been allocating most of its marketing resources to Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft.

Miller lost market share across all categories in the mid- to late 1990s, however, as Bud Light outpaced Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft failed to keep pace with Budweiser in an increasingly tough full-calorie beer market. In 1997 strategic discounting led to improved sales of High Life, and Miller decided to try to bolster the sales of its once-leading product with more aggressive branding. The company repackaged the beer in tall bottles with retro labels that resurrected the "Champagne of Beers" slogan and hired W+K to mount the first national television campaign behind High Life since the mid-1980s.

TARGET MARKET

The "Miller High Life" campaign targeted male baby boomers and young adults simultaneously, using nostalgia as well as irony. The beer's new packaging hearkened back to Miller's 1970s heyday, and the campaign saluted traditional masculinity. But the subject matter and the tone of the paeans in the commercials were intentionally exaggerated to appeal to a knowing audience. As Paul Lukas noted in American Demographics, both the beer's packaging and the new ads made reference to the past without glorifying it, "sidestepping both the heavy kitsch factor inherent in the current spate of retro appeals and the bop-on-the-head ironies of postmodern ads." Advertising Age's Jonah Bloom noted that "it was the rare example of a campaign that appealed to young hipsters, and even some frat boys, without alienating the more-mature drinker."

The commercials set out to define manhood via the concept of a High Life man who embodied waning all-American values that Miller sought to connect with the brand. A "Miller High Life Manifesto," conceived by W+K creative director Jeff Kling, announced that "only a large-scale decline in American manhood can account for the near disappearance of Miller High Life Beer," and the ensuing TV spots drove home this point by

ERROL MORRIS

Errol Morris, who directed the Miller High Life ads for the duration of the multiyear campaign, was an award winner in both the advertising and the documentary film worlds. With a well-regarded film catalog already behind him, including A Thin Blue Line; A Brief History of Time; Fast, Cheap & Out of Control; and Mr. Death, Morris won an Oscar for Best Documentary in 2004 for his film The Fog of War: Eleven Lessons from the Life of Robert S. McNamara. That same year he won the Directors Guild of America Award for Best Commercial Director based on his work for Miller High Life, Nike, and Cisco. ''It's almost like I have these two separate careers,'' he told Adweek. ''I have a career as a documentary filmmaker, and I have a career as a commercial director, and oddly enough, there are people who know me for one and not the other.'' illustrating acceptable and unacceptable behaviors from the point of view of a High Life Man. Kling told Shoot, ''We are appealing to that masculine sensibility, the way men are always imparting undue significance to whatever it is we're doing, like a guy saying if I can't drive that 16-penny nail in three strokes I'll quit right now . . . It's like it's a matter of pride, as if the very fabric of our democracy is being woven here with the shifting gears of backing up a trailer . . . It's an absurd way of thinking that's pretty particular to guys.'' But at the same time, as Barbara Lippert noted in Adweek, the commercials, with their emphasis on nostalgia, did not alienate viewers with different belief systems: ''We're all invited in—hetero, homo, male, female, young, old, redneck, hipster, micro or imported beer drinker.''

COMPETITION

Anheuser-Busch's share of the domestic beer market approached 50 percent during this time, while Miller had less than a quarter and the Adolph Coors Company roughly 10 percent of the market. Full-calorie brew sales were waning for each company. Budweiser, the country's top beer for decades and formerly Miller High Life's direct rival, had been losing ground to sibling Bud Light for years. Coors Light, meanwhile, had long ago surpassed full-calorie Coors Original.

In the late 1990s and early 2000s, Anheuser-Busch advertising consistently set the standard for the beer industry, and despite declining sales of Budweiser, the brewer continued to support the ''King of Beers'' with blockbuster ad campaigns. Budweiser ads featuring talking frogs who croaked ''Budweiser'' in combination with one another gave way to a competing cast of lizards and an evolving swamp creatures story line, and then Budweiser made an even bigger splash with ''Whassup?!'' which featured a group of friends who greeted one another using the idiosyncratic slang question that gave the campaign its name. Among Bud Light's campaigns during these years was a radio effort called ''Real American Heroes'' that, similar to the ''Miller High Life'' campaign, updated the values associated with 1970s beer advertising. In contrast to the everyday heroes showcased in the classic ''Miller Time'' and ''This Bud's for You'' campaigns, ''Real American Heroes'' used 1990s-style irony in mock salutes to such ''heroes'' as the inventor of foot-long hotdogs.

The attempt by Coors to resuscitate sales of Coors Original by touting its rich taste—and, implicitly, its alcohol content—met with mixed results in the declining market for full-calorie domestic beers. Like Miller, Coors allocated the lion's share of its advertising budget to its light beer, which was by far its top seller and was threatening to overtake Miller Lite in sales. Coors Light campaigns of the time included the ''Beer Man'' commercials, which focused on ballpark beer vendors, and ads featuring doctored footage of legendary actor John Wayne.

Anheuser-Busch brands Natural Light, Busch, and Busch Light each consistently outsold High Life in the subpremium category. Among these brands only Busch received substantial advertising support, however.

MARKETING STRATEGY

W+K's Kling and Jeff Williams, the creative director and art director, respectively, for the ''Miller High Life'' campaign, generated the controlling concept and drafted the initial scripts for the television spots. They ''wanted the spots to have the authority of looking older, and lavishing these arcane and absurd subjects with a lot of attention,'' Kling told Shoot. ''But we also didn't want them to look irrelevant and retro.'' Based on these priorities, Kling and Williams contacted the acclaimed documentary filmmaker Morris, whose movie Fast, Cheap & Out of Control had convinced them that he might have the sensibility to match their vision. Once Morris agreed to work on the commercials, the three of them collaborated to define the visual elements of the campaign. Doug Jeffers was hired to do the deep-toned, calm, authoritative voice-over work that Kling and Williams had envisioned.

Taken together, the 15- and 30-second spots, which ran primarily on sports programming, were meant to construct a coherent world in which, according to Morris, ''values have been correctly readjusted.'' In ''Hamburger,'' for instance, a greasy burger was served to a diner patron as a voice-over stated, ''Something's not quite right.'' Then the waitress added a large scoop of butter to the patty, and the voice-over proclaimed, ''There, now that's a sandwich. And there's only one beer that can stand up to a man's meal. Right again. That's living the High Life. That's Miller Time.'' ''Duct Tape'' showed a man repairing his garage refrigerator, which held High Life, baking soda, and pickles, with duct tape, as Jeffers intoned, ''The High Life man knows that if the pharaohs had duct tape, the Sphinx would still have a nose. We salute you, duct tape. You help a man get to Miller Time.'' ''Boat,'' on the other hand, distinguished the High Life man's values by using the negative example of a neighbor incompetently backing a boat trailer into his driveway with an SUV. ''This is enough to put a High Life man off his lunch,'' proclaimed the voice-over. ''Time was a man knew how to command his own vehicle. Just how far are we willing to fall? Better reacquaint yourself with the High Life, soldier, before someone tries to take away your Miller Time.'' As the campaign continued, both the concept and the execution stayed the same, with Morris continuing to direct all of the spots.

OUTCOME

The campaign was immediately applauded by critics and advertising industry insiders. Upon its launch Adweek's Barbara Lippert compared it favorably to virtually all other beer advertising: ''It's so original and charming, it's as if Miller has finally found its way out of the image desert. There isn't a beer ad cliché in sight. This work reaches way beyond male bonding, bikinis and sports, as well as their second-generation replacements: anxious men, cross-dressers and talking frogs.'' Advertising Age named Morris's work on the campaign the Best Effort in Direction in 1998 and named the overall campaign its runner-up for Best of 1998 honors. W+K won a campaign gold award from the Art Directors Club in 2003 on the basis of its ''Miller High Life'' work, and Morris was nominated as Best Commercial Director by the Directors Guild of America in 2004, based in part on his work on ''Miller High Life.'' In the campaign's sixth year Creativity said, ''As other brewers assume all manner of unbecoming poses in efforts to get with the cool kids, the Miller High Life campaign keeps on keeping its pants on and is, as a result, cooler than just about any work out there.''

Originally allotted only $5 million of Miller's budget on an experimental basis, the campaign grew in stature both within and without the company during its nearly 7-year run, and it was credited with stopping a 20-year slide in High Life sales. Miller never expected High Life to challenge the likes of Budweiser, but by 2002 the subpremium brand had overtaken its premium sibling, Miller Genuine Draft, even though the latter's advertising budget of $25.3 million was nearly double that of the ''Miller High Life'' campaign at the time. Despite the fact that 21- to 27-year-olds, the primary target for most beer advertising, were only part of the target market for the ''Miller High Life'' ads, the percentage of sales among that segment more than doubled in the years 2001–03. When SABMiller decided in 2005 to phase out the High Life man, Bloom of Advertising Age lamented, ''The High Life man deserves a promotion, not retirement.''

WRITE OUT LOUD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Sanford, L.P., a fixture among ink companies since the mid-nineteenth century, introduced the Sharpie permanent marker in 1964. In subsequent decades the Fine Point black Sharpie became the world's most popular permanent marker, and the Sharpie brand experienced sustained growth at the expense of its competitors. With market dominance assured in the near term, Sharpie began looking for further brand growth via the introduction of new tip designs and ink colors. By 2002, however, the brand was still almost exclusively associated with its most successful product, the black Sharpie Fine Point. Sanford enlisted the New York office of ad agency McCann-Erickson Worldwide to helm a 2003 marketing campaign intended to spur sales of the other Sharpie lines and position the overall brand for sustained market growth.

The campaign, called "Write Out Loud," leveraged an initial budget of $7 million in the attempt to build a brand to which consumers could become emotionally attached, thereby driving sales of newer Sharpie models. McCann-Erickson's messaging strategy was built on the notion that, since marks made with a Sharpie were permanent, those who used the product were making a bold statement that was the equivalent of "writing out loud." One TV spot, for instance, showed a young husband preparing to record over a videotape marked "Our Wedding" in metallic silver Sharpie ink. While looking at the silver print, the husband saw an image of his wife's face and imagined her saying, "Don't even think about it." Point-of-sale tie-ins supported the media portion of the campaign, as did a series of promotions benefiting educational organizations in various American cities. The campaign began in June 2003.

During the campaign's 2003 run sales of Sharpie varieties that were showcased in the TV spots—the Chisel Tip, Fine Point Color, and Metallic lines—increased substantially. Sales of all Sharpie products likewise ballooned, helping the brand reach its sales goals for the entire year several months ahead of schedule. The campaign was extended in 2004 to pitch another new Sharpie line, a retractable-tip version of the marker that could be used with one hand, and in 2005 the "Write Out Loud" concept was once again reprised behind the new Sharpie Mini product, a smaller version of the standard marker.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1857 Frederick W. Redington and William H. Sanford, Jr., started the Sanford Manufacturing Company, a maker of ink and glue based in Worcester, Massachusetts. The company relocated to Chicago in the following decade and continued to grow through the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. It managed to expand even during the Great Depression, thanks primarily to the quality of its products and its distribution network. Early Sanford marketing included a Norman Rockwell print with copy reading, "It's lucky for you, child, your Gran'dad wrote this will with Sanford's Ink!" Renamed the Sanford Ink Company in 1940, the company moved its headquarters in 1947 to the suburban Chicago location that it would occupy for the rest of the century and beyond. The company moved into the emerging permanent-marker field in the 1960s, introducing the world's first pen-style permanent marker, the Sharpie. Among the initial marketing on behalf of the new product were celebrity endorsements by talk-show hosts Jack Parr and Johnny Carson. In subsequent decades the Sharpie Fine Point black marker became America's most popular permanent marker and the brand's iconic product.

In the 1970s and 1980s Sanford introduced Sharpie Extra Fine Point and Ultra Fine Point markers, and in the 1990s the company began to offer its range of Sharpie models in a variety of different colors. Although the brand grew during the 1990s, partly as a result of the growth of the memorabilia industry—virtually all sports and celebrity autographs were signed using Sharpies—sales of the new Sharpie colors and models did not meet expectations. The number of Sharpie colors and models continued to increase through the early 2000s, but the brand remained almost entirely connected, in consumers' minds, with the stalwart Fine Point black model. To push the full range of the brand's products, Sharpie used its largest marketing campaign to date, a 2002 integrated effort tagged "How Do You Use Your Sharpie?" A TV spot used man-on-the-street testimonials meant to demonstrate the multiple important uses to which various Sharpie markers were put. Though the campaign reinforced consumers' positive opinions of Sharpie's functionality, it did little to build emotional resonance around the brand.

TARGET MARKET

Because Sharpie users did not fit into any specific demographic group or groups, McCann-Erickson targeted a diverse market with "Write Out Loud." Though the disparate ways in which Sharpies were used would seem to complicate the brand's messaging tactics, McCann-Erickson found, through qualitative research, that individual Sharpie users were united by their desire to leave a permanent impression. When using a Sharpie, as opposed to a pencil or pen, the consumer wanted whatever he or she was writing to attract attention. This insight was translated into the idea that those who used Sharpies were bold and assertive—and into a target market unified by a mindset rather than a cultural or generational identity.

THE SHARPIE 500

Among Sharpie's marketing efforts outside of the "Write Out Loud" campaign was its ongoing partnership with the National Association of Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR). In 2001 the permanent-marker brand became the sponsor of the Bristol Night Race, a nighttime NASCAR event held at the Bristol Motor Speedway in Tennessee, and the race was accordingly renamed the Sharpie 500. The sponsorship deal was renewed in 2003, guaranteeing that the race would continue to be called the Sharpie 500 at least through 2008.

McCann-Erickson dubbed this target market "Impression Makers" and described them, in a 2004 EFFIE Award entry brief, in the following way: "['Impression Makers'] wanted to impose their will on their environment. They wanted to express themselves strongly with confidence and creativity and leave an imprint on their world (and every surface in that world). And they wanted a specific marker for a specific job that would allow them to leave that imprint and make that impact." By speaking to such qualities as boldness of personality and creativity despite the obviously down-to-earth nature of the product being marketed, McCann-Erickson hoped to build emotional resonance around the Sharpie brand. The agency and its client believed that an increase in the emotional ties to the Sharpie brand would boost consumers' interest in the specific new products highlighted in the campaign.

COMPETITION

The Sharpie brand accounted for an estimated 50 percent of permanent markers sold in the United States. Competing brands included Marks-A-Lot, owned by adhesives and office-supply maker Avery Dennison, and a line of permanent markers made by Eberhard Faber, a company known primarily for its pencils. Bic, the well-known pen company, also produced a line of Sharpie look-alike markers called "Mark-It." None of these competing brands had an advertising presence comparable to Sharpie's.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Budgeted at $7 million in its first year, "Write Out Loud" showcased fine-point colored and chisel-tip varieties of the Sharpie line, in addition to the new Sharpie Metallic product, which was designed to show up on dark surfaces. Though Sanford wanted to move Sharpie's brand image beyond its well-established reputation for functionality, the resulting emotional message, which focused on consumers' ability to make an imprint on the world with Sharpies, was naturally rooted in a key functional aspect of the product: the ink's boldness and permanence. Consumers, McCann-Erickson postulated, were mindful that the mark they were making with a Sharpie was permanent; therefore, their choice to make that mark was a bold and forceful one. As Greg Stoner, vice president and general manager of the Sharpie brand, announced in a press release, "If you want to make a bold statement—when you want to write out loud—you do it with a Sharpie marker." Sanford hoped that this more emotional brand positioning would drive sales of the specific advertised products, but the company also hoped that it would provide fuel for longer-term growth of the brand as a whole.

The campaign was released on June 23, 2003, with the first of three spots that aired on national network and cable TV in both 15- and 30-second versions. The initial spot, "Videotape," was also the campaign's most prominent one, showcasing the Sharpie Metallic marker by casting it in a humorous real-life situation involving a young married couple. The spot opened on a shot of a 20-something man searching in a frenzy for a blank videotape on which he could record a TV program that was about to begin. The only tape available was labeled "Our Wedding" in bold silver Sharpie Metallic ink; as it became clear that he was considering using the tape anyway, the Sharpie ink morphed onscreen into an image of his wife's face as she warned him, "Don't even think about it." The spot closed on an image of the married couple cozily watching their videotaped wedding together. The campaign's other two spots were "Party Cup," which focused on the subtleties of plastic-cup labeling, and "Moving Day," which communicated the impact that a Sharpie-labeled notice, such as "Fragile," had on professional movers. These spots showcased the fine-point colored and chisel-tip Sharpie varieties.

Point-of-purchase displays also communicated the "Write Out Loud" message, as did a series of promotional events prominently featuring Terrell Owens, a wide receiver for the San Francisco 49ers professional football team. Owens had become a de facto Sharpie endorser the previous season when he famously celebrated a touchdown by autographing the football he had been carrying, on the spot, with a Sharpie marker. Beginning in July 2003, after the "Write Out Loud" TV spots had begun airing, Owens participated in a program called "AUTOgraphs for Education," in which he and other professional football players visited Boys & Girls Clubs, schools, and other educational organizations, arriving in special-edition Sharpie Metallic Hummer H2 trucks to collect signatures from community members (signed using Sharpie markers, of course). Based on the number of signatures collected, Sharpie donated funds to the participating educational organization.

OUTCOME

During the campaign's 2003 run Sharpie Chisel Tip marker sales climbed by 7.3 percent, and Fine Point Color sales increased by 18.6 percent, according to McCann-Erickson. The launch of Sharpie Metallic was considered a success as well. Overall Sharpie sales grew by 27.5 percent during the 2003 portion of the campaign, with the brand meeting its sales goals for all of 2003 by September of that year, an acceleration of sales that Sanford attributed to the new campaign.

In 2004 the "Write Out Loud" campaign was extended on behalf of another new Sharpie line, Sharpie Retractable markers, which had writing tips that could be clicked into position using one hand, as with retractable pens. One TV spot focused on a mother whose baby began howling as soon as she put him down, leaving her only one hand with which to complete a time-sensitive Sharpie-labeling task. The retractable model, of course, allowed her to accomplish the task with her one free hand. The "AUTOgraphs for Education" series of promotions was continued in 2004 as well.

In 2005 Sanford and McCann-Erickson adapted the "Write Out Loud" tag to suit the launch of yet another suite of Sharpie products, the Sharpie Mini markers, which were about half the size of a standard Sharpie and thus more portable. Sanford increased the campaign budget to $10 million—a record high for the Sharpie brand—and added online and print advertisements to the continuing emphasis on television. The Mini TV spots were split into two vignettes, as in "Moon/Helmet": the first half of the spot showed an astronaut who, after landing on the moon, used a Sharpie Mini (attached to a lanyard around his neck) to sign "Doug Was Here" on the flag he planted into the moon's surface; the scene then shifted to a youth football game, where a coach drew a game-winning play on the back of the center's helmet so that the quarterback would remember how to execute it. Once again, the autograph promotion benefiting educational institutions provided grassroots support for Sharpie's mainstream marketing efforts, though the 2005 installment focused on professional golfers.

SPIRIT OF FREEDOM CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Hoechst Marion Roussel became a part of Sanofi-Aventis. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

On August 8, 1997, the United States Food and Drug Administration (FDA) announced new guidelines regulating direct-to-consumer (DTC) advertising of prescription drugs. The following Monday Hoechst Marion Roussel of Kansas City, Missouri, aired a revised version of its "Wheat-surfer" commercial for Allegra, its non-sedating prescription antihistamine. The previous version of the spot mentioned the brand name but not the condition it treated, in compliance with the old FDA rules that prohibited the mention of both the brand and the condition. The new commercial, which was the first television spot to take advantage of the updated rules, complied with the new standards by stating the brand, purpose, and benefits of the drug, while also mentioning possible risks or side effects and indicating a toll-free telephone number and a website for further information about the product.

The commercial itself fused high technology with symbolic imagery suggesting the freedom Allegra offered its users from their allergies. In the commercial a windsurfer sailed across a sea of wheat, suggesting both the ability to coexist with allergens and the liberty to remain active and have fun during the allergy season. Hoechst's advertising agency, the Medicus Consumer division of DMB&B New York, enlisted the services of Industrial Light & Magic Commercial Productions, the outfit that revolutionized special effects with the Star Wars movies, to create the illusion of windsurfing on dry land. Industrial Light & Magic subsequently produced follow-up commercials depicting a snorkler swimming through a flower field and a skier traversing a meadow. Competitor Claritin used similar imagery—a brightly-colored hot-air balloon that rose high above allergy-producing plants.

Traditionally pharmaceutical companies had targeted physicians with their prescription-drug advertising, since doctors by law controlled the consumption of these medicines. Patients, however, were the final consumers of the products, so in the mid-1980s companies began to target consumers directly, first with print ads and then with television commercials. The FDA's loosening of restrictions was intended to lessen the confusion created by the previous policies, though some critics questioned the wisdom of over-commercializing medicines since the consumer had no direct control over the accessibility of these drugs; doctors remained the gatekeepers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1985 Hoechst Marion Roussel introduced Seldane, the first nonsedating antihistamine. Seldane dominated the prescription market almost immediately, forcing antihistamines containing sedatives such as Schering-Plough's CTM and Parke-Davis' Benadryl to be sold over the counter. The prescription antihistamine market expanded markedly as consumers responded to this new remedy that produced significantly less drowsiness. Other pharmaceutical companies developed nonsedating antihistamines to take advantage of this new market, but none could challenge Seldane's market control. Johnson & Johnson's Hismanal came closest, with sales of more than $200 million in 1992; that same year Seldane's still dominated the market, with sales of more than $500 million.

Also in 1992 researchers discovered that Seldane could be hazardous in certain circumstances. If patients also suffered from liver disease, or if they were also taking a common antibiotic (erythromycin) or antifungal drug (ketaconozole), Seldane could build up in their bodies, possibly causing heart problems such as cardiotoxicity and arrhythmia that could threaten their lives. Although these circumstances were rare, the "black box" warning on the label required by the FDA branded Seldane as dangerous, eroding its control of the market. The subsequent year, Schering-Plough rebounded from its departure from the prescription antihistamine market by introducing Claritin. Claritin was marketed on the strength of its easy, once-a-day dosage and on the weakness of Seldane's perceived dangers. With the addition of Zyrtec from Pfizer, Seldane's control of the prescription antihistamine market dwindled, while Claritin's control increased until it gained dominance of the prescription antihistamine market in 1995.

In August 1996 Hoechst introduced Allegra, a prescription antihistamine that was a metabolite-meaning that it entered the bloodstream pharmacologically active instead of having to be metabolized to be activated. Allegra thus avoided the hazardous problems associated with its parent drug, Seldane. Furthermore, FDA regulations prevented television advertising of Seldane because of its "black box" status, so the advent of Allegra allowed Hoechst to recommence its television advertising. Although it was tempting to market Allegra on the equity created by Seldane, Hoechst realized that the negative publicity surrounding Seldane's hazards damaged the integrity of this equity, so Hoechst set out to create Allegra's own brand identity among the four other non- or low-sedating antihistamines on the prescription market.

TARGET MARKET

The marketing of Allegra represented a challenge to Medicus, as the advertising had to reach two distinct camps: physicians and consumers. Since physicians alone could prescribe medications, they needed to be informed of what Medicus' executive vice president and management director Lorraine Pastore called Allegra's "constellation of benefits": speed of action, power, efficacy, convenience of dosage, and all-around safety. "The diversity of preferences [that doctors mentioned in Medicus' research] led us to a collage presentation," Pastore said. Resembling a Monty Python cartoon, the collage featured 19th medical engravings as part of a six-page print ad that ran in prominent medical journals such as the Journal of the American Medical Association, Diversion, Medical Economics, Postgraduate Medicine, New England Journal of Medicine, American Family Physician, Cortland Forum, and Family Practice News, as well as publications geared toward allergy specialists and internists.

Simultaneously (and equally important), Medicus initiated a consumer print campaign in August 1996, featuring stills of the wheat-surfer in such mainstream publications as USA Today, the New York Times, the Washington Post, and weekly and monthly magazines. A television commercial featuring action shots of the wheat-surfer appeared two months later, in October 1996. Television's far-reaching influence was a key to marketing Allegra, with the potential to directly access those who suffered from allergy symptoms, the majority of whom did not seek prescription relief. A 1997 study by the American Pharmaceutical Association and Prevention magazine revealed that almost two-thirds of all consumers had seen DTC advertising, and 60 percent of those saw commercials on television. This exposure prompted almost a third of those who had seen DTC ads to ask their doctors about the advertised prescription products, and 29 percent of that third asked their doctors to write a prescription for the product. Doctors heeded these requests three-quarters of the time. So DTC advertising created a funneling effect whereby vast media exposure prompted a moderate number of

ALLEGRA FREEDOM FORECAST

In order to offer consumers (especially those not currently prescribed Allegra) more information about allergic reactions, Hoechst Marion Roussel set up the Allegra Freedom Forecast via a toll-free number and the Allegra website. The forecasts—devised by the aeroallergen research firm Multidata, Inc., of St. Paul, Minnesota—automatically fed variables such as past pollen records, variations of temperature, humidity, and rainfall, and percent of sunshine into a mathematical formula that predicted allergen counts with 85 percent accuracy in 50 U.S. cities on a daily basis.

inquiries, some of which translated into prescriptions and purchases.

Allegra's marketing targeted not only those who suffered from allergies regularly but also those who experienced allergic reactions sporadically. The revised "Wheat-surfer" spot specifically mentioned seasonal allergic rhinitis (SAR), an allergic reaction triggered by unseasonal changes in the weather or travel to new places that caused chronic flu-like symptoms. Since SAR could strike even those unaccustomed to allergies, and since its symptoms resembled those of a cold or flu, informing consumers of SAR was a means of establishing new markets.

COMPETITION

Schering-Plough's Claritin led the prescription antihistamine market in both revenues and market share. Claritin's North American sales amounted to $1.7 billion dollars in 1997, as compared to second-place Zyrtec's $265 million and third-place Allegra's $214 million. In the United States 67 percent of all antihistamine prescriptions written were for Claritin; Allegra was the second most-prescribed antihistamine, at 16 percent, followed by Zyrtec at 14 percent. Although Allegra was prescribed more often than Zyrtec, Allegra was the lowest-priced prescription antihistamine on the market, thus earning less in revenues. But Hoechst priced Allegra lower to attract customers from Claritin, which cost approximately 18 percent more. Each company spent roughly the same amount in 1997 advertising for these products, according to Competitive Media Reporting: Schering-Plough spent $68.4 million on Claritin, Hoechst spent $64.2 million on Allegra, and Pfizer spent $53.5 million on Zyrtec. Comparing these expenditures to revenues, Claritin was clearly the profit leader.

Claritin's commercials used imagery similar to Allegra's. Claritin's "Blue-Skies Balloon" spot featured a bright-colored, logo-branded hot-air balloon flying above the earth and then depositing its riders on the ground, unaffected by floating allergens. But the spot did not fully comply with the new FDA regulations; the benefits of the antihistamine pill overshadowed the risks and safety information, which were presented faster and in colors that did not distinguish the print from the background. The commercial had been in production when the FDA changed its rules, forcing Power Post Production to revise the spot quickly. An updated version that complied with new FDA regulations broke a few weeks later, in late August 1997.

Claritin ran into trouble earlier when it tried to capitalize on Seldane's hazards. On January 13, 1997, the FDA announced that it was considering banning Seldane because its benefits "no longer outweigh[ed] the risks of potentially fatal cardiac side effects"; Claritin immediately mounted a print campaign that quoted this FDA statement, then added, "Claritin. A safe choice." Hoechst filed a false-advertising lawsuit against Schering-Plough on the grounds that the FDA's announcement was based upon the availability of Allegra as an alternative to Seldane, a fact that the Claritin ad overlooked. The U.S. District Court in Kansas City, Missouri, granted a temporary restraining order blocking the Claritin ad. This had little effect, however, as the ad had already run its course. Hoechst and Schering settled the suit out of court in mid-February 1997, though the terms were not made public.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The strategies Hoechst developed for marketing Seldane's principal active metabolite, fexofenadine HCL, spread wide, extending as far as the choice of name: Allegra. Ads headlined, "Ahhh! Allegra!," followed by a lead-in line reading, "This allergy season, go far ahhhfield." The alliterative invocation of the "a" sound not only echoed the brand name but also reminded the consumer of respiratory relief. The first four letters of the name mirrored the condition it corrected, allergies, but the middle passage of the name also sounded like another important allergy-related term, alleviate. In its logo the swirling "e" was meant to suggest the spirit of freedom.

The "Spirit of Freedom" motto underpinned the entire Allegra campaign. Allegra offered physicians "prescribing freedom" with Allegra's "constellation of benefits"—the fact that Allegra responded to so many different symptoms freed doctors to prescribe Allegra with confidence that it would address their patients' needs and be safe for use. Researchers did testing of the collage ad on the toughest professional audience, New York City doctors, renowned as ad skeptics who did not typify national attitudes. The underlying humor of the collage ads struck a chord with the cynical crowd, and—much to the surprise of the marketing team—the test results from New York City matched the positive feedback from doctors around the country. Defending the seeming irreverence of the Monty Python approach, Hoechst's product manager Jan Creidenberg commented, "It's provocative. We want it that way so that you can't turn the page without looking at it. It will stop M.D.s. Research shows that."

Creidenberg applied a similar spin to the consumer audience for Allegra: "We've done a lot of in-depth research with the consumer on this. We think we've captured allergy sufferers' deepest needs—wanting to be free of the limitations of allergies. We think we've expressed the consumers' spirit of yearning for the freedom to enjoy life to the fullest." The actions of the windsurfer were intended to emphasize this spirit—not only did the windsurfer sail across the wheat, she also did flips and twists, accentuating her freedom. Medicus creative director Jerry Weinstein explained, "We wanted the right body language in the surfer. It's freedom with ability and confidence." Weinstein further explained that the marketing of Allegra attempted to move beyond surface reasons for using this antihistamine and delve into the internal motivations for taking allergy medications—a longing for freedom from the effects of allergies.

This approach was "unexpected," according to Weinstein. Traditionally, noted Medicus creative director Richard Norman, antihistamine advertising relied on "conventional allergy icons—smiling patients, pills, flowers, fields, allergens, clear skies for clear breathing, sunrises for day-long effects." He continued, "We decided we could work against this background to create a strong Allegra brand identity. Allegra is a brand with a mind of its own." Hoechst and Medicus could have marketed Allegra using the usual imagery for antihistamines, or as Seldane's offspring, but neither method would have garnered as much attention as the bold move they made in striking out into unchartered territory to redefine the way antihistamines were advertised and marketed.

OUTCOME

Allegra outpaced most drugs in terms of its research, development, and submission for FDA approval, completing these steps in 2.8 years as compared with the average 14 years it took most drugs to reach the market. But Hoechst needed a product to replace Seldane quickly. When Allegra entered the market alongside Seldane, approximately half of Seldane's consumers switched to Allegra, maintaining company loyalty; at the same time, approximately a third of consumers new to the prescription antihistamine market chose Allegra, according to Hoechst public relations spokesperson Julie Gladman. On December 24, 1997, the FDA approved Allegra-D, which reached pharmacies in January 1998. On February 1, 1998, Hoechst removed Seldane and Seldane-D from the market altogether. The speed with which the two Allegra products replaced the two Seldane products minimized any damage done to public perception by the hazards associated with Seldane and maximized the transfer of market shares from Seldane to Allegra as much as possible.

The efficiency and efficacy of Hoechst's introduction of Allegra was too successful in one sense: since the "Wheat-surfer" spot was the first to take advantage of the relaxed FDA regulations, and since its technological wizardry made it so memorable, it became a lightning rod for criticism of the commercialization of prescription drugs. Two newspaper reporters, Daniel J. Vargas of the San Antonio Express-News and Erik Parens of the Cincinnati Enquirer, wrote articles criticizing FDA regulations of DTC advertising using examples from the "Wheat-surfer" spot. Neither article focused exclusively on prescription antihistamines, so Allegra bore the brunt of criticism for the entire prescription drug market.

Parens' editorial encapsulated others' arguments against DTC advertising, stating that "when advertisers aim their products at patients rather than physicians, they are changing the dynamic of the way drugs are prescribed. They are suggesting that consumers diagnose themselves—and present that diagnosis to their doctor." Diane Seo of the Los Angeles Times quoted doctors' pronouncements that "medicine should not be a commodity" and that the "role of the physician is being displaced by the push of consumerism." There was concern that some patients would fixate on the brand name advertised and remain deaf to doctors' advice that cheaper alternatives existed.

But doctors admitted that DTC advertising sometimes benefited patients, educating them about certain medical conditions and the drugs available to treat them. Hoechst's Julie Gladman pointed out that consumers "still can't get the product on their own," since doctors alone could write prescriptions. The makers of Allegra, according to Gladman, wanted "to increase the dialogue between consumer and doctor." Unlike most advertising, prescription drug advertising had a filter built in between the consumer and the product in the person of the doctor, thus necessitating greater saturation of the market with the brand's message, and even this did not guarantee a return on advertising expenditures.

The most noticeable outcome of the FDA's relaxation of DTC advertising regulations was the predictable increase in advertising spending: the American Association of Advertising Agencies reported a leap in DTC ad spending from $250 million in 1995 to $1 billion in 1997 (Allegra's ad expenditures jumped from $19.9 million in 1996, when it was introduced to the market, to $64.2 million in 1997). In the battle for shares of this $2-billion-a-year market, which promised to grow since the majority of those who suffered from allergic reactions did not seek prescription relief, Allegra continued to spin out new versions of its "Spirit of Freedom" message.

SATURN RELAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After establishing a clear identity as a customer-friendly carmaker in the 1980s, Saturn Corporation, a subsidiary of General Motors Corporation (GM), lost its way in the late 1990s. To regain its footing, Saturn designed a new automobile, the Ion, in the early 2000s. Instead of turning over the marketing of the car to its longtime advertising agency, Publicis & Hal Riney, the company opened up the account to the bids of other shops. The winner, in early 2002, was Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, based in San Francisco.

Soon after hiring Goodby for the Ion account, worth approximately $30 to $50 million, Saturn decided to make a complete break with the past and relaunch the Saturn brand. It expanded Goodby's deal into a $300 million account that would encompass all of Saturn's advertising. The Saturn relaunch campaign, which stretched from 2002 until the spring of 2004, was supported by grassroots marketing efforts that involved dealers and included concert sponsorships and promotions at minor league baseball games.

The campaign culminated in the introduction in 2004 of a new tagline, "People first," replacing Saturn's first slogan, "A different kind of company. A different kind of car." While one of the television spots, "Sheet Metal," won prestigious awards, the campaign did not succeed in preventing the erosion of Saturn's sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Saturn Corporation was created in the early 1980s as GM's answer to the Japanese automakers that had been successfully selling small cars in the United States. Saturn's approach was unique for U.S. carmakers on a number of levels. Most notably the company replaced the traditional assembly line with flexible work teams and gave its employees extensive training in teamwork, self-direction, and responsibility. In addition Saturn established a "no-haggle" sticker price to appeal to customers who disliked the high-pressure sales tactics of traditional dealers. Years before the first car rolled off the production line, Saturn settled on its customer profile, which was similar to that of the imported-car buyer: people under 40 years of age with an average salary of $51,000, half of whom were college graduates. Because a major part of its market would be on the West Coast, Saturn in 1988 hired San Francisco–based ad agency Hal Riney & Partners (later called Publicis & Hal Riney).

Riney's goal was to build a charismatic brand. Thus all car models were to be called Saturns and distinguished only by numbers. The agency then crafted emotional advertising that focused not on the cars themselves but on the Tennessee town in which the cars were made, the people who built them, and the dealers who sold them.

The idea was to get people to root for the company because they related to it. This approach was embodied in the tagline "A different kind of company. A different kind of car." Saturn's advertisements were pure Americana, warm and generous soft sells that told human stories.

Although Saturn was able to develop a mystique through its marketing, the company struggled to sell enough cars to make the venture a true success. By the late 1990s sales had become stagnant. In response Saturn introduced the L-Series midsize sedans and wagons in 1999. The advertising, however, failed to drive sales of these new models, leading some to question whether Riney's low-key approach had lost its edge and if a more traditional tactic might not work better. While Riney developed the advertising campaign for the Vue (Saturn's entry in the sport-utility-vehicle market), a new model called the Ion was in the works.

In 2001 Saturn invited competing ad agencies to bid on the Ion account, estimated to be worth $30 to $50 million, and it was won in 2002 by another San Francisco shop, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The agency's founders, Jeff Goodby and Rich Silverstein, were former protégés of Hal Riney who had left his firm in 1983 to start their own shop. Immediately after winning the Ion business Goodby inherited the entire Saturn account. Saturn's management had concluded that it was not wise to split responsibilities between the two agencies. Hence Goodby's task grew from promoting the Ion into relaunching the Saturn brand.

TARGET MARKET

Writing for Advertising Age in 2002, Bob Garfield maintained that Riney's "long-cultivated folksiness" approach to advertising the Saturn "attracted certain buyers but repelled many others. The same values that made Saturn appealing to middle-aged, female Consumer Reports subscribers made it uninteresting, even emasculating to men." In a separate Advertising Age article, Garfield described Saturn owners as "utilitarian souls who proudly wore their plodding not-quite-Nissans as badges of inconspicuous consumption." Aside from attracting more female than male buyers, the Saturn also appealed to an older market, with a median age of 44 for its owners. By not offering a version of the L-Series with both a six-cylinder engine and a five-speed manual transmission, the carmaker lost the business of younger drivers who wanted a more robust, fun-to-drive vehicle. A major reason Goodby won the Ion account was that its pitch appealed to these buyers. In its effort to promote the new Ion and to relaunch the Saturn brand, Goodby targeted small-car buyers aged 18 to 34 and attempted to reach a larger percentage of men than had previously chosen a Saturn.

THE NAME GAME

At the time Saturn was founded, Japanese imports were luring large numbers of customers away from American cars. It was with a pro-American message in mind that GM chose the name "Saturn," a reference to the Saturn rocket that propelled U.S. astronauts to the moon, arguably the greatest technological feat ever accomplished by Americans.

COMPETITION

Saturn originally sought to compete with the Toyota Corolla and the Honda Civic in the subcompact sedan and coupé market, and during the mid-1990s it succeeded in luring a large number of buyers who had previously bought foreign cars. But when the brand was hot, cash-strapped GM failed to invest in bringing out new Saturn models, opting instead to put money into its Oldsmobile brand. While Saturn stood still, Japanese carmakers added features that it was unable to match. Moreover Saturn faced increased competition from South Korea's Hyundai Motor Co. and from U.S. automakers such as Chrysler, which introduced the Plymouth/Dodge Neon subcompact model in 1994. The L-Series, aimed at the midsize-car market, was supposed to be Saturn's salvation, but it proved a major disappointment, selling in far smaller numbers than expected. To make matters worse the company did not keep pace with changing consumer tastes as an increasing number of buyers opted for SUVs and luxury cars.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Once the decision was made to move the entire Saturn account from Riney to Goodby, the two agencies shortened the usual three-month transition, and Goodby set to work. Its immediate task was to promote Saturn's newly redesigned small car, the introduction of which would be followed by the launch of the Ion and the redesign of the midsize cars. Instead of discarding the work done by Riney over the years, Goodby elected to build upon it and in some cases play off of it, as evidenced by the new tagline "It's different in a Saturn," which echoed Riney's "A different kind of company. A different kind of car." Nor did Goodby wish to abandon Riney's work in establishing Saturn's core values of honesty and integrity in the minds of consumers. Rather, the shop wanted to make the same points but with a little humor. The most significant departure from the Riney approach was to be an increased emphasis on the car;

''MORNING AGAIN IN AMERICA''

Hal Riney, the man behind Saturn's original soft-selling, folksy advertising approach, was also responsible for one of the most memorable television commercials in the history of politics, the ''Morning Again in America'' spot for Ronald Reagan's 1984 reelection campaign. The spot featured positive images of everyday people, portraying their lives as having greatly improved since Reagan had become president.

Goodby had concluded that, after a decade of advertising, the audience had already learned enough about the company. It was ironic, therefore, that the first major television advertisement Goodby developed for Saturn did not even focus on the car.

Jamie Barrett, a Goodby creative director, told Automotive News's Julie Cantwell how his team approached its task. After initial discussions about the car company and what it represented, the team began to focus on Saturn customers and generated concepts such as ''people first'' and ''people before sheet metal.'' The latter idea became the inspiration for a television spot called ''Sheet Metal,'' which set the stage for the commercials that followed. The concept was to show people pretending to be cars, punctuated by a voice-over at the end: ''When we design cars, we don't see sheet metal. We see the people who may someday drive them.'' Saturn's marketing department instantly embraced the ''big idea'' nature of the spot, as did director Noam Murro of Biscuit Filmworks in Los Angeles.

Goodby developed four more ideas and then presented ''Sheet Metal'' before focus groups, where it ''effectively bombed,'' in the words of Barrett, who wrote the script. Nevertheless neither Saturn nor the agency lost faith in the idea, although the reaction of the focus groups led the agency to add 9 seconds of footage of an L-Series car to the end of the 60-second commercial. In a review for Advertising Age, Garfield praised the spot: ''The automotive body language of our car nation—from backing out of the driveway to sitting in traffic, to yielding at intersections, to riding the school bus—was reproduced, dead on, in actual body language . . . It was also beautiful. The choreography, cinematography, direction, and editing were crafted as if there were no joke afoot, and the accompanying piano etude by the Polish/French musician/composer Gregory Czerkinsky is a gentle and irresistible counterpoint.''

Many television viewers found the ''Sheet Metal'' spot captivating, but it was important for other reasons. According to Garfield, ''It was also a declaration that the old, clunky, homespun Saturn image was (if the advertising worked) about to change.'' Barrett told Alison Sloane Gaylin of Shoot that the spot ''helped all of us understand what we were trying to do with Saturn. It created a reference point for us.''

After creating the first spot, the intention of which was to shape the brand's image, Goodby fashioned product-focused TV commercials that built on the underlying concept of putting ''people first'' while also targeting younger car buyers. According to Jeff Goodby, the agency wanted to avoid the typical approach of selling cars to young people as ''badges of cool.'' Rather, Barrett explained, the agency conceived of its target market as ''young adults who are at an intersection—they are nostalgic about what they are leaving behind, but eager to make the move to full-fledged adulthood.'' Each of the four spots supporting the Ion launch in January 2003 showed four young adults driving in a car together through a town where everyone was experiencing the same life stages. For instance, in the spot called ''Childhood'' the passengers encountered an entire town of children playing on rocking horses, swing sets, and slides. Everybody was involved in the prom in one commercial, another portrayed a town devoted to college antics, and in the fourth everyone in town was getting married. Each spot closed with a voice-over that declared, ''The all-new Saturn Ion. Specifically designed and engineered for whatever's next.'' Saturn hoped that the commercials would also appeal to older buyers, who could look back with fondness on their own passage through these stages of life.

OUTCOME

Goodby's rebranding campaign, which employed the tagline ''It's different in a Saturn,'' came to a close in 2004, when the agency introduced a new series of television commercials that used a streamlined tag: ''People first.'' Research had shown that many people did not understand the line ''It's different in a Saturn.'' As Barrett told Adweek, ''We thought, 'Why get cryptic? Let's just tell people about it. Saturn is not about being overtly tricky or clever. We can get this done in two words.' '' Although the agency was able to hone the Saturn message, it was not successful in selling more cars. After an uptick in 2002, sales in 2003 dropped 3.2 percent to 271,157 vehicles delivered, a far cry from the more than 1 million comparable entry-level sedans that Honda and Toyota each sold. ''Sheet Metal'' received a number of accolades, however. Primarily on the strength of the spot, Murro was nominated for the Directors Guild of America award for best commercial director. The spot also garnered the prestigious Gold Lion award for Goodby at the 2003 International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France.

WHY DIDN'T ANYONE THINK OF THIS BEFORE? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

On November 1, 1998, the Saturn Corporation, a subsidiary of General Motors (GM), became the first car company to offer a three-door coupe when it introduced an updated model of its SC coupe. The third door, a rear access door, made it more convenient to load passengers and cargo into the back seat. Saturn hoped the innovation would shore up its flagging sales and carve out a niche for itself in the shrinking and highly competitive small-car market. Falling fuel prices and a vibrant U.S. economy had led many consumers to eschew smaller, more fuel-efficient cars like those offered by Saturn in favor of pickup trucks, sport-utility vehicles (SUVs), and minivans (vehicles collectively classified as "light trucks"). Saturn turned to its longtime San Francisco-based ad agency, Publicis & Hal Riney, to craft a campaign that would not only announce the coupe's arrival but also send a powerful positive message about the overall Saturn brand. The ensuing $40 million "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" television, radio, print, and outdoor campaign, which focused specifically on the utility of the third door, used the same quirky humor that had come to define Saturn's marketing.

The primary purpose of "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" was to highlight the practical elements of the coupe and to underscore Saturn's long-standing marketing position as a "different kind of company." Saturn had been receiving criticism for failing to expand or update its original line of small cars. In "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before," the company presented itself as the maker of innovative automobiles designed for the needs—from the utilitarian to the unusual—of innovative drivers. In one of the three commercials, for instance, a child stands alone in a vast, flat field playing "When The Saints Go Marching In" on a tuba. At the end of the spot, his mother arrives in a sporty red Saturn coupe. The third door clicks opens, and the boy climbs into the back seat with his tuba in tow. The message was clear: a Saturn three-door coupe could carry cumbersome items, offered easy access to the back seat, and was suitable for children. The commercial closed with a voice-over. "Arriving at last, from Saturn. The world's first three-door coupe. Why didn't anyone think of this before?" Two print ads that focused on the uniqueness of the third door accompanied the television spots.

Saturn planned to use the three-door coupe as a launching pad for additional new products. It expected to release its first midsize sedan (the LS) in 1999 and first SUV in 2001. Saturn wanted the coupe ultimately to be viewed as merely one facet of an innovative company. In any event, the three-door coupe and its supporting ad campaign proved to be unequivocal successes. Coupe sales rose immediately to unexpected levels, providing "one of the few positive notes in the small-car market," said the Sunday Gazette-Mail. Saturn continued to run "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" through the spring of 1999. "It was a launch campaign with enough life to last eight months," said Lisa Hutchinson, Saturn's marketing director.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Saturn was founded by GM in 1985 to convince young consumers to return to the flock of domestic car buyers. Years of bland products and bad press had convinced many U.S. consumers that American cars were inferior to Japanese imports, such as those made by Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Company. GM took care not to associate itself too closely with the Saturn name, and gave Saturn management free reign to institute more customer-oriented policies. When the first Saturns rolled off the production line in 1990, they managed to attract consumers who would not ordinarily even consider purchasing a GM vehicle. Saturn also revolutionized the often exasperating process of buying a car. Its dealerships were devoid of the high-pressure sales tactics and horse-trading that were so common in the automobile industry. Instead, Saturn used low-key sales representatives and set-pricing packages. Moreover, the company took pains to inculcate consumers with the notion that purchasing a Saturn was more like joining a community of Saturn owners and employees than simply engaging in a depersonalized financial transaction. Events such as the Saturn Reunion, a gathering at the company's plant in Tennessee to which all Saturn owners were invited, reinforced this image.

Saturn's advertising also stressed its distinctiveness among car companies. Since its inception, Saturn had used the tag line "A Different Kind Of Company. A Different Kind Of Car" in unusual ads conceived by Publicis & Hal Riney. The commercials were slice-of-life vignettes that featured actual Saturn employees and owners. Spots such as one that depicted a security guard who logged 100,000 miles on his Saturn without ever leaving his small town were "unexpected, understated, and unsurpassed in [their] ability to carve out a brand image," according to Advertising Age. "[They] had the most brilliant marketing campaign of any car in the last decade," a marketing analyst told the The Tennessean.

Although Saturn's small cars and unique brand image proved popular, rival companies were quick to imitate Saturn's friendly sales process and excellent service. In addition, the American small-car market grew more competitive, and U.S. gas prices were falling to new lows, undercutting consumers' interest in seeking out fuel-efficient cars like Saturn. Moreover, the booming economy produced more people willing to spend $30,000 or more for trendy SUVs. By 1998 the light truck market accounted for 51 percent of new car sales, while small car sales had plummeted 20 percent between 1997 and 1999. Saturn's troubles were compounded by its limited product line. With only one subcompact car—offered in sedan, coupe, and wagon versions—Saturn did not provide consumers with as many options as did competitors like Toyota. "Their life is dependent on how small cars are selling, and small cars have been tough to sell," an industry expert told AP Online. In the first nine months of 1998, Saturn's sales were 9.6 percent lower than in the same period of 1997, which themselves had been 10 percent less than 1996.

TARGET MARKET

Saturn's strength had traditionally been its appeal to young consumers. The two-door coupe was especially attractive to unmarried drivers who often traveled alone and liked its sports car-like style. The typical coupe was not, however, the most practical of vehicles. It was difficult for passengers to maneuver into the back seat through one of the two front doors, and it was also hard to access the space to stow even such cargo as groceries or laundry. As Saturn's core market of first-time car buyers began to start families, own pets, and grow a bit older, they came to favor roomier cars. Consumers with children were especially prone to disregard the coupe as a car choice. "Well, we've had a child now, so we'll have to go on to another product," said Dennis Aman, a member of the SC launch team. The debut of the three-door SC coupe was intended to address this problem. "We think the access door will . . . pull in some people who bought sedans before," Jim Ulrich, Saturn's chief engineer.

"Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" reinforced this message by making children central to the campaign. In addition to the "Tuba" spot, Saturn also ran "Pick-Up," an ad that featured a father and a Little League team. After the coupe pulls into the driveway of a model suburban home and disgorges its passengers, a small boy dashes back to close the third door left open. These two commercials touted the utility of the three-door coupe by emphasizing the car's capacity to be a family car—with style.

While the campaign encouraged family-car owners to consider the coupe as a viable car option, Saturn recognized that the primary market for the coupe would still be its base of young, single consumers, who might not appreciate the car's ability to tow tykes and their tubas. A third commercial, "Mannequin," addressed these consumers. The spot opened with the scene of a young man waiting outside a restaurant as a woman leans on his shoulder. A Saturn coupe pulls up, and he proceeds to load the "woman"—now recognizable as a mannequin—through the rear door into the back seat. By stressing that the three-door coupe could carry any item, no matter how unusual, Saturn made its point to childless viewers. Moreover, even the commercials that did use kids as the focus did not resort to sentimentality. The edgy humor and quirky scenarios would draw in all viewers, with or without families.

COMPETITION

Saturn wanted to broaden the coupe's appeal because of the severe contraction in the small-car market. According to the Wall Street Journal, by 1998 "sales of conventional passenger cars have slumped to levels not seen since the early 1980s recession." As companies jostled to maintain market share in a shrinking pool of consumers, competition grew ever more fierce. In its bid to boost sales, Saturn was confronted by several rivals. In January of 1999, DaimlerChrysler AG debuted its model-year 2000 Neon, which it sold under both its Dodge and Plymouth nameplates. When the Neon was first launched it 1994, the company (then Chrysler) attempted to imbue the car with a likable personality.

FROM THE MOUTHS OF BABES

The concept of the three-door coupe came from neither the company's design team nor from marketing planning sessions. Instead, Stuart Lasser, a Saturn dealer, suggested the idea at a meeting. His eight-year-old son had complained loudly about climbing into the rear seat of the family's two-door model. "Everybody just kind of stopped dead in their tracks and wondered why this hadn't been thought of before," a company representative told the Northern New Jersey Record.

This "Hi" campaign anthropomorphized the small Neon. Although "Hi" was critically-acclaimed, DaimlerChrysler devoted $40 million to a new television, print, outdoor, and web banner campaign by BBDO Worldwide that began in March of 1999. "We tried to get away from cute, so the ads are more sophisticated," Arthur Liebler, a senior vice president at DaimlerChrysler told Advertising Age. The initial commercials were set to familiar song melodies, to which comedian George Carlin provided voice-overs of Neon-praising lyrics. In one ad, a Neon was shown in a field of sunflowers while Carlin intoned lines like "When your foot hits the gas and you're off in a flash—that's amore" to the strains of the Dean Martin classic. The Ford Motor Company's Escort was another challenger. In February 1998 Ford launched a new campaign created by ad agency J. Walter Thompson that encompassed the entire Ford division. These spots, which featured actor John Corbett, incorporated the tag line "Built to Last" into stories about Ford cars and their owners.

Saturn would also need to fend off imports to prosper. Toyota's Corolla received considerable media spending in the brand-wide "Everyday" campaign created by Saatchi & Saatchi, which debuted in the fall of 1997 and continued to run through 1999. The television ads incorporated the song "Everyday People" by Sly and the Family Stone and stressed Toyota's reliability. In March 1998 eight-page "Everyday" spreads appeared in major magazines like Life, People, and Time. In the summer of 1998 Toyota debuted the Solara, a coupe that directly challenged Saturn's SC. Honda's Civic also vied for the consumers Saturn desired. Although the model-year 1999 Civic was redesigned, Honda continued to use agency Rubin Postaer & Associates, which had crafted the company's advertising since the Civic was introduced in 1974. Spots for the Civic remained product-focused. Moreover, in March of 1998, Volkswagen AG launched its New Beetle into what the Wall Street Journal termed "a cutthroat market" and captured the bulk of the attention aimed at the small-car sector. To support the New Beetle, agency Arnold Communications conceived clever print and television ads that not only conjured up memories of the iconic original Beetle, but also proved popular among younger consumers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" sought to carve out a distinct niche for the three-door Saturn SC coupe. To succeed in this venture, the campaign needed to make consumers take note of the coupe and its most unique aspect—the rear access door. This was, of course, no easy task since viewers were inundated with a virtual tidal wave of car advertising. But Publicis and Hal Riney strove to create ads that were intensely engaging and that captivated the viewer. One crucial aspect of this strategy was the initial teaser (or bookend) spot. Without revealing the brand or the product, Saturn aired a commercial that simply showed a child playing a tuba. During the next commercial break, the final version played, which showed the three-door Saturn coupe arriving and picking up the young tuba player. The goal was to entice viewers to wait for the follow-up ad and watch closely to see what product was being hawked with such an odd commercial.

Since Saturn hoped to reach a wide array of viewers, the company used national television as its primary venue. The campaign aired on an assortment of programs, ranging from 60 Minutes to shows that captured a younger audience, such as The X-Files and The Simpsons. This initial blitz was supported with print ads in both regional newspapers and national lifestyle magazines, such as Sports Illustrated, and newsweeklies. These print pieces broke new ground for Saturn. Rather than relying on its usual print method of presenting stories describing Saturn owners or employees, the company ran two mostly graphic ads ("Convention" and "Fox") that focused on the coupe itself. The copy was spare, the visual images striking and simple. Billboard versions of these spots were erected in major markets and made available to local Saturn dealers. Radio ads and point-of-sale material in Saturn dealerships provided the final elements of the campaign.

OUTCOME

Despite the pessimism of some commentators who predicted the failure of both the three-door SC coupe and the campaign to support it, Saturn was so convinced of the coupe's potential that it made the three-door design standard. "It's going to bring a different customer into our coupes, a broader market," an SC launch team member told The Tennessean. After one month, Saturn's optimism was justified as sales rose. In December 1998 Saturn reported "its first month-over-month increase since April," according to the Sunday Gazette-Mail. Sales continued to increase through January. In fact, coupe sales were 28 percent higher than in 1997. Moreover, the portion of Saturn's overall sales composed of coupe sales rose from 15 percent to 20 percent. This double digit growth continued during the months after the campaign's inauguration. Even more striking was the fact that Saturn's coupe sales soared during winter months, normally a slow sales period for the sporty model.

The "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign itself was also well-received. Advertising Age pronounced the commercials to be "marvelous." Marketing director Hutchinson told the February 8, 1999, edition of Advertising Age that the spots "broke through clutter and helped Saturn's coupe sales." The company continued to run the campaign through the spring of 1999, at which point it was shelved in favor of new ads touting the LS, Saturn's forthcoming midsize sedan.

LAUREL LANE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s broadband Internet service was becoming a much sought-after commodity in suburban areas. To expand its phone and Internet service to California, SBC Communications Inc. purchased California-based Pacific Bell in 1997 and then spent $6 billion retrofitting existing phone lines to support DSL (digital subscriber line) high-speed Internet by 2001. Soon SBC Pacific Bell became a leading DSL provider for California. Instead of using preexisting phone lines to provide Internet service (as done by DSL providers), cable Internet providers, such as Road Runner Holdco LLC, provided high-speed Internet through television coaxial cable. Because of utility regulations cable and DSL Internet services performed at relatively similar speeds. After encouragement from its advertising agency, SBC Pacific Bell released the ''Laurel Lane'' campaign, which suggested that cable slowed down if too many people used it at once.

Awarded SBC Pacific Bell's estimated $100 million advertising account, Omnicom Group's Goodby, Silverstein & Partners created three 60-second television spots—''COPS,'' ''Neighborhood,'' and ''Mailman''—that aired in March 2000. All three spots took place on the fictional Laurel Lane, which was supposedly wired with cable Internet. Presuming that high Internet usage reduced the Internet speed for everyone on Laurel Lane, the spots humorously depicted the street's residents calling each other ''Web hogs'' and spray painting messages such as ''Log off'' on the back of an ice cream truck. The spots ended with the tagline ''Don't share a cable line. Get Pacific Bell DSL. Always fast. Never shared.''

The spots swept advertising awards shows, such as winning Best of Show from Advertising Age's 2001 Best Awards and a Gold Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival, and assisted the agency in winning the Bellringer award at San Francisco Advertising Association's 15th annual show. In 2000 the entire SBC Communications' sales climbed $2 billion over the previous year. So many SBC Pacific Bell customers were added during the campaign that the DSL network had to be expanded. Later in the campaign SBC Pacific Bell's ''never shared'' claim was proven false, and a disclaimer was added to the commercials. DSL users actually did share the connection at the nearest telephone switching office.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pacific Bell had first awarded Goodby, Silverstein & Partners its advertising account in 1996. The following year SBC purchased Pacific Telesis, the parent company of Pacific Bell, to expand coverage into California. Initial SBC Pacific Bell spots focused on features such as caller ID and voice mail. In one television spot, ''The Message,'' a seven-year-old boy struggled to retell his mother a phone message he had accidentally erased from the answering machine. He began, ''The meeting has been changed because, um . . . we're not going to have the meeting today. We're going to go to the zoo to get ice cream, um, whatever.'' By 1999 Goodby, Silverstein & Partners changed strategies after polling consumers and discovering that most disliked phone use at home after talking on a phone at work all day. As reported in Adweek, a 1999 campaign strove to ''make the phone a friend again.''

Also in 1999 SBC Pacific Bell budgeted $6 billion for the next three years to provide DSL broadband service to 80 percent of its customers. Originally SBC Pacific Bell asked Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to brand the company as the status quo for broadband service. Because of DSL pricing plans and technology limitations, DSL and cable services performed almost identically. SBC Pacific Bell had no intention of positioning itself as a competitive company. ''It took a while to convince them it was the right thing to do,'' Bob Molineaux, account executive for Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, told Adweek, ''because they were going from a non-competitive mindset to an open market where they go directly after the competition.''

Several concepts depicting consumers' frustration with slow cable Internet services were pitched to SBC Pacific Bell. In one a boy grew a snail shell while waiting for his cable modem to connect to the Internet. SBC Pacific Bell finally chose the ''Laurel Lane'' campaign for its portrayal of connectivity frustrations in a suburban environment.

TARGET MARKET

''Laurel Lane'' targeted residential Internet users who preferred a quicker Internet connection than the 56Kb-per-second speed offered by dial-up services like EarthLink and America Online (AOL). SBC Pacific Bell planned on providing DSL broadband by 2001 to 80 percent of its preexisting phone subscribers. Broadband, although a relatively new residential service, had already reached 3.8 million subscribers the year ''Laurel Lane'' appeared. The Yankee Group predicted that 18 million homes would use broadband by 2004 even in the midst of a nationwide recession.

The campaign also targeted consumers wavering between DSL and cable. Even though connection speed was nearly identical between the two services, ''Laurel Lane'' took advantage of consumers unaware of their similarities. ''Broadband providers should move away from attacking each other and move to educate consumers,'' Fritz McCormick, a Yankee Group analyst, suggested to the Wall Street Journal. Instead Goodby, Silverstein & Partners misinformed its target audience. The commercials erroneously suggested that customers restricted to only using cable Internet service would be frustrated by their lack of bandwidth (the amount of data one connection can handle). The campaign also incorrectly stated that DSL never slowed down, and no matter how many people in one area used DSL, the connection remained unaffected.

CHRIS SMITH

Chris Smith, who directed all three SBC Pacific Bell ''Laurel Lane'' commercials, won the Grand Jury Prize at the Sundance Film Festival in 1999 for his documentary American Movie: The Making of Northwestern. The documentary followed moviemaker Mark Borchardt, who ran out of funds while making his independent film Northwestern. The financial predicament forced him to return to a previously unfinished horror-movie project titled Coven.

COMPETITION

The advertising climate among broadband providers was relatively mild before the ''Laurel Lane'' campaign. Immediately after, however, the cable Internet provider Road Runner, a joint venture between Time Warner Inc. and AT&T Corp., released radio and television spots to attack DSL and phone service providers. One spot featured a DSL technician entangled with phone wires as he installed a DSL modem. Installation took so long that a new mother living in the house actually named her baby Walter after the technician. The spot's ending voice-over stated, ''Get DSL and you may be more acquainted with the technicians than the services. Get Road Runner and find out how simple going online can be.'' The spots were created from reports that some DSL customers complained about installation complications. The spots were created by Shepardson Stern & Kaminsky and aired across San Diego, Cincinnati, and Austin markets. In 2000 it was estimated that 2.4 million consumers used cable while only 1.4 million used DSL.

The largest cable Internet provider in California's Bay Area, AT&T, attacked DSL for having a limited range covering an area of only a few miles around its telephone switching office. The limitation even forced SBC Pacific Bell to snake extra fiber-optic lines from remote neighborhoods to switching offices. In an AT&T spot titled ''Marathon,'' a sprinter became exhausted immediately after starting a race. The commercial tried to expose DSL's limited range.

DSL VERSUS CABLE

Theoretically cable actually outperformed DSL in raw performance speed. Cable peaked at speeds of 30Mbps, whereas most DSL only reached speeds of 10Mbps. The numbers were misleading, however, because most service providers offered residential service plans that started around 1Mbps. Data throughput speed in 2000 was not so much dependent on the type of connection as on the service plan the consumer paid for.

Dial-up service providers, which could offer a cheaper but much slower Internet connection, released advertisements that boasted of improved features such as pop-up blockers, spam guards, and more secure connections. In 2002 EarthLink released its "In Your Face" campaign to counter AOL's claims of a better pop-up blocker.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Colin Nissan and Sean Farrell, the Goodby, Silverstein & Partners creative directors who collaborated on "Laurel Lane," designed the campaign to show limitations with cable Internet service. Although the depicted limitations later proved incorrect, the agency's associate partner, Paul Venables, told Advertising Age that the attack was "more theoretically [correct] than in reality. The more people in your neighborhood that get on [cable] slow it down a little bit, because they're sharing the bandwidth. But there's probably no neighborhood in America where cable Internet use is so dense that it would make a difference right now."

Three 60-second television spots—"COPS," "Neighborhood," and "Mailman"—first aired in March 2000 and showed clips of residents bickering over the neighborhood's bandwidth use. The spot "Neighborhood," directed by Chris Smith, was narrated by a resident of the fictional Laurel Lane. Explained during the character's voice-over, the neighborhood was peaceful until "everyone started sharing the same cable line for the Internet. That's when things online got slower and people started acting, well, downright un-neighborly." First an impatient woman started smacking her desk while waiting for her computer to download. Then a girl sitting before a computer shouted, "Come on!"
