''Abbreviated'' was distinctive both for its message and for its quirky vocabulary, which entailed shortening words by leaving out most of the vowels and many of the consonants. By referring to a car as ''cr,'' for example, the spot captured the listener's attention. It began with the announcer saying, ''If YR FMLR with the CLSIFDS section of the NWSPPR, you PRBLY understand this MSSG quite well.'' This strange-sounding language was scattered throughout the spot, driving home its central thesis—that classified ads offered too little space for sellers to describe a vehicle properly—by demonstrating it. At one point the speaker described a car using the abbreviated language of newspaper ads, and the results sounded like gibberish.

The commercial also touted eBay's Vehicle Protection Program, which guarded consumers against being stuck paying for a car that was not in as good a condition as the advertisement had claimed. Finally it reminded listeners that eBay offered a nationwide customer base, as opposed to the local reach of most newspapers. Even when describing eBay's own services, the narrator still slipped into abbreviated words occasionally, using them sporadically enough that his meaning was not lost but often enough to keep the spot's humor going.

''Abbreviated'' referred specifically to ''eBay Motors'' instead of just ''eBay''—even though ''eBay Motors'' was only a category on www.ebay.com, as opposed to an actual separate entity. This distinction was made for consumers who were used to thinking about eBay as a place to buy smaller items, such as household goods or clothing. It also reinforced the idea that eBay was not only a place where automobiles were available for sale but also a natural place to go shopping for these kinds of items. This subtle gesture allowed the spot to concentrate on the benefits of selling cars on eBay without having to clear any hurdle the listener might have about shopping for an automobile that way. The commercial was recorded at the GSP Post studio in San Francisco. It was produced for Goodby, Silverstein & Partners by Brian Coate and was written by Tyler McKellar. GSP Post served as the production company.

OUTCOME

The spot was a success, although it also marked the end of eBay's account with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. In March 2005 eBay ended its relationship with the agency, replacing it with the New York–based BBDO. The company believed that BBDO, a larger agency, was better equipped to provide integrated marketing campaigns that would combine Internet, television, print, and radio elements.

Regardless, ''Abbreviated'' was particularly successful with critics. It received a Silver Lion in the Radio category at the 2005 International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. Called the ''Olympics of Advertising,'' the Cannes festival was among the most prestigious in the world, with campaigns and agencies from all over the globe under consideration. ''Abbreviated'' also won a Bronze Clio that year; the Clios were one of the largest international advertising award programs. In addition Goodby, Silverstein & Partners won the $100,000 first prize at the 2005 Radio Mercury Awards for the ''Abbreviated'' spot. Based in New York, the Radio Mercury Awards were begun in 1992 to offer an exclusive recognition for excellence in radio advertising. All of these awards were announced after eBay had terminated its relationship with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners.

The effort contributed to a solid year for eBay. The company finished 2004 with consolidated net revenues of $3.27 billion, a 51 percent improvement from 2003. The company also reported a record 1.4 billion listings during 2004, up more than 45 percent from the previous year. More than $34 billion of transactions took place in 2004 via eBay's online auctions and listings. Therefore, the ''Abbreviated'' commercial appeared to succeed in helping traffic at www.ebay.com continue to grow.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. ''Goodby Gets Radio-Mercury Grand Prize.'' San Francisco Chronicle, June 8, 2005.

———. '' 'Grr,' 'Real Men' Tally at Cannes.'' San Francisco Chronicle, June 25, 2005.

Cohen, Adam. The Perfect Store: Inside eBay. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 2002.

———. ''PayPal and Other Post-Bubble Signs of Life on the Internet.'' New York Times, February 6, 2002.

Guernsey, Lisa. ''EBay at a Crossroads: Can 'Buy Now' Share Space with 'Bid Now'?'' New York Times, December 7, 2004.

Howard, Theresa. "EBay Spends Bigger on Advertising." USA Today, January 2, 2005.

Lacy, Sarah. "Easier Shopping Around—Online." BusinessWeek, December 8, 2004.

Mullaney, Timothy J., and Robert D. Hof. "E-Tailing Finally Hits Its Stride." BusinessWeek, December 20, 2004.

Raine, George. "EBay Dumps S.F. Ad Agency." San Francisco Chronicle, March 31, 2005.

Stross, Randall E. EBay: The First Inside Account of Venture Capitalists at Work. New York: Crown Business, 2000.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

EBAY 2004 TELEVISION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The San Jose, California, company eBay, Inc., was an online-based auction and selling community that in 2004 serviced 115 million shoppers, who purchased items ranging from clocks to shoes to automobiles. The company did not sell anything itself, instead making money from advertising and by charging sellers listing fees for using the company's website, ebay.com, to sell items. In 2004 eBay restructured its listing fees, charging higher fees for more expensive items, in an effort to encourage sellers to offer lower opening prices for auctions. This carried the risk that some sellers would be less inclined to use eBay, because they might want to avoid the fees. Although eBay was the most popular online-auction site, it faced pressure from other Internet companies, such as Amazon and Google, whose own services diverted consumers away from eBay.

In order to maintain strong visibility in the face of this pressure, eBay earmarked $250 million for marketing in 2004. From its inception eBay had only run one major television campaign, relying on word of mouth, Internet ads, and print campaigns to attract consumers. In 2004, however, the company commissioned Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, an agency based in San Francisco, to run a new television campaign. There were four spots in all, rolled out that October and November. The most popular spot was known as "Toy Boat." It featured a boy losing his toy boat at sea, only to find it again as an adult after a fisherman found it and posted it for sale on eBay. The commercial featured a voice-over by Hollywood actress Rosanna Arquette. Other spots appealed to the sense of community offered by eBay. The campaign was meant to differentiate eBay from impersonal sellers such as Amazon or search engines like Yahoo and Google.

The spots were a hit with critics. The Directors Guild of America singled out Noam Murro, director of "Toy Boat," for Outstanding Directorial Achievement in Commercials. The commercials helped eBay's fourth-quarter revenues jump 24 percent compared to the same period in 2003. The campaign also marked the end of eBay's relationship with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. In 2005 eBay offered its business to BBDO, a larger advertising agency based in New York City.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Internet-centered company eBay, Inc., was founded in September 1995 and was based in San Jose, California, near the state's famous "Silicon Valley," so called because it was home to a number of technology-related businesses. By 2004 eBay employed about 9,000 people and operated around the world. It was intended to provide a global trading platform where consumers could trade or auction different items. EBay allowed vendors and consumers to buy and sell a wide range of items, ranging from clothing to electronics to celebrity collectables to cars. To describe its business it adopted the slogan "The World's Online Marketplace." Throughout the 1990s the company expanded, adding local eBay sites to service countries that included Australia, China, India, and France.

EBay offered buyers the choice between either bidding in an online auction or buying an item outright for a predetermined price. All sales took place via the company's website, which in the United States was located at www.ebay.com. The company made a profit not by selling items itself but by taking a percentage of the sales price of the items sold on the site. EBay collected listing, feature, and final-value fees from all of the registered sellers that used the site. Advertising on the site itself provided another source of income. The company also expanded its business by offering PayPal, an online payment system that could be used on other websites. In 2004 eBay purchased a 25 percent stake in the online community Craigslist, which offered online "classified ads" for people to buy and sell items. It had thus been emerging as a potential competitor for eBay.

In eBay's early years the company primarily relied on word of mouth to attract buyers and sellers to ebay.com. Even in the early 2000s the company stuck to more conservative print campaigns. The company's first major television campaign was released in 2002; it was created by Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, a San Francisco–based agency that was especially known for its work with technology companies. The campaign later won a 2004 Gold EFFIE Award in the retail category. The spots helped eBay's online community expand to 115 million shoppers.

© LANCE IVERSEN/SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE/CORBIS.

TARGET MARKET

EBay's target market was anyone interested in buying or selling things online. Because younger people were often more comfortable with technology such as the Internet, consumers under 40 were especially important to eBay. Collectors, who used the site to track down hard-to-find items such as out-of-print books and CDs, were also considered to be valuable users of the site.

After eBay raised its listing fees in January 2004, there was concern that some sellers might be more inclined to avoid listing on the site. The company had raised prices by about 9 percent across the board, but increases were as high as 45 percent on more expensive items. EBay hoped that this would convince some sellers to use a lower starting price for auctioned items, which would attract more bargain-conscious consumers, who then might be tempted to bid on more and more items. To prevent competitors from cutting into its core business, eBay decided that it needed to run another television-based marketing campaign. The company wanted to make sure that consumers still thought of eBay as the best place to buy things online.

COMPETITION

By 2004 eBay was the dominant online-auction site in the world. Because of the nature of the Internet, however, the company did not only compete with other auction-oriented sites. EBay made its money through the sales conducted on its site and via advertising on that same site. Both required the company to keep attracting a large numbers of visitors to the site. While eBay did not sell anything directly, it needed brisk sales to generate fees. Therefore, one of its biggest competitors was the online retailer Amazon. Amazon sold a variety of products, ranging from books to electronics. It conducted high-profile radio and television campaigns. Its direct sales often competed with the sellers that used eBay, so the auction site had to be sure to keep its own profile on par with Amazon.

Perhaps the most dynamic force on the Internet in 2004 was the search engine Google. Google and other search engines, including Yahoo, did not sell anything directly, but users could find individual sellers via such search engines. Users went to Google's website and searched for a particular product or seller; then they could connect with these sellers directly. Google did not have any connection with such sellers, instead making money from advertising sold on the google.com website itself. Google even added a special search called "Froogle," with which users could filter a search to show only online sellers. This cut into eBay's business, because if buyers could find sellers directly through Google, they would have no reason to shop at eBay. It also meant that sellers could sell items on their own websites and avoid paying eBay any fees.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2004 eBay earmarked about $250 million for U.S. advertising. Once again, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners

DESPERATELY SEEKING EBAY

When eBay released a major television campaign for only the second time in the company's history, it knew that the spots needed to connect quickly with customers in order to distinguish the online-auction site from Internet sellers such as Amazon and search engines such as Google. To do that the company enlisted a familiar voice to star in the spots: Rosanna Arquette.

Arquette was a part of an acting family that included sister Patricia (star of the film True Romance and the television show Medium) and brother David (of the Scream trilogy). Their father, Lewis, was an actor as well, having appeared in numerous television and film projects in the 1970s and 1980s.

One of Rosanna Arquette's first high-profile roles came in 1985, when she starred in Desperately Seeking Susan. In the film Arquette's bored suburban housewife switched places with a New York bohemian (played by pop singer Madonna). She later acted in critically lauded films such as New York Stories (1989) and Pulp Fiction (1994) along with box office hits Hope Floats (1998) and The Whole Nine Yards (2000). Arquette also appeared as a guest star on many of the biggest television hits of the day, including The Practice, Malcolm in the Middle, and Grey's Anatomy. As a result, she was familiar to a vast range of people. This breadth of recognition made her ideal for work with eBay, which attracted a variety of users.

ran the campaign. The San Francisco–based agency had made its reputation designing innovative campaigns for online-based businesses such as E*Trade. It had handled eBay's only other television campaign in 2002.

The new campaign centered on four television spots, two that launched in October and two more that followed a month later. The spots were intended to promote the idea of eBay as a community, differentiating it from the impersonal retailer Amazon or the sprawling Web that the search engine Google harnessed for its users. By underscoring the communal aspect of eBay, the company hoped to lure consumers into spending more time—and therefore making more purchases—at ebay.com. The campaign used the slogan "The Power of All of Us." One spot featured shots of people doing good deeds for each other, including opening doors for people and delivering food to shut-ins. On-screen text explained to the audience that eBay's online community "proved" that people were "good." The spot was an appeal to the sense of community that had inspired some eBay users to set up collectors' clubs built around particular products sold on eBay.com.

The most popular spot, "Toy Boat," was designed to underscore the perceived benefits of online auctions in general and eBay in particular. It began with a shot of a young boy playing with his new toy boat. The boat then was swept out to sea by the receding tide and apparently lost forever. Years later, however, it turned up in a fishnet. The fisherman who found it decided to make some money selling the toy on eBay. The now-adult boy discovered it there, posted in an online auction. The spot closed with the tagline "What if nothing was ever forgotten? What if nothing was ever lost?" Voice-over for the spot was provided by the actress Rosanna Arquette, known for her work in such films as Pulp Fiction and Desperately Seeking Susan.

Another commercial featured a man dusting off his clock collection. Soon his home was filled with other collectors offering him new clocks. He chose his favorite and added it to his current group of clocks. This spot appealed directly to collectors, people especially drawn to the site in hopes of finding a rare or unusual item. These kinds of items—a strange clock, for example—were not easy to find on sites like Amazon that focused on new, practical items, or via Google, which offered searches that showed popular (not quirky) products at the top of its listings.

OUTCOME

Critics and audiences enjoyed the new spots. One, "Toy Boat," garnered special recognition at the Directors Guild of America Awards for 2004. The spot's director, Noam Murro of the production company Biscuit Filmworks, was honored for Outstanding Directorial Achievement in Commercials for "Toy Boat" and two other spots. EBay's television commercials also helped boost the company's sales in the last quarter of 2004, which coincided with the campaign's run. U.S. revenues at the company were up 10 percent from the previous quarter and had increased a solid 24 percent compared to the previous year's fourth quarter.

While the increase was below the 38 percent growth the company had seen in the same quarter between 2002 and 2003, it was still a healthy pace. EBay nevertheless discontinued its relationship with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners soon after the campaign finished, moving to New York City–based BBDO for future campaigns. The agency was larger and operated a more diverse portfolio than Goodby, Silverstein & Partners.

FURTHER READING

Cohen, Adam. "PayPal and Other Post-Bubble Signs of Life on the Internet." New York Times, February 6, 2002.

———. The Perfect Store: Inside eBay. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 2002.

Guernsey, Lisa. "EBay at a Crossroads: Can 'Buy Now' Share Space with 'Bid Now'?" New York Times, December 7, 2004.

Howard, Theresa. "Ads Pump Up eBay Community with Good Feelings." USA Today, October 17, 2004.

———. "EBay Spends Bigger on Advertising." USA Today, January 2, 2005.

Lacy, Sarah. "Easier Shopping Around—Online." BusinessWeek, December 08, 2004.

Mullaney, Timothy J., and Robert D. Hof. "E-Tailing Finally Hits Its Stride." BusinessWeek, December 20, 2004.

Richtel, Matt. "EBay Buys 25% Stake in Craigslist, an Online Bulletin Board." New York Times, August 14, 2004.

Stross, Randall E. EBay: The First Inside Account of Venture Capitalists at Work. New York: Crown Business, 2000.

Tedeschi, Bob. "E-Commerce Report; The Three Big Internet Portals Begin to Distinguish among Themselves as Shopping Malls." New York Times, April 8, 2002.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

Electronic Data Systems

5400 Legacy Drive
Plano, Texas 75024
USA
Telephone: (800) 566-9337
Web site: www.eds.com

■■■

CAT HERDERS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although Electronic Data Systems (EDS), the Plano, Texas–based company founded by H. Ross Perot in 1962, was the acknowledged inventor of the information technology (IT) services industry, by the end of the twentieth century EDS, despite continued growth, had fallen behind its competitors—especially regarding its public image. To correct that, EDS chose Fallon McElligott (later Fallon Worldwide), an independent Minneapolis ad agency, as its lead agency in May 1999. Fallon, in conjunction with new corporate management at EDS, saw its mission as changing the EDS image not only with respect to the company's present and future customers but also for EDS employees, whose morale was low. The ad campaign set out to do this by creating brand awareness where either none had existed or the awareness had petrified over the years.

"Cat Herders" (the name applies to the initial television spot and the campaign), which played off the industry expression "it's like herding cats," served both these purposes. It gave EDS employees an image that was serious, despite the humor of the commercial, and it highlighted EDS's problem-solving capabilities for its customers. The initial campaign used television, print, the Internet, and the COMDEX trade show at a cost of approximately $8 million. The campaign was presented as a trilogy. The first television spot, "Cat Herders," was a huge success, while the second and third spots, "Airplane" and "Running with the Squirrels," were eye-catching follow-ups but lacked the impact of the initial spot.

The "Cat Herders" spot ran through 2001 and won numerous awards, including an Emmy Award nomination. EDS also enjoyed an improvement in employee morale and corporate image, along with new contracts and acquisitions. In 2000 EDS reported fourth-quarter earnings of $5.2 billion, a 5 percent increase from the previous year and a new quarterly high for the company.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Throughout the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, EDS experienced phenomenal growth and was the recognized leader in the IT services industry, enjoying government, military, and commercial contracts. In 1984 EDS became a division of General Motors (GM), and three years later, when EDS celebrated its 25th anniversary, it reported global revenues of $4.4 billion. In 1996 EDS severed its relationship with GM and once again became an independent company. The 1990s, which saw the rise of the dot-com businesses, was a decade in which EDS slipped behind newer competitors in the race for customers. Although EDS expanded globally throughout the decade, its image was that of a lumbering dinosaur whose primary ties were to the military. In an October 2000 article, Associated Press writer David Koenig quoted then EDS president and chief operating officer Jeffrey M. Heller on the company's decline. "By '96," Heller said, "technology had changed and skills had changed. We didn't change fast enough." Koenig noted that 1996 was also the year that IBM overtook EDS as leader in the IT services industry, though the computer giant had only been in the industry a few years.

Events leading to the EDS ad campaign trilogy occurred quickly in 1999. In January Richard Brown was named chairman and CEO. Fallon was chosen as lead agency, and Don Uzzi, named marketer of the year in 1995, came on board. Almost from the beginning Uzzi injected a bold style into staid EDS when he invited broadcast and print reporters to EDS's Plano headquarters to witness the company's handling of the Y2K transition. It was a successful PR move that was topped only by the ad campaign.

TARGET MARKET

With the ad campaign itself, EDS relied again on the press to help get its message across. Fallon, in its Brief of Effectiveness (submitted to the EFFIE Awards committee), stated, "We were after the editorial staff at key business and IT vehicles such as the Wall Street Journal, New York Times, ZDNet, etc. For them, EDS represented the Old Economy in a changed world. Reporters typically ignored or dismissed EDS as a company with little news value."

Other groups targeted by the ad campaign were technology decision makers and EDS employees and possible recruits. The first group consisted of company IT directors, marketing directors of e-commerce divisions, and top-level corporate executives: CEOs, COOs, and CIOs. The second group, employees and recruits, was targeted to reinvigorate corporate culture at EDS.

H. ROSS PEROT: THE MAN WHO WOULD BE PRESIDENT

Born in Texarkana, Texas, in 1930, H. Ross Perot first came to the attention of the general public when he funded an operation to rescue two of his employees at EDS from an Iranian prison in 1979. Perot, a graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy, had started EDS in 1962, virtually inventing the IT services industry while building his company into a multi-billion-dollar international corporation. He sold EDS to General Motors in 1984, thereby gaining a seat on GM's board. Two years later he quit the GM board and sold his remaining shares in EDS to the parent company. (EDS became an independent company in 1996.) In 1988 Perot started Perot Systems, also a computer company.

Perot is best known for his two quixotic presidential candidacies in the 1990s. In 1992 he garnered 19 percent of the presidential vote, the highest percentage for an independent or third-party candidate since Theodore Roosevelt in 1912. His percentage helped defeat incumbent George Bush Sr. and elect Bill Clinton president. Perot opposed the North American Free Trade Agreement (a pet Clinton project) and was the prime mover in the formation of the Reform Party in 1995. His second run for president was as that party's candidate in 1996. Perot was excluded from the televised debates and went on to receive just 8 percent of the vote.

COMPETITION

No company, even one that essentially invented an industry as EDS did, could remain without competitors for long. While EDS, especially during the Perot years, had successfully fended off challengers in the IT industry and grown into a multi-billion-dollar business, others sought to carve their own niches in the fast-growing IT services industry. Most notable among EDS's competitors was top computer hardware manufacturer IBM and its computer services division, IBM Global Services. Despite being the industry leader, IBM, too, suffered from a somewhat stodgy image. The firm tried to soften and humanize its reputation with a $100 million branding campaign in 1995. Entitled "Subtitles," the campaign emphasized IBM's global reach and power by featuring people in different countries using IBM products. In the television spots the actors spoke in their native tongues, and subtitles appeared on the screen. A strong element of humor put a positive spin on IBM's international dominance.

EDS's market share was also cut into by such startup companies as Scient Corp., founded in 1997 in San Francisco; then New York–based Razorfish (now known as Avenue A/Razorfish and headquartered in Seattle), which was founded in 1995; and Viant Corp. of Boston, originally Silicon Valley Internet Partners. Though each of these companies experienced its own troubles when the dot-com bubble burst, at the time they were viewed as hipper and more nimble—able to solve technology problems that were arising in the new information age that had come to fruition in the 1990s.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The first spot, "Cat Herders," set the tone for the trilogy. It provided a humorously visual description of the well-known phrase "it's like herding cats." In Silicon Valley parlance this phrase had come to mean working on extremely hard technology problems. The spot showed range-hardened cowboys on the trail, but instead of cattle they herded cats across a river. The visual united the new (Silicon Valley lingo) with the established (an image of a cowboy—rather fitting for a company located in Texas). It also gave EDS's employees a new identity and feeling of self-worth. As "cat herders" they were the tech people who could get anything done. Brand identification for viewers was provided by a final voice-over, which intoned, "EDS, managing the complexities of e-business."

The "Cat Herders" commercial made its debut in the most glamorous, and perhaps most expensive, of all television advertising venues, the Super Bowl. It aired on January 30, 2000, during Super Bowl XXXIV. EDS and Fallon chose to show the commercial during major televised sporting events, noting that the target group of technology decision makers was more likely to be viewing such programs. Subsequently the "Cat Herders" spot appeared during the U.S. Open golf tournament, in June; the National Basketball Association finals, also in June; the U.S. Open tennis tournament, in late August to early September; the Presidents Cup golf tournament, in October; and Monday Night Football. Fifty percent of the "Cat Herders" portion of the campaign went to television. The television spots were reinforced by print ads in such publications as the Wall Street Journal, Fortune, Forbes, and Wired. Ads also appeared in the online magazine Salon.

The second spot in the campaign was "Airplane," and it made its debut later in 2000. EDS and Fallon stuck to the winning strategy of breaking the commercial during a prime televised sporting event; "Airplane" appeared during the Thanksgiving holiday National Football League network broadcasts. The spot also appeared during broadcasts of Monday Night Football. "Airplane" depicted a group of mechanics assembling an airplane while in flight. Like its predecessor, "Airplane" was a visual manifestation of a well-known business expression, in this case "building an airplane on the fly." Explaining the spot's connection and symbolism, David Lubars, then president and executive director at Fallon, as quoted over the PR Newswire, said, "This is the second commercial in the series. The first, 'Cat Herders,' talked about the importance of aligning a company's scattered technologies and moving them in the right direction. The message of 'Airplane' is a natural follow-up in that it answers the question, 'Now I know what to do, how do I do it without messing up my company in the process?' "

"Running with the Squirrels" was the final spot in the trilogy, and it debuted on January 28, 2001, during the broadcast of Super Bowl XXXV. The ad parodied the famous running of the bulls in Pamplona, Spain. This was a bit of a departure from the first two spots in the series in that it did not depict a popular industry maxim. The humor aspect aside, squirrels were chosen because of their speed and agility. The commercial, at least the actors' part of it, was shot in Pedrazza, Spain, not far from Madrid; the squirrels (some real but most computer generated) were filmed on a California soundstage. Following Super Bowl XXXV, "Running with the Squirrels" ran in rotation with the previous two spots in the series.

OUTCOME

"Cat Herders" was an unqualified success for EDS. The campaign won numerous advertising awards, including a First Boards Award in 2000, a Cannes Silver Lion in 2000, a bronze Clio in 2001, Advertising Age's Best Visual Effects Award in 2001, and a silver EFFIE Award in 2001. EDS also estimated that its initial investment of about $8 million brought in an additional $12 million in "incremental PR"—233 outlets mentioned EDS in their pre- and post-Super Bowl coverage (according to the EFFIE Awards Brief of Effectiveness submitted by Fallon). The ad was even referred to by President Bill Clinton.

Speaking a year after the fact, Uzzi, EDS's senior vice president for global advertising, as quoted by Stefani Eads in BusinessWeek Online, said, "The Super Bowl [ad] played out in spades for our business. The first week after the Super Bowl, we had 10 million hits to EDS.com, which is five times our normal rate. And brand awareness increased 40 percent year-on-year in 2000, something we attribute greatly to the commercial's success." Uzzi's summation was echoed by Fallon boss Lubars in an article in the Minneapolis Star Tribune, written by Ann Merrill. Speaking a few days prior to Super Bowl XXXV, Lubars observed, "Last year the Super Bowl ad got an incredible internal buzz at EDS." Merrill also noted that there was "an influx of resumes" at the company following the "Cat Herders" airing.

The effectiveness of the latter two spots in the series was less clear cut. Critics were generally silent on "Airplane," but "Running with the Squirrels" provoked a mixed reaction. Some media critics, such as Ellen Neubourne, questioned the commercial's effectiveness in putting across its message. Writing in BusinessWeek Online, she gave "Running with the Squirrels" a thumbs-down, commenting that "the sure sign that the ad is in trouble comes at the end when text has to pop onto the screen and explain to the viewer that the squirrels are meant to represent small and nimble competition. If we got all the way to the final five seconds without getting it, the ad didn't work."

Other media critics, analysts, and advertising professionals felt "Running with the Squirrels" was as funny as "Cat Herders" but too much like the previous spot to be effective. Nevertheless EDS continued to prosper throughout 2001; the company reported fourth-quarter revenues of $5.9 billion and net income of $405 million. The "Cat Herders" campaign ran through 2001 and was replaced by a series of 50 thirty-second television spots that ran over the course of 17 days during the 2002 Winter Olympics.

FURTHER READING

Eads, Stefani. "Can Thousands of Squirrels Lift EDS? It Made a Splash at Super Bowl XXXV with Another Creative Ad—but That Doesn't Mean It Will See a Payoff." BusinessWeek Online, January 30, 2001. Available from <http://www.businessweek.com/bwdaily/dnflash/jan2001/nf20010130_999.htm?campaign_id=search>

"EDS Builds Airplane in Midflight in New TV Spot." Computer Publishing & Advertising Report, December 4, 2000.

"EDS: Cat Herders." EFFIE Awards Brief of Effectiveness, 2001.

"EDS Debuts Second in Series of Epic TV Ads at COMDEX; New Ad Shows How Company Can Help Transform Business 'On the Fly'; Company Continues Campaign That Started with Award-Winning 'Herding Cats' Spot." PR Newswire, November 15, 2000.

"EDS Selects Fallon McElligott as Ad Agency of Record; Fallon McElligott/Duffy Design to Reinvigorate EDS′ Marketplace Image." PR Newswire, May 26, 1999.

"EDS Signals New Marketing Posture at Super Bowl XXXIV; Company Uses Epic Humor, High-Visibility Venue to Spotlight Its E-Business Leadership; Reaffirm Corporate Commitment and Culture." PR Newswire, January 17, 2000.

Gaither, Chris. "Electronic Data's Earnings Are Better Than Expected." New York Times, February 8, 2001.

Hays, Constance L. "Herding Cats, Lassoing Viewers." New York Times, February 13, 2000.

Koenig, David. "EDS Strikes Boldest Stroke Yet in Makeover Campaign." Associated Press, October 20, 2000.

LeSueur, Steve. "Boss Brown Says EDS Has Shed Dinosaur Ways." Washington Technology, March 30, 2000. Available from <http://washingtontechnology.com>

Merrill, Ann. "Local Entries in the Super Bowl of Advertising; After Months of Planning, Filming and Editing, Ads Created by Twin Cities Agencies Are Prepared to Compete for the Hearts of About 120 Million Viewers." Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 25, 2001.

Neuborne, Ellen. "Scoring Supe XXXV's Commercials." BusinessWeek Online, January 29, 2001. Available from <http://www.businessweek.com/bwdaily/dnflash/jan2001/nf20010129_211.htm>

Frank Caso

Eli Lilly and Company

Lilly Corporate Ctr.
Indianapolis, Indiana 46285
USA
Telephone: (317) 276-2000
Fax: (317) 277-6579
Web site: www.lilly.com

■■■

PROZAC PRINT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Since its introduction in 1987, Prozac's sales had boomed, generating significant revenue for its manufacturer Eli Lilly and Company. But the success of this new type of antidepressant—a selective serotonin re-uptake inhibitor (SSRI)—soon spawned intense competition in the $4 billion per year antidepressant market. By mid-1996 Prozac's sales growth was slowing, and drugs such as Zoloft and Paxil were eating into its market share. In response, Lilly initiated a new advertising campaign for Prozac in 1997. The campaign was a radical shift in Lilly's marketing strategies for the little green pill. Instead of focusing solely on convincing doctors of the benefits of Prozac for their patients, Lilly reached out directly to consumers for the first time. The Prozac print campaign, which appeared in over 20 general-interest magazines, targeted both adults who suffered from depression and those who shared their lives. The ads used visual metaphors to describe the experience of depression and subsequent recovery through effective treatment and were designed most specifically to reach those who were depressed but had not sought any form of medical assistance.

Lilly selected the Chicago-based advertising firm of Leo Burnett USA to help spread the message to consumers that ''Prozac Can Help.'' The original ad was a three-page magazine spread that featured sharply contrasting images portraying the darkness experienced by a person suffering from depression and the light that a patient felt when the illness abated. The first page consisted of a gray cloud on a black background accompanied by the line ''Depression Hurts.'' The opposite page was a vibrant blue with a highly stylized drawing of a yellow sun captioned with the campaign's signature line: ''Prozac Can Help.'' Beneath both pictures were six paragraphs of text that described some of the symptoms of depression. The final paragraph encouraged readers to seek medical care if their symptoms matched those described in the ad and closed by stating that ''Prozac has been prescribed for more than 17 million Americans. Chances are someone you know is feeling sunny again because of it. Prozac. Welcome back.'' The third page contained the disclosure information and product warnings mandated by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

In the months following the publication of the initial ad, Lilly released two companion ads. Each featured the same text, and all were thematically similar. One of the new ads substituted a broken vase and a vase holding flowers for the gray cloud and the yellow sun of the original ad. The other, which ran only in November and December 1997, displayed a limp Christmas tree on one page and a sturdy, upright tree on the opposite page.

Although the actual execution of the campaign was the work of Leo Burnett, the creative inspiration for the images came from focus groups conducted with depressed patients. Not only did Lilly and Burnett use these groups to evaluate the effectiveness of the proposed campaigns, but the companies actually used ideas generated by the patients themselves. After having patients draw the "experience of depression and recovery," Burnett used this raw material to design the final campaign.

Although the Prozac print campaign received some criticism for its efforts to influence potential consumers directly, many others praised the campaign for removing some of the stigma attached to depression and mental illness in general. Lilly pronounced itself pleased with the results and doubled its advertising budget for 1998 in order to expand the campaign.

© ANNEBICQUE BERNARD/CORBIS SYGMA.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Eli Lilly introduced Prozac in 1987. The antidepressant immediately revolutionized the treatment of depression. As the first SSRI, Prozac acted to increase the available levels of the brain chemical serotonin. Not only did the medication have fewer side effects than older classes of antidepressants such as tricyclics, but it also worked remarkably well. By 1996 Prozac had been prescribed to more than 17 million Americans and had achieved $2.36 billion in sales worldwide. It was used to treat bulimia and obsessive-compulsive disorder, as well as depression. Since Prozac accounted for 29 percent of Lilly's sales by the fourth quarter of 1997, the drug was quite important to Lilly's continued success.

By the mid-1990s, however, the astronomical growth of Prozac sales had begun to taper off. According to the Chicago Sun-Times, "sales were no longer growing at previous levels." Lilly's drug met increasing competition from more recently introduced SSRIs, which eroded Prozac's dominance of the antidepressant market. Analysts were also predicting that the burgeoning antidepressant market—which by 1996 was expanding by almost 33 percent annually—would become saturated by the turn of the century. Furthermore, Lilly's exclusive patent on Prozac was to expire in 2003, at which time generic makers could enter the field, a development that would greatly reduce the drug's profitability.

In light of these changes, Lilly recognized the necessity of revamping its advertising strategy. Traditionally the company had marketed Prozac in two ways, both of which centered on physicians. The company maintained a vast sales force that traveled "door-to-door" to doctors' offices. The sales representatives met with both primary care physicians and psychiatrists to explain the benefits of prescribing the medication to their patients and handed out free samples. Lilly also advertised in professional medical journals in hopes of swaying more doctors to prescribe Prozac for depressed patients. Increasingly, though, Lilly—like others in the pharmaceutical industry—realized the incredible potential in targeting patients directly.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign was intended to reach depressed adults and the people closest to them. By 1997 17.5 million Americans suffered from depression, according to Med Ad News. Depression, however, was a seriously underdiagnosed and undertreated illness. Eli Lilly claimed that two out of every three depressed individuals did not receive treatment. By targeting those who were reluctant to seek professional help for their symptoms, the campaign attempted to appeal to a substantial number of people. Victoria Murphy, a spokesperson for Eli Lilly, explained her company's strategy to the Fort Worth Star-Telegram: "The goal is very simple: to encourage people suffering from depression to get into treatment."

By expanding its advertising focus to include depressed people who had not yet tried its medication, Lilly hoped to see its Prozac sales rise. Mike Grossman, Director of Public Relations for Leo Burnett, saw his project as one of "assisting people in their depressed stupor to raise their hand for help . . . [T]hey might not recognize their condition or know that help is out there." In order to do so, however, the campaign had to overcome the stigma that surrounded depression and other mental illnesses. The wording of the ads' text was carefully selected to describe the symptoms of depression in a nonthreatening way: "So you may have trouble sleeping. Feel unusually sad or irritable. Find it hard to concentrate. Lose your appetite. Lack energy. Or have trouble feeling pleasure . . . ." The ads also sought to dispel some of the prevalent misconceptions and fears about depression.

PEPPERMINT PROZAC

Shortly after the introduction of the direct-to-consumer print campaign, Lilly also brought out a liquid Prozac. The company claimed that this peppermint flavored product was targeted at elderly patients who could not swallow the pill version. Critics such as author/columnist Arianna Huffington, however, claimed that the company was trying to reach a far younger audience by using "child-like" graphics in its ads.

"[I]t isn't just feeling down. It's a real illness with real causes . . . . Some people think you can just will yourself out of a depression. That's not true." Grossman summed up Burnett's goal for the ads' text: "We wanted it to be dignified."

Because the visual elements of the advertisements were inspired by patients' illustrations of their own feelings about depression and recovery, the campaign clearly intended to connect with depressed readers (or their family members and friends) on an emotional level. The simple yet powerful symbols of darkness and light were developed to be inclusive. "We wanted patients and depressed people to be able to respond to the ads," said Grossman.

COMPETITION

Eli Lilly's strategy of appealing directly to consumers indicated that the company had "decided to fend off competition from other drug companies by going over doctors' heads and targeting patients," the Chicago Sun-Times reported. By expanding its potential market, Eli Lilly was attempting to reinvigorate flagging sales. When it was first released, Prozac was the only medication of its kind. Both doctors and patients appreciated the drug's ability to combat depression effectively, in many cases without causing disruptive or dangerous side effects. Over time, though, Prozac's solitary reign ended. Other pharmaceutical companies began to create and market their own SSRIs. Smith Kline Beecham's Paxil and Pfizer's Zoloft competed head-to-head against Prozac in the "modern antidepressant" category. Other SSRIs joined the increasingly crowded field. Effexor, manufactured by American Home Products Corp., and Bristol-Myers Squibb Company's Serzone began to encroach on Prozac's territory. In addition, the older tricyclic family of antidepressants continued to be readily prescribed by doctors. Even nonprescription remedies for depression gained adherents. Hypericum, a derivative of the St. John's wort plant, was touted as the "natural Prozac."

By July 1997 Prozac commanded less than 50 percent of the $4 billion market for "modern antidepressants" that it had previously dominated. Zoloft, introduced in 1992, was gaining in popularity and had captured nearly one-third of this market. In 1997 Zoloft's global sales grew to $1.51 billion, while third-ranked Paxil topped $1.45 billion. Prozac's sales for that year totaled $2.56 billion. Recognizing these developments, the Wall Street Journal Europe declared in 1996 that "the king of antidepressants is under attack." Claiming that its medication had fewer side effects than Prozac, Pfizer marketed Zoloft aggressively. Indeed, Pfizer's sales force outmaneuvered Lilly's, visiting almost 70,000 more doctors' offices in 1996 than the Lilly team. In the process, Pfizer's sales representatives passed out many Zoloft samples to these physicians, who in turn dispensed them to depressed patients. Pfizer also placed advertisements in medical journals that implicitly reminded doctors of Prozac's drawbacks, especially the fact that it was reputed to provoke anxiety in some patients. "Consider Safety. Consider Effectiveness. Consider Zoloft . . .," the ads suggested. The fact that Pfizer priced Zoloft 20 percent below Prozac also contributed to that drug's rapid rise by attracting cost-cutting Health Maintenance Organizations.

While its market dominance was being eroded, Lilly, like a number of other drug companies, took notice of a new development in medical advertising. Rogaine (an anti-hair loss product) and Nicoderm (a smoking cessation aid) had realized tremendous gains in profitability thanks to direct-to-consumer television campaigns run in 1994. These campaigns sparked a broader trend toward direct-to-consumer marketing of an array of pharmaceutical products. Peter Labadie of William-Labadie Advertising told the Chicago Tribune that this shift "started with hair replacement products. Marketers felt that advertising was moving the products." Thus, in addition to increasing its sales force and promoting Prozac more strongly to primary care physicians, Lilly embarked on its own direct-to-consumer print campaign in an effort to outflank its competitors. This was the first such effort that Lilly had made on behalf of Prozac. At the time, it was also the largest direct-to-consumer campaign for a "modern antidepressant." American Home Products Corp. had run a regional campaign for Effexor that featured tributes to the powers of the medication ("I got my marriage back," declared one), but Lilly's Prozac campaign appeared nationwide.

MARKETING STRATEGY

After Eli Lilly chose Leo Burnett to create its direct-to-consumer campaign, the ad agency devised a number of possible ads. The one that was best received by patients in Lilly focus groups was, not surprisingly, the series partially inspired by the experiences of patients. The dual metaphorical images of dark and light accurately expressed to them what depression and a return to health felt like. Lilly also sought input from doctors and mental health advocacy groups before releasing the original ad to the public.

In order to reach a large and varied group of people, Lilly chose to run the campaign in general-interest magazines with wide circulations. The ad first appeared in 20 such publications, including Family Circle, Good Housekeeping, Sports Illustrated, Cosmopolitan, Men's Health, Newsweek, Time, Parade Magazine, and Entertainment Weekly. In keeping with data indicating that the incidence of depression among women was twice as high as that among men, the magazine list was "skewed toward women," according to Grossman. As Med Ad News pointed out, women accounted for 60 percent of doctor visits and were twice as likely as men to request a specific brand of medication.

Lilly selected a print medium in part because of limitations that the FDA had placed on direct-to-consumer television ads. Regulations in force at the time prohibited pharmaceutical companies from drawing an explicit connection between a medical condition and a medication. Print ads, which were not circumscribed by such restrictions, were therefore a better way for Lilly to convey its message to consumers. Moreover, consumers had more time to reflect on a print ad then on a 30-second television spot, which was ideal for Lilly's purposes. Indeed, according to the Indianapolis Star, the ad encouraged the reader to muse actively over symptoms. As Gary Mitchell, a professor at the Indiana University Medical Center, told the Indianapolis Star, "You're on Paxil and you see the Prozac ad, and ask yourself, 'Why am I not on that drug?' "

OUTCOME

Although it is difficult to correlate sales increases to the campaign, Lilly expressed pleasure with the results. In fact, the company announced to Health News Daily that it was doubling its 1998 advertising budget in order to obtain "a full year effect" from the campaign. Industry analyst Myron Holubiak took a clearer stance on the effect of advertising in The Commercial Appeal: "That drug companies are creating a demand through consumer advertising can be proven, and physicians will prescribe drugs their patients ask for." Prozac's sales rose 9 percent in 1997 to reach $2.56 billion; 1997 fourth quarter earnings were up 15 percent.

Not everyone, however, approved of Lilly's direct-to-consumer efforts. The American Medical Association condemned all advertising that targeted patients. Erik Parens' column in the Washington Post was indicative of the outcry directed at the Prozac campaign. "Of course, doctors can—and should—say no to anyone who doesn't need a particular medication. But let's not fool ourselves: If doctors are under pressure from their patients to prescribe a particular medication, they must become strong gatekeepers to prevent misuse."

Despite the negative response from some columnists and consumer advocacy groups, a great many doctors and mental health alliances praised the campaign's efforts to educate a large number of individuals who suffered, undiagnosed and untreated, from an often debilitating illness.

FURTHER READING

Campbell, Laura. "Demand via Direct Ads Hikes Firms' Health." The Commercial Appeal, February 22, 1998.

Kirk, Jim. "FDA May Relieve T.V. Advertisers." Chicago Tribune, July 8, 1997.

Langreth, Robert. "Prozac Finds Itself Losing Market Share to Newer Rivals." Wall Street Journal (Europe), May 10, 1996.

"Lilly's Prozac Promotional Efforts Will Double in 1998." Health Daily News, January 30, 1998.

"Lilly Sheds Light on Depression." Med Ad News, August 1, 1997.

"No End in Sight." Med Ad News, October 1, 1997.

O'Malley, Chris. "Lilly Takes Prozac to the People." Indianapolis Star, July 1, 1998.

Parens, Erik. "The Problem of Mixing Drugs with Ads." Washington Post, October 26, 1997.

"Prozac Ads Hope to Lure Patients." Chicago Sun-Times, July 6, 1997.

Taylor, Holly. "Prozac Ads Cloud Issue of Therapy's Role, Experts Say." Fort Worth Star-Telegram, July 19, 1997.

Rebecca Stanfel

Energizer Holdings, Inc.

533 Maryville University Drive
St. Louis, Missouri 63141
USA
Telephone: (314) 985-2000
Fax: (314) 985-2000
Web site: www.energizer.com

■■■

BUNNY CHASERS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The pink Energizer Bunny first marched across American television screens in 1989 to advertise the Eveready Battery Company's Energizer batteries. Eight years later Eveready Battery (which eventually became Energizer Holdings, Inc.) was America's second-largest battery manufacturer, behind Duracell, Inc. After the Energizer Bunny's debut proved highly successful, Eveready continued to spin off similar campaigns throughout the early 1990s. One television spot began as a hemorrhoid-cream commercial but was soon interrupted by the marching Energizer Bunny. The voice-over message never varied, with the announcer proclaiming, "Energizer batteries. They keep going and going and going…" In 1997 Eveready and its longtime ad agency, TBWA\Chiat\Day, struggled to develop fresh Energizer Bunny campaigns. That year, in an attempt to revitalize the bunny's image and replace Duracell as the industry leader, Eveready introduced its "Bunny Chasers" television campaign, which borrowed the storyline from the previous summer's blockbuster tornado thriller Twister.

"Bunny Chasers" started in summer 1997, when Twister was released on video. TBWA\Chiat\Day created the campaign's seven TV spots with Eveready's $50 million advertising budget. The campaign featured teams of young, obsessed scientists who chased the Energizer Bunny much like meteorologists chased tornadoes in the movie. The spots were filmed to resemble documentaries: handheld cameras were used, and the dialogue was ad-libbed. At various bunny "sightings" the actors stepped outside of their "Bunny Chaser" van for staged interviews with director Phil Morrison. The campaign ended in late 1997, but campaigns featuring the Energizer Bunny continued for several more years.

Ad Track, USA Today's consumer poll about ad campaigns, revealed that audiences enjoyed "Bunny Chasers" but felt that the commercials were ineffective. Although ad analysts offered slight praise to the campaign for presenting the Energizer Bunny in a new format, ad publications such as Advertising Age's Creativity criticized TBWA\Chiat\Day for not retiring the Energizer Bunny earlier. The overall sales growth for the company in 1997 was less than the sales growth for the overall battery industry.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The battery market in the United States had traditionally been a fairly quiet category in terms of advertising. But the proliferation of household appliances, toys, pocket calculators, handheld computers, audio players, and other electronic devices that required batteries had steadily boosted sales into the $2 billion range. By the mid-1980s the field was highly competitive, with the major players being Duracell and Eveready, although Rayovac held on to approximately 10 percent of the market. It was at this point that Eveready and its Energizer brand of alkaline batteries launched the campaign that would create a lasting impact on the battery business and on American popular culture as well.

Created by the Los Angeles-based ad agency Chiat/Day (before its mid-1990s merger with TBWA and at the peak of its decadelong creative preeminence in the advertising industry), the campaign tapped into a widespread public weariness with clichéd advertising forms. Adopting as its mascot the most innocent-seeming of icons, a decidedly low-tech pink toy bunny, the campaign used wicked irony to infiltrate a wide range of insufferable commercials on the way to gaining the awareness of its target market. The spots worked by creating faux advertising that was just close enough to the real thing to provide a genuine sense of surprise—and in many cases, relief—when the actors droning on about hemorrhoid cream or some other numbingly familiar product were interrupted and thrown into confusion by the mute but energetic rabbit. Energizer's "going and going" tagline quickly became part of the national vocabulary. Having hit a winner with the campaign, Eveready and its agency stuck with it, creating successive versions of the bunny's adventures that worked ever harder to avoid becoming parodies of themselves. Advertisers typically did not use the same advertising theme for eight years, but Eveready believed that the Energizer Bunny was still viable.

REMAKING WAKITA

In 1997 the Eveready Battery Company introduced an advertising campaign for its Energizer battery that parodied the pervious summer's blockbuster movie Twister, which starred Helen Hunt and Bill Paxton. During the making of the tornado-themed action movie, the downtown section of Wakita, Oklahoma, was demolished for a scene in which a tornado wreaked havoc on the Great Plains. The Warner Bros. studio then paid for Wakita's downtown to be rebuilt and donated a new fire truck to the town.

TARGET MARKET

Because nearly everyone used portable devices requiring power—be they flashlights, radios, or handheld computers—the market for alkaline batteries was all but universal. Thus, category advertising attempted to be broad in its scope and appeal. Use among multiperson households was strong, given the prevalence of battery-powered toys and small appliances such as clocks and radios. That Duracell's Copper Top advertising often featured an animated family of battery-using toys illustrated the point. Even so, the market was directed toward men in general, who tended to be the predominant users of gadgets, and toward young men in particular, who were especially drawn to portable music systems, computer devices, camcorders, and other "high-drain" devices. In addition, the market was subject to a strong seasonal spike around the Christmas holidays, when the national spasm of gift spending created a strong demand for batteries to power millions of toys and other items. An estimated 40 percent of battery sales were connected to end-of-the-year gift giving, and this important market segment clearly centered on the parents who tossed a pack or two of batteries into the shopping cart along with the latest power-gobbling supertoy. Eveready's "Bunny Chasers" campaign, however, took as its primary target young men, the so-called Generation Xers who had grown up with television, knew its advertising inside and out, and had become immune to its tired tropes. The one thing this ultrahip cohort would respond to was irony, and "Bunny Chasers" had that in spades.

COMPETITION

The big three in the battery industry were Duracell, owned by Gillette; Eveready, a Ralston-Purina company; and Rayovac, which had been acquired by the Thomas H. Lee Company, a Boston investment house. The three were vying for a market valued by Information Services at $2 billion a year. Of that, an estimated 60 percent was made up of the disposable alkaline batteries commonly used in toys and household appliances. The remainder included nonalkaline and rechargeable batteries. Although, as tested by Consumer Reports, there was little actual difference in performance among the various brands of alkaline batteries, both of the leaders maintained that their own tests demonstrated real, even dramatic advantages in longevity.

When it came to marketing, the competition between Duracell and Eveready for the number one position was especially fierce, with Duracell's Copper Top traditionally edging out Eveready's Energizer. According to estimates from Merrill Lynch, Duracell recorded $800 million in sales in 1996, while Eveready followed closely with $701 million. Meanwhile, number three Rayovac reported a distant $211 million. Beginning in 1992 Rayovac had put most of its efforts into rechargeable batteries, but in 1997 the company threatened to stir the competitive soup when it signed superendorser Michael Jordan to help promote its newly redesigned Maximum alkaline batteries.

In terms of advertising budgets, Competitive Media Reporting pegged Eveready's 1996 Energizer budget at $65.6 million, while Duracell, running a campaign that featured computer-animated, battery-powered toy characters, spent $60.7 million. With its new Michael Jordan campaign, Rayovac was expected to spend $25 million in 1997. The competition between Duracell and Eveready was waged both on and off the advertising field. Duracell's longtime claim that "No other battery lasts longer" was openly challenged after Eveready introduced its new High Drain battery, designed for devices like camcorders and minidisc players that required more power. Energizer demanded that the television networks stop running Duracell's advertising unless the company changed the commercials.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Like any company hoping to extend a successful advertising campaign, Eveready, along with agency TBWA\Chiat\Day, faced the challenge of topping its previous efforts. In its eight-year run Energizer had become so well known in pop culture that any new incarnation would be watched very closely, both by a public that had established its own emotional bond to the bunny and by the advertising industry, some of whose members had long tired of the award-winning concept. Yet Eveready was strongly committed to its spokesrabbit. Observed Mark Larsen, the company's newly hired category manager of communications for Energizer, "We really wanted to dial it up and connect back with the consumer even stronger." To make that connection, Larsen and the TBWA\Chiat\Day creative team linked the Energizer Bunny with the 1996 movie Twister to create a campaign with Eveready's $50 million annual advertising budget.

One of the previous summer's special-effects extravaganzas, Twister chronicled a group of tornado-chasing scientists who, because of their obsession with the violent storms, kept going and going no matter the hardship or danger. As it happened, the obsessed scientists also fit right into the product's target profile. They were young males who used battery-operated gadgets. The agency knew, however, that their target consumers were media-wise and would respond best to irony and humor, and so the campaign was created as a deadpan parody of what had been a rather straightforward adventure movie. The obsession of the bunny chasers matched the endurance of the battery-driven bunny. The spots, shot in a documentary style—even to the point of having the actors ad-lib their lines—were classic image advertising, as the campaign had always been. No product was shown, only an attitude and the single benefit of longevity.

Commercial director Phil Morrison was hired to direct the "Bunny Chasers" campaign in part because he was known for his humorous style. In creating a documentary look and feel for the spots, he loaded his actors—chosen for their nonglamorous looks and ability to improvise—into an equipment-laden van and then drove through the countryside. At various "sightings," the whole crew would pile out, and Morrison would "interview" them. This technique yielded the very first installment of the seven-spot campaign, a teaser called "Woodchuck" in which the team located its quarry only to discover that it was not the bunny at all but a woodchuck. The woodchuck line was the spontaneous invention of one of the actors who had decided on his own that the first sighting should be a false alarm.

OUTCOME

USA Today's Ad Track poll indicated that, as one more installment of the overall Energizer Bunny campaign, "Bunny Chasers" was popular among audiences but nevertheless lacked effectiveness. Adweek named the commercial "Woodchuck" a Best Spot in 1997. Other critics attacked TBWA\Chiat\Day for overusing the Energizer Bunny and for not inventing something entirely new for Eveready. In the December 1, 1998, issue of Advertising Age's Creativity, the agency's creative director, Clay Williams, explained his reluctance to replace the Energizer Bunny: "It's hard to turn your back and move away from a campaign that has as much equity as this one."

In addition to disappointing the advertising critics, "Bunny Chasers" did little to help Eveready outperform its competition. Although Eveready's profits were up 3.3 percent in the second quarter of 1997, they lagged behind rival Duracell's 7.3 percent growth during the same period. Moreover, Eveready trailed the overall industry, which recorded a 4.2 percent gain during the quarter. Retailers, too, saw little direct impact from the advertising. Said Michael Polzin of Walgreens, the nation's largest drugstore chain, "We can't really recognize how the brand advertising affects that particular brand's sales. It does heighten awareness, however, among consumers that they need batteries, and so it helps our battery sales overall."

Nevertheless, the company was pleased with its 1997 skirmish in the battery wars, however substantial or insubstantial its impact on sales turned out to be. Said Eveready's Larsen, "The bunny is and always will be" a part of American culture. Although "Bunny Chasers" ended in 1997, the use of the bunny continued the next year for an Energizer campaign with a pit-stop theme. Actors playing mechanics in the commercials inserted new Energizer batteries into turbocharged, high-speed bunnies. Despite the fact that Eveready's sales fell even further behind Duracell in the late 1990s, in the months leading up to the November 2000 election Eveready revived its earlier strategy of using fake commercials, releasing spots in which the Energizer Bunny humorously interrupted TV promotions for the fictitious politician Bob Fremgen.

FURTHER READING

"Ask the Bunny." Advertising Age, June 3, 1991, p. 22.

Berger, Warren. "Agency of the Year." Advertising Age's Creativity, December 1, 1998, p. 28.

Clark, Michael. "Morrison, TBWA Chiat/Day Proclaim Bunny Season." Shoot, November 15, 1996.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "The Marketing 100: Energizer: Mark Larsen." Advertising Age, June 30, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Humor Remains Top Tool for Ad Campaigns." USA Today, September 30, 1996, p. 3B.

———. "Viewers Want Bunny Back; Energizer Battery Ads Skip a Beat with Current Twist." USA Today, February 24, 1997, p. 9B.

Goldrich, Robert. "Former C/D Creative Enters into First Spot Shop Affiliation." Shoot, June 13, 1997.

"How the Bunny Charged Eveready." Advertising Age, April 8, 1991, p. 20.

Martin, David M., Elaine Rowland, and David Bourgeois. "Taste Test—TBWA Chiat/Day Inc.'s 1997 Advertising Campaigns." Shoot, December 12, 1997, p. 50.

McCarthy, Michael. "TBWA Re-energizes Advertising 'Icon.' " Adweek (eastern ed.), November 13, 1995, p. 57.

Mehegan, Sean. "The Bunny—Energizer Challenges Duracell at the Networks." Brandweek, September 1, 1997.

"Real Money." Mediaweek, June 30, 1997.

Siwolop, Sana. "Now a Pure Play among Top Battery Makers." New York Times, November 23, 1997.

Wentz, Laurel. "Judges Boot Copycat 'Bunny,' " Advertising Age, June 25, 1990, p. 56.

Patrick Hutchins
Kevin Teague

ESPN, Inc.

ESPN Plaza
935 Middle Street
Bristol, Connecticut 06010
USA
Telephone: (860) 766-2000
Fax: (860) 766-2213
Web site: www.espn.go.com

■■■

THE RICK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

ESPN began in the late 1970s as the first 24-hour cable channel devoted exclusively to sports news and the airing of such minor sports as Australian Rules football and tractor pulls. By the 1990s, however, it was a powerhouse ready to extend its brand in every direction, including internationally. On the domestic side, a radio network was launched in 1992; a second cable channel, ESPN2, made its debut in 1993; and a website was introduced in 1995. Then in the fall of 1996 ESPN launched its third cable channel, ESPNews, a 24-hour sports-news service. ESPN hired ad agency Ground Zero to develop a new television and print campaign to promote the channel. The result was an effort titled ''The Rick.''

The Rick was a fictional obsessive sports fan who rarely left a bedroom bedecked with all manner of memorabilia. Based on a composite of real-life fans, The Rick embodied the dedication of ESPNews to the minutiae of the sports world. In the television spots the character often showed off his collection of sports memorabilia, including sports figurines, which he insisted were vital artifacts and not mere dolls.

Although it was difficult to say how much of a role ''The Rick'' played, ESPNews outlived its main competition, CNN-SI, which failed to achieve high enough ratings and was taken off the air. The Rick himself, while not especially well received by critics, was popular with ESPN's core audience. The character was brought back to promote the ESPN website as well as the ESPY Awards, a sports-award show organized by and aired on ESPN.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

A new era in televised sports began on September 7, 1979, when ESPN, the Entertainment and Sports Programming Network, went on the air. Backed by $10 million in start-up money from Getty Oil, the network was the brainchild of William F. Rasmussen, a broadcaster whose original idea was to televise school sports in Connecticut. ESPN's employees initially numbered about 75, and the network was available in some 1.4 million American homes.

The first program telecast, and to this day the centerpiece of ESPN programming, was SportsCenter, the network's daily wrap-up of sports news. Its success enabled ESPN to begin broadcasting around the clock on September 1, 1980. With few live events to cover, the network relied on a hodgepodge of monster-truck shows, tractor pulls, Australian Rules football, and business programming to keep viewers entertained. Although advertiser interest remained tepid, on May 31, 1981, ESPN reached the 10-million subscriber plateau, an important milestone for a start-up network.

The next three years were a period of exponential growth for ESPN. By August 1983 the network had 28.5 million subscribers and had surpassed Turner Broadcasting's WTBS to become the largest cable network in America. The next year ESPN acquired its first major sports programming, college football. "That was the first property we had that the networks wanted," said Steve Bornstein, the chief executive officer of ESPN. Also in 1984, ABC Video Enterprises bought ESPN from Texaco, which had taken over Getty Oil. ESPN concluded the year with its first profitable quarter and became available in all 50 U.S. states.

In 1985 Capital Cities Inc. bought ABC and acquired ESPN for $237.5 million. In July of that year the ticker known as Sports Update, which offered scores and news flashes on the half hour, made its debut as 28/58. Continuing to pursue football, the big game of sports programming, ESPN in 1987 inked a first-of-its-kind cable deal with the National Football League (NFL), allowing it to televise 13 games per season. Later that year ESPN became the first cable network to reach 50 percent of American homes with television, some 43.7 million households. ESPN International was launched in 1988, and within 10 years it was sending American sports worldwide, with broadcasts in 14 languages. Major league baseball joined the ESPN roster in 1989.

In 1991, in its 12th year, ESPN went to an all-sports format, dropping the morning program Nation's Business Today in favor of rebroadcasts of SportsCenter. On January 1, 1992, the ESPN Radio Network was introduced, offering 16 hours a week of sports news, commentary, and information. Reflecting a trend toward round-the-clock coverage of sports news, the ESPN Phone Update was introduced in 1993. The 900-number service offered scores, news, and information 24 hours a day.

In October 1993 ESPN expanded its family of television networks domestically for the first time when ESPN2, or "the Deuce" as it was known, became available to some 10 million households. The new network offered programming similar to that of ESPN but with a more youthful orientation and a commitment to covering alternative, or "extreme," sports.

In 1995 "ESPNet SportsZone" (later "ESPN SportsZone") was launched on the World Wide Web. This sports resource quickly emerged as one of the most-visited content sites on the Internet, setting a record for usage by registering a high point of 21.6 million hits in one day a year after it was introduced. Also in 1995 ESPN India went on the air, becoming ESPN's 16th network outside the United States. Commentary was provided in English and Hindi. By this time ESPN programming could be heard in 14 languages worldwide. In the United States ESPN could now boast of reaching 70 percent of homes with television, the first U.S. cable network to achieve this level of penetration. Total subscribers had reached 67.1 million.

Impressed by the network's development and the potential for further growth, the Walt Disney Company in 1996 bought ESPN, thus forging a partnership between Disney-owned ABC and the cable network. In the autumn of 1996 ESPNews—the 24-hour all-sports news network—was launched. Five charter advertisers quickly signed on: Coors Brewing Co., General Motors Corp., Levi Strauss & Co., McDonald's Corp., and Procter & Gamble Co. Several of the companies already advertised heavily on ESPN and ESPN2. ESPNews hired 11 new anchors for the network, adopting a format of consecutive 30-minute programs throughout the day. It replayed ESPN's showpiece SportsCenter program each night and featured ESPN commentators such as Peter Gammons on baseball and Chris Mortenson on the NFL. ESPN2 was used to help expose ESPNews to a wider audience by carrying the service between periods in its hockey coverage and at halftime during college basketball games.

At the end of the 1990s the ESPN family of networks, publications (including ESPN the Magazine, a biweekly publication that first appeared in March 1998), and services seemed poised for continued growth. Estimates of the value of ESPN and ESPN2 ranged as high as $5 billion, or about one-quarter of the $19 billion Disney had paid for the entire ABC-Capital Cities empire. By 1999 ESPN, the "mother network," was reaching 73 million, or almost 75 percent, of all homes with television in the United States as well as more than 90 million worldwide. This impressive level of market penetration allowed ESPN to aggressively cross-promote its other networks, including the infant ESPNews.

TARGET MARKET

"The Rick" targeted one of advertising's most coveted demographic groups: young men. These viewers were increasingly tuning out mainstream network television fare in favor of specialized programming geared to their interests, such as that found on ESPN and ESPNews. "Male viewers are continuing to be difficult to target in prime time," observed Larry Goodman, president of news sales for Turner Broadcasting. "For concentrated male viewership, in general, you have to look at cable."

Fortunately for sports news networks such as ESPNews, this male demographic group had few places to turn to in the market. "There's such a shortage of male viewers in broadcast network prime time that any

NOT THE FIRST TIME

"The Rick" was not ESPN's first foray into the realm of offbeat, humorous promotional advertising. In fact, in the eyes of many the network was a master at blending reality and whimsy.

In 1993, for example, ESPN signed a deal with ad agency Wieden+Kennedy, based in Portland, Oregon, to produce a series of promos for its nightly sports news broadcast. Entitled "This Is SportsCenter," the humorous spots featuring big-name athletes achieved a sizable cult following. Some of the more memorable spots in the campaign included one in which SportsCenter anchor Charley Steiner punched out the Syracuse Orangemen mascot, another in which anchors Keith Olbermann and Dan Patrick performed surgery on the knee of Indianapolis Colts quarterback Jim Harbaugh, and a third in which the rotund Steiner took over the role of a pool attendant on TV's Melrose Place when actor Andrew Shue was brought in to replace him on SportsCenter.

As the cornerstone of ESPN's 24-hour sports programming, SportsCenter was one of the network's core equities. ESPN's aim in developing the humorous campaign was to solidify the powerful ESPN brand image as not just a TV network but also as a huge sports fan itself. The SportsCenter anchors were allowed to convey their distinct personalities, and the spots gave sports fans an exaggerated documentary look at the show's inner workings. Based on the response the spots received at industry awards shows and in the trade press, they also provided viewers with many reasons to smile.

branded network specializing in the 25–54 demo is always going to be valuable," said Goodman.

COMPETITION

Although it was the first 24-hour all-sports news network, ESPNews was soon joined by a formidable competitor, CNN-SI, a joint venture of CNN, the Cable News Network, and Sports Illustrated magazine. A third major player in cable sports programming, Fox Sports Net, emerged in the late 1990s as a challenger to ESPNews sister network ESPN.

The networks shared many characteristics, but for the purpose of capturing the interest of viewers, they tended to emphasize their differences. Jim Walton, CNN senior vice president in charge of CNN-SI, saw the "hard news" cachet implicit in the CNN brand as the principal point of differentiation. In an interview soon after CNN-SI's launch, he was quick to point out that the satellite system PrimeStar had placed the network in two different areas of its service: news and sports. Nevertheless, Walton was not sure that the point was getting across to consumers. As he said in comparing his product with ESPNews, "I see us as different, but I don't know if consumers perceive us differently."

All three of the networks exerted considerable promotional muscle in their efforts to win the allegiance of sports-obsessed consumers. CNN-SI relied on Sports Illustrated as a built-in weekly promotional vehicle. ESPN and Fox aggressively advertised their services and programming with on-air and off-network promos. By the end of the 1990s all three of the networks remained viable, despite the suspicion in some quarters that the sports segment had become saturated. While no ratings data were available for CNN-SI and ESPNews, the networks reportedly boasted cable subscribers of 1 million and 1.5 million, respectively, minuscule numbers by cable standards but worth fighting over in the eyes of programmers and marketing officials.

MARKETING STRATEGY

ESPNews conceived of its fictional spokescharacter in the "Rick" advertisements as "the most knowledgeable sports fan in the history of the universe." He was an obsessive collector of everything related to sports, from a mouth guard belonging to hockey star Eric Lindros to a jar of pickle juice that Hall of Fame pitcher Nolan Ryan had used to prevent blisters on his fingers. As an exaggerated representation of the hard-core sports aficionado, the character was designed to reflect the target audience of ESPNews.

Television spots for the "Rick" campaign were directed by Christopher Guest of bicoastal Moxie Pictures. A veteran comic actor and director, Guest was best known for his work on NBC's Saturday Night Live in the mid-1980s. He also cowrote and costarred in the 1983 cult comedy hit This Is Spinal Tap. The creative team at ad agency Ground Zero consisted of creative directors Court Crandall and Kirk Souder, art director Guy Shelmerdine, copywriter Steve O'Brien, and agency producer Patricia Phelan. To play the part of The Rick, Crandall recruited a college friend, Boston-born Mike O'Malley, a rising actor with a number of credits on his resume, including a stint as a host of the Nickelodeon game show Guts.

The campaign was the brainchild of copywriter O'Brien. Relying on memories of his youth growing up in New England, he based the character depicted in the "Rick" commercials on his brother Pat and a group of sports-obsessed friends who, like ESPNews, prided themselves on always knowing the latest scores and all manner of minutiae. As a model for the character's cluttered bedroom, O'Brien envisioned his brother's old bedroom, its shelves crammed full of sports memorabilia. "We blew it out to the next level," O'Brien said, commenting on the real-life basis for the obsessive character. "We imagined a kid who is really, really into sports and kept growing in that knowledge and adding to his room until he had this awesome collection of sports-related items."

A sports fan in his own right, O'Brien also drew on himself for inspiration. At one point he brought some of his sports figurines into the Ground Zero offices and conducted fanciful "interviews" with them, as if he were a television broadcaster. In one of the "Rick" spots the spokescharacter did the same thing.

The other spots in the "Rick" campaign followed a similar pattern. In one the character proudly displayed a basketball net obtained for $15 from the grounds crew at North Carolina State University. In another he again trotted out his collection of sports figurines, this time to defend them as vital artifacts, "not toys, not dolls." In a third spot he played with a set of racing cars, defending his sports hobbies while dismissing other pastimes, such as reading Franz Kafka, whose story The Metamorphosis he erroneously described as concerning a man who turned into a cocker spaniel.

In 1998 The Rick was enlisted to promote ESPN.com, replacing a character called Net Boy who was not popular enough to retain after a website of the same name lodged a legal challenge. But The Rick's popularity also played a role. According to ESPN ad director Alex Kaminsky, quoted in Brandweek, "our audience related so well to 'The Rick,' that we really thought it was time to put him back into prime time." The new spots included The Rick demonstrating the versatility of "Rickwear," an Astroturf jacket that could double as a practice putting green. In another execution The Rick tried to convince ESPN to partner on a joint venture, "the official website of The Rick." In 2004 ESPN brought back The Rick once again, this time to promote the ESPN sports-awards program the ESPYs. Wearing his usual Boston sports garb, The Rick offered to trade used nasal strips worn by NFL players for tickets to the ESPYs.

OUTCOME

"The Rick" was recognized with a number of advertising-industry awards, a sign that it had accomplished the goal of breaking through the clutter of sports commercials. For the spot "Slot Cars—Scenarios," Ground Zero in 1998 won the 32nd annual Belding Award for the top low-budget commercial from the Advertising Club of Los Angeles. In 1999 Ground Zero was awarded the Belding Bowl for an ESPNews package made up of two TV spots, "Colors" and "Big Heads—Little Bodies," and a print ad entitled "The Rick, Rosin."

Not all reviewers reacted favorably to the campaign, however. Some did not find the spots to be funny and even thought that they were a bit unsavory. Writing in the Los Angeles Times, ad critic Denise Gellene observed, "In these spots, aimed at sports fans and cable programmers alike, The Rick comes off as a genuine sports-aholic. But his obsession lacks the zany quality of sports fanatics depicted in ads for other ESPN services. It seems The Rick needs to get a life—or at least a shower."

Despite the critics, The Rick was popular with ESPN's target audience, and the campaign played its part in successfully launching ESPNews. CNN-SI, in the meantime, failed to catch on and was ultimately dropped. When ESPN tapped The Rick to promote the ESPYs, ESPN received some of the best ratings it had experienced in several years for the program. "The Rick" campaign also helped to advance the acting career of O'Malley. He starred in the disastrous sitcom The Mike O'Malley Show, which was cancelled after two episodes in 1999, but found sitcom success as the star of the CBS sitcom Yes, Dear, which debuted in 2000. O'Malley also landed roles in such films as Pushing Tin and 28 Days.

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "ESPN Campaign Uses a 'Hostile' Web Site to Send Viewers Its Way." New York Times, February 27, 2001, p. C6.

Gellene, Denise. "ESPN Fumbles on 'The Rick,'" Los Angeles Times, March 5, 1998.

Jensen, Jeff. "Cable TV: Battle Gets Nasty for Eyes and Ears of Sports Junkies." Advertising Age, April 14, 1997.

Lefton, Terry. "ISL Latest to Shop College Grid Playoff with $2.4 Billion Plan." Brandweek, December 14, 1998, p. 16.

Seaman, Debbie. "What's the Big Idea?" Advertising Age, April 1, 1998.

Steinberh, Brian, and Suzanne Vranica. "ESPN Brings Off the 'Rick' Trick." Wall Street Journal, July 20, 2004, p. B8.

Takaki, Millie. "Ground Zero Tops Belding TV Competition." Shoot, May 7, 1999.

Robert Schnakenberg
Ed Dinger

THIS IS SPORTSCENTER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

ESPN was launched in 1979 in Bristol, Connecticut, as the first cable television channel devoted exclusively to sports, although it had limited access to sports programming. One way to fill airtime was to run a daily sports-highlight show. Called SportsCenter, this program could offer much greater depth than the traditional five minutes reserved on the local news. It proved highly popular with viewers. In 1993 ESPN hired ad agency Wieden+Kennedy to promote the SportsCenter brand. What resulted was the ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign, which would become one of the most popular and longest-running campaigns on television.

The campaign's television spots were humorous, topical vignettes that featured ESPN anchors, top athletes, mascots, and other celebrities. One of the most popular spots of the entire campaign parodied the fears of Y2K (also known as the millennium bug, which, it was believed, would cause many computers to crash when their clocks attempted to change the year from 1999 to 2000) by showing an ESPN Y2K test gone bizarrely awry. Chaos ensued in the darkened studios: sirens blared, and star athletes were out of control. The spot closed with crazed anchor Charlie Steiner holding a lantern, a tie wrapped around his head, and his face painted. ''Follow me,'' he screamed, ''Follow me to freedom!'' The phrase became so associated with Steiner that in 2002, when he was invited to lead the crowd in the singing of ''Take Me Out to the Ballgame'' at Wrigley Field, he closed by exclaiming, ''Follow me to freedom.''

The ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign was popular with ESPN's audience as well as critics, as reflected by its longevity. The campaign also won numerous awards, including the 1997 Best of Show (TV category) at the American Advertising Federation's ADDY Awards, the 1996 Ad Age Best of Show, and the 1997 Broadcast Best of Show at the American Advertising Awards. In 1999 TV Guide listed the campaign among the 50 greatest commercials of all time, and in 2002 the Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing inducted the ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign into its Hall of Fame.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1979 Bill Rasmussen founded the first cable channel devoted entirely to the coverage of sports events and news. ESPN, or the Entertainment and Sports Programming Network, was headquartered on a remote tract of land in Bristol, Connecticut. Before ESPN and SportsCenter, which debuted with the network, sports news was ''confined to the five minute ghetto on the eleven o'clock news,'' John Walsh, ESPN senior vice president, told the Boston Globe. ESPN expanded quickly, fueled in part by the evolution of sporting events into a pop-culture phenomenon. Athletes like Michael Jordan were no longer merely viewed as competitors; they were powerful celebrities in their own right. By 1998 ESPN reached 73 million homes, and, according to the Boston Globe, it was ''hailed as cable's most financially successful experiment.''

No longer just a single sports-broadcasting channel, ESPN had become a sports empire. The network grew to include numerous ventures that capitalized on the reputation and success of the original cable channel: ESPN2, a second sports cable channel that targeted a younger audience; ESPN International; ESPNews, a channel devoted exclusively to 24-hour sports news; ESPN SportsZone, a sports information and news site on the World Wide Web; and ESPN Magazine, a sports magazine intended to challenge Sports Illustrated. In addition, the network planned to expand further to include a chain of restaurants, ESPN Grill, and merchandise stores. By 1997 ESPN was worth an estimated $8 billion.

As ESPN's good fortunes grew, so did those of SportsCenter, which had become the network's most popular and best-known show. ''It represents the network in its entirety,'' Tom Clendenin, ESPN's director of advertising, said of the program. ''It represents ESPN as a franchise.'' SportsCenter's anchors, including Chris Berman, Dan Patrick, and Keith Olbermann (who later left to host a news show at MSNBC), became celebrities virtually as popular as the athletes they covered. While ESPN and SportsCenter became more polished and creative, ESPN's promotions, according to Advertising Age's Creativity, ''reflected that of a pretty conservative, straightforward cable programmer.''

This would change in 1993, however, when ESPN hired Wieden+Kennedy, the same advertising agency that had turned the Nike logo into a universally recognized symbol. Together, Wieden+Kennedy and ESPN shifted the network's marketing strategy. They ''wanted people to fall in love with ESPN the brand, and not just the programs,'' said Wieden+Kennedy's Larry Frey. Judy Fearing, ESPN's senior vice president of marketing, elaborated in Advertising Age's Creativity: ''Wieden [was] . . . very involved in developing a personality for ESPN so that you don't just look at us and think highlights, you see an identity and an attitude.'' Before the ''This Is SportsCenter'' ads Wieden+Kennedy produced several well-received campaigns, including ''Kooky College Tunes,'' in which lounge singer Robert Goulet serenaded NCAA basketball teams. The ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign, however, represented the culmination of Wieden+Kennedy's efforts to craft a memorable image for both SportsCenter and ESPN.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign's message, delivered with a deadpan humor that was reminiscent of the style of the SportsCenter anchors, was that ESPN was the hub of all sporting events. The amusing vignettes starring athletes, SportsCenter anchors, celebrities, coaches, and referees made clear the premise that ESPN was the world of sports. In this way the campaign reached out to any viewer with a passing interest in news of the day's sports. But men between the ages of 18 and 34 were consistently both ESPN's and SportsCenter's core audience, and it was this group the network particularly wanted to target with the advertisements.

A combination of topicality and humor was the preferred method for reaching out to the core group. In its satirical style the campaign alluded to many of the same issues that sports fans followed on SportsCenter. Commercials were based on events such as the gutting of the Florida Marlins after their championship season of 1997, the penny-pinching practices of team owners, and boxer Mike Tyson's carnivorous tendencies. For instance, one spot featured the "trade" of the SportsCenter anchor Charley Steiner to Melrose Place in exchange for one of the good-looking actors from the soap-opera drama. Another spot, "Marlins Trade," featured batboys cut by the champion baseball team and hired as camera operators for SportsCenter. A spot called "KidsCenter" spoofed the match in which Mike Tyson bit off a chunk of Evander Holyfield's ear.

The campaign also spoofed athletes' personas, exaggerating their personality traits by placing them in incongruous situations. In one popular spot Grant Hill, a basketball player for the Detroit Pistons and a noted nice guy, played the piano, in uniform, in the lobby of the ESPN building in much the same manner as a pianist in a hotel bar. The slickness of the commercials, coupled with their implicit message that the viewer was in on a terrific inside joke, was intended to appeal directly to ESPN's target audience.

COMPETITION

The campaign's claim that ESPN was the dominant voice in sports reflected a certain reality. SportsCenter was far and away the most watched sports show on television, and ESPN landed several lucrative contracts to broadcast NFL and major-league baseball games. But ESPN faced emerging competition in the sports cable industry, often from channels that deliberately imitated the snappy tone and informal feel of SportsCenter. CNN-SI, launched after the merger of Time Warner (the owner of Sports Illustrated) and CNN, posed a threat because of its huge talent pool of CNN journalists and Sports Illustrated print reporters. But CNN-SI reached only 10 million homes and ultimately fell by the wayside. Fox Sports Network also looked hungrily at ESPN's revenues and popularity, but it lacked ESPN's strong sense of identity. SportsCenter faced more potent competition from local cable sports channels like Comcast in Philadelphia and Washington, D.C., which hosted SportsNite, a 30-minute program devoted exclusively to hometown teams. But when it came to covering sports on a national basis, SportsCenter simply had no peer.

"When you think about it, [everybody does] what they're doing—highlights, scores, and the controversial athlete soundbite of the day," declared an analyst to the Boston Globe. "They've distinguished themselves largely because of their attitude." The intangible attitude that distinguished SportsCenter from its cable-channel competitors was precisely what the "This Is SportsCenter" campaign strove to convey. But the commercials also tried not to diminish ESPN's reputation as the single most authoritative source of sports information.

In the view of ESPN its competition was not limited solely to other sports cable channels. It considered any program on any television network that went against SportsCenter as a competitor. Even programs such as The Tonight Show and Late Night with David Letterman were challengers. ESPN's Clendenin encapsulated his network's philosophy when he said, "SportsCenter is more than a sports show. It's an entertainment show."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1995 Alan Broce, who was then ESPN's director of advertising, met with Wieden+Kennedy and elaborated the network's goals for the SportsCenter campaign. Hank Perlman, an avid SportsCenter fan and a copywriter for the agency, provided much of the early inspiration for the campaign. At a brainstorming session he hit upon a unique idea. "We were blown away by the silliness of this little industrial-park town which sports fans think is the place where it all happens," Perlman told

FUNNY BUT TRUE

SportsCenter anchors stressed that, despite the zaniness of the "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, the show remained the preeminent voice in sports broadcasting. Dan Patrick told the San Diego Union-Tribune, "Amid the foolishness, SportsCenter has compromised nothing."

Entertainment Weekly. ''So we decided, why not make Bristol the center of the sports universe?'' Perlman went on to write most of the first 80 spots in the campaign. By 1997 the campaign had yielded more than l20 spots, yet they never appeared to lose their freshness or to become fragmented. According to Advertising Age, the strength of the campaign was that each spot stood for the spirit of the whole. The relatively low budget (the first 70 spots cost in total less than a million dollars to produce) provided Wieden+Kennedy with the flexibility to continually mine current events for creative advertising ideas.

Two of the most popular spots released in 1997, ''KidsCenter'' and ''Broadcast News,'' received a great deal of attention. In ''KidsCenter'' Evander Holyfield, the heavyweight boxing champion, was overseeing a day-care center for the children of ESPN employees. Linda Cohn, one of the SportsCenter anchors, described the unique ''skills'' these children learned. Holyfield watched over the children as they boxed and admonished them ''not to bite,'' a sardonic reference to the match in which Mike Tyson bit off a portion of Holyfield's ear. Holyfield continued his instruction as he warned the children, ''Don't go out without your gloves on.'' Dutifully, the children left with boxing gloves. In ''Broadcast News,'' a spoof of the movie of the same name, a relay race of athletes frantically rushed to get a tape on the air. The spot ended with Drew Bledsoe, the star quarterback for the New England Patriots football team, trampling the University of South Carolina basketball team's mascot.

Although the ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign was primarily designed for television, the network released a series of print ads that appeared in sports magazines and in general-interest publications such as Rolling Stone, Spin, and Entertainment Weekly. Advertising Age reported that Wieden+Kennedy overcame the difficulties in ''translating the humor from a TV campaign to a print campaign.'' The agency used still images to convey the campaign's fictional documentary style. For example, the television spot featuring Hill playing the piano in his basketball uniform was transformed in print to a single photo. The copy provided additional humor by noting that he was able to play only a couple of times a week during the basketball season.

Most of Wieden+Kennedy's efforts in the SportsCenter campaign were devoted to television. The commercials were aired on both ESPN and network television programs, primarily during prime-time sporting events such as NBA and NFL games. According to Advertising Age's Creativity, the overall strategy behind the network spots was ''not only to increase use of regular viewers but to attract the occasional stray fan as well.'' In addition to snaring new viewers and convincing others to watch the network more often, the campaign was run on network television to increase the brand's visibility. ''The goal was to make SportsCenter a talked-about brand,'' ESPN's Fearing told Entertainment Weekly.

The ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign remained fresh and popular as the new century dawned. The television spots continued to maintain their humorous sensibility, and top athletes were eager to participate for the twice-yearly commercial shoots, willingly accepting their $1,000 fee, paid to the charity of their choice. The most significant change was the way the spots were unveiled to the public. In 2000 the latest batch of spots was first released as content on the ESPN website, www.ESPN.com. With only a limited amount of promotion, the initial spot posted on the first day was downloaded about 64,000 times. These four spots featured hockey player Ken Daneyko, basketball player Jerry Stackhouse, and comedian Carrot Top, who supposedly joined the SportsCenter staff in a bid to keep up with Monday Night Football's hiring of comedian Dennis Miller.

In July 2002 SportsCenter aired its 25,000th installment, and to help commemorate the occasion Wieden+Kennedy produced new television spots in the ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign. They featured Hilltopper, the Western Kentucky University fuzzy pink mascot, logging in past tapes of the show in the subbasement of the ESPN headquarters, as well as Los Angeles Clippers basketball player Elton Brand.

Instead of the usual array of star athletes, in 2004 the campaign focused on the winner of the national spelling-bee championship, covered by ESPN earlier in the year. The young champ, David Tidmarsh, was challenged by ESPN's Scott Van Pelt to spell ''Pujols,'' the last name of the Saint Louis Cardinals' star player. There appeared to be no letup to the campaign. In fact, in 2006 ESPN found yet more ways to deliver the television spots to its viewers. They were available on demand at ESPN.com, delivered on DVDs, and in 2006 became downloadable as videos for use on MP3 players.

OUTCOME

The ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign generated nearly constant attention from the media. Tom Shales, TV critic for the Washington Post, included the spots in his list of ''the 35 things to be thankful for in television.'' He wrote that ''the promos make you want to watch the show even if you hate sports and hate promos.'' Entertainment Weekly raved that the spots ''have delivered some of the freshest entertainment on the tube.'' The campaign collected numerous industry awards, including Best of Show (TV) at the 1997 American Advertising Federation's ADDY Awards, the 1996 Ad Age Best of Show, and the 1997 Broadcast Best of Show at the American Advertising Awards. In 1999 TV Guide ranked the campaign number 22 on its list of the 50 greatest commercials of all time. The Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing inducted the campaign into its Hall of Fame in 2002. Trade magazines such as Shoot, Adweek, and Advertising Age regularly ran articles lauding the innovation of the campaign. ESPN considered the buzz to be a sign of success. ''Anytime you develop an advertising campaign that is talked about, you know that you've hit a home run,'' Fearing told the Sacramento Bee.

The SportsCenter campaign also succeeded in galvanizing public attention and moving the show into the realm of entertainment in the public consciousness. Photos of SportsCenter anchors Patrick and Olbermann were splashed across the same page in TV Guide as those of Entertainment Tonight cohost-turned-pop-singer John Tesh. The spots so captivated people's imagination that strangers on the street shouted out lines from specific SportsCenter promos when they caught sight of Patrick and Berman. Fearing again summed up ESPN's delight to Entertainment Weekly when she said, ''Now SportsCenter is part of pop culture.''

ESPN monitored the response through a telephone survey of hundreds of viewers. The results indicated that the campaign had indeed broken through. Ratings figures rose as more viewers tuned into the show, but even more importantly, viewers increasingly recognized the ESPN brand. ''The consequence has been continuous ratings growth, unprecedented brand recall . . . and a positive buzz among sports elite,'' an ESPN executive told Advertising Age. Indeed, athletes as popular as Tiger Woods and Dennis Rodman called ESPN to request a spot in the commercials. But perhaps the best indication of the success of the ''This Is SportsCenter'' campaign was the spate of copycat spots inspired by the campaign. Companies such as the Weather Channel featured spots with the same documentary style and offbeat humor of the SportsCenter campaign. Fearing told USA Today in 2000 that she hoped the campaign ran forever, noting, ''As long as there's athletes and pop culture to tap into, we'll keep doing it.'' Several years later the campaign was running strong with no end in sight.

FURTHER READING

Cuneo, Alice. ''MPA Kelly Awards: The 1996 Finalists.'' Advertising Age, May 13, 1996.

Friedman, Wayne. ''ESPN Treats Promos as Programming.'' Advertising Age, November 13, 2000, p. 8.

Garfield, Bob. ''Best Awards: ESPN Scores Best of Show.'' Advertising Age, May 27, 1996.

Gough, Paul J. ''ABC Sports, ESPN Tackle iTunes.'' Hollywood Reporter, January 4, 2006, p. 4.

Hogan, Monica. ''ESPN Celebrates Milestone 'SportsCenter,' '' Multichannel News, July 15, 2002, p. 98.

Jurkowitz, Mark. ''They Know the Score with a Mixture of Fast Talk, Wacky Cultural Allusions, and Professional Expertise.'' Boston Globe, February 1, 1998.

McCarthy, Michael. ''ESPN's 'SportsCenter' Ad Campaign Going Strong.'' USA Today, April 17, 2000.

Miller, Stuart. ''SportsCenter: 25 Years of Excellence.'' Broadcasting & Cable, November 8, 2004, p. S48.

Nelson, John. ''ESPN Scores with Ad Campaign.'' Sacramento Bee, April 23, 1996.

Quindt, Fritz. ''Primo 'SportsCenter' Promos Make Fans Watch, Talent Known.'' San Diego Union-Tribune, April 26, 1996.

Shapiro, Leonard. ''ESPN Ads Generating Talk.'' Fort Worth Star-Telegram, May 24, 1996.

Snierson, Dan. ''Center of Attention with Assists from Athletes and Celebs.'' Entertainment Weekly, October 24, 1997.

Vagnoni, Anthony. ''Head Games: ESPN Has Taken the Sometimes Lowbrow Image of the Sports Fan and Turned That into Ultra Cool.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 1996.

Rebecca Stanfel
Ed Dinger

WITHOUT SPORTS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Beginning with its 1979 cable-television launch, ESPN, Inc. (then officially known as Entertainment and Sports Programming Network), strove to build a brand that was synonymous with sports. After progressively acquiring broadcasting rights to college basketball and football and then, one after another, to each of the major professional sports leagues, ESPN became the dominant sports network on television as well as a cable-industry model for success. Indeed, the proliferation of specifically targeted cable channels in the 1990s and 2000s owed a great deal to ESPN's example of successfully targeting sports-obsessed men. At the same time, the wide selection of channels that became available to most consumers made it ever more imperative that networks offer a clear brand image. In late 2002 ESPN unveiled its first overall branding campaign, ''Without Sports.''

Created by the New York office of ad agency Wieden+Kennedy (W+K), the ''Without Sports'' television spots ran during ESPN's own programming. The campaign attempted to reinforce the network's brand image as the sports-fan's lifeblood while simultaneously transcending the core audience of 18- to 34-year-old men to make the point that nearly everyone was, at bottom, a sports fan. Offering honest and at times humorous depictions of the intense ways in which sports and everyday life were inextricably linked, each commercial asked viewers to consider a particular element of human life that would be lost if sports did not exist. In the campaign's first season, for instance, a spot called ''Coach'' showed a wide cross-section of sports fans who, in the throes of complete emotional involvement with televised games, continually offered advice to the players. The commercial ended with the onscreen type, ''Without sports, there'd be no one to coach.'' A spot in the campaign's second season showed a father and son playing basketball and postulated, ''Without sports, how would we close the gap?''

''Without Sports'' won a Gold Lion at the 2003 International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, and ESPN research indicated that the campaign helped increase ratings as well as brand recognition in its first several years on the air. ESPN remained the premier cable network in the eyes of cable operators, viewers, and marketers during the campaign's multiyear run.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Started by entrepreneur Bill Rasmussen with funding from Getty Oil, ESPN made its television debut on September 7, 1979, at a time when fewer than 14 percent of American households had cable and the big-three broadcast networks could count on 90 percent of the country's television audience. Cable as a medium did not yet have a clear identity, and existing cable networks, such as HBO and WTBS, offered programming aimed at general audiences. More than just the first all-sports network, ESPN was the first network to target a specific segment of the American viewing public: namely, sports fans, the overwhelming majority of whom were men.

In its early years ESPN filled its programming schedule with a range of non-mainstream sports broadcasts, ranging from college baseball to tractor pulls to Australian Rules Football, and was further defined, in the public imagination, by the groundbreaking sports-news and highlights show SportsCenter, which ran nightly for one hour. The network was also instrumental in the popularization of college basketball; throughout the early 1980s ESPN attracted its largest audiences during its annual coverage of the NCAA men's basketball tournament and initiated the tournament-time phenomenon that came to be known as ''March Madness.'' ESPN increased its profile further by acquiring broadcasting rights to college football games in 1984, but the network's watershed moment came with its first NFL football programming deal, in 1987; its subsequent Sunday Night Football broadcasts routinely topped the cable ratings. After cementing additional deals with Major League Baseball, the National Hockey League, and eventually the National Basketball Association, ESPN could legitimately claim to be ''the ultimate destination for sports fans and the advertisers chasing them,'' as Mediaweek's Keith Dunnavant put it.

ESPN's success proved, in the words of the network's first president, Chet Simmons, ''that you could survive and prosper with a relatively small audience as long as you succeeded in targeting the right audience,'' and a wide range of niche networks followed in ESPN's wake, transforming television for both viewers and marketers. ESPN itself spawned six additional television networks as well as a successful magazine, the premier website of its kind, and numerous related ventures both in the United States and abroad. In the increasingly competitive cable-TV marketplace, the necessity for network branding became more apparent. Seeking to reinforce and extend its image as the premier source for sports on TV, ESPN enlisted ad agency Wieden+Kennedy's New York office to prepare the network's first-ever overall branding campaign in late 2002.

TARGET MARKET

ESPN had built its brand on the simple idea of appealing to men via 24-hour sports coverage. Among all men, 18- to 34-year-olds formed ESPN's core audience, a segment of the population that was both intensely coveted by marketers and notoriously difficult to reach. The network had further found, according to company executive Artie Bulgrin, that ''if you target a demo like men 18 to 34, you aren't likely to alienate teens and you aren't likely to [alienate] the older viewers.'' This strategy had made ESPN the most effective network in reaching men, according to Jason Kanefsky of the media-consulting firm Media Planning Group. He explained, ''ESPN delivers the double whammy of being able to attract a broad range of men with franchises like the NBA and NFL while also reaching the younger demos with hockey or the X Games.''

The ''Without Sports'' commercials, which ran during the network's own programming, were designed to show this base of sports fans that ESPN was, according to Wieden+Kennedy art director Kim Schoen, ''the world's biggest sports fan.'' At the same time, Schoen told Creativity, ESPN wanted to transcend the values of its traditional target audience ''to make the point that sports are part of everybody's life in some way or another. Even if you don't think you're a sports fan, you probably are.'' The spots therefore focused on moments demonstrating essential connections between sports and ordinary life and asked viewers to consider various ways in which their lives would be less rich without sports.

WHO WOULD CHEER FOR THE NIMRODS?

Among the commercials in the second year of the ESPN "Without Sports" campaign were three 30-second spots featuring the real-life Watersmeet High School Nimrods' basketball squad from Michigan's Upper Peninsula. In addition to Nimrods players, the commercials included community members, such as the 1940 graduate who sang the school fight song and George Peterson, who, in addition to coaching the Nimrods, served as the school's athletic director and principal and as the school district's superintendent. All of the "Without Sports" commercials asked viewers to consider the consequences of a world without sports, and the Nimrods spots, intended to show the ways that sports could unify communities, phrased the question in the following way: "Without sports, who would cheer for the Nimrods?" Peterson told Advertising Age that, in the months following the spots' release, the school was deluged with mail and website hits and sold $40,000 worth of Watersmeet Nimrods athletic wear.

COMPETITION

During this time cable and satellite subscribers routinely had access to literally hundreds of television channels; therefore, it became increasingly necessary for networks to define their brands for consumers. Several prominent network-branding campaigns ran at the same time as "Without Sports."

The Turner Broadcasting System's TBS Superstation, historically associated with rebroadcasts of movies and live broadcasts of Atlanta Braves baseball games, had recently shifted its focus to syndicated reruns of comedy series, including Sex and the City, Seinfeld, and Everybody Loves Raymond. The network thus tapped the ad agency Publicis USA of New York to craft a 2004 campaign repositioning it as a comedy-focused outlet. Publicis used an absurdist setup suggesting that TBS was an authority on comedy; the spots showed ordinary people contacting TBS representatives at a call center to ask whether situations they had witnessed were funny or not. The TBS representatives walked the callers through a set of questions in order to derive an estimate of the situation's comic value. The spots ran with the tagline "TBS. Very funny."

The USA Network was likewise attempting, during this time, to craft a new image. The network enlisted 72andSunny, an agency based in Los Angeles, to dramatize USA's distinctiveness, and the agency came up with a series of promotions, including a 2004 spot using characters from two of the network's programs. Called "Dueling Disorders," the commercial featured Tony Shalhoub, the actor who played the obsessive-compulsive, eponymous hero of Monk, and Anthony Michael Hall, who played a psychic on the show The Dead Zone. In the commercial the two heroes encountered one another and were mutually repelled by their respective oddities.

The Fox Entertainment Group's Fox Sports Networks meanwhile hired San Francisco–based agency TBWA\Chiat\Day in 2001 to advertise the network's coverage of Major League Baseball and National Hockey League games and to craft the network's brand image. Fox Sports, which supplied content to roughly 20 regional networks, also developed spots focusing on its regional sports coverage.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Wieden+Kennedy's New York office, ESPN's primary agency since the mid-1990s, won the network's branding account with a spring 2002 pitch centering on a made-up game called Shelfball, which resembled baseball and involved a ball, a bookshelf, and an ornate compendium of rules. Supposedly invented by bored W+K staffers as early as 1999, Shelfball and the inexplicable intensity its players brought to the game served as one of the key concepts underlying the "Without Sports" idea. W+K's Kevin Proudfoot, a copywriter and creative director on the campaign, said that "Without Sports" was meant to capture "instances where sports and our lives intersect." Six spots revolving around the playing of office Shelfball aired in the initial months after the campaign's December 2002 launch, highlighting the contrast between the sport's foolishness and the players' complete seriousness in the heat of competition. The spots were comical, but they also conveyed the campaign's central idea of the almost mystical power that sports exerted on human life. The tagline for each of the Shelfball spots was "Without sports, a shelf would just be a shelf."

Other initial "Without Sports" spots were less reliant on humor and more sincere in addressing, as Advertising Age's Bob Garfield phrased it, "the mystery of sports." The campaign's first-year flagship commercial, "Coach," showed, Garfield said, "fans from all walks of life, of all ethnicities and both major sexes, gripped in the pleasure-pain of a close game in progress, beseeching players to do the right thing." The action was punctuated by the tagline "Without sports, there'd be no one to coach." Another spot, reminiscent of a music video, featured hip-hop star Nelly rapping about sneakers while dressed, like his backup singers, in professional sports apparel. The commercial closed with the tagline "Without sports, there'd be nothing to wear."

In 2004 the campaign continued to depict true-to-life scenes illustrating the powerful ways in which sports and life were intertwined. "Makeshift" showed children energetically playing a variety of pickup sports games using improvised playing areas and equipment, like a laundry basket for a hoop and a pizza box for home plate. A series of three spots featured the Watersmeet High School Nimrods, an actual basketball team from Michigan's Upper Peninsula, in an attempt to show, as Proudfoot said, "how sports plays a role in bringing communities together." Another 2004 spot, "Foul Me," focused on how sports helped bring family members together, featuring a dad and his son playing basketball and using the tagline "Without sports, how would we close the gap?" For the 2005 NCAA basketball tournament ESPN focused on the idea of "Cinderella stories," those instances when long-shot teams overcame the odds to win emotional tournament victories. Using ESPN parent company Disney's classic cartoon Cinderella, W+K altered footage to show a sneaker-wearing Cinderella riding in a basketball-shaped carriage, in conjunction with the tagline "Without sports, Cinderella wouldn't wear sneakers."

OUTCOME

"Without Sports" generated favorable attention within the advertising industry and the press from its inception, and it won a Gold Lion at the 2003 Cannes International Advertising Festival. As of February 2004 ESPN could claim a ratings increase of 14 percent over the previous year and an increase of 41 percent over 2002, the year that closed with the airing of the first spots of the campaign. According to a January 2004 brand-relevance survey conducted by the network, 33 percent more people, as compared with results from the previous year, attested that they identified with the ESPN brand. As Lee Ann Daly, senior vice president of marketing at ESPN, told Advertising Age, "I don't think there's any question the campaign had something to do with it." As of 2005, according to Beta Research (a marketing-research firm), cable operators, viewers, and advertisers all ranked ESPN as the number one network in a variety of categories relative to perceived value, satisfaction, brand image, and marketing potential.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae, and Celeste Ward. "Creative Briefs." Adweek, March 7, 2005.

Berelowitz, Marian. "They Shoot, They Score." Adweek, March 10, 2003.

"Campaign: ESPN." Creativity, January 2004.

"Campaign: ESPN." Creativity, March 2003.

Cisterna, Fred. "Acne." Shoot, March 28, 2003.

———. "Channel Surfing." Shoot, June 11, 2004.

Dunnavant, Keith. "Changing the Game." Mediaweek, July 26, 2004.

"ESPN 'Makeshift.'" Creativity, April 2005.

Garfield, Bob. "ESPN Plays on Spiritual Sway of Sports in Wieden Campaign." Advertising Age, February 3, 2003.

Thomaselli, Rich. "ESPN Vaults Tiny H.S. from Obscurity to Fame." Advertising Age, March 15, 2004.

Whitney, Daisy. "Where the Boys Are." Television Week, September 6, 2004.

Mark Lane

E*TRADE Financial Corp.

135 East 57th Street
New York, New York 10022
USA
Telephone: (646) 521-4300
Fax: (888) 276-9771
Web site: www.etrade.com

■■■

MONKEY TRILOGY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In early 2000 the high stock prices of America's technology industry were reaching their zenith. E*TRADE Financial Corp., along with other brokerage firms, such as Charles Schwab & Co., Inc., and TD Ameritrade Holding Corp., allowed stock traders to monitor and trade stock online. The flippant buy-sell behavior of day traders—along with the overvaluation of technology companies—was greatly responsible for the stock market's drastic collapse in mid-2000. Although E*TRADE was considered a dot-com, meaning it was a business that existed primarily online, its financial services included ATM retail banking, institutional brokerages, and asset management. E*TRADE released its "Monkey Trilogy" campaign to suggest that it was not just another half-baked dot-com but a formidable brokerage that could compete with established firms such as Charles Schwab and Merrill Lynch & Co., Inc.

The campaign consisted of three commercials created by the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The first spot, "Monkey," aired during the 2000 Super Bowl. At that time the technology sector was still flourishing. Of the game's 36 spots, 17 were purchased by dot-coms. "Monkey" featured two disheveled men clapping while a chimpanzee danced to the Mexican folk song "La Cucaracha" in a garage. The spot concluded with the copy "Well, we just wasted two million bucks. What are you doing with your money?" At the 2001 Super Bowl, after the technology industry had imploded, E*TRADE aired "Monkey II." The spot featured the same chimpanzee walking through a ghost town consisting of failed dot-com companies. The final Super Bowl commercial, in 2002, featured an E*TRADE executive firing the chimpanzee for creating an over-the-top E*TRADE commercial complete with dancing showgirls and big-band music.

Many advertising critics considered the "Monkey Trilogy" an insightful commentary on the rise and fall of America's technology industry. The first commercial garnered a Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival. In 2000 Shoot magazine ranked "Monkey" above all other Super Bowl spots with its "Top Spot of the Week" rating. Audiences polled by Adweek also rated "Monkey" as the most memorable commercial out of all the 17 dot-com spots.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Trade Plus first surfaced in 1982 as an electronic brokerage firm for companies such as Charles Schwab. Ten years later Trade Plus created E*TRADE, an online service available only to stockbrokers. When www.etrade.com launched in 1996, E*TRADE's services also became available to the general public. Soon afterward the firm hired Christos Cotsakos as CEO, and the new executive took the firm public. The technology boom in the late 1990s fueled the popularity of purchasing and selling stocks online, which boosted E*TRADE's sales; in addition, the company's own stock price flourished.

In 1999 Goodby, Silverstein & Partners pitched its services to E*TRADE's Cotsakos, who quickly undermined the ad agency's concepts. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners' cochairman Rich Silverstein explained the experience in Campaign, an advertising-industry magazine. "The first meeting with him was like boot camp," he said. "It was really, really awful. Someone in our team—and I won't say who—came out saying they would never work for the man. He was challenging us to go to war with him, to see what we were made of. You don't usually get attacked in the first interview—usually it's a love fest. But he would ask you a question and you'd answer and he'd say, 'Wrong! Next!' " Despite an unfavorable start, however, E*TRADE awarded its ad account to the agency. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners soon released the "It's Time for E*TRADE" campaign, which collected a Gold EFFIE from the American Marketing Association in 2000.

Rich Silverstein explained the demands that Cotsakos placed on the agency leading up to the 2000 Super Bowl. "Christos always wanted to [advertising during] the Super Bowl," Silverstein continued in Campaign. "And he beat us up for six months. 'What's the Super Bowl commercial? What's the Super Bowl commercial?' It was unbelievable. Yeah, it was more pressure than anyone needs."

The agency believed that other dot-com ads were funny but that few connected their humor back to the brand. As a result, even though audiences enjoyed the commercials, they could not recall what was actually being advertised. The observation prompted Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to comment on its competitor's wasted advertising money and then contrast the wastage with E*TRADE's prudence.

TARGET MARKET

The original "Monkey" spot targeted the free-spending consumers who were still enjoying the technology boom at the beginning of 2000. One year later America's economic landscape had changed. Internet-based companies that could afford a $2 million Super Bowl spot in 2000, such as Pets.com, were no longer in existence. The economic slump of 2001 and 2002 changed the "Monkey" campaign's target. The second and third "Monkey Trilogy" commercials targeted America's growing jobless population that had once worked for dot-coms. It also targeted the suddenly sheepish investors that were recoiling from the damaged stock market. "E*TRADE always wants to be timely and on top of things," Dave Gray, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners group creative director and art director, explained to Shoot. "So, basically, [Monkey II] was just an observation of the condition of the market now&a lot of [dot-coms] are now out of business. The fact that there were only three [dot-com] companies advertising on the [2001] Super Bowl made it perfect timing."

GARAGE DOOR

Christos Cotsakos, the CEO of the online brokerage firm E*TRADE, had an atypical approach to leadership, according to Campaign, an advertising magazine. Inside an office building that served as E*TRADE's Menlo Park headquarters (the company moved to New York city in 2004), Cotsakos installed a regular garage door along an office hallway. The out-of-place furnishing was to remind E*TRADE employees that "behind some garage door somewhere, someone else could be working on ideas better than theirs."

With an estimated 135 million viewers during the 2000 Super Bowl and 131 million during the 2001 Super Bowl, the campaign reached one of America's largest audiences. Talking to Shoot magazine, Paul Cappelli, the president of the advertising service the Ad Store, New York, lightheartedly described the Super Bowl audience as "a bunch of morons sitting around a TV, watching a football game and drinking beer." Cappelli also explained that this target expected Super Bowl commercials to be funny. When the commercials were not, audiences sometimes felt confused.

The three "Monkey Trilogy" spots parodied other dot-com commercials. According to advertising analysts, using parody was a cost-effective method of reaching large audiences. Parody poked fun at something the target market already understood; it avoided the risk of creating an entirely new joke. "Advertising is one of our most popular forms of entertainment. So making jokes about ads can be a fun, 'in' thing to do," the marketing and advertising consultant Michael Markowitz explained to USA Today.

COMPETITION

On December 31, 1999, Merrill Lynch, one of the world's largest financial-services companies, released a $150 million campaign to herald its new online services under the tagline "Be Bullish." Although Merrill Lynch dwarfed competitors such as Charles Schwab, Ameritrade, and E*TRADE, the Merrill Lynch brokerage division had been criticized for its late delivery of an online trading service. Television spots for "Be Bullish" aired on cable channels such as CNN and USA. The campaign's premier television spot, which resembled a large-budget action movie, featured commandos rappelling from helicopters that were hovering above Manhattan. The helicopter squadron subsequently airlifted the 7,000-pound bull statue that was commonly associated with the New York Stock Exchange and Merrill Lynch's logo. "We're bringing the bull back," James Gorman, chief marketing officer at Merrill Lynch, said to USA Today, referring both to the company's logo and to an aggressive attitude within the stock market.

Charles Schwab reigned as America's largest online brokerage firm in 2000. Charles Schwab's "Smarter Investors" surfaced during the 2000 Super Bowl with three spots created by the ad agency BBDO New York. Until the Super Bowl "Smarter Investors" had only featured high-profile athletes such as tennis star Anna Kournikova and football player Shannon Sharpe. Hoping to stand out from the athletic climate of the Super Bowl, one Charles Schwab Super Bowl spot titled "Ringo" featured former Beatles drummer Ringo Starr explaining the stock market to younger musicians. "Using a non-sports personality, such as Ringo Starr, helps demonstrate the depth and breadth of this campaign," Ted Sann, cochief executive officer and chief creative officer of BBDO, said in a press release published in the PR Newswire news service.

CHIMPS VS. HUMANS

Dave Gray, the group creative director and art director for the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, helped film a commercial for the online brokerage firm E*TRADE. The spot, titled "Monkey," poked fun at dot-coms wasting money on poorly conceived Super Bowl commercials. "Monkey" featured two old men trying to clap while a chimpanzee danced to the song "La Cucaracha." Gray explained to Shoot magazine how working with the chimpanzee proved easier than working with humans. "You'd tell the monkey to run up the driveway, jump over the boom box, turn it on, jump up on the garbage can and start tapping its foot, and he'd nail it every single time," Gray said. "You tell the guy on the right to stop smiling and he'd start clapping."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The first "Monkey Trilogy" commercial cost an estimated $2 million. The 30-second spot "Monkey" began in front of a suburban-looking garage. Inside it one older man sitting on an ice chest was beside another man in a lawn chair. Next to them was an overturned bucket supporting a boom box. A chimpanzee dressed in an E*TRADE T-shirt pressed play on the boom box, which played the Mexican song "La Cucaracha." The ape began dancing; and the two men struggled to clap in time with the song. At the spot's conclusion copy read, "Well, we just wasted two million bucks. What are you doing with your money?"

The spot was originally conceived by Goodby, Silverstein & Partner's creative director Dave Gray and associate creative director Gerry Graf. Bryan Buckley of the production company Bicoastal/International Hungry Man directed the spot. Buckley explained his first impression of the commercial to Shoot "Gerry and Dave called me and said, 'OK, there's two guys clapping, and a monkey standing on a street corner, and it just goes on for thirty seconds,' and I'm thinking, 'This spot sounds terrible,'" Buckley mused. After he heard the spot's punch line, however, Buckley said, "I just laughed out loud because you just never expected that."

Buckley explained that two of the spot's main challenges were choosing the right actors and selecting a filming location. Instead of using a street corner Buckley chose an unassuming garage for the location. One of the men cast in the spot was not even an actor, but the father of an actor with whom Buckley had worked previously.

Buckley then directed the 2001 E*TRADE commercial titled "Monkey II," which also used the chimpanzee from "Monkey." Instead of parodying wasted dot-com advertising, "Monkey II" commented on the bankruptcy that had plagued dot-coms since mid-2000. Only three dot-com companies, E*TRADE, Hotjobs.com, and Monster.com, aired commercials in the 2001 Super Bowl; a drastic difference from the 17 companies featured in 2000's game. "Monkey II" began with the chimpanzee riding his horse through a ghost town of fictional startup companies such as Pimentoloaf.com and TieClasp.com. The vanity plates of an abandoned Porsche Boxster read "DOT COMER." After a wrecking ball smashed through the "LeSocks.com" building, the sock-puppet dog that had starred in the previous year's Pets.com commercial landed at the chimpanzee's feet. "Monkey II" was not entirely humorous. For the conclusion, tears began running down the chimpanzee's cheek, and the copy "Invest wisely" appeared with E*TRADE's logo.

The final spot, "Monkey Musical," aired during the 2002 Super Bowl. Although the spot continued

E*TRADE's previous wasted-money theme, it received less acclaim from the advertising industry. The spot began with a chimpanzee bedecked in a shiny green suit before an ensemble of Las Vegas showgirls. After a 30-second musical act the white copy "Tomorrow morning" appeared on a black background. The chimpanzee was shown sitting in the office of E*TRADE's CEO, Christos Cotsakos. The disapproving executive held a newspaper with the headline "Monkey Flops" and berated the chimpanzee for advertising with a musical. He fired the chimp but set him up with a new job manning space flights for NASA.

OUTCOME

The first two "Monkey Trilogy" spots collected some of advertising's most coveted awards. In 2000 "Monkey" won a Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival (in the investment, insurance, and property-development category). The same spot collected an ANDY Award in the financial products and services category of the International ANDY Awards, given out annually by the Advertising Club of New York. In the banking and financial category of the Clio Awards, it won a silver in 2001. "Monkey II" also collected an ANDY Award in the television category in 2002. It was short-listed in the investment, insurance, and property-development category at Cannes.

From 2000 until 2002 Goodby, Silverstein & Partners created other E*TRADE advertisements that coincided with "Monkey Trilogy." The combined effort safeguarded E*TRADE against the very thing "Monkey" accused other dot-coms of doing: wasting money. E*TRADE weathered the stock-market recession between 2000 and 2002 better than Merrill Lynch or Charles Schwab. Both posted a sales loss of 37 percent between 2000 and 2002. Even though it was grossly outsized by both Schwab ($4.4 billion in 2002 sales) and Merrill Lynch ($28.3 billion in 2002 sales), E*TRADE only decreased 13 percent during the same three-year-period. Sales for E*TRADE were $1.9 billion in 2002, a 13 percent decrease from the $2.2 billion posted in 2000.

FURTHER READING

Cuneo, Alice Z., and Richard Linnett. "Graf Lands at BBDO Again, Digs Straight into Doritos," Advertising Age, September 25, 2000, p. 4.

DeSalvo, Kathy. "DGA Nominees Reflect on Best Spot Director Honor." Shoot, February 9, 2001, p. 1.

———. "Evolution: Monkey See, Monkey Cry." Shoot, February 2, 2001, p. 16.

Dill, Mallorre. "Post-Game Wrap Up." Adweek, February 7, 2000, p. 20.

Elliott, Stuart. "Ad Bowl 2001 Will Be a Rout." New York Times, January 26, 2001, p. 1.

———. "Big Plays, Surprise Heroes, Shocking Defeats and Other Super Bowl XXXIV Marketing Memories." New York Times, February 1, 2000, p. 10.

———. "The Super Bowl XXXV Commercials, from Pleasant Surprises to Whose Idea Was This." New York Times, January 30, 2001, p. 8.

Garcia, Sandra. "Buckley Plays Monkey in the Middle for E*Trade." Shoot, February 4, 2000, p. 14.

Gaylin, Alison Sloane. "Bryan Buckley." Shoot, March 24, 2000, p. 24.

Hall, Amanda. "The Man Who Made a Monkey out of Advertising." Campaign, September 15, 2000, p. 40.

Kelly, Michael. "Prep Grad's Monkey Ad." Omaha World-Herald, February 1, 2001, p. 11.

Mark, Michael. "Boring Bowl." Shoot, February 9, 2001, p. 4.

Marshall, Caroline. "The Cream of Cannes." Campaign, July 7, 2000, p. 26.

McCarthy, Michael. "Marketers Turn Out Spoofs to Connect Quickly with Viewers." USA Today, April 23, 2001, p. B03.

Takaki, Millie. "Getting into the KQED 'Swing' of Things." Shoot, March 2, 2001, p. 11.

Vranica, Suzanne. "Advertising." Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2000, p. B3.

Wells, Melanie. "On the Cover." Forbes, January 24, 2000, p. 70.

Wilkinson-Ryan, Tess. "The Work." Advertising Age's Creativity, March 1, 2001, p. 15.

Kevin Teague

WHY WOULDN'T YOU? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

A pioneer of online stock trading, E*Trade Financial Corp., spending heavily on advertising that used irreverent humor, established itself in the minds of consumers during the 1990s. As long as the stock market and economy were booming, this marketing approach proved quite successful. That all came to an end in the early 2000s as the economy stalled, the dot-com bubble burst, and the stock market collapsed. People who dabbled in the market with their online accounts grew cautious. Faced with a severe erosion in business, E*Trade retrenched, bringing in new leadership that slashed the advertising budget and diversified the company's product offerings. When the stock market rebounded in 2003, E*Trade initiated a change in marketing strategy, hiring Minneapolis-based Martin/Williams Advertising to handle the advertising account. The agency developed the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign, which began in February 2004.

The new campaign featured a pair of television spots that repositioned the E*Trade brand while specifically promoting the company's mutual fund and mortgage products. Print elements, direct marketing, and in-store promotional pieces also played a part in the effort, which was slated to spend $90 million over the course of the year.

Only weeks after the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign began, however, E*Trade changed marketing heads. Although Martin/Williams soon lost the account, the campaign it created succeeded in helping E*Trade to add some 372,000 new accounts, significantly grow its mutual fund and mortgage business, and increase its overall assets by 35 percent over the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

E*Trade essentially invented online trading in 1991. As the economy soared in the second half of the 1990s and Internet ventures became the darlings of Wall Street, it enjoyed phenomenal growth. E*Trade spent heavily on advertising, about $140 million a year at one point. Like another newcomer in the brokerage business, Ameritrade, E*Trade used irreverent humor to establish its brand and appeal to a younger demographic, suggesting that stock trading was like playing a game while mocking traditional stock brokers, portrayed as stodgy and being interested only in customers who had already made their fortunes. The culmination of these free-spending days for E*Trade was a 2000 Super Bowl television spot that featured a chimpanzee and the text "Well, we just wasted 2 million bucks. What are you going to do with your money?"

Soon the dot-com bubble burst, and E*Trade was hurt like all the other Internet companies. And because the economy collapsed as well and the stock market tanked, people no longer saw stock trading as a game. Even consumers who harbored no desire to play day trader were hurt, as their 401(k) accounts and mutual funds suffered major losses. E*Trade lost almost half its customer base and in response slashed its ad budgets. Moreover, there was little money to be made in stock transactions themselves, prompting old-line firms to get out of the business. In early 2003, following a corporate shakeup, a new CEO was installed and E*Trade looked to revamp its business model. To mitigate the risk of becoming a niche player in the volatile online stock trading niche, E*Trade looked to diversify—an effort that was actually under way—moving into such areas as institutional trading, market making (acting as middleman in stock transactions), mutual funds, banking, lending, mortgages, and stock plan administration services. Along with adopting a more conservative, product-centered strategy, E*Trade also decided to reconsider its advertising.

E*Trade's advertising account, now estimated to be worth $35 to $45 million a year, was put up for review with five agencies participating. Incumbent Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, responsible for the Super Bowl chimp spot, opted not to participate. In October 2003 Martin/Williams emerged the winner. The new agency was charged with the task of repositioning the E*Trade brand as a safe haven for serious money. At the same time, E*Trade wanted to take advantage of an upswing in the stock market and promote its trading division. While humor would remain a key element in the E*Trade approach, the company looked to avoid the pure zaniness of past advertisements.

TARGET MARKET

Martin/Williams's first task was to determine the target customer for what would become the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign. The agency zeroed in on self-directed investors, the kind of people who mistrusted the traditional financial companies, perceiving them to be controlling and unapproachable. Although Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Merrill Lynch, and the like were now preaching "partnership," the consumers that E*Trade targeted were somewhat skeptical of this pitch, especially in light of recent Wall Street scandals in which some of these very same firms had knowingly sold marginal stocks to smaller clients while saving the prime issues for themselves and favored customers. Starting with the self-directed investor, Martin/Williams narrowed this target audience into what it saw as three focused subsegments, which research indicated was responsible for more than 60 percent of all brokerage accounts, online banking, and mutual fund investing. At least on the brokerage side, E*Trade and its online rivals were also "targeting a warier and more tech savvy customer than the newcomers who helped set the heady tone for the online broker industry in the 1990s," according to Kate Fitzgerald writing in American Demographics, eschewing "the soccer-mom day trader making a killing in her kitchen during the late 1990s" in favor of "the most active and experienced traders who generate the most profits."

COMPETITION

E*Trade's most direct competitor was Ameritrade Holding Corp., which had pursued a similar irreverent, free-spending marketing approach during the 1990s. Ameritrade continued to promote its brokerage services through humorous television spots. Shortly after Martin/Williams won the E*Trade account, Ameritrade launched its "Good Idea. Bad Idea" campaign to tout its flat pricing approach and other benefits. In one spot a man getting in a New York taxi said, "One flat rate, right? L.A. please." "Flat rate pricing," explained a voice-over. "Bad idea for taxis. Good idea for online trading." Another competitor

''WE BELIEVE WE HAVE A GOD-GIVEN RIGHT TO MARKET SHARE''

For seven years, from the mid-1990s to the early 2000s, E*Trade was headed by CEO and chairman Christos M. Cotsakos, a former Vietnam infantryman, who brought with him a foxhole mentality: you have to trust the person next to you. He became known for his team-building exercises and initiation rites, such as having newcomers stand on a chair to reveal something about themselves before a group of coworkers. He once had his managers attend cooking school and then work together to create a gourmet dinner. Cotsakos was also extremely aggressive, telling BusinessWeek, in a 2000 profile, ''At E*Trade, we're an attacker, we're predatory. We believe we have a God-given right to market share.'' But with the popping of the Internet bubble—and after it was revealed that his salary was $80 million in 2001, a year in which his company lost more than $240 million—Cotsakos went from being regarded as a visionary to becoming a poster child for dot-com excess, after it was revealed that his salary was $80 million in 2001, a year in which his company lost more than $240 million.

in this sector was Fidelity Investments, which at the time was promoting its ''active trade services.'' Taking a more emotional approach, this campaign featured a TV spot in which a man appeared to be a high-powered investor or fund manager executing offers from his well-apportioned office only to have it revealed, once the door was opened, that he was at home. Other online trading rivals included Charles Schwab & Company and TD Waterhouse Investor Services, Inc.

In its new businesses, E*Trade faced competition from numerous angles, as a wide swath of companies were positioning themselves as one-stop shopping centers of financial services. It was not just firms like Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, and Citigroup subsidiary Salomon Smith Barney that E*Trade had to contend with in this arena. There were also a multitude of insurance companies, banks, and even mutual fund companies, such as giants Fidelity Group and the Vanguard Group, which also provided stiff competition.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In keeping with its changing business model, E*Trade looked to evolve its marketing message and brand positioning. Because the targeted self-directed consumer exhibited an antipathy for old-guard financial firms, which the consumer saw as primarily interested in feathering their own nests, E*Trade wanted to portray itself as a sort of consumer advocate, one that was looking out for the little guys and offering them trustworthy ways to build wealth.

In addition to promoting its online trading service to take advantage of the rebounding stock market, the new E*Trade campaign also looked to target new services, like mutual funds and mortgages. Many customers, viewing their E*Trade accounts as ''play'' money, dabbled in the stock market without much worry. They generally put their ''safe'' money, however, in mutual funds. One of the tasks of the marketers was to assure these customers that E*Trade, despite its history of wacky television commercials, was a reliable harbor for their money. It was an opportune time to enter the field, given that the mutual fund industry faced allegations that it engaged in illegal trading and overcharging customers. In keeping with the consumer advocacy approach, E*Trade made the marketers' job easier by a change in fund structuring, in particular the 12b-1 fees that many mutual funds charged customers to cover the cost of promoting the funds. E*Trade became the first in the industry to rebate half of those and other service fees to its mutual fund customers. In the mortgage area E*Trade also gave the marketers something to work with by streamlining the way a mortgage was arranged and by launching the Mortgage on the Move program, allowing customers to move to a different market but keep their low mortgage rate. Again the company depicted itself as a consumer advocate.

As important as it was to position the brand, to maintain that E*Trade was looking out for the little guy, E*Trade still had to find a way to close the deal, to make potential customers take action. The strategy of the new ads was to get people to question their behavior and to present them with a tangible benefit, urging them to take advantage of it. In essence the benefit was a no-brainer, and E*Trade asked people, ''So why on earth wouldn't you?'' The phrase ''Why on earth wouldn't you?'' became the theme and encapsulation of the new campaign.

As the ''Why Wouldn't You'' campaign broke in February 2004, E*Trade announced that it planned to double its advertising budget in 2004 to $90 million. The first two television spots pursued the new theme and reintroduced the brand while specifically promoting some of E*Trade's new products. The first spot, titled ''Purse,'' pitched the company's mutual funds by playing up its fee rebate program. In it a man was seen running with a purse through a crowded city street. The commercial then cut to a woman who appeared to be chasing him, presumably because he had stolen her purse. She got on a bus, and in an unexpected twist, the commercial showed the man catching up to her to return the purse. In a further surprise the woman opened the purse to find that it contained more money than when she had lost it. A voice-over by actor Kevin Bacon then asked, "If you could own the same mutual funds and get cash back every year, why on earth wouldn't you?"

A second spot, titled "New Neighbors," promoted E*Trade's Mortgage on the Move program. In it a suburban couple watched their new neighbors move in. Out of the car and moving van emerged a host of horrors, including crying babies, armed skinhead adolescents, screaming adults, barking dogs, dirt bikes, alligators, and killer bees. In this spot Bacon intoned, "When it's time to move, E-Trade's new mortgage on the move goes with you. If you could move and keep your low mortgage rate, why on earth wouldn't you?"

The new E*Trade television commercials aired on a variety of national cable channels. They also aired on network television during the NCAA basketball tournament in March. In addition to these spots (which were the primary focus of the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign), other elements included a companion print campaign that ran in national newspapers and magazines, some direct marketing, in-store promotional pieces for E*Trade's walk-in branches, and an Internet component that included Web banners.

OUTCOME

E*Trade's chief marketing officer resigned two months after the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign broke and was replaced in June 2004 by Nicholas Utton, who soon put the account up for review once again. Martin/Williams was part of Omnicom Group, and Utton was portrayed in the press as an "Interpublic Group loyalist." While head of marketing at JP Morgan Chase and MasterCard International, he had forged a successful relationship with Interpublic shops McCann Erickson, Foote Cone & Belding, and the Martin Agency. It was not surprising, therefore, when E*Trade and Martin/Williams severed their relationship in July 2004. By all accounts it was an amicable parting. Martin/Williams spokesman Steve Rudolph explained to the press, "It's a business of relationships," while in a released statement, president Steve Collins noted, "With a change in marketing leadership often comes changes in agencies and we wish E*Trade the best as they move forward."

Although Martin/Williams did not have the chance to roll out additional phases, the "Why Wouldn't You" campaign succeeded in improving E*Trade's overall business as well as benefiting the firm's mutual fund and mortgage products. According to the agency E*Trade added nearly 372,000 new accounts in the six months after the campaign began. E*Trade also experienced a 35 percent increase in overall assets compared to the previous year. Moreover these assets were spread across a wider range of products. The campaign's mutual fund component, according to Martin/Williams, succeeded in attracting a higher-value customer, resulting in a 22 percent increase in E*Trade's mutual fund business. Likewise E*Trade's mortgage operation enjoyed a 33 percent increase in direct mortgage originations, although the company also benefited from a refinance boom caused by low interest rates. The campaign garnered no advertising awards, but it accomplished the goals laid out by the client. It was only a change in management at E*Trade that was responsible for Martin/Williams losing the account.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "E*Trade Boosts Marketing Budget." Adweek, February 19, 2004.

———. "E*Trade, M/W Go Separate Ways." Adweek, July 27, 2004.

———. "Martin/Williams Is Selected for E*Trade." Adweek, September 24, 2003.

———. "Trading Co.'s Adspend Takes Off with Market." Adweek, February 23, 2004, p. 12.

Fabrikant, Geraldine. "E*Trade Parts with Martin/Williams." New York Times, July 29, 2004, p. C3.

Fitzgerald, Kate. "The New Cautious Optimists." American Demographics, April 1, 2004.

Janoff, Barry. "Beware of the Ghoul Next Door." Brandweek, March 15, 2004, p. 34.

Kaplan, David. "No Joke: How Money Talks Now." Broadcasting & Cable, April 26, 2004, p. 24.

Steinberg, Jacques, and Matthew Preusch. "E*Trade Chooses Martin/Williams." New York Times, September 26, 2003, p. C4.

"Tricks of E*Trade." BusinessWeek, February 7, 2000, p. EB18.

Ed Dinger

Euromarket Design, Inc.

1250 Techny Rd.
Northbrook, Illinois 60062
USA
Telephone: (847) 272-2888
Fax: (847) 272-5366
Web site: www.crateandbarrel.com

■■■

CRATE & BARREL 1998 PRINT ADS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In October 1998 Euromarket Design, Inc. launched an advertising campaign for Crate & Barrel, its chain of housewares and furniture stores. With an estimated budget of $3.5 million, Chicago-based ad agency McConnaughy Stein Schmidt Brown (MSSB) created a visually striking print campaign that appeared in national publications and regional magazines. While most of Crate & Barrel's previous advertising had focused on selling individual products, the new campaign attempted to burnish Crate & Barrel's overall brand image and distinguish the company from its various rivals. Although the market for housewares was growing—as consumers' real wages rose, new home construction surged, and aging baby boomers spent more on redecorating—Crate & Barrel faced increased competition from other housewares retailers, ranging from other upscale stores such as Williams-Sonoma Inc.'s Pottery Barn to the mass merchandiser Target, owned by the Dayton Hudson Corp.

Crate & Barrel did not abandon specific products completely in its effort to promote its new image. Instead, the 1998 print ads paired shots of individual offerings with scenes of nature or buildings. The copy for the ads was somewhat lengthy and relied on a subdued wittiness to convey the campaign's message—that Crate & Barrel offered timeless products that imbued one's life with simplicity. For instance, one of the five ads queried, "What does one of our tables have in common with an afternoon in the country? Or one of our chairs with a lakeside sunset?" The copy continued, "Well, all warmly embrace the concept of simplicity: Clearly a plus in an age when three-fourths of the world's surface is covered with water, but four-fifths is wired for cable." An elegant, classic table was portrayed next to a scene of a wooden bridge expanding out over the ocean to the horizon line. The company's logo was discreetly placed in the corner of the piece. Other ads depicted a Crate & Barrel chair (along with a deserted shoreline), a goblet (with a snow-covered pastoral scene), plates (with a country chapel), and stockings stuffed with presents (with another snowy landscape). While some of the print executions were clearly holiday oriented, they nevertheless attempted to impart the campaign's overall theme, that Crate & Barrel was "not just a local housewares shop," as Heidi Musachio, an account supervisor at MSSB, told Adweek.

Like most other retailers, Crate & Barrel's peak business was during the holiday season. Accordingly, the campaign ran through December 1998 and then ended. Although the company's sales figures rose during the duration of the campaign and the ads received plaudits from the advertising community, Crate & Barrel shifted its advertising account to the recently formed Chicago ad shop Tucker Tapia and returned to more product-focused spots.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Crate & Barrel's humble origins gave no indication of its future status as a housewares and furniture "powerhouse," as the Chicago Tribune described the company. Founded in 1962 by Gordon and Carole Segal, the first Crate & Barrel store was housed in an abandoned elevator factory in Chicago and stocked with specialty housewares items. Because they could not afford expensive merchandise fixtures, the Segals displayed their wares on packing crates and barrels, thereby hitting upon the catchy name for their venture. "I knew plenty of young people like us with good taste and no money," Gordon Segal told HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network. "Who was catering to them?" As the company expanded and opened new stores, Crate & Barrel won the allegiance of the baby boomer generation—who increasingly earned more money to complement their "good taste"—with its distinctive and well-made products.

In the early 1990s Crate & Barrel broadened its offerings to include furniture. In fact, by 1995 furniture accounted for one-third of the company's sales. After its 1994 revenues topped $272 million, Crate & Barrel opened a Manhattan store in 1995 with a splashy campaign. By 1996 Crate & Barrel had grown to 62 retail outlets in 15 U.S. markets and did a brisk catalog business as well. Segal teamed up with German mail-order giant Otto Versand in 1998 to help fuel expansion of the privately held company. At the time the 1998 Crate & Barrel print campaign debuted, Segal boasted to the Chicago Tribune that "we've never had business better."

TARGET MARKET

Crate & Barrel's success was due in part to the financial well-being of its core customers, those consumers aged 35 to 60. According to Gifts and Decorative Accessories, the bullish U.S. economy had created "new pockets of affluence," in which "5 percent of the population [was] made up of households with incomes of more than $100,000." Leading the pack were baby boomers, who had sown their wild oats in the 1960s and 1970s and had settled down into middle age and family life by the 1990s. As a result, as the Chicago Tribune noted, these consumers chose "to spend their cash on decorating, remodeling, and expanding their homes." In 1997 "boomer-led families making more than $70,000 a year spent almost $100 billion on home-related products," the Los Angeles Times reported. Crate & Barrel's furniture sold especially well among baby boomers, who were more apt than their younger counterparts to devote thousands of dollars to new furniture. The company recognized that it would need to attract these mature consumers with its 1998 print campaign.

To reach this audience, Crate & Barrel incorporated themes that resonated with the group. After the rampant consumerism that had characterized much of the 1980s, the affluent classes of the 1990s largely eschewed this worldview and at least paid lip service to the notion of simplicity—of living with less and thereby living more fully. Moreover, as baby boomers aged, they grew nostalgic for the past. Crate & Barrel incorporated both of these sentiments into its 1998 print campaign. One of the ads, which depicted an oversized chair with classic lines and minimal detailing as well as an empty wooden bench facing the seemingly infinite span of the sea, proclaimed that "things were simpler 'then.' Or so we often hear. But if things were simpler 'then' does that mean they have to be more complicated now? Not by a long shot. At Crate & Barrel we've got a veritable store full of classic designs that prove 'then' doesn't own simple. It merely has a time share." The message was clear. Not only were Crate & Barrel's products themselves attractively and stylishly straightforward, but they could also seamlessly connect consumers to a less complicated past. As Segal told HFN, "We're selling concepts and lifestyles, not items."

Baby boomers were not the only consumer group interested in housewares, however. "American consumers' passion for the home spans to the young," noted Gifts & Decorative Accessories. First-time home buyers and newlyweds were crucial customer groups for Crate & Barrel as well. In an effort to draw in the soon-to-be-married (and those who wished to lavish gifts upon them), the company had become one of the first non-department stores to offer a gift registry. By 1997, 17 percent of its sales were derived from this tremendously popular service. One of the 1998 print pieces spoke directly to this group. The spot, which featured Crate & Barrel dishes and a photo of a humble-looking church, declared that "the average person spends 26 years finding the right partner. 13 months finding the right church. 8 months finding the right caterer. And 6 months finding the right honeymoon spot. Which just may explain why the average person ends up with the wrong plates." According to Jim Schmidt, MSSB's creative director for the campaign, the ad's use of tongue-in-cheek humor and visually arresting images was intended to appeal to younger consumers, an important demographic group for the retailer. While older consumers, who were at the apex of their careers and thus their earning capacities, had more disposable income, younger consumers—who were often embarking on their first housewares purchases—were crucial to Crate & Barrel's long-term success. Brand allegiances were formed early in life and lasted for a long time, and the company that could garner a following among the young would have a significant competitive advantage.

ON-LINE VENTURES

In addition to its fall print campaign, Crate & Barrel ventured into other new territories in 1998. In June the company teamed up with Fry Multimedia to launch its first website. Just as the print ads attempted to convey the "feel" of the Crate & Barrel experience, so too did the on-line effort. According to DM News, Fry Multimedia incorporated photographs "to create a light and airy ambiance, a look consistent with Crate & Barrel's other sales channels."

COMPETITION

Crate & Barrel faced considerable competition. According to the Arizona Republic, "The retailing landscape [was] packed with companies trying to cash in on the home craze." On the one hand, Crate & Barrel was challenged by other upscale housewares stores, especially Pottery Barn and Restoration Hardware Inc. On the other hand, mass-merchant retailers had begun to offer inexpensive imitations of the items found in more expensive stores. Target proved a particularly potent adversary for Crate & Barrel in this segment. Moreover, as a furniture seller, Crate & Barrel competed against more traditional furniture retailers. "Everybody is your competition nowadays," Segal told the Wall Street Journal. "The whole marketplace is more dynamic and aggressive."

In the realm of specialty stores, Pottery Barn primarily appealed to a younger, hipper customer. With its slightly less expensive products and dim store interiors, Pottery Barn attracted consumers with what Forbes termed its "relaxed contemporary" merchandise. The Swedish company Ikea AB, a chain of rapidly expanding furniture and housewares stores, drew an even younger core audience, often including college students and others furnishing their first apartments. At the other end of the demographic spectrum was Restoration Hardware, which, according to Business Week, "cannily play[ed] off childhood memories of nesting baby boomers." Founded in 1979 by Stephen Gordon after he had been unable to find authentic-looking fixtures for a remodeling project, the chain evolved into far more than the average neighborhood hardware store. Pricey furniture shared the floor with mirrors, lamps, and a number of knickknacks such as old-style toys. Each store had a hardware section, but Restoration Hardware's focus was predominantly on its housewares and furniture. Gordon's brainchild was also engaged in rapid expansion. At the close of 1998, 65 stores were in operation, often in close proximity to Crate & Barrel's venues. "Their customer is our customer," Bette Kahn, a Crate & Barrel representative, told Business Week.

Although Kmart Corp. had made headway into a more upscale market with its line of Martha Stewart Everyday housewares, Target was the clear leader among the giant retailers in drawing more affluent customers, those who might otherwise frequent Crate & Barrel. According to Fortune, Target's average customer was a college-educated woman with an income above $50,000. The more than 850 Target stores had seen a 26 percent increase in sales between 1997 and 1998, and the company's stock had risen a stunning 527 percent since 1995. Target's success stemmed from its persistence in "always looking to have the latest things," a retail analyst told Fortune. As HFN explained, "Instead of trying to copy a department store, Target's MO has been to emulate a Pottery Barn or a Crate & Barrel, and to translate those colors and trends to the masses." Designer Michael Graves offered a line of futuristic housewares exclusively at Target, which expanded the home section of its superstores to highlight such offerings. The chain also began to carry elite brands, such as the cookware line Calphalon, which once would have been considered too upmarket for Target. As part of its ongoing branding efforts, Target inaugurated the "Grab Your Own Style" campaign in 1998, which stressed the company's more sophisticated image. The campaign kicked off with a 16-page insert in Bon Appetit, a food and cooking magazine that catered to older and more affluent readers. With its focus on the coordinated home decorating ideas available at Target, "Grab Your Own Style," like Crate & Barrel's 1998 print campaign, touted notions of simplicity and fashion more than individual products.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Crate & Barrel strove to forge a distinct brand image for itself with its 1998 print effort. "The goal of the campaign was to reaffirm in people's minds that when you buy something from Crate & Barrel it is classic and timeless," MSSB's Schmidt explained. While Pottery Barn imbued its stores with a more funky aura and Restoration Hardware banked on a warm nostalgia, Crate & Barrel's 1998 print ads stressed elegant simplicity. Of course, to impress this message upon consumers, the ads had to be noticed. Schmidt emphasized that the executions were intended to stand out from the page in order to capture the reader's attention. Half black-and-white and half color, the spots were indeed striking. For instance, one piece depicted a single goblet, which was photographed to reveal every simple detail, every line, and every reflection of light from its surface. This artful presentation made it seem much more than a glass; it became an image, representing the essence of the Crate & Barrel brand.

By posing the goblet next to the scene of a snowy landscape, Crate & Barrel further refined the aura of simplicity. The ad copy humorously reinforced this notion by undercutting any sense of pretentiousness that might be conveyed by the photo: "It's the time of year when we raise a glass to our family and to our friends. To our pasts and to our futures. It's the time of the year when we raise a glass to our dreams and to our hopes. In short, it's the time of the year when there's a lot of pressure on a glass." Segal explained the principle underlying Crate & Barrel's advertising (as well as its store presentation) to HSN: "To be a good retailer, you've got to have that theatrical ego-centricity. You're setting an atmosphere and the architecture." Crate & Barrel ran the pieces in publications that were read by the upscale, home-oriented audience it sought. These included Martha Stewart's Living and Metropolitan Home, as well as the Sunday magazines of the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune.

The timing of the 1998 print campaign was also carefully calculated. Unlike some other industries, housewares retailers did a substantial portion of their business during the holidays, when consumers purchased new items either for their own entertaining or to give as presents. The campaign therefore debuted in October and ran through this peak period. In addition to the goblet piece, Crate & Barrel employed the holiday theme in an ad that portrayed three stockings stuffed with wrapped packages. Above another snowy scene, the copy expressed every parent's Christmas reality: "5:05am: Can we go downstairs now? 5:10am: Can we go downstairs now? . . . 5:34am: Can we go downstairs now?" The spots featuring the company's tables and chairs stayed away from holiday motifs, however, since furniture sales tended to be less seasonally sensitive.

OUTCOME

By all accounts Crate & Barrel's 1998 print campaign achieved impressive results. According to MSSB's Schmidt, the company's sales during the holiday shopping season rose between 5 and 10 percent. The ads were also praised by advertising critics. In addition to being recognized at several Chicago awards shows, the campaign was ranked among the year's best by Communications Arts. Nonetheless, because of the business cycle in the housewares industry, Crate & Barrel ended the campaign at the close of the holiday season.

In April 1999 Crate & Barrel switched ad agencies, settling on Tucker Tapia. Its new campaign, launched that month, returned to the more product-focused style of earlier Crate & Barrel ads. The theme of this effort was the Crate & Barrel "cocktail," in which large pieces of furniture were paired with small housewares. In one, for example, a sofa was shown on end balanced on a martini glass. The company also anticipated returning to television advertising in the fall of 1999 after a two-year hiatus.

FURTHER READING

Berner, Robert. "Crate & Barrel Sells a Majority Stake to German Mail-Order Firm Versand." Wall Street Journal, February 13, 1998.

Branch, Shelly. "How Target Got Hip." Fortune, May 24, 1999.

Chandler, Susan. "Furnishing a Sea Change: A Raft of New Retailers Are Redrawing the Furniture Landscape, and Many Traditional Stores Are Suffering." Chicago Tribune, February 28, 1999.

"Crate & Barrel in Holiday Mood." Adweek, October 26, 1998.

Creno, Glen. "Chain Expands to Valley Scottsdale." Arizona Republic, September 3, 1998.

Goldman, Abigail. "A Fine Time for Sellers and Consumers of Housewares: Boomers and Others Are Eating Up the Fancy yet Affordable Items." Los Angeles Times, February 25, 1999.

Marsh, Ann. "Retailing: What a Niche Home." Forbes, January 26, 1998.

McAllister, Liane. "Licensing Comes Home." Gifts & Decorative Accessories, May 1, 1998.

Neuborne, Ellen. "Welcome to Yuppie Hardware." Business Week, December 21, 1998.

Tisch, Carol. "Crate & Barrel Plans Home Store Rollout." HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, June 15, 1998.

Vincenti, Lisa. "Aggressive Target Launches a Marketing 'Glitzkrieg,' " HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, May 18, 1998.

Wray, Christina. "Impact's Call to Action (Ideas of Crate & Barrel Chief Executive, Gordon Segal)." HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, February 19, 1996.

Rebecca Stanfel

FedEx Corp.

942 S. Shady Grove Rd.
Memphis, Tennessee 38120
USA
Telephone: (901) 818-7500
Web site: www.fedex.com

■■■

BE ABSOLUTELY SURE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in the 1970s, Federal Express (FedEx) quickly carved out a niche in the express package business, helped in large part by its aggressive advertising. In the early years FedEx relied on a fast-talking spokesman who anchored the "Absolutely, Positively Overnight" campaign that ran from 1978 to 1983. By the 1990s it was facing increasing competition from rival express firms offering cheaper service. Despite being far younger than United Parcel Service (UPS) and the United States Postal Service, by this time FedEx was able to portray itself in its advertising as a well-established, reliable shipper.

The "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, which broke in January 1998, offered humorous examples of what could occur if someone relied on a cut-rate shipper rather than FedEx. In one spot a 30-something swimming-pool cleaner finally received his acceptance letter to Harvard University, news that, if received 20 years earlier, might have made a profound difference in his life. In another spot toy soldiers in a mock commercial were reduced to wearing dresses because their uniforms did not arrive on time.

The "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign ended at the close of 2000. During its three-year run it produced a number of memorable commercials. The spot "Apology," which was little more than a television test pattern and an abject apology for not having sent the tape of the real commercial by FedEx, was recognized as one of the best commercials of 1999. The toy-solider spot, "Action Figures," was nominated for an Emmy Award in 2000.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Fred Smith returned from the Vietnam War in the 1960s, he entered Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. The undergraduate Smith wrote a term paper in which he presented the idea that, with the fast-emerging service economy of the United States in the latter half of the twentieth century, what America needed was a good, reliable package delivery service. His professor gave him a C. This grade, however, did not deter Smith from raising investment capital, and by 1971 he had almost $140 million in operating funds. Bank loans accounted for $90 million of this amount, and Smith had raised another $40 million from investors. The remaining $8 million was loaned by family members. Obviously, Smith had a lot riding on this deal, and with his capital in place he proceeded to launch the largest venture-capital-funded start-up corporation in history: Federal Express. Smith reportedly chose the name because "Federal" suggested the U.S. government, a connotation that was still largely positive despite the unpopular war in Vietnam. And "Express" was chosen because it recalled the legendary Pony Express of the 1860s.

During the 1970s Federal Express—or FedEx, as it came to be called—grew rapidly alongside competitor United Parcel Service (UPS). Both profited from the fact that airlines were getting out of the parcel service and from the bankruptcy of rival REA Express. FedEx also benefited from a 1974 strike by UPS union workers, not to mention a strong record of advertising. Years later, in 1997, writers at Entertainment Weekly voted FedEx's 1981 "Fast-Paced World" spot the second greatest commercial of all time, behind Energizer's "Escape of the Bunny." In the spot, created by Ally & Gargano, actor John Moschitta managed to say 450 words in one minute, or seven words per second, as a way of illustrating FedEx's speed.

In the mid-1980s FedEx hit on a loser when it introduced the idea of ZapMail, which promised document delivery in two hours. It might have been a success if fax machines had not begun making their appearance, thereby eliminating the need for the service. The company ended up losing $300 million on ZapMail in 1986. It recovered handsomely in the 1990s, however, greatly expanding its international service and again profiting from a UPS strike in 1997. In the following year it created the FDX Corporation as a holding company for Federal Express and its other companies.

TARGET MARKET

Federal Express attained its position by appealing to businesses both big and small. The 1990s saw two opposing trends: the continued growth of large corporations through acquisitions and mergers and the concomitant growth of small business. As corporations became bigger and more impersonal, it seemed that more and more people were leaving salaried employment and setting up new businesses in their homes. At the same time, corporations outsourced more of their work and also allowed many employees to work from their homes. FedEx, like its competitors, benefited both from large corporate business and the growth of small business, which meant that more businesspeople were sending more packages.

The growth of telecommunications and a global economy helped spur an increase in international business, and here, too, FedEx was poised to reap a bountiful harvest. During the 1980s it expanded its international service greatly by acquiring companies in Italy, Japan, and other countries, and in 1995 it became the first U.S. express carrier to establish direct service to the People's Republic of China—perhaps the world's fastest-growing economic powerhouse. The mid-1990s also saw the creation of Latin American and Caribbean divisions, and in 1997 FedEx established a service hub in Miami to lead the way for greater Latin American expansion. It also set up its first hub in Europe, at Charles de Gaulle Airport in Paris.

FedEx illustrated the breadth of its customer base with 1997 ads that showed a wide array of people, separated by gender, race, ethnicity, and nationality, but united in their use of FedEx as a preferred service. According to Dottie Enrico in USA Today, a consumer poll conducted in 1997 found that FedEx's advertising was most popular with people in the 30 to 49 age group. The poll also showed that the advertising had proven particularly well received by African-American consumers, with 45 percent of black respondents judging the FedEx ads "very effective."

Later executions of the "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign had more specific targets. The 1999 television spots were aimed at companies doing business with Internet companies. A year later the campaign touted FedEx's new direct routes to China, targeting companies that were shipping to and from China.

COMPETITION

In the express-delivery market segment, FedEx's two largest competitors were UPS and DHL Worldwide, but by the mid-1990s it faced a new and formidable competitor: the United States Postal Service (USPS). The latter was a hybrid: formed as a part of the U.S. government, it became an independent entity in 1970, but it still maintained a monopoly over door-to-door mail delivery in the United States. Its dimensions dwarfed those of any competitor: as the USPS had often noted, it delivered more mail in a week than the combined forces of FedEx and UPS did in a year.

Yet as an independent entity, the USPS sought to go after the competition in its advertising to promote its Priority Mail service. There ensued a lengthy battle between FedEx and the Postal Service over ads that compared USPS's and FedEx's prices and asserted that it was cheaper to send packages through Priority Mail. FedEx took the Postal Service to court, and in April 1997 a Memphis federal judge, in the first ruling in the case, overturned an appeal by the USPS to throw the suit out of court. The USPS had claimed that, due to the Lanham Act, which protected certain federal agencies from lawsuits, it could not be sued, but the judge ruled that "by placing its no-holds-barred advertisements on national television, USPS embarked on an excursion into the commercial world unique to a federal entity."

Then there was UPS, which was nearly shut down between August 4 and 18, 1997, because of a strike by 185,000 of its employees, members of the Teamsters union. "When the Teamsters walked out on Atlanta-based United Parcel Service," wrote Tim Triplett in Marketing News, "they delivered an unexpected windfall

FROGS, PUMPS, AND BARS: JUST ANOTHER SUPER BOWL

The Super Bowl was not only one of American sports' biggest events, it was also one of advertising's business events of the year, as companies vied for airtime before audiences estimated at over 100 million. Among the most notable commercials aired during the 1998 Super Bowl was a Federal Express spot that caught the attention of Bob Garfield, who described it in Advertising Age: ''Somebody sent the ad to the network by a competing overnight service, so all we see is color bars. Absolutely, positively a breakthrough idea.''

Among the biggest headline-grabbers at the Super Bowl were the Budweiser frogs, the ultrapopular amphibians employed by Anheuser-Busch to promote its star brand. Garfield called the Budweiser spot, in which Louie the Lizard attempted to electrocute the frogs, ''a bit uncomfortably morbid but a lot funnier than the parallel soap opera playing out in Washington''—a reference to the sex scandal involving President Bill Clinton and White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

Another spot lauded by Garfield was a commercial for Mail Boxes Etc., which had turned over its commercial to a customer—a minuscule corporation that manufactured a pocket pump for inflating basketballs. ''This low-production-budget commercial within a commercial not only taps vicarious excitement for the lucky entrepreneurs,'' Garfield wrote, ''it underscores MBE's dedication to small business.''

Garfield, who reviewed a plethora of Super Bowl commercials, was not so enthusiastic about a spot for Qualcomm phones in which ''a man wakes up in a foreign hotel room, spooked and disoriented.'' The man walked to the balcony to find a crowd cheering; thinking the applause was directed at him (rather than the actual object, a dictator on the next balcony), the man raised his Qualcomm digital phone in a show of triumph. ''And the point of this stunning, enigmatic, surrealistic spot?'' Garfield asked. ''Good question.'' to the U.S. Postal Service and Memphis-based Federal Express Corp., among other parcel shipping competitors. But whether UPS's rivals can hang onto that newfound business remains to be seen.'' UPS, the world's leading package delivery service, estimated that it permanently lost 5 percent of its business due to the strike, but it sought to recover its position with an advertising campaign in which it apologized for the strike. Meanwhile, FedEx reported that it delivered an extra 9.5 million packages during the period of the strike.

MARKETING STRATEGY

FedEx began the ''Be Absolutely Sure'' campaign by airing a TV spot called ''Apology'' during the Super Bowl in January 1998. It proved to be one of its most notable commercials of the year. The Super Bowl, with more than 100 million viewers, was always a prominent arena in which companies advertised their wares, and many opted for a glitzy approach to build on the hype. Not so with FedEx and BBDO: their spot consisted simply of a test pattern made up of colored bars. A voice-over explained that FedEx's advertising agency—a fictionalized entity—had mistakenly sent its commercial via a competing package service. Of course it had not arrived, the voice-over explained, and therefore viewers would not see its planned spot, which was to have featured dancing kangaroos and country music superstar Garth Brooks.

This tongue-in-cheek approach won the company high praise, particularly from within the advertising industry. Bob Garfield of Advertising Age, often a stern critic of Super Bowl commercials, called it ''Absolutely, positively a breakthrough idea.'' FedEx followed this spot up with an even more attention-getting spot, whose first airing it also tied to a football event, ABC-TV's Monday Night Football on September 14. The spot, ''Opportunity Knocks,'' featured Mort, a figure described in a FedEx press release as ''a swimming pool cleaner in his late 30s.'' Mort ''receives a letter—20 years too late—from a generic delivery company.'' In fact the van that delivered Mort's delayed letter bore the name ''Lucky Shamrock Expediting.'' ''Had Mort received the letter on time,'' the press release went on, ''his destiny could have been totally different: 'You've been accepted to Harvard University,''' the letter announced. '''And awarded a scholarship. Please respond by August 1978.'''' The spot then reminded viewers to 'Be absolutely sure,' and ship with FedEx.

Another commercial in the first round of executions showed what could happen if a shipper other than FedEx was entrusted with the delivery of the Stanley Cup hockey trophy. Rabid fans who had gathered at Detroit's Joe Louis Arena to celebrate their champion Red Wings watched the team be presented not with the Stanley Cup but with a bag of donkey feed, while thousands of miles away the Cup was displayed to a group of Bolivian peasants in a marketplace.

The "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign continued in 1999, targeting businesses selling over the Internet. In one notable spot a website design team, composed of nerds and a raving madman smashing a computer, made its pitch to three befuddled executives. The message of the spot was simple: pick whoever you want to design your Web page, but stick to FedEx when it comes to shipping your packages.

During the 1999 NCAA Bowl Championship Series in January, FedEx aired more "Be Absolutely Sure" spots. This set of commercials took a less humorous approach. The 30- and 60-second spots were collectively entitled "Takeoffs" and showed FedEx planes taking off for various cities, along with songs that suggested their destinations: "April in Paris"; "Chicago"; "18 Miles from Memphis"; "Oklahoma"; and "Sweet Home Alabama."

In 2000 FedEx aired the most popular television commercial of the campaign. The spot, which highlighted the shipper's direct route to China, was unveiled on New Year's Eve 1999 during the Liberty Bowl college football game. Called "Action Figures," it was a parody of a low-budget toy commercial. The G.I. Joe–like dolls, Combat Rangers, were put through their paces: parachuted out of helicopters, plunged into mud. But the soldiers wore women's clothing and accessories, including pink handbags and blow-dryers. Watching the commercial was a trio of businessmen, one of whom asked why the Combat Rangers were wearing dresses. "That's because the commander uniforms didn't arrive from China on time," he was told as the underlings then blamed one another for not using FedEx as their shipper.

The "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign played itself out by the close of 2000. Before it ended, famed television crocodile hunter Steve Irwin made an appearance. In his spot he was bitten by a poisonous snake and reassured the audience that he had some antivenom that had been shipped via Federal Express, only to learn that someone had chosen a different carrier and the serum had not arrived. Irwin collapsed, the screen went blank, and the "Be Absolutely Sure" slogan and FedEx Logo appeared. In January 2001 FedEx retired "Be Absolutely Sure" in favor of a new approach that featured the slogan "This is a job for FedEx."

OUTCOME

As FedEx noted in its press release, the "Opportunity Knocks" spot was in line with memorable Federal Express ads throughout the years. Among those campaigns was "Absolutely, Positively Overnight," which included the famous fast-talker spot; the campaign, which ran from 1978 to 1983, had won advertising's EFFIE Award. Then there was "It's Not Just a Package, It's Your Business" from 1987 to 1988; "Our Most Important Package Is Yours," which aired from 1991 to 1994; and the short-lived "Absolutely, Positively Anytime" (1995).

Despite his sad story, Mort the pool cleaner—along with "Apology" and the entire "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign—won praise from the advertising industry. Adweek listed "Opportunity Knocks" among its "Best Spots" in the October 1998 issue. Advertising Age included "Apology" in its list of best spots in 1998, calling it an example of "zigging while everyone else zagged"—that is, pursuing a strategy that set the company apart. Though some in the industry had suggested that the spot might seem like an advertising inside joke, Advertising Age held that it "stood out amongst all the other overhyped TV ads . . . and cut through the clutter like the sound of one hand clapping." The most acclaimed spot of the entire campaign was "Action Figures," which, along with four other commercials, was nominated for an Emmy Award in 2000.

FURTHER READING

"Best Spots." Adweek (eastern ed.), October 12, 1998.

Campbell, Laurel, et al. "Here's Lookin' at Priciest Ads at Super Bowl: They Better Be Incredible." Memphis (TN) Commercial Appeal, January 31, 1999, p. C-1.

"Cut to the Chase." B to B, November 20, 2000, p. 34.

Enrico, Dottie. "FedEx Advertising Campaign Delivers Effective Message." USA Today, August 25, 1997, p. B-4.

"FedEx Wins Ruling in USPS Lawsuit." Traffic World, April 14, 1997, p. 31.

Garcia, Sandra. "Not Using Fed Ex Can Be a Drag for 'Action Figures,'" Shoot, January 7, 2000, p. 14.

Garfield, Bob. "Bud Lizards Electrify Super Bowl Ads." Advertising Age, January 26, 1998, p. 1.

———. "Super Bowl Advertisers Set the World Back 30 Years with Naked Appeals to Guys." Advertising Age, February 1, 1999, p. 1.

"Heart Defects, Bones, and Other Cases of Zigging When Others Zag: Miscellaneous." Advertising Age, May 31, 1999, p. S-10.

Hill, Dan. "The Post Office's Priority." Brandweek, February 23, 1998, p. 18.

Linnett, Richard. "Some Like It Hotter." Adweek, January 3, 2000, p. 18.

Mull, Angela. "FedEx Ad Wins Local Agency Nods." Phoenix (AZ) Business Journal, January 30, 1998, p. 3.

"New FedEx Ad Reminds Viewers to 'Be Absolutely Sure' about Shipping; Campaign to Break Tonight During Monday Night Football." Business Wire, September 14, 1998.

Salomon, Alan. "FedEx Delivers New Ads via College Bowl Blitz: Delivery Service Stresses Global Reach in Latest Commercials." Advertising Age, January 4, 1999, p. 8.

Triplett, Tim. "Teamsters Deliver Windfall to UPS Competitors, but Can They Retain It?" Marketing News, November 24, 1997, pp. 2-3.

Judson Knight
Ed Dinger

OUR OFFICE IS YOUR OFFICE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

On February 12, 2004, the Memphis, Tennessee–based express shipping giant FedEx Corp. (founded in 1973 as Federal Express) expanded in a new direction when it purchased the Dallas, Texas–based Kinko's photocopy center chain, which was founded in 1970 in Santa Barbara, California. The purchase was not a complete surprise to industry analysts—FedEx had already been using many Kinko's copy centers as drop-off points for customers, and the purchase consolidated these services, among other things. After rebranding the company as FedEx Kinko's Office and Print Services and the outlets themselves as FedEx Kinko's Office and Print Centers, FedEx began to implement an ad campaign designed to attract small business owners as well as a more mobile customer, one who would find FedEx Kinko's services convenient as an "office on the road." The ad campaign was tagged "Our Office Is Your Office."

The campaign was created by BBDO New York, FedEx's lead agency and creators of the award-winning 2003 campaign "Relax, It's FedEx." Using the offbeat humor that had become a hallmark of FedEx advertising, the $25 million rebranding campaign broke with four 30-second television spots. Other spots were added later. In addition to television the campaign used radio, the Internet, print, and direct mail. The campaign had the important task of reintroducing a known entity to the public with ads titled "First," "Luggage," "Welcome Aboard," "Cloud Nine," and "Plastic."

"Our Office Is Your Office" intended to cement FedEx Kinko's new identity into customers' psyches. Several of the spots earned accolades from the advertising industry. Sales at FedEx Kinko's failed to soar as much as management had hoped, but for fiscal year 2005 the company still managed to report revenues of $2.1 billion, an increase over the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

At a glance the combination of FedEx and Kinko's would seem an unlikely merger. The former was an established shipping company that practically reinvented the package delivery industry by concentrating on express delivery via jets. Kinko's, on the other hand, was one of the leaders in the print and photocopy field. At the time of the buyout, Kinko's was operating approximately 1,200 stores worldwide, serving 215 countries. The company estimated its annual revenue for calendar year 2003, which was just prior to the buyout, at nearly $2 billion. However, the relationship between FedEx and the privately owned Kinko's, which stretched back to the 1980s, had been growing more intertwined over the years. In 1988 FedEx became Kinko's exclusive shipper, and by the end of 2003 FedEx was conducting full-service retail business in 134 Kinko's stores.

Kinko's profitability aside, a further incentive for the buyout was a shift in corporate thinking at FedEx. Since its inception the company had been the leader in express delivery services, pioneering domestic and international air shipment. The financial downturn of the first years of the twenty-first century, however, was a major factor in the flattening out (and in some fiscal quarters a slight decline) in the company's express shipment sector. During this same time FedEx Ground experienced seven consecutive quarters of double-digit growth. Clearly customers were choosing a lower price over the convenience of fast delivery. With the corporate shift toward focusing more effort on its ground delivery service and the already solid relationship between FedEx and Kinko's, plus the high profitability of mobile customers who used the FedEx drop-off points in Kinko's stores, the decision to expand into the print and copy industry seemed an almost foregone conclusion in the information age.

The announcement of the buyout came in December 2003. At that time, as reported in Brandweek, FedEx chairman, president, and CEO Frederick Smith declared, "The FedEx and Kinko's combination will substantially increase our retail presence worldwide and will enable both companies to take advantage of growth opportunities in the fast-moving digital economy. Our two companies share a similar background, culture and customer focus, and that common ground is extremely important as we prepare for future growth and success." In February 2004 FedEx paid approximately $2.4 billion in cash to acquire the global operations of Kinko's.

TARGET MARKET

Aimed at small business owners and casual and regular customers in need of the office and shipping services the new FedEx Kinko's could provide, the "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign relied on offbeat humor—practically a FedEx trademark. The spots made several points, primarily that the busy mobile customer and small business owner, who might not be able to afford or have the

RETAIL MERCHANT

By the end of 2005 FedEx Kinko's was certainly venturing far from the roots of its progenitor companies. That year the company established an online office supply and furniture outlet. In doing so FedEx Kinko's expanded its competition from its traditional rival, the UPS Store, to include Staples, Office Depot, and OfficeMax. In a New York Times article by Bob Tedeschi, Kenneth A. May, FedEx Kinko's chief operating officer, noted some concern but pointed out, "They're competitors who have also been marketing at the sweet spot of our space." In other words, the aforementioned superstores offered copying, printing, and shipping services. Kinko's, on the other hand, had been selling office supplies for 15 years. While the giant office supply companies seemed unfazed by the FedEx Kinko's move into their territory, the midsize and smaller supply houses were clearly upset, especially those that had been using FedEx as their shipper. Meanwhile analysts saw the move as a response to consolidation in that sector of the retail industry.

inclination for permanent office space, let alone myriad office equipment, could find satisfaction at FedEx Kinko's. The ad campaign targeted casual, more mobile customers because they, and to a lesser degree small business owners, were more likely to pay higher shipping rates in addition to making use of the full range of printing, copying, shipping, and electronic services—the latter dealing with electronic transfer and delivery of scanned and documents and PDF files.

FedEx Kinko's also intended to lure customers away from the UPS Store, the leading provider of shipping, postal, and business services in the world. The UPS Store not only offered identical services as FedEx Kinko's, but it also provided mailbox rentals. To attract these UPS Store customers, "Our Office Is Your Office" focused on FedEx Kinko's lower shipping rates.

COMPETITION

From the outset the main competition for FedEx Kinko's was the UPS Store. Shipping rival United Parcel Service (UPS) had actually led the way in diversification with its 2001 purchase (for $191 million) of Mail Boxes Etc., which was rebranded the UPS Store in 2003. In 2004 UPS opened 525 additional outlets, which raised the total number of UPS Stores to 3,771. This was approximately three times the number of FedEx Kinko's outlets.

Regarding their retail pack-and-ship outlets, UPS had a strategy that differed from that of FedEx in three important ways. First, the UPS Stores were franchised as opposed to being a subsidiary company. The second difference was location. FedEx Kinko's were concentrated in urban areas, while UPS Stores were located in suburban and rural areas, though by early 2005 UPS Stores were expanding into urban neighborhoods as well as college campuses, military bases, and convention centers. Third, while both were after the growing retail shipping market, FedEx Kinko's offered more print and copy services than the UPS Store.

Dave Hirschman, writing in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution soon after the "Our Office Is Your Office" ad campaign broke, noted that while FedEx Kinko's lagged behind the UPS Store in terms of physical numbers, its urban stores took in "far more revenue on average than suburban UPS Stores." Nevertheless, and despite its expansion elsewhere, UPS Stores remained wedded to the suburbs. On this subject Mark Davis, a senior analyst at FTN Midwest in Cleveland, as quoted by Sandra O'Loughlin in Brandweek, observed, "UPS is very focused on the next battleground, which they believe is out in the suburbs and rural areas. That's where they feel the next opportunity exists for them to enhance their relationships with customers and provide an additional point of contact for them in their competition with both FedEx and DHL, but also the U.S. Postal Service."

In time as FedEx Kinko's services evolved, the "Our Office Is Your Office" ad campaign would seem to foreshadow a whole new dimension. By 2005 FedEx Kinko's was in competition not only with the UPS Store (as an extension of UPS itself) and DHL but with office suppliers Staples and Office Depot as well.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign was the first for FedEx Kinko's. The campaign debuted during the first week of July 2004 with nine television spots along with radio, print, direct-mail, and Web elements. The campaign's goal was to immediately position FedEx Kinko's as a less expensive, more convenient alternative to the UPS Store. The "Welcome Aboard" spot did this by specifically mentioning savings of up to 35 percent. As quoted in Business Wire at the time of the launch, Gary Kusin, president of FedEx Kinko's, declared, "These ads reflect the value that FedEx Kinko's offers to our customers. In addition to the industry's broadest range of services—copying and printing, computer rental, Wi-Fi Internet access, videoconferencing, and FedEx shipping—we plan to launch a complete pack-and-ship capability before the peak holiday season.'' And FedEx executive vice president T. Michael Glenn (quoted in the same article) noted, ''FedEx Kinko's powerfully redefines the future of the business services marketplace by offering customers a fully functional office on the road.'' Many business journalists picked up on and advanced that theme.

From the outset the campaign strategy was to take on the UPS Store directly. When FedEx purchased Kinko's it went full steam into waters it had previously only been testing. While the number of domestic UPS Stores was far greater than the number of FedEx Kinko's, the latter relied on location—urban versus suburban—and its wider range of services to attract new customers.

The spots ''First'' and ''Welcome Aboard'' both touted FedEx Kinko's over its main rival, the UPS Store. ''First'' used sight and sound gags to show the availability of FedEx Kinko's as opposed to the UPS Store and empathized with customer frustrations over not finding a UPS Store open. The spot depicted a man pointing out different company artifacts (the first dollar, which was framed, and the first letter from a satisfied customer) to a woman. The third artifact was a chair embedded in a wall, which signified the first tantrum. The man in the commercial, as quoted by Barry Janoff in Brandweek, went on to explain, ''because we had to ship a package and the UPS Store was closed.''

In ''Welcome Aboard'' a boss and an employee argued over whether the employee had been fired or quit. The spot ended with the worker being rehired after mentioning that by using FedEx Kinko's instead of the UPS Store he had saved up to 35 percent. Thus the humor had a very competitive edge to it.

In another spot, ''Luggage,'' the convenience of utilizing FedEx Kinko's services was highlighted. Two would-be entrepreneurs struggled as they tried to unload office equipment from an airline carousel. One finally suggested that perhaps they ought to have gone to FedEx Kinko's.

OUTCOME

In comparing FedEx Kinko's with the UPS Store, Jack Aaronson, CEO of the Aaronson Group, an award-winning strategy and design firm, noted in his online column ''Customer Relations'' in September 2004 (two and a half months after the ''Our Office Is Your Office'' campaign broke) that the FedEx Kinko's ''rebranding was a lot more successful in terms of user perception. Users know both brands [FedEx and Kinko's] and the core competencies of each . . . No questions remain in consumers' minds as to what these newly rebranded stores can do . . . FedEx Kinko's commercials and online ads tell you everything you can expect from the stores. They reaffirm the consumer really does get the best of both worlds.''

Despite Aaronson's high marks for the rebranding effort and the ''Our Office Is Your Office'' ad campaign, the public was slower to make use of the wide range of services at FedEx Kinko's Office and Print Centers than had been hoped by company executives. Nevertheless in the first quarter of fiscal 2006, FedEx Kinko's reported revenues of $517 million. This was a 6 percent increase over the first quarter of the previous fiscal year. Operating income, however, had declined 16 percent over the first quarter of fiscal 2005. The increase in revenue was attributed to the traditional FedEx services that were available at the Office and Print Centers: FedEx Ground and FedEx Express delivery. There was a decline in revenue in the copy product line.

Despite the decline in revenue for ''traditional'' office services at FedEx Kinko's Office and Print Centers, corporate officials felt that the ''Our Office Is Your Office'' ad campaign had successfully implanted the notion of integrated services in customers' minds. The ad industry seemed to agree, as ''Cloud Nine'' was designated as one of Adweek magazine's Best Spots of 2004, and ''Plastic'' won an international bronze Andy award in 2005.

By the end of the first quarter of fiscal 2006, FedEx Kinko's claimed more than 1,450 employees with service in more than 11 countries. One year after the launch of the campaign, FedEx Kinko's was making plans to triple its number of domestic stores. In August 2005 the parent company took the office notion one step further when it began selling office supplies and furniture online.

FURTHER READING

Aaronson, Jack. ''The Rebrand Challenge: UPS/MBE vs. FedEx/Kinko's.'' September 30, 2004. Available from <http://www.clickz.com/experts/crm/crm_strat/article.php/3414121>

''FedEx Changing Kinko's Brand Name to FedEx Kinko's.'' New York Times, April 27, 2004, p. 4.

''FedEx Delivers $2.4 B to Acquire Kinko's.'' Brandweek, January 5, 2004.

''FedEx Expands Operations with Kinko's Buy.'' Brandweek, December 30, 2003. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>

''FedEx Hits the Road to Tout Kinko's.'' Brandweek, July 6, 2004. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>

''FedEx Launches New Ad Campaign: Positions FedEx Kinko's as Your 'Office on the Road.' '' Business Wire, July 6, 2004.

''FedEx Taps BBDO for Kinko's Advertising Campaign.'' Memphis Business Journal, July 6, 2004. Available from <http://www.bizjournals.com/memphis/stories/2004/07/05/daily1.html>

Hirschman, Dave. ''FedEx, UPS Tactics Diverge: Retail Shippers a Top Priority.'' Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 13, 2004.

Janoff, Barry. "If Your Ex Comes Knocking, Start Rocking." Brandweek, July 12, 2004.

O'Loughlin, Sandra. "Strategy: UPS Eyes Retail Growth in Urban, College Locations." Brandweek, March 7, 2005.

Tedeschi, Bob. "New Level of Competition: When a Supplier Gets into Its Customers' Business." New York Times, September 26, 2005.

Frank Caso

RELAX, IT'S FEDEX CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Witty and engaging ads, a hallmark of the Memphis-based FedEx Corp. for more than two decades, had helped propel the success of the shipping and transportation company. In September 2003, however, in response to an economic downturn and highly competitive television advertising from rival United Parcel Service (UPS), FedEx sought to redefine itself to the public. That year the company launched "Relax, It's FedEx," its most ambitious ad campaign. Unlike past advertising, the "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign placed more emphasis on ground delivery and international shipping. It also emphasized the appeal of FedEx's integrated services in helping businesses solve their shipping problems.

Created by ad agency BBDO New York, the campaign initially kicked off with a series of eight spots created for television, but it eventually included print, radio, and Internet components. Television, as expected, consumed between 65 and 70 percent of the campaign's $90 million budget. Each of the humorous spots contained the campaign's tagline, "Relax, It's FedEx," reinforcing the point that harried workers need not worry about shipping dilemmas. The eight spots in the initial phase of the campaign were titled "Call Center," "Career Maker," "Chinese Office," "Crate," "Drama," "MBA," "Problems," and "Remind Me." In "Drama," for example, two workers melodramatically repeated that they were "doomed," believing that they would not be able to get a shipment to Houston by the next day. Each repetition of the word "doomed" became more melodramatic than the previous one. But the final voice-over announced, "You can try, but we've taken all the drama out of shipping overnight."

The campaign was successful enough for FedEx to continue running it through 2005. It also won a number of awards. In 2004 the spot "Drama" garnered a Gold Addy Award, while "Chinese Office," with the entire commercial spoken in Cantonese without English subtitles until the company name was mentioned at the end, won a Silver Addy Award. The campaign also won an Andy Head Award and an LIAA (London International Advertising Awards) Trophy in 2004. FedEx enjoyed an increase in sales, reporting revenues of $24.7 billion for fiscal 2004, up from $22.5 billion the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since FedEx's founding in 1973 as Federal Express, the company had concentrated on air shipping—on its first day of operation it shipped 186 packages—as the key to successful express delivery. Over the next three decades the company remained the leader in that sector of the delivery industry, and by May 2003 FedEx was making 2.7 million air shipments per day. Yet the number marked a decline of four-tenths of a percent over FedEx's previous fiscal quarter. In fact FedEx's air shipment numbers declined in 9 of the 10 fiscal quarters between 2001 and May 2003. Meanwhile, the company's ground delivery service enjoyed double-digit growth for seven consecutive quarters.

FedEx Ground came into being in 1998 after the company purchased Roadway Package Service. Within five years its popularity with customers, based on its lower costs, was on the verge of altering the company's original approach. The move by customers away from express delivery was attributed to the stalled economy, in which cost had taken preference over an item's "absolutely positively" —an earlier FedEx tagline—arriving quickly, though FedEx took great pains in the ads to assure that it would. This reality was acknowledged by Laurie A. Tucker, a FedEx senior vice president, in a Wall Street Journal article by Suzanne Vranica and Rick Brooks that appeared the day the "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign kicked off. "The [domestic] express industry took a big hit," she admitted. Tipping off Wall Street Journal readers as to the content of the upcoming ad campaign, Tucker observed that the industry's immediate future was in ground shipping and international express shipping.

TARGET MARKET

The wry tone of the new ad campaign was a return to the style of earlier FedEx campaigns. Since "Relax, It's FedEx" was the company's first campaign to focus on ground and international express delivery, however, the target market was therefore expanded from the core audience the company had previously sought to reach. Whereas "Chinese Office," for example, emphasized the reliability of FedEx's international delivery, "Call Center" took a different approach by humorously emphasizing the company's prompt home delivery service. The latter commercial showed a man whose shower had been interrupted by a FedEx delivery calling the service department of a company he had done business with to complain that he had not expected his package so soon. While these ads highlighted the shift in FedEx thinking, the spots also appealed to the company's important target market of middle management and small-business owners. The ads also highlighted FedEx's Internet service. Spots such as ''Drama,'' ''MBA,'' and ''Remind Me'' were aimed at midlevel shippers or poked fun at the boss.

© ALAN SCHEIN PHOTOGRAPHY/CORBIS

COMPETITION

A sluggish economy was not the only factor contributing to the shift in FedEx's thinking. The company's major rival and the leading ground shipper, UPS, launched its own successful ad campaign with the tagline ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' In the Wall Street Journal article by Vranica and Brooks, Alan Brew of Addison Branding & Communications in San Francisco declared, ''Brown has put some pressure on FedEx.'' The writers mentioned Brew's observation that the UPS campaign employed an important branding strategy—personalization—which, inadvertently or not, had been emphasized by Brew himself in his use of the term ''Brown'' for UPS. Furthermore, UPS had been outspending FedEx in advertising. In 2002 UPS spent $163.8 million on advertising, while FedEx spent only $84.6 million. FedEx enjoyed a modest improvement in its share of the ground delivery market in 2003, though more than half of all ground deliveries in the United States were made by UPS. In 2004 UPS had revenue totaling $36.6 billion.

The United States Postal Service (USPS) ranked second in ground deliveries, but its 2004 revenue totaled $69 billion. As Douglas P. Shuit pointed out in Workforce Management, however, the revenue for those services that placed the USPS in competition with the privately owned companies—priority and overnight mail and package delivery—totaled approximately $7.4 billion per year. Also in 2003 another rival, the German-owned DHL International, sought to make inroads in the express delivery market. The purchase of Airborne Express was part of its $1.2 billion investment plan in the U.S. market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Relax, It's FedEx'' campaign debuted with two 30-second spots on October 4, 2003, during a telecast of the first game of the National Football League season. The game, between the Washington Redskins and the New York Jets, was played on the Redskins' home field, FedEx Field, thus reinforcing the company's brand name. FedEx had also purchased naming rights to the arena that was home to the Memphis Grizzlies of the National Basketball Association, and the company was a sponsor of the Orange Bowl and of Professional Golfers Association events. In an article published in Traffic

SNAPPY TAGLINES, FUNNY ADS

In 2003 "Relax, It's FedEx" became the latest in a series of memorable advertising taglines used by the company, some of which, because of their humor, survived in an expanded cultural context. In 1975 FedEx, then known as Federal Express, debuted its first television commercial with the tagline "America, you've got a new airline." This was followed in 1977 with the simple "Hellooo Federal." It was in 1979, however, that Federal Express commercials really began to leave their mark on the public consciousness, beginning with the tagline "When it absolutely positively has to be there overnight." That tagline was parodied on Saturday Night Live in a skit about a company called Einstein Express: "When it absolutely positively has to be there the day before yesterday." Federal Express embraced the humor and further defied industry standards with its "Fast-Talking Man" ads of the 1980s, which used the line, "Peter, may I call you Pete?" In this instance the memorable line did not even mention the company name. Nevertheless, the humor served as subliminal reinforcement.

World soon after the first ads appeared, Angela Greiling Keane quoted Brian Philips, FedEx's vice president of U.S. marketing, as saying, "We rely heavily on sports to reach the decision makers in our industry. We can track a return on investment for each and every sponsorship property we engage with." But FedEx was not about to put all of its advertising eggs in one basket, and the company's television spots showed up more and more on cable specialty programs. In addition, the "Relax, It's FedEx" ads encompassed the full range of the media.

As the campaign progressed through 2004, FedEx made further efforts to secure a larger portion of the ground delivery market. The preparation for this had been made in December 2003 when the company purchased Kinko's, the Dallas-based photocopying chain, for more than $2 billion. Kinko's was the largest such chain in the world, with more than 1,200 stores, located primarily in the United States. FedEx, which already had drop-off centers in Kinko's stores, planned to expand the chain into Europe and Asia, thus facilitating electronic transfer and the delivery of scanned documents and PDF (Portable Document Format) files.

In December 2004 the company announced that it would extend the "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign into 2005 with six new 30-second television spots, which previewed that month. BBDO New York once again produced the spots. Highlighting FedEx's integrated services—express delivery, international delivery, ground delivery, FedEx.com, and FedEx Kinko's—the ads turned on the same winning formula of wry humor. The six spots in the second series were titled "Bus," "Job Counselor," "Shower," "Sweeps," "Tom," and "Wrong." "Job Counselor," in which a pirate was interviewed for a job in a company's shipping department, highlighted FedEx.com. China was again the focus of one spot—"Tom"—promoting FedEx's international delivery service. In the spot the world's seemingly most inept worker was still able to ship to China by using FedEx. "Wrong," a commercial for FedEx ground delivery, featured a befuddled worker whose coworkers were constantly pointing out his linguistic and other confusions: the leaning tower of pizza, French benefits, and actor James Dean and singer and sausage pitchman Jimmy Dean.

In keeping with its policy of advertising heavily on sports broadcasts, thus directing the spots primarily to males between the ages of 25 and 55, the second series of ads debuted throughout the Bowl Championship Series of college football during the first weekend of 2005. Another ad was shown during the Super Bowl in February of that year.

OUTCOME

The ads not only won awards in the advertising industry and recognition from the public, but they were accompanied by an upturn in FedEx business. As the United States emerged from the recession of the early years of the twenty-first century, FedEx market shares also improved. In fiscal 2004 FedEx Ground had revenues of $3.9 billion. Its share of the ground delivery market in 2004 ranged from 27 percent, according to Pittsburgh analysts SJ Consulting, to 31 percent, according to J.P. Morgan. Both figures showed that FedEx was making significant inroads into what was formerly seen as unassailable UPS territory.

In May 2005 the Atlanta consulting firm the Colography Group confirmed a trend that the "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign not only capitalized on but also nurtured. The Colography Group estimated that the year would see FedEx Ground and FedEx Freight handle 50.1 percent, or more than half, of the company's shipments. Without commenting directly on the shipping percentages for these two segments, FedEx officials gave tacit approval to this figure. As quoted by Jane Roberts in the Memphis Commercial Appeal, the president of the Colography Group, Ted Scherck, noted, "This is a watershed because you have the carrier that defined the concept of air express now providing more shipments on the ground than in the air. . .The mode of transportation is increasingly irrelevant to shippers.''

In 2004 the U.S. Department of Transportation awarded FedEx 12 additional flights to China, including the sole direct flight from the United States to the Pearl River Delta area, which was one of China's major economic and manufacturing centers. In 2005 FedEx signed an agreement to use the Guangzhou Baiyun International Airport as its Asian transfer hub beginning in 2008.

In the first quarter of fiscal year 2006, which ended on August 31, 2005, FedEx reported that ''total combined average daily package volume at FedEx Express and FedEx Ground grew 5 percent year over year for the quarter, due to continued growth in international express, U.S. domestic express and ground shipments.'' The company further reported that its overall revenues were up 10 percent, to $7.71 billion as opposed to $6.98 billion the previous year. Net income rose 3 percent, from $330 million to $339 million. These increases were reflected in the various segments of FedEx services. FedEx Express revenue was up 11 percent over the previous year, to $5.12 billion, and FedEx Ground revenue increased 14 percent, to $1.22 billion. The daily package volume had increased 6 percent in comparison with the previous fiscal year. Revenue in the FedEx Freight segment increased 11 percent, to $882 million, while FedEx Kinko's saw a 6 percent increase, to $517 million. This last increase was largely attributed to the growth of FedEx Ground and Express services in conjunction with the conversion of FedEx World Service centers to FedEx Kinko's Ship Centers.

FURTHER READING

''FedEx Companies Star in New Advertising Campaign.'' Business Wire, September 4, 2003.

''FedEx Continues to Relax in 2005.'' December 30, 2004. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>

''FedEx Scores with NFL Breakout.'' September 5, 2003. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>

''FedEx, UPS to Set Up Transfer Hubs in China.'' Comtex News Network, July 21, 2005.

Janoff, Barry. ''BBDO Freshens FedEx 'Relax' Campaign.'' Adweek, December 30, 2004.

Keane, Angela Greiling. ''Relax, It's a FedEx Ad.'' Traffic World, September 15, 2003.

Link, Jonathan. ''Relax, Nothing Has Changed.'' Boards, October 1, 2003.

Maddox, Kate. ''BBDO New York's 'Imagination' Sparks a Big Year.'' Business to Business, March 8, 2004.

Roberts, Jane. ''FedEx Likely to Ship More Packages by Ground in 2005.'' Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 22, 2005.

Shuit, Douglas P. ''Packing in Customers.'' Workforce Management, May 1, 2005.

Vranica, Suzanne, and Rick Brooks. ''FedEx Recasts Itself on the Ground.'' Wall Street Journal, September 4, 2003.

Weber, Henry R. ''UPS, FedEx Rivalry a Study in Contrasts.'' May 20, 2005. Available from <http://www.boston.com/business/articles/2004/05/20/ups_fedex_rivalry_a_study_in_contrasts>

''AAF Awards: Addy; The Creative Spirit of Advertising.'' October 23, 2005. Available from <http://www.aaf.org/awards/addys_silver_2005.html>

Frank Caso

THE WAY THE WORLD WORKS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Federal Express Corporation (FedEx), founded in the 1970s, built its success on an innovative business model, offering the business world the first overnight shipping service. But savvy marketing also played a key role in the rise of the company. Just one year after becoming operational, FedEx released its first advertising campaign. Increased sales resulted, as did more advertising. In 1978 FedEx introduced the award-winning ''Absolutely, Positively Overnight'' campaign, which featured a fast-talking spokesman. It ran until 1983. Other memorable FedEx campaigns that followed were ''It's Not Just a Package, It's Your Business,'' which ran in 1987 and 1988; ''Our Most Important Package is Yours,'' which ran from 1991 to 1994; and ''Absolutely, Positively Anything,'' a 1995 campaign. Reliability and speed were at the heart of the message in these campaigns. Then, in 1996, FedEx released a campaign called ''The Way the World Works'' that emphasized the company's position as a leader in global shipping.

''The Way the World Works'' was designed to communicate the idea that FedEx could help customers, particularly small businesses, cultivate contacts all over the globe. The company's longtime advertising agency, BBDO Worldwide of New York, designed the advertisements, which showed customers in various countries using FedEx delivery and warehousing-inventory services to market their goods.

FedEx considered ''The Way the World Works'' to be one of its most successful marketing efforts. According to the company, it increased awareness levels of FedEx to new highs. Nevertheless, by autumn 1998 the company was ready for a change, and it returned to a more humorous approach with the ''Be Absolutely Sure'' campaign that followed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When it began operations with 14 small aircraft in 1973, Federal Express was the first company of its kind to offer overnight shipping. At the time it delivered to 25 cities from New York to Florida. The next year the company launched its first advertising campaign with a budget of $150,000 and the tagline ''Federal Express—a whole new airline for packages only.'' After the first commercial was broadcast, the company's shipping volume shot up from 3,000 to 10,000 packages a night. By the end of 1997 the company had a fleet of more than 600 aircraft and some 40,000 other vehicles, and it was handling 3 million packages worldwide every day.

Because it was the first company to offer express delivery services, Federal Express created its own market. Demand grew quickly, and Federal Express became the first company in the United States to achieve revenues of $1 billion within 10 years. Revenues mushroomed to nearly $35 billion by 1996, and, according to the company's 1997 annual report, they were expected to reach more than $250 billion worldwide before the year 2020.

Over the years Federal Express became known for its humorous advertising campaigns, including pitchmen who spoke at a frenetic speed and an employer who pretended to be his secretary when he telephoned to check on a package. With ''The Way the World Works'' the company took a more serious approach, stressing brand image and the ability to help businesses compete in the global economy. The latest campaign also meshed with the general FedEx tagline, ''The World On Time,'' which had been introduced along with the company's updated logo in 1994. It was not only the tone but also the message of the company's advertising that changed. In the early 1990s the message was that consumers could rely on Federal Express to deliver packages quickly. The ads emphasized the company's technological features, such as software for tracking shipments. The principal message of ''The Way the World Works,'' however, was that FedEx could deliver worldwide.

TARGET MARKET

According to Steve Pacheco, manager of advertising for FedEx, ''The Way the World Works'' campaign was targeted primarily at three groups of consumers: professional managers who were 25 to 54 years old and who earned at least $35,000 annually, small shippers and owners of small businesses who were 25 to 54 years old and who earned at least $50,000, and people who made decisions and influenced opinions in corporations, a largely male group 35 to 64 years old and with household incomes of at least $60,000. Although in the past, small businesses had not had much opportunity to buy and sell merchandise in other countries, this was becoming important to compete globally. ''Federal Express is an enabler that allows them to do business all over the world,'' Pacheco explained.

NAME CHANGE

In conjunction with the launch of its ''The World On Time'' campaign in 1994, Federal Express also changed its logo and brand name to FedEx, the name by which the company and its services had informally come to be known. The logo, which used an arrow to symbolize speed and efficiency, was done in the trademark purple and orange, and the company's planes and ground vehicles were repainted to match.

FedEx could not only ship goods quickly, but it could also track the precise location of a package, and it offered a money-back guarantee if the item did not arrive on time. A business could predict when merchandise would arrive or exactly when it needed to be shipped. This allowed businesses to lower their operating costs by maintaining smaller inventories. Because a large percentage of inventory was in transit at any given time, FedEx planes and trucks, in effect, became mobile warehouses for the company's customers. The concept of shipping and receiving merchandise ''just in time'' became increasingly popular. The taglines ''The World On Time'' and ''The Way the World Works'' thus helped FedEx convey the message that it understood modern business practices and could be an important element in a company's operating strategy.

Pacheco said that FedEx hoped that the ads would surprise people who were not familiar with everything the company had to offer. At the same time the campaign was intended to broaden the company's appeal to its established customers and to encourage them to make better use of its services.

COMPETITION

FedEx was the largest express transportation company in the world. Thanks to its vast network of aircraft and trucks, it could deliver to more than 200 countries within 48 hours. It had the only routes in and out of China and exclusive rights to many other routes in Asia, where 7 of the 10 fastest-growing economies were located.

By 1997, although FedEx still dominated express delivery with a market share of about 43 percent, it had lost ground to competitors. According to the Colography Group, United Parcel Service (UPS) had 27 percent of the market, Airborne Express 15 percent, and the U.S. Postal Service 5 percent, with all other services combined claiming 8 percent. Worldwide, the total revenues from express shipments for FedEx were 50 percent more than those of its nearest competitor.

In terms of all shipping, however, UPS had grown to be twice the size of FedEx. In 1995 UPS shipped 3 billion packages every day and had revenues of $21 billion. By contrast, in 1997 FedEx shipped about 3 million items daily, and it reported revenues of $10.2 billion in 1996 and $11.5 billion in 1997. To better compete with UPS, FedEx merged with Caliber System and thereby acquired the RPS trucking company, which was the second-largest ground carrier after UPS.

FedEx also benefited from a 15-day strike of UPS workers in August 1997. UPS saw its share of the package delivery market drop from about 80 percent before the strike to an estimated 70 percent after. FedEx employees put in overtime to cope with the flood of extra packages during the strike, and the company reported that its earnings more than doubled for the quarter because of the additional volume. FedEx estimated that it retained 15 percent of the extra volume after the UPS strike had ended. During the strike FedEx ran a print ad thanking its employees for helping the company handle the additional workload, and it rewarded its workforce with a $20 million bonus. Among other things, the ad told the public that customer service was important to FedEx personnel.

The U.S. Postal Service competed with both FedEx and UPS by advertising its Priority Mail service, priced beginning at $3, which was notably cheaper than its competitors' charges of $6 to $12 for two-day delivery. FedEx sued the Postal Service for false advertising, because Priority Mail did not guarantee two-day delivery. Instead, it offered "two- or three-day" delivery and in 1996 delivered only 81 percent of its packages within two days. An advertising industry watchdog council said that the ads were acceptable, however, for the public understood the difference between what the Postal Service and its competitors were offering. The ads and the lawsuit continued, and the Postal Service maintained that, by promoting Priority Mail at an inexpensive price, it had pressured FedEx to lower its charges by a third.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"The Way the World Works" campaign was created at the request of Frederick Smith, founder and CEO of Federal Express, who had asked the senior management of the company to organize a campaign that would focus on the global economy. BBDO produced the commercials.

SPECIAL ADS FOR NEW SERVICES

Over the years Federal Express had also done special advertising to promote new services and technology. The "AsiaOne" campaign, for example, promoted the company's delivery services in Asia, the "Early A.M." a new service within the United States, and "FedEx Ship" its enhanced computer capabilities. Such innovations kept FedEx a leader in its business, and they also put pressure on competitors.

BBDO, known for the use of emotion and human interest in its advertising, tapped into the idea that FedEx empowered individuals to realize their dreams. The dream might involve designing avant-garde furniture and selling it to someone on the other side of the world or shipping a dress from Italy to Japan so that a wedding would come off perfectly. FedEx wanted people who saw the commercials to perceive them as heartfelt messages. What was implied was that the company cared as much about every package as it cared about the wedding dress.

FedEx's Pacheco said that the campaign's five key objectives were to "magnify the scope of Federal Express, show the global and international capabilities, add value to the FedEx brand, communicate all of our high-tech innovations, and position Federal Express as a leader." Previous ads had touched on some of these points, but "The Way the World Works" took a new direction by calling attention to global delivery services. The word "world" in the tagline was significant, because it emphasized FedEx's ability to deliver worldwide. In addition, it referred to the fact that the people who worked for FedEx were of all races and lived in many countries. "Early on, we identified the need to be as culturally diverse as we could. You'll see people from all around the world in the campaign," said Pacheco. Just as important was the word "works," which conveyed the idea that FedEx helped its customers get their work done by helping them solve their delivery problems.

The campaign featured six TV spots—five 30-second commercials and one 60-second commercial—that were introduced in late 1996. The spots ran mainly on highly rated television programs, including prime-time shows and sports and news broadcasts. In one spot a dressmaker in Italy shipped bridal gowns to customers in Japan. Another scenario showed pop-up books published in Wales being sent to classrooms in England and Thailand. The warm, distinctive voice of actress Linda Hunt asked, "How did such ordinary people come by such extraordinary powers? Believe it or not, all it took was the wave of a wand.'' In a humorous spot called ''Doug,'' an employee had entrusted an important package to a delivery company other than FedEx. When the package failed to arrive on time, Doug's manager locked him in a closet and berated him while the rest of the staff looked on. Each commercial ended with a picture of a revolving globe and the tagline ''The Way the World Works.''

The spots were translated into various languages for the 20 markets in which BBDO handled FedEx advertising. Although they were broadcast in various countries, the commercials were created primarily for the United States. In fact, the campaign was the first that FedEx had not customized to individual countries.

OUTCOME

It was generally felt that FedEx's ''The Way the World Works'' campaign achieved its goals. For one thing the commercials improved the company's image with the public. ''The campaign spiked our awareness level up almost to all-time high levels,'' Pacheco said. In a survey reported in USA Today, 28 percent of consumers said that the spots were very effective, while 15 percent said that they ''liked the ads a lot.'' A mere 4 percent said that they disliked the campaign. The spots were most popular with people 30 to 49 years old. Pacheco claimed that the commercials were actually more popular than the USA Today survey indicated. He noted that FedEx and BBDO had conducted their own awareness studies and had found that the campaign was one of the most effective the company had ever undertaken. For example, multiple telephone surveys conducted to judge the public's perception of the FedEx brand over a period of time showed a strong, positive response to the commercials.

Perhaps one of the most important indicators of the campaign's success was the number of people who contacted FedEx directly after seeing the spots on television. One woman in New York City liked the wedding dress in the commercial so much that FedEx put her in touch with the dressmaker and gave her permission to use a copy of the gown for her own wedding. Another person used classical music from the campaign as a tribute at the funeral of a loved one. A third person obtained some 20 red chairs like those used in one of the spots. Pacheco noted, ''I think FedEx, because of its closeness with its customers, probably gets more customer reaction like this.''

''The Way the World Works'' came to a close in 1998, when FedEx elected to shift gears, as the company now faced competition from a number of upstart overnight shippers, such as DHL. The company returned to a more humorous approach with the ''Be Absolutely Sure'' campaign, which offered comical examples of what could occur when someone relied on a cut-rate shipper rather than FedEx.

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. ''FedEx Ad Campaign Delivers Effective Message.'' USA Today, August 25, 1997.

''FedEx Will Quit Joking Around Overseas Marketing: The Company Decides Humorous Ads Don't Work Globally.'' Los Angeles Times, January 21, 1997.

Fisher, Anne. ''The World's Most Admired Companies.'' Fortune, October 27, 1997.

Garcia, Shelly. ''Federal Express' New World View: Delivery Company Breaks Global Ad Campaign Created by BBDO.'' Adweek (eastern ed.), September 16, 1996.

Grant, Linda. ''Why FedEx Is Flying High.'' Fortune, November 10, 1997.

''How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up.'' USA Today, December 29, 1997.

Janah, Monua, and Clinton Wilder. ''FedEx? Try . . . LogistEx.'' Information Week, October 27, 1997.

Levering, Robert, and Milton Moskowitz. ''The 100 Best Companies to Work For in America.'' Fortune, January 12, 1998.

''Reshaping the Postal Service to Fit a Changing World.'' Postal Record, June 1997.

Rosato, Donna. ''FedEx Delivers Strong Earnings on UPS Strike.'' USA Today, September 16, 1997.

Susan Risland
Ed Dinger

Fila USA

1 Fila Way
Sparks, Maryland 21152-3000
USA
Telephone: (410) 773-3000
Fax: (410) 773-3000
Web site: www.fila.com

■■■

GRANT HILL 4 CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Between 1994 and 1996 Fila USA climbed from seventh place in the athletic-footwear category to an impressive third place. Although the company made shoes and attire for a variety of sports, basketball-shoe sales proved Fila's biggest success. An endorsement deal with Detroit Pistons' player Grant Hill played a clear role in this achievement. After introducing Hill's signature shoe in 1995, Fila's basketball shoe sales shot up 52 percent in one year, putting it right behind the industry leader Nike. Image problems, however, continued to nag Fila. In the United States athletic-shoe sales were driven by both technology and style. Fila was struggling to transform its image from that of fashionable shoes to functional shoes. By 1997 Fila had still not found a solid niche among young consumers, the lifeblood for athletic-shoe sales. During the first half of the year retail orders were weaker than expected and sales were stalled, forcing Fila to do heavy discounting. Even Hill's endorsement seemed less meaningful to teens than it had been a few years earlier. A young player in a New Jersey basketball league was asked by Bloomberg News about Fila shoes. He summed up the problem: "Look around—nobody's wearing them."

Despite the waning effectiveness of Hill's endorsement, Fila renewed his contract in 1997 and created a new advertising campaign to promote the Grant Hill 4 basketball shoe. It was reported that Hill's new seven-year endorsement agreement with Fila was valued at $80 million. The campaign began in early November to tie in with the start of the National Basketball Association's new season. Four initial television spots focused on Hill's personality rather than the shoe's new high-performance technology and featured the tagline "Change the game." Subsequent print ads followed the same theme as the television spots.

The campaign failed to achieve its goal of driving sales. Based on 1997 sales, in 1998 Fila had dropped to number four in the U.S. market, behind competitors adidas, Nike, and Reebok. Further, in the first quarter of 1998 Fila's U.S. sales plummeted 52 percent. Leo Burnett USA was hired as the agency of record for Fila in July 1998 and was charged with creating a new campaign to support the launch of the Grant Hill 5 shoe.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Fila was founded in Italy in 1926 as a knitwear company and introduced its first line of athletic sportswear in 1973. During the 1980s and early 1990s Fila's U.S. footwear was produced by another company under a licensing agreement. In 1991 Fila made the strategic decision to regain direct control of its footwear line and bought back the license to make its own shoes. Over the years Fila had positioned itself as a source for fashionable athletic footwear and apparel. The fashion niche had helped distinguish Fila from its more technically oriented competitors, but it marred Fila's image as a maker of functional shoes.

In 1993 Fila began remedying its lackluster sports image by signing a number of marquee athletes to endorse the shoes. In the basketball market the roster included players Jerry Stackhouse, Jamal Mashburn, and Hersey Hawkins. Bringing Detroit Pistons basketball player Grant Hill into the fold in 1994 helped the company climb from seventh place in the athletic-footwear category to third. Fila senior vice president of advertising and communications Howe Burch credited Hill's alliance with taking the company to a new level. He told the Washington Post that Hill "bridged the two markets for us, urban and suburban." Hill's endorsement meant a lot to footwear buyers for sporting-good stores as well as to the kids who bought the shoes. A buyer for City Sports in North Reading, Massachusetts, told Footwear News that he considered Hill's selling power second only to Chicago Bulls' basketball great Michael Jordan.

The endorsement strategy worked well initially. In the athletic-shoe category Fila moved into the number three slot, behind Nike and Reebok. For basketball shoes the company's sales were second only to Nike. The original Grant Hill basketball shoes, introduced in 1995, were unique and sold out quickly. But young consumers proved fickle about their athletic shoes. Many were unimpressed with the design of the second and third version of the Grant Hill shoes. Pairs were sitting on retailer's shelves and being discounted. "Sell-through" (the percentage of inventory sold by retailers per week) on the Grant Hill model introduced in October 1996 was just 10 to 15 percent. By contrast, the first version had sold through at as high as 70 percent. In 1997 Bloomberg News asked players on the New Jersey basketball league what they thought of Fila. One 17-year-old said, "They look ugly, with those big Fila words."

Part of the problem was that basketball shoes as a category were in a slump. Fila also acknowledged that releasing the shoes prior to the start of the basketball season might have been a mistake. Alan Sisson, owner of Slam Dunk, New York, told Footwear News in September 1997, "Fila was one of my best vendors a year ago. They've definitely slipped, but I feel they'll come back."

Others were more critical of Fila for continuing to play up the style of its shoes rather than emphasizing technological innovation. Young consumers who had grown up in the age of technology expected to hear about a shoe's technical features. Company president Bob Liewald justified Fila's positioning in Sporting Goods Business, saying, "Our mission is to create a unique blend of creativity and function. We're not ashamed of who we are. The name works against us and for us."

TOP 10 ENDORSERS OF 1997

NBA players held the top two spots on the list of most coveted sports spokesmen of 1997. The ranking took into account money earned from endorsements and a subjective evaluation of demand that Brian Murphy of the Sports Marketing Letter called the "heat index."

Athlete and annual endorsement income in millions: (1) Michael Jordan: $40.0, (2) Grant Hill: $26.9, (3) Tiger Woods: $25.0, (4) Shaquille O'Neal: $23.0, (5) Arnold Palmer: $19.2, (6) Andre Agassi: $17.0, (7) Jack Nicklaus: $16.0, (8) Joe Montana: $12.0, (9) Ken Griffey, Jr.: $6.0, (10) Deion Sanders: $6.0.

TARGET MARKET

Several years after Fila began producing its own athletic shoes, the company held a pivotal focus group with 12- to 18-year-olds that altered the direction of the company's marketing efforts. The youths said that they could not relate to Fila at all. Fila shoes seemed more like fashion statements than something to wear for playing sports. According to American Demographics, most athletic shoes were actually worn in nonathletic situations where style was more important than performance. For most wearers, what mattered was looking cool in school. Nonetheless, even the least athletic kids were looking to inner-city basketball courts for cues to what shoes to wear, and they did not see Filas there.

Capturing young buyers' interest was crucial for Fila and other athletic-sportswear companies. According to the Athletic Footwear Association, most athletic-footwear firms actively targeted consumers in the 12- to 24-year-old range. Not only did this group make up 28 percent of the total sales market, but they also tended to spend more per pair and stick with a brand as they grew older.

COMPETITION

Few retail categories had as formidable a leader as athletic footwear did in the mid-1900s. In 1996 Nike dominated the market with 44 percent of U.S. athletic-footwear sales. Reebok held 16 percent of the market, Fila 7 percent, adidas 5 percent, and New Balance 3 percent.

By 1998 Nike was running its "I Can" campaign, a successor to the wildly successful "Just Do It" campaign. Nike's new ads, however, had not resonated with the youth market as its previous ads had. Consumers were apparently growing tired of Nike's win-or-else attitude and its glorification of athletes. In addition, by becoming the industry leader, the shoes had lost some of their trendiness. Evan Cameron, a partner and head of planning at Berlin, Cameron & Partners, which handled part of the Reebok account, said that teens in his focus groups referred to the Nike symbol as a "swooshstika."

During the 1990s Reebok followed in Nike's footsteps, making heavy use of athlete endorsements to impart the message that it too was a performance brand. Although the strategy had paid off by earning the company the number two sales spot, Reebok was also facing poor sales in the late 1990s. In fact, athletic-shoe sales had cooled for the entire industry. Companies were realizing that imitating Nike would no longer earn them easy sales. "Nike created a vocabulary ten years ago, and everybody's been using that same kind of imagery and vocabulary ever since," Bill Heater of Heater Advertising, the lead agency for Reebok, told Advertising Age. "The same athletes, the same photographers. There's a suffocating sameness in the category."

The athletic-footwear companies that showed any substantial growth in 1997 were those with offbeat approaches to marketing. Adidas's advertising, for instance, relied less on athlete endorsements and more on regular Joes. One series of TV commercials for adidas that was successful in courting new customers actually portrayed a group of fat Yankee fans. The "brown shoe" phenomenon was another factor in declining sales of athletic shoes. Kids were taking off their basketball shoes and putting on hiking boots and lug-soled shoes made by smaller labels, such as Wolverine's, Hush Puppies, and Caterpillar. To complicate the matter, they were also flocking to designer-label sneakers from such companies as DKNY and Tommy Hilfiger.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In September 1997 Fila renewed its contract with basketball star Grant Hill, signing him to an $80 million, seven-year endorsement deal. Analysts had speculated earlier that losing the endorsement would have been a crippling blow to Fila. There were other indications, however, that buyers did not necessarily want any more sports celebrity endorsements. In years past, a celebrity endorsement was a surefire way to sell athletic shoes, but many insiders believed that the trend had outlived its usefulness. Executive director Gregg Hartley of the Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association told the Boston Globe, "There are only about four athletes in the whole world who can actually sell product." According to Hartley, the athletes that were worth their fees included basketball star Michael Jordan and golfers Tiger Woods and Greg Norman. Other athletes did not necessarily earn "a bang for their marketing buck," noted editor Sean Brenner of Team Marketing Report, an industry newsletter.

Fila was banking on Hill's cachet to lend credibility to its footwear line. They had good reason to think it would; more than $100 million had already been generated from Hill's signature shoes. But with the NBA season about to get under way, Fila still faced a considerable roadblock. "They don't have the shoes that kids want to buy," Peter Russ, an analyst with Shelby, Cullom Davis & Co., bluntly told Bloomberg News in mid-1997. Kids wanted shoes that blended the latest street looks with the hottest technology. Fila's reputation as a company that sacrificed performance for fashion continued to hurt sales. The new Grant Hill 4 basketball shoe had the potential to overcome that image problem. It was built on the company's proprietary 2A technology, which consisted of a matrix of high-performance, thermoplastic cylinders that provided cushioning and stability.

Arnell Brand Consulting Group, New York, created the advertising campaign for the Grant Hill 4 shoe. The campaign's debut tied into the beginning of the NBA season in November. For most marquee basketball shoes, footwear companies could count on a window of four to six weeks in which to sell their brands. "After a week," says Mark Westerman, director of advertising at Fila, "you know if the campaign is working." The four 30-second television commercials for the Grant Hill 4 shoe played up Hill's personality and image, which Westerman described as "a champion, a winner, a good guy." The spots, which employed the tagline "Change the game," communicated what it took to win, using a more low-key, introspective style than past campaigns. For instance, "Anthem" interspersed images of Hill playing basketball with close-ups of him as he listened to the national anthem before a game. "4 on the Floor" used rap lyrics to draw attention to the Fila shoe. In both "Tunnel" and "Shower," viewers saw Hill quietly getting himself psyched up for a game. Print ads that complemented the television spots appeared in Slam, Source, and Sports Illustrated, and a mural of Hill on a wall in downtown Detroit carried the theme as well.

OUTCOME

The campaign did not spark the sales that Fila needed. In 1998 Fila announced that its overall sales were worse than expected in the United States. "We had an exceptionally high level of close-out sales which killed the market," Fila spokesman Andrea Nacmias told Footwear

News. $480 million in 1997 U.S. sales gave the brand a share of about 6 percent, which meant that it trailed adidas as well as Nike and Reebok. Fila's 1998 first-quarter U.S. footwear sales figures were also grim, dropping 52 percent to $78.8 million. "[Fila] essentially [has] no shelf space left. It can only go up from here, I suspect," said Flavio Cereda, an analyst with the London office of ABN Amro. "They've got to do something about their presence in the U.S." Fila did not need an industry analyst to state the obvious. By that time it had already hired companies to study branding and logistics and brought on board a new advertising agency to release the Grant Hill 5 shoe.

Fila was not alone in posting poor sales for basketball shoes. The Athletic Footwear Association reported that basketball shoes accounted for only 20.2 percent of total athletic-shoe sales in 1997, compared to 28 percent in 1998. Other styles, such as running shoes, were on the rise, perhaps in a backlash response to bulky basketball shoes. Even with rising sales in certain categories, however, the entire athletic-footwear industry—including Nike—suffered that year. Consumers seemed to be moving away from big brands and toward smaller, more individualistic labels. Many companies were reevaluating their marketing strategies, particularly their use of endorsements by athletes. Jim Andrews, editor of IEG Endorsement Insider, a newsletter that tracked endorsements, said he thought that shoe companies had "oversaturated the market. So many players had signature footwear, it was no longer unique." Although Grant Hill's endorsement had undeniably helped put Fila on the map, even Howe Burch acknowledged that "kids just aren't as inspired by athletes because a) there are too many of them and b) because of their behavior. It's contributed to the overall cynicism and distrust of sports personalities." Reebok was a visible example of a company that chose not to renew its contract with its star athlete, basketball player Shaquille O'Neal.

Sporting Goods Business reported that Fila was shifting its focus more toward performance sports. "We put the needs of the street ahead of the performance needs of the athletes," said John Eberle, vice president of communications at Fila. "We'll return to making innovative products." Sources indicated to Advertising Age that the next brand push, released in 1999 by newly hired ad agency Leo Burnett, would position Fila around performance and technology and might also leverage the company's Italian heritage. The first ads promoted the newest Grant Hill shoe, the Grant Hill 5, and they were followed by additional work to promote the Fila brand. And while Fila was committed to its contract with Hill through 2004, ankle injuries had the basketball star sidelined for much of the 2000–01 season. Frank Fudo, a partner at the sports-marketing firm 16W Marketing, told ESPN that Hill excelled on the basketball court, "but him not playing doesn't help Fila too much."

In 2000 Fila began its first consolidated global campaign with BDDP/TBWA of Paris and Merkley Newman Harty of New York serving as the creatives. The new tagline that enhanced the various ad images, "Sport Life Fila," was designed to send the message that there was more to life than sports. Television spots featured Hill, Chicago Cubs star Sammy Sosa, and U.S. women's soccer team captain Carla Overbeck. The new campaign portrayed the athletes actively participating in their specific sports but also showed their human side outside of the sports arena.

FURTHER READING

"Fila Close-Outs Wreck Quarter." Footwear News, July 20, 1998.

"Fila Grant Hill 5 Advertising Campaign Links to Proprietary Website." PR Newswire, November 12, 1998.

"Fila Tries to Put Spring Back in Its Step." Chicago Tribune, August 17, 1997.

Fisher, Eric. "Fila Hopes Restructuring Can Put a Bounce Back in Step." Washington (DC) Times, November 23, 1998.

Gorant, Jim. "Slam-Dunking Hoop Shoes." Popular Mechanics, December 1, 1997.

"International News." Advertising Age, April 10, 2000.

Jensen, Jeff. "Fila Names Burnett to $20 Mil Account: New Shoe Intro First Task for Former Reebok Agency." Advertising Age, July 6, 1998.

"Retailers See Green in Fila's New $80M Grant Hill Deal." Footwear News, September 29, 1997.

Tedeschi, Mark. "Fila Plans '98 Retreat." Sporting Goods Business, February 25, 1998.

Walpert, Bryan. "Fila Gains Foothold in Athletic Shoe Market." Washington Post, April 7, 1997.

Kim Kazemi
Rayna Bailey

Ford Motor Company

1 American Road
Dearborn, Michigan 48126
USA
Telephone: (800) 392-3673
Web site: www.ford.com

■■■

DRIVING AMERICAN INNOVATION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Ford Motor Company, based in Dearborn, Michigan, entered 2005 in a difficult position. The automaker had sold only 3.15 million vehicles in the previous year, a million units less than what it had sold annually at the beginning of the decade. The company had been hemorrhaging market share as well, dropping to 18.6 percent in 2004 after spending much of the 1990s with more than 25 percent. Competition was especially fierce from Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., whose Japanese parent company, Toyota Motor Corporation, in 2004 displaced the Ford Motor Company as the world's second-largest automobile company in terms of sales for the first time (Ford's traditional rival, General Motors, remained number one).

To improve its overall image Ford mounted a brandwide advertising initiative called ''Driving American Innovation'' in 2005. The company wanted to bolster its reputation for innovation and address criticism from environmentally conscious consumers that the company's vehicles were not fuel efficient. To accomplish this Ford relied on two agencies owned by the communications-services conglomerate WPP Group—Penn Schoen & Berland and Ogilvy & Mather Detroit—to develop an advertising campaign. The effort included television, print, and Internet elements. Television spots and print ads featured the company's CEO, William ''Bill'' Ford, Jr. The TV commercials combined archival footage of previous Ford Motor Company successes, such as the famous Model T, with images of contemporary Ford vehicles. In the spots Bill Ford discussed how the company was building on its history of innovation and touted new products such as Ford's fuel-efficient hybrid vehicles. The campaign began in October 2005 and ran through the end of the year.

Because the campaign was designed to bolster the entire Ford brand's image, its success was difficult to gauge. According to marketing-information firm J.D. Power and Associates, in 2005 Ford drivers remained loyal to the brand at higher rates than was typical in the industry. Nevertheless, the company continued to lose market share.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Based in Dearborn, Michigan, Ford Motor Company was the third-largest automaker in the world in 2005 in terms of units sold. The company was founded in Michigan in 1903 by Henry Ford. In 1908 the company introduced the Model T. The car quickly became one of the most successful vehicles in U.S. automotive history, selling more than 15 million units from its inception through its cancellation in 1927. The Model T helped make Ford the world's largest automaker at that time. In fact, in 1918 nearly half of all cars owned in the United States were Model Ts. While Ford was eventually overtaken by General Motors as the world's largest automobile manufacturer, the company continued to prosper throughout the twentieth century.

William (Bill) Clay Ford, Jr., Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of Ford Motor Company. © JAMES LEYNSE/CORBIS.

By 2005 Ford was employing more than 320,000 people worldwide and selling vehicles under the Ford, Lincoln, Mercury, Land Rover, Mazda, Volvo, Jaguar, and Aston Martin nameplates. The company also faced substantial challenges. In January 2004 the Toyota Motor Corporation, based in Japan, passed Ford to become the second-largest automaker in the world. Toyota was able to overtake Ford in part because the latter's sales fell sharply in the first few years of the twenty-first century.

In 2004 Ford sold 3.15 million units worldwide, more than a million fewer units than it had sold in 2000. The company had maintained a market share of 25 percent through the mid-1990s, but by 2004 that was down to 18.6 percent. More worrisome was the fact that Ford had failed to turn a profit in 2004. As a result there were a number of shakeups at Ford in 2005, as the company introduced a slate of new top executives in September in the hopes of turning around its sales decline. In October 2005, just before the "Driving American Innovation" campaign began, the company reported a quarterly loss of $284 million.

Because Ford sold a number of large vehicles, such as the Explorer sport-utility vehicle (SUV), that got few miles to the gallon, Ford's sales were especially sensitive to high gas prices. In 2005 gas prices rose to as high as $3 per gallon in the United States, in part as a result of market pressures caused by war in the oil-rich nation of Iraq. One way to reduce demand for gasoline was to offer hybrid vehicles. A hybrid vehicle combined two energy sources for propulsion: an internal combustion engine and an electric motor. The electric components reduced the need for gasoline, allowing the car to go further on less gas. In 2005 Ford produced about 24,000 hybrid vehicles. At the time the only Ford hybrid available was the Ford Escape Hybrid SUV, introduced earlier that year.

TARGET MARKET

Ford was interested in promoting the entire brand, not just one or two vehicle lines. This was an unusual move in the industry; most automotive campaigns tended to spotlight a particular vehicle or group of vehicles. Hence the new campaign would have to be accessible to a notably wide audience (essentially, any potential car buyer). The purpose of the campaign was to improve Ford's overall corporate image. The automaker wanted to project an image as an innovative company that was at the cutting edge in designing safer, more environmentally friendly vehicles. In addition, any Ford campaign would have to

FORD'S STAR EXECUTIVE

William Clay "Bill" Ford, Jr., was born in Detroit, Michigan, in 1957. He was the great-grandson of Henry Ford, the founder of Ford Motor Company. His father, William Clay Ford, Sr., also worked at Ford as chairman of the company's finance committee. After graduating from Princeton University in 1979, Bill Ford joined Ford Motor Company, working as a product-planning analyst. In 1987 he became managing director of Ford Switzerland, a Ford affiliate based in Europe, before being elevated to the company's board of directors the following year. He became chairman of that board on January 1, 1999, and was named CEO on October 21, 2001.

A professed environmentalist, Bill Ford promised to make the Ford Motor Company a "greener" automaker, speaking out about global warming and air pollution. Upon becoming CEO he directed the company to publish its first report outlining the environmental impact of its vehicles and operations. In addition, he pledged in 2001 to improve fuel efficiency by 25 percent by 2005. He withdrew that goal in 2003, however, saying that market conditions made it untenable. This attracted heavy criticism from environmental groups such as the Sierra Club, which accused him of going back on his word.

In addition to his work at the Ford Motor Company, Bill Ford was a trustee at Princeton. He also served as the vice chairman of the Detroit Lions, a National Football League franchise. His father, William, was the company's president and owner, having purchased the club in 1964.

emphasize performance, because according to internal data, 52 percent of Ford drivers were also racing fans.

Ford was also interested in reaching out to environmentally conscious consumers. Although Bill Ford made environmental innovation a focus of his tenure as CEO, the company drew the ire of many environmental groups. Various organizations, including the Sierra Club, the Bluewater Network, and the Rainforest Action Network, staged protests against the automaker.

COMPETITION

The two automakers that Ford traditionally competed against were General Motors and the Chrysler Group, the U.S. affiliate of Daimler Chrysler. Commonly referred to as the "Big Three," these three major American automakers had dominated the industry for most of the twentieth century. General Motors was the largest automaker in the world, and its Chevrolet brand was the best-selling brand in the United States. Chevrolet's success stretched back for decades: 1 out of every 10 cars in the United States was a Chevrolet in 1964. By 2004 Chevrolet's TrailBlazer sport-utility vehicle was making inroads against the Ford Explorer, the most popular vehicle in the segment. The TrailBlazer moved 283, 384 units in 2004, versus 339, 333 units sold by the Ford Explorer.

By the late twentieth century, however, the U.S. automotive market had changed. Toyota Motor Sales had made substantial gains in the U.S. market. In 2004 it sold 2,060,049 units in the United States alone. Sales were buoyed by vehicles such as the Toyota Camry, a midsize sedan that was the best-selling car in the United States in seven out of eight years between 1997 and 2004 (1997–2000 and 2002–04). Toyota's sales gains were helped by the automaker's reputation for innovation, safety, and quality.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Ford decided to bolster its reputation with a brandwide campaign. Two different agencies, Penn Schoen & Berland and Ogilvy & Mather of Detroit, worked in concert to create this major initiative. Both were part of the WPP Group, a media and communications services holding company. The theme of the campaign was "Driving American Innovation," a title that was intended to reflect both Ford's history of innovation and its stated commitment to developing new technologies, particularly in regard to safety and fuel efficiency. The campaign celebrated the company's enduring "spirit" of innovation. Its centerpieces were two television commercials, the 60-second "Innovation" and the 30-second "Compass." Eventually another 30-second spot, "Rebirth," also appeared, following a similar format.

All three spots combined archival footage from the automaker's history with scenes of the company's CEO, Bill Ford, discussing the Ford brand and its history. Ford, a descendent of the automaker's founder, had been with the company since 1979 and had taken over as CEO in 2001. He had previously starred in a 2002 television campaign. In the commercial titled "Innovation" Ford discussed how important innovation had always been to the Ford Motor Company, calling it "the compass that guides this company moving forward." The spot further illustrated the company's innovation by highlighting famed early Ford vehicles, such as the Model T. The Ford GT, which the company billed as a "supercar," was also shown. The vehicle, which had first appeared in 2003, was an expensive (costing in excess on $150,000) sports car that featured a racing-style design.

Ford, a self-described environmentalist, also discussed the company's efforts to increase the production of hybrid vehicles, which would help reduce the release of greenhouse gasses into the environment by using less gasoline to power their engines. "Innovation" helped underscore this by featuring the Ford Escape Hybrid, a sport-utility vehicle (SUV) with a hybrid engine. The spots were broadcast during hit television programs with wide audiences. These included Oprah Winfrey's syndicated talk show, ABC's prime-time adventure drama Lost, the ABC nighttime soap opera Desperate Housewives, CBS's immensely popular police drama CSI, and televised games of the National Football League.

The campaign also included print and radio components. Some print ads featured blueprint-style images of new Ford vehicles and touted the company's current innovations. One two-page spread that appeared in major dailies, including the Wall Street Journal, consisted of a photograph of Bill Ford along with text from a speech on innovation that was attributed to him.

OUTCOME

In September 2005 the Ford Motor Company announced plans to boost the production of hybrid vehicles to about 250,000 units per year by 2010. The Ford Escape Hybrid garnered the North American Truck of the Year award at the 2005 North American International Auto Show. That year Ford was especially successful with its midsize sedan the Fusion; that vehicle managed to sell more than 23,000 units during the period from its October 2005 introduction to the end of the year. This did not, however, mollify the company's detractors in the environmental movement. In November the Rainforest Action Network staged demonstrations at 12 different Ford dealerships in the Dearborn area in protest of the poor gas mileage of vehicles such as the popular Ford Explorer SUV.

The campaign also appeared to bolster Ford's customer loyalty. According to J.D. Power and Associates, a marketing-information firm, a 51 percent majority of all Ford customers who traded in vehicles in 2005 did so to get another Ford. This was about two percentage points higher than the industry average. The company's market share continued to slip, however, hitting 17.4 percent for the year.

FURTHER READING

Adubato, Steve. "Message, Messenger Must Quickly Click." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, February 12, 2006.

Banham, Russ. The Ford Century: Ford Motor Company and the Innovations that Shaped the World. New York: Artisan, 2002.

Carty, Sharon Silke. "Bill Ford Carries On Family Name with Grace." USA Today, February 27, 2005.

Elliott, Dorinda. "Can This Man Save the American Auto Industry?" Time, January 30, 2006.

Greenberg, Karl. "Ford Chairman Is Ready for His Close-Up." Adweek, October 20, 2005.

Krebs, Michelle. "In Detroit, the Dogs Have Their Day." New York Times, January 9, 2005.

Maynard, Micheline. "A Comeback for the Car Species." New York Times, January 5, 2006.

O'Donnell, Jayne. "Ford Touts Volvo Safety Link in Ads but Not Trials." USA Today, January 16, 2006.

Taylor, Alex, III. "Bill Ford: Market Share Bleed Stops Now." Fortune, January 8, 2006.

Wilson, Kevin. "The Way For'd: Dearborn Sets Sail on a New Tack." AutoWeek, January 23, 2006.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

LIFE IN DRIVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In October 2005, Ford Motor Company introduced the new Ford Fusion. Inspired by the company's futuristic Ford 427 concept car, the Fusion was a four-door sedan aimed at young, upwardly mobile drivers. It replaced the discontinued Taurus model. The Fusion was launched into a competitive segment that featured established vehicles such as the Nissan Altima, the Honda Accord, and the best-selling car in the U.S. market, the Toyota Camry. Ford hoped that the Fusion's unique visual design, which included a distinctive three-bar front grille, would help the vehicle stand out.

The J. Walter Thompson agency, also based in Detroit, was responsible for developing a launch campaign for the Fusion. The resulting "Life in Drive" campaign kicked off in October 2005 and featured a mix of traditional and new-media advertising. Its centerpiece was a series of television commercials. There were several 15-second spots, along with two 30-second spots. The spots often ran back-to-back, with a 15-second commercial leading into one of the two longer spots. The 15-second spots all featured a contrast between "life"—illustrated by images of people performing dull, frustrating tasks, such as trying to open a CD case—and "Life in Drive," where the viewer saw the Fusion on a drive through a hip cityscape depicted via quick cuts. The campaign also featured an innovative online component, which included a ''Photo Fusion'' feature on the Ford website. Consumers could post pictures of themselves along with brief descriptions of what the photos contained. Posters were then given an opportunity to view other consumers' pictures based on shared keywords in their descriptions. This interactive program was meant to attract young consumers who were comfortable with seeking information online.

The campaign met with solid success. Ford sold more than 23,000 units between the Fusion's October 2005 debut and the end of the calendar year, with sales climbing every month. The vehicle sold so well that dealers reported having trouble keeping the new Fusion in stock, forcing Ford to increase production of the vehicle.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Ford Motor Company was founded by Henry Ford on June 16, 1903. Based in Detroit, Michigan, the company was responsible for one of the most important innovations in automobile manufacturing, the assembly line. This 1913 innovation helped make Ford the second-largest automaker in the world (after General Motors) for much of the twentieth century. By the beginning of the twenty-first century the Ford Motor Company was selling vehicles under eight different brands: Ford, Lincoln, Mercury, Land Rover, Mazda, Volvo, Jaguar, and Aston Martin.

Ford decided to create a new four-door family sedan to replace the Taurus, an older model that consumers no longer found exciting. After considering other names, the company called the new vehicle the Ford Fusion. The design of the vehicle was inspired in part by the Ford 427, a concept vehicle that had been met with general acclaim at a number of auto shows. The Fusion featured a spacious interior, a stiff chassis for better handling, and a distinctive exterior design. The car was meant to look sleek and speedy, in contrast to other, more staid midsize sedans, such as the Taurus. Most notable was the vehicle's three-bar front grille and its unique triangular taillights.

Ford also created a racing version of the Fusion, which competed in National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR) events. In fact, Ford's racing division provided some input on the car's design. Internal data showed that Ford's market share was 6 percent higher among NASCAR fans than it was nationally. The Fusion would debut at the Ford Championship weekend at the Homestead-Miami Speedway, which featured the final race of the 2005 NASCAR Busch series. The event was planned for November 17 and 18, 2005.

In October 2005 Ford introduced the Fusion for model year 2006, with a base price of $17,795. Ford was already in the midst of a strong year, with sales up 12 percent from 2004 through September. It hoped to be able to establish the Fusion as a vehicle that could sell up to 160,000 units annually.

TARGET MARKET

The Fusion was designed to appeal to consumers between the ages of 25 and 35. These consumers were identified by the company as being strongly interested in music and technology. Ford wanted to connect with middle-income consumers who were both established in their careers and upwardly mobile. While some of these buyers gravitated toward sportier cars, such as the Ford Mustang, or toward large SUVs, internal data at the automaker led Ford to believe that drivers in this age group were becoming more interested in midsize sedans. In effect, the Fusion would serve as the next step for the young drivers who had previously driven smaller cars such as the Ford Focus. As a family sedan the Fusion was especially geared toward young families, people with younger children, or those considering starting a family soon.

COMPETITION

The Fusion competed most directly with other midsize vehicles. These included imports such as the Honda Accord, the Nissan Altima, and the Volkswagen Jetta and domestic models such as GM's Chevrolet Malibu. The giant of the midsize field, however, was the Toyota Camry. First introduced in 1980, the Camry had been the biggest-selling car in the United States in seven out of the eight years between 1997 and 2004. In 2004 it sold an impressive 426,990 units. It usually sold for between $19,000 and $25,000. The Camry was not a flashy car; its popularity rested primarily on its reputation for quality. It was a safe, durable vehicle and held its resale value well.

Ford hoped that by pricing the Fusion between $17,995 and $21,000, it would distinguish itself from its competitors. Prices for the other major midsize cars on the market began around $18,400 and could climb as high as $25,000 for so-called luxury versions of the vehicles. Ford believed that its aggressive pricing might help offset the fact that many established brands had built-in customer bases.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Ford designated the Detroit-based ad agency J. Walter Thompson with developing a launch strategy for the new Fusion. The resulting campaign, released in October 2005, was named ''Life in Drive,'' and it mixed

FUSION FLASH CONCERTS

A key part of the Ford Motor Company's introduction of the Ford Fusion in 2005 was its sponsorship of a series of free concerts in the months leading up to the vehicle's launch. The series was a joint effort between Ford and Sony Pictures Digital, a division of the Sony Corporation of America. After registering on a special Ford Fusion website, consumers were notified about the concerts via text message. These concerts were inspired by ''flash mobs,'' outdoor gatherings created on the spur of the moment by using the text-messaging features of cell phones and other mobile communication devices. Often organizers of flash mobs would alert a small number of people about a gathering, and then word would spread organically as those people contacted others.

The first Fusion Flash Concert was held in July 2005 in New York City. It featured the alternative hip-hop act the Roots. Later concerts presented a mix of rock acts, including Collective Soul, the Wallflowers, Yellowcard, Pete Yorn, and Staind, as well as hip-hop performers Jermaine Dupri, Fat Joe, and Frankie J. Each band appeared at their own individual concerts. Registered consumers were notified about each performance at the last minute, meaning that the entire event would come together in a ''flash.'' Each concert took place in a different urban area, including Dallas, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and Chicago. The most successful of the Flash concerts was the hard-rock band Staind's August 9 appearance in Boston, which drew an audience of 12,000 people.

traditional television and print advertising with online efforts and live events. Print ads appeared in USA Today and in local newspapers. The campaign was preceded by a series of Fusion Flash Concerts, featuring bands such as alternative hip-hop stars the Roots, popular rapper Fat Joe, and rock bands Staind and Collective Soul. The Staind event was a particular success, drawing 12,000 people to a free concert in Boston. Organizers had only expected a showing of about 500.

The ''Life in Drive'' campaign began in earnest with a series of 15-second teaser spots directed by Grammy-winning director Joseph Kahn, who had previously directed music videos for rock band U2 and rapper Eminem, among others. One commercial, ''Trash Day,'' began with a half-dressed man taking out the garbage. He was too late and missed the garbage truck, and a voice-over declared, ''This is life.'' Suddenly, rock music blared, and a series of quick cuts showed a Fusion driving around a city. The voice-over returned to say, ''This is life in drive.'' Another 15-second spot, ''Doggie,'' showed a young woman cleaning up after her dog, leading to the same voice-over and quick cuts. The spot titled ''CD'' featured the same setup, only this time it began with someone having difficulty opening a CD case. Each commercial closed with the text tagline ''Life in D,'' which then gave way to the Ford Fusion logo. The ''D'' resembled the ''D'' (for ''drive'') that appeared on the Fusion's gearshift.

Kahn also directed two 30-second spots for the campaign. These premiered on October 31, 2005. The most important, ''Particle,'' drew attention through its prominent use of the Apple iPod as a prop. A portable music player known for its distinctive white color and sleek design, the iPod was first introduced in 2001 and quickly became the most popular digital-music player on the market. It was particularly popular among drivers in the Fusion's target demographic. Some critics felt that by trying to associate itself with a trendy new product, Ford risked allowing the Fusion to look stale and uncool by comparison. One critic noted that the Fusion did not even have an adapter that would allow the iPod to play in the vehicle.

''Particle'' began with a man on a subway listening to the device. As he listened, particles that looked like bubbles began to rise out of the iPod. These bubbles then drifted up from the subway car and onto a dance floor, where they circled a young woman. The bubbles continued to circulate, moving past rollerbladers and a flat-screen television. Finally they reached a traffic intersection, where they ''fused'' together to become a Ford Fusion vehicle. The other 30-second spot, ''Ignition,'' featured a similar theme. This time the Fusion itself generated the energy, which in turn revitalized a worn-out urban neighborhood. Both commercials ended with a voice-over declaring, ''a car shouldn't just use energy, it should create it,'' before concluding that the Fusion represented ''more innovation from Ford.'' Often Ford packaged one of the 15-second spots back-to-back with one of the longer commercials, creating a 45-second advertising block.

The campaign quickly branched out into new media. In November Ford began an effort at three major Web portals: Yahoo!, AOL, and MSN. The Fusion was represented via prominent ads and banners on all three sites. Ford also used an innovative ''Photo Fusion'' feature on its own website. The feature allowed customers to post personal pictures on the site. When they did so, consumers were also asked to describe their photos. Based on those descriptions, the Photo Fusion feature would then show other consumers' pictures to the poster, based on similar keywords in both descriptions. This interactive system was meant to appeal to young consumers who were more interested in actively navigating the Web than in watching TV commercials. The company also posted selected "Life in Drive" television spots on the company's website.

OUTCOME

The Fusion met with solid success. After its October 2005 introduction the vehicle saw sales increase every month. By November Ford had already sold 15,481 units (a number that included precampaign sales). In December the Fusion sold 7,568 units, its best monthly figures for 2005. According to internal studies, customers rated the Fusion's unique design as the number one reason for purchasing the vehicle. The car managed this without the heavy incentives, such as cash rebates, that many automakers used to help sell new vehicles. The vehicle proved so popular that Ford dealers had a difficult time keeping it in stock. As 2006 began, Ford ramped up production to meet the ever-growing demand. In an effort to expand its appeal, the company also announced that it would develop a hybrid version of the Fusion for model year 2008.

FURTHER READING

Banham, Russ. The Ford Century: Ford Motor Company and the Innovations that Shaped the World. New York: Artisan, 2002.

Bowens, Greg. "Ford Looks beyond Traditional Audience at It Tilts New Fusion Campaign toward Hip Youth." Automotive News, December 1, 2005.

Chura, Hillary. "Throwing All Cultures into the Marketing Pot." New York Times, February 21, 2006.

Cobb, James G. "Diamonds Out of the Distress of 2005." New York Times, January 1, 2006.

Krebs, Michelle. "In Detroit, the Dogs Have Their Day." New York Times, January 9, 2005.

Maynard, Micheline. "A Comeback for the Car Species." New York Times, January 5, 2006.

Rashbaum, Alyssa. "Fat Joe, Roots, Jermaine Dupri Coming Soon to a Parking Lot Near You." Vibe.com, July 11, 2005. Available from <http://www.vibe.com/news/news_headlines/2005/07/fatjoe_flashconcerts/>

Stevenson, Seth. "Apple Jacking: Car Ads that Look Like iPod Ads." Slate, January 30, 2006. Available from <http://www.slate.com/id/2135009/?nav=navoa>

Wilson, Amy. "Ford Dealers Can't Get Enough Fusions." Automotive News, December 16, 2005.

Wilson, Kevin. "The Way For'd: Dearborn Sets Sail on a New Tack." AutoWeek, January 23, 2006.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

STORYTELLING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For 15 years Ford Motor Company, the number two automaker among Detroit's big three, had advertised its vehicles with the slogan "Have you driven a Ford lately?" In 1998 the company launched a new campaign with the tag line "Ford Cars: Built to Last." The campaign, developed by advertising agency J. Walter Thompson, used a storytelling approach and ran in print and broadcast media as well as on the Internet. It was based on the notion that people enjoyed hearing other people's stories.

The "Storytelling" campaign centered around everyday people who owned Ford vehicles, and the ads used humor and emotion to reach consumers. As its spokesperson Ford chose John Corbett, best known as the philosophical disc jockey on the television series Northern Exposure, a man with a pleasant, relatively low-key demeanor that fit well with the campaign. His role in the commercials closely resembled his work from the hit show, in which he had been something of a narrator. Corbett and country superstar Alan Jackson, another Ford spokesman, appeared together in an ad for National Ford Truck Season beginning in October 1998, and they were also featured on the company's website.

The company launched the campaign during the Winter Olympics in February 1998 with six television spots. The campaign included ads for the Mustang, Taurus, Escort ZX2, and pickup truck models. Six months later, Ford decided to expand the campaign to all of its 1999 vehicles.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Ford Motor Company, founded in 1903, has experienced its share of highs and lows. Its founder, Henry Ford, was described by Ed Crews in an August 11, 1998, article in the Richmond (Virginia) Times-Dispatch as "a mythic figure in American business history. He comes down to us as a contradictory mix of inspired tinkerer, backyard mechanic, captain of industry, eccentric and capitalist oppressor. Sometimes it is impossible to see where the myth ends and the man begins.''

Actor John Corbett. © LYNN GOLDSMITH/CORBIS.

In 1908 Ford introduced the popular Model T. Also known as the ''Tin Lizzie,'' it was said to be the ''universal car,'' built to be rugged, reliable, and easy to operate. When Ford incorporated the assembly line into his company's production process, he revolutionized not only the auto industry but also all industries. Increased efficiencies allowed Ford to keep prices down and expand into overseas markets. By 1915 Ford had produced its millionth car. In 1916 Ford made half of all the American cars built and accounted for 40 percent of the world's auto production.

But success may have blinded Henry Ford to the need for change. By the 1920s competing automakers were producing models with more style, comfort, and power than the Tin Lizzie. Ford dragged his feet on producing a new model, and the company continued to make the Model T into the late 1920s. Only when it became absolutely clear that the car would not sell at any price did Ford throw in the towel. He shut down production for six months in order to retool the plants for a new model. The successor Model A enjoyed good sales, but by 1932 General Motors (GM) had taken the number one spot from Ford, and GM held it for decades.

Over the years Ford introduced many successful models, including the Thunderbird, Escort, Taurus, and, perhaps most notably, Mustang. It also produced the Edsel, a spectacular flop, and from time to time the company suffered financial setbacks. Ford became known for its pickup trucks and sport utility vehicles, including the F-Series truck and the Explorer. Despite its successes, however, for the most part Ford remained an also-ran to number one General Motors. In addition, Ford and other U.S. automakers eventually had to contend with inroads made by foreign auto manufacturers, primarily the Japanese.

TARGET MARKET

The ''Storytelling'' campaign was developed with both male and female consumers in mind. For instance, ''Hands,'' a commercial for the F-Series truck, showed close-ups of the hands of a hardworking but sensitive mechanic named Joe. Shots of Joe's hands working with a blowtorch and gripping the wheel of his Ford truck were interspersed with shots of him holding a small child. Jan Klug, Ford Division's marketing communications manager, said, ''The 'Hands' story is the highest rated F-Series spot we have tested among men and women. It really touched a chord with consumers, who could relate to a guy and his truck balancing work and family.''

Ford took care to ensure that the campaign would appeal to women even if it did not target them exclusively. Three of the six television spots used to launch the campaign featured women. One spot informed viewers of Ford's support for Race for the Cure, a national breast cancer charity. In addition, because ''Built Ford Tough,'' the popular tag line used for trucks, tested poorly with women, Ford dropped the idea of also using it for its car ads. Instead, the tag line ''Built to Last'' tag was created for Ford cars.

Seven months after the campaign launch, Adweek reported that Ford intended to increase its spending on ads that targeted Hispanic and African American consumers and, for the first time, to make some of the advertising targeting African Americans part of the general market pool. Uniworld, New York, was hired to handle the African-American marketing, while Zubi Advertising of Miami handled the Hispanic advertising.

COMPETITION

Ford, General Motors, and Chrysler (which in November 1998 merged with Daimler-Benz AG to become DaimlerChrysler AG) made up Detroit's big three automakers. For years GM had enjoyed the number one spot in U.S. auto manufacturing, followed by number two Ford and number three Chrysler. In November 1997, however, Ward's Auto World reported that all three were losing market share in passenger cars to light trucks and sport utility vehicles. At the same time there was increasing pressure on the Detroit automakers to keep prices down. GM offered various financial incentives, including cut-rate financing programs and cash rebates on 1998 cars and light trucks. Ford and Chrysler offered similar incentives as well. The Wall Street Journal reported in November 1997 that, despite healthy sales and a robust economy, U.S.-based automakers were also

JOHN CORBETT: FROM STEELWORKER TO SPOKESPERSON

John Corbett, an ex-steelworker from West Virginia who went into acting after being injured on his job, was probably best known for his role as small town disc jockey Chris Stevens in Northern Exposure. Corbett also served a shorter stint on the Fox sci-fi series The Visitor, in which he played a passenger on an alien spaceship that crash-landed in Utah.

The Ford campaign was not Corbett's first experience as an auto spokesperson. During his time on Northern Exposure, Corbett also provided the voice-over for Isuzu Trooper commercials. A spokesman for the Isuzu advertising agency said that Corbett was chosen because "we wanted someone who was observant, who had a compassionate voice that would present a situation and then make it relevant." Perhaps Ford observed those same qualities in Corbett when it signed him on as its storyteller.

facing increased price pressures from Japanese imports as a result of the weak yen and reduced production costs.

During 1998 General Motors reportedly lost market share, and in August 1998 the Wall Street Journal noted that "GM's total sales and market share fell below those of No. 2 automaker Ford Motor Company for the first time since a national strike against GM in 1970." Ford's market share for April 1999 was reported to have dropped by 0.9 percent from that of the previous three months, however.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The launch of a new advertising campaign in February 1998 was a major event for the company. According to Art Spinella, the automotive director for CNW Marketing Research, "Ford tends to hand on to its ad campaigns for a long time." The new campaign featured a new tag line. The slogan that Ford had used for 15 years—"Have you driven a Ford lately?"—was replaced with "Ford Cars: Built to Last." The tag line "Built Ford Tough" continued to be used in truck advertising.

The television ads told stories of everyday people with humor and emotion in order to strike a chord with consumers. In choosing a spokesperson, Ford looked for someone who was not such a megastar that he or she would overshadow the product. Corbett, known from Northern Exposure, tested well. In fact, his role in the commercials closely resembled his role in the television series, in which he served as something of a narrator.

In a written statement issued several months after the campaign had started, Ford described its approach as "down-to-earth" and "a real change in Ford's approach to advertising." According to Ford's Klug, "When we launched the campaign in 1998, we discovered that everyone has a favorite story about a car or truck. This campaign is all about communicating on an emotional level—not just price and features." According to Ford, the spots dealt with "the human spectrum of experience, from the humorous to very emotional themes." Klug noted that the campaign "is all about building mind-changing communication, and to do that we need to make an emotional connection with our customers. One of the benefits of the campaign is the ability to tell stories that capture the personality of individual vehicles, but in a consistent, unified way that conveys the values that stand behind the Ford name."

Examples included an ad in which two friends—Charlie and Ray—made a wager over the capabilities of the F-Series truck. Charlie bet that Ray's truck would not be able to tow an 8,000-ton ship, and, of course, he lost. Another example was an Escort ad in which two women in a ZX2 tried to elude a strange van that was chasing them. When the van passed them, they realized that it was Publishers Clearing House trying to give them a prize.

Ford reportedly earmarked $80 million for the campaign, double the amount spent the year before. Six 30-second television spots were introduced during the coverage of the Winter Olympics, with the models advertised including the Mustang, Taurus, Escort ZX2, and F-Series pickup truck. One of the ads focused on Ford history, and another emphasized Ford's commitment toward Race for the Cure.

OUTCOME

After six months of running the ads, Ford decided to expand the campaign to all of its vehicles—cars and trucks—with the release of the 1999 models. Corbett was enlisted to appear in 13 new commercials, which included the "Hands" spot and another called "Charlie's Parents," in which two overprotective parents took comfort in knowing that a Taurus was helping keep their son Charlie from harm. Another humorous spot showed two women talking about their boyfriends' Mustangs, only to realize that they might be talking about the same man. In addition to the 13 new spots, several old ones were carried over from the 1998 campaign.

Ford also decided to change its 1999 marketing strategy to focus on its primary brands—Ford, Lincoln,

FORD TRUCK ADS COME ON STRONG

For its 1999 advertising efforts Ford decided to do more than just tell nice stories about its trucks. In fact, in a departure from precedent the company decided to come on stronger. In addition to referring to competitors by name, Ford's truck advertising took on a somewhat confrontation tone. Paul Morel, Ford Division's truck group brand manager, called the ads "very hard-hitting and confident for a very tough and competitive market." In one ad a factory foreman announced to the plant that a Ford F-Series truck in the parking lot had its lights on, and he watched in dismay as all of the workers cleared out to check on their trucks. One print ad showed a Ford F-Series truck driving through the rain with the text "You're not going to find a better truck anywhere. Not even if you look under a rock." The reference was reportedly to advertising for the General Motors C/K Series truck in which Bob Seger sang "Like a Rock."

"Ford hasn't been doing in-your-face advertising with their competitors before. So I think the strategy they're taking with their truck represents forward thinking," said Tanya Gazdik, the Detroit bureau chief for Adweek.

Mercury, Jaguar, and Mazda—rather than individual models. Jim Schroer, Ford's executive director of marketing strategy and brand management, believed that past marketing efforts had tended to promote specific nameplates, such as Taurus and Explorer, too heavily and did not connect with or reinforce the primary brand. "The change is to make sure each nameplate strengthens the primary brand it is under," he said.

Spinella of CNW Marketing Research predicted, "This new campaign looks like it has some legs under it and Ford should be able to use it for another 10 to 15 years." Ford's Klug thought that the storytelling approach was effective. "Storytelling is part of the human DNA," she said. "People can really relate to it. You can tell stories that revolve around the personalities of our products."

FURTHER READING

Berkowitz, Harry. "TV Advertisers Go for the Gold." Newsday, February 5, 1998, p. A53.

"Ford Ads to Bolster Truck Lead." Calgary Sun, October 2, 1998, p. A18.

"Ford Division Launches New Internet Website." PR Newswire, October 13, 1998.

"Ford Expands 'Storytelling' Advertising Campaign for 1999 Model Year." Ford Division Public Affairs, September 28, 1998.

"Ford Readies '99 Effort." Adweek (Midwest Edition), September 28, 1998, p. 8.

Gazdik, Tanya. "Ford Tries New Tagline, Approach." Adweek (Southeast Edition), February 9, 1998, p. 41.

Halliday, Jean. "Ford Division Expands Storytelling Ads For '99." Automotive News, August 24, 1998, p. 49.

———. "Ford Switches Directions to Push Primary Brands." Advertising Age, November 16, 1998, p. 6.

Ramirez, Charles E. "Ford Gets New Ad Theme." Detroit News, February 5, 1998, p. B1.

Teegardin, Carol. "Ford Ad Campaign Takes On Competition." Detroit Free Press, October 3, 1998.

Winter, Drew. "Feisty Ford." Ward's Auto World, May 1996, p. 63.

Debbi Mack

Fortune Brands, Inc.

300 Tower Parkway
Lincolnshire, Illinois 60069-3640
USA
Telephone: (847) 484-4400
Fax: (847) 478-0073
Web site: www.fortunebrands.com

■■■

SIGN BOY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

FootJoy, owned by Fortune Brands, Inc., sold more golf shoes during the 1990s than any other company by keeping their innovative shoes on the feet of the world's best golfers. Two events in 1996, however, caused the company, which also made socks and gloves, to restrategize its advertising. Not only did Nike, Inc., announce it would begin designing golf shoes, but it agreed to pay champion golfer Tiger Woods $8 million a year to endorse them. Fearful that Nike would dominate the burgeoning younger market of golfers, FootJoy released its quirky "Sign Boy" campaign to attract young players.

In 1998 FootJoy awarded its estimated $5 to $7 million advertising budget to ad agency Arnold Worldwide Partners. Print ads and television spots appeared in January 1999 starring comedian Matt Griesser, who played the campaign's character titled "Sign Boy," a moniker for the standard-bearer or person carrying the cumbersome scoreboard from hole to hole during golf tournaments. In the first eight commercials Sign Boy pestered golfers, sometimes mid-swing, with his overzealous blathering and obsession over FootJoy shoes. With a background in improvisational comedy, Griesser ad-libbed every commercial, which appeared on channels such as ESPN, NBC, and ABC. In one spot Sign Boy dove into a water hazard while wearing nothing but FootJoy shoes. The golfers Phil Mickelson and David Toms looked on in horror. Another spot showed Sign Boy slinking into a locker room just to sniff the FootJoy shoes of professional golfers. Another featured him nabbing Ernie Els's toothbrush. With the exception of a yearlong hiatus in 2002, the "Sign Boy" campaign expanded to include Internet ads as well as on-site promotions where Griesser would actually heckle players during golf tournaments.

The campaign collected a Silver EFFIE Award in 2001 and helped increase FootJoy sales 10 percent in the market of people under age 30. Andy Jones, marketing vice president at FootJoy, told the Palm Beach Post, "Ultimately the judge of any advertising campaign is market-share growth. During the campaign we've experienced significant market-share growth in both golf shoes and golf gloves."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Fortune Brands, the corporation that owned alcohol brands such as Jim Beam and Knob Creek, purchased FootJoy in 1986. Running non-humorous advertising that usually featured golfers, FootJoy dominated the golf-shoe industry during the 1990s. It was only after Nike announced its upcoming golf shoe that FootJoy rethought its entire marketing strategy. Not only had Nike dominated the outside-athletic-shoe industry, but the titan was showing a growing interest in golf, first with its introduction of Nike golf apparel. Then it offered world-champion golfer Tiger Woods an $8 million endorsement in 1996. Woods, who was playing Masters Tournaments by the age of 19, appealed to the under-30-year-old age group. Soon afterward FootJoy senior product manager Tim Murphy told Adweek (eastern edition) that FootJoy had experienced an erosion in its market share among younger customers since Nike engaged Woods.

In 1998 FootJoy asked Arnold Worldwide to rebrand the company's shoes for a younger audience. Arnold Worldwide's senior vice president, Jamie Graham, worked on the project with Ron Harper, the agency's senior art director. Graham explained to Shoot, "We were in the right place at the right time, because Nike was coming along, doing some very cool stuff with Tiger Woods. FootJoy was worried about being perceived as old-fashioned, so they gave us more [freedom] than they might otherwise have done."

The Sign Boy character was first conceived by Harper, who recalled a friend raving about serving as a standard-bearer at a tournament. Harper and Graham began strategizing FootJoy's first humorous television commercial. For the casting call they titled their scripts after player nicknames such as "Philly Mick" for Phil Mickelson and "DL3" for Davis Love III. After screening 100 candidates Harper and Graham chose actor-comedian Matt Griesser, who not only picked up on the nickname references but also began lampooning different golfers during the cast selection. "He nailed David Duval's swing in the audition room. We couldn't get rid of him, in fact," Graham said to the Palm Beach Post.

SECOND CITY

Before his role as the blundering sign carrier in a FootJoy shoe campaign titled "Sign Boy," Matt Griesser performed improvisational comedy for the Los Angeles troupe of Second City. Second City was a Chicago-based entertainment program famous for launching the careers of, among others, comedians John Candy, Eugene Levy, and Martin Short.

TARGET MARKET

The "Sign Boy" campaign targeted golfers and golf enthusiasts under 30 years old. It also hoped to retain FootJoy's core golf customers while maintaining the brand's rank as the golf-shoe industry leader. To reach this younger demographic, the campaign used humor, a quality not typically found in golf commercials before 1999. "A lot of golf commercials in the past were just Lee Trevino telling people to use Top-Flite," Griesser told the Florida Times-Union. "FootJoy was trying to reach a younger audience and one way to do it is with humor." In a spot with British Open champion David Duval, Sign Boy began testing wind speed for the golfer and then rambled on about what club he should use. The spot ended with Sign Boy heaping praise upon Duval's choice of FootJoy shoes. Sign Boy also made appearances at tournaments. During Rhode Island Country Club's CVS Classic, Griesser told driving-distance record holder John Daly that he needed to lengthen his already lengthy backswing if he was serious about driving the golf ball.

Aware that its target market would grow tired of seeing the same three or four commercials played over and over, Arnold Worldwide filmed eight commercials total. Graham explained to Shoot, "People who watch golf watch it religiously, so the same people who watch golf this weekend will see all the golf advertising over and over again. They appreciate the fact that we give them more, rather than less, commercials. Sign Boy himself has a cult following on the tours. He makes appearances and goes to charity golf events."

COMPETITION

In 1998 Etonic Athletic Worldwide, one of America's leading makers of golf shoes, ran television and prints advertising that claimed their new plastic-cleated shoes caused less damage to fairway turf than FootJoy shoes. The print, created by ad agency Greenberg Seronick O'Leary & Partners of Boston, ran in Golf Digest, Golfweek, and Golf Magazine. FootJoy immediately sued Etonic, stating that FootJoy had been making spikeless, fairway-friendly shoes since 1959. FootJoy demanded Etonic stop the campaign and pay damages.

In August 1996, while donning a black Nike hat with the company's "swoosh" emblem, Tiger Woods won his third U.S. Amateur Championship. After the tournament he announced that he would begin endorsing Nike, which analysts estimated would earn Woods $8 million per year. At the Greater Milwaukee Open that took place the following weekend, Woods dressed in more Nike apparel, which included Nike golf shoes. Bob Wood, president of Nike Golf, said to Brandweek, "Our philosophy at Nike Golf, as well as at Nike, is to start with the best players, make product that works for them, and establish ourselves that way." Not only would Tiger Woods continue endorsing Nike shoes, but Nike also rolled out its own line of golf balls in 1999 and had introduced clubs by 2002. After Woods first announced the relationship with Nike, one retailer, Susan French, told the Portland Oregonian that she immediately sold

TIGER WOODS

In 1996 world-champion golfer Tiger Woods was featured in a Nike Golf television spot that exposed racist policies still lingering on a small group of American golf courses. In the spot, which aired during a Monday night NFL football game, Tiger stated, "There are still golf courses in the United States that I cannot play because of the color of my skin. I'm told I'm not ready for you. Are you ready for me?" The spot was followed by Nike Golf's tagline, "It's time to change."

out of her 3,000 Nike hats and ordered an additional 750 to keep up with demand. "They want the hat, they want a shirt, they want any sort of memento," she said. Nike continued using Woods's endorsements, each of which featured the tagline "It's time to change."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Sign Boy" television spots first appeared on January 8, 1999, during the Mercedes Championship on ESPN, and later rotated across network channels NBC, CBS, and ABC and on the cable channel USA Network. Initial commercials ended with the FootJoy taglines "The No. 1 shoe in golf" or "The No. 1 glove in golf." The first eight spots were also filmed unscripted. Professional golfers featured in the spots, such as Davis Love III, Justin Leonard, Phil Mickelson, David Duval, and Jesper Parnevik, were asked to react with Sign Boy as they would any tournament volunteer. Sign Boy, played by Griesser, pestered, distracted, and admired the golfers with overzealousness as they attempted to golf. "We use him in a specific relationship with all the pros, mashing on them and telling them what superb footwear they have," Graham explained to Shoot. "His particular obsession is that he knows every single style and brand of shoe inside out. We engage him in good-natured banter with the pro golfers."

The "Sign Boy" campaign took a hiatus in 2002 when FootJoy released its poorly received "Golf Gods" campaign, which featured animated golfers receiving superpowers from their FootJoy shoes. Graham told the Palm Beach Post, "[FootJoy] got hundreds of e-mails, hundreds and thousands of e-mails saying, 'Hey, where's Sign Boy? What have you people done? And by the way, we hate these Golf Gods.'" Andy Jones, FootJoy's vice president for marketing, said to Shoot, "I think the best thing we can say about it is that it was a mistake. . . .We pushed the envelope with Sign Boy and we were trying to push the envelope again." By 2003 the "Sign Boy" campaign had resumed with five new spots, including one that featured Incredible Technologies, Inc.'s video-golf game Golden Tee. By 2005 the campaign included Internet banner ads, and its budget had escalated from an estimated $5 million to $7 million.

As the campaign progressed Griesser increased his public appearances at tournaments. In 2005 Sign Boy stumbled into the audience at the CVS Charity Classic golf tournament. Craig Stadler, a well-built professional golfer with thick facial hair, sat beside his son and other golfers waiting for the father-son tournament to begin. According to the Providence Journal, the crowd exploded with laughter as Sign Boy pointed back and forth between both Stadlers and said, "Walrus. Little Walrus. Walrus. Little Walrus." Next he teased Jay and Bill Haas by repeating, "Big Haas. Little Haas. Big Haas. Little Haas."

Each year the campaign released more commercials than most industry competitors. "We shoot them at breakneck speed," Graham stated to Shoot. "I think the thing with humor is, the more you have—as long as it's funny—the better. You don't want to tell the same joke over and over again. So even though some of these spots don't air nearly as much as a purist would say they should, it satisfies us because it never gets boring."

OUTCOME

The "Sign Boy" campaign earned a Silver EFFIE Award in 2001, increased FootJoy sales 10 percent with the under-30 market, and stoked FootJoy's lead over the rest of the industry. The campaign also injected golf advertising with humor, something it had lacked before the campaign's 1999 release. In 2001 Griesser said to the Portland Oregonian, "Now you can see more humor in golf ads all the time. I like to think that the ads I've been in also have served to reveal more of the golfers' personalities." The campaign reaped praise from cable station the Golf Channel and from sports publications such as Golf Magazine, Sports Illustrated, Golf Plus, Golfweek, and Golf World.

During the campaign's first five months FootJoy sales increased 16 percent over the previous year-to-date figures. The campaign's lighthearted humor, according to some analysts, simultaneously appealed to older and younger consumers. Graham told Brandweek, "Only FootJoy can talk about tour dominance, which they do via these ads in a way that appeals to young players without putting off the older guy." Griesser's personality as Sign Boy far exceeded the creatives' expectations for the character, which originally called for "a doofy-looking guy who walks around in very long shorts." Arnold Worldwide originally gave the campaign a life expectancy of three years, and was pleased to be proven wrong when it exceeded five years.

FURTHER READING

Champagne, Christine. "J.J. Sedelmaier Goes Golfing with Gods." Shoot, January 25, 2002, p. 14.

Diaz, Ann-Christine. "Special Report: Top Production Companies." Advertising Age's Creativity, September, 1, 2005, p. 44.

Dolbow, Sandra. "FootJoy's 'Sign Boy' Goes inside Ropes." Brandweek, June 19, 2000, p. 17.

Duckworth, Ed. "Golf: The CVS Charity Classic." Providence (RI) Journal, July 11, 2000, p. D5.

Long, Rani. "Golf Shoes Fore Sale." Shoot, December 10, 1999, p. 54.

Griesser, Matt. "Sign Boy: After a One-Year Hiatus, the Bungling FootJoy Pitchman Played by Matt Griesser Is Back On the Air." Sports Illustrated, February 10, 2003.

Manning, Jeff. "Woods Lays Claim to New Kind of Green." Portland Oregonian, August 29, 1996, p. A1.

McCabe, Jim. "Score One for Yuks: 'Sign Boy' Character Is Back for Another Round." Boston Globe, January 19, 2003, p. C17.

———. "'Sign Boy' Character Holds Fans' Attention." Boston Globe, March 23, 2000, p. F2.

O'Brien, George, "Spalding Goes for the Rebound." Business West, October 1, 2000, p. 6.

Robinson, Bob. "Notebook: 'Sign Boy' Lends Hand to Stunt by Mickelson." Portland Oregonian, August 8, 2001, p. E4.

Smits, Garry. "Sign (Boy) of the Times Dives into Job." Florida Times-Union, June 8, 2003, p. C6.

Tays, Alan. "Fits Him Like a Glove." Palm Beach (FL) Post, April 27, 2005, p. 10C.

Thornton, Carolyn. "CVS Charity Classic: 'Sign Boy,' Jacobsen Leave Them Laughing." Providence (RI) Journal, June 28, 2005, p. D4.

Kevin Teague

Foster's Group Limited

77 Southbank Blvd.
Southbank, Victoria 3006
Australia
Telephone: 61 3 96332000
Fax: 61 3 96332000
Web site: www.fostersgroup.com

■■■

HOW TO SPEAK AUSTRALIAN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1990 Foster's Lager, owned by Foster's Group Limited (previously Foster's Brewing Group) and distributed and marketed by Miller Brewing Company in the United States, began pursuing a U.S. strategy of associating itself with "Australianness." After a detour away from this marketing strategy, Miller and its Foster's agency, Angotti, Thomas, Hedge of New York, in 1994 released "How to Speak Australian," which became one of the longest-running and most popular beer advertising campaigns of its time.

"How to Speak Australian" began with spot placements in regional markets and an estimated budget of $3 million. In 1997 Miller made it a national campaign and increased the budget to approximately $10 million. From 1994 to 2001 the campaign's central idea remained consistent. TV spots introduced a word or term, such as "Room Service," and then showed what that term meant in Australia; in this case, it meant a live chicken and a meat cleaver delivered to a hotel guest's room. Following such arresting redefinitions of commonplace terms was an image of the Foster's can, labeled "Beer." The commercials closed with the tagline "Fosters. Australian for Beer." Print, outdoor, and radio executions followed this basic model, which seemed virtually inexhaustible. Four to six new TV spots were crafted each year, and the consistency of the platform also meant that old spots could be recycled as long as they remained fresh.

"How to Speak Australian" won a Silver EFFIE Award in 1994 and a Gold EFFIE in 1995, and the Foster's brand grew rapidly in the United States through 1998. The campaign remained popular, and the brand continued to grow, but by 2000 Foster's sales had begun to be eclipsed by other beers in the imported-beer market. Some analysts believed that Miller had missed an opportunity to turn Foster's into an import stalwart along the lines of category-leading Corona Extra. After the dissolution of Angotti, Thomas, Hedge in 2001 Miller assigned the Foster's advertising account to Chicago's J. Walter Thompson agency. J. Walter Thompson made an unsuccessful attempt to reinterpret what was by then a classic advertising campaign, and in the following years Miller continued searching for the right agency to update the Foster's identity.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the 1980s the Foster's Brewing Group (which later bought heavily into wine brands and dropped "Brewing" from its name) set out to make its undistinguished namesake brew stand out from the pack of Australian beers by raising its profile internationally. As the brand attained status outside of Australia, Australians themselves began drinking it in larger numbers. By the mid-1980s Foster's was at the top of the Australian beer heap, and its international image was strengthened by a series of commercials in the United Kingdom featuring the actor Paul Hogan, then a TV personality trafficking in the supposedly quintessential Australianness that he would go on to parlay into international fame in the movie Crocodile Dundee (1986). Foreign sales became a prime source of Foster's revenue, and in the early 1990s the company set out to brand itself in the United States by playing up its Australian roots. An unproductive detour away from this strategy was scuttled in 1994, when Foster's U.S. agency, Angotti, Thomas, Hedge, settled on the "How to Speak Australian" platform that, together with the tagline "Australian for Beer," would define the brand's marketing for years to come.

A still from the "Guppy" television ad for Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign.
MILLER BREWING COMPANY. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

During the 1990s and into the first half of the following decade, Foster's was distributed and marketed in the United States according to a succession of complex corporate arrangements in which its Australian parent company partnered with the Canadian beer maker Molson and the United States' Miller Brewing. Although the specific terms of these agreements shifted over the course of the "How to Speak Australian" campaign, Miller was, practically speaking, responsible for Foster's marketing in the United States. The arrangement allowed Foster's to take advantage of Miller's extensive distribution network, but at the same time Foster's parent company did not have control over the brand's marketing. This became cause for concern when, because of the terms of the three-way partnership, Foster's advertising budget was calibrated not just according to its own performance but according to the performance of Molson, whose fortunes were then in decline in the United States. Thus, despite Foster's sales growth, Miller capped spending on "How To Speak Australian" at approximately $10 million annually through 2000.

TARGET MARKET

As Foster's beer became established in numerous countries, advertising for the brand was no longer aimed chiefly at Australians but at a broader audience of people who may not have known much about the Australian way of life. In the United States in 1997 the "How to Speak Australian" campaign was directed primarily at male consumers of legal drinking age, 21 to 34 years old, who favored imported beer. That group of consumers had been the main target for the brand's U.S. advertisements for some time. "This audience is very advertising-savvy. They want commercials to not only give them a reason to drink Foster's, but they also want to be entertained. We feel these ads succeed on both levels. Our Foster's ads try to entertain, show the product attributes, and provide a humorous look into the Australian lifestyle," said Marino. "Our research shows that Foster's is viewed as a very unassuming, approachable brand that appeals to both blue-collar and white-collar audiences."

A still from Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign. MILLER BREWING COMPANY. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

COMPETITION

When, in 1997, the "How to Speak Australian" campaign moved from spot and regional placements to become a national campaign, the leading imported beer brands in the United States were Heineken and Corona Extra. In 1997 Heineken ran an advertising campaign to establish the company's symbol—a red star on a green background—as a widely recognized icon. One print ad featured a red star floating on the Chicago River, which had been turned green for Saint Patrick's Day. Another showed a star-shaped display of red Christmas lights against green electrical cord. The campaign had been launched in 1996 with a teaser that consisted of a solitary, unidentified red star on buildings and outdoor billboards. The campaign's broadcast advertisements showed the Heineken star on objects such as sunglasses and cocktail napkins. Actual conversations among people drinking beer in social situations were recorded and then performed by actors for the commercials. In one spot a man expressed his amazement that his date did not know who wrote Moby Dick, and the woman snapped at him in return. In another spot a man boasted about his state-of-the-art computer system. His companion commented, "That's psychotic. What are you gonna do with all that?" The man answered, "I don't know. Go online. Meet girls." Another spot showed people discussing the significance of a white radiator on display at an exhibit of modern art. The commercials were intended to convey the message that Heineken was "authentic" while faddish microbrews were not. Heineken spent more than $30 million on print and broadcast advertising in 1997, an increase of 55 percent over its budget for 1996.

Another competitor, the top-selling import brand Corona Extra, had experienced slow sales during the late 1980s but had seen a 35.7 percent sales surge in 1996. The Mexican beer was marketed in the United States by two companies, Barton Beers and Gambrinus Co., that operated separate regional promotions. The brand's U.S. advertising, which revolved around fun and sun at the beach, was widely viewed as instrumental in the brand's rise to the top of the U.S. import market. Corona's unwavering commitment to this marketing strategy through the end of the century and beyond was rivaled, among beer advertisers, only by the consistency of Foster's positioning.

The leading American beers during this time were Budweiser, Bud Light, Miller Lite, and Coors Light. These brands, led by the Bud sibling brands, leveraged marketing budgets 5 to 15 times larger than that of Foster's.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Foster's U.S. marketers and the agency Angotti, Thomas, Hedge initially grappled with the problem of creating brand awareness in an environment dominated by big-budget domestic-beer campaigns. The campaign ran during 1994, 1995, and 1996 in markets including San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, Phoenix, Denver, Atlanta, and New York. A warm reception and sales gains

HOW TO SPEAK ''FOOTY''

The ''How to Speak Australian'' campaign was supplemented by various other marketing endeavors, including sponsorship of weekly parties for fans of the Australian Football League. Posters and a booklet were printed to help fans learn ''How to Speak 'Footy,' '' the slang term for this wild sport resembling a cross between rugby and cricket in which the players wore no protective padding. The posters featured a photograph of players crashing into each other above the words ''Australian for Football,'' then a picture of Foster's in a glass, a can, and a bottle over the tagline ''Australian for Beer.'' led Miller, in 1997, to take the effort national, raising the initial budget from an estimated $3 million to the $10 million figure that was to remain constant, with slight variations, through 2001. During this time the campaign remained extremely faithful to the original concept developed by Angotti, Thomas, Hedge. ''What we're trying to do is position Foster's for both a domestic audience and an imported audience,'' Angotti account director Michael Stoner told Brandweek. ''It has an easygoing, laid back personality. We tried to get that through in the ads.'' The TV, print, outdoor, and radio executions used Australia's reputation as a refreshingly untamed land inhabited by tough, no-nonsense, offbeat men and women as a corollary to the values Angotti hoped to attach to the Foster's brand identity.

The 15-second television commercials opened with an announcer saying in a thick Australian accent, ''How to Speak Australian.'' The announcer pronounced a word or phrase, and then the commercial illustrated a humorous definition. For example, the spot that defined ''room service'' showed a live chicken and a meat cleaver being delivered to a guest's motel room. Another early spot showed the Australian definition of ''No'': a woman casually tossing a man out of a bar. The spots each ended with an image of a can of Foster's and the caption ''Beer,'' followed by a close-up of the brand's logo and the tagline ''Foster's. Australian for Beer.'' Similarly, a billboard used a picture of a dagger labeled ''Australian for dental floss'' and a picture of a Foster's can labeled ''Australian for beer.'' The tagline made it sound as if Australians were so fond of Foster's that they equated it with the word ''beer'' and would drink no other brand. Although this was not strictly true—Foster's was, during the 1990s, Australia's second-biggest beer brand—all of the various executions during the campaign's life worked together to convey that single brand message.

As the campaign became well known across America, Angotti's challenge became to keep the commercials fresh through consistently surprising and humorous interpretations of the central conceit. ''Witness Protection Program'' featured a man dressed in a kangaroo suit living with a gang of kangaroos in the desert. In ''Wake-Up Call'' an innkeeper tossed an alarm clock through an open motel window, striking a rugged male guest, who grinned as he awoke and sat upright. ''Marriage Counselor'' depicted a woman winning an arm-wrestling match with a man in a bar, after which a referee said, ''That settles it, mate. Her mum moves in.'' Another spot showed a great white shark with the caption ''Guppy.'' Each year Angotti typically produced four to six new executions, and because of the campaign's consistency, commercials from previous years could be reused seamlessly alongside new spots. The campaign became so successful that the parent company of Foster's adapted it for use in Canada, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, the Caribbean, and numerous European countries.

OUTCOME

The ''How to Speak Australian'' campaign won a Silver EFFIE Award for advertising effectiveness and creativity in 1994 and a Gold EFFIE in 1995. Consumers tended to be more familiar with the Foster's brand than any other brand except Budweiser, and Foster's commercials were the most popular among brands in the category, according to the Australian American Chamber of Commerce in Los Angeles. Jim Mullahy, senior brand manager for Foster's lager, said, ''We have a lot of fun with Foster's advertising, and viewers clearly enjoy that humor. Research indicates that 'How to Speak Australian' is one of the most widely recognized and memorable ad campaigns for beer. The strong brand-building advertising was integral to Foster's tremendous sales growth, which has been in the double digits for the last five years. In 1997 alone the brand increased more than 25 percent.''

Foster's sales again handily outpaced those of the fast-growing import segment as a whole in 1998, ending the year up 20.6 percent, but 1999 saw the brand's growth slow markedly, to 9.2 percent. By 2000 Foster's was growing more slowly than the imported-beer category as a whole, and beer-industry analysts routinely spoke of the brew as a missed opportunity for Miller. Because of the Miller-Molson-Foster's agreement, Miller had never raised spending on Foster's to the levels that the immense popularity of ''How to Speak Australian'' seemed to warrant. By the time this restrictive corporate arrangement was reconfigured in late 2000, analysts

PACKAGING COUNTS

When Foster's beer was first marketed in the United States, it was presented in 25-ounce "Oil Cans" instead of the standard 12-ounce bottles and cans. The unusually large packaging made Foster's stand out on the shelf and was the perfect complement for the "How to Speak Australian" campaign, which had a rugged, masculine, exaggerated quality. Later Foster's was also offered in 12-ounce bottles and in kegs.

wondered whether Foster's might not have missed its chance for sustained success. Although spending was raised to more than $15 million in 2001 and was projected to rise in future years as high as $25 million, Foster's was not able to capitalize on these increases. By 2003 the brand was in decline in the United States, with sales losses of 7 percent.

In 2000 Angotti, Thomas, Hedge was dissolved. Miller awarded the Foster's account to J. Walter Thompson of Chicago, and the new agency crafted a 2001 reinterpretation of the "How to Speak Australian" that applied the original campaign concept to urban-dwelling Australians. J. Walter Thompson had lost the account by 2002, however, and its successor, Wieden+Kennedy, held the Foster's account for 10 months without selling Miller on any of its "How to Speak Australian" executions. In June 2004 Miller gave the account to another of its roster agencies, Ogilvy & Mather, which was charged with the job of applying the "Australian for Beer" tagline to escapist imagery of the sort that had propelled Foster's competitor Corona to its spot at the top of the imported-beer market in the United States.

FURTHER READING

"Beverages/Alcohol: Foster's." Brandweek, June 12, 1995.

Chakravarty, Subrata N. "Soap Opera Down Under." Forbes, February 15, 1993.

Cooper, Ann. "Foster's Beer." Brandweek, May 9, 1994.

"Foster's Brewing Olympics Tie to Aid in Image at Home." Wall Street Journal (eastern ed.), March 24, 1999.

Khermouch, Gerry. "Aussie Rules." Brandweek, October 16, 2000.

———. "Molson, Foster Seen Clamoring for More Marketing Control in U.S." Brandweek, August 21, 2000.

———. "Translating Australian." Brandweek, May 10, 1999.

Levere, Jane L. "Foster's Beer Is Putting a New Twist on Its Longtime 'How to Speak Australian' Campaign." New York Times, March 6, 2001.

McDowell, Bill. "Miller Devotes More Focus to Import Beer Portfolio: Foster's Ads Air on Network TV, while Molson Turns to Hockey." Advertising Age, February 24, 1997.

Panczyk, Tania D. "JWT Bows First Foster's Work." Adweek (midwest ed.), March 5, 2001.

Susan Risland
Mark Lane

Fox Entertainment Group, Inc.

1211 Avenue of the Americas, Ste. 302
New York, New York 10036
USA
Telephone: (212) 852-7111
Fax: (212) 852-7145
Web site: www.foxsports.com

■■■

NHL ON FOX CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Fox Entertainment Group was a division of Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation, a global media and entertainment empire. News Corporation published newspapers (including the Times of London), magazines (including The Weekly Standard), and books (HarperCollins). The company owned an 81 percent stake in the Fox Entertainment Group, one of the largest entertainment conglomerates in the world. Fox Entertainment Group produced, developed, and distributed TV and motion picture programming (including Ally McBeal, The X-Files, and Titanic) through its Fox Filmed Entertainment and Twentieth Century Fox units. It also owned America's Fox Television Network as well as 22 TV stations across the United States. In addition, Fox Entertainment had interests in cable TV channels and major league sports teams.

Fox Entertainment's Fox Sports division gained instant credibility in 1993 when it acquired the rights to broadcast National Football League (NFL) games. While the exorbitant rights fees the league commanded made the property a "loss leader" for the network, the cachet of professional football—especially among Fox's core youthful male demographic—made the acquisition worthwhile. Using ultramodern graphics, "in your face" promos, and a highly energetic pregame show, Fox took over an already successful product and enhanced it. Two years later Fox took a bigger gamble when it paid $155 million for broadcast rights to National Hockey League (NHL) games for the next five years. In doing so the network had acquired an underperforming TV property that traditionally drew lower ratings than bowling. It hoped to repeat its NFL success on the ice.

For the first three years of Fox coverage, ads for the NHL were handled by various agencies on a project basis. Then in late 1997 Fox Sports named the New York-based advertising agency of Cliff Freeman & Partners to handle advertising for its broadcast coverage of NHL games. The agency immediately initiated a campaign designed to win hockey a wider audience through the use of offbeat humorous promos.

The Fox NHL promo campaign, directed by Christopher Guest through bicoastal Moxie Pictures, was composed of five ads based on the premise that many sports would be better if they were played like hockey. In one typical spot a female bowler was knocked to the floor by a competitor trying to prevent her from making a game-winning strike. Other spots depicted hockey's violence and aggression applied to the sports of billiards, golf, and squash. The spots proved enormously popular with viewers and critics alike, earning Cliff Freeman & Partners a host of advertising industry awards. Fox continued to struggle to broaden the viewership for professional hockey, however, and in 1998 when the network's contract ran out, ABC acquired the NHL broadcast rights for the 1999–2000 season and beyond.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Fox Sports acquired the right to telecast professional hockey at a time of great promise, when the NHL's ratings on other networks were rising. Ratings for ESPN's Sunday night NHL games were up 67 percent in 1993–94, while the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's telecasts were up 59 percent. Fox officials believed they could increase the average rating for hockey telecasts to a 2, which would represent a 12 percent increase over the 1.6 rating earned by ABC in a limited number of games in 1993-94.

The NHL was also optimistic about the partnership. "This is our first over-the-air contract in 20 years," said Bernadette Mansur, NHL vice president for corporate communications. "There's no doubt that ESPN has done a tremendous job in producing and promoting the NHL, but Fox gives us a national network contract. It takes us to another level."

A labor dispute between the league's owners and players unfortunately delayed the start of the 1994–95 NHL season. When the lockout finally ended in January 1995, Fox Sports aired its first slate of promotional ads for its broadcasts of NHL games. The spots featured the offbeat humor that would become a hallmark of Fox hockey ads over the next few years. In one ad New York Islanders winger Benoit Hogue was shown shooting raisin bagels at a goal. In another Florida goalie John Vanbiesbrouck parodied 1950s child icon Jerry Mathers for a spot called "Leave It to Beezer."

The ads aired frequently, paving the way for Fox's initial broadcast on April 2, 1995. That Sunday's slate of six regional games boasted a panoply of new technical innovations designed to enhance the viewing experience. These "bells and whistles" included animated graphics, a theme song, five to eight cameras (with a robotic camera at the main game site), Dolby surround sound, super slow motion, and the "Fox Box," a score/clock graphic that Fox had previously introduced during its NFL broadcasts. The broadcast was preceded by a 15-minute pregame show hosted by former basketball player James Brown, with commentary from former NHL player Dave Maloney. The anchors returned during intermissions for analysis that featured a few unconventional touches, including an in-studio roller rink, which analysts used to demonstrate skills and techniques.

After a shaky first season ratings-wise, the NHL on Fox, as it was dubbed, began to show signs of success over the ensuing seasons. During the 1996–97 NHL season, for example, national television demographic results posted increases in key areas. There was a 36 percent increase in NHL on Fox viewership among women aged 18 to 24, with an 86 percent increase during the Stanley Cup Finals. At the same time there was a 5 percent increase in NHL on Fox viewership among men aged 18 to 34, with a 32 percent increase during the Stanley Cup Finals. There was a 3 percent increase in viewership among male teens 12 to 17, with a 22 percent increase during the Stanley Cup Finals. The demographic improvements, however, may have had more to do with a renewed interest in hockey generally rather than a reflection of Fox's broadcasts or promotional strategy. During the same season, by contrast, NHL on ESPN viewership rose 22 percent among women 18 to 24, with a 106 percent increase during the Stanley Cup Finals. There was a 14 percent increase in NHL on ESPN viewership among men 18 to 34, with a 52 percent increase during the Stanley Cup Finals.

Ratings did not continue to improve over the next season, however, and in the fall of 1997 Cliff Freeman & Partners of New York was awarded the Fox NHL account after a presentation to Neal Tiles, senior vice president for marketing at Fox Sports in Los Angeles. Spike DDB, owned by filmmaker Spike Lee and the DDB Needham Worldwide unit of Omnicom Group, continued to handle advertising for NHL games on Fox Sports Net, a cable television joint venture of News Corporation, Tele-Communications Inc., and Liberty Media, a unit of Tele-Communications.

TARGET MARKET

Having inherited rights to broadcast hockey at a point of record viewer interest in the sport, Fox marketing officials believed the only way to "grow" the audience for its broadcasts was to appeal to casual fans of the sport. "If we put on a production for purists, hockey is going to fail," declared Ed Goren, an executive in the Fox Sports division. "A lot of people have done it well, but the bottom line is that hockey hasn't been able to attract a national audience. The most important mission we have is broadening the audience. If we do the greatest show in the world and all we get is a 1.6 [rating], we've failed."

To capture a youthful audience, Fox from the beginning relied on humor, high-tech effects, and the lure of larger-than-life personalities to sell hockey to fans who rarely watched the sport on TV. "Right now, hockey is like soccer," said Goren. "Millions of kids play it, but they don't watch it, because there are no heroes. We have to give them heroes. We have to sell these players as athletes and as personalities."

COMPETITION

Despite a major marketing push in recent years, the NHL, as far as the major professional team sports went,

THE CURIOUS CASE OF THE GLOWING PUCK

No feature symbolized Fox's ill-fated attempt to broaden the audience for televised hockey more than its infamous "glowing puck." Officially known as FoxTrax, the glowing puck was designed to remedy a frequent viewer complaint about hockey on television: that the tiny, fast-moving puck was impossible to follow on the flat screen of a TV set.

FoxTrax relied on sophisticated computer technology to track the puck and then laid graphics on top of it, creating the effect of a glowing blue disk with a comet tail that changed colors depending on how fast the puck was moving. Almost immediately critics attacked the idea, claiming among other things that it could not possibly work. Fox officials were quick to refute that charge. "We tested that by shooting pucks out of cannons at a wall, and none ever failed," said Stan Honey, executive vice president of technology for News Corporation, Fox's parent company.

Others complained that the glowing puck cheapened the game by introducing an element of technological gimmickry into the telecasts. The decision to use it, however, was fully in keeping with Fox Sports' stated intention to bring hockey to the masses. "The point is, some people needed FoxTrax to learn the game," NHL on Fox game analyst John "J.D." Davidson explained. "Others, who are hard-core fans, didn't like it. It's a shame we couldn't find a way to have a remote control that you could either have it or not have it through your clicker. That would have been ideal."

Fox's inability to generate significant viewer interest in its hockey eventually prompted it to abandon FoxTrax. The glowing puck was retired, presumably to a museum of technology. No viewer complaints were recorded at its demise.

remained a decided fourth among viewers, behind the NFL, Major League Baseball, and the NBA. Hockey remained a low-rated sport that nevertheless had solid advertiser appeal for companies seeking a young, male demographic target. Hockey's major competitor in the fall/winter sports market was the NBA, which had arguably surpassed baseball as the second most popular sport after the NFL in the United States. Its ability to reach 18- to 34-year-old males made it an attractive property for those wishing to sell autos, soft drinks, and athletic shoes. Like hockey, though, the league had some problems—lower scoring games, the threat of labor strife, growing pains for the new breed of players, and the aging of its longtime current star system. As of 1999, however, the NBA appeared unthreatened by the NHL as a television property.

MARKETING STRATEGY

From the day it won the rights to broadcast NHL hockey games, Fox Sports pursued an aggressive promotional strategy designed to whip up interest among viewers who had previously not tuned in to hockey telecasts. From the ads to the broadcasts themselves, this strategy was marked by innovation, risk taking, and a "rewriting the rules" approach. "We're telling our people there is no right or wrong," said Goren.

There was, of course, an inherent danger in this strategy. If Fox reached too far to pull in new fans, it could alienate hard-core fans who preferred a more traditional approach. The network was willing to take that risk, however, betting that hard-core hockey fans would realize that the TV audience for the sport must expand if it were to grow in the next century.

To promote its 1997–98 slate of telecasts, Fox Sports turned to Cliff Freeman & Partners. Cliff Freeman landed the assignment from Fox Sports personally after making a presentation to Tiles, the senior vice president of marketing for the sports division of Fox. "I'm a big fan of Cliff Freeman's work," said Tiles. "We need a highly creative message to break through the clutter, because we are the clutter."

Freeman's first ads broke in fall 1997, while the main campaign kicked off in January during Fox's broadcast of the annual NHL All-Star Game. The new campaign consisted of four spots, all conceived by copywriter Eric Silver. In the first, "Bowling," a woman bowler was shown about to make a crucial shot to win a match. From behind her back her opponent suddenly charged into her and knocked her to the floor, causing her to drop the bowling ball. "Bowling would be better," a caption declared, "if it were hockey." The other three ads played off the same juxtaposition. In "Billiards" a pool player needing to make one final shot was assaulted from the side by his opponent, who went on to sink the ball himself. "Golf" playfully sent up the solemnity of TV golf broadcasts, as a golfer's rolling putt was shown being swatted away from the hole by another player, hockey goalie style. "Very smoothly done," commented the unseen announcers dryly. And in "Squash" two elderly competitors were shown ferociously checking each other into the court's walls as they traded shots. The spot concluded with one man savagely pressing the other's face into a clear glass pane. Once again, a caption proclaimed that the sport would be better "if it were hockey."

All four spots were designed to capture viewer interest with what looked like a real sporting event, then concluded with a humorous twist in which the violent ethos of hockey was introduced. This style was in keeping with research that showed that young viewers—jaded by a lifetime of watching conventional TV commercials—responded most favorably to offbeat ads marked by humor and surprising and violent twists.

OUTCOME

Cliff Freeman & Partners won numerous awards for its "NHL on Fox" campaign. An entry comprised of "Billiards," "Bowling," and "Golf" earned the agency the Grand Clio in television at the 1998 Clio Awards Gala, held at Lincoln Center. Freeman's work for Fox collected four Golds in various TV categories. The Fox ads were also awarded a Gold Lion as a media campaign at the 45th annual International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, in July 1998.

Despite all the accolades, the quirky spots did little to boost the ratings for Fox's NHL telecasts. The network's NHL ratings plummeted to a 1.4, the lowest in four years. Fox admitted to losing a fortune on its $155 million rights fees. As a consequence, in August 1998 Fox lost its NHL rights to Disney (ABC, ESPN, and ESPN2) for a staggering five-year, $600 million bid. "In our own way, I guess we elevated the awareness of the game to a point where the folks at Disney decided it was worth a lot of money," commented Fox Sports' Goren.

The outcome of the "NHL on Fox" was more favorable for at least one player in the campaign. The ad shop of Cliff Freeman & Partners was kept on by Fox to create a series of offbeat commercials for the network's game of the week baseball broadcasts. The slapstick spots retained the same wacky perspective and odd, cartoonlike characters of the agency's NHL campaign.

FURTHER READING

Berkowitz, Harry. "NYC Agency Gets Top Clio Award: Cliff Freeman Wins for Hockey Spots." Newsday, May 15, 1998.

DelNagro, Mike. NHL Has Serious TV Marketing Problem, Gannett News Service, February 26, 1999.

Robert Schnakenberg

French Connection Group PLC

30 Old Burlington St.
London, W1S 3NL
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 20 73997000
Fax: 44 20 73997001
Web site: www.frenchconnection.com

■■■

SCENT TO BED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997 the French Connection Group PLC embarked on a rebranding of its flagship French Connection line of clothing, which was sold in both department stores and stand-alone company stores throughout the world. The company's agency, TBWA\London, used an internal company moniker, FCUK (French Connection United Kingdom), as the conceptual basis for a newly brash brand image. Featured on product labels, storefronts, and in advertising that overtly encouraged the subliminal rearrangement of the acronym, the letters FCUK proved an immensely successful marketing device. The brand name was exported to North America in 1998, and subsequent advertising campaigns used the near-obscenity to incite predictable and, for French Connection, lucrative controversies. A 2003 print and promotional campaign on behalf of a line of FCUK fragrances, however, was bolder than previous FCUK campaigns, and it met with more mixed results.

The 2003 campaign, called "Scent to Bed," leveraged a projected $10 million budget to introduce American teens and young adults to the fragrances FCUK Him and FCUK Her. The obvious implications of the tagline and product name were bolstered by an image, in print ads, of an attractive, nearly nude couple in an intimate bedroom situation. The ads ran in men's and women's fashion magazines as well as in teen magazines. Planned promotional tie-ins included in-store handouts labeled "License to FCUK," which touted a "Scent to Bed" website.

French Connection was not, however, able to mobilize the campaign's full budget or promotional capacities. Widespread protests by religious and concerned-citizens' groups led the country's largest department-store company—Federated, the owner of Macy's, Bloomingdale's, and Goldsmith's—to remove all FCUK products from its inventories, and the "Scent to Bed" ads were pulled from the teen magazines in which they had been placed. Though French Connection reported strong sales of the FCUK fragrances, the marketing campaign was put on hold. The company's next American advertising campaign did not use the FCUK acronym at all.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Stephen Marks worked in the British fashion industry in the 1960s before starting his own company in 1972. Named after Marks's favorite movie, French Connection established itself as a British wholesaler of midpriced, upscale, casual clothing aimed at a fashion-conscious target market consisting primarily of teens and young adults. The French Connection brand expanded to continental European, Asian, and North American markets. Marks took the company public in 1984.

In the 1990s French Connection shifted its emphasis from wholesale to retail operations; the company undertook a corresponding broadening of its product offerings and renovation of its stores' appearance. The retail fashion market was highly competitive and fragmented, however, and French Connection needed a clearer market positioning. In 1997 founder Marks enlisted TBWA\London's Trevor Beattie, a creative director who had achieved fame in the advertising industry for creating an overtly provocative (and very successful) campaign for Wonderbra, to helm a rebranding of French Connection. Beattie decided that the company needed to promote an image of irreverent hipness in keeping with its core target market, but he had not settled on any unifying icon for the rebranding project when, while at French Connection headquarters, he noticed the letters "FCUK" in a company fax header. The letters stood for "French Connection United Kingdom" and were used in communications with the company's Hong Kong office (FCHK), but Beattie immediately saw the brand-building potential of the near-obscenity. French Connection was rebranded as FCUK, a move that generated extensive controversy while fueling unprecedented company growth. Outdoor advertisements in London, tagged "FCUK fashion," were outlawed by Britain's Advertising Standards Authority after widespread outrage; the company responded with ads whose tagline, "FCUK advertising," did little to quell citizens' complaints.

In 1998 the FCUK logo began appearing in the United States, on T-shirts and on the company's U.S. storefronts. Print ads explicitly encouraged the logo's subliminal associations, using transposed language such as "night all long" and "I you want." An outdoor campaign that ran on top of New York City taxicabs paired the brand name with the tag "Think your clothes off"; it was pulled after only a few days. Another New York print and taxi-top campaign followed, using copy that stated, "Brave but not free / FCUK censorship."

TROUBLE HERE, TROUBLE THERE

French Connection had a larger market presence in the United Kingdom than in the United States, and in the 2000s it leveraged the FCUK brand for a variety of U.K. ventures, including a line of alcohol (which was eventually recalled in reaction to complaints that it targeted minors). In 2004 the company launched an Internet-based radio station under the FCUK brand. Advertisements on behalf of FCUK radio were characteristically bold, reading, "FCUK FM from PNUK to RCOK and back. Nonstop FNUK. FCUK FM." Britain's Advertising Standards Authority ruled that the ad was offensive and required that all FCUK ads for the following two years be submitted for preapproval. Soon after this ruling, which came on the heels of FCUK's marketing troubles during the U.S. "Scent to Bed" campaign, French Connection temporarily dropped the FCUK logo from its advertising.

TARGET MARKET

The primary target for the FCUK Her and FCUK Him fragrance lines was 18- to 25-year-olds, but FCUK also placed "Scent to Bed" advertisements in publications primarily read by much younger teenage girls. Given the ubiquity of sexual imagery in the media at the time, sexual appeals to young people had to be extremely explicit or daring to stand out. FCUK's ability to make a splash in a hypersexual environment was primarily a function of its products' brand name, which, in combination with the clear sexual implications of the ad imagery and the "Scent to Bed" tagline, amounted to one of the bluntest sexual appeals in recent mainstream U.S. advertising.

Given FCUK's history of courting controversy as a means of spurring sales, industry observers took it for granted that the company welcomed the inevitable public uproar surrounding the fragrances' launch. As religious and concerned-citizens' groups began to mount predictable protests, Michael Wood, vice president of the media consultancy Teenage Research Unlimited, told USA Today, "The more people say, 'How dare them,' the more interest they get from the teen market." Other analysts pointed out a potential pitfall of this approach: teens were dependent on their parents for the money required to make most of their purchases.

COMPETITION

The American fashion-industry standard for sexually explicit marketing had arguably been established by Abercrombie & Fitch (A & F) in the late 1990s and early 2000s. Indeed, one of the most prominent groups protesting the "Scent to Bed" campaign, Concerned Women for America, described the FCUK campaign as "Abercrombie & Fitch on Viagra." Despite the suggestion that A & F's marketing was tame by comparison, the popular retailer of clothing for college-age young adults had become one of the most roundly protested advertisers of the time, regularly provoking the ire of concerned citizens across the political spectrum. Most of this outrage centered on the company's signature "magalog" (a hybrid of magazine and mail-order catalog), the "A & F Quarterly," which integrated racy editorial content with art-quality photos of nearly nude young men and women. An early issue of the magalog ran a widely condemned feature called "Drinking 101," which encouraged college students to "drink creatively" and provided recipes for such cocktails as the "Brain Hemorrhage." Another notorious issue, from the 1999 holiday season, featured a cover image that included a male model's pubic hair as well as an image of Santa and Mrs. Claus engaging in sadomasochistic sex acts. A 2003 Christmas issue touting "group sex and more" generated a last round of outrage but proved the last installment of the publication; it was retired amid ongoing controversy and, perhaps more to the point, flagging in-store sales.

American Apparel, an upstart wholesaler of high-quality T-shirts and other basic knitwear, was responsible for another prominent advertising campaigns that flirted with pornography. The American Apparel print and outdoor campaign, introduced to coincide with the opening of the brand's first retail outlets in late 2003, was largely masterminded and executed by the company's founder, Dov Charney. It featured overtly sexual, casual snapshots of employees and other nonprofessional models. Balancing this pronounced appeal to sexual appetites with a sweatshop-free corporate model, American Apparel successfully targeted young, fashion-conscious urban progressives. Regularly outpacing the garment industry in yearly sales, American Apparel grew rapidly, expanding its stable of retail stores from two to more than 50 during the first two years of the campaign's run.

MARKETING STRATEGY

FCUK Him and FCUK Her were the company's first global fragrance products, and they became available worldwide in French Connection stores and department stores starting with a September 2003 launch in the United States. The "Scent to Bed" print and promotional campaign, developed by TBWA\London (FCUK's agency of record since the 1997 rebranding), was a U.S.-specific element of the global push that was timed to coincide with the fragrances' introduction. The projected campaign budget at the start of the campaign was $10 million.

Print ads ran in magazines that included Cosmopolitan, Marie Claire, Maxim, and FHM as well as in the magazines Seventeen and Teen People, whose readerships consisted primarily of girls in their early and middle teenage years. The "Scent to Bed" tagline was superimposed over an attractive young couple in an intimate bedroom situation. This combination of imagery and text, supported by the subliminal reading of the accompanying brand name, sent an unmistakable sexual message to young people. Many assumed, judging from FCUK's history of parlaying controversy into sales gains, that the company was hoping for some amount of buzz-generating backlash. The company itself remained coy about its strategies. "Whether it shocks you or amuses you," Andrea Hyde, president of French Connection Holdings, told USA Today, "FCUK certainly makes the consumer think."

Promotional elements of the campaign included invitations to a FCUK fragrance launch party that were shaped like "do not disturb" signs for hotel doorknobs and that read, "FCUK in progress." At the time of the campaign's September release, plans were in place for a holiday promotion involving "License to FCUK" cards to be distributed by stores that carried the fragrance. The cards were to include a code to be used at a "Scent to Bed" website, allowing consumers access to a list of effective pickup lines and the chance to win a free six-person Club Med vacation.

OUTCOME

A "Scent to Bed" backlash gained steam immediately upon the FCUK fragrances' American introduction. "It's very disgusting and highly offensive," Roberta Combs, president of the Christian Coalition of America, told USA Today. "It's a sad day when people have to do this type of advertising, especially toward our youth." The American Family Association initiated a large-scale E-mail and phone drive to file complaints with participating department-store chains, and French Connection began experiencing trouble with the department stores that carried the FCUK brand. In the first two weeks after the fragrances were introduced, they ranked no lower than eighth among top-selling fragrances at Sephora stores and no lower than fourth at Bloomingdale's. The controversy soon began to affect stores, however. The department store Kaufmann's ceased using in-store "Scent to Bed" displays, while the largest department-store corporation in America, Federated Department Stores—which owned Macy's, Bloomingdale's, and Goldsmith's, among others—pulled not just the FCUK fragrances but all FCUK-labeled products from its stores within a month after the campaign's launch. In October 2003 the magazines Seventeen and Teen People both announced that they would no longer run FCUK ads, and French Connection discontinued the campaign.

The fragrances remained available in French Connection stand-alone stores and sold well. According to Zirh International, the company that manufactured the fragrances for French Connection, the launch exceeded sales expectations as well as production capacities. Unused portions of the campaign budget were redirected to in-store initiatives and to other international markets. In November the company submitted to a relabeling of its products as "French Connection United Kingdom" in an attempt to get them back on Federated Department Stores shelves. The advertising campaign on behalf of the fragrances remained on hold indefinitely.

According to Advertising Age, chairman and CEO Marks remained convinced that the campaign was right for its target market. French Connection's North American sales continued to grow, reaching $84 million for 2003, more than double the company's sales figures for 1997. After a separate 2004 controversy in Great Britain resulted in an order by the Advertising Standards Authority that all FCUK outdoor advertising be preinspected, French Connection temporarily discontinued the use of its notorious acronym. A 2004 U.S. campaign featuring TV, print, and outdoor components used models posing as bikers in the American desert. The campaign's copy included, "Something beginning with F," and "Don't make us say it." "We think it's revolutionary," Marks told Women's Wear Daily. "Who else would advertise without using their name?"

FURTHER READING

Conti, Samantha. "FCUK's Disappearing Logo." Women's Wear Daily, September 13, 2004.

Estell, Libby. "Well, 'FCUK' You, Too." Incentive, November 2003.

Hall, Emma. "Stephen Marks: French Connection Group." Advertising Age, January 26, 2004.

Howard, Theresa. "Teen Fragrance's Titillating PR Push Could Create a Stink." USA Today, September 10, 2003.

Jardine, Alexandra. "FCUK Ads Raise Ire of U.K. Watchdog." Advertising Age, July 19, 2004.

Jardine, Alexandra, and Laurel Wentz. "French Connection Gives FCUK a Rest." Advertising Age, August 23, 2004.

Lindsay, Greg. "An FCUKing Brilliant Idea; French Connection Was Struggling in America—Until Its Bad-Boy Adman Found Salvation in Four Not-So-Naughty Letters." Business 2.0, August 2004.

Lippert, Barbara. "All FCUKed Up." Adweek (eastern ed.), October 11, 1999.

Neff, Jack. "FCUK Abandons Abbreviation to Get Perfume Back in Stores." Advertising Age, November 24, 2003.

Neff, Jack, and Jon Fine. "Magazines, Retailers Ban Racy FCUK Scent." Advertising Age, October 13, 2003.

O'Loughlin, Sandra. "French Connection UK Turns Radio on Its Ear." Brandweek, March 15, 2004.

Mark Lane

Frito-Lay Inc.

7701 Legacy Dr.
Plano, Texas 75024
USA
Telephone: (972) 334-7000
Fax: (972) 334-2019
Web site: www.fritolay.com

■■■

THE LOUDEST TASTE ON EARTH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Frito-Lay Inc., the world's largest maker of snack foods, launched an advertising campaign in 1997 to focus on a narrow market for its Doritos brand of flavored tortilla chips, to introduce new Doritos products, and to increase the international sales of tortilla chips. Doritos were the top-selling tortilla chips in the United States, but previous advertising had targeted a broad audience, and public awareness of the brand had begun to decline. With "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, the company targeted consumers who were 16 to 21 years old and who appreciated the freedom to make noise. The campaign emphasized that Doritos were flavorful, that they made a loud crunch when they were eaten, and that it was acceptable for young people to be exuberant and uninhibited.

One television commercial showed a middle-aged man going berserk because three young men were eating Doritos to the accompaniment of deafening rock and roll. The older man cried out in frustration as he rushed past the young men to unplug their stereo, but the music continued. He then cut down a power pole, causing a citywide blackout. The music stopped abruptly, and he looked relieved. The young men glanced mischievously at each other while one of them crumpled an empty Doritos bag. He then ripped open a new bag, the music started again, and the older man bellowed in exasperation. The voice-over said, "Doritos tortilla chips. The loudest taste on earth."

The campaign, which was launched in April 1977 and ran into 1998, was developed by BBDO Worldwide, New York, an agency that had been doing business with Frito-Lay's parent company, PepsiCo, for decades. In 1997 the ad budget for Doritos was increased significantly, to $40 million. "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign ran in the United States, where Doritos were already popular, and then in several other countries. PepsiCo's net sales increased during 1997, with the Doritos brand showing particularly strong growth.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Frito Company began operations in San Antonio, Texas, in 1932 and merged with H. W. Lay & Company to form Frito-Lay in 1961. Four years later, Frito-Lay merged with the Pepsi-Cola Company to form PepsiCo, and during the 1990s the snack food division became known as the Frito-Lay Company. In 1997 Frito-Lay expanded its product lines in Europe, Australia, and South America by purchasing salty snack brands in countries there, and in the United States it acquired the Cracker Jack brand of candy-coated popcorn and peanuts.

Frito-Lay made nine of the 10 top-selling brands of snack chips in the United States, including Lay's and Ruffles potato chips, Cheetos cheese puffs, Rold Gold pretzels, and Tostitos and Doritos tortilla chips. The company's first product had been Fritos corn chips, which were promoted for years by a character called the Frito Kid and later with the tag line "Munch a Bunch! of Fritos Brand Corn Chips." Humor had worked well in marketing for various Frito-Lay brands. A 1996 ad campaign for Baked Lay's potato crisps featured a popular puppet character named Miss Piggy and three fashion models devouring the low-fat snack without worrying about gaining weight. The ads produced a rush to buy the product, and Baked Lay's went on to become the most successful new product in Frito-Lay's history, generating more than $250 million in sales in its first year. Another campaign that began in 1994 and ran for several years featured comedian Chris Elliott as a good-natured man who could liven up any occasion by producing a bag of Tostitos tortilla chips. The tag line was "You Got Tostitos, You Got a Party." In one spot Elliott displayed Tostitos in an attempt to impress women, but the women took the Tostitos and rejected him.

Frito-Lay's "better-for-you" low-fat products generated $1 billion annually, but controversy arose in 1996 when some consumers reported gastrointestinal problems after eating foods that contained olestra, a fat replacer also known by the brand name Olean. A one-ounce serving of Doritos MAX Tortilla Chips with Olean had one gram of fat and 90 calories, compared to seven grams of fat and 140 calories in a serving of original Doritos. "The idea of no-fat snacks is hugely appealing to millions of people," said Dennis Heard, Frito-Lay's senior vice president of technology and operations. "Our testing of olestra is to determine whether this new ingredient can be made to work and deliver that important benefit to our customers. As with any new product, ultimately the consumer must decide." He added that "Frito-Lay would never make any product that intentionally could cause people to become sick."

In 1995 and 1996 Frito-Lay's low-fat products accounted for 47 percent of the company's growth, and they figured prominently in its marketing plans. A campaign for Reduced Fat Doritos debuted on the telecast of the Summer Olympics in 1996 and extended into 1997. The commercials showed physicians examining a man who had tried the new tortilla chips and was so startled by their good flavor that an expression of surprise had frozen on his face. In addition to the advertising campaign, Frito-Lay launched a nationwide promotion in which 5 million consumers in 4,500 supermarkets were given "mystery samples," black bags that contained Reduced Fat Doritos. The words "So . . . what is it? The answer is in the bag!" were printed next to a bright yellow and red question mark on the front of the package. On the back were the words "It's not what you think it is." Inside was a coupon and a printed message identifying the tortilla chips as Reduced Fat Doritos.

A HIT IN ISRAEL

In August 1997 Frito-Lay launched "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign in Israel. Television commercials were supplemented by advertisements on 600 billboards, promotions in Israel's largest supermarket chains, and sponsorship of music festivals attended by the target market of young people. The Doritos brand was enthusiastically welcomed in Israel, where in Tel Aviv a $5.7 million production plant had been built by Elite Foods, the company that manufactured Doritos. "Before we even started advertising, the product was flying off the shelves," said Gidi Landsberger, the Elite Foods marketing director.

TARGET MARKET

In 1997 Frito-Lay decided to reposition Doritos as the snack of choice for a specific group of consumers. A 1996 campaign called "Get a Life" had targeted a broad market, primarily consumers 12 to 34 years old, with the message that Doritos was "everybody's snack." One spot, for example, featured a masseur who was energized by snacking on Doritos. In contrast, "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign was intended to appeal to a narrower market of consumers, people 16 to 21 years old. These consumers, known as Generation Xers, tended to enjoy alternative music and had grown up watching rock videos on MTV.

Tortilla chips were particularly popular in the United States, where per capita consumption of the crunchy corn snack was nearly five pounds a year. In an average month one bag of Doritos was sold for each household in the country. Many consumers snacked on tortilla chips instead of cooking, a practice that Frito-Lay hoped to encourage by positioning its chips and dips as convenience meals. For consumers who were concerned about gaining weight, Frito-Lay promoted its low-calorie lines during the same months "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign was being broadcast.

COMPETITION

With more than $1 billion in annual sales, Doritos was the top-selling brand in the flavored tortilla chip category and was popular throughout North and South America. Doritos accounted for 10 percent of Frito-Lay's annual sales of about $10 billion worldwide. The company sold its products in 40 countries, was the leader in five of the 10 largest snack food markets, and had 54 percent of the salty snack market in the United States. Its closest competitors, Procter & Gamble and Borden, had 4 percent each. Pringles potato crisps, made by Proctor & Gamble, were the only top 10 snack chips in the United States not made by Frito-Lay. A third competitor, Anheuser-Busch, had given up the snack food business in 1996, selling its processing plants to Frito-Lay and its Eagle brand to Procter & Gamble.

THE CINEMA IN FRANCE

To publicize the brand in France, Frito-Lay gave away 800,000 bags of Doritos at the cinema during 1996. A $5 million television advertising campaign ran concurrently with the promotion. In addition, Frito-Lay worked with its parent company, PepsiCo, to sponsor a movie festival called the Doritos Pepsi Show.

Thus, Procter & Gamble constituted Frito-Lay's principal competition in the United States. During 1997 Procter & Gamble continued a $40 million television advertising campaign for Pringles that had been running since 1995. The commercials originally had featured young people drumming on the cans in which Pringles were packaged, but eventually the campaign included people of all ages. The tag line, ''Once You Pop, You Can't Stop,'' called attention to the brand's unusual packaging, complete with lids that could be popped open and snapped shut again. Procter & Gamble said that the commercials helped increase brand awareness and improved sales of Pringles, which was the third most popular brand of potato snack in the country. According to the Snack Food Association, the brand gained 1.5 percentage points of market share in supermarkets during 1997, up from 10.2 percent in 1996. Procter & Gamble had introduced a tortilla chip line of Pringles in 1996 and was preparing to launch Fat Free Pringles, made with Olean, in 1998. Pringles containing Olean had been tested in a few markets in 1996, and within a year the brand's sales in those markets had risen by 25 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Frito-Lay planned to make Doritos a priority in 1997 by introducing new lines and airing blockbuster commercials in the United States and in other countries. In January the company asked ad agency BBDO Worldwide, New York, and affiliated agency DDB Needham Worldwide to present ideas for a new Doritos campaign. DDB Needham had been handling the company's Cheetos, Rold Gold, and Fritos accounts. BBDO had been doing business with Pepsi-Cola for more than 30 years and was handling Frito-Lay's Tostitos, Ruffles, and Lay's accounts, among others. BBDO was awarded the Doritos account and developed ''The Loudest Taste on Earth'' campaign, with the Lay's account given to DDB Needham soon afterward. At the end of the year, however, PepsiCo reviewed the way its national television commercials, worth about $170 million annually, were being planned and purchased. Several ad agencies were considered, but in the end all of the Frito-Lay accounts were consolidated with BBDO.

''The Loudest Taste on Earth'' campaign stressed that Doritos were flavorful tortilla chips that made a loud crunch when they were eaten. Because making a noise while eating was frowned upon in many social situations, the joy of being ''allowed to be loud'' was intended to appeal to young people, who liked to challenge the rules of etiquette. With their driving rock and roll sound tracks, the commercials also brought to mind the many times such young people had heard their parents tell them to lower the volume of their music. Above all, the campaign conveyed an attitude of unrestrained exhilaration. The people in the ads were having a good time with their friends as they snacked on Doritos.

''The Loudest Taste on Earth'' campaign was launched in April. The first of 20 spots, ''Boy,'' opened with an angelic looking woman with short, platinum blond hair. In a clear, sweet voice she sang, ''There once was a boy who wanted everything to be loud.'' The camera showed a long-haired teenager tearing open a bag of Doritos, with the words ''LOUD LOUD LOUD'' flashed across the screen as the music changed into pounding rock and roll. ''You're allowed to be loud,'' the song continued, as a series of wildly colorful music video images followed. The boy began to fly, a plastic cow fell down, a walking Doritos bag paraded along a runway like a fashion model, people rode Doritos bags through city streets, and an enormous Doritos tortilla chip tumbled down an avenue. ''The hundred decibel, in-your-face taste of Doritos,'' said the voice-over, and the singer concluded, ''The loudest taste on earth.'' The woman in the ad was Crushing Underground's Mary Wood, a performer and jingle producer who had helped write the music for ''Boy.'' She also performed in another spot in the campaign, introducing a line called Spicy Nacho Doritos. In addition to spots that looked like music videos, the campaign featured three television commercials that focused on the Doritos logo.

One of Frito-Lay's goals was to make sure that its advertising budget went toward campaigns consumers would remember and discuss. "It's got to be a great idea first—that's where the dollars will flow," said Roger Berdusco, Frito-Lay's vice president of marketing. To place its messages before the largest number of consumers, the company tended to run commercials during major media events, such as the Super Bowl or the Academy Awards, but some of "The Loudest Taste on Earth" spots aired during programs with young audiences, such as science fiction programs on cable.

OUTCOME

With the relaunch of Doritos and the introduction of less fattening lines of several brands, including Baked Lay's and Reduced Fat Doritos, Frito-Lay's sales had been increasing for several years. The Doritos brand showed particularly strong growth in 1997, the year "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign was launched. According to Hoover's Company Capsules, Frito-Lay experienced growth of 7.2 percent in 1997. Sales totaled $10.4 billion, up from $9.7 billion in 1996.

"The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign continued to run into 1998, even as Frito-Lay prepared to keep the brand's momentum going with the launch of two more lines, Doritos 3D's Tortilla Chips and Doritos WOW! Nacho Cheesier Tortilla Chips, made with Olean. In addition, "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign was scheduled to be broadcast in several other countries as Frito-Lay attempted to position the brand as the most popular snack for young adults around the world.

FURTHER READING

"AMA Cites Frito-Lay." Advertising Age, April 26, 1996.

Chakravarty, Subrata N., and John R. Hayes. "The Pure-Play Syndrome." Forbes, October 20, 1997.

"DDB Wins $50M Pan-Euro Frito-Lay Account." Advertising Age, May 28, 1997.

"Doritos Ads Go Global." Advertising Age, March 29, 1996.

"Doritos Woos French." Advertising Age, June 4, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie. "Chipper Pitchman: Comedian Chris Elliott Touts Low-Fat Tostitos." USA Today, April 8, 1996.

———. "Consumers Pig Out on Baked Lay's Campaign." USA Today, October 7, 1996.

Merrill, Christina. "New Directions for Doritos: BBDO Breaks Campaign That Saved the Business in Pitch Versus DDB Needham." Adweek (Eastern Edition), April 28, 1997.

"P&G to Roll Out Fat-Free Pringles." Advertising Age, October 15, 1997.

"PepsiCo Puts Its Weight Behind Doritos' Israeli Launch." Advertising Age, August 20, 1997.

Petrecca, Laura, Judann Pollack, and Mark Gleason, "Frito-Lay's Doritos Sets Agency Shootout: DDB Needham, BBDO Vie for $40 Mil Business." Advertising Age, January 27, 1997.

Soter, Tom. "Ear Candy: Shoot's Fall Top Three Spot Tracks Are Cheesy, Ultra Hip, and an Old Favorite with a Twist." Shoot, October 31, 1997.

Willman, John. "Salty Snack Attack on Europe." Financial Times, February 2, 1998.

Susan Risland

Fuji Photo Film U.S.A., Inc.

200 Summit Lake Drive
Valhalla, New York 10595
USA
Telephone: (914) 789-8100
Fax: (914) 789-8295
Web site: www.fujifilm.com

■■■

MEET THE GREENS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With the rise of digital photography in the 1990s, Fuji Photo Film U.S.A. found itself in danger of being marginalized as nothing more than a film company despite offering a wide range of digital products and services. In 2000 New York advertising agency Publicis was hired to help reposition Fuji as an image and communications brand. To help achieve this end, Fuji in November 2002 launched a new campaign, ''Meet the Greens,'' that featured a modern family that used the full range of Fuji products, both digital and traditional. In addition to high-tech Dad and low-tech (and very pregnant) Mom, the family included teenage daughter Kellie and six-year-old Stewart.

The $20 to $25 million multimedia campaign featured three television spots, as well as print ads, newspaper inserts, outdoor advertising, and an online sweepstakes. An example of the humorous approach the campaign took was the television spot ''Miracle,'' which showed Mrs. Green using her Fuji QuickSnap disposable camera to capture what she and the children considered to be the miracle of all miracles: Dad vacuuming.

Fuji hoped to exploit the Green family concept for an extended period of time, but after a second sweepstakes, in which participants were asked to submit names for the Greens' new twins, the campaign petered out in 2003. The television spots were generally well received, but the concept did not prove to work well in print ads.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Publicis took over the Fuji account in 2000 it faced the difficult challenge of expanding the brand beyond an immediate association with film. According to Claudia Deutsch writing in the New York Times in 2001, that association ''galls them. FujiFilm sells developing equipment, photo processing services, printers, coated papers and cameras . . . the many lucrative things that can help film companies survive the encroachments that digital photography is making into the film market.'' Indeed the emergence of digital technology in the 1990s had turned the photography industry upside down. Traditionally the lion's share of profits had come from the sale of film. While consumers might buy a camera every few years, they had to regularly purchase film, a highly profitable business for traditional photo companies like Kodak and Fuji. Digital technology brought in a host of new competition from the electronics arena, and as was the case with all consumer electronics, the price of cameras dipped to the point that it was difficult to make money from selling them. And with an increasing number of consumers embracing digital technology, the need for film diminished, forcing an old-line photography company like Fuji to adjust to the new business reality. Having ''film'' in its name was no longer an advantage, and years of brand development that equated ''Fuji'' with ''film'' in the mind of consumers now created a drag on the company's efforts to advance into the future.

''We have simply got to reposition Fuji as a communications company,'' Fuji's vice president for advertising Joan C. Rutherford told Deutsch. Jennifer Garr, chief marketing officer for Publicis, added, ''Pictures aren't just about archiving, but about communicating . . . We want the Fuji brand to be top of mind when consumers think about using images.'' According to Deutsch repositioning the Fuji brand was more than a hope: it was a ''survival strategy.'' From a sales point of view, however, the goal had not changed much. The money in photography had always been on the ''output stream.'' As Deutsch explained, ''He who dominates the output side—that is, sells the most prints, developing chemicals and such—will rule the market.''

To begin the process of repositioning the brand, Fuji launched a $20 million campaign in the fall of 2001 that also highlighted the company's digital cameras, scanners, printers, and new digital developing equipment. The campaign's three television commercials showed how Fuji products could be used to solve real problems, however exaggerated they might be. In the spot titled ''Poodle'' a young man in an elevator was enamored with a beautiful lady who clearly adored her pet poodle. He used a Fuji digital camera to take a picture of a pet store poodle and then uploaded the image to the Fuji website. Next he returned to the elevator wearing a sweatshirt with a poodle printed on the front, catching the attention of the young lady. The tagline for all the spots was ''Do you speak Fuji?''

''The overall theme running throughout the new campaign is that 'if you speak Fuji your communication will be enhanced,''' Rutherford explained in a press release. ''The new campaign extends pictures beyond memories and takes the mystery out of digital imaging. It brings to life the concept of better communication through pictures. What is particularly important is that each ad demonstrates the fun and easy practical benefits of digital imaging and relates those benefits to everyday life.''

A year later Fuji and Publicis took the concept further by embodying Fuji's consumers in a single family: the Greens. The name was an allusion to Fuji's longtime association to the color green in its distinctive packaging.

CRAZY ABOUT THE MOVIES

Fuji Photo Film Company was founded in Japan in 1934 to take over a factory that intended to produce black-and-white motion picture film for local consumption. The facility, located in a small village in the shadow of Mount Fuji, was chosen because of its clean water and air and close proximity to Tokyo, located about 50 kilometers west of the city.

TARGET MARKET

Because the ''Meet the Greens'' campaign was part of a larger brand repositioning effort, it was aimed at a wide target audience that included consumer, professional, business, and retail customers. Previous ad campaigns had targeted early adapters of new technologies, but digital photography had moved beyond this stage, prompting Fuji and the competition to appeal to general consumers. On a more specific level the new Fuji ads hoped to reach women, in particular mothers 24 to 41 years of age. According to research conducted by Kodak, 70 to 80 percent of family pictures were taken by women. They were the ones who maintained family photo albums, so they had to be educated about the ways to get prints from their digital cameras, whether it was from home printers, sending the digital files to a lab for development, or using Fuji self-serve kiosks at a drugstore. The use of a family in the new campaign, featuring domestic situations that would have appeal to women, was intended to reach this key demographic. Only to a small extent did the marketers attempt to target men and children, although both were represented in the Green family concept. The younger demographic, for instance, was not of prime concern because they tended to share pictures with one another via E-mail and were less likely to make prints.

COMPETITION

For many years Fuji's chief competitor had been Eastman Kodak. The two companies vied for film customers. Fuji had done particularly well with lower-priced film and disposable cameras, which it introduced into the market in the mid-1980s. But because Fuji's product offerings now extended beyond film and disposable cameras to include a wide range of digital cameras and output solutions, it faced a host of new competitors. In the digital camera field Fuji had to contend with old-guard brands like Kodak, Minolta, Olympus, and, to a lesser degree, upscale Nokia. But of equal threat were the newcomers to photography through digital technology, such as Hewlett-Packard, Samsung, Sony, and LG, all of which had successful product lines outside of photography and possessed the financial wherewithal to fund aggressive marketing campaigns. It was their combined marketing heft that was a key factor in the speed in which digital photography overtook film, catching both Fuji and Kodak by surprise. In the home printer market Fuji competed against category leader Hewlett-Packard as well as an increasingly aggressive Kodak, which was heavily promoting its EasyShare system and home printing dock. Kodak was also a chief rival in the all-important self-service digital photo kiosk business. Such units were cropping up at drugstore chains and other retail establishments, allowing customers to select, edit, and print digital pictures on the spot, and were becoming an increasingly important offset to the loss of film sales. Kodak was especially effective in leveraging its brand to become a major force in this category, but Fuji also faced competition in kiosks from major players like Polaroid, Olympus, PMI/KIS, IBM, Mitsubishi, and Sony, as well as from a number of smaller companies.

TALE OF THE TAPE

The first commercial blank videotape was offered in 1956 by the 3M Corporation at a price of $307 per reel. Fuji Photo Film Company was the first non-U.S. company to produce videotape.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Green family—reminiscent of an irreverent suburban television sitcom family, a la The Simpsons or Malcolm in the Middle—was crafted to include every type of picture taker. According to a Fuji press release when the campaign was launched in November 2002, ''Mr. Green is an advanced amateur photographer who loves to shoot with Fujifilm's range of digital cameras. Mrs. Green likes to use Fujifilm 35 mm and QuickSnap one-time-use cameras. Kellie, their teenaged daughter, is a fan of Fujifilm's Nexia Q1, a trendy-looking APS film camera. And Stewart, the always-scheming six-year-old, is happy to take pictures with whatever camera he can get his hands on.'' The ''Do you speak Fuji?'' tagline of the previous campaign was dropped in favor of ''Get the picture,'' a slogan Fuji had actually used several years earlier and which the company believed offered more universal appeal. ''Get the picture'' was also catchy because of its ambiguous meaning. As an imperative, ''Get the picture'' urged the audience to take pictures as well as to make prints. As a question, ''Get the picture'' asked the audience if it understood—in essence asking if it was in the know and hip enough to embrace the Fuji message. The multifaceted campaign, estimated to have a budget of $20 to $25 million, included television spots, print ads, newspaper inserts, outdoor advertising, and an online sweepstakes.

The linchpin of the ''Meet the Greens'' campaign was the three TV spots, which broke on national television during an episode of NBC's Crossing Jordan. The spots also appeared during other primetime network shows, such as Alias, NYPD Blue, The Practice, ER, Law & Order, and The West Wing. Cable television stations that aired the commercials included Discover, Nick at Nite, TLC, VH1, USA, and TBS. The spots also ran during syndicated reruns of such popular shows as Seinfeld and Just Shoot Me.

The three commercials were structured as humorous, offbeat vignettes, each one highlighting a specific Fuji product or service while showing the Green family involved in everyday picture-taking situations. In the spot called ''Date,'' Mr. Green and Stewart decided to have fun with Kellie's nervous young date, Chad. In answer to Mr. Green's implied question, ''So, Kellie tells me you're on the football team,'' bratty Stewart quipped, ''He's the mascot.'' Chad then had the misfortune of accepting an offering of messy candy. When Kellie finally made her appearance, he had candy stuck to his braces and smeared around his mouth. ''Let's get a picture,'' Mr. Green announced, after which he picked up his Fujifilm FinePix F401 camera to get a candid shot of a smiling Chad and mortified Kellie. The focus of the second spot, ''Miracle,'' was a Fujifilm QuickSnap Flash disposable camera. The commercial opened with Mrs. Green and the children frantically in search of something. Finally she found a QuickSnap camera buried beneath the cushions of the couch. She and the children then rushed upstairs to capture a picture of a ''miracle,'' which turned out to be Mr. Green vacuuming. In the last of the three spots, ''Charade,'' Fuji's self-serve digital photo kiosk was the centerpiece product. In the ad Mr. Green was shown using an in-store kiosk (the Aladdin Digital Photo Center) to develop pictures of his wife and kids. At home he laid out the pictures on the couch and started playing charades by himself. When the family walked in on him, Stewart offered a guess at the subject of the charade: ''Night of the Living Dead?''

The ''Meet the Greens'' campaign also featured a pair of print ads. In one Mr. Green was shown taking a close-up picture of blades of grass, accompanied by the cheeky caption ''Mr. Green Gets Hooked on grass,'' a marijuana allusion geared toward a baby boomer audience. The ad ran in such publications as Popular Photography and Wired. A second print ad featured Kellie taking a picture of her brother listening to the swollen belly of a very pregnant Mrs. Green. The headline read, ''Stewart listens for a change.'' The ad appeared in mainstream publications like People. Another print element was an insert in 100 million newspapers that featured the Greens and included coupons for Fuji film and one-time cameras. The ''Meet the Greens'' campaign also included outdoor advertising that pictured the Greens' mailbox filled with a complete array of Fujifilm products. The text read, ''What Cool Families Use.'' The mailbox concept was then carried over into the online sweepstakes that was launched later in November and promoted on the Fujifilm website as well as on Yahoo.com, Nickjr.com, ABCnews.com, Babycenter.com, and a number of other sites.

OUTCOME

The ''Meet the Greens'' advertising ran through the rest of 2002 and were supposed to be followed with a new series of commercials in the spring of 2003 and a third series in the fall of 2003. In April 2003 Fuji launched another sweepstakes by way of an ad in Good Housekeeping, inviting participants to offer names for the twins Mrs. Green was set to have. The twins were also expected to be featured in new television spots. The spots never materialized, however, as the Green family concept failed to resonate with the audience as well as the marketers had hoped. While the television spots were engaging—''Date'' was highlighted as one of the best recent spots in a December 2002 issue of Adweek —the concept did not translate well to the print medium. Nevertheless Fuji had made strides in its effort to recast its brand as more than just film.

FURTHER READING

Deutsch, Claudia. ''Fuji and Kodak Are Trying to Expand Their Images and Their Horizons beyond Just Traditional Film.'' New York Times, September 5, 2001, p. C2.

———. ''A Fuji Campaign Features the Everyday Moments of the Greens—Captured on Film, of Course.'' New York Times, December 2, 2002, p. C10.

''Fuji Stays in Step with Changes in the Market.'' Chain Drug Review, June 21, 2004, p. 192.

Havlik, Dan. ''Move Over 'Simpsons' and Make Way for 'The Greens.'" Imaginginfo.com, December 1, 2002.

Hoffman, Mala. ''In Process Fujifilm USA Takes Off in Westchester.'' Westchester County Business Journal, September 30, 2002, p. T1.

Mack, Ann M. ''The Greens' Scene.'' Adweek, November 11, 2002, p. 4.

———. ''Photo Finish.'' Adweek, September 10, 2001, p. 30.

''Publicis Catches Fuji Photo Film.'' Adweek (eastern ed.), April 17, 2000, p. 88.

Wasserman, Todd. ''Fuji Expecting Green Family Additions.'' Brandweek, April 14, 2003, p. 8.

———. ''Meet the Greens.'' Brandweek, November 11, 2002, p. 1.

Ed Dinger

Game Show Network

2150 Colorado Ave., Ste. 100
Santa Monica, California 90404
USA
Telephone: (310) 255-6800
Fax: (310) 255-6810
Web site: www.gsn.com

■■■

YOU KNOW YOU KNOW CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Game Show Network (GSN), the only 24-hour cable channel in the United States dedicated to game shows and interactive game playing, was founded in 1995. By 2000 its ratings were at an all-time high, and the network said it was attracting a growing number of viewers. Its goal, however, was to expand the number of cable outlets offering GSN and to increase its viewer base from 25 million subscribers to 50 million within three years.

To accomplish this goal, GSN launched its first-ever consumer-marketing and brand-awareness campaign in March 2000. Signed on to create the campaign, which was estimated to cost between $5 million and $10 million, was TBWA\Chiat\Day, an ad agency based in San Francisco. Themed "You Know You Know," the campaign featured three television spots showing ordinary people in different locations, each shouting the same word. At the end of the spots it was revealed that the people were watching a game show on television and yelling the answer to a question.

Within seven months of the campaign's launch its success was evident. According to Nielsen Media Research, the Game Show Network had added five million new subscribers. The campaign also garnered a long list of awards, including two Clio Awards, a Cannes Lion Award, and recognition as one of Adweek 's top 20 spots of the year. The company said, "The remarkable growth of the network continues to exceed our expectations . . . we have significantly impacted our sales efforts in the past six months."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Game shows were popular programming in the early days of television, but they dropped off the viewing radar in the 1950s when it was revealed that cheating was rampant on such hit shows as The $64,000 Question. By the mid-1960s and 1970s forgiving viewers were again tuning in to game shows, including The Gong Show, The Price Is Right, and The $10,000 Pyramid. Seeing a unique niche, in December 1994 the Game Show Network hit the airwaves. The new network, jointly owned by Sony Pictures Entertainment and Liberty Media Corporation, offered cable subscribers 24 hours of nonstop programming from its library of classic game shows. In addition to The Price is Right, GSN's library included Match Game, Password, Family Feud, and To Tell the Truth. For insomniac gamers, the network offered Black & White Overnight, a block of programming that featured game shows from the 1950s and 1960s, such as I've Got a Secret, Beat the Clock, and What's My Line?

But despite a full programming line up and a base of 25 million subscribers, by 2000 the network was struggling to survive. To attract a broader audience GSN added new programming that allowed viewers to participate in the on-air games; they could win money or other prizes by playing along while watching the program and calling a special telephone number. Noting that game shows were interactive by nature—viewers often shouted answers at their televisions before the on-screen contestants responded—the network also moved playing opportunities to the Internet. Gamers could go online and play a game while it was on television. Other additions were new game shows original to the network, including 3's a Crowd, and special-event programming such as Y2PLAY, which ran on New Year's Eve 1999 and featured the final episodes of popular game shows of the past. The "You Know You Know" campaign, the network's first marketing effort, was launched in 2000 in an attempt to expand GSN's reach and to increase consumer awareness of the network.

INTERACTIVE SITE LETS GAMERS PLAY ON TV AND WEB

Game Show Network fans were able to be active participants in their favorite games without leaving the comfort of their living rooms. The network's updated interactive website, gameshownetwork.com, included features that enabled players to watch a game on television while playing along on the Internet. As part of the website's launch the network gave players a chance win more than $10,000 in prize money playing "What's in the Box," a trivia-type game. Also available on the site was related merchandise for sale, such as Hollywood Square T-shirts. For viewers who listed game show-hosts among their heroes, the site gave them a chance to chat online with such legends as Wink Martindale, who hosted 19 game shows during his career, including Tic-Tac-Dough.

TARGET MARKET

When it was introduced, the Game Show Network struggled under the perception that game shows only attracted older, less-upscale audiences. It also had to change perceptions that successful shows such as Jeopardy were known as "quiz shows" but that programs called "game shows" were losers. GSN founder and president Michael Fleming said that the challenge was getting out the message that game shows had a broad appeal for all audience demographics, from preteens to older viewers. Early in 2000 GSN executives reported that its viewer base of 25 million subscribers was expected to double by 2003. That prediction of increased viewers was based in part on the success of game-show programming on non-cable networks, such as ABC's Who Wants to be a Millionaire, which pushed cable operators to take a closer look at the Game Show Network.

While the "You Know You Know" campaign's primary target was households with cable providers offering GSN, it was presented in a way that encouraged game-show fans not receiving the network to request that their cable ompanies add the channel. The campaign also was designed to tickle the secret superiority complex of many average game-show viewers—those viewers who sat on their sofas in front of their televisions and shouted out the correct answers before the game's on-air contestants.

COMPETITION

In the 1990s viewership of the big-four television networks—ABC, CBS, NBC, and FOX—was steadily declining, and cable channels were gaining viewers. In addition, the Game Show Network was in the unusual position of trying to woo viewers away from competing cable networks at a time when viewers were asking for fewer game shows and more educational fare. A 1997 Wall Street Journal poll indicated that 79 percent of respondents wanted television programming to include more documentaries and shows related to history and the arts, while 60 percent wanted to see fewer game shows.

As the Game Show Network moved ahead with plans to boost its program lineup with a new game show set in the Mall of America in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and with interactive gaming options on its website, cable channels Bravo and Discovery were applying similar strategies to attract viewers. Bravo, the artsy cable channel that sent programming into 79 million U.S. homes, turned to England when it decided to add a new show to its offerings. The new series, Cold Feet, was added to the 2001 program mix along with the long-running hit shows Queer Eye for the Straight Guy and Inside the Actors Studio. The new program was supported by a marketing campaign that included television, radio, and print advertising as well as Internet marketing. Also in 2001 the network gave a fresh look to its year-old tagline, "Not your everyday . . . everyday on Bravo Network," which had helped increase viewership by about 30 percent after its introduction. The network's revamped on-air look was designed to capture the attention of its target audience, viewers between 25 and 54 years old with discriminating tastes. Besides on-air ads that featured images of average people doing everyday things such as answering the phone, the campaign included print ads and website tie-ins.

In 2000 the Discovery Channel, a cable network with a subscriber base of 78 million homes and best known for its spectacular documentaries, turned its advertising focus to its Internet division, Discovery.com. The new ''Two Guys'' campaign, described as humorous and edgy, had the tagline ''Discover something new every day.'' Although the commercials remained loyal to the Discovery brand, complete with close-ups of insects and flaming meteors, they had a twist designed to appeal to younger viewers. In one spot, mosquitoes landed on a man's arm, but a closer look revealed the insects to be two men dressed as bugs. As the bug-men began sucking their victim's blood through straws, one bug was smashed, in true mosquito style, by the victim. Another spot featured two men dressed as meteors. When one man commented that meteors burned up in the Earth's atmosphere, there was a flash and the camera showed both men bursting into flames. The Discovery.com campaign included TV spots on the Discovery Channel as well as print and online ads. Despite its popularity with viewers—the ads increased the number of Internet users logging onto Discovery.com by one percentage point—the campaign had been canceled by the end of the year, with the network offering no explanation for the decision.

ABC and NBC were also trying to win back defecting viewers and to keep viewers who continued to tune in. Both networks had launched major marketing campaigns in late 1997. ABC's ''TV Is Good'' campaign included ads in newspapers and magazines as well as television spots. NBC's campaign, ''Must See TV,'' took a similar approach. In addition, ABC offered direct competition to the Game Show Network with its game shows Wheel of Fortune and Jeopardy, two of the highest-rated first-run syndicated shows on television.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The GSN's ''You Know You Know'' campaign was the network's first foray into consumer marketing since its inception in 1995. The brand-awareness campaign kicked off in March 2000 with three television spots in limited markets that included Boston and Philadelphia. Also a part of the campaign were outdoor ads and other promotional events. The campaign was multipurposed: it was designed to encourage cable operators not offering the network to subscribers to add GSN to their channels, and it was aimed at getting the cable and satellite subscribers who were already receiving the channel to tune in and watch.

''You Know You Know'' television spots, which ran on cable channels such as Comedy Central, Lifetime, and Nickelodeon (during its ''Nick at Nite'' programming), featured ordinary people in unusual situations, each repeating the same word. At the end of each commercial it was revealed the people were shouting the answer to a game-show question on television. In one spot a woman getting a massage shouted, ''Sputnik,'' while another woman checking coats for customers shouted the same word, and a man in an office did also. The camera shifted to show a woman on television asking, ''Sky Lab?'' A buzzer sounded, the woman on television lost, and it became clear that the correct answer was ''Sputnik.'' The tagline ''You Know You Know'' followed. In the ''Botulism'' spot the incorrect answer was ''salmonella,'' and the wrong word in the ''Marsupial'' spot was ''rodent.''

The television portion of the campaign was supplemented by a live contest that featured a GSN van towing a huge box to different locations with the question, ''What's in the Box?'' Clues about what was in the box were announced each day. Contestants were able to register their guesses with either local sponsors of the game or by calling a posted phone number.

In an effort to further promote its brand, in August the campaign was expanded to include seven additional markets: Sacramento, Los Angeles, Saint Louis, Kansas City, Indianapolis, Charlotte, and Raleigh-Durham. The network explained that the decision was made to expand the campaign because it resonated well with cable providers and consumers. ''These spots do an incredible job capturing the fun, unpredictable, and involving nature of game shows. . . . By expanding the reach of the campaign, we can continue to increase GSN awareness and encourage consumers to tune in to GSN,'' a company spokesman said.

OUTCOME

The ''You Know You Know'' campaign was named one of the 20 best advertising spots of 2000 by Adweek. Additional accolades for the campaign quickly followed. The ''Botulism'' television spot won a Silver Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, and the ''Marsupial'' spot was included on the Cannes Lion Shortlist. The Game Show Network also earned two Promax Judge's Choice awards, given for overall outstanding work by Promax & BDA, an international association of promotion, marketing, and design professionals in electronic media. Promax presented the entire campaign with a Gold Award in its Branding and Imaging category, and the ''Sputnik'' spot was recognized separately. Silver and Bronze Clio Awards and a nomination for a Mark Award (an honor given out by the Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing) in recognition of excellence in cable-television marketing, were added to the campaign's honors.

Dena Kaplan, the network's senior vice president of marketing, said that the success of the campaign exceeded the company's expectations. Business Wire quoted Kaplan as stating, "It is exciting to see the 'You Know You Know' television campaign play well with consumers as well as the advertising community. Our brand campaign has been successful in expanding the awareness and distribution of the network."

FURTHER READING

Adalian, Josef. "All-Game Network Plans Next Steps." Variety, January 1, 2000.

"Bravo, Game Show Plan Series Pushes." Multichannel News, November 13, 2000.

"Game Show Network Debuts Its First Consumer Marketing Campaign." Business Wire, April 3, 2000.

"Game Show Network Hits 30 Million Subscribers." Business Wire, November 28, 2000.

"Game Show Network Receives Cannes 2001 Lion Award and Prestigious Promax Judge's Choice Recognition for 'You Know You Know' Marketing Campaign." Business Wire, July 11, 2001.

"Game Show Network Relaunches gameshownetwork.com, the One-Stop Game Show Site on the Internet." Business Wire, February 18, 2000.

"Game Show Network You Know You Know Clio." Business Wire, June 7, 2001.

"Game Show Network's First Consumer Marketing Campaign Expands Its Reach." Business Wire, August 3, 2000.

"Game Show Network's First Consumer Marketing Campaign Honored as One of Year's Best." Business Wire, March 6, 2001.

Hogan, Monica. "Bravo Updates On-Air Look." Multichannel News, February 5, 2001.

Lipschultz, David. "Sony Spies a Jackpot." Internet World, April 1, 2000.

Norton, Justin M. "Discovery.com Debuts 'Two Guys." Adweek, June 19, 2000, p. 7.

Voight, Joan. "TBWA Touts Game Show Network," Adweek (western ed.), April 10, 2000, p. 9.

"The Work." Advertising Age's Creativity, May 1, 2000, p. 12.

Rayna Bailey

Gap Inc.

2 Folsom Street
San Francisco, California 94105
USA
Telephone: (800) 333-7899
Fax: (415) 427-2553
Web site: www.gap.com

■■■

FOR EVERY GENERATION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1999 Gap Inc., with a reputation for offering consumers affordable casual clothing basics such as khakis, jeans, and T-shirts, shifted its marketing focus to teen shoppers. To attract teens to its stores, Gap began offering trendy merchandise such as glitter-decorated denim jackets and body-hugging shirts. The strategy backfired when Gap's core customers, baby boomers who had relied on the chain's basic, casual styles, took their clothing dollars elsewhere. Gap's sales went into a downward spiral, and in April 2002 the company reported a 24 percent drop in sales at stores that had been open for a year or more.

In 2002, in an effort to win back its core customers and reverse its declining sales, Gap again changed its focus. Working with the New York–based advertising agency Laird + Partners, the chain launched a global marketing campaign titled "For Every Generation," which was aimed at a broader audience. Although executives declined to release the campaign's budget, a spokesman for Laird + Partners stated that it was one of the largest projects Gap had undertaken in several years. The campaign included television spots, print and billboard ads, and direct mailings. Commercials featured a roster of some 50 celebrities dressed in their own Gap clothes.

By the end of 2002 it had become clear that Gap's marketing strategy had accomplished its goal. Prior to the campaign's launch, the chain had reported 29 consecutive months of declining sales. Following its launch in October 2002, Gap's sales were on the rise, up 1 percent compared with a 17 percent drop in the same month the previous year. In addition USA Today's weekly poll Ad Track concluded that consumers, especially adults between the ages of 25 and 64, found the ads highly appealing.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1969 Doris and Don Fisher opened the first Gap store in San Francisco. According to the company Don Fisher's motivation for opening the store was "to make it easier to find a pair of jeans." In an effort to update the look of its merchandise, Gap in the late 1990s turned away from its founder's original idea and began selling trendy fashions geared toward teens instead of the basics preferred by baby boomers. As a result it lost many of its core customers, sending the company into a financial free fall. In 1999, prior to the shift in product, the company had reported $1.13 billion in earnings. After the switch in 2001 Gap reported a loss of $7.8 million. In early 2002 Gap reported its worst financial performance in its 30-year history.

Gap's product switch was partly a result of a shift, in the late 1990s, in fashion trends away from basic casual clothes to a flashier look favored by young women. In 2002 the Washington Times described Gap's product change as a fashion faux pas. The paper stated, "Gap's problems started well before this season as the company moved away from the look that made it famous and added trendy clothes like denim jackets with glitter and tight-fitting fashions to its product mix." Customers walking into their favorite Gap store in search of a pair of basic khakis fled when they instead saw orange and turquoise cropped jeans embellished with silver studs. The chain also found itself losing business to its sister chain, Old Navy (also owned by Gap Inc.), which sold products similar to Gap's but at lower prices. Further confounding Gap Inc. was what many analysts saw as the company's lack of focus when it came to establishing an identity for the Gap brand that would help distinguish it from Old Navy.

When the brand launched its new campaign in 2002, it returned to its roots and original philosophy of enabling people of all ages to buy Gap products and adapt them to fit their personal styles. The company admitted that chasing fickle teens with trendy clothes was a no-win plan. Kyle Andrew, vice president of marketing for Gap, said in a Women's Wear Daily interview, "Let Gap be Gap. Let's not try to be trendy." For the new campaign, in addition to returning to its offerings of basic jeans, khakis, and tees, the company also revived and slightly modified a slogan it had used in the past but had failed to take full advantage of: "For every generation, there's a Gap."

GAP, OLD NAVY, AND BANANA REPUBLIC

With Gap promoting the idea that it was for everybody, Women's Wear Daily wondered who Gap Inc. expected to shop at its other chains, Old Navy and Banana Republic. Gap's vice president of marketing, Kyle Andrew, explained that many customers would shop at all three chains but that efforts were being made to separate the brands. "Old Navy is more family and value shopping. Gap can move up to be a more stylish place, and Banana Republic can move up to be an even more stylish place." Gap was also especially known for its jeans, a feature the company emphasized in its fall 2002 line. By 2002 Old Navy was being pressured by—and losing customers to—discount stores that carried similar merchandise but that also offered the convenience of one-stop shopping. Because of its higher customer profile and merchandise offerings that were trendier or more stylish, the other store in the trio, Banana Republic, was having fewer problems keeping its customers.

TARGET MARKET

Although Gap's "For Every Generation" campaign alienated trend-obsessed teens, it shifted the company's focus back to a broader range of customers. The consumers Gap's new campaign targeted ranged from infants to senior citizens. It also was designed to win back its former core customers, baby boomers who had always relied on the chain's quality, affordable basic clothing styles.

Explaining the new strategy, company president and CEO Millard Drexler told Business Wire, "Gap speaks a common language that everyone understands, and this campaign reflects the connection that people of all ages have with Gap. Whether you are six, sixteen or sixty, nothing is more universal than a pair of Gap jeans. That's the kind of classic style, product and message we stand for."

COMPETITION

As Gap struggled to reverse more than 22 months of negative same-store sales, one of its top competitors, Abercrombie & Fitch, was embroiled in its own problems related to marketing and product offerings that many considered offensive. Also among Gap's top competitors was American Eagle Outfitters, which was on the opposite end of the marketing spectrum from Abercrombie, with climbing sales and a reputation for offering wholesome advertising and merchandise.

Abercrombie & Fitch was founded in 1892 as a purveyor of quality camping, hunting, and fishing clothing and equipment, and by 1917 it was the world's largest sporting-goods store. Among the store's customers were Teddy Roosevelt, who purchased gear at the store before setting off on an African safari, and Ernest Hemingway. In 1988 the chain was bought by the Limited (which also owned Victoria's Secret) and shifted from selling sporting clothes and equipment to outfitting suburban kids.

The Limited phased out its ownership in 1998, and Abercrombie became an independent public company. The chain's marketing and merchandise, produced in-house, turned toward the explicit and sexual. In 2002 the company was listed by PR Newswire as producing one of the 10 worst public relations blunders of the year. The publication reported that Abercrombie had offended the public with its thong underwear for prepubescent girls and its T-shirts that portrayed stereotyped images of Asian-Americans. Despite pulling the controversial merchandise from its product line, the company remained known for the "sex sells" theme in its marketing. The company's 2002 catalog, titled "XXX," included sexually suggestive photographs on more than half of its 280 pages. Despite consumer complaints about its merchandise, Abercrombie reported a 21 percent sales increase in October 2002 compared with the same period the previous year. It noted, however, that same-store sales had dropped 5 percent from January through November 2002.

American Eagle Outfitters, founded in 1977, was originally known for selling men's outdoor gear. In 1992 it underwent a rebranding and became known for its classic American, mainstream style, which successfully appealed to its target market: mature teens and young adults. By 1997 the chain had begun making additional improvements to its selection of merchandise, and it introduced marketing—which included ads in such magazines as Mademoiselle, Seventeen, and Spin—intended to broaden the brand's customer base by promoting its affordable, casual, and basic clothing. American Eagle reported that first-quarter sales overall in 2002 were up 14.9 percent over the same period in the previous year; however, same-store sales for the first quarter of 2002 were down about 2 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As Gap's "For Every Generation" campaign was prepared for its launch, a company spokesman said that the new marketing strategy had been created to broaden its appeal to consumers and to attract people of all ages back to the chain. In addition the campaign was the first one the company had used for all Gap divisions, including adult, kids, and baby.

The campaign starred some 50 celebrities of all ages from a variety of fields (such as movies, music, art, and fashion) in TV spots and print ads. The latter included a 48-page portfolio in Vanity Fair magazine. Personalities featured in the print campaign ranged from country music icon Willie Nelson and up-and-coming singer Taryn Manning to comedian Whoopi Goldberg. Among the film stars dressing in their favorite Gap fashions for the ads were Sissy Spacek, Lauren Hutton, Salma Hayek, and Christian Slater. Trey Laird, president and executive creative director of Laird + Partners, explained to Business Wire, "We selected a broad range of personalities who each have a highly defined individual style. We worked with each person to create their own look in Gap jeans—keeping it personal, authentic and real."

Each ad featured a celebrity wearing a pair of Gap jeans combined with other Gap items as well as their own clothes and accessories. Nelson appeared in a TV spot wearing his Gap jeans and performing a guitar version of the Hank Williams classic "Move It On Over." Another TV spot starred models Shalom Harlow and Alek Wek showing off the comfort and style of their Gap jeans while dancing to the 1960s hit song "Bend Me, Shape Me." In one print ad Kelly Klein, socialite, photographer, and ex-wife of fashion designer Calvin Klein, paired her Gap jeans with one of her favorite lacy tops.

OUTCOME

With more than two years of negative same-store sales results at the end of 2002, following the launch of its "For Every Generation" campaign, the company reported that, while its earnings remained down, they still came in above expectations. Although in October its same-store sales had been up only 1 percent, this was a turnaround from a 17 percent drop during that month the previous year. A report in USA Today stated that, based on the data, "It looks like Gap's more familiar basic merchandise and new ad campaign are working." Gap executives also said that the campaign appeared to be moving the company back in the right direction.

According to information gathered by Ad Track, USA Today 's weekly consumer poll, about 21 percent of those surveyed liked the ads "a lot." The commercials also scored higher with two key groups—women and adults ages 25 to 64—indicating that Gap was reconnecting with its former core customers. An article in Women's Wear Daily noted that Gap's "increased advertising, and increasingly amusing advertising, [had] helped expand sales in recent months" for the retailer. It further noted that, while the chain's rebirth was not complete, it was clearly occurring.

FURTHER READING

"Abercrombie & Fitch, Martha Stewart, Jerry Falwell, N.Y. Yankees on List of 10 Worst 2002 PR Gaffes: Eighth Annual PR Blunders List Unveiled." PR Newswire, December 5, 2002.

"American Eagle Outfitters Wins Abercrombie & Fitch Lawsuit in U.S. Court of Appeals: For the Third Time in Four Years AE Prevails in Court against A & F." PR Newswire, February 18, 2002.

Atkinson, William. "Specialty Apparel Retail Survivors." Shopping Center World, May 1, 2002.

De Marco, Donna. "Gap Goes Back to Basics to Stop Sales Slouch: Retailer Returns to Less Flashy Clothes." Washington Times, May 10, 2002.

Forson, Lindsye. "Abercrombie & Fitch Too Sexy for Young Kids." Battalion, June 5, 2002.

"Gap Launches 'For Every Generation.' " Business Wire, August 8, 2002.

Howard, Theresa. "Gap Swings Back into Action." USA Today, November 18, 2002.

Lockwood, Lisa. "Gap's New Ad Plan: Market to Boomers, Not to Fickle Teens." Women's Wear Daily, August 6, 2002.

———. "Gap's New Ads Target Former Customers: Troubled Specialty Store Chain Will Kick Off New Television Campaign on Aug. 15." Daily News Record, August 12, 2002.

———. "Laird Adds Gap Stores Account to His Fledgling Ad Agency." Women's Wear Daily, March 14, 2002.

Weitzman, Jennifer. "Gap's Transition." Women's Wear Daily, December 10, 2002.

———. "Second Straight Profit for Gap." Women's Wear Daily, August 16, 2002.

Young, Kristin. "Chains Aim at Core." Women's Wear Daily, August 21, 2002.

Rayna Bailey

HOW DO YOU WEAR IT? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

As Gap, Inc., approached its 35th birthday in early 2004, the 1,500-store chain was experiencing an upswing in profits and sales, reporting steady increases since 2002. First-quarter profits in 2004 were up 55 percent, and sales were up 9.4 percent compared with the same period the previous year. To celebrate its birthday and maintain the profit and sales momentum, Gap charged its advertising agency, Laird + Partners, New York, with creating a new global marketing campaign to be released in summer 2004.

For the "How Do You Wear It?" campaign Laird + Partners turned to what had worked well for the chain in the past: celebrity-centered television spots and print ads. Signed on as the celebrity spokeswoman was Sex and the City star and fashion idol Sarah Jessica Parker. Although no specific budget for the campaign was available, Adweek reported that Gap's advertising budget the previous year was $140 million. Further, Gap reportedly paid Parker $38 million for her three-season, six-month contract. Besides Parker, other celebrities featured in the campaign's different television spots and print ads included singer Lenny Kravitz, actress Jada Pinkett Smith, and New England Patriots football star Tom Brady.

Despite the success of previous celebrity-centered campaigns, Gap's new effort failed to drive sales or resonate with consumers. Within months of the campaign's start Gap reported its worst overall sales performance in two years. The spokeswoman of the campaign, Parker, also took a hit as consumers posted their criticisms on the Internet. When Parker's contract expired in spring 2005, Gap replaced her with a new spokeswoman: 17-year-old British singing star Joss Stone.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Gap chain of retail clothing stores got its start in 1969, when the first store was opened in San Francisco by Doris and Don Fisher. Motivated by the desire to provide customers with an easy option for finding jeans, when the store opened, it sold only one product: Levi's jeans for men and women. By 1970 Gap had grown to six stores, and in 1974 the rapidly expanding chain introduced its own private-label jeans as well as accessories. Over time Gap expanded its brand to include other basic casual styles, such as khakis and tees for men, women, and children. It stopped selling Levi's in 1991. In late 1999 the chain was beginning to show its age, and as its marketing focus and product mix shifted from its core customers—baby boomers—to teens, sales fell into a steady 22-month decline. In April 2002 the chain reported a 24 percent drop in sales at stores open at least one year. Furthermore, in May of that year the company reported that overall sales for the month fell to $962 million compared with sales of $1.2 billion for the same month one year earlier.

In an effort to reverse the downward spiral, in 2002 Gap replaced its agency, Modernista! of Boston, with New York–based advertising agency Laird + Partners. The agency worked with the chain's in-house marketing team on a new advertising campaign that would target a broader audience than the teens on whom Gap had been focusing. The partnership resulted in the "For Every Generation" campaign. Featuring a list of celebrities ranging from country-music icon Willie Nelson to comedian Whoopie Goldberg and actress Christina Ricci, the campaign moved Gap back to its roots of offering basic casual clothing for consumers of all ages and showed how Gap fashions were adaptable to each person's individual style. Following the campaign's introduction, the chain reported a sales increase of 1 percent in October 2002. While small, the sales improvement was significant considering the 17 percent drop reported for October 2001.

In 2004, as the chain prepared to celebrate its 35th anniversary, Gap also planned to release a new global marketing campaign. Based on the success of its celebrity-centered campaigns, which included the first such effort, "Individuals of Style," which ran from 1988 through 1993, and the 2002 "For Every Generation" campaign, Gap and its agency stuck with what had worked in the past. Laird + Partners' new campaign, "How Do You Wear It?" featured celebrity and fashion icon Sarah Jessica Parker as well as other celebrities who would connect with consumers and send the message that Gap offered clothes that enabled people to express their individual style.

TARGET MARKET

Through the use of celebrities of all ages and genders in its marketing campaigns, Gap attempted to reach a broad range of consumers: men and women, teens to baby boomers. Earlier campaigns featured celebrities such as counterculture writer Jack Kerouac, country-music elder statesman Willie Nelson, and 20-something actress Christina Ricci wearing Gap clothes. The campaigns were designed to send the message that everyone, regardless of age or sex, could find a Gap style perfectly suited or adaptable to his or her personal taste.

When, in 2004, the chain released its "How Do You Wear It?" campaign with 39-year-old actress Sarah Jessica Parker as its spokeswoman, it was clear that women were the target market. Parker's TV show Sex and the City was highly popular with women. In addition, the actress was the ideal person to convey the idea of individuality, because she was closely linked with her character's eclectic, cutting-edge style, a combination of vintage and couture clothes and pricey Manolo Blahnik shoes. According to a Gap press release, Parker's spots were intended to connect with "women of all ages and to help them understand the versatility of our products and our spirit of individual style." Not forgetting its male target, for some spots Gap's campaign partnered Parker with singer Lenny Kravitz, also wearing Gap clothes, while additional print ads featured top athletes and actors who resonated with male consumers.

COMPETITION

American Eagle Outfitters, Inc. (AE), which had 828 shopping-mall-based stores scattered throughout the United States and Canada in 2004, got its start in 1977 selling outdoor gear. By 1992 the retailer's product line had been expanded to include a wide selection of casual attire, from polo shirts and khaki pants to shorts, sweaters, and skirts. For the brand's target market—men and women 15 to 25 years old—the high quality and reasonable prices of AE's merchandise were particularly appealing. By 2004 the chain was ranked 9th among the country's top 10 specialty retailers. The company reported a 19.9 percent sales jump to $350 million in the three months ended May 2004 compared to the same period the previous year.

Keeping its marketing eye on its target audience of high school and college students, in 2004 AE began a new marketing campaign, "AE Jeans Will Rock You." The campaign kicked off in September at 22 college football stadiums across the country. Each time the 1977 hit rock song We Will Rock You by Queen was played during football games, AE product giveaways were announced. To reach the high-school crowd, campaign television spots featuring the Queen song aired on MTV as teens prepared to go back to school. In addition to its new marketing campaign, in 2004 AE also began a redesign of its stores, replacing its original beach-house-themed decor with a trendy city-lofts theme featuring concrete floors, high ceilings with skylights, and plasma televisions running AE ad spots.

Abercrombie & Fitch (A & F) was also founded as a provider of outdoor gear. But unlike AE, which was a relative newcomer in the market, A & F opened its doors in 1892 and had counted author Ernest Hemingway and U.S. president Theodore Roosevelt among its clients. In 1988 the chain was bought by the Limited, which operated the women's clothing chains the Limited and Victoria's Secret. After the acquisition A & F's product focus shifted from outdoor gear to contemporary casual clothes for upper-class suburban teens and 20-somethings. Ten years after its purchase of A & F the Limited phased out its ownership of the chain. As an independent public company, A & F took a new approach to its marketing strategy.

GAP HOPES TO LURE SHOPPERS WITH NEW STORE DESIGNS

The year 2005 was marked by store makeovers for San Francisco–based clothing chain Gap, Inc. In April the chain reopened seven of its stores in Colorado following extensive remodeling. The new store designs were planned with older consumers with deeper pockets in mind, rather than the teens it had been targeting previously. The overhaul was also the first store-upgrading effort undertaken by the chain in at least 10 years. Hoping to win back its core customers—baby boomers—who had fled the Gap when its merchandise and advertising began targeting a younger crowd, the redesigned stores offered a variety of perks. Included was free bottled water in the dressing rooms and a lounge area with magazines, newspapers, and books for shoppers to read while taking a break. The redesigned Colorado stores were prototypes for all Gap stores, with a nationwide store renovation on the schedule. Later in 2005 the Gap introduced a new store design in Omaha, Nebraska, that included four of the chain's brands—Gap, GapKids, BabyGap, and GapBody—under one roof.

In 2002 the chain's in-house marketing team developed a campaign that included a 280-page sales catalog titled "XXX." The title clearly portrayed the catalog's contents, which featured sexually suggestive photographs on more than half its pages. The catalog targeted high school and college students, but it raised the ire of parents and consumer watchdogs. It also pushed sales at the chain up 18 percent. By 2004, however, A & F was experiencing a sales decline, reporting an 11 percent drop in same-store sales in the quarter that ended January 2004. For the same quarter, overall sales chain-wide inched up slightly (4.8 percent) to $560.4 million. Acknowledging that the chain's marketing had occasionally crossed the line, A & F's chief executive officer, Michael Jeffries, told Women's Wear Daily of plans for changes to the strategy. A & F introduced a new national advertising campaign in 2004 that included ads in magazines and outdoors as well as a 60-page catalog. The promised changes to its marketing strategy were evident. While the catalog featured photos of bare-chested young men and young women in bathing suits or skimpy outfits, it lacked the nude models in suggestive poses found in previous publications. The summer 2004 catalog was also plastic-wrapped and had a tag noting that it was not for sale to anyone under 18 years old.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Since the 1980s Gap had relied on celebrities to promote its brand in several advertising campaigns. Celebrities were featured in its "Individuals of Style" campaign, which ran for six years beginning in 1988, and in its "For Every Generation" campaign, which was created for Gap in 2002 by Laird + Partners. Based on the success of its previous celebrity-centered campaigns, when Laird + Partners designed its "How Do You Wear It?" campaign for Gap, stars were front and center in the television spots and print ads. Signed to a three-season, six-month, $38 million contract as the campaign's spokeswoman was actress Sarah Jessica Parker, known for her role as fashionista Carrie Bradshaw on the hit television show Sex and the City.

A 90-second television spot featuring Parker and musician Lenny Kravitz first aired during the MTV Video Music Awards in August 2004. In the spot Parker danced while Kravitz performed a mix of his songs Lady and Are You Gonna Go My Way. As Kravitz sang and played the electric guitar, Parker added to her outfit, showing the variety of ways that Gap jeans could be worn. Eventually six different versions of Parker appeared to be dancing with Kravitz. Parker was shown in Gap jeans customized with everything from velvet ribbons to millions of dollars worth of antique jewelry. During the spot Kravitz's Gap clothes also were customized with a variety of items, including studs, grommets, and gold-braided ribbon. The campaign also included a series of 30-second spots and 15-second teaser spots, which aired on all major networks and cable channels in the United States and Canada.

Print ads began running in September in national magazines, including Vogue, Vanity Fair, Harper's Bazaar, and Essence. In addition to Parker, the print ads featured other stars from television, music, fashion, and sports, such as actresses Jada Pinkett Smith and Jessica Alba. Ads also broke in men's magazines such as GQ and Details; these versions featured Kravitz as well as New England Patriot football star Tom Brady and actors Michael Vartan and Josh Duhamel.

Other marketing elements of the campaign were outdoor, direct mail, in-store, and online efforts. The online aspect included a special website, www.howdoyou.com, that allowed customers to post photos of themselves showing how they personalized their Gap clothes. Customers who logged onto the site could also vote for their favorites of the posted pictures, view the campaign's TV spots, and get fall fashion tips.

OUTCOME

Although the strategy of relying on celebrities to promote its brand worked for Gap in the late 1980s through the early 1990s, the idea seemed to fall flat in the first decade of the new century. The chain's "Individuals of Style" campaign, which ran from 1988 through 1993 and featured a variety of celebrities, boosted sales and earnings an average of 43 percent from 1990 to 1993. The sales growth for 1993 alone was a reported 30 percent. In 2002 the chain released a campaign, "For Every Generation," that also featured a long list of stars and contributed to a slight turnaround in declining sales. The celebrity spokespersons also helped establish Gap's reputation as a cool brand. But whether it was a sign of changing consumer tastes or the increasing retail options available to shoppers, Gap's subsequent celebrity-centered campaigns, including a single television spot featuring singers Madonna and Missy Elliot, failed to resonate with customers. Wendy Liebmann, president of the New York–based marketing consulting firm WSL Strategic Retail, told Advertising Age that the Gap had lost its meaning and edge. She said, "It's the name everyone knows but aren't real sure what it stands for anymore . . . there are other choices that mean more to consumers anyway today."

The 2004 "How Do You Wear It?" campaign also failed to accomplish its goal of driving sales, and despite her image as a fashion icon, its celebrity spokesperson, Sarah Jessica Parker, failed to enhance Gap's former cool image. The Advertising Age report stated that, following the campaign's introduction, the chain reported its worst sales performance since 2002. Additionally, comments that consumers posted about the advertisements on the New York–based blog Gothamist (www.gothamist.com) were generally less than kind about both the Gap clothing featured in the spots and about its celebrity spokeswoman. One writer described the print ad in which Parker had cut her Gap jeans off at the knees and embellished them with black velvet bows as "weird." Another described Parker's appearance in the same ad as looking like "Little Bo Peep on acid." Another asked the question, "Could those pants be any less flattering?"

In March 2005, just weeks after announcing a new series of advertisements featuring Parker, the star's three-season contract with Gap expired, and the chain reported that it was replacing her with a new celebrity spokeswoman: up-and-coming 17-year-old British singing sensation Joss Stone.

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Deborah. "Gap Opens 4 Stores under a Single Roof." Omaha (NE) World-Herald, November 9, 2005.

"American Eagle Outfitters Reinforces 'AE Jeans Will Rock You Campaign' with Innovative Advertising Initiative." Business Wire, September 29, 2004.

Arellano, Kristi. "Gap Upgrades Design of Colorado Stores to Cater to Older, Upscale Customer." Denver Post, April 22, 2005.

Frazier, Mya. "Star-Struck Gap Follows Celebs off a Sales Cliff; News Analysis: Decline Due to Many Factors, but Ad Campaign Isn't Helping." Advertising Age, November 28, 2005.

"Gap Taps Sarah Jessica Parker for Ads." Adweek, May 28, 2004.

Greenberg, Julee. "American Eagle's City Escape (American Eagle Outfitters Revamps Store Design)." Women's Wear Daily, June 17, 2004.

"In Brief: Adidas Olympic Sponsorship. . .Trimming Down. . .No Gaps." Women's Wear Daily, January 25, 2005.

"Parker Parked? Gap Gets Stone(d)." Cincinnati (OH) Post, March 16, 2005.

Roberts, Roxanne. "40, but Sporting a $38 Million Figure." Washington Post, March 23, 2005.

"Sarah Jessica Parker and Lenny Kravitz Show Us How They Wear It in New Gap TV Campaign." PR Newswire, August 27, 2004.

"Sarah Jessica Parker Enjoys Being a Girl in Gap's New Spring TV Spot." PR Newswire, March 1, 2005.

Weitzman, Jennifer. "A&F to Revamp Approach." Women's Wear Daily, February 18, 2004.

Williams, Mark. "Abercrombie's Cover-Up/Retailer's New Photo Essay: More Clothes, Less Skin." Cincinnati (OH) Post, June 16, 2004.

Young, Kristin. "Sarah Jessica Parker Inks Deal with Gap." Women's Wear Daily, May 27, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

KHAKIS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

On April 23, 1998, Gap Inc. launched a global advertising campaign for its chain of nearly 1,600 casual-clothing stores. This campaign, created by Gap's in-house agency, Gap Direct, focused on the company's khaki pants. The U.S. khakis market was growing at a rapid rate. Younger consumers fueled the expanding market as they increasingly eschewed blue jeans, the traditional badge of youth culture, because their baby-boomer parents often wore denim. Furthermore, "business casual" clothes, including khakis, were gaining acceptance as appropriate professional attire. In an effort to claim a greater portion of the khakis market, as well as to burnish the Gap brand, Gap dedicated an estimated $20 to $30 million to its 1998 "Khakis" campaign.

The initial three commercials sought to "reinvent khakis," according to a Gap news release. Each spot was set to a distinct type of music and featured active young adults sporting different styles of Gap khakis. In "Khakis Rock," skateboarders and in-line skaters executed moves to the music of the alternative rock band Crystal Method, while "Khakis Groove" portrayed energetic hip-hop dancers and funk music from Bill Mason. The most popular and acclaimed ad of the trilogy was "Khakis Swing," in which stylish khaki-wearers expertly swing danced to Louis Prima's "Jump, Jive an' Wail." The spots, which ran during such high-profile programs as Ally McBeal and ER, used Gap's trademark white background and showcased Gap's newest varieties of khakis—flat front, low rise, slim fit, and cargo. Print and outdoor ads also appeared in major markets and in national magazines such as Spin and Details. "It's about what you bring together to khakis, and what you want that look to say about you," a Gap representative stated in the May 25, 1998, Daily News Record in an effort to explain the underlying premise of the campaign. Once known as comfortable "old man's" clothes and then as the preppy pants of the 1980s, khakis were presented as the ultimate in cool in this campaign.

The campaign was an immediate success. Consumers were effusive about the commercials, and Gap's sales soared after the release of the ads. A USA Today AdTrack survey revealed that younger consumers—a key target for the campaign—responded particularly favorably to Gap's new message. By March 1999 the company had created a new trio of "Khakis" ads: "Khakis A-Go-Go," with a 1960s-inspired soundtrack; "Khaki Soul," set to soul music; and "Khaki Country," which featured line dancers and the music of country star Dwight Yokum.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Gap was founded in 1969 when Doris and Don Fisher opened a San Francisco store that primarily offered Levi's blue jeans. Although the couple had originally planned to name their business PAD, they settled instead on the Gap, in honor of the generation gap that defined the young baby boomer generation. The company rapidly expanded in the 1970s, debuting private-line labels, of which "Gap" eventually became the only brand offered in the stores. The company developed a loyal following of teenagers and young adults, who responded to the catchy "Fall Into the Gap" advertising campaign that ran from 1974 to 1979. In 1981 the Gap acquired the chain of Banana Republic stores, and in 1986 it launched its children's-clothing venture, GapKids.

A seminal moment in Gap history occurred in 1983 when Fischer brought aboard Mickey Drexler as his deputy. Not only did Drexler hire new designers and renovate stores, but he also honed and simplified the Gap's brand image. Gap's advertising reflected its new, carefully cultivated cachet. In 1988 the company began its "Individuals of Style" campaign, a series of striking black-and-white print ads that portrayed famous individuals in simple articles of Gap clothes. Actress Kim Basinger appeared in a crisp white Gap shirt and pearls, while Dizzy Gillespie donned a black turtleneck. As the May 15, 1998, edition of Women's Wear Daily explained, Gap "flouted the convention of showing fashion models in pretty poses, [instead] featuring poets and musicians." Gap continued this theme—described by Fortune as "extraordinary people in ordinary clothes"—in its 1993 to 1995 "Who wore khakis?" campaign. These print ads incorporated photos of past celebrities, such as Pablo Picasso, Marilyn Monroe, and Ernest Hemingway, clad in khakis.

Gap's design and marketing formula of studied simplicity proved imitable, however. "Apparel companies from J.C. Penney to Armani had started selling 'basics,'" said Fortune. With new competitors, such as Abercrombie & Fitch, gaining the loyalty of teenagers and 20-somethings, Gap's sales dwindled. By 1995 store sales were flat. As part of a broader effort to bolster both its sales and its image, Gap launched its first television campaign in 12 years in 1997 with ads for its Easy-Fit jeans. The campaign starred a variety of performers, including L.L. Cool J., Lena Horne, and David Arquette, and revived the "Fall Into the Gap" tag line. For its efforts Gap was named 1997 "Marketer of the Year" by Advertising Age.

TARGET MARKET

One of the primary target audiences of the "Khakis" campaign was teenagers. These members of the so-called Generation Y (or "echo boom") provided obvious opportunities to the company that could capture their allegiance. In 1999 there were 31 million consumers between the ages of 12 and 19, comprising 28 percent of the American population. This group spent an estimated $149 billion of its own money in 1998, according to Long Island (N.Y.) Newsday, and also heavily influenced many family purchasing decisions. In an effort to appeal to Generation Y, Gap sought to create "Khakis" commercials that expressed the values and activities of this segment. "Khakis Rock," for instance, featured in-line skating and skateboarding, sports that the November 9, 1998, Daily News Record labeled as "Gen Y pastimes." The khaki pants modeled in the spot were of the baggy style popular among teens. The music choice in "Khakis Rock"—the pulsing alternative sound of Crystal Method—was in tune with teens' tastes. The ad, which was produced to look more like a music video than a traditional commercial, was designed to appeal to a group raised on MTV. Although a Gap spokesperson cautioned the Newark (N.J.) Star-Ledger that the "Khakis" campaign was meant to curry favor with "all ages," she did emphasize that "we think the campaign is very young and high energy."

The "Khakis" campaign also attempted to court the notoriously cynical Generation X, those consumers born between 1964 and 1979. "X-ers are decidedly anti-marketing [and] anti-hype," an analyst told the Daily News Record. This demographic group, which came of age during economic recession and the onset of the AIDS epidemic, tended to be pessimistic and reluctant to respond to standard hard-sell advertising messages. "Khakis" ads were accordingly stylish in their execution but deliberately understated in their pitch. "With us, it's about entertaining as much as it is about fashion," a Gap spokesperson explained to the Chicago Tribune. The "retro" craze that captivated Generation Xers was also apparent in the "Khakis" campaign. Twenty-somethings in the 1990s embraced cocktails, cigars, and lounge music with a fervency that had eluded their parents, and "Khakis Swing" featured young people swing dancing with aplomb. Moreover, all the actors appearing in the "Khakis" ads were young adults, a calculated choice that conformed to Generation X's "prefer[ence for] images that portray people like themselves," according to the Daily News Record.

While the "Khakis" campaign tended to skew toward younger consumers, Gap took care not to alienate baby boomers. The "business-casual" boom of the 1990s meant that more employees—of all ages and positions—took to wearing khakis to work more often. Indeed, in September 1997, Gap handed out free khakis on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange and convinced the exchange to relax its strict suits-only dress code for one day. The "Khakis Swing" ad exploited boomers' "nostalgia for the old days," an industry analyst told the Daily News Record. In fact, the Daily News Record concluded that the "Khakis Swing" commercial "reach[ed] all three generations."

A SWINGING INFLUENCE

Although Gap's "Khakis Swing" commercial was influenced by the resurgence of "retro" culture among young consumers, the ad itself did much to boost further interest in swing dancing. "I think that ad did more for swing dance than it actually did for those pants," a swing commentator told the Quincy (Mass.) Patriot Ledger.

COMPETITION

Gap was not the only company seeking to capture younger consumers. Levi Strauss & Company launched its $50 million "One Leg At A Time" advertising campaign for its Dockers division in March, 1998. Founded in 1986, Dockers dominated the khaki sector, controlling 26 percent of the market in 1998. While Dockers had experienced considerable success with its "Nice Pants" campaign (which ran from 1995 through 1998), Dockers, like Gap, expected growth to come from Generation Xers and echo boomers, according to Advertising Age. This new campaign, conceived by Foote, Cone & Belding was intended to draw in younger consumers. "One Leg At A Time" had different components, including television commercials (which appeared during programming such as the NCAA basketball championships and prime-time shows), print, and outdoor spots. Dockers also utilized more unconventional marketing strategies. The brand sponsored independent film festivals, showed movie clips from these festivals on the walls of buildings in trendy neighborhoods, and sent free khakis to cutting-edge figures such as Harmon Lee and Omar Sosa. "We don't want to be the big corporation, banging you over the head with our message," a Dockers spokesperson told the Daily News Record. "We'll try to set ourselves apart by making ourselves a part of life on the street level." In July 1998, however, Dockers ended "One Leg At A Time," citing increased advertising pressure from Gap. In its place Dockers tried a new strategy when it "dropp[ed] the ordinary guy image it has had since its launch, [and] switch[ed] to a sexier approach," according to Advertising Age on January 18, 1999. Two new commercials—both of which featured attractive young men who receive considerable attention from women because of their pants—aired mostly during sports and male-oriented programming.

Gap faced other challengers as well. Like Dockers, the Haggar Clothing Company sold its khaki pants at retail stores. In June 1998 the company debuted print ads that portrayed model Billy Brown clad only in Haggar khakis. "The ad," said the Washington Post, "communicated the sentiment that khakis, specifically those from Haggar, are cool." Recognizing that women purchased nearly half of all men's clothing for their partners, Haggar's new campaign targeted females. Thus the ads appeared in publications popular among women, such as Glamour and Marie Claire. Tommy Hilfiger, a trendy casual-wear designer, represented an additional threat to Gap. Advertising Age called Hilfiger a "marketing titan" and the "sportswear choice" for fashion-minded 20- and 30-somethings. After launching a women's sportswear line in 1996 to augment its successful men's line, Hilfiger and Miramax films teamed up to tout the 1998 movie, The Faculty. Stars from the film appeared in print and television ads (wearing Hilfiger creations, of course) that ran on MTV, VH1, and Comedy Central and in magazines such as Teen People, Spin, Details, and Rolling Stone. Gap also faced competition from hip retail chains such as Abercrombie & Fitch, which targeted consumers below the age of 30. The bulk of Abercrombie & Fitch's sales were derived from its glossy catalogue, but the company also operated a chain of 159 stores across the United States.

MARKETING STRATEGY

A year before the launch of Gap's "Khakis" ads, the company's designers and marketers had determined that "1998 would be the year of the khaki," said Fortune. In addition to conceiving the campaign Gap developed new styles of the classic tan pants in hopes of capitalizing on booming khakis sales. (Total khaki sales were 12 percent higher in 1997 than 1996, and 1996 sales had been 22 percent higher than 1995.) While Gap certainly hoped to sell large quantities of khakis, the massive effort it devoted to the campaign undergirded its overarching goal: to strengthen and contemporize the Gap brand. Khakis offered the Gap a means to draw a broad cross-section of American consumers into the company's stores. As the Daily News Record asserted, "[i]t's rare for one item to stretch its legs from the golf clubhouse to urban streets to the corporate boardroom." Khakis did just this, however, proving to be popular school attire for teens, "casual day" garb for employees, and clubbing clothes for Generation Xers. The "Khakis" campaign attempted to reach all of these distinct demographic groups.

Since Gap sought to reach across demographic divides, the company used different media to carry its "Khakis" message. Television commercials were the foundation of the campaign. For the most part Gap selected programs that garnered a younger audience of Generation X and Generation Y viewers, including ER,

Ally McBeal, The Practice, and The X-Files. When the company "re-debuted" these ads in August 1998 it added to its roster Felicity, a hit show among teens, and Party of 5, a drama that had a cult-like following among teens and 20-somethings. Gap also ran "Khakis" commercials during more high-profile programming. In May 1998 the company spent an estimated $1.7 million to advertise on the final episode of the tremendously popular sitcom Seinfeld. The 1999 installment of "Khakis" ads first appeared during the Academy Awards telecast, which was a "major hit with women and young people and dr[ew] a more affluent audience than the Super Bowl," according to the San Jose Mercury News. Print "Khakis" ads were published in more youth-oriented magazines, such as Spin, Details, Vibe, Vanity Fair, Vogue, ESPN, Teen People, and Entertainment Weekly. Bus and billboard ads were also used in key markets.

Since the campaign had the dual purpose of enhancing the image of the overall Gap brand, the company was careful to ensure that the "Khakis" ads projected the Gap's desired image. The look and feel of the spots, with their stark, white backgrounds and minimalist feel, shared the design principle of Gap stores. Moreover, despite their music-video undercurrent, the commercials remained focused on Gap's khakis and the Gap logo that silently appeared at the end of each spot.

OUTCOME

The "Khakis" ad were lauded by viewers and critics. A USA Today AdTrack survey revealed that the spots were "very effective and very popular with consumers of all ages." The survey indicated that the "Khakis" spots scored "especially well among young consumers." Teen marketing studies showed that "Khakis" ads were the second most popular of any advertisement among teenagers and that consumers under 20 ranked Gap fifth among brands they liked most.

Advertising critics and apparel industry analysts were equally enthusiastic. The New York Times named "Khakis Swing" one of the year's best ads, and the Chicago Daily Tribune declared that the "Khaki" ads "created the biggest cultural stir of any TV spot" since a popular 1997 ad. An analyst for the Wall Street Journal reported that the "Khakis" commercials had bolstered Gap's brand: "They have a brand, not just retail stores. People are buying the brand, not just something to cover their nakedness."

Gap stores experienced a stunning 24 percent gain in same-store sales during May 1998 alone, which USA Today credited to the "Khakis" advertising. Year-end figures for 1998 revealed that Gap had increased its sales nearly 40 percent during the year. The San Francisco Chronicle praised Gap's "high-energy advertising" for "fueling" this rapid growth.

FURTHER READING

Berkowitz, Harry. "Marketers' Dilemma: What Gets Teens To Buy?" Long Island (N.Y.) Newsday, January 24, 1999. Detailed discussion of the teenage market that "Gap Khakis" attempted to reach.

Berner, Robert. "Gap Launches TV-Ad Campaign to Boost Sales At Its Retail Stores." Wall Street Journal, April 28, 1997.

Carter, Kelly. "In the Swing." Quincy (Mass.) Patriot Ledger, October 12, 1998.

Cox, Ted. "The Gap's 'Khakis Rock' Ad a Jivin' Blend of Past and Present." Arlington Heights (Ill.) Daily Herald, June 15, 1998.

Cuneo, Alice. "Dockers Aims to Equal Jeans Sales: Levi Strauss Sets $50 Million Campaign Seeking Younger Buyers for Brand." Advertising Age, March 9, 1998. Descsribes Dockers advertising campaign.

Cuneo, Alice. "Dockers Takes A Sexier Approach in New Ad Push." Advertising Age, January 18, 1999.

Dodd, Annmarie. "Dockers Bringing Khaki Message to Urban Areas." Daily News Record, June 3, 1998.

Dodd, Annmarie. "In Today's Bottoms Business, Comfort is Spelled K-H-A-K-I-S." Daily News Record, May 25, 1998.

Emert, Carol. "Gap Sizzles." San Francisco Chronicle, April 26,1999.

Enrico, Dottie. "Viewers Find Gap Ads Toe-Tapping Good." USA Today, June 8,1998.

Givhan, Robin. "Rhapsody in Beige." Washington Post, June 7, 1998.

Gladfelter, Elizabeth. "A Consultant Says that Gen X, Gen Y and Boomers Have Starkly Different Charactersitics, and Marketers Should Proceed with Caution." Daily News Record, November 9, 1998. Compares and contrasts the different demographic segments "Gap Khakis" ads targeted.

Grant, Lorrie. "Retailers Report Strong Sales Gains in May." USA Today, June 5, 1998. Describes rising sales in the wake of the "Gap Khakis" campaign.

Grogan, Leigh. "Gap Fills in Void of Television Advertising with Some Real Toe-Tappers." Sacramento Bee, May 20, 1998.

Haber, Holly (with Sharon Edelson). "Retail Ads: Upping the Ante." Women's Wear Daily, May 15, 1998.

McCollum, Charlie. "Khakis Taking Jeans' Place as Wardrobe Staples." Newark (N.J.) Star-Ledger, June 8, 1998.

———. "Oscar Ceremony Becomes Advertising Event." San Jose Mercury News, March 22, 1999.

Munk, Nina (with Michelle McGowan). "Gap Gets It: Mickey Drexler is Turning His Apparel Chain into a Global Brand." Fortune, August 3, 1998. Outlines Gap's history and marketing strategies.

Patterson, Philana. "Gap Shares Hit 52-Week High After 'Blow-Out' May Sales Report." Wall Street Journal, June 5, 1998.

Smith, Sid. "Nice Pants." Chicago Tribune, June 4, 1999.

Rebecca Stanfel

THIS IS EASY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Gap, Inc. was established in 1969 with the purpose of selling one product: Levi's jeans. In 1991 Gap cut its ties with the Levi's brand and limited its merchandise offerings to Gap's private-label brand of jeans, khakis, and colorful one-pocket T-shirts, which had been introduced beginning in 1974. Despite the company's profit and sales growth through 1991, sales went into a slump in 1993 and 1994, increasing just 1 percent each year. The chain reported no sales growth in 1995. As the downward slide continued, Gap began looking for ways to expedite a turnaround. Part of the strategy included opening more than 200 new stores in 1996, and in 1997 its in-house marketing team created a new brand-building campaign titled "This Is Easy."

Gap's $15 million "This Is Easy" television campaign was introduced in April 1997 to promote the company's line of Easy Fit Jeans. Although a few Gap commercials appeared on television during the early 1990s, the "This Is Easy" campaign marked the company's first significant journey into television advertising since the mid-1980s, when the Gap opted to put its marketing efforts into print advertising. The spots were intended to renew enthusiasm and boost sales at Gap stores, which in 1996 showed the poorest sales performance of the three Gap Inc. divisions—Gap, Old Navy Clothing, and Banana Republic. Gap was also responding to the highly competitive market for denim jeans by reasserting its strong brand image.

The renewed foray into television and increased spending on advertising helped Gap achieved its goal of growing sales and boosting its brand image. Following the campaign's launch in 1997, sales increased 23 percent from the previous year. BusinessWeek listed Gap 17th on its 1998 list of best-performing companies, and the chain announced plans to open 300 new stores that year. Also in 1998, Gap began a new global marketing campaign that was a modified version of its "This Is Easy" campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Gap skated along relatively smoothly after its inception in 1969 until the mid-1990s, when management realized that other retail companies were imitating its store design and products, essentially relegating the Gap to being just another retailer. The stacks of jeans, khaki pants, and multicolored one-pocket T-shirts that could be purchased at every Gap turned up in other stores, often at lower prices. Sales figures reflected this turn of events. BusinessWeek reported that, although profits at stores that had been open for more than a year had grown an average of 12 percent from 1986 to 1991, earnings skidded in the mid-1990s. Sales grew a mere 1 percent in both 1993 and 1994, and there was no growth in 1995. Donald Fisher, Gap founder and chairman, confessed to BusinessWeek, "We were looking at ourselves as a store rather than a brand. When you do that, you draw thick, heavy lines around your freedom."

Marketing strategies were shifted, and the company's upper management made efforts to solidify Gap's brand image. Millard "Mickey" Drexler, Gap's president and CEO, studied companies with strong brand presence, such as Coca-Cola, McDonald's, and Nike, and concluded that Gap should follow in their footsteps. According to BusinessWeek, Drexler discovered that "the first thing that hits you is that you can buy [such highly branded products] in a lot more places than you can buy Gap." The company, therefore, opened 203 new stores in 1996 alone. Drexler also introduced new products, such as nail polish and perfume, and he decided to invest more time and money in advertising. Drexler told Advertising Age that, in addition to building the brand, "We also realized we had to expand what advertising and marketing mean to this company." The Gap, reported BusinessWeek, increased its advertising budget and spent an estimated $90 million in 1996, compared to $64 million in 1995, and comparable store sales (sales at stores open for more than a year) jumped from being flat in 1995 to a 5 percent increase in 1996.

TARGET MARKET

The Gap's appeal had spanned generations, and thus its target market was also wide-ranging. When the company opened its first store in 1969 and sold Levi's jeans, it appealed largely to the youth market, consumers between the ages of 15 and 25. The Gap attempted to expand its core consumer group in the 1970s by adding additional clothing items and active wear, but for the most part its popularity through the 1980s remained with teenagers and the youth market. In the 1990s, however, Gap began to open more stores and offer new products to expand its consumer base.

The Gap customer, regardless of age, appreciated comfortable, simple clothes and went to the Gap for its ease of shopping and inventory of classic styles. In a conversation with MSNBC Business Video, Warren Hashagen, Gap's senior vice president and chief financial officer, explained the diversity of its consumers: "[The Gap] is certainly a company that likes to think of itself as relevant to the youth of America as well as people of all ages." Through its merchandise the company "give[s] a consistent message to the customer how easy it is to take clothes from our store and mix with their own wardrobe for their own style." June Beckstead, Gap's vice president of product design for the women's division, asserted that Gap clothes appealed to the full spectrum of consumers. She told the Wall Street Journal, "We dress America. . . . You walk down the street, and you see people wearing our clothes. They're young and old, they're hip and they're not."

For the "This Is Easy" campaign the Gap chose to hone in on the target market that consisted of younger men, including teenage boys. The men's line had not performed as well as the other divisions, and Gap wanted to lure back male customers. Alice Ruth, an analyst at Montgomery Securities, told the Wall Street Journal that the men's clothing line had suffered because it had gotten a bit too trendy and because the Gap had deviated from its reputation as a store that offered wardrobe basics such as jeans, khaki pants, and solid-colored T-shirts. The Gap hoped to reassert its position in men's clothing by focusing again on the basics. In the Wall Street Journal McCadden explained the "This Is Easy" campaign's message to men: "Gap offers you all the pieces. No matter who you are there is something at the Gap for you."

COMPETITION

Because the Gap was a major retail clothing chain as well as a manufacturer of private-label clothes, it faced competition in virtually every corner. When asked during Biz Buzz, a business-oriented show on the cable network CNN, about the companies that provided competition, McCadden responded, "In the case of Gap, probably just about everyone. I mean we're [a] very large, very broad brand . . . I think how we view the brand and how we manage the personality and the message of the brand really isn't in relation to competitors." Hashagen, in an interview with MSNBC Business Video, agreed with McCadden and stated that the Gap provided a level of quality and service that set the company apart from its competitors. Hashagen noted, "there's always a tremendous amount of competition in retail. We think of our business as being a great value . . . The quality of the product, how long it will last, how well it works with your other wardrobe items or our store, the service level you get, how easy the store is to shop and all of that is meant to give a good value overall."

Regardless of whether Gap stores possessed a competitive edge over other retail and private-label companies in terms of value and brand identity, the lack of sales growth in the early 1990s indicated that the company needed to adopt new strategies to boost profits. Competition from stores that imitated Gap's core products and display styles prompted the company to strengthen its brand identity and provide a constant flow of new products. In fact, approximately every six weeks Gap stores introduced and rotated styles. Robyn Waters, the trend director for Dayton Hudson's Target Stores, told the Wall Street Journal, "If there is anything we emulate it's [Gap's] great core product and the constant flow of newness and fresh product all the time."

A NEW COMPETITOR

When the Gap first opened its doors in San Francisco, its competitive edge came from the bell-bottom Levi's it offered for sale. When in 1991 the Gap stopped selling Levi's jeans to focus exclusively on its own label, it bid farewell to an ally and said hello to a new competitor.

According to figures from the market-research specialists NPD Group, published in the San Francisco Examiner, the jeans industry exploded in the 1990s, hitting $8.7 billion in sales in 1996 alone. This reflected a 10 percent increase over sales in 1995. Beverly Butler, a spokesperson for Gap, said, "It's a really crowded market and getting more so." Designer labels such as Tommy Hilfiger and Nautica entered the jeans market, and private-label jeans by Sears and J.C. Penney grew in popularity. BusinessWeek published data compiled by NPD Group that indicated a considerable increase in the market shares of private-label jeans, from 16 percent in 1990 to 25 percent in 1997. The Gap, as the largest manufacturer of private-label jeans, held some of this valuable market, but as flat earnings demonstrated, it needed more.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Gap's brand-building "This Is Easy" campaign debuted on prime-time television on April 27, 1997. In the initial two-week period the first six spots were aired nationally more than 600 times on the major networks and also on cable channels, including MTV, ESPN, and Comedy Central. As McCadden explained to the Los Angeles Times, "That whole campaign of easy-fit jeans really springs off a 28-year history at Gap of personal style . . . What we're doing right now is simply taking what's been a core equity and carrying it to new mediums." The resurrection of the "Fall into the Gap" theme and jingle served both a nostalgic and marketing purpose. McCadden elaborated, "It subtly says to someone, 'This brand has a great history. You've trusted this brand for a long time.' " Jeans were selected as the Gap product that best represented the brand image.

The decision to return to national television advertising in full force after a hiatus of nearly a dozen years was necessary to achieve the ubiquity of a well-known brand. As Drexler related to Advertising Age, "TV was critical for us . . . You can't consider yourself a serious marketer without, in fact, having a major presence in TV long-term." Hank Wilson, a consumer-goods analyst for Hambrect & Quist, voiced his agreement in the Los Angeles Times when he stated, "The Gap is of a size and scale where traditional television advertising can yield the kinds of awareness improvement that they would probably like to see."

The "This Is Easy" television spots featured jeans-clad celebrities singing, playing musical instruments, dancing, or performing other artistic specialties they considered to be easy. The Gap's choices of celebrities were designed to attract as wide a range of viewers and consumers as possible. Younger stars drew in the youth market, while older celebrities were chosen to appeal to a more mature crowd. Each spot was filmed against a stark white backdrop to evoke the Gap's simple and easy style and ended with the Gap logo and the tagline "Easy Fit Jeans."

The first spot starred rapper and actor LL Cool J. Outfitted in Gap jeans and T-shirt, LL Cool J offered his take on what he considered to be "easy." McCadden explained the concept of including celebrities in the television spots in his conversation on CNN's Biz Buzz when he said, "The whole idea of that campaign is about personal style, and what we do is we invite the stars to come, and the first 20 seconds is about them. It's what's easy for them. They wear our easy fit jeans. LL arrived on the set and had actually written that entire rap himself about the Gap." The pervading theme of what is easy also conveyed the message that Gap provided ease in shopping, especially for males. McCadden told the Los Angeles Times, "The message is that we've figured it out for you. We're going to make this as easy as it can be."

LL Cool J's rap started with "I know you like your outfits stylish. Any other line but the Gap is childish. Everybody working there's a personal stylist. You're fallin' once you hear the Gap callin'," and it included "'G' is for gritty, 'A' is for always, 'P' is for power and the people." To conclude the 30-second spot, LL Cool J stated, "How easy is this? Fall into the Gap," and he then threw a kiss to viewers. Although the spots promoted Gap's Easy Fit Jeans, the company and product being pushed were not revealed until the end of the ads, when the tagline and Gap logo appeared.

"This Is Easy" included four additional television spot during the initial campaign launch. Two spots featured actors Lukas Haas and David Arquette, with Haas playing the keyboard while Arquette accompanied on the trumpet. Arquette ended by stating, "This is definitely easy," and the "Fall into the Gap" theme was heard. Rounding out the ads were two spots with actor Eric Mabius, who beat on conga drums and concluded, "This is really easy."

At the beginning of July 1997 the company initiated a radio campaign and introduced several new television spots. The two radio spots featured LL Cool J and the musicians Junior and Tanya Rae Brown and ran in major markets that included Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, New York, and Boston. One of the new television spots showed ballet star Nikolaj Hubbe dancing in jeans and sneakers, with jazz piano music in the background. Hubbe announced, "This is super easy," and he finished by performing pirouettes to the "Fall into the Gap" theme. The Hubbe spot debuted in United Artists Cinemas, where it ran for a month before moving to television. The other new spots featured actors Peter Berg and William H. Macy and country music stars Junior and Tanya Rae Brown. Macy, who appeared in the motion picture Fargo, played a harmonica, and Berg, star of the television show Chicago Hope, strummed an electric guitar. Junior Brown performed on his "guit-steel," a guitar and slide steel combination he created, while his wife played a guitar. Brown surmised, "This is totally easy," and the spot closed with the signature theme.

The Gap continued its tradition of using the print medium and invested heavily in outdoor advertising. The company also used its stores as an advertising venue, putting approximately 170,000 posters in its windows. Billboards displayed the Gap ads, and enormous outdoor signs known as spectaculars, which were large enough to cover the entire side of an office building, appeared in major cities. McCadden, in his discussion on Biz Buzz, explained, "The whole idea behind them is to really present Gap jeans in a different format . . . [W]e like the idea of the walls because they just present it to the consumer in sort of a new . . . light. And they're also—you know, they're larger than life."

In 1998 the campaign was revised and a new series of commercials was released to promote another of Gap's jeans styles: Original Fit Jeans. The new campaign included television spots and prints ads that followed a format similar to that of the "This Is Easy" effort. No specific budget for the campaign was released, but a company spokeswoman told Women's Wear Daily that it was Gap's "biggest campaign to date." The four 30-second television spots, which were released in July, featured music stars from various genres, from blues and jazz to hip-hop and rap. Appearing in the spots were blues guitarist Kenny Wayne

Shepherd, singer and rapper Missy Elliott, legendary trumpeter Herb Alpert, and hip-hop group Run-DMC. In a press release Gap described the campaign as a "tribute to originality." Each spot included the chain's familiar white background and the theme "Fall into the Gap." The print ads showed models dressed in Gap's Original Fit Jeans. Ads ran in consumer magazines such as Vanity Fair, Vogue, and Rolling Stone beginning in August. The campaign also included billboards displayed in 24 cities worldwide that featured models wearing Gap Original Fit Jeans.

OUTCOME

The return to television and the increase in spending paid off for Gap. According to BusinessWeek, Gap's 1997 sales increased 23 percent from 1996, and the company ranked 17th on BusinessWeek 's 1998 list of best performers. Industry executives applauded the Gap's marketing efforts and brand-building campaign, and it became the company to emulate. Alan Millstein, a retail analyst and publisher of Fashion Network Report, told Advertising Age, "They made their name into a brand . . . They are one of the few retailers that has that luxury." Sergio Zyman, senior vice president and chief marketing officer at Coca-Cola, agreed: "The Gap accelerated to the point that the brand is on fire . . . There is no competitor who has a kind of brand essence that can pose a threat."

The Gap showed no signs of slowing down. The company announced plans to open 300 new Gap stores in 1998, and by May 1998 the company operated more than 1,000 Gap stores, up 15 percent from the previous year. Hashagen told MSNBC Business Video, "I think if you have a good store, a destination people want to shop at, you can have quite a few of them." The Gap appeared poised to become ubiquitous. According to Stores, Fisher believed that there was plenty of room for more Gap stores: "When you look at the total number of dollars spent on our kind of apparel, we're a small market share player. I think Wal-Mart does $30 billion and they continue to grow, so I have every reason to believe that we will continue to grow as well."

While the 1997 and 1998 marketing campaigns and store-expansion efforts seemed to pay off with increased sales and praise from industry insiders, trouble was looming on the horizon for Gap, and it was coming from its sister chain Old Navy. In 1999 Gap was reporting that sales were flat or down compared to the previous year, versus Old Navy, which had increases of 20 percent. Old Navy, with its bargain-basement prices on products that were similar to those that Gap was selling, was winning away Gap's customers. Gap's clever advertisements with music stars that crossed generations were beginning to have a negative effect as well. Analysts complained that Gap lacked focus. Bob Buchanan, an analyst with A.G. Edwards, told BusinessWeek, "I've got a problem when I see Gap trying to appeal to people age 12 to 60." In late 1999 Gap announced plans for a new marketing campaign to kick off the 2000 spring season. It shifted its focus from jeans and basic khakis and tees to its fashion-forward sportswear in bright colors. Also in a change from its 1997 and 1998 efforts, the new campaign had no tagline.

FURTHER READING

Becker, Ingrid. "Gap Tries to Refashion Image for a Better Fit." Los Angeles Times, October 2, 1997, p. D5.

Berner, Robert. "Gap Launches Television-Ad Campaign to Boost Sales at Its Gap-Store Division." Wall Street Journal, April 28, 1997, p. B8.

———. "How Gap's Own Design Shop Keeps Its Imitators Hustling." Wall Street Journal, March 13, 1997.

Byrnes, Nanette, Amy Barrett, Steve Hamm, Andy Reinhardt, and Gary McWilliams. "The Business Week Fifty." BusinessWeek, March 30, 1998, pp. 76–85.

Callebs, Sean. "Vice President in Charge of Marketing for the Gap Discusses Marketing." Biz Buzz (CNNfn), August 7, 1997.

Cuneo, Alice Z.. "Gap Returns to TV in $15 Mil Campaign." Advertising Age, April 28, 1997, pp. 1f.

———. "Gap TV Spots Take Jeans beyond the Blues; Maverick Musicians Tune in to Original Fit Jeans." PR Newswire, July 17, 1998.

———. "Marketer of the Year: The Gap." Advertising Age, December 15, 1997.

Himelstein, Linda. "The World according to Gap." BusinessWeek, January 27, 1997.

Lee, Louise. "People: Trend Spotters: Why Gap Isn't Galloping Anymore." BusinessWeek, November 8, 1999, 1997.

Lockwood, Lisa. "Gap Ads Will Sing Blues to Sell Jeans in Major Campaign." Daily News Record, July 20, 1998.

Neuborne, Ellen, and Stephanie Anderson Forest. "Look Who's Picking Levi's Pocket." BusinessWeek, September 8, 1997, p. 68.

Reda, Susan. "Donald G. Fisher, Chairman of The Gap Inc." Stores, 1997.

Sundius, Ann. "One on One Interview with Warren Hashagen, Chief Financial Officer and Senior Vice President, Gap Inc. (GPS)." MSNBC Business Video, September 26, 1997.

Tanaka, Wendy. "Denim Derby." San Francisco Examiner, May 20, 1997, p. C1.

Mariko Fujinaka
Rayna Bailey

Gateway, Inc.

7565 Irvine Center Drive
Irvine, California 92618
USA
Telephone: (949) 471-7000
Fax: (949) 471-7041
Web site: www.gateway.com

■■■

PEOPLE RULE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In August 2000, in the midst of a collapse of the global personal-computer market, direct marketer Gateway, Inc., launched the ''People Rule'' branding campaign. Developed by New York advertising agency McCann-Erickson Worldwide, the campaign was built on the premise that average consumers were not getting the most out of their computers and would welcome more support from a PC maker.

''People Rule'' extended beyond television, radio, and prints advertising. It also included free help at Gateway Country stores in the form of weekly ''Ask-a-Tech'' sessions and clinics that taught the rudiments of computers and the Internet. The advertising portion of the campaign also included the company's first use of a celebrity spokesperson: actor Michael J. Fox.

The $150 million campaign petered out in 2001, as Gateway underwent changes in the top ranks of its management and as McCann-Erickson was dismissed as the company's ad agency. The campaign was disjointed from the start; all along McCann-Erickson was second-guessed by Gateway's founder, who, in the middle of the campaign, brought in a documentary filmmaker to create a pair of television spots that clashed with the style of the ads the agency had developed. ''People Rule'' did little to prevent Gateway from losing a major slice of the market, and economic conditions were such that, in all likelihood, it had been a doomed effort from the start, no matter how effective individual parts of the campaign may have been.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In only a handful of years, Gateway, Inc., founded in 1985, grew from a $10,000 startup in Sioux City, Iowa, into one of the leading direct retailers of personal computers in the world, with annual sales approaching $10 billion. From the time it began advertising, Gateway took a folksy approach and played off its rural roots, featuring pictures of cows and even shipping its products in white boxes adorned with black spots resembling the markings of a Holstein cow. The company developed an in-house marketing team in the early 1990s but in 1997 hired an advertising agency, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. Gateway's young founder, Ted Waitt, brought in an AT&T veteran, Jeffrey Weitzen, to run the company in January 1998, and one of Weitzen's first moves was to change ad agencies. He hired McCann-Erickson Worldwide, with whom he had worked closely while at AT&T.

Business was booming for Gateway when McCann-Erickson took over the account, but the relationship with the client soon began to sour. In 1999 McCann-Erickson won Microsoft's huge advertising account, after which Gateway officials became increasingly dissatisfied with McCann's level of service. More importantly, in 2000 the global PC industry was hit by the worst slump in its brief history. Because Gateway relied greatly on the consumer and small-business markets, the hardest-hit sectors, it began to see a serious erosion in sales. Although revenues reached a record $9.2 billion in 2000, Gateway's sales tailed off severely during the course of the year. Weitzen was under great pressure from Waitt to stop the bleeding, as was McCann-Erickson, Weitzen's hand-picked ad agency, which Waitt also criticized, considering its approach "more corny than folksy," as reported by Aaron Baar and Kathleen Sampey of Adweek. It was under these difficult circumstances that McCann-Erickson launched its "People Rule" campaign in August 2000.

TARGET MARKET

Earlier in 2000 Gateway had employed the "Gateway@work" campaign, which targeted medium-size businesses to boost sales in that market. The "People Rule" campaign focused on the other key sector, consumer sales. The company commissioned research that revealed that there was "a disconnect between people and technology," as Brad Heimdichner, one of Gateway's "technology ambassadors," told Lyn Berry of the Denver Business Journal. According to Berry, a random sampling of 750 Americans showed that "69 percent of people who own personal computers believe they are not maximizing the potential of their personal computers. Only 32 percent said they even know the full potential of their computer." The survey also revealed that 44 percent did not believe they had enough training on how to use their computers and did not have enough available technical support. Furthermore, just 15 percent believed that their computers delivered everything their manufacturers had promised. It was these dissatisfied, less technologically knowledgeable consumers that the "People Rule" campaign hoped to reach. As Heimdichner explained, "It's Gateway's promise to always put people before technology, and that's why we're focusing more than ever on helping people understand their technology."

COMPETITION

As the "People Rule" campaign broke in 2000, Gateway faced competition in the commercial market—in which Gateway ranked fifth at the time—from another direct marketer, Dell, as well as from IBM, Hewlett-Packard, and Compaq Computer Corp. About 70 percent of Dell's sales came from large corporations and government organizations, but it had begun to commit greater resources to competing in the home-PC market, Gateway's strength.

HAVING A COW

The association of Gateway, Inc., with cows—they appeared in its advertisements and were evoked by the black Holstein spots on its white shipping boxes—was a reflection of the company's roots. Founder Ted Waitt learned the computer business while working for nine months at a computer store in Des Moines, Iowa. Confident that he knew enough to start his own business selling computers, he borrowed $10,000 from his grandmother in 1985 and set up a mail-order operation in a farmhouse at his father's sagging cattle brokerage in Sioux City, Iowa. After the business outgrew the farmhouse, Waitt moved it to Sioux City's Livestock Exchange building. Gateway started advertising in computer magazines in 1988. Given the company's connection to livestock, it was not surprising that the first full-page ad featured a picture of his father's cattle herd. Thus, a motif was born.

Gateway ranked third in the global consumer-PC area with a 13.9 percent market share, trailing top-ranked Compaq and the number two company, Hewlett-Packard. But it was Dell that emerged as Gateway's greatest threat in this market. Dell had perfected a build-to-order model that kept down costs by not keeping hardware stockpiled, and with its size came buying power that allowed it to offer PCs at low prices that Gateway and the others were unable to match. Moreover, a seemingly unlimited marketing budget allowed Dell to promote its affordable PCs around the clock on television and through other media. Ironically, it was a similar strategy of building affordable computers that had made Gateway an overnight success in the late 1980s, when Waitt found a way to assemble off-the-shelf components to make a computer that offered customers a better value than the competition. Gateway might have been able to undercut some of its other rivals in price, but it could not come close to matching Dell, which, at the time the "People Rule" campaign began, was starting a price war that crippled the competition. Dell quickly assumed the top spot in global PC sales, while Hewlett-Packard and Compaq joined forces through a merger and Gateway struggled to hang onto market share.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Gateway's "People Rule" campaign was part advertising campaign, part educational program. The company leveraged its chain of 290 Gateway Country stores to offer a range of programs, a number of them free, to demystify technology for both consumers and businesses and to help them get the most out of their computers. Full-time computer experts, called ''technology ambassadors,'' were hired for the stores, which hosted weekly ''Ask-a-Tech'' sessions at which consumers could get free advice and have their computer problems analyzed. The ambassadors also held free mobile clinics and conducted outreach programs with local community groups. Free weekly clinics at the stores taught PC users—whether or not they were Gateway customers—a wide range of subjects, including PC and Internet basics, online investing, and the elements of digital photography and digital music. Gateway also increased the number of classroom and online training sessions it offered. The company's Web presence was beefed up with the introduction of a ''supportal,'' a website intended to augment the technical support Gateway made available to its customers over the phone.

The $150 million ''People Rule'' campaign included television, print, and radio elements. Because it was in essence part of a long-term positioning of the Gateway brand, the advertising portion of ''People Rule'' focused on the brand more than on specific products. In the words of a press release announcing the launch of the campaign, the goal was to expand ''the definition of 'Gateway Country' from the name of its revolutionary retail concept to a more human way to approach technology.''

The first of four television spots McCann-Erickson developed showed a typical living room with a PC sitting unused, ignored by family members; two girls played while a father opened bills. A voice-over described the many uses of a computer but stated that none of them mattered if a person was not shown how to use it. Viewers were then urged to call or visit a Gateway Country store for help in unlocking the power of their PCs. In another of the early television spots a boy traded in his computer for a new one and then tried to trade in his little sister for a scanner. An ad called ''Apartment,'' which debuted later in 2000, was especially well received. It featured a young woman entering her date's apartment and being surprised to see a series of framed pictures in which he posed with an odd assortment of celebrities: boxer Evander Holyfield, rock singer David Lee Roth, actress Marilyn Monroe, and Lassie, the canine star of TV and film. A voice-over posed the rhetorical question, ''Wish you could add a little something to your photographs?'' Viewers were then told that Gateway would help teach them all about digital photography. The television spots appeared on network television and national cable channels as well as on local television on a spot-market basis (as time slots opened up at attractive prices at the last minute).

To accompany the initial TV spot, a two-page print ad on the same subject appeared in a number of national and local newspapers. Further print ads were employed throughout the campaign. One of them incited the ire of Maryland's state comptroller, however. A Gateway ad that ran in the Baltimore Sun on September 12, 2000, read, ''Buy one now and we'll pay the sales tax.'' But ''sales tax'' was crossed out, ostensibly by a Gateway lawyer who in a handwritten note commented, ''Can't say this! Must say 'we'll offer a discount equal to the sales tax rate.' '' It was intended to poke fun at the legal maneuvers in advertising but did not amuse the comptroller, who charged the ad was misleading and violated Maryland's tax code prohibiting ''tax sales.'' He instructed his compliance division to force Gateway to drop the ad or change it.

The run-in with the state of Maryland was just one of a number of distractions McCann-Erickson faced as it launched the ''People Rule'' campaign. In late October Gateway, at the insistence of Waitt, circumvented the agency and began running a pair of commercials produced by documentary filmmaker Henry Corra, whose low-key, no-frills work included George, a film about his autistic son. Corra and Waitt had become friends in the mid-1990s, and the filmmaker had done some work for Gateway shortly before McCann-Erickson took over the account. Corra's two new commercials were at odds with McCann-Erickson's work. According to Stuart Elliott of the New York Times, Corra's spots, ''which are fast-paced and mix footage of actual shoppers shot in black-and-white as well as color, contrast markedly with McCann's, which are shot conventionally and feature actors.'' McCann-Erickson was initially diplomatic about the situation, stating, through spokesman Stewart Alter, ''The 'people rule' brand platform is a big one and it can accommodate a documentary approach.'' But Elliott reported that a few months later, after McCann-Erickson and Gateway had parted ways, agency heads called Corra a ''behind-the scenes thorn in our sides'' and accused him of trying to ''undermine the agency in many ways.'' For his part, Corra commented, ''I don't think McCann understood what I did.''

The relationship between McCann-Erickson and Gateway was clearly falling apart in the final weeks of 2000. At the same time, with the severe drop-off in sales during the fourth quarter of the year, Weitzen's tenure as Gateway's head was coming to an end. Adweek reported in December 2000 that Gateway was talking with East Coast ad agencies. When Waitt dismissed Weitzen and reassumed the CEO post in January 2001, McCann-Erickson's prospects of keeping the Gateway account dimmed further. The agency made one last stab at saving the "People Rule" campaign. Actor Michael J. Fox was hired as Gateway's first celebrity spokesman. In recent months he had been diagnosed with Parkinson's disease and had established a foundation dedicated to find a cure for it. As part of the Fox advertising Gateway became the technology partner for the foundation. The premise of the new humorous television spots featuring Fox was that he was just like the target audience, overcoming technology challenges. Two weeks after the Fox portion of the campaign debuted, the McCann-Erickson ads were scrapped as Gateway dropped the agency.

OUTCOME

Early in 2001 Gateway was on the verge of hiring Minneapolis-based agency Fallon to replace McCann-Erickson, but Fallon too ran afoul of Waitt after it proposed a complete rebranding of Gateway. The company decided to handle its advertising in-house once again, trying its best to make use of Fox's celebrity. But he proved ill suited to the task. As Frank Priscaro noted in MC Technology Marketing Intelligences, "One of the most important rules of using a spokesperson is to pick someone who tied in with the product in some way. Pretending that Mr. Fox is going through the rigors of buying a new computer himself doesn't wash . . . Barring an obvious tie-in, a spokesperson should be famous, but not too famous, so he doesn't steal the show. It's nice that Mr. Fox would do these commercials, but he's a lot bigger than Gateway is, and so he overshadows the campaign."

Aside from the problems that cropped up during the "People Rule" campaign, the effort appeared to have been ill fated from the start. No one questioned that consumers wanted help in getting the most out of their computers, but when it came time to buy a new PC, they generally opted to get the most features for the lowest price—a lesson Gateway itself had taught the market. At the time, Gateway simply could not match Dell in terms of price, and no amount of in-store tech sessions, art-house commercials, or celebrity endorsements could stem the tide of eroding sales.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron, and Kathleen Sampey. "Creative, Connections Help Fallon Gain Gateway." Adweek, February 12, 2001, p. 2.

Berry, Lyn. "Most Computer Users Fail to Maximize PC Potential." Denver Business Journal, September 1, 2000, p. 10A.

Elkin, Tobi. "Troubled Gateway Turns to New Shop as Earnings Fall." Advertising Age, February 12, 2001, p. 4.

Elliott, Stuart. "A Computer Company Again Asks a Filmmaker for a Fresh Creative Slant." New York Times, October 30, 2000, p. C18.

Hachman, Mark. "'People Rule' Shows Who's Minding Shop at Gateway." TechWeb, September 2, 2000.

Kady, Martin, II, Chris Silva, Mike Sunnicks, Suzanne White, and Owen T. Davis. "Gateway's Taxing Predicament." Washington Business Journal, September 15, 2000, p. 2.

Linnett, Richard. "Regarding Henry." Advertising Age, March 26, 2001, p. 1.

Linnett, Richard, and Tobi Elkin. "Gateway Ads Set to Return to House Unit." Advertising Age, February 26, 2001, p. 1.

Mallorre, Dill. "Power to the People." Adweek (eastern ed.), September 4, 2000, p. 32.

Piven, Joshua. "Is Shakeout Looming for PC OEMs?" Computing Technology Review, February 2001, p. 6.

Priscaro, Frank. "Peer Review: Tear Sheet." MC Technology Marketing Intelligences, April 2001, p. 48.

Rodrigues, Tanya. "Adweek Names Gateway, Jack in the Box Ads among 50 Top Spots." San Diego Business Journal, February 12, 2001, p. 22.

Sampey, Kathleen, and David Gianatasio. "Gateway Meets Quietly with a Handful of Agencies." Adweek, December 18, 2000, p. 3.

Stamler, Bernard. "Gateway Splits with McCann-Erickson." New York Times, February 8, 2001, p. C6.

Ed Dinger

GEICO

One GEICO Plaza
Washington, DC 20076
USA
Telephone: (301) 986-3000
Web site: www.geico.com

■■■

GECKO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Relatively obscure until the 1990s, GEICO, a direct marketer of auto insurance, began to make its mark when it expanded beyond direct-mail solicitation and spent money on other media, especially television. Unlike rival insurers, GEICO took a lighthearted, humorous approach to its television spots, which produced steady growth for the company. Nevertheless, many consumers were still not certain about the pronunciation of the company's name, often referring to it as "gecko" when calling for a rate quote. In the summer of 1999 GEICO aired a 15-second television spot that featured a cartoon gecko, a tropical lizard, conducting a press conference to tell people that it was not he but GEICO that could save them money on their car insurance and to please stop calling him.

The gecko spot was just a single quirky commercial and was not intended as the start of a long-term campaign. But in reaction to an actors' strike, GEICO instructed its advertising agency, the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia, to develop more gecko spots. The character became popular, and GEICO added more human features to him and created a new series of commercials featuring the gecko. In 2002, in a spot titled "The Meadow," he ran through a field hand in hand with an adoring female customer. In "Big News," a spot that aired in 2005, he urged fellow lizards to spread the news that GEICO could save people money. In the meantime GEICO released two other campaigns that ran alongside the "Gecko" campaign, which had become a general brand-building effort for the company but still received a hefty share of the more than $200 million that GEICO spent on advertising each year.

Although it never garnered any major advertising awards, the "Gecko" campaign proved popular with consumers and played a major role in GEICO's emergence as one of the leading auto insurers in the United States. In 2005, during New York's Advertising Week, an annual industry event hosted by the American Association of Advertising Agencies, the gecko was named one of advertising's top icons.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For 60 years, starting in the 1930s, GEICO was a relatively unknown automobile insurer that targeted federal government employees and noncommissioned military officers with its direct-mail pitches. By concentrating on customers with sterling driving records, it was able to offer low rates and carve out a profitable niche in the marketplace. In the 1990s GEICO, by then the seventh-largest auto insurer in the United States, looked to expand its client base. In 1994 it hired the Martin Agency to handle its advertising and add television, radio, and print to the marketing mix. The public company soon came into the orbit of Berkshire Hathaway, Inc., controlled by legendary stock-market investor Warren Buffett, who had owned GEICO stock since 1951. He took GEICO private in 1996 and made it a Hathaway subsidiary.

Commercials for car insurance were traditionally straightforward, serious appeals. To make GEICO stand out and to humanize car insurance, Martin decided to rely on humor. It also developed a brand promise in a slogan that would be reinforced campaign after campaign: "Fifteen minutes could save you 15 percent or more on car insurance." Inherent in the promise was another key element in the marketing strategy: a call to action. Because GEICO insurance was not sold to brokers, customers had to be moved to mail in a response, call a toll-free phone number, or, with the advent of the Internet, visit the company's website. To assure that GEICO was to customers more than a computer screen or a voice on the telephone, the agency also had to put a face on GEICO itself.

The new advertising emphasis quickly produced solid results for GEICO. The company had been writing approximately 26,000 premiums a year, but that number improved to 39,570 in 1995 and to 69,600 in 1996. When Buffett took control, GEICO was told to accelerate the pace of its growth strategy even more. Hence, ad spending increased from $10 million in 1995 to $270 million in 2000. With a great deal of money at its disposal and significant creative latitude, the Martin Agency produced a variety of humorous ads. In 1999 the creative team at Martin considered the common mispronunciation of GEICO as "gecko," the small tropical lizard. This brainstorming session led to a single 15-second television spot, which gave birth to an advertising icon and initiated a long-term campaign for GEICO.

TARGET MARKET

GEICO and other automobile insurers tried to reach one of the broadest markets possible: virtually everyone who drove a car. "Who is GEICO selling to?" asked Seth Stevenson, writing for the online magazine Slate. "Pretty much everyone—man or woman, gay or straight, black or white, hip or hick. If you drive a car, they want your business." Because older drivers tended to stick with their longtime insurers, GEICO hoped to appeal to a younger audience, roughly 25 to 40 years of age. GEICO vice president of marketing Edward Ward told USA Today 's Michael McCarthy in 2005, "We have a lot of information that [says] those are the people who shop. We want to fish where the fish are biting."

COMPETITION

GEICO had to contend with well-entrenched competition. King of the hill since the 1940s was State Farm, which controlled nearly a fifth of the market. It had spent considerable sums to establish its own brand promise, one that did not rely on price: "Like a good neighbor, State Farm is there." Second to State Farm was Allstate, with a share of more than 10 percent. It also had a well-known slogan: "You're in good hands with Allstate." Less entrenched was the Progressive Corporation, which quickly stepped up its ad spending to fend off GEICO. Progressive also focused on price, making its mark through the use of the Internet and the promise to present its best quote alongside those of its chief competitors.

The heavy marketing activity of Progressive and GEICO forced Allstate to begin competing on the basis of price. While State Farm continued to remain above the fray in terms of pricing—stressing instead service and reliability—it felt enough pressure from the competition to increase its own advertising budget significantly. Furthermore, because of several factors, there were now greater profits to be made from car insurance, prompting insurers to scramble for more customers. One reason for the increased profits was that during the 1990s there were major improvements in the way cars were built, which resulted not only in fewer repairs but also fewer accidents. Also of importance was the graying of America: as baby boomers grew older, they began driving slower, again leading to fewer accidents, fewer claims, and greater profits for insurers. The fastest-growing segment of the auto insurance business was the direct model, as pursued by GEICO. In addition to State Farm, Allstate, Progressive, and other companies selling policies through agents—such as Travelers, Hartford, Nationwide, and AIG (American International Group)—GEICO had to deal with a new breed of direct marketers leveraging the power of the Internet. Another challenge was the fact that old-guard firms were beginning to use the Internet to add direct-sales capabilities to their offerings.

WELL SPOKEN

Despite being a reptile, GEICO's gecko spokesperson was known for his distinguished British accent. Over the years a number of actors supplied his voice. The first was Kelsey Grammer, star of the hit TV situation comedy Frasier.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In July 1999 GEICO ran a television spot that featured a computer-generated cartoon gecko holding a press conference at which he declared, "I am a gecko, not GEICO. Please stop calling me." GEICO's Ward told Jim Lovel of Adweek, "It was a throwaway 15-second spot. . .It was an odd spot that didn't fit, but we thought it was funny." According to Lovel, "The gecko could have disappeared after the spot, if professional actors had not gone on strike that year. Because of the absence of talent, GEICO asked Martin to produce more spots with the gecko. The company was inundated with calls and letters from people who wanted to see more of the lizard."

The Martin Agency developed a number of television spots in 2000 in which the gecko, with his refined British accent, made the same point repeatedly: he could not save viewers money on their car insurance—only GEICO could. At the beginning of 2001 the agency proposed a change of tack to GEICO. Martin's Steve Bassett, a senior vice president and group creative director, told Shoot magazine's Sloane Gaylin that the agency's creatives had thought it would be an interesting twist if the gecko gave up on telling people not to call him and decided instead to finally start working for the company. Out of this idea flowed several new gecko spots. In the one called "Audition" the gecko tried to land the GEICO spokesperson position and encountered an out-of-work veteran of television commercials, the Taco Bell Chihuahua. Other spots in the series, " 'Hands,' " "Tail," "Employees of the Month," and "Food," showed the gecko working at the GEICO office. In "Action Figures," a parody of the movie Toy Story, a gecko doll broke up a fight between two action figures in a sleeping child's bedroom while telling them about the GEICO's affordability.

In order to make the gecko more suitable to these new scenarios, the animators reworked him to include more human attributes. In the press conference commercial the gecko had crawled on the microphone on all fours, but in later spots he moved on two feet and carried himself more like a person. Thus, in the 2002 spot "Meadow" he was able to hold hands, run down a beach, and spin around in a field with a woman.

Although the gecko commercials proved popular, Martin developed two other television campaigns that ran in parallel: "Good News," which consisted of comical spots in which someone told an unsuspecting person that they had just received good news, only to reveal that the news was that they had saved money on their car insurance; and a series of "mini campaigns" featuring a mix of humorous commercials. The three campaigns each carved out their own territory in GEICO's overall marketing strategy. The "Good News" spots focused mostly on the cash-savings message, while the gecko spots became more of a brand-building vehicle, keeping the GEICO name front and center in the minds of consumers.

GEICO added another twist to the gecko-as-spokesperson spots in the fall of 2005. In the commercial "Big News," the gecko, after two years of spots in which the only words he spoke were "well, hello," delivered a pep talk to a group of other lizards in the woods, sending them forth to spread the big news that, by visiting geico.com, people could save hundreds of dollars on car insurance. Other spots featured the gecko encouraging other lizards to pitch GEICO. To exploit the gecko character even further, GEICO introduced an amateur filmmaking competition, giving people a chance to submit their "15-second conceptual movie trailers" involving the gecko character. The goal was to appeal to the 18- to 34-year-old demographic as well as to a create a viral campaign, one that would take on a life of its own and perhaps drum up some new ideas for using the gecko in future commercials.

OUTCOME

In the year after GEICO introduced the gecko character, the company generated sales of $5.6 billion. By the end of 2003 revenues had grown to $7.8 billion. It was impossible to say how much of that success could be attributed to the "Gecko" campaign, and with the launch of two parallel campaigns in 2003 and 2004, it became even more difficult to determine. There was no doubt, however, that the gecko had achieved the status of pop-culture figure. During New York's Advertising Week in September 2005, the gecko tied with Juan Valdez, the face of Colombian coffee since 1960, as America's favorite ad icon. The honor was determined by consumer votes. GEICO and the Martin Agency were still having fun with the character, as evidenced by the accolades they showered upon the gecko after it gained iconic status. In a press release Martin's Basset commented, "He's cute, he's green, he works hard, he's got a great attitude, and he could save people a lot of money on their car insurance."

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "GEICO Lightens Up a Successful Campaign while Trying to Keep What Made It Work." New York Times, August 8, 2003, p. C2.

Frazier, Mya. "Progressive, GEICO Prod Auto Rivals into Price War." Advertising Age, February 28, 2005, p 4.

Gaylin, Sloane. "Leaping Lizards." Shoot, August 2, 2002, p. 18.

Janoff, Barry. "It's Easy Being Green." Brandweek, December 5, 2005, p. 28.

Lovel, Jim. "Gecko Gets More GEICO Airtime." Adweek (southeast ed.), November 17, 2005.

———. "Loving the Lizard." Adweek, October 24, 2005, p. 32.

McCarthy, Michael. ''Buffett Wants to Know: Do GEICO Ads Get Job Done.'' USA Today, January 24, 2005.

Nudd, Tim. ''Koenigsberg and the Gecko.'' Adweek (southwest ed.), July 2, 2001, p. 26.

Rayner, Bob. ''After Some Lean Years, Richmond, Va., Ad Agency Wins Back Big Accounts.'' Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, March 29, 2004.

———. ''Born Here, GEICO Gecko Goes for Ad-Industry Glory.'' Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, September 17, 2005.

Edward Dinger

GOOD NEWS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the mid-1990s direct auto insurer GEICO had already enjoyed strong growth through the use of mass-market advertising, expanding beyond direct mail to include humorous television commercials. At the start of the new century GEICO scored a hit with its commercials that featured a cartoon gecko. In the spring of 2003 GEICO released a second, complementary effort, the ''Good News'' campaign.

''Good News,'' developed by the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia, was essentially a television campaign, although some of the material was recycled for radio spots. The commercials played off the familiar pattern of ''good news, bad news'' jokes. In each spot someone was told by another that there was ''good news,'' then learned that the good news had nothing to do with their predicament. Rather, the bearer of glad tidings had just saved a ''bunch of money'' on his car insurance by switching to GEICO. In one of the early spots, for example, a prisoner thought that his sentence had been commuted, only to learn that his lawyer's good news concerned car insurance.

The ''Good News'' campaign was effective in carrying GEICO's money-saving sales pitch, while the gecko advertisements served more to build the brand image, and a third campaign focused on a younger demographic. The company did not disclose how much of its more than $200 million ad budget was devoted to ''Good News.'' But it was clear that it worked: after the campaign began, GEICO's brand recognition improved among consumers, and sales soared. Moreover, the ''Good News'' reversal-of-expectation ploy began to be adopted by consumers for comedic purposes, and they invariably mentioned GEICO by name. The value of such free advertising was incalculable.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

A direct marketer of auto insurance that for nearly 60 years was dependent on direct-mail advertisements, GEICO began to spend an increasing amount of money on television spots in the 1990s. When legendary investor Warren Buffett acquired control of the company in 1996 through his holding company Berkshire Hathaway, Inc., GEICO allotted even more money to its advertising budget in order to meet the kind of growth that was expected. To get noticed GEICO and its ad agency, the Richmond, Virginia–based Martin Agency, looked to exploit humor in an industry that had traditionally adopted a serious tone in its advertising. Lacking the support network of State Farm, Allstate, and other agent-based insurers, GEICO made its humorous pitch on the basis of price and found a strong brand promise in the slogan ''Fifteen minutes could save you 15 percent or more on car insurance.'' Furthermore, because GEICO lacked the personal contact of an insurance salesman, it used humor to make the company seem less impersonal to potential customers, who needed to feel comfortable and confident, not to mention motivated, to place a telephone call—or later, log onto the Internet—to purchase a policy.

With an increasing amount of ad dollars at its disposal, the Martin Agency developed a wide variety of advertisements for GEICO. One, a television spot featuring a gecko (customers often mispronounced the GEICO name as ''gecko''), struck a chord in 1999 and became the anchor for the company's marketing and the inspiration for a long-term advertising campaign. In 2003 GEICO and Martin developed the ''Good News'' television campaign, which ran alongside the gecko spots, sometimes back-to-back in 15-second clips. The gecko spots began to focus on reinforcing the GEICO brand, while the ''Good News'' spots reminded consumers of the insurer's low-price promise.

TARGET MARKET

In general GEICO's advertising targeted every person who owned a car and was required by law to carry insurance. But because older drivers tended to be loyal to their insurance companies, GEICO focused a great deal of its attention on a younger demographic, essentially 25 to 40 years of age, in hopes of peeling away customers from rival insurers. Younger drivers were especially attractive potential customers because they had not built up a relationship with an insurer and by nature were more willing to look around for a better rate. Having less money than most older drivers, they were also more price-sensitive and especially open to GEICO's lower cost. For this group the absence of a personal relationship with an insurance agent was not deemed as significant a factor as the price of the policy. With their often irreverent and playful tone, the "Good News" commercials were especially effective in reaching younger consumers.

GOOD NEWS FOR "GOOD NEWS"

Few advertising slogans actually became part of pop culture. GEICO's marketers knew that their "Good News" campaign had reached such status when, on a late night television show, popular actor Jim Carrey told host Conan O'Brien, "Good news! I just saved a bunch of money on my car insurance by switching to GEICO." More importantly, the audience erupted in laughter, well aware of the reference.

COMPETITION

When GEICO began its advertising push in the early 1990s, it was seventh in a crowded field of companies offering car insurance. As it moved up the ranks, its main competition was winnowed down to market leader State Farm, which had less than 20 percent of the business; Allstate, with about half that amount; and the Progressive Corporation, a distant third. The big two spent hefty sums on advertising to remind the public of their individual brand promises: State Farm with "Like a good neighbor, State Farm is there," and Allstate with "You're in good hands with Allstate." They were well entrenched with a strong core of loyal customers, and as conservative companies, it was not surprising that these insurers produced conservative advertising that focused mostly on their honesty and concern for their customers. Making a sales pitch on the basis of price was not part of the strategy and was almost beneath their image. Moreover, by emphasizing price State Farm and Allstate risked turning car insurance into nothing more than a commodity, the buying and selling of which was based on the lowest price possible.

Progressive, with more to lose to GEICO, quickly followed suit and increased its ad budgets. Thus, Progressive and GEICO forced their larger competitors to spend more advertising dollars as well. Allstate even began to compete in terms of price. But there was another reason why these insurance companies began to spend more on advertising: there were more profits to be made. Cars were better built and less prone to accidents. Moreover, the large baby-boomer population was growing older, driving slower, and experiencing fewer accidents. With fewer claims to pay out, insurers made more money, even if they lowered rates to lure business away from their rivals.

Because direct marketers such as GEICO did not have the expense of an agent network to support and could offer the lowest rates, the direct model became the fastest-growing segment of the auto insurance industry. GEICO had to continue to spend heavily on advertising to fend off a new breed of Internet direct marketers of car insurance. Traditional agent-based companies such as Nationwide, Hartford, Travelers, and AIG (American International Group) also began pursuing the direct model through their websites.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Good News" campaign broke on March 1, 2003, and adhered to GEICO's successful three-part strategy. First, it used humor to make the television spots stand out; second, it reinforced the company's brand promise, "Fifteen minutes could save you 15 percent or more on car insurance"; and finally, it made a strong appeal for action, urging the audience to initiate contact with GEICO, especially via the Web.

The campaign began with a series of three television spots. In "Lawyer" a man waited in prison while his lawyer took a call and then pronounced, "Good news." The prisoner hoped that he had gained his freedom but learned that, in fact, the good news was that his attorney had just saved "a bunch of money" on car insurance by switching to GEICO. This reversal of expectation was the pattern followed by all subsequent commercials in the campaign. In another of the initial spots, "Pitcher," a baseball manager visited a pitcher on the mound with good news. The pitcher thought that he would be allowed to stay in the game but instead was told that his manager just saved money on GEICO; the pitcher was still on his way to the showers. The last of the three spots, "News," featured a news anchor covering a volcano eruption. He told viewers not to worry because, despite the obvious disaster unfolding, there was good news: he had just saved money on his car insurance.

The first wave of "Good News" commercials were effective but drew criticism as being somewhat nasty. Bob Garfield, critic for Advertising Age, called them "strikingly cruel." The reason they were effective, according to executives at GEICO and the Martin Agency, as cited by Stuart Elliott of the New York Times, was "the added twist that the person being told the good news is on the outside looking in, almost chumplike, and is not invited to share in the good fortune." Moreover, Elliott wrote, "The approach defies the hoary rules of so-called slice-of-life advertising, which require that the person serving as the sponsor's proxy welcomes everyone else to change their lives wonderfully, too, by buying the product."

Although GEICO and the Martin Agency maintained that they received few complaints about the "Good News" commercials, the second round of five spots, which began airing in August 2003, were softer in tone. They also veered further away from the slice-of-life approach, as four of them focused on tricking viewers by parodying typical television fare. Brian Steinberg of the Wall Street Journal called them "situational commercials, ones designed to play off the shows consumers are watching." One of the new spots spoofed a soap opera: a man told his lover the good news about his car insurance only to watch her storm out as he pleaded, "I saved. I thought that meant something to you." Other programming that became grist for the mill included home-improvement shows, televised congressional hearings, and infomercials (such as a parody of a hair-loss-treatment product spot). To make the spots even more effective GEICO took care to shoot them on video rather than film and to air them during the type of programming that they tried to imitate—for instance, running the soap opera spot during soap operas and the prisoner spot with courtroom dramas.

GEICO and Martin also developed what they called "Mini- Campaigns," a collection of humorous spots that began airing in 2004 along with "Good News" and the long-standing gecko spots. GEICO was now running three campaigns simultaneously, saturating the airways with 15-second spots that espoused the GEICO brand promise. In addition, each of the campaigns emphasized a different part of the marketing strategy. The gecko spots became more of a brand-polishing effort, while the "mini campaigns" mostly targeted younger viewers with their off-the-wall humor. For its part, "Good News" focused on GEICO's savings pitch.

The "Good News" spots were rotated constantly, with new ones occasionally added to the mix. In the spring of 2005, for example, GEICO unveiled a pair of new spots. "Speed Racer" was a parody of the classic cartoon series of that name. In it the hero, Speed, received a call from Trixie warning him that the bridge was out and that he was headed for disaster. "But I have good news," she declared, then delivered the standard punch line to the bewilderment of Speed. The second spot featured personal trainer Tony Little, familiar to television viewers for his infomercial pitches. Once again, the viewer was tricked into thinking that the commercial was actual programming.

OUTCOME

It was impossible to determine how much credit the "Good News" campaign deserved for GEICO's success, since it was initially paired with the gecko ads and then became one of three simultaneous TV campaigns. But there was no doubt that GEICO was pleased with the "Good News" effort. In August 2003 Edward Ward, GEICO's vice president of marketing, told Elliott of the New York Times that, since the campaign had begun, the company was "ecstatic with the volume of phone calls and Web activity and sales." He also told Elliott that results were "running at record levels."

The spots clearly resonated with consumers, who, much to the delight of the marketers, began to use the campaign as a source of humor in their own telling of jokes. "When a campaign slogan makes it into the common vernacular of popular culture, you know you've got yourself a hit," wrote Rae Ann Fera for Boards in 2003. "Two famous instances of the tag being used—without duress or influence—are when an airline pilot and an on-air weatherman relayed bad news to their audience while following up with the good news that they [had] switched to GEICO." Fera also reported that, after the spots began airing, GEICO's unaided brand recall was the highest in company history.

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "GEICO Lightens Up a Successful Campaign while Trying to Keep What Made It Work." New York Times, August 8, 2003, p. C2.

Fera, Rae Ann. "The Good News Is GEICO's Back." Boards, August 27, 2003.

Frazier, Mya. "Progressive, GEICO Prod Auto Rivals into Price War." Advertising Age, February 28, 2005, p. 4.

Janoff, Barry. "License to Drive Us Crazy." Brandweek, April 25, 2005, p. 42.

Lovel, Jim. "Loving the Lizard." Adweek, October 24, 2005, p. 32.

"The Martin Agency Erupts for GEICO." Shoot, April 11, 2003, p. 12.

McCarthy, Michael. "Buffett Wants to Know: Do GEICO Ads Get Job Done." USA Today, January 24, 2005.

Rayner, Bob. "After Some Lean Years, Richmond, Va., Ad Agency Wins Back Big Accounts." Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, March 29, 2004.

Steinberg, Brian. "Newest TV Spinoffs: 'Situ-mercials.'" Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2004, p. B11.

Ed Dinger

MINI-CAMPAIGNS

OVERVIEW

Starting in the mid-1990s GEICO, a direct marketer of automobile insurance, began spending an increasing amount of money on advertising, particularly television spots. The company's ad agency, the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia, produced a wide variety of commercials. Unlike traditional car insurance advertising that took a serious tone and focused on accidents, GEICO spots were lighthearted and humorous. In 1999 GEICO introduced a gecko cartoon character that became a company mascot and the subject of its own advertising campaign. In 2003 GEICO released its popular ''Good News'' campaign, a ''good news, bad news'' comedic formula that spoofed television programming, from soap operas to congressional hearings. Both of these campaigns were joined by a simultaneous effort, ''Mini-Campaigns,'' which was unveiled in 2004.

''Mini-Campaigns'' played on older GEICO formulas, such as explaining that in the time it took to do a particular thing, a person could purchase car insurance from GEICO. The campaign also introduced a group of sophisticated cavemen offended by GEICO's claim that its website was so easy to use, even a caveman could do it. They became the subject of a series of spots. The wide-open campaign also allowed the creative team to pursue television-programming parodies that fell outside the ''Good News'' formula. The reality-TV spoof ''Tiny House'' proved to be particularly popular.

''Mini-Campaigns'' became one strand in a three-part, $200 million-plus advertising strategy for GEICO. Commercials from all three campaigns inundated the airways, keeping the GEICO message front and center with consumers and helping to drive increasing sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

GEICO was a relatively obscure auto insurance company until the 1990s. For nearly 60 years it had operated as a niche player, using direct-mail pitches to attract customers with excellent driving records. In this way GEICO was able to offer cheaper rates than its competitors. The company almost failed in the 1970s as it adjusted to changes in the marketplace, but it found a savior in renowned stock-market investor Warren Buffett, who had held stock in the company since the 1950s. By the 1990s GEICO was the seventh-largest auto insurer in the United States and was eager to grow even larger and attract a wider customer base. In 1994 it hired the Martin Agency to serve as its ad agency and began for the first time to spend money on mass-advertising efforts, which quickly resulted in strong growth. When Buffett acquired GEICO for his investment vehicle, Berkshire Hathaway, Inc., two years later, the company was told to grow even faster, and the advertising budget swelled.

GEICO honed its pitch into a brand promise that would anchor all of its subsequent campaigns: ''Fifteen minutes could save you 15 percent or more on car insurance.'' The Martin Agency also proved adept at crafting humorous television commercials, a significant departure for the staid car insurance industry, which had traditionally adopted a serious tone. Not only did the humor help GEICO to stand out from the crowd, but it also put a human face on a company that did not rely on agents. Instead, people's interaction with the company was a voice on the telephone or an impersonal computer screen.

In the summer of 1999 GEICO aired its first commercial employing a cartoon gecko, playing off of the common mispronunciation of the GEICO name. A series of spots featuring the gecko followed and became a staple of U.S. television commercials. In 2003 GEICO launched a second successful campaign, called ''Good News.'' Commercials in this series featured someone, often in dire straits, being told by another that there was good news. Their expectations were dashed, however, when it was revealed that the good news was that the other person had saved a lot of money on their car insurance by switching to GEICO. The insurer ran both the ''Gecko'' and ''Good News'' campaigns simultaneously, with the former keeping the GEICO brand in the forefront and the latter focusing on the company's money-saving message. GEICO's ad budget swelled beyond $200 million a year, and with a mandate to achieve outstanding growth, the marketers released yet another campaign in 2004. Called ''Mini-Campaigns,'' the new effort was a collection of humorous television spots that provided the creative team with a outlet for ideas that did not fit into the ''Gecko'' or ''Good News'' models but continued to build on GEICO's humor and brand image.

TARGET MARKET

Because every person who drove a car in the United States was required by law to carry car insurance, GEICO targeted a vast audience, young and old, male and female, and all ethnic groups. GEICO tended to focus on a younger demographic, however, because a major part of its marketing strategy was convincing people to take action, to call GEICO or visit the company website and change insurance carriers. Older drivers tended to stick with their insurance agents, making it natural that GEICO should focus most of its appeal on younger drivers, essentially those 25 to 40 years of age. It was this demographic that the company believed was most likely to shop around for a better rate and ultimately do business with GEICO. The television spots that made up the ''Mini-Campaigns'' appealed to an even younger demographic: drivers between the ages of 18 and 34.

COMPETITION

By the time of the ''Mini-Campaigns,'' GEICO had grown to become the fourth-largest auto insurer in the United States. At the head of the list since the 1940s was State Farm, controlling about 18.5 percent of the market.

GEICO'S HERITAGE

GEICO stood for Government Employees Insurance Company, a name that led to the common misperception that it was a government agency. In fact, it was founded in Texas in the 1930s by Leo and Lillian Goodwin, who decided to sell car insurance only to people with sterling driving records. In this way they would be able to offer lower premiums, attract new business, and carve out a niche in the auto insurance field. Their initial market consisted of federal government employees and the top three grades of noncommissioned military officers. It was not until the early 1990s that GEICO began to expand aggressively beyond that pool of customers.

It had spent hundreds of millions of dollars on marketing over the decades and had one of the best-known slogans in all of advertising: "Like a good neighbor, State Farm is there." Next in line, with just over 10 percent of the market, was Allstate, another well-entrenched competitor with its own timeworn slogan: "You're in good hands with Allstate." Coming in third and fourth were the Progressive Corporation and GEICO, with 7.1 percent and 5.5 percent market shares respectively. State Farm and Allstate did not wish to compete with GEICO on price, a move that the top-two companies feared would relegate car insurance to mere commodity status—a generic item people bought because it was the cheapest. The big two were not just selling insurance; they were selling their reputations. Progressive, not as well entrenched, was quick to follow suit with GEICO, increasing its ad budgets and emphasizing price.

Eventually Allstate made some price appeals, and even State Farm beefed up its ad spending. But a major reason they were willing to join GEICO and Progressive in the car insurance ad wars was that there were more profits than ever to be made in the business. In the 1990s cars became better built, resulting in fewer repairs, fewer accidents, and consequently fewer insurance claims. In addition, the population was growing older on average, and typically the older people became, the slower they drove, again leading to fewer accidents. Thus, GEICO had to contend with companies larger in market share as well as a pack of smaller insurers also eager to attract more customers and reap the benefits of higher profits in the industry. Rounding out the top 10 in direct premiums written in 2004 were Farmers Insurance Group (4.9 percent), Nationwide Group (4.5 percent), United Services Automobile Association Group (3.5 percent), American International Group (3 percent), Liberty Mutual Group (2.8 percent), and American Family Insurance Group (2.2 percent).

MARKETING STRATEGY

Having enjoyed success with "Gecko" and "Good News," both of which became populist campaigns embraced by consumers, GEICO and the Martin Agency launched "Mini-Campaigns" in September 2004. The freewheeling, humorous effort contained variety in hopes of touching a chord with consumers and perhaps giving birth to another popular ad concept.

The initial wave of the campaign comprised nine spots. Three featured cavemen and were intended to drive traffic to GEICO's website as well as to appeal to younger drivers. In the first of the series, "Insult," a TV announcer made the claim that the GEICO website was so easy to use that "even a caveman can do it." A caveman who was part of the TV crew, however, took offense at this supposedly politically incorrect remark, shouted, "Not cool!" and stormed off the set. The second spot, "TV," showed a pair of urbane caveman in their finely apportioned living room watching the first spot and grumbling, "What's that supposed to mean?" In the third spot, "Apology," the announcer tried to make peace by inviting the two cavemen to a trendy eatery. "We had no idea you guys were still around," he pleaded, only to be dismissed with a suggestion that in the future he should do a little research first.

Three of the "Mini-Campaigns" commercials offered new humorous variations on an old GEICO commercial formula that used the phrase "In the time it takes . . ." For example, a husband was asked by his wife, who was modeling a new dress, "Does this make me look fat?" Only half listening, he replied, "You betcha." The voice-over then commented, "In the time it takes you to pull out the sofa bed, you could save 15 percent or more."

The final three spots were parodies of infomercials and reality TV shows, territory the "Good News" campaign had been adept at exploiting. One spot spoofed an Old Navy commercial, making the point that the clothes would not save a person money on car insurance, while another was a takeoff of a Super Glue infomercial. The most widely acclaimed spot of all nine was a reality-TV parody called "Tiny House." Taking its cue from the hit film Being John Malkovitch, which featured an absurdly low-ceilinged office space that was located between elevator floors, "Tiny House" appeared to be a promo for an upcoming reality show in which a newly married couple would have to spend a year in a miniature house.

"The marriage was built to last," intoned the announcer, "but the house was too small." Snippets were shown of the marriage unraveling because of the confined space. The announcer then said, "The drama will be real, but it won't save you any money on your car insurance." The spot fooled viewers and critics alike, many of whom praised the execution. "Why do I love this Tiny House thing so much?" wrote Barbara Lippert of Adweek. "First of all, its meticulous production expertly mimics every squalid detail of the reality-promo genre (the cutting and pacing, the typeface, the music). And there's a clever, deeper insight here: 'living concept' shows like Big Brother are awful precisely because they make the viewer feel claustrophobic."

GEICO added a pair of new executions to "Mini-Campaigns" in April 2005. Both of the 30-second spots focused on the ease of buying a GEICO policy online by contrasting it with the difficulty of everyday situations. In one spot the wheels from a set of rolling luggage came off. In another children in a spelling bee were presented with an extremely difficult word to tackle.

OUTCOME

"Mini-Campaigns" became a useful outlet for a variety of ideas for GEICO television commercials. While it was impossible to determine how much money the campaign added to GEICO's balance sheet, there was no doubting the role the entire advertising strategy played in the company's strong growth. Just to keep pace, GEICO would have to continue to advertise aggressively, and "Mini-Campaigns" served a valuable function, acting as a depository for spots outside the "Gecko" and "Good News" formulas as well as providing a breeding ground for potentially popular new formulas. According to Seth Stevenson, writing for the online magazine Slate, GEICO pursued a "scattershot approach" because it had to appeal to such a broad group of people. "Some ads are straightforward and tame (aimed at older drivers), while some are absurd (the kids seem to like this). All for a single product. Still, it's not just the range, but the volume of ads that's so astonishing. It seems like there's a GEICO spot every time you turn on the TV." Given the heated competition in the auto insurance field, that situation was not likely to change for some time to come, and the "Mini-Campaigns" concept was well suited to providing GEICO with new iterations of time-tested themes.

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "GEICO Lightens Up a Successful Campaign while Trying to Keep What Made It Work." New York Times, August 8, 2003, p. C2.

Frazier, Mya. "Progressive, GEICO Prod Auto Rivals into Price War." Advertising Age, February 28, 2005, p. 4.

Janoff, Barry. "Car Insurance Salesmen Come Out of the Cave." Brandweek, September 27, 2004, p. 38.

Lippert, Barbara. "Keeping It Real." Adweek, September 20, 2004, p. 36.

Lovel, Jim. "GEICO TV Campaign Evolves at Martin." Adweek, April 25, 2005.

———. "Martin Withholds GEICO's Gecko." Adweek, September 13, 2004.

McCarthy, Michael. "Buffett Wants to Know: Do GEICO Ads Get Job Done." USA Today, January 24, 2005.

Rayner, Bob. "After Some Lean Years, Richmond, Va., Ad Agency Wins Back Big Accounts." Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, March 29, 2004.

Steinberg, Brian. "Newest TV Spinoffs: 'Siti-mercials.'" Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2004, p. B11.

Stevenson, Seth. "The Best Ad on Television." Slate, July 25, 2005. Available from <http://www.slate.com/id/2123285/>

Ed Dinger

General Electric Co.

3135 Easton Turnpike
Fairfield, Connecticut 06828-0001
USA
Telephone: (203) 373-2211
Fax: (203) 373-3131
Web site: www.ge.com

■■■

IMAGINATION AT WORK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Since 1979 General Electric Co. (GE) had relied on one of the most successful branding slogans in history: ''We bring good things to life.'' But along the way the company had become almost exclusively associated with its lighting and appliance products, which by the end of the twentieth century represented only a small percentage of the company's business. With the installation of a new chief executive, Jeffrey R. Immelt, who replaced the legendary Jack Welch, the company decided to rethink its branding in order to better position GE as an innovative and forward-looking company. The result was a new slogan, ''Imagination at work,'' which became the focus of a campaign aimed at consumers, business partners, and investors as well as GE employees.

The $100 million ''Imagination at Work'' campaign, developed by BBDO Worldwide Inc., began in January 2003. In addition to TV spots, it included print ads and Web elements. The advertisements simultaneously repositioned the brand and directly promoted one of GE's many businesses. In one commercial, for example, Lassie, the heroic canine star of vintage TV and films, warded off a cougar with an array of karate moves as a way to talk about GE's security technology. In time the campaign also spread to Europe and Asia.

Despite taking some criticism for dropping ''We bring good things to life,'' GE expressed satisfaction with the campaign and continued to build on it. Market research detected a change in consumers' perceptions of GE: more people were viewing GE as a high-tech company rather than as a relic from the smokestack era. Moreover the new slogan became something of a rallying cry within the company, spurring on employees to make innovative contributions.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Throughout its history General Electric Co. enjoyed the benefits of a consistent marketing message. From the 1930s to the 1950s the company relied on the slogan ''Live better electrically,'' which was followed by two decades of variations on the word ''progress,'' such as ''Progress is our most important product.'' In 1979 GE unveiled ''We bring good things to life,'' a cornerstone to one of the most successful corporate branding campaigns in history, backed by about $1 billion in advertising. The company also had consistent leadership in the form of John F. ''Jack'' Welch, who became chairman and CEO in 1981. The charismatic leader sought to build up GE's status in all of the technology, service, and manufacturing areas that the company participated in. By the time Welch announced that he would retiring in 2001, GE, fast growing and profitable, had a market capitalization of $505 billion, making it second only to Microsoft.

Welch's tenure at the top, however, ended on a sour note when GE failed in its bid to acquire a major rival, Honeywell International.

Welch was succeeded by Immelt, who set out to put his own imprint on GE by, among other things, revamping the company's marketing. According to Diane Scarponi, writing in the Seattle Times, "Immelt said shortly after he was appointed in September 2001 that he wanted to rethink the company's image." Beth Comstock, head of communications at GE, told Scarponi, "Immelt has really been pushing a technology focus, a reinvigoration of technology at GE around the world. We wanted our communications to match that." The company conducted research that suggested that most consumers connected the "We bring goods things to life" slogan with GE's lighting and appliance business. Since the introduction of the slogan a generation earlier, however, the company had grown in so many directions that lighting and appliances had come to account for only 6 to 7 percent of revenues. Management decided that GE needed a new articulation, one that was part mission, part vision, and part strategy. After 18 months of research, brainstorming, and testing, the company and BBDO Worldwide coined a new slogan, "Imagination at work," and began to plan a marketing campaign to support it.

TARGET MARKET

One goal of the "Imagination at Work" campaign was to reach a broader range of consumers. Instead of concentrating on Sunday-morning television programming, the new GE spots would try to appeal to prime-time audiences by advertising on such shows as the hit sitcom Friends. In defining its target market the company took care to include Hispanic consumers, who accounted for nearly 13 percent of the U.S. population, a figure that was expected to reach 17 percent by 2020.

Because the contemporary GE was essentially a business-to-business company, the campaign also sought to communicate with other companies, who were GE's business partners. In addition it needed to reach GE's investors. The launch of the new campaign came at a time when the company had seen significant erosion in its stock price. A public company, GE wanted to assure investors that, because of its continuing ability to develop innovative products, it was a corporation with a large amount of untapped potential. GE employees were also a target audience; the campaign provided a directive to them to create the new products that would meet the needs of consumers and create the growth that investors expected. Moreover, because GE was a global company, the new campaign had to reach a worldwide audience of consumers, businesses, and investors.

IMAGINATION WORKING OVERTIME

General Electric Co. grew out of Thomas Edison's 1879 invention of the first commercially feasible lightbulb. Over the course of his lifetime, the former newsboy and telegraph operator received more than 1,300 patents associated with such inventions as the stock ticker, the phonograph, the movie camera, and the alkaline battery. He generally slept 4 hours a night and was known to work 40 to 50 hours at a stretch.

COMPETITION

As a multifaceted global company involved in 11 different businesses, GE faced competition on a multitude of fronts. Direct global competition came from a variety of companies, since GE was involved in such diverse areas as aircraft engines, television, amusement parks, commercial lending, environmental control products, plastics, medical technology, and robotics. As a result GE competed against a panoply of multinational corporate giants, including Citigroup, General Motors Corporation, Honeywell International, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., the News Corporation Limited, Rolls-Royce, Time Warner Inc., Toshiba Corporation, the Walt Disney Company, and Whirlpool Corporation. Hence the "Imagination at Work" campaign had to promote GE in a broad enough way to position the brand in a myriad of markets, taking on countless competitors.

Because a bulk of its advertising was on television, GE, and its message, also had to contend with indirect competition in the form of a host of other voices vying for viewers' attention. Further, given that the campaign was based on the idea that GE was imaginative and innovative, the pressure was on the marketers to demonstrate that quality in the advertising itself.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Judy Hu, GE's general manager of advertising and brand, explained the company's rebranding strategy to Kate Maddox and Beth Snyder Bulik of B to B: "We wanted to highlight some of our 'wow' products and services—things that were unexpected and that people didn't know GE was involved in . . . The overall objective was aligning our market position with our future and creating a truly integrated campaign." Furthermore she said, "It had to be global, touch our external and internal constituencies and use as many different types of media as possible." Because they had the best stories to tell in terms of

NEEDS A LITTLE WORK

Before coming up with the much-admired slogan "We bring good things to life" in 1979, General Electric's ad agency offered the client a slightly less refined version: "We make the things that make life good."

innovation, three divisions—GE Aircraft Engines, GE Plastics, and GE Medical Systems—became the focal point of the initial advertising efforts.

The $100 million "Imagination at Work" campaign broke on January 19, 2003, with television, print, and Internet advertising. A week earlier GE had introduced the program to its employees by giving out promotional items such as mouse pads because, as Hu told B to B, "We wanted everyone to understand why we were doing it and what it meant." GE also held an online trivia question about the company. The winner was given a trip to the Golden Globe Awards, during the telecast of which the new commercials would first air—a further reflection of GE's desire to appeal to a prime-time audience. The first set of TV spots tried to establish the new slogan and reposition the brand while at the same time drawing attention to a specific GE business. In one commercial the company promoted its aviation products by wondering what would have happened 100 years ago if the Wright brothers had strapped a GE jet engine to their box-kite airplane, which, at the close of the commercial, morphed into a contemporary jet. Another spot compared GE's medical technology with a genius clerk able to locate medical records quickly in an immense storage room.

The "Imagination at Work" campaign also included print and Internet elements and even an upgrade of the GE logo, traditionally rendered in black and white but now available in 14 different bright colors and pastels. According to Maddox and Bulik of B to B, the print ads used "the 'wow' factor to highlight GE's various businesses. The ads featured dramatic photos of products such as a wind turbine, Evolution locomotive and GE image-guided surgery, while providing additional information on the nuts and bolts of the products." The ads ran in such mainstream publications as the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, BusinessWeek, and Forbes as well as in trade magazines, including Automotive Design and Production, Building Operation Management, Plastics Technology, and Power Engineering. To promote GE online and to help reeducate consumers, the company launched the "Pen" subcampaign, developed by Omnicom's OMD unit. "Pen" introduced an interactive Web space in which users could put their own imaginations to work by making drawings that could be E-mailed to others, who could then add their own touches.

GE built on the successful launch of the "Imagination at Work" campaign by adding new TV spots and expanding other elements. In one commercial promoting GE Commercial Finance, Christopher Columbus charmed the queen of Spain into providing him with three small ships. According to the voice-over, "Without proper financing, even the best ideas in the world can fall flat." Perhaps the most memorable of the subsequent television spots was "Lassie," a black-and-white commercial that played off of the old television series featuring Lassie, a collie, and her owner, Timmy, to promote GE's security technology. In it Lassie protected Timmy from the threat of a ferocious cougar by rising up on her hind legs and, with the help of computer-generated imagery, unleashing a set of martial-arts moves. The graphics and voice-overs of three of the later television commercials were translated into Spanish and then ran for 10 weeks on Spanish television channels in seven markets, including Dallas, Houston, and Miami.

The "Pen" subcampaign also warranted a second generation; an enhanced website was launched in September 2004. Called "Imagination Cubed," it allowed up to three people to collaborate on illustrations at the same time while communicating through a chat interface. The "Imagination at Work" campaign expanded beyond the United States as GE began advertising in Asia and Europe, where the campaign included outdoor advertising. In May 2005 GE introduced an initiative called "Ecomagination" to promote its environmentally friendly products. This initiative, the largest marketing effort in the "Imagination at Work" campaign, broke with eight-page inserts in four major newspapers and later included TV spots, more print ads, and another online element.

OUTCOME

Dropping the slogan "We bring good things to life" in favor of "Imagination at work" was met with criticism from both inside and outside GE. Some suggested that, rather than making such a radical departure, the company would have been better served to build on the previous slogan, which had been so successful. It was also suggested that, as a slogan, "Imagination at work" was far from imaginative: Black & Decker used "Ideas at work," Sony had "Innovation at work," and three companies, including Ford, were mining the phrase "Ingenuity at work." But Robert Lauterborn, a former GE marketing executive turned college professor, approved of the change, telling Sean Callahan of B to B, "It's a return to GE's roots as one of the great innovative and manufacturing companies on earth.''

Regardless of what others thought, GE's management appeared pleased with the change. About a year after the campaign began, market research indicated that half the respondents perceived GE as ''dynamic,'' 40 percent saw it as a company able to deliver high-tech solutions, and 35 percent considered it ''innovative.'' Comstock told Marv Balousek, writing for the Wisconsin State Journal, that ''Imagination at Work'' was more than just a tagline, explaining, ''It's really become a rallying cry. It's allowed us a platform to reinvigorate marketing.''

FURTHER READING

Callahan, Sean. ''GE Campaign Brings 'Good Things' to an End.'' B to B, February 10, 2003, p. 3.

———. ''GE Continues to Develop 'Imagination.'' B to B, October 25, 2004, p. 22.

———. ''New GE CMO Taps 'Imagination.'' B to B, August 11, 2003, p. 3.

Creamer, Matthew. ''GE Sets Aside Big Bucks to Show Off Some Green.'' Advertising Age, May 9, 2005, p. 7.

Elliott, Stuart. ''GE to Spend $100 Million Promoting Itself as Innovative.'' New York Times, January 16, 2003, p. C1.

Maddox, Kate, and Beth Snyder Bulik. ''Integrated Marketing Success Stories.'' B to B, June 7, 2004, p. 20.

Scarponi, Diane. ''GE Bringing New Ad Slogan to Life.'' Seattle Times, January 17, 2003, p. C2.

Soter, Tom. ''On the Job: Finding the Right Match for a Spot's Soundtrack.'' Shoot, March 12, 2004, p. 13.

Ed Dinger

General Mills, Inc.

One General Mills Boulevard
Minneapolis, Minnesota 55426
USA
Telephone: (763) 764-7600
Fax: (783) 764-7384
Web site: www.generalmills.com

■■■

STORIES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003 General Mills, Inc.'s brand Cheerios was the top-selling cold-cereal brand in the United States, claiming $334 million in sales of the $8 billion cereal market. But General Mills believed that the aging brand, which had been introduced in 1941 as Cheerioats, was losing its edge. The company began looking for ways to move the brand out of the kitchen cupboard and to make the cereal part of American families on a more emotional level.

To help achieve that goal, the Cheerios packaging was changed, replacing the bowl of Cheerios on the box's front with a heart. And General Mills' agency, Saatchi & Saatchi New York, which had worked with the company for almost 80 years, was charged with creating a new advertising campaign that focused less on the nutritional message that the brand's oat ingredients were healthy and more on the emotional benefits of the cereal. Saatchi & Saatchi's co-chief operating officer Mike Burns said in an interview with Fast Company, "It became very much about motherhood and nurturance—that Cheerios is an expression of love and doing the best for your family." The "Stories" campaign, which presented a series of television spots sharing the true experiences of consumers that involved Cheerios, began in 2003.

According to Saatchi & Saatchi, the campaign succeeded in reaching mothers as well as consumers of all ages, which helped to drive sales. The campaign also inspired consumers to log on to the "Stories" website to post their own heartwarming family experiences involving Cheerios and to read those of others. In addition, the ongoing campaign was recognized by the advertising industry, beginning in 2003 with one spot, "Breakfast in Bed," being named a Best Spot by Adweek. In 2005 the "Heartbeat" spot won a Gold EFFIE Award, and the "Adoption" spot garnered four ADDY Awards, including the National Gold.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

General Mills introduced Cheerioats in 1941 with a marketing strategy that included a cute little-girl spokescharacter named Cheery O'Leary and the tagline "Cheer up with Cheerioats." The brand also signed on in 1941 as sponsor of the radio Western The Lone Ranger, and it maintained the relationship during the program's run through 1949. The popularity of the masked man and his show pushed sales of Cheerios to nearly 1.8 million cases of the cereal in the first year of sponsorship. When the program moved to television in 1949, Cheerios stayed on as its sponsor until the 1960s. During the years that it sponsored The Lone Ranger the brand experienced numerous changes.

In 1945 the cereal's name was changed to Cheerios, and sweet little Cheery disappeared into the cereal-character history books. The tagline was changed to "Cheerios: the first ready-to-eat cereal." In the 1960s General Mills began promoting the health benefits of its Cheerios brand with marketing taglines such as "Go with the goodness of Cheerios" (introduced in 1964), which was followed by "Nutrition: that's the Cheerios tradition" (1971). Almost from the beginning, Cheerios' marketing targeted children, and in 1974 it got a boost with moms as the preferred first finger-food for their toddlers when pediatricians began recommending it to parents. In 1994 the tagline "The one and only" was introduced, and when the "Stories" campaign began in 2003, the long-running tagline continued to be used.

TARGET MARKET

According to Saatchi & Saatchi, the "Stories" campaign targeted and was designed to resonate with anyone who had a tender spot in their heart, regardless of their age. But beyond that, the campaign targeted moms by portraying real situations that busy women could relate to. In an E-mail correspondence Saatchi & Saatchi representative Blair Meisels wrote, "We know the world isn't perfect and neither is her family, but it's the special moments when they come together that make it all worthwhile." The campaign also targeted all generations of consumers looking for diet support for a healthier life by promoting the product's cholesterol-lowering benefits as well as its value as a nutritious first finger-food for toddlers.

COMPETITION

The Kellogg Company was the number one breakfast-cereal maker in the United States in 2004, with a 33.5 percent share compared to General Mills' 31.5 percent share. With its Frosted Flakes brand falling in at number two behind General Mills' Cheerios, a long-standing favorite with parents of toddlers, Kellogg determined to meet the competition head-on by introducing its own toddler-friendly cereal. The new brand, Tiger Power, was tagged "food to grow" and targeted the mothers of toddlers and preschool-age children. Supporting the new cereal's launch was a $20 million television, print, and Internet marketing campaign created by Leo Burnett Chicago. It used Tony the Tiger, Kellogg's iconic spokescharacter for the Frosted Flakes brand. Even though the new cereal resembled Cheerios (it had three O-shapes connected to form a triangle) and had a strong supporting campaign and a well-known spokescharacter touting it as "Gr-r-reat to grow," Tiger Power lacked power and failed to grow. The new cereal hit the shelves in January 2005, and by May sales had reached only $3.4 million, a small number compared to Cheerios' reported $550 million in sales in 2004. Kellogg announced plans to increase the advertising budget for the new brand, but according to a report in Advertising Age, some were questioning whether the cereal would still be on store shelves by the end of the year.

Kraft Foods, Inc., the number one food company in the United States, was best known for its expansive line of cheeses, crackers, and cookies. Also in the Kraft Foods arsenal was the Post Cereals line with more than 23 varieties. One was Grape-Nuts, which was introduced to consumers in 1897 and was one of the first ready-to-eat cereals, and another was kid-targeted Alpha-Bits (introduced in 1957), cereal shaped like the letters in the alphabet and loaded with sugar. Despite its broad selection of cereals, Post ranked a distant third behind Kellogg and General Mills, claiming just a 16 percent market share at the beginning of 2000. To help drive sales, in 2000 Post began a promotional effort that included offering items from the Universal Studios Land Before Time movies, a dinosaur-themed series that had been a hit with kids aged two to seven. The effort was supported by print advertising that targeted mothers of children in that age group, but it seemed futile, as Post reported a 1.9 percent drop in sales in 2001 from the previous year. In a 2003 promotion Post put mini-bobblehead statues of Major League Baseball players in boxes of its different cereal brands, including Alpha-Bits. Again the effort did not noticeably increase sales. Post took a different approach to reach moms and their kids in 2005; it reformulated its Alpha-Bits cereal, making it sugar free and whole grain. To promote the improved cereal as a healthy finger food for toddlers, Post partnered with the

CHEERIOS PROJECT PROMOTES CHILDREN'S LITERACY

To promote children's literacy, General Mills' Cheerios brand kicked off its "Spoonfuls of Stories" project in 2002. During the holiday season that year the company packaged one of five different children's book titles in five million boxes of Cheerios. The first free books, in what was planned as an annual holiday giveaway, included Rosie's Walk; Alexander and the Terrible, Horrible, No Good, Very Bad Day; Sylvester and the Magic Pebble; Cloudy with a Chance of Meatballs; and Salt in His Shoes: Michael Jordan in Pursuit of a Dream. Supporting the project was a new website, www.spoonfulsofstories.com, that had a variety of age-appropriate activities and stories that parents and their children could share. The books were published by Simon & Schuster.

Reach Out and Read program to introduce letter recognition and reading to young children. The children's literacy effort included distributing new books to children ages six months to five years old through pediatricians' offices. In addition, learning activities using the alphabet cereal in what the company described as ''eat-ertainment'' could be found on the website www.alpha-bits.com.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cheerios was the top-selling cold cereal in the United States in 2003, but General Mills wanted to give the brand a creative edge that promoted the cereal's health benefits while also connecting with consumers on a meaningful and emotional level. Saatchi & Saatchi, which had been General Mills' agency for nearly 80 years, was charged with creating a new marketing campaign for Cheerios that would achieve the desired edge for the brand, connect with consumers, and drive sales. Working with the idea that customers' real-life experiences with Cheerios would resonate with consumers, the agency developed the ''Stories'' campaign. It was released in 2003. No specific budget for the campaign was announced, but according to a report in Advertising Age, in 2003 General Mills spent $40 million advertising the Cheerios brand overall.

The campaign, limited to television, told the true stories of various customers' life experiences in which Cheerios had played a role. The 10 unique spots included the titles ''Breakfast in Bed,'' which aired in 2003, and ''Heartbeats'' and ''Adoption,'' both of which aired in 2005. ''Breakfast in Bed'' depicted a young boy in the wee hours of the morning carrying bowls, spoons, and a bottle of milk into the semidark bedroom where his parents were sleeping. He used a box of Cheerios as a tray, and he advised his sleepy parents, ''You've got to take some cholesterol off of you.'' In the ''Heartbeat'' spot, a small boy was shown cuddling with his father on a sofa. The boy said, ''I hear something. Thump, thump, thump.'' The father said that the sound was his heart talking to the boy. The little boy then asked, ''Does it ever say anything else?'' A voice-over stated the health benefits of eating Cheerios. This was followed by the boy saying, ''I hear gorp, gorp,'' to which the man responded, ''That's my stomach.'' The boy asked, ''Your stomach talks too?'' The spot ended with the Cheerios tagline, ''The one and only.'' In ''Adoption'' a young couple was shown riding in the back seat of a car in an unknown but clearly foreign city. They were picking up two small children who they were adopting. Both children were reluctant to leave the orphanage or foster home where they had been living, but the couple had an opportunity to begin bonding with the children when they offered them Cheerios as a treat.

Supporting the campaign was a new website, www.cheerios.com/stories, that enabled consumers to share their own ''Cheerios Moments'' and read those of others. The stories shared on the website touched upon Cheerios lovers from all generations. Many of the posted stories were from parents whose children were adults but continued to eat Cheerios. In one story, ''Cheerios Bandit,'' the mother of a toddler wrote that her daughter began walking at 10 months old and quickly learned how to help herself to the box of Cheerios, earning her the nickname that titled the story. Another person said that her daughter, who had eaten Cheerios since she was a toddler and was then 23 years old, still considered Cheerios her favorite ''comfort'' food. The writer of ''88 Years of Dedication'' told of the person's 88-year-old mother, who ate a bowl of Cheerios for breakfast every day and occasionally a bowl of the cereal before bed if she was hungry. It noted that the elderly mother was in good health, volunteered, and cut her own grass using a riding mower. People who visited the website could also view the ''Adoption'' television spot.

OUTCOME

The ''Stories'' campaign was well received by consumers and was recognized with numerous advertising-industry awards. Consumers motivated by the television spots took time to log on to the ''Stories'' website to share their own ''Cheerios Moments'' stories, read the stories of others, and comment on the commercials. One customer who posted her comments on the site wrote that the spot featuring a young boy serving his parents breakfast in bed was ''the most wonderful, delightful, and adorable ad I've ever seen.''

The commercial ''Breakfast in Bed'' was named an Adweek Best Spot in 2003. The campaign's spot ''Heartbeat,'' telling the story of a young boy hearing his father's heart beating, garnered a 2005 Gold EFFIE Award. The award's summary credited the campaign with boosting Cheerios' sales and getting to the heart of what was important to consumers. In addition, the ''Adoption'' commercial, which related the story of a couple on their journey to pick up the two small children they had adopted, won four 2005 ADDY Awards in the cinema and television categories, including the National Gold award. The American Advertising Federation presented the awards each year in recognition of creative excellence in advertising.

FURTHER READING

''Best Spots.'' Adweek, February 17, 2003.

Lee, Thomas. ''Tony vs. Cheerios; Kellogg Co. Is Taking On General Mills' Cheerios Brand with a New Cereal Aimed at Toddlers and Touted by Venerable Pitchman Tony the Tiger.'' Minneapolis (MN) Star Tribune, January 8, 2005.

"Multimedia Available: More than Nutrition Packed in This Cereal: Free Children's Books inside Millions of Cheerios Boxes." Business Wire, November 17, 2003.

Reinan, John. "Keeping the 'O' Rolling." Minneapolis (MN) Star Tribune, July 20, 2003.

Scourtes, Mary D. "Brief Bites. Cheering On Cheerios." Tampa (FL) Tribune, December 4, 2002, p. 1.

Sicherman, Al. "Tidbits. Alpha-Bits: How Sweet It Isn't." Minneapolis (MN) Star Tribune, August 11, 2005.

"Sound Source Interactive Teams with Kraft Foods Unit in National Promotion for 'The Land Before Time.'" Business Wire, May 10, 2000.

"Spots: Cheerios." Advertising Age, April 28, 2003.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Cheerios Crushes Tony as Kellogg Launch Flops." Advertising Age, June 13, 2005.

———. "Kellogg Pounces on Toddlers; Tiger Power to Wrest Tot Monopoly Away from General Mills' $500M Cheerios Brand." Advertising Age, December 6, 2004.

Tischler, Linda. "How Do I Love Thee? Let Me Plot the Graph." Fast Company, July 1, 2004, p. 64.

Rayna Bailey

General Motors Corporation

300 Renaissance Center
PO Box 300
Detroit, Michigan 48265-3000
USA
Telephone: (313) 556-5000
Web site: www.gm.com

■■■

AN AMERICAN REVOLUTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Chevrolet was a division of the General Motors Corporation (GM), the largest car manufacturer in the United States. Long facing pressure from Japanese automakers such as Toyota, the company decided to revamp its vehicle lineup in 2004 by launching 10 new and redesigned models under a single campaign, "An American Revolution." This marked Chevrolet's first division-wide marketing push in more than a decade.

The campaign was headed by Michigan-based ad agency Campbell-Ewald. Beginning with a television commercial on December 31, 2003, during Dick Clark's Primetime New Year's Rockin' Eve, "An American Revolution" featured dozens of TV spots, each featuring a vehicle in the company's fleet. Key spots promoted the sports-car model Corvette C6 and the SSR truck. Chevrolet reached out to many demographics, using "An American Revolution" as a flexible umbrella that encompassed many targeted mini-initiatives. This included a male-focused print campaign for the Silverado truck and a hip-hop themed radio and television campaign for the Impala and HHR. The campaign relied on exposure during key events, including New Year's Eve, the Super Bowl, the Vibe Awards, and the 2004 Summer Olympics.

The campaign was mostly successful. Many models, such as the Corvette and the Impala, had strong sales numbers. Consumers responded favorably to the new commercials, which all fared well in USA Today's Ad Track surveys, with 26 percent of respondents giving the campaign the highest score possible (against an industry average of 16 percent). At 98 percent, dealer participation was impressive. The company also generated significantly more traffic at its website and maintained its high public profile. Nevertheless, some individual lines, especially the SSR, did not sell well.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Chevrolet was founded in 1911 by Louis Chevrolet, a Swiss-born race-car driver, and William Durant, a former executive at General Motors. By producing cars such as the 1912 Classic Six, a five-passenger sedan, the company soon became successful enough for Durant to buy a majority of GM's voting stock. Soon thereafter Chevrolet merged with GM and became a separate division of the older company. GM dominated vehicle sales in the United States throughout the twentieth century, with Chevrolet as its premier line. By 1963, in fact, 1 out of very 10 vehicles sold in the United States was a Chevrolet.

The brand featured a number of well-known vehicles over the years, including the 1957 Bel Air, which would later be known as the "'57 Chevy," and the most recognizable American sports car, the Corvette. The Corvette was introduced in the early 1950s and became the most famous vehicle in the entire Chevrolet line. Production on the car continued through the twenty-first century, making it Chevrolet's most established vehicle.

Chevrolet's Super Sports Roadster (SSR) concept pickup truck. © REUTERS/CORBIS.

In the face of strong competition from such competitors as the Toyota Motor Corp., Chevy decided to update much of its fleet in a 20-month period beginning in January 2004. Ten of the vehicles would be launched in that period: the cars models Malibu Maxx, Aveo, Cobalt, Corvette C6, Uplander, and Impala; the trucks SSR and Colorado; and the sports utility vehicles (SUVs) Equinox and HHR.

As Chevrolet's signature car, the Corvette was to be the centerpiece of the campaign. The SSR was also important to the launch. Based on Chevy's midsize SUV, the Trailblazer, the SSR was a stylized, convertible truck that Chevrolet hoped would prove popular enough to boost the sales of its other trucks.

TARGET MARKET

The target market for the campaign varied from vehicle to vehicle. The SSR and Colorado trucks were aimed at men, especially those in their 20s and 30s. At a price of more than $40,000 per vehicle, the SSR would have to find a lucrative audience of young professionals to be successful.

Chevrolet also used the "American Revolution" campaign to reach out to minority consumers, particularly African-Americans. The Impala and HHR were especially important to that outreach. The company also made a push for Latin-American consumers. The Accent Marketing agency of Miami was hired to run the parallel Spanish-language "Subte" (Join Us) campaign. The campaign featured television spots that aired on Spanish-language stations such as Telemundo and Univision as well as radio spots and print ads.

COMPETITION

Chevrolet's traditional competition came from GM's primary American competitors, the Ford Motor Company and the Chrysler Group (the American division of DaimlerChrysler, responsible for the Chrysler, Jeep, and Dodge brands). The company was also under pressure from the Japanese automaker Toyota Motor Corp., whose subsidiary, Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., was making heavy inroads in the U.S. market. In 2003 Toyota passed Ford to become the second-largest automaker in the world, right after Chevrolet's parent, GM. The Japanese automaker moved 6.78 million units worldwide in 2003 alone, versus 8.6 million units sold worldwide that year by GM.

Chevrolet was especially concerned about the SSR's sales prospects. It would be entering the already crowded light-truck field. Nevertheless, Chevy hoped to move at least 13,000 units of the SSR. This was a relatively conservative number that reflected the strength of the light-truck market in the United States. Both the SSR and the Trailblazer faced stiff competition from the Ford Explorer, which remained the top-selling vehicle in its

A BLOCKBUSTER ADMAN

Chevrolet kicked off its major "An American Revolution" campaign on December 31, 2003, during the TV program Dick Clark's Primetime New Year's Rockin' Eve, with a commercial titled "Car Carrier." The spot had to be a blockbuster, because it would introduce six brand-new and newly designed vehicles as well an initiate an umbrella campaign that would last 20 months. To ensure success Chevy turned to a blockbuster director: Michael Bay.

Bay had been one of Hollywood's most successful action-movie directors since his 1995 debut film, Bad Boys, which helped make Will Smith a major movie star. He also directed one of the biggest hits of 1996, The Rock, starring Sean Connery and Nicolas Cage. His most successful picture, however, was the Bruce Willis vehicle Armageddon, which was the highest-grossing film globally in 1998. Though often derided by critics as vapid, Bay's films were almost always major box-office hits.

Bay had long been a successful director of commercials. His first spot, for the American Red Cross, won a prestigious Clio Award. Spots directed by Bay also won several Gold Lions at the Cannes International Advertising Festival, an event dubbed the "Olympics of advertising" for its competitiveness and respect within the industry. Bay did work for a number of the world's most recognized brands, including Budweiser, Nike, Levi's, and Coca-Cola.

class in 2003. The Corvette, Chevrolet's biggest name, would be challenged by other sports cars, including the Porsche 911, the Audi 350Z, and the BMW Z4.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Chevrolet was faced with the daunting task of introducing new models for 10 separate vehicle lines, or half of its fleet. To meet this challenge the company unified all of its advertising under one overarching campaign, "An American Revolution." This tagline reflected the dynamic new products Chevy was introducing. The campaign was created by the Michigan-based agency Campbell-Ewald and cost a reported $800 million to implement.

Chevrolet had many goals for the campaign. Most importantly, it wanted to establish strong sales for all of its new vehicles, especially key models such as the Corvette C6. Dealer participation in the company's most recent campaign, "We'll Be There," had been only about 20 percent. Chevy wanted this number to improve significantly. It also wanted to maintain a high level of customer awareness for the company in general.

The campaign was the first company-wide initiative since the "Heartbeat of America" campaign in the 1980s. It kicked off on New Year's Eve 2003–2004, during the television special Dick Clark's Primetime New Year's Rockin' Eve. Chevrolet was the primary sponsor of the event, the most-watched New Year's celebration on American TV. It also bought a major billboard in Times Square to capitalize on the New Year's Eve publicity.

The first spot of the campaign—and the focus of Chevy's New Year's advertising—was the "Car Carrier" spot. Helmed by major Hollywood director Michael Bay, whose films included the blockbusters Armageddon and The Rock, it featured six new Chevrolets that were being introduced in 2004. The spot starred the premier vehicle in Corvette's fleet: the Corvette. Each new vehicle made an appearance as it was loaded onto a car carrier. The SSR received prominent placement, dramatically backing into the frame at the end of the spot.

The New Year's launch underscored one of Chevrolet's key goals for the campaign: to advertise at major events. This approach continued with the debut of two major spots at the Super Bowl just a few weeks later. The SSR was the star of one of these spots, titled "Soap." It featured children getting their mouths washed out with soap after their response to seeing the SSR for the first time. The commercial met with controversy for its implied profanity and only ran for a few months. It made an impression on viewers, however, and was regarded as one of the best spots on the broadcast, which was acknowledged to be the biggest night in TV advertising.

The Summer Olympics gave Chevrolet a chance to premiere a TV commercial featuring its Silverado truck. The spot depicted a Silverado acting as a tow truck for a car carrier. It recalled the New Year's spot that kicked off the entire campaign while also underscoring the sturdy, reliable power of Chevrolet's signature truck. Later, another key move of the campaign focused on the Silverado as well. In order to unite all of its advertising under one banner, Chevrolet discontinued its popular "Like a Rock" campaign, which had run for more than a decade. Featuring the eponymous song by Bob Seger, the "Like a Rock" spots had helped the Silverado become one of the most popular trucks in the United States. In anticipation of a 2006 redesign, however, Chevrolet decided that a new approach was needed to keep the brand fresh.

To reach the male consumers that composed the major target market for Chevy trucks, Chevrolet used both television spots and print ads. The key spot of the campaign featured the catchphrase "Men love trucks. Why? Because trucks don't ask why." The print campaign was built around a 10-page insert called "Men, Woman, and the Truck: A Relationship Handbook." These inserts were placed in publications with large male readerships, such as Popular Mechanics and Men's Health. The ads were meant to underscore the Silverado's appeal to men in a humorous way, by tweaking traditional "macho" notions about men and women. In addition, retired National Football League (NFL) star Howie Long was signed on as a spokesman for entire Chevy truck line.

For the HHR and Impala lines, Chevrolet devised commercials around the rap group Slum Village in an effort to reach younger fans of hip-hop music. Several television and radio spots were produced, including two 60-second radio spots for the Impala. The television commercials, with stylized visuals and quick-cut edits, were meant to look like music videos. They featured the song "EZ Up," a single by Slum Village. The group itself was chosen because of its Detroit roots, and the spots prominently featured Detroit scenes. These commercials were intended to show the hipness of the Chevrolet brand. They also targeted urban consumers and ran during popular hip-hop themed events, including the Vibe Awards. Created by Vibe magazine, one of the most successful urban-music-themed publications, the awards spotlighted the best hip-hop performers in the United States.

OUTCOME

The campaign was successful on most fronts. Chevrolet accomplished its goal of increasing dealer participation. Ninety-eight percent of United States Chevy dealers participated in the campaign. Traffic at the company's website increased significantly, with individual vehicles, such as the Aveo, seeing 280 percent more visitors than they were before 2004. The campaign's television commercials drew praise from critics, who found them bold and interesting. More importantly, consumers responded to the spots. According to a Millward Brown study conducted in late 2004, the "American Revolution" campaign was the seventh-most-recognized campaign at that time.

The spots as a group drew a positive response in USA Today 's Ad Track survey as well, with 26 percent of respondents holding a highly favorable view of the campaign, versus an industry average of only 16 percent. Sales were solid. The Corvette C6, which featured prominently in the campaign's kickoff, sold out for the year. The Impala also performed impressively, moving 290,259 units to become the top-selling domestic four-door passenger vehicle in 2004; and the Trailblazer, with 283,384 units sold, made stiff inroads against the class-leading Ford Explorer's 339,333 units. Some lines disappointed, however. The SSR had surprisingly weak sales, moving less than 9,000 units. Chevrolet later discontinued the line.

FURTHER READING

Carter, Bill, and Stuart Elliott. "New Creative Director for Chevrolet Account." New York Times, May 19, 2004.

Geist, Laura Clark. "Silverado Joins Chevy Revolution." AutoWeek, November 18, 2005.

Greenberg, Karl. "Chevy Silverado Sheds 'Like a Rock.'" Adweek, October 07, 2005.

Howard, Theresa. "'Revolution' in Ad Campaign." USA Today, October 17, 2004.

Krebs, Michelle. "In Detroit, Home Teams Swing for the Fences." New York Times, January 4, 2004.

———. "In Detroit, the Dogs Have Their Day." New York Times, January 9, 2005.

Piligan, Ellen. "Chevrolet Greets the New Year with an Ambitious Campaign to Introduce 10 Vehicles in 20 Months." New York Times, December 19, 2003.

Robinson, Eugene. "GM's Collapsing Ladder." Washington Post, November 25, 2005.

Sanneh, Kelefa. "Mixing Rednecks and Blue States." New York Times, November 8, 2004.

Smith, Stephanie. "Publishers Ponder Auto Ads." Adweek, December 05, 2005.

Guy PatrickCunningham

BREAK THROUGH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Cadillac, a division of Detroit-based auto giant General Motors Corporation (GM), had long been GM's luxury division, offering higher-priced, roomier vehicles. The brand had been in trouble for several years, however, and saw sales tumble almost 10 percent between 2000 and 2001. One of the primary culprits was Cadillac's aging customer base. By the early 2000s the average age of Cadillac buyers was 65 years old. Younger drivers tended to prefer European and Japanese luxury automobiles such as BMW, Mercedes, and Lexus. To help reach younger consumers, Cadillac developed the CTS, a sedan that was priced as an "entry" luxury car, along the lines of the BMW 3 Series.

Cadillac earmarked nearly a quarter of a billion dollars for a new campaign, which was implemented by advertising agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles.

A Cadillac CTS © CARLO CORTES IV/REUTERS/CORBIS.

Titled ''Break Through,'' the campaign revolved around a television spot that premiered at the 2002 Super Bowl. The commercial first invoked the brand's post–World War II heyday by showing a young professional driving a 1959 Cadillac. The commercial really kicked into gear with the arrival of the new CTS, which passed the 1959 vehicle on the open road while Led Zeppelin's ''Rock n' Roll'' played in the background. Led Zeppelin was one of the most successful rock bands of the 1960s and 1970s, and Cadillac believed that the band's iconic status and hard-rock sound offered the right combination of nostalgia and edge.

Representing a major achievement for the campaign, the average CTS buyer was 55 years old. Cadillac expanded the ''Break Through'' campaign for several years, making it a division-wide affair. It became a key component in the company's efforts to revitalize itself.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cadillac rose from the remains of the Henry Ford Company. After Ford left the company, his former partners decided to continue in the automobile business. In 1902 they formed the Cadillac Automobile Company. The organization took its name from Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac, the founder of the company's home city of Detroit. In 1909 Cadillac was purchased by General Motors. As the twentieth century progressed, GM grew to become the largest automaker in the world.

Cadillac developed into GM's luxury brand. The vehicle never sold well outside the United States, but within the country Cadillac became synonymous with quality and luxury. By the early 2000s, however, the brand was under pressure from European and Japanese luxury brands such as Lexus and BMW. Between 2000 and 2001 the company's sales dropped about 9 percent, bringing to 40 percent the sales slide that had been going on since the mid-1980s.

As Cadillac's customer base aged, the brand began to get a reputation as an ''older'' company aligned with establishmentarian attitudes. In fact, by 2001 the average Cadillac buyer was 65 years old. This presented a problem for GM because the division's future depended on attracting baby boomers—people who were in their 40s and 50s in 2001. The company also had trouble getting women to purchase its vehicles. In an effort to reach out to younger drivers, for model year 2003 Cadillac replaced its sagging Catera model with the CTS, which was designed to be sleeker and flashier than the Catera. The CTS operated on a 5-speed transmission, reminiscent of that used in BMWs, and it used a 220-horsepower V-6 engine, which provided a smooth ride. It also offered OnStar, a computerized guidance system.

TARGET MARKET

The new CTS was positioned as an entry-level luxury car for drivers who tended to be well established in their careers. It was intended for professionals and other consumers who were interested in a roomier, more luxurious ride but who were put off by the price of such Cadillac mainstays as the Seville, a midsize luxury vehicle that would soon be phased out in favor of the STS. Cadillac hoped to attract a younger audience for the CTS: baby boomers (those born from World War II to the early 1960s) and members of Generation X (those born in the late 1960s and 1970s).

The company was concerned that Cadillac was being seen by consumers as an older, un-hip brand. Image-conscious boomers tended to shy away from Cadillac in favor of flashy foreign luxury brands such as BMW and Lexus. The company also felt that it needed to appeal to more women drivers. Cadillac wanted to reach those consumers with the CTS, with the anticipation of luring them to buy higher-priced Cadillac models, like the Seville/STS, in the future. While the company enjoyed its reputation as a classic luxury car, it wanted to freshen up that image to help meet the challenges of the early 2000s.

COMPETITION

As an affordable, entry-level luxury car, the CTS competed with similarly priced vehicles from other luxury automobile brands. Chief among these was the Lexus ES 300, manufactured by the Toyota Motor Corporation's Lexus division. The ES 300 was the latest in the popular ES sedan line, first introduced in 1989. Lexus introduced the ES 300 in model year 2003, at the same time that Cadillac brought out its new CTS. Because the ES 300 launch was a major priority for Lexus, the CTS faced intense competition from the beginning.

Acura would also be launching a new design of its luxury vehicle the TL, though with less fanfare than Lexus. Other imports that competed directly with the CTS included the Mercedes-Benz C-Class, the Audi A4, the BMW 3 Series, and the Infiniti G35, made by a subsidiary of Nissan. The Ford Motor Company's Lincoln luxury division was long considered a chief competitor for GM's Cadillac division. Lincoln, however, did not have a strong entry-level vehicle available at the time. Its flagship model, the Town Car, did draw from some of the CTS's market share, but it was more expensive and competed more directly with the Cadillac Seville.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cadillac wanted its new campaign to accomplish many different things. Most importantly, it needed to introduce the CTS successfully. Its other goals were to reverse the previous year's substantial decline in sales and to burnish the company's image in relation to import luxury brands. Cadillac enlisted ad agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, based in Troy, Michigan, to run its new campaign, which would cost more than $240 million. The agency had worked with Cadillac before and understood the company's concerns.

To drum up advance publicity, Cadillac offered the CTS for use in The Matrix Reloaded, the 2003 sequel to the popular science fiction movie The Matrix. At the core of the campaign was a series of several television spots, all of which featured the Led Zeppelin song "Rock n' Roll." Led Zeppelin, who recorded nine studio albums between 1968 and 1980, was one of the first hard-rock bands and also one of the most enduringly popular. While the band still appealed to younger fans, its original loyal fan base was now comfortably middle-aged.

It was believed that Led Zeppelin's music possessed a combination of nostalgia and edge that would appeal to baby boomers. The band's untitled fourth record,

THE CADILLAC OF ROCK BANDS

In 2002 Cadillac used Led Zeppelin's 1971 song "Rock n' Roll" as the soundtrack to the company's Super Bowl commercial introducing the new CTS. The spot was so successful that Cadillac continued the campaign for several years, using "Rock n' Roll" as the backdrop for numerous spots that highlighted its other vehicles.

Led Zeppelin was a British-based hard-rock band that had sold more than 100 million records in the United States alone by the time the spot was filmed. It was formed in 1968 by former Yardbirds guitarist Jimmy Page. The band also featured singer Robert Plant, bassist John Paul Jones, and drummer John Bonham. With such songs as "Whole Lotta Love," Led Zeppelin quickly established itself as the premier hard-rock band of its era. Its untitled fourth album, released in 1971, was its most successful outing. The album featured "Rock n' Roll" as well as the band's best-known song, "Stairway to Heaven," which for decades was one of American radio's most-requested songs.

The band continued to record and tour throughout the 1970s, releasing multiplatinum albums such as Houses of the Holy (1973) and Physical Graffiti (1975), until the tragic death of John Bonham on September 5, 1980. While the band reformed for 1985's Live Aid benefit concert, and Page and Plant recorded together again in the 1990s, the band never toured or recorded again.

featuring the classic-rock staple ''Stairway to Heaven'' as well as the hard-charging ''Rock n' Roll,'' was one of the best-selling records of the 1970s and was seen by some baby boomers as a touchtone of their youth. Because Led Zeppelin had an outlaw reputation in its heyday, attracting various stories and urban myths about its members' over-the-top parties and decadent lifestyle, the band never acquired a stuffy reputation, even with the passage of time. Also, the band's classic status—it was in the Rock n' Roll Hall of Fame and was generally regarded as the exemplar of the hard-rock genre—helped to underscore Cadillac's reputation as the classic luxury car.

The campaign kicked off during the 2002 Super Bowl on Fox television, at a cost of more than $10 million. The event, which served as the championship game for the National Football League, was typically the most watched television event of the year, and the advertisements that ran during it garnered not only a large audience but also a significant amount of media attention. The Cadillac spot began by showing a young professional driving a vintage 1959 Cadillac. He was stuck in a traffic jam but then managed to turn off down a side street, which led to an open highway. At this point the Led Zeppelin music began, and a CTS appeared in the rearview mirror. A unseen announcer then declared: ''A legend—reborn.'' Soon the CTS passed the older car and rocketed down the open road, as the music played louder and louder. The spot closed with the tagline ''Break Through.''

Other brands, including Coors Light beer and Sheraton Hotels, also used popular 1960s and 1970s songs in their advertisements during this time. As baby boomers aged, they continued to buy products that celebrated 1960s and 1970s recording artists, such as the Beatles Anthology CDs. Led Zeppelin itself had released several popular box sets in the 1990s, and in 2003 it put out a successful collection of live performances recorded in 1972.

On January 27, 2004, Cadillac paid to become the official vehicle of Super Bowl XXXVIII, which was broadcast on CBS. Cadillac featured a new 60-second spot called ''Turbulence'' that expanded upon the ''Break Through'' campaign. It featured a voice-over by the actor Gary Sinise, who had played a major role in the Oscar-winning 1994 film Forrest Gump. The commercial retained ''Rock n' Roll'' on the soundtrack and highlighted four key Cadillac models: the Escalade and SRX sports utility vehicles (SUVs), the XLR, and the CTS. The spot showed the four cars driving in the desert. The CTS, Escalade, and SRX all met at an intersection, creating a swirl of ''turbulence'' that eventually subsided to reveal an XLR with its top down, driven by a young woman. Cadillac ran three other spots during the broadcast, featuring the Escalade, SRX, and XLR individually. All three ended with the ''Break Through'' tagline.

The musical focus of the spot dovetailed with Cadillac's decision to offer XM radio in its DeVille, Seville, CTS, and Escalade models. XM was a popular satellite-radio service that provided a diverse array of music, sports, and entertainment channels. The subscription service required a special radio, which Cadillac began to offer for the CTS and other lines.

OUTCOME

The CTS did not fare well competing head-on with BMW or Mercedes, but its competitive pricing—it came in at under $35,000—meant that Cadillac could reorient its campaign to take on the Honda Accord and Toyota Camry. Otherwise, the campaign met with success. Automobile journalists awarded the CTS the North American Car of the Year at the Detroit-based North American International Auto Show in 2002.

Cadillac was pleased with the ''Break Through'' campaign results. Eventually the company's website even carried the ''Break Through'' tagline. As late as 2005, 85 percent of respondents to an internal survey still saw the campaign as fresh and different. Most importantly, within nine months of the ''Break Through'' campaign's inception, the average age of CTS buyers was down to 55, a marked improvement over the Cadillac division's average of 65. Nearly 40 percent of those consumers were women. Internal data showed that approximately half of CTS buyers would not have previously considered purchasing a Cadillac.

FURTHER READING

Cantwell, Julie. ''The Big Idea Is Even More Important Now.'' Automotive News, January 14, 2002.

———. ''Cadillac Launches 'Break Through' Ad Campaign to Reverse Sales Slide, Change Image.'' Automotive News, January 28, 2002.

Elliott, Stuart. ''Despite Millions of Viewers, the Super Bowl Is Not Quite So for Madison Avenue.'' New York Times, February 1, 2002.

Guilford, David. ''A Cadillac Century: At 100, Cadillac Shows Signs of Life.'' Automotive News, August 22, 2002.

Hendry, Maurice, et al. Cadillac, Standard of the World: The Complete Seventy-Year History. New York: Dutton, 1973.

Howard, Theresa. ''Hard-Rocking Ads Aim for All Ages.'' USA Today, July 27, 2003.

Salmieri, Stephen. Cadillac. New York: Rizzoli, 1985.

Walker, Rob. ''Ad Report Card: Cadillac's Rock of Ages.'' Slate, April 15, 2002. Available from <http://www.slate.com/id/2064338/> Yorke, Ritchie. Led Zeppelin: The Definitive Biography. Lancaster, PA: Underwood-Miller, 1993.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

THE CADDY THAT ZIGS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although ownership of a Cadillac was for decades widely considered a part of the "American Dream," Cadillac Motor, a division of General Motors, saw its share of the luxury-car market begin to decline in the 1990s. The company also saw the rise of a new subcategory in the luxury-car field, the entry-level luxury car (or "entry-lux"), exemplified by new models such as the Lexus and new, lower-priced Mercedes models. Cadillac responded to these trends by taking a risk in 1997 with a new entry-lux model, the Catera. The sporty, comparatively affordable Catera was unlike anything Cadillac had ever sold before. It was also the first Cadillac made entirely overseas (in Germany).

To launch this groundbreaking new model, Cadillac implemented a marketing campaign unlike any it had done before, calling the Catera "The Caddy that Zigs." The campaign—which included a variety of television and print advertisements—used humor and clever copy to communicate to car buyers that the Catera was a whole new kind of Cadillac. The campaign even used a quirky red cartoon duck as a prominent symbol, another move that broke with the more staid marketing usually associated with Cadillac.

The campaign received harsh criticism from media and auto-industry critics. Surveys also showed the public had a mixed reaction to the campaign (especially the duck). But Cadillac executives were pleased with the sales figures for Catera's first year, and they reported that the campaign overall had made a positive impression on the public's traditional perceptions of the car maker.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since its early days Cadillac was a company that specialized in luxury cars. Eventually car buyers identified the Cadillac name as synonymous with American luxury cars ("Cadillac" even appears in some dictionaries with the definition "luxurious"). Marketing campaigns emphasized the car maker's tradition and quality and were aimed at an older, wealthy, male demographic.

But the emergence of luxury cars from foreign manufacturers made a dent in Cadillac's market share. Competitors like Mercedes-Benz, BMW, and Lexus gradually eroded Cadillac's long-time dominance of the luxury field: from 1990 to 1996 Cadillac's share of the luxury-car market plunged dramatically from 22.2 percent to 14.8 percent.

One of the reasons for the drop was that other car makers were building the popular entry-lux vehicles. Traditional luxury vehicles controlled 52 percent of the overall luxury market in 1991 but only 34 percent four years later. During the same time period, the market for entry-lux cars grew from 25 to 39 percent.

TARGET MARKET

The typical buyer of a Cadillac automobile was male, in his late 50s or 60s, affluent, and usually but not always college-educated. David Nottoli, Cadillac's Catera brand manager for 1997, said the Catera campaign sought a different market. "We were looking at the 45–50 age bracket," he said. In addition to this narrow market, Cadillac wanted to expand on its traditional customer base by pursuing more female customers. The car maker was hoping 50 percent of Catera customers would be women. In addition, Cadillac hoped to draw an audience that was almost 100 percent college-educated. Nottoli added that non-General Motors customers were also targeted by the Catera campaign.

According to the Catera Brand Book for Cadillac dealers, "The target buyer for this car is young enough to be the son (or, just as likely, daughter) of people currently driving DeVilles [a larger, older Cadillac model]. Their definition of luxury bears no resemblance to their parents' generation. For them . . . BMWs, Volvos, and Infinitis say more than Cadillacs and Lincolns. When it comes to luxury, Cadillac is status quo. And these buyers don't want status quo."

COMPETITION

By 1997 Cadillac was increasingly concerned about its decreasing market share as well as the growing popularity of entry-lux autos. The buyers in this new market tended to be younger, more performance-conscious, and more open to automobiles built overseas such as Mercedes-Benz and Lexus. Cadillac executives' attention was especially drawn to the cases of two competitors' vehicles launched in the 1990s: The Lexus ES 300, which sold 39,367 units in its first year (1992); and the Mercedes-Benz C class, which sold 23,793 units in its launch year (1994).

Cadillac's Nottoli noted that these cars were introduced with essentially the same marketing strategies traditionally used for upscale automobiles. Television and print ads were geared for an affluent audience, with dignified shots of cars rolling along country roads or displayed in luxurious settings. Cadillac knew it had to pursue a different style of marketing campaign for its Catera, as it wanted to make a major impact in the competitive entry-lux market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To launch its ambitious Catera campaign Cadillac worked closely with its national advertising agency, the Bloomfield, Michigan, office of the international firm

SUPER BOWL SPOT NOT SUPER FOR CADILLAC

It was the 1997 Super Bowl, the most prestigious advertising platform available to companies seeking a prime audience. Cadillac bought a 45-second spot during the second quarter of the game. They then readied an ad starring supermodel Cindy Crawford and the red cartoon duck used as a spokes-symbol for the Catera. The car maker hoped Crawford and a witty script would give Catera the younger buzz they were looking for.

The spot aired and won a few raves. But then the criticism started. As the London Daily Telegraph described it, ''There in the driving seat was supermodel Cindy Crawford, kitted-out in black leather micro skirt and thigh-high leather boots, looking like she was on her way to an Emma Peel fan-club meeting. What's more, Ms. Crawford is discussing the car's finer qualities with a cartoon duck, informing the feathery fellow that 'This is the Caddy that zigs'—presumably followed by a particularly impressive zag.'' Women's groups were outraged at the choice of clothing for Crawford, especially the leather miniskirt and go-go boots. They did not find the clever copy amusing, either.

Facing a firestorm of criticism, Cadillac pulled the spot from rotation. When combined with the widespread criticism of the poor maligned duck, the 1997 Catera campaign confronted more than its share of slings and arrows.

D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles (DMB&B). The car maker spent an estimated $40 million on the campaign. According to Nottoli, Cadillac knew most car buyers saw the company as the manufacturer of serious, luxury automobiles. To challenge this perception, Cadillac wanted to emphasize a lighter side in the Catera campaign. ''We tried to focus on fun,'' he said.

They started with the campaign's slogan, ''The Caddy that Zigs.'' Although auto enthusiasts and Cadillac owners had long called the cars by the ''Caddy'' abbreviation, the company had never used the shortened term in any advertisement before the Catera. This simple break with tradition was an important one for Cadillac, as the company wanted to emphasize that the Catera was different from any car the maker had produced before.

When Cadillac and DMB&B faced the issue of which symbol or spokesperson to use for the campaign, they turned to the family crest of the founder of Cadillac (the crest is on each automobile made by the company). That crest featured six ducks—actually mythical birds called merlettes that are similar to ducks. In the crest all six ducks face left. Cadillac officials decided to play off the crest—a symbol rooted in years of family and company tradition—for its Catera ''spokesperson.'' Cadillac and DMB&B creative teams decided to turn one of the ducks in the crest to the right. The idea was that the duck ''zigged'' away from Cadillac tradition, just like the Catera. Thus the slogan ''The Caddy that Zigs'' was born.

The use of a cartoon duck—red, no less—was meant to emphasize fun and irreverence, Nottoli said. Cadillac knew the use of a cartoon animal to promote a luxury car was not without its risks, but the company also knew it had to take chances to reach its younger target market. ''The goal of the duck was to show how luxury and fun could come together,'' Nottoli said. ''It was representative of a whole attitude.''

The 1997 Catera campaign got off the ground in January with a spot in a prime advertising location: the Super Bowl. The Catera spot, featuring the red duck and model Cindy Crawford, generated quite a bit of attention—not all positive—for the car maker. Several more television spots followed, all emphasizing the duck and a younger, irreverent attitude. One full-page magazine advertisement played on this attitude with a paean to ''duck logic'': ''Ducks think differently than you and me. They would never forget a birthday. They have never sponsored a negative political ad. They avoid talk shows like the plague. They dance in the rain and take great pains not to walk around the puddles.'' Ads later in the year noted the performance features of the car. One 30-second television spot was set on a curving, mountain road. The Catera drove along with two competing entry-lux cars following. The voiceover announced, ''You follow the leader. You follow the pack. Then you get a Catera. Suddenly, you don't follow anything.'' The background music was upbeat techno-pop, and the spot closed with the ''Caddy that Zigs'' slogan and the duck.

In a unique promotional move, Cadillac displayed Cateras at an Atlanta mall for five weeks in January and February 1997. Cadillac-trained specialists were on hand to answer questions about the cars, and special kiosks were set up for curious shoppers. The idea was to expose the Catera to the public in an environment not traditionally associated with automobiles, with the goal of interesting consumers who might not normally consider buying a Cadillac in test driving a Catera. Figures showed about 70,000 people visited the mall display.

Other innovative direct marketing techniques were employed. One Cadillac dealer took Cateras to golf and tennis tournaments, events populated by affluent, younger car buyers. The same dealer also used Cateras to taxi people to and from National Symphony Orchestra performances. In another unique move, a six-page fold-out ad, which ran in fashion magazines, tied the Catera's styling to the work of trendy fashion designers.

OUTCOME

There were strong, divergent views on how successful the 1997 Catera campaign was. For Nottoli, the campaign was a winner for bottom-line reasons: the Catera sold well in its launch year. "In the end you judge the outcome based on results," Nottoli said. Those results included the sale of 25,411 Cateras in the vehicle's first year, surpassing Cadillac's sales goal of 25,000. But Nottoli remarked that sales figures were not the only measure of success for the Catera campaign. He noted that the age of the typical Catera buyer—a factor that had been a crucial part of the marketing strategy—was lower than that of other Cadillac buyers. While Cadillac and industry experts differed on what the median Catera-buyer age was (while Cadillac claimed the median age was 52 years old, 13 years younger than the median age for traditional Cadillac buyers, auto industry observers claimed the age was closer to 58), Nottoli said the undeniable fact was that the car was bought by younger consumers.

The gender makeup of Catera buyers was also promising, Nottoli said. About 51 percent of Catera buyers were male, which was right on target for Cadillac's goal of having an equal number of female and male buyers. This gender equity was much different from the typical Cadillac customer base, and Nottoli said the Catera marketing campaign played a big part in drawing female customers.

In addition, Nottoli said the Catera was successful as a "conquest vehicle," an auto industry term for a car that brings in buyers who had previously not purchased a vehicle from that brand. In the case of the Catera, the campaign helped draw non-General Motors buyers into the Cadillac showrooms, another of the campaign's key goals.

While Nottoli considered the 1997 Catera campaign a success, he acknowledged problems, most notably the red duck. While Cadillac originally adopted the duck as a spokes-symbol to emphasize fun and irreverence, the cartoon character soon began receiving too much attention. "We couldn't get people off the duck," Nottoli said. "People took it too far. They had a love-hate relationship with the duck."

Criticism of the Catera campaign was consistent and strong. From the beginning of the campaign, viewers were critical of the use of the duck. They also questioned whether the target market would accept a Cadillac. USA Today's fourth annual survey of advertising agency creative directors reported it as one of the worst campaigns of 1997, writing, "More than a third of the panelists name Catera as their first choice for 1997's worst ad. Cadillac wants to attract younger viewers to its $30,000 car, but ad executives say it was a mistake to link a luxury brand in a commercial with a wise-cracking cartoon duck." In addition, USA Today's Ad Track survey reported that only 9 percent of consumers surveyed liked the Catera duck (below the 22 percent average) and only 11 percent found the ad campaign very effective (compared to a 25 percent average).

Cadillac dealers were also critical of the campaign, complaining that the Catera campaign focused too much on fun and not enough on the car's features. "We don't need a quack as our spokesman," Jacques J. Moore, president of a Cadillac dealership, told the Washington Post. "The Catera is a heck of a good car, an excellent car. We need an advertising campaign that sticks to the merits of the car, that emphasizes the quality of the Cadillac name."

Nottoli responded by saying that Cadillac was aware of the campaign's weaknesses. He added that his one regret was the campaign was a little too "silly" and not sophisticated enough. But, he added, "We took a risk. I'm glad we did."

Nottoli said focus groups conducted by Cadillac showed solid awareness of the Catera, but that awareness did not necessarily bring buyers to the point where they bought the car. He added that many focus group participants did not consider the Catera a Cadillac; they considered it to be a different car altogether. Cadillac owners also did not consider the Catera a "real" Cadillac, but rather a "little Cadillac," he said.

Nottoli said this was part of the "Cadillac baggage" the Catera marketing campaign fought to overcome. Cadillac's traditional image as a maker of big luxury cars for older people played a big part in the acceptance of the "Caddy that Zigs" message. "We didn't start with a clean slate," Nottoli said. "The Cadillac baggage hurt us."

In 1998 Catera advertising downplayed the duck and emphasized the car's performance features. The duck only appeared at the end of ads as an icon. Catera sales for 1998 were up considerably over sales in 1997, and the age of Catera buyers continued to decrease, Nottoli said, demonstrating the effectiveness of the "Caddy that Zigs" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Brown, Warren. "The Caddy They Ducked; Sporty Catera Hasn't Steered Younger Buyers to GM's Flagship Division." Washington Post, September 11, 1997.

"Cadillac Goes after Customers by Taking Catera to the Mall." Automotive News, June 26, 1997.

Crain, Rance. "If It Walks Like a Duck . . . Then Caddy Rises to Defense of its 'Entry Lux'." Advertising Age, September 29, 1997, p. 28.

Enrico, Dottie, and Melanie Wells. "Campaign 1997: Some Ads Win Kudos, Others in Death Throes." Salt Lake Tribune, December 21, 1997.

Halliday, Jean. "Caddy's Catera Will Be a Tough Sell." Advertising Age, August 19, 1996, p. 12.

"How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

Jackson, Kathy. "Catera Report Card: Missing Boomers on First Attempt." Automotive News, September 1, 1997, p. 3.

Pepper, Jon. "Cadillac Catera Ad Team Flying against Tradition." Detroit News, Jan. 26, 1997.

Simison, Robert L., and Rebecca Blumenstein. "Cadillac, Lincoln Struggle to Get Back in Luxury-Car Race." Wall Street Journal, July 3, 1997.

Washington, Frank S. "Caddy Hopes Catera Lures Younger Buyers." Automotive News, October 28, 1996, p. 6.

Washington, Frank S. "Cadillac: Pluck the Duck, Dealers Urge." Automotive News, February 10, 1997.

Washington, Frank S. "Catera Finds Red Duck Is a Lame Icon." San Diego Union-Tribune, December 6, 1997.

Alden ScottCrow

EV1 INTRODUCTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In December 1996 General Motors Corporation (GM) became the first major automaker in almost 80 years to market an electric car, dubbed the EV1. The car's debut came just months after the California Air Resources Board had reluctantly decided to postpone a mandate requiring that 2 percent of cars sold in the state by 1998 be powered by electricity. Regulators agreed to change the mandate to 10 percent by 2003, but only if automakers began voluntarily introducing electric cars. With the EV1, GM effectively shifted the discussion about electric cars from the fringe to the mainstream.

By most accounts, the car was a technological marvel. Its sporty aerodynamic design, which included an all-aluminum frame, magnesium seats, and low-resistance tires, earned GM engineers 23 patents. But while the introduction of the EV1 was undeniably a watershed event, there were obstacles to the car's success. It could travel just 80 to 90 miles before needing to be recharged, which took about three hours. The price was high, with lease payments coming to about $480 a month after various federal, state, and local tax incentives. And since there were only a handful of public charging sites, drivers would need to lease a charging unit for their garages or workplaces for another $50 a month.

Thanks to a steady stream of media coverage, there was pent-up curiosity about the EV1 when it became available on December 5, 1996. The $10 million advertising campaign developed by Hal Riney & Partners of San Francisco added to the mystique of the EV1. The campaign did not delve into the intricacies of the car's technology but instead was aimed at building awareness and excitement about the fact that an electric car was available and that GM was behind it. While the target market for the EV1 was expected to be affluent people with an interest in technology and the environment, the early stage of the campaign was aimed at reaching a broader, more general audience. Teaser billboards and newspaper ads inaugurated the campaign, which was kicked off in full force on December 5, 1996, with the broadcast of a $1.5 million television commercial that featured an endearingly lifelike brigade of home appliances.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

During the 1990s California earned the dubious distinction of having the dirtiest air in the nation. Car and truck exhaust could be blamed for at least half of the state's air pollution, which spurred regulators to create a mandate for electric-powered vehicles. Similar clean-air mandates were in the works in other states, such as New York and Massachusetts that were also alarmed by worsening air quality. The laws that were passed varied, but in general they required automakers to begin offering vehicles that met the ultra-low-emissions-vehicle (ULEV) standard or the zero-emissions-vehicle (ZEV) standard.

The mandates were controversial. The principal question was whether states should mandate production of the cars and hope that consumers and ample public charging stations followed or if consumer demand should determine how many electric cars automakers built. GM's research suggested that consumers were receptive to electric cars, even if it meant sacrificing some of the conveniences they enjoyed with gas-powered automobiles. The lack of a public infrastructure was worrisome but not insurmountable to GM. In southern California, for example, utility companies had already begun installing charging sites in locations such as shopping centers, restaurants, hospitals, theaters, and public parking structures. By being the first to bring a car to market, GM would be able to stake a claim to technological leadership going into the next century.

Many in the industry believed that the EV1 and other electric cars could legitimize a new approach to transportation that would dramatically lessen air pollution. John Dunlap III, the chairman of the California Air Resources Board, was enthusiastic about the EV1: "This has the potential of being a revolutionary step." Others, however, worried that if the EV1 failed it could set back development of alternative-fuel vehicles for years to come.

General Motors' EVI. © KIM KULISH/CORBIS SYGMA.

TARGET MARKET

Not surprisingly, GM selected California as a launch state for the EV1. Arizona, the other launch state, also made sense, for its warm climate allowed for optimal performance of the car's battery. A key marketing decision was made that, while the car would carry the GM badge, it would be leased through the Saturn Corporation subsidiary. The two-seater EV1 seemed to be a good fit with Saturn's young, environmentally conscious buyers. Moreover, by offering the EV1 at Saturn dealerships, where 73 percent of sales were to people whose second choice was not a GM vehicle, GM saw an opportunity to reach import-loyal customers.

Oddly enough, marketing the EV1 was as much about determining who should not drive it as who should. GM was quick to point out that the EV1 was not right for everyone. Joseph Kennedy, the Saturn vice president for marketing, told Popular Science, "Because the EV1 is a two-seat vehicle and does not have the long-distance range [of] 200 miles or 300 miles, it will play a role in the owner's portfolio of vehicles." He explained that the EV1 was not a primary household vehicle that could fulfill all driving needs but one appropriate for "shorter, quicker uses around town."

The groundwork for introducing the EV1 was laid in 1994, when GM's PrEview Drive Program gave people in 12 cities the chance to drive a prototype model for two weeks. "We saw that it wasn't going to be an ordinary buyer," Necole Merritt, manager of corporate communications for Saturn, observed. "It was someone attuned to innovation, the kind of person who bought the first cell phone or first computer." The PrEview Drive Program and other research suggested that potential drivers would be affluent college graduates, usually white, middle-aged men who were leaders in their fields. They were expected to be 35 to 54 years old, with an annual family income of more than $125,000 and a high interest in technology and the environment. Frank Pereira, GM's EV1 brand manager, noted that the car "really speaks to those who have a desire to be in the forefront of directing the evolution of technology."

Once the vehicle was in the Saturn retail facilities, sales consultants narrowed the target market even further. Each facility had a consultant trained in EV1 technology who screened customers to be sure that an electric vehicle was appropriate for their needs. Next, would-be customers made an appointment with an electric vehicle marketing specialist who spent up to 12 hours making certain that their driving habits and expectations were a good fit with the EV1. "It's important they convey to customers what this car can and cannot do," explained Donald Young, Saturn's representative for the EV1 program. "We don't want to sell it to someone who drives 60

FROM PLANES TO CARS

General Motors' commitment to the development of an electric car can be traced to a 1977 airplane flight. The plane, called the Gossamer Condor, was the first human-powered plane to fly a difficult three-mile course. Designed by engineer Paul MacCready, it had transparent wings spanning 96 feet, virtually no fuselage, and a minuscule cockpit in which the pilot sat and pedaled. The success of the delicate craft led to the creation in 1979 of the Gossamer Albatross, a human-powered plane that was able to cross the English Channel. Two years later MacCready built a solar-powered aircraft that accomplished the same feat.

Engineers at GM financed the next MacCready project, which was an aerodynamic, solar-powered vehicle called Sunraycer. When the vehicle won a 2,000-mile race in Australia in 1987 against fierce international competition, GM decided to hire MacCready's research firm to build a prototype electric vehicle. This car, called the Impact, debuted at an auto show in Los Angeles in 1990 to tremendous public response. Its innovative design and technology established the direction for what was to become the EV1.

miles to work each way.'' The specialists also coordinated a home and garage inspection to determine how to install the EV1's charging unit.

COMPETITION

In 1996 a reporter for the Los Angeles Times wrote that, ''while other major auto makers have held their electric vehicle cards close to the vest, GM has been center stage.'' Every major automaker, however, was under the same clean-air mandate, and they all kept watchful eyes on the public's reaction to the EV1. What they observed was a market, albeit a small one, emerging.

Other automakers followed on GM's heels. Toyota produced an electric version of its RAV4sport utility vehicle, but for government or company fleet leasing only. In 1997 Ford produced an electric vehicle for fleet use. Ford, however, seemed to be taking a different approach from GM, with its efforts directed at creating alternative-fuel vehicles that would meet ULEV standards. Consumers' Research Magazine reported that Ford offered the best range of ''street-worthy'' alternative-fuel vehicles, including the electric Ranger pickup truck, a Taurus sedan that ran on methanol and ethanol, and several other sedans that ran on compressed natural gas.

In May 1997 Honda presented the most formidable challenge to GM's electric car yet when it introduced its EV Plus, which boasted a longer-life nickel-metal hybrid battery and a greater driving range. Advertising for the EV1, however, did not address any of the emerging competitors. For the time being there was plenty of room for all electric carmakers on the playing field.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To build public awareness of the EV1's introduction, GM hired Hal Riney & Partners, the same marketing and communications partner that had created Saturn's award-winning advertising. Teaser billboards in Los Angeles and San Diego were the first element of the campaign to be unveiled. The billboards displayed a lightning bolt and the words ''You can't hear it coming, but it is.'' The day the cars went on sale, new billboard ads went up with a photograph of the EV1 and the words ''The electric car is here.''

The campaign's centerpiece was a 90-second television commercial that showed animated household appliances greeting the battery-powered EV1. Its eye-catching special effects were created by Industrial Light and Magic, a studio started by Star Wars creator George Lucas. The commercial began with a thunderstorm that knocked the electricity out in a home. When the power came back on, the appliances sprang to life. They unplugged themselves and waddled out the door to watch as the EV1 approached on the street. ''It's intended as a celebration of the arrival of the electric vehicle,'' explained Saturn's Kennedy. Both 30- and 60-second versions of the commercial also aired for 12 weeks in late 1996 and early 1997.

Newspaper ads during the introductory campaign tried to show consumers what a dramatic departure the EV1 was from gasoline-powered cars. For instance, a two-page ad in the Los Angeles Times depicted reeds blowing in the wind as the car drove by. It read, ''There is no noise. No pistons. No valves or exhaust. Just the whir of an AC motor. And the wind. And your thoughts, of course. As you drive the electric car.'' Because the automobile was available only in limited markets, the heaviest concentration of newspaper advertising was regional. Newspapers ads appeared in the California edition of the Wall Street Journal and in the Los Angeles Times, Arizona Republic, and Phoenix Gazette.

Magazine advertising during the introductory period was placed to reach leaders in technology and innovation. The media plan included such periodicals as Business Week, Inc., Scientific American, Wired, and American Benefactor. Magazine ads had the same thoughtful, laid-back

NOTHING NEW

Electric-powered vehicles were anything but a new invention. In fact, in the early 1900s battery-powered cars were all the rage, accounting for about 30 percent of the market. They were quiet and easier to start than gas-powered cars, which had to be cranked. After improvements, however, gasoline-powered cars quickly eclipsed electrics, for they were faster and could go farther. By the 1920s electric cars were a thing of the past.

approach as the newspaper ads. One ad, for instance, showed the blur of the car on a stretch of highway and read, "You will never again use the words 'fill'er up.' Or 'check the oil.' Never utter the need for a tune-up. Or a smog check. Nope. You will simply say, 'Unplug the car and let's go.' When you drive the electric car."

Following the 12-week introductory campaign, the marketing efforts for the EV1 shifted into a lower gear. The remainder of the advertising budget went primarily into direct-mail pieces and a handful of ads in magazines favored by technology buffs.

Time magazine's Margot Hornblower criticized the marketing approach used for the EV1. Describing a billboard that showed a single headlight in the darkness and the words "Electrohydraulic power steering, digital clock, EV1," Hornblower wrote, "The low-key print campaign has been so esoteric as to be nearly incomprehensible." This subtle approach also was frustrating to members of the EV1 Owners Club, who felt that the car's features should be spelled out more clearly in order to lure potential drivers. In fact, Marvin Rush, cofounder of the club, purchased airtime on KFI in Los Angeles with his own money and ran unauthorized spots for four weeks in early 1998. Rush told the Los Angeles Times that EV1 owners "consider ourselves evangelists. We're trying to get GM to change its advertising." In the end GM's lawyers reviewed the radio ads for misstatements, found none, and opted to let the renegade campaign run its course. "They're actually pretty good," EV1 brand manager Frank Periera confessed to the Los Angeles Times.

OUTCOME

The EV1 advertising campaign received critical kudos. Bob Garfield, a reviewer for Advertising Age, wrote that the television commercial used "eye-popping digital effects to communicate the revolutionary significance, the drama and the exciting implications of this introduction." He added, "The march of the electronivores! It's a wonderful concept, wonderfully realized. Even the unplugged among us will not be able not to stare at the futuristic vehicle Californians and Arizonans can buy right now." A print ad for the EV1 took home the prized $100,000 cash Kelly Award for best magazine advertising as well as nonmonetary Kelly Awards for meeting the campaign's objective and for design and graphics.

While the EV1 got rave reviews for its advertising, the car itself had no shortage of critics. Automotive analyst Christopher Cedergen told CBS News, "Overall, the electric car concept is premature. The technology really isn't there yet." Richard de Neufville, professor of transportation at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was quoted in Time magazine as saying, "They gave a party, and nobody came." GM declined to make sales projections when the EV1 rolled out, but industry sources speculated that fewer than 2,000 would be leased in the first year. That figure proved to be optimistic, for only 300 EV1s were actually leased. Some speculated that the advertising had missed the mark by failing to link the EV1 with Saturn dealerships. Joe Ricciardi, who led GM's EV1 effort in Arizona, acknowledged in the Arizona Republic that "there are a lot of people who don't know it [the electric car] is out there and don't know where to find it."

To some the EV1 was most remarkable in its role as a stepping-stone to other clean-air transportation solutions. Phil Hodgetts, president of the Electric Vehicles Association of Southern California, said in the Los Angeles Times, "The biggest advantage of the EV1 has been to excite public interest in cars that will be nonpolluting, in pure electric vehicles running on batteries. I think it's the start of something big." GM executives contended all along that the goal of the EV1 was to build a market for alternative-fuel vehicles and that sales volume was less important than giving early drivers a good experience. Despite tepid leasing numbers in 1997, GM's commitment to the EV1 remained firm going into 1998. The car was introduced in the metropolitan areas of San Francisco and Sacramento, the advertising budget was increased from $10 million to $15 million, and GM stepped up efforts to create an infrastructure by committing $750,000 for the development of public charging sites in the car's markets.

While the basic approach remained the same, advertising leading into 1998 introduced a welcome touch of humor to the sometimes awestruck tone of the 1997 campaign. A few print ads even cleverly capitalized on the public's dubiousness. An ad that ran in newspapers in northern California, for example, showed an overhead view of the EV1 and stated, "All the skepticism in the world can't stop it. The electric car is here."

FURTHER READING

"Charge over Electric Cars." Newsday, February 13, 1997, p. A75.

Cogan, Ron. "The Electric Experience." Popular Science, November 1, 1996, p. 81.

Gardner, Greg. "GM Flips EV1 'On' Switch." Ward's Auto World, March 1, 1996, p. 89.

Garfield, Bob. "EV1 Provides Saturn with Charge of Pride." Advertising Age, November 1996.

Gellene, Denise. "Electric Car Owner Spots GM Some Ads." Los Angeles Times, May 22, 1998, p. D1.

Golfen, Bob. "GM Trying to Spark Interest in EV1: Allowing Car's Sale Could Be Next Step." Arizona Republic, March 29, 1997.

Hornblower, Margot. "Is This Clean Machine for Real? Electric Cars Hum down the Road but Face Obstacles of High Cost, Limited Range, and Unlimited Politics." Time, December 15, 1997, p. 62.

Maynard, Michelle. "Only A List Can Buy New E Car." USA Today, August 28, 1996, p. 1.

Nauss, Donald W. "GM's EV1 Gears Up amid Charge of the Ad Brigade." Los Angeles Times, November 26, 1996, p. D3.

———. "GM Rolls Dice with Roll-Out of Electric Car." Los Angeles Times, December 5, 1996, Home Edition, p. A1.

Peters, Eric. "Alternative Fuel Vehicles." Consumers' Research Magazine, October 1, 1997, p. 35.

"Reality Check on Electric Cars." Los Angeles Times, September 1, 1996, p. B4.

Kim Kazemi

HUMMER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When General Motors Corporation (GM) acquired the commercial marketing rights to the Hummer truck, the civilian version of the U.S. Army's Humvee, it faced the challenge of promoting a vehicle that was never intended to be sold in high numbers. Part of the solution was to design smaller, less-expensive versions, the H2 and H3, but much of the success would have to depend on the marketing. Rather than turning to a roster of ad agencies it usually worked with, GM hired a young Boston creative boutique, Modernista!, in 2000.

The initial goal of the $35 million campaign, begun in August 2001, was to establish Hummer as a luxury brand. Thus, images of mud-splattered Hummers that played up the vehicle's off-road capabilities were scrapped in favor of shots that made it seem jewel-like. Once the brand was repositioned, the marketers' goal was to pitch the lower-priced H2 and H3 to a wider market, hopefully to more women.

Factors such as rising gas prices and the perception that the Hummer was oversized for most consumers proved to be major hurdles for the marketers. However, by the end of 2003 the campaign had succeeded in redefining the Hummer brand, and with the introduction of the H3 in 2005, the marketers took on a new challenge: selling the Hummer to a mass market.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Humvee was designed for the U.S. Army in 1979 by AM General Corp., based in South Bend, Indiana. The 3.5-ton vehicle became a star of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, spurring consumer demand for a civilian version, which was introduced in 1992 as the Hummer. It catered to an exclusive market, as demonstrated by the fact that Arnold Schwarzenegger was one of the first buyers. The vehicle never received much advertising support; AM General spent less than $1 million on marketing the Hummer in 1999, when it sold about 700 of the trucks. Nevertheless, AM General did enough business to attract the attention of General Motors, and in the end bought the Hummer brand in late 1999.

GM signed a seven-year contract with AM General to produce the next generation, GM-designed version, the Hummer H2 sport-utility vehicle (SUV). The agency Modernista! was hired to promote the brand. Prior marketing efforts had played up the military connection and the Hummer's off-road capabilities, billing the vehicle as "the world's most serious 4x4." Modernista! won the account because it was the only agency that attempted to fashion a wider appeal by going beyond the tough-guy, army-truck image.

The principals involved in the campaign did not lack experience in selling cars. Modernista!'s cofounder, Lance Jensen, had worked with Hummer's advertising director, Liz Vanzura, when she was at Volkswagen of America and he was with the Boston-based ad agency Arnold Communications. Both played key roles in developing Volkswagen's award-winning "Drivers Wanted" campaign. Vanzura commented that, while the Volkswagen ads were aimed at "cool, young people," her new mission was to sell Hummers to "cool, rich people."

TARGET MARKET

Even before hiring Modernista!, GM had done a great deal of market research. According to Ted Evanoff, writing for the Indianapolis Star, "In 1999 researchers stumbled across the notion that an unlikely cross-section of America—surgeons, dot-com millionaires, rock stars, high school students, corporate execs—prized their individuality. And they regarded the rugged Hummer as a symbol of individuality, especially compared with the typical sport-utility common in suburbia." Modernista! was given 2,200 pages of market data to distill into an advertising message. The agency was also handed a brand that skewed very much toward males, averaging 50 years in age and with an annual household income of more than $200,000. The target buyer for the less-expensive H2, while still male, was 42 years old on average and had a household income above $125,000. Vanzura told Chris Reidy of the Boston Globe that the coveted audience included "rugged individualists, adventurous entrepreneurs, and adrenaline junkies." In other interviews she described the target market as "successful achievers" and "style leaders." She also told Evanoff that Hummer had to vie with other purchases the well-to-do might consider, such as yachts or vacation houses, stating, "We're really not competing in an automotive category."

© NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

COMPETITION

The yacht, vacation house, and other status symbols notwithstanding, Hummer competed in the luxury-SUV category against other SUVs, including the Lincoln Navigator, Land Rover's Range Rover, and the Lexus LX 470. But Hummer's chief opponent was DaimlerChrysler's Jeep Wrangler. Boasting similar military roots but extending back to World War II, Jeep had defined the SUV category and at its height in 1993 controlled nearly 30 percent of the traditional SUV market. Over the following several years, however, the brand failed had to introduce new models, and its less-expensive ones faced increasingly stiff competition, resulting in a severe erosion of sales. As long as Hummer was not a direct competitor, DaimlerChrysler took little notice of it, but as soon as GM acquired the right to mass-market the Hummer, DaimlerChrysler recognized the threat at the high end of the SUV category and became determined to hold on to Jeep's reputation as the premier heavy-duty, off-road brand.

The two vehicles had slightly different target markets, however. Jeep appealed to consumers who loved the outdoors and might attend one of the dozens of Jeep Jamboree off-road events held throughout the year. Typical Hummer customers, on the other hand, wanted the off-road capabilities the vehicle had to offer but were more interested in the image it created. They were as likely to drive their Hummers to an upscale mall as up a mountain.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In preparation for marketing the lower-priced H2, Modernista! instituted a bridge campaign, paid for by AM General, to sell the H1 while repositioning the brand. As Will Uronis, an associate creative director at Modernista!, explained to the Boston Herald's Greg Gatlin, "Hollywood had defined what Hummers stood for—war, explosions and arrogance . . . We just took a look at another facet of the truck." Jensen added, "We went out and talked to guys that drove them . . . they don't all hunt and kill things." Nevertheless, Hollywood movies had done a good job of making consumers aware of the Hummer. Market research conducted in 1999 indicated that as many as one in five buyers of full-size SUVs considered purchasing the Hummer. The bridge campaign was intended to play to the "rugged individualists" who, research revealed, were

FAMILY FEUD

Hummer and its chief rival, Jeep, shared a common heritage. American Motors bought the Jeep business from Kaiser Jeep in 1970, forming the basis of a military unit that was spun off as a subsidiary, AM General Corp. In 1979 AM General designed the Humvee for the U.S. Army as a military transport vehicle and incorporated Jeep's seven-slot grille. When Chrysler acquired the Jeep business in 1987, the two vehicles parted ways. AM General introduced the civilian version of the Humvee, the Hummer, in 1992. Although Chrysler did not initially object to sharing the Jeep's distinctive grille, that changed in 1999, when GM acquired the rights to market Hummer and became a direct threat to the Jeep franchise. In February 2001 DaimlerChrysler sued General Motors, alleging that the Hummer's front grille too closely resembled that of the Jeep. DaimlerChrysler lost, and the cousins continued to share a family resemblance.

attracted to the Hummer and to set the stage for the launch of the H2 by creating an emotional attachment to the brand that transcended the hard-edged image fostered by Hollywood. According to Evanoff, writing in the Indianapolis Star, the promotion of the H1 was intended to create a "halo" over the brand, providing "the foundation for a brand image that will carry the smaller H2."

The first national ads for the GM-owned Hummer began appearing on August 13, 2001. It was an all-print campaign that featured photographs of the vehicle in lush locales in Chile. Not only did the pictures suggest where the H1, with its off-road prowess, could take the viewer, but they also made the big truck look small. It was the first time Hummer was not portrayed covered in mud or linked to the military. Reinforcing the visual message of the ad was the text, which included the headline "How did my soul get way out here?" and the concluding text "Sometimes you find yourself in the middle of nowhere. And sometimes in the middle of nowhere you find yourself. The legendary H1." Hummer's longtime tagline, "World's most serious 4x4," was replaced by "Like nothing else." The four ads ran through the rest of 2001, appearing in such publications as the Wall Street Journal, Barron's, Esquire, Spin, Wired, and Red Herring. Hummer's 50 dealers were also encouraged to use the ads created by Modernista! to bring continuity to the brand's makeover, with some of their media costs being reimbursed by a cooperative advertising program.

The H2, based on GM's Chevrolet Tahoe full-size SUV, was introduced in July 2002. A second model featuring a small pickup bed and a cargo door was supposed to be offered at the same time, but the launch was pushed back, partly because the vehicle needed more work but also as a way to extend the marketing buzz the brand was creating. The new H2, with a base price of $48,000, was about half the price of the H1 and, despite being called the "baby Hummer," essentially the same size. But it featured a smaller, less noisy gas engine rather than a cumbersome diesel one, and it had comforts and customizable options the H1 lacked but that were expected in a luxury SUV.

The introduction of the H2 was supported by another print campaign developed by Modernista! While the "Like nothing else" tagline of the previous ads was retained, the look of the new ads was markedly different, relying on dramatic close-ups set against bold, sky-blue backgrounds.

Like the first ads, the new ones ran in a wide range of magazines, with the text tailored to the publication. For example, in the Robb Report, which covered all things luxurious, the text read, "Excessive. In a Rome at the height of its power sort of way." The Vanity Fair text read, "Threaten the men in your office in a whole new way," part of an effort to increase the number of women buying the vehicles. Another ad proclaimed, "Perfect for rugby moms." About 10 percent of H1 owners were women, and one goal of the H2 campaign was to increase that number to 25 percent. Outdoor ads were also produced, running in 14 major markets, including New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Detroit. Print and outdoor ads were made available for the use of dealers.

The first Hummer television ads aired in mid-August 2002. The initial three 30-second spots, intended to romanticize the truck, were shot in Iceland and in Vancouver, British Columbia, and featured both natural and urban locations. They showed friends in a Hummer speeding over the tundra of Iceland or a professional woman weaving through traffic in a city. Set to rock music, the only words in the spots were text statements such as "Maybe if you can, you will." A second phase of the television campaign played on people's perception of the Hummer as a gas-guzzling road hog. In one spot a young boy constructed a small wooden version of the Hummer to enter in a soapbox derby, while The Who's "Happy Jack" played in the background and the little girl next door looked on. At the start of the big race the other boys scoffed at little Jack and his less-than-streamlined racer, but he prevailed by abandoning the asphalt course, breaking the rules to go cross-country and win the race and the girl. Through the humor of the spot Jack was portrayed not as a blatant cheater but as a heroic iconoclast, offering subliminal reassurance to potential Hummer customers who might feel guilty about buying a vehicle that got about 13 miles to a gallon of gas on the highway. A second Hummer spot, also displaying a tough side, hearkened back to the Asteroids video game of the 1980s, with a spaceship blasting boulders only to confront an indestructible Hummer, which chased the ship off the screen.

OUTCOME

GM and Modernista! succeeded in introducing Hummer to a wider market, but after a strong showing in 2003, sales began to tail off, partly because of high gas prices. To regain lost ground, in 2004 GM introduced the H2 SUT (sport-utility truck). This was followed by the unveiling in 2005 of the H3, a midsize Hummer priced from $29,500 to $32,000. Almost 17 inches shorter, 1,700 pounds lighter, and more fuel-efficient at 20 miles per gallon, it was a vehicle GM hoped women and younger drivers would find more appealing.

In pitching the vehicle to a mass market, Hummer and Modernista! faced a new task. Putting a positive spin on the challenge, Jensen told Jeremy W. Peters of the New York Times, "The brand has a lot of different personality levels . . . You can do the serious capability stuff, the real rough-and-tumble rock climbing stuff, the peaceful back-to-nature stuff." Industry analyst Mary Ann Keller disagreed, telling the New York Times that it was impossible to sell Hummer to the masses: "How in the world can you possibly fathom that something that looks like a military vehicle is practical for the average driver?"

FURTHER READING

Cantwell, Julie. "General Motors Is Trying to Wipe the Mud Off Hummer." Automotive News, August 6, 2001.

Evanoff, Ted. "GM Blazes a New Trail with Its Marketing Strategy for Upscale Hummer." Indianapolis Star, August 12, 2001.

Garfield, Bob. "Garfield's AdReview." Advertising Age, July 7, 2003, p. 25.

Greenberg, Karl. "Liz Vanzura: GM's Ad Director Is on a Roll." Brandweek, April 7, 2003.

Hakim, Danny. "Spots for the Hummer and the Hybrid Prius, Opposites on the Road." New York Times, September 11, 2003, p. C5.

Halliday, Jean. "Of Hummers and Zen." Advertising Age, August 6, 2001, p. 29.

Irwin, Tanya. "GM's Hummer Choice Reflects Desire for Daring." Adweek, October 16, 2000, p. 6.

———. "Modernista! Launches $20 Mil. Hummer Campaign." Adweek, July 8, 2002, p. 5.

———. "Modernista! Repositions Hummer." Brandweek, August 6, 2001, p. 5.

Peters, Jeremy W. "How to Market Hummers to the Masses." New York Times, June 28, 2005, p. C3.

Reidy, Chris. "Boston Ad Agency Hopes Hummer Ads Juice General Motors Profits." Boston Globe, August 16, 2001.

Wells, Melanie. "Muscle Car." Forbes, July 22, 2002.

Ed Dinger

LOOKING FOR MR. GOODWRENCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

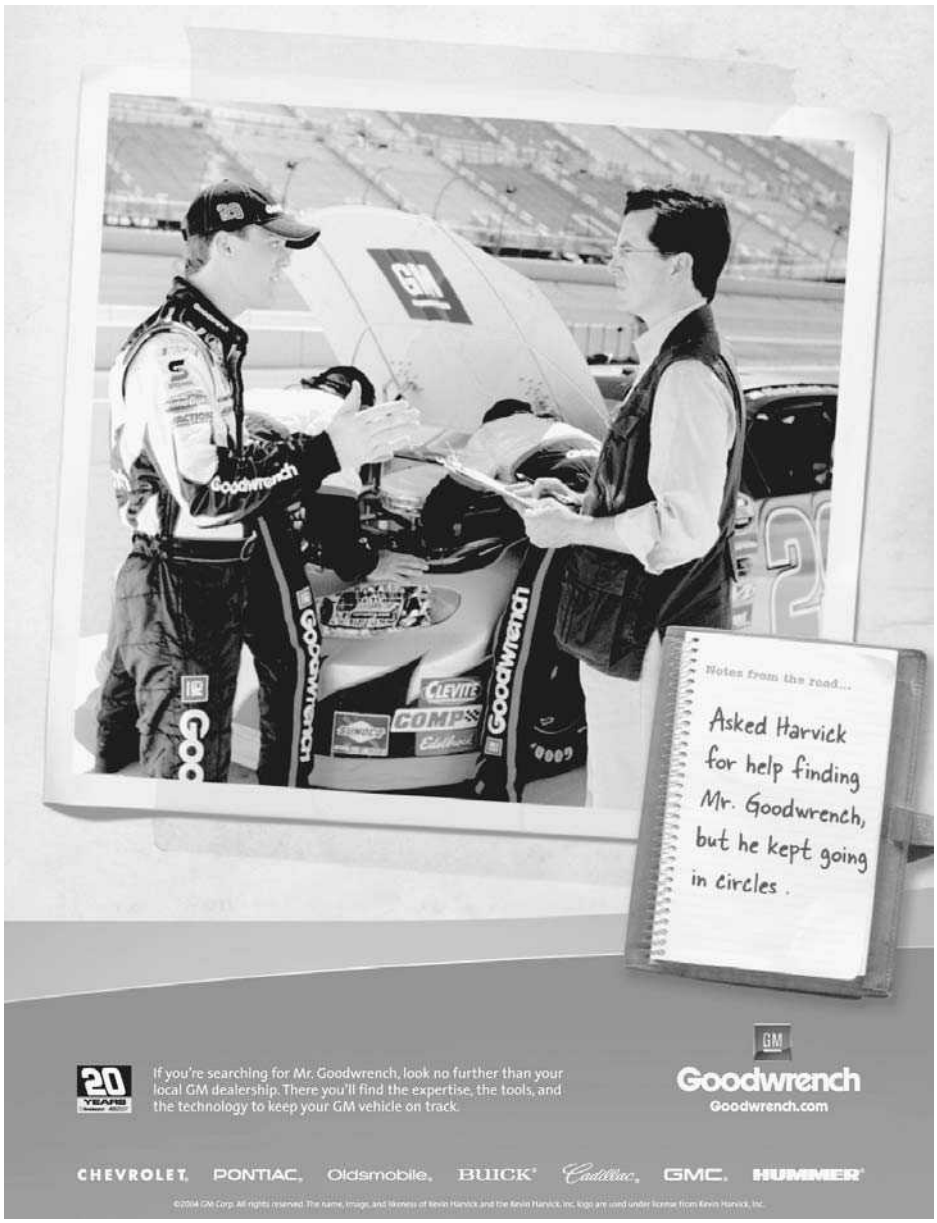
In the early 2000s General Motors Corporation (GM) found itself the victim of its own success. Improved quality in its vehicles had resulted in less warranty work for the service centers of GM dealerships, which very much depended on the revenues. All of GM's 7,400 dealers were brought under the Goodwrench program (a national chain of GM dealer repair shops), and the ad agency chemistri (later called Leo Burnett Detroit) was given the task of building up the brand to attract more nonwarranty work to the service centers. The marketers decided to revive the Mr. Goodwrench character, not seen in GM ads for almost a generation but still alive as a cultural icon. The result was the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign.

Rather than portray Mr. Goodwrench as an actual person, as was done from 1975 to 1985, chemistri revisited the concept by creating an oblivious reporter character, played by comedian Stephen Colbert, known for a similar role on Comedy Central's program The Daily Show. He set off on a never-ending quest to find the one and only Mr. Goodwrench, never quite able to comprehend that every one of GM's 80,000 technicians was, in essence, Mr. Goodwrench. In addition to 30-second TV spots, the campaign consisted of radio spots and print ads, supplemented by an updated website.

In the first year GM spent $50 million on the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, which began in March 2003 and succeeded in elevating the Goodwrench brand in the minds of consumers. Colbert's rising stardom also helped the campaign, and he was retained for a second set of TV spots, launched in October 2004, and for a third in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

To promote its network of dealership service centers, in 1975 GM's Service and Parts Operations (SPO) introduced Mr. Goodwrench, the everyman of General



Steven Colbert looking for Mr. Goodwrench. PHOTO COURTESY OF LEO BURNETT DETROIT. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Motors technicians, along with the slogan ''Keep that great GM feeling with genuine GM parts.'' The character remained the focal point of GM SPO ads for a decade. In the ensuing years, however, GM SPO received fewer advertising dollars and produced no memorable campaigns. In the meantime the quality of General Motors cars improved, resulting in a significant erosion in income for the shops, which concentrated on performing warranty work. In 2002, for example, GM cars had 130 problems per 100 vehicles, an 11 percent improvement over the prior year, placing the company third in quality behind Toyota and Honda. Because their cars had fewer problems, GM consumers also became lax about taking them in for scheduled maintenance and repairs, adding further to the loss of business at GM repair shops. It was estimated that dealers performed 15 to 20 percent less warranty work in 2002 than in 2001. GM dealers became concerned that the loss of warranty work would reduce the amount of money they could invest in mechanics' training and service facilities and that this would produce a downward spiral of diminished service quality, poor reputation, and further erosion of sales.

The obvious way to offset the loss of warranty repairs was to boost nonwarranty business. To do this GM decided to beef up its Goodwrench program, in which only about half of the GM dealerships were participating. Starting in January 2003 all of the dealers were required to participate in the program. As a result Goodwrench became the largest automotive service network in the United States and had more financial resources at its disposal. For advertising GM turned to chemistri, an agency based in Troy, Michigan. Chemistri was heir to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, whose connection to GM dated to 1915, when the agency fashioned ads for Cadillac. In 2002 D'Arcy's parent company, Bcom3, was acquired by Publicis Groupe SA and disbanded. D'Arcy's Detroit operation was kept and renamed chemistri, its purpose to focus exclusively on GM clients.

TARGET MARKET

The target market for the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign consisted of both male and female owners of GM vehicles whose ages ranged from 24 to 54. A GM spokesperson quoted by Alice Z. Cuneo in Advertising Age described the coveted demographic as "Starbucks suburbanites." It was with this type of person in mind that the marketers made their decision about who would represent the brand in the new campaign.

COMPETITION

As Goodwrench service centers attempted to expand beyond warranty work, they began competing against a multitude of local mom-and-pop shops. On the national scene Goodwrench had to contend with Ford's Quality Care service centers, which were in much the same plight, looking to drum up repair work to make up for the loss of business that had resulted from improved vehicle quality. Quality Care was spending about $40 million a year on advertising, as was another national player, Midas Muffler Company, which had been hurt by the introduction of longer-lasting mufflers in the 1990s. Midas was attempting to reposition itself as a general car maintenance center instead of just a muffler shop, and it had the benefit of a well-recognized brand to aid in the effort.

Goodwrench also faced regional competition from smaller muffler shops, such as Meineke Discount Mufflers, which had changed the name of its 900 shops in Canada and the United States to Meineke Car Care Center. Although it lacked the budgets of other companies, Meineke had the advantage of a celebrity pitchman, boxer George Foreman. Another muffler chain stepping into the fray was the 600-unit Monro Muffler and Brake. Moreover, the repair field was crowded with competitors of a different type: auto parts retailers—such as Pep Boys and the northeastern chain Strauss Discount Auto—who were opening supercenters to install the parts they sold.

Given the crowded auto repair field and the difficulty of standing out, GM was committed to spending at least as much as Ford and Midas on advertising. "We want to get this program launched at industry-leading levels," Jon Brancheau, director of brand marketing for GM SPO, told Automotive News's Dave Guilford.

CAREER IMPROVEMENT

In the late 1980s, before becoming the star of the hit television sitcom Home Improvement, Tim Allen played a Mr. Goodwrench-like technician in a General Motors ad campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As the new Goodwrench campaign was being developed, GM requested that chemistri expand its marketing approach beyond creating TV spots. The agency was asked to think in terms of wider marketing plans and to bring in partner agencies with expertise in direct mail, interactive advertising, diversity affairs, and other areas. In crafting the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, chemistri received significant input from GM's Dealer Fixed Operations Advisory Board. The agency also got marketing advice from the Optimization Group, a Detroit consulting firm, and hired Six Degrees, based in Scottsdale, Arizona, to provide research assistance.

In an interview with Guilford for Automotive News Brancheau said that the decision to bring back the Mr. Goodwrench character, even though he would be nothing more than a phantom, was a "no-brainer." Research showed that, despite an 18-year absence, Mr. Goodwrench remained firmly entrenched in the mind of consumers. The marketers elected to use humor, but because it was important to portray the technicians as skilled professionals, they had to walk a fine line. The challenge, therefore, was to find a way to relay serious information—such as the fact that dealer technicians used the latest in diagnostic tools and had received more then one million hours of combined training in the previous year—and still be funny. Humor also helped to address another potential pitfall: focusing too much on the need for service, which might carry the implication that GM products were not trustworthy. Moreover, humor helped spice up what was a less-than-exciting subject for consumers. Marketing

A COMEDY VET

Born in South Carolina, Stephen Colbert, star of the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, studied acting at Northwestern University. He got his start with the Second City comedy troupe in Chicago, then moved to New York with fellow cast members to create the sketch comedy show Exit 57 for Comedy Central. After two seasons Colbert joined The Daily Show in 1997. He was also a creator and star of the acclaimed program Strangers With Candy, which aired on Comedy Central from 1999 to 2000.

director Beth Grotz told Theresa Howard of USA Today, "Your typical automotive service ad is a technician or service manager pleading with you to come in. We thought we'd take a little different approach to see if we could get more interest in the category."

To serve as the focal point of the new Goodwrench campaign, GM elected to hire a comedian and settled on Stephen Colbert, a reporter on Comedy Central's The Daily Show, a satire of an evening news program. Colbert's deadpan delivery and well-honed dimwit persona made him an ideal choice to play the role of a reporter searching to find the one and only Mr. Goodwrench. While many people may not have recognized Colbert at the time, he was well known by the target market.

The "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign was multifaceted. In addition to TV spots, it included radio, print, and Internet elements. Print ads appeared in such magazines as People, Newsweek, Time, Sports Illustrated, Better Homes and Gardens, and Ebony. All ads mentioned the Goodwrench website, where consumers could find additional information and locate their nearest service center.

The focus of the campaign was four 30-second television spots, which aired during both network and cable programs. In addition, chemistri created five spots that dealers could air on their own, and GM established 30 local marketing groups to fund local advertising. The national ads first appeared in March 2003, in time to be shown during telecasts of the NCAA Men's Basketball Championship. They were also shown during other sporting events, including NASCAR races, a major venue for promoting anything automotive. Moreover, GM Goodwrench sponsored a race car, which would be featured in one of the TV spots.

All four of the first wave of ads in the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign featured Colbert's clueless reporter attempting to uncover the identity of the man called Goodwrench. The spot called "Service Bay" showed Colbert in a safari vest that would become the character's trademark. He interviewed three GM service technicians, asking, "Mr. Goodwrench—who is this one and only GM expert?" They all claimed to be Mr. Goodwrench, confusing Colbert, who resorted to a bullhorn to ask the real Mr. Goodwrench to please step forward. The spot closed with the line "Find Mr. Goodwrench at over 7,000 GM dealerships nationwide." A second spot, "Mitre Saw," was broken into two parts. First, when told that Mr. Goodwrench had more than one million hours of training, the disbelieving reporter quipped, "Doesn't leave much time for Mrs. Goodwrench now, does it?" Colbert then asked a technician what kind of tool Mr. Goodwrench would be if he were a tool. When the bemused technician answered, "Wrench," Colbert was quick to reply, "No, the correct answer is mitre saw."

The final two spots in the initial "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign took Colbert out of the service center. In "NASCAR Garage" he visited with the driver of the GM Goodwrench-sponsored race car, Kevin Harvick. Colbert was again skeptical when Harvick confirmed that Mr. Goodwrench knew GM cars better than he did and could be found both at the track and at GM dealerships. The spot closed with Harvick expelling Colbert from his race car, where Colbert was pretending to be a driver. In the last spot, "On the Street," Colbert approached people to question them about Mr. Goodwrench, capping off the interviews by outlandishly asking whether he did root canals as well as service work on GM vehicles.

There was no doubt that Colbert's work on the TV and radio spots was the cornerstone of the success of the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign. When the ratings of The Daily Show improved dramatically during the U.S. presidential campaign of 2004, Colbert's visibility grew. The show's "Indecision 2004" coverage was especially popular with a younger demographic, part of which admitted to getting most, if not all, of their real news from the fake news show. GM's Goodwrench service centers enjoyed Colbert's reflected popularity. GM even became a sponsor of The Daily Show's website. Market research indicated that, after the launch of the campaign, GM experienced significant gains in unaided brand awareness, ad awareness, and brand consideration.

In October 2004, in an attempt to build on the momentum created over the previous year, GM began airing two new spots in the "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign. Colbert was again featured, this time joined by a sidekick, comedian Brian Posehn. Together they traveled in a tiny three-wheeled truck with "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench'' emblazoned on the side. In the spot titled ''Stakeout'' they tried using high-tech equipment in a dealership parking lot to find Mr. Goodwrench. In the second spot, ''APB,'' Colbert asked a mounted police officer to put out an all points bulletin (APB) for Mr. Goodwrench, noting that Mr. Goodwrench claimed to spend more than a million hours a year training. ''Do you know what that means?'' he asked. ''Expertise?'' suggested the officer. ''Two words,'' replied Colbert, then offered three: ''Labor law infraction.''

Three new ''Looking for Mr. Goodwrench'' ads appeared in the summer of 2005. While the little truck made an appearance when Colbert challenged Harvick to a race, Posehn did not. Instead, Colbert was solo once again, questioning technicians and customers alike in his ongoing search for Mr. Goodwrench, a concept that continued to provide the copywriters with enough humorous situations to exploit Colbert's talent and promote the Goodwrench brand.

OUTCOME

GM was extremely pleased with the ''Looking for Mr. Goodwrench'' ads. As Grotz told the online resource the Auto Channel, ''GM has broken away from the pack . . . Most vehicle service ads feature a technician holding a part in his or her hand, but we moved away from the typical spot and connected with consumers through unique settings in addition to the dealership environment, and through humor.'' The campaign was recognized by the advertising industry, winning a Bronze EFFIE Award (Automotive Aftermarket Products and Services category) in 2005. Meanwhile, Colbert's high profile, both in films and on Comedy Central, added luster to the ongoing campaign.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Ross K. ''Logo-Types.'' American Demographics 11, no. 3 (March 1989): p. 68.

Bonamici, Kate. ''The Daily Show Shill.'' Fortune, November 29, 2004, p. 64.

''Chemistri Continues Search for Mr. Goodwrench.'' Adweek, October 5, 2004.

Cuneo, Alice Z. ''Marketers, Politicians Clamor for 'Daily' Fix.'' Advertising Age, September 27, 2004, p. 12.

Guilford, Dave. ''GM Boosts Goodwrench Advertising.'' Automotive News, March 17, 2003, p. 8.

Halliday, Jean. ''GM's New Goodwrench Ads Seek Trust in Dealer Service.'' Advertising Age, June 7, 1999, p. 20.

———. ''Goodwrench Rolls First Ads in 2 Years.'' Advertising Age, August 18, 1997, p. 25.

Howard, Theresa. ''GM Revives Mr. Goodwrench Ads, Throwing in Comedic Twist.'' USA Today, December 5, 2004.

Irwin, Tanya. ''New GM Spots Look for Mr. Goodwrench.'' Brandweek, March 17, 2003, p. 12.

Jackson, Kathy. ''D'Arcy Takes a New Name.'' Automotive News, March 17, 2003, p. 22.

Miller, Duane. ''Driving Service Business during Car Care Month.'' Automotive News, April 11, 2005, p. 2.

''Mr. Goodwrench Cranks up Fresh Pitch for GM Service.'' Brandweek, March 17, 2003, p. 7.

Ed Dinger

START SOMETHING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Once the crown jewel of the General Motors Corp. (GM), the Oldsmobile division had fallen on hard times. As a result, GM went so far as to contemplate terminating the venerable Oldsmobile nameplate, but it opted to reinvent the division instead. Beginning in 1994 Oldsmobile introduced new cars designed to appeal to younger consumers and help win back sales from competitors. Moreover, GM designated Oldsmobile as its import-fighting wing. To this end Oldsmobile created the Alero, a compact car designed to take on such best-sellers as Honda Motor Co.'s Accord and Toyota Motor Corp.'s Camry. With a planned launch date of September 1, 1998, Oldsmobile turned to its longtime ad agency, the Leo Burnett Company, to create a campaign that would generate excitement about the Alero.

For this $80 million kickoff campaign, Oldsmobile adopted the tagline ''Start Something.'' The commercials were unlike anything Oldsmobile had ever done before. In both the 15-second teaser commercials (which debuted August 3, 1998) and the 30-second commercials (which began on September 1), quick-cutting images were set to a pulsing electronic sound track, scenes of screaming teenagers were interspersed with shots of the Alero, and red ovals spelled out such commands as ''Start to Scream'' and ''Stop Commuting. Start Driving.'' Every spot closed with the ''Start Something'' moniker. Leo Burnett also created print pieces and savvy Internet ads.

The Alero and its supporting marketing campaign were deemed a success by General Motors executives as well as industry insiders. The campaign also managed to reach its target audience of younger consumers. GM predicted that 1999 sales of the Alero would reach or surpass 100,000 vehicles. Based on its success, the campaign was continued in 1999 and expanded to include the entire Oldsmobile line of vehicles. Early in 2000 the tagline ''Start Something'' was modified depending on which vehicle was being promoted in the specific spot. The initial success of the Alero was brief, however, and by the end of 2000 Oldsmobile sales were again on the decline. In December 2000 GM announced that it was ceasing production of Oldsmobiles.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Oldsmobile had once been perceived as a "status" car, a high-powered American car for the stylish executive with a family, said an article in the July 15, 1991, Adweek. Between 1983 and 1986 the division sold more than one million cars per year. In 1987, however, Oldsmobile's fortunes waned. GM's policy of "badge engineering" resulted in Oldsmobile's vehicles becoming indistinguishable from other GM lines, diluting the brand's cachet. In addition, the company was slow to introduce new products that kept up with consumers' tastes. Although Oldsmobile's 1988 campaign, "This Is Not Your Father's Oldsmobile! This Is a New Generation of Olds," was lauded by ad critics and popular with consumers, it did little to bolster the brand's sinking sales. By 1996 Oldsmobile's share of the U.S. car market had reached an all-time low of 2.2 percent (down from its 1995 share of 2.6 percent). Its 1996 sales were 14.5 percent lower than in 1995. According to Fortune magazine, Oldsmobile's loyal customers were aging and had either "died or defected to Buick."

The division took stock of its situation in the mid-1990s and committed itself to revamping its entire product line. In 1994 Oldsmobile debuted the Aurora, which served as "the centerpiece of [the company's] strategy to boost sagging sales by attracting buyers younger than its traditional sixty-something crowd," noted USA Today. The redesigned Bravada sport-utility vehicle (model year 1996), the Silhouette and Cutlass (1997), and the Intrigue (1997) followed. So adamant was Oldsmobile to reach younger drivers that in 1997 it teamed up with The X-Files, a show that had a cultlike following among Generation Xers, for a major promotion. Nevertheless, Oldsmobile had no entry-level car that could draw consumers into the Oldsmobile line, so as the entire Oldsmobile line struggled to shed its geriatric image, Alero was pegged as the division's entry-level vehicle.

TARGET MARKET

Priced between $17,500 and $22,000, the Alero was designated as the entry-level vehicle of the Oldsmobile line. The division intended it to be a high-volume car and set a prelaunch goal for Alero of eventually accounting for 40 percent of Oldsmobile's sales. "Start Something" was grounded in the premise that the bulk of the consumers who would ultimately drive these sales would be those between the ages of 30 and 50. Within this broad demographic group, Oldsmobile focused on "well-educated singles or young families with children," according to the San Diego Union-Tribune. The division's lingering reputation for "fogey-mobiles" made this a challenging audience to win over. Nevertheless, it was an important segment for Oldsmobile to capture. The grail for all car companies was to have consumers "grow" within a line of cars—to start with low-end vehicles and progress to ever-more expensive cars as they became older and wealthier. Market research had shown that brand allegiances were often formed early and tended to be long lasting. If Oldsmobile were to survive, it had to introduce consumers to its line.

To indicate that the Alero represented a new direction for Oldsmobile, Leo Burnett crafted a campaign that was meant to stand out from the array of other car commercials and seize viewers' attention for itself. "At first glance, it doesn't look like car advertising—it's not supposed to," the division explained in an August 26, 1998, press release. To add to the aura of uniqueness, Oldsmobile opted not to use actors in the commercials. "These are real people with real lives and passions. They closely reflect the attitude and character of the Alero," said Mike Sands, Oldsmobile's director of advertising. Moreover, the commercials had a high-energy, youthful feeling. Images of children, teens at a concert, a martial artist, and a man jumping off a mountain into the snow were the core of the spots. The sound track was modern and pulsing, and the quick-cutting cinematography resembled a music video more than a standard car commercial. "We want people who are willing to try something new," Sands told Automotive News. But Oldsmobile was careful not to position itself too far outside the mainstream. The company wanted women to account for 50 percent of its sales, and conventional wisdom held that this demographic responded well to family-oriented messages. As a result, the division included upbeat domestic scenes in many of its ads. "The spots are trying to communicate a certain way of thinking and living," a Leo Burnett spokesperson told Adweek. "[The campaign] speaks to a consumer set that is very new to Oldsmobile."

Oldsmobile pitched the Alero not only to younger drivers but also to minority groups, most notably Hispanics and African-Americans. The U.S. Census predicted that Hispanics would account for 42 percent of America's population growth between 1998 and 2008, while only 2.3 percent of Oldsmobile's 1997 sales had come from Hispanics. African-Americans were also underrepresented among Oldsmobile consumers. "There is a huge potential for the Alero to gain Hispanic and African-American customers who had never before considered buying an Oldsmobile," Oldsmobile's brand manager Bob Clark explained to Automotive News in September 1998. In its bid to pitch Alero to Hispanic and African-American consumers, Oldsmobile created

REAR VIEW?

One interesting aspect of the "Start Something" teaser spots for the Alero was that each commercial ended with a shot of the Alero backing up, seemingly out of the commercial. The image was probably meant to help differentiate "Start Something" ads from the visual cacophony of other car advertising.

separate ads that targeted these distinct communities. For instance, Alero's Hispanic-oriented advertising used the tagline "Vivelo," which meant "To Live," because "Start Something" translated poorly.

COMPETITION

As GM's "import-fighting" line, Oldsmobile wanted the Alero to compete against comparable compact sedans by the established import players—the Honda Accord, the Toyota Camry, the Nissan Altima, and the Mazda 626. Alero's task was a difficult one because it involved "mak[ing] conquest sales in a shrinking market segment," according to Automotive News. Sales in the lower mid-range segment that Alero sought to enter had seen shrinking sales, as increasing numbers of consumers bought sport-utility vehicles and other light trucks instead of cars. It was a highly competitive market, and Alero's rivals conducted savvy campaigns designed to keep their share of the market. Claiming converts would be a challenge.

Foremost among the Alero's rivals was the Toyota Camry, which was the best-selling car in the United States in both 1997 and 1998. Since fall 1997 Toyota's ad agency, Saatchi & Saatchi, had advertised the Camry as part of the company's overall branding campaign: "Everyday People." The Camry figured prominently in these print and television spots that showed the versatility and practicality of Toyota. Toyota's overall share of the U.S. market grew from 8.1 percent in 1997 to 8.7 percent in 1998.

The Honda Accord was the second-best-selling car in the United States in 1997 and 1998. For model year 1998 Honda had launched a completely redesigned Accord. Spots by Rubin Postaer & Associates used the tagline "An Accord Like No Other" to tout the Accord's roomier interior, performance, and quiet engine. This $100 million campaign "was almost paying homage to the Accord over the past 22 years," a Honda spokesperson told Advertising Age. In October 1998 Honda switched strategies with two new national Accord commercials (also by Rubin Postaer) that did not use "An Accord Like No Other." Instead the spots presented the Accord not just "as a car you need," but more as "a car you want," a Honda representative explained in the October 5, 1998, issue of Advertising Age. In one a frazzled woman left an airport, and, by using her remote-control key, was able to freeze all action around her until she reached her Accord. The tagline proclaimed, "It's not just a car. It's a state of mind." Honda's overall share of the U.S. car market rose from 6.2 percent in 1997 to 6.5 percent in 1998.

Oldsmobile also viewed the Mazda 626 and the Nissan Altima as direct competitors of the Alero. Since spring 1998 Mazda, which controlled a 1.5 percent share of the U.S. car market, had used the slogan "Get In. Be Moved." in advertising for all its offerings. As part of this campaign, Mazda's ad agency, W.B. Doner & Co., created a commercial for the 626 that sought to build a more energetic and sophisticated image for the car. Set to David Bowie's song "Rebel Rebel," the commercial portrayed an attractive woman driving across town in her 626. She stopped at a sign announcing a PTA meeting and walked inside carrying a cake. "Do not go gentle into that good PTA meeting," the voice-over intoned, in a spoof on Dylan Thomas's famous poem, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night." Mazda ran a similar commercial for the 626 in May 1999. Nissan, whose share of the U.S. car market was an impressive 4.0 percent, pulled the plug on its "Enjoy the Ride" branding campaign in 1998 and initiated more product-specific spots that failed to have their desired effect. The company consequently inaugurated a new branding campaign in 1999 with the tagline "Driven."

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Start Something" was designed to generate excitement for the launch of the Oldsmobile Alero. Just as the component advertisements strove to convey the car's fun-to-drive and distinct image, Oldsmobile's marketing efforts attempted to make the Alero's introduction highly visible to the car's target audience. "We really need to establish this vehicle with a big splash," Oldsmobile's Sand was quoted in the August 17, 1998, Adweek. The teaser commercials were an essential component of this plan. Even before the Alero had arrived at dealers, these 15-second spots "offer[ed] more of a sneak preview than a full disclosure of what l[ay] ahead," Oldsmobile explained in a press release. By the time the full 30-second spots aired on September 1, Oldsmobile had piqued viewers' curiosity. Print ads ran in major monthly magazines and newsweeklies after September 1.

Oldsmobile employed atypical media strategies to ensure that the Alero received a considerable amount of attention. The Internet figured prominently in the "Start Something'' campaign. According to Brandweek, the Internet was the ''centerpiece of its media blitz.'' In addition to scores of banner ads displayed on popular websites, Oldsmobile even offered test drives at home for consumers who signed up online. Incorporating the Internet into its marketing venues was a logical choice for Oldsmobile. ''We think the Internet is used by very youthful, very technologically savvy consumers who are similar to the consumer profile that we want to attract with the Alero,'' Sands told Automotive News. To raise the Alero's profile further, Oldsmobile announced its ''Start Something Tuesdays on ABC Sweepstakes'' in August 1998. This promotional tie-in with ABC's Tuesday evening prime-time lineup encouraged viewers to enter a sweepstakes in which 200 Aleros would be awarded.

Because Oldsmobile included Hispanic and African-American consumers in its target audience, the division used slightly different methods to reach these groups. For instance, Alero advertisements bearing the ''Vivelo'' tagline appeared in national Hispanic magazines and on Spanish-speaking networks. Oldsmobile concentrated its Hispanic-oriented efforts on large cities such as Los Angeles and Miami, as well as in regions with substantial Hispanic populations, such as Texas and the Southwest. GM declared October 13, 1998, to be ''GM Hispanic Awareness Day.'' At the company's Miami symposium that day, a GM executive said, ''I think the Alero speaks volumes about our commitment to, and expansion into, the Hispanic community.''

In 1999 GM expanded the ''Start Something'' campaign to encompass all of its Oldsmobile vehicles in what company executives described in Advertising Age as a ''divisional branding campaign,'' or ''divisional effort.'' Karen Francis, Oldsmobile's general marketing manager, told Advertising Age that in 1999 Alero's marketing tagline, ''Start Something,'' was being moved to all Oldsmobile vehicle models and that the expanded campaign would kick off with television spots during the 1999 Super Bowl. A new campaign to support the introduction of the Oldsmobile Aurora sedan began in April 2000; it featured the ''Start Something'' theme, but with a subtle twist. Francis explained to Advertising Age that each vehicle in the Oldsmobile line would have a different word after ''Start.'' For the Aurora the tagline was ''Start Obsessing,'' and the Alero's modified tagline was ''Start Connecting.'' The strategy took a different spin in late 2000 when GM announced that the redesigned Bravada sport-utility vehicle would be the last vehicle released under the Oldsmobile brand. Leo Burnett created just one 30-second TV spot supporting Bravada's launch; it was scheduled to appear on syndicated cable for three weeks followed by a run during the ''March Madness'' basketball coverage. The spot featured a Bravada racing down a road with a herd of wild horses running alongside it. A voice-over stated, ''A new beast on the road.''

OUTCOME

Both GM officials and industry analysts heralded the Alero's launch as a success. Although GM's overall 1998 performance was sluggish, the Wall Street Journal called the Oldsmobile division GM's ''one bright spot'' and stressed the importance of the Alero to Oldsmobile's positive results. Sands informed the January 11, 1999, Adweek that the Alero campaign was the first Oldsmobile effort that had ''truly resonated'' with this younger target audience. ''It was like a light bulb went off in [consumer's heads] that Oldsmobile had changed,'' he exclaimed. An Oldsmobile dealer further emphasized the division's turnaround to Automotive News on February 15, 1999: ''We're attracting non-Oldsmobile owners into the showrooms to buy Oldsmobiles.'' The company predicted 1999 sales of the Alero to exceed 100,000.

The Alero's debut was made all the more impressive by the challenges it overcame. In June 1998 a labor dispute led to strikes at major GM production facilities, which delayed the Alero's initial release. Some dealers and analysts therefore predicted a tepid reception for the car. ''We've got a lot of advertising support and market interest generated and now people come in the door and there's nothing to show them,'' one dealer complained to the Capital Times. But these fears proved to be overblown.

Following a brief rise on the crest of the ''Start Something'' campaign, in December 2000 Oldsmobile sales took a disappointing nosedive. GM executives soon announced that the entire Oldsmobile line would be phased out. The launch of the redesigned Bravada sport-utility vehicle in 2001 would be the brand's swan song. According to an Advertising Age report, Oldsmobile's plans for a 2001 first-quarter divisional branding campaign were canceled. ''Obviously, we're not into brand building, we're into brand selling,'' a GM spokesman said. Further, amidst complaints from Oldsmobile dealers that the advertising failed to clarify fully the brand's new positioning, the unit's general manager Karen Francis and advertising director Mike Sands both resigned, and Oldsmobile conducted an agency review. Included in the review were incumbent Leo Burnett; McCann-Erickson Worldwide, which was the agency for the Buick line; and E. Morris Communications, the agency handling Oldsmobile's African-American advertising. Following the review Leo Burnett retained the account and created the final advertising for Oldsmobile. In 2004 the last new Oldsmobile rolled off the assembly line.

FURTHER READING

Akre, Brian. "GM Strike Has Dealers Fretting over Inventory." Capital Times, June 19, 1998.

Halliday, Jean. "Curtain Call for Oldsmobile; GM's 103-Year-Old Unit Going Out with Bravada—and a $10 Mil Push." Advertising Age, March 19, 2001.

———. "Honda Ads Stick Simplicity." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998.

———. "How to Sell a Dying Brand; GM Agencies Confront Uphill Challenge of Marketing to Consumers Who Worry about Servicing Their Olds." Advertising Age, December 18, 2000.

———. "The Marketing 100: Honda Accord." Advertising Age, June 29, 1998.

———. "New Olds Effort Evolves Tagline; Automaker Starts 'Obsessing' for Aurora and 'Connecting' for Alero." Advertising Age, February 28, 2000.

———. "Olds Suffers Sales Slide, Dealers' Dissatisfaction; New Ad Director to be Named at Troubled GM Unit." Advertising Age, October 16, 2000.

———. "Olds to Buck GM Trend, Plans Division Brand Ads: Effort Likely in 1st Quarter 2000, Says Francis." Advertising Age, June 21, 1999.

Jaffe, Andrew. "Is Olds Making an Intelligent Choice?." Adweek, July 15, 1991.

Maynard, Mark. "The New Olds Alero." San Diego Union-Tribune, April 5, 1998.

"Oldsmobile." Adweek, August 10, 1998.

Taylor, Alex, III. "GM: Time to Get in Gear." Fortune, August 28, 1997.

Warner, Fara. "GM's Sales Fall by 5% in the US." Wall Street Journal, December 4, 1998.

Washington, Frank. "Olds' Goal: 400,000 '99 Sales." Automotive News, February 15, 1999.

———. "Olds Plans an Aggressive Ethnic Pitch." Automotive News, September 14, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel
Rayna Bailey

Gill Foundation

2215 Market Street
Denver, Colorado 80205
USA
Telephone: (303) 292-1594
Web site: www.gillfoundation.org

■■■

TURNOUT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2004 the issue of same-sex marriage catapulted into the media spotlight when San Francisco's newly elected mayor, Gavin Newsom, allowed city officials to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Colorado became a focal point for the issue after two of its politicians, U.S. Representative Marilyn Musgrave and U.S. Senator Wayne Allard, proposed an amendment that banned same-sex marriage. Also based in Colorado, the Christian group Focus on the Family Action began campaigning to preserve what it considered "traditional" marriage. In response Denver-based Gill Foundation, America's largest contributor to lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) organizations, launched the "TurnOut" campaign to drum up voter support for same-sex marriages and sexual-orientation antidiscrimination laws.

Between 1994 and 2004 the Gill Foundation invested nearly $54 million in LGBT-related issues, and in 2003 it contracted advertising agency DDB Seattle to create the "TurnOut" campaign for the months preceding the 2004 presidential elections. Television and print advertising appeared in July and targeted cities that had no laws to protect Americans from losing their jobs because of their sexual orientation. Six television spots played like minidocumentaries, showing real people coming out in their workplaces. These employees described what it was like to keep their personal lives secret at work and explained how they planned to disclose their sexual orientation to coworkers and management. The spots ended by directing viewers to http://www.TurnOut.org, a website that revealed the results of each person's effort and explained other key LGBT issues.

Although Musgrave was reelected in 2004 and Allard was reappointed to serve as a deputy majority whip in 2005, a survey showed that, by the end of the "TurnOut" campaign, its audience felt more receptive to same-sex marriage issues. From an ad industry standpoint "TurnOut" was highly successful; it won five awards at the 51st Annual Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival as well as a Clio Award.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1992 Colorado voters passed an amendment to their state constitution that negated the power of laws protecting Americans from sexual-orientation discrimination. Four years later the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the amendment. The issue, remaining relatively undisturbed for years, exploded in 2004 when San Francisco's mayor allowed the city to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples.

In 2004 Colorado Republicans Musgrave and Allard proposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that banned same-sex marriage. If passed the amendment would affect survivor benefits for children and spouses in same-sex families. At the time, same-sex families were also denied more than a thousand federal benefits that opposite-sex families qualified for. At the state level only three states granted same-sex marriages the same rights and responsibilities bestowed upon so-called traditional marriages.

The Gill Foundation, which had been founded by software tycoon Tim Gill in the 1990s, reacted by rallying voters to support same-sex marriages and antidiscrimination laws. As part of the "TurnOut" campaign, voter-mobilization tool kits were sent to some 250 organizations around the country, encouraging voters to elect candidates such as Colorado's Stan Matsunaka, who did not support the proposed amendment. Ted Trimpa, a Colorado attorney and gay-rights lobbyist, told the Rocky Mountain News that it was time to politically "go after people who go after us." Many in LGBT communities feared that if the wrong candidates were elected, they could hinder the rising momentum of the gay-rights movement. "We can't afford to lose," Trimpa continued in the Rocky Mountain News. Gill Foundation organizers were telling volunteers to encourage similar-minded voters to "vote like your civil rights depend on it."

Television spots for the "TurnOut" campaign focused on antidiscrimination issues, specifically in the workplace. At the time, only 14 states protected citizens from being fired because of their sexual orientation. Surveys conducted before the campaign indicated that mainstream voters felt sympathetic about the problem of workplace discrimination.

THE GILL FOUNDATION'S FOUNDER

Tim Gill, founder of the Gill Foundation, was one of only two openly gay individuals to make the Forbes 400 list in 1997. After borrowing $2,000 from his parents in 1981, Gill founded Quark, Inc., a company that grew to create high-end software for page-layout design. In the mid-1990s Gill established the Gill Foundation and subsequently provided millions of dollars for lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender groups and HIV/AIDS charities, including the Colorado AIDS Project.

TARGET MARKET

According to Eric Gutierrez, a creative director at DDB, "TurnOut" targeted voters who "might be open to a discussion about rights in the workplace." Polls conducted by the Gill Foundation showed that, out of a wide range of LGBT issues, equal rights in the workplace was considered highly important; more than 80 percent of straight people felt that everyone should have such rights. These findings prompted DDB to center the campaign's most prominent aspect, the television spots, on this issue. Rodger McFarlane, executive director of the Gill Foundation, told Business Wire, "Numerous studies, including our own, reveal that a majority of 'straight' people are appalled when they know that non-discrimination protections don't exist for many lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender citizens." The campaign was also aimed at the 56 percent of Colorado voters who did not support gay issues.

The "TurnOut" television spots showed six real people dissatisfied about hiding their sexual orientation from coworkers. Filmed as minidocumentaries, the spots featured the employees coming out at work. Lisa Herrera, for example, ended five years of silence about her personal life by placing a picture of her girlfriend on her desk. Steve Calhoun, a prototype tester at Detroit's Ford Motor Company, said his coworkers were not supportive when he came out. Each person also lived in a state that permitted employers to fire people for being gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender.

Gill Foundation volunteers told the Rocky Mountain News that the biggest challenge for "TurnOut" was getting straight, like-minded voters, specifically those under the age of 35, to vote. Even though volunteers felt that they could make a bigger impact by talking to voters one-on-one, "TurnOut" allowed the Gill Foundation to make gay-rights issues visible inside voters' homes.

COMPETITION

Focus on the Family Action (FOTFA), a political lobbying organization spearheaded by James Dobson to ban same-sex marriage and abortion, targeted the Evangelical Protestants that made up 23 percent of the U.S. electorate in 2004. Frustrated by previous Supreme Court decisions, Dobson began endorsing political candidates he thought would galvanize his religion-charged agenda. He appeared on TV talk shows such as ABC's This Week and on Fox News to express his distaste for same-sex marriage, claiming that it exacerbated what he referred to as a "culture war." Despite Dobson's influence, President George W. Bush refused to screen Supreme Court appointees according to their position on same-sex marriage. Bush also condoned civil unions if the state law allowed it.

Leading up to the election, FOTFA organized mass voting drives intended to register at least 1 million voters. Latinos were targeted with paid radio programming that aired across Spanish radio. FOTFA sponsored groups called ''family policy councils,'' which operated in 35 locations throughout the United States. One such group based in Ohio even sponsored the initiative that eventually banned same-sex marriages in that state.

RESTRICTED SURVIVOR BENEFITS

One of the most prominent cases involving the rights of same-sex couples involved Peggy Neff. After her partner of 18 years, Sheila Hein, was killed inside the Pentagon during the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, Neff petitioned for survivor benefits under the Virginia Victims of Crime Act. The state denied her the award, declaring that only a ''surviving spouse, parent, grandparent, sibling, adult child, or legal dependent of a deceased victim'' was eligible. Neff eventually sought compensation at the federal level. In 2003 she was granted $557,390 from the federal funding set aside for the victims' relatives.

Dobson's personal efforts included barnstorming the battleground states in the months before the election. He urged Christians to ''vote their values'' at a rally titled ''Mayday for Marriage'' that FOTFA organized in Washington, D.C. More than 13 thousand Hispanic churches were sent mailers that outlined how the congregation should vote. Also the group donated some $60,000 to support an Oregon measure banning same-sex marriages. Many analysts credited FOTFA for Bush's reelection, the placement of congressmen opposed to same-sex marriage, and the ousting of Democratic Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, who had previously blocked a vote on an amendment prohibiting gay marriage.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When the Gill Foundation awarded DDB its advertising work, it presented the ad agency with research. One study showed that more than 80 percent of Americans believed that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation should not be tolerated in the workplace. Making this statistic its starting point, DDB, in collaboration with director Doug Pray of the production company Oil Factory, filmed minidocumentaries to expose work-related discrimination. According to Gutierrez, ''TurnOut'' had been originally slated for early 2004, but after San Francisco's mayor stirred up media attention by issuing marriage certificates to same-sex couples in February, DDB and the Gill Foundation delayed the launch. The foundation feared that the political climate had become too volatile for ''TurnOut,'' the intent of which was to encourage a more cerebral discussion of LGBT issues.

With the November election approaching and the media fervor about LGBT issues showing no sign of abating, the Gill Foundation finally aired the first ''TurnOut'' television spots on July 5, 2004. The minidocumentaries appeared on TV in states that allowed employees no legal recourse if they were discriminated against because of their sexual orientation. Modeling the campaign after past civil-rights cases, DDB wanted to portray real people coming out in the face of opposition. Finding volunteers to do it was difficult but necessary, according to Pray, who filmed the spots. Gutierrez told Advertising Age's Creativity, ''In our concepting phase, we realized there's probably no moment in the Civil Rights era that better illuminated white folks than the Rosa Parks bus incident. Her small act of courage served as a great national commercial for civil rights.''

Detroit native Herrera came out by setting a picture of her girlfriend on her work desk. Calhoun, another subject for ''TurnOut,'' sent a note that explained to his bosses that he was gay and about to be in a commercial. The six television spots then directed viewers to http://www.TurnOut.org to read about the outcomes of the employees' actions. All six employees received a range of responses. Kimya Ayodele was fired after she came out. According to the Denver Post, her tires were also slashed, and coworkers verbally abused her after she dated someone from work. Herrera had a different experience. ''More people would come up and talk to me,'' she told the Denver Post. ''Everyone is more helpful. It's more like a team now. I don't feel like the outside person.''

Once people visited http://www.TurnOut.org, they were exposed to a wider range of issues regarding LGBT rights. One bullet read, ''Did you know . . . Forty-six states have failed to enact laws that address crimes motivated by prejudice against gender identity?'' Other campaign efforts involved sending voter-mobilization tool kits to more than 250 organizations with a collective audience of 4 million voters. Three different print ads appeared, featuring copy such as, ''For gays and lesbians, America is 14 states that recognize our right to live free from job discrimination, and 36 states that don't.'' The campaign's website went offline after the election.

OUTCOME

Making its mark in the ad industry, the campaign in 2004 snagged a Clio Award in the Integrated Campaign category. At the 51st Annual Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival, the ''TurnOut'' television spots won 5 of the 89 available awards. According to postcampaign surveys, unaided awareness for "TurnOut" increased more than 50 percent with exposed populations—meaning that most people who saw the spots remembered them. Data also showed that individuals exposed to the campaign were more receptive to discussing LGBT rights, one of the campaign's main objectives. Nadine Smith, executive director for the advocacy group Equality Florida, told Business Wire, "Encouraging greater civic involvement around LGBT issues is critical for any positive, lasting change to occur."

Election results in 2004 were more daunting. Many candidates who supported LGBT rights were replaced by conservatives who did not. Nonetheless DDB and the Gill Foundation felt that the campaign was a success in that it educated its audience and encouraged wider public participation in LGBT issues, two achievements that were necessary for the expansion of civil rights.

FURTHER READING

Beller, Gerald. "GOP Tapped Growing Christian Fervor." Charleston (WV) Gazette, November 22, 2004, p. P5A.

Champagne, Christine. "DDB Seattle Creates Uplifting HIV/AIDS Awareness Ad." Shoot, February 6, 2004, p. 12.

Dwyer, Kelly Pate. "Going inside the Decision to Come Out: Four Featured in Ads about Gays in the Workplace Share Their Experiences." Denver Post, August 13, 2004, p. C1.

Gorski, Eric. "Dobson Shifts Power to Focus on the Politics." Denver Post, November 14, 2004, p. A1.

Gutierrez, Eric. "On the Issue of Selling Issues." Advertising Age's Creativity, April 1, 2004, p. 6.

Herel, Suzanne. "Newsom's First Veto Upheld by Board." San Francisco Chronicle, March 31, 2004, p. B4.

Ives, Nat. "To Get Their Messages Across, More and More Nonprofit Organizations Are Going Commercial." New York Times, February 20, 2004, p. 4.

Kirkpatrick, David. "Rally against Gay Marriage Draws Thousands to Capital." New York Times, October 16, 2004, p. 12.

Knight, Heather. "Wong to Resign as Director of Port of S.F." San Francisco Chronicle, April 1, 2004, p. B4.

Mack, Ann M., and Eleftheria Parpis. "Jurors Take 'Fun' Route to Grand Prix." Adweek, June 28, 2004, p. 6.

Miller, Robert. "Junior League Ball Is 'Hot' Stuff." Dallas Morning News, January 27, 1994, p. 3D.

Olvera, Javier Erik. "Girding the Gay Vote: Collaborative Effort Under Way to Elect Friendly Candidates." Rocky Mountain News, July 5, 2004, p. 12A.

Weinkopf, Chris. "Different Renegades, Different Media Portraits." American Enterprise, April 1, 2004, p. 51.

Kevin Teague

GlaxoSmithKline plc

980 Great West Rd.
Brentford, Middlesex TW8 9GS
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 20 80475000
Fax: 44 20 80477807
Web site: www.gsk.com

■■■

POWER TO QUIT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, SmithKline Beecham merged with Glaxo to form GlaxoSmithKline plc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

NicoDerm CQ, a sticky patch that adhered to the skin and delivered a steady flow of nicotine to help ease the physical withdrawal symptoms associated with quitting smoking, was introduced by its manufacturer, the pharmaceutical company SmithKline Beecham, as a prescription drug in 1991. The product was a success, climbing to the top of the prescription smoking-cessation market and winning a prestigious R&D 100 Award for 1992. By the mid-1990s, however, NicoDerm's sales had flattened, and SmithKline decided that the product's future lay in the over-the-counter drug market. The company received approval from the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in mid-1996 to sell NicoDerm as an over-the-counter medication rather than by prescription only. Hoping to attract the broad base of American smokers who had either been unsuccessful in prior attempts to quit smoking or who were contemplating quitting for the first time, SmithKline hired the advertising agency Jordan, McGrath, Case, Taylor, New York to design its initial advertising blitz. The pharmaceutical company dedicated $35 million to advertise NicoDerm and in August 1996 launched a multimedia campaign featuring a barrage of print, radio, and television spots.

The campaign pitted NicoDerm most directly against its main competitor—Johnson & Johnson subsidiary McNeil Consumer Products Company's Nicotrol, another transdermal nicotine replacement product. Both products vied for the vast market of smokers of either gender between the ages of 25 and 64. The two companies vigorously sought to win over consumers. SmithKline's NicoDerm campaign consisted of two kinds of advertisements, one that focused on NicoDerm's effectiveness and the other that favorably compared its product to Nicotrol. For example, the commercial "Morning Break" relates the fate of two office workers who both recently quit smoking. One used NicoDerm while the other tried to give up the habit "cold turkey." The man who used the patch remains calm and collected, but his co-worker suffers from constant cravings, nervousness, and an inability to concentrate. Another spot, "Pharmacy," shows NicoDerm spokesperson, Carolyn McCormick, explaining the differences between NicoDerm and Nicotrol. Because NicoDerm supplied three different dosages of nicotine patches and Nicotrol only one, she emphasizes that NicoDerm is the better product because it allows smokers to taper. Testimonial ads—which featured personal accounts of how NicoDerm had eased the difficulties in quitting smoking—were often used as well. All of the ads bore the same tag line, "The power to quit, the power to comfort, the power to quit successfully," and were careful not to understate the difficulty of quitting. Instead, they emphasized that with NicoDerm it was possible to do so.

The campaign was a resounding success. Marketing surveys discovered that consumers considered the ads highly effective. Backed by its ubiquitous commercials, NicoDerm quickly assumed a dominant position in the over-the-counter smoking-cessation aid market. By 1998 the product's power had nearly forced Nicotrol to abandon the field. McNeil severely curtailed Nicotrol's advertising budget and chose to refocus its promotional efforts on a new antismoking nasal spray available only with a prescription. SmithKline, on the other hand, intended to continue its broad-based advertising campaign in order to protect NicoDerm's position in the field against encroachment by other antismoking products.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1991 SmithKline Beecham released its prescription-only nicotine patch, which was designed to be attached—rather like an adhesive bandage—to the skin of a person attempting to quit smoking. NicoDerm delivered a steady flow of nicotine, the highly addictive substance in tobacco, transdermally so that the ex-smoker did not experience the uncomfortable symptoms of nicotine withdrawal. The product came in three dosages: 21, 14, and 7 milligram patches. Heavy smokers began using the 21 milligram patch and, through the full ten weeks of the "three step" NicoDerm program, progressively decreased their dosage of nicotine until they were not only smoke-free but also patch-free. Those who smoked less could begin the regime with the 14 milligram or 7 milligram patch. Although early sales for this prescription program were strong, demand for the patch tapered off by the mid-1990s, and its revenues plateaued. NicoDerm was, however, the clear leader in this sector of the prescription drug market.

In a major policy shift the FDA decided to approve nicotine replacement products for over-the-counter use in 1996. NicoDerm was the second patch to become available after this development, following McNeil Consumer Products' Nicotrol. SmithKline's own Nicorette, a nicotine-laced chewing gum that served the same end as the transdermal patches, also hit the over-the-counter market before NicoDerm. Although its chief competitor, Nicotrol, became available to consumers first, NicoDerm had the advantage of having controlled nearly 40 percent of the prescription market.

Analysts expected nicotine replacement therapies to sell well over the counter. "Once you eliminate the need to visit a doctor, sales will increase dramatically," George Quesnelle, a SmithKline Beecham marketing executive, told the September 13, 1996, edition of USA Today. "The ability to walk into the local pharmacy and buy these products will make a world of difference." Still, experts concurred that advertising would play a substantial role in determining which of the nicotine patch brands would win over smokers.

TARGET MARKET

NicoDerm's big-budget campaign had a wide audience to reach. Of the 48 million American smokers, nearly 16 million tried to give up smoking each year. According to Brandweek, NicoDerm's ads especially targeted those smokers aged 25 to 64. Not all who tried NicoDerm were first-time quitters. The Centers for Disease Control declared that only 2 million of the 16 million people who attempted to kick the habit each year actually succeeded. Moreover, nearly a quarter of those who did had made up to five attempts at quitting. "The consumer has to have made a very important decision about his own health and welfare before he ever considers this kind of product," a marketing analyst told USA Today.

Appealing to this target market could be a delicate task at times. Instead of creating slick ads that downplayed the enormity of the challenge facing the soon to be ex-smoker, Jordan, McGrath focused on relating to the concerns of its desired audience. Joe Martin, a senior brand equity manager for NicoDerm CQ, told the March 31, 1997, edition of USA Today that the ads wanted to reassure consumers that "it is difficult to quit smoking." The commercials and print ads never trivialized the symptoms such as anxiety, restlessness, and withdrawal that might have been experienced by NicoDerm's potential users during past attempts at quitting smoking.

The campaign also strove to appeal to its target market by not being pejorative. Smokers had come to inhabit a world that increasingly condemned their habit. Not only were most smokers fully aware of the negative health risks associated with the vice, they were also constantly reminded of these by their doctors, spouses, co-workers, newspaper articles, and the antismoking commercials funded by some states. Jordan, McGrath realized that harping on this theme would not boost NicoDerm's sales. "We aren't here to preach the horrors of smoking; we're here to advertise a product that is available to smokers once they've convinced themselves it's time to quit," Ilon Specht of Jordan, McGrath told USA Today.

Although the ads did not seek to impress the viewer like some of the more flashy campaigns for athletic shoes or cars, they did try to capture a certain earnestness in an attempt to win the trust of their audience. "A key

OFF TO THE RACES

In possibly its most creative effort to reach its smoking audience, NicoDerm sponsored a car at the 1997 Marlboro 500 auto race at the California Speedway. This marked the first time a smoking-cessation product had sought to enter the heavily cigarette-sponsored auto world. Danny Vitolo, the driver of the NicoDerm car, thought that the connection was logical. "[Quitting smoking] takes a commitment," he told the September 25, 1997, edition of Florida Today. "It's very similar to racing. In racing, you must be very committed and determined." As part of the promotion SmithKline also promised to donate $500 to the American Cancer Society for each member of Championship Auto Racing Teams who quit smoking.

motivating factor is for consumers to feel comfortable purchasing a product without a doctor's prescription or advice," said Don Stuart of the marketing-consulting firm Cannondale Associates. The ads did need to motivate viewers, though. Since so many people had unsuccessfully attempted to stop smoking in the past, the NicoDerm spots explicitly stated that their product, and theirs alone, could help end an ongoing struggle to become tobacco-free. Jordan, McGrath's testimonial ads were designed to serve this purpose. The message conveyed in these was: "If I could do it, so can you."

COMPETITION

The smoking-cessation aid market exploded after NicoDerm and Nicotrol began being sold over the counter in 1996. Total revenues for the industry in 1997 reached nearly $650 million, more than double the previous year's volume. Analysts believed this expansion would continue. "I still see growth in the [smoking-cessation aid] category," Barbara Kuhn, a buyer for a major drug-store chain, told the October 6, 1997, edition of Drug Store News. "I don't think it's peaked yet, with more companies going to non-smoking policies and more public places being restricted." On the strength of its 40 percent share of the prescription drug market at the time of its shift to over-the-counter status, coupled with a $50 million advertising blitz, NicoDerm surged to a commanding lead in the field. Its 1996 sales were more than $134 million, as compared to $52 million for its most direct competitor, Nicotrol.

Nicotrol, however, had no intention of remaining in second place and decided that advertising was its key to success. McNeil Consumer Products unleashed a full-scale advertising barrage on behalf of its brand, spending more than $53 million between March 1996 and March 1997 alone. Nicotrol was promoted via print, radio, and television spots, coupon offers, and brochures sent directly to doctors. The company bought air-time for commercials on such highly rated network television shows as ER. Some of these ads featured celebrities such as actress Patricia Kalember, who had appeared in the television shows Sisters and thirtysomething. Others were "reality-based" spots that tracked the progress of three Ann Arbor, Michigan, residents as they used Nicotrol to help themselves quit smoking. These testimonial commercials in particular proved to be quite popular with consumers. "We discovered that the best way to reach smokers who are ready to quit is to have other smokers talk to them," McNeil Consumer Products spokesman Ron Schmid told The Detroit News.

Although Nicotrol was the only other transdermal patch available over the counter, NicoDerm faced competition from prescription smoking-cessation aids as well. In June 1997 pharmaceutical titan Glaxo Wellcome introduced an oral tablet designed to curb smokers' cravings for nicotine. It supported this new product, called Zyban, with a strong direct-to-consumer marketing campaign. Novaritis's Habitrol, which did not make the shift from prescription to over-the-counter status with NicoDerm and Nicotrol, remained a market player as well. Although its sales were relatively small compared to NicoDerm, the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus (NAD) noted that the prescription/over-the-counter distinction "does not remove competition between [NicoDerm and Habitrol] or reduce Habitrol to bit player status." Johnson & Johnson was also developing an antismoking nasal spray. The increased competition had an impact on NicoDerm's share of the market. By the second quarter of 1998 NicoDerm's sales had dropped 18 percent, although sales of Nicorette, SmithKline Beecham's nicotine gum, continued to rise. SmithKline's NicoDerm, though, still enjoyed a substantial lead over its rivals.

The battle between the manufacturers of these smoking-cessation aids was heated. McNeil Consumer Products and Novaritis both filed complaints with the NAD, which served as a watchdog agency monitoring the accuracy of consumer advertising; the companies alleged that SmithKline Beecham had made misrepresentations in its advertising for NicoDerm. SmithKline filed two complaints against Nicotrol as well. The NAD sustained both of the complaints against NicoDerm and admonished SmithKline to alter some of its ads. It rejected one of the complaints against McNeil Consumer Products but sustained the other, mandating changes in ad copy. SmithKline and McNeil also went to court over one of these disputes, eventually reaching a confidential settlement on the matter.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Because its target market—adult smokers between the ages of 25 and 64—was so broad, NicoDerm employed a range of strategies to appeal to its potential customers. It ran ads directed at narrow segments of the market, such as smoking couples who were thinking about having children. One commercial featured a young couple using NicoDerm to stop smoking before trying to get pregnant in order to have a healthier baby. SmithKline also secured an exclusive sponsorship deal with the American Cancer Society (ACS) in August 1996. In return for payments of at least $1 million per year in sales royalties over the three years of the arrangement, the ACS permitted NicoDerm packages to be emblazoned with the society's logo as well as with a reference to the partnership between NicoDerm and the ACS for promoting the cessation of smoking.

The company also sought to increase NicoDerm's sales through its association with special television programming. NicoDerm was a primary sponsor of New Year's-themed programming on the TBS, Nickelodeon, and Family Channel cable networks that ran on and around New Year's Eve 1997. For example, NicoDerm's sponsorship earned it very visible signs on stage during "Comedy Cure II," a movie marathon on the TBS channel hosted by comedian Rodney Dangerfield. Whenever Dangerfield or other comedians performed, NicoDerm's logo was prominently displayed. In addition, the product received further billing during the course of interviews with passers-by about their new year's resolutions. As NicoDerm's media manager Nancy Louvre explained to the December 16, 1996, edition of Adweek, "It made sense for us to partner with programming that would showcase our product. This is our most critical time of the year, and we're very heavy in both TV and print ads with a New Year's resolution theme."

Creating effective advertising was a challenge, however. A writer in USA Today remarked on September 13, 1996: "Glitzy ad campaigns, attractive coupon offers, scare tactics, and other tried-and-true marketing tactics that help sell other over-the-counter medications may not work with heavy smokers." SmithKline decided that emphasis on a simple, straight-forward message was the best way to promote the product. "Smokers know the problem with smoking," said George Quesnelle, a vice-president of medical marketing and sales for SmithKline Beecham's consumer-health unit, in the May 22, 1996, edition of The Wall Street Journal Europe. "You might say they've been beaten over the head by it. What they need to know is that [quitting] is possible."

Building on this message, Jordan, McGrath devised two classes of ads to increase NicoDerm's sales. The first, termed "equity ads," strove to strengthen the cachet of the NicoDerm brand, stressing that NicoDerm was a product capable of helping even the most addicted smoker break the habit. The second type of ad, dubbed "competitive ads," focused on distinguishing NicoDerm most directly from Nicotrol but also from its other competitors. It was these ads, with their specific claims about NicoDerm in contrast to other smoking-cessation products, that gave rise to the complaints that Nicotrol and Novaritis filed with the NAD. While NicoDerm was forced to alter particular statements in two of its ads in response, it continued to employ "competitive ads" as a way of defending and increasing its share of the market.

NicoDerm employed a saturation strategy for these ads across television, radio, and print media. On television NicoDerm sought to reach all segments of its target market. It advertised on soap operas and other daytime shows, early morning programming such as the Today show, late night chat shows, and even syndicated and cable television broadcasts. Although SmithKline did make the occasional ad-purchase on prime-time shows, the company felt that the cost of such slots generally outweighed the benefits they brought in return.

NicoDerm ads also ran frequently on an assortment of radio broadcasts. SmithKline liked radio spots because they were comparatively inexpensive, allowing the company to bombard listeners with information about NicoDerm. Additionally, SmithKline advertised heavily in large-circulation magazines, such as Life, Better Homes and Gardens, Sports Illustrated, Readers Digest, and U.S. News & World Report. The company's goal for this multimedia approach was to reach the maximum possible number of consumers.

OUTCOME

NicoDerm's advertising campaign was a tremendous success. Despite the handicap of coming onto the over-the-counter market a month after its closest competitor, NicoDerm was backed by SmithKline's marketing muscle and quickly established itself as the leading brand in the field. It continually refused to relinquish this position, even as other smoking-cessation aids came on the market or strove to challenge its supremacy. By mid-1998, in fact, Nicotrol had effectively ceded the patch field to NicoDerm. A health-care marketing consultant told the June 8, 1998, edition of Advertising Age: "There comes a time when you're spending more than you're selling, and you cut your losses." McNeil slashed its advertising budget for Nicotrol and shifted its focus to promoting a new antismoking inhaler available only by prescription. But NicoDerm's drop in sales volume through the early part of 1998, coupled with the $15 million McNeil planned to spend advertising its new product, as well as Glaxo's heavy spending on Zyban—$20 million in the fourth quarter of 1997 alone—indicated that NicoDerm would need to continue to fight to maintain its primacy in the field.

Although the ads promoting NicoDerm were not particularly innovative or cutting edge, surveys demonstrated their value. USA Today 's "Ad Track" poll on advertising success reported that only 14 percent of consumers gave NicoDerm's ads high popularity marks. But more then 20 percent of the people exposed to NicoDerm commercials said the ads were effective, an impressive response level for the industry. Buoyed by feedback such as this, SmithKline planned to continue its multimedia campaign in order to support and expand NicoDerm's share of the smoking-cessation aid market.

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. "NicoDerm CQ Smokes Competition in Sales." USA Today, March 31, 1997.

———. "Targeting Quitters: Cashing in on Kicking a Habit." USA Today, September 13, 1996.

Hwang, Suein L. "U.S. TV Ads by Drug Firms Promote Quitting Smoking." Wall Street Journal Europe, May 22, 1996.

"Indy-Car Driver to Deliver Anti-Smoking Message." Florida Today, September 25, 1997.

Kulpa, Jennifer. "Family Planners Could be Untapped Market for Smoking Cessation Products." Drug Store News, October 6, 1997.

Matzer, Maria. "NicoDerm Puts Stamp across New Year's TV to Net Resolvers." Brandweek, December 16, 1996.

"SmithKline NicoDerm CQ 'Only' Three-Step System Claims to be Modified." The Tan Sheet, January 19, 1998.

Wilke, Michael. "McNeil Counters Nicotrol's Sales Slide with RX Extension." Advertising Age, June 8, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

SOCIAL ANXIETY DISORDER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1999 Paxil, manufactured by SmithKline Beecham (now GlaxoSmithKline plc), was third among the pharmaceutical industry's best-selling SSRIs, a class of drugs then used primarily to treat depression and anxiety-related maladies. The drugmaker's strategy for gaining ground on rivals Prozac and Zoloft included extending Paxil's market by winning approval by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) to treat other forms of mental illness. When, in May of that year, the FDA made Paxil its only approved treatment for social anxiety disorder, the drug finally found itself in a position, after seven years on the market, to outsell its rivals. Social anxiety disorder was a little-known condition at the time, but estimates by SmithKline Beecham put the number of potential Paxil customers in the United States at close to 10 million. Enlisting the public relations firm Cohn & Wolfe as well as Paxil's advertising agency of record, McCann Erickson Consumer Health, SmithKline Beecham mounted a combined physician, PR, and direct-to-consumer branded campaign that was meant to inform Americans about social anxiety disorder and to let them know that Paxil alone had been approved to treat it.

Immediately after learning of the FDA ruling, SmithKline Beecham increased its spending on physician-targeted ads to get the word out about the new Paxil designation. Meanwhile, the drugmaker funded a public-service campaign meant to spread awareness of social anxiety disorder. Then, in September 1999, a $30 million push of the Paxil brand began its run on television and in magazines with national circulations. SmithKline Beecham focused its message about social anxiety disorder on professionals between the ages of 18 and 34, with an emphasis on men, who were believed more likely to seek help for the condition because of career concerns.

The PR campaign resulted in more than a billion media references to social anxiety disorder, up from roughly 50 in previous years, almost all of which mentioned that Paxil was the only approved treatment for the condition. Seven months after its launch, the campaign had made the Paxil brand name one of the most recognized prescription drugs in the United States, and the drug was responsible for a sizeable increase in the anxiety medication category. Paxil gained on its SSRI rivals and experienced sustained sales growth, a trend that continued as the drug won further treatment designations, and the company adapted its marketing accordingly in the following years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1987 Eli Lilly and Company won U.S. approval to sell Prozac, the first among a class of drugs called selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs) that treated clinical depression by elevating levels of serotonin—a chemical believed crucial to regulating mood—in the brain. Prozac's effectiveness and lack of side effects compared to existing medications for depression revolutionized not only the way mental illness was treated by psychiatrists but also the way it was perceived by the public. By 1992, when Pfizer and SmithKline Beecham introduced their own SSRIs, Zoloft and Paxil, respectively, depression had lost much of its stigma in the United States. In the following years SSRIs became one of the best-selling prescription drug categories.

For its first several years on the market, Paxil remained in third place among SSRIs, and SmithKline Beecham set its sights on new markets for the drug. In the mid-1990s Paxil won FDA approval for the treatment of anxiety-related conditions like panic disorder and obsessive-compulsive disorder. Though these markets led to substantial growth for the brand, it was the FDA's approval of Paxil in 1999 as a treatment for a little-known condition called social anxiety disorder that gave the drug its first significant advantage over competitors. Social anxiety disorder, or debilitating shyness, was a condition that, according to SmithKline Beecham, affected as many as 10 million Americans, and Paxil was the only FDA-approved treatment.

SmithKline Beecham was aided in its attempt to reach this untapped market by an easing of FDA regulations in 1997 that governed the advertising of prescription drugs. The policy shift almost immediately changed the nature of the advertising of prescription drugs, as pharmaceutical companies, which traditionally had focused on physicians and other medical professionals in their marketing efforts, began to rely on advertising their products directly to consumers, much as was done with other consumer goods. Though restrictions remained regarding the disclosure of side effects and though the FDA retained a role in approving advertisements, direct-to-consumer pharmaceutical marketing quickly became ubiquitous in the United States, increasingly putting patients rather than their doctors in the position of deciding which drugs might best satisfy their needs.

TARGET MARKET

The social anxiety disorder campaign targeted professionals aged 18–34 who, despite appearing normal, experienced overwhelming fear in social or work-related situations. SmithKline Beecham estimated that the total number of people suffering from the condition in the United States numbered 10 million, and the company believed that only 5 percent of these people were being treated. The company thus set out to define social anxiety disorder for an enormous untapped market, to let people know that they were not alone in their suffering, and to urge people to seek out Paxil, the only available FDA-approved treatment. As the Paxil product director, Barry Brand, told Advertising Age, "Every marketer's dream is to find an unidentified or unknown market and develop it. That's what we were able to do with social anxiety disorder."

The National Institute of Mental Health, however, placed the number of sufferers from social anxiety disorder at around 5 million. This discrepancy pointed to a controversy surrounding the subjectivity of diagnosis and, by extension, SmithKline Beecham's marketing of Paxil. While SmithKline Beecham argued that it was catering to an overwhelming need and helping relieve previously untreated suffering, critics believed that the drugmaker was artificially creating a market for Paxil by encouraging the merely shy to diagnose themselves with the more debilitating form of social phobia.

It was estimated that twice as many women suffered from social anxiety disorder as men, but in a departure from conventional wisdom men appeared more likely to seek treatment for the condition. In most medical matters men were less likely to seek treatment, but as McCann Erickson's Nan Dillon told Advertising Age, "This tends to be the exception because social anxiety disorder can actually damage a man's career."

COMPETITION

When the Paxil social anxiety campaign was launched, Prozac was the SSRI market leader and Eli Lilly's biggest earner, with annual sales approaching $3 billion. In the summer of 1999 a Prozac campaign narrowly preceded Paxil's social anxiety disorder ads to become the first-ever TV marketing of a psychiatric drug. The centerpiece of the Prozac campaign was a 30-minute infomercial that aired on local and cable networks late at night and on weekends, when people with untreated depression were believed likely to be watching. The infomercial featured a mostly female cast of Prozac users giving testimonials, as well as imagery of presumably depressed people and informational segments with doctors talking about depression and its treatment. Mental health experts were divided on the question of whether it was appropriate to pitch Prozac under the cover of public-service programming. The company supported the infomercial with 30-second TV spots offering a toll-free number to call for more information.

Paxil's other major competitor in the SSRI market, Pfizer's Zoloft, whose 1999 sales were estimated at $2 billion, had not yet used direct-to-consumer advertising. In early 2000, however, Pfizer initiated an account review with the intention of moving the duties for Zoloft advertising away from health care specialists Lyons Lavey Nickel Swift to a general-market agency. Deutsch Inc. won the review and began preparing a Zoloft direct-to-consumer message. Having already won approval for treatment of post-traumatic stress disorder, Zoloft was well positioned to benefit from the dramatic increase in SSRI prescriptions following the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001.

PUBLIC SERVICE?

In the years before and after the social anxiety disorder campaign, blurring the line between public service and marketing became a staple of the prescription drug business, and the practice went well beyond the framework of traditional advertising. As the Wall Street Journal reported in 2001, with the rise of prescription drug branding, it became increasingly common for drug companies to pay celebrities to mention their products on television, as though for altruistic or personal reasons. Singer Donny Osmond, for instance, credited Paxil with curing his social anxiety disorder. Former Olympic gymnast Bart Conner touted Celebrex's salutary effects on his osteoarthritis, while his near contemporaries Bruce Jenner and Dorothy Hamill were hired to talk about their use of Vioxx to treat their own painful joints.

The stories of celebrity triumphs over illness often were picked up by news outlets that were not aware they were covering paid endorsements for drugs. As with other drug marketing that offered itself as a public service, many health care professionals frowned on the dishonesty of the practice, while others defended celebrity plugs as a useful technique for spreading a message of relief to millions of suffering people.

In late 1999 Bristol-Myers Squibb Company launched a direct-to-consumer campaign supporting BuSpar. One of only two drugs approved to treat generalized anxiety disorder at the time, BuSpar was also used to treat depression. Unlike its competitors among psychiatric drugs, BuSpar was not associated with such side effects as drowsiness and loss of libido. The BuSpar campaign targeted women via magazines like Good Housekeeping and People and, using an image of a cartoon female with symptoms of anxiety, on broadcast and cable TV.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Soon after the FDA decision in May 1999 allowing Paxil to be marketed as a treatment for social anxiety disorder, SmithKline Beecham increased its spending on physician-targeted ads by $1 million, according to Medical Marketing and Media. The company changed the copy in medical journals from "Paxil means peace . . . in depression, panic disorder, and OCD" to "Show them they can . . . the first and only approved treatment for social anxiety disorder."

Meanwhile, SmithKline Beecham funded an informational and public relations campaign to spread awareness about social anxiety disorder. Sponsored by a trio of advocacy organizations—the American Psychiatry Association, the Anxiety Disorders Association of America, and Freedom From Fear—the campaign was orchestrated by the New York PR firm Cohn & Wolfe and was designed, according to PR News, "to educate reporters, consumers, and, in some cases, physicians, in an effort to encourage diagnosis and treatment." Featuring posters placed at bus stops across the country and the tagline "Imagine being allergic to people," the PR campaign did not explicitly mention Paxil or SmithKline Beecham. Likewise, Cohn & Wolfe technically represented the nonprofit organizations and the doctors involved, even though SmithKline Beecham paid for the campaign. Virtually all of the sizeable media coverage Cohn & Wolfe generated mentioned not just the Paxil name but also the fact that it was the only FDA-approved treatment for the condition.

In September 1999 SmithKline Beecham launched its first Paxil direct-to-consumer ads, a TV and print campaign crafted by McCann Erickson Consumer Health and with an estimated cost of $30 million. Like the public relations efforts, the branded advertising was intended to define the condition for potential Paxil users and to give afflicted Americans comfort by sending the message that they were not alone. This portion of the campaign also sought more directly to raise awareness of the Paxil name.

In an attempt to reach its core target of 18- to 34-year-old professionals, SmithKline Beecham bought airtime on prime-time shows like Ally McBeal and ran the print ads in magazines that included Rolling Stone and Sports Illustrated. Both the television spots and the print ads used the tagline "Your life is waiting," and they directed consumers to ask themselves whether they experienced anxiety that made them avoid social interaction, that resembled a panic attack, or that was detrimental to their social or professional life. The 60-second TV spot informed viewers that more than 10 million Americans suffered from social anxiety disorder and that sufferers were a mix of male and female professionals engaged in productive office and social activities. In keeping with the belief that men were more likely to seek treatment for social anxiety disorder, the print ads primarily targeted male professionals, with the primary image being a distraught man in business clothes.

OUTCOME

PR News reported that, as a result of the campaign to advertise social anxiety disorder, media references to the condition climbed to more than 1 billion articles, up from 50 in 1997 and 1998, with 96 percent conveying the information that Paxil was the only FDA-approved treatment then available. After the campaign had been running for seven months, according to Medical Marketing and Media, Paxil scored third among advertised prescription drugs in unaided recall, behind Viagra and Claritin. Paxil's market share among anxiety drugs from December 1998 to May 1999, the months immediately preceding the campaign, was 9.3 percent of 6.7 million prescriptions. From June to October 1999, as the campaign ran, Paxil's market share not only grew to 11.5 percent but was responsible for half of the increase in the entire market, which grew to 7.2 million prescriptions.

In 2000 British rival Glaxo Wellcome merged with SmithKline Beecham. In its 2000 annual report the new entity, GlaxoSmithKline, claimed that Paxil "became number one in the U.S. selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor market for new retail prescriptions in 2000." In 2001 GlaxoSmithKline won FDA approval to market Paxil for both generalized anxiety disorder and post-traumatic stress disorder. Paxil continued to outpace its rivals in sales growth. The terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001, resulted in a dramatic increase in prescriptions for all antidepressants and anxiety drugs. During this time Paxil's advertising positioned it as an answer to the uncontrollable feelings of fear and helplessness that many people felt in the aftermath of the attacks.

FURTHER READING

Andelman, David. "Misleading or Not, Ads Boost Drug Makers' Earnings but Raise Cost to Consumer." New York Daily News, February 12, 2001.

"Drug Makers Pay Sick Celebrities to Gain News Play." Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2001.

"Experts Saddened by Medication Infomercial." Marketing News, June 7, 1999.

Goetzl, David. "Anxiety Level on the Rise with High-Profile DTC Ads." Advertising Age, December 20, 1999.

———. "Paxil." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

———. "Paxil Anxious to Get Message Out." Advertising Age, September 27, 1999.

Hawkins, Beth. "Paxil Is Forever." City Pages, October 16, 2002.

Koerner, Brendan. "Coming to You Direct." U.S. News & World Report, June 21, 1999.

Liebman, Milton. "Head-to-Head Marketing . . . May the Best-Promoted Drug Win." Medical Marketing and Media, November 2000.

McMain, Andrew. "Pfizer Places Zoloft's $50 Mil. Biz in Review." Adweek, January 31, 2000.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Fear Factor." Adweek, November 12, 2001.

"Patient Testimonials Reintroduce an Old Drug in a New Market." PR News, May 15, 2000.

Vedantam, Shankar. "Drug Ads Hyping Anxiety Make Some Uneasy." Washington Post, July 16, 2001.

Mark Lane

Global Gillette

Prudential Tower Bldg.
Boston, Massachusetts 02199
USA
Telephone: (617) 421-7000
Fax: (617) 421-7123
Web site: www.gillette.com

■■■

ANYTHING ELSE WOULD BE UNCIVILIZED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Gillette was acquired by Procter & Gamble. Global Gillette now operates as a subsidiary company. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

The Gillette Company enjoyed a position of dominance in men's toiletries, a broad category that included not only deodorants and antiperspirants but also such items as pre- and aftershave products. Deodorants and antiperspirants, however, remained the largest product categories in toiletries, with Gillette's Right Guard brand among the leaders. Gillette had attained its leadership in the market through a combination of new product development, technological innovation, and an expanding global presence.

By the mid-1990s marketers of deodorants and antiperspirants were no longer emphasizing protection against odor but rather various aesthetic factors. New developments included products that were clear and that left no residue on clothing as well as protectants that were formulated to glide on easily. This new approach in product development and marketing came at a time when sales of antiperspirants and deodorants had begun to stagnate, a sign that the market was saturated.

With the advent of clear gels and sticks, however, the market began growing again. Not unexpectedly, industry leader Gillette was in the forefront of the growth. Seeking continuity in its marketing, it rolled out its clear stick and clear gel products under the banner of its long-running "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, using famous athletes in unlikely situations to promote the new items. Although response to the campaign was mixed, Gillette was able to maintain and even improve upon its market share.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For almost a century Gillette had been the worldwide leader in products for male grooming, a category originally comprising blades, razors, and other shaving accoutrements. But toiletries for men came to form only a portion of the company's vast global sales. Gillette also achieved a dominant market position in writing implements, correction products, and toothbrushes and oral care appliances. Relying on its traditional strengths of research and development, advertising, and geographic expansion, the company managed to continue to sustain its growth.

Founded in Boston in 1901 by King C. Gillette, the company introduced the world's first safety razor two years later. A patent for the device followed in 1904. In 1905 Gillette expanded outside the United States, establishing a sales office in London and a manufacturing operation in Paris. The famous Gillette Blue Blade was introduced in 1932 and an innovative dispenser that eliminated the need to unwrap razor blades after World War II.

Advertisement for Gillette Right Guard Clear Stick deodorant. GILLETTE COMPANY. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Gillette diversified its operations after the war. In 1955 it acquired the Paper Mate Pen Company, an expansion into the area of stationery that it has maintained since. Hoping to secure its grip on the toiletries market, Gillette introduced Right Guard aerosol deodorant in 1960. Brisk sales of the deodorant, along with innovations in shaving products, pushed annual Gillette sales past the $1 billion mark for the first time in 1973. In the 1980s Gillette continued to expand by acquiring Liquid Paper Corp., a maker of correction products, and Oral-B Laboratories, a toothbrush manufacturer. But the company had to fend off numerous hostile takeover bids, and it embarked on a dramatic restructuring program in order to increase profitability. In 1990 the company introduced the Sensor shaving system in 16 countries.

Since that time Gillette has continued to seek competitive advantage in its three businesses: personal grooming products, stationery products, and small electrical appliances. By 1997 sales exceeded $10 billion. With a workforce of 44,000 in 63 facilities worldwide, the company distributed its products in more than 200 countries and territories around the globe.

By sharing resources among its units to optimize performance, Gillette hoped to nurture sustained sales and profit growth. Its plan was to maintain its market dominance by shrewdly investing in the technologies that were vital to success in each of its core businesses. This strategy informed the 1993 launch of Gillette Series Clear Gel antiperspirant. This product was followed in 1996 by the introduction of clear stick products under the Gillette and Right Guard brand names. The company's stated mission, however, remained unchanged—"to offer consumers products of the highest level of performance for value."

TARGET MARKET

"Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" was first introduced as the tag line in Right Guard ads in 1986. The New York advertising agency NW Ayer & Partners had created the commercials to appeal to sports-loving male consumers. Early spots featured such sports celebrities as the basketball player Charles Barkley, football's Brian Bosworth, baseball player Kirk Gibson, boxer Marvin Hagler, and wrestler Terry "Hulk" Hogan, along with action film star Chuck Norris. The common trait of these celebrity spokesmen was an aggressive nature and tough-guy demeanor.

Basketball player Scottie Pippen in a scene from Gillette Company's "Uncivilized" television commercials. GILLETTE COMPANY. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

With the launch of Right Guard Clear Stick Antiperspirant and Deodorant in 1996, Gillette again turned to NW Ayer to create an appeal to the active male. The agency developed a new print and television ad campaign featuring Scottie Pippen of the National Basketball Association (NBA) champion Chicago Bulls. By placing a highly recognizable sports star in an unfamiliar visual context—in this case on a croquet lawn—the ad team hoped to provide a juxtaposition that would grab the attention of the male sports fans who bought Right Guard.

ATHLETES AS PITCHMEN

The practice of using professional athletes as endorsers is always fraught with peril. Agencies have to be lucky enough to snare an athlete at the top of his or her game and then pray that declining performance or personal controversies do not torpedo a promising campaign. When Converse Sneakers terminated its contract with basketball player Latrell Sprewell for his off-court behavior (trying to strangle his coach), it found itself the object of a lawsuit. The fact that Converse ultimately won its case did not altogether calm nerves at ad agencies across the country.

COMPETITION

By the mid-1990s Gillette had reasons to be concerned about its toiletries business. According to data from Information Resources, sales of deodorants and antiperspirants in food, drug, and mass-merchandising stores fell 1.1 percent in 1996 to $1.4 billion. Among the top five leading brands, only Procter & Gamble's Secret and Colgate-Palmolive's Mennen registered sales gains. The dollar sales of Secret rose 3 percent, while Mennen's sales increased 13.1 percent. According to Mennen's own figures, its Speed Stick grew two to three times faster than its other brands.

The tremendous rise in Speed Stick sales could be explained by three key factors: the introduction of Speed Stick gel in March 1996, improvements to the traditional stick formula that kept cannibalization of existing products to a minimum, and an aggressive marketing program that motivated consumers. Because of the success of Speed Stick, Gillette moved quickly to replicate the formula.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the category of clear antiperspirants, Gillette chose to focus its efforts on promoting its existing line instead of launching a new one. Accordingly, in 1996, when Peter Clay was named vice president for business management of Gillette toiletries, he was given a simple mission—to take the technology already in use on Gillette Series Clear Gel and put it into an antiperspirant stick form. Gillette poured $30 million into research and development on the clear stick.

The first fruit of Clay's mandate was Gillette Series Clear Stick, introduced in the summer of 1996. This was followed later in the year by Right Guard Clear Stick. Together the two products were the first truly clear antiperspirant sticks on the market that did not leave white residue on the body or clothes. "It's an antiperspirant formula that's a challenge because it's hard to get the efficaciousness of a stick without white residue," Clay explained to Advertising Age. To emphasize the difference, Clay decided to make the packaging clear, and, to drive home the distinction even further, he had stickers bearing the legend "No White Residue" placed on every package. Under the aegis of Clay and his staff, NW Ayer created the product's $25 million ad campaign.

For its national ad campaign Gillette commissioned the agency to create a series of television commercials using the slogan "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized." The tag line had been a staple of Right Guard spots since 1986. Industry veteran Stan Schofield was selected to direct the ads, and Scottie Pippen of the NBA champion Chicago Bulls was chosen to appear in the spots as celebrity spokesman. The sports connection was obvious, since many previous Right Guard spots had used superstar athletes. But Gillette had other reasons for choosing Pippen. "We decided to utilize Scottie because he is a driving force on the most powerful team in the NBA and truly embodies the spirit of Right Guard," Carole Johnson, Gillette's vice president for personal care products, told PR Newswire.

To provide humor that would help make the ad memorable, NW Ayer's creative team attired Pippen demurely in an Edwardian cable knit sweater vest and placed him on a croquet lawn. His mouthing of the campaign's tag line thus became the blithe comment of a sophisticate who has finally found a deodorant that will not jeopardize the aesthetics of his leisure ensemble. For Gillette's Johnson, the use of a basketball player was winningly apropos. "On the court, he's a tough competitor and a highly respected player," she told PR Newswire. "Portraying him in an unexpectedly gentle and reserved manner provides a contrast that is both attention-getting and humorous." The first ads of the new campaign began airing in January 1997. The commercials appeared in prime time on broadcast networks and cable television outlets in 15- and 30-second versions. The accompanying print campaign ran in sports and general-interest publications.

In January 1997 the 10-year relationship between Right Guard and NW Ayer & Partners came to an end. Gillette shifted its account, whose value was estimated at $10 million, to New York-based Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising. The new agency now faced the challenge of putting a fresh twist on the "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign. In January 1998, Saatchi & Saatchi debuted its first television commercials. The 15- and 30-second spots were shown during NBC's national telecast of the FedEx Orange Bowl college football game. Retaining the "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" tag line, the new spots again placed a prominent athlete in an unlikely situation, this time Dallas Cowboys running back Emmitt Smith as the master of a team of show dogs.

"When one is competing for the eye of the judges," Smith remarked in the 30-second spot, as he held a pack of bulldogs at bay, "one must keep a firm leash on odor and perspiration." The dogs then performed tricks at Smith's command. The spot ended with Smith accepting a trophy for best of show as he uttered the tag line. The commercials were followed by print ads in sports and general-interest periodicals. Some critics questioned the choice of Smith, a veteran on the downside of his career, as the new spokesman. But Gillette was quick to offer a defense of its new standard bearer. "Emmitt's championship attitude and tenacious style of play mirror the Right Guard image and make him a great candidate for the campaign," said Clay. "He is a driving force on the field and a highly respected player by both teammates and fans; depicting him as reserved and genteel is a contradiction that is entertaining and humorous."

OUTCOME

Despite favorable reaction in the media, the Right Guard "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" ads failed to impress consumers. USA Today's Ad Track measured the popularity and effectiveness of the Pippen commercials in the spring of 1997. A scant 11 percent of respondents who had seen the spots at least three times reported that they liked them a great deal. The Right Guard commercials thus ranked among the least popular campaigns measured by Ad Track in its first two years of polling.

There also were mixed results among demographic groups. Older consumers tended to like the ads, with 19 percent responding very favorably. The spots were clearly targeted at the young, however. But only 14 percent of those polled between the ages of 18 and 24 gave high popularity marks to the ads. Even more vexing for Right Guard's marketers was the lukewarm response of male consumers, the campaign's core market. Only 9 percent of men liked the ads a lot, compared with 14 percent of women.

When Ad Track sought to measure consumer recall, the Right Guard ads elicited more positive responses. More than 60 percent of those surveyed reported that they had seen an "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" ad on more than one occasion. Industry observers credited the campaign's high recall numbers to its effective use of humor.

It remained to be seen whether the Saatchi & Saatchi ads featuring Smith would do anything to improve the poll numbers. The initial critical response to the ads was less than encouraging. At best, Gillette was faulted for bad timing in choosing Smith to do the ads. For the first time in seven seasons the Dallas Cowboys had failed to make the National Football League play-offs, and Smith himself was widely seen as being headed for retirement. "Smith is a likable athlete," said Denise Gellene in the Los Angeles Times, "but for now, at least, he isn't a winner."

Although the deodorant category as a whole was flat in 1997, Gillette, along with other top brands, posted sizable gains. According to Information Resources, sales of Gillette's Right Guard grew 4.9 percent during the year.

FURTHER READING

Alm, Richard. "Advertising Spot No Sweat for Emmitt." Dallas Morning News, January 1, 1998, p. 1D.

Enrico, Dottie. "Searching for Deodorant Ads That Stick." USA Today, April 28, 1998, p. 5B.

Gellene, Denise. "Timing Is Off for Right Guard Spokesman." Los Angeles Times, January 15, 1998, p. D4.

"Gillette Moves Right Guard to Saatchi." Adweek, October 7, 1996, p. 6.

Lefton, Terry. "Pippen Gets Civilized with Gillette." Brandweek, December 2, 1996.

"Marketing in Brief: Right Guard." Rose Sheet, January 5, 1998.

"Scottie Pippen Shoots Croquet for Right Guard." PR Newswire, January 28, 1997.

Robert Schnakenberg

Go Daddy Software, Inc.

14455 N. Hayden Rd., Ste. 219
Scottsdale, Arizona 85260
USA
Telephone: (480) 505-8800
Fax: (480) 505-8844
Web site: www.godaddy.com

■■■

GODADDY.COM SUPER BOWL COMMERCIAL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2004 Go Daddy Software had become a leader in the Internet domain-name registration industry, buying available domain names and then selling them to individuals and businesses for a yearly fee. In 2004 the company embarked on its first national marketing effort, contracting New York agency the Ad Store to help make Go Daddy and the GoDaddy.com website known to mainstream America via a TV spot for Super Bowl XXXIX. That Super Bowl, played on February 6, 2005, was the first since the infamous "wardrobe malfunction" that had resulted in pop singer Janet Jackson's breast being exposed on the air during the previous year's halftime show. Among the results of the public outcry following the incident was increased pressure on Super Bowl advertisers to avoid risqué images and themes. Go Daddy chose to fly in the face of this pressure by running a sexually suggestive commercial that lampooned the prevailing climate of censorship.

With a 30-second Super Bowl spot costing $2.4 million, Go Daddy's decision to advertise twice during the game represented a considerable risk for such an unknown company. Additional production expenses approached $1 million. The spot featured a buxom woman undergoing Congressional questioning in order to gain approval to appear in a commercial for GoDaddy.com. As the woman pointed to the GoDaddy.com logo on the front of her tight tank top, one of the shirt's straps broke, a wardrobe malfunction that was met with camera flashes and shocked exclamations as the woman continued to explain what GoDaddy.com was. The commercial aired as planned during the first quarter of the Super Bowl, but then, apparently because of the protests of a National Football League executive, Fox neglected to run the spot during the second on-air slot that Go Daddy had purchased.

The spot was rated one of the Super Bowl's most memorable, but it was the controversy surrounding the network's refusal to air it a second time that proved to be Go Daddy's true marketing coup. The numerous media stories about Fox's censorship of a commercial about censorship gave Go Daddy nearly $12 million in free publicity. The company continued to run TV spots featuring the tank-top-clad woman, including a spot during Super Bowl XL that made reference to the previous year's commercial.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Bob Parsons sold his first successful company, Parsons Technology, in 1994, and in 1997 he used the proceeds to start a new company, Jomax Technologies. Unsatisfied with the Jomax name, Parsons and his staff came up with the more arresting moniker Go Daddy. As Parsons told Wall Street Transcripts, the name worked "because the domain name GoDaddy.com was available, but we also noticed that when people hear that name, two things happen. First, they smile. Second, they remember it." After an unsuccessful attempt to establish the company as a source for website-building software, Parsons reinvented Go Daddy as a registrar of Internet domain names, buying unused website names and then reselling them to individuals and businesses in need of an online presence. Go Daddy also offered auxiliary services and products enabling customers to launch their sites after the domain-name purchase, including (as in the company's early days) software for building sites. Domain-name registration, however, was a burgeoning industry as America became increasingly wired and more and more businesses found it essential to establish a Web presence. By 2004 Go Daddy had sold nearly seven million domain names and was the world's leading registrar of domain names. Up to that point the company had done little marketing, relying primarily on word-of-mouth buzz and low prices; Go Daddy offered domain names for $8.95, compared with fees of $35 at the industry's high end.

In late 2004 Go Daddy enlisted New York agency the Ad Store for its first sustained offline advertising campaign. The company announced that the campaign would make its TV debut during the 2005 Super Bowl, a move that drew widespread criticism, partly because of the recent history of Super Bowl advertising undertaken by dot-com companies. Dot-com advertising on the Super Bowl had been prevalent in the late 1990s and in the first few years of the new century but had been nearly absent from the game since the bursting of the Internet bubble, leading many industry observers to connect such Super Bowl airtime purchases with the fiscal irresponsibility characteristic of failed dot-coms. Parsons argued that his company was different. As he told Brandweek, "Back in '99 . . . dot-coms raised money on ideas that weren't viable. But we are the leader in our industry and actually do make money."

The 2005 Super Bowl presented a uniquely restrictive environment for advertisers. During the previous year's Super Bowl halftime show a much-publicized "wardrobe malfunction" had occurred that resulted in the on-air exposure of pop singer Janet Jackson's breast. The uproar surrounding this incident led some critics to address what they saw as the related indecency of much of that year's Super Bowl advertising. 2004 Super Bowl commercials singled out for censure had included a Budweiser spot featuring flatulent Clydesdale horses and numerous commercials promoting erectile-dysfunction drugs. Both the National Football League and the Federal Communications Commission were exerting pressure on Fox, the broadcaster carrying the 2005 game, to ensure that newly rigorous standards of decency were upheld during Super Bowl XXXIX.

TARGET MARKET

Parsons told Brandweek that Go Daddy targeted "everyone who wants a [W]eb presence." Go Daddy's domain-name prices were among the industry's least expensive, and it offered a range of website-management services that comparably priced competitors did not; therefore, Parsons and his colleagues believed that the company would continue to grow rapidly as long as it could make a wider public aware of its brand. The Super Bowl, of course, offered one of the last giant television audiences in an age of fragmenting viewership, and it was annually the most watched television program in America by a wide margin. Super Bowl XXXIX was expected to reach 130 million U.S. viewers, though the actual number of viewers watching the game at any given time was estimated at closer to 90 million.

If Go Daddy could make a splash with an audience of this size, it could count on a much greater degree of brand awareness among the American population at large. Though that year's restrictions on the content of Super Bowl commercials limited the degree to which advertisers could use provocative imagery and messages, Go Daddy and the Ad Store nevertheless charted an intentionally controversial course as a means of standing out from the field of high-profile advertisers. The Go Daddy commercial thus featured an attractive female model in sexually suggestive attire and in a context that directly parodied the political hysteria surrounding the previous year's halftime incident.

COMPETITION

Among Go Daddy's top competitors was Network Solutions, which was introduced as a technology-consulting company in 1979, making it a veritable ancient in the online world. Network Solutions was awarded a grant from the National Science Foundation in 1993 to create a single domain-name registration service for the Internet, which effectively gave the company a monopoly in the industry of domain-name registration until 1999, when the field was opened to competition. The Internet-security and telecommunications company VeriSign acquired Network Solutions at the height of the dot-com bubble in 2000, for $15 billion (the largest Internet merger in history at that point). The company's 2003 sale to Pivotal Equity was a measure of the changes in the dot-com world in the interim: the purchase price this time was $100 million.

Register.com was another of Go Daddy's rival domain-name registrars. The company was founded as a domain-name registrar in 1994, and it was one of the five original companies selected for entry into the newly opened market in 1999. Like Network Solutions, Register.com had Internet-bubble baggage. The company made its initial public offering on March 3, 2000, a week before the Nasdaq peaked, at a price of $24 per share; by the end of that first trading day, Register.com was priced at $57.25 per share. Register.com shares climbed to $116 before the dot-com bubble definitively burst. By 2005 the company's shares were hovering between $5 and $6 and were considered by many analysts to be a good value for the money.

LAYERS OF MEANING

The Go Daddy commercial that ran during Super Bowl XXXIX made obvious reference to Janet Jackson's "wardrobe malfunction" in the previous year's Super Bowl halftime show, but the spot included other veiled references as well. The "Broadcast Censorship Hearings" providing the commercial with its backdrop were supposedly being held in Salem, Massachusetts, suggesting that the then-current restrictions on Super Bowl advertisers were not unlike the famous seventeenth-century witch trials for which that town was famous. More obscure, and perhaps less meaningful, inside references came in the form of the characters' names. The central character in the spot, Nikki Cappelli, was named after the 17-year-old daughter of Paul Cappelli, the creative director and copywriter of the commercial. One of the Congressional committee members shown questioning the Nikki Cappelli character was named Bob Parsons, after Go Daddy's founder and CEO, and another committee member was named Tom Rossano, after a member of the team from Hungry Man, the production company that worked on the spot.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The official price for 30 seconds of Super Bowl XXXIX airtime was $2.4 million, and Go Daddy bought two such blocks of time, intending to run the same commercial twice, once in the first quarter of the game and once just before the two-minute warning at the game's end. (Media-industry insiders contended, however, that publicized Super Bowl advertising rates were akin to sticker prices on automobiles and that advertisers ultimately did not pay the full amount.) Go Daddy's expenses were not limited to the media-buying cost; the company invested close to $1 million in production of its Super Bowl commercial, an amount of money equivalent to the yearly marketing budget of comparably sized companies. Part of this expense was a result of unforeseen problems with Fox in the weeks leading up to the game. As Tim Arnold, managing partner at the Ad Store, recounted after the fact in Adweek, Fox approved storyboards of the Go Daddy commercial on December 3, 2004 (just over two months prior to the Super Bowl, which was played on February 6, 2005), only to withdraw that approval on December 22, after the commercial was already in preproduction. After Fox placed new restrictions on the commercial—including a demand that the words "wardrobe malfunction" be removed from the script—the Ad Store shot "16 and a half" versions of the spot to account for all possible objections the network might yet make. The network continued to reject proposed versions of the commercial until the week before the game, at which point Go Daddy finally received grudging permission to use the airtime for which it had already paid in excess of $4 million.

The commercial reproduced the look of the C-SPAN network (known for its live coverage of Congressional matters), with a banner at the bottom of the screen informing viewers that they were witnessing "Broadcast Censorship Hearings" in Salem, Massachusetts. A woman named Nikki Cappelli (played by Candice Michelle), wearing a tight-fitting tank top and jeans in an otherwise formally dressed crowd, explained to the Congressional committee that she wanted to be in a commercial. When asked what she was advertising, she stood and pointed to the chest of her tank top, on which the GoDaddy.com name was printed, and as she began to inform the panelists about the company's identity, a strap on her top snapped, threatening to reveal her breasts and triggering a flurry of camera flashes and gasps from onlookers. Asked what she would do in the commercial, Cappelli stood and performed a dance with her arms in the air, again triggering shocked gasps and camera flashes. A Congressional panelist then said, "Surely by now you must realize that you're upsetting the committee." Cappelli earnestly replied, "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to upset the committee," as an elderly committee member was shown putting an oxygen mask to his face. A black screen featuring the message "See more coverage at GoDaddy.com" then appeared—a reference to an uncensored and more sexually suggestive version of the "hearings" that was available for viewing on the website—and the commercial closed with the voice of a female committee member saying, "May I suggest a turtleneck?"

The commercial never made its second appearance on the Super Bowl. After airing it in its assigned first-quarter spot, Fox decided not to run it in the fourth quarter, reportedly because of complaints made by a high-level National Football League executive.

OUTCOME

During the Super Bowl traffic to GoDaddy.com spiked by 378 percent, and a survey conducted one and then two days after the Super Bowl found that the Go Daddy commercial was the most memorable of all spots that ran during the game. It was the story of Fox's decision not to air the commercial a second time, however, that proved most useful to the company. The censorship of a commercial that itself poked fun at overzealous censorship proved irresistible to the media, especially in the context of the ongoing commentary about standards of broadcast decency. As word of this incident spread, Go Daddy became by far the most talked-about Super Bowl advertiser. The buzz surrounding the brand in the game's aftermath—measured as "share of voice," the percentage of times that Go Daddy was mentioned in stories about the Super Bowl that ran on national, cable, and the top 50 local TV networks—was calculated at 51.4 percent between February 7 and 11, 2005. Go Daddy received nearly $12 million in free publicity, and many of the TV stories about the incident replayed portions of the commercial. Bob Parsons said in a press release, "Go Daddy accomplished exactly what it set out to achieve with its first-ever Super Bowl ad—increased brand awareness. Today, millions of people now know about GoDaddy.com, which in turn has generated significant new business." The magazine Business 2.0 declared the Go Daddy Super Bowl effort the "Smartest Ad Campaign" of 2005.

Though Go Daddy allowed its contract with the Ad Store to expire soon after the 2005 Super Bowl, moving its creative duties in-house, the company's subsequent advertising conformed closely to the model established by the Super Bowl commercial. The actress who played Nikki Cappelli, Candice Michelle, continued to appear in Go Daddy spots that drew overt attention to her sexual appeal, and she became known as the "Go Daddy Girl." In 2006 she appeared in a Go Daddy spot that ran during the NFL Playoffs, and Go Daddy again struggled to get a spot approved for the Super Bowl. The Super Bowl XL commercial, which rehashed material from the previous year's spot, again ran in an extended form on the company website, as did alternate versions of other Go Daddy commercials. Website visitors could read a detailed history of Go Daddy's attempt to gain approval for its 2006 Super Bowl entry and could also view numerous spots that had been denied, suggesting that the company's battles against censorship had become increasingly self-conscious and premeditated. Go Daddy continued to grow rapidly.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Diane. "GoDaddy.com Strives to Make Name for Itself." Brandweek, December 13, 2004.

Anderson, Mae. "GoDaddy.com Tops ACNielson Recall Index." Adweek, February 28, 2005.

Arnold, Tim. "Who's Your Daddy?" Adweek, February 21, 2005.

"CEO Interview: Bob Parsons—GoDaddy.com." Wall Street Transcript, October 26, 2004.

Crawford, Krysten, and Matthew Maier. "And the Winners Are . . . Our Picks for the Brainiest Businesses and Businesspeople of the Year." Business 2.0, January/February 2006.

Doty, Cate. "A Win-Win for Advertisers." New York Times, February 14, 2005.

Elliott, Stuart. "GoDaddy.com Is Ending Contract with Ad Store." New York Times, March 29, 2005.

———. "A Super Bowl Spot Meant to Be Provocative Apparently Succeeds after Only One Broadcast." New York Times, February 8, 2005.

Fass, Allison. "Super Pricey." Forbes, February 14, 2005.

Garfield, Bob. "Fear Wins in Super Bowl Rout." Advertising Age, February 7, 2005.

Hein, Kenneth. "Study Says Some Should Take Pass on Super Bowl." Brandweek, January 24, 2005.

Lippert, Barbara. "The Disabled List." Adweek, February 7, 2005.

Van Munching, Philip. "ABC, Tell Daddy Where to Go." Brandweek, January 23, 2006.

Zammit, Deanna. "The Ad Store." Adweek, January 31, 2005.

———. "GoDaddy Severs Ties to Ad Store." Adweek, March 28, 2005.

Mark Lane

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company

1144 East Market Street
Akron, Ohio 44316-0001
USA
Telephone: (330) 796-2121
Fax: (330) 796-2222
Web site: www.goodyear.com

■■■

ON THE WINGS OF GOODYEAR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Upon regaining its title as the world's largest tire manufacturer in 1999, the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company broke sales records and was busy collecting the tattered market shares of its competitors. Its competitor Bridgestone/Firestone Retail & Commercial Operations suffered notably in 2000, when tires made by the company malfunctioned, causing some 200 deaths. In an attempt to gain even more ground over the competition and create a campaign outside of its traditional format, Goodyear decided to embark upon a new campaign.

Goodyear awarded its $60 million advertising contract to San Francisco–based Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The resulting television and print campaign, called "On the Wings of Goodyear," began over Labor Day weekend in 2001. The agency tailored "On the Wings of Goodyear" for viewers who were previously unresponsive to product-centered tire commercials. "It really wasn't about the tires. It was more about the role that tires, and specifically Goodyear tires, play in people's lives," Cathryn Fischer, Goodyear's vice president and chief global marketing officer, told the PR Newswire. Three different 30-second spots, all centering on the experience of travel, aired across network and cable programming. The commercials continued into 2003 and focused on universal travel themes; for instance, one spot depicted families from different cultures on road trips, all with children asking, "Are we there yet?" from the backseat. Aiming at a wider target than past campaigns, six print variations of "On the Wings of Goodyear" appeared in consumer magazines.

By 2003 Michelin North America and Bridgestone had rallied back, knocking Goodyear to the number three position. Analysts attributed Goodyear's market slip to its restructuring attempts, which involved consolidating factories and performing cost-cutting measures. Even though "On the Wings of Goodyear" did not draw many accolades from the ad industry, it forced all tire makers to rethink using a technical pitch to sell their products to Americans. In 2004 Goodyear ended its relationship with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners and reassigned responsibilities to Arnold Worldwide, but the company continued to use the tagline "On the Wings of Goodyear."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Goodyear was founded in 1898 and led the world's tire market by 1916. Throughout the twentieth century it oscillated in and out of the number one spot in the tire industry. By 1990, however, Goodyear had been suffering so drastically that it lost money for the first time since the Great Depression. With the help of CEO Stanley Gault, Goodyear by 1999 had rallied back and regained its position as market leader. Gault moved the company's tire sales outside Goodyear's retail stores by forging partnerships with Wal-Mart, Kmart, and Sears. Goodyear also benefited from the misfortune of its competitor Firestone when Firestone Wilderness AT tires malfunctioned on Ford Explorers. Ford replaced them with Goodyear-made tires.

In 2001 Goodyear ended its 15-year relationship with ad agency J. Walter Thompson, which had orchestrated Goodyear's straight-shooting "Serious Freedom" campaign. The campaign included spots that explained to consumers the inner workings of tires. Advertising commentators criticized "Serious Freedom," along with campaigns launched by Michelin and Bridgestone, for not differentiating the brands from one another. Except for a handful of tire enthusiasts, most consumers described tire commercials "simply as a lot of tires," Fischer told the PR Newswire. In an attempt to reach a wider audience, Goodyear hired Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to craft its advertising. Saul Ludwig, an industry analyst, said to the Cleveland Plain Dealer, "Goodyear is getting in with their new ad program, while Firestone is on the sidelines, and Michelin is in the process of changing their advertising. Goodyear hasn't had a brand problem. Goodyear is acting out of strength, not out of weakness."

TARGET MARKET

Goodyear's new campaign targeted a much broader market than its previous "Serious Freedom" campaign, which had appealed to male, sports-orientated tire consumers. In contrast "On the Wings of Goodyear" focused on safety-minded consumers with an affinity for travel. Awareness about tire-safety issues, however, did not automatically translate into brand awareness. "Surprisingly, even with all the Firestone stuff, it's not on people's minds," Harold Sogard, general manager of Goodby, explained in an interview with the Plain Dealer. "If you go ask your neighbors what kind they are driving on, they don't have a clue." Research conducted before the campaign showed that most consumers never purchased tires with a brand in mind. The company concluded that explaining tire safety with a heartfelt narrative would make a more vivid impression.

To make sure the ads connected with consumers, Goodyear first screened the campaign for 20,000 of its employees. A.J. Faught, vice president of Goodyear affiliate Northwest Tire & Service in Flint, Michigan, told Tire Business, "So many tire ads look so technical, which doesn't appeal to anyone other than the enthusiast. This campaign goes straight to the point about safety. Safety is a big issue right now with consumers, who don't want to have to worry about their tires." Goodyear employees felt that the new campaign was more "touchy-feely" and that it would indeed strike a chord with a larger demographic.

"WHAT'S THE THIRD PEDAL FOR?"

During production for the television spot "Family Vacations," casting called for speakers of one of the African click languages. The spot featured a family road-tripping across Africa in a Land Rover. Two boys in the backseat, using their own tribal dialect, incessantly asked their parents when they would reach their destination. Director Bryan Buckley found an actor in Los Angeles to play the father, but at the last minute it was discovered that he could not drive the Land Rover. As Buckley told Shoot, "We asked everyone we cast three things: Can you drive, do you have a license and can you drive a standard transmission? Well, of course, this guy says 'yes' to all three, but when he steps into the vintage Land Rover we have on the set, he asks, 'What's the third pedal for?' and it becomes obvious that he has no idea how to drive a stick . . . So for safety reasons, I tell him he can't do the commercial, and I'm wondering just where I'm going to be able to find a replacement . . . Fortunately, the 'mother' stepped forward, and, as it turns out, in addition to speaking the click dialect perfectly, she could drive a stick like nobody's business."

COMPETITION

Bridgestone/Firestone had worked its way up to be the world's largest tire manufacturer by 2003. This was despite the fact that Firestone tires had notoriously shredded on Ford Explorers in 2000, leading to the deaths of more than 200 people. Further investigation into the tragedy's causes shifted blame onto Ford. One source quoted a Ford Motors spokesperson as admitting, "Something about the car caused it to roll over and crash, no matter what tires it was riding on." In 2000 Bridgestone/Firestone reported a $2.8 billon loss over the previous year. By 2002 Bridgestone had rebounded with a sales growth of 16.5 percent, reaching almost $19 billion and surpassing Goodyear's $13.8 billion. Until 2001 Bridgestone had primarily advertised with sponsorships at motor-sports events. After 2000 the company began moving advertising into wider markets, shifted efforts from Firestone to Bridgestone, and premiered two TV spots at the start of the 2002 Olympic Games. For the first six months of 2001 Bridgestone spent $12 million on advertising, a significant increase from the $400,000 the same period the year before. Despite the accidents Bridgestone continued marketing Firestone tires. Grey Worldwide, the advertising firm handling the Bridgestone account, told Advertising Age in 2002, ''We are not going to abandon a more than 100-year-old brand. Firestone has a rich heritage and it's the tire you can rely on.''

While Goodyear's ''On the Wings of Goodyear'' campaign ran, its competitor Michelin drifted between being the second- and third-largest tire manufacturer in the world. Focusing most of its efforts in North America, the South Carolina corporation had $7 billion in sales during 2002 and grew 14 percent. In 2002 Michelin launched a television, print, and outdoor campaign that featured Michelin's longtime mascot, Bibendum, the plump character made of white tires. The campaign's first TV spot, ''Guardian Angels,'' was created by Palmer Jarvis DDB and capitalized on the consumer's need for safety. The 30-second commercial featured Bibendum making snow angels, followed by the tagline ''Your guardian angel this winter.'' Another Michelin spot, ''Shuttle,'' featured Bibendum entering a NASA space shuttle, which also used Michelin tires, just before its launch. The campaign focused primarily on consumer satisfaction and safety issues, as opposed to tire performance.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Before releasing the ''On the Wings of Goodyear'' campaign, Goodyear had 20,000 of its employees preview the first television spots in August of 2001. Each 30-second commercial centered on a specific theme: carpooling, family vacations, and the morning commute. All three aired for the public during Labor Day weekend, and six print ads began appearing in consumer magazines such as Time, People, and Newsweek. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners wanted to venture outside Goodyear's previous target market, sports-centric males. The television spots ran during a wide range of prime-time television programs, including 60 Minutes, The Drew Carey Show, Everybody Loves Raymond, and 48 Hours.

Firestone's disaster had made the public acutely sensitive to tire safety, a concept Goodby drove home with ''On the Wings of Goodyear.'' The campaign attempted to imply that Goodyear's tires would keep drivers and passengers safer, which in turn would increase consumer desire for Goodyear tires. One 30-second spot, ''Carpooling,'' which dwelled exclusively on the theme of safety, featured a young girl being carpooled. The spot's voice-over warned, ''She's not your daughter, but if you give her a ride home, she might as well be.'' Another spot, ''Morning Commute,'' carried a lighter tone and featured a car full of office workers. The driver was constantly swerving to avoid random furniture and housewares left in the road.

One of the campaign's most memorable spots, first airing on September 1, 2001, featured four families from different ethnic backgrounds on road trips. The spot, directed by Bryan Buckley of the production company Hungry Man, played on the universality of bored children enduring family road trips. The commercial began with an American family traveling in a midsize sedan. A little girl in the back seat asked, ''Are we there yet?'' to which the father grunted, ''No.'' The next shot featured a second family road-tripping through snow-capped mountains, and a similar ''Are we there yet?'' exchange took place, but in subtitled Russian. A third road trip, in the middle of a rainstorm, unfolded, but this time the family spoke Chinese. The last shot featured an African family all speaking a tribal click dialect and speeding across the desert in a Land Rover. Two young boys in back asked if they had arrived at their destination yet. The mother finally snapped, ''If you ask me that again, I have to stop this car!''

Later television spots, gravitating around similar themes of safety and introducing Goodyear's Run-Flat technology, broke in 2003. One television spot, ''Screw,'' showed a screw tumbling from a skyscraper and onto the street. After a car ran over it, a voice-over explained, ''Sharp steel is no match for smart rubber. Tires with Run-Flat technology.'' Print ads ran during 2003 as well. Harry Cocciolo, creative director for Goodby, Silverstein & Partners during 2003, told Adweek, ''We tried to find ways to remind people that tires can really make a difference. The Run-Flat technology is being used by Humvees in the military. These are really great proof points that haven't been taken advantage of.''

Adweek selected the Goodyear commercial ''Bouncing Balls'' as one of the best spots of April 2003. The surreal spot featured a driver heading down a street that suddenly filled with bouncing balls. Seconds later children began chasing the balls. The driver slammed on his brakes, and a voice-over remarked, ''The unexpected can be planned for. Tires with proven stopping power.''

OUTCOME

By 2003 Goodyear had again slipped to number three among tire makers. But despite the fact that ''On the Wings of Goodyear'' coincided with a decline in Goodyear's sales (from $14.1 billion to $13.8 billion in one year), the campaign was important for reshaping the advertising paradigm that tire makers had used for years. As John Polhemus, president of Goodyear's North American operations, told Tire Business, ''It's a dramatic departure from the type of product-and-technology-focused advertising that Goodyear has used in the past, and quite frankly, a departure for the tire industry itself.'' In 2002 Michelin and Bridgestone began tailoring advertising efforts around safety and brand awareness instead of product design.

The majority of industry analysts blamed Goodyear's 2002 backslide on the company's restructuring efforts rather than on Goodby's campaign work. The closing of factories and laying off of thousands of workers resulted in an $85 million decrease in annual operating costs. In 2003 Goodyear also sold most of its stock in Sumitomo Rubber Industries, which had sustained the company for decades. To exacerbate Goodyear's problems even further, it became entangled in an age-discrimination lawsuit.

"On the Wings of Goodyear" did score minor ad-industry points when Adweek chose the "Bouncing Balls" commercial as one of the best spots of April 2003. By 2004 Goodyear had signed its creative efforts over to Arnold Worldwide, but it continued using the tagline "On the Wings of Goodyear."

FURTHER READING

Chappell, Lindsay. "Bridgestone Gets a Big Boost: Ad Dollars Surge as Focus Shifts from Firestone." Advertising Age, November 26, 2001, p. 31.

Diedrick, Brian. "Director Buckley Goes On the Road, Family Style." Shoot, September 21, 2001, p. 12.

Ethridge, Mary. "Goodyear Begins Ad Campaign for Assurance Line of Tires." Akron (OH) Beacon Journal, April 27, 2004.

Frazier, Mya. "Goodyear Ads Go Road Least Traveled." Cleveland (OH) Plain Dealer, September 4, 2001, p. C2.

Halliday, Jean. "Fighting Tire Slump: Leading Brands Up Ad Budgets as Sales Deflate." Advertising Age, February 25, 2002, p. 4.

Irwin, Tanya, and David Gianatasio. "Dunlop Consolidation Advances: Final Shootout Comes Down to Goodby, BBH and Arnold." Adweek (eastern ed.), February 18, 2002, p. 3.

Jeffers, Michelle. "Goodyear Tires Take on Hazards: Rubber Balls, Screws Are the Enemy in New Goodby Spots." Adweek, April 21, 2003, p. 7.

Norton, Justin. "Goodby Crafts Interactive Racing Site for Goodyear." Adweek (western ed.), September 23, 2002, p. 4.

Ransom, Kevin. "It's Lights, Camera, Action for Goodyear Tire Effort." Adweek, April 26, 2004, p. 15.

Sanders, Lisa, and Alice Cuneo. "Goodyear Changes Ad Agency." Rubber & Plastics News, June 14, 2004, p. 26.

Stumpf, Todd. "Yep, 2001 a Real Head(line) Banger." Tire Business, December 17, 2001, p. 11.

Zielasko, Dave. "Goodyear's Taking Flight: New Marketing Promo 'Wings' It." Tire Business, September 10, 2001, p. 1.

Kevin Teague

William Grant & Sons Ltd.

Glenfiddich Distillery
Keith
Grampian, AB5 4DH
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 1340 820000

■■■

SINGLE MALT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Having established what constituted a high advertising budget for its Glenfiddich brand of scotch, nearly $1.7 million, William Grant & Sons Ltd. at the end of 1998 moved its account from New York-based McCann-Erickson Worldwide to a much smaller firm, Gyro Worldwide in Philadelphia. The change marked the end of McCann's three-year ''The Friday Scotch'' campaign.

Scotch whisky was not usually a product whose advertising attracted enormous attention in the United States, simply because it was not marketed on television or radio. Nor had Glenfiddich or its family-owned Scottish distillery attained enormous exposure in the American market—despite the fact that it was the world's leading brand of single-malt scotch. For that matter Glenfiddich's 1998 advertising itself did not make headlines: the real story was the gathering resurgence of scotch in general and of single-malt scotch in particular—a trend on which Glenfiddich and its competitors sought to capitalize. ''About five years ago,'' wrote Jerry Shriver in USA Today in 1998, ''a wave of well-heeled consumers began rebelling against the prevailing low-fat/abstemious lifestyle.'' Shriver went on to note, ''distinctive and pricey single-malt scotches began elbowing aside generic blend whiskies. Then, cigar smokers helped revive cognac, port, and bourbon sales.''

Despite the renewed interest in scotch among the youthful set, single-malt scotch whisky still suffered from an association with old age, according to Lisa Buckingham in the Guardian: ''Think of whisky and the picture which most readily springs to mind is that of a greying cardigan wearer, nestled contentedly in a high-backed armchair. It is an impression most distillers would give their right arm to eradicate.'' Age and the changing of the guard between generations were themes that had animated the advertising of Glenfiddich for many years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Scotch whisky received its name for a simple reason: it came only from Scotland, which in the 1990s had some 100 distilleries. Most of these were of long standing, though few had remained in the hands of their founders' descendants from the beginning. Thus William Grant & Sons, established in the 1850s and led some 140 years later by the great-great-grandchildren of the founders, was an exception.

The term ''single-malt scotch'' had little meaning until the latter part of the nineteenth century. Up until that time all scotch was made from malted barley and was distilled unblended; then a distiller by the name of Usher began blending high-grade scotch with less expensive varieties of whisky, using water to further extend the mixture. The resulting whisky was not only cheaper than single-malt but also weaker, which actually proved to be an advantage since it made it more appealing to a wider range of drinkers.

Another benefit to the distiller was the fact that blends were easier to control. Each batch of single malt tended to have its own level of quality, which was consistent throughout the whole batch but did not extend to future batches. The many variables in a blend actually made it more predictable, since a distiller could use varying mixtures to correct for anomalies such as bitterness.

Thanks to these factors, single-malt had all but disappeared by the end of World War II. Scotch itself continued to be popular, but by the late 1960s liquor consumption began to decline and was increasingly confined to older and older drinkers. The young, who became ever more health-conscious in the 1980s, saw liquor as something their parents drank.

Yet in the early to mid-1990s there came a popular backlash against those values of the 1980s. This was accompanied by the stigmatization of "political correctness" and an embracing of fashions from the 1950s and early '60s, albeit reinterpreted for the '90s. The change in the zeitgeist extended to diet: thus red meat, vilified for many years, was in again. So were martinis, cigars instead of cigarettes, and single-malt scotch.

A BIT OF SCOTLAND IN INDIA

At first glance it might seem—to an American at least—that there was little connection between Scotland and India. But of course there was a strong historic link between the two places, thanks to the British Empire, which introduced British phenomena such as cricket and scotch whisky to the Indian subcontinent. Thus when William Grant & Sons vice chairman Grant Gordon wanted to establish a stronger Indian presence for the Glenfiddich brand in 1998, it made perfect sense to sponsor the Triangular Cricket Tournament.

Cricket remained India's most popular sport, with whisky one of its most popular alcoholic beverages. Gordon told Business Line's Indian edition, The Hindu, that his company, which invested $1 million in the tournament, held an 8 percent share of the blended whisky market in India. Gordon invited Indian tourists in Scotland to visit the Glenfiddich distillery, which had welcomed more than two million visitors since it first opened its doors to the public in 1976.

TARGET MARKET

Driving the new trends toward single-malt scotch and other fashions was the same youthful market that made crooner Tony Bennett one of the most popular performers on MTV. In 1998 James B. Arndorfer of Advertising Age speculated that William Grant would introduce "shooter-type drinks aimed at young adults," and though a William Grant executive declined to comment on this supposition, vice chairman Grant Gordon—great-grandson of one of the company's founders—told a reporter for the Indian edition of Business Line that "Our target-group all over the world is the 25-30 age." Gordon went on to add something that seemed to contradict his first statement: "Whisky is for mature drinkers." What he meant, of course, was that it was not for people who had merely reached legal drinking age, a clientele more inclined toward beer. The youngest drinkers, after all, would not typically be able to afford the prices associated with higher grades of scotch. According to Peter Simoncelli, food and beverage director at the Four Seasons hotel in Chicago, "the trend is to order the 18- or 25-year-old selections at prices up to $23 a pour."

Such prices fit with the upscale "menus" of cigar bars. "Cigar rooms in restaurants provide a clublike setting," said Curt Burns of Chicago's Hudson Club, quoted in the Orlando Sentinel, "and since it takes time to smoke a great cigar, it's tempting to sip a special spirit too. The need to spend $10 to $18 for a snifter hasn't scared anyone off." Burns was referring to brandy or cognac, but similar rules applied to single-malt scotches. Yet price, combined with the long-standing image associated with scotch, meant that brands such as Glenfiddich had to overcome resistance among the young. According to Mike Dennis in SuperMarketing, a British survey in 1997 revealed that 62 percent of regular whisky drinkers were 50 years old or older.

COMPETITION

The British study also showed that 61 percent of vodka drinkers, by contrast, were in the 18-to-34 age group. Vodka, the star component in the martini, thus represented one of Glenfiddich's primary competitors. Then there were the 100-plus makers of scotch whisky.

Dominating the scotch industry, in terms of quality appraisal if not sales, were six distilleries that earned a five-star rating from British connoisseur Michael Jackson, arguably the world's leading authority on scotch. These six distilleries were the Macallan, Auchentoshan, the Glenlivet, Highland Park, Lagavulin, and Springbank. As for the top scotch in terms of U.S. sales, that position was held by Dewar's; but Glenfiddich still held the lead in Great Britain, with a 22 percent market share, and in the world, where it enjoyed a 27 percent share.

According to an October 1998 report in the Herald, three brands had managed to overcome vicissitudes in the market, such as a decline in overall growth of whisky sales in Europe and North America. These three brands were Glenfiddich, Laphroaig, and Glenmorangie, each of which had reached a "respectable" 13 percent increase in sales during the year. Of Glenfiddich, a commentator in Off Licence News ("off licence" is the British term for a liquor store) wrote, "It is sold in 190 nations. Considering [that] the United Nations has just 185 members, that's pretty impressive brand penetration." Hence William Grant marketing manager Patrick Tully spoke proudly of Glenfiddich as the "category captain."

Certainly maintenance of a distinct identity proved crucial in a heavily segmented industry. William Rice in the Orlando Sentinel quoted Ronny Millar of United Distillers as saying, "One thing is clear: if you try to duplicate a whisky at another distillery, it won't work." But in the sudden rush to single-malt brands that characterized the market during the late 1990s, numerous scotch makers either attempted to get on the bandwagon or to shore up existing offerings. Dewar's announced plans in 1998 to introduce a "high malt content" 12-year-old scotch, and Bowmo represented a "cask strength" malt. The latter had a higher alcohol content than most single malts, up to 120 proof; Glenfiddich also marketed its own cask strength variety.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1996 Glenfiddich and McCann-Erickson ran 90-second spots on British television in a campaign that cost 1.5 million pounds, or about $2.5 million. The spots focused on a father and son, whose dialogue emphasized the concept of scotch as a tradition passed down through generations. At the end of the commercial, the two shook hands, and the father handed his son a small bottle of Glenfiddich.

This advertising represented a shift from past Glenfiddich marketing, which was built around images of Scottish heritage and time-honored techniques of distilling. In the United States at about the same time, McCann-Erickson launched "The Friday Scotch," a series of print ads centering around the idea of scotch as an element of good times and celebration. During this period William Grant dramatically increased its advertising, establishing an annual budget as high as $10 million for all its brands. In 1997 it devoted $3 million to Glenfiddich and Frangelico alone, and by 1998 it was spending 1 million pounds, or about $1.68 million, on Glenfiddich.

"We have outstanding brands," Mark Teasdale, senior vice president for marketing, told Advertising Age in April 1998, "and we're going to aggressively get back to building their upscale status." At the same time William Grant moved away from its exclusive relationship with McCann, first by signing Grace & Rothschild of New York to handle all brands except for Glenfiddich. Teasdale suggested that the company would be reviewing its "Friday Scotch" campaign but declined to discuss future plans; meanwhile, as Arndorfer reported in Advertising Age, Glenfiddich sales in the stateside market had leveled off at 95,000 cases in 1996, the last year for which sales information was available.

By December 1998 Glenfiddich was running a new campaign in Britain. Posters displayed at bus stops and shopping centers asked "How much do you love your next-door neighbour?" and "How much do you love your father-in-law?" According to a report in Off Licence News, First Drinks Brands, distributor of Glenfiddich in Great Britain, had conducted research which showed that "consumers hold their beloved bottle of single malt in such high esteem that they are likely to hide it away when expecting a high influx of visitors, and offer their guest less prized drams instead."

OUTCOME

William Grant spent one million pounds on the British poster campaign and by the end of 1998 was prepared for a new assault on the U.S. market—with a new advertising agency. Thus on one of the last business days of the year, December 22, the New York Times reported that the company was prepared to drop its "Friday Scotch" campaign. According to Teasdale, the latter had run "for about three years and delivered some solid numbers," but apparently it was time for a change.

That change came with the December selection of Gyro Worldwide as the U.S. agency for Glenfiddich. McCann would still handle other advertising throughout the world, but the choice of Gyro represented a clear desire to appeal to a more youthful, MTV-influenced market. The Philadelphia agency, as the New York Times reported, was "known for provocative campaigns aimed at consumers in the 20's and 30's for such products as clothing, alcoholic beverages, and cigarettes." Gyro's techniques had not always won praise from critics of advertising: its print ads for clothing retailer Zipper Head, for instance, showed convicted mass murderer Charles Manson along with the headline, "Everyone has the occasional urge to go wild and do something completely outrageous."

In 1999 a new William Grant marketing director, Heather Graham, signaled the company's interest in a new agency to handle its British advertising, primarily on television. During the spring of that year, it launched an agency review with the help of pitch consultant Agency Assessments, and by July BMP DDB had won the British account for William Grant. Universal McCann would continue to oversee media buying in the British market.

If anything was clear about William Grant in general, or its Glenfiddich single-malt advertising in particular, it was the fact that changes were afoot. As Off Licence News reported in November 1998, "there are clearly busy times ahead for Glenfiddich and William Grant. Whether the brand succeeds in maintaining the momentum in the malt market or not over the next few years, no one will be able to turn around and accuse it of not trying."

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James B. "Wm. Grant Hikes Budget for Upscale Liquor Brands: Spirits Marketer Enlists Grace, Eyes Product Introductions." Advertising Age, April 13, 1998, p. 12.

Buckingham, Lisa. "Single Malt Can Survive Drowning in Cola; It's the Pipe and Slippers That Are Damaging One of Scotland's Key Export Industries." Guardian (London), April 10, 1999, p. 28.

"By the Single File: Whisky Industry Needs Strategy Re-Think." Herald (United Kingdom), October 8, 1998, p. 27.

Cozens, Claire. "Agencies Vie for William Grant Whisky Business." Campaign, April 2, 1999, p. 1.

Dennis, Mike. "Spirited." SuperMarketing, November 20, 1998, p. 22.

"Like Your Scotch Neat? On the Rocks? Pretension, Be Gone. A New Campaign Portrays It as Way Cool." New York Times, December 22, 1998, p. C1.

"New Glenfiddich Posters." Off Licence News, December 4, 1998.

Olmsted, Larry. "Scotch Drinking: What's New in Old Whisky?" Investors Business Daily, February 20, 1998, p. A1.

Purdom, Nick. "Consumer PR—Scots Persuaded Back to Whisky." PR Week, June 4, 1999, p. 8.

Rice, William. "Scotch Drinkers Becoming Single-Minded in Their Pursuit: Lovers of Fine Whisky Are Willing to Pay Plenty for the Distinctive Taste of Aged Spirits." Orlando Sentinel, January 15, 1998, p. H7.

Shriver, Jerry. "Demystifying Spirits." USA Today, December 11, 1998, p. 7D.

"We Intend to Stay in the News and Tap the Huge Whisky Market." Business Line (The Hindu), May 7, 1998.

Judson Knight

H&R Block, Inc.

4400 Main Street
Kansas City, Missouri 64111
USA
Telephone: (816) 753-6900
Web site: www.hrblock.com

■■■

WORRIED ABOUT BILL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2000 the largest tax-preparation company in the Unites States, H&R Block, Inc., was venturing beyond the niche industry in which it had excelled for 45 years. After a series of acquisitions and changes in upper management, the firm known for preparing tax returns began touting its new mortgage and brokerage services, financial-planning services, and line of personal-finance software. The company's executives also wanted to brand H&R Block as a financial service available to all Americans, not just high-profile businesses. Assimilating all of the company's changes into one advertising message, H&R Block released its "Worried about Bill" campaign.

Created by the advertising agency Young & Rubicam, "Worried about Bill" broke nationally on January 12, 2000. H&R tripled its advertising budget to finance the $100 million campaign, which employed television, radio, print, and outdoor advertisements. Most of the campaign's 21 television spots featured the fictional character Bill, who, as the April 15 tax deadline approached, grew increasingly anxious while preparing his taxes. The commercials depicted the frazzled Bill becoming so obsessed with the task that he ignored his wife's attempts at seduction, allowed his daughter to stay out all night, and eventually looked to his daughter's boyfriend for financial advice. The campaign's storyline culminated with Bill, delirious from reading his 1099 tax form, incinerating his financial records in the backyard barbecue.

The campaign collected the Best of Show and two Gold awards for the broadcast category at the 32nd annual American Advertising (ADDY) Awards. It also garnered two Gold awards in the television competition at the One Show's 2001 ceremony. Besides its ad-industry success, the campaign helped H&R Block boost its 2000 sales 38 percent over the previous year's sales. David Byers, the company's chief marketing officer, explained to USA Today, "We're very happy with the creativity. The feedback we've gotten from consumers has been that it's been enormously successful for us." Much to Young & Rubicam's astonishment, H&R Block opened its advertising account up for review only a few months after "Worried About Bill" began.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Henry and Richard Bloch, brothers from Kansas City, Missouri, first offered their tax-preparation services in 1946 under the name United Business Company. The business quickly grew after the Bloch brothers franchised it. Wanting to change the name United Business Company but afraid that consumers would pronounce their last name as "blotch," Henry and Richard renamed the business H&R Block in 1955. Later in the 1970s

Henry appeared in television spots for the company and assured his audience that their taxes were safe with H&R Block.

In 1996 Young & Rubicam won the firm's advertising account. Some of the agency's early work for H&R Block included a 20-second radio spot titled "Proctor," which stressed the importance of privacy by humorously featuring a street-corner proctology exam. The magazine Advertising Age deemed "Proctor" the best radio commercial of 1998. That year H&R Block spent an estimated $30 million on advertising. In 1999 the firm spent $28 million on advertising during the first nine months.

Believing that his company could offer more services to its preexisting customers, newly elected H&R Block president Mark Ernst wanted to brand the business as more than just a tax preparer. In 1993 the company had purchased the personal-finance-software company MECA Software; to expand its mortgaging services H&R Block purchased Fleet Financial Group's Option One Mortgage; and in 1999 the company expanded its brokerage services by acquiring discount brokers Olde Financial Discount. By late 1999 the firm wanted Young & Rubicam to unify its services under the H&R Block brand. The Delaney Report quoted H&R Block chief marketing officer David Byers as saying in 1999, "We're going through a major transformation—moving from being a one product company to a financial services powerhouse. H&R Block is a brand that is ubiquitous. We want to capitalize on that as well as on the high degree of trust the consumer has in the brand."

FALSE CLAIMS

During an advertising campaign launched in January 2000, the financial-services provider H&R Block created a Refund Rewards program that placed its clients' tax returns on ATM cards. As part of the promotion the ATM cards were eligible for discounts on brands such as Sears, General Motors, RadioShack, and US Airways. One ad for Refund Rewards appeared in the Virginian Pilot, a Virginia newspaper, and read, "Spend more quality time with your refund. Why wait six weeks for your tax refund when H&R Block can give you your refund amount in as little as two days?" Liberty Tax Service, one of H&R Block's tax-preparing competitors, filed a lawsuit against H&R Block stating that the advertising made false claims. Refund Rewards ATM cards were not actually carrying the balance of tax refunds but rather small loans that were to be paid off after the real tax returns arrived. A three-judge federal court of appeals banned the Refund Rewards advertisement and forced H&R Block to pay Liberty $325,000 in legal costs.

TARGET MARKET

"Worried about Bill" targeted its preexisting small and medium-sized business customers that trusted H&R Block for their tax preparation but that still relied on brokerages such as the Charles Schwab Corp., Morgan Stanley, and Merrill Lynch & Company for financial planning, mortgaging, and investing. In addition to businesses, the campaign also targeted individuals with similar financial needs. Differing from H&R Block's advertising during the late 1990s, which suggested that H&R Block was the best firm for preparing taxes, "Worried about Bill" communicated to audiences that the firm offered a wider range of financial services. According to Greg Farrell of USA Today, the campaign attempted the transform "H&R Block from tax preparer to full financial services company for Middle America."

By early 2000 the surge of young entrepreneurs within the burgeoning technology sector had expanded America's newly wealthy crowd. According to market researcher Spectrem Group, the number of U.S. households with more than $1 million in assets had doubled from 3.45 million in 1994 to 7.1 million in 2000. Spectrem Group also reported that 44 percent of this population felt overwhelmed by the amount of time needed to manage their assets. Sixty percent of the same population believed that there was too much information regarding financial planning. "Worried about Bill" suggested that using H&R Block's services would make organizing their finances easier.

COMPETITION

The ad agency Emmerling Post released a series of print ads for the asset-management branch of financial holding company the Phoenix Companies in 2000. One print ad featured the text "Money. It's not what it used to be," above a picture of a queen dressed in ostentatious clothing beside another woman wearing black leather and a tiara. Other print ads stated, "Some people still inherit wealth, the rest of us have no choice but to earn it." Specifically targeting an audience composed of the newly wealthy, a third print ad featured a casually dressed young man standing beside a dapper-looking gentleman with the copy, "New money is different than old money. For one thing, it's younger." Instead of repeating the trends of other asset-management firms that placed print ads in financial magazines, Phoenix Companies placed the ads in "lifestyle books read by the well-to-do," according to Advertising Age.

On December 31, 1999, Merrill Lynch, which provided financial services for private, institutional, and government clients, launched a $150 million campaign to herald its new online services under the tagline "Be Bullish." Television spots for the campaign aired on cable channels such as CNN and USA. The campaign's premier television spot consisted of a large-budget commercial that began with a squadron of helicopters descending upon Manhattan. As the commercial progressed, commandos rappelled from the helicopters and later airlifted the 7,000-pound bull statue that was commonly associated with the New York Stock Exchange. Merrill Lynch's logo also featured the image of a bull. "We're bringing the bull back," said James Gorman, chief marketing officer at Merrill Lynch, referring to both the company's logo and an aggressive attitude within the stock market. "The icon is much loved, but modernized. The bull is entering the digital age."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Worried about Bill" campaign's first spot, "Block Air," did not feature the campaign's lead character, Bill. Young & Rubicam hoped the 30-second television spot would herald H&R Block's newer services without distracting from its tax-preparation reputation. "Block Air" parodied airline commercials by featuring a pilot, purportedly flying for H&R Block's new airline, giving his mechanics and then his crew a thumbs-up. The spot's voice-over asked, "How much has H&R Block changed?" It then answered, "Not this much."

Twenty television spots followed "Block Air" and ranged from 15 to 60 seconds long. Throughout the bulk of the campaign, the character Bill grew increasingly frazzled as the April 15 tax deadline approached. The campaign excluded all images of accountants, tax-preparation software, or handshaking, the kinds of themes that, according to Adweek critic Barbara Lippert, were typically used in financial-services advertisements. Instead the commercials featured the average disorganized consumer. Bill was shown so consumed with preparing his own taxes that when his teenage daughter asked for money in the spot "Dad, Can I Have Some Money—Tax Day 6," he offered her his entire wallet. When she told him she would be out all night, Bill replied, "Have a good time." His preoccupation caused him to ignore his wife's attempt at seduction in a spot titled "W-2—Tax Day 5."

"The humor is intended to build on the brand's reputation of accessibility," explained Byers to Adweek. "We're a brand that mainstream America feels comfortable doing business with." In the television spot "Please Be Quiet—Tax Day 20," Bill's daughter and wife were featured silently reading in their living room with only the sound of a clock ticking. Bill burst into the room and screamed, "Dad needs quiet!" The campaign's 60-second television spot, which shared the campaign's title, "Worried about Bill," began with Bill appearing chipper and very sane. As Bill read through his tax forms, he grew paranoid and even began confiding in the family cat. After tax preparation completely wore down his sanity, the wild-eyed Bill piled his financial statements into the backyard barbecue. The spot ended with Bill's wife calling for professional help and the appearance of the tagline "Get help."

"Taxes can be such a downer, and we don't want H&R Block to be," Young & Rubicam's group creative director John Matejczyk told Adweek. Although the $100 million campaign was not the first humorous advertising that Young & Rubicam had developed for H&R Block, it was by far the most expensive the agency had created for the firm.

OUTCOME

The campaign was awarded Best of Show and received two Gold awards for the broadcast category at the 32nd annual ADDY Awards, conducted by the American Advertising Federation. It also garnered two Gold awards in the television competition at One Show's 2001 ceremony. Barbara Lippert, critic for Adweek magazine, praised the campaign, saying, "It conveys that the brand is not only alive, but responsive and even hip to the 21st century. That's no small feat." In 2000 H&R Block posted $2.2 billion in sales, a significant increase over the previous year's sales figure of $1.5 billion.

The ad agency seemed convinced of its client's delight with the campaign. "Young & Rubicam helped H&R Block achieve four consecutive record-breaking years for its business," Howard Breen, the agency's president and CEO, stated to Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News in April 2000. "They've been happy with our efforts . . . In fact, the current work we've done for them has effectively repositioned the company in a stylish, contemporary and relevant way, and has been well-received by both consumers and the media."

Unfortunately for Young & Rubicam, two of the campaign's creators, John Matejczyk and David Skinner, resigned in March 2000. Even though more than 50 people were involved with the campaign, the two resignations prompted H&R Block to reopen its advertising account for review. Although it was invited to, Young & Rubicam did not compete for the account. The ad agency Campbell Mithun took over the firm's advertising on June 19, 2000.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "H&R Block Focuses on Taxes." Adweek (midwest ed.), January 15, 2001, p. 4.

Cardona, Mercedes M. "H&R Block's $100 Mil Review Jolts Y&R: Marketer Pleased with Creative but Cites Key Departures for Move." Advertising Age, April 3, 2000, p. 67.

———. "Investors Opening Arms to Nouveau Riche Clients." Advertising Age, August 14, 2000, p. S2.

———. "Marketing 1000." Advertising Age, October 8, 2001, p. S20.

Champagne, Christine. "Back in Action." Shoot, April 7, 2000, p. 40.

Cisterna, Fred. "Craig Gillespie." Shoot, October 12, 2001, p. 22.

Dill, Mallorre. "Chip off the Old Block." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 10, 2000, p. 26.

Elliott, Stuart. "Chicago Agencies Win Addy Awards." New York Times, June 9, 2000, p. 6.

Farrell, Greg. "Ad Agency's Reward for Good Reviews: Hit the road, Jack." USA Today, April 17, 2000, p. 8B.

———. "Merrill Lynch Upgrades Bull from Bronze Age to Digital Era." USA Today, December 27, 1999, p. 8B.

Goddu, Jenn. "H&R Block Goes Beyond Taxes." Adweek (midwest ed.), January 17, 2000, p. 4.

———. "H&R Block in Play." Adweek (midwest ed.), April 3, 2000, p. 8.

Lippert, Barbara. "Taxing Times." Adweek (eastern ed.), March 6, 2000, p. 28.

O'Reilly, Terry. "Our Radio Doesn't Suck." Marketing Magazine, July 12, 1999, p. 9.

Wilcha, Kristin. "Cliff Freeman and Partners Tops One Show Awards." Shoot, May 11, 2001, p. 7.

Kevin Teague

Hallmark Cards, Inc.

2501 McGee St.
Kansas City, Missouri 64108
USA
Telephone: (816) 274-5111
Fax: (816) 274-5061
Web site: www.hallmark.com

■■■

SNEAK A PEEK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With its "Sneak a Peek" advertising campaign, Hallmark Cards, Inc., hoped to convince consumers to insist on buying only Hallmark greeting cards and to check the brand insignia on the backs of cards they received. "This campaign hinges on the concept that there is only one thing consumers need to know: it's Hallmark, cards that say what they think and feel, the brand they trust," said Brad Van Auken, the company's director of brand management and marketing. The television spots for the campaign featured a young married couple either exchanging greeting cards between them or picking out cards to give to others. The woman attempts to teach her husband the best techniques to discreetly check whether or not the cards he receives are from Hallmark. The campaign played on the company's long-running slogan, "When you care enough to send the very best."

Hallmark, the dominant greeting card company in the United States, had a wholesome image and was known for its emphasis on excellence. The company had a long history of successful marketing endeavors, including the award-winning "Hallmark Hall of Fame" series of television programs. Hallmark and its two major competitors, Gibson Greetings, Inc. and American Greetings Corporation, branched out in 1997 by marketing their merchandise via the Internet and offering related products, such as cards that consumers could print at home on their computers. The "Sneak a Peek" commercials won an Effie Award and were popular among consumers, especially with women, who were the primary target market. The campaign was launched in 1996 and ran through 1997. As in previous years, Hallmark's sales accounted for nearly half of the $7 billion in revenues generated by the greeting card industry in 1997.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Hallmark company was established in 1910, when a penniless teenager named Joyce C. Hall arrived in Kansas City, Missouri, and began marketing his two shoeboxes full of picture postcards through a mail-order business. The business grew rapidly and was soon producing greeting cards, ornamental gift wrap, party decorations, and jigsaw puzzles. In 1984 the company acquired Binney & Smith, which manufactured Crayola products, Magic Markers, and Liquitex art supplies. By 1997 Hallmark Cards was a global firm employing more than 20,000 people, including hundreds of artists, designers, writers, editors, and photographers. In addition to the Hallmark brand, the company made Ambassador Cards, Shoebox Greetings, and several other lines. Hallmark products were sold at a chain of stores owned by the company but also at drug stores and other retail outlets. Since consumers wanted the convenience of finding Hallmark products wherever they shopped, the company launched a new line of cards, Expressions from Hallmark, in 1996. Unlike some other Hallmark brands, the Expressions line was available in supermarkets and other mass-merchandise stores. By encouraging consumers to check the insignia on the back of cards, the ''Sneak a Peek'' campaign helped call attention to the fact that Expressions was a Hallmark line.

AP IMAGES.

Some of the company's advertisements were tailored to promote specific products, such as Ambassador Cards. Others, like the ''Sneak a Peek'' campaign, were intended to generate awareness of Hallmark products in general. In 1951 the company had begun a long-term sponsorship of the popular and critically acclaimed ''Hallmark Hall of Fame,'' a series of television programs for family viewing. In 1997 alone Hallmark sponsored 87 films and miniseries for television, including Gulliver's Travels and Larry McMurtry's Streets of Laredo. In 1996 the company spent $23 million to publicize the Hallmark Hall of Fame and $102 million on advertising designed to draw consumers into Hallmark Gold Crown stores, which carried greeting cards and specialty items. The print and broadcast ads promised, ''You'll Feel Better Inside.''

A Hallmark survey in the spring of 1997 showed a 93 percent approval rating for the programs and an 86 percent approval rating for the company's advertising. The ''Hallmark Hall of Fame'' broadcasts won numerous Emmy Awards, and the Hallmark commercials that accompanied the programs were recognized for their tastefulness and creativity. Joyce Hall's motto, ''Good taste is good business,'' had helped the company establish a wholesome image. The company's slogan since 1944, ''When You Care Enough to Send the Very Best,'' was a reference to Hall's memoirs When You Care Enough. For many years the slogan was incorporated into the company's advertising. Consumers age 50 and over tended to be particularly fond of Hallmark's sentimental, family-oriented advertising. In 1997 the company's Internet site included a Nice-O-Meter, an interactive survey that allowed visitors to measure how nice they were.

TARGET MARKET

In 1997 the market for greeting cards, stationery, and other correspondence products was increasing steadily. Hallmark's research showed that 29 percent of consumers were writing more than they had previously, 46 percent of grandmothers said they received correspondence from their grandchildren, and 58 percent of mothers said their children wrote them thank you notes. A poll in Adweek said nearly a third of the people in the United States planned to correspond more frequently than they had in the past. Consumers liked to give cards that expressed the feelings that they did not have the courage to say aloud. ''If the message in a card rings true, people identify with it and see themselves in it,'' said Ellen McKeever, manager of the Shoebox Greetings division of Hallmark. ''If a character on a card reminds people of someone they know, or if they just like the character or find it funny, they will choose that card." The perception was that the exchange of cards made people feel good and enhanced their relationships. The "Sneak a Peek" campaign played up these feelings by emphasizing that sending a Hallmark greeting was the ultimate demonstration of caring.

INNOVATIVE MARKETING

Hallmark Cards was the first greeting card company to advertise nationally. That initial ad, in the Ladies Home Journal in 1928, was ridiculed as "Hall's Folly" because it was thought that consumers took no notice of brand names when they purchased greeting cards. But the venture was a success. Hallmark later generated publicity by sponsoring a radio program in which poems and other writings from greeting cards were read.

The company had conducted extensive research to determine what its customers, who were 90 percent women, wanted in greeting cards. "From all the information we've collected directly from greeting card purchasers, three things are abundantly clear," said Mark J. Schwab, the company's vice president of strategy and marketing. "First, consumers want to find great products that are a good value . . . Second, the time-pressed consumer longs for a convenience-based greeting card offering from Hallmark, a company she knows and trusts . . . . Third, we have to make it crystal clear to the consumer that the card shop is simply the best place to shop for our category of products, an exciting, vibrant site from which to reinforce Hallmark brand equity." The "Sneak a Peek" campaign encouraged consumers to have such faith in the Hallmark brand that they would not bother looking at anything else.

COMPETITION

Hallmark was the dominant greeting card company in the United States, with a market share that averaged about 42 percent, according to USA Today 's Ad Track. American Greetings Corporation came in second with 35 percent, and Gibson Greetings, Inc., was third. In 1996 American Greetings had entered a small but expanding market—interactive entertainment for girls—by developing books and video games that featured several of the company's popular characters, including Strawberry Shortcake, the Holly Hobbie Blue Girl, and the Popples. In 1997 the company worked with Avery Dennison Corp. to produce a line of greeting cards for inkjet printers. Television commercials and ads in women's magazines were planned to target women 25 to 54 years old who had children less than 18 years old. American Greetings was involved in various other marketing endeavors during 1997, including advertising on the Internet site of Hearst HomeArts, which featured several magazines published by the Hearst Corporation.

The World Wide Web offered vast opportunities for selling greeting cards, candy, and related merchandise, a market estimated to be more than $219 million in 1998. In December 1997 American Greetings tapped into the world of electronic commerce by promoting its cards, flowers, chocolates, and gifts via America Online at a site that had previously been known as AOL's Card-o-Matic store. American Greetings invested $3 million initially, committed to the arrangement for three years, and agreed to pay millions more in the future. The venture, which had been announced in October, was launched at about the same time that Hallmark began an on-line marketing partnership with the company operating Yahoo!, an Internet search engine. Although some of Hallmark's on-line cards were free, American Greetings charged for all its cards.

American Greetings was also one of 65 businesses that began marketing merchandise through CompuServe's Electronic Mall on the World Wide Web in March. In addition, the company collaborated with SmarTalk TeleServices in an on-line promotion before Mother's Day, from April 22 through May 11. Customers who purchased American Greetings merchandise were awarded free telephone time, and customers could follow a link to SmarTalk's site on the Internet. American Greetings products were also featured at the redesigned Internet site of a third company that offered telephone services, MCI Communications Corp.

Meanwhile, Gibson Greetings invested $6 million for an equity in Greet Street, an Internet site where the company could market its cards. Gibson also made an agreement with Firefly, a software company, to market cards through Firefly products. By the end of the year Gibson was preparing to launch its first television advertising campaign to promote its popular bean bag toys. The company had lost $28.6 million in 1994 but had made a profit of $900,000 in the first half of 1995. In that year Gibson wanted to sell either its greeting card business or its Cleo, Inc., gift wrap division. Although American Greetings expressed interest in merging with the greeting card division, Gibson would not agree to the arrangement because of possible antitrust complications.

MARKETING STRATEGY

One of Hallmark's strongest selling points was the popularity and widespread recognition of the brand. In a

HALLOWEEN PROMOTIONS

Research by Hallmark Cards revealed that Halloween was the eighth most popular occasion for exchanging greeting cards in 1995. The company estimated that nearly 30 million Halloween cards were distributed that year. The holiday was second only to Christmas in regard to marketing efforts. In 1990 Halloween ranked third on the list of most popular occasions for adults to attend parties, behind New Year's Eve and the Super Bowl.

1995 survey by UPS Equitrend, consumers preferred the Hallmark brand more than 18 times as often as its closest competitor. When asked to name a brand of greeting cards, 91 percent of consumers mentioned Hallmark, and 84 percent mentioned Hallmark first. The company had built its brand equity by insisting on excellence, continually pushing its creative staff to be innovative, developing new ways to help Hallmark outlets and other retailers market the company's merchandise, and conducting research to determine consumer response to the company and its products. ''The marketplace is changing, and consumers' needs are always evolving, but excellence remains at the top of our priority list,'' said Hallmark's Van Auken. ''Through our products, our advertising, our retail environments, and even our World Wide Web site, Hallmark creates experiences to strengthen the tremendous equity of the Hallmark brand. So the real good news is, we're on the right track, and consumers see it.''

In 1996 Hallmark had begun to employ a new, multifaceted marketing strategy that included launching the ''Sneak a Peek'' advertising campaign to promote general awareness of the brand. Of the $175 million Hallmark spent each year for marketing, it budgeted $50 million for the ''Sneak a Peek'' campaign in 1996 and $44 million in 1997. The campaign, developed by the Leo Burnett USA advertising agency in Chicago, was intended to motivate consumers to act on their preference for the Hallmark brand when they purchased greeting cards and other personal expression products. The campaign centered on a consumer's impulse to look at the back of a greeting card to see whether it was a Hallmark. ''Sneaking a peek'' was portrayed as a commonplace indulgence that required enviable adroitness. The broadcast commercials featured a young couple who verified that they ''cared enough to send the very best'' by glancing furtively at the backs of cards they received from each other. Celebrities appeared in some of the television commercials during 1997; one spot showed three women checking for the Hallmark insignia on the backs of Valentine's Day cards they had received from singer Ray Charles. Another spot showed a baby in a bassinet looking at the ''Hallmark'' on a card. The commercials aired during popular prime-time television programs such as Friends, Frasier, Mad about You, and Home Improvement. The campaign also included advertisements in print media. These ads, which made the back covers of magazines such as Good Housekeeping and National Geographic look like the backs of Hallmark cards, ran in 115 publications in 1996 and 125 publications in 1997. Most of them featured a single line of text that was tailored for each magazine. Other ads on the backs of more than 100 magazines consisted of the Hallmark name only.

OUTCOME

The ''Sneak a Peek'' campaign received an Effie Award in 1996 for effectiveness and creativity in advertising. Hallmark's research from the spring of 1997 indicated that 86 percent of consumers felt positive about the company's advertising. In October 1997 Hallmark's brand equity was ranked fourth among 282 national brands in a study by Total Research Corporation. The study analyzed how well consumers recognized each brand and their perception of the quality associated with it. In another survey USA Today's Ad Track reported that 31 percent of respondents liked the ''Sneak a Peek'' campaign, compared with a survey average of 22 percent. The campaign was particularly popular with its primary target market; 36 percent of women liked the ads. In contrast, 21 percent of men liked them. Only 4 percent of the respondents said they disliked the ads, compared with a survey average of 12 percent. Consumers age 65 or older liked the campaign best; 37 percent gave it the highest scores for popularity. The Hallmark ads were among only a few in the survey to receive high marks for both popularity and effectiveness.

The company maintained its dominance in the $7 billion greeting card industry with sales of $3.4 billion in 1997, $3.6 billion in 1996, and $3.4 billion in 1995. The market remained strong and was expected to expand because the average age of the population was increasing, and older people tended to send more greeting cards. Additional sales were expected as card companies customized more of their products for target markets.

FURTHER READING

''America Online Formally Announces Plans for American Greetings Business.'' Advertising Age, October 10, 1997.

''American Greetings Launches Mother's Day Promo.'' Advertising Age, April 23, 1997.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Avery Taking on Epson with Help from Saatchi; Market Could Boom to $500 Mil. in Two Years; Hallmark May Be Next." Advertising Age, June 23, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Viewers Open Up to Greeting-Card Ads." USA Today Ad Track, May 27, 1997.

Fitzgerald, Kate. "Hallmark Going for the Gold." Advertising Age, April 29, 1996.

"Gibson Greetings Bows on the Web." Advertising Age, December 9, 1997.

"Hallmark Ads Support Low-Price Card Lines." Advertising Age, February 9, 1998.

"Hallmark Dons on Web." Advertising Age, November 19, 1996.

"Hallmark Promotes Equity of Its Brand." Chain Drug Review, June 23, 1997.

"Hot Spot: Valentine's Day Ads: Burnett Buddies Up for Valentine's." Advertising Age, February 10, 1997.

"How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

"If It's News Today, It's in a Birthday Card Tomorrow." PRNewswire, July 28, 1997.

"Resurgence in Letter, Card Sending at Home, in Office." PRNewswire, January 23, 1997.

"Today's Ad: Hallmark." USA Today Ad Track, May 27, 1997.

Troy, Mike. "Demographic Merchandising Zeros in on Niche Card Givers." Discount Store News, April 1, 1997.

Susan Risland

Hardee's Food Systems, Inc.

505 N. Seventh St., Ste. 2000
St. Louis, Missouri 63101
USA
Telephone: (314) 259-6200
Fax: (314) 621-1778
Web site: www.hardees.com

■■■

REVOLUTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997, when it was acquired by CKE Restaurants, Hardee's Food Systems was a struggling chain in the Midwest and Southeast with a growing reputation for poor service and substandard food. By 2002 the chain had launched 10 different marketing campaigns in nine years, each designed to turn the chain's business around. The campaigns met with little success. To try and carve out a niche somewhere between inexpensive fast-food chains and pricier "quick-casual" restaurants, as well as to win back customers, Hardee's executives initiated the Hardee's "Revolution" in select test markets. The rebranding effort included a scaled-down menu featuring the chain's new premium Thickburgers, renovated restaurants, and a new emphasis on customer service.

In 2003 the "Revolution" program was expanded to the rest of the chain with a supporting marketing campaign created by Mendelsohn/Zein Advertising, an agency based in Los Angeles. Andrew Puzder, president and chief executive officer of Hardee's, told Nation's Restaurant News that the chain planned to devote all of its marketing energy in 2003 to the "Thickburger Revolution." According to Nation's Restaurant News the campaign had an estimated budget of $50 to $60 million. The commercials, which ran on television and radio, were honest and apologetic about the company's slip into substandard food and service. Puzder was featured in some spots, where he admitted that the food the chain used to serve was bad. In other spots former customers stated why they no longer ate at Hardee's.

Although it seemed that Hardee's was taking a risk by introducing higher-priced premium burgers at a time when competitors were slashing prices, the strategy paid off. In 2004, following the launch of "Revolution," the chain's fourth-quarter same-store sales increased 9.2 percent over 2003. In addition the "Revolution" campaign was awarded an EFFIE in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Hardee's started out in 1960 in Greenville, North Carolina, as a simple walk-up counter business owned by Wilbur Hardee. It eventually grew into a small-town hero to hungry diners throughout the South and Midwest. The chain built a reputation for good quality, nontraditional fast-food fare such as roast beef sandwiches and "made from scratch" biscuits. For a brief time, before Hardee's became known as the place to avoid if you were hungry for hamburgers, the chain bumped Wendy's International from its number three spot. But by 1990 its downward spiral had begun. The chain's food quality was unpredictable, and menu changes left customers confused, while poor service sent them running for the door.

In 1997 CKE Restaurants, which already owned the burger chain Carl's Jr., acquired Hardee's with a plan to transition the entire chain to Carl's Jr. restaurants. Hardee's franchisees and executives bitterly rejected the plan. Hardee's and Carl's Jr. maintained their separate identities, but the former became known as Star Hardee's and sported the Carl's Jr. happy-star logo on its signs. The menu at Hardee's also underwent changes to more closely match the offerings served by its sister chain, and stores were haphazardly remodeled to make their decor resemble that of Carl's Jr. The changes did little to boost business for Hardee's, and the brand slipped to number six among fast-food burger restaurants. In 2003 Puzder, who had become president of Hardee's in 2000, determined it was time to reestablish the brand's identity and to rebuild the neglected chain's business and reputation. The Hardee's "Revolution" was launched.

TARGET MARKET

Sister chain Carl's Jr. had focused its energies on being the place for young men to go for big, juicy burgers, but the goal for Hardee's was to appeal to adults by offering a broader range of menu items that included fast, tasty breakfasts and restaurant-style burgers for lunch or dinner. "The Hardee's brand is broader—it has more breakfast business, it's more adult," Brad Haley, the company's executive vice president for marketing, told Restaurants & Institutions.

The two brands not only appealed to different consumer groups but also were distinguished from each other by regional differences, which made it difficult to create a single marketing theme for both brands. Hardee's was centered in the Midwest and Southeast, whereas Carl's Jr. served the West. Haley said, "In the Southeast, Hardee's is a very strong breakfast brand. In other regions it's more a lunch/dinner [concept]. So when you're looking at the brand, it's not one-size-fits-all."

COMPETITION

While Hardee's was taking a risk by offering customers the kind of thick burgers served at casual-dining restaurants and selling them at a higher price (about $4 for a burger), the chain's key competitors, McDonald's (the number one burger chain) and Burger King (the number two chain), were promoting discount prices to attract customers. The tactic was dubbed the "99-cent menu war" by Jim Kirk of the Chicago Tribune. He wrote, "With No. 2 burger chain Burger King preparing a major national marketing assault around 99-cent menu items, executives at McDonald's are making their own value strategy a priority with franchisees."

McDonald's launched a national marketing campaign focused on its "Dollar Value Menu" in October 2002. Burger King launched its campaign just a month ahead of that of McDonald's. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution reported that, faced with complaints that fast-food restaurants were causing American obesity, the two chains had earlier "tinkered with their menus to add healthier choices and more sophisticated flavors. Now they're turning to price to win back customers." Individual items on the 99-cent value menu at McDonald's included two sandwiches, fries, salad, and beverages; Burger King's 99-cent offerings included hamburgers, tacos, and chili.

For both chains the strategy behind the 99-cent value menu was to attract price-conscious consumers who were limiting their visits to restaurants because of the weak economy. Harry Balzer, vice president of the market research firm NPD Group, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, "The average cost of preparing a meal at home is $1.96, making it tempting to turn the cooking over to someone else for just a few pennies more." The 99-cent value menu strategy produced mixed results and

HARDEE'S SPOT FEATURING PARIS HILTON TOO HOT FOR SOME TO HANDLE

When Hardee's added the Spicy BBQ Thickburger to its popular line of Angus Thickburgers in 2005, it turned to hotel heiress and reality-TV star Paris Hilton to promote it. The resulting spot, which featured a bathing-suit-clad Hilton washing a Bentley automobile while eating a BBQ Thickburger, was first used by Carl's Jr. That chain pulled the controversial spot in early June, but Hardee's launched it later in the month, changing the product name and logo. The commercial came on the heels of another Hardee's spot, which starred a young woman described by the St. Louis Post-Dispatch as "seductively riding a mechanical bull." Brad Haley, executive vice president of marketing for Hardee's, explained that sexy women were used in the commercials to appeal to the young men that constituted the chain's target market. The Hilton spot may have resonated with the target audience, but some media watchdogs and consumer groups, such as the Los Angeles–based Parents Television Council, denounced it as "soft-core porn." Despite such complaints, the commercials produced results. Hardee's reported that its revenues had climbed 11 percent in 2004 and that for the first time since 1999 it was profitable.

weakened profits for the dueling chains. As Burger King's global marketing officer Chris Clouser noted during an interview with Time magazine, the problem with promotions offering deep discounts was that "you train customers to come only when there's a blue-light special."

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Revolution" was created to set the Hardee's chain apart from other fast-food restaurants and to establish it as a premier-burger specialist, according to Jack Hayes, writing for Nation's Restaurant News. The company was also trying to lure customers by carving out a niche somewhere between typical fast-food chains and higher-priced quick-casual dining establishments. To accomplish that, Hardee's introduced a selection of Angus-beef burgers and eliminated about 40 percent of its lunch and dinner items. The breakfast menu, popular with customers, was left intact.

In addition to a menu overhaul, the campaign included a series of television commercials that boldly tackled the chain's reputation for bad food and poor customer service. One spot, which opened with a scene shot in black-and-white, featured a young man stating that, while Hardee's "used to be cool," he no longer went there because when he wanted a burger, he wanted a big, juicy one. The spot then switched to a color shot of a Thickburger and the tagline "It's how the last place you'd go for a burger will become the first place." Other commercials featured company president Puzder humbly agreeing with customer complaints that the food quality at Hardee's had deteriorated and that service was substandard. The spots had been developed based on consumer research that included reviewing comment forms customers had filled out and left in suggestion boxes at Hardee's restaurants.

The "Revolution" campaign also signified the chain's shift away from the low-cost—and often low-quality—approach to fast-food menu items that had dominated the quick-service food arena almost since its beginnings. Puzder said that the chain's new campaign was intended to set Hardee's apart from the competition and to build its brand identity as the premium-burger specialist among fast-food restaurants. In an interview with QSR Magazine, he explained, "We not only made the burgers bigger and began using higher quality Angus beef, we also improved the quality of virtually every ingredient on the burgers . . . At a time when most of our competitors have turned to discounting tactics, Hardee's is banking on America's ongoing love affair with truly great burgers."

OUTCOME

After declining steadily for more than 10 years, Hardee's experienced a swing in the other direction following the January launch of "Revolution." The chain reported a 9.2 percent increase in same-store sales in the fourth quarter of 2003 compared to the same period the previous year. Sales growth continued, and Hardee's reported same-store sales increases for eight consecutive months through March 2004 at stores open for one year or more. Haley told QSR Magazine, "This was a pure quality strategy and it's very reassuring to see that fast food consumers appreciate what we have done." The success of the campaign was enhanced when CKE, reversing its original strategy, applied the Hardee's approach to sister chain Carl's Jr. and introduced to the latter's menu not only Thickburgers but also some of the Hardee's breakfast items. Further recognition of the campaign's success came in 2005, when it was awarded an EFFIE for meeting its goals of increasing sales, regaining consumer confidence in the brand, winning back the company's core customers (men aged 16 to 34), and earning credibility as the best place to go for a great burger.

FURTHER READING

Cantrell, Kate. "Hardee's Ad Featuring Paris Hilton Will Not Run in the Southeast." Fayetteville (NC) Observer, July 12, 2005.

Eisenberg, Daniel. "Can McDonald's Shape Up? The Fast-Food King Thinks Better Service, Nicer Décor and Bigger Bargains Will Get Business Cooking Again." Time, September 30, 2002.

Feldstein, Mary Jo. "Hardee's Goes to Paris for New Burger Campaign." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, May 14, 2005.

"Flame Out? CKE Is Trying Again to Rejuvenate Hardee's." Restaurants & Institutions, April 1, 2002.

Gilligan, Gregory J. "Changes at Hardee's Restaurants Pay Off." Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, May 2, 2004.

"Hardee's Breaks Rank from Competition with New Premium Burger Menu." QSR Magazine, January 21, 2003.

Hayes, Jack. "Hardee's Thins Menu with Thickburger Focus." Nation's Restaurant News, February 3, 2003.

Kirk, Jim. "Burger King, McDonald's Expected to Grapple at 99-cent Level." Chicago Tribune, May 7, 2002.

Lee, Elizabeth. "Burger Giants Put Bargains on the Menu." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 4, 2002.

MacArthur, Kate. "Hardee's Tries Big-Burger Line: Thickburgers Anchor Pared-Down Menu." Advertising Age, January 27, 2003.

"Parental Group Says Hilton Ads Too Hot." AP Online, May 25, 2005.

Smith, Samantha Thompson. "Hardee's New Marketing Campaign Deprecates Former 'Skinny' Burgers." Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, July 12, 2003.

Stewart, Al. "Big Burgers Boosting CKE Bottom Line as Strategy Pays Off." Los Angeles Business Journal, July 5, 2004.

Tritto, Christopher. "'Hardee's Revolution' Spreads to West Coast, Carl's Jr." St. Louis Business Journal, April 16, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

Harley-Davidson Motor Company

3700 W. Juneau Ave.
Milwaukee, Wisconsin 53208
USA
Telephone: (414) 343-4680
Fax: (414) 343-8230
Web site: www.harley-davidson.com

■■■

THE BOOK OF HARLEY-DAVIDSON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

As a symbol of brawny industrial power, no-nonsense technological prowess, and pure American individualism, it would be difficult to surpass the Harley-Davidson motorcycle. Even as flagship Americans products, from automobiles to television sets, were overtaken, outdesigned, and outmarketed by competitors from Asia and Europe, the Harley stood defiantly apart, refusing to give an inch, much like its famous champions, the Hell's Angels-style bikers of modern legend. At least that was the image most people held after nearly two decades of ambitious product development by the company, helped along by generally inspired advertising from its agency. And as demand for the high-priced motorcycles exceeded supply, the company launched a line of "genuine" Harley-Davidson accessories and clothing, including cigarettes and cologne. These marketing successes, however, came at a cost. Potential Harley buyers, unable to ride away on the bike they wanted and unwilling to wait the average two years until it became available, were turning to Japanese brands. Japanese companies had begun marketing a line of Harley clones, heavy cruising bikes designed to capture the low-slung style of the classic Harley, sometimes with more power and features. At the same time, Harley's very success in selling to a wider market was causing some of its core riders to question the company's commitment to its values. Company research found that "a small but vocal group of core riders are saying that Harley is 'selling out.'"

To counter this trend, a new advertising campaign was launched in 1997. The campaign, dubbed "The Book of Harley-Davidson," was designed to remind core consumers that the company that "wrote the book" on Harley was not about to stray from its principles. In this way the campaign hoped to reinforce positive brand perception among new buyers, while reversing any negative perceptions core riders might have. The company had ambitious sales objectives as well, for it hoped for a 10 percent increase over 1996 figures. Sticking mostly to print advertising, the campaign presented a series of spread ads in national men's magazines as well as in books for enthusiasts. Each ad was a "chapter" that sold the romance of both the motorcycle and the American road. For example, chapter 5, which sold touring bikes, was titled "Waking Up in Strange Places," while chapter 8 was called "Is That Thing Street Legal?" an appropriate headline for an ad touting racing bikes. By all measures, the campaign succeeded in meeting its objectives. By 1998 unit sales had increased, positive perceptions by new buyers had improved, and negative perceptions by core riders had been cut in half.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1903, the Harley-Davidson Motor Company was among the original companies building and selling motorcycles to racers and other thrill seekers. Among a crowded field of starters, it had the distinction of being the only motorcycle company to survive the next 80 years, and thus it came by its legendary status honestly. During the late 1970s, however, the company was troubled by a reputation for poor quality, lagging innovation, and serious competition from abroad, most notably from Japanese manufacturers. During an unfortunate period of ownership by AMF Corporation, the company even produced Harley-Davidson golf carts. Finally, after a group of investors bought the company back, it began a remarkable turnaround. In 1979 the company hired the Minneapolis ad agency Carmichael Lynch Spong to help reverse some of the negative perceptions that were plaguing it. Jud Smith, group creative director of the agency team that worked on the account at the time, said in an Adweek article, ''The image was that it [the motorcycle] was owned by dirtballs and decidedly uncool.'' Although Harleys were seen as distinctively designed, honest machines, many of the competitors were offering more user-friendly motorcycles, especially for less-experienced riders. Easier to maintain, some of the other bikes were even faster than the legendary Harley. Still, Harley-Davidson had developed a near fanatical following of riders whose deep emotional attachment to their bikes had already crept into American culture. Harley ''Hogs'' were perceived as simple but tough and as embodying the rebellious facet of the national character.

A 1997 model Harley-Davidson motorcycle. AP IMAGES.

By 1984 Harley-Davidson had turned an important corner under its new management, introducing a new line of bikes while significantly improving quality. The advertising began to communicate the changes, and at the same time it drew upon the passion the motorcycle inspired in its core riders with themes like ''Things are different on a Harley'' and ''Harley through and through.'' The advertising even broke with its rule of always making the bike the hero of the ad by employing high-profile—and highly passionate—Harley riders like Malcolm Forbes, Jay Leno, and Mickey Rourke, who agreed to do the ads for a dollar if it would help their favorite motorcycle company. By the 1990s an improved product and savvy marketing had turned Harley-Davidson from the motorcycle of ''dirtballs'' to the choice of free-spirited American individualists. Along with them came a legion of consumers who wanted to own part of a legend and could afford to pay as much for a bike as most people paid for a car. Despite the long waiting period, sales edged ever upward.

TARGET MARKET

Harley-Davidson's core rider had always defined its primary target market. That rider was most likely to be a male (91 percent), although his mate, if he had one, tended to be as enthusiastic about the bike as he was. He rode the motorcycle and lived the lifestyle. Yet, unlike consumers of many other high-ticket products, Harley owners spanned a broad socioeconomic spectrum. Visitors to the massive Harley-Davidson meets that took place in Sturgis, South Dakota, and in Daytona Beach, Florida, encountered riders from every strata of American life. But all of them embraced, if only for a weekend, the Harley credo of freedom, self-reliance, and individualism. The advertising invariably addressed itself to those riders

MEET THE NEW BOSS

As advertising campaigns went, Harley-Davidson's award-winning print campaign was fairly inexpensive to produce. Carmichael Lynch Spong's Rowley noted that in some cases the agency stretched its photography budget by using existing images. This was possible because, unlike new cars, Harleys were not restyled each year. For instance, one photograph from the campaign showed a glistening, black Fat Boy Harley-Davidson parked under a clothesline as the sun set behind it. Just a year earlier, the same bike had been a glistening, yellow Fat Boy, but, thanks to the magic of digital imaging technology, the expensive image could be reused.

who lived the credo, who in fact already owned a Harley. Jack Supple, for many years the executive creative director on the account at Carmichael Lynch Spong, described bluntly the tight focus Harley-Davidson's advertising maintained on the core rider: ''We don't pander to the broader public.''

Yet there was a secondary target market the advertising also reached, the segment of the broader market that was interested in Harley-Davidson motorcycles because of their reputation. In many ways this segment was every bit as important as the primary group, for it was from this group that increased sales came. Existing Harley owners might buy a new bike from time to time, but they would never fuel 10 percent or higher annual growth. This market also tended to be predominantly men who had grown up with the Harley legend in some form or other but who did not own one. It was a tribute to the company, the advertising, and the motorcycle itself that these men did not need to be convinced of the superiority of the product, as they might if they were shopping among Japanese bikes. They merely needed to be exposed to the legend frequently enough.

COMPETITION

Any company that owned 50 percent of its category, as Harley-Davidson did of cruiser motorcycles, might easily be thought of as not having serious competition. Yet because demand was exceeding supply and creating a remarkable two-year waiting period for buying a Harley, the door was open to a handful of competitors, each looking to increase its share of the market at Harley-Davidson's expense. Foremost among these were the four big Japanese motorcycle manufacturers—Honda, Yamaha, Kawasaki, and Suzuki—each of which had begun building its own heavy cruiser motorcycle in the previous three years. These Harley clones were characterized by big engines and an authentic look. Each could be mistaken by a non-Harley novice for the real thing. Unlike the real thing, however, these motorcycles were ready to be driven away from the showroom.

More troubling in some ways were a pair of companies preparing to offer an alternative American bike right in Harley's own neighborhood. In Minneapolis, Excelsior Henderson, a classic American motorcycle company that had failed, was threatening to come to life again and produce its own, truly authentic line of bikes. At the same time Polaris, a large manufacturer of snowmobiles, had plans—and the resources—to market a moderately priced cruiser in the $8,000 to $10,000 range. Against this background Harley-Davidson was not content to rest on its laurels, even if it could still sell many more bikes than it actually produced.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Harley's strategy for the campaign flowed quite naturally out of the company's unique history and place in the market. The shape of the campaign, however, was determined primarily by the need to reassure the core rider-ship that the company had not ''sold out,'' in the words of Craig Rowley, account supervisor at Carmichael Lynch Spong. The campaign's theme, ''The Book of Harley-Davidson,'' was devised by a team led by creative directors Kerry Casey and Jim Nelson. They relied primarily on print media because of its ability to reach the target market most cost-efficiently. Although two television spots were shot for the campaign, they were designed to be used by dealers and not broadcast nationally. The print ads consisted of spreads, each purporting to be a chapter from ''The Book of Harley-Davidson,'' although only three actual chapters were represented in the campaign. These chapters were supplemented by a series of similar spreads selling parts and accessories, although not in chapter form. Headlines in the series said, for instance, ''She's a full-figured gal,'' referring to a fully decked-out Electra-Glidecruiser, and ''Drop the wrench. Stand back and look. Laugh evilly,'' over a gorgeous shot of a Heritage Softail Classic. The ads ran in media catering to motorcycle enthusiasts, including Harley Woman, and also in national general-interest men's magazines such as Men's Journal, Rolling Stone, and Sports Illustrated, a sure indication of the company's focus on the large secondary market of non-Harley-owning men.

It should be noted that the campaign was supplemented by Harley-Davidson's exceptionally thorough dealer support programs, which included a catalog that was virtually a collector's item among Harley enthusiasts. Rowley reported that many dealers would not give a catalog to a prospective customer until he bought a bike, the catalog then serving as a surrogate until his motorcycle was delivered two years later. The company also earmarked a significant portion of its marketing budget in support of its owners groups, known as HOGs, or Harley Owners Groups, a practice that Harley-Davidson had pioneered long before Saturn automobiles, for instance, began announcing picnics for owners and related support programs.

OUTCOME

Judging the Harley-Davidson campaign by the most common measure—sales figures—would be somewhat misleading, given that the company could have sold every motorcycle it built with or without advertising. Indeed, Harley-Davidson exceeded its goal of selling 10 percent more bikes in 1997, reaching 13 percent, for a total of 96,216 units. But this was due to, if nothing else, a 13 percent increase in production. Had the factory turned out 50 percent more Harleys, the company could have reported a 50 percent sales increase. Yet, based on its own extensive polling of its customers and on the market, management considered the campaign a success. Based on its data, the "perception of Harley-Davidson as 'a strong and appealing brand' increased by sixteen percent during the campaign," according to an agency press release. At the same time the number of core riders who described the company as "selling out"—admittedly small to begin with—fell by more than half. Positive publicity continued to generate itself as the media rushed to align itself with the Harley phenomenon, always a sure sign that a brand was hot. In the area of creativity, one of the dealer television spots won a Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival, one of advertising's most coveted honors.

FURTHER READING

Cooper, Ann. "Believers in the Power of Print." Adweek (Eastern Edition), April 12, 1993, p. 34.

Damashek, Harris, and Junu Bryan Kim. "Echo Award Winners Diverse but Represent Fields Top Work." Advertising Age, October 28, 1996, p. S4.

Flint, Jerry. "No Sweat." Forbes, April 10, 1995, p. 22.

"Harley-Davidson Returns to TV." Adweek (Eastern Edition), August 19, 1996, p. 36.

"Newswire Roundup." Adweek (Eastern Edition), August 10, 1998, p. 49.

"1996 Echo Awards: Spotting the Trendsetters." Direct Marketing, November 1996, p. 10.

"Partnerships in Engineering Excellence." Forbes, November 9, 1992, p. 218.

Smith, Geoffrey N. "Live to Ride." Financial World, September 26, 1995, p. 6.

Watanabe, Laurie. "How the Midwest Was Won." Dealernews, July 1998, p. 22.

Patrick Hutchins

Heineken USA Inc.

360 Hamilton Ave., Ste. 1103
White Plains, New York 10601
USA
Telephone: (914) 681-4100
Fax: (914) 681-1900
Web site: www.heineken.com

■■■

IT'S ALL ABOUT THE BEER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the 1990s Heineken beer (imported from Dutch parent company Heineken NV and sold in America by Heineken USA Inc.) had an outdated image. An icon of 1980s luxury and excess, Heineken had not adapted to changing trends in the United States. Heineken USA understood that its future growth hinged on making the brand more approachable in the U.S. market and on connecting with the beer industry's all-important audience of 21 to 35 year olds. The company also wanted to maintain its reputation for superior beer. Enlisting agency Lowe & Partners (later called Lowe Lintas & Partners), Heineken in 1999 launched an advertising campaign that balanced these prerogatives while reinventing the brand's image.

"It's All About the Beer"—the central component of Heineken USA's estimated measured-media spend of $34 million for 1999—focused on so-called "beer moments," situations in ordinary life that became dramatic or otherwise noteworthy because of the presence of Heineken. With irreverent humor and down-to-earth backdrops, the new television spots took Heineken off its pedestal and communicated an updated, youth-conscious sensibility. At the same time, as the campaign's tagline and theme suggested, the commercials' focus was solidly on the quality of the beer itself.

The campaign helped fuel consistent increases in Heineken sales and was credited with positioning the beer for healthy long-term growth. These successes were likewise reflected in increased ad spending, as the brand's measured-media budget grew to an estimated $50 million by 2001. Despite changing agencies twice in two years, Heineken stuck with the "It's All about the Beer" concept and tagline and continued to target a youthful audience in the following years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The first barrels of Heineken reached the United States in the 1880s, and by 1972 the brand had become America's top imported beer. Heineken's fortunes in America improved even further in the 1980s, as it, like other luxury items, was a prime beneficiary of the conspicuous consumption for which that decade was known, a cultural trend that was especially pronounced in Heineken's biggest market, New York City. Heineken likewise adapted, in the 1980s, to the emerging light-beer phenomenon, introducing Amstel Light and imbuing it with an upscale image similar to that of its older sibling. Marketing on Heineken's behalf had long been geared toward making the brand a status symbol and identifying it as the beer of choice for urban sophisticates.

Heineken's pedestal positioning did not serve it as well in the 1990s, however. Sales slumped, and the company struggled to craft an up-to-date image for the beer that would make it relevant to a new generation of younger drinkers. "We had an aging franchise," Heineken's senior vice president of marketing, Steve Davis, told Beverage Industry. "We didn't conjure up in consumers' minds much energy and excitement, and we were becoming kind of 'your father's Oldsmobile.' We got high marks from everybody saying we were a great beer; what they weren't saying is that we were a great beer for them." The company recognized that, if it were to increase its U.S. market share, it needed to mute its elitist image and win over young domestic-beer drinkers. After an unsuccessful marketing campaign designed to make the red star on Heineken's label an icon comparable to Nike's "swoosh" symbol, Heineken initiated an agency search, dismissing Wells Rich Greene and hiring Lowe & Partners of New York (which later merged with Ammirati Puris Lintas to become Lowe Lintas & Partners), whose chief creative officer, Lee Garfinkel, had previously helmed an effort that successfully recast Mercedes, in much the way Heineken hoped to reinvent itself, as a more approachable brand.

© THE COVER STORY/CORBIS.

TARGET MARKET

Heineken's effort to expand the U.S. market for its beer depended on appealing to younger drinkers. As Beverage Industry noted, "a 25-year-old averages 65 gallons of beer per year, while a 55-year-old sips 15 gallons." Among 21 to 35 year olds Heineken particularly focused on urban-dwelling trendsetters, ordinary but sophisticated beer drinkers. Davis told Brandweek that Heineken's ideal consumers were younger people "who tend to be opinion leaders. They are visible, self-confident, and risk-takers." The brewer also needed to counteract these drinkers' perception that Heineken was a beer strictly for special occasions in bars and restaurants but not for everyday, off-premise consumption. To thus broaden its appeal, the brand had to strike a delicate balance between its hard-won image as a superior product and its desire to appear more ordinary.

"It's All About the Beer" accordingly used irreverent humor while showing the product, in television spots, being consumed in settings far less rarefied than those traditionally associated with the brand. The campaign focused on universal "beer moments," occasions when the presence of Heineken significantly affected otherwise ordinary behavior. This approach enabled the brand to show its lighter, more populist side, while also managing to keep the focus on the high quality of its beer.

COMPETITION

In its push to broaden its market in America, Heineken necessarily took aim at beer-industry heavyweights such as Anheuser-Busch and its flagship brew, Budweiser. Anheuser-Busch, in addition to possessing an almost 50 percent market share of the country's beer market, had an advertising budget far larger than those of its nearest competitors. Despite declining sales of Budweiser, the brewer continued to support the "King of Beers" with blockbuster ad campaigns in the late 1990s and early 2000s. Budweiser commercials featuring talking frogs that croaked "Budweiser" in combination with one another gave way to a competing cast of lizards and an evolving swamp-creatures storyline, and then Budweiser made an even bigger splash with "Whassup?!" a campaign featuring a group of friends who greeted one another using the idiosyncratic, slang question that gave the campaign its name. A true measure of Heineken's success, in the eyes of industry commentators, was the fact that, during this time, Anheuser-Busch used a "Whassup?!" spot to poke fun at stereotypical Heineken drinkers, thereby acknowledging its much smaller competitor as a threat. In the commercial, preppy types greeted each other with a hyper-articulate rendering of "How are you doing?" while drinking beer from green bottles clearly meant to suggest Heineken.

AUSTIN POWERS AND HIS HEINEKEN

During the first year of the "It's All about the Beer" campaign, Heineken and ad agency Lowe Lintas also linked the beer to the movie Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me, which starred comic Mike Myers as a lusty, mod-style British detective. Though this marketing effort was separate from "It's All about the Beer," it was coordinated with the overall goal of broadening Heineken's reach among young people. The beer maker bought product-placement rights in the movie and ran a television spot in which Powers was shown receiving a massage from an attractive woman. "Why did you stop?" Powers asked the masseuse when she paused in her work. "I was just admiring your Heine," she answered, speaking of his beer, not his body. The eight-week promotional effort was considered an integral part of the successful push—anchored by "It's All about the Beer"—to appeal to younger drinkers.

Corona Extra doubled its share of the American import market between 1995 and 2000, going from a 13.5 percent market share to 27.3 percent and overtaking Heineken as the country's best-selling import. The brand's marketing strategy, which attempted to make the Mexican beer synonymous with seaside relaxation and escape from the everyday, was widely credited with providing fuel for such rapid growth. Taglines such as "Miles Away from Ordinary" and "Go Someplace Better" ran in concert with beach scenery, as Corona extended its tried-and-true advertising formula into the early years of the millennium.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"It's All About the Beer" premiered two weeks before the 1999 Super Bowl, during telecasts of the National Football League (NFL) conference championship games. This choice of venue was a strategic move by Heineken to counteract Anheuser-Busch's dominance in Super Bowl advertising by achieving comparable visibility for a fraction of the cost, while effectively taking center stage as the only advertiser offering Super Bowl–quality spots during those earlier games. Further, for the big game itself Heineken skirted Anheuser-Busch's Super Bowl exclusivity agreement with the Fox network, which prohibited other brewers from buying national airtime during the big game, by buying time on selected local affiliates. Heineken spots ran during the Super Bowl in markets that included New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Atlanta, cities accounting for 70 to 80 percent of the brand's American sales.

In its bid to appeal to a younger and more down-to-earth audience, Heineken took calculated risks of various types in the campaign's individual spots. Commercials that broke in 1999 and ran through 2000 included "Mood Swing," in which a fan in a basketball arena was shown doing something that had been unthinkable in an earlier era's Heineken advertising: drinking the brew from a plastic cup. The dramatic crux of the spot came when the fan's enthusiasm for his team caused him to spill his Heineken. Another spot, "The Weasel," showed a man bringing a Budweiser-like beer to a house party and then filching another guest's Heineken from the refrigerator. "Premature Pour" showed a man and woman pouring Heineken while eyeing one another seductively; excited, the man poured too much beer too quickly, and spilled it. "The Male Bonding Incident," meanwhile, parodied heterosexual men's hang-ups about homosexuality. The spot showed two sports-watching men accidentally holding hands while passing a Heineken bottle, before both recoiled in horror. While the sexuality and humor of these spots was in keeping with the tone of much beer advertising of the period, Heineken was almost alone among industry competitors in linking such human situations explicitly to its product. Each of the "beer moments" dramatized in the campaign, regardless of the human behavior exhibited, hinged on the presence not just of beer but of Heineken.

Later executions of the "It's All About the Beer" theme included a group of spots keyed to Heineken's introduction of a keg-shaped can. In "The Envy," which ran through 2002, two men stood next to one another at public urinals. Both set their beers on top of the receptacles, but one of the men could not stop looking at the other's keg-shaped Heineken can. The Heineken drinker, rattled by the attention, left the restroom abruptly. In "The Poachers," two friends in the checkout aisle of a supermarket stealthily moved the grocery divider on the conveyor belt so that another customer's case of Heineken would be included among their own purchases.

OUTCOME

Heineken's U.S. sales grew consistently with the introduction of "It's All About the Beer." The brand's estimated sales were at 35 million cases in the mid-1990s; by 1999 that figure had grown to 47 million cases, and in 2000 Heineken saw another 10 percent increase, with sales of 54 million cases. The sales increases were seen as directly tied to Heineken's new brand image, and the brew's measured-media spend of an estimated

$34 million in 1999 grew to $50 million by 2001. Additionally, Lowe Lintas was tapped, in 2000, to adapt the concept of the campaign for Heineken markets worldwide. Hillary Chura noted in Advertising Age, "Heineken's game plan—to broaden the brand's appeal—allowed the lager to break records, shatter stereotypes and register consecutive years of healthy growth." Gerry Khermouch of Brandweek said of the campaign, paraphrasing Heineken's Steve Davis, "It clicked on all three requirements for a winning campaign: it broke through, was entertaining and offered a provocative, relevant message . . . By contrast, even the best work on Bud and Miller often clicks on just the first two criteria."

In 2002 Heineken moved its advertising account from Lowe Lintas to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, because Lee Garfinkel, the most instrumental figure from the outset of the campaign, had himself taken a job at D'Arcy in January of 2001. Heineken waited for Garfinkel's non-compete clause to expire before moving its account to his new agency. D'Arcy continued the "It's All about the Beer" campaign in work that paired the established beer-centered theme with holiday subject matter. Heineken changed agencies again in 2003, enlisting Publicis New York, but stayed on message, extending "It's All About the Beer" in well-received TV spots as well as outdoor ads and radio spots in the following years.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Heineken Seeing More Green on TV, In-Store." Brandweek, November 10, 2003.

———. "Heineken's New Summer Creative Is a Case of Déjà vu All Over Again." Brandweek, July 1–July 8, 2002.

Chura, Hillary. "Heineken Sips Success." Advertising Age, October 22, 2001.

Elliott, Stuart. "Favoring Creativity, Heineken Will Take Its U.S. Campaign to a World Audience." New York Times, May 25, 2000.

Halleron, Chris. "Heineken USA." Beverage World, May 15, 2001.

Khermouch, Gerry. "It's All about the Beer Ads." Brandweek, October 16, 2000.

Lippert, Barbara. "Last Laugh: Lowe Crafts a Final Round of Sly, Subtle Work for Heineken." Adweek, April 22, 2002.

Mack, Ann M., and Kathleen Sampey. "At Publicis, It Ain't Easy Being Green." Adweek, June 2, 2003.

McCarthy, Michael. "Risky 'Premature Pour' Ad Sells Beer with Sex, Humor." USA Today, July 24, 2000.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Reason to Be Jolly." Brandweek, October 28, 2002.

Theodore, Sarah. "Rising Star." Beverage Industry, July 2002.

Weinbach, Jonathan B. "Heineken Orchestrates Super Bowl Play." Wall Street Journal, January 22, 1999.

Mark Lane

The Hershey Company

100 Crystal A Drive
Hershey, Pennsylvania 17033-0810
USA
Telephone: (717) 534-6799
Fax: (717) 534-6760
Web site: www.hersheys.com

■■■

THE CRISP YOU CAN'T RESIST! CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Hershey supported the launch of ReeseSticks wafer bars with a campaign that emphasized the product's connection to its predecessor, the popular Reese's Peanut Butter Cup. ReeseSticks had a different texture and taste because they contained crisp wafers in addition to the creamy peanut butter and milk chocolate found in peanut butter cups. A television commercial featured a round peanut butter cup in the form of a buzzsaw, cutting a wafer in half and covering it with chocolate and peanut butter. An advertisement in Reader's Digest in May 1998 simply showed two Reese's Peanut Butter Cups above the word "original" and two ReeseSticks above the words "new extra crispy." One of the ReeseSticks was broken apart to reveal that it contained layers of peanut butter between wafers, all coated in milk chocolate. The tag line "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" was centered below a picture of the new product in the trademark orange Reese's wrapper.

ReeseSticks were the latest in a series of innovative line extensions that had helped make Reese's the company's most successful brand. Reese's was one of the first widely popular candies that combined chocolate and peanut butter. Competing with Hershey, the industry leader, other confectioners introduced their own crispy chocolate-and-peanut butter candies. Advertising for ReeseSticks was so effective, however, that demand exceeded supply shortly after the product was launched nationally in the spring of 1998. "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" campaign of television commercials and print advertisements was created by the New York office of Ogilvy & Mather. It was introduced in print and broadcast media early in 1998 and continued into 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Hershey traced its roots to Lancaster Caramel Company, founded in 1886 by Milton S. Hershey. A subsidiary, Hershey Chocolate Company, opened in 1894. Milton Hershey retained the chocolate business when he sold the caramel operation for $1 million in 1900. He used the money to open what would become the largest chocolate factory in the world. He also founded a utopian community named Hershey, Pennsylvania, for the company's workers, and he established an orphanage and ensured that it would continue to receive a large percentage of the firm's profits after his death. By the 1990s the company was called Hershey Foods. It manufactured ice cream toppings, chocolate syrup, chocolate chips and other baking products, milk products, and various brands of pasta. The company led the U.S. candy industry with brands such as Hershey's milk chocolate bars, Hershey's Kisses, Hershey's Nuggets, Kit Kat chocolate bars, Cookies 'n' Creme white chocolate bars with cookie bits, York Peppermint Patties, and Twizzlers licorice. In 1996

Hershey also acquired Leaf North America, which made Jolly Rancher, Milk Duds, Whoppers, and PayDay candies. In 1998 Reese's was the largest and most popular of Hershey's brands and was valued at $350 million, according to Advertising Age.

Reese's Peanut Butter Cups were launched in 1928 by Harry Burnett Reese, the founder of H.B. Reese Candy Company. Hershey acquired the firm for $23.5 million in 1963 and began marketing Reese's Peanut Butter Cups nationally. The product consisted of specially processed peanut butter in a disk-shaped, milk chocolate shell with fluted edges. It was packaged in bright orange wrappers that contained two peanut butter cups. The first line extension, Reese's Crunchy Peanut Butter Cups, was launched in 1976. Other line extensions introduced over the years included small candies called Reese's Pieces, peanut butter Easter eggs and Christmas trees, peanut butter baking bits, peanut butter in a jar, peanut butter ice cream, and peanut butter puffs cereal. According to Brandweek, Hershey's total advertising budget for all its Reese's products was $33 million in 1997, up from $22.6 million in 1996.

From 1969 to 1988 Reese's Peanut Butter Cups were promoted with the tag line, "Two great tastes that taste great together." In 1988, after market research showed that consumers had developed individual, ritualistic ways of eating Reese's Peanut Butter Cups, the company launched a humorous campaign called "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" that was still running in 1999. The new ads highlighted the candy's unique qualities and the many eccentric ways it could be eaten. One magazine advertisement that ran in 1998 showed two miniature peanut butter cups above two captions that both said, "'I eat them just like my brother.'" A second line of text explained, "(Don and Dan, identical twins.)"

In 1995 Hershey supported its recently introduced Reese's Nutrageous candy bar—a crunchy combination of chocolate and peanuts—with a $9.5 million advertising campaign. In 1997 the company spent an estimated $10 million to launch another line extension, Reese's Crunchy Cookie Cups, which contained peanut butter, milk chocolate, and a chocolate cookie. The promotion included the distribution of 50 million coupons and 8 million free samples of the product. Later in the year Hershey began selling ReeseSticks wafer bars in limited markets. The "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" campaign was launched early in 1998 to support the national introduction of ReeseSticks.

TARGET MARKET

Targeting a broad audience of people who enjoyed the taste of creamy peanut butter and rich milk chocolate together, "The Crisp You Can't Resist" appealed to consumers who enjoyed Reese's Peanut Butter Cups but who wanted to try a line extension with a new texture and slightly different taste. Hershey intended the new product to move beyond the candy market and compete with cookies and cakes in the snack market. Lisa Kronmuller, new products manager of Hershey's marketing department, said in a news release: "Consumers love the taste of peanut butter and chocolate together. ReeseSticks provide a unique combination of sweet and salty tastes with an extra crispy texture—a perfect snack item for chocolate candy, cookie, and snack cake lovers." The ads emphasized the similarities and differences between ReeseSticks and Reese's Peanut Butter Cups. The campaign's lighthearted tone entertained the audience and conveyed the message that candy was a fun, enjoyable treat. The ads also showed that ReeseSticks were more complex than some other candies, since they contained three ingredients assembled in layers.

DESCRIPTIVE NAMES

Hershey considered calling one of its candy bars "Acclaim" but rejected the idea after consumers in focus groups guessed that the product being described was most likely a four-door sedan. The candy was eventually dubbed Reese's Nutrageous, a name that immediately evoked an image of peanuts and caramel.

COMPETITION

Hershey led the U.S. candy industry in 1997 with sales of $4.3 billion. Its closest rival was Mars, Inc., which owned brands such as M&M's Chocolate Candies, Snickers, Twix, 3 Musketeers, and Milky Way. In third place was Nestlé SA, a company based in Switzerland, with brands that included Baby Ruth, Butterfinger, and Crunchbars. The chocolate-covered cookie and wafer category was valued at $155 million that year. Information Resources, Inc., reported that Reese's Crunchy Cookie Cups had sales of $20 million and controlled 12.9 percent of the category. Reese's Crunchy Cookie Cups Halloween Candy generated an additional $7 million in sales. Hershey's Kit Kat brand had sales of $61 million, and Twix had sales of $49.9 million. For the year ended November 8, 1998, all Reese's products had sales of $108.9 million; Kit Kat had $60.5 million, and Hershey's Mr. Goodbar had $9.5 million, according to Brandweek. From mid-August 1997 through mid-August 1998 Twix had sales of $70.5 million in grocery stores, drug stores, and mass merchandise outlets.

Advertising Age reported that Mars spent $67.3 million to advertise its products in 1998. Of that amount, $58.9 million went for television commercials and $7.2 million went for print ads. A large percentage of Mars' marketing budget was used to promote M&M's, a popular product that came in two styles—chocolate and chocolate-covered peanuts—with multicolored candy coatings. An M&M's Crispyline extension was launched late in 1998 with a $40 million advertising campaign.

During the first half of 1998 Mars spent $11.9 million to promote another popular brand, Twix chocolate-covered wafer, with the tag line "Two for me, none for you." The print ads and television commercials revolved around the idea that although Twix was sold in packages of two, the product tasted so good that people were not willing to share it. One commercial showed a man who had just been awarded two expensive vehicles in the brand's "Double or Nothing" instant-win game. As he wondered what he would do with identical Jeep Wranglers, his companion mused, "Maybe give one to your best friend." Television commercials in the campaign aired during programs for young people, including Buffy the Vampire Slayer and Party of Five.

Hershey's other primary rival, Nestlé promoted its Butterfinger brand with an advertising campaign that starred cartoon characters from the popular television program The Simpsons. Ads for another crunchy candy, Baby Ruth, used the tag line "This baby gets you going!" to position the brand as a source of energy for active people. In 1997 Nestlé spent about $5 million on advertising to support the launch of White Crunch, a bar of white chocolate with crisped rice and peanut pieces. Nestlé also introduced four varieties of a new brand, Treasures, which consisted of milk chocolate shells filled with peanut butter, Butterfinger Bits, the crisped rice used in Crunch bars, or caramel. An advertisement in People magazine featured the headline, "This would read even better if you were curled up with some Nestlé Treasures." The tag line "From you to you" suggested that Treasures were a good choice for consumers who wanted to indulge themselves.

Another rival, Russell Stover Candies, launched Russell Stover Peanut Butter & Jelly Cups. Sold two to a package or individually wrapped in large bags, the product consisted of round chocolate shells with a peanut butter filling and either grape jelly or raspberry jam. One advertisement featured the tag line "Gushing with Flavor" in type that looked as if it had been written with purple and red jelly. The text said, "For the first time ever, Russell Stover combines the world's most popular flavors: peanut butter, jelly, and milk chocolate." The ad included a coupon that could be redeemed for 50 cents toward the purchase of the product and another coupon that consumers could redeem for a free sample.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Hershey originally picked ReeseSticks as the most promising contender among a field of four new products made with wafers and peanut butter. The company spent three years conducting focus groups, distributing free samples in locations such as shopping malls, and surveying several hundred consumers as it adjusted the recipe to achieve the most popular balance of chocolate, peanut butter, and wafers. Hundreds of names, including "Reeskies," were considered before the product was christened. The New York office of Ogilvy & Mather created advertisements that emphasized the new line extension's taste, texture, and connection to the familiar Reese's Peanut Butter Cups. In a 15-second television commercial called "Sawmill," the blade of a buzzsaw—shaped like a round Reese's Peanut Butter Cup on its side—sliced a crisp wafer in half. The chocolate and peanut butter of the blade melted in the process and coated the divided wafer to form two ReeseSticks. The commercial included the tag line "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" The Los Angeles Times said that during the week of April 13-19, commercials for ReeseSticks aired 16 times on daytime network television, placing the message in 70 million homes.

In addition to television commercials, the national launch of ReeseSticks in February 1998 was supported by advertisements in magazines such as People, and Sports Illustrated. More than 10 million samples of the product were given away at retail outlets, and 40 million coupons were either attached to the product's packaging or inserted in Parade magazine in April. Standard packages of ReeseSticks sold for about 50 cents, but to encourage consumers to sample the new candy, trial-size ReeseSticks were priced at 25 cents for a short time after the product's launch. Beginning in April some of the product's packaging featured a tie-in to the motion picture Godzilla, which was scheduled for release on Memorial Day. When the National Football League season started, Hershey included ReeseSticks in its second annual $1 Million Kick promotion, which offered consumers an opportunity to kick a field goal during the Super Bowl.

"The Crisp You Can't Resist" ad ran in conjunction with the popular "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, which promoted Reese's Peanut Butter Cups and the Reese's brand in general. Hershey sometimes alternated the two campaigns in consecutive issues of magazines such as Reader's Digest. Advertising Age reported that Hershey spent $86.2 million to advertise its candies in 1998, up from $84.5 million in 1997, with $60.6 million going toward television commercials and $23.3 million going toward print ads. Hershey budgeted an estimated $15 million for "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" in 1998.

OUTCOME

Soon after the launch of ReeseSticks in February, the candy was so popular that Hershey could not manufacture enough to keep up with demand. The company briefly scaled back its advertising until a larger supply of the product became available. Hershey's earnings per share rose from 33 cents to 39 cents by June 1998, and the increase was attributed primarily to sales of ReeseSticks. The company continued to dominate the U.S. chocolate industry with a market share of 45 percent in the spring of 1999.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Crispy Cruncher." Brandweek, September 14, 1998, p. 1.

———. "Twix." Mediaweek, September 28, 1998, p. 52.

"Candy & Snacks." Discount Store News, October 20, 1997, p. 32.

Liebeck, Laura. "Candy Show Set to Launch." Discount Store News, January 26, 1998, p. 25.

"Mars Extends M&M's Crisp-Ward." Brandweek, June 29, 1998.

Mehegan, Sean. "Hershey Bets $15M to Grow Reese's Again." Brandweek, December 1, 1997, p. 1.

Thompson Stephanie. "Candy." Mediaweek, May 18, 1998, p. 30.

Warner, Mary. "Sweet Success: Reese's Sticks [sic] Debut Today." Harrisburg Patriot, February 9, 1998.

Susan Risland

THERE'S NO WRONG WAY TO EAT A REESE'S CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Hershey Company acquired the H.B. Reese Candy Company in 1963, and with the acquisition came a popular peanut-butter-filled, chocolate-coated candy, Reese's peanut butter cups. The Reese's brand expanded over time to include Crunchy Peanut Butter Cups, Reese's Nutrageous candy bar, and Reese's Pieces, which in 1982 were made famous as the preferred treat of a lovable alien in the movie E.T. the Extraterrestrial. For almost 20 years, from 1969 to 1988, Hershey promoted its Reese's peanut butter cups with the familiar tagline "Two Great Tastes that Taste Great Together" and with humorous television spots. That changed after research revealed that people had developed various methods of eating Reese's peanut butter cups.

After reviewing the research, the company's ad agency, Ogilvy & Mather of New York, created a series of humorous TV spots and print ads that emphasized the unique character of peanut butter cups and the people who ate them. Themed "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's," the campaign began in 1988, with new advertisements introduced each year through the 1990s. Some played up the shape or composition of the candy, while others hinged entirely on the traits of the person eating the peanut butter cup. One print ad depicted four Reese's peanut butter cups with bites taken out of them to make them look like the four phases of the moon. The caption said, "I eat them in phases. (Richard Chandler, Astronomer)."

The positive reactions to the new campaign showed that, while its long-running predecessor was a success, consumers had been ready for a change. As the "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign continued what would become a nearly 15-year run, studies conducted by the agency revealed that consumers enjoyed the ads, related to them, and connected them with the Reese's brand. In the late 1990s an agency executive commented that, even after 10 years, the campaign "really worked."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Reese's peanut butter cups were invented in the 1920s by Harry Burnett Reese, who had worked at the dairy of Milton S. Hershey, the founder of Hershey Foods Corporation. Inspired by Hershey's success, Reese quit his dairy job and founded the H.B. Reese Candy Company. Reese's peanut butter cups, the company's most popular product, were shells of Hershey's milk chocolate filled with specially processed peanut butter. In 1963 the company was sold to Hershey for $23.5 million. The Reese's brand grew steadily and was expanded to include Reese's Crunchy Peanut Butter Cups, Reese's Pieces, Reese's Nutrageous candy bars, peanut butter Easter eggs and Christmas trees, peanut butter in a jar, baking bits, and peanut-butter-puffs cereal. Reese's became the top seller among the Hershey brands, which included Hershey's Kisses, Kit Kat chocolate bars, York Peppermint Patties, and Twizzlers licorice. In 1996 Hershey also acquired Leaf North America, which made Jolly Rancher, Milk Duds, Whoppers, and PayDay candies. In addition, Hershey sold chocolate syrup, ice-cream toppings, baking products, pasta, peanut butter, milk products, and other foods.

From 1969 to 1988 the tagline in two advertising campaigns for Reese's peanut butter cups was "Two Great Tastes that Taste Great Together." Commercials in the first campaign, ''Collisions,'' featured two people, one carrying chocolate and the other carrying peanut butter, who accidentally collided and jammed their snacks together. They were always delighted with the taste of the new combination. Some of the unlikely collisions happened as people rounded corners, climbed out of manholes, and watched video games. The lively, fun tone of the commercials was intended to reflect the enjoyment consumers would experience as they tasted a Reese's. After the campaign had run for a decade, the company began developing more contemporary advertising that would appeal to consumers 12 to 34 years old. The ''Collisions'' advertisements had emphasized that chocolate and peanut butter were individual ingredients. In contrast, the ''Near Misses'' campaign stressed the fact that Reese's taste was a result of the combination of the two. This campaign, which ran from 1986 to 1988, used less slapstick and more sophistication in its humor. In 1988 the ''There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's'' campaign was developed to emphasize the candy's unique qualities and the many ways it could be eaten.

TARGET MARKET

Because advertisements for candy had to appeal to consumers of all ages, they tended to be amusing and offbeat. A catchy jingle that children would sing at school was part of many successful campaigns. According to some experts, adult consumers were most apt to buy candy that was advertised humorously regardless of the price or taste of the product. The ''There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's'' campaign used humor to emphasize the fact that peanut butter cups were different and more complex than some other types of candy and that they could be eaten in various ways. In fact, the company had discovered that many consumers had formed a strong emotional attachment to Reese's peanut butter cups and often ate them ritualistically. The act of consuming a rich, flavorful candy with a variety of textures could be a highly satisfying experience. The advertising campaign emphasized this individuality and self-indulgence in a lighthearted way.

In 1995 the United States ranked eighth in the world for total annual chocolate consumption. Americans ate a total of 3.1 billion pounds of chocolate in 1996. The average American ate 11.7 pounds of chocolate that year, up from 9.7 pounds in 1983. The average per capita consumption of all candy was 24.3 pounds, up from 17.9 in 1983. Candy sales climbed during the Halloween, Christmas, Easter, and Valentine's Day seasons.

COMPETITION

In the 1990s the U.S. retail chocolate industry was worth $13 billion annually, according to the Chocolate Manufacturers Association, and most of the top-selling chocolate candies were made by either Hershey or Mars, Inc., a private company owned by one of the nation's wealthiest families. Hoover's Company Capsules placed the value of the Mars company at $13 billion. The Arizona Republic reported that Mars had more than $1 billion in annual sales in 1997. The company's products included M&M's, Snickers, Three Musketeers, Milky Way, Skittles, and Starburst candies; Twix snacks; Uncle Ben's rice; and several brands of pet food. Hershey led the overall candy market in the United States, and Mars was second. According to Candy Industry Magazine, Reese's peanut butter cups were the fourth most popular chocolate candy bar in 1997, with 9 percent of the market. M&M's Chocolate Candies were the leading chocolate candy worldwide and had 16 percent of the market in the United States. Hershey's chocolate bars had 10 percent; Snickers bars had 8 percent; Butterfinger bars and York Peppermint Patties each had 4 percent; Crunch bars, Three Musketeers bars, and Russell Stover chocolate bars each had 3 percent; and Reese's Nutrageous bars had 2 percent. Hershey's Kisses and Kit Kat bars, made by Hershey, were also popular.

The top-selling Mars brand and Reese's main competitor, M&M's, had a series of enormously successful campaigns. In the past the brand had been marketed with the tagline ''M&M's Melt in Your Mouth, Not in Your Hands.'' In a 1996 promotion consumers had voted to replace tan M&M's with blue. Advertising in 1997 featured animated M&M characters named Red, Yellow, and Blue to represent the three main colors of M&M's. Mars also designed its Internet site to look like a tour of a movie studio where each animated character had a trailer full of photographs and other fanciful possessions. In 1997 Mars responded to consumer suggestions and added a female Green character, and the ads featuring her played on the old myth that green M&M's were an aphrodisiac. The campaign featuring these characters included celebrities such as Dennis Miller, B.B. King, and Tia Carerre playfully interacting with the M&M's. The celebrities helped draw the attention of adult audiences, but the animated characters took center stage in the commercials. In a 1996 survey by USA Today 's Ad Track the commercials ranked second out of more than 60 campaigns in the poll, with 45 percent of respondents saying they ''liked the ads a lot.'' In a 1997 survey by the American Marketing Association, fifth-grade students in Dallas listed spots for M&M's among their favorite commercials. Competitive Media Reporting calculated that Mars spent about $20 million on television commercials for M&M's during the first half of 1996.

PUBLICITY COUP

The Reese's brand experienced a rush of popularity in 1982, when the main character in the blockbuster movie E.T. used a trail of Reese's Pieces to find his way through a forest.

The other top-selling Mars candy, Snickers, also had a popular campaign attached to it. Snickers had long been advertised as the perfect snack to satisfy hunger, but since 1995 the message had taken on a more lighthearted slant. A strategy revolving around the tagline ''Hungry? Why Wait?'' was developed to target males 18 to 22 years old, and more commercials were aired during sports programs on television. In one spot an elderly man had just finished painting a giant-size logo of the Chiefs football team between a pair of goalposts when a player commented, ''Hey, that's great. But who are the Chefs?'' The painter stared at the misspelling, muttered ''Great googily moogily!'' and took comfort in a Snickers bar as he resigned himself to the fact that the entire logo would have to be repainted. A voice-over said, ''Not going anywhere for a while? Grab a Snickers.'' In another spot a coach informed a football team, ''Listen up. This year we gotta be a little more 'politically correct' with the team prayer.'' A priest began the prayer, but the coach interrupted him to let a Rabbi take over, then a Native American shaman, a mystic from India, an Eastern Orthodox priest, and a long line of other religious leaders. ''Not going anywhere for a while?'' asked the announcer. ''Grab a Snickers.'' The ''Team Prayer'' spot was among the 10 most popular ads of 1997, according to a survey by USA Today 's Ad Track. Nearly a third of respondents said they ''liked the ad a lot,'' and 26 percent said it was effective. About 40 percent of consumers with household incomes of at least $50,000 said they liked the campaign. Advertising Age reported that Snickers generated sales of $277 million from March 1997 to March 1998, an increase of 2.3 percent from the previous year. Competitive Media Reporting estimated that the 1996 advertising budget for Snickers was $42.2 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Previous marketing had first stressed the two main ingredients of Reese's—chocolate and peanut butter—as individual elements. Next, the combination of the two was emphasized. In 1987, however, the company's research revealed that consumers could not replicate Reese's by combining chocolate and peanut butter at home. The product's unique taste was identified as a key selling point. In addition, the research showed that many consumers had peculiar ways of eating Reese's peanut butter cups. The ''There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's'' campaign featured the humor that consumers expected of the brand, and they were strongly focused on the product.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

The Hershey Company promoted one of its top-selling chocolate candies with the Hershey's Kissmobile, a specialty vehicle more than 25 feet long and 11 feet tall, which looked like a row of three enormous Hershey Kisses. The vehicle traveled thousands of miles every year, stopping at children's hospitals, parades, festivals, and retail outlets. The promotion increased awareness of the brand and helped raise donations for the Children's Miracle Network, a nonprofit organization that supported children's hospitals.

The first six commercials in the campaign began airing in 1988, and additional spots were released in waves. Five of them ran in 1997. The campaign initially consisted of television commercials and included print ads after 1994. One print advertisement showed a Reese's peanut butter cup with four holes that made it look like a button. The caption read, ''I make my own special alterations. (William Hamilton, Tailor).'' In another print ad the candy had been nibbled into the shape of the United States. The caption said, ''I start in Seattle and work my way around. (Miss Moore, Geography Teacher.)'' A third showed a vampire leaving two fang marks where he had sucked the peanut-butter center out through the chocolate shell. The campaign featured a lively cast of additional characters, including a barber, a dragon, a secret agent, a private detective, a golfer, an Internal Revenue Service agent, a postal worker, and a mentalist.

Television spots included one that began with an announcer saying, ''How domino champ Charlie Armstrong eats a Reese's Peanut Butter Cup.'' A drum roll accompanied a close-up of a little boy peering around a row of carefully balanced candy packages. To the sound of falling dominoes, the boy tipped over the first package, and the camera followed the rapidly falling Reese's across the table until the last package flipped one piece of candy into the boy's hand. The boy said, ''Yeah.'' Clapping and cheers were heard in the background. As the camera zoomed in on two peanut butter cups and their wrapper, the announcer concluded, ''There's no wrong way to eat a Reese's.'' Another began with an announcer saying,

"How librarian Harriet Causbie eats a Reese's peanut butter cup." The words also appeared on the screen in gold letters against an orange and chocolate-brown background, the trademark colors of Reese's candies. The scene then shifted to a library, where a serious woman in a gray suit sat at her desk. A sign over her head said, "Quiet please." She held a piece of candy and shook her finger at the camera as she whispered, "I eat them as quietly as I can." At that moment the sign fell with a crash, but she continued eating her candy. The commercial ended with a view of two peanut butter cups and their wrapper against an orange and brown background. A voice-over stated, "There's no wrong way—Shhh—to eat a Reese's."

In March 1997 Hershey began promoting a new product in the Reese's line, Reese's Crunchy Cookie Cups, with an estimated $10 million advertising campaign that appeared in print media and on television. Reese's Crunchy Cookie Cups consisted of peanut butter, milk chocolate, and a chocolate cookie, which gave the product an interesting texture. In April the company distributed 50 million coupons and 8 million free samples of the new product. Later in the year the cookie cups were included in the "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign. Another line extension, the Reese's Nutrageous candy bar, had been introduced in 1994. It received $9.5 million for advertising in 1995 and $5.4 million for the first six months of 1996. In comparison, the company spent $16.2 million to advertise regular and crunchy Reese's peanut butter cups in 1995 and $9.2 million for the first six months of 1996.

OUTCOME

The effectiveness of the "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign was demonstrated in tracking and copy tests conducted by ad agency Ogilvy & Mather. "It's run for almost ten years, and it's a campaign that really worked. Consumers identify with it," said Amy Robertson, an account executive with the agency. The tests showed that people remembered the advertisements, related to them, and associated them with the Reese's brand.

With a growth rate of 5.4 percent, the retail-confectionery category was one of the most rapidly expanding food markets in the United States in 1997. Hershey had record net sales of about $4.3 billion, up from about $4 billion in 1996, and the company said that its candy business in North America was the chief contributor to the increase in earnings. At the end of 1997 Hershey was preparing a new television and print advertising campaign, coupons, and a sampling promotion to introduce another line extension, ReeseSticks wafer bars, in February 1998.

After a successful 15-year run, in 2002 the "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign was replaced. A new campaign created by Ogilvy & Mather had the theme and tagline "Get Lost in a Reese's." It targeted young men ages 18–24 who typically enjoyed candy on the run, but it also appealed to consumers in other age groups. In addition to the new campaign, to help the brand stay relevant to consumers the company updated its product packaging and introduced another line extension: FastBreak candy bars. "Get Lost in a Reese's" supported the launch of FastBreak.

FURTHER READING

Associated Press. "Green Means Go for M&M's." Tampa Tribune, January 24, 1997.

DeKok, David. "Chocolate Wars." Harrisburg (PA) Patriot & Evening News, October 13, 1995.

"Divine Ms. Green Lives Up to Name in M&Mland." Arizona Republic, February 18, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Consumers Sweet on M&M Ads." USA Today, July 28, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie, and Lydia Gibson. "Snickers' 'Why Wait?' Ads Hit Sweet Spot." USA Today, April 21, 1997.

"Food Ads Are Top with Kids." Adweek, April 24, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Snickers Ads Grab the Elusive 'Big Idea.' " Advertising Age, September 2, 1996.

Grant, Tracy, and Judith Evans. "Honey, Pass the Green M&M's." Washington Post, January 27, 1997.

Gustin, Carl, Jr. "Ogilvy Clients Talk about the Agency and Its Work: Partnerships and Brand-Building Are Stressed." Advertising Age, September 21, 1998.

"Hershey Sets Reese's Crunchy Launch." Adweek, Eastern Edition, October 28, 1996.

"How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up" USA Today, December 29, 1997.

"Late News. (Advertising/Marketing News Briefs)." Advertising Age, June 17, 2002.

Mehegan, Sean. "Hershey Keeps Reese's Growing with $10M Intro of Cookie Cups." Brandweek, October 28, 1996.

"The Power and the Passion: Reese's Is Just One of Hershey's Power Brands. Here's the Punch behind It." Confectioner, October 1, 2002.

Susan Risland
Rayna Bailey

Hewlett-Packard Company

3000 Hanover St.
Palo Alto, California 94304
USA
Telephone: (650) 857-1501
Fax: (650) 857-5518
Web site: www.hp.com

■■■

BUILT BY ENGINEERS, USED BY ORDINARY PEOPLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In early 1996 the Hewlett-Packard Company began to rethink its role in the electronics products industry. Undisputedly the market leader for printers and other electronic products, Hewlett-Packard (HP) nevertheless saw the competition at its heels. Even more important, as technology became more ''personalized'' and accessible to the average person, the company was not sure it could rely solely on its history as a purveyor of electronic goods to businesses and institutions.

Hewlett-Packard turned to the San Francisco advertising firm Goodby Silverstein & Partners to create an ad campaign that would give it a more human face and present it as a company responsive to the needs of its customers. Goodby Silverstein designed ''Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People,'' a campaign focusing on the new Mopier business printer and the 690 series of DeskJet printers for the home. The campaign, which ran from late 1996 until about the middle of 1997, was designed to appeal to both HP's core customers—businesses—and to recreational or home users of electronics. The consumer ads showed people in situations that could easily be made simpler by the use of Hewlett-Packard products, while the business ads showed the imagination and flexibility of HP's engineering capacity.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Like many pioneering companies of the 20th century, Hewlett-Packard was born in a garage. It was founded by engineers David Packard and Bill Hewlett in 1938. At the time the mission was to develop and market a resistance-capacity audio oscillator that could be used to test sound equipment. Hewlett and Packard's $538 in founding capital carried them through until the Walt Disney studios ordered eight of their devices. Then in 1941 the United States entered the Second World War, and an immediate overwhelming need for HP's instruments was created. After the war ended, the company lost its mainstay government orders and decided to seek clients in the private sector. Hewlett-Packard introduced its measuring devices into the flourishing post-war electronics industry. In 1972 the company pioneered personal computing with the world's first handheld scientific calculator, and it then went on to introduce the first desktop mainframe (in 1982) and the LaserJet printer (the first and most prominent of a line of printers for business and home), as well as copiers and scanners.

TARGET MARKET

Although Hewlett-Packard held its position as the world's leading supplier of hard-copy products

HP GETS ANOTHER MAKEOVER

At the end of 1997 Hewlett-Packard launched a second advertising campaign, this one with the tag line "Expanding Possibilities." "Expanding Possibilities" grew out of reflections at the company that it was still perceived by consumers simply as the company that makes computer printers. HP had failed to establish a strong corporate identity in the way it wanted to be perceived: as an interesting, even sexy, maker of products that are relevant to the ways ordinary people live.

"Expanding Possibilities" differed greatly from "Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People" in that it did not focus on specific products. Rather, in recognition of the increasing role technology plays in everyday life, it asked viewers to think about the company as more than just the maker of business-related gadgets.

One way it did this was to make changes, albeit not drastic ones, in the company's use of color. Until then the boxes used to house the company's computers and printers had been a simple white, suggesting scientific prowess and accuracy but also sterility and lack of emotion. The company began using strong, vivid colors on its boxes, consumer manuals, and store displays.

Television ads (also developed by Goodby Silverstein & Partners) that began running in November showed new ways for people to use the company's products to make and transmit images. In one spot new parents use a Hewlett-Packard camera and computer to send out birth announcements over the Internet. In another, former Negro League baseball player Buck O'Neil uses HP printers, scanners, and computers to make and sell Negro League baseball cards online.

(LaserJet and DeskJet printers, DesignJet large-format printers and plotters, ScanJet scanners, OfficeJet printer-fax-copiers, CopyJet color printer-copiers, and HP FAX facsimile machines), the company became concerned in 1996 that it projected an image too cold and technological for the home-electronics user to relate to. Since HP had a growing customer base of individual consumers, it decided to focus on making its technology seem more accessible.

The resulting television and print advertising in the "Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People" campaign targeted two audiences: families with children and business professionals, particularly corporate executives, management information system (MIS) experts, and end users. Creative elements were designed to appeal to low-end users while at the same time showing off the products' high-tech features to viewers well versed in information technology.

COMPETITION

Although Hewlett-Packard remained the market leader for printers, its largest competitors—Canon, Xerox, and Lexmark—were making strenuous efforts to narrow the gap. Also, as high technology moved into people's living rooms, the company saw that other makers of computers and electronic goods—such as Microsoft and Apple, among others—had been able to position themselves as interesting and cutting edge while Hewlett-Packard was viewed by consumers as reliable but stodgy.

Canon, the giant Japanese maker of business machines, cameras, and other optical products, presented a formidable challenge to Hewlett-Packard with its line of laser and BubbleJet printers. Marketing its products under the tag line "You can with a Canon," the company experienced strong growth in its printers during 1997. Canon targeted businesses with such products as the Digital GP215, a multifunctional digital device for networked workgroups that printed, faxed, copied, and scanned. The company also introduced the MultiPASS L90, another multifunctional system, and a new color laser printer, the CLBP 360PS. The BubbleJet continued to defend its market share with a very small and light personal model, the BJC-50, weighing only 900 grams.

Xerox Corporation, which introduced the first (manually operated) commercial xerographic product in 1949 and the first automatic office copier in 1959, made its first laser printer in 1977 and by 1991 was developing an extensive printer line. To highlight the company's evolution from copy machines to a wide range of business products, Xerox in 1994 adopted the tag line "The Document Company, Xerox" as its new corporate signature. As a document company, Xerox in 1997 introduced an array of specialized printer products for business, including a color printer for signs, banners, and billboards; a printer designed specifically for engineering needs; and the Xerox Productivity Centre System, which allowed users to scan, store, manage, electronically collate, distribute, print, and copy wide-format documents such as those used by architects, mapmakers, and graphic artists.

Lexmark brought up the rear in this august assemblage, but it was able to chip away at the other companies' lead during 1997. Lexmark, based in Lexington, Kentucky, was smaller than its competitors and had a narrower product range. It concentrated on laser, ink jet, and dot matrix printers and associated supplies that were comparable but lower-priced than Hewlett-Packard models. In November 1997 Lexmark won the first Annual Peripherals Excellence Award for network laser printers, beating out Hewlett-Packard and Apple.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Hewlett-Packard advertising account had been held since 1988 by Saatchi & Saatchi in San Francisco, but the company decided against asking them to carry out the new campaign. According to the San Jose Business Journal, this was partially because of a 1995 print campaign that cost more than $30 million but failed to leave any lasting impression on consumers. Arlene King, peripherals-advertising manager at Hewlett-Packard, had another explanation for the move. ''We wanted to get more visible advertising than we did in the past. We had been with Saatchi for eight years and we were becoming too alike.'' In May 1996 HP chose Goodby Silverstein & Partners in San Francisco to head the $40 million printer advertising account (Saatchi did, however, retain the PC portion of the Hewlett-Packard account). Goodby Silverstein & Partners had previously been known for creative and popular campaigns such as the ''Got Milk?'' ads for the California Milk Processor Board.

In consumer research, Goodby Silverstein found that most people associated Hewlett-Packard with technical strength and reliability. Therefore, the new campaign needed to link Hewlett-Packard's heritage as an engineering company and its reputation for building reliable products with the usefulness of HP products in ''ordinary'' situations. In short, the challenge was to humanize the face of technical prowess by giving complicated engineering a human face.

The $10.5 million Goodby Silverstein campaign for Hewlett-Packard, ''Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People,'' solved the dilemma by poking gentle fun at its own engineers while illustrating the excellence of HP products, particularly the 693 DeskJet printer, for use in the home, and the LaserJet 5si Mopier (multiple originals copier), a network printer for large-scale commercial use.

The year-long campaign was two-pronged, targeting both individual consumers and corporate entities. It featured television spots that ran from late November 1996 through late February 1997 on CNN and national networks. Those were supplemented by print ads in publications like Newsweek, the Wall Street Journal, Business Week, Fortune, PC Magazine, PC Week, and PC Computing that ran beyond the close of the television segment. In addition, the San Francisco-based interactive ad agency Red Sky developed an interactive ad that could be viewed on the Internet though the end of February 1997.

The Goodby Silverstein television spots showed both the ordinary and the extraordinary uses to which Hewlett-Packard printers can be put. In ''Mower,'' the first of the ''corporate side ads,'' a nerdy-looking announcer sporting a bow tie lists what a Mopier can do (print, staple, collate) and then jokes that the only thing it cannot do is mow the lawn. That serves as enough of a challenge to HP engineers, who immediately begin reconfiguring the printer. In the next scene the Mopier is turned on its side charging around an overgrown field, having been transformed by the company's engineers into a lawnmower.

In a second spot, ''Translation,'' the interviewer asks an HP engineer to explain exactly how a Mopier works. The engineer answers in highly technical jargon, which is translated for the layperson in a running voice-over. In both of these spots the engineers were actual Hewlett-Packard employees.

In the consumer-oriented spots, the usefulness of HP products in personal situations was demonstrated. In the ''Baby-sitter'' spot, an elderly man babysitting his infant granddaughter panics when she wakes up and begins to cry for her mother. Suddenly he has a brilliant idea: he grabs a picture of the mother and turns on his DeskJet printer. When the mother returns, she sees the grandfather—with a color print of the mother pasted on his face—holding the peacefully sleeping baby.

In a similar ad (''Room''), a teenager whose mother checks up on him through the key hole on his bedroom door fools her into thinking he has finally cleaned his extremely messy room by making a color printout of a picture of the room in a pristine state and positioning it just beyond the key hole.

The interactive ad developed by Red Sky was an extension of the television and print campaign into the electronic medium. It carried on the playfulness of the television spots but was also very different, using as it did the interactive capabilities of online advertising. As Joel Hladecek, Red Sky's chief creative director, told the San Francisco Business Times, ''There are two rules of advertising in this medium. The audience has the ability to choose what it's interested in, and people will avoid advertising if they can.''

Red Sky responded by burying the advertising message within entertainment. Their 1997 Pong advertising banner for Hewlett-Packard, promoting the LaserJet Mopier, played off the print and television tag line. Viewers used Shockwave technology to play games of Pong with an engineer named Jerry. They were initially drawn to the ad by the familiar sound of a ping-pong game. They then discovered that the ad was more than just a banner: it was an interactive game in which they could use their mouse to actually play along. The ad ran through February 1997 at various sites.

OUTCOME

The "Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People" campaign was pronounced an unqualified success by the company. Post-campaign quantitative research showed that the campaign had been very effective in reaching the desired targets. Those assessments were confirmed by the number of awards the campaign won during 1996 and 1997.

At the ICON Awards, sponsored by Marketing Computers and Business Week to honor excellence in high technology marketing and advertising, "Built by Engineers" won 1996 Best of Show ICONs for "Baby-sitter," "Room," and "Mower"; platinum in the best advertising campaign, broadcast category; and gold in the best advertising/television campaign category.

At the international Clio Awards, which recognize excellence and creativity in consumer advertising, "Baby-sitter," "Room," and "Mower" won best national campaign certificates, and "Baby-sitter" was also a certificate winner. In addition, Adweek, which publishes an annual list of the 10 best spots of the year, declared "Baby-sitter" to be one of the best spots of 1996. The spots won other awards as well, both in local advertising industry shows, such as the San Francisco Show, and in New York-based shows, such as The One Show.

In Europe the campaign also won a Directors and Art Directors Silver Pencil Award in London for "Baby-sitter." Finally, "Baby-sitter" won a Silver Lion at the Cannes Advertising Festival.

The Red Sky interactive ad also garnered acclaim, in this case from critics of Internet advertising. Microscope, a weekly online Web ad review magazine, rated the banner ad "a perfect 10" and called it "the most attention-getting ad on the Web." PC World followed suit, awarding it the number one position in PC World 's Top 10 Advertiser Achievement Awards. The ad went on to win a Platinum Award in the 1997 Marketing Computers/Business Week ICON Award for the multimedia category.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "H-P to Get Marketing Makeover." Wall Street Journal, November 11, 1997.

Bennis, Warren, and Patricia Ward Biedermann. Organizing Genius: The Secrets of Creative Collaboration, Addison-Wesley Publishing Co, Inc., 1998.

Charry, Tamar. "H-P Gently Mocks Its Own Nerds in Ads." Denver Post, January 6, 1997.

Ginsberg, Steven. "HP Hopes New Agency, Campaign Can Attract Reams of New Customers." San Jose Business Journal, December 16, 1997.

Hemmila, Donna. "Red Sky Warning: Interactive Ad Firm Creates Strange Digital Worlds." San Francisco Business Times, April 24, 1998.

"Hewlett-Packard: HP Plays Ping-pong with Mopier Ad." M2 Presswire, February 13, 1997.

"HP Breaks First Work From Goodby With New Effort Promoting Printers." Computer Publishing & Advertising Report, November 25, 1996.

"New Television Ad Campaign Unveiled for HP Printers." Business Wire, November 8, 1996.

Scrupski, Stephen. "The Curse of Normality." Electronic Design, March 17, 1997.

Voight, Joan. "Ads Soften Hewlett-Packard Image: Goody Silverstein Promotes Printers for 'Normal People'." Adweek Eastern Edition, November 18, 1996.

Susan M. Steiner

EXPANDING POSSIBILITIES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although it was widely known and respected in the business world for its solid engineering and reliable products, Hewlett-Packard, a huge company with 121,900 employees and revenues of $42.9 billion in 1997, found itself relatively unknown to the general public. Beginning in the late 1990s, Hewlett-Packard sought to expand its presence in the consumer market. To do so, the company initiated a $75 million consumer brand strategy that included an advertising campaign called "Expanding Possibilities." It was the first time in Hewlett-Packard's 60-year history that it had tried to shed its reputation as an engineering and business firm for a more consumer-oriented image. In 1997 the consumer business accounted for only a quarter of Hewlett-Packard's revenue, but the company saw this segment as being the place where growth would come most rapidly. As the general public became more focused on technology, Hewlett-Packard wanted to have a more prominent place in the consumer's mind.

The "Expanding Possibilities" campaign first appeared in the United States on November 11, 1997, in the form of three television spots that featured color printing applications people could employ in everyday situations. The ads ran through January 1998. They were aired in prime time on CBS, ABC, NBC, CNN, A&E, and the Discovery Channel. In Canada the spots ran on the Hockey Night, Bravo!, Showcase, Discover, and Life Network channels. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners of San Francisco created the spots. The original "Expanding Possibilities" campaign was budgeted at $15 million for the United States and at $40 million globally.

Hewlett-Packard Company headquarters in Palo Alto, California. AP IMAGES.

The "Mason" spot showed a couple capturing their newborn baby's wrinkled image on a Hewlett-Packard digital camera. The father downloaded the image onto a Hewlett-Packard computer, created a birth announcement, and E-mailed it to relatives. "Herta" featured a grandmother who took family photographs off the wall, scanned them into her Hewlett-Packard PC, and made a family history book for her children and grandchildren. "Buck" centered on a former Negro Leagues baseball player, Buck O'Neil, and a young friend who created their own baseball cards with O'Neil's Hewlett-Packard scanner, PC, and printer and then sold them on the Internet.

In March 1998 Hewlett-Packard added a $12 million brand campaign with two more television spots and a print element, all created by Saatchi & Saatchi of San Francisco. The two 30-second spots ran during sports and news programs in the company's top 10 regional markets in the United States. The schedule later included national exposure on CNN, ESPN, the Discovery Channel, and the Learning Channel. This round of the campaign, unlike the original ads, was aimed toward businesses. In one spot, for example, an airline maintenance worker discovered that it would take five months to produce a revised manual telling workers not to remove the plug in a plane's oil pan. As an alternative, he quickly updated the manual via the Internet. The print ads appeared in the Wall Street Journal for a month. A third group of "Expanding Possibilities" ads that were released in October 1998 used print media, on-line services, and radio to reach corporate customers, small businesses, home users, and students.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Two Stanford University engineers, William Hewlett and David Packard, founded the company with $538 in a Palo Alto garage in 1939. Their first major customer, Walt Disney, bought oscillators to help make his film Fantasia. In the 1970s and 1980s Hewlett-Packard became known as an entrepreneurial high-tech company, and it has been credited with establishing Silicon Valley. For years it made the lists of America's best-managed companies. By the late 1980s, however, the company seemed entrapped in a bureaucratic jungle, with burdensome decision making by consensus and other organizational problems. In 1990 Hewlett-Packard was reorganized, and cost-cutting measures included voluntary severance and early-retirement programs. The company's single sales force was divided by product lines, and administrative and manufacturing areas were consolidated.

During its history Hewlett-Packard had always been much better known in the business community than among general consumers. It was the world's second largest computer supplier and a leading provider of electronic products and systems for computing, measurement, and communications. But it did not use advertising to appeal directly to consumers. Lewis Platt, then the chairman, president, and CEO of Hewlett-Packard, said that 18 months of focus group testing showed that the public felt the company to be trustworthy and reliable but did not view it as innovative. Hewlett-Packard's reputation stemmed from its engineering-dominated culture, and while people judged its products to be of high quality, they perceived the company as being technical and impersonal.

In addition, the company's decentralized structure contributed to its fragmented marketing efforts and prevented it from taking full advantage of consumer interactions. For example, the owners of Hewlett-Packard's 75 million ink-jet printers bought from two to five new cartridges a year, but the company did not have a plan to take advantage of these customer contacts.

Hewlett-Packard's vision of the future included a blending of consumer electronics, including PCs and communications and entertainment products, with new product categories emerging. The company's goal was to prepare to become the largest consumer electronics supplier by the early 2000s. This would mean becoming much better known among consumers. As the technology battleground moved into the home, however, Hewlett-Packard had to prepare to compete with electronics and entertainment companies such as Sony and General Electric that already had a much higher profile with consumers and that were viewed in more positive terms.

TARGET MARKET

The primary target of the initial "Expanding Possibilities" ads was families with children, but the company also wanted to become better known among small businesses, microbusinesses, and the owners of home businesses. Both business owners and workers were targeted. In Canada, Hewlett-Packard made a direct appeal to entrepreneurs and the self-employed. According to Statistics Canada, the latter group numbered 1.8 million, up 28 percent from 1991 to 1998.

HEWLETT-PACKARD EARNS HIGH RANKINGS

Hewlett-Packard's reputation could be gleaned from the following rankings:

- first worldwide in sales of ink-jet printers, photo-quality printers, and laser printers
- first worldwide in sales of acute-care patient-monitoring systems
- first in reliability for notebooks, desktop PCs, and PC servers (IDC and Dataquest)
- first in on-site support staff responsiveness, technical knowledge of phone staff, and remote automated diagnostics (Computerworld)
- second most-admired computers/office equipment company (Fortune, March 1, 1999)
- third most-admired company in Asia (Asian Business, May 1, 1998)
- tenth best company to work for in the United States (Fortune, January 11, 1999)

COMPETITION

In 1997 and 1998 the consumer demand for sub-$1,000 computers continued to erode profit margins throughout the industry. Many major computer manufacturers responded by going after small and medium-sized businesses and by launching large-scale e-business ventures. The top marketers supported these moves with glossy multi-million-dollar brand advertising campaigns. IBM made the first and most dramatic move in this direction with a $130 million e-business initiative that targeted businesses using the Internet.

Among Hewlett-Packard's other competitors were Compaq, Dell, and Apple. Compaq spent some $102 million on advertising in 1997 and planned to double the amount in 1998, when it launched its first global brand campaign. Dell spent $43 million on ads in 1997 and planned to double the amount in 1998 to brand itself as the originator and leader in selling directly to the consumer and in providing technical support services to its customers. Apple spent $47 million on its "Think Different" campaign, which aimed to link the company's computers with Einstein, Picasso, and other creative people.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To demonstrate the excitement of its new campaign, Hewlett-Packard hosted a gala announcement event in San Francisco on November 11, 1997. At the kickoff event Hewlett-Packard chairman Platt described the company's image as "a lab coat that was empty." The company had excelled at engineering prowess but never at savvy self-promotion. The new campaign aimed to add to the company's strengths a new spirit of excitement, creativity, and innovation. Along with the new advertising, Hewlett-Packard introduced new product packaging, in-store merchandising, and vending machines for its ink-jet printer supplies.

The introduction of the "Expanding Possibilities" campaign meant dropping Goodby, Silverstein & Partners' award-winning campaign that used the tag line "Built by engineers. Used by normal people." One reason for the switch was to dispel the notion that the company was dominated by engineers. "The consumer brand strategy and advertising campaign aim to make the HP brand more relevant to consumers by revealing the company's dynamic side and dispelling the idea that HP is only a printer company," said the firm's Antonio

Perez. ''People used to say HP was a great stealth marketer,'' said Jill Kramer, the company's marketing communications manager, in Adweek. ''There's been growing recognition with HP that our brand is truly an asset and that is something we should be investing in. We are becoming more visible and more aggressive.''

Part of the reason for a move toward consumers was the rapid pace of change. With technology and products evolving so quickly, consumers were easily confused and often felt behind the times. Executives at Hewlett-Packard felt that a finely honed brand identity might attract consumers looking for a guide through the digital and technology jungle. In addition, the company recognized that the market for traditional business products was expanding to include in-home and consumer use. Lower-cost, higher-quality printers, scanners, and all-in-one machines made the products attractive outside the typical corporate or business setting. The campaign also called attention to Hewlett-Packard's Internet products, something it had been producing for years but had never promoted to the public.

Hewlett-Packard sometimes referred to the new campaign as ''the real life campaign'' because the strategy was to shine the spotlight on people not usually associated with technology. Grandparents and children were highlighted, and they shared their stories in their own words. The intent was not just to show what people could do with Hewlett-Packard products but also to demonstrate what the products could help people achieve. Hewlett-Packard products were presented as engines for consumers' creative thinking.

Although Hewlett-Packard wanted to change its image with the ''Expanding Possibilities'' campaign, there were certain elements in its marketing effort and image that were retained. The company logo and the display of the Hewlett-Packard name with the logo remained the same. The company also maintained continuity with its advertising agencies. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners continued handling the ads for Hewlett-Packard printers and scanners and for the company's other computer equipment. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising continued the advertising for the company's Pavilion line of personal computers, and Winkler Advertising continued to create the company's ads for laser printer supplies.

OUTCOME

Independent research showed that the ads were successful in changing the perceptions of consumers. According to Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, studies showed that the ads had helped Hewlett-Packard come to be perceived as a company that ''empowers people to 'make exciting things happen.' '' People's awareness that Hewlett-Packard made more than just printers also increased.

In March 1998 the Business Journal of San Jose reported that Hewlett-Packard led the market as the top seller of workstations running off Microsoft Windows. It sold nearly 155,000 Windows-based workstations, or 42 percent of the market, in 1997. The journal attributed part of Hewlett-Packard's success to the ''Expanding Possibilities'' campaign.

The original three ''Expanding Possibilities'' spots won two Icon Awards, and ''Buck'' won a silver Clio.

FURTHER READING

Elkin, Tobi. ''Upfront: The Clients—Brands: Computer.'' Adweek, May 18, 1998.

''HP's New Brand Advertising Campaign Demonstrates How Consumers Can 'Expand Possibilities,' '' Business Wire, November 12, 1997.

Johnson, Bradley. ''Seeing Opening, HP Rushes New Global Ad Effort.'' Adweek, March 2, 1998.

''The Pack.'' Brandweek, September 28, 1998.

Chris John Amorosino

YOU + HP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Long known as a reliable but predictable maker of computer printers, Hewlett-Packard Company (HP) was, in 2003, engaged in a recasting of its moribund image, a project initiated by HP's chief executive officer, Carly Fiorina, after a divisive 2002 merger with computer company Compaq. That year HP unveiled its most ambitious consumer advertising campaign ever. The new campaign, called ''You + HP,'' featured HP's digital cameras and imaging products, a segment of the Fortune 100 company's operations that was seen as a major growth opportunity.

''You + HP'' supplemented an ongoing enterprise campaign that had introduced the ''+'' graphic as a means of showcasing HP's partnerships with other companies and institutions and that further positioned the old-line company as a forward-looking, glamorous company in tune with twenty-first-century lifestyles. Developed by HP's main U.S. advertising agency, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners of San Francisco, the campaign broke in October 2003 with the risky use of 20-page print inserts, first in USA Today and later in trendsetting magazines, and went on to feature some of the most talked-about television spots of the time. Directed by François Vogel, the television spots dramatized the digital-photography revolution with visuals integrating still frames and live action, while catchy pop music by the Cure (in the campaign's first year) and the Kinks (in the second year) played as the spots' sound track.

Carly Fiorina, January 8, 2004. © STEVE MARCUS/LAS VEGAS SUN/REUTERS/CORBIS.

The print and television portions of "You + HP" were well received by industry commentators as well as the general public, and the campaign was credited with effectively updating HP's image for a new generation of consumers. The campaign continued to evolve, and the company's broader marketing efforts kept the "+ HP" idea as their starting point. HP's change in direction, however, was not welcomed by all; the company's board of directors ousted Fiorina in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

HP had a storied history of innovation and was a Fortune 100 company when Carly Fiorina took over as chief executive officer in 1999. Though the company was well known for its quality products and particularly for its printers, "it had become clear," according to Advertising Age, "that HP had to do something to change its consumer image." HP's takeover of its rival Compaq in 2002—at a time when PC sales (the heart of Compaq's business) were abysmal—raised further questions about the company's direction in the precarious postbubble marketplace. Fiorina and Allison Johnson, HP's senior vice president for global brand and communications, asked agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to answer these questions by showcasing the merger itself and then by focusing on other high-profile but previously unpublicized HP partnerships in a large-scale rebranding push that broke in the fall of 2002.

Ads touting the merger used an "HP + Compaq" graphic to show the strength of the partnership, and the "+" sign was then used as a unifying visual symbol in the larger branding campaign, which extolled HP's contributions to an impressive array of corporate and institutional partners. The campaign was launched with "Anthem," a television spot that, as Creativity magazine noted, "linked HP technology to bigger and cooler things—Dreamworks' imagemaking, FedEx's efficiency, BMW's Formula 1 need for speed." Other memorable ads were "Restore," which brought figures from a Dutch master painting to life in order to illustrate the role HP played in restoring art for London's National Gallery, and "The Next Shift," which featured iconic toys—Slinky, Elmo, Spiderman, and others—commuting to work in Manhattan as a way of illustrating HP's involvement in keeping Toys "R" Us stores stocked and ready for business. Creativity selected Goodby's HP branding work as its campaign of the year for 2003, arguing that the spots had worked together to "render formerly square HP a magnetic new personality."

Meanwhile the rapid rise in popularity of digital cameras presented one of the few bright spots in the dismal technology sectors of the struggling American economy. As the 2003 holiday season approached, digital cameras were poised to overtake traditional cameras in yearly sales for the first time. Though HP was not known for its cameras, its wide portfolio of products meant that it was positioned to offer consumers an integrated system for home digital photography.

TOO COOL?

Though no one argued that Carly Fiorina had been a bold, decisive leader during her tenure at HP, her February 2005 dismissal generated plenty of speculation about the overall value of her contributions to the company. Many pointed to the Compaq acquisition—narrowly approved over the open hostility of Walter Hewlett, son of the company's founder—as an outright blunder, moving HP as it did into a heavy investment in PCs at the expense of its lucrative printer business. Some observers even wondered whether Fiorina's drastic makeover of the HP image, celebrated though it had been in advertising circles, could be classified a success. As analyst Rob Enderle told the San Francisco Chronicle, "When she took over, HP was kind of stuck in the mud. Now, it's clearly a much more vibrant company, but it's harder to tell what it is. It used to have a clear identity—like your grandpa five years after retirement, really nice but not going anyplace. Now, it has a faster-moving capability, but it would have been nice to keep the warm, fuzzy part."

TARGET MARKET

"You + HP" specifically targeted consumers, which distinguished the campaign from other HP enterprise and business-to-business efforts. Digital-imaging products were becoming integral to the personal lives of ordinary Americans, so these products in particular offered HP the opportunity to position itself as "the ultimate lifestyle technology company," in the words of Advertising Age.

Because most of those who were buying digital cameras were first-time purchasers, it was imperative that HP emphasize the simplicity of the new technology. At the same time, simplicity could not be the campaign's main message, because HP did not want to appear to be pointing out consumers' ignorance. Goodby and HP therefore pitched the company's digital-imaging products as vehicles for promoting individuals' creativity and fulfillment. Scott Berg, director of worldwide media for HP, told Adweek, "Our position was to say the digital camera could become a natural extension of, or appendage to, your being, that you are free from the tyranny of the photo lab." By linking the HP brand image with the inspirational notion of personal fulfillment, Fiorina aimed at making the tech giant a true pop-culture brand along the lines of Coca-Cola or Nike. The "You + HP" campaign, then, was meant to cut across demographic lines, and it dwarfed all previous HP attempts to target consumers.

To make the pitch specific to HP, the campaign pointed to the company's full range of products, suggesting that the seamless transition from picture taking to picture printing was possible because HP could satisfy every step of the process. Consumers could take pictures with an HP camera, store and manipulate them on an HP personal computer, and print them using an HP printer, ink cartridge, and paper.

COMPETITION

Given its sprawling portfolio HP competed with a wide range of companies, but its "You + HP" campaign, while leveraging and further establishing its overall brand identity, directly pitted the company against other digital-camera manufacturers. At the time of the campaign it was number six among digital-camera vendors in the United States, well behind segment leaders Eastman Kodak Company and Sony Corporation.

Kodak's success, according to Advertising Age, was chiefly attributable to its "century-long simple stance that Kodak equals pictures." Though hampered somewhat by losses in the rapidly diminishing film-photography side of its business, Kodak could claim, like HP, to offer simple solutions to the entire picture-making process, especially as PCs became unnecessary for printing. Kodak had the industry-leading photo printer as well as the industry-leading online printing and storage site (called the Kodak EasyShare Gallery), and it had kiosks at major retail stores, such as Wal-Mart and CVS, that allowed consumers yet another outlet for printing pictures. Kodak's digital-imaging ads therefore focused on ease of use while reinforcing the company's history of photographic excellence.

Sony likewise made appeals to consumers based on its legacy, but that legacy was one of "quality technology and cutting-edge design," according to Advertising Age, rather than one of film photography. This image merged neatly with the company's digital-imaging marketing efforts, which drew attention to the convenient size and sleekness of Sony cameras. In 2005 Sony reinforced its image by unveiling the tagline "WorryFree Digital Products," orchestrating a marketing push with partner retailers to head off the concerns of first-time digital-camera buyers and assure them that its products were simple and easy to use.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"You + HP" was launched with a 20-page print insert in the October 2, 2003, edition of USA Today. The idea of spending $10 million on such an insert, designed to run in about a dozen publications, went against the grain of traditional print advertising for photography brands, which tended to focus on maximum coverage and frequency. Because the campaign was "more lifestyle-oriented than anything else," as Berg told Adweek, the company "had to find a way to stand out in unique environments" rather than take a blanket approach to print placement. Goodby's creative team decided that the magazines in which the insert would appear after its launch should be ones whose editorial focus celebrated the power of photography; the team thus chose such titles as Vogue, the New Yorker, People, Entertainment Weekly, InStyle, ESPN: The Magazine, GQ, Travel + Leisure, and Condé Nast Traveler. The inserts put the consumer at the center of HP's message, featuring the word "You" in a prominent position on nearly every page, employing vibrant photo collages and statements such as "You are a point-and-shoot revolutionary with an itchy shutter finger" and "You are the Van Gogh of pic files." The ads featured the full range of HP digital-imaging products, pointing out the brand's coverage of the entire picture-making process but forgoing the usual listings of technical specifications.

The campaign's initial television spots, directed by Vogel and shot in Barcelona, further underscored the revolutionary nature of digital-photography technology. In both "You" and "Statue," people in social settings and on city streets were frozen in still frames suggesting photographs, while the scenes' action moved on briskly and a continuous stream of individual moments were framed before dissolving back into motion. The fluidity of the movement from human interaction to still frame, along with the profusion of photographic possibilities suggested, communicated the limitless options available to the digital-camera owner while dramatizing the integration of artistic expression and ordinary life. The arresting visual effects worked with the Cure's moody 1989 hit song "Pictures of You" to create, as Adweek put it, "an emotional paean to digital photography."

In 2004 Goodby's creative team planned a second series of television spots to be paired with the upbeat Kinks song "Picture Book." This time the challenge was to go beyond illustrating picture-taking possibilities and find a visual method for dramatizing the ease of printing photos. In a test spot filmed as his bid to direct the new series, Vogel shot himself at his desk putting empty white frames around his head while coolly singing along to the Kinks song playing in the background. Vogel then tweaked the footage until it appeared that he was effortlessly creating a series of casual self-portraits from thin air. Not only did this test ad get him the job, but it was reshot with little alteration as the 30-second spot "François." In the spot "Picture Book" the principle of picking photographs out of thin air was applied to crowds of people. At the start of the commercial, two rows of people held frames to their faces, after which the frames became pictures, and then the people traded these self-portraits with one another. In "Relay" the photographic frame was passed like a baton between groups and individuals. Photos transformed into dynamic real-life scenes and vice versa as the frame made its way through a hypnotic flux of distinctive people and moments.

OUTCOME

"You + HP" was widely acknowledged as a key contributor to the ongoing transformation of the company's image from, as Advertising Age put it, "well-regarded though stodgy into a brand akin to sexier rivals such as Sony Corp." For the print insert that launched the campaign, which "cut through in a medium that HP's rivals have dominated for decades," Goodby was awarded Adweek's Media Plan of the Year for Best Use of Magazines. Goodby's market research indicated that the inserts raised consumers' likelihood to buy HP digital-imaging products by 8 percent. The 2004 television spots generated, according to Goodby and HP, more consumer feedback than either had ever gotten from an ad, and Adweek named "You + HP" its Campaign of the Year for 2004. TV Guide 's praise went beyond the realm of advertising, claiming that the spot "Picture Book" was the best 60 seconds of television then on the air.

In 2004 HP extended the "You + HP" concept to digital music, partnering with Apple to sell HP-branded iPods and offering iTunes software on its PCs. The iPod, an MP3 player that allowed consumers to mix and match music to suit their personalities, offered HP a further vehicle for connecting the personal-expression ethos to its brand image. A business-to-business campaign called "Change + HP" was likewise launched in 2004, using the company's new cutting-edge image to appeal to information-technology decision makers in the rapidly evolving tech marketplace. "You + HP," along with the umbrella "+ HP" idea and HP's image, continued to evolve through 2005. Whether HP's change in direction was a welcome one remained an open question, however, at least to the company's board of directors. Fiorina was ousted as chief executive officer in February 2005.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Campaign of the Year: Hewlett-Packard." Adweek, February 7, 2005.

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Hewlett-Packard." Advertising Age, December 13, 2004.

———. "Kodak Scores with Digital Cameras but Film-Biz Losses Cloud Big Picture." Advertising Age, April 25, 2005.

———. "Sony, Kodak Lead U.S. Battle for Share in Digital Cameras." Advertising Age, May 31, 2004.

"Campaign of the Year: HP." Creativity, December 2003.

Champagne, Christine. "Agency Producer: Josh Reynolds." Adweek, January 24, 2005.

Dolliver, Mark. "Creative: Portfolio." Adweek, October 20, 2003.

"Goodby, Silverstein & Partners." Advertising Age, January 12, 2004.

Granatstein, Lisal. "Goodby, Silverstein & Partners." Adweek, June 21, 2004.

"HP 'Francois.'" Creativity, April 2005.

Khermouch, Gerry. "Can HP Make Consumers' Hearts Race?" Business Week Online, October 2, 2003.

Maddox, Kate. "HP Demonstrates Power of Partnerships." B to B, October 25, 2004.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Creative All-Stars." Adweek, January 19, 2004.

Said, Carolyn. "Fiorina: 'Wicked Smart' but Ultimately Unsuccessful." San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2005.

Wasserman, Todd. "HP Puts More Focus on Digital Cameras." Brandweek, September 1, 2003.

Woodward, Sarah. "Francois Vogel." Shoot, March 26, 2004.

Mark Lane

Hilton Hotels Corporation

9336 Civic Center Dr.
Beverly Hills, California 90210
USA
Telephone: (310) 278-4321
Fax: (310) 205-7678
Web site: www.hiltonworldwide.com

■■■

IT HAPPENS AT THE HILTON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Ownership of the Hilton Hotel brand had been split apart in 1964. As a result, the hotel chain was controlled by two distinct groups—Hilton Hotel Corporation (HHC), which held the rights to the brand in the United States, and Hilton International Company (HIC, a division of the Ladbroke Group PLC), which owned the brand abroad. Since their breakup, HHC and HIC had maintained separate marketing and public relations efforts. In 1997, however, facing intense competition in both domestic and international markets, the two companies formed the Hilton Alliance, which was committed to creating a single global image for the hotel chain. After changing the Hilton logo, the companies selected advertising agency Bozell Worldwide to produce a branding campaign that would differentiate Hilton from its competitors. The company wanted a unique message to position itself advantageously among the other massive global hotel chains competing for the patronage of business and leisure consumers. The result was the "It Happens at the Hilton" campaign, which debuted on October 5, 1998, and used photographs of celebrities and everyday travelers to "convey the strength of the Hilton name and its association with quality, achievement, innovation, and timeless style," said Robert Dirks, the senior vice president of marketing for HHC.

Hilton allocated a budget of approximately $10 million for the first three months of the campaign, which was comprised mainly of print ads. "It Happens at the Hilton" sought to epitomize the Hilton experience for its audience. Unlike traditional advertising for major hotel chains, which typically focused on the nuts and bolts of the visiting experience—mainly rooms or services—Hilton's campaign used striking photos of past and present celebrities at various Hilton hotels. One spot featured ex-Beatle John Lennon and his wife Yoko Ono during their "Bed-in for Peace" at the Amsterdam Hilton. Political figures Winston Churchill and Nelson Mandela, as well as celebrities Larry King and Naomi Campbell, also appeared in ads bearing the "It Happens at the Hilton" tag line. To ensure that consumers were not alienated by a celebrity-laden campaign, however, Hilton also ran a substantial number of ads that portrayed average Hilton guests, ranging from CEOs and other business people to families on vacation. One print piece, for instance, depicted a family at a Hilton pool. "Relaxation now available in a convenient family size," the copy chirped. The company's goal was straightforward. "We want to show that so many things happen at the Hilton, from weddings to romance, and that Hilton is part of the community," Dirks told Advertising Age International. Hilton declared itself pleased with the campaign's result.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Hilton chain had come a long way from its beginning in 1925 when Conrad Hilton built the first hotel to carry his name in Dallas, Texas. By 1998 more than 400 Hilton hotels—ranging from resorts and casinos to airport business hotels—were operating in 50 countries. The company's 1964 decision to spin off its global properties into a separate entity, however, impeded Hilton from developing a consistent worldwide image. After Hilton's international wing was acquired by Trans World Airlines, HHC and HIC agreed not to develop their franchises in the other's zones. Nevertheless, the erstwhile siblings bickered over trademarks.

In the early 1990s HHC had struggled to forge an identity. Pernicious price wars among upper-class hotels led HHC, and its ad agency McCann-Erickson, to craft ads focused more on price and perks than on the chain's own attributes. The result was a frequently chaotic marketing strategy that relied heavily on special promotions, often to the detriment of HHC's bottom line. In an effort to rectify this situation, HHC severed its relationship with McCann in 1992 and hired Daley & Associates to develop a new ad campaign. The resulting "Take Me to the Hilton" effort helped the company overcome some of its difficulties, but HHC was still hampered by its inability to expand in overseas markets. The burgeoning travel market, both domestically and internationally, had generated a wave of consolidations in the industry, as hotel chains teamed up in order to offer broader options to consumers. As an industry insider explained in the January 16, 1995, issue of Brandweek, "just to be a domestic brand does not insure long-term visibility." HIC faced similar limitations by virtue of its exclusion from the sizeable U.S. market. Recognizing the importance of presenting a more unified front to its rivals, HHC and HIC linked their advertising, sales, loyalty programs, and development strategies, and then sought to leverage this new alliance into enhanced business opportunities.

TARGET MARKET

According to Advertising Age International, "It Happens at the Hilton" strove to appeal to people between the ages of 35 and 50 who were "active achievers among business and leisure groups." It would certainly be a challenge to attract an audience this broad within the confines of a single campaign. To do so, HHC opted to use a diverse array of photographs in the "It Happens at the Hilton" ads in the hope that this multifaceted approach would connect with consumers on various levels. For example, HHC chose to use images of celebrities from different generations at Hilton hotels both to grab people's attention with the famous faces and to reinforce the notion that Hilton had a long and storied history. The use of political icons such as Nelson Mandela and Winston Churchill was intended to lend the campaign a particular gravitas, which was calculated to appeal to the elite business travelers Hilton wanted to reach.

At the same time, the images of iconoclast John Lennon and supermodel Naomi Campbell ensured that the campaign would appear neither stuffy nor dated. In fact, the incorporation of celebrities such as these into the branding campaign let Hilton speak to a more status-conscious and upscale group of travelers. "The implied message to Hilton customers is, 'If it happens for these people at Hilton, it can happen for me too,'" Dirks explained. In a period when affluent business and recreational travelers had a slew of hotel options, "It Happens at the Hilton" provided the hotel chain a certain cachet that played well to its more status-oriented guests.

But Hilton was careful not to pursue this more upscale and business-oriented identity at the expense of other travelers. "We wanted consumers to know the hotel is accessible, not just for the rich and famous," Ken Sakoda, a Bozell vice president, said in the October 5, 1998, issue of Advertising Age. The company therefore presented a variety of scenes of everyday people enjoying the Hilton's amenities in order to balance the celebrity shots. Bozell also injected humor into these projects, and stressed the pleasure and convenience Hilton could bring to any vacation. In an ad for Hilton's line of resorts, a couple is shown sprawled in lounge chairs on the beach. "Tailored vacations call for a fitting," the tag line declared. By presenting real-life scenarios—such as weddings or stressed-out families in dire need of respite—Hilton made it possible for a whole other sector of consumers to relate to the scenes.

AN INCLUSIVE CAMPAIGN

"It Happens at the Hilton" was praised by South Africa's Commission for Racial Equality for its presentation of prominent black figures, such as Nelson Mandela and Naomi Campbell. Mandela was pictured at a Hilton in London during an African National Congress meeting, while Campbell was captured at the National Italian American Foundation Banquet at a Washington, D.C. Hilton. "It is always good to see black people portrayed in a positive light," a CRE spokesperson told The Voice. "However, all this does is emphasize how easy it is to produce a good advertisement and how biased other campaigns can be."

COMPETITION

Hilton's quest to forge a unified brand image occurred while many of its rival upscale hotel chains were striving to do the same. According to the Wall Street Journal, hotel occupancy rates in 1998 had reached a four year low because of overbuilding. At the same time, the industry was in the midst of a significant consolidation. Chains such as Marriott and Renaissance merged with each other to help bolster their presence on a national and global scale. The result of these agglomerations was a degree of industry-wide uniformity, as local or regional properties with their distinct characteristics, selling points, or histories, were folded into often generic multinational conglomerates. "If you ever stay in a three- or four-star hotel, they are increasingly offering more or less the same product and levels of comfort," Greg Delaney, one of the creative forces behind "It Happens at the Hilton," told Marketing Week. While hotels had once used such features as excellent service or a four-star dining room to differentiate themselves, by the mid-1990s, "these [were] standard in each sector," noted Marketing Week. "The only way that hoteliers [could now] stand out [was] through brand building."

One of Hilton's most formidable rivals was the Hyatt Hotels Corporation, which embarked on an updated global branding campaign in 1999. Created by agency Cramer Krasselt, these print ads targeted individual business and leisure travelers, meeting planners, travel agents, and corporate travel planners. While the campaign built upon Hyatt's slogan from a pre-existing campaign, "Feel the Hyatt Touch," it avoided the conventional formula of using service and traveler bonus programs as its focal point. Like Hilton, Hyatt acknowledged that "in the minds of our target audience, the difference between major hotel chains is becoming less and less apparent," a Hyatt spokesperson told Advertising Age on October 19, 1998.

Another large hotelier, Holiday Inn Worldwide, had launched its first branding campaign in 1997 to support its Crowne Plaza chain of high-end hotels. This campaign, "Get to Know Us, We'll Get to Know You," used famous "business personalities . . . to give the somewhat stony corporation a relatable face," explained the January 27, 1997, Brandweek. With agency Scaros & Casselman, Crowne selected celebrities who reflected the interests of its targeted guests to appear in its ads. For instance, Crowne used Armour Golf CEO Michael Magerman in a television spot that humorously showed hotel staffers so accustomed to Magerman's indoor golfing that they gracefully avoid golf balls flying across lobby floors as a matter of course. "A lot of upscale hotel users' principal hobby is golf," Crowne's marketing vice president told Brandweek. "Michael Magerman is an up-and-coming CEO, and, at 34, a prototypical Crowne Plaza user." Other spots depicted various comparable business leaders.

Some of Hilton's other competitors began to institute similar marketing programs as well. Marriott International, which had acquired Renaissance in 1997, consolidated its massive ad account in 1998 in order to better broadcast its message. Promus Hotels Corporation's Doubletree and Wyndham Hotels and Resorts, on the other hand, continued to stress the traditional attributes of pleasant rooms and attentive service, according to the June 28, 1999, issue of Advertising Age.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Hilton's challenge was to distinguish its brand from the numerous competing upscale hotel chains. It's first objective was, therefore, to make "It Happens at the Hilton" stand out from other hotel advertising. "There is a lot of hotel advertising out there, but if you take the logo off, they are almost interchangeable," a Bozell executive told Advertising Age on October 5, 1998. Using celebrities to represent the brand was essential to this agenda. But this approach was not without its danger. While "celebrity-driven ad campaigns [were] immediate attention-getters" that could break "through the clutter," of other advertising, the Chicago Tribune noted, Hilton's effort ran the risk of having consumers confuse its brand with those of other companies the celebrities had endorsed in the past. Alternately, consumers might assume that Hilton was too exclusive, if the likes of Naomi Campbell lodged there. "We had been concerned that the creative concept featuring personalities might not be relevant to everyday guests," Dirks said to Advertising Age International. To alleviate this risk, Hilton and Bozell conducted extensive pre-launch testing in key Hilton markets, such as Los Angeles, New York, and London, to ensure that "It Happens at the Hilton" was accessible to its target audience.

Having cleared this hurdle, Hilton's next task was to bring the message of the campaign—that guests should expect a memorable experience when staying at the Hilton—to its chosen audience of elite business and leisure travelers. Print was the predominant medium used because of its ability to hone in on select niches. For instance, since frequent business travelers were a key market, Hilton erected poster versions of the spots at international airports and ran them in in-flight magazines such as American Way and Delta Sky. To address business people even when they were not on the road, Hilton also advertised in publications including the Financial Times, Business Week, Time, Newsweek, U.S. News & World Report, as well as major market newspapers, such as the Wall Street Journal, USA Today, and the New York Times.

Moreover, Hilton utilized travel magazines so that it could connect with consumers planning leisure travel. Hilton placed ads in Travel & Leisure and Conde Nast Traveler as well as in family-focused magazines such as Family Fun and Travel & Leisure Family. Finally, Hilton pitched "It Happens at the Hilton" to meeting planners at large corporations by printing the pieces in meeting planner magazines. There was also a small portion of the campaign devoted to television. For the most part, Hilton would trade rooms for airtime on programs such as Entertainment Weekly and broadcasts of the Oscars and Grammys. These short 15-second spots employed the "It Happens at the Hilton" tag line.

The campaign was global in its scope, running on four continents. The first two print pieces broke not only in the United States and Canada, but also in Australia, the United Kingdom, Germany, and various Asian nations. Publications in each country were used, such as the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung in Germany. The international focus was imperative if Hilton was to reach the growing market of American business people who traveled frequently, as well as international business travelers around the world. According to a company press release, Hilton wanted the campaign to be seen by more than three-quarters of international business travelers.

OUTCOME

Hilton was delighted with the results of "It Happens at the Hilton." Consumer surveys indicated that the campaign had performed well above expectations in reaching its target audience. Moreover, research revealed that Hilton had successfully negotiated the risks of incorporating famous personalities, according to Hilton's vice president of marketing. Despite the company's concerns, the campaign had remained rooted to the product it touted. Consumers understood that the celebrity photos were used to underscore the unique qualities of the hotel—that things "happened there"—and did not feel put off by them. Hilton continued the campaign into 1999.

The company was so impressed with the effectiveness of "It Happens at the Hilton" that it extended the campaign for internal use. Just as "It Happens at the Hilton" signaled to consumers a new identity for the venerable old hotel, the company inaugurated "Hilton Pride Makes It Happen" to bring this same message to its staff. These posters strove to remind employees that the "new" Hilton was their creation and responsibility and that they should take pride in the hotels where they worked.

FURTHER READING

Cuneo, Alice. "Hilton Touts Some Famous Hotel Goers." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998.

Fannin, Rebecca. "Hilton Features Celebrities, Reaches for Everyday Guests." Advertising Age International, January 11, 1999.

Goetz, Thomas. "Hotel Occupancy Rates Hit Four Year Low." Wall Street Journal, May 14, 1998.

Killgren, Lucy. "Hotel Chains Wake Up to the Power of Branding." Marketing Week, January 11, 1999.

Lazarus, George. "Star Power Gets the Lead in New Hilton Campaign." Chicago Tribune, September 28, 1998.

Salomon, Alan. "Hilton Hotels: Alison Kal." Advertising Age, June 28, 1999.

———. "Hyatt Slates $6 Million for '99 Branding Campaign." Advertising Age, October 19, 1998.

Underwood, Elaine. "Hilton versus Hilton." Brandweek, January 16, 1995.

———. "$7 Million Crowne Push Taps CEO Power." Brandweek, January 27, 1997.

Rebecca Stanfel

Hollywood Entertainment Corporation

9275 SW Peyton Ln.
Wilsonville, Oregon 97070
USA
Telephone: (503) 570-1600
Fax: (503) 570-1680
E-mail: info@hollywoodvideo.com
Web site: www.hollywoodvideo.com

■■■

WELCOME TO HOLLYWOOD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Hollywood Entertainment Corporation hurtled into 1998 at a screaming expansion pace for its chain of Hollywood Video retail stores—the company planned to open more than 353 new stores in 1998 to bring the total number up to 1,260 by year's end. The decade-old chain of superstores had quickly become the second largest video-rental chain in the nation, and chairman, founder, and CEO Mark J. Wattles believed that Hollywood Video had ample opportunity for growth. "[In 1993] we were a 15 store chain and embarked on a very aggressive store opening schedule." Wattles announced in a prepared statement. "Last week [April 13, 1998] we opened our 1,000th video superstore and we plan on opening our 2,000th within the next three years. With over 20,000 employees, and a very strong management team, we are not only focused on growth, but the continued improvement of our operations, as well."

To position Hollywood Video as the superlative entertainment store, Hollywood Entertainment launched its first major branding campaign in May 1998. Developed by New York-based Cliff Freeman and Partners, an agency known for its creative, cutting-edge work, the "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign consisted of nine television spots and eight radio ads. The radio ads followed the theme "Sixty Second Theater" and provided humorous synopses of popular movie plots. The television ads were set in Hollywood Video stores and featured store employees in amusing behind-the-scenes situations. Wattles discussed the purpose of the campaign—estimated to have cost anywhere from $11 million to $20 million—at the company shareholders' meeting in May 1998. "We want to be a brand so powerful that when you think of movies you think of Hollywood [Video]," he said. President and COO Jeff Yapp agreed. "We want our customers to think of Hollywood Video as their inside connection to Hollywood and the world of entertainment," Yapp said in a prepared statement. "As our mission statement says, 'We are Hollywood. We are entertainment.'"

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Hollywood Video first opened its doors in 1988 with one store in Portland, Oregon, run by owner Wattles and his wife. From the outset Hollywood Video stores were large, brightly lit with an abundance of neon, and had 50 to 70 television monitors blasting the latest video offers. Employees dressed in red bow ties and cummerbunds. Every detail was designed to mimic the excitement and bright lights of Hollywood. And like Hollywood and the movie industry, Hollywood Video moved quickly and aggressively—only five years after its formation and with a total of 16 stores, the company went public.

With the acquisition of Texas video-rental chain Video Central in 1994, the number of Hollywood Video stores rose to 100, and by 1995 the company was the third largest video-rental chain in the United States. By 1996 Hollywood had assumed the number-two position, and the company reported net income in 1996 of $20.63 million, a surge of 75 percent over net income in 1995, which was $11.79 million. The company had more than 500 stores in 29 states by October of 1996. Wattles told the Portland Oregonian, "In the third quarter [of 1996], we averaged better than a new store opening every 36 hours . . . and in the fourth quarter we plan on averaging over a new store every 24 hours." In 1997 the company opened 356 new stores, and net income continued to rise—in the second quarter of 1997, Hollywood enjoyed an 83 percent increase in profits.

THE PRICE OF FAME

Though Don LaFontaine's voice was familiar to many moviegoers, his face was not, and this may have motivated his acceptance to sit in the small cabinet for multiple takes. Cliff Freeman's executive creative director, Arthur Bijur, told SHOOT that voice talents "probably live for the moment that their voice is attached to their face." Tate & Partners' Baker Smith, who directed the commercial, agreed, noting that LaFontaine must have been eager to participate in that ad because "we didn't find out until we were shooting that he is slightly claustrophobic and asthmatic, and here we are shutting him up in a dark little cabinet, and when we opened it up to check on him he would be in there taking hits off his medicine inhaler."

TARGET MARKET

More than 80 percent of households in the United States owned VCRs in the late 1990s, and these households were filled with potential Hollywood Video customers. As a result Hollywood's target audience was quite broad. The company's advertising agency indicated that Hollywood's target market consisted of those aged 18 to 45 as well as suburban families with children. Wattles discussed the company's consumer target in an interview in the Wall Street Transcript in 1994 and said, "'. . . when the advertising agencies ask what your demographic profile is, I say, 'Alive.'" Nearly everyone, Wattles elaborated, enjoyed watching movies. "One thing that's nice about our business is our demographic profile. It's so simple. Obviously there are demographic profiles of people who watch more movies than others but the curve is very slight. We're not just a teenage business, or a midlife business, or an X-generation business." To appeal to this wide audience, Hollywood Video stores focused on the one thing all the customers shared—the love of movies. "Our store design, our marketing, and our advertising reflect the name and image of Hollywood," he explained. "We try to create an exciting environment that is movie and/or movie star oriented."

Though Hollywood Video's audience was sizeable, many viewers were growing increasingly distracted by new entertainment technologies and options, such as pay-per-view television programming, digital video disks (DVD), the Internet, and expanded offerings from cable television and direct broadcast satellite. Industry analysts labeled the video-rental market mature, with little growth left. According to a study for the Video Software Rental Association, total revenue from the rental market declined 4.2 percent in 1997. Tom Wolzien, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein, pointed to a 1996 poll of 1,000 households with satellite television programming that discovered a 70 percent drop in video rentals. Still, many believed an audience for video rentals remained. Roffman Miller Associates' Marvin Roffman told the Los Angeles Daily News: "There were a lot of people on Wall Street that were giving the death knell to the industry . . . [b]ut it's probably not going to die for a long time. Home video is still a very viable business." Hollywood Video believed this as well, and to continue to attract customers the company implemented many customer-oriented policies, such as lower rental prices, guaranteed availability of popular rentals, and five-day rentals on every video in the store. According to the Portland Oregonian, Wattles was not intimidated by new technologies or forecasts of doom; Hollywood Video would, Wattles stated, change with the times and with clientele tastes. "As long as interest in movies continues, . . . there will be opportunities," Wattles vowed.

COMPETITION

Generating three times as much revenue as the theatre arena, the home video market was extremely lucrative and, as a result, highly competitive. Number-one ranked Blockbuster Inc. (previously Blockbuster Entertainment Corp.), which was three times the size of Hollywood Video, had dominated the field for a decade and at the end of 1997 boasted 4,000 stores in the United States and 6,000 globally. Purchased by entertainment giant Viacom Inc. in 1994, Blockbuster enjoyed a commanding market share of 25 percent at the beginning of 1998. Hollywood, though expanding rapidly, had just fewer than 1,000 stores by Christmas 1997 and a market share of about 5 percent, according to the Portland Oregonian. Blockbuster was not invincible, however, and the company struggled in 1996 and 1997 as a result of financial and marketing blunders. Hollywood Video, meanwhile, enjoyed rapid expansion and healthy profits.

Though media reports made much of the competition between Blockbuster and Hollywood, Wattles maintained that he did not view Blockbuster as a rival or an enemy. "[W]hile Blockbuster is certainly the Goliath, I would not describe us as the David at all. We are not out to slay Goliath," Wattles said in the Wall Street Transcript in 1994. He referred to Blockbuster as "our friendly competitor" and insisted there was room in the market for both superstore chains. Still, the two appeared to be rivals—Hollywood claimed to have the largest number of titles, offered guaranteed availability of popular releases, and had aggressive pricing and rental strategies. Blockbuster, with a new CEO and renewed focus on video rentals, responded in late 1997 by lowering its prices, extending rental periods, providing incentives for returning rentals early, and offering more new releases. Blockbuster also launched a new advertising campaign in early 1998 with the theme, "Get your movie . . . and go home happy."

Blockbuster and Hollywood Video were the clear leaders in the video-rental market, but both companies had to contend with independent retailers as well as national and regional chains such as third-ranked Video Update Inc. and Suncoast Motion Picture Company. The independents, on the other hand, complained that they could not compete with video giants, which were capable of instituting revenue-sharing deals with movie studios that allowed them to purchase videos at much lower costs and thus offer larger numbers of popular titles—the Independent Video Retailers Group stated that independent stores located within three miles of a Blockbuster store suffered from an 11 percent decline in revenues during the first half of 1998.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By the time Hollywood Video launched its "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign in mid-1998 the company had a strong first quarter under its belt—it had opened 88 new stores and reported revenue of $170 million, a 54 percent jump from the first quarter of 1997. The company also launched a new store design that emulated the allure of Hollywood to a greater degree—the bright lights and monitors were accompanied by Hollywood memorabilia and photos of movie stars. The campaign's ads appeared in major U.S. markets and spotlighted Hollywood Video's new releases, promotions, guarantee policies, and, as Wattles said in the Portland Oregonian, "that we love movies. . . . We are Hollywood." Arthur Bijur, Cliff Freeman's executive creative director, explained in SHOOT that the campaign was designed to show consumers that Hollywood Video "really gets Hollywood and everything about it, . . . to show that it's more a place which is really all about movies." To accomplish this, Bijur said, the spots focused on things that were uniquely and utterly Hollywood.

"Action" was set in the action/adventure section of a Hollywood Video store. An older cowboy dressed in black attempted to teach two male employees how to throw a fake punch as customers looked on in curiosity. The employee practicing to hit ran into some trouble with the maneuver. The cowboy explained, "That was a good start, but we don't actually want to hit the person." The puncher tried again but was unsuccessful. On the third punch the second employee slumped to the ground as the cowboy exclaimed, "That was so close!" Another television spot, "Don," lampooned movie trailers and featured Don LaFontaine, who actually provided voice-overs for many trailers. In the ad a couple approached the counter with a video and asked the employee to tell them a bit about the movie. The employee knocked on a cabinet underneath the counter and LaFontaine, dressed in a suit, emerged. The employee handed him the tape, and LaFontaine read in his instantly recognizable voice: "From Flesh to Steel. From Blood to Blade. From Man to Mutant. Evil has a new enemy. Justice has a new weapon. And the world . . . has a new hero." LaFontaine then handed the tape back to the employee and crawled back into the cabinet. Cliff Freeman art director Matt Vescovo explained in SHOOT that "the whole idea is that Hollywood Video is totally Hollywood, and one of the things we associate with Hollywood is this guy's voice. So what better guy is there to describe a movie to customers than this guy who's an authority and knows everything about every movie and everybody has heard his voice a million times?" Other spots included "Birds," which parodied Alfred Hitchcock's movie of the same name, "Musical," which featured two male employees dancing and singing about the store's five-day rental policy, and "Credits," which spoofed the final credits of a movie.

The "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign also included several radio spots. All followed the "Sixty Second Theater" theme and provided a humorous glimpse into the plots of such popular movies as Tomorrow Never Dies, As Good As It Gets, Scream 2, and Good Will Hunting. In the ads the announcer began, "Hollywood Video presents Sixty Second Theater, where we try, unsuccessfully, to pack all the action and drama of a two-hour Hollywood production into 60 seconds." A comical take-off of the plot ensued, complete with actors impersonating the celebrity voices. The Good Will Hunting spot ended with the announcer stating,

"If this doesn't satisfy your urge to see Good Will Hunting, and we can't say we blame you, then rent it today at Hollywood Video, where Good Will Hunting is guaranteed to be in stock, or next time it's free."

OUTCOME

The "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign was well received and resulted in numerous honors. Not only did the campaign garner several awards at the 40th annual Clio Awards Festival but the radio portion of the campaign received a gold award at the One Show, and several of the spots were recognized at the national Addy Awards. "Action" was named on Adweek's "Best Spots of the Year—1998" list, and the campaign took honors at the 46th International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. Cliff Freeman was selected as the Agency of the Year by both the Clio Awards and SHOOT.

Hollywood Entertainment managed to open about one store per day in 1998, and by mid-1999 there were more than 1,300 Hollywood Video stores in 43 states; Hollywood Video's market share was about 10 percent. For the quarter ended September 30, 1998, Hollywood reported revenue of $184.1 million, a 48 percent increase from the same period in 1997. Same-store sales enjoyed an increase of 7 percent. For the first quarter of 1999 the company reported revenue of $260 million, up 53 percent from the same period in 1998. Same-store sales jumped by 18 percent, and net income climbed 92 percent. In October 1998 Hollywood purchased Reel.com, Inc., a leading Web-based video retailer, thus expanding its distribution channels. As the company's Web site indicated: "The past success of Hollywood Video is apparent and the future is bright. If the Hollywood Video story were a movie, the final frame of this action packed adventure would not read 'The End,' but rather 'To Be Continued . . . ' "

FURTHER READING

Garcia, Sandra. "Tales from the Script." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 1998, p. 30.

Hill, Jim. "Hollywood Continues its Rapid Expansion." Portland Oregonian, May 29, 1997, p. B1.

———. "Hollywood Kicks Off Big Ad Push." Portland Oregonian, May 28, 1998, p. C1.

Oberlag, Reginald. "Smith Pokes Fun at Movie Trailers for Hollywood Video." SHOOT, August 14, 1998, p. 14.

Mariko Fujinaka

Home Box Office, Inc.

1100 Avenue of the Americas
New York, New York 10036
USA
Telephone: (212) 512-1000
Fax: (212) 512-1000
Web site: www.hbo.com

■■■

IT'S NOT T.V. IT'S HBO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in 1972, Home Box Office (HBO) was the oldest and largest premium pay television channel in the United States. Unlike network television and most other cable channels, which raised revenue by selling advertising spots during programming, HBO relied exclusively on subscribers' monthly fees to generate income. As consumers' entertainment choices multiplied dramatically over the years, HBO strove to construct a distinctive niche for itself and to stand out amid competitors, which included other television channels, movies, home video rentals, and the Internet.

In 1996 HBO launched an innovative $60 million television advertising campaign in an effort to draw attention to itself and to strengthen its brand recognition. The spots, conceived by ad agency BBDO New York, sought to reflect the spirit and the programming of HBO. Instead of previewing upcoming events or providing a traditional "tune-in" message, the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign attempted to present the viewer with a sample of HBO's programming. The five spots making up the campaign deliberately strove to be humorous, creative, and original.

According to the company, based on surveys prior to and following the launch of the campaign, "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" achieved its goal of increasing the network's brand image and awareness among consumers. Further, the campaign earned praise from the media and advertising industries. "Chimps," the first commercial of the campaign, was awarded the first ever commercial Emmy. In 1997 the "Chimps" spot received a Gold Clio Award in the Television/Cinema category. As the campaign continued, its focus shifted, and the slogan evolved into the network's mantra, setting HBO apart not only from other pay television channels but also from all TV networks. The Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing (CTAM) named the campaign its Hall of Fame winner in 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In its early days HBO primarily showed Hollywood movies and high-profile sporting events such as boxing. In the mid-1980s, however, HBO began to emphasize original productions, which included critically acclaimed made-for-HBO movies such as And the Band Played On and From the Earth to the Moon, comedy shows such as The Larry Sanders Show, and dramatic series such as Oz. The shift toward original programming was fueled in part by the arrival of the VCR, which enabled viewers to rent at their convenience the same Hollywood movies broadcast by HBO. By the mid-1990s the network also offered original documentary films, animation specials, children's and family programming, extensive sporting events and shows, and coverage of contemporary music concerts. At the time of the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 30 percent of HBO's programming was original. By 1997 HBO reached roughly 23 million subscribers, approximately one-fourth of the viewing public. That same year it also won 19 Emmy Awards for its original films and shows, the most ever garnered by a cable television channel.

HBO's programming was recognized for being innovative and daring. The New York Times lauded the channel's "willingness to take a chance on unconventional programming and to allow writers and directors to operate with minimal interference." HBO produced movies dealing with such issues as abortion, AIDS, and racism. As a pay television channel independent of advertisers' pressures and demands, HBO had the flexibility for controversial and bold programming. "We're not selling ads," Jeffrey Bewkes, the company's CEO, told BusinessWeek. "We're not selling our audience to advertisers. We're selling our programming service to you." HBO's mandate, and the key to its survival and profitability, was to continue to expand its subscriber base.

Like the cable industry as a whole, HBO was subject to "churning," the phenomenon of tremendous fluctuations among subscribers. Each month a huge number of viewers disconnected their HBO service for a variety of reasons. Some signed up for a specific event, such as a high-profile tennis tournament, and then disconnected the next month. Others subscribed to HBO only during the winter months, when they knew they would spend more time indoors, and canceled the service in the spring and summer. Some lost their jobs or suffered other financial hardships, and some disconnected when they moved. Despite the constant drain of viewers, however, an even greater percentage signed up either as first-time or repeat subscribers.

There were other factors that made it challenging for HBO to attract and retain subscribers. Potential customers had a wide array of entertainment choices. Network and cable television, premium cable channels like HBO, Showtime, and the Disney Channel, and video rentals, movie theaters, and even chat rooms on the Internet—all vied for the consumer's entertainment time and dollars. It was in this competitive situation that HBO developed the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign. The goal was not only to distinguish HBO from its competitors but also to reflect the originality of much of HBO's programming. The commercials, with their quirky humor, compelling plots, and high-tech execution, were intended to encapsulate the strengths of HBO and keep the channel prominent in the consumer's mind.

GOODALL'S ROLE

Jane Goodall agreed to the "Chimps" commercial only when HBO and BBDO New York pledged to film wild chimpanzees, not captured, "entertainment," animals. Despite the fact that she only charged her normal speaking fee, Goodall was criticized for entering the commercial realm. She stated, however, that her goal was to help the plight of chimpanzees through the exposure of the commercial.

TARGET MARKET

With its huge base of subscribers, HBO had a diverse viewing audience. For that reason the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign did not target a narrow demographic group. HBO hoped to reach all segments of the American consumer market from ages 18 to 49. The image ads conceived by BBDO were considered an ideal means to reach this broad-based target. Because the spots did not focus on one aspect of HBO's programming but instead tried to hone the overall image of the channel, the campaign could appeal to all viewers. "The campaign tries to convey that we are a total entertainment package—that there is something for everyone," said Chris Donlay, HBO's manager of corporate affairs.

"We were not looking for a market share or Nielsen ratings," said Nancy Parmet, HBO's vice president of marketing, who oversaw the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign. "We were looking to break through the clutter." USA Today acknowledged the competitive and multifaceted state of the entertainment industry when it declared that to thrive "HBO must remain top-of-mind with consumers."

COMPETITION

In striving to establish a strong brand identity for HBO, the campaign had to differentiate the channel from its competitors. HBO's most direct competitors were other pay television channels. Although it was by far the most watched pay television station, HBO faced stiff competition from other cable channels. Networks such as Showtime and TNT followed HBO's lead in offering more original programming. "There was a time when HBO's programming was the only thing worth watching on cable, but that's not the case anymore," a television industry analyst told the New York Times.

HBO's long-term success involved more than simply staying afloat in the premium channel television industry. The channel was also competing against different types of entertainment sources. HBO felt that it could not compare itself only to other TV channels. It had to get people's attention. In an era in which the average person could choose to watch a sitcom on network television, tune in to CNN on a basic cable package, rent a movie from a local video store, drive to a nearby theater to see the latest Hollywood film, or pay for HBO's movies and shows, the image ads were intended to equate HBO with entertainment. According to Parmet, "The ads needed to be cutting edge. We wanted to make the kinds of ads that people would talk about the next day at work."

MARKETING STRATEGY

HBO gave BBDO New York the project of creating a memorable campaign. After HBO briefed the ad agency on its specific needs and concerns, BBDO took over the creative aspects of the campaign. In a brainstorming session, Michael Patti, the vice chairman and executive creative director of BBDO, and Don Schneider, the agency's senior creative director, hit upon a striking concept. The two envisioned a commercial in which a parrot would recite famous movie lines because it saw into a neighboring apartment, where a television was tuned to HBO. The idea quickly evolved into the award-winning spot featuring lip-synching chimpanzees steeped in movie lingo.

The 1996 spot, titled "Chimps," featured renowned primatologist Jane Goodall and a group of wild chimpanzees in the Gombe preserve in Africa. Frame-by-frame animation made it appear as though the chimps were actually speaking famous lines from classic Hollywood movies. The premise of the spot was the powerful impact HBO exerted on its viewers. The commercial opened with a proud chimp uttering lines spoken by Marlon Brando in The Godfather: "He never could have outfoxed Santino. But I didn't know until this day that it was Barzini all along." Another chimp replied with lines from Forrest Gump: "Mama says that stupid is as stupid does." As a third chimp tossed a stick to the ground, he repeated a line from Network: "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take it anymore." A father chimp spoke Darth Vader's well-known line from Star Wars—"The force is with you, young Skywalker"—as he patted a small chimp on the head. After a group of chimps chanted, "Toga! Toga! Toga! Toga!..." from Animal House, the camera panned to a bewildered Goodall writing in her journal. Her voice-over said, "September 19: Their inexplicable behavior continues." A chimp then bellowed, "Yo, Adrian, I did it," a line from Rocky. The camera cut back to Goodall's cabin, where her television was tuned to HBO, and she continued, "Got to go now. Braveheart is on." A black screen followed with a graphic and the campaign's tagline, "It's Not T.V. It's HBO."

Producing the spot proved to be quite a challenge, however. The chimpanzees were filmed at their feeding sites in the Gombe preserve. Frame-by-frame animation was then used to create the illusion that the animals were reciting movie lines. Sherri Margulies, a film editor who worked on the spot, told Shoot that, while other commercials had used similar effects, "the elaborate attention to detail...on this spot [was] completely unique." All told, the special effects took approximately 20 to 30 hours per chimp, requiring the ad agency to work around the clock for a month.

In 1997 HBO followed "Chimps" with four new television spots, each intended to elevate the HBO brand. Using tongue-in-cheek humor, the spots attempted to convey the uniqueness of HBO's programming. In "Haircuts" the men of an idealized American small town sported bizarre, patterned haircuts. It turned out that Carl, the town barber, had become engrossed in HBO's programming as he cut his customers' hair, the result being freakish haircuts. In another spot, "Roach Motel," an enthusiastic pest exterminator was unable to rid a home of its roaches by using sprays or bombs. He succeeded only by luring the cockroaches into a roach "motel" with a neon sign that advertised "Free HBO." The campaign's ironic wit continued in a spot featuring a sadistic repairman who tormented an entire town by plugging in and unplugging their cable in the midst of a captivating HBO program. A final commercial, "Glee Club," related the tale of a disgruntled neighbor who gave the local barbershop quartet free HBO in the hope of distracting them from practicing at all hours.

In order to reach the maximum number of potential viewers, HBO aired the commercials during its own programming, on other cable channels, and, most notably, on network television. All five spots ran during prime-time network shows, including top-rated programs such as the 1997 World Series, Seinfeld, Chicago Hope, and ER. The network commercials were intended to reach both current HBO subscribers and those who had either never subscribed or had allowed their subscription to lapse. HBO hoped that the commercials would remind current subscribers of the quality and value of the channel's programming, while at the same time reaching millions of other viewers who had not signed up for HBO. "We wanted to inform nonsubscribers of what they are missing," said Parmet.

In 1998 the network continued the campaign with two new spots, including one that debuted during a Monday Night Football game. HBO also reported that the spots would be shown on as many as 20 other cable networks. Like the original spots, the new commercials relied on humor and high production values to assure that they would stand out. One spot, "Guardian Angel," showed a person hit by a falling piano when his guardian angel was distracted by a television in a store window. The mishap was explained by the campaign's tagline, "It's not T.V. It's HBO." The second spot starred actor

George C. Scott serving as the general of an army of germs fighting for control of a television remote. The campaign's focus shifted in 1999 from the original brand strategy. Although its emphasis remained on the central theme, "It's Not T.V. It's HBO," the advertising spots became focused on marketing specific HBO programming.

OUTCOME

HBO pronounced the "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign an unequivocal success. In the company's estimation, the campaign achieved its primary goal of elevating the brand's image in the market. Extensive precampaign and postcampaign surveys indicated that the commercials had made viewers more aware of the HBO brand. According to the December 8, 1997, edition of USA Today, HBO's membership increased from 21.1 million in 1996 to 22.7 million in 1997. But HBO stressed that it was difficult to correlate the number of subscribers with its high-profile ad campaign because of the variety of factors that influenced fluctuations in membership. For 25 years HBO had seen the number of its subscribers increase each year.

The media and the advertising industry responded positively to the spots. On December 9, 1996, USA Today heralded the campaign as one of the "rare knockouts" in advertising. Trade publications such as Adweek and Shoot extolled the technical wizardry of the commercials. "Certainly there is something to be gained for an entertainment provider merely by being entertaining," declared the November 4, 1996, Advertising Age. In September 1997 "Chimps" received the first ever Emmy Award for a commercial. It beat out other well-liked campaigns, such as those by Nike and Levi's, to be named the best commercial of the year. Also in 1997 the "Chimps" spot received a Gold Clio Award. The Clios were international advertising awards presented annually in recognition of creative excellence and innovation in advertising.

Viewers also responded well to the campaign. USA Today 's Ad Track, a poll measuring the popularity and effectiveness of national campaigns, revealed that consumers consistently liked the HBO spots, often ranking them among the 10 best commercials. According to the newspaper, "the spots were especially effective with consumers aged 18–24." Larry Gerbrandt, a senior analyst at Paul Kagan, told USA Today on December 8, 1997, that "the ads worked well for HBO. The name HBO is practically synonymous with pay TV."

Yet the campaign's positive impact on HBO's subscriber figures was less clear. Although 33 percent of respondents in the December 29, 1997, Ad Track survey declared that they liked the HBO campaign "a lot," only 20 percent thought that the campaign was "very effective." In a similar vein, Advertising Age criticized the campaign for not providing enough information about HBO's actual programming.

"Chimps" in particular generated a great deal of controversy. Many journalists were outraged that the basic premise of the spot was false. Goodall did not watch HBO; in fact, the pay channel was not available in the remote region of Africa where she lived. The spot drew more criticism when it was learned that the voice attributed to Goodall was not hers. HBO, however, felt the media were taking the commercial far too seriously, and the company itself was pleased with the results of its efforts.

In 1998 the campaign was expanded to include print, radio, and direct mail. As the campaign morphed from a branding strategy for the network into its operating mantra in 1999, the marketing also shifted to specific programming. According to network executives, the strategy evolved based on the success of two of its shows—The Sopranos and Sex and the City—as well as of original movies that the network was producing and sporting events that it aired. The new marketing effort resulted in HBO being named Cable Marketer of the Year in 2000 by Advertising Age. The original "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign was named to the Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing (CTAM) Hall of Fame in 2003, which, according to the organization, honored the "finest and most influential campaigns in the history of cable."

FURTHER READING

Applebaum, Simon. "Hall of Fame. (The 2003 CTAM Hall of Fame Winner Goes to HBO for Its 'It's Not TV. It's HBO' Campaign)." Multichannel News, July 21, 2003.

Berger, Warren. "At 25, Excellence and Big Budgets for a Late Bloomer." New York Times, November 9, 1997.

Bernstein, Paula. "Branding Bolsters Expectations. (HBO at 30)." Variety, November 4, 2002.

Eberle, Ed. "Sherri Margulies: Editor Explains Assembling HBO's 'Chimps.' " Shoot, September 19, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "HBO Ads Tickle Primal Funny Bone." USA Today, January 13, 1997.

Friedman, Wane. "HBO Finds Humor in Roaches." USA Today, December 8, 1997.

———. "HBO; Original Programming Choices Drive Viral Marketing Strategies that Include Word-of-Mouth, Touring Caravans, Parties in Major Markets, and Massive Direct Marketing Campaigns for HBO." Advertising Age, November 27, 2000.

Garfield, Bob. "Chimps Are Champs at Ad Entertainment." Advertising Age, November 4, 1996.

Hogan, Monica. "HBO Makes Heavy Cable Buy for New Spots." Multichannel News, October 26, 1998.

Stevens, Elizabeth Lesly. "Call It Home Buzz Office." BusinessWeek, December 8, 1997, pp. 77–78.

Wells, Melanie. "The Good, The Bad, The Ugly of 1996." USA Today, December 9, 1996.

Rebecca Stanfel
Rayna Bailey

Honda Motor Company

2-1-1 Minami-Aoyama
Minato-ku
Tokyo, 107-8556
Japan
Telephone: 81 3 34231111
Fax: 81 3 54121515
Web site: www.world.honda.com

■■■

THE POWER OF DREAMS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 Honda Motor Company was the number-three Japanese automobile manufacturer in the world, behind Toyota and Nissan. While Honda's automobile sales in Japan and the United States were considered strong, sales in the United Kingdom and mainland Europe were thought to be weak, even though automobile production in the United Kingdom had been ongoing for a decade. Further, Honda vehicle sales had been declining in these regions since 1998. In response to these problems Honda hired ad agency Wieden+Kennedy's London office to create an advertising campaign that would directly address the issues.

"The Power of Dreams," released in 2002, was an omnipresent campaign in the United Kingdom and beyond, using television, direct mail, radio, posters, press, interactive television, cinema, magazines, motor shows, press launches, dealerships, postcards, beermats (coasters), and even traffic cones. It built upon Honda's company slogan, "Yume No Chikara," which was first endorsed in the 1940s by the company's founder, Soichiro Honda. Translated into English, it meant to "see" one's dreams. Wieden+Kennedy used this phrase as the basis of its question to consumers: "Do you believe in the power of dreams?" The global campaign, which centered on this tagline, included print and television components starring ASIMO, a humanoid robot developed by Honda. While the ASIMO ads gained widespread recognition, the 2003 television commercial called "Cog" was clearly a pinnacle of the campaign. In a single take with no special effects, more than 85 individual parts of the new Accord interacted in a complicated chain reaction. The spot won 37 advertising awards.

Honda considered "The Power of Dreams" an advertising success. Worldwide sales of Honda vehicles rose dramatically from 2002 through 2005, from 2.6 million units per year to 3.2 million units per year. In the United Kingdom sales improved by 28 percent. In Europe sales in 2002 increased from 170,000 to 196,000, which rose to 217,000 in 2003. The campaign also won IPA Advertising Effectiveness awards, British Television Advertising awards, and even a 2003 Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In April 1964 Honda spent $300,000 to sponsor the Academy Awards, becoming the first foreign corporate sponsor in the event's history. With the tagline "You Meet the Nicest People on a Honda," the Honda advertising campaign was a success, becoming one of the best-remembered advertising campaigns in the company's history. Nevertheless, although the campaign promoted Honda's motorcycles well, it did little to sell Honda vehicles. The reality was that Honda was better known for its motorcycles than it was for its cars. This long remained the case in most of the countries where Hondas were sold. In Japan, where big-splash promotional efforts for Honda's cars were common, the problem was not so severe. The 1981 campaign to promote Honda's model the City, for one, was omnipresent in Japan, incorporating large-scale TV, radio, and print advertising. There was even a variety of City novelty goods for sale and a specialty magazine called City Press.

Meanwhile, in the United Kingdom, Honda automobile production had yet to begin. Honda cars had been available there as imports, but not enough units were ordered to establish a presence. Further, the prices of imported cars could not compete with that of vehicles manufactured within the country. Thus, at the time, any sales push in the area focused on Honda motorbikes. In 1992, when Honda automobile production began in the United Kingdom, the shift toward promoting Honda automobiles there began, albeit slowly. But the potential market for the new manufacturing plant was huge: located in Swindon, England, it was responsible for producing vehicles well beyond the United Kingdom, including mainland Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. As such, Honda felt the need to begin a major campaign within the United Kingdom. Eventually it happened.

"The Power of Dreams" replaced the 1999 global tagline "Do You Have a Honda?" This earlier campaign employed print, radio, and television, and portrayed the dreams of Honda's founder, Soichiro Honda, who envisioned providing the world with all the possible means of travel. Soichiro Honda himself had repaired and created bicycles and motorcycles as well as both road cars and racing vehicles. The "Do You Have a Honda?" ads thus incorporated images of all of these means of transportation as well as more creative means, including a hot-air balloon and a cable car. Although the "Do You Have a Honda?" ads spread worldwide, the United Kingdom was barely affected by the campaign. From 1998 to 1999 Honda automobile sales in Europe dropped from 240,000 to 235,000. The decline continued through 2002. In the United Kingdom, Honda auto sales began to drop in 2000.

In 2002 "Do You Have a Honda?" was replaced with the campaign "The Power of Dreams." Although the tagline was part of a larger global focus, the campaign, under the leadership of ad agency Wieden+Kennedy in London, centered on promotional efforts within the United Kingdom.

TARGET MARKET

"The Power of Dreams" targeted a large and diverse audience. While Honda wished to attract younger buyers, they were not the company's only focus. With a wide range of car models, from the lower-priced Civic to the higher-end Accord, Honda could potentially appeal to drivers within all age groups and socioeconomic statuses. All potential new buyers, whatever their age, represented Honda's target market. Thus, of the many different media that "The Power of Dreams" employed, television advertising, with its ability to reach a wide audience, was expected to be the most effective. Further, by portraying Hondas as hip and fun, the commercials appealed to a broad range of potential buyers.

Honda's new campaign mainly focused on raising public awareness of its cars—especially in Europe and the United Kingdom, where Honda was largely associated with motorcycles—and, in particular, getting new customers to visit Honda showrooms. There was also an emphasis on pleasing return customers. The company wished to improve communications with Honda owners and thus make them feel good about their choice of Honda; this in turn would convince them to buy a Honda the next time around.

WERE THOSE BALLOONS REALLY COMING OUT OF THEIR EARS?

Honda wanted real balloons to inflate from actors' ears in its 2005 "Dreams/Yume No Chikara" television commercial. To achieve this effect, devices were placed inside the ears; each had a small tube that was pulled behind the ear and taped to the actor's back. As the actors were playing their roles, the devices popped out, and the balloons (representing ideas considered by the actors) filled with air.

COMPETITION

Worldwide, Honda was largely associated with its motorbikes. Toyota Motor Corp., on the other hand, was synonymous with Japanese automobiles. Japan's number one carmaker, Toyota brought in huge revenue from around the globe. While Honda was spending millions promoting its campaign "The Power of Dreams," Toyota was enjoying incredible revenue increases: from $129 billion in 2003, to $154 billion in 2004, to $173 billion in 2005. The sales were generally connected to Toyota's solid reputation for quality and value. To enhance this reputation, Toyota advertisements around the globe had been consistently reminding customers of the economical excellence of Toyota cars. At the same time another message had been spread: Toyota's concern for the environment (and for the price customers were paying for gasoline). In 2003 Toyota began a global campaign for its hybrid automobile, the Prius, which had been released in Japan in 1997. Toyota claimed that in 2003 Prius grabbed 90 percent of the worldwide hybrid-car market. Among its top competitors in the category was Honda, which had created two hybrid automobiles of its own: the Insight (developed in 2001) and the Civic Hybrid (developed in 2003).

In 2002 Japan's second-largest automaker, Nissan Motor Company ran a global marketing campaign of its own, titled "Shift." With the tagline "Shift can change a person, a life, the world, or it can simply change the way you move through it," it was Nissan's first-ever global campaign. Its launch coincided with the reintroduction of the popular Nissan Z, a sports car that had been sold from 1969 through 1996. When the Z was revived as the 350Z for model year 2003, those who had not preordered the vehicle had a difficult time getting one. To further confirm the car's success, the 350Z was named one of Car and Driver's "Ten Best" for 2003. Nissan's revenue climbed dramatically between 2002 and 2004. From 2002 to 2003 revenue increased from $47 billion to $57 billion. By 2003 the number had jumped to $70 billion.

While Honda's 2003 fiscal revenue of $66 billion reflected an 8.6 percent increase from the year prior, its revenue from auto sales was not quite enough to take over Nissan's number two spot in Japanese auto sales. Honda's 2003 automobile revenue was $54 billion, just below that of Nissan. But sales continued to rise during its "The Power of Dreams" campaign, bringing in $78 billion in revenue in fiscal 2004 and $81 billion in fiscal 2005.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2002 Honda wished to increase worldwide familiarity with its automobiles, especially within the European market. The use of ad agency Wieden+Kennedy in London confirmed a strong focus on the United Kingdom in particular. Before the launch of "The Power of Dreams," Honda thought that its name was too often connected to its motorcycles only, especially in Europe and the United Kingdom. Honda wanted to be equally known for its automobiles. Thus, Honda and Wieden+Kennedy attempted to convey that it was in fact a distinctively innovative car company. As a first step in doing so, Wieden+Kennedy developed "The Book of Dreams." Colorful and eclectic, it was part scrapbook, part information packet. It was fun, and it helped to illustrate Honda's identity, which the agency dubbed "Honda-ness." The book was used as a springboard for many of the campaign's subsequent ads. Next Honda formed "The Dream Factory," a committee with the task of maintaining a consistent philosophy while placing the campaign everywhere, including on television, in the mail, on posters, in the press, cinema, and magazines, and at motor shows.

In its print ads Honda depicted simple, everyday objects: a perfume bottle with the Honda name; a banana; a pencil; a stamp. Other ads displayed parts of the Honda vehicle, such as a stick shift, tires, and a muffler. There was a traffic cone draped in leopard fur and a brightly painted birdhouse. More complicated advertisements also were used: in one, a Honda CR-V was shown driving on a road lined with trees growing traffic lights on their branches, and in another the car drove past traffic-cone mountains. The television spots were equally diverse and interesting. Children played on a colorful jungle-gym model of a Honda in "Play." Honda Jazz vehicles were seen driving through cartoon worlds in "Pecking Order," "Seats," and "Bus Lane."

In the much-acclaimed TV spot "Cog," more than 85 individual parts of the new Accord interacted in a highly complicated chain reaction, ending with a voice-over that asked, "Isn't it nice when things just work?" The television spot was expensive to produce. The final 10 seconds used the voice of Garrison Keillor, voice of Public Radio's program Prairie Home Companion. In addition, the spot, which reportedly used no special effects, required the film crew to shoot it 606 times to get it right. At two minutes in length, air time for the complete commercial was extremely costly. The spot, first run during the Brazilian Grand Prix in April 2003, was met with awe.

The eclectic advertisements, still toting the tagline "The Power of Dreams," continued in 2005. "Dreams/Yume No Chikara," broadcast that year, showed Tokyo business leaders discussing different ideas. The ideas came out of their ears as real balloons, inflating, deflating, popping, or flying away. One balloon formed perfectly, representing a dream becoming reality. The campaign's radio commercials included "Doodle," "Big Grin," and "Oblonger."

"The Power of Dreams" also featured ASIMO, Honda's ever-evolving humanoid robot. Honda presented its first humanoid robot in 1986, under the name EO. By 2000 it had evolved into ASIMO, whose legs and arms moved like a human's. This was an incredible feat in the field of robotics. ASIMO first appeared in a TV spot in an earlier campaign in 2002. That year, when "The Power of Dreams" took over as the new tagline, the robot became even more omnipresent, both in Honda ads and in other contexts. ASIMO hosted many Honda promotional events; the robot rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange's 25th anniversary in 2002 and shook hands with the Belgian prime minister in 2005. Such public appearances contributed to the widespread recognition and success of the ASIMO global branding ads in "The Power of Dreams" campaign. In 2005 Honda released "Run," a global corporate TV spot featuring ASIMO. The commercial gained international renown for its clever portrayal of a "race" in an airport between the robot and an elderly Japanese businessman. The global campaign also released two variations of posters titled "ASIMO and a Boy," set in the same airport, substituting the businessman with a young boy. In the U.K. version of the campaign, however, ASIMO played a more minor role.

OUTCOME

"The Power of Dreams" was widely recognized within the industry, receiving IPA Advertising Effectiveness awards; AD&D awards for Radio Advertising; British Television Advertising awards; and Advertising Creative Circle awards. The television spot "Sense," portraying a collection of daily situations in which power sources "sensed" when they needed to turn on or shut down (to promote Honda's Integrated Motor Assist Engine), gained 13 awards and recognitions. "Cog" brought in 37, including the highly prestigious Gold Lion (Cars category) at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, in 2003. In addition to advertising awards, "Cog" (also known as the "Rube Goldberg ad," after the legendary American cartoonist and sculptor) brought Honda the status of creating an advertising phenomenon. Like Wendy's "Where's the Beef?" campaign of the 1980s, "Cog" was regarded as advertising legend, becoming one of the most talked-about television commercials in advertising history.

The "Power of Dreams" also met with monetary success. From the start of the campaign through 2005, Honda's unit auto sales worldwide increased from 2.6 million units to 3.2 million units per year. In the United Kingdom sales improved by 28 percent. Later in the campaign, from 2004 through 2005, unit sales of Hondas in Asia increased by 50 percent. Other positive results were more subtle: Honda recognition increased, including acknowledgement of its advertising as being "cool." Media coverage was intensive, and free media value was generated (for instance, CNN ran two features on the campaign, and the Discovery Channel ran a documentary on it). Showroom visits rose, and even sales of used Hondas increased. Internally, there were also benefits. In the United Kingdom, Honda was included in the Sunday Times newspaper's "Best Companies to Work for" list for the first time ever in 2003; it was number 18. By 2004 the company had moved up to number 16. Staff turnover was low, and 89 percent of workers said that they were proud to work for Honda. The goal of reaching 100,000 annual unit sales in the United Kingdom by 2005 was reached.

FURTHER READING

"Advertising Imitates Art." Sunday Telegraph (London), April 20, 2003.

Bold, Ben. "Honda Takes 'Power of Dreams' into Mail." Marketing, January 5, 2005.

Cookson, Clive. "Robots Show What's Afoot in Cornell Lab." Financial Times (London), February 18, 2005.

Elliott, Stuart. "Wieden Is Top Winner in Awards for TV Work." New York Times, June 18, 2004.

"Kim Papworth and Tony Davidson, Creative Directors, Wieden & Kennedy." Financial Times (London), November 9, 2004.

Le, Thuy-Doan. "Can-Do-Robot, at Your Service." Sacramento Bee, April 1, 2005.

Manning, Jeff. "Mechanical Marvel." Portland Oregonian, April 29, 2003.

"Market Review—Beemers Hit the Buffers." Motor Industry Magazine, July 2004.

Mills, Dominic. "Ad of the Week." Daily Telegraph (London), April 9, 2002.

Parshotam, Arthur. "Direct Choice: Honda Welcome Pack." Marketing, February 16, 2005.

"Pick of the Week: Honda." Campaign, April 29, 2005.

"Private View." Campaign, March 4, 2005.

"Process: Honda—Yume No Chikara." Creative Review, June 2, 2005.

"Robots Welcome the Expo Visitors." Journal of Japanese Trade & Industry, March 1, 2005.

"Wieden and Kennedy Create Honda Ad." Marketing Week, April 14, 2005.

Candice L. Mancini

Honda UK

470 London Rd.
Slough, Berkshire SL3 8QY
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 845 2008000
Web site: www.honda.uk

■■■

GRRR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

One of the world's best-known carmakers, the Honda Motor Company, Ltd., had popularized economy and midsize cars for decades. In 2003 the company struck out in a new direction when it began selling in the United Kingdom a version of its popular Accord powered by a newly designed diesel engine. The advertising campaign to promote the diesel engine (the Accord also came in a standard gasoline-engine model) was even bolder than the product itself. Titled "Grrr," it was a masterpiece of counterintuitive thinking and presentation.

The campaign was designed by Wieden+Kennedy London and consisted of a television and cinema spot backed by radio, print, and Internet advertisements. It broke on September 24, 2004, in cinemas in the United Kingdom. The spot featured a retro 1960s neopsychedelic look, complete with flying diesel engines, a rainbow, animated bunnies, and a folk song sung by radio humorist Garrison Keillor. The song also backed the radio commercial. The point of the spot was to show that a new, modified diesel engine had been designed by Honda, one that was cleaner and less noisy.

The "Grrr" campaign and the television spot in particular won numerous awards in the United Kingdom, the United States, and elsewhere. The television spot won the Epica D'Or at the Epica Awards (which recognized creativity in European advertising); four gold British Television Advertising Awards, including TV Commercial of the Year (2004); the Grand Prize at the ANDY Awards in New York; two gold and eight silver D&AD (Design and Art Direction) awards, including the first D&AD gold for music; Best in Show at the One Show Awards; a Titanium Lion (for the radio spot) and the Grand Prix at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France; and a Gold Clio and the Grand Clio.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

While the Japanese automobile maker Honda enjoyed modest success in the United Kingdom, innovation was always the watchword. In the early twenty-first century that theme intersected with British and European drivers' growing preference for diesel-powered over regular gasoline-engine autos. For Honda and its chief designer, Kenichi Nagahiro, the diesel engine was a new adventure. Although Honda had been producing hybrid cars (which used an internal combustion engine with an electric motor) since 2001, the company had yet to produce a diesel engine, and Nagahiro professed to despise them. (Honda had sold diesel-powered Civics, but the engine was produced by Isuzu.) The diesel market, however, was growing fast in Europe and the United Kingdom in the early years of the twenty-first century, and Honda, a company noted for the high quality of its engines, had no choice but to follow the trend or lose customers.

A still from Honda's "Grrr" campaign. IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Nagahiro's dislike of the diesel engine was in fact one of the motivating forces behind his desire to make a quieter, cleaner one. The model he and his team came up with, the 2.2i CTDi, was placed in the Accord in 2003 (and later in the CR-V and the FR-V, Honda's compact multipurpose vehicle) for distribution throughout the United Kingdom, Ireland, and the more diesel-conscious European market. In a January 2004 article for the London newspaper the Sun, Ken Gibson wrote that in 2003 diesel-powered automobile sales in the United Kingdom "increased to 710,000—29 percent of the market—with diesel converts driving everything from superminis to executive cars."

The Accord itself had been reintroduced to consumers in the United Kingdom and Europe with Honda's previous advertising campaign, "Cog." This Rube Goldbergesque television spot, which followed a chain reaction of Accord parts, beginning with ball bearings and including tires that roll uphill, was itself critically acclaimed.

TARGET MARKET

The "Grrr" campaign focused on the increasing number of diesel auto drivers in the United Kingdom as well as on those willing to make the switch to a diesel-powered auto. In continental Europe the percentage of diesel drivers was even higher, with some pockets reaching as high as 70 percent. The television—and to a lesser extent radio—spots were also aimed at aging baby boomers, who presumably had families and for whom the TV spots' look and sound would have a humorously nostalgic feel. They were also geared toward a younger generation with families and disposable income, but who would view the spots as retro. The Accord, into which the 2.2i CTDi diesel engine was originally placed, was considered a family car, as was the popular CR-V sport-utility vehicle, the second Honda to be powered by the 2.2i CTDi.

COMPETITION

In addition to competing in the United Kingdom and throughout Europe with other Japanese carmakers, Honda was considered on a par with the low-end BMW models and the high-end Volkswagens. But as more than one car critic noted, the diesel engine took Honda to a higher level. In the Sun, Gibson wrote, "The Honda Accord is everything good about diesel power—the only surprise is that it took Honda so long to develop

THE DIESEL ENGINE

The diesel engine got its name from its inventor, Rudolf Diesel (1858–1913), who received a patent for the engine in 1893. The prototypes for his engine ran on coal dust, and he even produced a demonstration model in the 1890s that was fueled by peanut oil. By 1897 Diesel had built an engine that ran at a theoretical 75 percent efficiency.

The main difference between a diesel engine and a gasoline engine was that a spark was not required in a diesel (hence, no spark plugs). In the early diesel models air compression within the engine's cylinders caused the fuel combustion. The early diesels were large and were used only in heavy machinery, ships, and trains. In the 1920s an injection-pump design was implemented in the diesel engine. This advance was responsible for smaller engines, making them viable for automobiles. The first auto manufacturer to employ a diesel engine was Mercedes Benz in the 1930s. By the end of the twentieth century more and more drivers were recognizing the efficiency of the diesel, which in turn led to more innovations on the engine.

the model . . . [T]he 2.2 litre [engine] in the Accord shows they have been fine tuning an exceptional engine that sets new levels of excellence. In fact the Honda power unit is so good only top-of-the-range executive diesels from Mercedes, BMW and Audi can compete with it.'' Edward Stephens of the Birmingham Evening Mail declared the new vehicle ''a diesel that performs just like a petrol engine in terms of acceleration, quietness and responsiveness . . . [T]his diesel is certainly one of the best—if not the best—in its class.''

Nevertheless, Honda started out well behind other carmakers in the race to attract diesel car buyers in the United Kingdom and Europe. Audi had introduced its Avant in 1998 with support from a campaign that included a print ad that depicted a crushed pink rabbit with a drum on a road (a reference to battery manufacturer Energizer's well-known ''Energizer Bunny'' commercials). The ad read: ''Audi TDi. Keeps on going. No other diesel looks like it or lasts like it.'' Volkswagen introduced its diesel Passat soon afterward, while BMW had preceded both.

MARKETING STRATEGY

A number of factors contributed to the style and message of the ''Grrr'' campaign and of the television spot in particular. These included chief engineer Nagahiro's disdain for diesel engines, the whimsy of the ''Cog'' campaign, and competitor Audi's 2003 campaign that featured animation in its television spot (though the spot advertised a gasoline-powered auto). The difference with ''Grrr'' was that Wieden+Kennedy took what some media critics described as a counterintuitive route.

The ''Grrr'' spot, with its 1960s retro look and feel, invoked that decade's idealism, but with a twist. The message, as filtered through Nagahiro's experience, was that hate could be a catalyst for change. In a June 2005 article in Adweek Mae Anderson quoted Sean Thompson, a senior copywriter for Wieden+Kennedy, who admitted, ''When we were asked to do an ad for launching the new diesel engine, we got really interested in this hate thing, how hate can push you forward. In tandem with that, we started thinking about a song, because a song is happy—so what if we wrote a song of hate?'' In fact, throughout the animated spot the word ''hate'' was spelled out numerous times as visual reinforcement while smoky, dark diesel engines flew through the air and assorted feel-good animals such as bunnies, birds, and fish gamboled about. Backing this was a song sung by radio personality Garrison Keillor, who crooned: ''Can hate be good? / Can hate be great? / Can hate be good? / Can hate be great? / . . . Hate something / Change something / Make something better . . . '' By the end of the spot the old, dirty diesel had been transformed into a thing of beauty: a quiet, clean, efficient diesel engine, the 2.2i CTDi. Meanwhile Honda had expounded a new concept, ''positive hate.''

The version of the spot that launched the ''Grrr'' campaign on September 24, 2004, in cinemas throughout the United Kingdom was 90 seconds in length. The television version was edited into 90- and 60-second lengths and was supported by radio, print, and Internet advertising. The idea of ''Grrr'' was to build on the success of the ''Cog'' campaign. This had been Honda's manufacturing strategy as well. While ''Cog'' reintroduced the Accord to the public, ''Grrr'' went a step further by introducing a diesel-powered Accord model as well as the diesel CR-V sport-utility vehicle. The ingenious part was that the spots were not about the cars at all. The focus was completely on the new diesel engine that Honda offered; the automobiles were therefore passively advertised. Because prospective buyers were already aware of the qualities of the Accord and CR-V, what they needed to be reassured about was the fact that Honda's proprietary diesel was an improvement over competitors' engines (and the Isuzu diesel used in the Civic). By concentrating on what was really new, a Honda-built diesel engine, the ''Grrr'' spots provided that reassurance in a positive yet quirky manner.

OUTCOME

The "Grrr" campaign was an excellent follow-up to "Cog." If anything, it surpassed its acclaimed predecessor in the number of advertising awards it garnered. As a tandem, the two campaigns boosted sales of the Accord and, by extension, Honda autos in general. Total sales of the Accord went from 34,879 in 2003 to 51,235 in 2004, an increase of 46.9 percent. Total Honda sales throughout Europe in those two years increased from 217,473 to 255,721, a jump of 17.6 percent.

More remarkable was what the "Grrr" campaign accomplished on its own. The rise in sales of diesel-powered Accords was astonishing. In 2003, the year the diesel-powered Accord was introduced, 518 were sold. In 2004, the year the "Grrr" campaign came out, 21,776 were sold. That figure represented 42.5 percent of all Accord sales. It was almost twice as much as the 2004 sales figure for the diesel-powered Civic (which had an Isuzu engine), which totaled 12,025. On the strength of its success with the diesel engine, Honda went ahead with its plans to produce diesel-powered CR-Vs and FR-Vs in 2005. Honda also announced that in 2004 its manufacturing plant in Swindon had set a production record of 193,456 cars, a 4.75 percent increase from 2003.

With all of that in place Honda predicted a good year for 2005 for its United Kingdom and European market. While the overall market was down in 2005, Honda experienced a 7.8 percent growth in sales that year. This was second only to BMW, which tallied a 9.3 percent increase in 2005. In calendar year 2005 Honda's sales in Europe totaled 285,924, an 11.8 percent increase from 2004. (This was a 31.4 percent increase compared to Honda's 2003 European sales numbers.)

More important, along with the Accord, the CR-V and FR-V, both with diesel engines, played crucial roles in Honda's continued upswing in Europe and particularly the United Kingdom, where Honda was the ninth-largest auto company in terms of sales. A brief, unsigned article that appeared in the Daily Post of Liverpool in July 2005 reported, "Honda has hit 50,000 sales in the UK within the first half of the year—equalling the firm's full year sales figure in 1996. The result has been made possible by a dramatic boost in Accord diesel sales, continuing demand for the CR-V . . . and the successful introduction of the FR-V."

By the end of 2005 Honda held 4 percent of the U.K. market, a half percentage point behind BMW. Since its introduction in 1995 the Honda CR-V had been the best-selling gasoline-powered SUV in the United Kingdom, so offering a diesel option was a logical step. Commenting on that move in the Daily Telegraph of London, Andrew English wrote, "[It] would be difficult to find a safer, better engineered and more socially and environmentally responsible example than the Honda CR-V . . . Start up and the diesel gives little indications of its origins, unless you have the window open, whereupon the industrial growl leaks in. In fact there are few occasions when you are aware that this is a diesel other than the occasional turbo whistle and momentary injector rattle. In that respect it's a match for the best German and French units." With a follow-up advertising campaign to "Grrr" in the works, and with new innovations to is diesel-powered autos, Honda remained optimistic for 2006.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "The Conception of 'Grrr' and How It Came to Warm So Many Hearts." Adweek, June 20, 2005.

Comyn, Paddy. "New Accord Takes a Power Trip; Honda May Be a Little Late to the Diesel Engine Party, but Their Latest Executive Car Demands Serious Attention." Sunday Tribune (Dublin), February 22, 2004.

English, Andrew. "Making the Best of a Flawed Idea. First Drive: The New Diesel Engine Is Beautiful and Honda's CR-V Is among the Best of Its Kind." Daily Telegraph (London), January 15, 2005.

Gibson, Ken. "Honda Finds Peace with New Diesel." Sun (London), January 2, 2004.

"Honda Going Diesel in Europe." Nikkei Weekly (Tokyo), May 24, 2004.

"Honda Joins the Chorus of Support for 4x4s." Sentinel (Stoke-on-Trent, England), January 1, 2004.

Letts, Quentin. "And That's What Sells the Car." Sunday Telegraph (London), April 13, 2004.

McAleer, Michael. "Ending the Fuel Discord." Irish Times, March 10, 2004.

———. "Honda Diesel a Three-Times Winner." Irish Times, January 21, 2004.

"Motoring: Honda Record." Daily Post (Liverpool), July 13, 2005.

Mutel, Glen. "BBH Promotes Audi A4 Engine with Fish Theme." Campaign, February 14, 2003.

Stephens, Edward. "Motoring: Diesel Is First among Equals." Birmingham Evening Mail (Birmingham, England), September 8, 2004.

Frank Caso

Iconix Brand Group, Inc.

215 W. 40th Street
New York, New York 10018
USA
Telephone: (212) 730-0030
Fax: (212) 730-0030
Web site: www.candiesinc.com

■■■

JENNY MCCARTHY FOR CANDIE'S CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1978 Candie's shoes, especially a model called the Slide (a high-heeled slip-on), became a "must have" fashion accessory for America's teenage population. The shoe's popularity, as well as the company's fortunes (which peaked at approximately $190 million in sales in 1984), waned as fashion fads changed in the late 1980s. In the mid-1990s Candie's Inc. was still designing and manufacturing women's and girl's casual and fashion footwear, but its brand was considered passé by its core market of teenage girls. Hoping to revive its brand and trigger a sales upsurge similar to the one in 1978, Candie's released its "Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign.

The $4 million campaign was conceived by Candie's CEO Neil Cole and Candie's in-house advertising agency, InMarketing, Inc. "Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" surfaced in February 1997 as a print campaign with risqué images of the former Playboy Playmate of the Year and NBC sitcom star Jenny McCarthy. The ads featured McCarthy in a variety of poses (most of them in the bathroom) wearing Candie's shoes. One of the most contentious images featured an almost-nude McCarthy sitting on a toilet wearing nothing but her panties and a pair of Candie's shoes. Despite the ads being rejected by almost every consumer magazine except for Spin, the controversy surrounding them brought Candie's back into the limelight. McCarthy returned in 1998 for two Candie's TV spots titled "Just Screw It," which parodied a Nike shoe commercial. In 2001 McCarthy was featured in a Candie's campaign that consisted of a set of print ads and one television spot that doubled as public service announcements discouraging teenage pregnancy. The actress reappeared in 2004 to advertise Candie's shoes with print ads that paired McCarthy with American Idol singing-contest winner Kelly Clarkson.

Although the majority of the campaign was deemed by many to be in poor taste, it catapulted Candie's into the headlines over and over again. In 1998 Fortune listed Candie's, which was later renamed Iconix Brand Group, Inc., as one of the top 25 fastest-growing companies in the United States.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The history of the Cole family shoe business and the Candie's brand was full of ups and downs. When Neil Cole and his brother Kenneth were boys, they spent much of their time in and around their father's dilapidated shoe factory in Brooklyn, New York. The company, called El Greco, was moderately successful until 1978, when father Charles and son Kenneth took a trip to Italy. There they stumbled upon a shoe unlike any Jenny McCarthy with her advertisement for Candies.

© MITCHELL GERBER/CORBIS.

El Greco had ever made. The backless, toeless slip-on had a chunky wooden wedge sole and a 2 1/2-inch, pencil-thin high heel. The Coles bought 600 pairs on sight and began importing them to the states. When actress Olivia Newton-John wore a similar style in the 1978 hit movie Grease, the shoe's popularity took off. Within five years the Cole's small family business had sold more than 14 million pairs of Candie's Slides and increased its sales 60 times over.

Young women aged 14 to 30 who aspired to be part of the fashion in-crowd were constantly bedecked in their skintight Jordache or Sasson jeans, tiny tube tops, and Candie's Slides. Advertising for the shoes took a straightforward "sex sells" attitude, as print ads and television commercials depicted scantily clad coeds running around college dormitories (wearing their Candie's, of course).

In 1982 son Kenneth left to start his own shoe company. The Kenneth Cole brand became one of the best-known designer shoe labels in America. He developed a unique advertising style by integrating issues of the day (usually political) in his ads. Through the years Kenneth Cole ads featured messages related to AIDS, the homeless, the rain forest, cloning, right-wing politics, and even presidential intern Monica Lewinsky. By 1997 Cole had built his business to more than $148 million in sales. In 1985 it was Neil's turn to go out on his own. He went into the jeans business, registering the name "No Excuses." Continuing the family tradition of controversial advertising, Cole used "notorious" models in his print ads and television commercials, including Donna Rice, the former mistress of presidential candidate Gary Hart.

By that time the shoe business was beginning to slide. Candie's were out of fashion and piling up in bins at discount stores. Charles Cole retired, and the business was sold in 1986. But Neil decided he wanted it back, so along with a group of individual investors, he purchased the company in 1991.

At first Cole brought out new designs of Timberland-style hiking boots, practical sneakers, and comfortable sandals with thick heels. Advertising was simple, earthy, and home-oriented, featuring lace curtains and bowls of fruit. Forbes magazine quoted Cole as saying, "We've traded the flash and trash of the Eighties for a more Nineties look. I'm no longer interested in fads that are here today, gone tomorrow."

But the "Nineties look" was not selling. So Cole, tuning in to the "retro" trend in fashion (the return of styles from the 1970s and 1980s) and besieged with requests for Candie's Slides from fashion editors and buyers, decided to bring the line back. To attract Candie's original customers who remembered the shoe from their own teen years, Cole introduced an upscale version of the shoe by forming alliances with four of the country's top women designers. In 1996 Cole announced that Anna Sui, Betsey Johnson, Nicole Miller, and Vivienne Tam would each be designing a line of Candie's Slides. In 1997, with the introduction of the Jenny McCarthy campaign, Candie's once again became a household word.

TARGET MARKET

In many an American household the Candie's name became one more crack in the typical rift between teenagers and their parents. Although some products may have had crossover appeal, attracting numerous age groups, Candie's Slides were clearly and purposely marketed to 12- to 24-year-old females. When the shoes first came out in the late 1970s, many parents forbade their daughters to wear them, disapproving of the "image" they created. Naturally, young girls only became more determined to wear them. Many of those women, grown up and with teenagers of their own, voiced their disapproval of Candie's in the 1990s—not so much of the

MCCARTHY WAS NOT ALONE ON THE POT

Candie's toilet-based advertisements featuring Jenny McCarthy may have generated the most controversy in 1997, but they were not the only ones that appeared that year. In a much tamer ad for Vanish toilet bowl cleaner, a woman named Pat Mayo (a real person) from Hometown, Illinois (a real place), stood next to her porcelain treasure and told viewers, "I have the cleanest and nicest-smelling bathroom in the neighborhood. If anybody doesn't believe me, ring my doorbell and you can smell my toilet!" And, lest little children feel left out, Mattell introduced a toddler-sized doll called Potty Training Kelly. Commercials for the toy showed a child playing with the doll, pulling down its pants, sitting it on the toilet, and listening to it "tinkle."

shoes but of the Jenny McCarthy advertising campaign. Once again, those protests only served to spur on Candie's sales.

In 1997 Jill Kilcoyne of Teen-age Research Unlimited in Northbrook, Illinois, estimated that U.S. teenagers spent $84 billion of their own money and $38 billion of their parents' money. Candie's was targeting this strong spending market, and alienating parents was a way of creating a bond with its young customers. Jenny McCarthy was Candie's way of cementing that bond. Focus groups showed that teens loved her flamboyant personality and off-center sense of humor. When asked about the Candie's bathroom ads, David Conn, Candie's director of marketing, told Anne Moncreiff Arrarte of the Houston Chronicle, "Our audience finds the visuals cute and funny. Granted, there's a fine line between what is gross and what is cute, but we care about how our customers react—not adults." One of the main reasons McCarthy was chosen to model Candie's was that teens identified with her and parents did not. In fact, Candie's CEO Neil Cole told Marcia Pledger of the Cleveland Plain Dealer that the company did not want teens to know that their mothers had worn the Slides 15 years earlier. Said Cole, "We think this girl wants to think she's discovering fashion and that she's a part of a fashion trend."

COMPETITION

The retro fashion trend that was so beneficial to Candie's did not spill over to all shoe companies. Two of Candie's largest competitors, Nike and Nine West, were plagued by negative publicity and disappointing earnings. Nike's success in signing golf champion Tiger Woods just before he won the Masters tournament at the age of 20 was a marketing coup for the company. Nike faced tough national criticism, however, when reports surfaced about human-rights violations and unfair labor practices in its Asian plants. Nine West reported lower-than-expected earnings for 1997, partly as a result of the fact that the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating its accounting practices.

Athletic endorsements for shoe companies were as popular as ever. Converse signed controversial basketball star Dennis Rodman to a multiyear endorsement deal, and Fila USA inked a seven-year, $80 million contract with Grant Hill. Yet among all the celebrity endorsements, Candie's McCarthy campaign was a standout. In December 1997 Footwear News stated, "Candie's will be remembered in 1997 for one of the most indelible ad images, featuring unforgettable MTV diva Jenny McCarthy in a spunky, tongue-in-cheek print campaign."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the mid-1990s Candie's conducted an extensive search for someone to represent the Slide to its target market. That search revealed that MTV's Jenny McCarthy rated most popular with those 12 to 24 years old. McCarthy, who originally studied to be a nurse, had become Playboy's Playmate of the Year in 1994. Within the next few years her career skyrocketed. She became a guest veejay on MTV then got the job as host of that channel's irreverent version of The Dating Game, called Singled Out. Soon she had her own skit-oriented show on MTV. She later starred in her own sitcom on NBC, although it lasted less than one season. During this time Candie's chose her to be the spokeswoman for its $4 million print campaign, and on February 10, 1997, she made her first personal appearance at New York's famed Macy's department store. Hundreds of teenage fans waited in line for hours to catch a glimpse of her and to get her autograph.

Candies and its then in-house advertising agency, InMarketing, Inc., showed McCarthy three advertising concepts, and she chose the "bathroom" theme. In an E!Online interview with McCarthy she was asked if she sought out controversy. She replied, "I really don't. I didn't want to be, like, the Madonna shock wave of the entertainment industry. I thought of [the ads] as something that made fun of myself."

Celebrity and fashion photographer Davis Factor, a member of the legendary Max Factor family, shot the print ads. They depicted McCarthy in a series of bathroom scenes: as a sultry nightclub performer singing into the shower head wearing a red sequined dress, as a glamorous femme fatale painting her finger nails while dressed in a sophisticated full slip, and as a sexy maid at work scrubbing the toilet in a bubblegum-pink nightie.

The most controversial ad was shot in two versions. In both McCarthy was sitting on the toilet with her panties down around her ankles. In one she was wearing an orange T-shirt and a pair of orange Candie's. In the second she was wearing nothing but the shoes. The company claimed that there was no message to this edgy advertising. Its marketing director David Conn told the Northern New Jersey Record that Candie's was simply attempting to sell shoes. "We're a $100 million company trying to compete with the like of Hilfiger and Guess," said Conn. "We can't outspend them, so we have to create a stir." CEO Neil Cole told Footwear News in February 1998, "Our advertising philosophy is to create brand awareness. We don't think people buy product either way based on whether they like the ad. With our advertising, the key is to drive them to be intrigued by the brand."

With a spike in sales following its 1997 print ads, the next year Candie's tripled its ad spending to an estimated $13.5 million. In August 1997 most television stations, including New York's WCBS and WNBC, rejected a Candie's commercial featuring McCarthy that was designed to sell Candie's Durango ankle boots. In the spot the actress was talking on the phone while a plumber worked under her sink. "I'm getting my crack fixed," she told her friend. "It's so big, it's smiling at me." McCarthy then climbed down and joined the plumber, exposing her own backside in the process.

On February 1, 1998, McCarthy was featured in two TV spots with the tagline "Just Screw It," in which she demonstrated her lack of athletic prowess as she wore the new line of Candie's fashion sneakers. Fearing litigation for the commercials' adulterated use of Nike's "Just Do It" tagline, MTV and other networks refused to air the spots. Three years later McCarthy and the pop group Destiny's Child made public appearances to promote the Candie's Foundation, a new organization created by Neil Cole to discourage teenage pregnancy in America. In one spot for the organization McCarthy warned a teenage couple not to have unprotected sex and then handed the girl a wailing newborn to heighten the reality of pregnancy. Print ads also featured McCarthy wearing a new Candie's clothing line and included text that advised against teenage pregnancy. In 2004 McCarthy surfaced again to promote Candie's shoes in ads that hinted at her controversial 1997 images. Sitting on a toilet, McCarthy wore little besides Candie's shoes. This time she appeared alongside singer Kelly Clarkson, winner of the contest American Idol, who wore nothing but Candie's shoes while soaking in a bathtub. The ads ran in the April and May issues of magazines popular with the teen-girl target, including YM, Teen People, Elle Girl, Teen Vogue, Hollywood Life, and Jane.

OUTCOME

Despite the controversy, or more likely because of it, Candie's campaign became one of the most successful marketing events of 1997. In December of that year Footwear News reported that since the campaign began, brand recognition for Candie's had increased by 90 percent. Sales for the first quarter of 1997 jumped to $16.9 million from $6.8 million in the previous quarter. During the same time period the company's earnings went up to $823,338, or 6 cents a share, compared with a loss of $423,338, or 5 cents a share, during the same period in 1996.

The campaign, like most of Candie's history, had its ups and downs. It was originally scheduled to appear in national magazines including Allure, Cosmopolitan, Elle, Glamour, InStyle, Mademoiselle, Marie Claire, Seventeen, Vogue, and YM. Several of the magazines, including Seventeen, InStyle, Cosmopolitan, and Vogue, refused to run some of the ads. The only magazine that ran the ad of McCarthy without her T-shirt was Spin, and the ad only ran once.

Candie's also aborted an attempt to have McCarthy sell a sneaker the company called "microsoft." The shoe was part of a line of computer-themed footwear with names such as Dot Com, Mega Byte, Web Site, and Crash. The company, however, did not get permission from Microsoft to use its name, and, after being "asked" by Bill Gates's legal department to stop using the name, Candie's pulled the ads.

To top it off, Time Magazine chose the Candie's campaign as the worst advertisement of 1997, saying, "Candie's bathroom humor, even when good, is still, well, bathroom humor. Putting the scatological Jenny McCarthy on a toilet, panties wrapped around her calves, to sell Candie's shoes couldn't raise this print campaign above the level of potty chic."

Nonetheless Jenny McCarthy—along with later Candie's spokeswomen that included Kelly Clarkson, the actress Hillary Duff, the pop singer Ciara, and the country-rock trio the Dixie Chicks—helped Candie's reclaim the status it had in the late 1970s and early 1980s. When asked by Footwear News in February 1998 why the company was focusing so much on advertising and promotions, Neil Cole replied, "We think of ourselves as a marketing company that happens to be in footwear."

For 1998 the brand posted shoe sales of $93 million, considerably less than the company's 1984 high-water mark of $190 million. During the years of the campaign Candie's continued to meet with success. Between 2003 and 2004 the company's stock more than doubled. In July 2005 Candie's changed its name to Iconix Brand Group, Inc.; Candie's had already sold licenses for most of its brands, including Candie's, the Bongo footwear line, and the recently acquired clothing line Badgley Mischka. Neil Cole wanted the enterprise's name changed as it expanded beyond just being a footwear designer and into a brand-management company.

FURTHER READING

Arrarte, Anne Moncreiff. "Ads Use Shock Value to Reach Rebellious Demographic." Houston Chronicle, June 29, 1997.

"The Best and Worst of '97." Time Magazine, December 19, 1997.

Fox, Danielle, "Skin Trade; As Footwear Companies Continue to Sex Up Their Marketing Images, Many Are Left Wondering." Footwear News, February 26, 2001, p. 50.

Ivry, Bob. "Shock of the Rude: Selling to Gen-X." Bergen County (NJ) Record, October 3, 1997.

Krol, Carol, and Laura Petrecca, "Footwear Marketer Candie's Seeks Shop for Brand Project," Advertising Age, September 21, 1998, p. 3.

Kroll, Luisa. "Like My Shoes." Forbes, April 7, 1997.

Lenetz, Dana, "Candie's Celeb Ads Tell Teens to Be Survivors." Footwear News, May, 7, 2001, p. 6.

Pledger, Marcia. "Girl Power Makes Waves with Retailers." Cleveland Plain Dealer, April 1, 1998.

Quick, Rebecca, "Candie's Restates Results, as SEC Probes Accounting." Wall Street Journal, September, 23, 1999, p. B19.

"Sweet Success." Footwear News, February 9, 1998.

"Year on the Edge." Footwear News, December 29, 1997.

Sharyn Kolberg
Kevin Teague

IKEA International A/S

Box 640
Helsingborg, SE 25 106
Sweden
Telephone: 46 42 267100
Fax: 46 42 132805
Web site: www.IKEA.com

■■■

UNBÖRING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 IKEA was the world's largest home-furnishing retail chain and had just released plans to open 60 to 70 new stores across Asia, Europe, and North America. Although most people in U.S. metropolitan areas were already familiar with the Swedish home retailer, many Americans living in smaller cities and suburban areas were not. To increase its brand recognition in the United States, IKEA launched its "Unböring" campaign, the title of which was fashioned with a fake umlaut as a tongue-in-cheek reference to the company's Swedish heritage.

After 11 years with Deutsch Inc. as its ad agency and a brief contract with Carmichael Lynch, in 2002 IKEA signed over its advertising budget, estimated at $45 million, to Crispin Porter + Bogusky, an agency based in Miami. For the new campaign the agency focused on a phenomenon that it called "furniture guilt" or "old furniture gravity," which it described as Americans' compulsion to keep outdated furniture. "Lamp," the first television spot, featured an old red lamp that had been replaced by a new IKEA lamp. The lamp's curbside doom was accompanied by poignant piano music. In the spot's final few seconds a man with a Swedish accent appeared and scoffed at the audience's sympathies. "Many of you feel bad for this lamp. That's because you [are] crazy. It has no feelings. And the new one is much better." "Unböring" continued into 2005; all ads featured the word "Unböring" at the end. Print, Internet, and billboard ads were employed along with a heavy catalog launch at North American IKEA stores.

"Unböring" earned several awards and occurred during a critical point in IKEA's U.S. market expansion. The first television spot, "Lamp," received the campaign's greatest accolades, snagging the Grand Prix at the Cannes International Advertising Festival along with the Grand Clio. IKEA sales in the United States, which was IKEA's second-largest market, increased by 8 percent between 2002 and 2003. "There was a lot of discussion about the whole IKEA campaign," Clio juror Bob Scarpelli told Adweek. "We agreed that it plays with your emotions and perception the way few commercials do. You feel uneasy when you see it. That's great. It makes you think."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

With its first store appearing in Sweden in 1958, IKEA climbed to the position of world's top furniture retailer by designing hip, Bauhaus-inspired furnishings and shipping them unassembled to reduce labor costs. The first U.S. IKEA opened in Philadelphia in 1985, and in the early nineties, Los Angeles became the site of the first West Coast IKEA. In 1989 IKEA awarded Deutsch, an agency based in New York, the company's advertising budget. Linda Sawyer, managing partner and CEO for Deutsch, told Advertising Age, "Ikea was pivotal to us. Its growth paralleled our own. It was the reason we invested in direct marketing, the reason we moved into interactive." The agency created commercials for IKEA that some considered controversial, including a 1994 spot featuring a gay couple picking out a dining-room table from IKEA. The agency's contract lasted 11 years, at which point IKEA briefly signed with the Minneapolis-based shop Carmichael Lynch.

© JERRY MCCREA/STAR LEDGER/CORBIS.

With plans to expand its retail presence in North America, in 2002 IKEA switched agencies again, choosing Crispin Porter + Bogusky after seeing the agency's work. "They identified in the pitch a real strategic opportunity that we now see translated into the creative, and that was to challenge the home furnishing that is out there," Christian Mathieu, external marketing manager for IKEA, told Advertising Age. Mathieu said that the company had been especially impressed by the agency's ads for MINI Cooper cars and its "Florida Truth" anti-tobacco campaign, saying, "We're an advocate of trying to break conventions, and you see that in those campaigns."

In developing an advertising strategy to support IKEA's expansion, Crispin Porter + Bogusky suggested that American sales would be stimulated by a campaign that shattered America's persistence to accumulate outdated furniture. Speaking to the New York Times, Irma Zandl, president of the Zandl Group, a market research and consulting company, offered an analysis of the reasoning behind the campaign: "IKEA's cheap prices are a plus, as are its contemporary designs. But it has a spotty reputation for quality. The campaign may be seeking to 'put a positive spin' on that disadvantage, suggesting that you will want to replace something anyway, so that it doesn't matter that it doesn't last very long."

TARGET MARKET

Alex Bogusky, creative director at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told USA Today that the original "Unböring" spots, "Lamp" and "Moo Cow," were aimed at Americans who "spend wildly on 'fashion' purchases, such as clothes and shoes. They still cling to a 'till death do us part attitude' with their furniture." According to Crispin Porter + Bogusky, these consumers had a guilt-induced, Puritan attachment to Colonial remakes. Before the campaign Crispin Porter + Bogusky's planning group conducted research showing that, in one American lifetime, people had the same average number of dining room tables as they did spouses: 1.6. Even affluent consumers who decorated every year or two held tightly to old furniture. Crispin Porter + Bogusky ran the first segment of the campaign hoping to break Americans of this inclination and to get them to view furniture as fashion items. "People here just don't approach furniture as a fashion category at all," Bogusky told Shoot. "But in the Bahamas, people tend to redo their homes every year, with this year's colors and styles. It's another culture." Furniture-industry analyst Jerry Epperson told the Washington Post that the average sofa was kept for eight years by Americans. Bedroom furniture stuck around for 16 to 20 years. Recliners were replaced every six years; not because they fell out of fashion but because their parts and padding were worn out.

COMPETITION

By 2005 Bed Bath and Beyond (BBB) was considered the largest domestic retailer in the United States, with 660 stores and $5.1 billion in sales. In 2000 BBB had begun relying exclusively on circulars, catalogs, and word of mouth to advertise. All BBB stores were divided into two main departments: domestics (which included kitchen fixtures, bathroom accessories, and bedroom items) and home furnishings. BBB rarely held sales, focusing instead on what it called "everyday low prices." One expense BBB budgeted into passive advertising was the creation of its website. Designed by R/GA, an agency specializing in interactive advertising, http://www.bedbathandbeyond.com was called "Best E-Commerce Site" by Advertising Age in 2000.

In 2002 and 2003 Linens 'n Things (LNT) ranked 21st out of all U.S. home retailers. The company almost doubled its sales between 2001 and 2003. By 2005 it was considered the second-largest U.S. retailer of home

THE OLD RED LAMP

Crispin Porter + Bogusky and Spike Jonze considered a variety of lamps before settling on the red, lonely desk light that was left curbside in the television spot "Lamp." Explaining why Crispin Porter + Bogusky settled on that particular lamp, Ari Merkin, the spot's writer, told Shoot, "This one stood out as the most pathetic. It was the kind of thing you'd have in your dorm room. I actually think I did have a lamp like this in my dorm room at school." After the shoot someone not from Crispin Porter + Bogusky took the prop home. When the agency asked for it back, the lamp's new owner mimicked the "Lamp" commercial by sending Crispin Porter + Bogusky a note that stated, "See, you've fallen for it. See, you've grown attached to it, and you are crazy."

textiles, housewares, and decorating accessories. Realizing that home fixtures were more lucrative than linen, LNT had begun marketing "things" more aggressively by 2003. Advertising created by the Richards Group targeted women aged 25 to 54 with a "recipe" message. One television spot depicted people cooking together in a kitchen during a casual dinner party, with a voice-over listing visible items as if they were recipe ingredients. TNS Media Intelligence/CMR, a business information service, stated in Adweek that LNT spent almost $4 million on newspaper, radio, magazine, and outdoor advertising in 2002. The majority of its $60 million ad budget was spent on circulars and direct mail.

MARKETING STRATEGY

During the last weeks of September 2002 Crispin Porter + Bogusky unleashed IKEA's "Unböring" campaign, which cost an estimated $45 million, across television, the Internet, print, and outdoor advertising, all ads containing the pronouncement: "Unböring." Outdoor billboards featured enormous IKEA price tags with actual furnishings, such as bookcases and sofas, attached to the signs. "Unböring" posters were pasted on walls in New York City and Chicago, and "Lamp" and "Moo Cow" television commercials aired during the World Series and during popular network shows such as Frasier and Friends. Magazine ads appeared in Spin, Cosmopolitan, Vogue, Entertainment Weekly, Essence, and Vibe.

The campaign's first television spot, "Lamp," garnered the most awards. It was directed by Oscar nominee Spike Jonze, who also directed Being John Malkovich. Bogusky explained to Shoot why Jonze chose the script: "He loved the idea of trying to make you feel for this inanimate object. He loved that challenge." The spot featured a red desk lamp that a woman removed from her apartment and set on the sidewalk. A moody piano score accentuated the lamp's doom as heavy rain began to fall. A newer, more contemporary lamp appeared in the window overhead, which the old lamp seemed to be hopelessly gazing at. The commercial ended with Jonas Forlander, a Swede, scolding the audience for caring about an old lamp's fate.

Filmed back-to-back with "Lamp," the next television spot, "Moo Cow," depicted a couple passionately embraced on a table. The woman, perturbed by the gaze of a cow-shaped ceramic creamer, smacked it onto the floor. Forlander appeared once again to state, "You feel sad for the little creamer. This is because you are crazy. Tacky items can easily be replaced with better IKEA."

Wes Anderson, director of Rushmore, helmed IKEA's next two commercials, "Kitchen" and "Living Room." The spots, which first aired in November of 2002, drifted from the original "old furniture gravity" concept of the first two and focused exclusively on IKEA's brand. The spots portrayed a family and a couple arguing inside an IKEA showroom. In the spot "Living Room," a family appeared to be arguing inside their living room, which was furnished with IKEA products. By the spot's conclusion it had become apparent they were actually inside an IKEA showroom. Bogusky explained the two spots in Shoot. "The way you are allowed to use their showroom is extremely interactive. They don't mind if you take naps on a piece of furniture. We wanted to play on that and take some broader ground from a brand point of view that we're a life-at-home company, not just a furnishings company."

The next television spots, which were designed by Crispin Porter + Bogusky and StyleWar, a collective of Swedish designers and directors, refocused on IKEA's affordability by explaining how easily people could fit new IKEA furnishings into their household budgets. The commercials showed living rooms and kitchens being magically remodeled. "Maybe you have $120. Maybe you have $650. Maybe you have $2,300," a female voice explained in the spot titled "Thugs." Each time a price was quoted, different IKEA products appeared in the room. The "Unböring" campaign continued into 2005, bolstering IKEA for the opening of its 50 new U.S. stores between 2005 and 2012.

OUTCOME

"Unböring" ran during a time in IKEA's history when its U.S. sales were rising (they increased 8 percent between

SPIKE JONZE

Spike Jonze, the director of "Lamp," also directed the films Being John Malkovich and Adaptation and starred in Three Kings. Although Jonze was nominated for a best-director Oscar for Being John Malkovich in 1999, the family of his ex-wife, Sophia Coppola, clearly collected more rewards from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. In 2004 Sophia Coppola won the Oscar for best original screenplay. Her father, the director Francis Ford Coppola, grandfather, the composer Carmine Coppola, and cousin, the actor Nicolas Cage, had all won Oscars.

2002 and 2003). It helped push global sales to $15.4 billion by 2004. In 2003 most ad industry pundits had predicted that Wieden & Kennedy's Honda commercial "cog" would win the Grand Prix at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, but "Lamp" snatched the award. Crispin Porter + Bogusky creative director Paul Keister, surprised about winning the Grand Prix, told Shoot, "It's a very simple, strong idea, and the strategy came through without any sort of compromises. It wasn't bogged down with information. It was just pure branding for IKEA." "Lamp" also won the 2003 Grand Clio for television.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. " 'Crazy' at the Clios: TV Back in Spotlight with CP+B's 'Lamp' Coup." Adweek, May 26, 2003, p. 26.

Beer, Rebecca. "Close-Up: Live Issue—Crispin Porter & Bogusky. The US Ad Agency That Trounced 'Cog' at Cannes." Campaign, July 4,2003, p. 16.

Dunlap, Bill. "Flying Right: Crispin Porter + Bogusky Has an Award-Winning Year, Topped with Continuing Creativity." Shoot, December 5, 2003, p. 15.

Elliot, Stuart. "IKEA Challenges the Attachment to Old Stuff, in Favor of Brighter, New Stuff." New York Times, September 16, 2002, p. 6.

Garcia, Sandra. "Home Makeover: Crispin Porter + Bogusky Highlights Style and Affordability for IKEA." Shoot, December 5, 2003. p. 17.

Griswold, Alicia. "Off-road Trip: Crispin Porter + Bogusky Explores New Terrain with Mini, IKEA and Molson." Adweek, January 20, 2003, p. 26.

Hales, Linda. "Jeepers, Keepers!; IKEA Ads Deride Attachment to Old Furniture." Washington Post, September 21, 2002, p. C2.

Lazare, Lewis. "IKEA Makes Argument; Angry Couples at Center of New Spots for Retailer." Chicago Sun-Times, November 14, 2002, p. 63.

Lippert, Barbara. "Broken Homes: Unboring, Yes, but Also Cheerless. Bring Back the Swede!" Adweek (eastern ed.), November 25, 2002, p. 22.

McCarthy, Michael. "IKEA Pulls an Upset to Win Top Ad at Cannes Lions." USA Today, June 23, 2002, p. B2.

Soter, Tom. "New Frontiers: Crispin Porter + Bogusky Production Department Is on Top of New Trends." Shoot, December 5, 2003, p. 16.

Van Dusen, Christine. "Who's Afraid of IKEA?" Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 26, 2005, p. C1.

Wilcha, Kristin. "IKEA's 'Lamp' Shines at Cannes Advertising Festival." Shoot, June 27, 2003, p. 1.

Kevin Teague

InBev USA

101 Merritt 7
Norwalk, Connecticut 06856-5075
USA
Telephone: (203) 750-6600
Fax: (203) 750-6699
Web site: www.inbev.com

■■■

GRAB A ROCK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Also see essay for Labatt USA.

After years of outperforming other beers in its category, the Latrobe Brewing Company's Rolling Rock, then owned by Labatt USA (a division of Belgium's Interbrew that became known as InBev USA following the parent company's 2004 merger with AmBev), set out in 2002 to reverse the previous year's sales decline. Rolling Rock's recipe for success had included a positioning based on the brand's perceived authenticity and quirkiness as well as a push to capture the loyalty of entry-age drinkers. Building on the success of a rock-music festival called the Rolling Rock Town Fair in the brewery's hometown of Latrobe, Pennsylvania, but moving away from its previous emphasis on radio advertising, Labatt USA charged agency McCann-Erickson of New York to craft a national TV campaign. The result was "Grab a Rock."

"Grab a Rock," a four-commercial campaign that was part of the $25 million spent annually to promote Rolling Rock in North America, focused on peculiarities of male behavior and bonding codes and targeted men aged 21 to 34. Within this target, however, Labatt USA further honed its message by aiming two spots at the younger subset of the larger group and two spots at the older subset. The campaign began in January 2002 and was supported by a promotional partnership with ESPN. In addition to sports-programming placements, airtime was purchased on a variety of other cable networks during male-oriented shows.

The campaign was credited with helping to arrest the previous year's sales slide and with contributing to a 2 percent gain in Rolling Rock sales for 2002. The success of the first four spots led Labatt USA to commission four more for 2003. The 2004 merger between parent company Interbrew (which owned such best-selling European brands as Stella Artois, Bass, and Beck's) and Brazil's AmBev (maker of the world's third-most-popular beer, Latin America's Skol) made Rolling Rock's new ultimate parent the largest beer producer in the world.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Rolling Rock brand was introduced in 1939 by Latrobe Brewing, an entity created by five brothers from the Tito family of Pittsburgh when, speculating that President Roosevelt would repeal Prohibition a year before he actually did, they purchased what had been the Loyalhanna Brewing Co. in Latrobe, Pennsylvania. Rolling Rock, with its distinctive green bottle featuring painted-on horse imagery and the mysterious number 33, saw consistent sales gains in the 1960s and sold 720,000 barrels in 1974 before beginning a decade-long decline. Throughout this time, however, the Tito family maintained and renovated their brewery, and the company survived even as many local breweries nationwide went out of business. In 1985 a Japanese beverage manufacturer called Sundor bought Latrobe Brewing and then sold the company at a profit to Labatt USA in 1987.

Labatt USA continued to invest heavily in production and bottling capability, but it also added a key ingredient to the Rolling Rock sales strategy: marketing, a tactic the Tito family had believed unnecessary. In the 1990s the brand relied mostly on radio advertising and continued to build a consumer following, especially in the Northeast, the Great Lakes region, and California. Rolling Rock outperformed most players in the so-called superpremium beer category, which included imports and microbrews along with other beers priced higher than the mainstream beer brands, and targeted newly legal drinkers with the first Rolling Rock Town Fair, a rock-music festival near Latrobe, in August 2000. After experiencing record sales that year Rolling Rock saw its position weaken in 2001, with declines of 8 percent in volume. Although the brand supplemented its Town Fair positioning with targeted TV spots featuring aspiring alternative-rock bands, Labatt USA continued to allot the bulk of its Rolling Rock ad spending to radio. As it took the Town Fair concept to 15 other cities in 2001 and embarked on a new round of production-enhancing upgrades at the Latrobe brewery, Rolling Rock faced increasing competition from both imports and microbrews in the U.S. market. Labatt USA began, with agency McCann-Erickson of New York, planning Rolling Rock's first large-scale national TV effort.

TARGET MARKET

"Grab a Rock," whose four TV spots had in common an emphasis on humorous, peculiarly male codes of behavior, primarily targeted 21- to 34-year-old men, who were far and away the beer industry's most voracious consumers. Within this market, however, the campaign made separate appeals: two of the spots targeted the 21- to 24-year-old subset of the overall target, while the other two were geared toward the older men of the group. Rolling Rock's shift in its advertising emphasis from radio to television made sense, as Rolling Rock director of marketing David Van Wees told Brandweek, because "Our target spends more time watching TV—20 hours a week—than they do listening to radio, reading or going online combined."

The spots aimed at the younger segment featured correspondingly young actors in humorous situations involving bar behavior and pizza eating, while the other two commercials focused on marriage and backyard barbecues, issues more pertinent to those in their late twenties and early thirties. All of the spots featured cameos of the number 33, the mystery number on the Rolling Rock bottle. The tendency of Rolling Rock aficionados to speculate about the meaning of the number was perceived to be a factor in the brand's allure.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

The 33 on the Rolling Rock beer bottle had long been seen as a brand asset, helping to inspire loyalty among drinkers. Since the beer's 1939 debut, consumers had obsessively guessed at the 33's meaning and provenance, but Latrobe Brewing and its subsequent corporate owners guarded the secret closely, wisely assuming, according to observers, that the mystery was worth much more to marketers than any explanation could be. Among theories regarding the meaning of the 33 were that it was the racing number for the horse pictured on the bottle, that it referred to the 33 paces separating the brew house from the brewmaster's office, and that it referred to the year 1933, which marked the repeal of Prohibition. Another long-held theory held that the 33 was a typo, a word count of the print generated for the original Rolling Rock label, which erroneously made it onto the proofs for the bottle label and stayed put because the brewery's original owners did not want to waste the bottles that had been made before the error was caught.

COMPETITION

Though Rolling Rock's ultimate parent, Interbrew (later known as InBev) of Belgium—which bought Labatt in 1995—rivaled Anheuser-Busch at the top of beer markets around the world, it did so not through the global marketing of individual brands or images but by tailoring the image of individual beers to individual markets. Thus, while Rolling Rock was Interbrew's top U.S. product, and although Interbrew was an international powerhouse, Rolling Rock was not—and was never intended to be—a top product outside of North America. In the United States Rolling Rock necessarily competed with domestic full-calorie beers such as Budweiser and also with superpremium beers, those priced higher than the mainstream brands.

Anheuser-Busch, in addition to having an almost 50 percent market share of the country's beer market, had an advertising budget far larger than its nearest competitors. Despite declining sales of Budweiser, the brewer continued to support the "King of Beers" with blockbuster ad campaigns in the late 1990s and early 2000s. Among the most noteworthy campaigns on behalf of Budweiser were the series of commercials featuring frogs whose croaks sounded out the brand's name and a long-running follow-up effort in which the scope of the swamp motif was widened to include talking lizards. Budweiser made what may have been its biggest advertising splash ever, though, with the "Whassup?!" campaign, which focused on four friends' trademark, slang greeting and became a pop-culture phenomenon in 2000.

Heineken, one of Rolling Rock's top competitors in the superpremium category, unveiled its long-running "It's All About the Beer" campaign in 1999. Focusing on universal "beer moments," situations in ordinary life that hinged on the presence of Heineken, the campaign was designed to broaden the brand's U.S. market, especially among young people, by counteracting consumers' elitist associations regarding the classic Dutch brew. At the same time, the tagline and content of the commercials strove to communicate the superiority of the actual product.

Corona Extra, meanwhile, had recently eclipsed Heineken as the United States' top imported beer. The brand's rapid growth in the 1990s was chiefly attributable, in the eyes of many industry watchers, to its marketing strategy. In a succession of campaigns that each built on the same idea—equating Corona with a beach vacation—the brand's marketers established a clear and appealing product image that was distinct from that of all competitors. Between 1995 and 2000 Corona Extra's share of the American import market went from 13.5 percent to 27.3 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Labatt USA declined to release budget figures for "Grab a Rock," Rolling Rock's biggest advertising campaign ever, but senior brand manager Daniel R. Hilbert indicated that the campaign represented a tripling of spending on advertising in support of the brand and yet still accounted for only a fraction of the $25 million spent annually to promote the beer in North America. The campaign built on the youth-oriented marketing push fueled by the Rolling Rock Town Fair concerts and also relied on the perception of authenticity and mystery that supposedly surrounded the brand. New packaging, unveiled almost simultaneously with "Grab a Rock," retained Rolling Rock's traditional horse and steeplechase imagery but highlighted the mystery number 33, which had always appeared on the brand's bottles but the meaning of which had never been disclosed. Likewise, a $14.5 million upgrade of Latrobe Brewing's bottling capacity indicated that Rolling Rock was poised to grow by up to half a million barrels in sales per year.

"Grab a Rock" broke during a January 2002 telecast of a National Football League (NFL) game on ESPN, and the spots continued to appear during that network's SportsCenter sports news show as well as on live coverage of athletic events such as college basketball tournaments and the National Hockey League (NHL) playoffs. "Grab a Rock" spots also appeared on the major networks Fox and CBS and during NFL pregame coverage. Airtime was purchased on cable channels such as TBS, VH1, and the Discovery Channel. Rolling Rock additionally sponsored 33 hours of comedy on the cable channel Comedy Central, a deal that included numerous placements of the "Grab a Rock" commercials.

In one of the campaign's spots aimed at 21- to 24-year-olds, two young men were seen sending hand signals to one another across a crowded nightclub, as one was invited to play pool with an attractive woman and the other was buying Rolling Rocks for the group. A deadpan voice-over provided a humorous translation of the signals. In the other spot aimed at the target market's younger end, the voice-over explained the principle of the "reverse blow," a coping strategy for the young man who had just bitten into an extremely hot piece of pizza. The real solution to the young man's dilemma was, of course, to drink a Rolling Rock.

The commercials that were meant to appeal to the target's older subgroup dealt with more domestic issues but still emphasized male codes of interaction and the ways in which Rolling Rock figured into the lives of men. In "Barbecue," for instance, several critical onlookers ridiculed a host's burger-grilling technique, calling him a "rookie" when he ran out of steak sauce. By pouring Rolling Rock over the sizzling meat, however, he regained his credibility as grill master. Similarly, in "Wedding Rock," set at a wedding reception, the groom took a break from the ceremonial festivities to share a Rolling Rock with his friends. "Did she give you a hall pass, or what?" one friend asked. Another poked fun at him with the question, "What's it like to wear jewelry?" The groom coolly responded, "This old thing?" and opened the beer with his new wedding ring, as the voice-over proclaimed, "And thus the groom maintains his status among the pack."

In April 2002 Rolling Rock supported its airing of the "Grab a Rock" spots on ESPN by entering into a promotional partnership with the network. A SportsCenter basketball-highlights segment titled "Shooting the Rock," which showcased great shooting plays, was introduced. Additionally, "Grab a Rock" commercials were preceded, on SportsCenter, by a Rolling Rock billboard highlighting a consumer scavenger hunt called "Hunt for 33," in which viewers were encouraged to locate the hidden 33s in the TV spots and report their findings on ESPN.com, where they had the chance to win 33 tickets to sporting events of their choice. The promotion lasted for six weeks.

OUTCOME

After "Grab a Rock" was launched in January 2002, brand manager Hilbert told Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, "Sales for February absolutely crushed our plan [for the month] and were well ahead of last year. . . . Our orders so far for March look to be 8 percent above plan. So we're on a roll, and things are going well." As these trends continued through the year, Labatt USA commissioned four new "Grab a Rock" spots in November 2002. Like the first batch, these commercials, which aired in 2003, focused on male behavior, and especially male-female relations, while prominently showcasing Rolling Rock and its trademark green bottle. A heavy emphasis on sports programming continued, and another promotional partnership with ESPN's SportsCenter ran during the spring of 2003. Sales figures for 2002 showed an overall gain in volume of 2 percent, confirming that the declines of 2001 had been reversed.

The Rolling Rock Town Fair was extended, along with "Grab a Rock," into 2003. In 2004 Interbrew merged with Brazil's AmBev, and the resultant company was called InBev. The merger made InBev the world's leading beer producer, surpassing Anheuser-Busch. Latrobe Brewing's official U.S. owner became known as InBev USA. In 2004 Rolling Rock tried to sidestep new commercial-excising TV technologies (such as TiVo) with an emphasis on product placement in TV shows, including CBS's Ed and NBC's The West Wing.

FURTHER READING

Barbieri, Kelly. "On a 'Roll': Sponsorship a Hit for Beer Company." Amusement Business, September 17, 2001.

Beirne, Mike. "Labatt Alternative Ads Target Rolling Rockers." Brandweek, April 30, 2001.

———. "Marketers of the Next Generation: David van Wees." Brandweek, April 7, 2003.

———. "Rolling Rock Orders Up More TV Ads after Campaign Spurs Sales Spike." Brandweek, November 11, 2002.

———. "Rolling Rock Trades Radio for Television." Brandweek, October 29, 2001.

Cassidy, Hilary. "ESPN to Rock Viewers With '33' Roll." Brandweek, March 25, 2002.

Khermouch, Gerry. "Follow-Up: Rock Rolls." Brandweek, August 21, 2000.

McKay, Jim. "Expanded Production, New Ad Campaign Raise Profile, Reach of Rolling Rock Beer." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, March 2, 2002.

"Rolling Rock Beer Plans New TV Ad Campaign." Pittsburgh Business Times, October 31, 2001.

Tomlinson, Richard. "The New King of Beers." Fortune, October 18, 2004.

Mark Lane

ING Groep N.V.

ING House
Amstelveenseweg 500
Amsterdam, 1081 KL
Netherlands
Telephone: 31 20 5415411
Fax: 31 20 5415412
Web site: www.ing.com

■■■

ING LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2000 ING Groep N.V. (spelled ING Group in the United States) was a financial powerhouse in Europe, offering a diverse range of insurance, banking, and asset-management services through offices in 60 countries, but the company had not made its way into the U.S. financial arena. That changed in late 2000, when ING finalized the acquisition of three American insurance companies: ReliaStar, Aetna Financial Services, and Aetna International. With the acquisitions complete ING was positioned to pursue a position in the U.S. financial marketplace.

To boost its identity and attract customers in the United States, ING partnered with New York advertising agency Jordan McGrath Case & Partners (JMCP) to create an integrated branding and marketing campaign. The campaign, estimated at $20 to $30 million, began in May 2001 and took a humorous approach to introducing the ING name to consumers. It included television spots and print ads that featured the ING name and company logo—a stylized orange lion—on the back of a park bench. The name appeared to be the suffix of a verb, the first part of which was obscured by someone sitting on the bench. The tagline was "It's not an ending, it's a beginning." In 2002 the campaign evolved to include Internet ads on specific financial websites.

Although the campaign increased awareness of the ING name among American consumers, the financial climate in the United States at the time prevented the company's business from increasing. Further, in June 2001, just one month after the campaign began, ING ended its relationship with JMCP; it awarded the account to DDB Worldwide in August. That October JMCP's parent, Havas Advertising, combined the agency with another of its companies, Arnold Worldwide, to create Arnold McGrath New York. ING reported that the follow-up Internet advertising effort resonated with consumers, with 35 percent who viewed the ads saying that they would use ING's services.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

ING Group, based in Amsterdam, the Netherlands, was established following the 1991 merger of two financial institutions in the Netherlands: the insurance company Nationale-Nederlanden and the bank NMB Postbank Group, both of which had roots stretching back to the nineteenth century. The combined companies, known as Internationale Nederlanden Group, formed the first bancassurer (a bank with a subsidiary insurance company) in the Netherlands. Also in 1991 its name was shortened to its initials: ING. The company soon emerged as an international financial force through acquisitions of related companies, including Brussels Lambert Bank of Belgium and BHF-Bank of Frankfurt, Germany.

In 2000 ING acquired three U.S. insurance companies: Minneapolis-based ReliaStar Financial Corp. for $5 billion in September and Aetna Financial Services and Aetna International, both divisions of Aetna, Inc., of Hartford, Connecticut, for $7.7 billion in December. With the American companies added to its business holdings, by 2001 ING Group boasted more than 100,000 employees in 65 countries, including 11,000 employees in the United States. Following integration of its U.S. acquisitions into its group, ING's stated goals included spending up to $50 million to build brand identity with its existing U.S. customers as well as to attract new American customers. As part of the effort ING announced plans to begin a national marketing campaign in early 2001. The company hired Jordan McGrath Case & Partners of New York to develop a campaign that would both present the company's name and its correct pronunciation—"eye-en-gee"—and let consumers know that it was now a player in the American financial industry.

ING FOUNDATION SUPPORTS UNSUNG HEROES: TEACHERS

Through its philanthropic foundation ING U.S. Financial Services, a division of ING's U.S. operations, the company supported educators in all 50 states with the Unsung Heroes Awards. The awards recognized 100 outstanding teachers each year, with at least one teacher (and his or her school) from each state selected to win a $2,000 monetary prize. The 100 teachers were selected by Scholarship America, a nonprofit education-support and student-aid organization. From the 100 finalists, 3 were chosen by ING's Educators Advisory Board, composed of six top educators from across the United States, to receive an additional financial award—$25,000 for first place, $10,000 for second place, and $5,000 for third place—for an exceptional educational project.

TARGET MARKET

Although people in all income demographics needed a variety of financial services, when ING launched its business in the United States it had its corporate eye on what industry officials described as the "sweet spot." This consisted of consumers in the middle-income markets and "evolving-affluent" markets (the latter category referred to people who were in the process of advancing beyond the middle-class market into the upper-income market). Specifically, ING's campaign was designed to resonate with men and women aged 35 to 54 with annual household incomes of $75,000 or more. This group of consumers was believed to be the most likely to need the financial products and services offered by ING both for the protection of their wealth and for access to methods that would help their accumulated money grow.

COMPETITION

Citigroup Inc. entered the financial marketplace with the founding of City Bank of New York, which was opened in 1812 with the goal of serving a group of New York's business owners. In 1864 the bank's name was changed to National City Bank of New York. By 1894 it had grown to become the largest bank in the United States, and three years later it was the first to establish a foreign department and begin foreign exchange trading. In 1914 the bank opened a branch in Buenos Aries, Argentina, becoming the first U.S. national bank with a foreign office. The stock market crashed in 1929, the same year that National City Bank became the world's largest commercial bank. The bank holding company First National City Corporation became the parent of the bank in 1968. The parent corporation's name was changed to Citicorp in 1974, and two years later National City Bank became Citibank. In 1998 the company's Citicorp and Travelers Group divisions were merged to create Citigroup Inc. To help reach consumers with the message that Citigroup could be their partner in managing all aspects of their finances, it launched an advertising campaign in 2001 with the theme and tagline "Live Richly." Advertising was created by Fallon Worldwide and appeared on television, in print, and in outdoor executions. The campaign ran through 2003 in New York City, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Miami, and Washington, D.C.

AXA Financial was a U.S. division of the Paris-based company AXA. The latter was formed in the early 1980s when Mutuelles Unies, a group of insurance companies, acquired the Drouot Group, France's leading private insurance company. By 1982 Mutuelles Unies-Drouot was France's largest non-state-owned insurance company and was expanding internationally with services that included life insurance, financial management, and real-estate investment. In 1985 the company was becoming better known as the "Bebear Group" for its chairman and chief executive officer, Claude Bebear. To reverse the growing trend of using the incorrect name, company officials began searching for a new one. After compiling a list of suggested names, three settled at the top: Argos, AXA, and Elan. The top choices were presented to company employees, who voted for their favorite. ''Elan'' was the preferred name, but executives in the company's Canada offices complained that the name meant ''moose'' in French, and according to Canadian myth the moose was considered to be unintelligent. ''Argos'' was eliminated when it was learned that another company had already claimed the name. By default, in 1985 ''AXA'' became the new company name of Mutuelles Unies-Drouot. To increase brand awareness and inform U.S. consumers of the variety of financial services that AXA Financial offered, in 2002 the company announced a new advertising campaign created by the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia. Its television spots had the tagline ''Your Future. Your Way,'' and included the music and words from the song My Way by Frank Sinatra.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although ING was a well-known integrated financial services company throughout Europe, when it decided to enter the U.S. market, it was faced with building brand identity and name recognition. The challenge for the company's agency, Havas Advertising's Jordan McGrath Case & Partners of New York (JMCP), was to create a marketing campaign that would launch the company in the United States while clearly sending the message that ING was a name and not a suffix. JMCP signed on with ING in November 2000 and developed a campaign that took a humorous, tongue-in-cheek approach to the ING brand. Included in the effort were television spots and print ads. In an interview with Adweek, Rochelle Klein, chief creative officer for JMCP, explained that the campaign was designed to introduce ING to American consumers as ''a new player in the financial industry and [to] get [its] name across.''

Television spots for the branding and marketing effort, which had an estimated budget of $20–$30 million, began airing in May 2001. The kick-off spot opened with a man and his dog walking in a park. When the man got near a park bench where some people were sitting, he noticed the large letters ''ING'' on the back of the bench. Curious about the word that appeared to be partially hidden, the man asked a woman, ''You have any idea what that says?'' She answered, ''ING.'' Not satisfied with her answer, he asked, ''Do you know what's before it?'' When the woman did not answer, the man looked at the bench and shouted, ''What's that say?'' The tagline for the spot was ''It's not an ending, it's a beginning.'' Other spots featured various characters clearly pronouncing the company's name as three letters: ''I-N-G.'' The spots also stressed that ING was an integrated financial services company. Spots aired during network and cable programs, including the popular Friends and The West Wing.

Like the television spots, print ads featured the ING name and stylized lion logo on a partially obstructed billboard. The full billboard was eventually revealed, showing the person reading the sign that he or she was seeing the company's entire name and not the end of a word. Also as in the TV spots, the tagline was ''It's not an ending, it's a beginning.'' Print ads appeared in the Wall Street Journal and USA Today as well as in other national business and consumer magazines and trade publications read by financial-services professionals.

In the following year, 2002, the campaign was expanded to include advertising on the Internet. The ads appeared on financial news sites such as Fool.com, Forbes.com, and Smartmoney.com. In one ad every ing that appeared in the news text turned orange to match ING's corporate color. Another Internet ad was an extension of the television spots and print ads and featured the man and his dog looking up at an ING billboard. When the man asked, ''What is ING?'' another man responded, ''It's a financial services company.'' His reply, however, was drowned out by a passing herd of sheep. Still another Internet ad displayed a number with the headline ''People in the U.S. who don't know what ING does.'' Each time someone viewed the ad, the number decreased by one. The New York office of Tribal DDB (the interactive and online division of the agency DDB Worldwide) created the Internet advertising.

OUTCOME

Although the campaign succeeded in familiarizing American consumers with the ING name and helped create brand identity, the company reported in a press release that ''the reality of today's depressed and volatile U.S. equity markets has kicked the industry and put an unwelcome dent in our nine-month performance.'' Following the start of the campaign ING reported that its 2002 pretax results for its U.S. financial-services division were $462.6 million, down from $717.7 million for the same period in 2001. The 2002 Internet effort that followed the television and print launch, however, did help drive business and further increased the company's name and brand recognition among consumers. According to an ING survey, 35 percent of consumers who saw the online ads stated that they planned to use ING's services.

Shortly after the start of its branding campaign in June 2001, ING ended its relationship with the agency Jordan McGrath Case & Partners (JMCP). The account was awarded to Omnicom's DDB Worldwide New York in August 2001. Further, in October 2001 JMCP's parent company, Havas Advertising, folded JMCP into another of its agencies, Arnold Worldwide, to create Arnold McGrath New York. That agency was ultimately folded into Arnold Worldwide.

FURTHER READING

"Breaking: ING Americas; ING Lets the Dogs Out." Advertising Age, May 21, 2001.

"A Brush with Greatness, Financial Services—Citigroup Ads." Brandweek, April 30, 2001.

Bryan, Scott. "European Financial Firm Land-ING in America." Brandweek, May 21, 2001.

———. "ING Breaks U.S. Ads." Adweek, May 21, 2001.

"A European Scope: ING Group." Global Finance, July 1, 2001.

Green, Heather, and Pallavi Gogoi. "Online Ads Take Off—Again." BusinessWeek Online, May 5, 2003. Available from <http://www.businessweek.com/magazine/content/03_18/b3831079_mz063.htm>

"Hotline (The ING Group Goes into Review)." Adweek, June 18, 2001.

Howard, Theresa. "Discover Goes for Funny Bone." USA Today, March 12, 2001.

"ING Americas Announces Integrated Management and Organizational Structure." Business Wire, December 14, 2000.

"ING Group Banks $50 M on Boosting Identity in the U.S." Brandweek, November 6, 2000.

"ING Launches First Major U.S. Ad Campaign; Campaign Marks the Next Phase in ING's U.S. Strategy—Building Name Awareness." PR Newswire, May 21, 2001.

Mack, Ann M. "ING Uses Web to Build Awareness." Adweek, October 22, 2002.

Stephens, Erica. "ING Ad Campaign Focuses on Products and Name." Atlanta Business Chronicle, May 25, 2001.

"The Washington Times Advertising and Media Column." Washington (D.C.) Times, September 30, 2002.

Rayna Bailey

Intel Corporation

2200 Mission College Blvd.
PO Box 58119
Santa Clara, California 95052-8119
USA
Telephone: (408) 765-8080
Fax: (408) 765-9904
Web site: www.intel.com

■■■

BUNNY PEOPLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

During the 1980s the popularity and performance of personal computers (PCs) experienced phenomenal growth. Chip maker Intel Corporation, based in Santa Clara, California, produced a major share of the microprocessors powering those PCs, leading the way in both consumer recognition and sales and claiming a 90 percent market segment share by the late 1990s. By 1990 Intel had begun to focus its marketing on shaping the corporate brand with newly hired agency EURO RSCG DSW Partners, Salt Lake City. The agency set out to create a brand image for Intel's chips as "The computer inside," a concept that, in a 1991 campaign, hit the bull's-eye. "Intel inside" became more than a campaign tag line; it was an industry icon.

Throughout the 1990s the PC industry faced an ever-increasing demand from consumers for faster, high-performance microprocessors for their personal computers. In 1997 Intel responded by introducing its most enhanced technology in 10 years, MMX and the Pentium II processor. Acknowledging the increasing trend to use PCs for entertainment as well work, Ann Lewnes, Intel's director of worldwide advertising, stated, "[The company's objective] is to create awareness and excitement among consumers. We wanted to position the product as fun, particularly for multimedia applications."

Intel was the only tech company to purchase ads for the 1997 Super Bowl's coveted commercial slots. During Intel's 30 seconds, "Bunny People" did the disco. These Bunny People were modeled after chip technicians who work in the hyperclean manufacturing rooms of fabrication plants. Their spacesuit like "cleansuits," or "bunny suits," are worn to prevent even the tiniest of particles from contaminating the processors. In the spot a group of Bunny People danced about in brightly colored lam, bunny suits. Said Lewnes, "These commercials are humorous, high-tech fantasies that show how fun computing can be with MMX technology." Another spot in the campaign featured Seinfeld star Jason Alexander as a hapless character hoping to impress potential blind dates via Intel's video phone. These spots, together with related print ads, radio spots, and promotions, spurred both consumer approval and rival spoofing and was the most comprehensive campaign ever undertaken by Intel.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

By the 1980s computers had begun to move from a largely scientific and industrial market into the personal user market. Intel's 1989 ad campaign with Shafer & Shafer, an Irvine, California, tech agency, prompted consumers to upgrade their systems with the latest technologies. Intel had just released its 386 chip, an upgrade of its 286 chip. When computer makers and buyers did not rush to upgrade, a striking ''Red X'' campaign was designed. Print ads and billboards featured graffiti-esque red spray paint x-ing out ''286'' and scrawling in ''386SX'' in an effort to move consumers along the upgrade food chain. In 1990 Intel signed on EURO RSCG DSW Partners. That year's campaign, ''The Computer Inside,'' focused on building the corporate brand. In 1991 the company launched ''Intel Inside.'' The success of the ''Intel Inside'' campaign was due in part to brilliant co-op marketing—that is, paying PC makers to feature the logo in ads. Through a combined marketing effort between Intel and computer makers, the ''Intel Inside'' logo on PCs became a seal of approval in the minds of consumers.

Between the years 1989 and 1996 Intel's revenues soared from $3.1 billion to $20.8 billion, net income rose from $391 million to $5.2 billion, and market segment share grew from under 60 percent to 80 percent. The ''Intel Inside'' campaign had solidified Intel's image of superior performance, outweighing the fact that the company's microprocessors cost considerably more than those available from its competitors. Intel became a cash cow, with sales increasing a whopping 30 to 50 percent every year between 1994 and 1997.

As Intel's enviable success was turning heads and profits, their competitors were carving a different niche. Prior to 1997 the average PC price was $2,000. In that year Compaq Computer Corporation set an industry precedent by offering a high-powered PC at a bargain-basement price of $999, powered by rival Cyrix Corporation's MediaGX chip. The sub-$1,000 PC market proved irrepressible. Within a year nearly all major PC makers were offering the new price point, resulting in a segment sales increase from 7 percent of the U.S. retail market in 1996 to approximately 25 percent in 1997. Intel's president and CEO Dr. Andrew S. Grove explained the company's response to this competition to Business Week: ''For us to walk away from a market whose size is going to be measured in tens of millions of units per year, maybe bigger, is inconceivable.... It is very important for us to participate at both ends of the wire.'' The company planned to make up for meager profits on the low end with increased volume and on the high-end with sales directed at server and workstation markets.

TARGET MARKET

The success of Intel's brand identification could largely be summed up in two words: ''Intel Inside.'' The tag line had proven enormously successful in whispering ''performance inside'' into the ears of PCs buyers. Consumers wanted an assurance that their PC could go the distance double-time as they cruised the Internet, developed intricate audio and animation programs, and played power-hungry computer games.

The age market for such a product was widespread—PC users from their late teens to late 40s. To reach such a diffuse target, the "Blind Date" and "Bunny People" spots were aired on such programs as ER, Seinfeld, and Veronica's Closet, with cable TV spots purchased on The History Channel, CNN, and A&E. The women's market was targeted with print ads placed in Self, Vanity Fair, Gourmet, and, for the first time, Martha Stewart Living.

The "Bunny People" spots proved the most popular aspect of the campaign. The mood set by Wild Cherry's boogie-down tune, "Play That Funky Music," hit home with those at both ends of the Baby Boomer generation. Boomers who had come of age during the 1970s identified with the disco reference from firsthand experience. The theme spoke to younger Boomers as well because the campaign was launched during a late 1990s nostalgia for anything from the 1970s. The hints of '70s nostalgia in the disco-themed ads proved a winner with the youngest target market segment as well. Intel's campaign had successfully caught the ears of all ages within its intended market.

COMPETITION

By the 1997 release of MMX technology, Intel had a decided claim on the title of world's top selling chip maker. Primary competition came from Cyrix Corporation's MediaGX processor and Advanced Micro Devices's (AMDs) K6chip. Intel had already earned a distinguished reputation for performance, if not low-end pricing. Rivals Cyrix and AMD set out to develop a reputation for high quality at a more competitive price than Intel's. Cyrix's 1997 marketing goals were strikingly similar to Intel's, with one exception. "People want to be entertained in their living room—they don't want just a productivity tool. Through our innovative processor and system technology, we've made possible an easy-to-use home infotainment system with PC capability that people can actually afford," stated Cyrix's vice president of corporate marketing, Steve Tobak, on the company's website. Intel's rivals had an edge in competing in the sub-$1,000 PC market, because their processors continued to be available at prices well below the Pentium's. Consumers had been offered a sub-$1,000 PC that could perform, and they scooped them up. Market segment share for the price point jumped from 10 percent in 1996 to upwards of 20 percent the following year. "It's the first time in many years that there has been a viable alternative [to Intel] at the low end," IBM senior vice president Samuel J. Palmisano told Business Week. His company tapped AMD's K6 chip for their low-end line of PCs. Intel's monopoly on high performance chips that could run desirable software had been challenged, and at a considerably lower cost to PC makers.

AMD's fall 1997 campaign, developed by Hill, Holliday Advertising, sent out just this message. One spot featured a secret agent held captive by an evil mastermind whose plot to rule the world is foiled when the processor in his expensive PC cannot deliver. Thanks to the AMD processor in his PC, the secret agent handily

PLAYING IS THE THING

Intel's "Bunny People" campaign succeeded in transforming supposedly geeky MMX chip technicians into fun-loving, dance-at-the-drop-of-a-keystroke guys. The ads were popular in consumer surveys, and thanks to Intel merchandising, anyone enamored with the brightly suited techies could take home an eight-inch beanbag doll version of their very own. Bunny People character dolls, available in an assortment of cleansuit colors, were among a treasure trove of merchandise developed around MMX technology. Consumers could pick up a Bunny People doll at their favorite computer outlet or log on to Uniquely Intel, the company's Internet merchandise catalog (http://www.intel.com), to scoop up Bunny People embellished beach towels, bags, tumblers, watches, and apparel.

escapes. On AMD's website, Tom Stites, vice president of communications, said, "These television spots target personal computer consumers. Our intent is to show that buying PCs based on the AMD K6 processor is a smart choice. The message is that no matter how much or how little consumers are prepared to spend for a similarly configured system, they will get better performance with the AMD K6. Our message of performance and value is compelling, but our primary competitor outspends us on advertising by almost twenty to one. In order to be heard above the noise, commercials from AMD must break through with humor and excitement."

Apple Computer, Inc., could not have agreed more. In 1997 Apple joined forces with TBWA Chiat/Day for the first time in over a decade. This team was responsible for having produced Apple's legendary "1984" campaign, voted the best ad of all time by advertising professionals. In early 1998 the team followed their cerebral 1997 "Think Different" campaign with the "Toasted Bunny" spot, a direct spoof on Intel's disco dancing "Bunny People." Apple had already made fun of Intel's vaunted processor speed in a spot of a garden snail crawling along with a Pentium II chip on its back. Their "Toasted Bunny" spot featured a guy in a shimmering blue cleansuit, accompanied by the 1970s classic "Disco Inferno." As the foil-clad techie dances to the beat, his feet burst into flames, and he has to be doused by a fireman. Apple's website deepened the tease with, "Ah, there's nothing sweeter than the smell of toasted chips in the morning."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Intel's decision to take a more humorous marketing tack came about as chip suppliers were discovering that consumers were not responding well to ads dwelling on the technical intricacies of PCs. On television two "Blind Date" spots, starring Jason Alexander, were the first ads to lighten up. Director Jim Gartner, who had brought to life Pepsi's "Dad's Blessing," HBO's "Falling TV" and Visa's "Burro," teamed up with EURO RSCG DSW Partners in creating the spots, a tongue-in-cheek portrayal of Intel's video phone capabilities.

In the second round of spots, the Bunny People characters were introduced in a send-up of the boring geek stereotype. The first spot, debuting during the 1997 Super Bowl, contrasted a traditional fabrication-plant setting with a more free-spirited MMX technology department. Within this more fun-loving environment, the Bunny People danced the workday away, suggesting the PC user could experience new heights of fun with the aid of MMX technology. The Bunny People showed up on television spots throughout the year, and during the fall an international flavor was added by having the Bunny People travel the globe in a "TechMobile," created by Batmobile designers Trans FX of Los Angeles. In the "Road Trip" spot the Bunny People became so excited about Pentium II technology, they were inspired to build the TechMobile to help them spread the word around the world. In a second spot the TechMobile delivered the beloved Bunny People to Hong Kong, where they were hailed by crowds in awe of the marvels of Pentium II.

The television and print campaigns were complemented by radio commercials and an interactive sweepstakes. On the websites of MTV, Interzine, Gamespot, MPlayer, Hotwired, and Hollywood Online, users were supplied with clues for the official sweepstakes found on Intel's website.

Intel continued its proven track record of co-op marketing in 1997. The home PC buyer's awareness of the Intel microprocessor increased from 20 percent at 1992's campaign launch date to 80 percent in 1996, according to Dennis Carter, vice president of sales and marketing for the company. Even more impressive was the 90 percent recognition in the business market. Carter told Advertising Age magazine that 70 percent of home PC buyers and 85 percent of business buyers preferred Intel and were willing to pay the higher price the "Intel Inside" logo commanded.

Since the inception of "Intel Inside," consumers had shown a strong allegiance to the company's co-op efforts. According to a September 15, 1997, issue of Advertising Age, Intel had an estimated advertising budget of $900 million in 1997, $750 million of which went into co-op ads. As of 1997, approximately 1,500 PC makers were participating with Intel in co-op marketing, wherein they received a 6 percent rebate on chip purchases by tacking the Pentium logo on their PCs and ads. PC makers would come up with one-third of the cost of print ads and one-half that of broadcast costs. For the first half of the year, nearly 80 percent of the $202.9 million spent on U.S. PC advertising in computer and business publications featured the "Intel Inside" logo according to Sheila Craven, president of Adscope, an ad tracking company. Intel's contributions toward shared advertising proved irresistible, with every major Intel-based PC maker participating by 1996.

OUTCOME

Intel's "Bunny People" campaign proved a strong success, thanks to the uplifting image provided by Wild Cherry's "Play That Funky Music." A USA Today Ad Track survey found the spot among the top 10 favorite ads among baby boomer consumers, making it the most popular tech campaign ever measured by the poll. It ranked in the top 20 of 90 campaigns measured by Ad Track in a two-year period. The breakdown showed that 30 percent of those answering the survey claimed they liked the MMX ads a lot, with 38 percent of those between 18 and 24 giving the ads a thumbs up. A mere 8 percent of those polled felt the television spots were ineffective. Consumers said they felt the disco-dancing Bunny People imparted a fun, consistent image for the brand. Ricky Banaag, Intel Microelectronics country manager for the Philippines, told Newsbytes News, "Our research shows that the Bunny People characters have been a positive influence on Intel's brand personality. Bunny People characters have helped make the Intel brand more friendly and accessible."

Industry insiders were not necessarily so positive. Apple executive Allen Olivio called the "Bunny People" ads frivolous in Entertainment Weekly. "It's what happens to advertisers when they don't have anything to say." Marketing consultant Gary Stibel showed concern that Intel's funky ads might threaten the reputation for high quality secured with its earlier "Intel Inside" identification, and he suggested to USA Today that Intel should stick to a consistent image. A president of an undisclosed ad agency for a major computer client, commenting on Intel's focus on co-op marketing, told Advertising Age, "Most people that buy computers don't even know that that chip is in there. They care about the performance of the computer. It really doesn't matter what the chip is." But John Dahlin of EURO RSCG DSW Partners responded, "Ultimately the success of your work is the success of your client. What we do is produce advertising that works great for the problems that our client has. If it doesn't win a lot of awards . . . as long as a billion people buy Pentium, I can handle that." Intel could well handle its year-end report for 1997: revenue totaled $25.1 billion, with net income at $6.9 billion. It was the eighth consecutive year of earnings and revenue record setting for the world's largest chip maker.

FURTHER READING

Abrams, Judith. "Hearing Footsteps in Sub-$1,000 Market." Multimedia Monitor, November 1, 1997.

Armstrong, David. "Computers; Loose Connections." The Press, December 23, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Consumers Bought into Real-World Ads in '97." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

———. "Consumers Flip for Hip Chip Ads but Is Intel's Image Being Squandered?" USA Today, May 12, 1997.

———. "For Advertisers, Age Starts to Matter." USA Today, September 22, 1997.

Goldfisher, Alastair. "Apple Torches Bunny in Latest TV Campaign." The Business Journal, San Jose, March 23, 1998.

"Intel Bunny People to Invade Aussie Living Rooms." Newsbytes News Network, February 26, 1997.

"Intel Launches $100+ Million Worldwide Ad Campaign." Computer Publishing & Advertising Report, September 29, 1997.

"Intel Unveils Global Pentium II Processor Ad Campaign." M2 PressWire, September 16, 1997.

Jacobs, A. J., and Shawna Malcom. "Spoof in Advertising: Imitation Is the Sincerest Form of Parody." Entertainment Weekly, April 10, 1998.

Johnson, Bradley. "Challenge for Intel: Boosting Tech Market." Advertising Age, September 15, 1997.

Reinhardt, Andy, Ira Sager, and Peter Burrows, "Cover Story: Intel." Business Week, December 22, 1997.

Seaman, Debbie. "What's the Big Idea?" Advertising Age's Creativity, May 1, 1998.

Stahlman, Mark. "MMX Is Great, But Do We Need It?" Computer Reseller News, February 10, 1997.

"US $10 Million Intel Media Blitz for Asia Pacific." Newbytes News Network, November 17, 1997.

Barbra Brady

TIME FOR A PENTIUM II PROCESSOR? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Intel Corporation, the world's largest manufacturer of computer chips, had used a consistent marketing strategy to make its brand universally recognizable. Since 1991 Intel had advertised its line of chips directly to consumers with the tag line "Intel Inside." By 1998, 80 percent of all active computers were powered by Intel's Pentium chip, and its share of the global chip market was also an impressive 80 percent. According to the National Post, Intel so "thoroughly dominate[d] the microprocessor industry that [its] slogan [had] become a defining reality of personal computing." Intel had thrived in part because its advertising had convinced consumers and business users to upgrade repeatedly to its latest products. As Advertising Age explained, Intel's marketing premise was to bill itself as providing "the fastest, latest, and greatest chips." In May 1997 Intel introduced the Pentium II, a microprocessor that was more powerful than its predecessors and also contained innovative MMX technology, which allowed for improved multimedia functions.

After initially pitching the Pentium II to the business side of the market, Intel decided that 1998 was the year in which to explain to a mass consumer audience why they should also buy personal computers containing the Pentium II. In September of that year, Intel launched its "Time For A Pentium II Processor?" campaign, which consisted of a trio of television commercials created by Messner Vetere Berger McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG—the first work this agency had produced for Intel. The purpose of the three spots was "to dramatize the question of what would happen if the deficiencies of Pentium II's competitors (and progenitors) insinuated themselves" into the real world, noted Advertising Age on September 28, 1998. Although Intel's lead in the microprocessor market was substantial, its competitors had begun to make inroads by offering budget chips. Consumers were becoming increasingly unwilling to pay premium prices for Intel's cutting-edge technology when they could purchase computers powered by cheaper chips, that—although slower—were still capable of executing a variety of tasks.

The three "Time" spots humorously and hyperbolically illustrated the difficulties a failure to use a Pentium II processor could create. One ad depicted a sky diver whose parachute unfurls at a glacial speed. As he plummets towards the ground, a message box pops up on screen: "Processing parachute, please wait." Another commercial portrayed a soccer match in which the goalie had not fully downloaded. As the opposing team advances with the ball, only his legs have materialized and a similar "please wait" message is displayed. The final commercial featured a baseball game where the pitcher's fastball never arrives at home plate. "Whoaaa," the broadcaster exclaims as the ball hangs in the air, "the pitch hasn't processed yet. Aw, this slow processing thing is a tough break for this young kid." Another "window" appears—"Processing fastball"—to explain the delay. Each commercial closed with a voice-over querying, "Time for a Pentium II Processor?" accompanied by the "Intel Inside" logo. Intel was quite pleased with the spots. Not only did they boost sales of the Pentium II itself but they were lauded by consumers and advertising industry insiders alike.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Intel's greatest marketing innovation was to target a mass audience with its microprocessors. Beginning in 1989 with its famous "Red X" campaign on behalf of its 386 chip, Intel recognized the rewards afforded by hawking its wares directly to a broad range of consumers rather than simply aiming for technophiles. This approach was significantly at odds with what was then conventional wisdom concerning technology advertising. According to the September 15, 1997, issue of Advertising Age, ad critics derided Intel's consumer-based efforts because "most people that buy computers don't even know that the chip is in there . . . They care about the performance of the computer [not] what chip the chip is." Microprocessor manufacturers typically touted their products to original equipment manufacturers (OEMS), who assembled personal computers and then sold machines to the public. Intel, by contrast, believed that it could create demand for its products through savvy ads, and that by doing so it could get personal computer users to pay attention to microprocessor brands and even ask specifically for computers containing Intel.

"Intel Inside," which was conceived by Dahlin Smith White and debuted in 1991, consistently delivered the message that Intel's chips were superior. The first "Intel Inside" ads were designed to promote Intel's 486 chip (the successor to the 386), and the company continued to use the campaign as it rolled out new generations of ever more speedy and advanced chips including the Pentium and then the Pentium Pro chips. Early "Intel Inside" commercials took viewers on a high-tech voyage through the innards of a computer that ended at the processor, the "brain" of the machine. Later ads were more sophisticated, such as the company's "Bunny People" spots, which first aired during the 1997 Super Bowl, and depicted disco-dancing technicians adding fun to Pentium chips. (These "Bunny People" commercials were also the first to feature the Pentium II chip.) In addition to the television, print, and radio campaigns that ran under the umbrella of "Intel Inside," the company also sponsored an advertising co-op, in which it paid a portion of an OEM's marketing costs if the manufacturer would announce that its machines had "Intel Inside," generally accomplished by way of a sticker affixed to each computer made. By 1997 every major computer maker participated in the co-op, including Compaq, IBM, Packard-Bell, and Hewlett-Packard. Contrary to the glum forecasts of tech insiders, Intel's consumer-targeted campaigns were an unequivocal success. The company's revenue had grown from $3.1 billion in 1989 to $20.8 billion in 1996, and "its Pentium brand has become synonymous with the rise of the PC," declared Marketing.

The Pentium II was not only faster, but it also performed multimedia functions better than its predecessors. In May 1997 Intel launched a campaign for the Pentium II that sought to reach business PC users. This $20 million print and Internet campaign used the slogan "The Next Chapter in PC Technology," and appeared in newspapers such as the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and USA Today.

TARGET MARKET

After completing the campaign aimed exclusively at business PC users, Intel focused on a mass consumer audience with "Time." While the market for technical products had once been dominated by a computing elite, one-third of all American households owned a PC by 1994, according to the Wall Street Journal on September 20, 1994. Reaching such a vast and diverse audience was a challenge. As Advertising Age explained on October 7, 1996, Intel's overarching goal was to craft advertisements that were "relevant to consumer and business targets" alike, across demographic and geographic divides.

The primary way "Time" attempted to appeal to a broad audience was to avoid technical terms and jargon that would alienate some consumers (albeit while catering to a more computer-savvy segment). This was a key shift from the "Bunny People" approach, which had reached a more technology-oriented audience with its focus on the chip-making process. Instead, the "Time" spots "cleverly connect[ed] the cold concept of computer processing power to real-life situations," according to the Orange County Register. Without resorting to a discussion of megabits or graphic interface, Intel perfectly illustrated the campaign's underlying premise that computer speed was a necessity. In this way, the campaign reflected the computing reality of the mass of people who used their machines mainly as tools to word process, surf the Internet, and download information from favorite Web sites. The spots tapped into the "frustration [such a consumer] feels if [her] PC isn't working as fast as it might," a Messner executive told Marketing. The campaign hoped to play off the frustration everyone felt at some point, as they sat by idly while their computers slowly downloaded a file. The "message bar" incorporated in the commercial ("Processing parachute") was nearly identical to those that cropped up on all machines during a download.

"Time" simultaneously strove not to alienate those whose computer skills transcended this basic tool level. As the Dow Jones News Service noted, Intel had to "reach the 'in' crowd while amusing the rest of the audience." The ironic humor of the spots helped fulfill this goal by ensuring that regardless of a viewer's level of technical know-how, the spots would be engaging and witty.

INTEL HITS A HOMER

Shortly after the debut of "Time for a Pentium II Processor?" Intel broke a more general branding spot featuring an unlikely hero—Homer Simpson of the hit comedy show The Simpsons. The animated commercial depicts the famously stupid Simpson getting a Pentium chip implanted in his brain. He becomes a brilliant professor, who formulates a sort of unified pastry theory. The spot, which appeared after November 8, 1998, closed with a shot of the back of Homer's head—on which was stamped the famous "Intel Inside" logo. An Intel marketing executive explained in a press release that "Homer Simpson is the perfect vehicle to communicate that having an Intel processor makes your computer smarter . . . If an Intel chip can turn Homer Simpson into a scholar, imagine what it can do for your PC."

COMPETITION

Despite Intel's overwhelming past success in its consumer advertising, "Time" was launched at a crucial point for the company. In what the National Post termed "a rare, but costly stumble," Intel had "failed to foresee that many users would prefer low-cost PCs that handle[d] typical computing tasks with alacrity" instead of "costlier machines based on Intel's fastest and most lucrative processors." By the summer of 1997, the San Jose Business Journal reported the results of a survey conducted by ZD Market Intelligence, which indicated that a stunning 34 percent of U.S. businesses would consider buying PCs with a chip other than a Pentium, and 25 percent claimed they were "highly interested" in purchasing a non-Intel PC.

Advanced Micro Devices Inc. (AMD) was one of Intel's competitors that was winning over OEMs and customers alike with its inexpensive chips. According to the National Post, AMD controlled 50 percent of the chip market for PCs costing less than $1,000 by 1998, and it was supplying chips for the consumer computer lines at OEMS, such as Compaq, IBM, and Packard-Bell, that had previously been Intel's exclusive domain.

Part of AMD's strategy was to make consumers aware of its offerings. In 1996 the company launched a television campaign with the tag line "amd@work." Created by Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, the spots detailed how AMD chips "make the technology that people use today more affordable, more powerful, easier to use," an AMD spokesperson told Advertising Age on October 7, 1996. In May 1997 AMD announced that it would price its chips 25 percent below the cost of a comparable Intel microprocessor. In 1998 AMD aired humorous spots that demonstrated the 3-D capabilities of its chips.

Cyrix, a unit of National Semiconductor Corp., also gained a foothold in the low-end computer chip market. In November 1998 Cyrix inaugurated its first branding campaign. As its focal point, Cyrix stressed its cheaper prices and positioned itself as an egalitarian product. The print and television campaign "intended to let consumers know that Cyrix is enabling the PC manufacturers to deliver high-performance computers . . . for well under $1,000," Cyrix's director of advertising told the November 2, 1998, Brandweek. The ads, which were designed by Goldberg Moser O'Neilland targeted first-time PC buyers, used bold drawing done in the Russian constructivist style to augment the campaign's tag line "The Liberation of Information." One print piece, "Liberty and Access for All," made its proletarian pitch: "Gen X-ers, empty nesters, boomers, cocooners, closet capitalists, web surfers, gainers, educators, unite."

In addition to this pressure at the less expensive end of the market, Intel also encountered more aggressive marketing from one of its high-end competitors, Apple Computer. After breaking out of its long slump, Apple debuted three competitive ads in March 1998. Crafted by TBWA Chiat/Day, these spots directly attacked the Pentium II. In one, a man wearing a suit identical to those of Intel's "Bunny People" has to be hosed down. As he looks at the camera with smoke pouring from his helmet, the voice-over (performed by actor Richard Dreyfus) declared, "Apple Computer would like to apologize for toasting the Pentium II processor in public." Apple claimed its G3 chip, which was a joint project between Apple, IBM, and Motorola, was twice as fast as the Pentium II. "Apple has to make some very strong product statements here," a company executive told the Wall Street Journal on March 26, 1998.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Intel selected television as the means to convey the message of "Time." Since the company sought to reach a mass audience, it selected an array of programs, ranging from The X-Files to major sporting events to late night chat shows, on which to air its spots. To heighten the impact, the campaign debuted during the season premieres of heavily watched shows such as NBC's Thursday night titans Seinfeld and ER. The company also used web banner ads to spread its message. These efforts featured a slow moving download screen similar to the television executions.

Intel's goals for the campaign were two-fold. Since the company wanted to drive sales for the Pentium II, the product's name featured prominently in the tag line in each commercial. On the other hand, because Intel was increasingly under siege from competitors who sold bargain chips, Intel needed the campaign to reinforce its overall branding message. Therefore, while the commercials used the speed of the Pentium II's as a specific product selling point, the implicit message was "to educate our consumer audience about what role the processor plays in their PC and the value of it," Joanne O'Brien, Intel's manager of consumer advertising, told Brandweek on October 26, 1998.

Ever since Intel had first ventured into consumer advertising, it was faced with a challenge. Because its chips grew exponentially more advanced every few months, Intel was continually in the midst of introducing a new microprocessor. Its advertising had somehow to cultivate consumers' desire for the latest and fastest chip. As the September 15, 1997, Advertising Age explained, "Intel's future depends as much on marketing as it does on technology . . . it must continue to create demand for its ever-faster chips." "Time" strove to incite this demand. By presenting the problems of the technical world in the "real" world of the commercials' soccer game and skydiving, Intel sought to make the speed of one's processor less a concept of computing and more about computing's growing power over life. The divide between reality and virtual reality was blurred in the spots. The campaign's chief goal was to encourage viewers to feel a sense of concern over matters technical, and then to find a solution in the message of the ads. "Time" worked to make consumers "feel comfortable with a . . . product that was impersonal," according to USA Today.

OUTCOME

Intel expressed satisfaction with "Time." The humorous vignettes combined with Intel's persistent use of the "Intel Inside" tag line, helped fuel sales of the Pentium II. In addition, the campaign was credited with reinforcing the Intel brand before an even more massive launch campaign—the one for the Pentium III microprocessor early in 1999.

"Time for a Pentium II Processor?" was also quite well-received by its target audience. Consumer surveys revealed that the "Time" ads were the best-liked advertising Intel had ever released. Moreover, advertising critics were enthusiastic. While many of Intel's previous efforts had been soundly panned within the ad industry, "Time" spots received plaudits from advertising critics. Advertising Age 's Bob Garfield praised the campaign on September 28, 1998, for focusing on the product and successfully distinguishing its from its competitors. "Anyone who has ever tried to multitask or download video understands" the spot's moniker, he noted.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Apple's Ads Scorch Intel Bunnies." Wall Street Journal, March 26, 1998.

Garfield, Bob. "Intel Downloads Chip Woes into Real World." Advertising Age, September 28, 1998.

Goldfisher, Alastair. "Intel Plants New Brain in Homer: Chipmaker Latest to Air Consumer-Oriented Commercials." San Jose Business Journal, November 9, 1998.

Goldman, Kevin. "Computer Companies Try TV Ads' Mass Appeal." Wall Street Journal, September 20, 1994.

"If Only Homer Simpson Had a Brain! It Happens, in New Intel Campaign." Brandweek, October 26, 1998.

Johnson, Bradley. "Advanced Micro Devices Spreads Word on Its Chips." Advertising Age, October 7, 1997.

———. "Challenge for Intel: Boosting Tech Market." Advertising Age, September 15, 1997.

———. "Computer World's Task: Sell 1 Brand to 2 Targets." Advertising Age, October 7, 1996.

McLuhan, Robert. "Speed Is the Issue for Intel." Marketing, December 3, 1998.

Nguyen, Peter. "Short Cuts." Orange County Register, October 11, 1998.

Piller, Charles. "Intel's Dominance under Siege." National Post, February 26, 1999.

Wells, Melanie. "Toon Town Takes Over Baby Boom." USA Today, November 4, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC

3 Ravinia Drive, Suite 100
Atlanta, Georgia 30346
USA
Telephone: (770) 604-2000
Fax: (770) 604-5403
Web site: www.ihgplc.com

■■■

HOLIDAY INN BRAND REJUVENATION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1996 Holiday Inn, then owned by the British brewing conglomerate Bass PLC but subsequently acquired by Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC (IHG), embarked on a $1 billion renovation program that forced franchises to improve their facilities or lose their association with the brand. Holiday Inn wanted not only to publicize the physical improvements it was making but also to revitalize consumers' ideas about the chain. After dominating the roadside hotel market for decades, the chain had been struggling since the 1980s to distinguish itself from a host of new competitors. Parent company Bass brought in ad agency Fallon McElligott (later Fallon Worldwide) of Minneapolis to modernize the Holiday Inn image and rebuild the brand's reputation for quality and consistency.

Fallon launched its brand-rejuvenation efforts with a splash during the 1997 Super Bowl, using the tagline "On the way" to tell consumers about the physical makeover in process at many Holiday Inns. The television campaign "Mark" followed, running to wide acclaim from 1999 to 2002 and significantly raising the brand's profile. After "Mark," Holiday Inn left television for two years, focusing on print, airport displays, and outdoor ads in its "What Matters Most" campaign. A 2004 television campaign on the children's network Nickelodeon followed, and in 2005 Fallon adapted the concept behind the "What Matters Most" campaign for placement on a variety of cable television networks.

The success of the brand-rejuvenation strategy was most evident during the "Mark" campaign, but Holiday Inn's evolution was complicated by the economic downturn following the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001, as well as by the growing consumer preference for budget accommodations. Holiday Inn remained the heart of IHG, and the parent company continued to look for ways of leveraging the brand's heritage while appealing to changing consumer tastes.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The first Holiday Inn was opened near Memphis, Tennessee, in 1952. Entrepreneur Kemmons Wilson conceived his chain of hotels as an antidote to the uneven selection of accommodations then available along America's highways. As the brand expanded, its consistency from location to location set it apart from competing mom-and-pop establishments, as did innovations like free ice cubes, swimming pools, in-room televisions, air-conditioning, and kids-stay-for-free room rates. A computerized reservations system revolutionized trip planning and triggered a large-scale franchising push. Holiday Inn's famed "Great Sign," as it was called, loomed over highways across the nation and came to symbolize dependable, unpretentious comfort for weary travelers. By 1972 a new Holiday Inn opened its doors for business every three days.

But the 1970s oil embargo reduced the number of vacationers on the nation's roads, and in some ways the wild success of Holiday Inn's first two decades became a hindrance to the brand's continued development. The large number of franchises the chain sold during its boom years threatened to undermine the very consistency that had set Holiday Inn apart in the beginning, and competing chains, having adopted Wilson's innovations exactly, began using them in varying combinations to attract specific subsets of the everyman traveler who had always been Holiday Inn's target customer. Holiday Inn itself eventually spawned subbrands—such as Hampton Inn, Crowne Plaza, and Holiday Inn Express, Select, and SunSpree—to compete in the fractured travel market, and though Holiday Inn's parent company performed well, by the 1980s the original brand had lost not only its authority but also its identity. The Great Sign was retired in favor of a supposedly more modern, back-lit plastic model, and consumers could no longer say with confidence what to expect from a stay at any given Holiday Inn.

BAD IDEAS

Though the innovations of Holiday Inn founder Kemmons Wilson in roadside lodging amenities transformed the American hotel industry and landed him on the cover of Time magazine in 1972, his entrepreneurial instincts were not infallible. According to USA Today, Wilson demanded that all Holiday Inn rooms come with flyswatters before realizing that "it probably wasn't sending the right kind of message." Likewise, the notion of equipping every franchise with a trampoline was banished to the scrap heap of hotel history when "a youngster bounced too high and crashed (unhurt) through Wilson's office window."

TARGET MARKET

During preliminary market studies Fallon found that Holiday Inn had an incredibly strong base of consumer loyalty and that this loyalty cut across cultural barriers. Individuals who participated in Fallon's study, according to the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, recalled fond childhood memories of Holiday Inn vacations and spoke of Holiday Inns "as places where 'good people' stay." The overwhelming sentiment was that consumers of all backgrounds wanted Holiday Inn once again to become a brand they could trust. This information dovetailed with Holiday Inn's age-old definition of its core target as the everyman traveler. "It is a heartland, middle-market brand," Fallon's chairman, Pat Fallon, told the Minneapolis Star Tribune. Accordingly, the resulting campaign emphasized middle-American values and the sensible, standard features that had constituted the brand's reliability in earlier years.

At the same time Fallon's creative team believed that consumers, and young people in particular, needed an initial shock in order to be encouraged to take another look at what they believed to be an outdated brand. The campaign thus made an intentionally risky television premiere with a 1997 Super Bowl spot in which an extremely attractive female at a high school reunion turned the heads of her male classmates before they discovered that she was their former classmate Bob Johnson, now a transsexual. This dramatic metaphor for Holiday Inn's renovation project was followed, in the campaign's first year, with spots that used a more mainstream brand of humor to communicate the brand's return to consistency.

As the campaign developed, Holiday Inn and Fallon increasingly tailored the brand-rejuvenation message to the 25- to 54-year-old businesspeople among their everyman audience, those who by 1999 accounted for 70 percent of the chain's guests. This focus on business travelers was especially apparent in the "Mark" television campaign, which used the ongoing story of a 37-year-old slacker who lived at home with his parents. In repeatedly making it clear that he could not expect the amenities at home to compare to those of a Holiday Inn, Mark's parents pointed out to business and other travelers the specific advantages of staying at the chain's hotels.

COMPETITION

The scope of the rejuvenation campaign and Fallon's unconventional approach to the brand placed Holiday Inn among the most striking of hotel advertisers on the national stage at the time, but competitors across the market spectrum likewise had noteworthy campaigns. Accor Economy Lodging's Motel 6 had met with sustained success in its radio spots featuring the voice of National Public Radio personality Tom Bodett and his well-known tagline "We'll leave the light on for you," supporting the chain's own billion-dollar renovation of its properties. These spots eventually moved to television. Holiday Inn's sibling brand in the budget sector, Holiday Inn Express, boasted an acclaimed ongoing campaign called "Stay Smart," also the handiwork of Fallon, that showed hotel guests making absurdly intelligent statements about matters on which they had been ignorant before getting a good night's rest at a Holiday Inn Express. Cendant's Days Inn chain used its "There You Go" campaign to position itself as a brand whose extensive global presence took the guesswork and inconvenience out of travel.

Other chains tried to appeal to children, who, it was believed, could strongly influence their parents' lodging decisions. Embassy Suites, a leader in the family leisure sector, used characters from Nickelodeon's long-running Rugrats series in television commercials that were filmed, like the popular cartoon, from the point of view of children. Comfort Inn and Comfort Suites used a promotional tie-in with Pokemon, the cartoon character trading-card phenomenon that became a movie in 2000, which they publicized via national radio and print outlets.

MARKETING STRATEGY

From the time Fallon pitched the Holiday Inn account, it was apparent to all that reviving the brand would be an extremely difficult, long-term project. The belief that Holiday Inn was a mediocre chain whose time had come and gone was as widespread as consumers' affection for the brand. Likewise, the massive renovation project behind the claim that Holiday Inn was changing did not yet apply to all franchises. At the time the campaign opened, only about one-third of the chain's hotels had been renovated. "This puts us in a conundrum," Fallon's president and creative director, Bill Westbrook, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. "We need to have another way [aside from detailing the renovation project] to tell consumers about Holiday Inn but not to get them to expect too much."

The first phase of the campaign was launched with the Super Bowl ad in which, according to Holiday Inn's John Sweetwood, transsexual Bob Johnson served as a "wake up call to consumers across America." The commercial indeed attracted attention, but much of it was negative, and the ad was pulled from circulation rather than being used, as planned, in combination with the other spots in the ongoing campaign. The television spots that followed up the campaign's launch reminded consumers of the Holiday Inn they had once trusted and used the tagline "On the way" to indicate that the chain was in the process of reviving its prior standards of excellence. Print and outdoor ads supported this message of ongoing improvement.

Once the idea of renovations and a return to excellence had been publicized, the popular "Mark" campaign, which ran on television from 1999 to 2002, pointed out specific perks available to business and leisure travelers. A jobless 37-year-old living at home with his parents and grandmother, Mark's demands for amenities like free rent ("kids should stay for free"), better breakfast, and business services led his mother to ask, "What do you think this is, a Holiday Inn?" In its second year Mark's parents continued to ask that brand-defining question, and the tagline "More is better" was added to promote features like high-speed Internet connections and large work spaces. In his third year on the air Mark took the logical step of moving into a Holiday Inn, where he was shown eating leftovers off a room-service tray in the hallway and interrupting a "Symposium for Global e-Thinking" to ask if anyone could direct him to the pool.

The emphasis of the brand-rejuvenation strategy then shifted to print and outdoor advertisements as the "What Matters Most" campaign again emphasized Holiday Inn's all-American roots, down-to-earth personality, and basic features. The ads brought back the iconic Great Sign, pictured against a sunrise or sunset in a way meant to duplicate the feeling of arriving at a Holiday Inn. Witty copy like "Close to downtown. Near the airport. As far from trendy as you can get" reinforced the convenience and no-nonsense image that Fallon and Holiday Inn had long been trying to reestablish. Another popular spot referred to the widespread practice of filching hotel towels: "About the towels, we forgive you." In late 2003 the "What Matters Most" ads focused on the quality of Holiday Inn breakfasts to distinguish the chain from budget competitors who provided little or no breakfast choices. These ads ran in publications such as the business-friendly Wall Street Journal and USA Today and were placed in dioramas in the Hartsfield-Atlanta International Airport.

In 2004, for the first time since the "Mark" campaign had ended in 2002, Holiday Inn commercials returned to television, beginning a two-year partnership with the children's cable network Nickelodeon. The initial Nickelodeon spots featured a cartoon family with enormous noses who found freedom from their insecurities at a Holiday Inn. As part of the Nickelodeon deal, Holiday Inn became the official hotel sponsor of The SpongeBob SquarePants Movie and its DVD release. In 2005 the brand-rejuvenation effort moved beyond Nickelodeon to a wide variety of cable networks with "Signs," a television campaign derived from the "What Matters Most" print ads.

OUTCOME

During the "Mark" portion of the brand-rejuvenation effort, Holiday Inn's advertising strategy met with its clearest signs of success. According to Holiday Inn's

Greg Price, unaided awareness of the brand grew by roughly 50 percent in the "Mark" campaign's first two years. But the U.S. lodging industry as a whole suffered during the economic downturn that followed the terrorist attacks in 2001 and the bursting of the stock market bubble, with the midscale-with-food-and-beverage sector—Holiday Inn's sector—losing out in particular as more and more travelers opted for budget hotels.

Holiday Inn remained the heart of IHG's portfolio, with 1,484 hotels worldwide. In 2004 IHG unveiled a new prototype Holiday Inn in Gwinnet County, Georgia, that showcased artwork celebrating the brand's past, employed a modernized Great Sign, and had streamlined kitchen operations with an eye toward greater profitability.

FURTHER READING

Alexander, Keith L. "Hotel Ad May Get Early Checkout." USA Today, January 28, 1997.

Baar, Aaron. "Holiday Inn Offers More Mark." Adweek, March 13, 2000.

———. "Renovations Done, Holiday Inn Touts Amenities." Adweek, March 8, 1999.

Bly, Laura. "Come Inn off the Highway." USA Today, May 24, 2002.

Gleason, Mark. "Fallon's Challenge: Make Holiday Inn More 'In.'" Advertising Age, September 2, 1996.

"Hello Again, Great Sign." Lodging Hospitality, July 15, 2003.

Lazare, Lewis. "Holiday Inn Brings Back Successful Mark Campaign." Chicago Sun-Times, July 2, 2001.

Lippert, Barbara. "Marking the Spots." Adweek, April 5, 1999.

Merrill, Ann. "Ad Agency Fallon McElligott Captures Holiday Inn Account: Minneapolis Company Will Get Foot in Door of Travel Market as It Creates Campaign to Shed Hotel Firm's Outdated Image." Minneapolis Star Tribune, August 20, 1996.

Petrecca, Laura. "Holiday Inn Makes Its Mark to Tout Amenities: Ads' Yutzy Guy Wants More than Comforts of Home." Advertising Age, March 8, 1999.

Rauscher, Susannah Vesey. "The Holiday Inns of the Future: Polishing a Dated Image the First Task." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 17, 1996.

Rich, Motoko. "Holiday Inn's TV 'Slacker' Is Leaving Nest." Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2001.

Sheehan, Patricia. "Ship Shape." Lodging Hospitality, May 15, 2005.

Siebert, T.W. "Gotta Stay at Them All!" Adweek, June 12, 2000.

Steinberg, Brian. "Ads Target Stay-at-Home Travelers—Hotel-Industry Marketers Seek to Imprint Brands as Domestic Trips Gain." Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2003.

Mark Lane

STAY SMART CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998, after being in business for seven years, Holiday Inn Express, the limited-service offshoot of the famed but ailing Holiday Inn brand, had no clear identity apart from its namesake and was in danger of being left behind in a burgeoning segment of the hotel industry. Its parent at the time, Bass PLC (the Holiday Inn brands later became part of the Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC), enlisted Fallon McElligott (later renamed Fallon Worldwide) of Minneapolis to establish a personality for the young brand. The result was the "Stay Smart" campaign.

Aimed at male business travelers aged 25 to 54 and supported by a mere $3.5 million estimated annual ad budget in its early stages, the "Stay Smart" campaign made use of the premise that such travelers felt emotional validation at the idea that, in choosing a limited-service rather than a full-service hotel, they had acted sensibly. Exaggerating this idea of intelligent hotel choice for comic effect, the early TV spots in the campaign showed ordinary people opining about subjects in the manner of true experts, even though they had no training or education in these subjects. In lieu of knowledge, these individuals offered the following explanation for their mastery of complicated disciplines: "I did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night." Though the content of the commercials went through various alterations over the campaign's multiyear run, the premise as well as the line "I did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night" remained unchanged.

The campaign's punch line was picked up and used to humorous effect by journalists, editorial writers, and talk show hosts, among others, and the "Stay Smart" concept was given credit for effectively putting Holiday Inn Express on the industry map. The chain became the fastest-growing hotel in its category and outpaced its own sales goals during the campaign's run. "Stay Smart" saw its budget grow over the course of its run, and it was awarded a 2004 EFFIE that acknowledged its long-running effectiveness.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Holiday Inn brand was launched in the 1950s by Memphis entrepreneur Kemmons Wilson, who, as a result of his own struggles to find reliable overnight lodging while traveling across the country, saw the need for a standardized set of hotels. The first links in the Holiday Inn chain grew up around Memphis, and their overwhelming success led Wilson to expand nationwide. Thanks to reasonable rates and amenities, like free ice, swimming pools, in-room televisions, and air-conditioning, Holiday Inn prospered, setting the standard for the roadside lodging industry in the 1960s and 1970s. In the 1980s, however, the chain began to suffer from its size and success. The number of franchisees operating under the Holiday Inn banner had grown unmanageably in the chain's boom years, and the disparity in quality between individual franchises undermined the brand's promise of reliability. In addition, as competitors copied the Holiday Inn model, Holiday Inn itself was no longer a unique lodging option. The unpretentious, reliable hotelier for the masses had become a shabby, lesser version of its old self in consumers' minds.

The Holiday Inn Express subbrand was launched in 1991 by then parent Bass PLC as a means of capitalizing on another developing trend in the lodging industry. Travelers increasingly were choosing less expensive accommodations, foregoing the full-service model established by Holiday Inn for limited-service hotels offering, in lieu of a restaurant, a free breakfast requiring minimal kitchen facilities and preparation. The established leaders in this segment included Hampton Inn and Courtyard by Marriott. After its first several years in business, Holiday Inn Express could claim no clear brand identity separate from its older sibling. The introduction of other Holiday Inn subbrands like Crowne Plaza, Sunspree, and Select in the 1990s further muddied consumers' perceptions of the brand family's individual members.

A DISSENTING VIEW

Thanks to their outrageous brand of humor, the "Stay Smart" ads on behalf of Holiday Inn Express immediately registered with consumers, but some critics, including prominent industry analyst Bob Garfield, an Advertising Age columnist, derided the premise of ordinary people developing extraordinary knowledge after a night's stay at the hotel chain. The idea that someone became "smart" about a matter like orthopedic medicine, as happened in one spot, after staying at a Holiday Inn Express had no logical connection, Garfield argued, to the intelligence required to choose a sensible hotel. There was no mention of the amenities that made Holiday Inn Express a smart choice and no explanation of how the subbrand differed from the regular Holiday Inn brand.

TARGET MARKET

Ultimately Bass and Fallon wanted the "Stay Smart" message to resonate with all travelers, but budgetary constraints made such a broadly aimed pitch untenable, especially at the outset of the campaign. Thus, they narrowed the target market, tuning the campaign's message so that it would resonate with the group of consumers most essential to the health of Holiday Inn Express and others in its market category, namely, men aged 25 to 54 who traveled frequently on business. The business travelers most likely to patronize Holiday Inn Express were those whose expenses were not fully reimbursed by their employers. These travelers were, therefore, expected to be economy minded and inclined to choose hotels for pragmatic reasons.

Fallon research indicated, moreover, that such travelers felt emotionally validated for choosing limited-service hotels like Holiday Inn Express. The idea that they had chosen no-nonsense comfort rather than unnecessary niceties presumably made these businessmen feel intelligent and sensible. The agency therefore arrived at its "Stay Smart" message, which acknowledged and encouraged this feeling of validation. The appeal to feelings was intended to establish a deeper connection with business travelers than would a more traditional hotel campaign touting amenities. Fallon also placed a premium on delivering the "Stay Smart" message in a way that distinguished Holiday Inn Express, in business travelers' minds, from the more established brands in its category. The campaign thus utilized absurdist scenarios and relied heavily on humor, departures from most hotel advertising of the time.

COMPETITION

Hotels had traditionally used print and television advertising to reinforce ideas about the cleanliness and comfort of their rooms and the quality of their customer service. As the differences between major hotel chains became insubstantial, many in the lodging industry turned to awards programs to distinguish themselves and to inspire brand loyalty. The awards tactic also became a casualty of standardization, however, as numerous hotel chains came to offer similar programs and airline partnerships. In this climate, hoteliers like Marriott, Starwood—whose holdings included Westin and Sheraton—and Hilton—the owner not only of its eponymous chain but, thanks to a recent merger, of Doubletree, Embassy Suites, and Hampton Inn—added features and elite levels to their awards programs. Among these companies, Starwood attempted to break out of this pattern by renovating its hotel rooms with an eye toward giving them a signature, marketable look. Another option for differentiating hotel brands was, of course, advertising.

Bass and Fallon were among the first hotel advertisers to use risky advertising as a way of breaking out of this impasse of sameness, and their branding work for Holiday Inn was, along with the ''Stay Smart'' campaign, among the hotel industry's most notable marketing at the time. As part of the project to rejuvenate the ailing brand, and in concert with a large-scale push to renovate aging Holiday Inn properties across the country, Bass and Fallon courted controversy with a 1998 Super Bowl ad that used a transsexual as a symbol of the changes then occurring within the organization. This ad was followed up by TV spots assuring viewers ''We're on the way'' and showing housekeepers entering Holiday Inn rooms with chainsaws when the guests left for the day. After the change in brand identity and the message of the renovation project were established, Holiday Inn unveiled its lauded ''Mark'' campaign, in which an aging slacker named Mark who lived at home with his parents kept demanding amenities and services from his family. The family's response—''What does this look like, a Holiday Inn?''—was met with hilarity by Mark's elderly grandmother and was meant to reinforce the notion that Holiday Inn was, indeed, the standard for comfortable lodging in America.

Another hotel brand that had managed to create a distinct personality at least partly through marketing was Motel 6. In 1987 the discount chain began to use the voice of down-home radio personality Tom Bodett and the signature phrase ''We'll leave the light on for you'' in a radio campaign. The campaign, which was effective in establishing the brand's earthy, no-frills image, ran for more than a decade, eventually moving to television with a message of large-scale property renovations in the 1990s and continuing through the turn of the century.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Stay Smart'' campaign, with an original budget estimated at $3.5 million, was launched in May 1998 on cable TV networks, with particular emphasis on sports programming. The initial group of three 30-second spots took the idea of guests' intelligence to a logical extreme, showing ordinary individuals who, after staying at a Holiday Inn Express, found themselves capable of giving extremely nuanced professional advice despite the fact that they had no qualifications for doing so. In one commercial, for example, a motorist stopped on the side of the road to tend to an injured cyclist. After declaring that the man was suffering from a dislocated patella, the Good Samaritan informed him that he was going to reset the bones. When the cyclist asked, ''You are an orthopedic surgeon?'' the Good Samaritan replied, ''No, but I did stay at Holiday Inn Express last night.'' Copy reading ''It won't make your smarter, but you'll feel smarter'' ran on-screen.

The TV campaign's first significant update came in 2000, with two 30-second spots that maintained the central premise of the 1998 spots while scaling back the extremity of the humor. Rather than showing people who had become absurdly knowledgeable, the new spots showed people making intelligent decisions in humorous real-life situations. One spot, set in the waiting room of a dentist's office, featured a patient who, while waiting for his name to be called, overheard his dentist having a heated phone exchange involving a trip to the police station. Someone, it became clear as the patient listened, had suffered a life-threatening injury at the dentist's hands, and the dentist was supremely unconcerned with the person's well-being. At the end of the conversation the camera cut away from the insensitive dentist and back to the waiting room, revealing that the patient had fled. A caption reading ''Stayed at a Holiday Inn Express last night'' appeared on-screen.

In the spring of 2001 the concept was given a new twist in a TV spot featuring, or so it seemed, the rock band KISS. The musicians, in trademark face paint, were shown leaving the stage after a riotous encore, only to be revealed, once they had removed their makeup, as impostors. ''You guys aren't KISS,'' a band manager asserted, and one of the members said, ''No, but we did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night.'' A simultaneous promotion took the ''Stay Smart'' theme in another direction, as Fallon put the operating idea behind the campaign—that those who stayed at a Holiday Inn Express should be commended for their intelligence—to the test. A promotion called ''Express Your Smarts'' asked ordinary people to write their own scripts for a ''Stay Smart'' commercial. Entry forms were available in Holiday Inn Express lobbies, online, and at branches of Gold's Gym, and contestants were required to use the campaign's now well-established punch line. The winning spot aired on the Discovery Channel.

By 2003, thanks to the success of the campaign's first five years, the budget had nearly doubled, and for the first time new creative work was used to bolster specific hotel amenities. In that year the ''Stay Smart'' theme was applied to spots introducing the chain's spruced-up breakfast bar, which featured special coffee roasts and a cinnamon roll developed especially for the hotel. In 2004 the campaign was adapted to publicize an upgrade of all bathrooms in the franchise, including the installation of high-powered ''Stay Smart'' showerheads manufactured exclusively for the hotel by Kohler. New Fallon-scripted TV spots showed guests arriving at inspired business ideas while showering, with accompanying text reading ''If you do your best thinking in the shower, imagine how smart you'll be under our new showerhead.'' The enduring tagline ''No, but I did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night'' remained in place.

OUTCOME

The ''Stay Smart'' message entered quickly into the American pop-culture lexicon. Ordinary people, as well as journalists and commentators, recycled the ''No, but I did stay at a Holiday Inn Express last night'' tagline. Mentions on The Late Show with David Letterman and National Public Radio were measures of the idea's pervasiveness, as was presidential candidate Al Gore's adoption of the tagline for his own humorous purposes during a speech in the run-up to the 2000 election. Holiday Inn Express became the fastest-growing hotel chain in its market segment and surpassed its own goal of generating $1 billion in sales a year ahead of schedule, in 1999 rather than 2000. Brand awareness of Holiday Inn Express grew 40 percent during the campaign's first three years, and in 2004 ''Stay Smart'' won a Gold EFFIE in the Sustained Success category, an honor based on the complete life of the campaign and its salutary effects on sales and brand image.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. ''Advertising? Do-It-Yourself.'' Adweek, April 23, 2001.

———. ''Fallon Airs Debut Spots for Holiday Inn Express.'' Adweek, May 4, 1998.

———. ''New Holiday Inn Express Spots Closer to Reality.'' Adweek, April 17, 2000.

Beirne, Mike. ''Breaking Out of the Hotel Rut.'' Brandweek, June 5, 2000.

———. ''Holiday Inn Express Does Breakfast.'' Brandweek, November 11, 2002.

———. ''Holiday Inn Express Launches Ad Contest.'' Adweek, May 28, 2001.

Garfield, Bob. ''No Room for Logic at Holiday Inn Express.'' Advertising Age, May 11, 1998.

''Holiday Inn Express Ads Support New Bathrooms.'' Hotels, November 2004.

Rich, Motoko. ''Holiday Inn's TV 'Slacker' Is Leaving Nest.'' Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2001.

Salomon, Alan. ''Holiday Faces Future Aiming for Stability.'' Hotel & Motel Management. April 7, 1997.

Mark Lane

International Business Machines Corp.

New Orchard Road
Armonk, New York 10504
USA
Telephone: (914) 499-1900
Web site: www.ibm.com

■■■

CAN YOU SEE IT? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 the world's largest provider of computer products and services, International Business Machines Corp. (IBM), was relishing the comeback it had begun to experience eight years earlier. The computer titan had consolidated its scattered advertising accounts into a single account with one agency. By 2003 IBM was emerging not only as a leader in the production of computers but also as a consultant for e-business, a term referring to the integration of technologies such as E-mail servers, internal networks, call centers, and online inventory technology. To attract c-level (e.g., chief executive officer or chief technology officer) executives to its products and e-business consulting service, IBM released a campaign titled "Can You See It?"

The company's ad agency, Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, created the campaign using IBM's $600 million annual advertising budget. Print and television spots first appeared on April 21, 2003. Print ads featured businesses that were flourishing with IBM's e-business consulting. One ad displayed a bank's exterior and read, "A bank discovers a source of new customers. Existing customers. Can you see it?" Ads appeared in the Wall Street Journal, Computerworld, and Information Week. With a less serious approach than the print ads, the campaign's television spots featured c-level executives explaining their business-related nightmares to therapists. In the 30-second spot "Museum," for instance, an executive explained his recurring nightmare about being on exhibit at a natural history museum. In his dream the executive was trapped inside a glass case while a museum guide explained to visitors that "Executiva Obsoletus" had become extinct after not adapting to contemporary business demands. The campaign continued until the end of 2003.

In 2004 "Can You See It?" won Best of Show at the ICON Awards, an event that recognized achievements in advertising. During the first nine months of 2003 IBM also posted a $1.5 billion income gain over the same period of 2002. The ad critic Barbara Lippert praised the television spots in Adweek, stating, "There's no overt sexual interpretation, as with Freud, but the commercials do make the solving of abstruse business problems like outsourcing and e-business on demand a little sexier, smarter and more fun."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In early 1994 IBM's stronghold on the computer industry was giving way to younger companies such as Compaq Computer Corp. and Dell Computer. Advertising for the 83-year-old IBM was delegated to 42 different advertising agencies. Lisa Baird, vice president of worldwide advertising for IBM, explained to B to B that using so many ad agencies had created problems for the company. "We had different logo presentations, the pieces of the IBM story were being told everywhere and were different country to country and business unit to business unit, and we weren't using our competitive advantage end to end to help customers be more successful.'' Hoping to consolidate its image and improve sales, IBM awarded its entire $500 million advertising account to the agency Ogilvy & Mather in 1994.

In 1997 the ad agency marketed IBM using the tagline ''e-business,'' a term coined by IBM and which referred to the integration of technologies such as E-mail servers, internal network services, call centers, and online inventory technology. IBM's focus expanded at the beginning of 2002, when its new CEO, Sam Palmisano, changed the company's tagline to ''e-business on demand'' to emphasize its dedication to the ever-changing demands of customers.

The tagline ''e-business on demand'' was first used in IBM's ''Gizmo'' campaign, released in October 2002. Humorous television spots for the campaign featured executives from the fictitious electronics company Bagotronics evaluating inventions such as an elixir that granted omniscience and a ''business time machine.'' Executives in the spots considered using the latter to go back in time and amend underbudgeted jobs and dead-end consulting projects. The spots ended with copy explaining that IBM's e-business consulting and e-business products provided reality-based solutions to such problems. Whereas ''Gizmo'' targeted both c-level executives and information technology (IT) employees, the ''Can You See It?'' campaign was aimed primarily at c-level executives.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign's target market consisted of c-level (e.g., chief executive officer, chief technology officer) executives who typically affected purchasing decisions for corporations. Ogilvy & Mather aired the commercials on news channels such as CNN and MSNBC to target an audience that treated television more as a resource than as a source of entertainment. Print ads appeared in similar-minded publications such as the Wall Street Journal, Computerworld, and Information Week.

Research conducted by Ogilvy & Mather before the campaign revealed that high-level executives worried about large-scale problems. To connect with this target, television spots featured c-level executives explaining corporate-level problems to their therapists. One executive loathed her business's lack of focus. Another expressed doubt about his company's ability to adjust quickly to future changes. Chris Wall, a senior partner at Ogilvy & Mather, explained to B to B that even levelheaded executives agonized over their business's future. ''The whole notion of anxiety really resonated. It was simply an exaggeration of something that is quite real,'' Wall said. ''Executives watching these spots should come away thinking, this company gets it, it understands me and my problem.''

The ''Can You See It?'' message did not necessarily tout IBM's technology. Instead it suggested that IBM understood business and sold services to help c-level executives. Creatives at Ogilvy & Mather did not want the target to order IBM products after viewing the spots, but instead wanted the spots to prompt executives into a discussion about using IBM as a technology consultant. Using humor, each spot featured a therapist attributing his or her client's nightmares to business problems. Copy then explained that IBM offered a viable solution to similar problems. Barbara Lippert wrote in Adweek, ''Not only does this IBM campaign manage to talk e-business with all the 'c-level' executives it needs to reach, it also manages to make fun of corporately correct speech and procedures, no doubt learned at '90s-style touchy-feely, walking-on-coals, being-blindfolded-to-learn-to-trust bonding retreats.''

COMPETITION

The computer company Sun Microsystems posted sales in 2002 that were only 15 percent of IBM's sales. Servers, the large computers that businesses used for their networks, were Sun's flagship product. Sun also introduced in 1995 a software language called Java, which could be used to create applications for the Internet, video games, mobile phones, and computers.

In 2003 the ad agency J. Walter Thompson released the first Sun advertising campaign that targeted consumers instead of only businesses. The campaign advertised Sun's Java software, which was increasingly being used for mobile-phone video games. Sun's website featured pop star Christina Aguilera holding a mobile phone that played Java-based games. The campaign was intended to strengthen Java's image and subsequently boost the sales of Java products. ''What we would like to create is demand for all things Java,'' Ingrid Van Den Hoogen, a Sun senior director of marketing, said about the campaign in the Wall Street Journal.

In June 2003 Sun released a multimillion-dollar campaign to discredit IBM. Similar to the concept of a personal computer using Microsoft's Windows operating system, all of Sun's servers used an operating system called Unix. IBM instead used the Linux operating system for its servers along with software titled AIX, which was IBM's proprietary version of Unix. Referring to IBM's blue icon, Sun's print ads read, ''Attention AIX users: Sun is here to help . . . Unfortunately, our friends in Blue have a problem with licensing contracts that could make things very expensive for anyone running AIX.'' The ad's mention of ''licensing contracts'' referred to a lawsuit filed by the computer retailer the SCO Group, Inc. The SCO Group claimed that IBM's Linux software had stolen code from Unix. The print ads appeared in the Wall Street Journal and the San Jose Mercury News.

TABULATING SUCCESS

The salesman Thomas Watson saved the struggling punch-card processing company Computing-Tabulating-Recording (C-T-R) Company from bankruptcy when he joined C-T-R in 1914. Watson aggressively marketed his new company, which soon landed contracts with the U.S. government during World War I. In 1924 C-T-R changed its name to International Business Machines (IBM) and soon dominated the global market of tabulators, time clocks, and electric typewriters.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Can You See It?'' television spots appeared less than six months after IBM's ''Gizmo'' campaign began and borrowed some of its predecessor's qualities. First airing on April 21, 2003, ''Can You See It?'' spots even featured actors that had played Bagotronics executives in the ''Gizmo'' commercials. Just as in ''Gizmo,'' the executives depicted in ''Can You See It?'' needed help with their businesses. The television spots aired on CNN and MSNBC, which were channels commonly watched by c-level executives.

In the 60-second spot ''Balloon'' a business executive described a recurring nightmare to a therapist. While resting on a leather couch, he said that in this dream he and his colleague were ''falling to our doom'' inside the basket of a hot air balloon. The two executives threw everything they could out of the basket, but the balloon continued to plummet. The therapist explained that the nightmare was rooted in the executive's ''fixed cost fixation'' and recommend he ''let go.'' At first the executive assumed the therapist was suggesting he fire his colleague, which was later revealed to be the executive's brother-in-law Phil. The therapist assured him that that was not necessary. Framed by IBM's trademark blue borders, the commercials copy then stated, ''It's an on demand world. Jettison fixed costs. Not Phil.'' The spot ended with the tagline ''e-business on demand'' followed by the IBM logo.

Further spots showed therapists connecting the nightmares of c-level executives back to their c-level business problems. Text at the finale of each spot explained that IBM offered e-business consulting or e-business products to solve such problems. Lippert wrote in Adweek, ''The work shows that you don't have to be even slightly neurotic, given the reality of business these days, to feel awash in anxiety and worry or that you might just be sunk.''

The campaign's print ads, which appeared in business publications, featured images of businesses that were prospering from IBM's advanced e-business products and consulting service. In the print ad ''Retailer'' an image showed a store selling men's business clothing. The ad's headline read, ''A retailer does less selling. Yet gets more sold. Can you see it?'' Copy below the headline explained that the store's IBM inventory system had helped a clothing retailer monitor its inventory. Another print ad explained how a Tokyo scooter seller with limited showroom space sold twice the amount of scooters it featured by using IBM. Other ads continued to ask, ''Can you see it?''—referring to the audience's ability to ''see'' how IBM was helping businesses meet the demands of customers. The campaign continued until the end of 2003.

OUTCOME

''Can You See It?'' won a gold award and Best of Show at the 2004 ICON Awards, an event that recognized achievements in advertising. IBM's income during the first nine months of 2003 skyrocketed 30 percent compared to the same period in 2002. Advertising critics, citing how difficult it was to blend humor with business-to-business (b-to-b) advertising, praised the IBM campaign. Ellis Booker, the editor of the business magazine B to B, was referring to ''Can You See It?'' when he wrote, ''We give special kudos to humor when it's done well in b-to-b advertising. Because the best of these ads, even as they wink at us, show they know what they're talking about, that there's something important beneath the levity—something we ought to know, think about or do.'' Booker further explained that campaigns that failed in their attempts to be funny eventually offended the business crowd they were trying to amuse.

''Can You See It?'' helped IBM continue its string of success following the consolidation of its advertising account in 1994. Even as the technology sector began crumbling in 2000, IBM remained relatively stable, drawing on its steady capital and decades of experience. ''Can You See It?'' reinforced IBM's legacy as a business that was determined to help its customers succeed. Lippert praised the campaign in Adweek, stating, ''So in these tricky times, forget about buying from some ex-dot-com operator who can't get himself arrested—go to the old guys who will do it comprehensively (but expensively) and correctly, so you can stay nimble and responsive. You might get a better night's sleep in the bargain, and even manage to make it [to] your meeting."

FURTHER READING

Allossery, Patrick. "Big Blue Playing to Win: IBM Canada Targets Mid-sized Companies in New, More-spirited E-business Campaign." National Post (Don Mills, Ontario), May 13, 2002, p. FP8.

Bernstein, Roberta. "2003 Ad Agency of the Year." MC Technology Marketing Intelligence, May 1, 2004, p. 24.

Booker, Ellis. "Finding the Funny in B-to-B Ads." B to B, July 11, 2005, p. 10.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "IBM Puts Push behind Linux; Sees It as Tool to Fight Microsoft." Advertising Age, September 8, 2003, p. 89.

D'Innocenzo, Lisa. "Beating Brand Fatigue." Strategy, November 17, 2003, p. 1.

Kaplan, David. "Into the Blue." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 8, 2002, p. 12.

Kohnstamm, Abby. "Special Report: Power Players." Advertising Age, October 4, 2004, p. P14.

Lippert, Barbara. "IBM's Nightmares on Wall Street." Adweek, May 5, 2003, p. 26.

Maddox, Kate. "Creative." B to B, June 13, 2005, p. 37.

———. "IBM, Ogilvy Celebrate 10 Years." B to B, June 7, 2004, p. 1.

———. "IBM's Strategy Keeps It In and On Demand." B to B, October 25, 2004, p. 24.

McArthur, Keith. "IBM Launches New Campaign." Globe and Mail (Toronto), May 24, 2004, p. B12.

Silverman, Gary. "IBM Deletes Its 'e' on Demand." Financial Times (London), May 20, 2004, p. 20.

Kevin Teague

E-BUSINESS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Long associated with mainframe computers, International Business Machines Corporation (IBM) struggled in the late 1980s because it was unable to deal with a world dominated by personal computers and other changes in the marketplace. The fortunes of the giant corporation spiraled downward and touched bottom in 1993. A management shakeout led to a major change of direction as IBM rebranded itself as a solutions company. The company introduced its "Solutions for a Small Planet" marketing campaign in 1995. The tagline from this campaign was then used on the "E-Business" campaign that was released in April 1997.

The "E-Business" campaign, created by ad agency Ogilvy & Mather, targeted small businesses and corporations alike. A multifaceted effort, it featured television spots, prints ads, and Internet elements, all of which emphasized how IBM could help companies take advantage of the business possibilities of the Internet. Each of the early spots, filmed in black and white, presented a typical business problem that IBM, with the power of Internet technology, was able to solve. One spot showed young Web designers who were able to create a flaming logo but were unable to create a website capable of integrating suppliers and customers.

Due in large measure to its marketing efforts, IBM successfully recast itself as a solutions company. The "E-Business" campaign then broke off into a number of directions, focusing, for example, on wireless products and infrastructure. Nevertheless, as IBM entered the new century, the term "e-business" remained at the center of its marketing. The "E-Business" campaign and some of its commercials were also recognized with several advertising-industry awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The advent of the Internet opened a myriad of opportunities for IBM. The company aggressively promoted the concept of electronic commerce under the trademarked name e-business. E-business combined IBM's strength in networks, information storage, and data management with the global reach of the Internet to create a worldwide marketplace. According to research firm Forrester Research, the trade of goods and services via the Internet was projected to increase from $7.8 billion in 1997 to $105 billion by the year 2000. Although Forrester conceded that this amount accounted for only a small portion of the U.S. gross national product, many clamored to stake claims to it, including IBM. As Jerry Michalski, managing editor of a newsletter focused on computers and communication, told Fortune, "Over time, a portion of practically every transaction will touch the Internet." IBM's CEO, Louis V. Gerstner, Jr., agreed. He explained to U.S. News & World Report, "For 11 years I ran one of the world's most electronic businesses, the American Express Card. . . . It's a great example of an e-business, a network business—millions and tens of millions of people doing business in hundreds of countries, and it's all done electronically."

IBM's previous advertising campaign, "Solutions for a Small Planet," which began in 1995, was designed to enhance the IBM brand and to assert the company's global yet human image. The television spots showcased various IBM products and services but focused primarily on the IBM brand. "E-Business" leveraged the strength of the brand that "Solutions" had worked to promote and narrowed the focus to IBM's Internet technologies and e-business products and services. "E-Business" was essentially an extension of the "Solutions" campaign, and thus all of the commercials shared the same tagline.

TARGET MARKET

The "E-Business" campaign targeted businesspersons, particularly those in high-tech industries and those involved in making decisions and directing corporate strategies. As Fortune stated, "The advertising is effectively aimed at Everybusinessman, from the FORTUNE 500 to the startup, from the risk-averse 50-something middle manager to the frustrated Gen Xer. But in particular, it is also skewed toward small and medium-sized businesses, which may have thought IBM was out of their league and which also, some believe, provide the greatest e-business growth opportunity for IBM in the near term as big business slowly warms up to the idea." So while the audience appeared broad, its members shared one critical trait: all were involved in businesses that depended heavily on computers and that could benefit from jumping on the Internet bandwagon.

IBM hoped to emphasize the relevance of e-business and to assert its dominance in the field, and one way to accomplish this was to target smaller-sized businesses with which IBM had no prior history. When Irving Wladawsky-Berger, general manager of the company's Internet division, discussed IBM's customer base in an interview with MSNBC Business Video, he indicated that existing customers showed the earliest interest in e-business. He also explained the importance of attracting smaller businesses and the potential power they could wield in an environment such as the Web, where all were created equal. Wladawsky-Berger also explained why IBM generally targeted businesses and businesspeople rather than individual consumers, stating that "for the most part, we know how to work with businesses—large business, mid-sized businesses, more and more small businesses. . . . That's our forte, and the kinds of things we offer are very attractive to them." IBM's strategy was to help the businesses, and they in turn would reach the consumers.

To entice the target audience, IBM incorporated humor into the "E-Business" campaign, which featured office employees felled by common computer problems such as a malfunctioning printer and telephone glitches during a conference call. It was hoped that office workers and managers, because they had experienced similar frustrations, would be drawn in by the spots. Viewers in the target group would then realize that IBM could help them solve their daily technological trials. An executive at advertising agency Foote Cone & Belding commented on a print portion of IBM's "E-Business" campaign in Fortune, saying, "it has taken a subject that was terribly esoteric, about which everyone is uncomfortable, and explained it. This is not the arrogant, awesome IBM; this is a very helpful and supportive IBM."

E-COMMERCE VS. E-BUSINESS

In the mid-1990s IBM coined the term "e-business," which referred to the infrastructure of E-mail servers, network servers, and even call centers used by a business. The term was commonly confused with the existing term "e-commerce," which referred to business conducted over the Internet.

COMPETITION

The Wall Street Journal noted that, despite losing market share and suffering immense losses in the early 1990s, IBM's PC business seemed to be recovering in the second half of the decade. Information on market shares from Dataquest indicated that IBM's take of the U.S. computer market in 1996 was 8.7 percent, which placed the company third behind Compaq, with 13.3 percent, and Packard Bell-NEC, with 11.6 percent. IBM also fared well in the services market. According to the Star Tribune, the company's services division became the second-largest producer of revenue in the first quarter of 1996, posting sales of $3.2 billion and passing the software business for the first time. Although IBM faced competition from EDS, Computer Sciences, and Andersen Consulting, CEO Gerstner felt confident that the company could be a formidable force in the services sector. He told the Star Tribune that, as the largest manufacturer of computers, software, and disk drives, "We can build a very successful model for growth around services."

IBM was not impregnable, however, and the company faced considerable competition in many fields. IBM struggled to earn market share in the global arena, and International Data reported that, although the worldwide information technology market grew 13 percent in 1996, IBM's once dominant 21 percent share in 1987 had dropped to 12 percent in 1996, down even from 15 percent in 1993. An executive at the North American unit of British Airways told the Wall Street Journal, "Ten years ago, IBM would have been the obvious lead choice. . . . There are a lot more situations [today] where IBM has to make much greater efforts to win the work." These situations included the relatively new playing field

IBM DROPS THE BALL AT THE OLYMPIC GAMES

As IBM regained footing in the precarious high-tech industry, the company also indulged in high-profile events to announce its comeback. IBM may have jumped the gun, however, when it stepped up as the exclusive provider of computing services for the 1996 Olympic Summer Games in Atlanta. An official sponsor, IBM handled everything from the tabulation of results and scoring to the management of schedules, and the company greatly publicized its involvement. While the world watched, however, IBM stumbled, for the system responsible for transmitting results to the news media was slow and inaccurate, and news organizations resorted to copying down scores from telecasts or to sending assistants to sports arenas to collect results by hand. A wiser, much more low-key IBM arrived at the 1998 Winter Games in Nagano, Japan, determined to win a quiet victory the second time around.

of e-business, where competitors such as Microsoft, Netscape Communications, and Yahoo! would certainly line up for a piece of the action. Microsoft's Eric Koivisto told Fortune, "A lot of companies share the desire to be the one people think of when they want to conduct commerce using the Web."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The purpose of the "E-Business" campaign was to convince customers that IBM was the company that could offer the best solutions for their e-business and Internet problems. The first phase of the campaign began in April 1997 with four television spots, a print effort, and Internet ads. The second phase, which started in October with a budget of $200 million, was touted as a new promotion. Many of the television commercials focused on a business problem occurring in an office environment and then introduced IBM as the company that could help. Stylistically unique, the spots were filmed in black and white, with a blue border surrounding each frame. Steve Hayden of the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather explained the message of the "E-Business" spots to Adweek when he said, "There have been a lot of communications saying you can get on the Internet overnight and suddenly everything is rosy." He noted that the Internet "does change everything about the way you do business, but it's not quite that simple." The spots emphasized that, while technological problems arose constantly, IBM was there to help.

The first batch of television spots included "Whizzy," "Whizzy Website," "Conference Call," and "Virus." The last showed problems that could arise from computer viruses. A group of office employees tried to solve a printing problem only to discover that a coworker had downloaded a virus off the Web. The spot promoted IBM's virus scanning products. "Whizzy Website" showed two men reviewing various websites on the Internet and animatedly discussing features they could put on their own site. One commented, "Wait until the guys in marketing see this!" The other said, "We could get a flaming, dancing logo," and the two men both shouted, "We can do anything!" Their spirits were tempered, however, when one asked the other, "Can you order any of this stuff?" and the other responded, "No." The spot then cut to a frame with the words "IBM Internet Solutions," with the voice-over saying, "IBM helps business websites do business." The spot ended with the familiar tagline from the "Solutions" campaign. IBM's Michael Reene explained the strategy behind the spot at an industry forum: "E-business isn't about twirling logos and fire-breathing web sites. It's about being more competitive . . . and profitable. It's about expanding global market opportunities."

Other spots included "Restaurant," "On Hold," "Websters," "Christmas," "Web Jam," "Hype," and "Knowledge." "Restaurant" featured a group of businessmen discussing the online purchase of golf clubs. One asked, "Are you crazy?" and another said, "Your life may be ruined." The spot promoted IBM's encryption technology. Both "Hype" and "Web Jam," which were part of the October promotion, included a frame with IBM's "e-business solutions" logo, with the e graphically encased in a circle. "Hype" featured two men sitting in a conference room, one reading documents while the other typed on a laptop. The reader said, "It says here the Internet is the future of business." He paused, then continued, "We have to be on the Internet." The other asked, "Why?" The reader replied, "Doesn't say." With catchy piano music in the background, the text explained, "IBM helps thousands of companies do real business on the Web." "Web Jam," which continued with the previous theme, featured two male office employees dealing with a website problem. When one said, "Check out the flame now," the other showed alarm. He later said, "We should have upgraded this server," to which the other replied, "Can't. It's not scalable." The spot culminated in a frame that explained, "IBM Scalable Web Servers mean never having to say you're sorry." Although the spots were lighthearted and humorous, the problems featured could seriously damage a business's operations.

Wladawsky-Berger summed up IBM's intent when he told MSNBC Business Video, "We want people, first of all, to agree that something dramatic is happening and that this is something they need to get on with, and if they say—what do I do next? We want them to think—well, call IBM." Carla Hendra, Ogilvy & Mather's president, explained to Mediaweek in 1999 how the different elements of the campaign worked together: "We used television for brand awareness and to drive traffic to the Web. Business print was used for more in-depth messaging to opinion leaders. Web advertising was meant to show the medium is the message."

In an expansion of the "E-Business" campaign, launched in October 1999, IBM focused on what it called "e-culture," highlighting customer testimonials and the depiction of real-life solutions IBM offered its customers. A few months later, in a related effort, IBM released a campaign called "E-Business People" that focused on IBM employees who provided the solutions. The "Solutions for a Small Planet" slogan continued to be used in 2000 when IBM turned its attention to the emerging wireless market. These e-business spots, for example, showed a young woman in Italy using a cell phone to arrange a credit-card purchase from a vending machine. By this time a major portion of IBM advertising was devoted to e-business. In a 2000 article Brandweek quoted an unnamed IBM representative as saying, "People ask us 'What comes after e-business?' More e-business."

OUTCOME

The "E-Business" campaign did not end so much as it branched off into a number of directions, as "e-business" in effect became the IBM brand. In 1998 IBM began to promote what it called e-business tools. This effort was followed by "E-culture," "E-Business People," and the wireless spots. In 2002 IBM was still flying high despite the collapse of the dot-com sector. It introduced a new campaign, "E-Business Is the Game. Play to Win," which focused on the need to maintain a robust computer infrastructure. A subsequent campaign, "E-Business On Demand," showed how companies could leverage that infrastructure to better serve their customers in a fast-paced world.

The "E-Business" campaign met with varied reactions among viewers. USA Today 's Ad Track, a poll that measured an advertising campaign's popularity and effectiveness, found that a mere 11 percent of those surveyed actually liked the spots a lot. Forty-three percent were neutral, and 7 percent of viewers did not like the advertisements. In terms of effectiveness, the campaign earned higher ratings, with 24 percent of men polled finding the ads highly effective. In contrast, only 11 percent of women surveyed considered the spots highly effective. IBM representatives noted that Ad Track generally polled a diverse group, and because the campaign was aimed at a specific target group, this could explain the low scores. IBM declared the campaign a success, and others agreed. Adweek voted "E-Business" the best campaign of the year in 1997, and the spots "Virus" and "Whizzy Website" both won awards at the 1997 Cannes International Advertising Festival. In 2004 the "E-Business On Demand" effort won an EFFIE Award; hosted by the New York American Marketing Association, the EFFIEs were one of the most prestigious awards programs in the advertising industry.

FURTHER READING

Ditlea, Steve. "Big Blue Is Back." Mediaweek, January 4, 1999, p. 28.

Enrico, Dottie. "IBM Ads Compute Low Popularity Score." USA Today, January 19, 1998, p. B6.

Garfield, Bob. "IBM Finds Solution to Become Relevant." Advertising Age, April 7, 1997, p. 53.

Kaplan, David. "Into the Blue: How Ogilvy & Mather Gave IBM a Dash of Color—and a Pile of New Business." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 8, 2002, p. 12.

Marchetti, Michele. "IBM's Marketing Visionary." Sales & Marketing Management, September 2000, p. 52.

Morris, Betsy. "IBM Really Wants Your E-Business." Fortune, November 10, 1997, p. 36f.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Best Spots 1997." Adweek, February 2, 1998, p. 21.

Wasserman, Todd. "IBM Mines Wireless Gold in New TV Ads." Brandweek, September 11 2000, p. 6.

Mariko Fujinaka
Ed Dinger

GIZMO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After consolidating its advertising account in 1994 from 42 advertising agencies to just one (Ogilvy & Mather), International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) resurrected its image from an outpaced computer company to that of an innovative leader within the computer industry. Besides streamlining its advertising account, IBM also benefited from the dot-com collapse that started in 2000. While younger companies without IBM's experience and capital perished, IBM expanded its scope by providing more infrastructure hardware, increased software development, and e-business consulting. The term "e-business," coined by IBM in the mid-1990s, referred to the infrastructure of technologies—such as internal networks, E-mail, call centers, and the Internet—used by a business. To tout the ability of IBM's e-business products to meet the ever-changing demands of customers, IBM released its "Gizmo" campaign.

Drawing on the company's estimated $500 million advertising budget, the New York office of Ogilvy & Mather created "Gizmo." The campaign first appeared on October 29, 2002, with a series of teaser television commercials, online ads, and print ads. The campaign included the launch of bagotronics.com, a website belonging to a fictional company called Bagotronics. The majority of the "Gizmo" spots featured the Bagotronics executives troubleshooting their e-business problems with fantastical products such as an elixir that granted omniscience, a time machine that would help amend past mistakes, and a "Universal Business Adapter" that connected any electronic device to any other electronic device. At the end of each spot, copy explained that the featured product did not exist but that IBM's e-business products could provide a realistic solution to a similar problem. The "Gizmo" campaign included nine television spots along with print and online ads. All the commercials featured the tagline "e-business on demand."

During the campaign's first three months, ad awareness for IBM increased 20 percent compared with the three months before the campaign. Among other ad-industry awards, "Gizmo" won a 2004 Silver EFFIE Award in the Corporate Reputation/Image/Identity category. IBM reported an income of $4.9 billion during the first nine months of 2003, a major improvement from the $3.4 billion reported for the same period in 2002.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1994 sales were waning for the 83-year-old IBM. Its advertising account was spread across 42 different advertising agencies, and its future as a technology leader was diminishing. "The IBM brand, though once heroic and famous and incredibly valuable, declined in relevance," Brian Fetherstonhaugh, the chief operating officer managing IBM's account at Ogilvy & Mather, explained to Adweek. "IBM was rated the 283rd most valuable brand in the world. In addition to a new-business model and positioning, the brand needed to attract people or it faced going out of business."

After awarding its estimated $500 million advertising account in 1994 to just one agency, Ogilvy & Mather, IBM began an extraordinary comeback. The newly appointed ad agency advertised IBM with what it called a "360 degree" approach. Explaining this approach in MC Technology Marketing Intelligence, Carla Hendra, president of Ogilvy & Mather's OgilvyOne North America division, said, "A lot of other agencies create an ad and then extend it out into other channels. We bring together the integrated team at the outset, and look for a kind of media-agnostic solution."

NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC IMAGE COLLECTION

In November 2002 the National Geographic Society, the company that for more than a century was responsible for publishing National Geographic, a magazine that focused on culture, adventure, and nature, began selling 10,000 of its archived images on www.ngsimages.com. The website was made possible by IBM's e-business software and hardware infrastructure technology.

In 1997 IBM released its "E-business" campaign. The term referred to a business's infrastructure, or the integration of different technologies, such as customer call centers, internal computer networks, Internet servers, security services, and E-mail servers. The campaign suggested that businesses could integrate their technologies using IBM infrastructure products. One of the campaign's commercials featured a Web designer trying to please a client with a spinning logo. The unamused client had originally asked the designer not to make a new logo but rather to put his entire supply chain online, one of the services provided by IBM.

In March 2002 Sam Palmisano replaced Lou Gerstner as CEO of IBM. One of Palmisano's first decisions as CEO was to expand IBM's "e-business" tagline to "e-business on demand." The addition of the phrase "on demand" was intended to emphasize the fact that IBM's flexible products and services could fill the fluctuating demands of customers.

TARGET MARKET

Graham Calderwood, senior partner at Ogilvy & Mather's Toronto office, explained to Strategy that a campaign did not become successful by chance. "It happens through a disciplined approach, and the first part of that is to understand what's going on in the customer's head. You have to make that connection between the advertiser and the target customer." Ogilvy & Mather used focus groups, individual interviews, and workshops to understand the "Gizmo" campaign's target market, which consisted of two groups. First, the campaign targeted the information technology (IT) employees that typically oversaw the purchasing of products used for E-mail, networking, security, and phone systems. The campaign also targeted c-level (i.e., chief information officer, chief technology officer) executives that made purchasing decisions for a company.

Although the campaign appeared across traditional television channels, Ogilvy & Mather hoped to target the IT demographic with video spots on ESPN.com, CNN.com, and other websites popular with IT employees. This group tended to use Internet news sources rather than watch television news programs. The campaign targeted c-level executives by releasing print ads in business magazines.

"Gizmo" also avoided technical details about IBM products. Instead it reached its target market with humor and a strong human element. The majority of the campaign's commercials featured executives of the fictional company Bagotronics listening to an IT employee explain an absurd gizmo that would hopefully solve business problems. Although the ads focused on Bagotronics, Ogilvy & Mather's initial audience testing showed that the audience had a clear idea of which brand was being advertised.

NICE FACADE. BAD INFRASTRUCTURE.

IBM released a television commercial in 2001 that touted the company's superior infrastructure technology. One spot featured the Leaning Tower of Pisa and copy that read, "Nice facade. Bad infrastructure." As two people attempted to photograph the structure in the commercial, the tower collapsed. The spot ended with the copy "Infrastructure: Sooner or later, it matters." IBM stopped airing the commercial immediately after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, in which the two World Trade Center towers in New York were destroyed.

COMPETITION

Carly Fiorina, the CEO of the computer and printer company Hewlett-Packard (HP), spearheaded the largest acquisition in tech-sector history in 2002 after she convinced HP's shareholders to approve the $19 billion acquisition of the computer maker Compaq Computer. To quell the shareholders' doubts, Fiorina argued that the acquisition of Compaq would strengthen HP enough to take infrastructure business away from IBM. Undermining the IBM tagline "e-business on demand," HP titled its $400 million campaign "Demand More." The campaign, released in early 2003, used the tagline "Everything is possible."

"Everybody is doing this," Paul Phillips, manager of competitive strategy for the computer company Sun Microsystems, said to Reuters News. "[HP is] trying to move [itself] closer to the IBM model but without the depth and experience IBM has." To promote its own management software, Sun created a similar campaign titled "N1."

Before HP acquired Compaq, consumer polls showed that the HP brand was still associated only with printers. With "Demand More" HP hoped to expand its reputation into the realm of personal-computer systems, imaging and printing systems, enterprise infrastructures, and services. During the campaign HP released more than 150 new products that could be used to improve business infrastructures. HP updated its infrastructure software OpenView with a self-fixing technology. It also reshaped its ProLiant blade servers so that more server hardware could be stacked on shelves. The new design freed up computer storage space for businesses and reduced the energy needed to keep the servers cool.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Gizmo" campaign first surfaced on October 29, 2002, with a series of teaser commercials and print ads that hinted at the existence of Bagotronics, a fictional company created for the campaign. IBM was not identified as the advertising source until later. The campaign would extend into 2003 and include nine television spots, several online ads, and print ads with the "Gizmo" theme. Ogilvy & Mather even created a Bagotronics website.

The campaign's commercials spoofed business problems such as underbudgeted projects, network problems, and missed deadlines. In each spot the Bagotronics executives invited an IT representative to pitch the latest gizmo in the company's boardroom. The spot "Time Machine," for instance, began with the Bagotronics CEO studying a glass contraption filled with twirling parts. When he asked his IT representative what the gizmo was, the IT rep replied, "It's a business time machine." He then proceeded to explain that Bagotronics could use the machine to amend past business mistakes. The executives appeared delighted with the contraption. When a female executive asked about the company's "dead-end consulting project," the IT employee smugly insisted that the time machine would make sure the project "never happened." After a few more questions and answers, the IT employee warned that the time machine was just a prototype and therefore dangerous. Pointing to an executive on his right, the CEO said, "Phil, you go first." The spot then flashed through several screens displaying the copy "THERE IS NO BUSINESS TIME MACHINE" and "YOU SHOULD CALL IBM FIRST." The spot ended with the campaign tagline, "e-business on demand," and a final image of the IBM logo.

In promoting IBM's e-business solutions Ogilvy & Mather faced the challenge of making infrastructure technology appear interesting to the campaign's target market. "How do you get people engaged in something they may not be interested in to begin with?" Chris Wall, Ogilvy & Mather senior partner, asked in B to B. The agency resorted to humorous situations with which c-level executives and IT personnel could readily identify. "There was a time when [business-to-business advertising] was thought of as very serious and austere," Wall continued. "Now, business has become like sports, where people follow businesses and stocks like they follow sports scores. That is a pretty big shift. You find us talking about business in a more entertaining way."

Further television spots showed the same Bagotronics executives considering the use of magic server pixie dust, magic business binoculars, and a magic elixir that could offer powers of omniscience. Print ads displayed similar gizmos. The print's copy explained that, unlike magic elixirs and pixie dust, IBM offered a reality-based solution to e-business problems.

OUTCOME

Advertising critics deemed "Gizmo" a quantifiable success. Four days after the campaign was released, the Bagotronics.com website recorded 17,131 unique visitors. IBM's connection to Bagotronics was explained in the "read our ad" section of the website, which was viewed more than 41,000 times. According to B to B, ad awareness for IBM was 20 percent greater during the campaign's first three months than during the three months before the campaign. As "Gizmo" continued into 2003, IBM's business skyrocketed. The company's reported income was 30 percent greater during the first nine months of 2003 than during the first nine months of 2002. The New York American Marketing Association awarded "Gizmo" a prestigious Silver EFFIE in the Corporate Reputation/Image/Identity category in 2004.

Chris Wall stated that one of the achievements of the "Gizmo" campaign was illustrating IBM's ability to deliver on the promises made by less-experienced companies during the 1990s. "We had the go-go years of the dot-com era, then we kind of had a hangover after the crash, and now we have an in-between stage," Wall explained to B to B. "[The possibilities] talked about in the late '90s [are] starting to happen, but the companies that are doing it are companies you know and trust, not 20-year-old kids."

FURTHER READING

Allossery, Patrick. "Big Blue Playing to Win: IBM Canada Targets Mid-sized Companies in New, More-spirited E-business Campaign." National Post (Don Mills, Ontario), May 13, 2002, p. FP8.

Bernstein, Roberta. "2003 Ad Agency of the Year." MC Technology Marketing Intelligence, May 1, 2004, p. 24.

Booker, Ellis. "Finding the Funny in B-to-B Ads." B to B, July 11, 2005, p. 10.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "IBM Puts Push behind Linux; Sees It as Tool to Fight Microsoft." Advertising Age, September 8, 2003, p. 89.

D'Innocenzo, Lisa. "Beating Brand Fatigue." Strategy, November 17, 2003, p. 1.

Kaplan, David. "Into the Blue." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 8, 2002, p. 12.

Kohnstamm, Abby. "Special Report: Power Players." Advertising Age, October 4, 2004, p. P14.

Lippert, Barbara. "IBM's Nightmares on Wall Street." Adweek, May 5, 2003, p. 26.

Maddox, Kate. "Creative." B to B, June 13, 2005, p. 37.

———. "IBM, Ogilvy Celebrate 10 Years." B to B, June 7, 2004, p. 1.

———. "IBM's Strategy Keeps It In and On Demand." B to B, October 25, 2004, p. 24.

McArthur, Keith. "IBM Launches New Campaign." Globe and Mail (Toronto), May 24, 2004, p. B12.

Silverman, Gary. "IBM Deletes Its 'e' on Demand." Financial Times (London), May 20, 2004, p. 20.

Kevin Teague

LINUX CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The world's largest computer company, International Business Machines Corporation (IBM), was one of the first large computer companies to sell its mainframe servers with an operating system called Linux. Linux was developed in 1991 by a software developer searching for a free alternative to the costly operating system called Unix. Unlike Unix and operating systems such as Microsoft Corporation's Windows, Linux was free, or "open-source," and available without patent or copyright protections. To cut down on software costs, IBM shipped 15 percent of its servers with the free Linux operating system in 2002. To increase consumer faith in Linux and wean more of IBM's customers off of Unix and Microsoft operating systems, IBM released its "Linux" campaign.

Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide drew upon IBM's $600 million annual advertising budget to create the campaign. The first "Linux" spot, a 90-second commercial titled "Prodigy," began airing on September 5, 2003. It featured an alert 10-year-old boy who sat inside a stark, brightly lit room. The boy, whom Ogilvy & Mather used to represent a computer operating with Linux, listened attentively to lessons given by individuals such as the academician Henry Louis Gates, the director Penny Marshall, a plumber, an airline pilot, and the boxing champion Muhammad Ali. Similar television spots ensued, including a 30-second, $2.3 million Super Bowl commercial in 2004. The campaign included print ads, postcards, E-mail, and Web banners. Using the word "open" to emphasize Linux's open-source use, the campaign used the tagline "LINUX. THE FUTURE IS OPEN. IBM."

"Linux" earned a Bronze EFFIE Award in 2005 within the Computer Software category. For the first half of 2004 IBM posted $45.4 billion in global revenues, which surpassed IBM's revenues during the same period a year before by nearly 9 percent. Ad critics praised the campaign for blending elegance with simplicity. The ad critic Barbara Lippert wrote in Adweek that the serious tone of the campaign's 2004 Super Bowl spot set IBM apart from the clutter of humorous spots vying for attention.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Created by the Finnish student Linus Torvalds in 1991, Linux became a popular nonproprietary operating system that could be used in lieu of more expensive products such as Microsoft's Windows and Sun Microsystems' Unix. Not usually installed in personal computers, Linux was instead used in servers, which were the large computers powering networks. IBM wanted to sell more servers with Linux in order to reduce its reliance on expensive operating systems. "IBM has seen that Linux opens doors . . . it takes expenses away from IBM, it makes life simpler because the software helps unify IBM's diverse products," Dan Kusnetzky, vice president of systems software research at the technology market research firm International Data Corp., said to Reuters News. "IBM sees that by making the Linux market bigger, IBM's slice of that market will be bigger," he explained.

According to Reuters News, IBM was responsible for a 2001 guerrilla marketing campaign called "Peace, Love, and Linux," in which Linux's penguin logo was spray painted, along with a heart and a peace symbol, on the sidewalks of San Francisco, New York, and Chicago. In 2002 IBM stated that 6,000 of its business customers were using Linux and that 15 percent of IBM servers were shipped with the free operating system. IBM was not the only computer company taking advantage of Linux. International Data Corp. reported that, during the first quarter of 2003, Hewlett-Packard shipped 29.4 percent of its servers with Linux, and Dell shipped 22.1 percent.

"Linux" was IBM's first large advertising campaign to focus on Linux. Executives at IBM wanted to use IBM's brand equity to persuade information technology (IT) employees and c-level (e.g., chief executive officer, chief technology officer) executives to rely on Linux. Speaking with Reuters News in 2003, Lisa Baird, head of global advertising at IBM, stated that awareness of Linux had reached "a tipping point" and that the campaign was meant to encourage interest in the operating system. "We are only one of many companies committed to it," she said. "We are certainly doing everything to increase the momentum of that interest."

TARGET MARKET

"Linux" television spots reached a mass audience by airing across popular sports programming, including the 2004 Super Bowl. With the campaign IBM hoped to foster trust among consumers in general, but it was more specifically aimed at technology decision makers. Marketing analysts explained that, even though IT employees and c-level executives watched less television than the general population, they still watched broadcasts of high-profile sporting events such as the Super Bowl. To resonate with the broader audience that may not have understood the intricacies of Linux, the campaign used little technical information. Instead the commercials employed a highly emotional content backed by A-list celebrities and IBM branding.

Speaking to Computerworld, Christopher Williams, a strategist at the marketing firm Idea Engineering, described the three groups most affected by the 2004

DIGITAL FOOTBALL

In 2003 the National Football League (NFL) designated IBM as its official technology partner. In return for the NFL's endorsement, IBM began converting 80 years of football film footage into a digital format that could be accessed instantaneously by the public. The NFL hoped that its new digital archive would cut costs and make the league more efficient.

"Linux" Super Bowl spot: "In reaching the mainstream, [IBM is] reaching the IT decision-makers, the company's stakeholders, and the IBM shareholders." The latter two, stakeholders and shareholders, may not have understood the difference between Unix and Linux, but the campaign suggested that IBM was making the right decision by choosing Linux. The spot used endorsements by celebrities such as boxer Muhammad Ali to establish Linux "as a good business decision for you and your bosses," said Williams.

Some IBM stakeholders feared that, by using an operating system without an entity responsible for its production, no one could be held accountable for failure. "Users still have concerns about the viability of Linux vendors over time," Dan Kusnetzky of International Data Corp. said to the San Jose Mercury News. "They have concerns about staff expertise for administering Linux, and they worry there is no one throat to choke because it's developed by a community of developers."

MUHAMMAD ALI

Although he was a highly public figure during the 1960s and 1970s, the retired heavyweight boxer Muhammad Ali began a slow retreat from public appearances after being diagnosed with pugilistic Parkinson's syndrome in 1984. Much to the advertising world's surprise, the boxer appeared in three commercials during the 2004 Super Bowl: IBM's "Linux" commercial, Global Gillette's "Gillette" commercial, and a "Choose to Vote" public service announcement. Ali's wife, Lonnie, explained to Women's Wear Daily that her husband was using the advertisements to reassure the public that he was alive and active. The boxer was opening a museum that promoted the legacy of Muhammad Ali the following year.

COMPETITION

In January 2004 Microsoft, the world's largest software company, launched a global advertising campaign that claimed that its Windows Server 2003 was 10 times cheaper to use than Linux. The campaign, titled "Get the Facts," was based on findings unearthed by independent market-research firms such as Giga Research and Meta Group. In addition to print ads, the campaign included an updated section on Microsoft's website; titled "Get the Facts on Windows and Linux," it allowed visitors to download the comparison results between the two operating systems. One magazine ad began with the headline "Weighing the cost of Linux vs. Windows? Let's review the facts." Even though Linux was free, explained the ad, the installation, development, and service of Linux would make it a more expensive alternative to Windows Server 2003.

"As Linux became more mainstream, as Linux became more commercial, as IT professionals wanted to make more pragmatic decisions on it, they needed a set of data to help them sort through their decisions," Martin Taylor, Microsoft's general manager of platform strategies and its lead media contact for Linux issues, said to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. Taylor explained that the campaign was merely an effort to collect and organize outside information that discredited Linux.

Some advertising critics lambasted the campaign for using research that claimed to be "independent" even though it was financed by Microsoft. In August 2004 the Advertising Standards Authority (ASA), a U.K. advertising watchdog, concluded that the "Get the Facts" campaign was flawed. According to the ASA, Meta Group used more expensive hardware to operate Linux for the price comparison between Windows Server 2003 and Linux. The unnecessary expense tipped the results in Microsoft's favor.

MARKETING STRATEGY

During the first week of September 2003 IBM released "Linux" print ads, postcards, E-mails, and Web banners with the tagline "LINUX. THE FUTURE IS OPEN. IBM." The campaign was IBM's first bold statement of support for Linux. On September 7 the campaign's first TV commercial, a 90-second spot titled "Prodigy," broke during the opening games of the National Football League. The spot also appeared on CBS during the men's finals of the US Open tennis tournament.

"Prodigy" featured a 10-year-old boy sitting inside an all-white room that New York Times ad critic Nat Ives described as reminiscent of the movie 2001: A Space Odyssey. The commercial began with a male voice and a female voice discussing the boy, who was sitting quietly on a white plastic chair. The male voice-over stated, "I think you should see this." The female replied, "It's just a kid." For the remainder of the spot, the boy sat silently as professionals from various disciplines explained subjects such as problem solving, plumbing, Latin, guitar, astronomy, and history. The boy's focused expression suggested that he comprehended the information as quickly as it was disseminated. After the boxer Muhammad Ali told the boy, "Speak your mind, don't back down," the two off-camera voices from the spot's beginning finished their conversation. "Does he have a name?'' the woman asked. ''His name is Linux,'' the man answered. The spot ended with the tagline ''LINUX. THE FUTURE IS OPEN. IBM.'' Ogilvy & Mather used the word ''open'' to remark on Linux's open-source software, which allowed the public to use it for little or no fee.

Further spots with the same 10-year-old boy continued into 2004. The 30-second spot titled ''Muhammad Ali,'' which cost an estimated $2.25 million, aired during the 2004 Super Bowl. It featured the boy watching television footage of the world heavyweight champion Muhammad Ali winning a boxing match. After the match Ali shouted, ''I shook up the world!'' The television set disappeared. Then the more recent 62-year-old Ali appeared to encourage the boy to ''Shake things up. Shake up the world.'' Ali, famous for his unorthodox boxing style and his spectacular results, was considered to be an ideal endorsement for Linux. John Lucy, a spokesman for IBM, told the Herald-Sun, ''Linux is the underdog, as Ali was. Both developed a global cult following by taking on the big boys and proving they were ultimately the most powerful and popular contenders.''

Super Bowl ad critics praised the dignified nature of the ''Muhammad Ali'' commercial. While so many other brands used humor during the game, ''Muhammad Ali'' stood apart with its inspirational message. ''The way you differentiate yourself is to have a different tone, a different creative feel in the midst of the guffaws,'' Deirdre Bigley, vice president of advertising at IBM, explained to Reuters News. ''I think we are going to grab attention by being more elegant.''

OUTCOME

The ''Linux'' campaign did not score well in some audience polls. One survey, conducted in Canton, Ohio, which was the location of the Pro Football Hall of Fame, rated ''Muhammad Ali'' as the fifth-worst commercial aired during the 2004 Super Bowl. The campaign garnered more praise from ad critics, many of whom admired the campaign's creative strategy and classy execution. Praising the Super Bowl spot ''Muhammad Ali,'' Adweek advertising critic Barbara Lippert explained on CBS News: The Early Show, ''I liked the Linux one. . . . I thought it looked great. It was startling. It changed the tone.''

The commercial ''Prodigy'' earned the campaign a Bronze EFFIE in 2005 in the ceremony's Computer Software category. Aside from ad-industry success, the campaign was also credited with boosting IBM's profit. During the first half of 2004 IBM posted $45.4 billion in global revenues, which surpassed IBM's revenues during the same period a year before by nearly 9 percent.

The campaign's failure to impress the broader Super Bowl audience was attributed by some critics to the general confusion about Linux. Audience polls, including USA Today 's Ad Track survey, showed a general dislike of the campaign. Some advertising critics believed that, if given enough time, audiences would embrace the ''Linux'' campaign. For instance, Paul Cappelli, president of the ad agency the Ad Store, wrote in Shoot, ''I'm aware [that the Muhammad Ali spot] didn't score all that well with USA Today, but the exposure on the game will help that ad. As it airs some more, I think you'll see it climb in its effectiveness.''

FURTHER READING

Allossery, Patrick. ''Big Blue Playing to Win: IBM Canada Targets Mid-sized Companies in New, More-spirited E-business Campaign.'' National Post (Don Mills, Ontario), May 13, 2002, p. FP8.

Bernstein, Roberta. ''2003 Ad Agency of the Year.'' MC Technology Marketing Intelligence, May 1, 2004, p. 24.

Booker, Ellis. ''Finding the Funny in B-To-B Ads.'' B to B, July 11, 2005, p. 10.

Cuneo, Alice Z. ''IBM Puts Push behind Linux; Sees It as Tool to Fight Microsoft.'' Advertising Age, September 8, 2003, p. 89.

D'Innocenzo, Lisa. ''Beating Brand Fatigue.'' Strategy, November 17, 2003, p. 1.

Kaplan, David. ''Into the Blue.'' Adweek (eastern ed.), July 8, 2002, p. 12.

Kohnstamm, Abby. ''Special Report: Power Players.'' Advertising Age, October 4, 2004, p. P14.

Lippert, Barbara. ''IBM's Nightmares on Wall Street.'' Adweek, May 5, 2003, p. 26.

Maddox, Kate. ''Creative.'' B to B, June 13, 2005, p. 37.

———. ''IBM, Ogilvy Celebrate 10 Years.'' B to B, June 7, 2004, p. 1.

———. ''IBM's Strategy Keeps It In and On Demand.'' B to B, October 25, 2004, p. 24.

McArthur, Keith. ''IBM Launches New Campaign.'' Globe and Mail (Toronto), May 24, 2004, p. B12.

Silverman, Gary. ''IBM Deletes Its 'E' On Demand.'' Financial Times, May 20, 2004, p. 20.

Kevin Teague

SOLUTIONS FOR A SMALL PLANET CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

International Business Machines (IBM) Corporation was undeniably a powerful and influential presence during the early days of the computer boom. In the 1970s and early 1980s IBM dominated the computer market. The company was largely responsible for the success of the personal computer industry, and major corporations and the federal government relied on its mainframe systems. IBM's profits reached $6.6 billion in 1984, and the company's stock reached an all-time high in August 1987. Increased competition led to a drop in profitability, however, and by the 1990s Big Blue, as the company was known, had lost its omnipresence.

A revitalization effort began in 1993 with the hiring of a new CEO. The advent of the Internet also boosted IBM's prospects. The company hoped to become a major contender in electronic commerce by combining its long-standing strength in network computing and research with the global capabilities of the Internet. To accomplish these goals, IBM needed to present a more user-friendly image while leveraging its powerful brand name. IBM's "Solutions for a Small Planet," which debuted in early 1995 with a budget of $100 million, was a brand-building campaign designed to reveal the company's global reach. To emphasize the company's universal relevance, the print and television ads depicted people throughout the world using various IBM products in their everyday lives.

The "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign continued through 1998 and included more than 25 television spots. The campaign, initially launched in the United States, soon made its way to Canada, Latin America, Europe, the Middle East, Africa, Asia, and elsewhere. At the commencement of the worldwide campaign, IBM's Scott Brooks told USA Today, "This campaign will be seen by millions of people in over four continents . . . . It was designed to reflect IBM's universal appeal all over the world."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

IBM had a number of problems when Louis V. Gerstner, Jr., became CEO in April 1993. The company had lost $16 billion between 1991 and 1993, and its stock plunged to a low of $40 in 1993. (The high, which was reached in 1987, had been $175.) In seven years the company, long known for its no-layoff policy, had undergone five major restructurings and cut its workforce by half. Plans to split IBM into smaller divisions were in the works, which distracted the company and blurred its focus. IBM's two mainstays, mainframe computer systems and personal computers, lost market share in the early 1990s as well. Mainframes seemed destined for obsolescence, and small, aggressive upstarts entered the personal computer market and gobbled up profits. These young companies sped past the large and unwieldy IBM in terms of product development and introduced new systems to the public while IBM fumbled. In 1992 computer consultant Ulric Weil told Time magazine, "IBM is no longer the monolithic monster that strikes fear in the hearts of competitors . . . . It has proved to be quite mortal after all." No one seemed to possess much confidence that IBM could recover, not even Gerstner. He had not been thrilled with the offer to head the flailing IBM, and he told Fortune, "It just looked like it was going into a death spiral. I wasn't convinced it was solvable."

When Gerstner took the reins, he slashed jobs, decided against dividing the company, and chose not to give up on mainframes. He also shifted the focus to support services and systems and acquired software companies in order to compete with Microsoft. In an unprecedented move, in 1994 Gerstner severed ties with IBM's 40 advertising agencies and consolidated all advertising, an estimated $400 to $500 million in global spending, at one agency—Ogilvy & Mather. A worldwide agency, Ogilvy & Mather had branch offices in 59 countries at the time. Gerstner hoped to present a unified brand image in its global advertising, and it was thought that a single agency would be best equipped to deal with such a task.

Ogilvy & Mather's first major effort as IBM's sole advertising agency was the "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, which began on New Year's Day in 1995. IBM needed the brand-enhancing campaign to be successful if it were to regain its reputation as a technological leader. Marketing consultant Al Ries told USA Today that the campaign was "the make-it or break-it campaign" and that "if this flops, IBM's reputation with consumers will suffer." Forrester Research's Bill Bluestein agreed and said that IBM "has been surpassed by Microsoft, even Intel, as a technological powerhouse, and this kind of an ad effort could help change people's minds about IBM."

TARGET MARKET

According to a USA Today interview with an IBM marketing executive in 1995, the "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign initially targeted "affluent, well-educated, mostly male consumers." This group represented those most likely to have had prior experience with and knowledge of IBM and its products. IBM purchased commercial ad time on sports- and news-related shows to reach these consumers, and USA Today 's Ad Track, a poll designed to measure a campaign's popularity and effectiveness, found that the strategy had worked. When Ad Track surveyed 1,255 adults, it discovered that more than one-third had not seen any of IBM's spots. Those who had seen the commercials, however, were predominantly members of IBM's target audience. While approximately one-third of the women polled had seen the ads, more than one-half of the men had viewed them. In terms of popularity, the high-income viewer earning more than $50,000 a year liked the spots more than those who made less than $7,500 a year.

While IBM may have hoped to capture the attention of the high-income consumer at the beginning of the "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, it then adopted a more egalitarian approach by placing the spots on national network television during prime time. And because the reach of computers was growing at an exponential rate throughout the 1990s, so was IBM's target market. Although the spots featured foreign languages and countries, they showed common people discussing technological issues in an everyday manner, sending the message that technology affected everyone. For instance, one of the spots showed a group of Czechoslovakian nuns discussing the Internet and IBM's OS/2 Warp. One nun said, "I'm dying to surf the 'net," and another was beeped on her pager. Another spot was set in Marrakech, Morocco, with one man confessing in Arabic, "Hey, I'm no wirehead," something that many in the United States could understand. The idea was to show empathy for those who felt that technology was passing by them and to suggest that IBM could be the company to provide the solution.

DOES ANYONE GET IT?

One of the spots in the "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign featured the fictitious rock band Spinal Tap. The commercial was shown during the 1996 Summer Olympic Games and was intended to be funny. Unfortunately for IBM, many viewers were unfamiliar with the 1984 faux documentary This Is Spinal Tap, in which the band originated and which parodied heavy metal rock and band tours. In the IBM spot the musicians' dialogue was subtitled, which kept with the "Solutions for a Small Planet" strategy, for the loud music drowned out the voices. The band members discussed the launch of a comeback tour and surmised that, if IBM could help manage the Olympics, the company could certainly handle the logistics of its tour. The spot was supposed to surprise and engage viewers and dispel IBM's uptight image, but viewers were at most surprised.

COMPETITION

There was a time when IBM ruled the computer industry and had no direct competition. A 1992 Star Tribune article stated, "So tight was IBM's market grip that it was practically impossible for any computer company to do business without being tied in some way to the Big Blue colossus." IBM's glory days passed in the late 1980s and early 1990s, however, as the high-tech industry blossomed and new competitors arose. IBM chose to stand by its cash cow—mainframes—but, unfortunately for IBM, sales declined as more users opted for personal computers. IBM was slow to enter the personal computer market, and competitors such as Apple, Compaq, and Packard Bell had a healthy head start. Time noted that IBM's PC business ailed in 1992, with revenues and market share dropping.

After Gerstner joined IBM, profits began to pick up, and IBM's future did not appear as grim. According to Dataquest, IBM ranked third in the U.S. computer market in 1996, with a market share of 8.7 percent. Compaq led the group with 13.3 percent of the market, followed by Packard Bell-NEC with 11.6 percent. After IBM came Dell, with 6.9 percent, and then Apple, with 6.7 percent. According to Dataquest, IBM also placed third in the home PC market for 1996, with 8.1 percent. Packard Bell ranked first, with a 27.3 percent share, and Compaq came in second, with 12.2 percent. Gateway, Apple, and Acer, respectively, followed IBM.

IBM also provided Microsoft with competition in software. After IBM acquired Lotus Development in 1995, U.S. News & World Report indicated that the two company's software businesses were comparable in size, with IBM's growing successfully. IBM's personal computers were preloaded with Lotus software, which significantly increased the chances that those using the 624,000 IBM PCs sold in 1996 would use Lotus rather than Microsoft.

Although IBM had gotten back in the game, the company still faced fierce competition. The Wall Street Journal noted that revenue in 1997 had increased 40 percent from 1987 and that nearly two-thirds of the company's revenue was attributed to personal computers and services. (In 1992 only about 40 percent of IBM's revenue had come from PCs.) Although these statistics seemed impressive, profits had gone up only 3.2 percent during the decade. According to the Wall Street Journal, "That means IBM labored mightily to add more than $20 billion in yearly revenue—all to produce less than a penny of profit on each extra dollar." While IBM's revenue went up 5.6 percent in 1996, Hewlett-Packard's increased 19 percent and Intel's rose 29 percent. In other words, "IBM added $4 billion in new revenue last year [1996], but Hewlett-Packard, half IBM's size, added $6.9 billion; and Intel, one-third as big as IBM, tacked on $4.6 billion.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

The aim of the ''Solutions for a Small Planet'' campaign was to demonstrate IBM's global reach while giving the company a friendly, unintimidating image. The spots were filmed in the languages of the countries depicted and carried subtitles. While the ads were shown worldwide, none was televised in the country of its native language. Using foreign languages was intended to draw in viewers and hold their interest. Ogilvy & Mather's Matt Ross told Newsday that using a foreign tongue ''draws people in and causes them to become a lot more involved in the spots.... It's hard not to pay closer attention when a foreign language comes on.'' The spots showed common people discussing IBM, computers, and technology to illustrate the company's universal reach. Greek fishermen, Argentine tango dancers, Italian farmers, and Irish shepherds were among those featured.

IBM increased advertising spending significantly to ensure that the campaign would reach as many viewers as possible, with Business Marketing reporting that its broadcast spending increased by 866 percent in 1995. The campaign continued through 1997 and into 1998 and included several Olympic-themed spots to inform viewers of IBM's Olympic sponsorship. IBM also invested in other advertising campaigns and, as the ''Solutions for a Small Planet'' campaign aged, gradually placed less emphasis on its spots. Many of IBM's ads, whether or not they were part of the campaign, shared the tag line ''IBM. Solutions for a Small Planet.''

Several ads appeared on U.S. network television during 1997. Some were humorous and all depicted interesting scenarios. The ''Fashion Models'' spot featured two Scandinavian models walking down a runway during a fashion show. They conversed in Swedish about IBM's ''data mining'' services, with English subtitles to guide U.S. viewers. One of the models asked the other how her line of knee socks was selling, and the second responded that business had improved since she contacted IBM. She explained, ''See, IBM's got a fab way of looking at data and coming up with zillions of ideas you'd just never think of. It's called 'data mining.'' The first model then replied, ''Data mining? Sounds like the edge I need for my chain of Tire and Auto Centers.'' The spot introduced an IBM service and solution in an alluring and unexpected manner.

Another ad, ''Japanese Surgeons,'' took place in an operating room and featured two Japanese surgeons, one male and one female. As they prepared to perform surgery, they discussed in Japanese their personal computers. The patient, still conscious, laid on the operating table listening. The female surgeon asked the male how his children were enjoying their new computer. The male surgeon responded, ''It's not up and running yet. You know me. All thumbs.'' The patient's eyes widened at this remark. The female surgeon then said that her family loved their IBM Aptiva: ''It's got CD-ROM... lots of software... It's ready to go right out of the box.'' The male then asked if the computer was difficult to set up, to which the female surgeon replied, ''It's not brain surgery.'' The spot ended with a shot of the patient's alarmed and surprised face and the tag line. The intent of the spot was to introduce IBM's line of Aptiva home computers in an engaging and humorous manner.

IBM's campaign attempted to cover a large number of IBM products and services in many foreign countries. A Hungarian organ grinder showed interest in an IBM ThinkPad laptop computer, and Tibetan monks discussed the advantages of Lotus Notes. Singers in South Africa discovered children's software, actresses in a Chinese opera house discussed the benefits of IBM's technical support for PC owners, and a water taxi driver in Bangkok told a businessman passenger about IBM's consulting services. Every spot showed how IBM affected individuals in varying professions and of varying ages spanning the globe and how IBM offered solutions for all of them.

OUTCOME

The ''Solutions for a Small Planet'' campaign lasted through 1998, although IBM supported various other advertising endeavors during the duration of the campaign. The other campaigns complemented the ''Solutions for a Small Planet'' ads, placing heavier emphasis on specific products and services rather than promoting only the IBM brand. ''Nuns'' and ''French Guys,'' both early spots, won Clio Awards for 1995, and ''Ships,'' developed by Ogilvy & Mather's Paris branch and televised during the 1998 Winter Olympic Games, won an award at the 1997 Cannes International Advertising Festival.

IBM had progressed considerably since its near death days of the early 1990s. According to U.S. News & World Report, IBM's record-setting 1997 revenues of $78.5 billion provided a clear indication that the company had been resurrected. Because of economic downturns in foreign markets, however, IBM saw profits fall in early 1998. Nonetheless, the declining revenues had been expected, and others in the computer industry were affected as well. IBM became a contender in an industry in which the company had been written off, but as IBM's chief financial officer, G. Richard Thoman, told the Wall Street Journal, ''We've done a lot, but we still have a lot to do.''

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. "IBM Launches 'Small Planet' Ads to Boost Image." USA Today, December 30, 1994.

———. "IBM's Subtle 'Solutions' Target Affluent Men." USA Today, May 22, 1995.

Garfield, Bob. "Spinal Tap Drops Torch in IBM Effort." Advertising Age, May 27, 1996.

"International Flavor: Advertisers Sprinkle in a Little Foreign Language." Newsday, January 29, 1995, p. E5.

Mariko Fujinaka

Isuzu Motors America, Inc.

13340 183rd Street
Cerritos, California 90702-6007
USA
Telephone: (800) 255-6727
Web site: www.isuzu.com

■■■

THE CALL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In an effort to diversify its vehicle lineup, Isuzu Motors America, Inc., designed a new sports utility vehicle (SUV), the Axiom, for model year 2001. At that point Isuzu sold only trucks and SUVs that offered a rugged, truck-like ride. This made the company vulnerable to fluctuations in the truck market in ways that other, more diverse automakers were not. Essentially, every Isuzu line featured vehicles designed to be driven off-road. The company designed the Axiom to offer a smoother ride, in the hopes of luring young suburban drivers. This presented a challenge for the company since the SUV field was a crowded one and Isuzu suffered from poor brand visibility.

Isuzu's low profile was a result in part of its failure to run a major television marketing campaign since 1999. In an attempt to raise its profile, in 2001 the company budgeted $15 million for advertising. It decided to return to TV and contracted San Francisco–based ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to produce a spot that brought back Isuzu's famed "pitchman" Joe Isuzu. Played by the actor David Leisure, Joe Isuzu had achieved widespread notoriety from 1986 to 1990, when he starred in a series of Isuzu commercials. The humor in the spots came from the over-the-top exaggerations Joe used to "sell" Isuzu vehicles, including claiming one Isuzu had a greater seating capacity than the Houston Astrodome. The new Joe Isuzu spot, "The Call," depicted a now-overweight Joe getting back into shape following a call from Isuzu asking him to come back to work.

Unfortunately the spot, which ran from spring through fall of 2001, did not jump-start Axiom sales. The vehicle missed a modest goal of 12,000 units sold, and Isuzu failed to attract the new consumers that it wanted. The spot met with a mixed reaction and did not enter the national consciousness on the same scale as the original Joe Isuzu spots. Some observers felt that the Axiom's poor sales may have been partially due to the company's decision to offer stronger customer incentives to other SUVs in the Isuzu fleet, the Rodeo and the Trooper. The spot did, however, boost Isuzu's overall brand recognition.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Isuzu Motors America, Inc., was the American subsidiary of the Tokyo-based company Isuzu Motors Ltd. Created in 1981, Isuzu Motors America was responsible for the marketing and distribution of Isuzu vehicles in the United States. In 1971 Isuzu Motors Ltd. began a close relationship with U.S. auto giant General Motors (GM). By 2001 GM had taken a 49 percent capital interest in the Japanese manufacturer. The two companies cooperated in the production of new technologies; for example, beginning in 1997 Isuzu took over most of GM's diesel development. A year later Isuzu assumed most of the responsibility for engineering GM's commercial-vehicle fleet.

The automaker specialized in making trucks. In fact, at the turn of the twenty-first century Isuzu did not sell a single car in North America. This lack of diversity led the company to be vulnerable to downturns in the truck-buying market. As Japan's economy went through a sustained rough patch in the 1990s, Isuzu took major sales hits in its home market. In the late 1980s Japanese drivers bought 190,000 trucks per year, but by 2002 that number had dropped to some 70,000 units. This led to a financial crunch at Isuzu. More pressing for Isuzu Motors America was the struggles at its one North American factory in the late 1990s and early 2000s. Subaru-Isuzu Automotive, Inc., was a joint venture of Isuzu and Fuji Heavy Industries, Ltd., which was responsible for the manufacturing of vehicles for Isuzu and for Fuji's Subaru subsidiary. Combined production at the plant topped out at about 216,000 units per year in 1998, before falling to a mere 186,317 units in 2001. Isuzu was looking to sell its share of the plant to Fuji, though the automaker did not want to abandon the lucrative U.S. market altogether. After the sale to Fuji was completed in 2002, Isuzu would have to rely on partners such as GM to supply more manufacturing aid in the United States. As part of the deal to take full control of the plant, Fuji agreed also to provide up to 30,000 units of the Rodeo and Axiom per year for sale in the North American market.

Isuzu decided that it needed to diversify its lineup. At the time the automaker was known primarily as a producer of durable, high-performance off-road vehicles. Though the company did not want to stray too far from its roots as a truck manufacturer, it felt that a sports utility vehicle (SUV) with some car-like features might give the brand more flexibility. The vehicle would be built on a platform similar to that of the Isuzu Rodeo. It would feature a lower ride height than most SUVs. The auto was primarily designed for street driving. This contrasted with the Rodeo, which was a rugged, off-road vehicle. While still rugged, the Axiom would offer a smoother ride than most trucks. Isuzu hoped that this would open up its brand to drivers who might not ever be inclined to drive off-road.

Isuzu's troubles were compounded by its lack of a strong presence on U.S. television. The company had not run a major TV campaign since 1999, which hurt its visibility among consumers. In the past the automaker had had notable success with the Joe Isuzu character. Joe Isuzu, played by the actor David Leisure, starred in a series of commercials for various Isuzu vehicles from 1986 to 1990. The character, who billed himself as a "company spokesman," was created by the ad agency Della Femina, Travisano, and Partners.

Joe was famous for his outrageous exaggerations (and outright lies) on behalf of Isuzu's vehicles. One spot for the Isuzu Trooper featured Joe promising that if he was lying, lightning would strike his mother. After Joe proceeded to tell the audience that the Trooper was big enough to carry an entire symphony orchestra, that was just what happened. Text often appeared on the screen, chiding Joe for his dishonesty (sometimes a caption would bluntly declare: "He's lying.") His most visible moment was in several well-received spots that aired during Super Bowl XXI in 1987, the most-watched sporting event of the year. The character Joe Isuzu quickly entered the nation's consciousness as an emblem of dishonesty, leading President Ronald Reagan to compare Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, whose Communist regime in Nicaragua was a Cold War adversary of the United States, to the TV pitchman.

TARGET MARKET

Isuzu hoped that by concentrating on drivability, it could lure middle-class SUV buyers. The Axiom's price, which ranged from $26,595 to the low $30,000s, would make the car accessible to the SUV-buying public. Isuzu wanted new drivers, people who might not be inclined to purchase its more rugged Rodeo or Trooper lines. Like many SUVs, the Axiom appealed to drivers in their 20s and 30s. Because the Axiom was largely unknown to this target group, Isuzu set a modest goal of selling 12,000 units for model year 2001.

It was believed that the cynical humor of Joe Isuzu would resonate particularly well with the younger buyers that the Axiom needed to attract. The Isuzu Axiom suffered most from a distinct lack of visibility with its target market, which was exacerbated by the company's absence from television advertising for several years. Because it was anticipated that Joe Isuzu's return would also attract free publicity in the media, the character offered a low-cost way to garner additional attention for the brand.

COMPETITION

Isuzu's main concern was positioning the Axiom against other rugged midsize SUVs. The company felt that the Toyota 4Runner and Ford Explorer were comparable vehicles. Toyota, as a Japan-based automaker with a high reputation for quality, was an especially important competitor. Isuzu also considered the Lexus RX 300 and the Volvo V70 Cross Country to be important models to watch. Though both were slightly more expensive than the Axiom, these luxury brands offered similar driving experiences, and many consumers saw them as comparable vehicles.

DAVID LEISURE: THE MAN BEHIND THE LIAR

Through both his original run in the late 1980s and his brief return in 2001, the character of Joe Isuzu in the Isuzu television commercials was played by David Leisure. The actor first made an impression on audiences with a small but memorable turn as an unnamed Hare Krishna in the 1980 hit comedy Airplane!, directed by Jim Abrahams and the Zucker brothers, David and Jerry. The peak of Leisure's visibility came in 1986, however, when he first played Joe Isuzu. From 1986 to 1990 the serial liar Joe was the company's pitchman. The Joe Isuzu commercials featured Joe making obviously inflated claims about various Isuzu products, once claiming that a new Isuzu had "more seats than the Astrodome." The character was so popular that in 1988 Burger King "borrowed" him for a joint promotion with Isuzu.

Leisure was able to use his newfound visibility to land a major role on NBC's sitcom Empty Nest. The show, which ran from 1988 to 1995, focused on recently widowed Dr. Harry Weston, played by Richard Mulligan. Leisure costarred as Charlie Dietz, Weston's womanizing neighbor. Leisure was a key source of comic relief on the show. After Empty Nest left the air, Leisure continued to work steadily on TV, making guest appearances on such shows as Touched by an Angel, Diagnosis Murder, General Hospital, and Sabrina, the Teenage Witch.

Other Asian automakers were making major gains in the early 2000s. Their combined market share in 2001 rose to approximately 19 percent, up from about 17 percent the year before. Isuzu had concerns about being overshadowed by these fellow Japanese imports, especially since several featured successful SUVs in their 2001 fleet. By running high-profile marketing campaigns, these competitors had attained much more visibility than Isuzu in recent years. Isuzu felt that it needed to reestablish its presence on TV and then quickly boost the Axiom's visibility.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Isuzu enlisted the agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to run the company's fist television-driven campaign of the decade. In order to connect quickly with its target audience, Isuzu centered its marketing drive on the best-known figure in the company's marketing history: Joe Isuzu. Goodby would be resurrecting a character created by another agency, Della Femina, Travisano, and Partners, which no longer did business with Isuzu. The key spot featured Joe Isuzu's return to the company following a 15-year "retirement." Isuzu also used other means to get the word out about its street-friendly new Axiom. One of the most prominent of these was a product placement in Spy Kids, a hit family film produced by the Walt Disney Company's Miramax subsidiary. In an unorthodox move Isuzu also cooperated on a remote-controlled toy Axiom that would be sold at RadioShack.

Goodby, Silverstein & Partners was a major advertising agency based in San Francisco. It had created a number of major campaigns, included "Got Milk?" for California Milk Processors. The agency was founded in 1983, and by 2001 it had become a part of the advertising and marketing conglomerate the Omnicom Group.

The return of Joe Isuzu relied on a single 30-second spot titled "The Call." It featured an overweight Joe Isuzu at home, railing against Isuzu's mediocre post-Joe commercials. Suddenly a call came through from Isuzu, calling Joe to work for the company again. To the strains of "The Eye of the Tiger," a hit 1983 song by Survivor that was featured prominently in the film Rocky III, Joe began to work out. Partly because of the sound track, the spot recalled the training montages of the popular "Rocky" film series, though it was not a direct homage. Over the course of 20 seconds the audience saw Joe slim down to his original weight, and the spot closed with him grinning before the camera, ready to resume pitching Isuzu vehicles.

The company decided to bring the character back as a shortcut, instead of launching the Axiom with a brand-new campaign that might need some time to register with consumers. Because of the original spots' popularity, Joe Isuzu was a cultural artifact. He would be instantly recognized by viewers, who would then be more likely to remember the new Axiom. The spot ran for a relatively limited time, beginning in the spring of 2001 and closing in October. It was also made available on the Internet through Isuzu's website.

OUTCOME

The response to the campaign was mixed. The advertisements helped Isuzu's brand recognition climb up to 25 percent across all models. The spot fared poorly in USA Today's Ad Track survey, with 21 percent of respondents rating the spot negatively, compared to a survey average of 13 percent. The spots were particularly unpopular with older consumers; 36 percent of respondents over the age of 50 gave the commercial an unfavorable rating.

The negative reactions of mature viewers did not bother the company, however, because "The Call" was intended for younger consumers, and they had a higher opinion of the spot. On the bright side, 48 percent of consumers told Ad Track that they considered the spot effective.

Sales for the Axiom, however, were deeply disappointing. By August 2001 only about 2,700 units had been sold, and the company was not able to make up the difference by the end of the year. This was blamed on a number of factors. Many observers said that Isuzu did a poor job of targeting sales incentives at Axiom buyers. In fact, by concentrating its incentives for the year on its other SUVs, the Rodeo and the Trooper, Isuzu might have undercut the Axiom's sales. Also, the units' base price of $26,595 might have been too high for a newcomer to the crowded SUV field. The Axiom did not put up the kind of numbers Isuzu wanted and did not help the company reverse its poor fortunes. It was eventually discontinued in 2004. Isuzu also parted ways with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners in 2002.

FURTHER READING

Belson, Ken. "G.M. Moves to Increase Control of Some Isuzu Units." New York Times, August 15, 2002.

Graham, Laurie. On the Line at Subaru-Isuzu: The Japanese Model and the American Worker. Ithaca, NY: ILR Press, 1995.

Halliday, Jean. "'Slow, Painful Death': Troubled Isuzu Cuts Production, Spending." Advertising Age, September 23, 2002.

Kohn, Joe. "Lost in SUV Crowd, Axiom Sales Disappoint Isuzu." AutoWeek, October 3, 2001.

Krebs, Michael. "Joe Isuzu Is Back, and He Has a New Sport Utility to Sell." New York Times, July 1, 2001.

May, Jeff. "Carmaker Jump-Starts Joe Isuzu Ad." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, March 9, 2001.

McCarthy, Michael. "Marketers Bring Back Vintage Ad Icons." USA Today, August 7, 2001.

Tanikawa, Miki. "Isuzu Motors Moves to Cut Losses." New York Times, May 30, 2001.

Yamaguchi, Yuzo. "Isuzu Will Sell Stake in U.S. Plant; Sagging Sales of Sport-Utilities Blamed." AutoWeek, October 29, 2002.

Yamaguchi, Yuzo, and Lindsay Chappell. "Flagging Sales Forcing Isuzu to Reconsider Its Venture in U.S." AutoWeek, October 18, 2002.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

J.C. Penney Company, Inc.

6501 Legacy Drive
Plano, Texas 75024
USA
Telephone: (972) 431-1000
Web site: www.jcpenney.net

■■■

IT'S ALL INSIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

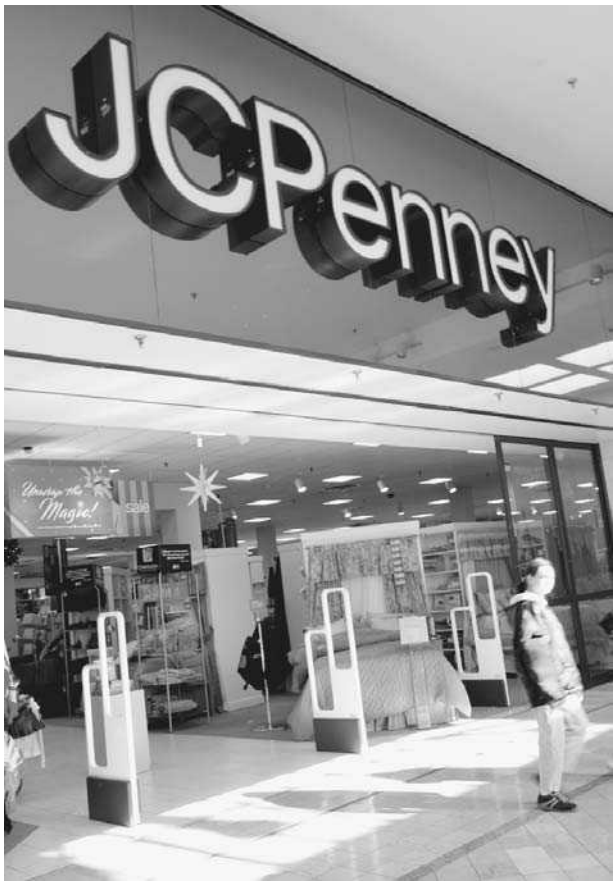
The J.C. Penney Company, Inc., had been a fixture in the retail world for nearly 100 years when sales started to drop in the late 1990s. The Plano, Texas, company realized that Americans had lost interest in J.C. Penney and developed a five-year strategy to bring it back from the brink of financial failure. In 2000 Chicago-based advertising giant DDB was engaged to replace Dallas-based Temerlin McClain, which had been J.C. Penney's agency since 1991. DDB had launched the "It's All Inside" campaign by the fall of 2000, setting the stage to rebrand the company inside and out.

The $200 million advertising effort reached all levels of media, from television to print, and also included using in-store signage and updating the look of the company's catalog, stores, and online shopping site. "Fresh and contemporary" was how Bob Scarpelli, DDB's chief creative officer, described the new J.C. Penney look in a September 2000 article of Adweek (southwest edition). Television spots debuted that same month and were carefully crafted to prompt core female consumers—who had either deserted the chain or ignored it altogether—to rethink their perceptions of the merchandise as well as of themselves. One commercial that typified this mission depicted an attractive everywoman whose clothing and personal style changed to reflect her moods as she went about her day. The song "Never the Same Girl Twice," by the band Supreme Beings of Leisure, underscored the sentiment of a J.C. Penney that had something for everyone.

J.C. Penney's debt had decreased by 50 percent at the end of 2004, keeping one of the nation's oldest retailers alive and kicking. The new logo, a red square with a crisply written "JCPenney," was the cornerstone of a new image for Penney's, and although ad slogans evolved, the tagline "It's all inside" remained integral to the logo (it was placed directly adjacent to the red square) throughout the five-year restructuring period. Under the new leadership of retail veteran Allen Questrom, J.C. Penney consolidated its product buying, redesigned stores, and began repositioning itself in the national mindset. Sales growth over the next five years met or exceeded the company's goal of 2 percent each year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

James Cash Penney opened his first store in Kemmerer, Wyoming, in 1902. He named it the Golden Rule to signify that he had set out to make value and fair dealing the hallmark of his retail business. At the time, many merchants operated under the motto "caveat emptor," meaning let the buyer beware. Penney's service-oriented philosophy was a welcome change for customers, and his business flourished. The company's first of many private brands, Big Mac, hit the shelves in 1922 (by which time the name Golden Rule had been replaced with "J.C. Penney



JC Penney store located in the Garden State Plaza Mall, Paramus, New Jersey. © NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

Company''). Private brands became a mainstay of Penney's merchandise success. The J.C. Penney catalog debuted in 1963, and the company continued to grow. It struggled through the 1980s and even more so in the 1990s, but that did not stop it from opening a new 1.9 million square-foot headquarters in Plano, Texas, in 1992.

From its inception J.C. Penney had relied on word of mouth and traditional advertising for its local stores. In 1948 the company made its first foray into movie tie-in promotion when stores gave away patterns based on the popular Oscar-winning song ''Buttons and Bows'' from the Bob Hope film The Paleface. The year 1953 saw an even more unusual tie-in. J.C. Penney dressed more than 50 mannequins exposed to an atomic-bomb test at Yucca Flat, Nevada. The clothes were then displayed at stores across the country to prove that J.C. Penney clothes offered the best protection in an atomic blast. The first time that the company participated in national advertising was in 1956, when it ran a series of ads in the hugely popular Life magazine. In 1969 it hired its first advertising agency, LaRoche, McCaffrey, and McCall. Through the end of the century J.C. Penney continued to use notably conservative advertising to promote its brands and services. By 1991 sales of $16.2 billion reflected a drop in revenue for the company.

The 1990s were not kind to the national retailer. Its bonds were reduced to junk status, and the store's merchandise proved unappealing to the buying public. ''We found [that] a lot of our problems were self-inflicted,'' said Michael Boylson, Penney's chief marketing officer, in an April 2004 issue of Advertising Age. The company's advertising during this period was created by Dallas agency Temerlin McClain. Consumers were moved neither by the company's slogan, ''The look. Look who. J.C. Penney,'' nor by TV commercials that tried too hard to be hip. In early 2000 J.C. Penney severed ties with Temerlin McClain in favor of a more cohesive marketing program from global mega-agency DDB of Chicago. Retail-turnaround expert Allen Questrom, credited with the recent rebound of Federated Department Stores, Inc., came on board as chairman and CEO of J.C. Penney in September 2000. His mission—to centralize buying, redesign product, and get the message out to the consumer—affected the nearly 1,100 department stores that the company operated. By its 100-year anniversary in 2002 J.C. Penney's recovery was underway, thanks to the combination of advertising and product overhaul that typified the ''It's All Inside'' campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Through a century of doing business J.C. Penney remained focused on serving the needs of the consumer's whole family. In the June 2002 issue of Retail Merchandiser Questrom reaffirmed this description of the company's core market as ''mainstream American families,'' a group earning somewhere between $30,000 and $80,000 a year and seeking value. Still, as a new millennium began, it became clear that the J.C. Penney consumer was overwhelmingly female; women accounted for 80 percent of sales, and they were buying for not only themselves but also for their families.

Prior to the ''It's All Inside'' campaign the Penney's marketing team worked to identify its target and settled on two categories of customer. The ''Starting Outs'' were young people between 18 and 35 who were beginning careers and families. ''Modern Spenders'' were consumers 35 to 54 with two incomes and more discretionary dollars at their disposal. Within these two groups women were still believed to be the primary buyers, and Penney's recognized that their attitudes were changing. Traditionally large department stores such as J.C. Penney

J.C. PENNEY LOOKS TO HISPANICS FOR SALES BOOST

By the time that J.C. Penney approached the end of its five-year recovery plan, American working families—historically the bedrock of Penney's sales—had found the retailer again. In 2004 J.C. Penney turned a significant portion of its marketing attention to a new and growing segment of the population: Hispanics. A price-conscious and family-centered demographic, Hispanics were a natural focus for Penney's. That year the company dedicated $15 million in advertising dollars to wooing Hispanic consumers, a group that encompassed a wide variety of nationalities. Omnicom's Dieste Harmel & Partners in Dallas was hired to coordinate merchandise, store signage, promotions, and TV spots that would make the cultural connections necessary to win over what had become the country's largest minority group.

had been in a position to set the trends for consumers who had scant retail choices. The explosion of retail variety in the late twentieth century gave women more freedom to reject J.C. Penney lines whose style had not kept up with the times. The "It's All Inside" tag was meant to draw women's attention to the fact that Penney's merchandise was catching up to the needs of a variety-oriented customer. Not only did Penney's change its logo, but also it revamped buying practices and reconfigured its distribution at the same time in order to allow quicker response to market demand.

COMPETITION

J.C. Penney's historical rival was Sears. Founded in 1886, Sears predated J.C. Penney in the catalog market by several decades and also had a formidable private-brand business. In the 1980s J.C. Penney faced even stiffer competition from young upstarts that took its philosophy of value-for-less and ran with it. Target came on the scene in 1962 as the discount-merchandising face of department-store giant the Dayton Company. Target's slick marketing and appealing, trendy merchandise outhipped everyone in the field, and by year 2000 the company had 1,300 stores in 47 states and was doing billions of dollars in business. Kohl's was a much more blatant copy of the J.C. Penney model but managed to do better at providing an enjoyable value-shopping experience. The conservative-looking Kohl's stores were easy to navigate, and the company's fashion lines were quality approximations of the latest styles. By 1999 Kohl's had recorded its fourth consecutive year of growth exceeding 30 percent, while J.C. Penney struggled to stay afloat.

Customers were losing interest in Penney's formerly strong brands, such as St. John's Bay and Arizona Jean Company. Sales were suffering in the wake of Target's success in commissioning designers to create exclusive Target lines, such as Liz Lange maternity and Michael Graves housewares. J.C. Penney had tried a similar strategy in the 1980s with lines from Mary McFadden and Halston, but these particular designer labels, along with a less-attractive shopping space, did not hit the right note with consumers. Also stealing some of J.C. Penney's pie was the Wal-Mart chain of superstores. A frequent destination for low-cost home items but not necessarily apparel, Wal-Mart began offering more up-to-date fashion in the 1990s. That company's founder, Sam Walton, had been a Penney's employee in 1940 and had used many of the J.C. Penney principles in the founding of his own business.

MARKETING STRATEGY

A five-year recovery plan that began in 2000 was implemented with the goal of making J.C. Penney the "driveway decision" for consumers, meaning that it would be their first destination on shopping excursions for apparel and housewares. The company's new agency, DDB of Chicago, was allotted $200 million for TV spots and radio, print, direct mail, and in-store efforts. DDB came up with a winning slogan, "It's All Inside." The tagline was intended to communicate that there was a fresh change in the brands and decor at J.C. Penney stores while also addressing the consumers' state of mind. J.C. Penney and DDB wanted customers to reevaluate how they felt about the store and themselves.

Three television spots specifically geared toward that huge buying group of women debuted during the Emmy Awards telecast in September 2000, with additional runs on popular sitcoms and the hit prime-time game show Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. One spot depicted a couple excitedly preparing for the arrival of an adopted daughter. Another commercial took a playful tone, showing a woman using a pile of shoes to play fetch with her dog. Finally, in the spot that best embodied Penney's new appreciation for its female customer, a woman was depicted whose outfits transformed throughout the day to match her change in mood. The music behind each spot was provided by stylish electronic-pop band Supreme Beings of Leisure. The commercials conveyed a feeling of being up-to-date without looking overly trendy. In a September 2000 Brandweek article, DDB's Scarpelli said that the agency's goal for J.C. Penney was "to make people think about [the company] in a new way." He continued, "Our whole strategic insight was self-expression."

In that same 2000 issue of Brandweek, Stephen Farley, then chief marketing officer for J.C. Penney, reflected on his expectations of the new agency: "In the past, we had to manage five or six different resources. Now, we're asking DDB to manage those resources for us in a full integration effort." Making the J.C. Penney brand more prominent as well as more universally appealing was key to DDB's mission. To this end the Penney's online shopping site was revamped at this time. The new logo, a bright red box surrounding "JCPenney" with the directly adjacent tagline "it's all inside," anchored the corner of every Web page. The color scheme of red, white, and gray may have taken a page from Target's red bull's-eye logo, but J.C. Penney managed successfully to present its own clean, contemporary Web destination reflecting the company's revitalized personality. DDB left no stone unturned, enlisting its sister agencies for specific tasks: Optimum for media planning, Omnicom's OMD for media buying, Rapp Collins for direct-marketing duties, and Spike DDB for ethnic and urban marketing. The new, more sophisticated look of J.C. Penney was consistent through all the company's public appearances, creating an approachable, inviting image, whether a potential customer was leafing through the mail-order catalog or looking at a newspaper insert.

OUTCOME

In its five-year turnaround plan the J.C. Penney Company had set the goal of achieving a 2 percent increase per year from 2000 to 2005. Retail Merchandiser reported that J.C. Penney had surpassed that goal, with a sales increase of 3.3 percent in 2001, a year that saw the company's store and catalog sales reach a desirable $18 billion. The sluggish economy throughout the period actually highlighted Penney's strengths. With household incomes remaining low, consumers were willing to give the revamped J.C. Penney another shot at their dollars. Although the "It's All Inside" campaign was not a favorite with ad-industry reviewers, it did resonate with the most important audience: consumers. By 2004 the company's daunting debt was cut in half, and the first quarter was a strong start, promising to keep J.C. Penney growing steadily into the fifth year of its comeback plan.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron, and J. Dee Hill. "DDB Gets Fresh for Penney." Adweek, September 11, 2000, p. 5.

Cardona, Mercedes. "'One-Trick Pony' No More: Penney's Markets Way to Turnaround." Advertising Age, April 26, 2004.

Curry, Mary Elizabeth. Creating an American Institution: The Merchandising Genius of J.C. Penney. New York: Taylor & Francis, 1993.

Dolbow, Sandra, Aaron Baar, and J. Dee Hill. "Penney's 'Inside' Pitch, via DDB, Seeks Relevance with Core Target." Brandweek, September 11, 2000, p. 6.

Halkias, Maria. "Top Advertising, Marketing Executive Resigns from J.C. Penney." Dallas Morning News, November 21, 2000.

Hill, J. Dee, and Aaron Baar. "Penney Takes an 'Inside' Track." Adweek (southwest ed.), September 11, 2000, p. 4.

Lazare, Lewis. "JCPenney Ads Lack Broad Creative Theme." Chicago Sun-Times, February 25, 2004, p. 84.

"Special Report: Power Players." Advertising Age, October 4, 2004, p. 12.

Stankevich, Debby Garbato. "Penney Turns on a Dime." Retail Merchandiser, June 1, 2002, p. 55.

Thau, Barbara. "Penney Seeks Happy Medium between Online, Catalog Sales." HFN, December 18, 2000, p. 6.

Wells, Devona. "Former J.C. Penney CEO to Speak at Bakersfield, Calif., Business Conference." Bakersfield Californian, October 13, 2000.

Williamson, Richard. "JC Penney Dresses Up for Oscars." Adweek, February 17, 2005.

Simone Samano

Jack in the Box, Inc.

9330 Balboa Avenue
San Diego, California 92313-1516
USA
Telephone: (858) 571-2121
Fax: (858) 571-2121
Web site: www.jackinthebox.com

■■■

JACK'S BACK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s Jack, the clown spokesman for Jack in the Box restaurants, was at the center of a comeback for the fast-food chain. Jack in the Box had used a clown as its mascot until 1980. In that year a commercial showed the clown being blown up as a means of signifying the chain's move into fare with an adult appeal. The chain was hard hit in 1993 when an outbreak of E. coli bacteria in its Seattle restaurants led to the hospitalization of hundreds of customers and the deaths of four who had eaten tainted burgers sold by the restaurants. For the company the challenge in the mid-1990s became to rebuild its brand and win back customers.

In 1994, with a campaign orchestrated by the Venice, California, office of TBWA\Chiat\Day, Jack made his return. Thereafter, Jack in the Box advertising was built around the theme "Jack's Back." Production for the campaign was almost entirely TV-based. Spending figures were not disclosed. Most prominent among the Jack TV spots in 1998 was the award-winning "The Visit." It was a parody of the TV show Cops and showed Jack beating on a door, demanding to see a Brad Haley. Jack then confronted Haley, a smart-aleck kid who had bad-mouthed the chain's food. When Haley tried to flee, Jack chased him down and forced him to eat a burger, which Haley admitted was "tasty." "You're not just saying that because I'm kneeling on your spine?" Jack asked. The humor of the commercial was further compounded by the fact that Jack in the Box's vice president of marketing communications, one of the people most responsible for the "Jack's Back" campaign, was named Brad Haley.

The campaign's success was undeniable. The "Visit" spot won numerous awards, including a Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes. After Dick Sittig, creator of the Jack campaign, resigned from TBWA\Chiat\Day, Jack in the Box moved its account to Sittig's new agency, which had the unlikely name of Kowloon Wholesale Seafood Company. Sittig's agency continued to create new television spots using the "Jack's Back" theme. The ongoing campaign won a Bronze EFFIE in 2003 and a Silver EFFIE in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1941 Robert Peterson founded Topsy's Drive-In in San Diego, California. He later renamed it Oscar's, and by 1950, when he changed the name to Jack in the Box, the company had four restaurants. It was among the first drive-in restaurants in America, and the appeal of Jack in the Box was heightened by its mascot, a clown whose head appeared on the restaurant's distinctive logo and signage.

The company became Foodmaker, Inc., during the 1960s, but the restaurants remained under the Jack in the Box name, and by 1968, when Peterson sold Foodmaker to Ralston Purina, it had some 300 restaurants. In 1969

Jack in the Box became the nation's first fast-food restaurant to serve breakfast, and within a decade it had more than 1,000 locations around the United States. In 1979, however, it decided to scale back its operations, selling 232 facilities in the East and Midwest and focusing its business on the West Coast and in the southwestern United States.

Ownership of Foodmaker fell into the hands of management after a leveraged buyout in 1987, and the company began to franchise many of its formerly company-owned stores. Foodmaker hit on hard times in 1993, an event painfully remembered five years later by CEO Robert Nugent, then chief operating officer. "Sunday morning, January 17, 1993," he told Jennifer Waters of Restaurants & Institutions, "I got a call from our head marketing guy. He said, 'We have a problem in Seattle. It's food poisoning.'"

The cause was the E. coli bacteria, which had tainted ground beef, causing hundreds of people to be hospitalized and killing four others—including a nine-year-old boy. Nugent, the father of two daughters, remembered this as "one of the most devastating things I've ever experienced." But Foodmaker responded in an exemplary fashion. It halted all hamburger sales in its more than 1,100 U.S. restaurants and removed the meat from all its facilities. Facing huge lawsuits, company executives met regularly in prayer groups, and Foodmaker developed a food inspection program later cited by the Food & Drug Administration (FDA) as a model to the industry. Foodmaker weathered the storm, including the lawsuits and huge losses, and by the late 1990s had reemerged stronger than ever.

TARGET MARKET

In a bid to draw in more adults, Foodmaker in 1980 had gotten rid of its Jack logo, the trademark clown; in fact, a television spot actually showed Jack being blown up. The end of the logo was meant to symbolize a shift in direction, with a greater appeal to adults rather than children. This was accompanied by a change in the menu. By 1994, however, Foodmaker had decided it was time to bring Jack back, so in the first of a new wave of commercials, Jack announced his return—"thanks to the miracle of plastic surgery."

"If that sounds like serious business," wrote Linda Mae Carlstone of Franchise Times in February 1997, "be aware that the new Jack is seven feet tall—part clown, part man—with a giant spherical head, a permanent painted smile, and a pointed yellow hat. Let's also point out [that] he blows up the boardroom in the lead ad." Brad Haley, vice president of marketing communications for Jack in the Box, told Carlstone that "Jack was carefully planned." As Carlstone noted, "Company research showed the biggest fast-food hamburger consumer is the 18-to-34-year-old male, so the humor is targeted to this group that is," in Haley's words, "jaded about advertising in general, mistrustful, and typically [without] a character to relate to." Carlstone went on to note that "Jack is liked by older adults and kids. His likeness appears in kids' meals and toy promotions." Said Haley, "I'd like to say the broad appeal was part of our thinking, but it was a pleasant surprise."

Garcia of the Los Angeles Times specifically linked the appeal of Jack to Generation X: "The secret behind Jack lies in his disarming personality," she wrote. "Gen-Xers distasteful of advertising view him as a parody of hyped celebrity pitchmen—and like him because of it." She also noted that he was "a hit with males in their late teens up to their 30s—voracious consumers of cheeseburgers, shakes, and fries."

WEBISODES

In Nation's Restaurant News Gregg Cebrzynski described the following vignette, which might have seemed at first sight like something from a Jack in the Box TV commercial: "Jack is driving along the freeway, the top down on the car. Suddenly, thunder is heard. Lightning flashes in the sky. Jack never loses the grin on his face. He reaches next to him on the seat and grabs a Jumbo Jack sandwich. Rain starts to pour down. It's pouring so hard that Noah's Ark can be seen in the distance. But it's not raining in Jack's car. It's illuminated by its own little sunshine because Jack is having so gosh darn much fun eating a Jumbo Jack that even a storm can't darken his day."

In fact, this was not a television commercial, but a potential part of a new phenomenon called "webisodes," a term coined by Johann Liedgren of Seattle's Honkworm. The latter, along with Rocket Pictures, also of Seattle, had teamed up to produce animated commercials on the Internet, spots that would feature longer, more involved stories than would be possible on television. In the future, Cebrzynski suggested, visitors to the Jack in the Box website might be able to access such webisodes. According to Cebrzynski, Liedgren and his partner, Dan Pepper of Rocket Pictures, "have not signed up any restaurants as clients yet, but they believe Jack in the Box, Taco Bell, and McDonald's, because of their strong brand images, would be perfect candidates."

COMPETITION

Another powerful California-based fast-food chain, Carl's Jr., made its own appeal to the young in 1998 with what Robert Wisely, president of parent company CKE Restaurants, called "the big messy, drippy advertising campaign." Dennis Pollock of the Fresno Bee described one of the chain's most controversial spots: "The burger drips and the couple strips down inside a coin-operated laundry. In a television commercial that has brought howls of protest in the [San Fernando] Valley and elsewhere, her melting ice cream bar prompts her to disrobe while he strips down to his paper bag from Carl's Jr."

Although Jordin Mendelsohn, managing partner of the agency that created the spot, told Pollock, "I can sell a lot of hamburgers," many viewers found such advertising a turnoff. In another spot a young man "slobbers," in Pollock's words, over a double-bacon cheeseburger from Carl's Jr. before a blonde in a Porsche caused him to toss the burger on the ground and jump in with her. A voice-over announced, "If you ever find anything hotter and juicier than a Carl's Jr. Double Western, go for it." Wisely dismissed detractors as people "from the Central Valley, which seems to have more Midwestern values. The [complaint] calls have come from grandparents and mothers with young children who see it as an affront to their lifestyle."

By 1999 Carl's Jr. had acquired North Carolina–based Hardee's, which had been the nation's fourth-largest burger chain after McDonald's, Burger King, and Wendy's. This put the California chain into a southern market where West Coast advertising styles were not likely to be as popular; meanwhile, Foodmaker made its own push into the southeast with Jack in the Box. As for Jack, many observers saw him as one of the most effective weapons in Foodmaker's arsenal, which would give the company an edge over even McDonald's Ronald McDonald or Wendy's popular Dave Thomas. Foodmaker poked fun at one competitor's symbol in a spot where Jack appeared at the gate of a mansion and said, "Let me speak to the Colonel, founder-to-founder." The spot promoted the company's new chicken sandwich, competition for Kentucky Fried Chicken.

MARKETING STRATEGY

From the time of the 1994 reintroduction of Jack, Foodmaker worked with TBWA\Chiat\Day. In 1996, however, the new Jack's creator, Sittig, left TBWA\Chiat\Day to form his own agency in Santa Barbara. Foodmaker moved the account in March 1997 to follow Sittig, and @radicaL.media handled production for television commercials.

Television spots for Jack in the Box during 1998 were seemingly endless, and indeed the campaign consisted of perhaps two dozen different commercials. These developed the story line of Jack's existence, along with his personality as a witty, sardonic iconoclast. Central to this advertising was the idea that Jack was the true CEO of Jack in the Box, a concept he reinforced with phrases such as "Since I regained control of the company"—a reference to his return from suspended animation four years earlier.

In January 1999 Eric Celeste of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reviewed some of his favorite Jack commercials. In a spot called "Spicy Crispy Chicks," for instance, Foodmaker seemed to lampoon efforts by competitor Carl's Jr. to use sex as a means of selling hamburgers. An underling showed Jack an intended commercial showing the scantily clad "Spicy Crispy Chicks Dancers" cavorting to music. Disgusted, Jack told the lackey, "You are so fired." Thus Foodmaker managed to simultaneously use sex and make fun of the concept. Celeste described another spot, titled "Focus Group": "Jack and his corporate suits are conducting a focus group composed of meat-lovers, asking them what they think of the company's new Ultimate Cheeseburger, which contains only meat and cheese. The men complain about the use of a bun. 'Lose that bun,' says one, 'and you got somethin'.' Jack storms in and screams that their suggestion is ridiculous because 'your hands would be covered with MEAT and CHEESE!'" At the end, however, he sighed and said of the "no-bun theory," "All right, we'll look into that."

Based on the campaign's continued success, new spots were created that targeted a broader audience and featured Jack poking fun at the chain's fast-food competitors. In 2000, working with a measured-media budget of $61.6 million, Jack in the Box released television commercials that included several aimed at the Hispanic market. One Spanish-language spot featured Jack talking to a tarot-card reader at a carnival; another spot, released in time for the holidays, spoofed 1970s dating-game shows. One spot that aired in 2002 was aimed at the burger chain's competitor, the Subway sandwich chain, and its famous weight-loss spokesman Jared. The spot, titled "Jared," showed Jack walking onto a train platform to introduce the restaurant's Ultimate Cheeseburger to people. Jack approached a 20-something man named Jared and asked him where he was from. Jared, reluctant to talk to a man with a giant Ping-Pong ball for a head, responded, "The subway."

In 2003 the campaign was modified to expand its target market beyond burger-hungry 18- to 34-year-old men to include women and older adults. Described as a "brand reinvention" by the San Diego Business Journal, the effort included spots featuring Jack in situations that promoted the chain's upgraded food and the restaurants' move from fast food into the trendier "fast-casual dining" category. A spot released in 2004 and titled "No French" showed Jack being interviewed by a French newscaster, who asked why Jack was calling French fries "natural-cut fries." Jack cracked under the pressure of the newscaster's "You have a problem with the French" attitude and responded with an undiplomatic "Eh."

The introduction of Jack car-antenna attachments led to the creation of sidekicks for Jack, little Ping-Pong heads who began developing a story line of their own in some commercials. During the summer, with Congressional campaigns afoot, Jack ran a political campaign in which he demonized his opponent as "a milkshake-hating extremist." Denise Gellene of the Los Angeles Times called this spot "a sendup of political advertising" that managed, in just 30 seconds, to make fun of "every cliché of political advertising." But perhaps the biggest news of Jack's ersatz political campaign was the fact that he had a wife—a normal-looking woman, without the Ping-Pong head.

OUTCOME

"The Visit," the spot in which Jack confronted Haley, won a Belding Award from the Advertising Club of Los Angeles in April 1998, as well as a Gold Lion at the 45th International Advertising Festival in June. In October "The Visit" won still more awards at the Excellence in Advertising for Television and Excellence in Advertising for Radio Awards. In December Gellene chose Jack's political campaign as one of her top three ads of the year.

While Jack gathered awards and kudos, his company prepared for a push into the southeastern United States. According to Louise Kramer, writing in Advertising Age in February 1999, "The move east will be backed by TV commercials from Jack in the Box agency Kowloon Wholesale Seafood Co. . . . They will introduce the concept to consumers, and use the same theme as the long-running campaign featuring the Jack character."

In May 1999 Warren Berger of Advertising Age celebrated Jack, along with "Got Milk" and a few others, as examples of campaigns whose impact had not faded. According to Berger, "Haley says research has shown that consumers can't wait to see what Jack's going to do next. And unlike more human founders of other burger chains, Sittig believes this character can go on indefinitely as spokesperson—because 'this is one company founder who doesn't age.'"

As the campaign's run continued, the awards also continued to pile up. In 2002 the "Jared" commercial was named one of Adweek magazine's Best Spots. The campaign earned a Bronze EFFIE Award for Sustained Success in 2003, and in 2004 Adweek again honored one of the campaign's spots, "No French," as one of the publication's Best Spots. Another EFFIE for Sustained Success, this time a Silver, was awarded in 2005.

FURTHER READING

Bell, Diane. "Jack's Wife Is Normal: No Fat Head." San Diego Union-Tribune, July 28, 1998, p. B-1.

Berger, Warren. "Jack in the Box: Explosive Staying Power." Advertising Age's Creativity, May 1, 1999, p. 30.

Carlstone, Linda Mae. "Clown Returns Home to Help Jack Up Sales." Franchise Times, February 1, 1997, p. 20.

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "Marketing & Media." Nation's Restaurant News, July 13, 1998, p. 18.

Celeste, Eric. "We Do Know (and Love) Jack: Edgy Jack in the Box Commercials Funnier than Most TV Fare." Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram, January 12, 1999, p. 1.

Garcia, Shelly Nina. "Clowning Glory: Never Mind His Looks, Icon's Personality Gives Fast-Food Chain the Last Laugh." Los Angeles Times, October 9, 1997, p. D-4.

Gellene, Denise. "Campaign Spoof Wins for Pitch with Appeal." Los Angeles Times, July 30, 1998, p. D-6.

"Jack Pez to Do Battle against Taco Bell Chihuahua: It's Dog vs. Pez in World of Fast Food." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register March 24, 1999.

Kramer, Louise. "Jack to Burst Out of Its West Coast Box: Fast-Food Chain Eyes 500 Sites in Southeast." Advertising Age, February 1, 1999, p. 3.

Lansner, Jonathan. "Can You Top This? In the Fast-Food War for Your Belly and Your Buck, Tackiness Is King." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, July 8, 1998, p. C-1.

Lewis, Connie. "A Test in Taste: Jack in the Box Offers New Fare, but Quality May Still Be Job No. 1." San Diego Business Journal, October 13, 2003.

MacArthur, Kate. "Jack's Fighting at Fifty; Jack in the Box Struggles with Image and Rivals." Advertising Age, February 19, 2001.

Pollock, Dennis. "Sex, Burgers and Outrage: Carl's Jr.'s 'Big Messy, Drippy Advertising Campaign' Proves Profitable, but Complaints Are Piling Up." Fresno Bee, October 2, 1998, p. C-1.

Waters, Jennifer. "Back in the Black." Restaurants & Institutions, July 1, 1998.

Judson Knight
Rayna Bailey

Jenny Craig, Inc.

5770 Fleet Street
Carlsbad, California 92008
USA
Telephone: (760) 696-4000
Fax: (760) 696-4009
Web site: www.jennycraig.com

■■■

KIRSTIE ALLEY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With 64 percent of American adults considered overweight or obese in 2004, weight loss was big business in the United States. An estimated 44 percent of women and 29 percent of men were trying to lose weight in 2004, and they were spending about $44 billion on diet programs. That amount was expected to increase steadily to nearly $48 billion by 2006. As the number of overweight people looking for a magic bullet for weight loss grew, so did fad programs promising to make the task of dieting easier. Diet crazes such as the Atkins low-carbohydrate diet plan began winning consumers away from traditional programs, such as Jenny Craig, that took a conservative approach to dieting. By 2004 the number of people signing on with Jenny Craig weight-management centers was stagnating.

To win back customers, in 2004 Jenny Craig made two changes: it added to its roster a new diet program that offered clients more flexibility than its original plans, and it signed on J. Walter Thompson New York as its advertising agency, replacing its former agency, Johnson/Ukropina of Irvine, California. The first task for J. Walter Thompson was to create an advertising campaign supporting Jenny Craig's new diet program, Jenny YourStyle. Although the campaign began in September 2004, it was replaced just months later, in January 2005, with a new set of advertisements that featured actress/comedian Kirstie Alley as its celebrity spokeswoman. No budget for the new campaign was available, but according to a report in the New York Times, the preceding campaign, "Jenny YourStyle," cost $30 million.

The "Kirstie Alley" campaign was an immediate hit with consumers. American dieters drawn to Alley's humorous approach to her own weight problem and dieting efforts rushed in droves to Jenny Craig Centres to sign up. Following an appearance by Alley on The Oprah Winfrey Show, calls to Jenny Craig centers increased 81 percent. Based on its success a series of new television spots were added to the "Kirstie Alley" campaign and began airing in December 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Before Jenny Craig became an international weight-management company, she was a 50-year-old woman with a supportive husband, Sid Craig, and a dream. She wanted to help people improve their lives through balanced nutrition, physical activity, and lifestyle. In 1982 Jenny Craig opened her first eponymous weight-loss center in Melbourne, Australia. The Craigs established additional centers in New Zealand, and in 1985 the company expanded into the United States with 12 centers in Los Angeles. By 2004 there were more than 650 company-owned and franchised Jenny Craig Weight Loss

Actress Kirstie Alley. © JIM RUYMEN/REUTERS/CORBIS.

Centres in Australia, New Zealand, Canada, Guam, Puerto Rico, and the United States. The company steadily increased memberships at Jenny Craig Weight Loss Centres by using marketing methods that relied on customer testimonials similar to those promoting other weight-loss programs. Included were commercials featuring ordinary consumers sharing their personal weight-loss success stories.

As the number of overweight and obese people increased, so too did the number of weight-loss companies and programs vying for their share of the diet industry, which had climbed to an estimated $44.6 billion in 2004. Low-carbohydrate fad diets such as Atkins and South Beach, which promised weight loss by only eating foods low in carbs, began winning away dieters from traditional programs like Jenny Craig. In 2004 Jenny Craig responded to the new diet plans with the introduction of Jenny YourStyle, a more flexible plan that allowed participants to continue many of their dietary habits while still losing weight. Wanting a fresh approach to its advertising to support its new weight-loss program, Jenny Craig also began looking for an advertising agency to replace Johnson/Ukropina of Irvine, California.

Agencies competing for the business included Interpublic Group of Companies, based in New York; Newport Beach, California–based independent agency Heil-Brice; and Bartle Bogle Hegarty, which withdrew from the competition prior to the final round. J. Walter Thompson New York (JWT) eventually won the account. To prepare for the competition and become familiar with the client, executives at JWT went on a Jenny Craig diet, and in addition to winning the account, they lost a total of 50 pounds. JWT's first creative effort for Jenny Craig was a $30 million campaign that was released in September 2004 and helped introduce the new Jenny YourStyle program. It also was designed to reintroduce Jenny Craig as the diet center of choice for consumers looking for sustainable weight loss. In December 2004 JWT prepared to begin a campaign featuring celebrity spokeswoman Kirstie Alley, who signed on to promote Jenny Craig after going on the Jenny YourStyle weight-loss program. The first television spot starring Alley aired in January 2005.

TARGET MARKET

According to U.S. News & World Report, 64 percent of Americans were overweight or obese in 2004. Further, at that time 44 percent of women and 29 percent of men said that they were trying to lose weight. In 2005 nearly an equal number of men and women said that they were actively trying to lose weight: 30 percent and 31 percent, respectively. Reaching the men and women already on a diet program as well as those considering starting a program was the goal of J. Walter Thompson's 2005 "Kirstie Alley" campaign. Jenny Craig's chief operating officer, Jim Evans, noted in PR Newswire that the new campaign featuring Alley "was designed to resonate with anyone looking to lose unwanted weight with a safe, scientifically proven, lifestyle-focused method."

COMPETITION

Weight Watchers International, based in Woodbury, New York, was established in 1963. In 1997 Weight Watchers signed on as spokeswoman British royal and ex-wife of Prince Andrew, Sarah Ferguson, the Duchess of York. The stunning, red-haired "Fergie" was the ideal spokeswoman for Weight Watchers: she was a celebrity, an emotional eater struggling with weight loss, divorced, and a busy, working single mom. The Tampa Tribune described her as "both glamorous and ordinary." She also connected with American women, who followed her lead and embraced the Weight Watchers diet program, flocking to its weekly weigh-ins and meetings held in communities nationwide. In 2001 the privately held Weight Watchers went public, and by the following year it reported that sales had increased 127 percent to $620 million. Sales jumped to $944 million two years later. But by 2004, despite having some 1.5 million members, Weight Watchers was slipping. Many dieters, frustrated with the hassles of the program's system for counting

WHAT'S FOR DINNER? OR BREAKFAST? OR LUNCH? GOURMET DIET FOOD

More and more people, regardless of their weight, were discovering the convenience of having gourmet diet meals delivered right to their doors, ready to heat and eat. Jenny Direct, the home-delivery division of weight-loss management company Jenny Craig, Inc., reported that in 2004 its service had grown to more than 8,000 clients in the United States. The nutritious meals were growing in popularity with dieters and nondieters alike who had neither the time nor the inclination to prepare three home-cooked meals plus snacks each day. Participation in the Jenny Direct program cost on average $15 per day, and it included delivery by Federal Express or United Parcel Service. Meals arrived frozen with instructions about what should be eaten at each meal, removing all the guesswork and ensuring that hungry gourmands or dieters had perfectly balanced meals three times a day with little effort on their part beyond turning on a microwave oven.

calories, were abandoning Weight Watchers. Others were wooed away by the newest fad diets, such as Atkins and South Beach, which espoused losing weight while eating what you wanted as long as it was low in carbohydrates. To reverse the trend, during the summer of 2004 Weight Watchers ran a series of television spots created by its agency, the Seiden Group of New York. The commercials featured women who told not only of their weight-loss successes with the program but also of the side benefits, such as developing more self-esteem and achieving more quality time with their families. Weight Watchers also responded to the low-carb diet craze and introduced a selection of low-carbohydrate, ready-to-eat meals and a new program, the TurnAround plan, that focused less on counting calories and more on food choices. In November 2004 Weight Watchers replaced the Seiden Group with ad agency Young & Rubicam of New York, but then it partnered with Foote Cone & Belding, Chicago, to launch a new advertising campaign with the tagline "Watch yourself change" in January 2005.

In 1996 the Internet took dieting to a new level with the introduction of the website eDiets.com. It was described by its founders as the "premier one-stop online diet and healthy-living destination." Included on the site were personalized information, products, professional advice, and other services for consumers who wanted not only wanted to lose weight but also to improve their lives through fitness and nutrition. Relying solely on online advertising, eDiets.com had attracted more than 1.5 million members worldwide by 2003. Its target market was women aged 25 to 54 years old with an average weight-loss goal of at least 50 pounds. The site offered more than 20 different diet plans, including Atkins and the Mayo Clinic Diet, and won the praises of Forbes, which named it "Best of the Web" in the diet and nutrition category. Hoping to reach a broader range of consumers, in early 2004 eDiets.com released a series of four television spots created by the Ad Store, an agency based in New York. The $1.5 million effort paid off, nearly doubling the number of visitors to the site. Later that year eDiets.com announced plans to double its budget for television advertising to $3 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

J. Walter Thompson's creative effort for Jenny Craig featuring actress/comedian Kirstie Alley was twofold: it expanded on an earlier, albeit brief, campaign developed to promote Jenny Craig's new weight-management program titled YourStyle, and it built on Alley's self-deprecating sense of humor. The new campaign followed Alley's efforts to lose more than 50 pounds by adhering to the Jenny YourStyle weight-loss program, which was also the basis of her new Showtime television show, Fat Actress. Campaign spots were loosely based on the theme "Have you called Jenny yet?"

Television spots for the new campaign were released during the first week of January 2005, a critical time for companies in the diet business, because it was when many people were enthusiastic about their New Year's resolutions to lose weight. In the initial spot Alley was shown on a set with little decor beyond a chair and an oversized pink telephone. Alley picked up the phone handset and called Jenny Craig's founder. She then told an unseen person at the other end of the line that the call was "in regards to me being fat." Alley then looked directly at the camera, as if speaking to every overweight person watching the commercial, and said, "Hey, you're chubby too! Let's lose weight together! They have really yummy food. . . . They have chicken fettuccini!" At the end of the spot Alley's call was finally put through, presumably to Jenny Craig herself, and Alley said, "Jenny! Hey, listen girl, I'm fat!" Unlike the first-person testimonials usually used in diet-program ads, Alley's spot appeared believable.

Subsequent spots followed Alley on her weight-loss adventure and featured her sharing her personal experiences with dieting and the Jenny Craig program. Spots also maintained the sense of humor used in the initial spot while focusing on Alley's increased energy and emphasizing the variety of foods available through the plan. People who missed the spots when they aired could log onto the company's website, www.jennycraig.com, and read Alley's blog entries, which were updated each week. Television spots could also be watched on the website.

OUTCOME

When Jenny Craig launched a new advertising campaign featuring Kirstie Alley as its spokeswoman, consumers quickly embraced the star as she pursued weight loss through Jenny Craig. More importantly, record numbers of overweight Americans enrolled in the program. According to a PR Newswire report, the company claimed that the campaign resonated with consumers because the commercials were humorous, honest, and lacked the "outlandish 'magic bullet' claims" typically seen in ads for other weight loss plans. Adweek critic Barbara Lippert also praised the campaign for its honesty, commending it for avoiding political correctness and for not being afraid to use the "f" word—fat—in weight-loss television spots. Five months after the campaign began, Alley appeared on The Oprah Winfrey Show to announce that she had lost more than 33 pounds, reaching the halfway mark of her weight-loss goal. Alley's statements during the show resulted in an 81 percent increase in callers to Jenny Craig inquiring about the weight-loss program. In a press release commenting on the campaign, Jenny Craig's chief operating officer, Jim Evans, said, "Our business has been very strong since Kirstie Alley joined our program." The campaign was so successful that it was extended. J. Walter Thompson created a new series of television spots featuring Alley that began airing at the end of 2005, and it continued the tagline "Have you called Jenny yet?"

FURTHER READING

"EDiets.com Ranks as No. 1 Health, Fitness & Nutrition Site, According to Nielsen/NetRatings." PR Newswire, January 14, 2004.

"'Fat Actress' Kirstie Alley Chooses Jenny Craig to Lose Weight; Actress to Star in New Advertising Campaign." PR Newswire, December 20, 2004.

Ives, Nat. "Eat Carbs, Lose Weight. Jenny Craig's New Campaign Touts Flexibility." New York Times, September 10, 2004, p. 5.

"Jenny Craig Phones Jump after Kirstie Alley's Appearance on 'The Oprah Winfrey Show.'" PR Newswire, May 24, 2005.

"Jenny Craig Unveils New Twists in Its Next Round of Kirstie Alley Commercials." PR Newswire, December 16, 2005.

Lawlor, Vera. "Not for Dieters Only: Gourmet Breakfast, Lunch, and Dinner—Delivered." Bergen County (NJ) Record, August 4, 2004.

Lippert, Barbara. "Barbara Lippert's Critique: The Weighting Game." Adweek, January 10, 2005.

Oser, Kris. "EDiets Launches Digital Magazine for 13 Million." Advertising Age, January 24, 2005.

"Rethinking Weight." U.S. News & World Report, February 9, 2004.

Sanders, Lisa. "J. Walter Thompson Diets Its Way to Review Victory." Advertising Age, June 10, 2004.

Thompson, Stephanie. "After the Carb Craze: Diet Marketers Bet on Balanced Options." Advertising Age, January 3, 2005.

Thompson, Susan H. "Britain's Fergie Brings Her Message of Inspiration and Weight Loss." Tampa (FL) Tribune, February 1, 2004.

"Weight Watchers Woodbury, N.Y." Adweek, November 1, 2004.

"Y&R Wins $45 Mil. Weight Watchers' Account." Adweek, November 16, 2004.

Zammit, Deanna. "Ediets.com Beefs Up TV Budget." Adweek, June 16, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

JetBlue Airways Corporation

118-29 Queens Boulevard
Forest Hills, New York 11375
USA
Telephone: (718) 286-7900
Fax: (718) 709-3621
Web site: www.jetblue.com

■■■

JETBLUE LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

JetBlue Airways was the brainchild of David Neeleman, an aviation expert. It was Neeleman's third foray into start-up discount airlines; he launched the Salt Lake City, Utah–based Morris Air in the late 1980s and helped to develop WestJet, a Canadian low-fare carrier, in the mid 1990s. The key priorities for the new airline, according to an Advertising Age report, was providing the "best coach for the best price" and remembering that quality service would result in return business and drive positive word of mouth from customers. The company's stated philosophy was "people are travelers, and not cargo."

Prior to its launch in February 2000, JetBlue was generating buzz without any advertising efforts. Magazine feature articles profiled the start-up airline in December 1999 and January 2000. As the airline prepared for its first flight, however, its advertising agency, Merkley Newman Harty, New York, created a print-only campaign themed "Unbelievable" to reinforce the new airline's amenities and low fares. As JetBlue evolved, its marketing strategy shifted as well. Although the "Unbelievable" campaign was reaching consumers, in July 2000 the company, without review, hired Arnold Communications Boston as its agency and axed Merkley Newman Harty. Despite Arnold's successful efforts, including creating the airline's first television campaign, JetBlue dumped the agency and began looking for a replacement in 2001. JetBlue hired independent New York agency the Ad Store to replace Arnold, but the company also turned to BBDO and Ground Zero New York to create additional campaigns that year.

While JetBlue's early marketing strategy and relationships with its various agencies may have seemed tempestuous, the approach also seemed to work. Not only did each agency's campaign efforts reach consumers and help build the discount carrier's brand identity, but the campaigns built business. Within eight months of its first flight, JetBlue reported that it was profitable and that its 500,000th passenger had climbed aboard. Further, by September 2001 the company reported that its income had increased more than 20 percent from the same period the previous year. Advertising Age named JetBlue its 2001 Marketer of the Year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When he laid the groundwork for JetBlue, founder David Neeleman already had a solid background in start-up airline experience. Neeleman's first commercial airline, Salt Lake City, Utah–based discount carrier Morris Air, was sold to Southwest Airlines in 1993 for $130 million in stock. In 1996 Neeleman helped found Canada's discount airline WestJet, modeled after Southwest Airlines. Based on his airline experience, in

© JAMES LEYNSE/CORBIS.

1999 Neeleman put together a management team and $130 million in capital funding with plans to launch a new discount carrier that the company's website stated "would bring humanity back to air travel."

Based at New York's John F. Kennedy International (JFK) Airport, JetBlue offered its first flight in February 2000, with amenities not typical of a discount airline, including new planes, leather seats with extra legroom, and free in-flight satellite television at each seat. The company also took a unique approach to its marketing. It reported that it had allotted an ad budget of $12.8 million to support its launch. This was a pittance compared to other airlines' ad spending; for instance, competitor Southwest Airlines reported a $107.6 million advertising budget in 2000. JetBlue worked instead with the theory that it was more important to get everything about the product right first and then consider advertising. Helping JetBlue reach consumers and build brand identity without extensive spending on advertising was free publicity, such as articles profiling the start-up airline that appeared in issues of Condé Nast Traveler and New York magazine before the first flight ever took off. When JetBlue put its marketing budget to work, it partnered with Merkley Newman Harty New York for its first campaign. Within months of the campaign's start in 2000, Merkley Newman Harty was replaced by Arnold Communications Boston. Arnold created JetBlue's first television spots, which hit the air in October 2000. Arnold introduced a new campaign for JetBlue in June 2001, but the airline was already looking for a new agency. During 2001 three separate agencies created campaigns for JetBlue: the Ad Store, BBDO, and Ground Zero New York.

TARGET MARKET

Following research and serious number crunching, JetBlue's executives determined that the new airline's target market was the eight million people who lived within a five-mile radius of New York's JFK Airport, JetBlue's home base, as well as anyone living in Manhattan. According to a report by Jonah Bloom in Advertising Age, the numbers were accurate. He wrote, "Manhattanites have flocked to the airline in the thousands." As JetBlue expanded its service area, the target market also was expanded to include college students, young professionals, and middle-aged travelers looking for a bargain. The reach also extended beyond bargain hunters to target more affluent consumers, or what JetBlue's executives described in Advertising Age as "travel snobs." Noting JetBlue's reluctance to restrict its target market to younger, hipper consumers, the company's CEO, David Neeleman, said that age was irrelevant: "We are an every person airline."

COMPETITION

When JetBlue's founders planned the new low-cost airline, their model was the granddaddy of discount air carriers, Southwest Airlines. Southwest began operating in Texas in 1971 with the notion of getting passengers to their destinations on time, offering the lowest possible price, and assuring that the customers enjoyed the trip. Not only did that idea attract customers, but it also set the standard for other low-cost carriers. Southwest's first flights served the Texas cities of Dallas, Houston, and San Antonio. At the end of 1999 Southwest was ranked the number-four air-passenger carrier, and it included on its list of destinations 58 cities in 29 states. Southwest kicked off 2000 with a new marketing campaign designed to encourage travelers to visit its website, www.southwest.com, for everything from researching destination information to booking flight tickets, rental cars, and hotel rooms. The new campaign's tagline, "A symbol of e-freedom," put a spin on Southwest's ongoing tagline, "A symbol of freedom." Television spots used humor to portray people in a variety of unpleasant situations juxtaposed with the same people enjoying a fun vacation. The voice-over said, "When the going gets tough, get going to southwest.com to book a quick getaway."

To compete with discount carriers such as Southwest and start-ups such as JetBlue, in 2000 Fort Worth, Texas–based American Airlines added some perks to its aircraft in hopes of enticing new customers and keeping its existing ones. Citing customer complaints about comfort aboard its planes, in February 2000 American

JETBLUE PASSENGERS GET FREE IN-FLIGHT TV

When passengers boarded a JetBlue plane, they could do something not available on any other airline: settle back in their seats, put on a pair of headphones, and watch programs on 24 television stations. The satellite programming was offered to each individual passenger through seat-back screens. Despite being a low-cost carrier that looked for ways to save money and cut expenses, JetBlue's LiveTV was a free service for passengers. But the free TV was originally planned as a pay-to-use service with a $5 price tag. The plan to charge for the service was dismissed by JetBlue executives, however, when they determined that the goodwill gained from offering the perk for free was worth more than the estimated $810 additional revenue per flight that would be generated by charging for the service.

announced plans to remove two rows of seats from each of its more than 700 jets, thereby giving coach-class passengers more legroom. The effort kicked off in August and was supported by a marketing campaign tagged, ''Make More Room throughout Coach.'' Global marketing agency TLP, Inc., of Dallas created the campaign, which included the ''Great American Seat Take Off'' contest to respond to the question: Where did all the seats go? The goal of the contest was to find owners for the seats American removed from its planes. To promote the campaign, print ads ran in major daily newspapers, including the New York Times, the Chicago Tribune, the Boston Globe, the San Francisco Chronicle, and the Los Angeles Times. The following year American took another step to make the insides of its narrow-body planes more passenger-friendly, increasing the size of the overhead storage bins to allow more room for carry-on luggage.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When JetBlue took to the skies in February 2000, it was introduced to consumers in the first two cities it included on its flight route—Buffalo, New York, and Fort Lauderdale, Florida—with a marketing campaign created by the fledgling airline's agency, Merkley Newman Harty. Themed ''Unbelievable,'' the initial campaign, which began in January 2000, also was designed to help establish the brand. It was limited to print and featured full-page ads in local newspapers that touted the new airline's ''unbelievable'' low fares and amenities not typically provided by a discount air-passenger carrier. Text in one ad read: ''$79 to Fort Lauderdale? What, as a stowaway?'' At the time of the ''Unbelievable'' campaign's launch, future campaigns were planned that would apply the same theme to outdoor efforts and television spots.

In May 2000 JetBlue hired Arnold Communications Boston to replace Merkley Newman Harty. Arnold created a multimedia campaign for JetBlue that included newspaper, outdoor, and broadcast advertising. The cost of the new marketing effort was estimated at $10 million, and new ads were slated to begin running in the summer of 2000. These ads, which like the ''Unbelievable'' campaign ran only in cities served by JetBlue, lacked a specific tagline and were designed to drive customer traffic rather than establish a brand image for the airline. One new billboard that appeared in New York City at the Queens Midtown Tunnel stated: ''$79 to Florida. Quite a bargain considering it's $3.50 to Queens.'' Print ads focused on humor to inform consumers of the airline's perks as well as its efforts to keep costs in check, such as not offering passengers hot meals. In one print ad a caricature of a chicken was shown with the text: ''Nature never intended it to fly. Really low fares. Free live TV. No rubber chickens.'' Television spots aired during the World Series, which was played that year between New York's two teams. Arnold Communications created a new campaign for JetBlue that launched in June 2001. With the tagline ''Somebody Up There Likes You,'' it focused on customers and employees of the airline. The new campaign's advertisements appeared in print, broadcast, and outdoor formats and ran in the cities served by JetBlue.

Shortly after the ''Somebody Up There Likes You'' campaign began, JetBlue replaced Arnold with independent New York creative shop the Ad Store. A new campaign by the Ad Store that concentrated on the New York market began running on television after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in which commercial airliners were crashed into the World Trade Center towers in Manhattan. The Ad Store's work included spots that emphasized travel, customer service, and the airline's humanity. One spot portrayed what it would be like if a subway train were a JetBlue plane. In a crowded subway car, crew members put pillows under passengers' heads and blankets over their bodies, poured coffee in a cup that a beggar was holding out to collect change, and more—all executed to the classic pop song by Jackie DeShannon, ''Put a Little Love in Your Heart.''

BBDO also created a television campaign for JetBlue following the September 11 terrorists attacks. Titled

"New York Miracle," the campaign positioned the airline as the first passenger carrier to use humor in its advertising to encourage people to return to air travel after the attacks. The commercials poked fun at New York institutions, celebrities, and cultural stereotypes. In one spot the camera panned across a lavish, upper-class New York holiday party, settling on a woman pouring her friend a glass of wine. A voice-over with a British accent stated, "New Yorkers are known for their exceptional taste. So what is New York's favorite wine?" The joke of the spot was a pun: the first socialite responded in a nasal whine, "I want to go to Florida!" and her friend added, "Me too!" A second television spot showed a New York man sitting on an armless leather chair in a room sans decor other than a blinking Christmas tree and a bouncing robotic puppy. The voice-over said, "We've got a warm spot for you." The man responded with a smile.

When JetBlue expanded its California services in September 2001, the airline turned to Ground Zero New York to create a marketing campaign. The agency described its effort in Adweek as a "guerilla-marketing campaign." It promoted JetBlue's service between New York's JFK Airport and Long Beach Airport in California. Included were JetBlue-branded Volkswagen Beetles, T-shirts, maps, and bumper stickers with the slogan "Goodbye LAX" (a reference to the Los Angeles area's major airport) that blanketed Southern California. Signs stating, "Goodbye airfare shock. Goodbye parking agony. Goodbye getting lost," appeared on airport shuttle buses at both the JFK and Long Beach airports.

OUTCOME

JetBlue's strategy of keeping its advertising small and targeting it to specific markets rather than embarking on a major branding effort seemed to pay off for the passenger carrier, but not necessarily for its agencies. Although Merkley Newman Harty's "Unbelievable" campaign initially was limited to full-page ads that ran in major newspapers in Florida and New York, it succeeded in attracting customers and creating buzz about the carrier. According to a report in World Airline News, the company stated that the launch of the campaign and the airline's new website resulted in more than half of consumer inquiries becoming flight bookings. JetBlue's director of communications, Gareth Edmondson-Jones, further noted, "As it is, each inquiry is being converted into two bookings." Within six months of its first flight, JetBlue had boarded half a million passengers and had its first month of profitability.

Despite the campaign's success, without review JetBlue replaced Merkley Newman Harty with Arnold Communications barely six months after the "Unbelievable" campaign began. Arnold's work for the airline also succeeded in conveying the message that, while JetBlue was low cost, it was also high class. Again, within one year JetBlue ended its contract with the agency. Stepping in were the Ad Store, BBDO, and Ground Zero New York. The efforts of all three agencies succeeded in increasing awareness of the airline, but BBDO's television spots raised complaints from some industry insiders. Adweek critic Barbara Lippert commented that the stereotyping used in the spot featuring the socialites, who she described as "Jewish American Princesses," was offensive. She added that, while the spot depicting the well-to-do man in his loft was "simple and kind of cute," it also made no sense.

Noting that JetBlue was thriving and growing on the buzz created by customers' word-of-mouth praise as much as from JetBlue's mixed advertising efforts, Advertising Age named the airline its 2001 Marketer of the Year.

FURTHER READING

Gianatasio, David. "Arnold Retools JetBlue Message." Adweek, June 11, 2001.

———. "Arnold Soars with JetBlue Air." Adweek, June 4, 2000.

Goetze, David. "JetBlue Asks Sponsors to Pick Up TV Tab." Advertising Age, July 21, 2000.

Higginbotham, Keith. "JetBlue Kicks Up Promotion Level for Two New Flights from Long Beach, Calif." Long Beach (CA) Press-Telegram, August 16, 2001.

"JetBlue Airways Awards Integrated Marketing Campaign to Arnold Communications." Business Wire, May 31, 2000.

"JetBlue Airways Open for Business." Business Wire, January 11, 2000.

"JetBlue Opens Reservation Center, Launches Ad Campaign." World Airline News, January 14, 2000.

"JetBlue Seeks 'Smaller' Partners." Adweek, August 14, 2001.

Knapp, Kevin. "Airlines Vie for Online Runway; Southwest Rolls New Campaign; United Woos Specific Segments." Advertising Age, March 20, 2000.

Lippert, Barbara. "Barbara Lippert's Critique." Adweek, December 3, 2001.

Mack, Ann M. "Ground Zero's Hour." Adweek, September 3, 2001.

Reed, Dan. "American Airlines to Give Coach-Class Customers More Legroom." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, February 6, 2000.

"Southwest Airlines Unveils Destinations and Fares from Palm Beach International Airport." PR Newswire, October 19, 2000.

"TLP, Inc. Partners with American Airlines to Promote 'More Room throughout Coach' Campaign." Business Wire, August 16, 2000.

Tsui, Bonnie. "JetBlue Soars in First Months." Advertising Age, September 11, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

John Hancock Financial Services Inc.

John Hancock Place
Boston, Massachusetts 02117
USA
Telephone: (617) 572-6000
Fax: (617) 572-9799
Web site: www.johnhancock.com

■■■

INSURANCE FOR THE UNEXPECTED. INVESTMENTS FOR THE OPPORTUNITIES. CAMPAIGN (1996)

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company changed its name to John Hancock Financial Services Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

With assets of $62 billion, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company ranks among the nation's 15 largest life insurance companies. But the 136-year-old company also sells a growing number of investment management products and services for which it generally has not been recognized. In 1996 John Hancock was better known as an insurance company at a time when consumers were showing less interest in insurance and more interest in investments.

With its "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign, launched in 1996, the company sought to raise consumer awareness of its investment management expertise and to reinforce its position as a leading life insurance provider. Hancock also wanted to emphasize the need for financial self-reliance and to show consumers that it recognized their changing needs and desires.

For this high budget television campaign, the long-standing Hancock agency Hill Holliday Connors Cosmopulos created five spots (in both 60- and 30-second versions). Contrasting tender family moments with tough financial decisions, the spots addressed financial planning for various life situations, such as saving for college tuition and retirement and adjusting financially to single parenthood. Actress Sigourney Weaver supplied the voice-over, while the music was provided by Mark Knopfler, songwriter for the rock group Dire Straits. Tony Kaye of Tony Kaye & Partners, West Hollywood and London, directed the spots.

Shot in black and white, the campaign featured the same personal style that had distinguished Hancock's critically acclaimed "Real Life, Real Answers" campaign in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The company launched the ads in April of 1996 with a media buy concentrated around the 1996 Summer Olympics (Hancock is a Worldwide Olympic Sponsor). The spots ("Triple Squeeze," "Shepherds," "Subway," "Alone," and "Freedom") took six months to create. Expense was not the first consideration; getting the appropriate feeling and message was.

"Triple Squeeze" opened with a few shots of well-dressed children and grandparents in a field, followed by a title card that read, ''Your parents, your children, yourself.'' Video of a girl walking between an older man and woman gave way to another title card that completed the first. It read, ''Who do you love the least?'' The black and white video continued showing small children and elderly grandparents as Weaver's voice-over said, ''You owe it to your parents . . . for they brought you into this world. You owe it to your children . . . for you did the same for them. But the day may arrive when both debts come to you. When you may have no choice but to borrow from your own retirement . . . to educate a child or care for a parent. And into whose eyes can you look and say you just can't help, for in both you will surely see your own?'' All the spots ended with the tag line ''Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities,'' followed by the Hancock logo and website address.

The 60-second version of ''Subway'' started with shots of a flower and a man's profile superimposed on an electrical tower. The first title card read, ''Will you want to work when you're 65?'' Next the viewer saw a lone man standing in the middle of an empty downtown city street, then walking into a subway station as the voice-over began, ''You will wake up one day and there will be no subways.'' A second title card, responding to the first, read, ''Will you have to?'' As the viewer watched a man alone at an airport, a plane taking off, and other stark business shots, the voice-over continued, ''There will be no time sheets or corporate ladders to climb. You will find in that moment, life will change from a thing to be conquered to a time to be savored.'' Video for the second half of the ad, when retirement is discussed, showed a man in a business suit with bare feet and his pants rolled up as he wades in the water on a beach. The voice-over continued, ''If retirement is a bridge to be crossed when we get there, then we must accept whatever lies in store for us. If it is one we must build, then let us begin.''

Another spot opened with senior citizens wading in the ocean's surf as the voice-over explained that as an insurance company it is Hancock's business to predict how long people will live. The commercial continued by explaining that as a leading investment firm it is also Hancock's business to help people save enough money should they happen to live longer and prove the company's predictions wrong. Each spot used Knopfler's haunting music to heighten the emotional impact.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

This campaign followed the long-running ''Real Life, Real Solutions'' campaign that debuted in 1985 and focused on John Hancock as an insurance provider. By 1996 management wanted to position the company as a provider not only of insurance but also of investment services.

Although Hancock's life insurance sales continued to grow throughout the 1990s, industry-wide sales were flat, having decreased by 3 percent in both 1994 and 1995, according to the market research trade group LIMRA International. Tillinghast-Towers Perrin reported that from 1970 to 1996 the life insurance industry's share of people's personal assets dropped from 20 percent to 14 percent. Many insurers dealt with this decline by offering fewer new insurance products and more wealth accumulation or investment-type products.

By 1997 annuities, mutual funds, and specialty products were providing more and more of the leading companies' revenue. According to LIMRA International, annuities and pensions increased to 66 percent of the industry's business, making accumulation products the dominant force in the life insurance industry.

Hancock's strategy was to offer a wide range of protection and investment products through many different distribution channels. Although the company was well recognized for life insurance products, Hill Holliday research revealed that the brand had lower recognition with its investment products (variable annuities and mutual funds). The company lacked credibility and awareness as an expert in the high interest investment arena.

TARGET MARKET

The traditional Hancock market was middle income households with annual salaries of $35,000 and up. ''Real Life, Real Answers'' had aimed at this broad audience. The new campaign moved upscale, aiming for 16 million ''Investment Enthusiasts,''—adults, ages 35-64, with annual household incomes of $75,000 or more and with assets or interest in both insurance and investments. Hancock's research suggested that these consumers faced a triple financial concern: saving for their children's education, caring for aging parents, and saving for their own retirements.

But unlike many other insurers, Hancock also sought to serve the needs of more modest, nontraditional households. For example, in 1997 the company used ads similar to but less costly than those in the ''Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities'' campaign to target a narrow market segment—single parents. Hancock hired a small strategic planning firm to sift through its customer database, interview a range of potential customers, and use that research to fine tune both its products and its advertising. To these consumers, Hancock advertised lower-cost term life insurance that they could purchase over the telephone or the Internet.

Q & A WITH THE ART DIRECTOR

Jamie Mambro, Art Director for Hill Holliday, on John Hancock's "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign:

Q: Is insurance a difficult product to create ads for?

A: No, because it's dealing with a lot of fears and anxieties that everyone shares. It's pretty close to home.

Q: Did you need to be aware of the competition so you could distinguish John Hancock in this campaign?

A: Not really. John Hancock has been distinguished in this category for quite a while. They, in a way, have defined the category, at least emotionally.

Q: How did you start the campaign?

A: It started about a year before we worked on the creative. Our research showed what people's issues were. Two writers and myself took that research and began to talk among ourselves about the issues each one of us faced in terms of older parents who might need care . . . children who need college . . . retirement. The ideas came out of our own life experiences.

Q: Is there a core idea behind the campaign?

A: It centers around the issue of self-reliance. You have to rely on yourself to provide for your financial needs.

Q: Why two writers?

A: I went to both of them—both are excellent writers (Mike Sheehan and Ernie Schenck)—and asked them to write because we had six spots to do. I wanted the scripts to stay fresh. Sometimes when you have one writer on six scripts some scripts tend to be stronger than others.

Q: What happened to the sixth spot?

A: It never ran. The client didn't like the visual imagery or the music we chose. The great thing about the client, David D'Alessandro, is he really believes in powerful work. He wants to do things that he believes are going to make a mark for his company. He's really, for a lot of us, the best creative director we've ever had. He has great taste. Even though he might want to kill something we listen to him because he's the one who's been responsible for creating the work.

Q: Was there any additional pressure following up such a successful campaign as "Real Life, Real Solutions"?

A: Yes, in the beginning there was, but we let it work for us. No one's going to deny that "Real Life, Real Answers" is one of the greatest campaigns this agency's ever produced. But following that up was a challenge and something we looked forward to. It was a good kind of pressure.

COMPETITION

The life insurance industry's largest company, Prudential, ran its "Be Your Own Rock" campaign during the same time period as the Hancock campaign. Some observers found the two similar. Both were shot in black and white, addressed major life questions, featured voice-overs, and urged people to actively confront their own financial realities. In one Prudential spot a man snowshoed through a mountain meadow as the voice-over said, "Somehow, at some deep level, we're responsible for what happens to us . . . I mean, you're the best investment you've got. You're the best investment you'll ever have." To streamline production, Prudential began producing commercials with its own internal advertising agency. Early in 1998 the company's crews produced 35 spots in a five month period.

Many other insurers—such as CIGNA, ReliaStar, and SunAmerica—began increasing their television advertising budgets in 1996 and 1997. The life insurance industry spent $255 million on network television spots in 1996—a 78 percent increase over 1995, according to Television Bureau of Advertising numbers. In 1998 Hancock planned to spend $15-20 million. While other insurance companies like Prudential, Metropolitan Life, and Northwestern were clearly Hancock's main competition, the company also considered the large mutual funds, brokerage houses, and banks to be competitors. They, too, were increasing ad spending. Janus, Fidelity Investments, American Century, and T. Rowe Price all began or greatly expanded their television advertising in 1997. Although John Hancock was outspent five to ten times by some insurance, investment, and brokerage competitors, the company believed its brand recognition was at parity with its higher spending competitors.

One advantage John Hancock had was a close, 14-year relationship with Hill Holliday. The agency constantly monitored the financial services industry and had built up a comprehensive and proprietary research database.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Traditionally, life insurance advertising has emphasized the insurer's financial strength. Much like banks, insurance companies have tried to convey the sense of security and safety they offer to customers.

As it had with the "Real Life, Real Solutions" campaign, Hancock broke from the traditional and emphasized the need for financial self-reliance. "Much insurance advertising is still stuck in the world of Ozzie and Harriet," Fred Bertino, creative director at Hill Holliday, told Shoot magazine. "This is a campaign that's not afraid to tell you what's going on." The ads presented Hancock's empathy for its customers facing tough financial problems and then offered solutions and motivation for people to take action. Hancock believed consumers felt increasing anxiety about their ability to meet all their own and their family's financial responsibilities and that they needed and wanted to become more astute, self-sufficient, and focused on their financial future.

As with the previous campaign, Hancock sought to turn the camera around with these spots. The company strove to portray the consumer's perspective and to do so in a way that no other financial services company had done. Each spot attempted to reinforce what consumers deeply felt about their financial future and empower them to act.

OUTCOME

Hill Holliday measured consumer viewpoints before the April 1996 launch and compared them with a sampling taken after the Olympics in August. Results showed increases in several investment attributes. There was a 38 percent increase in the number of consumers who saw Hancock as an investment industry leader; a 75 percent increase in people who thought Hancock was a smart, sophisticated company; and a 67 percent increase in consumers who thought the company offered flexible products that change with customers' needs.

Financially, Hancock did well in 1997. Net gain from operations hit a record $506 million. Assets under management increased 11 percent, to $116 billion. Life insurance sales increased while the industry as a whole continued to drop. Company sales of annuities and mutual funds, its two core investment products, rose 117 percent and 175 percent of goal, respectively.

Creatively the campaign was a huge success as well, garnering critical praise and numerous industry awards. The campaign earned the TV Grand Clio at the 38th annual Clio Awards on May 14th, 1997, as well as Silver and Bronze Lions at the 1997 Cannes International Film Festival. It also won a pair of Clios in the insurance ad and copywriting categories. The campaign captured Best of Show in the Northeast region's top creative award show, the Hatch Awards. The New England Broadcasting Association presented the campaign with its Gold Award and another Best of Show.

FURTHER READING

Dunlap, Bill. "When All the Stars Align: The Creative Minds Behind Award-Winning Spots Tell How They Came Together." Shoot June 20, 1997.

Goch, Lynna. "Don't Touch that Dial." Best's Review, Property-Casualty Insurance Edition, January 1998, p. 63.

McGavin, Patrick Z. "Vital and Innovative." Shoot March 21, 1997.

Reidy, Chris. "Pinpointing a Market." Boston Globe June 12, 1998, p. C4.

Savan, Leslie. "The Pause that Refrightens: Reality . . . What An Ad Concept." Village Voice June 11, 1996.

Chris John Amorosino

INSURANCE FOR THE UNEXPECTED. INVESTMENTS FOR THE OPPORTUNITIES. CAMPAIGN (2000)

OVERVIEW

In 1996 John Hancock Financial Services, Inc. (then called John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company), began updating its acclaimed "Real Life, Real Answers" campaign, which had been running since 1985 and which used real-life situations to point out the wide range of insurance and financial-services products the company offered. John Hancock adopted the tagline "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" and extended the emphasis on the dramas ordinary people faced. In 2000 the company leveraged its sponsorship of the Olympic Games in Sydney and of Major League Baseball's World Series to launch a series of four television commercials running under the four-year-old tagline.

Created by long-time John Hancock agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopolous of Boston, the 2000 TV campaign built on the realism of the company's previous advertising by featuring families in moments of crisis or joy and continued to position John Hancock as a company equipped to respond to the financial needs of all such human situations. The campaign's most noteworthy spot featured a lesbian couple arriving in the United States with their newly adopted Asian baby.

The lesbian-themed spot, one of the first mainstream advertisements ever to showcase a same-sex relationship, generated the bulk of the media attention given to the campaign. Applauded by gay and lesbian advocacy groups and criticized by some conservatives, the commercial was altered after its first airing to make the nature of the relationship more ambiguous. John Hancock's research indicated an increase in brand awareness as a result of the campaign, which was estimated to cost $12 million, and the "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" tagline was retained in subsequent advertising.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the 1980s, like many of its competitors, John Hancock expanded beyond its primary business of life insurance to enter a broad range of financial-services business sectors. Intent on bolstering its core insurance business while simultaneously informing consumers of its wider portfolio of products and services, and likewise hoping to counteract the negative image most Americans had of insurance companies and agents, the company launched the "Real Life, Real Answers" campaign in 1985. Using print ads and TV spots, the campaign focused on people rather than on the company itself, employing story lines that revolved around the everyday financial difficulties and decisions faced by real people. The ads thereby positioned John Hancock as a sympathetic supplier of financial services that answered a variety of ordinary but critical needs. The "Real Life, Real Answers" campaign immediately generated critical acclaim for its realism and emotional force, and it translated into increased brand awareness and sales. The campaign won the Grand Prix at the Cannes International Advertising Awards Festival in its first year, ran for 10 years, and in 1998 was named one of the top 20 campaigns of the preceding 20 years by Adweek.

In 1996 John Hancock and Hill, Holliday undertook the task of replacing the by-then legendary campaign. The new campaign had simultaneously had to distinguish itself from "Real Life, Real Answers" and to deliver comparable doses of humanity and emotional charge. Using the updated tagline "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities," the new campaign similarly focused on ordinary people faced with difficult financial decisions. Though the execution of the new campaign differed in substantial ways from that of "Real Life," relying more on voice-overs than the docudrama scenarios that had characterized the long-running campaign, "Insurance for the Unexpected" worked to maintain the same brand image and market positioning John Hancock had been cultivating for the previous decade.

As part of its long-term branding strategy, John Hancock was a sponsor of high-profile sporting events, and it was a perennial sponsor of the Olympic Games. Like the "Real Life" campaign, "Insurance for the Unexpected" relied especially heavily on placement during Olympic television coverage. In 2000 John Hancock renewed its contract with the Olympics and entered into a five-year sponsorship with Major League Baseball, which made it the exclusive financial-services partner of the league.

TARGET MARKET

The 2000 television campaign was designed to appeal to members of households earning more than $75,000 in annual income, but the spots were otherwise not meant to split consumers along traditional demographic lines. As Steve Burgay, who was then John Hancock's vice president of advertising and corporate communications, put it, "Our advertising has always tried to honestly and respectfully depict what's going on in the world. We don't target a segment. We speak to a need, an emotion, a financial uncertainty or opportunity." Above all, the campaign sought to communicate a human touch. Adweek columnist Barbara Lippert remarked on the same quality, which in her view distinguished the John Hancock ads from other, more specifically targeted campaigns of the time: "What's impressive about the campaign is that it mirrors the rhythms and dissonances of life. More than appealing to segments, it's human—and that's what connects."

By featuring ordinary people in situations with which a diverse range of middle-class Americans could identify, John Hancock sought to convince consumers that it understood their everyday issues and situations and had a suite of products to meet their needs. Like "Real Life" and previous incarnations of "Insurance for the Unexpected," the campaign put the focus on consumers. The individual scenes on which each commercial turned returned to the mode of the "Real Life" commercials, with a storytelling style reminiscent of short nonfiction films. There was no mention of the company or interruption in the drama, and at the close of each spot the John Hancock logo and tagline appeared silently on the screen. Such a gentle promotional style worked to send John Hancock's brand message of understanding and concern rather than to showcase particular products.

COMPETITION

John Hancock's top competitors, Prudential Financial, Inc., and MetLife, Inc., were similarly trying to maintain their core business of life insurance while building consumer recognition of their increasingly diverse range of financial-services products. Prudential and MetLife were consistently among the most-recognized names among insurers, thanks to long-running ad campaigns that had become part of the fabric of American culture, but both were transitioning into new marketing phases during this time.

UNDER FIRE

John Hancock aroused predictable protests from conservative groups in the wake of its "Immigration" spot, which featured lesbian partners bringing an adopted Asian child back to the United States, but the company also found itself under fire from international adoption advocates. The commercial did not specify the adopted child's ethnicity, but some advocates believed that the child was Chinese. Since China prohibited the adoption of its country's children by gay parents, the Joint Council on International Children's Services worried that the ad might provoke China to ban all adoption by unmarried parents.

Prudential, thanks to its long-running "Get a Piece of the Rock" campaign, was a top-of-mind brand among consumers, but most Americans thought of the Rock, as the company was sometimes called, strictly as a provider of life insurance. In the middle and late 1990s Prudential struggled to capitalize on the equity of its Rock identity and spread awareness of its expanded financial-services capabilities. A well-regarded campaign created by the Minneapolis-based agency Fallon McElligott in 1996 aimed to update the company's image and support all of its business units by using the slogan "Be Your Own Rock." After Fallon and Prudential parted ways, the company moved its advertising in-house, before initiating separate account reviews for specific divisions like Prudential HealthCare and Prudential Investments. In the late 1990s and early 2000s a variety of specific campaigns ran on behalf of individual Prudential products and services, but the parent company did not embark on any noteworthy branding work.

MetLife likewise had enormous brand recognition thanks to its association with Charles Schulz's Peanuts characters and its long-time use of Snoopy as the company's "spokesbeagle." The slogan "Get Met, It Pays" was well known among consumers and intimately associated with the Peanuts characters, but as with Prudential and John Hancock, the company's established image was that of an insurer, despite its expansion in previous years. In 1999 MetLife shifted away from the Snoopy-based imagery and began featuring real people in its advertisements, though Snoopy continued to appear at the end of television commercials, dancing above the MetLife logo. The "Get Met, It Pays" tagline was replaced in a 2001 rebranding campaign with the slogan "Have you met life today?" The new campaign, intended to raise awareness of the company's financial-advising capabilities, was described by MetLife as a "celebration of life, beginnings and the financial freedom that leads to life significance."

MARKETING STRATEGY

After a preview during the women's qualifying events for gymnastics, the 2000 "Insurance for the Unexpected" campaign took advantage of John Hancock's renewal of its Olympic sponsorship agreement to make a network launch during the Sydney games, which were held in September 2000. The spots ran throughout the games before going on to appear again during that year's World Series, as part of the company's new five-year sponsorship agreement with Major League Baseball.

Each of the four commercials captured, as a John Hancock spokesman told Annuity Market News, "a moment of crisis, wonder or glory." The commercials made it clear, moreover, that such moments potentially created the need for financial products. By focusing on the stories being told rather than on the company, John Hancock intended to forge an emotional connection with consumers while informing them, through the range of situations featured in the ads, that it had products to meet the needs of a variety of situations ordinary people might encounter. John Hancock wanted to distinguish itself from companies claiming that their financial products would substantially alter customers' lives. Instead, the "Insurance for the Unexpected" campaign painted a picture of a company whose products were designed to support individuals' lives no matter what shape those lives took.

Three of the spots set out to accomplish this task by using relatively mainstream imagery and characters and by focusing on moments of difficulty. "Tour" took as its subject a middle-aged man who was preparing to put his father in a nursing home and who became highly emotional when an employee took him on a tour of the facilities. "California" focused on a divorced couple in the midst of a whispered argument about the ex-husband's role in their son's life. The father insisted that he was doing enough just before announcing that he and his new companion were thinking of moving to California. "Saturday Night," meanwhile, introduced viewers to a single mother who had to rush home after a date with her boyfriend to avoid making the babysitter stay late. As a solution to such inconveniences, the boyfriend proposed that they get married, but the woman declared that she and her daughter could take care of themselves.

One of the four spots, however, represented a bold departure from themes traditionally broached in mainstream advertising, and it accordingly attracted far more attention than the other three, easily breaking through the clutter created by the many corporate heavyweights who were also advertising during the Olympics. Titled "Immigration," the spot showed two women in an airport marveling over their new Asian baby, with whom they had obviously just arrived in the United States. On the way to customs one of the women remarked that the other would be a "great mom," and the other replied, "So will you." The clear implication that the women were lesbian domestic partners, and the treatment of this fact as completely normal, made the commercial unique in mainstream marketing history. As Lippert said, "I can't remember any other national spot in ad history so effortlessly featuring homosexuals, except for the Ikea ad years back showing two gay men proving their commitment by buying a dining-room table." Predictably, the ad met with a substantial number of complaints, and after its first showing it was edited to make the nature of the women's relationship more open to interpretation. Most prominently, the "great mom" exchange was excised from the revised version. Explaining the change, John Hancock issued a statement saying, "People focused a great deal of their attention on what was going on between the adults. It was important to us to focus them, instead, on the real message of the spot, which is however a child comes into a family, that child is entitled to financial protection, and John Hancock can help."

OUTCOME

Most of the media attention paid to the 2000 "Insurance for the Unexpected" campaign centered on the "Immigration" spot. Gay and lesbian advocacy groups were virtually unanimous in applauding the breakthrough treatment of homosexuality in the original version of the ad, but the revised version drew mixed reviews. Mike Wilke of the Gay Financial Network called the spot "one of the most honest, nonsensational looks at a same-sex couple in mainstream advertising ever to come along" but criticized John Hancock for "backpedaling away from it." Scott Seomin of the Gay and Lesbian Alliance against Defamation applauded John Hancock and defended the revised version, saying that "it's a great ad even without the dialogue."

John Hancock's research both before and after the Olympics indicated an increase in brand recognition as a result of the 2000 "Insurance for the Unexpected" campaign. The company extended both the concept and the tagline of the campaign, modifying it to suit the marketplace but continuing to stress the same message. In 2004 John Hancock continued to emphasize real people and the company's potential role in their lives but focused a new campaign on children, returning the spotlight to its core life insurance business with the tagline "It's Not Your Life You Insure."

FURTHER READING

"Be Your Own Rock." Adweek, July 21, 1997.

Dill, Mallorre. "Creative Briefs." Adweek (Midwest ed.), September 18, 2000.

Gianatasio, David. "Hancock Ads Take Some Chances." Adweek (New England ed.), August 14, 2000.

Goch, Lynna. "Don't Touch That Dial." Best's Review, January 1998.

———. "Hancock Returns to Olympics, Signs Major League Baseball." Best's Review, April 2000.

"Hancock's Ad Draws Fire." BestWire, September 19, 2000.

Lippert, Barbara. "A Time for Us." Adweek, September 11, 2000.

McNatt, Robert. "Did Hancock Go a Mom Too Far." Business Week, September 25, 2000.

"MetLife Reinvents Its Identity with Launch of Ad Campaign." Best's Review, June 2001.

Pizzani, Lori. "Hancock Skips Gloss in New Ads." Annuity Market News, November 2000.

Reidy, Chris. "Hancock Re-edits Ad for Olympics: Company Tones Down Commercial Featuring Gay Couple with Baby." Boston Globe, September 13, 2000.

Riedman, Patricia. "Reel Life, Reel Answers." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1996.

Warner, Judy. "Mike Sheehan." Adweek (western ed.), February 10, 1997.

Mark Lane

Kellogg Company

1 Kellogg Square
Battle Creek, Michigan 49016-3599
USA
Telephone: (616) 961-2000
Fax: (616) 961-2871
Web site: www.kelloggcompany.com

■■■

GOTTA HAVE MY POPS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Kellogg Company's humorous "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, which had been airing on television since 1988, continued to increase brand awareness of Kellogg's Corn Pops ready-to-eat cereal throughout 1997. Like many cereal ads, the campaign was aimed primarily at children. The advertisements depicted friendly scheming among people who wanted to make sure they got their Corn Pops, particularly if the cereal was in short supply. In one spot a teenage boy searched for a box of Corn Pops while his grandmother sat nearby at the kitchen table with a bowl of cereal. Realizing that she was about to eat the last of the Corn Pops, the boy tried to think of a plan to take them away from her. She guarded the bowl and laughed to herself, knowing what he was thinking, but when he gave her a mournful, pleading look, she handed them over to him.

Although Kellogg led the cold-cereal industry in the United States and worldwide, it had been losing market share gradually since 1988. Consumers were switching to generic brands, in part because of the rising price of name-brand cereals. In fact, the four dominant cereal companies had raised their prices so often that the U.S. Congress had considered launching an investigation of the industry. After a competitor slashed its prices in 1996, Kellogg followed suit and suffered a loss of revenues as a result, but the company's profits began to rise again in 1997. Kellogg said the "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign had helped the brand gain market share and had increased sales of Corn Pops.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Kellogg had been in business since 1906. It made more ready-to-eat cereal than any other company in the world and sold its products in about 160 countries. Cereal constituted 80 percent of its sales, but Kellogg also made other grain-based foods, including Eggo frozen waffles, Pop-Tarts toaster pastries, Lender's bagels, Kellogg's Nutri-Grain cereal bars, and a cereal-based snack called Rice Krispies Treats. In 1997 the company made 12 of the top 15 brands of cold cereal. But its share of the $8 billion U.S. market had dropped to 33.2 percent from a peak of 40.5 percent in 1988, and its net income had fallen by about 20 percent since 1992, to $546 million. Although competition in the industry was intense, with more than 200 brands of cereal on the market, the top four manufacturers had raised their prices steadily for years. Kellogg had increased its prices as often as twice a year, until some of its brands cost about $5 a box. In response, consumers began buying less expensive generic cereals available at supermarkets and large stores such as Wal-Mart. In addition, growth had almost leveled off in the cereal market as consumers turned to muffins, bagels, and other breakfast foods they could eat on the way to work or school. Although Americans were buying 2.7 billion packages of cereal each year, Kellogg's sales had increased by only 3 percent annually from 1992 to 1996.

Like some of its competitors, the company ran expensive coupon promotions to encourage consumers to buy its brands, even as the price of the cereal continued to rise. But analysts said the strategy was not cost-efficient. One professor of agricultural economics at Purdue University said manufacturers who used coupon promotions spent an amount equivalent to 20 percent of their sales for coupon distribution, reimbursement to retailers and clearing-houses, and executive salaries. In November 1996 Kellogg Chief Executive Officer Arnold Langbo said that the company would do whatever it took to regain its market share. Since 1995 he had closed some of the company's manufacturing plants and laid off 1,000 workers to reduce costs. He had also bought back $2.4 billion worth of the company's stock to keep the price from falling. In response to price cuts by competitors, Kellogg had reduced the price of two-thirds of its products by an average of 19 percent in 1996. To increase sales further, the company launched two new line extensions, Honey Crunch Corn Flakes in 1996 and Cocoa Frosted Flakes in May 1997.

Kellogg's Corn Flakes and Kellogg's Frosted Flakes were the most popular brands of ready-to-eat cereal in the world in 1997. Frosted Flakes had been advertised for years with a cartoon character named Tony the Tiger, who enthusiastically proclaimed that Frosted Flakes were "grrrrrreat." Well-known characters associated with other Kellogg brands included Toucan Sam, Corny the rooster, Dig 'Em the frog, and a trio of elves called Snap, Crackle, and Pop. Kellogg's best selling cereal brands included Frosted Flakes, Corn Flakes, Rice Krispies, Raisin Bran, Special K, and Corn Pops.

TARGET MARKET

Young people had been the only target for Kellogg's Corn Pops advertising until 1993, and they were the primary target of the "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign in 1997. But like Kellogg's Frosted Flakes campaign, the Corn Pops campaign sought to appeal to adults as well as children. The "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign portrayed Corn Pops as a food that was so fun to eat and so flavorful that people would plot to take the cereal away from each other. Cold cereal was a favorite breakfast for children, since all but the youngest of them could prepare it without help from an adult. It provided a quick meal before the early morning rush to school, and some children and adults ate it as a snack at other times of the day. Not all cereals were popular with children, however. The "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign featured young people of various ages having a good time as they ate Corn Pops instead of reluctantly eating some other brand at the insistence of an adult.

INTERNET ADVERTISING

Kellogg's "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign was featured on Sony Corporation of America's "The Station," an interactive, entertainment website (http://www.station.sony.com). Kellogg was one of eight major advertisers that signed on when the network was launched in March 1997. The site featured shopping, games, music, chat rooms, children's programs, and online versions of the popular game show Wheel of Fortune and the television soap opera Days of Our Lives.

COMPETITION

More than 85 percent of the ready-to-eat cereal sold in the United States was made by four companies: Kellogg, General Mills, Inc., Post Cereals, and the Quaker Oats Company.

General Mills, in second place behind Kellogg, had sales of $5.6 billion in 1997. The company made the nation's most popular cold cereal, Cheerios, in addition to Wheaties, Chex, Total, Lucky Charms, Cocoa Puffs, and other brands. General Mills also made Betty Crocker and Bisquick desserts and baking mixes, Hamburger Helper dinner mixes, Gold Medal flour, Fruit Roll-Ups and Bugles snacks, Yoplait yogurt, and Pop Secret microwave popcorn. In 1997 the company continued its long history of promoting the health benefits of Wheaties, "The Breakfast of Champions," by featuring sports stars on the cereal boxes. General Mills had sponsored the first televised sports broadcast in 1938, and through the years its products had been promoted by such television and radio personalities as the Lone Ranger, George Burns and Gracie Allen, and cartoon characters Rocky and Bullwinkle. In 1997 another well-known cartoon character, the Trix Rabbit, continued its 20-year quest for a taste of Trix cereal, only to be foiled as usual. The commercials ended with one of the most famous lines in advertising: "Silly rabbit. Trix are for kids." General Mills had reduced prices on more than 90 percent of its brands four times since 1993, including a cut that averaged 11 percent in 1994, but the company adjusted for inflation by raising prices an average of 2.6 percent in July 1997.

In third place was Post (a division of Kraft Foods, which was owned by Philip Morris Companies, Inc.), the manufacturer of brands such as Shredded Wheat and Grape Nuts. Although the company had spent large amounts of money to promote its products, its market share had fallen from 16.8 percent in 1995 to 15.6 percent in 1996. The president of Kraft said that if Post had done nothing to halt the slide, its share would have dropped to 13 percent. In 1996 Post and its sister company Nabisco rocked the industry by cutting prices about 20 percent, an average of $1 a box. Post's market share promptly increased by 4 percent while Kellogg's share dropped. Post had conducted a survey and found that 59 percent of consumers were angry about the steadily rising price of cold cereal. Some of the major brands cost as much as $4 or $5 a box, while the price of similar generic brands was about $1 less. Much of the additional money was being used to finance a marketing war among the nation's top cereal companies. For a package of cereal priced at about $3.50, $1 was spent on advertising and promotions, 40 cents on ingredients, 31 cents on packaging, the manufacturer made a profit of 45 cents, the grocery store made 68 cents, and the remainder went for operating expenses. In 1995 Congress had considered an investigation to determine whether cereal makers were guilty of overpricing their products. Also in that year the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics had reported that between 1983 and 1995 retail cereal prices had climbed 93 percent, an increase that was much greater than the increase in the cost of manufacturing cereal. After Post reduced its prices, other major manufacturers were pressured to follow suit and consequently experienced lower profits. Post also cut promotional costs by issuing a single coupon that could be used to purchase any of its brands, instead of running one coupon for each brand.

The fourth-place cereal maker, Quaker Oats, responded to the pricing problem by offering nine of its brands in bags instead of boxes, which reduced the cost by 35 to 40 percent. At $2 a bag, the cereals experienced 73 percent growth during 1997. Quaker's sales of bagged cereal for the year were $160 million, but its profit margin on those cereals was 3 percent, compared to 20 percent for branded cereals in boxes. Although its profit from bagged cereals was only $5 million, Quaker gained 2 percent of cereal market share in 1997. The company also appealed to consumers by manufacturing cereals, such as Frosted Flakers, that were similar to competitors' brands but less expensive. Quaker's top selling brands included Quaker Oats, Cap'n Crunch, and Life Cereal. During 1997 the company revived an ad campaign that had aired more than 20 years earlier. The original ads had featured "Mikey," a picky eater who amazed his brothers by enthusiastically eating Life Cereal. The brothers had exclaimed, "He likes it! Hey, Mikey!" In the new promotion more than 35,000 children entered the "Be the Next 'Mikey' Contest," which ran from January through June 1997. The winner, four-year-old Marli Brianna Hughes, was judged the most photogenic embodiment of the Mikey personality: energetic, independent, and confident. Sales of Quaker's boxed cereals increased 11 percent in 1997, but the company's total sales decreased by 4 percent to $5.02 billion, primarily because Quaker sold its Snapple beverage business in May.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Because most cereals were made from similar basic ingredients—mostly grains and sugars—manufacturers relied to a large extent on advertising, colorful artwork on the boxes, games on the back, sometimes a prize inside, and endorsements from celebrities to persuade consumers to choose their brands. Some companies called attention to the health benefits of eating certain types of cereal. Commercials aimed at children tended to emphasize the taste of the product and to portray cereal as food that was fun to eat. The "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign had been developed in 1988 by the Leo Burnett ad agency as a new creative idea to generate interest and excitement for the Corn Pops brand. It had been airing for nearly 10 years, and new spots had been added as the campaign progressed. Of the four commercials that ran in 1997—"Roofdeck," "Tickets," "Guests," and "Grandma" —two were new, and two had run in 1996. The ads aired on television in the United States and Canada but did not appear in print media.

In the spot called "Guests," a teenage boy was babysitting his younger sister and her friends, who were in the living room eating the last box of Corn Pops. The boy schemed to get some of the Corn Pops and finally went outside and rang the doorbell. Then he opened the door and shouted, "Look! It's Barney!" Thinking that they were about to meet one of their favorite animated characters—a purple dinosaur named Barney—the girls screamed in delight and rushed outside, and the boy hurried to snatch up the box of Corn Pops.

OUTCOME

Kellogg felt that the "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign had succeeded in helping to build the Corn Pops brand, and the campaign was continued into 1998. The company reported that sales of Kellogg's Corn Pops had increased since the campaign began, and the brand had gained market share. Overall, however, Kellogg brands of cold cereal continued to lose market share in the United States, dropping from 33.8 percent in 1996 to 33.2 percent in 1997, according to Fortune magazine. Net sales for all Kellogg products were $6.83 billion in 1997, an increase of 2 percent since 1996. In 1997 Kellogg sold 3.9 percent more cereal in the United States than it had in 1996, when it had weathered the price cuts by Post. But Kellogg was still the number one cereal maker in the nation and in the world. At the end of 1997 the company was promoting its cereals as healthy food with a new television and print campaign called "Cereal. Eat It for Life."

FURTHER READING

Baumohl, Bernard; Jane Van Tassel; William A. McWhirter; and Adam Zagorin. "Cereal Showdown." Time, April 29, 1996.

Carvell, Tim. "Grape-Nuts Monday. Cereal Wars: A Tale of Bran, Oats, and Air." Fortune, May 13, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie. "Frost Flakes Ads Receive Soggy Reviews." USA Today Ad Track, September 9, 1996.

"FDA Finalizes First Food-Specific Health Claim for Oatmeal." PR Newswire, January 21, 1997.

Grant, Linda. "Where Did the Snap, Crackle & Pop Go?" Fortune, August 4, 1997, p. 223.

"Life Cereal Searches for the Next 'Mikey'." PR Newswire, January 7, 1997.

Norton, Rob, and Kerry Hubert. "Are There Too Many Breakfast Cereals?." Fortune, March 3, 1997.

"Quaker Oatmeal Celebrates 120 Years on America's Breakfast Table." PR Newswire, September 17, 1997.

Schay, Alex. "Two Scoops of Competition." Motley Fool, July 31, 1998.

"Schumer, Gejdenson Remarks Don't 'Bag' Everything; Quaker Bagged Cereals Offer Taste, Quality at 40 Percent Less than Boxed Every Day." PR Newswire, July 24, 1997.

Van Tassel, Jane. "Cereal Siege: Kellogg's Answers Post's Cuts, But It's Not a Price War." Time, June 24, 1996.

Susan Risland

SPECIAL K KICK-START DIET PLAN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Kellogg Company had been a dominant force in the ready-to-eat cereal market for a little more than a century, but in 2001 the company's cereal division failed to register a significant profit increase for the company. In order to grow sales quickly for one of its flagship brands, Special K, Kellogg reintroduced a diet plan in 2002 that it had floated successfully a few years before. The Special K Kick-Start Diet instructed participants to replace breakfast and lunch with a bowl of Special K and skim milk, promising a loss of up to six pounds in two weeks. The "Kick-Start" campaign, sometimes called the "Un Testimonials" campaign, offered body-conscious consumers an alternative to complex and unsatisfying weight-loss options.

Ad agency Leo Burnett USA enlisted the help of its media agency, Starcom, to replant the Special K flag. With a budget of approximately $9 million for TV, print, outdoor, and online advertising, the Special K Kick-Start Diet first reached the public at holiday time in late 2002 and early 2003. This period was determined to be the perfect opportunity to reach adults resigned to address their weight concerns in the new year. A set of television commercials dubbed "Un Testimonials" showed everyday men and women discussing all the weight-loss tactics that had failed them in the past, such as "the downsize diet," in which one ate a personal pizza instead of a whole one, or the unappealing "corn juice" diet. Contrasted with these fad diets, the Special K plan was presented as a sensibly delicious weight-loss solution. Starcom was responsible for hundreds of wallboards (indoor billboards) that were placed in locations where women in particular would be thinking about their appearance or health. For instance, in a hair salon the ad would read, "The right hair cut can make you look slimmer. This actually helps make you slimmer."

The ads resonated with consumers. Special K was rewarded with a 22 percent increase in sales by the end of 2002, an important step in resurrecting brand interest. There was also significant improvement for Kellogg's cereal division, which recorded a 7 percent rise in retail sales in 2003. In 2004 Leo Burnett USA won a coveted Gold EFFIE (Packaged Food category), an industry award measuring effectiveness in advertising, for the campaign. The two-week diet was also successfully used to promote Kellogg's new cereal Smart Start.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cereal products got their start in 1894, when W.K. Kellogg stumbled upon the recipe that inspired Corn Flakes in the kitchen of the Battle Creek Sanitarium in Battle Creek, Michigan, where he was employed by his brother, Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, as an accountant, business manager, and jack-of-all trades. An early proponent of "health food," Kellogg later marketed his product, and the Kellogg Company as well as the entire cereal industry was born. In the century that followed, the Kellogg Company, headquartered where it began, in Battle Creek, grew to become a world leader in the production of convenience foods, manufacturing in 17 countries and marketing its brands in 180 countries. The company reported sales nearing $10 billion at the end of 2004.

Throughout the twentieth century Kellogg often touted the nutritional value of its cereals. Special K was introduced in 1955 as a high-protein, quick breakfast alternative. Advertising for many brands was also closely tied to iconic characters, such as Tony the Tiger for Frosted Flakes; Snap! Crackle! and Pop! for Rice

© RAMIN TALAIE/CORBIS.

Krispies; and the Corn Flake's rooster. Special K's brand images were more body-conscious in nature. One of the brand's most enduring TV images was a lingering shot of the body of a model-thin woman in a white one-piece bathing suit who bent to a position that then allowed her to morph into the Special K logo, a letter K. The vast Kellogg empire used more than one advertising agency to get the message across for all its various brands, chiefly employing Leo Burnett and J. Walter Thompson.

In the late 1990s Kellogg found new ways to emphasize the health aspects of its brands, including Special K. Jon Cashen, vice president and creative director of Leo Burnett, stated in a 1997 New York Times article that the agency's mission was to "weave a tapestry of the goodness of cereal and the goodness of life." It zeroed in on specific health concerns for women. One print ad showed a mother playing with her child; the caption read, "A bowl of cereal may help reduce the risks of osteoporosis," emphasizing that five Kellogg cereals, including Special K, provided recommended daily amounts of calcium. Later in 1999 Kellogg took an even bolder step by positioning its cereal as diet food for the first time. The Special K Two-Week Challenge Diet was developed by Kellogg and backed by Purdue University professor of foods and nutrition Richard Mattes. The plan, which was described on the backs of cereal boxes as well as in print ads and television spots, was simply to replace breakfast and lunch with a bowl of Special K and skim milk in order to lose up to 6 pounds in two weeks. One early TV commercial for the diet proved to be a misstep. It featured a doll named Diet Debbie who followed crash diets and exercised after each meal. This was followed by an image of Special K cereal and the tagline "Let's just eat sensibly all year." Despite the exhortation to eat sensibly, many consumers believed that the use of a Barbie-like doll could be misconstrued as endorsement of dieting to young girls. The company next successfully revisited a "Reshape Your Attitude" campaign directed at women and stressing positive body image, self-worth, and sensible eating. One extremely successful TV spot during this time showed men of all sizes in a bar worrying about their weight. The ending showed an average-looking guy in his late 40s saying, "I have my mother's thighs. I just have to accept that." The tagline that followed stated, "Men don't obsess over these things. Why do we?"

TARGET MARKET

The "Special K Kick-Start Diet" campaign began in late 2002. Kellogg needed to give adults a compelling reason to choose Special K and then keep them coming back for more. Mike Greene, vice president of customer marketing at Kellogg, described the company mindset in a November 2002 article in Progressive Grocer. "From 2001 to 2002 there has been an increase from 21 percent to 35 percent of adults that are dieting," said Greene. He explained that consumers looked for a diet that easily fit into their lifestyles. "We heard back from consumers that

COURT TV INVENTS A CEREAL SLEUTH TO FIND AD DOLLARS

In January 2004 the cable television channel Court TV introduced a new advertising vehicle in the form of short vignettes that were aired between prime-time investigative programs. In the segments Linda Lo-Cal, a female detective character created by the network's ad sales team specifically to win Kellogg's ad dollars, was featured taking on her first assignment: the case of unwanted extra holiday pounds. To solve the mystery, advertiser Kellogg stepped in with the Special K two-week diet challenge. Kellogg was so convinced Linda Lo-Cal could do the job that it committed to a seven-figure deal, marking its first ad buy on the network.

using cereal for weight loss had the highest level of satisfaction out of any other form of dieting. It's easy, simple to do, and it tastes good." Women, making up the majority of weight-conscious adults, were particularly on the minds of the marketers at Kellogg.

Starcom's part of the ad push consisted of positioning wallboards and brochures; the agency was even more specific about its target market, describing it as consisting of women who were "concerned with looking and feeling good." Starcom even took into consideration the intended female consumer's state of mind at certain locations, such as the doctor's office or dressing rooms. "We know a lot about our target and its habits around resolution time," said Amy Hume, associate media director of Starcom in a June 2003 issue of Mediaweek. She continued, "People get energized around the holidays—they get a new hairstyle to start the year fresh, they schedule a physical, new health club memberships peak. And it's a huge time for wedding dresses—you order in January for a June wedding." The media team honed in on the places where women tended to think about their weight, thus ensuring that their target consumer viewed the Special K ads when they were probably most receptive to the weight-loss message.

COMPETITION

In the 1990s consumers increasingly left cereal behind for other breakfast alternatives, such as bagels and breakfast bars. In 1997 Kellogg's Jon Wilson, executive vice president for consumer and customer engagement, acknowledged this to the New York Times, saying, "We are cognizant that we have more competition for breakfast than we ever had before." That year all cereal makers, including Kraft Food's Post Cereals brands, had raised prices and then had to cut them again when consumers balked at buying boxes costing $5.00 each. Kellogg had traded the market-share lead back and forth with General Mills for decades and was still locked in a tight battle in 2002. General Mills' Big G cereal division was floundering (its sales had dipped 3.1 percent in 2001, to $2.17 billion), and Kellogg's sales were flat that year at $2.2 billion.

Kellogg's cereals' second-biggest competitor at the time was Post Cereals, which was also founded in Battle Creek, Michigan. After Charles William Post spent a restorative stay at the same sanitarium where W.K. Kellogg had worked, he developed the flagship cereal Grape-Nuts in 1897. At the start of the twenty-first century Special K's direct competition was General Mills' Total. Both cereals made similar claims of offering high protein, low fat and great taste. General Mills was not timid when it came to ad spending. In January and February of 2002 it spent $39 million, compared to Kellogg's $32 million in ad spending for that same period, according to TNS/CMR, a provider of advertising and marketing information.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To reinvigorate interest in and consumer devotion to Special K, the Kellogg Company enlisted the help of mega-agency Leo Burnett USA as well as its media buying partner, Starcom. It was decided that the end of 2002 and the beginning of 2003, a span of months referred to by Amy Hume of Starcom as "resolution time," would be ideal to launch a new incarnation of their two-week diet challenge, the Special K Kick-Start Diet. It was aimed at adults susceptible to fad dieting who felt that most weight-loss options were difficult stick with. A set of television spots called "Un Testimonials" aired showing several examples of the perennial "man or woman on the street" recalling various outrageous diets that they had tried—and failed—to follow. The doomed diets included the "one-meal-a-day," "olive oil," and "all-garlic" diets. Later that year another round of similar spots highlighted the presummer months, when the target audience increased once again as people took stock of their physiques in anticipation of bathing suit season.

Andy Jung, senior director of advertising and media services for Kellogg, stated to Mediaweek that the company spent $8 million to $12 million per year in support of the Special K diet challenge. A standout component of the Kick-Start Diet campaign was designed by media agency, Starcom, and executed for under $1 million. Hundreds of wallboards with brochures, which described the diet and included a progress-tracking grid, were placed in more than a dozen markets. Locations were chosen carefully. In addition to health clubs, the boards went up in dressing rooms, bridal shops, and beauty salons. Ad copy was tailored to the location. In doctor's offices the ads read, ''The doctor will see (less of) you now!'' and in a bridal salon they stated, ''Your bridesmaids' dresses don't have to look bad for you to look good.'' Jung told Mediaweek that the strategy broke new ground, stating, ''It took brand advertising more into immediacy marketing.''

The most creative tactic may have been the diet itself. The Kick-Start Diet ensured that each individual following the plan would need to purchase three boxes of cereal over a two-week period. If the consumer did experience weight loss, presumably he or she would go on after the two weeks to include Special K in his or her eating routine, either as a continuation of the diet or because he or she had had a positive experience with the cereal. Kellogg also introduced a website to support its newly created community; at the site Kick-Start dieters could network, keep a progress journal, or find nutrition and exercise information.

OUTCOME

Consumer reaction to the Special K Kick-Start Diet plan translated into positive numbers for the company, which only the year before had seen no sales growth and previous to that had been trailing General Mills. In the markets where Kellogg had concentrated the campaign, Special K in 2002 gained 22 percent in dollar volume over the year before. Smart Start, a newly introduced Kellogg brand, which was also promoting its own two-week challenge, experienced a significant increase as well. By 2003 retail cereal sales as a whole had increased by 7 percent for Kellogg, contributing to the nearly $9 billion the company ultimately took in that year. The ''Un Testimonials'' spots and Kick-Start campaign were also recognized with a Gold EFFIE Award in 2004 for Leo Burnett and Starcom. These prestigious industry awards were given annually by the New York American Media Association to honor effective ad campaigns. Kellogg's success with weight-conscious Americans did not go unnoticed by the competition. In late 2005 Post Cereals began a weight-loss campaign of its own that was remarkably similar to the Special K plan: replace two meals a day with Post ''Healthy Classics'' cereals and lose 10 pounds.

FURTHER READING

''Breakfast Smarts.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, April 1, 2003, p. 25.

Carmichael, Mary. ''Third Helping for Kick-Start.'' Grocer, May 31, 2003 p. 46.

Emerson, Bo. ''Crunch Time: For Many, Cereal Is the 24/7 Food of Choice.'' Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2002, p. 1C.

Hellmich, Nanci. ''Riding the Subway to Fitness.'' USA Today, February 5, 2002, p. 1D.

Kane, Courtney. ''Kellogg Promotes Its Family of Cereals, Even the Sugary Ones, as Components of a Healthy Diet.'' New York Times, September 3, 1997, p. D7.

Lafayette, Jon. ''Court TV to Feature Ad Vignettes.'' Television Week, November 17, 2003, p. 3.

''PMA Reggie Awards: Bronze Winners.'' Brandweek, March 22, 2004, p. R13.

Schmuckler, Eric. ''Starcom.'' Mediaweek, June 23, 2003, p. SR10

Sege, Irene. ''Kellogg's Eats Its Ad.'' Boston Globe, January 20, 1999, p. C1.

Thompson, Stephanie. ''Kellogg's Kick-Start.'' Advertising Age, January 2, 2002, p. 2.

———. ''Kellogg's Retakes Lead.'' Advertising Age, May 13, 2002, p. 2.

Turcsik, Richard. ''The Battle Plan from Battle Creek.'' Progressive Grocer, November 15, 2002, p. 48.

Simone Samano

KFC Corp.

1441 Gardiner Lane
Louisville, Kentucky 40213
USA
Telephone: (502) 874-1000
Fax: (502) 874-8291
Web site: www.kfc.com

■■■

CHICKEN CAPITAL USA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite 50 years of selling ''finger lickin' good'' fried chicken, Kentucky Fried Chicken in the early 1990s Corp. decided to change with the times. Besides changing its menu offerings to include healthier choices, such as roasted chicken and salads, the company further distanced the brand from its greasy past by dropping its full name and adopting the moniker ''KFC.'' An editorial in Advertising Age stated, ''It made sense then to diversify the menu . . . But the chain's jettisoning of a venerable name—and distancing from the word fried—was ill-conceived and damaging. It made a clear brand fuzzy.'' Even worse for the company, the strategy failed. KFC's business went into a downward spiral. After trying several tactics to win back customers—including a series of advertising efforts promoting its fried chicken as health food, which landed the chain in trouble with the Federal Trade Commission—in 2003 KFC returned to its Southern-fried roots and launched a new marketing campaign called ''Chicken Capital USA.''

The campaign, created by KFC's agency Foote Cone & Belding, kicked off with a television spot that promoted a ''Fried with Pride'' tagline and featured country-music star Trace Adkins singing while average people declared their love for chicken. The company also dropped its initials and returned to using its full name. Additional marketing had the chain joining forces with NASCAR heavyweight Dale Earnhardt, Jr., to sponsor the Chance 2 Motorsports racing team.

Writing for the Nation's Restaurant News, Gregg Cebrzynski said of the campaign, ''[It] adheres to the fundamental approach of staying true to the brand and the product, giving consumers a reason to try the product and entertaining viewers along the way . . . This campaign is just what KFC needed: presenting fried chicken as fun to eat—the fat calories be damned.'' In addition, the Ad Age/IAG Quarterly Ad Performance Report (based on research conducted by the firm Intermedia Advertising Group) listed one of the ''Chicken Capital USA'' campaign's spots as ''the most-recalled new TV ad of the second quarter of 2004.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1992 Kentucky Fried Chicken abandoned its full name if favor of its initials, shifted its product focus from what it did best—fried chicken—to roasted chicken, and dropped the well-known tagline that helped build the brand, ''Finger Lickin' Good,'' for less memorable slogans such as ''America Loves What the Colonel Cooks'' and ''Kitchen Fresh Chicken.'' The changes brought trouble to the 50-year-old company that had come to represent old-fashioned comfort food to many consumers.

An editorial in Advertising Age stated that, while it made sense to add healthier options to its menu offerings, "particularly for a chain that sells lots of family meals and needs to offer something for family members who don't want traditional fried chicken," it did not make sense for the company to drop its name. "It implied there was something unmentionable about KFC's former middle name." The editorial said that in making the changes "KFC violated basic rules that ailing marketers often forget when a business and market is in flux. Marketers need to be what they are, be authentic, be real. If you sell a product, make it the best you can, be proud of it, and don't waffle."

It took 14 years, but Kentucky Fried Chicken finally recognized that its success was in its roots. A company spokeswoman told Advertising Age, "People have asked why we changed the name back in the '90s and that was because we offered more non-fried products. Consumers tell us they love Kentucky Fried Chicken and many of our customers never stopped calling us Kentucky Fried Chicken." The chain reverted back to its full name and offered its fried food with pride but kept its healthier products on the menu as well. It launched the "Chicken Capital USA" campaign to let people know that it was moving back to its Southern roots.

BLENDING CONTEMPORARY COOL WITH OLD-FASHIONED HERITAGE

In 2005 Kentucky Fried Chicken opened a store in Louisville, Kentucky, featuring a new logo and an updated, more youthful, and slimmer image of the original Colonel Sanders caricature that had been used to promote the product since its beginnings. The restaurant's interior featured low tables, ottomans, and a digital jukebox. Added to the contemporary decor was a new menu that harkened back to the chain's Southern roots and featured its core menu item—fried chicken—along with other Southern-style comfort foods, such as popcorn shrimp, collard greens, and sweet-potato pie.

In an interview with the Nation's Restaurant News, Tre Musco, chief creative officer of KFC's brand-imaging agency, said that the chain's "current image is a little dated and doesn't have a feel and contemporary image that relates to younger consumers who are looking for a healthier lifestyle. So what we want to do is bring a lot of respect to the heritage of the brand in a more contemporary way. The 'old-school cool' approach takes KFC's brand heritage and reinterprets it in a fresh, hip way."

The Nation's Restaurant News reported that the new Louisville restaurant followed the remodeling of a store in Washington, D.C. Company spokeswoman Bonnie Warschauer told the publication that sales rose 20 percent at the Washington restaurant following its remodeling and reopening. She explained that KFC planned to update 50 test stores in the chain's other locations.

TARGET MARKET

Kentucky Fried Chicken's main target had always been busy families hungry for affordable, quick, and complete meals. Fried chicken was the chain's mainstay and the reason its customers flocked to the restaurant. KFC spent years promoting its various fried foods and "finger lickin' good" crispy chicken. But customers' tastes had changed, and to appeal to those who had become worried about the health detriments associated with eating fried food, KFC introduced rotisserie chicken. The effort was a dismal failure when the roasters did not work properly, and diet- and health-conscious consumers continued to avoid the restaurant. Then in 2004 the chain's "Chicken Capital USA" campaign was introduced along with new menu items such as baked chicken. The old favorite, fried chicken, was still on the menu. The campaign was meant to broaden KFC's reach to include 20-something women and men, middle-class adult Americans, and even diet-conscious consumers. Company president and chief concept officer Gregg Dedrick told Cebrzynski of the Nation's Restaurant News that the new product offerings were a way to "offer lunch and dinner options for everyone in the family."

COMPETITION

While Kentucky Fried Chicken struggled to return to its fried roots and recapture customers, the number two fried chicken chain, Chick-fil-A, Inc., with more than 1,100 outlets nationwide and $1.5 billion in sales in 2003, embraced its heritage and attracted customers to its stores with a marketing strategy that included carnival-like parties and the offer of free food at new stores. To promote the opening of a new Chick-fil-A restaurant in Texas in 2004, the company celebrated with music and prizes, and the first 100 adults in the door received coupons good for a year's worth of free combo meals. A report in the Dallas Morning News stated that fans of the chain's fried chicken had gathered outside the store up to 24 hours in advance of its opening, "with the devotion of followers seeking front-row concert tickets." According to the report, "It's at least the 45th such event nationwide since the program was launched." Jerry Collins, a Dallas-based marketing and advertising consultant, estimated that the cost of the Texas event, including the 100 free meals, was about $50,000. He told the Dallas Morning News that, while the expense was high for a single restaurant, "For brand image and brand identity, that's cheap."

Chick-fil-A also promoted its brand through a campaign themed "Eat Mor Chikin" that featured cows encouraging consumers to avoid eating beef. The long-running campaign—the title of which was misspelled because cows had purportedly written it—starred the bovines on merchandise such as calendars, stuffed toys, and clothing as well as in radio and television spots and on billboards. Following the introduction of the campaign Chick-fil-A's brand awareness increased 44 percent in the chain's top 27 markets, and system-wide sales tripled. Like KFC, the chain also used a race-car driver in its marketing, partnering with stock-car legend Kyle Petty to sponsor the "Kyle Petty Charity Ride across America."

Number three in the fried-chicken market, Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits (held by AFC Enterprises, Inc.), followed the path of Kentucky Fried Chicken and moved away from its fried history and into the health-food arena by offering what the Gazette of Colorado Springs described as "chicken in slimmed-down versions." Popeyes also ignored the labels other chains used to avoid the fried stigma, such as "tender strips" or "crispy nuggets," opting instead for humor and honesty, calling its lighter offering "Naked Chicken." Along with the unbreaded chicken, Popeyes offered dieting customers seasoned green beans instead of fries.

Unlike its competitors, Popeyes did not use race-car drivers to promote its product offerings. Its marketing, themed "Stand Up for Flavor," used humor, featuring comedian Bruce Bruce in a series of spots designed to maintain the chain's sales momentum. And although Bruce was "a heavy guy," whose appearance may have reminded consumers that fried chicken and mashed potatoes were not diet food, the company's chief marketing officer, Rob Calderin, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that the comedian's main job "would be to appeal to the chain's core audience, especially African-Americans, who have been loyal customers. He was the right person at the right time for our brand. The notion of humor and the irreverence of Bruce Bruce is what our food is all about."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Speaking of Kentucky Fried Chicken's campaign to revert to its roots, revive its brand, and win back customers, David Aaker, a professor of marketing at the University of California, Berkeley, said in an interview with Advertising Age, "Every time a brand gets into trouble, one way to get out of it is to go back to your heritage and figure out what you used to be." Another marketing professor, John Swan of St. John's University in New York, added, "KFC has an authenticity that's less about fried chicken than it is about family gatherings after church or for a hearty lunch. . . . They finally understood the essence of the brand." To help with KFC's rebranding, or the re-embracing of its heritage, Foote, Cone & Belding created the "Chicken Country USA" campaign.

"Chicken Country USA" featured a variety of spots with country-music star Trace Adkins singing catchy jingles while average Americans—from truckers and football players to kids and sexy young women—enjoyed a chicken meal. One spot had a child eating chicken while dressed in a T-shirt that proclaimed "I'm in the Colonel's Army." Another spot, aimed at women, featured a "diva" going through a KFC drive-through to pick up some roasted chicken. Building further on the success of the "Chicken Capital USA" campaign, the chain partnered with race-car driver Dale Earnhardt, Jr., to sponsor six races in the NASCAR Busch Series in 2004. As part of the promotion the company issued limited-edition KFC commemorative buckets signed by Earnhardt with his quote, "My Favorite Chicken," beneath his picture.

According to a report in the Nation's Restaurant News, the new campaign clearly presented both the brand and the product message. Additionally, it successfully used contemporary images to present an aging brand that was a distinct switch from the dull campaigns the chain had used in the past. David Novak, chairman and chief executive officer of KFC's parent company, Yum Brands, took a cautionary approach to KFC's "everything old is new again" strategy, however. He said to Nation's Restaurant News, "A brand's heritage can either take you forward or it can hold you back. What we don't want to do is live in the past at KFC."

OUTCOME

Kentucky Fried Chicken's marketing strategy paid off, as indicated by the fact that TV spots for "Chicken Capital USA" occupied 4 of the top 10 spots on Advertising Age magazine's list of most-recalled commercials. In addition, the magazine named one KFC commercial as the most-recalled new television spot of the second quarter in 2004. An editorial in Advertising Age stated, "Kentucky Fried Chicken takes a risk in putting attention back on 'fried' even as critics blame fatty fast food for Americans' obesity. That's a risk worth taking. Kentucky Fried Chicken is an iconic brand that can thrive if it makes a product as good as its name."

Improvements in the company's sales also were attributed to the campaign's success. Five months after "Chicken Capital USA" kicked off, Yum Brands, KFC's parent company, reported that the chain had "posted a 2 percent increase in U.S. same-store sales for the quarter, ending a prolonged slump," and linked this success with the "Chicken Capital USA" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "KFC, Facing Slump, Serves Up 'Roasted' Items." Nation's Restaurant News, May 24, 2004.

———. "Latest TV Spots for KFC Send Strong Message about the Brand." Nation's Restaurant News, July 5, 2004.

"Editorial: No Shame in KFC's Real Name." Advertising Age, May 2, 2005.

Frumkin, Paul. "Beak to the Future: Chicken Chains Take Flight." Nation's Restaurant News, June 27, 2005.

Horovitz, Bruce. "KFC to Boast about Roasted Chicken." USA Today, April 27, 2004.

"KFC Most-Recalled Ad of Quarter." Advertising Age, August 2, 2004.

"Late News; Red Cell's Daley Said to Be in Talks about Role at FCB." Advertising Age, May 3, 2004.

Lewis, Herschell Gordon. "Fried Chicken from the Chicken Hearted." Direct, July 1, 2004.

MacArthur, Kate, "KFC Spells It Out: Chain Takes Pride in Being Fried." Advertising Age, April 25, 2005.

Powell, Jennifer Heldt. "Kentucky Fried Roots Return." Boston Herald, April 21, 2005.

Schreiner, Bruce. "Yum Brands Reports 13 Percent Earnings." AP Online, October 5, 2004. Available from <http://www.highbeam.com/library>

Spielberg, Susan. "KFC Eyes Return to 'Kentucky Fried' Roots." Nation's Restaurant News, May 2, 2005.

Rayna Bailey

Kimberly-Clark Corporation

351 Phelps Drive
Irving, Texas 75038
USA
Telephone: (972) 281-1200
Fax: (972) 281-1490
Web site: www.kimberly-clark.com

■■■

KLEENEX ANTI-VIRAL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Kimberly-Clark Corporation, in business since the 1870s, had long been servicing the sick with its medical supply brands and consumer paper brands. By the first years of the twenty-first century health and infectious illness had become a hot global topic. In 2004 a flu vaccine shortage was predicted for the United States. It was at this time that one of the Irving, Texas, company's top brands, Kleenex, was serendipitously poised to introduce a new entrant into the facial-tissue market. Kleenex Anti-Viral tissues hit store shelves in August 2004 in anticipation of the upcoming cold and flu season. The supporting campaign, released in October, was focused on getting the word out to consumers that the product could help stop the spread of seasonal illnesses.

To introduce Kleenex Anti-Viral to American families, the $30 million campaign used television, cinema, print, radio, and online advertisements as well as education programs, coupon inserts, and public relations. Ad agency J. Walter Thompson New York, part of communications conglomerate WPP Group, was responsible for the campaign. The most widely visible element, a humorous TV and cinema commercial called "Guru," came nearly a year after the product's introduction. In it a robed, spiritual-looking man walked through a scenic landscape. Gentle music played as he was shown saving small creatures from certain death. Back at home he sneezed and grabbed the Kleenex Anti-Viral tissue in front of him, only to be mortified when he saw that the tissue box stated that the product "kills 99.9 percent of cold and flu viruses."

Demand for the product exceeded Kimberly-Clark's expectations. In its first months as a retail offering, Kleenex Anti-Viral captured 4 percent of the $1.5 billon tissue market. Research showed that a third of the consumers who bought the product were new to the facial-tissue category. Major media outlets covered the product as a news story prior to its introduction. By the end of 2005 the product's market share was up another point to 5 percent.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Kimberly-Clark Corporation was founded in 1872 as a paper mill in Neenah, Wisconsin, but it soon branched out into product innovation. The company boasted a stable of brands, which by the year 2000 included national household names such as Scott, Huggies, and Kleenex. In the early years one of the company's most important innovations was a creped cellulose wadding called Cellucotton. A substitute for cotton bandages, it was used to treat wounded soldiers in World War I and soon afterward led to the development of Kotex feminine pads and Kleenex facial tissue. Kleenex, originally introduced in 1924 as a disposable towel for removing cold cream, became a cornerstone of the Kimberly-Clark paper and personal-product empire. Consumers quickly found another use for Kleenex, and in 1930 marketing was changed to show the products as disposable handkerchiefs. Sales skyrocketed. In 1932 print ads showed a homemaker uncomfortably holding by her fingertips a used cloth handkerchief that she was about to launder. The copy read, ''World's Worst Job Ended.''

© SGO/IMAGE POINT FR/CORBIS.

The Kleenex name became synonymous with facial tissue, and the company dominated the new market that it had created. Through the years advertising included cartoon ads, the first of which appeared in 1941, when a contest called ''True Confessions'' was introduced. It challenged the public to come up with a new, creative use for Kleenex tissue; the winners' entries would appear in the comics section of their local papers. In the 1950s the popular cartoon character Little Lulu appeared in the product's first television commercials, giving her ''timely tips'' for tissue use and singing the jingle ''Soft, Strong, Pops Up, Too.'' The strength of the tissue was the selling point in the 1960s, when Harry James, a well-known bandleader, was shown blowing on his horn with an intact Kleenex tissue secured around the bell. In the 1980s the product was promoted with an award-winning campaign called ''Kleenex Says Bless You.'' Kleenex ColdCare tissues, the company's first significant tissue innovation, was introduced in September 1996 with a campaign created by ad agency Foote Cone & Belding of Chicago. These ultrasoft tissues with aloe and a menthol scent combated competitor Puffs' introduction in the late 1980s of tissues containing aloe lotion.

The 1995 merger of Kimberly-Clark with Scott Paper, a top producer of paper towels and toilet paper, cemented the company's place as the world's leading maker of paper products and put it on the global Fortune 100 list. Unfortunately for agency Foote Cone & Belding, the marriage with Scott also precipitated a change in advertising strategy. The ad agency J. Walter Thompson, or JWT, had already done creative work for the Scott brand when it won the $100 million tissue account for Kleenex and sister brands Scottex and Andrex in North America and Europe in 1999. Kleenex moved on to a new slogan, ''Thank Goodness for Kleenex,'' and was working on making an emotional connection to consumers with a promotion called ''Kleenex Moments'' to be tied into the upcoming 2004 Olympics. Kimberly-Clark's medical-supply business was also increasing during this time. At the start of the new millennium, consciousness about germs was on the rise, and there was a corresponding increase in the number of hand-sanitizing products and antibacterial soaps. In response to this growing health-focused trend, in 2004 Kimberly-Clark was set to introduce the next big Kleenex extension product.

TARGET MARKET

Kleenex began as a cold-cream-removal product that was originally aimed exclusively at women. Once the product changed its focus, families became its primary target. Kleenex Anti-Viral was no exception. Because Kimberly-Clark's research revealed that families with children were more likely than those without kids to develop colds throughout a season, the new product was designed with family needs in mind. In the press release announcing the launch of Kleenex Anti-Viral, Robert P. van der Merwe, group president of Kimberly-Clark's North Atlantic Family Care division, said, ''Through research, we learned that it's increasingly important to consumers to protect their families against common cold and flu viruses.'' As the major purchasers of household and personal-care items, women, or more specifically mothers, were secondarily targeted by the Anti-Viral campaign. The company saw women as the primary caregivers, often the ones responsible for doctor visits and health maintenance. The Kleenex website thus provided ''Mom's Stay-Well Tips'' and ''Mom's Remedies'' as well as recipes, symptom lists, and scenes of caring family interaction.

COMPETITION

Global consumer-products giant Procter & Gamble bought Charmin Paper Company in 1958 and then renamed its tissues Puffs in 1960. Since then Puffs had been a determined second in the race for facial-tissue market share. Even though the word ''Kleenex'' had long been synonymous with tissue, the supersoft Puffs

UNMENTIONABLE PRODUCTS

Kimberly-Clark and Scott Paper, which eventually became one company in the 1990s, built their fortunes on products that everyone wanted and needed but that were not considered suitable for advertising. During World War I Kimberly-Clark discovered that army nurses were using the company's Cellucotton bandage products for feminine-hygiene purposes. As a result Kimberly-Clark developed Kotex feminine pads, but in the 1920s it faced opposition from many newspapers and magazines, which would not allow advertising for the product. Likewise, stores would not permit point-of-purchase advertising displays and even kept the product off shelves, stocking it behind the counter. Kimberly-Clark persisted and eventually broke those marketing barriers, creating another world-famous brand.

developed a strong and loyal following. By 1996 it had a nearly 33 percent share of the market, compared to Kleenex's formidable 48 percent. Still, Procter & Gamble beat Kleenex to punch in 1987 with its line extension Puffs Plus with Lotion. With this new line Procter & Gamble began to dip into traditional Kimberly-Clark territory: product innovation.

When Kleenex added another specialized tissue, Kleenex Anti-Viral, to its roster in 2004, Puffs did not have an answer in the form of a competing product. Its parent company, Procter & Gamble, did, however, start what it called an "education campaign," according to an article published in the December 6, 2004, issue of the Toledo Blade. The article stated that Procter & Gamble had hired a public relations firm to spread the word that Kleenex Anti-Viral would probably not prevent colds and flu.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By the closing decades of the twentieth century, line extensions of core brands had become an increasingly important tool for companies such as Kimberly-Clark, whose Kleenex-brand tissues had dominated the market for 80 years. Kimberly-Clark was encouraged in its development of Kleenex Anti-Viral partly because of the growing popularity of germ-fighting soaps and other personal products. In August 2004 the company launched its Anti-Viral tissues, the first product of its kind. That October a $30 million campaign began; timed to coincide with the start of cold and flu season, it consisted of print ads, cable and network television spots, cinema and radio advertising, special events, consumer sampling, coupons, and educational programs. The initial emphasis was on the product and the science behind it. Packaging was an important element. An image of an undulating yellow banner wrapped every new box of Kleenex Anti-Viral, announcing "Kills 99.9 percent of cold & flu viruses." The tissue itself was designed to look effective, with blue dots making a subtle pattern on each sheet. Graphics on the Kleenex website magnified the blue-dotted middle layer, explaining that it was a unique moisture-activated system designed to trap and kill viruses.

Promotion and education was important for the Kleenex brand. Prior to the release of the campaign in October, Kimberly-Clark was successful in publicizing the attributes of the new Kleenex product through means other than advertising. In July 2004 media outlets such as USA Today and CNN's American Morning ran stories about the upcoming product. The cable news show featured its medical correspondent, physician Sanjay Gupta, demonstrating the actual Kleenex Anti-Viral tissues and packaging. Gupta stated that the tissues' ability to kill viruses would probably help to slow the spread of illness to others.

Television spots did not follow until October 2005, when the next cold and flu season began. JWT New York created a clever TV spot that aired on U.S. television and in cinemas and in the United Kingdom as well. Creative director Ty Montague oversaw the agency's production of the spot, called "Guru." In it a robed monk walked through a serene landscape rescuing tiny creatures, including a goldfish and a spider, from dire circumstances. Mystical-sounding music played as he arrived at his spartan domicile. He looked as if he were about to sneeze and then reached for a tissue as a voice-over stated, "Kleenex Anti-Viral tissues trap and kill 99.9 percent of cold and flu viruses in the tissue . . . " The guru sneezed into it and expressed relief until he read the virus-killing claim on the box. The narrator continued, "That's right, kills." The guru looked stunned and then gazed up to the sky as the voice-over concluded, "Thank goodness for forgiveness. Thank goodness for Kleenex."

OUTCOME

When Kimberly-Clark bought Scott Paper for $9.4 billion in 1995, the company's market share in some products made great increases, but the merger put a strain on Kimberly-Clark as it tried to integrate the two operations. By 2004 it had gone through a reorganization and needed a winning new product. Hopes were high for Kleenex Anti-Viral, and early statistics indicated that the new product had contributed to improved overall sales for Kimberly-Clark. The company reported that its consumer-tissue revenues, which accounted for 36 percent of the company's total revenues, were a healthy $5.8 billion worldwide in 2005. In the August 6, 2005, issue of Grocer, Matt Muniz, Kleenex Anti-Viral brand manager, described a promising breakthrough: "In the U.S. we found that after six months 35 percent of Kleenex Anti-Viral tissues buyers were new to the facial tissue category." In its first months Kleenex Anti-Viral captured 4 percent of the $1.5 billon tissue market. As 2005 came to a close, the new product had increased its market share to 5 percent and had posted more than $50 million in sales, not counting those at the nation's largest retailer, Wal-Mart, or other discount outlets.

FURTHER READING

"Ad Notes. . . ." Wall Street Journal, February 24, 1999, p. 1.

Bach, Pete. "Tissue, Paper Towel Making a Growing Business in Valley." Appleton (WI) Post-Crescent, February 5, 2006.

"Branding the Sneeze." Retail Merchandiser, August 2005, p. 28.

Kirsche, Michelle L. "Consumables: Reporter's Notebook." Drug Store News, August 23, 2004, p. 47.

Lewis, Diane E. "Flu-Wary Massachusetts Firms Attack Germs." Boston Globe, November 8, 2004.

Lindeman, Teresa F. "Retailers Scramble to Fill Gap Left by Flu Shot Shortage." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, October 12, 2004, p. 1.

Mehegan, Sean. "Tissue of Buys." Brandweek, September 2, 1996, p. 1.

Neff, Jack. "Flu Fear Equals Marketer Bonanza." Advertising Age, October 25, 2004, p. 8.

Raju, Narisetti. "Plotting to Get Tissues into Living Rooms." Wall Street Journal, May 3, 1996, p. 6.

Rosenwald, Michael S. "Fear of Flu Sparks Home-Remedy Sales." Washington Post, December 22, 2004. p. E01.

Wasserman, Todd. "A Fertile Environment for New Germ Killer PS." Brandweek, January 30, 2006, p. 5.

———. "Forget Tissues, Kleenex Is Branding 'Moments': Olympic Tie-In Will Include Plugs from Athletes' Moms." Brandweek, December 19, 2005, p. 9.

Simone Samano

Kmart Corp.

3100 West Big Beaver Road
Troy, Michigan 48084
USA
Telephone: (248) 463-1000
Web site: www.kmartcorp.com

■■■

KMART JOE BOXER LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Joe Boxer built its reputation in the underwear field by being offbeat. It was the first to offer glow-in-the-dark boxers and was known to stage outrageous stunts, such as sending 100 pairs of underwear to President Bill Clinton in 1993 to mark his first 100 days in office. The accompanying note read, ''If you're going to change the country, you've got to change your underwear.'' But Joe Boxer was sold in department stores, where it had to fight for shelf space, and saw sales drop off as consumers began opting to shop at specialty stores. In 2001 the company was sold and the new owner soon struck an exclusive deal with Kmart. Although Kmart was the second largest retailer in the United States, it could not hope to compete on price with the top retailer, Wal-Mart, and had attempted to carve out a place in the market by creating celebrity brands, such as the Martha Stewart line of products. Joe Boxer was the first major department store brand to make the switch to Kmart, and its launch took on even greater importance for Kmart, which in the meantime had to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection and contend with the uncertainty of the future of Martha Stewart, who was involved in an insider stock trading scandal that ultimately led to her imprisonment. Thus the Joe Boxer launch not only sought to introduce Joe Boxer's expanded line of apparel and other lifestyle products but also hoped to infuse some energy into Kmart, sorely in need of a spark.

The Joe Boxer kickoff was part of a larger back-to-school effort in the summer of 2002. Developed by ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day, it consisted of the usual oddball promotional stunts, such as shooting people wearing Joe Boxer clothes out of a cannon, as well as a special pullout section in Kmart's weekly advertising circular, mailed to 10 million people. The core of the campaign, however, was the television spots, and one in particular, ''Vaughn,'' grabbed the spotlight. In it a muscular young African-American man happily danced his Boxer Boogie, wearing nothing more than a pair of white boxers and a toothy smile. The pure joy of his routine won over viewers, and the dancer, Vaughn Lowery, not only received his 15 minutes of fame, making television appearances and becoming the object of press interviews, but also provided Joe Boxer and Kmart with some much appreciated attention and momentum.

The Joe Boxer launch only lasted through August 2002 and the end of the back-to-school sales push, but it resulted in an immediate surge for Joe Boxer products. The emergence of Lowery as the Boxer Guy also set the stage for a pair of equally popular holiday ads and an elaborate dance-number TV spot that was part of the 2003 back-to-school campaign, which also marked the one-year anniversary of the Joe Boxer launch. The brand, in spite of its solid start, began to lose its place with Kmart, which emerged from bankruptcy and was swallowed up by Sears. The company subsequently began deemphasizing Joe Boxer, seen as little more than a men's underwear and women's intimates brand.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 2001 a struggling retailer, Kmart, and a struggling underwear maker, Joe Boxer, joined forces in an effort to reverse their fortunes. The latter, established in 1985 to make novelty ties, had made its mark with its irreverent, wacky approach to boxer shorts, including the Imperial Hoser, a red tartan boxer with a detachable raccoon tail; boxers with a $100 bill silk-screened on them; and the industry's first glow-in-the-dark underwear. The company branched into loungewear and sleepwear for men and women and enjoyed strong growth during the 1990s, supported by unusual, attention-grabbing marketing efforts, such as the first-ever in-flight underwear fashion show. The brand took steps toward becoming a lifestyle brand, introducing a licensed Timex watch, for example, but Joe Boxer focused on department stores—including Saks Inc., Marshall Field's, Dillard's, May Department Stores, and Federated Department Stores—where it never received the shelf space the company wanted. More importantly, target customers began turning to specialty stores, a move that had an adverse impact on Joe Boxer's sales. In 2001 Joe Boxer was acquired by apparel holding company Windsong Allegiance Group, LLC. A short time later the company signed a long-term, exclusive agreement with Kmart. It was a down-market move for a major department store brand, but it gave Joe Boxer an opportunity to launch new lines of home and apparel products, as well as a chance to reintroduce the brand in a major marketing campaign with the resources of America's second largest retailer behind it.

For years Kmart had done well creating a series of exclusive brands—including Disney, Sesame Street, Kathy Ireland, Jaclyn Smith, and Martha Stewart—to drive sales. With Stewart in legal trouble because of insider stock trading charges, Kmart was eager to lure its first major department store brand in Joe Boxer, which also appealed to a younger customer. The retailer planned to promote the Joe Boxer–exclusive with a back-to-school campaign, but before that could take place Kmart was forced to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Nevertheless the company pressed ahead with its plans for Joe Boxer, the launch of which took on even greater importance as Kmart more than ever needed something to change the topic away from finances and Martha Stewart and bring some energy to the business.

TARGET MARKET

The target customer for Kmart was a married woman, 35 to 45 years old, with children. The retailer's top brand, Martha Stewart, was also skewed toward older women. What made the addition of Joe Boxer so appealing to Kmart was that it targeted a younger demographic, the 14- to 34-year-old age range, and appealed to both women and men. As an exclusive Kmart brand, the Joe Boxer product lines were greatly expanded beyond underwear and sleepwear, practically infiltrating every department in the store. The brand was applied to all manner of apparel, from infant clothing to jackets and jeans, as well as shoes, jewelry, clocks, and picture frames. Given that the Joe Boxer launch was tied in with a back-to-school push, the target audience of the campaign was expanded to include the wider family market.

FOOTLOOSE AND IVY LEAGUE

Vaughn Lowery, the Boxer Guy who gained sudden popularity dancing in his boxer shorts in a 15-second ad for the Joe Boxer launch with Kmart, was born in Detroit in modest circumstances. Although his family lived in a federally subsidized housing community, he grew up with a strong desire to go to college. He graduated from Cornell University with a degree in labor relations. He also wanted to pursue acting, and with that in mind he moved to Los Angeles two years before landing his first Joe Boxer commercial.

COMPETITION

As a department store underwear and sleepwear brand, Joe Boxer competed against the likes of Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, and Donna Karan—all of which possessed greater clout in terms of brand recognition and financial resources. The move to Kmart put Joe Boxer in competition with down-market underwear brands, like Fruit of the Loom and Jockey International, and with other mass merchants, like Wal-Mart and Target. But the expansion into other product categories turned Joe Boxer into a lifestyle brand. Because of its iconoclastic, somewhat irreverent approach, Joe Boxer had carved out a unique niche and lacked any direct competitor, other than companies with competing lifestyle visions, such as Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, and other designers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In July 2002 the campaign to introduce the Joe Boxer brand to Kmart was kicked off in typical Joe Boxer fashion. Two men dressed in Joe Boxer clothes and underwear were shot from a cannon in the parking lot of a Detroit Kmart store. ''We definitely needed to get out there with the message of what you'd expect from Joe Boxer is still there, and now it's at Kmart,'' Kmart marketing executive Steven Feuling told Sherri Day of the New York Times. A few days later a round of four television commercials, developed by TBWA\Chiat\Day, were unveiled. Kmart also used its weekly advertising circular, sent to more than 10 million households, to promote the brand. An eight-page pullout featured Joe Boxer merchandise. Also in keeping with the brand's fun promotional events, Joe Boxer held a fashion show later in July on the escalator of the Astor Place Kmart store located in New York's Greenwich Village. Joe Boxer's founder, Nick Graham, riding on the back of a convertible, headed a parade that included the New York Police Department pipe and drum band. Graham then hosted the fashion show that featured teens modeling back-to-school apparel and presided over a mock wedding of Joe Boxer and a woman representing Kmart. ''Do you, Joe, take this woman as your wife, even though she has 1,800 stores and gets around a lot?'' he asked.

The centerpiece of the campaign, however, was the four 15-second TV spots, which focused on Joe Boxer's core underwear and clothing items. With the younger demographic in mind, the spots relied on an upbeat, bossa nova music track and featured young models wearing Joe Boxer underwear and clothing. In the spot titled ''Guy's Trend,'' for example, young men 14 to 24 years of age were targeted. In it one male model wore a hooded sweatshirt with Joe Boxer on the chest, and as he pulled it over his head he commented that he loved to wear his boxers on his head. Another model wearing a Joe Boxer jacket claimed to put on his boxers ''one arm at a time.'' A companion spot called ''Girl's Trend'' featured young women wearing skirts and studded blue jeans. One of the models commented that ''a girl can never have too many studs.''

Another of the first wave of spots, titled ''Vaughn,'' was created spontaneously and proved so popular that it changed the entire direction of the Joe Boxer launch at Kmart. In the commercial a smiling, muscular African-American model dressed only in white cotton boxers danced to the campaign's bossa nova music in what would become known as the Boxer Boogie, something of an homage to rope-skipping fighters. The text ''Why is this guy so happy?'' flashed across the screen. The spot quickly developed a fan following, as did the model, 28-year-old Vaughn Lowery.

Lowery, an aspiring actor who moved to Los Angeles and turned to modeling, attended an audition for the Joe Boxer spots. He twice read from the script, asked to deliver the line ''They're tight and they're white.'' The director had urged the actors to have fun and just be themselves, so on his third shot Lowery deviated from the script. ''They played the music and I went crazy, dancing like my little cousins and I do in the living room,'' he told Sarah Freeman of the Associated Press. ''Then I stripped down to my Joe Boxers and kept on dancing . . . At first it was like, 'Oh, my God, what did I just do?' But then all the Joe Boxer people, Kmart people, production people, they were all standing, whistling and clapping.'' TBWA creative director Patrick O'Neill called it an inspired performance, telling Freeman, ''He didn't just audition to get the job; he created a combination of things we didn't foresee. It was what we call a happy accident.'' In short order Lowery was brought into the studio and did 25 takes of his dance; a commercial was fashioned out of his moment of spontaneity.

The ''Vaughn'' spot caught the attention of The Tonight Show, which played it with the head of bandleader Kevin Eubanks (who looked a lot like Lowery) superimposed over the dancer's face. Lowery gained a fan club and began making television appearances, including The Tonight Show, and granted press interviews. The spot was so popular that Kmart set up a separate website to accommodate fans who wanted to download the clip.

OUTCOME

According to Lorene Yue, writing for the Detroit Free Press, Kmart, because of ''Vaughn,'' hadn't ''seen this much attention paid to its commercials since Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall strolled the aisles from 1997 to 1999.'' The spot was a key element in a brief campaign that created a very positive buzz about Kmart and Joe Boxer, ''helping Kmart sell roughly $20 million in Joe Boxer apparel a week after the line was introduced,'' wrote Yue. For Kmart, dealing with Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization, the success with the Joe Boxer launch was a major boost to the balance sheet as well as company morale.

Lowery took advantage of his sudden fame to land a costarring role on the NBC sitcom Scrubs and appear in other advertising campaigns, and he figured prominently in subsequent Kmart efforts to promote Joe Boxer. He appeared in a pair of holiday spots in late 2002, dancing in one while wearing just a silver-wrapped box and in the other performing an ''antler dance'' with several women. These ads proved popular as well, leading to Lowery appearing in an ad that was part of the 2003 back-to-school marketing campaign. It offered a more elaborate, Broadway-like dance number in which Lowery made his entrance on a swing and joined in a group boogie.

The back-to-school campaign and the final Vaughn spot were held up when Kmart and TBWA\Chiat\Day became involved in a dispute over fees: $2.4 million to the agency and another $1.1 million to vendors used by the agency. Kmart eventually made the payments but parted ways with the agency that had been instrumental in the successful launch of Joe Boxer with Kmart. But the retailer, which emerged from bankruptcy in May 2003, had more pressing issues to address than building on the momentum of Joe Boxer. Kmart then merged with Sears, after which the Joe Boxer brand was cut back, and the focus returned to men's underwear and women's intimates.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Ad Libs: A Little Spontaneity on Set Can Go a Long Way." Adweek, October 13, 2003, p. 28.

Baar, Aaron, and Rebecca Flass. "A Popular Pitchman's Next Step: Videogame Fame." Adweek, February 24, 2003, p. 10.

Day, Sherri. "Kmart Will Shoot Two Men in Joe Boxer Shorts from a Cannon in a Brand-Promotion Effort." New York Times, July 25, 2002, p. 14.

Elliott, Stuart. "After a Bitter Parting, Kmart Picks Finalists to Succeed 2 Agencies." New York Times, August 19, 2004, p. C3.

Freeman, Sarah. "Boxer Boogie Brings Fame." Associated Press, December 18, 2002.

Garcia, Sandra. "Song and Dance: Joe Boxer and Kmart Get in the Groove." Shoot, May 9, 2003, p. 21.

Irwin, Tanya. "Kmart Diversifies Holiday Spots." Adweek, November 25, 2002, p. 4.

Nudd, Tim. "The Odd Couple: Graham Puts the Blue in Blue-Light Special." Adweek (eastern ed.), August 5, 2002, p. 22.

Robinson, Gaile. "Under It All, the Joe Boxer Dancer Is a Zany Guy." Fort Worth Star-Telegram, December 27, 2002.

Walker, Rob. "Boxer Rebellion." Slate, September 9, 2002.

Young, Vicki M. "Rolling with the Punches." WWD, July 21, 2005, p. 1.

Yue, Lorene. "Joe Boxer Commercial Brings Kmart Big Bucks." Detroit Free Press, September 4, 2002.

Ed Dinger

MARTHA STEWART EVERYDAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997 Kmart Corporation wooed Martha Stewart back. She had taken the position of Kmart lifestyles consultant and Home Division spokesperson in 1987 but had, according to Stewart, been alienated through "unimaginative" retailing and "no quality control." As Stewart ascended to the status of lifestyle maven for American culture at large in the early 1990s, she worked her way out of her contract with Kmart, which was descending to the verge of bankruptcy. In 1995, however, Floyd Hall took over the helm of Kmart and orchestrated a turnaround. Even before he began to transform the existing Kmart format into the more shopper-friendly Big Kmart and Super Kmart formats, Hall sought to reestablish the chain's relationship with Stewart. Hall recognized that Stewart's reputation for a commitment to quality and economy suited Kmart's rebuilding plans perfectly.

Working together, Kmart and Stewart developed a video that featured each category in Stewart's Everyday brand and explained how to coordinate the various products in the line. The effort was an in-store, point-of purchase video. Additionally, Kmart released a $60 million marketing campaign to support the new brand that included television spots, print ads, and direct mailings to consumers. The remarriage succeeded, for Stewart, by establishing her own corporation, Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, LLC, had leveraged enough power to oversee quality control. Although Stewart, a renowned perfectionist, could prove hard to please, the arrangement benefited Kmart, because it retained not a cardboard character as spokesperson but rather a well-oiled machine in the form of the 30-person staff at Stewart's company that paid attention to details. In return, Stewart benefited from the increased exposure Kmart gave her name and concept through the Martha Stewart Everyday line. Kmart and Stewart thus established a symbiotic relationship.

Brand extensions and new commercials were added in 1999 and 2000, but trouble was looming. In 2000 Kmart dropped its agency, Campbell Mithun Esty, Minneapolis, and replaced it with TBWA\Chiat\Day New York. Despite reviving its BlueLight Special in 2001 and releasing a new marketing campaign supporting it as well as a new round of commercials promoting the Martha Stewart Everyday brand, Kmart filed for bankruptcy in 2002. Stewart encountered her own legal problems in 2002 when she became embroiled in an insider-trading scandal.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

According to Marcia Heroux Pounds in a 1998 article in the Ft. Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel, in 1987 Boca Raton-based marketing consultant Barbara Loren-Snyder was searching for "the Ralph Lauren for the masses of the ['90s]," someone to pair with Kmart to boost profits in its housewares department. Stewart's 1982 book Entertaining caught Loren-Snyder's eye on a bookstore shelf, and a visit to Stewart's Westport, Connecticut, home, with its painted floors, confirmed Loren-Snyder's hunch that she had identified a candidate with flair and style. Loren-Snyder's advice outweighed that of the other three consultants assigned to the project, and Kmart gave Stewart the nod, negotiating what amounted to a licensing agreement with her. Stewart appeared in television commercials for Kmart, and Kmart featured Stewart's Martha Stewart and Kmart joined forces in 1997 to form a lucrative partnership.

© NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

name on some of its products. The agreement, however, did not prevent Stewart from backing out when she experienced difficulty dealing with Kmart, which was on a downslide at the time.

Under chief executive officer Joseph Antonini, Kmart started to founder in the early 1990s. The discount retailer posted a staggering loss of $974 million in 1993. It rebounded in 1994 with a slight profit but sank back into red ink in 1995, losing $571 million. Much of the blame for the slide fell on Antonini, who resigned in March 1995 at the urging of shareholders and the board of directors. The board replaced Antonini with Hall, the former chief executive of rival discount retailer Target who had since headed Grand Union supermarkets and cofounded his own business in museum reproductions. Hall strategized a turnaround by restructuring the existing Kmarts instead of expanding; in fact, he closed some 200 locations that were lagging in sales. The Big Kmart format featured wider aisles and brighter lighting. In addition, it expanded the grocery section by 35 percent, hoping to lure one-stop shoppers with low-margin groceries in addition to high-margin apparel. These and other strategies succeeded, and Kmart posted profits of $249 million in 1997.

At the same time that Kmart was rebounding, Stewart was eclipsing her previous success. She continued to publish books as well as Martha Stewart Living magazine, which reached a circulation of 2 million. She had a syndicated newspaper column, a daily radio feature, and a television program. She also mastered interactive media, maintaining a World Wide Web site that hosted 300,000 visits a week. Just as Kmart approached her to reestablish their relationship, Stewart was consolidating these diverse enterprises under one umbrella, her company Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, which she bought from Time Inc. in 1997. Thus, what distinguished the second union between Kmart and Stewart was that both sides were now operating from a position of strength.

TARGET MARKET

Kmart's target market consisted of women aged 25 to 49 who came from households with incomes of $20,000 to $60,000. Kmart had traditionally offered low prices for low-quality merchandise, but Hall changed this formula. Stewart represented the key to the transformation, with the success of the Martha Stewart Everyday line, symbolizing the overall repositioning of Kmart. Stewart's name was synonymous with quality, but she also promoted common sense, which included economizing. In fact, Stewart helped usher in the trend toward sensible shopping. In the 1980s shoppers had displayed their ability to overspend. The recession of the early 1990s reversed this dynamic. It became "chic to save," according to Kurt Barnard, president of Barnard's Retail Trend Report, as reported by Marty Hair in the Newark Star-Ledger.

Stewart did not act only to lower the bar, however. She also raised the bar in terms of Kmart's clientele.

TAPPING INTO ASPIRATIONS

Part of Martha Stewart's work at Kmart involved educating consumers about the benefits of buying higher-quality products. For example, a 180-thread-count bedsheet had traditionally been considered a good value for a discount store, but few discount-store shoppers understood what 180-count meant. In order to convince people to buy a better quality, Stewart had to explain to them what they were missing. Stewart simply pointed out to consumers that the 200-count sheets in her Blue line were woven more tightly, felt more comfortable, and lasted longer than the 180-count sheets they were used to. The White line sported a 230-count sheet, and the Silver line featured a 250-count sheet. Once these comparisons were established, Kmart shoppers could understand why they might consider paying a little more (though still a reasonable price) for a slightly better product. Hence the success of the White line, the next step up in the Martha Stewart Everyday product range, and of the Silver line, the top tier. Stewart and Kmart were simply tapping into shoppers' aspirations.

Shoppers who would not otherwise have frequented the discount chain were lured in specifically by her line. Even though Martha Stewart Living magazine categorically avoided advertising the Martha Stewart Everyday line, cross-fertilization nevertheless occurred on the strength of Stewart's reputation. Kmart and Stewart anticipated and facilitated this dynamic of higher-income women shopping at a discount store by offering three tiers of products: Blue, White, and Silver lines. The uninitiated could work their way up from the bottom tier, the Blue line, but those accustomed to high quality could find what they wanted from the start in the top tier, the Silver line.

COMPETITION

In reputation Kmart positioned itself between Wal-Mart and Target, and it fell between them in market share as well. Wal-Mart appealed to hard-core discount shoppers, while Target appealed to younger and higher-income shoppers. According to a 1998 article by George White in the Los Angeles Times, Wal-Mart had 22 percent of the discount retail market, while Kmart controlled 9 percent and Target 5 percent. The Martha Stewart Everyday line provided a point of differentiation from Wal-Mart, for it offered not simply savings but also value and quality. This positioned Kmart closer to Target, whose target market consisted of under-40 college graduates with young children and a household income of about $47,000.

Target reacted by hiring architect Michael Graves to design a line of affordable but stylish housewares, such as clocks, kitchen utensils and appliances, and picture frames. Target extended the notion of branding a designer by choosing not a lifestyle designer such as Stewart but rather a designer of the forms and objects themselves such as Graves. Although critics complained about the commercialization of architecture, Target customers benefited by being able to purchase pleasantly designed functional items.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Martha Stewart has a reputation for doing things right," said Kmart shopper Janet Day in George White's Los Angeles Times article. "I'm sure she wouldn't allow anyone to use her name on a product unless she was happy with it." Although it might have been easy to exploit such a reputation, Stewart worked hard to gain integrity and to sustain it. Thus, she oversaw quality control of the Martha Stewart Everyday line. "We don't advise. We don't approve. We do it," said Sharon Patrick, president and chief operating officer of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia. Steve Ryman, Kmart divisional vice president and brand director of Martha Stewart Everyday, agreed. "They have total control. But," he added, "they listen well." As explained by Patrick, Stewart and Kmart shared a vision: "We want to engineer quality into mass market products."

The central considerations behind the Martha Stewart Everyday line were function and coordination. Individually, each product in the line was designed to fulfill a specific function properly. More important, however, Stewart designed her products to correspond in color and style across categories. This design symmetry removed the burden of matching from Kmart consumers, many of whom were not prepared to undertake the task. The designer, in this case Stewart, thus had the most important role in creating the brand. Martha Stewart Everyday epitomized the "designer brand," as Stewart herself was both the designer and the brand, exemplifying the 1990s trend toward the branding of designers, as with Graves. The strength behind the brand was the equity Stewart had accumulated by investing in her own identity, which at this point had a tangible salability.

Kmart and Stewart produced an in-store, point-of-purchase video that showed all of the categories in the Martha Stewart Everyday line—bedding, towels, paints, and so forth—and explained how to coordinate items. The video also explained the progression from the different tiers of products, from the Blue to the White to the Silver line. Kmart further supported the Martha Stewart Everyday line by devoting a 4,500-square-foot area in each store exclusively to the products. In early 1998 these products accounted for 55 percent of Kmart's "soft home" business, and by the end of the year they accounted for 70 percent of Kmart's sales of domestic products. Kmart and Stewart agreed, however, that the line should not represent Kmart's entire offerings in domestic products, for some products were not appropriate to the Stewart concept. On the other hand, Kmart announced its intentions to expand the Martha Stewart Everyday line into other appropriate categories.

Kmart supported the Martha Stewart Everyday brand with its most extensive marketing campaign ever. The discount retailer spent $60 million on television and print advertising, direct mailings, and special events to promote the line. In March 1998 Kmart relaunched a national television spot that showed Stewart hanging sheets across the Grand Canyon, and it produced a new spot for the summer. It supported the new spring line of products with print advertising, direct mail, Sunday newspaper inserts, and magazine ads.

As promised, in 1999 Kmart and Stewart launched an extension of her Everyday brand with the introduction of Martha Stewart Everyday Garden, which included outdoor and patio furniture. In 2000 Everyday Kitchen, another brand extension featuring more than 650 cooking and entertaining items, such as dinnerware, bakeware, and cutlery, hit Kmart's shelves. The Everyday Keeping collection of home-storage items followed in 2001 and included such products as closet organizers, hangers, ironing boards, and airtight glass and plastic containers. Also introduced in 2001 was the Everyday Decorating line, with lamps, mirrors, picture frames, and other home-decor products. Each new line extension was supported by television spots, print ads, and direct mailings. Stewart, shown putting her products to good use, figured prominently in all of the commercials. One spot supporting the Everyday Kitchen product launch featured Stewart setting her table for dinner guests with a selection of items from her Kitchen collection.

OUTCOME

Measuring strictly by the book, Kmart's Martha Stewart Everyday campaign succeeded beyond expectations. In 1998, its second year, the brand had $800 million in sales, up from $450 million in the first year. The success stemmed from each category of the line performing in top form. The Martha Stewart Everyday brand of towels was outsold only by Cannon, which had been in the business for more than 100 years. Success also stemmed from the coordination of the lines under the larger umbrella. The White line, the intermediate tier, outperformed all expectations, and the Silver line also did better than projected. Only the Blue line merely met sales expectations.

Kmart and Stewart won a slew of awards for their coordinated marketing efforts. The Big Kmart layout, with 4,500 square feet devoted to the Martha Stewart Everyday line, won the 1997 Discount Store News Supply Performance Award by Retail Category, (SPARC/3M Award) for its unique and effective design. Kmart was named the 1998 LIMA Retailer of the Year specifically for the Martha Stewart Everyday line in domestics and nonfurnishings. The American Marketing Association awarded both Kmart and Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia its silver and bronze Edison Best New Product Awards for the Martha Stewart Everyday line in its introductory year. In addition, the association awarded Stewart herself the Edison Achievement Award, bestowed upon executives who distinguished themselves through exemplary business careers.

The success of the Martha Stewart Everyday line became the benchmark for Kmart's potential under the restructuring orchestrated by Hall. One key feature of the success was its sustainability as the Martha Stewart Everyday line was extended into other categories. In spring 1999 Kmart introduced the Martha Stewart Everyday Garden collection, which included 10 patio furniture sets as well as gardening supplies such as bamboo rakes, organic fertilizers, gloves, hoses, and flowerpots. In the future the retailer planned to extend the horticultural line with the addition of live plants, bulbs, and seeds. Kmart also announced plans to launch the Martha Stewart Everyday Baby layette collection and later to add kitchen products, the area in which Stewart, on the strength of her cookbooks, had initially earned her reputation. According to a 1999 article by Mike Duff in Discount Store News, Andy Giancamilli, president of U.S. Kmart Stores, said, "Once we've extended her into kitchen, that's it. Then we build." Martha Stewart Everyday brand director Ryman agreed with his colleague. "I think it's best to say we're just at the beginning and have a lot of product development, marketing and advertising to accomplish," he was quoted as saying in Duff's article. "You haven't seen anything but the tip of the iceberg. We have just started to see the effects of Martha Stewart at Kmart," Ryman concluded.

Although the Martha Stewart Everyday line was a success, Kmart was struggling in the marketplace and in search of more edgy advertising to try and win customers from its competitor Target. In 2000 Kmart moved its $100 million advertising account to TBWA\Chiat\Day New York. The new agency did not tamper with the Stewart campaign, but in 2001 it released a marketing campaign that reintroduced Kmart's BlueLight Special and the familiar announcement "Attention Kmart Shoppers . . . "

Despite the sales increases attributed to the Martha Stewart Everyday line, a new ad agency, and a new campaign, Kmart continued to face declining overall sales, climbing financial losses, and a particularly poor 2001 holiday shopping season. In January 2002 the chain filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Adding to the retailer's woes, Martha Stewart was embroiled in her own legal problems after becoming tied to the ImClone Systems insider-trading scandal. A new series of commercials that Kmart released in October 2002, featuring Stewart promoting her line of bed and bath linens for the holidays, came under fire from the media and consumers. For subsequent holiday television spots promoting the Martha Stewart Everyday brands, Kmart dropped Stewart, using only her voice with an image of Santa Claus.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Chris. "Kmart Has No Comment on New Television Advertisements featuring Martha Stewart." Washington (DC) Times, October 11, 2002.

Connor, Tracy. "Kmart Drops Martha Stewart Visage from New Holiday-Houseware Ad Campaign." New York Daily News, November 15, 2002.

Cuneo, Alice. "Banking on Blue; Kmart Reinvents the Blue Light Special." Crain's Detroit Business, April 9, 2001.

Duff, Mike. "The Martha Miracle Takes Root in L&G and Blossoms in Baby." Discount Store News, March 22, 1999.

Gatlin, Greg. "Retail Giant Kmart Is Bankrupt." Boston Herald, January 23, 2002.

Hair, Marty. "Martha Pays Attention to Detail . . . and Kmart Shoppers." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, April 7, 1999.

Heroux Pounds, Marcia. "Martha Stewart and Kmart: A Match Made in Boca." Fort Lauderdale (FL) Sun-Sentinel, March 13, 1998.

Liebeck, Laura. "The Mileage of Martha Stewart Keeps Extending Every Day." Discount Store News, March 9, 1998.

Meyer, Nancy. "Kmart Launches Martha Stewart Garden Furniture." HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, January 25, 1999.

White, George. "K-Ching! Kmart Trying to Boost Image, Products." Los Angeles Times, February 20, 1998.

William D. Baue
Rayna Bailey

ROSIE O'DONNELL AND PENNY MARSHALL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1994 Kmart Corporation came close to bankruptcy. In October of that year the company—then the second-largest retailer in the United States—posted its seventh consecutive quarterly decline in profits, closed 100 of its 2,350 stores, cut the ranks of management by 10 percent, and laid off 5,350 hourly employees. In March 1995 Kmart's board of directors forced the company's president and CEO to resign. And in April of that year Kmart ended its 25-year association with the advertising firm of Ross Roy Communications when it announced that it had chosen Minneapolis-based Campbell Mithun Esty (CME) to handle its $175 million account.

In November 1995 CME introduced a new Kmart holiday advertising campaign starring television and movie celebrities Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall. The campaign included 10 commercials directed by comedian David Steinberg. They depicted the two women as Kmart shopping buddies, with shopping-savvy O'Donnell pointing out featured merchandise and great values to novice shopper Marshall. The goal of the spots was not only to increase sales but also to build awareness of Kmart as a fun place to shop. According to a CME executive, the message was that "Kmart is changing. The merchandise is better, it's more fun to shop there, and I can still get great deals."

The campaign was a success, despite polls that showed consumers had lost faith in celebrity endorsements. According to USA Today 's Ad Track, 31 percent of women who had viewed the commercials described them as "very effective." Television spots featuring O'Donnell and Marshall also helped drive sales, and as the campaign continued, so too did its success. In December 1997 the campaign moved into its second year with new commercials, and Kmart reported that sales had increased 2.9 percent over the same period the previous year, with overall earnings in 1997 up 43 percent. Based on the campaign's success, new spots were released in 1998 and 1999. At the end of 1999, however, O'Donnell's relationship with Kmart ended as a result of complaints from consumers about her advocacy of gun control. In 2000 Kmart also moved its account to ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day New York as it planned to shift to edgier advertising.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From modest beginnings in 1899 as the S.S. Kresge Co. Store in downtown Detroit, rapid expansion took Kresge to 85 stores and annual sales of $10 million by 1912. In 1929 a Kresge store became part of the first suburban shopping center, Country Club Plaza in Kansas City, Missouri. The Kresge company launched its first newspaper advertising in 1930 and in the 1950s added radio advertising. It was during this time that the discount store came into being. Kresge opened its first discount store in Garden City, Michigan, in 1962 under the name Kmart. By 1998 Kmart had some 2,100 stores in the United States, Puerto Rico, Guam, the U.S. Virgin Islands, Canada, and Mexico and employed more than 300,000 people.

The growth of the company was not all uphill. From the late 1970s through the early 1990s the company instituted an aggressive program of expansion and acquisition. It acquired all or parts of such companies as Waldenbooks, Sports Giant, Sports Authority, and OfficeMax. By the mid-1990s Kmart seemed to have lost focus, and the company began to reevaluate its holdings. According to CME spokeswoman Ginny Vonckx, "Despite a presence in thousands of towns across America and elsewhere, its identity with consumers had declined. . . . Consumers questioned if it was still a great store that delivered great merchandise at a great value."

In the early 1990s Kmart instituted a five-year store renovation project. Commercials promised consumers that stores would be brighter and better stocked. As Jennifer Negley reported in Discount Store News, however, ". . . consumers overall were not convinced to switch their allegiance to 'the new Kmart,' particularly when there were freshly built, cleaner, better-stocked Wal-Marts and Targets just down the road."

When new management took over the company in late 1994, there was a move to shore up the chain's sagging image. Before it hired CME as its ad agency, Kmart's slogan had been "Low prices and extras you won't find anywhere else." Consumer research showed that the advertising led customers to expect to find great deals, a pleasant shopping atmosphere, and a good selection of merchandise. Shoppers had difficulty, however, matching the advertising with the reality of a visit to a Kmart store. Thus, by late 1995 Kmart was experiencing severe image problems and was rapidly losing credibility with its customers and shareholders. David Tree, chief creative officer of CME, told Adweek's Jean Halliday and Ellen Rooney Martin that Kmart's previous advertising had been "self-important and over-reaching. It missed the target."

As a way of improving communications with customers, CME introduced O'Donnell and Marshall as ambassadors for Kmart. O'Donnell had been a stand-up comic before beginning a movie career in 1992, when she was selected by director Marshall to costar in A League of Their Own. Other film credits included Sleepless in Seattle, The Flintstones, Exit to Eden, and Harriet the Spy. She made her Broadway debut in 1994 as Rizzo in Tommy Tune's revival of Grease and in 1996 began her own variety and talk show. Marshall was perhaps best remembered for her role in the situation comedy Laverne and Shirley, which ran for more than seven seasons on ABC. She moved to the forefront of Hollywood directors with the film Big, the first movie directed by a woman to take in more than $100 million at the box office. Since then she had directed numerous other movies, including the Academy Award–nominated Awakenings.

The pair was chosen because it was believed that Kmart shoppers could identify with them because they were down-to-earth and had the ability to relate to the average consumer. In a 1995 interview in Advertising Age, R. Fulton Macdonald, president of International Business Development, applauded Kmart's choice. He told reporter Leah Haran, "Rosie is very credible, and the biggest thing Kmart needs is credibility. That is going in the right direction—getting credible women to vouch for Kmart without making false pretenses. She is no-nonsense and tells it like it is."

TARGET MARKET

During the years Kmart was undergoing its program of expansion and acquisition, it also tried to change its identity. The company made efforts to broaden its traditional blue-collar appeal and to include a more upscale market by, for example, instituting exclusive items such as a designer clothing line by former Charlie's Angels actress Jaclyn Smith. When the O'Donnell-Marshall campaign was created, however, the idea was to appeal to the company's original target market. This market consisted of women between the ages of 25 and 49 who had children and household incomes of $20,000 to $50,000. Research showed that 87 percent of America's children came from such households and that these women were heavy discount shoppers. The idea was to relate directly to these women in a humorous way.

COMPETITION

The problems that Kmart was experiencing in attracting consumers were caused in part by what retail consultants Management Horizons called the "overstoring of America." Stores such as Wal-Mart, Sears, Target, and J.C. Penney created intense competition for customers, and they did so partly through substantial increases in advertising. In the early 1990s, for example, Wal-Mart increased its ad spending by 14 percent and Target its spending by 47 percent. During the same two years Kmart's spending on advertising dropped almost 32 percent.

By 1998 Wal-Mart was the world's number one retailer, bigger than Sears, Kmart, and J.C. Penney combined. Its commercials focused on the store's low prices

ROSIE O'DONNELL'S ROSIE O'DOLL

The success of Rosie O'Donnell's talk show took many people by surprise, including toy makers. During the holiday shopping season of 1996, O'Donnell talked about one of her new favorites, a toy called Tickle Me Elmo by Tyco. This generated a national buying frenzy for the doll, as well as Tyco's immense gratitude. To say thanks, the company made a doll in O'Donnell's likeness and presented it to her. Rosie O'Doll was a 16-inch soft-bodied toy that, when squeezed, uttered O'Donnell-inspired phrases like "What a cutie patootie!" and "Dreams come true with Rosie." O'Donnell was so taken with the doll that she suggested to Tyco that they mass-produce it and work with selected retailers to donate a portion of the proceeds to the For All Kids Foundation.

Naturally, one of the retailers chosen was Kmart. Bill Dunlap, chairman of Campbell Mithun Esty, told Stuart Elliott of the New York Times, "Rosie puts fun into shopping, and she's very interested in kids, which is a big part of the Kmart mix." The doll also made a cameo appearance in the 1997 commercial "Toy Mania," perched on a shelf above O'Donnell and Penny Marshall as they answered questions on the toy hotline.

as well as the friendliness of its staff, with many of the commercials featuring actual employees talking about the great values that could be found at a Wal-Mart store. Sears, another of Kmart's principal competitors, faced its own image problems. Its solution was a long-running campaign created by Young & Rubicam that featured the slogans "The Many Sides of Sears" and "The Softer Sides of Sears." If Kmart were to stay afloat, it needed to make the experience of shopping in its stores more desirable for the target customer and address the negative perceptions of its stores.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Kmart took a four-pronged approach to restoring its image and its profits. First, it built on the popularity and credibility of the two spokeswomen, O'Donnell and Marshall, to instill confidence in consumers. The company then strengthened its exclusive celebrity brands, including Jaclyn Smith's sportswear, Kathy Ireland's swimwear and lingerie, Martha Stewart Everyday housewares, and Sesame Street children's merchandise. The third step was to refurbish stores to create a more pleasant shopping experience. And, fourth, in 1998 the company began to reposition the chain as Big Kmart, relying on big-name celebrities like Bob Hope, featured in one of the first Big Kmart commercials, to bring added credibility to the turnaround.

All of Kmart's efforts were successful in bringing the company back to life, but it was the O'Donnell-Marshall commercials that most people came to associate with the Kmart name. From the beginning consumers enjoyed the two women's sharp-tongued yet good-natured banter. One of the first commercials in the series had Marshall looking for toys while she and O'Donnell hurried through a Kmart store. "They got Hot Skate Barbie?" asked Marshall. "Right here," said O'Donnell. "They got Hot Wheels Criss Cross Crash?" asked Marshall. "Right here," said O'Donnell. "What about Dr. Dreadful?" asked Marshall. To which O'Donnell replied, "Oh, we broke up months ago."

But even Kmart could not have foreseen the success of the Rosie O'Donnell Show. When the comedian went on the air with her own talk show in 1996, it was an immediate hit. She and her guests referred to Kmart frequently, and O'Donnell even began to refer to herself as "the Kmart lady." Marshall was sometimes a guest on the program, and she and O'Donnell recited Kmart escapades. When O'Donnell hosted Saturday Night Live, none other than Marshall made a special guest appearance. In the show's opening segment Marshall complimented O'Donnell on her outfit, asking her where she had bought it. "Kmart," replied O'Donnell. "Who knew?" Marshall answered, repeating a refrain from a Kmart commercial.

O'Donnell and Marshall celebrated their first anniversary with Kmart in November 1996 with another series of 10 holiday commercials. The first two were "Toy Mania," which showed the two women in a Kmart playing with Legos, which was featured in a store-wide promotion, and "Trim-A-Home," in which O'Donnell used soap opera terms to discuss the happenings in her illuminated ceramic Christmas village. Their anniversary series also marked the pair's first 60-second spot (previous spots had been 30 seconds long), a parody of the "Twelve Days of Christmas."

In 1997 the two celebrities were featured in Kmart's holiday commercials for the third straight year. Larry Davis, Kmart's vice president of marketing, told Adweek 's Aaron Baar, "Customers tell us that, as they're in the midst of their own holiday preparations, they look forward to seeing how Rosie and Penny fare." Two of the 1997 spots were once again directed by comedian Steinberg. One spot, "Holiday Magic," showed how O'Donnell moved from the present to the Renaissance and back again with a click of her fingers. Marshall attempted to re-create the feat but to no avail. She then found herself sporting reindeer antlers and lamenting that she would like to go shopping but would not fit in the car. O'Donnell told her not to worry because "you'll pull it." "Santa's Workshop" found the pair at the North Pole, where they observed busy elves readying a wide variety of holiday merchandise for Kmart stores. At the conclusion of the tour, O'Donnell asked Marshall, "So what we have learned?" "We need elves," Marshall replied.

The campaigns were fully integrated with Kmart promotions. Items fitting the campaign strategy were also prominently featured in Sunday newspaper circulars, and store signs promoted such themes as "Toy Mania." When a major in-store promotion was scheduled, O'Donnell and Marshall were used to generate awareness and highlight the promotion. One Thanksgiving commercial, for example, featured the pair waiting at dawn for a Kmart store to open so they could get a free fanny pack with $70 in coupons. The spot was coordinated with a promotion offering the free gift and coupons to the first 500 customers at each Kmart store.

The campaign continued in 1998 with the introduction of a new series of holiday-season television spots featuring the popular duo. The spots debuted in November during the NBC Sunday Night Movie and ran through mid-December. Playing up O'Donnell's well-known passion for Broadway, two of the spots promoted the "big show" at Kmart, according to a report in PR Newswire. One spot, titled "That's Entertainment," had O'Donnell and Marshall doing a song-and-dance routine riddled with pratfalls and featuring a guest appearance by Godzilla. Another spot, "Be a Santa," featured the two performing with singing elves.

As the 1999 holiday shopping season unfolded, Kmart and other traditional retailers were confronted with competition from the Internet as more and more shoppers preferred to do their gift buying online. In an Advertising Age report analysts predicted a "bleak Christmas for the inert traditional retailers." Kmart released a new round of commercials and television specials featuring its top spokeswomen, O'Donnell and Marshall. In a break from the humorous spots featuring O'Donnell and Marshall, the chain also introduced a new campaign that targeted women and starred the country-music mother-daughter singing team Naomi and Wynonna Judd.

OUTCOME

Although a 1996 USA Today Ad Track poll showed that consumers were losing faith in celebrity endorsers, the Kmart commercials proved to be an exception to the rule. CME's Tree told USA Today reporter Melanie Wells that consumers were responding more favorably to Kmart since the campaign had begun airing. "We're not looking for celebrities to be shills for the company," said Tree. "They're there as actresses. They're an exaggeration of the Kmart customer. They are 'ordinary people' who tell it like it is."

The strategy seemed to work. According to USA Today 's Ad Track, more than one-third of the women polled liked the spots, compared with less than one-fifth of men. The spots were said to be "very effective" by 31 percent of the women, as opposed to 19 percent of the men. According to Dottie Enrico, "... the campaign performed well with all adult consumers. An impressive 29 percent of those who'd seen the ads three times or more [said] they liked them a lot. The ads were especially popular with consumers over 25." The ad agency was pleased with the campaign's results; CME's Vonckx stated, "our own research, and research done by third parties, has told us repeatedly how much our consumers like these ads. And they like them because they can relate to these two friends as shoppers, and they're rewarded for watching them with a story that's entertaining too."

Writing about the campaign in Discount Store News, reporter Negley stated, "The casting of two women with strong blue collar appeal and working class bonafides not only speaks straight to Kmart's core customer, it's proved something of a public relations master-stroke." That masterstroke seemed to have been successful in getting Kmart on the road back to the position it once held. In 1998 Kmart was the country's third-largest retailer, and its stock was trading at more than three times the value it had before the O'Donnell-Marshall spots began running. Kmart's holiday sales in December 1997 rose a small but significant 2.9 percent over the same period in 1996, with Wal-Mart's sales rising 7.2 percent and Target's 6.4 percent, while J.C. Penney's was falling by 2.3 percent. Overall earnings at Kmart in 1997 were $330 million, a 43 percent increase over the previous year.

In 1999 O'Donnell and Kmart announced that the company's popular spokeswoman was ending her five-year association with the company when her contract expired in December. A Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News report attributed the decision to O'Donnell's pro-gun-control views and subsequent complaints from angry consumers. According to Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, after O'Donnell publicly criticized actor Tom Selleck for appearing in a commercial for the National Rifle Association, "Kmart received hundreds of angry phone calls from National Rifle Association supporters." It was uncertain whether or not Marshall would continue to appear in commercials for Kmart without her sidekick. Kmart announced in 2000 that it was moving its $100 million account to TBWA\Chiat\Day New York.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Rosie and Penny Check In." Adweek, November 11, 1997.

"Broadway, Family Entertainment and Goodwill Take Center Stage in Kmart Holiday Promotions." PR Newswire, November 12, 1998.

Cuneo, Alice Z.. "Holiday Shopping Showdown; Turning Point: Traditional Retailers Could Find Their Usual Tactics Outdated by Cyber-Selling." Advertising Age, November 15, 1999.

———. "Kmart Targets Target as It Taps TBWA for Ads; Retailer Seeks Creative Boost, Awards Account to Chiat/Day." Advertising Age, October 2, 2000.

"Detroit Free Press Michigan Memo Column." Detroit Free Press, September 23, 1999.

Elliott, Stuart. "A Soft-Bodied Toy and Cause-Related Marketing." New York Times, November 26, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Women Like Kmart's Rosie and Penny Ads." USA Today, October 14, 1996.

Goldman, Kevin. "Kmart Gives Campbell Mithun Blue Light." Wall Street Journal, April 18, 1995.

Halliday, Jean, and Ellen Rooney Martin. "Kmart Greets Holidays." Adweek, November 13, 1995.

Haran, Leah. "Kmart Gets Real as It Maps Road to Survival." Advertising Age, October 16, 1995.

Herzog, Boaz. "Gun-Control Stance Leads Rosie O'Donnell to Leave Kmart Ads." Knight Ridder/ Tribune Business News, November 23, 1999.

Liebeck, Laura. "Over the Hump, but Not the Mountain." Discount Store News, June 23, 1997.

Negley, Jennifer. "Attention Kmart Shoppers." Discount Store News, December 12, 1996.

Wells, Melanie. "All's Not Well in Celebrity Pitchdom." USA Today, November 4, 1996.

Sharyn Kolberg
Rayna Bailey

Kraft Foods, Inc.

3 Lakes Dr.
Northfield, Illinois 60093-2753
USA
Telephone: (847) 646-2000
Web site: www.kraftfoods.com

■■■

IT'S HOW TO UNPLUG CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The "It's How to Unplug" advertising campaign, handled by the New York office of Young & Rubicam, encouraged women to pause during busy days and relax with a cup of General Foods International Coffees, made by Kraft Foods, Inc. "Inhale the subtle cinnamon aroma. Sip slowly until you unplug," suggested a magazine advertisement announcing that Cafe Vienna—one of the brand's many varieties—had been reformulated with a richer, creamier taste. Since their launch in the early 1970s, General Foods International Coffees had been marketed with an emphasis on the idea that drinking them was almost like taking a vacation, because they resembled beverages a traveler might enjoy while touring Europe and other faraway places. Although competing lines of flavored coffees continued to multiply while demand for instant coffees in general decreased throughout the 1990s, General Foods International Coffees remained one of the most popular brands in the United States. The "It's How to Unplug" campaign ran in print and broadcast media during 1997 and 1998.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

General Foods International Coffees were introduced in 1973 by General Foods Corporation. Founded in 1895 by Charles William (C.W.) Post in Battle Creek, Michigan, the firm was originally called Postum Cereal Company Ltd., but in 1922 its name was changed to General Foods. In 1985 the company was purchased by Philip Morris Companies Inc. Three years later Philip Morris also acquired Kraft, Inc., a major manufacturer of cheese and other food products since 1903. The two firms were soon combined to form the nation's largest food company, Kraft General Foods, which was reorganized in 1995 as Kraft Foods, Inc.

The numerous brands made by General Foods included Grape Nuts and Post Toasties cereals, Jell-O gelatin, Log Cabin syrup, Calumet baking powder, Birdseye frozen foods, Oscar Mayer meat products, and a cereal beverage named Postum. For many years the company's Maxwell House coffee was advertised with the famous slogan "Good to the last drop." According to legend, the statement was originally made by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1907 when he tasted the blend in the Maxwell House Hotel in Nashville. In 1988 General Foods introduced Private Collection, a line extension of Maxwell House that featured eight varieties of gourmet coffee beans that consumers could grind at supermarket displays to suit their preferences. Private Collection was intended primarily for professional consumers more than 30 years of age with annual incomes of at least $35,000. In 1992 Maxwell House Cappuccino was introduced as a premium coffee aimed at women more than 35 years of age. General Foods also manufactured ground and instant Sanka, which had been introduced in 1927 as the nation's first decaffeinated coffee and which was most popular with older consumers. During 1998 Kraft promoted Sanka with the tag line "Everything you love about coffee." In addition to Maxwell House and Sanka, Kraft marketed ground and instant Yuban, a coffee made with Colombian beans and billed as "the richest coffee in the world."

General Foods International Coffees were powdered instant beverages complete with nondairy creamer, designed to be stirred into hot water or milk. All 18 varieties in the line were presweetened, but some contained no sugar, no fat, and no caffeine. Chocolate, cinnamon, nonalcoholic liqueurs, and other specialty ingredients were added to make blends such as Orange Cappuccino, Cafe Francais, Cafe Vienna, Irish Mocha Mint, Suisse Mocha, and Kahlua Cafe. Kraft also made a related line of powdered General Foods International English Teasin flavors that included English Breakfast Creme, Viennese Creme, and Island Orange Creme. They were promoted as "tea you scoop instead of steep."

Early advertising for General Foods International Coffees featured spokeswoman Carol Lawrence discussing her European travels and noting that she enjoyed coffee that reminded her of Vienna and other places. "Now I can have the flavor of a European coffeehouse in my own house," read the headline in a magazine advertisement in 1975. Another ad showed Lawrence seated among ferns that bordered an Italian-style lily pond. "I love Italy. I love coffee. I suppose that's why I love everything about Orange Cappuccino," read the headline. Later ads suggested combining the instant coffee with ice cream to make a cool summer drink. Some of the advertisement featured the tag line "It's our flavor that makes us special," while others used the long-running slogan "Celebrate the moments of your life." A campaign during the mid-1990s showed cups of coffee against uncluttered landscapes. "New Irish Cream Cafe. Escape to your own Emerald Isle," read one headline. Steam from the coffee cup formed the ghostly image of a castle against a background of velvety green pasture. Another ad showed the sun setting above the ocean while steam in the shape of a palm tree wafted from a coffee cup. "Escape to your own little island," read the headline.

MUSICAL KIOSKS

In 1994 General Foods International Coffees were advertised on interactive kiosks in music stores. Consumers could watch videos and read music reviews while listening to tracks from more than 40,000 albums. Between selections they saw 10-second advertisements aimed at specific ethnic or age groups or at people interested in certain types of music. To use the kiosks, consumers were required to reveal demographic information such as income, age, address, and favorite genre of music. By the end of November 1994 profiles of 820,000 people who used kiosks nationwide had been compiled into a customer database.

TARGET MARKET

Many advertisements for General Foods International Coffees revolved around visiting a friend, spending time with a husband and children, and other emotional moments. General Foods had identified the needs of its target market by conducting focus groups, often led by psychologists who asked women questions such as how they felt before and after drinking coffee, what sort of people they thought would drink General Foods International Coffees, and how the brand might be incorporated into a person's dreams. The research revealed that most women who purchased the product were amiable, warm, and employed but not obsessed with their careers. Early advertisements for the brand were slanted toward college-age women who had visited foreign countries or who planned to travel some day. The ads were also aimed at nurturing homemakers who drank flavored coffees as a special treat. Over the years the ads showed more interaction among family members, friends, and people who worked together. The "It's How to Unplug" campaign targeted the brand's traditional customers (women 25 to 54 years old) with an emphasis on the idea that General Foods International Coffees could be a pleasant, relaxing self-indulgence amid the pressures of everyday life.

During the 1990s demand for the plain ground coffee typically sold in supermarkets declined. Some Americans drank less coffee because they were concerned that caffeine might harm their health. In addition, many consumers experimented with trendy gourmet blends, while others switched to soft drinks. Positioned as a premium brand that offered a wide assortment of flavors, General Foods International Coffees were often seen as a substitute for a sweet snack. Further, because the coffees came in powder form, the consumer could control the strength of the drink.

COMPETITION

In 1990, at a time when total sales of instant coffee had declined by 9.4 percent in 12 months, sales of General Foods International Coffees increased by 11 percent to $115.9 million. Advertising Age reported that by 1995, with 4.7 percent of the U.S. market, General Foods International Coffees was the fourth most popular coffee of any kind, behind Folgers with 27.4 percent, Maxwell House with 19.2 percent, and private-label brands with 7.6 percent. Hills Bros. and Maxwell House Master Blend each had 4.1 percent, and Taster's Choice had 4.0 percent.

Leading the trend toward specialty coffees, Starbucks Corporation expanded its market rapidly during 1998 by offering premium blends at 3,500 supermarkets in selected regions of the United States. Until 1997 the company had sold coffee primarily through its coffee shops, an idea inspired by the espresso bars of Italy. Founded at Pike's Place Market in Seattle in 1971, the Starbucks chain grew slowly to five cafés by 1982 and then mushroomed to 1,000 by 1996. During 1998 Starbucks opened its first coffee shops in Europe and launched a 250-page Internet site where customers could order coffee on-line. The site included a Coffee Taste Matcher to help consumers decide which of the company's numerous products they would like to sample.

In 1997, according to Advertising Age, Procter & Gamble Company spent $65.9 million to advertise its Folgers brand. In April 1998, after Procter & Gamble reduced the price of its instant and ground Folgers coffees by 10 cents, Kraft cut the price of selected Maxwell House coffees by about twice as much. Procter & Gamble had introduced Folgers Custom Blend in 1991 and followed with Folgers French Roast Regular Coffee and Custom Roast Folgers. The company also competed with Starbucks by purchasing the gourmet Millstone brand of specialty coffees in 1995. Within three years Millstone was available at 7,000 supermarkets.

Hills Bros. and Taster's Choice were both made by Nestlé SA, a company based in Switzerland. Its Nescafé brand, one of the first instant coffees launched in the United States and the most popular brand of coffee in the world, had U.S. sales of $14 million in 1998. Nestlé introduced Hills Bros. French Roast in 1992 and in 1994 launched Taster's Choice Flavored Coffee, an instant coffee that was available in Irish crème French vanilla, and hazelnut flavors. Taster's Choice had been advertised for years with the "Romantic Neighbors" campaign, a series of episodes that chronicled the budding romance between two sophisticated neighbors. In 1998 Nestlé launched a new ad campaign to announce that Taster's Choice had been reformulated. The campaign's first television commercial showed various people drinking coffee, and then, through special effects, the pictures were combined to form the image of a coffee cup and a jar of Taster's Choice.

DECORATIVE TINS

General Foods International Coffees were sold in rectangular or oblong tins with ring-pull opening tabs and resealable plastic lids. To help establish a brand identity and to increase sales, the limited-edition tins were sometimes decorated with special designs that encouraged consumers to collect and save them. When a new series of designs was placed on the market, many people purchased an entire set. Floral motifs, reproductions of quilts, European cityscapes, and landscapes were a few of the themes used over the years, with each promotion usually running for about six months. For one series contemporary artists were commissioned to create work that looked as if it had been done by four great European artists: Vincent van Gogh, Pieter Brueghel, Jean-Honor, Fragonard, and Jean-Baptiste-Camille Corot. Kraft sometimes packaged other products, such as Maxwell House Cappuccino, in designer tins as well.

Nestlé also made Coffee-Mate creamers in flavors such as Irish crème and amaretto. Although only 12 percent of American households tended to purchase flavored coffee creamers, the category was growing at a rate of more than 20 percent each year and had sales of nearly $400 million in 1998. Another company, Suiza Foods, made International Delight creamers in hazelnut, French vanilla, and Irish crème flavors. Aimed primarily at women, the product line included single-serve creamers that consumers often added to ordinary coffee at work or in other settings away from home.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Young & Rubicam advertising agency developed the "It's How to Unplug" campaign to improve brand awareness and to encourage women to drink General Foods International Coffees more frequently. The ads conveyed the message that rich, creamy coffee was a satisfying indulgence to lift the spirits, alleviate stress, and help people enjoy the simple pleasures of life. The campaign ran in print and broadcast media during 1997 and 1998. According to Competitive Media Reporting, Kraft spent $41.2 million to advertise General Foods International Coffees in 1997 and planned to increase its budget by at least $4 million in 1998. Advertising Age reported that the brand's advertising budget had been $33.6 million in 1992 and $37.2 million in 1995.

In the fall of 1998 Kraft budgeted an estimated $7 million for television commercials, print advertisements, and freestanding inserts to support the relaunch of Viennese Chocolate Cafe. An advertisement in People magazine in November showed an Austrian style of building with a window framed by lace curtains. Bright red flowers below the window emphasized the red in an awning above, which looked exactly like a tin of Viennese Chocolate Cafe. In an elegant typestyle the headline read, "Take the time to stop and smell the chocolate." The ad featured only two additional lines of text: "It's the perfectly chocolate way to unplug. General Foods International Coffees." Viennese Chocolate Cafe had been introduced in 1992 and was relaunched in 1998 after the company's research indicated that chocolate ranked high among consumers' favorite flavors of coffee, second only to vanilla. In 1998 Kraft also launched Cappuccino Coolers, sweetened blends of General Foods International Coffees in hazelnut and French vanilla flavors intended to be mixed with milk and ice and served cold.

OUTCOME

For the fiscal year that ended May 24, 1998, General Foods International Coffees had 19 percent of the market for instant coffee, with sales of $165.7 million, according to Brandweek. That year the instant coffee segment of the beverage industry was valued at $855.3 million. Demand for instant coffees sold in supermarkets continued to decline during 1999, however, as consumers purchased Starbucks and other alternative brands. To attract younger consumers, Nestlé relaunched Taster's Choice Instant Coffees in 1999 and introduced a line extension of its Nescafé brand named Frothe, a foamy beverage available in six flavors. Frothe was intended to compete directly with General Foods International Coffees, particularly Cappuccino Coolers. Meanwhile, Procter & Gamble launched the Folgers Whole Bean line of six premium blends, including hazelnut, French vanilla, and French roast flavors.

In March 1999 Kraft ran a sweepstakes to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the launch of General Foods International Coffees. Prizes included two $2,500 cash awards and a trip for two to Paris. A new tag line for General Foods International Coffees, "It stirs the soul," was introduced in February. Like previous advertising for the brand, the new campaign emphasized the satisfying, contemplative state of mind that consumers experienced while relaxing with a cup of their favorite coffee. Television commercials featured actor Armand Assante narrating while women sipped coffee beside a fireplace and on the shore of a lake. One magazine advertisement featured a photograph of flowers, a garden path, an empty chair, and the sun setting over a grassy field. "It's that moment when you discover there's a resort outside your back door," read the headline.

FURTHER READING

"Brand Scorecard." Advertising Age, October 5, 1992, p. 16.

"Coffee and Tea Cup Runneth Under." Marketing & Media Decisions, October 1983, p. 179.

Freeman, Laurie. "Specialty Coffees' Thirst Grows Unquenchable." Advertising Age, September 30, 1996, p. S14.

Kanner, Bernice. "The Secret Life of the Female Customer." Working Woman, December 1990, p. 68.

Masterson, Peg. "Top 100 Succumbs to Specialty Coffees' Aroma." Advertising Age, September 29, 1993, p. 30.

McMath, Robert. "Multiplicity of Ways to Drink and Serve Coffee." Brandweek, October 12, 1992, p. 25.

Postlewaite, Kimbra. "Powder Potential." Beverage Industry, July 1998, p. 10.

Susan Risland

IT'S NOT DELIVERY, IT'S DIGIORNO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Owned since 1988 by the Philip Morris Companies, Inc., Kraft is the largest U.S.-based packaged food company in the world. It traces its history to three separate and successful entrepreneurs of the late-19th and early-20th centuries: J. L. Kraft, who began a wholesale cheese business in Chicago in 1903; Oscar Mayer, who in 1906 was one of the first meat packers to receive a Federal Meat Inspection stamp of approval; and C. W. Post, who put Grape-Nuts cereal on the market in 1897. Kraft owns and markets more than 70 major brands, many of which were the first of their kind and have become deeply entrenched in 20th-century American popular culture, most notably Velveeta cheese, Jell-O gelatin, Kool-Aid, Kraft cheeses, Oscar Mayer meats, Maxwell House coffees, Post ready-to-eat cereals, Stove Top stuffing mixes, and Miracle Whip salad dressing. In 1989 Kraft introduced a newcomer to that august family of products: DiGiorno brand refrigerated pastas and sauces. Kraft's long history of food industry firsts continued when the company expanded the DiGiorno brand line in 1995 by introducing DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza, the first frozen pizza with a fresh-frozen, not precooked, crust.

Using an advertising campaign designed by Foote Cone & Belding, Chicago, that included in-store product sampling as well as television and print advertising, DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza met with immediate positive response. The campaign, with a reported $11 million budget, kicked off on television in select markets in 1996 and 1997. Print advertising continued the campaign in 1998. The campaign was updated and enhanced in subsequent years to support extensions to the rising crust pizza line.

DiGiorno was a breakout success in its category; in its first year, even before it was in national distribution, it had sales of $125 million, and it ended 1997 with a sales volume of $200 million. In fact, DiGiorno became one of the fastest product successes ever at Kraft, rivaling Oscar Mayer Lunchables for its speed in breaking the $100 million sales mark while at the same time garnering a repeat purchase rate of 50 percent. The campaign's tagline, "It's not delivery, it's DiGiorno," successfully drove home the message with consumers that the DiGiorno was as good as the pizza delivered from their favorite take-out pizzeria.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the summer of 1997 Kraft downsized its corporate structure, merging several divisions and creating a joint coffee and cereals division, a beverages and desserts division, and a "New Meals" division, into which category DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza was placed. The reorganization fell together with changes in the executive ranks—Bob Eckert was named president and CEO following the departure of Robert Morrison in October 1997—and with an agency realignment. Kraft ended its relationship with the New York-based Grey Advertising, Inc. Its remaining agencies include Foote Cone & Belding and Leo Burnett, both of Chicago, and New York's Ogilvy & Mather, Y&R Advertising, and J. Walter Thompson. Foote Cone & Belding was chosen to create the advertising for DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza and later for Tombstone Rising Crust Pizza, an in-house competitor.

The company architect of the DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza phenomenon was Arthur Reingold, senior brand manager for DiGiorno Rising Crust from early 1994 to 1996. From formulation of the original idea to machinery to marketing, Reingold led a team that in effect let loose a frozen pizza revolution in 1996. When Reingold was assigned to the Kraft Pizza division in Glenview, Illinois, in 1994, he and his team began seriously discussing an idea that had been floating around for some time. The idea was the creation of a premium frozen pizza, a supermarket pie that could rival, and possibly beat, the offerings of a good pizzeria. This level of quality was considered an unattainable goal, but as Reingold discussed it with Frank Cole, who had been part of the General Foods (GF) organization in the 1980s—when GF had patented baking processes for other products to make them rise and bake up fresh in the oven—the idea took more concrete form. Cole retrieved the research, and Reingold and his team went to work on it. The result was the "rising crust" in DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza. Unlike conventional frozen pizzas, DiGiorno's crust was not precooked. It baked in the oven as it was prepared, rising and creating a fresh-baked bread aroma.

In addition to quality, convenience was a prime consideration in the development of DiGiorno Rising Crust. The pizza was designed to go into the oven without preheating so that consumers could do other things while the meal was baking.

FIRST CHEESE

The cheese covering DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza is not just any cheese—it is one of a long line of "firsts" Kraft has developed over the decades. Kraft cheese was the first to appear in many different forms and packages, some of which dramatically changed the way cheese was marketed and used by customers. Kraft processed cheese, developed in 1915 and patented in 1916 after many years of experimentation, was among the first and most successful of its kind. The new cheese had an extended shelf life and uniform flavor and was sold in convenient packaging. Kraft was also the first to sell processed cheese in individually wrapped slices (and later shredded or as strings); before that, cheese had been sliced by the retailer, so consumers could not know for sure which brand they were buying. It also had a short shelf life, quickly drying out or becoming moldy. Another first for Kraft was the development of nonfat cheese.

TARGET MARKET

The "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign targeted an audience of adults aged 25 to 54. The tighter focus was on adults 44 and younger with incomes of $40,000 and above who were medium to heavy users of carry-out pizza parlors such as Pizza Hut.

COMPETITION

Supermarket frozen pizza was a hot sales category in 1997, growing by double digits in that year at least in part due to the extraordinary success of DiGiorno Rising Crust. That success notwithstanding, DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza still faced stiff competition on two fronts: among purveyors of fresh pizza and in supermarket freezers. DiGiorno Rising Crust had been created to go up against fresh take-out pizza, such as that sold by Pizza Hut, Papa John's, and others, and those remained its primary competitors. In the supermarket pizza category, a major new competitor to DiGiorno Rising Crust was Freschetta frozen pizza.

Although DiGiorno's place at the top of the list of rising crust frozen pizzas remained secure throughout 1997, Freschetta's $56 million in sales during its first year landed it the number 10 spot on the 1997 "Top 10 New Product Pacesetters" list drawn up annually by Information Resources, Inc., of Chicago. The makers of Freschetta, Schwan's Sales Enterprises of Minnesota, were newcomers to the rising-crust pizza market but long-time competitors of Kraft. Schwan's, which primarily marketed the Tony's and Red Baron brand pizzas, introduced Freschetta into four markets in October 1996 and had moved the product into about half of the country by May 1997. The Freschetta advertising campaign from Bozell Advertising, Minneapolis, included television spots, magazine ads, outdoor posters and billboards, coupons, and in-store sampling, Brand Manager Tom Bierbaum told Advertising Age. The name Freschetta, Bierbaum said, was created to suggest flavor "like the old country" and "to marry its authentic taste with freshness." Schwan's total budget for all pizza advertising was $7 million in 1996.

The overwhelming success of DiGiorno Rising Crust also spawned competition from within the company itself. Kraft competed with itself by marketing a similar entry into the frozen pizza market under the Tombstone brand name, which Kraft had acquired in 1986. During the research and development stage of DiGiorno Rising Crust, Kraft had at one point considered marketing the final product under the Tombstone name but instead decided on DiGiorno to help position it as a high-quality Italian meal. Retailing at a slightly lower price and planned specifically to go up against Freschetta, Tombstone Rising Crust likewise used ads from Foote Cone & Belding. The advertising plan included television spots, free-standing inserts, and sampling, with consumer promotions handled by Davidson Marketing. Television spots showed the Tombstone character in a variety of precarious situations, including sinking in quicksand and ready for hanging at the gallows. When asked what he wanted on his tombstone, he answered, "A crust that rises."

In April 1997 Tombstone was sold in about 80 percent of the country. Kraft also owns a third entry in the supermarket pizza category, Jack's, which is sold mainly in the Midwest and the South and did not seriously threaten DiGiorno's lead.

According to Information Resources, Kraft, including Jack's brand, held the largest share of the frozen pizza market in 1997, with 35 percent, while Schwan's, the makers of Freschetta, had a market share of 23.7 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Reingold and his team took the finished product to focus groups, who were highly enthusiastic—in fact, their reaction, as Reingold recalled, was "wow." Bearing the pizza in one hand and stacks of glowing consumer group reports in the other, Reingold approached top management for funding for development of the rather complicated machinery that would be needed for mass production of the rising crust pizza. The product was introduced to a test market in about 6 percent of the country in 1995. In a departure from normal test market procedure, Reingold began tracking sales on a weekly basis and setting weekly goals. The product was an instant hit; by October of that year, distribution had doubled. In fact, demand was so much higher than expected that Reingold and other Kraft officials were initially unsure how much to produce. "How high was high?" Reingold wondered. "We didn't want to commit to markets we couldn't service."

The advertising agency Foote Cone & Belding had been brought into the project at the focus group stage. FCB developed television and print/outdoor advertising with the tag line "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno," which featured consumers trying the product—at a party, for example—and finding it so good that they assumed it was pizzeria pizza. Because the test market had shown that sampling would be crucial to DiGiorno's success (Advertising Age reported that about 25 percent of the total budget went to sampling rather than advertising), the direct sales force sent into stores for in-store sampling received extra training. The company also developed the DiGiorno Travelin' Pizzeria, an 18-foot truck that could distribute samples at events and in parking lots.

The rollout continued, and by 1996 DiGiorno was available in about 80 percent of the United States. The Travelin' Pizzeria reached 63 different markets, and in July 1997 the "DiGiorno Hot Air Balloon Tour" was added to the list of marketing strategies. The enormous balloon was adorned with a huge "pizza" ("a larger than life crust that literally rises," as the company described it). It made stops across the country, offering balloon rides to members of the media as well as to consumers.

Kraft supported the DiGiorno introduction with an $11 million budget, a little more than the $9 million it allocated to its in-house rival Tombstone. Television advertising took place in selected markets around the country during 1996 and the first three quarters of 1997. In the last quarter of 1997, television spots were shown on national networks. Print advertising, which carried into 1998, was focused on general interest and entertainment publications, and included Entertainment Weekly, Style, People, TV Guide, Rolling Stone, and ESPN Magazine. Men were specifically targeted with ads in Esquire and GQ, and gourmet cooks with ads in Bon Appetit.

The campaign was expanded in 1999 to support the introduction of several new flavor varieties of the popular pizza brand. According to a report in Frozen Food Age, soft drinks are the top beverage consumed with pizza, and tapping into the information Kraft launched a joint venture with its DiGiorno brand and Coca Cola that included in-store displays and other merchandising.

In 2000, a new series of television spots were added to the campaign to support the launch of DiGiorno's Half & Half Rising Crust pizzas. One spot was based on a scene from the Alfred Hitchcock thriller, Psycho, and included the familiar tagline, "It's not delivery, it's DiGiorno."

A new spin was put on the "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign in 2001 when Kraft launched a new promotion, "Be a DiGiorno Delivery Guy," with the prize for one winner, who would not deliver pizza, was $100,000 cash and a new Chrysler PT Cruiser. A television spot supporting the promotion showed a "slacker" visiting an unemployment office responding to a job offer on a DiGiorno pizza box. The woman working behind the counter said that DiGiorno is not delivery pizza. Print ads appeared in People magazine and an insert was included in newspapers. The promotion and campaign was repeated in 2002.

The tagline got a twist in a 2003 television spot that featured ESPN and ABC announcers for the National College Athletic Association, Bill Rafferty and Dick Vitale. During the spot the usually verbose Vitale was quiet as he enjoyed a slice of DiGiorno pizza. Rafferty thanked the pizza delivery guy for finding the secret to keeping Vitale quiet, but Vitale had the last word when he reminded Rafferty, "It's not deliver. It's DiGiorno, baby."

OUTCOME

The marketing campaign for DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza was by all measures a resounding success. The level of sales and the results of the sales analysis were both very satisfying to the company. While Reingold and the others admitted to some spillover from buyers of the Kraft Tombstone and Jack's frozen pizzas, the greater part of sales came from increased frozen pizza usage.Food and Beverage Marketing reported that roughly half of DiGiorno volume was new to the category and that both category spending and household penetration had grown at a much higher rate in DiGiorno markets than in non-DiGiorno markets. Moreover, qualitative research indicated that many consumers were replacing some of their spending at pizza parlors with DiGiorno. Repeat purchase levels exceeded 50 percent, the second highest repeat levels in the history of Kraft foods.

Food and Beverage Marketing also described surveys that noted that a strong brand relationship had been established with consumers. The impact of the product, and the impact of the ongoing marketing campaign, was such that DiGiorno was able to establish brand equity in its first year in the nation's supermarket freezers. DiGiorno also received accolades from Consumer Reports, which declared in its January 1997 issue that DiGiorno Rising Crust "tastes almost as good as pizza-chain pizza and costs less."

The 2001 and 2002 "Be the DiGiorno Delivery Guy" promotions were a notable success. Andrea Brown, the brand's director of consumer promotion told Promo magazine, that the contest was run two years because "it resonated so well with consumers, retailers, and the sales force that it was a must to repeat." In 2002, Promo named DiGiorno Rising Crust pizzas as one of the year's Best Promoted Brands, due to the success of the ongoing "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign. The "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign was updated and enhanced each year as new products in Kraft's rising crust pizza line were added. In 2003, the campaign was recognized by Frozen Food Age for Excellence in Marketing. Some 10 years after the campaign's 1996 launch, it and the iconic tagline were still reminding consumers, "It's not delivery, it's DiGiorno."

FURTHER READING

"A Meal That's Easy as Pie." Consumer Reports January, 1997, p. 19.

"DiGiorno Raises Dough—Fast!." Frozen Food Age, August 1, 1997.

"Freschetta Pizza Makes IRI's Top 10 for 1997." Frozen Food Age, June 1, 1998.

Harrison, Dan. "DiGiorno Widens First Place Position in Pizza." Frozen Food Age, July 1, 1999.

Harrison, Dan. "Rising Crust Pizza Rolls On." Frozen Food Age, January 1, 1999.

"He Delivers! (DiGiorno Rising Crust Brand Manager Arthur Reingold)." Food & Beverage Marketing, April 1, 1997.

Kirk, Jim. "Chicago Tribune Marketing Column (Vitale Pitches Pizza)." Chicago Tribune, March 6, 2003.

Petrecca, Laura, and Judann Pollack. "Kraft Dumps Grey in Advertising Shift." Crain's Chicago Business, March 9, 1998.

Pollack, Judann. "Kraft's DiGiorno Sparks Rising Crust Pizza Rivals." Advertising Age, April 28, 1997.

Thompson, Stephanie. "DiGiorno Keeps Delivery Theme for New Promo; In a Twist on Tagline, Brand Pledges Big Payoff for Not Delivering Pizzas." Advertising Age, April 2, 2001.

———. "Tombstone Rings Dip Into Snacktime; Kraft's New Doughnut-Shaped Pizza to Arrive with Mom-Focused Ads." Advertising Age, March 20, 2000.

Susan M. Steiner
Rayna Bailey

Labatt USA

101 Merrit 7
Norwalk, Connecticut 06856
USA
Telephone: (203) 750-6600
Web site: www.labattblue.com

■■■

ROLLING ROCK ADS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Also see essay for InBev USA.

In February 1998 Labatt USA, a division of Labatt, Inc., of Canada, increased its ad spending by 40 percent as part of a five-year plan to become the largest import/specialty beer marketer in the United States. A good portion of the increase was spent on an aggressive marketing push for Rolling Rock, a product of the Latrobe Brewing Company. Although Rolling Rock was the company's premier domestic brand, it was beset by stagnant sales. Labatt USA charged the New York-based ad agency Ammirati Puris Lintas with the task of creating a new campaign for Rolling Rock. Television spots made their debut later in 1998 and continued into 1999. The ads, which emphasized Rolling Rock's core equities of distinctiveness and quality, were supplied by bicoastal X-Ray Productions. The campaign also had a print component, created by the Bartle Bogle Hegarty agency.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Rolling Rock had been brewed in Latrobe, a town located in the Appalachian Mountains of Pennsylvania, about 25 miles east of Pittsburgh, since 1939. In its early days Rolling Rock was a core-market beer that was sold largely in seven-ounce bottles, called "ponies" or "pork chops" by the locals. Early radio ads for the brand proclaimed, "From the rolling hills of the Laurel Highlands: Rolling Rock."

Like most of the other medium-sized regional firms that survived the growth of national breweries in the postwar era, Latrobe plowed profits back into its physical plant and thus kept up with advances in brewing machinery and techniques. From around 3,000 barrels in 1939, Rolling Rock's output peaked at 715,000 barrels. But by 1987 sales had shrunk to 450,000 barrels a year. In order to allow sales to grow, the founding Tito family found itself forced to sell the brewery to a major player.

In 1987 Labatt USA acquired Rolling Rock, ushering in six years of rapid growth for the brand. Sales in Boston, New York, and other markets benefited from shrewd positioning by Labatt. The new owner took a brand that was a regional mainstream beer and reintroduced it to other markets as a specialty beer. On-premise sales were driven by a specially painted bottle. By 1993, however, the brand was once again stagnating. Sales stalled at about 1 million barrels in that year, just as "craft beers" from microbreweries started catching on. The craze for craft brews kept sales of Rolling Rock at about this level until 1997 when, after years of double-digit growth, the expansion of the craft brew segment slowed.

With microbrews clearly falling out of favor, Labatt USA concluded that it could boost sales of Rolling Rock by 5 percent with a plan that involved $12 million in media support, including the brand's first network television exposure. In early 1998 Labatt announced plans to spend more than $20 million in media advertising for the coming year. Its priorities included the first national network TV buy for Rolling Rock; new creative and increased spending for its Mexican beers Dos Equis, Tecate, and Sol; expanded TV support for the Canadian import Labatt Blue; and a campaign for the newly acquired Dutch brew Carlsberg.

TARGET MARKET

Males in their 20s were the principal target market for beer. About 75 percent of all beer in the United States was consumed by men. Since the late 1970s, however, the number of beer drinkers had been declining. The trade publication Beer Marketer's Insights reported a correlation between a decline in males aged 18 to 24 with a decline in beer sales in areas such as California, New England, and the mid-Atlantic states. Not only were there fewer young people, but fewer young people were drinking, and those who continued to drink were drinking less. A 1998 study conducted by the Journal of Studies on Alcohol found that the number of men who identified themselves as frequent drinkers of alcohol had declined and that the number of infrequent drinkers and abstainers had increased.

Some brewing companies responded to the shrinking target market by tailoring their advertising to create a strong relationship between their beers and their customers. "We've been dealing with a flat to declining market for close to a decade," said Susan Henderson, a spokeswoman for the Miller Brewing Company. "To have compelling branded messages that gain loyalty for responsible uses for our products is job number one." Other brewers chose not to target young drinkers specifically. "We're not constantly trying to figure out what the best way to talk to a 21-year-old is," commented Tom Cardella, a vice president of Labatt USA. As a higher-priced specialty brand, Rolling Rock had a marketing strategy that was not geared toward replenishing the supply of young beer drinkers. Instead, marketing efforts in the late 1990s focused on Rolling Rock's heritage as a small Pennsylvania brewer.

The aim was not to target all young beer drinkers but to appeal to a discrete portion of the market. "We have identified a group in the market called premium packaged lager triallists," explained Rolling Rock marketing manager Susan Keyes. "These people try different brands but are not loyal to any particular one. They are 12 percent of [premium-packaged lager] drinkers and account for 20 percent of volume." Rolling Rock's marketing research showed that young premium-packaged lager drinkers liked to keep up with the latest fashions in beer drinking. According to Keyes, "They believe what they drink says a lot about them. They have a 'live for the weekend' attitude." Wooing these consumers emerged as a priority for Rolling Rock in the late 1990s.

COMPETITION

Beer advertising took an unconventional turn in 1997 as competitors such as Miller Lite, Miller Genuine Draft, Heineken, and Bass Aleeach launched edgy campaigns designed to break the mold of the traditional approach. By the next year, however, puzzled responses from consumers and wholesalers prompted almost all of the brewers to abandon entertainment-oriented ads and to shift back to product and user themes.

Miller provided the most prominent example of this retrenchment. In 1997 the struggling number two brewer unveiled a series of quirky commercials for its two most popular brands, Lite and Genuine Draft. The ads in the Lite campaign featured a character dubbed Dick, a fictional advertising executive. One of the first commercials showed a man emerging from a field without pants, his genitals covered by a Miller logo. The Genuine Draft ads, shot in black and white, employed quick-cut editing and relied on music instead of a spoken narrative or dialogue, creating an effect that was akin to a music video.

Miller's sales initially improved, and company executives crowed that the ads deserved some of the credit. Several Miller wholesalers complained about the ads, however, and in 1998 sales resumed their decline. Some members of the advertising industry trade press criticized the ads for alienating Miller's older drinkers. "That's the danger of so-called 'edgy' humor," said former Heineken USA executive Philip Van Munching. "You get 'em with one ad and turn 'em off with the next. It's a stupid way to advertise your product."

Coors, the number three U.S. brewer, enjoyed more success with its unconventional approach. Its 1998 campaign featuring the tag line "Hey Beer Man" was targeted to young men. Coors also increased its ad support for Zima, a citrus-flavored malt beverage positioned as a hip alternative to beer.

MARKETING STRATEGY

According to Labatt USA's official positioning statement, Rolling Rock was "unique and distinctive from all other beers. Rolling Rock consumers tend to be people that are looking for things outside the mainstream. They want something different. Rolling Rock is a lager, so it's more like mainstream beers, but it has a little more body, a little more bite than the traditional lagers. Then there's the quirkiness of the brand, the 33 [printed on the bottle], the horsehead, the small town origin.

THE MYSTERY OF ''33''

An element of Rolling Rock's appeal involved the unexplained ''33'' on the back of each silk-screened green bottle. What did it mean? Where did it come from? Why was it there? The number had provided hours of conversation in bars over the years, not to mention E-mails, Internet discussions, and late-night college bull sessions. The brand did its own promotions on the question, offering contests for the best explanations.

The most common answer was that the number referred to 1933, the year of the repeal of Prohibition in the United States. Other popular explanations were that 33 was the number of words in the original Rolling Rock advertising slogan, the number of letters in the ingredients of the beer (hops, malt, water, rice, corn, brewer's yeast), and the number of the race horse on the bottle (the horse's number was not shown).

Even the brewery's owners, Labatt USA, professed to be mystified about the origin of the number. ''The 33 is the first thing people ask me about,'' said Darin Wolf, Labatt USA's director of marketing for the brand. Quirky ad campaigns were spun around the number, one noting the synchronicity of the number and Super Bowl XXXIII and another coinciding with the introduction of the 33-cent stamp.

What was the real truth about the mysterious 33? The straight story was this. The Latrobe Brewing Company was originally a satellite of the Pittsburgh Brewing Company, best known as the brewers of Iron City Beer. After the repeal of Prohibition, Pittsburgh sold off its smaller brewing facilities, and the Latrobe brewery was bought by five brothers from the town—Frank, Joseph, Robert, Ralph, and Anthony Tito. The Titos sold beer for five years but wanted to launch a new brand that would get sales going on an upward trend. They came up with a name, Rolling Rock, but were looking for a slogan that covered all of the salient facts without taking up too much space.

According to James Tito, a member of the family, whoever came up with the slogan proudly scrawled ''33'' at the bottom of it to show how concise it was. The brewery sent the slogan off on the original sheet of paper, forgetting to tell the printer that the ''33'' was not part of the advertising. Thousands of fairly expensive silk-screened bottles later, the brewery realized that it had a problem. After considering the price of destroying the bottles and of silk-screening new ones, the brewery decided to let them go out without explanation. It was a surprisingly smart move.

Everything we do tries to position the brand as different from other beers.''

For many years Labatt USA did not do much to plant this image of Rolling Rock in the public mind. Stagnant sales, however, finally prompted the company to launch a full-scale restaging of the brand, aimed at changing its image from a laid-back discovery for 30-somethings to a leading-edge streetwise brew for 20- to 25-year-olds. The restaging dropped references to mountain springs to offset consumers' misperceptions that Rolling Rock was watery. It also cleared the way for a national rollout for a line extension, Rock Light, after two decades of being limited mainly to the core Pennsylvania and Ohio markets.

The 1998 Rolling Rock marketing initiative represented the biggest-ever TV buy for the brand. During the spring and fall of 1998, Labatt USA ran a mix of seven 30-second spots and four 15-second spots during sports telecasts and prime-time and late-night network and cable TV programming. The humorous ads from Ammirati Puris Lintas revolved around Rolling Rock's distinctive green, painted bottle.

On August 24 the print campaign for Rolling Rock, devised by Bartle Bogle Hegarty, was unveiled. The print ads challenged consumers to take actions depending on five rolls of dice. They included winking at a newsagent, growing a moustache, and asking a stranger the time in a Danish accent. The print ads, which carried the tag line ''On a roll with a rock,'' ran in entertainment listings magazines, including Time Out, and were supported by a corresponding poster campaign. Labatt USA also ran a separate summer promotion in which consumers could get posters of artists' renditions of the Rolling Rock bottle.

Rolling Rock was a specialty product that relied on package design for its main means of brand recognition, and so its bottle played an important role in the repositioning of the brand. Rolling Rock officials considered its green glass, long neck, and mysterious ''33'' as core equities. ''Everything revolves around the longneck bottle,'' according to Brad Hittle, group director of marketing at Labatt USA. ''Consistency is the name of the game when you're a niche player.'' The taller container with the painted label provided ''genuine character'' to the brand, Hittle said. As for the green, blue, and white presentation, he added, ''They're not sexy colors. But that's what the consumers like.''

There was only one problem. Until 1998 the painted long-necked bottles of Rolling Rock were available only on-premise, that is, in bars and restaurants. Some years earlier, as a cost-cutting measure, the brand had gone to paper labels for off-premise sales. But according to Rolling Rock marketing executive Joe Gruss, the change had caused a problem. ''We were known for the silk-screened bottles. People would drink it in those bottles on-premise. When they got to the store to buy beer to take home and saw paper labels, it was kind of a let-down. It was the same beer, it was just a perception change.''

In 1998 Labatt decided to return to selling Rolling Rock exclusively in long-necked, painted bottles. Doing so required the brewer to raise prices almost 50 cents per six-pack, thus repositioning the brew between domestic premium and specialty beers. But the decision to go to the painted bottles exclusively had an unexpected result that made the higher costs a moot point. ''When we made the decision to eliminate the paper labels, we did quite a bit of quantitative research on the change, and the perception of the new packaging,'' said marketing executive Darin Wolf. ''Not only were consumers willing to pay more for the silk-screened bottles, they actually expected to pay more.''

OUTCOME

Rolling Rock's 1998 ad campaign, stressing its Pennsylvania heritage and distinctive green bottle, was one of the big winners at the 14th Annual ''Best of New York'' Addy Awards honoring the best creative advertising of the year. The campaign won three Addies in the alcoholic beverages category for the spots titled ''Thirsty,'' ''History,'' and ''Evolution.''

The campaign also proved popular with Rolling Rock wholesalers, who seemed pleased that advertising support was finally being provided for the brand, even if they did not fully comprehend the strategy. ''They seem to be working,'' one wholesaler said of the Rolling Rock ads. Then he added, in a comment typical of wholesalers on any brand of beer advertising in the 1990s, ''Besides, I don't know what we're looking for in beer ads any more.''

FURTHER READING

Khermouch, Gary. ''Labatt to Juice Dos Equis, Rock in '98.'' Brandweek, December 15, 1997.

''Rocking and Rolling.'' Grocer, May 29, 1999.

Robert Schnakenberg

Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority

3150 Paradise Road
Las Vegas, Nevada 89109
USA
Telephone: (702) 892-0711
Web site: www.lvcva.com

■■■

VEGAS STORIES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Between 2000 and 2002 the number of visitors to Las Vegas dipped from 35.8 million to 35 million. Analysts blamed the slump on the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and the sprawl of Native-American-owned casinos across America, along with a sudden increase in jurisdictions allowing gambling. The Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority (LVCVA), whose primary duty was to market Southern Nevada as a premier destination for leisure and business travel, drew its funding from Nevada's room tax. In hopes of branding Las Vegas as a leisure destination for people craving indulgence and an escape from their humdrum lives, LVCVA released its "Vegas Stories" campaign in January 2003. It differed from past LVCVA campaigns that advertised Las Vegas's exquisite hotels, golf courses, and entertainment.

The $58 million campaign was originally scheduled for 20 months and featured the tagline "What happens here, stays here." After achieving considerable success it continued into 2005. Conceived by the ad agency R&R Partners, the campaign appeared across print, Internet, outdoor, and television mediums. Suggesting that people did not always want to disclose what they did in Las Vegas, the spots were based on true stories. Several commercials merely featured people, usually in their twenties or thirties, who were suspiciously vague about what they actually did during recent Las Vegas vacations. When asked about their trip, the travelers grew quickly uncomfortable and fabricated hardly cohesive stories. Some spots featured people completely reluctant to talk about their Las Vegas trip.

Shrouded in controversy almost from its conception, "Vegas Stories" commercials were banned from airing during the 2003 Super Bowl. Las Vegas businesses also voiced their difficulty in hiring out-of-state employees after the campaign's tagline boasted of Las Vegas's immoral side. Despite the discord, the campaign prompted Brandweek magazine to bestow R&R Partners with its Grand Marketer of the Year award. The campaign also helped reverse Las Vegas's visitor decline. In 2004 the city hosted 37.4 million visitors, which was 2.4 million more than in 2002.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The LVCVA advertising account had been handled by Las Vegas–based R&R Partners since 1981. Not only had R&R Partners helped Las Vegas become one of America's fastest-growing cities by the late 1990s, but it had also helped brand Las Vegas as a popular destination for art, musicals, and world-class cuisine. Erika Brandvik, PR manager at LVCVA, told PR Week US, "The fact is 15 years ago there were only two states where you could gamble, and now you can engage in some form of gambling in 48 of the 50 states. So just being a gaming destination isn't going to do it for people anymore."

© DAVE BARTRUFF/CORBIS.

In March 1999 R&R Partners released a campaign titled "Las Vegas—It's anything and everything," which appeared during the same year that luxury hotels such as the Venetian, Mandalay Bay, Bellagio, and Paris opened along the Las Vegas strip. Soon afterward an R&R Partners survey revealed that most visitors were attracted to Las Vegas's unrestricted atmosphere. To hype the city's liberated environment the agency released a campaign called "Freedom Party." It involved the construction of the website www.vegasfreedom.com and ads announcing a fictitious presidential candidate who, incidentally, belonged to an equally fictitious "Freedom Party."

To stoke Las Vegas's convention business, the "We Work as Hard as We Play" campaign appeared just before the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. R&R Partners valued the campaign but wanted to also target leisure travelers by branding Las Vegas as a "commitment-free, pressure-free, judgment-free" destination. After fumbling with such taglines as "Las Vegas: You know how it goes," "Vegas: Keep it between us," and "Las Vegas: Get in on the secret," Jason Hoff and Jeff Candido, copywriters at R&R Partners, chose "What happens here, stays here," the previous motto of men misbehaving in remote locations.

TARGET MARKET

During the campaign's first year, "Vegas Stories" targeted 21- to 35-year-olds with a penchant for adult entertainment. The first television spots, aired in January 2003, suggested that Las Vegas was a place where businesswomen led double lives, coeds engaged in one-night stands, and groups of friends got so drunk at night that members of the party would be missing the next morning. As the campaign continued and its popularity increased, its target market was expanded. By 2005 the campaign's commercials became more ambiguous to broaden their appeal. Candido told the Washington Post, "They're successful because people can imagine more than what we show. A grandmother who sees these spots can imagine that [the debauchery] is spending too much time at the buffet. The 23-year-old bachelor party guys can have their own ideas about what went on." To widen their target R&R Partners also created spots that featured elderly couples, African-American and Latino women, middle-aged couples, and a sexually ambiguous character.

LVCVA and R&R Partners later began targeting different archetypes that they created for the campaign. One such archetype, titled "The Admiral's Club," was profiled as a heavy traveler and recreational gambler, usually 35 years of age or older, with a household income of more than $50,000 and who read magazines such as Golf Digest, Sports Illustrated, and Playboy. "The Cultured Pearl" was described as a high-power businesswoman whose household income exceeded $100,000. "Fashionistas" were flashy, domestic travelers who enjoyed recreational gambling, were sometimes college-educated, and watched TV shows like Will & Grace, American Idol, and The Bachelorette at night. The "Jack & Diane" archetype was described as a married-with-children suburbanite who took short vacations and enjoyed heavy recreational gambling. Lastly, "Mr. Saturday Night," was depicted as a unmarried man who earned more than $50,000 annually, preferred high-energy activities, was a modest gambler, and watched television shows like Fear Factor, Survivor, The Apprentice, and The Contender.

COMPETITION

As with Las Vegas, room tax also provided a marketing budget for the gambling-friendly city of Reno, located 450 miles north of Las Vegas. In 2003 Reno-Sparks

$1 DEAL

The Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority (LVCVA) formed a committee in 2005 to investigate its president and CEO, Rossi Ralenkotter. Without consulting his board members Ralenkotter had sold rights to LVCVA's popular slogan, "What happens here, stays here," back to the advertising agency that created it, R&R Partners, for the price of $1. After further investigation Ralenkotter's name was cleared. Analysts, however, criticized him for selling the slogan, which could have generated millions of dollars in licensing agreements. Before the sale R&R Partners convinced Ralenkotter that they were more prepared to protect the slogan from copycats and opportunists.

Convention & Visitors Authority (RSCVA) released a campaign titled "America's Adventure Place," referring to Reno, which was still reeling from the popularity of Native-American casinos and from public unease over possible terrorist attacks. Las Vegas was generating seven times Reno's gambling revenue; many of Reno's casinos were in desperate need of renovation. "We found Reno didn't have a great perception in our (tourist) market," Deanna Ashby, the RSCVA executive marketing director, told the Reno Gazette-Journal. She described Reno's previous image as "a place where you can get your teeth knocked out in a barroom brawl."

In 2004 the $1.5 million Truckee River Whitewater Park was built in the heart of downtown Reno. With 8,000 tons of concrete the city converted a 2,600-foot stretch of the Truckee River into class II and class III rapids for kayakers. Print and television spots for "America's Adventure Place" aired in California's Bay Area and Sacramento markets. Commercials portrayed Reno as a popular destination for nightlife, hiking, mountain biking, and white-water kayaking. Print ads with the tagline "360 Degrees of Adventure" showed panoramic collages of similar activities. Despite most of Reno's visitors being age 55 or older, the campaign focused on a younger demographic of outdoor enthusiasts. By 2004 Reno had finally stopped the diminution of its tourist industry, but the city still had not regained the 5.1 million visitor count it saw in 2000.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Vegas Stories" was a major departure from previous LVCVA campaigns, in that it did not flaunt the famous Las Vegas strip, show the insides of casinos, or display forms of adult entertainment. Instead it strove to brand Las Vegas as a retreat for adults searching for guilt-free fun. For instance, in the 30-second spot "Parents," two parents confronted their teenage son, who had hosted a house party while they were away at Las Vegas. When asked what he had done all weekend, the son replied, "Nothing." When he asked his parents the same question, they sheepishly replied, "Nothing." In contrast to past LVCVA campaigns, the "Parents" spot was not even set in Las Vegas. "We're developing a brand rather than a product," Rob Dondero, an executive vice president of R&R Partners, told Adweek.

The campaign's first spots, which began airing in January 2003, were slightly more risqué and were eventually banned from appearing during the 2003 Super Bowl. Several Las Vegas businesses also claimed that the spots marred the city's reputation as a respectable place to work. Directed by Bryan Buckley, the commercials showed, for instance, a businesswoman impulsively marrying a handsome, non-English-speaking man and then hurriedly insisting, "I have to get back to my convention." In another spot a young woman justified her one-night stand to her girlfriends by insisting, "He's a juggler and he had very nice hands." In a commercial featuring a group of middle-aged men recovering from a night of overindulgence, one man asked, "We've got one guy missing in action. All we have are his dentures. What are we gonna say?" All spots ended with the tagline "What happens here, stays here."

After its 2003 backlash, the campaign released six new TV commercials on February 11, 2004, that were less explicit. In the spot "Unclaimed Luggage," a couple approached the front desk of a hotel in search of their luggage. When asked a few simple questions, for instance, about what room they stayed in or when they checked in, the couple confessed to never actually entering their room. Instead they had spent a sleepless night enjoying Las Vegas. "What we've tried to show is the precursor, and the aftermath, to a personal story, and let viewers fill in the details," Candid told the Washington Post. Another spot, titled "Silent Car," featured a limousine transporting what seemed to be an exhausted bachelorette party. At first the women appeared sullen, until one bridesmaid snickered, which sparked contagious laughter throughout the car. LVCVA spent an initial $58 million to run print ads and television spots. The latter aired across such networks as Comedy Central, E!, ESPN, ESPN2, Fine Living, Food Network, Fox News, and MSNBC until August 2004.

The campaigned continued into 2005 with five more television spots, all of them less provocative than their original counterparts. One 2005 commercial featured a boxer whose manager was relieved that he could not remember the night before. Another spot, portraying the ambiguity that Las Vegas offered its visitors, featured a woman who assumed the names of television characters. R&R Partners' chief executive, Billy Vassiliadis, told the Washington Post, "People always ask if the spots are about sex. If that's what you want to read into it, that's fine."

OUTCOME

In 2004 "Vegas Stories" overtook campaigns released by McDonald's Corp. and Apple Computer to win Brandweek magazine's Grand Marketer of the Year award. As the campaign continued and Las Vegas restored its dwindling tourist industry, even some of the campaign's toughest critics, such as Nevada's Governor Kenny Guinn, warmed up to its controversial tagline. After traveling domestically, the governor, who was addressing the 20th annual Governor's Conference on Tourism, was quoted by Associated Press Newswires as saying, "I can tell you that slogan is synonymous with Las Vegas, and they don't take it as a negative. Some of us did. I believe I did to begin with. But I've changed my mind because you need something that is attached to Las Vegas and the state of Nevada."

Not only had the visitor decline to Las Vegas stopped by 2004, but the city also boasted 2.4 million more visitors that year than in 2002. Furthermore, a USA Today Ad Track survey deemed "Vegas Stories" spots the most effective commercials on television and the sixth most likable.

FURTHER READING

Farhi, Paul. "Las Vegas Ads' Winning Streak." Washington Post, December 2, 2004, p. C01.

Friedman, Wayne. "Vegas Touchback." Television Week, February 14, 2005, p. 2.

German, Jeff. "Dollar Deal Is Costing LVCVA Big Bucks." Las Vegas Sun, September 11, 2005, p. 03.

Kanigher, Steve. "Misrepresenting Vegas Is a Sign of the Times." Las Vegas Sun, June 6, 2004, p. 04.

———. "Recommendations Made for LVCVA to Keep Ownership of Protected Slogans." Las Vegas Sun, September 7, 2005, p. 01.

Koch, Ed. "Controversy Absent on Famous Vegas Sign." Las Vegas Sun, July 27, 2005, p. 02.

McKee, David. "Difficult to Assign Dollar Value to Las Vegas Slogan." Las Vegas Business Press, July 25, 2005, p. 2.

———. "$27K at Center of Slogan Brouhaha." Las Vegas Business Press, August 15, 2005, p. 2.

Mihailovich, Steven. " 'Las Vegas Stories' Wins Industry Award." Las Vegas Business Press, October 18, 2004, p. 2.

Smith, John L. "Ex-councilman Doesn't Like Las Vegans Losing Their Shirts in $1 Deal." Las Vegas Review-Journal, July 15, 2005, p. 1B.

Smith, Rod. "Tourism: Ad Effects, Terrorism Fears Fade." Las Vegas Review-Journal, April 24, 2004, p. 1D.

Wargo, Brian. "R&R Partners Hired to Launch Tourism Campaign." Las Vegas Sun, August 30, 2005, p. 03.

Wheaton, Ken. "Adages; Agency Brings out the Softer Side of Sin City." Advertising Age, September 19, 2005, p. 52.

Kevin Teague

La-Z-Boy Inc.

1284 N. Telegraph Road
Monroe, Michigan 48162
USA
Telephone: (734) 241-4074
Fax: (734) 457-2005
Web site: www.lazboy.com

■■■

THE NEW LOOK OF COMFORT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

La-Z-Boy Inc. built its furniture brand on a single product, the ubiquitous recliner-rocker closely associated with TV-watching men in their middle and late years. Though the company began expanding into other furniture products in the 1980s, it had not by the late 1990s effectively enlarged its consumer base beyond its aging male loyalists. Still number one in the recliner category, La-Z-Boy wanted to make itself relevant to a new generation of Americans, especially women, who played the dominant role in the overwhelming majority of furniture transactions. The company progressively placed more emphasis on modern, fashionable furniture lines, and in 2000 it charged its longtime agency, Doner of Detroit, with the project of changing consumers' perceptions of the La-Z-Boy brand.

The resulting campaign, "The New Look of Comfort," paired La-Z-Boy's reputation for comfort with a style-focused pitch meant to resonate with young women. Drawing on an estimated $5 to $10 million budget, the campaign's print portion appeared in home-oriented magazines in the fall of 2000, and the campaign moved to television in the summer of 2001. Each print and TV execution focused on an individual La-Z-Boy product in a striking visual arrangement meant to draw attention to its elegant design features, while witty copy and voice-overs supplemented the fashionable sensibility on display.

"The New Look of Comfort" spurred sales of each of the individual products advertised in print and on TV and was extended as La-Z-Boy continued to build its fashion credentials. A 2002 charity event in which the company asked prominent designers to contribute recliner prototypes for auction eventually led to a sustained collaboration with Todd Oldham, a former New York fashion designer. The Todd Oldham collection debuted in 2003 and built further buzz around La-Z-Boy's evolution; advertising on behalf of the prominent new line retained the tagline "The New Look of Comfort."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

La-Z-Boy began life in the garage of Edward Knabusch's father in Monroe, Michigan, when Knabusch and his cousin Edwin Shoemaker quit their jobs to start their own furniture company in 1927. In 1929 the pair introduced their first upholstered recliner, thus establishing the template responsible for the company's enormous success in subsequent decades. Recliner design took a step forward in the 1950s, when La-Z-Boy added built-in footrests, and the 1960s saw sales boom with the birth of the rocker-recliner, which became the industry standard. La-Z-Boy dominated the recliner category throughout the latter half of the twentieth century, becoming virtually synonymous with easy-chair comfort.

La-Z-Boy moved beyond the manufacture of recliners in the 1980s, but it remained almost exclusively associated with its signature product. Thus, in the 1990s the company pursued sales growth by outfitting recliners with numerous and varied gadgets, including telephones, modems, drink coolers, heaters, and massage equipment. These efforts did not substantially enlarge the company's market, and although La-Z-Boy remained the category leader, selling upward of 1 million recliners annually in the United States, its steady but unexciting consumer base of aging men offered no measurable avenues for growth.

In the 1990s the company began seeking growth via its other product lines, and this project necessitated the building of a new base of consumers. Though popular among baby boomers, La-Z-Boy out of necessity had to position itself to appeal to a new wave of Americans, and these young people were unlikely to adopt the style choices of their parents and grandparents. La-Z-Boy research indicated, moreover, that 85 percent of furniture purchases were initiated by women. The company accordingly moved into more modern furniture styles and pinpointed young women as the key demographic necessary for future sales growth. The La-Z-Boy brand remained so closely associated with unstylish recliners, however, that these typically fashion-conscious consumers did not take the new products seriously. The brand's well-developed reputation for comfort gave it a sizable advantage in the broader furniture market, but it had to overcome a corresponding reputation as a brand suited to suburban dads and granddads if it was to become an attractive option for young women.

COUNTERPOINT

Known almost exclusively as the maker of comfortable recliners for couch potatoes, La-Z-Boy made serious efforts to update its image beginning in 2000 with its campaign "The New Look of Comfort." Some analysts, however, remained skeptical about the company's prospects for generating sales among fashionable young women, La-Z-Boy's key target for future growth. Analyst Laura Champine of the financial-services firm Morgan Keegan, for instance, acknowledged that La-Z-Boy's contemporary offerings, including the collection created by prominent fashion designer Todd Oldham, represented a valid attempt to reach beyond its core market of aging men, but she downplayed the suggestion that the brand had substantially changed consumer perception as of 2005. "It has taken them decades to establish their brand image," she told Brandweek, suggesting that a comparable period of time might be necessary to see La-Z-Boy through as dramatic a brand transformation as the one the company was then undertaking.

TARGET MARKET

In previous years Doner had successfully helped La-Z-Boy maintain its image as a leader in furniture comfort with campaigns targeting married, college-educated consumers in their mid-20s to mid-50s, with household incomes of $50,000 or more. These men and women were expected to base their furniture-buying decisions more on comfort than on style. "The New Look of Comfort," by contrast, explicitly targeted fashion-conscious women between the ages of 25 and 44, both single and married, with incomes reaching into the upper ranges of the middle class. The campaign's intent was to encourage these consumers to rethink their notions of La-Z-Boy by linking the brand's heritage of comfort with a new, dramatically more stylish image. To attract the attention of a target group that did not necessarily take the brand seriously, La-Z-Boy needed to appear much bolder and more adventurous than it had in the past.

At the same time La-Z-Boy had to be careful not to alienate its more traditional consumer base, as conventional recliners continued to account for half of the brand's sales. The company simultaneously ran separate advertising efforts to speak to its traditional customers, but it was also mindful of the need to ensure that the fashion-oriented pitch of the new campaign could not be construed as a suggestion that the recliners upon which it had built its reputation were unsophisticated or outdated.

COMPETITION

The Ethan Allen brand, known for offering a full selection of home furnishings in a variety of styles, was during this time also attempting to appeal to young consumers. In 2000 the furniture maker and its retail network enlisted Grey Advertising of New York for a campaign in support of its new Horizons line, designed with 25- to 35-year-old consumers in mind. The campaign featured romantic storylines and surreal, dramatic imagery, such as an Ethan Allen bed placed in the middle of a dry desert lake bed. In 2002 the company intensified its efforts to reach young consumers, cutting prices on Horizons as well as on a more expensive line targeted at those who were beginning to upgrade their furniture after the first few years of home ownership. In an attempt to attract young families to its retail outlets, Ethan Allen likewise expanded its offerings of children's furniture and stepped up advertising on these new lines' behalf.

With its combination of sleek, modern design and low price, the Swedish furniture maker IKEA had become the brand of choice for young, urban men and women who wanted to balance style with economic considerations. Successful advertising crafted by New York–based agency Deutsch had positioned IKEA as the brand consumers turned to for the major purchases necessary during key transitional events, such as marriage or the purchase of a home. Deutsch later adapted this idea to allow for more company growth by extending the concept to smaller events in people's lives, effectively spurring consumers to visit IKEA stores more often. Later Deutsch work showed how mundane environments (including a bowling alley and a subway car) took on drama and life with the addition of IKEA furniture. IKEA and Deutsch ended their 11-year relationship in 2000, when the company solicited advertising ideas from other agencies. The company briefly gave its account to Minneapolis agency Carmichael Lynch before tapping agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky to take over its advertising in 2002. The agency began targeting a consumer subculture ranging from thrift-shop savants to the arbiters of underground fashion trends, urging them to see furniture as fashion items subject to changing trends rather than as settled fixtures in the home to be replaced only once or twice a lifetime.

Another manufacturer of recliners, Mitchell Gold, was, like La-Z-Boy, also attempting during this time to overcome that furniture category's fashion-related shortcomings. A 2001 Mitchell Gold print campaign targeting women suggested that the company made "recliners that don't look like recliners" and employed copy modeled after common women's-magazine exhortations, such as "Bring something a little daring into your relationship."

MARKETING STRATEGY

By 2000 La-Z-Boy boasted a full line of modern chairs, sofas, coffee tables, and other furniture that met the style demands of a younger, upscale, female target market, but these consumers either were not sufficiently aware of this fact or did not take La-Z-Boy's fashion credentials seriously because of the company's heritage. Doner's objective was to change these consumers' perceptions of La-Z-Boy and, accordingly, to spur sales of its new, fashionable lines. La-Z-Boy chose seven specific pieces of furniture and related fabrics to showcase. If the campaign could boost sales of these select items, then the company could more confidently proceed with the further cultivation of its new target market, thereby positioning itself for sustained sales growth. La-Z-Boy wanted to accomplish this goal without abandoning its image of comfort, a brand attribute that the company had been assiduously building for more than 70 years. The tagline for the new campaign, "The New Look of Comfort," was meant to update consumers' notions of what comfortable furniture could look like. Ideally Doner and La-Z-Boy wanted their female target to be pleasantly taken aback by the notion that the stylish new furniture lines carried the La-Z-Boy brand name.

La-Z-Boy spent an estimated $50 million on advertising annually; "The New Look of Comfort" initially accounted for $5 to $10 million of this total. Doner made the individual pieces of furniture the heroes of the campaign's introductory print ads, which ran, beginning in late November 2000, in publications that included InStyle, Martha Stewart Living, Elle Decor, and Metropolitan Home. Witty copy accompanied photo arrangements that, rather than showing La-Z-Boy furniture in standard domestic settings, used modern compositional elements to enhance the style-intensive message. For instance, a red recliner called the Carlyle, featuring sleek wooden arms and other retro-modern stylings, was shown surrounded by other red chairs with text reading, "Everybody needs a role model." A plum-colored sofa was showcased by itself in an ad advising, "We recommend a wallet-sized photo for those times when you absolutely have to leave the house." Another ad paired the same sofa's image with the copy "We thought it was about time furniture had a jazz section."

In June 2001 the campaign was extended to television with 15-second spots that were conceptually in keeping with the print ads. They ran on a range of cable channels, including Lifetime, Nick at Night, A&E, Discovery, USA, and Animal Planet. Doner also placed the commercials prominently on The View, an ABC morning talk show with a strong female viewership. As with the print ads, each spot focused explicitly on the furniture itself while using voice-overs (spoken by actress Courtney Thorne-Smith) similar to the print ads' copy. One spot opened with a shot of the Venus de Milo before showing a La-Z-Boy product called the Ava chair. Thorne-Smith intoned, "We thought our chair looks pretty good without arms, too." In another commercial the camera tracked paw prints through a forest, which led to the Catalina sofa; as it was shown, the voice-over declared, "Your other furniture will fear for its life."

OUTCOME

Before "The New Look of Comfort" began, none of the seven furniture and fabric combinations featured in the campaign were among La-Z-Boy's top-10-selling fabric-and-frame combinations. As of 2002, however, all seven advertised product combinations made the list. La-Z-Boy accordingly ventured further into the world of stylish furniture, partnering with seven fashion designers, including Tommy Hilfiger, Nicole Miller, MoMo Falana, and Todd Oldham, to create signature La-Z-Boy recliners. Two prototypes of each designer's chair were produced and auctioned to benefit a New York shelter for homeless victims of AIDS. In concert with the event La-Z-Boy ran a five-page spread in InStyle magazine using the tagline "The New Look of Comfort." La-Z-Boy particularly liked Oldham's approach to recliner design, and in 2003 the company announced a high-profile partnership with the former maker of popular shoes and jeans for the MTV generation. The resulting Todd Oldham by La-Z-Boy collection of urban-styled furniture generated substantial buzz upon its fall 2003 release. Supporting advertising on behalf of the Oldham collection retained the "New Look of Comfort" theme and tagline.

FURTHER READING

Appelbaum, Michael. "Comfy to Cool: A Brand Swivel." Brandweek, May 2, 2005.

Bloom, Jonah. "La-Z-Boy: Kurt Darrow." Advertising Age (midwest ed.), November 17, 2003.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Lounging Shoppers Show Off Comfort in Ads for La-Z-Boy." Advertising Age, August 9, 1999.

Fitzgerald, Kate. "La-Z-Boy Maxim." Advertising Age, June 26, 1998.

Gunin, Joan. "La-Z-Boy's New Print Ads Key on Style, Humor." Furniture/Today, November 6, 2000.

Irwin, Tanya. "Designs on a La-Z-Boy." Adweek (midwest ed.), February 11, 2002.

———. "La-Z-Boy Targets Younger Buyers." Adweek (midwest ed.), November 20, 2000.

———. "La-Z-Boy Targets Young Women." Adweek (midwest ed.), July 16, 2001.

Palmeri, Christopher. "La-Z-Boy: Up from Naugahyde; Its Stylish Line, by Designer Todd Oldham, May Just Banish the Stodgy Image." BusinessWeek, April 12, 2004.

Perry, David. "La-Z-Boy Ads Let Product Be the Hero." Furniture/Today, August 13, 2001.

Mark Lane

LeapFrog Enterprises, Inc.

6401 Hollis St., Ste. 150
Emeryville, California 94608-1071
USA
Telephone: (510) 420-5000
Fax: (510) 420-5001
Web site: www.LeapFrog.com

■■■

LEARN SOMETHING NEW EVERY DAY! CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Frustrated by the lack of educational toys, in 1995 Mike Wood, a California attorney, rewired a talking greeting card to help his son differentiate between phonetic sounds. Soon afterward Wood founded LeapFrog Enterprises, Inc., to fill what he considered a void in the $34 billion toy industry, which was dominated by the companies Mattel and Hasbro. While competitors focused on movie-licensed toys or one-hit products such as Beanie Babies, LeapFrog concentrated on high-quality educational toys. By 2001 LeapFrog had developed more than 100 products and recorded $222 million in sales. To codify its brand as the leading educational toymaker, LeapFrog released its ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' campaign.

In 2002 LeapFrog provided an advertising budget of $20 million to Ackerman McQueen, Inc., an agency that had handled LeapFrog's marketing since 1995. Released in 2002, ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' distinctly targeted mothers, along with gift-giving neighbors and grandparents. The strategy differed from those of other toy manufacturers, which targeted children. The campaign's television spots featured children learning different disciplines, including Spanish, reading, and phonics. All spots ended with the tagline ''Learn Something New Every Day'' below a green LeapFrog logo. In addition to television spots, the campaign's media included print, direct mail, point of purchase, and online advertisements as well as public relations.

Judges for the EFFIE Awards were so impressed with LeapFrog's sales jump and expanded brand awareness that they awarded the campaign the coveted Grand EFFIE Award in 2004. Between 2001 and 2002 LeapFrog sales skyrocketed 37 percent, brand awareness increased 21 percent, and the toymaker's electronic learning book, the LeapPad, held rank as the top-selling toy of 2002. ''This is David and Goliath,'' Gene Dunkin, president of the New York American Marketing Association's Board of Directors, announced at the EFFIE Awards. ''While the big agencies won lots of EFFIEs and are to be heartily congratulated, the big winner is a mid-size agency and a nine-year old startup that took the educational toy market by storm. Its success can be attributed in part to a smart advertising campaign that produced great results.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Ackerman McQueen had handled LeapFrog's advertising since 1995, after one of Mike Wood's friends recommended the agency to him. ''I thought we would just do a couple of spec ads, and that would be it,'' Ackerman McQueen's president, David Lipson, told Adweek. ''But the more we learned about LeapFrog, the more certain we became that it would be a big success.''

Advertising critics attributed LeapFrog's rapid growth to its unprecedented strategy. Not only did LeapFrog design its applications' circuitry instead of outsourcing it, but every toy was also designed to improve what LeapFrog considered an ''educational problem.'' The company kept more than 100 educators on staff. To oversee new toy development LeapFrog established an educational advisory board that was headed by Robert Calthey, the dean of the Stanford Graduate School of Education. To promote its educational edge over the rest of the industry, LeapFrog released a print campaign in 1997 that targeted parents with children under four years old. At the time LeapFrog's competitors were solely targeting children. LeapFrog's 1997 ads appeared in childcare and family magazines such as Parent and Family Circle. The campaign suggested that educating toddlers at an early age would help them learn when they were older. One ad featured an image of a young girl with the tagline ''How she does on her SAT depends on how well she does on her ABCs.''

Leading up to ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' was the economic downturn affecting the public school system. State budgets were being cut, and one in three students was reading below his or her grade level. LeapFrog conducted an in-home ethnographic survey to further understand its customer, who it dubbed the ''LeapFrog Mom.'' The LeapFrog Mom believed that stimulating a child's mind at an early age would benefit him or her later on in life. She also spent five times more on toys than other mothers did, provided that the toys were educational. Also, the LeapFrog Mom was the primary mentor, protector, and educator for her preschool children. After uncovering this target's educational priorities, LeapFrog released ''Learn Something New Every Day!''

LEAPSCANDAL

LeapFrog, a maker of educational toys, was the subject of scandal in 2004. The toymaker sold $1 million worth of products to Prince George's County Public Schools in Maryland. The sale included the brand's flagship product, LeapPad, an electronic platform that taught children disciplines such as reading, math, and geography. Controversy erupted when the public school board learned that its chief, Andre Hornsby, was living with a LeapFrog saleswoman at the time of the sale.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted the 25- to 49-year-old female subgroup titled ''LeapFrog Moms'' with children between the ages of 2 and 12. To unearth the LeapFrog Mom sensibilities, a precampaign survey was conducted by Flake-Wilkerson Market Insights, a marketing-research consultancy. The survey revealed that LeapFrog Moms believed that the earlier children's minds were stimulated, the better they performed later in life. The target mom was described as ''adventurous,'' ''confident,'' and ''discerning.'' While non-LeapFrog mothers purchased movie-licensed Harry Potter, SpongeBob, and Spider Man toys that offered little educational merit and averaged $7 a toy, LeapFrog Moms were willing to spend an average of $40 on a toy if it was purported to aid child development. Two-thirds of LeapFrog Moms also passed educational toys on to other children, while non-LeapFrog moms treated toys as disposable objects.

The campaign's secondary target consisted of gift-giving aunts, uncles, and grandparents who appreciated lasting presents that made a positive difference in a child's life. This subgroup composed 30 percent of the campaign's target. The campaign treated LeapFrog Moms, not their children, as the ultimate decision makers, and aired commercials across adult television channels such as Lifetime, Oxygen, and The Food Network, and during programs that tended to have female audiences, such as Oprah and The View. Other toymakers, such as Mattel and Hasbro, targeted children by airing commercials during Nickelodeon's children's shows and Saturday morning cartoons. Such toy companies then relied on what LeapFrog referred to as the ''nag factor,'' or children persistently asking their mothers for toys they had seen advertised on television.

COMPETITION

According to Securities and Exchange Commission documents, LeapFrog commanded an estimated 75 percent share of the preschool toy segment in 2002. LeapFrog's largest competitor, Mattel, was the world's largest overall toymaker in 2002, with brands such as Hot Wheels, Barbie, and Fisher-Price. The latter was Mattel's preschool toy brand, which released the PowerTouch Learning System in 2003. Similar to the LeapPad, the PowerTouch was a laptop-sized platform that used software to teach preschoolers different subjects. One slight difference between the two products was that the LeapPad required a stylus; but PowerTouch could be operated with a child's finger. LeapFrog claimed that the stylus enabled children to interact with smaller letters, a quality conducive to developing early reading skills.

Fisher-Price advertised the PowerTouch with its ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' campaign in 2003. In addition to noting the similarities of the two brands' products, critics drew parallels between Fisher-Price and LeapFrog's marketing strategies. ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' solely targeted mothers. Fisher-Price's research revealed that for the first time in history, Generation-X mothers were outspending baby-boomer mothers on toy purchases. Baby-boomer mothers tended to treat learning and playing as two separate activities, but the new majority of Generation-X mothers combined the two activities. The $25 million ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' campaign featured television spots with children having fun while learning on a PowerTouch. The campaign helped Fisher-Price sales to increase 7 percent in 2004. The campaign's ad agency, Young & Rubicam Brands, also earned a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005 for the work. By 2005 ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' was radically repositioned to target Latina mothers, one of the fastest-growing demographics in America.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Treating the LeapFrog Mom as the ultimate decision-maker when it came to toys, ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' television spots only appeared on adult programming. Ackerman McQueen also realized that first-time mothers had not yet established a brand allegiance, so 12-page brochures advertising LeapBaby, a LeapFrog product aimed at newborns, were mailed to daycares, preschools, and hospitals. The brochure explained how LeapFrog products developed early cognitive skills. Print ads for LeapBaby appeared in magazines such as American Baby and Child.

Most of the $20 million campaign's commercials featured children learning to read with LeapPad, an electronic platform that taught different subjects depending on what software was inserted. In one spot, titled ''Gifts,'' a preschool-aged girl kept receiving new LeapPad software in the mail from her grandfather. A voice-over for the commercial stated, ''Learning to read has never been more fun.'' As the commercial progressed, the girl's reading level improved with every new package. For the spot's finale she telephoned her grandfather to say, ''Hi Grandpa, I got a surprise for you.'' She then read him complete sentences from one of her latest LeapPad programs. The spot ended with the LeapFrog logo above the tagline ''Learn Something New Every Day.'' Other spots featured subjects besides reading. ''New Neighbor'' showed a young boy learning phrases in Spanish so that he could introduce himself to his new Latino neighbors.

LeapFrog noticed that its competitors advertised toys either by featuring children enjoying the toy within an unrealistically fun situation or by using ''over-the-top'' commercials to generate hype about a product. ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' strove for relevant and honest advertising content. Ackerman McQueen cast ''real-looking'' actors to play moms, dads, and children. When young boys and girls were shown learning in television spots, they sometimes did so with difficulty. The commercials intent was to connect with moms working to teach their own children.

In addition to employing traditional media outlets, for ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' LeapFrog hosted promotional events with teachers to galvanize the brand's ''educational position.'' To advertise one of its latest toys, LeapFrog presented teachers at several New York City public schools with donations and LeapFrog products. By 2004 more than 15,000 American classrooms were equipped with some type of LeapFrog toy. During the campaign LeapFrog's research also revealed that LeapFrog Moms were unsure about what learning toy was suitable for their child's age group. The brand's selection had jumped from one product to an overwhelming 134 in just nine years. To distinguish its toys better, LeapFrog deployed a classification system at retailers such as Target, Wal-Mart, and Toys ''R'' Us that was called ''LeapLevels: The right stage for the right age.'' LeapLevels separated products into different age groups. The groupings were then explained with signage, floor graphics, shelf blades, and retailer circulars.

OUTCOME

Not only did the campaign win the Grand EFFIE, considered to be one of the advertising industry's most coveted awards, in 2004, but it also helped solidify LeapFrog as an industry giant. During the campaign's first year LeapFrog sales increased 37 percent, brand awareness rose 32 percent, and retailers allotted 68 percent more footage for LeapFrog products. The two top-selling toys in America were made by LeapFrog, and much of the toy industry started mimicking its advertising strategy.

By 2003 LeapFrog was the third-largest toymaker in the world. Fisher-Price eventually released a product similar to the LeapPad, resulting in LeapFrog filing a lawsuit over patent violation. In 2004, however, LeapFrog's success waned after a combined slowdown in the toy industry and rising operational costs plagued the company. That year LeapFrog posted an $8 million loss, a stark contrast to the previous year's $72 million profit.

FURTHER READING

Bainbridge, Jane. "Sector Insight: Traditional Toys and Games—Playing to Win." Marketing, November 17, 2004, p. 34.

Best, Paul. "Cool Tech." The Age (Melbourne), August 26, 2003, p. 9.

Buckleitner, Warren. "Smaller. Smarter. Plugs into Your TV." New York Times, August 11, 2005, p. 10.

Bullard, Dave. "Nib Wins Draw." Herald-Sun (Melbourne), July 13, 2005, p. C08.

Devine, Nancy. "Unlocking the World of Imagination." Toronto Star, November 27, 2003, p. G08.

Elliott, Stuart, and Raymond Hernandez. "Groups Recognize Agencies' Creativity." New York Times, June 14, 2004, p. 10.

Fest, Glen. "LeapFrog." Adweek (southwest ed.), November 17, 1997, p. 40.

Kim, Queena Sook. "Advertising: Fisher-Price Courts Gen-X Mothers." Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2003, p. B3.

Lomartire, Paul. "Toronto Firm's Toys Are Hot." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 28, 2003, p. 10B.

Vavra, Bob. "Fun with the Basics: The Best-Selling Toys Don't Come with a Lot of Bells and Whistles." Progressive Grocer, October 15, 2002, p. 53.

Williamson, Richard. "The Ride's Far from Over at Ackerman McQueen." Adweek, August 2, 2004, p. 12.

Kevin Teague

Levi Strauss & Co.

1155 Battery St.
San Francisco, California 94111
USA
Telephone: (415) 501-6000
Fax: (415) 501-7112
Web site: www.levistrauss.com

■■■

IT'S WIDE OPEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Clothing manufacturer Levi Strauss & Company entered the wide-leg jeans market in the summer of 1996. To celebrate the launch of its Wide Leg line, the company initiated a campaign aimed at a target market of boys age 9 to 14. The "Make Room" campaign featured television spots with male youths, looking rebellious and tough, tromping through urban settings.

In November 1996 Levi's followed up the "Make Room" campaign with the $40 million "It's Wide Open" campaign. The latter was designed to expand the target market from young boys to males up to 34 years of age. The "Elevator Fantasy" spot starred two strangers—a young man and woman wearing Levi's Wide Leg jeans—sharing an elevator ride. As the elevator descended, fantasies of romantic possibilities ensued, with visions of the couple getting married and having a child. The daydreams stopped, however, when the elevator reached its destination, and the pair emerged and parted without having spoken a word. Another spot in the "It's Wide Open" campaign was "Doctors," which spoofed television programs such as ER by showing surgeons and a patient singing and having fun in an emergency room.

Levi's goal in the "It's Wide Open" campaign was to engender popularity among trend-setting, jeans-wearing youth and to increase its market share in the highly competitive denim category. Both television spots were enthusiastically received by the public and the media, but they did little to boost Levi's denim sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

One of the most widely known brand of jeans, Levi's was a major player in the market from its inception in 1850 to the early 1990s. Levi's became extremely popular in the 1950s among youth influenced by movie stars such as James Dean and Marlon Brando, who appeared in films wearing the company's jeans. The 1980s marked a decline in the jeans market, and Levi's profits fell as a result. Levi's then ventured into the casual clothing category and introduced its Dockers line in 1986, hoping to recapture sales especially with the baby boomer generation that had stoked Levi's popularity in the 1950s.

The denim market was revitalized in the 1990s as consumers opted for comfortable, casual clothing. The company enjoyed record sales of $7.1 billion in 1996 (with $4.3 billion attributed to U.S. sales), including $3 billion from Levi's products, but the company felt the need to increase its share of the jeans market by attracting new customers while also satisfying loyal Levi's consumers. Business Week reported that Levi's dominance in the jeans market had slipped from 30.9 percent in 1990 to 18.7 percent in 1997. The desire to reverse this decline and keep up with fashion trends was the impetus for the Wide Leg line and its accompanying marketing campaign.

The wide-leg style was popular with teenagers, particularly urban youths concerned with fashion and image. Other jeans manufacturers, however, had already introduced wide-leg and baggy jeans and established their presence in the market; Levi's had to scramble to catch up. As Alan Millstein, a New York retail consultant and editor of Fashion Network Report, stated in Business Week, "Levi Strauss was zagging when the world was zigging . . . The company totally missed the significance of the inner city and the huge impact it has on trends. It tells me they're sleepy in their marketing." Levi's had been preoccupied with the Dockers line and the launch of Slates, its men's dress clothing line, and may have neglected its denim division. Robert Haas, Levi's chairman and CEO, admitted in Business Week, "When you try to take on too many things, you are not as attentive to the warning signs."

Levi's first attempt to win back market share with its Wide Leg line of jeans was manifested in the "Make Room" campaign, aimed at younger boys. The campaign, launched in August 1996 in time to influence back-to-school purchases, included television ads of rebellious-looking boys traversing urban locales and making businessmen in suits nervous. The spots ran on prime-time network television shows popular with this age group such as The Simpsons and on cable channels such as MTV.

NOT ALL WERE AMUSED

Although many people found the "It's Wide Open" campaign humorous and enjoyable, some viewers were not amused at the "Doctors" ad. Critics found the ad to be in poor taste, arguing that it made light of serious medical situations. Jill Lynch, a Levi's spokesperson, defended the ad in USA Today: "The doctor spot is clearly a spoof of TV emergency room shows . . . It is not intended in any way to represent real-life situations."

TARGET MARKET

Levi's traditional target market included males between the ages of 15 and 25, but the "It's Wide Open" campaign was designed to attract men up to 34 years of age. Levi's initial Wide Leg jeans campaign, "Make Room," targeted the youth market in an attempt to gain popularity and loyalty. Because the wide-leg style evolved from the skateboarding craze generated by this age group, it seemed appropriate to gain its approval before progressing to older consumers. Fashions adopted by youths often influenced older customers as well, and Levi's hoped to benefit from this trend. In addition, the teen group was a lucrative market. Gus Floris, an associate publisher of the trade magazine Sportswear International, told the San Francisco Examiner, ". . . the biggest group buying jeans are teenagers. They own like eight pairs on average." Unfortunately for Levi's, its market share with the consumer group of 15- to 19-year-olds had dropped from 33 percent in 1993 to 26 percent in 1997. Gordon Harton, vice president for the Lee brand of jeans, a Levi's competitor, told Business Week, "It's very important that you attract this age group . . . By the time they're 24, they've adopted brands that they will use for the rest of their lives."

After responding to the youth market, Levi's quickly sought to broaden the market for Wide Leg jeans by targeting males up to age 34. "Wide leg is a huge trend for us," Steve Goldstein, vice president of marketing and research for Levi's USA, reported to Advertising Age. He added that males "are willing to and anxious to have more than one [cut of jeans] in their closet," indicating that Levi's felt there was a market for the trendy style with an older crowd.

COMPETITION

Although Levi Strauss & Company was the largest brand-name clothing manufacturer in the world in the 1990s, it was second to VF Corporation in the manufacture of jeans. According to the 1998 Market Share Reporter, VF, the maker of Lee and Wrangler jeans, held 30.1 percent of the U.S. market, compared to Levi's 16 percent. Stores such as the Gap and designer labels, including Guess, Tommy Hilfiger, Calvin Klein's CK, Nautica, Diesel, and Ralph Lauren's Polo, also posed competition for Levi's. As Millstein explained in the San Francisco Chronicle, "Tommy Hilfiger is king of the hill with inner-city youth . . . Levi's is terrified that their back-to-school business will be affected by the entry of Tommy into the jeans market."

Private-label jeans also honed in on Levi's market share. According to the San Francisco Examiner, J.C. Penney grossed $1 billion in 1996 with its Arizona line, and Sears, Roebuck's Canyon River Blues line enjoyed sales of $200 million in 1996 and the first half of 1997. Wal-Mart and Kmart also entered the jeans market with Route 66 and Faded Glory, respectively. Levi's jeans also were sold at these stores and thus were forced to share shelf space with the lower-priced labels.

Millstein told the San Francisco Examiner, "The party is over for Levi and Lee . . . They owned and dominated their collective brands in department stores and mass merchandisers through the '70s and '80s. Now nouveau competition is eroding their share of the market dramatically." As reported in the San Francisco Chronicle, Kurt Barnard, a New Jersey retail analyst, agreed, "The jeans business has become a cutthroat, highly competitive, overcrowded field that is extremely price oriented." Millstein summed things up in the San Francisco Examiner when he said, "There's only a finite amount of space in stores."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Levi's strategy for marketing its Wide Leg line of jeans was twofold: first, draw in the youth market, and then rely on the older male market to follow. After targeting teenagers with the "Make Room" campaign, Levi's introduced the "It's Wide Open" campaign to attract older customers without alienating the younger ones. According to Advertising Age, there was some concern that the "Make Room" ads with tough-looking young boys may have been interpreted as promoting intimidation. The "It's Wide Open" spots, on the other hand, were brazen yet humorous and played on the concept of wide-open possibilities. Geoffrey Thompson, creative director at Levi's advertising agency, Foote, Cone & Belding (FCB), indicated in the San Francisco Examiner that the spots were designed to appeal to the late teen and early 20s crowd "who are starting out on their own and appreciate irreverence." FCB account supervisor Ken Epstein told USA Today, "We were launching a new product, so we wanted to cut through the clutter and get consumers' attention." To accomplish this, FCB focused on originality and attitude rather than directly pushing the product.

The first television spot of the campaign, "Elevator Fantasy," aired in late 1996 on prime-time network television, and it was followed by "Doctors," which ran through early 1997. "Elevator Fantasy," which featured the young strangers, was set to a tune by the Partridge Family, a band easily recognized by those who grew up in the 1970s. The spot was thus progressive because it promoted a new line of Levi's jeans, yet nostalgic because the Partridge Family harkened back to the days when many members of the target market were children.

"Doctors" parodied popular television medical dramas. It presented a critically injured patient, clad in Wide Leg jeans, being rushed into an operating room. The staff hurriedly prepared to operate, with the beeping of medical machines heard in the background. The patient then pushed his oxygen mask aside and began to sing the techno-pop song "Tainted Love," a hit in the 1980s, in synchronization with the beeping. The surgical team appeared surprised, but then the head surgeon removed his surgical mask and joined in, followed by the rest of the team. They started dancing about the operating room, playing with the medical equipment and inflating surgical scrubs with oxygen tubes. The beeping suddenly stopped, replaced by a steady tone, and the patient became unconscious. A staff member yelled, "He's crashing!" and the surgical team worked to revive him. They succeeded, and the beeping resumed, allowing the patient and operating room personnel to finish the song. The spot ended with the Levi's Wide Leg logo and the tag line "Levi's Wide Leg Jeans. It's Wide Open."

According to the Washington Post, the "Doctors" spot was "intended to radiate originality and possibilities." Like the "Elevator Fantasy" ad, "Doctors" was modern and forward thinking because of the product it promoted and because it spoofed contemporary hit television shows. At the same time it evoked memories for the target market through the song "Tainted Love." Still, the spot was risky because it did not specifically focus on the product. Chuck McBride, the group creative director of FCB, admitted to the Washington Post, "The client was a little worried about its relevancy at first, . . . but the kids got it right away."

OUTCOME

Both spots in the "It's Wide Open" campaign were successful in generating enthusiasm. According to Ad Track, a USA Today poll designed to measure the popularity and effectiveness of ads, of more than 85 campaigns reviewed since May 1995 "It's Wide Open" was among the top 20 in popularity. The spots were especially popular with those between the ages of 18 and 29, with 44 percent responding positively. In contrast, only 24 percent of those polled between the ages of 30 and 49 stated that they enjoyed the ads.

Both television commercials received nominations for Emmy Awards as the best commercial in 1997. "Doctors" and "Elevator Fantasy" were selected out of a pool of 237 entries that was narrowed down to 5 finalists. In addition, both spots took gold medals at the San Francisco Ad Club's annual creative competition in 1997, and "Doctors" received a Silver Lion at the 44th annual Cannes International Advertising Festival. The campaign earned a place on many lists of the best of 1996, including those of the New York Times, Adweek, and Time. FCB, Levi's advertising agency since 1930, was named the U.S. Agency of the Year for 1996 by Advertising Age, due in large part to its work for Levi's. Levi's Goldstein told Advertising Age, "They're hitting home runs . . . The Wide Leg campaign is the most celebrated work that's been done for us in many years."

Although the Levi's Wide Leg campaign received critical acclaim as well as recognition by the general public, it did little to boost Levi's market share in jeans. Ad Track reported that, though the spots ranked high in popularity, in terms of effectiveness they scored below the average of 26 percent. Only 21 percent of respondents considered the Wide Leg spots effective. Levi's profits reflected the poll's results, with 1997 worldwide sales of $6.9 billion, 4 percent below the record sales year of 1996.

FURTHER READING

Angwin, Julia. "Levi's Hopes Wide-Leg Jeans Will Grab Urban Youth Market." San Francisco Chronicle, July 26, 1996, p. B1.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Advertising Age's Agency of the Year." Advertising Age, April 21, 1997.

Cuneo, Alice Z., and Pat Sloan. "Levi's Dresses Up to Battle the Competition." Advertising Age, July 29, 1996.

Emert, Carol. "Levi's Battles to Stop Slide in Market Share." San Francisco Chronicle, June 25, 1997, p. B1.

Enrico, Dottie. "Levi's Ads Wear Well with Target Audience of Young Consumers." USA Today, March 17, 1997, p. 6B.

Feuerstein, Adam, and Clifford Carlsen. "Levi Tries to Get Young People into Its Pants." San Francisco Business Times, April 14, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Jeans' Allure Hangs on Elevator Fantasy." Advertising Age, November 25, 1996.

Himelstein, Linda. "Levi's Is Hiking Up Its Pants." Business Week, December 1, 1997, p. 70.

Irvine, Martha. "Levi's Searching for a New Image." Columbian, November 6, 1997, p. D2.

"Levi's Refashions Its Wide Leg Ads." Advertising Age, August 5, 1996.

Span, Paula. "It Ads Up to an Emmy." Washington Post, September 6, 1997, p. D5.

Tanaka, Wendy. "Denim Derby." San Francisco Examiner, May 20, 1997, p. C1.

Mariko Fujinaka

LEVI'S TYPE 1 JEANS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Levi Strauss & Co., whose founder invented blue jeans, became the jeans brand of choice for America's youth around the mid-twentieth century, but during the 1990s this began to change. After peaking in 1996 the company's sales fell steadily each year through the early years of the new millennium. In response to the changing tides of fashion, Levi Strauss in 2003 began implementing a new, segmented strategy that focused on the launch of two prominent new lines of jeans. Levi Strauss Signature jeans were a mass-market line to be sold in discount stores such as Wal-Mart, and Levi's Type 1 jeans were meant to appeal to trendsetting youth via Levi Strauss's ordinary channels of distribution. While the Signature line was seen as essential to its long-term health, the company did not want the mass-market line to upstage the main brand. Virtually all of the company's U.S. marketing in 2003, therefore, was devoted to Type 1, in the interest of updating the Levi's image for younger men and women, many of whom were increasingly turning to designer labels. The "Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign started on January 2, 2003.

The campaign kicked off with a "Gold Rush" consumer promotion, an interactive online treasure hunt for a pair of jewel-encrusted jeans. The promotion culminated in the airing of the campaign's initial television spot, "Stampede," during the 2003 Super Bowl broadcast. That commercial, in combination with a series of similar spots, had been meant to run through August 2003 but was deemed unworthy of Levi's by critics, including company CEO Philip Marineau, and the campaign was retooled.

Two further spots began airing in the summer of 2003 before the campaign was discontinued in the United States. The domestic launch of the Type 1 line proved disappointing. Levi Strauss continued to struggle with the perception that it was an out-of-date brand.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Bavarian immigrant Levi Strauss made canvas pants for prospectors during the California gold rush in the mid-nineteenth century before deciding on the more durable fabric that became known as denim, which Strauss further enhanced with indigo dye and copper rivets. For the company's first hundred years, Levi's jeans were the standard work pant for a wide variety of American laborers, but in the 1950s they became fashionable casual wear among young people. The successful addition of pants line Dockers, together with expansion into Europe and Asia, aided Levi Strauss's growth in the late twentieth century, and the company's global sales peaked at $7.1 billion in 1996. Between 1996 and 2001, however, sales of Levi's among young Americans plummeted. According to the Zandl Group, a youth-marketing consulting firm, only 8 percent of young people in 2001 named Levi's as their favorite brand of jeans, compared with 31 percent in 1996. In 1999 and 2000 the company closed 35 U.S. manufacturing facilities and transferred most such operations overseas.

Long known for classic styles such as the 501 jean, Levi's began introducing new lines to appeal to changing tastes. Its agency at the time, TBWA/Chiat/Day, experimented with a variety of tactics and taglines during these years, including "Opt for the Original" and "Make Them Your Own," as well as a digitized visual gag called "Crazy Legs," which attracted attention but did little to drive sales. CEO Marineau, hired away from PepsiCo in 1999, began shopping for a new agency for the Levi's account in 2001. The New York office of Bartle Bogle Hegarty (BBH), the London-based agency that handled Levi Strauss's more successful European and Asian advertising, won the account.

BBH's first U.S. campaign, a 2002 effort on behalf of Levi's Low-Rise jeans, used the tagline "Dangerously Low" and was intended, according to a company press release, to build on the company's "iconic brand heritage and convey that signature modern, sexy, old school rock 'n roll look of Levi's." Panned by some critics as failing to connect to the brand's longstanding virtues, the campaign did little to arrest the slide in Levi's sales and image.

ACROSS THE POND

Though Levi's was a struggling brand worldwide, it experienced measured success with Bartle Bogle Hegarty (BBH) advertising campaigns in England and Asia. In contrast to the American Type 1 campaign, the European launch of Type 1 jeans on February 13, 2003, had little to do with the brand's heritage and was well received by critics. The spot, created by BBH's London shop and using the tagline "A Bold New Breed," featured a gang of mouse-human hybrids who, while wearing Type 1 jeans, kidnapped a cat and successfully held it for ransom.

TARGET MARKET

In 2003 the company hoped to slow its sales decline by appealing to different market segments with the creation of two distinct brand lines. Levi Strauss Signature jeans, designed for a mass market in stores such as Wal-Mart, had a lower price than premium Levi's and were not branded with the trademark Levi's two-horse back patch or red tags. Though Signature, by giving Levi's an entrance into the growth market of discount stores, was seen as an essential part of the company's long-term U.S. sales outlook, the line was not supported by any out-of-store advertising nor mentioned in the Type 1 advertising.

The Type 1 line, conceived as a new flag bearer for the Levi's name, was designed to appeal to a fashion-conscious youth market of both genders. Type 1 jeans featured enhanced versions of the two-horse back patch, trademark rivets, and other characteristic Levi's detailing (in addition to the newly fashionable low waistband introduced in the preceding years). The jeans' new look and high-profile Super Bowl premiere were Levi Strauss's attempt, as the Wall Street Journal put it, "to convince people its brand is still cool."

Levi's and BBH envisioned this coolness as deriving from the company's authenticity and roots as well as from a modern sensibility. CEO Marineau told analysts, according to Advertising Age, that the purpose of the Type 1 ads "was to let consumers know Levi's was an 'innovation' icon, and 'no longer your mom and dad's jeans.' " The company website further described the new line as "perfect for people who make noise and speak—or sing—their minds to change the culture we live in." As the product launch progressed, Levi's research suggested that the jeans, though generally not selling as well among the youth market as the company had hoped, had found popularity among young male Hispanics and African-Americans.

COMPETITION

Levi Strauss's largest U.S. competitor during this time was Greensboro, North Carolina–based VF Corporation, owners of a range of apparel brands that included Lee and Wrangler jeans. During this time Lee, sold in mid-market department and specialty stores, launched its One True Fit jeans, targeted at 18- to 34-year-old women and supported by a TV, print, point-of-purchase, and online advertising campaign. Lee also continued to develop its Series 66206 oversized pants and shorts line, which featured wide legs and multiple pockets, and it revived Pipes, a boys' line emulating fashions popular among skateboarders. Wrangler, meanwhile, focused on men with a 2003 advertising campaign behind its Five Star Premium Denim line. TV commercials ran during sports programming, and print ads ran in a variety of sports and outdoors magazines as well as women's publications (because women often bought clothes for men). The Five Star Collection, like the Wrangler brand generally, was sold through discount chains including Wal-Mart, Kmart, and Target.

Gap Inc.'s Gap retail chain was, like Levi's, adjusting to strategic difficulties during this time. After alienating its core customers (adult buyers of basic casual khakis, jeans, T-shirts, and polo shirts) with collections aimed at young women, Gap brought in a new CEO, Paul Pressler, who presided over the retail chain's return to an emphasis on its staple products. A 2002 holiday print campaign featuring portraits of actors such as Will Ferrell and Ray Liotta was followed by a similar 2003 holiday campaign behind its Fair Isle line for women, which showcased celebrities including Claudia Schiffer, Jamie Lee Curtis and her daughter Annie Guest, and Katie Holmes. A TV campaign supporting a new line of corduroy jeans broke in the summer of 2003, featuring singers Madonna and Missy Elliott.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To launch its Type 1 jeans, Levi's announced its "Gold Rush" promotion, an online treasure hunt whose centerpiece was, in the words of a company press release, "the boldest and most valuable pair of jeans in the world." The Type 1 design features, intended to play up the brand's iconic rivets, stitching, back patch, and other detailing, were themselves accentuated, in the prize pair of jeans, with diamonds, rubies, and gold. Valued at $85,000, the jeans were part of a $150,000 package (the remainder of which came in the form of gold and cash packed into the jeans) meant to commemorate the company's 150-year anniversary. To compete for the prize package, consumers logged on to the Levi's website during the four-week period leading up to the 2003 Super Bowl. Each week one question was posted, and a correct answer gave participants access to clues about the location of the bejeweled jeans; additionally participants could play games on the site to gain access to further clues. The promotion culminated in a final clue revealed during the introductory Super Bowl spot.

The Super Bowl spot, "Stampede," combined Old West imagery with an urban backdrop in an attempt, as a company press release phrased it, "to symbolize the fusion of Levi's rich heritage with the brand's modern design sensibility." In the 60-second spot a herd of buffalo was seen stampeding through an unnamed cityscape. When the stampeding herd approached a young, stylish couple wearing Type 1 jeans, all the animals magically came to a stop before galloping around them. The ad closed with the text "Levi's Type 1 Jeans. Bold since 1853," and then the date shuffled forward before stopping at 2003.

Despite the anticipatory buzz Levi's and BBH built up around the Super Bowl spot's premiere, sales of Type 1 jeans were disappointing, and CEO Marineau publicly blamed the spot in a meeting with analysts, saying, "It wasn't a Levi's ad. It didn't have a sense of humor about itself. It was certainly a poor Super Bowl ad." BBH was ordered to rethink the campaign's two remaining television spots, and "Stampede" finished its run in March, six months earlier than had been planned.

The other TV spots appeared in the summer of 2003, in time for the back-to-school season. "Car," again relying on Western motifs, involved a contemporary cowboy outfitted in Type 1 jeans and jacket, but the sense of humor Marineau found lacking in "Stampede" now found its way into the campaign. The cowboy chased down and lassoed a wild, bucking car. As Adweek columnist Barbara Lippert stated, "'Car' makes serious American references but also manages to be funny and wry." A second spot, "Horse," fit this same profile, showing a woman on horseback facing down a sleek, modern train.

OUTCOME

"Car" won a Bronze Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, and a Silver Clio in 2004, but sales of Type 1 jeans did not live up to company projections, nor did the Type 1 campaign significantly affect Levi Strauss's flagging overall brand. The company continued to cut costs via reorganization and facility closures, shuttering all of its North American manufacturing plants in addition to many factories overseas, which were replaced by independent contractors.

In 2004 Levi's and BBH launched a U.S. print campaign, its largest ever, that signaled a departure from the strategic underpinnings of the Type 1 work. Photographed by Richard Avedon and placed in such magazines as Rolling Stone, Us Weekly, Glamour, Entertainment Weekly, and Allure, the campaign introduced portraits of real Levi's wearers organized around the theme "A Style for Every Story." The ads supported various Levi's product lines rather than focusing on any single style, and no allusion was made to the jeans maker's Western heritage.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally. "Levi's Strives to Keep a Hip Image—Some Retailer Discontent Gives It Reason to Promote 'Type One' Jeans at Game." Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2003.

"CEO Can't Duck When Ads Flop." Advertising Age, April 7, 2003.

Cuneo, Alice. "Levi's CEO Blames Slow Launch on Spots." Advertising Age, March 31, 2003.

Cuneo, Alice, and Richard Linnett. "Bartle Bogle Tapped to Cure Levi's Blues." Advertising Age, January 14, 2002.

Dill, Mallorre. "A Walk on the Wild Side." Adweek, July 1, 2002.

Dolbow, Sandra. "Starring Role for Wrangler's Five Star Jeans." Brandweek, July 29, 2002.

Garfield, Bob. "Lowered Expectations: Levi's Continues Tradition of Bad Ads." Advertising Age, July 29, 2002.

Grimm, Matthew. "False Consciousness." Brandweek, January 20, 2003.

"Levi's." Advertising Age, January 27, 2003.

Lippert, Barbara. "American Beauty." Adweek, July 14, 2003.

McMain, Andrew. "Levi's Has Stories to Tell of People and Their Jeans." Brandweek, March 29, 2004.

O'Laughlin, Sandra. "Celebs Fill Holiday Campaign from Gap." Brandweek, November 10, 2003.

———. "Lee Jeans Launching One True Fit in Move to Extend Market Share." Brandweek, January 13, 2003.

"Type 1 Gets Makeover." Advertising Age, June 30, 2003.

Mark Lane

THEY GO ON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Even though Levi Strauss & Company had been the cornerstone of the denim industry for over a century, declining sales plagued the company during the latter half of the 1990s. Jeans designed by competing brands such as Guess, Tommy Hilfiger, and Calvin Klein had encroached upon Levi's market share. Foote Cone & Belding, which had been Levi's ad agency since 1930, was set back after its executive creative director, Mike Koelker, resigned in 1994. Koelker had served as an adviser to Levi's chief executive, Bob Haas, and had also conceived the brand's most successful campaigns throughout the 1980s and early 1990s. Hoping to stop declining sales and revitalize its image, Levi's released its largest-ever advertising campaign, titled "They Go On."

The $90 million campaign began in 1997 and focused solely on the brand's image rather than specific products. Foote Cone & Belding created six television commercials, most 60 seconds in duration, interwoven in a dreamlike fashion. According to Levi's, the spots "are unusual in that they have no discernible beginning or end, and in many cases even rely on viewers to fill in the blanks." On September 22 the existing spots were merged with new ones to create a loosely connected drama that was released on the website NBC.com. The online segment also let viewers interact with the actors by posting messages on the website. The campaign ended in 1998.

Although increased competition in the jeans market had affected Levi's market share, the company contended that the "They Go On" campaign was intended as a celebration of the Levi's brand rather than a reaction to declining sales. The strategy proved ineffective. Even though some advertising critics initially praised the campaign, Levi's executives and ad critics later considered the campaign to be a total disaster. In 1998 Levi's reported its worst sales decline since World War II. It soon ended its 68-year relationship with Foote Cone & Belding and reassigned its account to TBWA\Chiat\Day.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Levi's, founded in 1850, had dominated the jeans industry for more than a century, surviving the ups and downs of the U.S. economy. When the denim market enjoyed revitalization in the 1990s, however, Levi's was slow to follow. Although Levi's was touted as the world's biggest apparel manufacturer and reported record sales of $7.1 billion in 1996, its market share in the jeans area had slipped. The Los Angeles Times reported figures from Tactical Retail Solutions, a firm specializing in tracking retail sales, that indicated a drop in Levi's share of the men's jeans market from 48.2 percent in 1990 to 26.2 percent in 1997. Previous efforts to restore its position had included the "It's Wide Open" campaign for Levi's Wide Leg jeans in 1996 and the ongoing "501 Reasons" campaign. Both campaigns garnered critical acclaim but failed to restore Levi's status as the jeans-market leader. Profits, in fact, rose only 1 percent during the first quarter of 1997, and in February Levi's announced that it would cut 1,000 jobs by year's end.

Spurred by declining jeans sales, the company turned to Foote Cone & Belding, its advertising agency since 1930, to help enhance Levi's image, and the decision was made to concentrate on the strength of the brand and to scrap individual product campaigns. Brad Williams, a marketing manager at Levi's USA, downplayed the significance of the new campaign strategy and explained to the San Francisco Business Times, "This is more of a campaign-driven shift than an overall strategy of the brand . . . Moving away from product advertising is a better way to characterize it than supplanting it." According to Advertising Age, Levi's ran a brand advertising campaign in March 1995, the first time it had done so in more than a dozen years. The campaign included two spots with the tagline "They're not Levi's jeans until we say they are," and it featured "Works Progress Administration era-style animation." The campaign was not well received, however, and the spots were short-lived.

TARGET MARKET

Levi's traditional market included males between the ages of 15 and 25, and "They Go On" was designed to include this consumer group as well as older demographics. Trying to please the 15–25 age group while not alienating older customers proved a difficult task. Tom Fanoe, president of Levi's USA, told the San Francisco Chronicle, "Our target consumer is 15 to 25 years old, so every few years we're dealing with a whole new set of consumers who may or may not [have the same taste] as their older brothers or sisters." Fanoe elaborated on this problem to the Los Angeles Times, admitting, "For many years, the Levi brand was the

CELEBRITY CAMEOS

Several of the spots in the Levi's "They Go On" campaign featured appearances by celebrities. Author Quentin Crisp appeared as a patron in a nightclub, and musician Lenny Kravitz was the rock star stuck at a gas station's pay phone. The bag boy in "Bag Boy Fantasy" was played by Brian Vaughan, the actor who had portrayed the young Brad Pitt character in the film Seven Years in Tibet, and the riled agent of the rock star was played by Bodhi Elfman, son of Danny Elfman, musician and member of the rock band Oingo Boingo.

uniform of younger people . . . and we were also able to nurture a relationship with people 25 years of age and older. In the last few years, that's been more problematic for us." CSC Consulting analyst Marie Drum Beninati agreed: "Boomers got older and started looking for more comfort than they can get from Levis. And while kids still wear jeans, it's a different kind of jeans—wide jeans, jeans hanging down over their derriere, jeans made from other materials."

Concurrent with Levi's loss of market share was a growing decline in popularity with the youth market that accounted for a large percentage of jeans purchases. In order to ensure future buyers, it was crucial to gain the allegiance of customers from a young age. Unfortunately for Levi's, its market share with the consumer group of 15- to 19-year-olds dropped from 33 percent in 1993 to 26 percent in 1997. Levi's learned that this statistic was not a fluke when a yearlong research project indicated that the "echo boomers," children of baby boomers, considered Levi's passé. Steve Goldstein, vice president of marketing and research for Levi's USA, told BusinessWeek, "Kids say they love the Levi's brand. But if you ask them whether it's 'with it,' they'll say no." Sixteen-year-old Irma Cruz stated in the Columbian, "Levi's are too straight, too plain . . . None of my friends wear them." Levi's needed to present a fashionable and modern campaign that would win over these consumers.

COMPETITION

As more players entered the lucrative denim market in the 1990s, Levi's faced growing competition. According to the 1998 Market Share Reporter, VF Corporation, the maker of Lee and Wrangler jeans, held 30.1 percent of the U.S. market, compared to Levi's at 16 percent. Designer labels also infiltrated the market, with Guess, Tommy Hilfiger, Calvin Klein's CK, Nautica, Diesel, and Ralph Lauren's Polo among the high-end labels fighting for market share. Gap, along with its Old Navy clothing line, also posed a threat. Private-label jeans, such as J.C. Penney's Arizona line and Sears, Roebuck's Canyon River Blues series, also entered the market and gobbled up valuable jeans dollars. According to the Tactical Retail Monitor, as reported in the Los Angeles Times, private-label jeans experienced a rise in market share from 3.2 percent in 1990 to 19.1 percent in 1997.

Alan Millstein, a New York retail consultant and editor of Fashion Network Report, told Advertising Age, "Levi's is in a pincers from the private-label and specialty brands in department stores and the designer brands." According to the Los Angeles Times, Tony Cherbak, a Deloitte & Touche retail-industry analyst, agreed with Millstein and stated, "For a long time, they were the only game in town. . . They were able to demand prices and dictate display. But as other brands ate into their market, retailers could turn elsewhere or make their own private label brands."

MARKETING STRATEGY

To boost its popularity with the younger market and to lure customers, Levi's chose to launch the $90 million image-building campaign based on the strength of its brand. Levi's Fanoe was quoted in the San Francisco Chronicle as saying, "The ads will be built around what the Levi's brand stands for: originality, independence and Levi's as an American icon." The biggest and most expensive campaign instigated by Levi's, "They Go On" included six television spots, five of which lasted 60 seconds and one 90 seconds. It debuted in August 1997 on prime-time network television and during telecasts of National Football League games on Fox as well as on MTV. The spots were also shown in movie theaters across the nation. The print and outdoor portions of the campaign began in October with print ads in magazines such as Rolling Stone and Sports Illustrated. Levi's home page on the World Wide Web provided additional ad information, and the campaign included bilingual spots in Spanish and English for viewers in the Los Angeles and Houston areas. Levi's expected 94 percent of its target consumers to see the campaign an average of 15 times each.

The six television spots shared a loosely interwoven narrative. Common elements linked the spots, but the elements were often random, and viewers had to pay close attention to notice the connections. As Amy Rosenthal, the senior marketing specialist at Levi's USA, explained to the Dallas Morning News, "We call it dream logic . . . There's no beginning, middle or end, just a series of little vignettes. Nothing much happens, but they are connected in interesting ways by interesting things.'' The strategy was similar to those adopted by competitors Lee and Guess, both of which produced television spots that were like minifilms that told stories, albeit nebulous ones, designed to push an image rather than a product. It was believed that this soft-sell approach would appeal to teenagers who had become jaded about pushy advertising. In the Dallas Morning News James Twitchell, author of Adcult USA, commented on the Levi's campaign by remarking, ''It's the ultimate super-soft sell, so soft there's no sell at all . . . Advertising has become so omnipresent, the only way to cut through it is with something that doesn't look like an advertisement.''

Levi's hoped that the target consumer would be engaged by the spots and encouraged to view all of them. Unlike other episodic campaigns that televised one spot at a time, Levi's chose to show the commercials in groups of two or three in an attempt to draw in the viewer and to signify that the spots were indeed related. Andy Berkenfield, Foote Cone & Belding account manager and vice president, told the Dallas Morning News, ''You do worry with this sort of episodic storytelling that it will be confusing, so you try to make it pretty obvious, especially early on.''

The first spot, the 90-second ''Impala Man,'' featured a man wearing a cowboy hat who drove a Chevrolet Impala filled with stuffed animals to a diner. In the diner he talked to D.J. Marcus, a New York–bound disc jockey, and gave away a stuffed dinosaur. The following spot, ''Car Chase,'' starred a Kojak-obsessed cab driver employed by a plainclothes policeman to chase a thief making a getaway on a moped. The cab driver engaged in a high-speed chase, with the nervous officer in the backseat. In the third spot, ''Ice Cream Man,'' the disc jockey from the first spot returned as a disc jockey in a trendy nightclub, an ice cream man would not hand over ice cream to young children unless they correctly answered difficult trivia questions, and a rock musician spoke on a pay phone at a gas station. ''Bag Boy Fantasy'' showed the agent of the rock star on a cellular phone in a grocery store while the bag boy daydreamed of being a rock star. ''Test Drive,'' the fifth installment, included a girl who took a car on a test drive, with the dealer in the backseat making sales claims. She stopped to pick up her boyfriend and then drove to a coffee shop. The final spot, ''Car Wash,'' featured a goggles-clad man who drove an AMC Gremlin through a car wash with the windows rolled down, thus washing the inside and outside of the car. As he exited the car wash, the Impala from the first spot drove by.

A team of 40 engineers from NBC Digital Productions merged the six original spots with new commercials to create a drama series that debuted on September 22, 1997. The drama appeared exclusively on NBC.com, which used ''They Go On'' to promote the network's new Snap! website browser created by the technology publisher CNET. Returning characters such as D.J. Marcus and the Impala man were featured along with the new characters Chloe and Zack. At certain arranged times the actors interacted with website visitors via a message board.

It was revealed in the April 26, 1999, issue of Adweek (eastern edition) that both the online ''They Go On'' drama series and earlier spots were the result of a new advertising agenda set in place by Gordon Shanks, the president of operations in the Americas for Levi's. In early 1997 Shanks had requested that Foote Cone & Belding make the campaign ''reinforce Levi's brand values across all consumers in all categories.'' In response, the agency's creative director Chuck McBride created a 30-second spot that spoofed the current baggy-pants trend while simultaneously touting Levi's own baggy Wide Leg jeans. The zany commercial featured a young man being operated on by dancing surgeons. Although representatives from Foote Cone & Belding believed the commercial would resonate well with younger consumers, Shanks rejected it. As a result, much of the agency's talent left, and the remaining creatives released the more elusive ''The Go On'' spots in August.

OUTCOME

When the campaign first aired, Levi's reported positive feedback regarding the ''They Go On'' campaign from young consumers, and it won critical praise for its originality. The Los Angeles Times rated the campaign a three out of four for effectiveness, and the Orange County Register scored it an A- for its concept. Bob Garfield, columnist and reviewer for Advertising Age, gave ''They Go On'' three out of four stars.

Unfortunately for Levi's the praise was short-lived. The company posted a 4 percent sales decline in 1997. That same year Levi's announced that it would close 11 U.S. factories and lay off nearly one-third of its workforce. Clothing-industry consultant Harry Bernard of Colton Bernard, Inc., told the Columbian, ''I think ['They Go On' is] probably the most unfocused ad campaign that they've ever had . . . I think they've lost track of who and what they are.'' Other advertising analysts accused Levi's of specifically losing touch with its teenage customers. John Flanagan of the youth-marketing consultancy Thermostat explained to Adweek (eastern edition) that Levi's ''wasn't monitoring the streets, they fell asleep.''

In 1998 Levi's posted its worst sales loss since World War II. Furthermore, according to a study conducted by the retail-industry analysts Tactical Retail Monitor, Levi's market share of U.S. jeans plummeted from 31 percent in 1990 to 16.9 percent in 1998. Levi's executives partially blamed Foote Cone & Belding for their company's downturn. Agency representatives blamed Levi's Gordon Shanks for trying to target such a wide demographic. In early 1998 Levi's ended its 68-year relationship with Foote Cone & Belding, but it continued using the "They Go On" tagline until mid-1998.

FURTHER READING

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Insight into Brand Wins Levi's for TBWA Chiat/Day." Advertising Age, February 2, 1998, p. 3.

———. "Levi's Branding Blitz in Works." Advertising Age, March 31, 1997.

———. "Levi's Fights Back with Image Ads." Advertising Age, July 28, 1997.

Emert, Carol. "Levi's Battles to Stop Slide in Market Share." San Francisco Chronicle, June 25, 1997, p. B1.

Feuerstein, Adam, and Clifford Carlsen. "Levi Tries to Get Young People into Its Pants." San Francisco Business Times, April 14, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Levi's Heroes Vapid, but They Wear Well." Advertising Age, August 11, 1997, p. 29.

Gellene, Denise. "Levi Strauss Shoots for the Hip." Los Angeles Times, September 4, 1997, p. D4. Reviews the "They Go On" campaign.

Himelstein, Linda. "Levi's Is Hiking Up Its Pants." Business Week, December 1, 1997, p. 70.

Irvine, Martha. "Levi's Searching for a New Image." Columbian, November 6, 1997, p. D2.

Johnson, Greg. "Levi Strauss Is Trying to Give Its Product and Image a Better Fit." Los Angeles Times, November 6, 1997, p. D1.

Kelly, Jane Irene, and Michael McCarthy. "TBWA C/D to Levi." Adweek (eastern ed.), February 2, 1998, p. 5.

"Levi's Launches 'Funky' Ad Blitz." San Francisco Examiner, July 29, 1997, p. B1.

Maurstad, Tom. "Levi's Commercials Sell Soft and Cool." Dallas Morning News, October 19, 1997, p.1C.

Oberlag, Reginald. "NBC Continues TV/Internet Convergence with Snap! Alliance." Shoot, August 14, 1998, p. 22.

Outhier, Craig. "From Edgy to Ridiculous, TV Pitches Continue to Push the Envelope and Test Our Patience." Orange County Register, October 26, 1997, p. F10.

Voight, Joan. "An American Icon Fades Away." Adweek (eastern ed.), April 26, 1999.

Mariko Fujinaka
Kevin Teague

Lincoln National Corp.

1500 Market Street, Suite 3900
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19102-2112
USA
Telephone: (215) 448-1400
Fax: (215) 448-3962
Web site: www.lfg.com

■■■

HELLO FUTURE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s Philadelphia-based Lincoln National Corp., which marketed itself as Lincoln Financial Group, launched a successful branding campaign that targeted affluent consumers. But in the early 2000s it became clear that as baby boomers entered their retirement years and challenged preconceived notions about what retirement meant, Lincoln Financial Group would have to reposition its brand and message to remain relevant in the marketplace. The result was the "Hello Future" campaign that began in April 2005. It was aimed at both affluent baby boomers and the financial planners and other intermediaries that sold the Lincoln Financial Group products.

The "Hello Future" campaign, created by ad agency Martin/Williams of Minneapolis, Minnesota, presented an optimistic image of retirement as an opportunity to pursue dreams, whether they satisfied a lifelong interest or involved giving back to the community. One of the television spots, for example, featured an African-American woman who as a child was told by a guidance counselor to become a file clerk so she could meet eligible lawyers to marry. Instead she became a lawyer, then a judge, and finally, in retirement, a guidance counselor. Coming full circle, she advised a young girl to think higher than file clerk and to consider becoming a lawyer. In addition to television spots, the "Hello Future" campaign included radio, print, online, and alternative media elements. Although the budget was not made public, Lincoln Financial Group had reportedly spent $20 million in advertising the previous year.

The initial phase of the "Hello Future" campaign came to a close at the end of 2005. The dramatic increase in call-center volume and website traffic indicated that the message resonated with consumers. Moreover, the intermediaries were pleased and embraced the campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although it was nearly 100 years old by the late 1990s, Lincoln Financial Group was a little-known provider of financial services, operating under a variety of brand names, such as Lincoln Life, the Delaware Group, and Vantage Global Advisers. Working with ad agency Martin/Williams, the firm launched a branding campaign to bring all the subsidiaries under the Lincoln name and developed a logo that featured a silhouette of Abraham Lincoln. Moreover, the association of the great president with integrity, trustworthiness, and honesty was in keeping with the image Lincoln Financial Group wished to project as it began to target affluent consumers. Relying on the tagline "Clear solutions in a complex world," the campaign proved highly successful. According to research firm Wirthlin Worldwide, between 1998 and 2000 aided brand awareness among consumers with assets between $250,000 and $500,000 increased from 22 percent to 36 percent. In addition, between 1999 and 2000 aided branded awareness among consumers worth more than $500,000 improved from 31 percent to 38 percent.

A still from "Guidance Counselor," a television ad featured in Lincoln National's "Hello Future" campaign. PHOTO COURTESY OF MARTIN WILLIAMS, INC. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Lincoln Financial Group underwent another significant change in the early 2000s. It introduced a new channel of distribution, moving from a network of financial advisors to a wholesale force that sold products to financial intermediaries (such as brokers and financial advisors). But it soon became apparent that many potential intermediaries were not familiar enough with what Lincoln Financial Group had to offer. A series of print ads was then introduced to make the pitch that Lincoln Financial Group products would make the brokers and financial advisors heroes to their clients.

While Lincoln Financial Group had made great strides with both affluent consumers and intermediaries, it was operating in a changing marketplace. Aside from increased competition in the number and type of companies offering financial products, Lincoln Financial Group and Martin/Williams recognized that a major sea change was about to take place. Just as the baby-boom generation, throughout its iconoclastic development, had differed markedly from its elders, forever defying the conventional wisdom of marketers, it was now in the process of redefining retirement. Baby boomers, especially affluent ones, planned to not only live longer but also to pursue a far more active retirement than their parents had, whether that meant launching a second career, giving their time to the community, or pursuing travel and other interests. And with that shift in paradigm, the financial needs of an older demographic would change as well. Lincoln Financial Group, as a result, had no choice but to adapt, but it also recognized a chance to seize an opportunity, to distinguish itself from the crowded field of companies offering financial products and to stake out a position in a changing marketplace.

Lincoln began to reposition and increase recognition of its brand in 2004 when it acquired the naming rights to the new football-only stadium in Philadelphia. Lincoln Financial Field became the home of the National Football League's Philadelphia Eagles, one of the most successful and popular NFL franchises. The company also gained exposure through sports by sponsoring the prime-time made-for-television golf tournament Lincoln Financial Battle at the Bridges, showcasing the world's most popular golfer, Tiger Woods. In 2005 it also sponsored the Lincoln Financial NBC Sports Report that appeared during the televised coverage of such high-profile events as the Wimbledon and French Open tennis tournaments, Notre Dame college football games, and PGA golf tournaments. In April 2005 Lincoln Financial Group launched the "Hello Future" campaign, retiring "Clear Solutions in a Complex World" after six years to take the next step in repositioning the brand.

TARGET MARKET

"Hello Future" targeted two audiences: consumers and intermediaries. As had been the case since the late 1990s, Lincoln Financial Group focused on affluent consumers, roughly 45 to 64 years of age with an annual income of at least $100,000 or income-producing assets of $250,000 and higher. The campaign tried to appeal to both men and women equally. Nor was age a prime consideration: research indicated that a person's mindset about retirement was more important. About 10 years before people planned to retire—whether that be 55, 65, or older—they began to think seriously about making sure their finances were in order and thus became open to the "Hello Future" message. Thus, the campaign had to be nimble enough to appeal to people in their 40s as well as their 60s.

The other target of the "Hello Future" campaign were the intermediaries, who would actually have to sell the Lincoln Financial Group products to consumers. Intermediaries were divided into four channels: wirehouse brokers like Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley; independent financial planners; banks; and insurance decision-makers.

COMPETITION

Lincoln Financial Group had to contend with strong competition on a number of fronts. It faced direct competition from dozens of firms, but the most prominent were the Hartford Financial Services Group, Pacific Life and Annuity Company, Genworth Financial, Prudential Financial, and Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company. All of them had the financial resources to market their products effectively, making it more difficult for Lincoln Financial Group to cut through the clutter to have its message heard. Offering less direct competition was another crowded field, which included such firms as Fidelity National Financial and T Rowe Price Group and such Internet-oriented companies as E*Trade Financial Corp. Lincoln Financial Group was also in a sense competing against—and appealing to—the self-directed investor, who might be using the services of a discount broker or trading online through E*Trade or Ameritrade Holding Corp., both of which had spent many millions of dollars in humorous, sometime outrageous advertisements to gain name recognition. In the process they changed the nature of financial-services advertising, which was traditionally staid and played off the idea "we're the experts, we know what's best for you." Now old-line firms like Morgan Stanley were introducing humor into their advertisements and talking about earning trust, a key concept given the number of recent Wall Street scandals in which financial firms clearly did not have the best interests of their customers at heart.

A PICTURE WORTH MORE THAN A THOUSAND PENNIES

Lincoln National Corp. did not establish its corporate headquarters in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, until 1998. Its roots actually stretched back to the early years of the century and to Fort Wayne, Indiana, where a man named Wilbur Wynant established a nonprofit fraternal insurance company in 1902. Two years later, however, he skipped town, leaving his local associates either to fold the company or make a stab at reviving the business. It was reorganized in 1905 as Lincoln National Life Insurance Company, with the Lincoln name invoked to suggest trustworthiness, an asset all too often lacking in the insurance industry at the time. The company wrote to Abraham Lincoln's only surviving son, Robert, requesting a picture of his father for use on the company's letterhead. Within days the younger Lincoln sent a photo with the reply: "I find no objection whatever to the use of a portrait of my father upon the letterhead of such a life insurance company named after him as you describe; and I take pleasure in enclosing you, for that purpose, what I regard as a very good photograph of him."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The underlying strategy of "Hello Future" was to show baby boomers that Lincoln Financial Group understood the changing nature of retirement and to project a positive image of retirement as a time of optimism and opportunity. In short, retirement was a beginning, not an ending. The resulting integrated campaign, which broke in April 2005 with a two-page full-color ad in the Wall Street Journal, included a wide range of elements, including television and radio spots, print ads, online marketing, and a variety of alternative media plays.

The five television spots of the campaign carried a crossover message. While they primarily targeted the customer, they were also intended to polish the image of Lincoln Financial Group to make it appeal to the intermediaries. Each of the spots provided examples of people embracing retirement. In the "Guidance Counselor" spot an African-American girl in the 1960s was advised by a school guidance counselor to become a file clerk: "It's a great way to meet eligible lawyers." Instead, she was shown going to college, becoming an attorney, then retiring as a judge to become a guidance counselor herself. The spot closed with her conferring with a student: "File clerk? Have you ever considered being a lawyer?" The voice-over then summed up the message: "The one thing you've always wanted to do? It's still out there, just waiting for you to say, 'Hello future.'" Another spot showed a classic-car garage owner telling a customer that he had decided to sell his business in order to pursue a dream before he was too old. The new owner was then shown. Ironically, he had bought the business to follow his own retirement dream. The voice-over stated, "Maybe you'll finish your life's work early. Or maybe you'll hear a second calling and say, 'Hello future.'" The other spots featured a retired man teaching physically challenged children to ski, a family returning to Russia to discover their roots, and a doctor volunteering in a distant country. The 30-second spots ran on national cable and network programming, including during the Lincoln Financial NBC Sports Report.

The radio spots and print ads of the "Hello Future" campaign mirrored one another in a number of ways. They primarily targeted intermediaries, although the message reached consumers as well. The 30-second radio commercials played on the Wall Street Radio network and in large part relied on similar text to what was found in the print ads. "Maybe you'll finish your life's work early. Maybe your next retirement party won't be your last. Maybe you prefer days filled with challenge and purpose. Maybe today you'll wake up and say... 'Hello future.'" The print ads appeared in the Wall Street Journal and in business and finance periodicals such as Fortune and Money.

Online elements of "Hello Future" included content sponsorship on the Wall Street Journal Online and on the Smart Money website. In terms of alternative media, the campaign participated in a co-branding insert that appeared in Smart Money, sponsored the Times Square ticker in New York City, and also provided plastic bags for the delivery of the Wall Street Journal in 10 top markets.

OUTCOME

According to an October 2005 interview with Stacy Hintermeister, vice president and group account director for Martin/Williams, there was no data available at the time to indicate what kind of impact the "Hello Future" campaign had on brand awareness. But other signs were positive, such as the doubling of call-center volume and website traffic. Anecdotally, the campaign was well received in the marketplace, and financial planners and other intermediaries expressed their approval and embraced the effort. Lincoln Financial Group was also pleased with the campaign, which helped in its efforts to strengthen strategic partnerships. Distribution in key segments increased, contributing to earnings growth in 2005. The campaign ran until the end of 2005, at which point it was reviewed and evolved for 2006.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Lincoln Focuses on Its Name." Adweek, July 22, 2002, p. 2.

———. "New Target for Lincoln Financial." Adweek (Midwest ed.), March 19, 2001, p. 5.

Frazier, Lynne McKenna. "Fort Wayne, Ind.–Based Lincoln Nation Raises Brand Profile." Fort Wayne (IN) News-Sentinel, October 6, 1998.

"Lincoln National Corporation." International Directory of Company Histories, Vol. 25. St James Press, 1999.

"M/W, Lincoln Financial in Storytelling Mode." Adweek (midwest ed.), April 28, 2005.

Rosenthal, Marshall M. "High-Yielding Assets." American Demographics, March 2001, p. S20.

Snyder, Beth. "Lincoln Financial Aims Ad Effort at Superrich in U.S." Advertising Age, March 15, 1999, p. 26.

Ed Dinger

Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc.

2211 Woodward Ave.
Detroit, Michigan 48201
USA
Telephone: (313) 983-6000
Fax: (313) 983-6390
Web site: www.littlecaesars.com

■■■

CLONING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Though few consumers would connect complicated mathematical equations and the latest scientific advances in biology with Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc., both figured into an early 1997 advertising campaign for Little Caesars Pizza, as the company is commonly known. Dreamed up by Cliff Freeman & Partners, who had been providing Little Caesars' wacky ads since 1986, the "Cloning" campaign was delivered to television audiences in March 1997.

Known for wildly improbable and quirky commercials, Cliff Freeman & Partners rolled out the "Cloning" campaign on the heels of one of the century's biggest biological bombshells—the cloning of Dolly the sheep. The campaign consisted of three television spots (the original 30-second spot, followed by 20- and 15-second versions), as well as print advertising for Little Caesars' latest bargain, the Unlimited Pizza. This product incarnation was available for only $6.99 and consisted of any size pizza, in round or square crust, with any combination of 12 toppings, which meant, mathematically speaking, hundreds of millions of available choices. The first Unlimited Pizza was only $6.99, and customers could order a second for $6.99 and receive a free order of Crazy Bread as well.

The Cloning commercial, launched March 31, 1997, portrayed a group of white-coated scientists (a writer for the Orange County Register likened them to something from an Ed Wood movie) watching a colleague in a glass-encased room with a sheep. As another scientist pressed a clearly marked red "cloning" button, a second sheep, identical to the first, appeared. The scientists, mad with glee, were interrupted by the arrival of two pizzas from Little Caesars. They were all so excited about the Unlimited Pizza deal that no one noticed that the pizzas were placed on top of the red button. As the red button then produced dozens of sheep, the slaphappy and blissfully ignorant scientists expounded on the excellent value of Little Caesars. The last shot showed the glass room overflowing with cloned sheep and the trapped scientist fruitlessly holding up a handwritten "help" sign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Little Caesars was the brainchild of Michael and Marian Ilitch, who joined in the post-World War II pizza boom. Brought to the United States by Italian immigrants decades earlier, pizza took the country by storm after hundreds of thousands of enlisted men came home after eating it in Europe. The Ilitches' first restaurant debuted in 1959, where pizza became their most-requested menu item, and the first "Little Caesars" opened in 1962.

In 1998 Little Caesars boasted more than 4,800 outlets in the United States, Canada, the Dominican Republic, Guam, Honduras, Korea, Puerto Rico, and the Czech and Slovak Republics. The Little Caesars chain was the third-largest pizza producer in the country, selling as many as four million pies (with the same recipe perfected in 1959) per week. At the time of the "Cloning" campaign, Little Caesars was struggling to maintain its market share and to juice sales after flat numbers for three years running. Though the Little Caesars brand was well known, consumers had an increasing number of choices for their pizza dollars—including fast food giants like McDonald's, which was test-marketing small pizzas.

The tag line "Pizza! Pizza!" was initiated by Little Caesars back in the early 1970s, when it began selling two pizzas for the price of one. Other pizza makers followed suit, at least for awhile, but most could not cover the costs; Pizza Hut and Domino's offered a second pizza for a nominal cost, such as four or five dollars. Little Caesars truly hit the big time in the 1980s and signed up with Cliff Freeman & Partners in 1986. Armed with about 5 percent of its annual revenues (which were $400 million in 1986), Little Caesars took a serious leap into television advertising, and its choice of Cliff Freeman & Partners was a favorable one. Known in the industry for such humorous classics as Almond Joy's "Sometimes You Feel Like a Nut" and Wendy's "Where's the Beef?" the creative team at Cliff Freeman soon put their spin on Little Caesars' products and turned out a series of goofy commercials that became the hallmark of Little Caesars' pizza.

Pizza carryout and delivery consumption heated up considerably in the late 1980s and early 1990s, and the Big Three—Pizza Hut, Domino's, and Little Caesars—used a myriad of approaches to differentiate themselves from one another in the consumer's mind. Although all touted value, Little Caesars was far and away the value leader. Pizza Hut's mainstay was its sit-down, red-roofed restaurants, and Domino's was better known for its delivery service. Pizza Hut and Little Caesars had also stepped up delivery (although Little Caesars originally delivered pizzas in the 1960s, it went to carryout only in the 1970s), but neither could top Domino's in this market segment. Little Caesars had some dine-in outlets, including "pizza stations" inside Kmart stores, but Pizza Hut ruled the sit-down segment with over 8,600 restaurants.

To bring greater awareness to its calling card—value—Little Caesars had to reinvent itself and its brand. As in the past, it turned to the creative minds at Cliff Freeman & Partners. Unfortunately for those at Cliff Freeman, the success of earlier campaigns like the "Conga Line," "Big! Big!" and "Safety Video" raised high expectations.

PIZZA AND GLADIATORS

Picture Nero noshing on a flat, breadlike substance covered with red sauce and varied ingredients as he hollers to bring in the lions. Yes, pizza has been around since the Roman Empire, at least according to Greg Hardesty of the Orange County Register. Early pies were probably topped with garlic, leeks, and herbs. Mozzarella cheese was not added until the seventh century, and by the 1880s pizza had become a staple for Italian royalty and peasants alike, with scores of immigrants bringing the dish to the United States. Soldiers ate pizza on the run during World War II, and the dish enjoyed a surge of popularity when they came back home, which in turn spawned Pizza Hut, Little Caesars, Domino's, and thousands of neighborhood pizzerias.

TARGET MARKET

Little Caesars' marketing has remained the same for each of its advertising campaigns—always targeting families and adults aged 18 to 49. Although the Unlimited Pizza's most recent predecessors (Pizza by the Foot and the Giant Caesar) appealed more heavily to crowds because of the sheer volume of pizza, the Unlimited Pizza appealed not only to this crowd but also to smaller groups or families who were more concerned with what was on their pizza than with gorging themselves. All of Little Caesars' pizzas were geared toward the budget-conscious; they were usually priced several dollars less than Pizza Hut or Domino's pizzas and provided enough food for at least one dinner and possibly leftovers as well. As a further bonus, if two Unlimited Pizzas were ordered at $6.99 each, Little Caesars threw in a complimentary order of Crazy Bread.

In addition to the age and income range of its customers, Little Caesars consistently targeted customers with a strong sense of the absurd, those who would laugh at highly improbable but humorous situations populated with bizarre characters. Cliff Freeman & Partners' commercials were always a bit left field, but they were well liked and remembered in consumer polls. The success of the quirky ads led consumers and Madison Avenue to expect more not only from Cliff Freeman & Partners but from Little Caesars as well.

COMPETITION

The fast food pizza segment had been ruled for decades by the Big Three until in the 1990s brought the emergence of the Louisville, Kentucky-based Papa John's International. Within a few short years, Papa John's had risen from nowhere to become the seventh-ranked pizza chain in 1994, then the fourth in 1996 with phenomenal growth in units, robust same-store sales, and burgeoning overall sales. The Big Three, however, took turns suffering setbacks and debacles: Pizza Hut's Big Foot and Triple Decker pizzas were "boom-splats," a term the chain coined itself. Domino's dove into reckless spending, and its famous 30-minute guarantee was blamed for car accidents and spurred lawsuits. Little Caesars' national rollout of delivery services met with little enthusiasm, and its sales were falling.

Minor setbacks loomed large for the Big Three as Papa John's grew rapidly, but Little Caesars was the most vulnerable of the bunch. Not only had the company lost a 10-year veteran to rival Domino's, but both Domino's and Pizza Hut were taking direct aim at Little Caesars' customers. Both chains introduced huge, cheaply priced pizzas, and Domino's went so far as to create Twisty Bread, remarkably similar to Little Caesars' Crazy Bread, and to debut amusing television commercials with a cartoon character. For its part, Papa John's was not fiddling much with different products or over-the-top promotions—the company stressed a quality pizza that tasted good. Plenty of consumers agreed, often citing Papa John's as the best tasting pizza in surveys. The franchise was named "Best Pizza Chain in America" in 1998 by Restaurants & Institutions and also topped its food quality, service, and convenience categories. Papa John's expanded in all directions, opening a new outlet virtually every day, with hopes for 2,000 by the year 2000.

For Little Caesars, new product rollouts generally took two months from conception to the completed ad campaign. With heavy pressure to boost sales, Little Caesars rolled out two huge pizza products (the Giant Caesar and Pizza by the Foot) in quick succession in 1996, a time when its market share was eroding and same-store sales were weakening. The Unlimited Pizza's debut in early 1997 was still a statement in value but also heralded another approach: to concentrate on better pizza rather than simply more pizza.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although the Cloning commercial was timely and as absurd as Cliff Freeman & Partners' usual television ads for Little Caesars, the company's print ads added another dimension to the campaign. Previous ad campaigns had consisted of a television commercial (usually in 30-, 20-, and 15-second versions), print ads, and radio spots, but the Unlimited Pizza rollout had no such accompanying radio spots, just print ads in newspapers and local direct mailers. Little Caesars' print ads were usually retreads of television commercials, yet in Unlimited Pizza's case, the print ads took another tack entirely. There was no reference to cloning sheep; a lesson in mathematics was given instead. By playing with numbers, signifying the nearly "unlimited" possibilities for its latest pizza rollout, Little Caesars was once again betting on its buzz word—value—but also on variety.

Value and variety were a complementary pair, successfully parlayed by Little Caesars with its Pizza by the Foot. In this three-square-foot behemoth, customers could enjoy a different topping on each one-foot section. The Unlimited Pizza, however, took variety to the extreme, offering any size (small, medium, or large) or shape (round or square) pizza, with any combination of 12 toppings. And herein was the mathematical lesson: if customers ordered two different Unlimited Pizzas, how many variations could be concocted? The folks at Little Caesars turned to finance professors at nearby Wayne State University, who determined that there were 302,002,176 possible combinations, more than enough to last a lifetime. In fact, according to Wayne State's professor Rob Wolf, you could "eat a different pizza every meal of every day for more than 275,000 years!"

The hype of the Unlimited Pizza's print ads appealed to younger pizza fans who delighted in experimenting, to those who loved pies with multiple toppings, and, with the very inexpensive price of $6.99, even to those who wanted only cheese and sausage. Little Caesars' only difficulty in enticing the younger generation was that most of its outlets did not have delivery, and younger, teenage consumers could not drive. Such consumers had to rely on a busy mom or dad or call another pizza maker.

In contrast to the Giant Caesar or Pizza by the Foot, the Unlimited Pizza did not require specially made pans and delivery boxes or as much oven space. At the outset, the new pizza product did not require extra spending because Little Caesars already had everything necessary to make the Unlimited Pizza—unless customers ordered so many more toppings than usual that there were shortages, which was unlikely.

OUTCOME

Although the Cloning commercial was not as popular with consumers and Madison Avenue as previous ad campaigns, the product did well enough to still be available at Little Caesars more than a year later. The television campaign, although oddly funny, did not produce the guffaws necessary to pull the company from its doldrums, which may have been the impetus for the next two moves made by Little Caesars. One was to return to the bigger-is-better theme by bumping up the size of its small, medium, and large pies by 4 inches each, from 10, 12, and 14 inches to 14, 16, and 18 inches. The other step, which was much more profound, was to put its $40 million advertising account up for review in early 1998, effectively ending its 12-year relationship with Cliff Freeman & Partners.

Despite the "Cloning" campaign's awards (a Silver Clio and two Communication Arts citations), rumors had circulated that the management at Little Caesars and Cliff Freeman were no longer seeing eye-to-eye on marketing strategy. With stagnant revenues of $1.8 billion for 1995, 1996, and 1997 and a host of other difficulties, Little Caesars needed a blockbuster ad campaign and felt a change of scenery might provide the boost. Yet regardless of what the future would bring, Little Caesars still had run more award-winning ad campaigns than any other pizza chain and could rest on its laurels for a while—if the words "Pizza! Pizza!" were uttered in quick succession, everyone immediately thought of Little Caesars.

So what was more important to pizza buyers: size, crust, or toppings? Cost or convenience? Little Caesars had geared its pizzas to just about every preference at some point, with Big! Big!, Giant Caesar, and Pizza by the Foot tackling size, with stuffed or seasoned crusts for dough lovers, and with the Unlimited Pizza for topping combinations. The chain always kept its price low and bet on the convenience factor by placing outlets in Kmart stores and Holiday Inn hotels, by rolling out credit card use in Utah, and by establishing plenty of neighborhood Little Caesars throughout North America and abroad. With lackluster sales in the late 1990s, the company needed some fine-tuning and perhaps a new product or variation so different it snapped consumers to attention. Little Caesars clearly hoped its new ad agency, Bozell Worldwide, would be the key to its rejuvenation.

FURTHER READING

Benezra, Karen. "Pizza Parting: Revamping Caesars Splits with Agency." Brandweek, February 23, 1998.

Child, Charles. "Domino's Preparing to Step up Pizza War." Crain's Detroit Business, May 31, 1993.

Enrico, Dottie. "Little Caesars Pleases, but Misses Topping Previous Ads." USA Today, July 21, 1997.

Frank, Robert. "Marketing and Media: Building a Better Pie—Pizza Hut Is Topping Rivals with Cheese. . . ." Wall Street Journal, January 18, 1996.

Halliday, Jean. "Variety Is the Spice of Life in Domino's Pizza-War Plan." Crain's Detroit Business, August 2, 1993.

Hardesty, Greg. "More Dough: With Fast Food Consumption Up, New Pizza Players Battle Entrenched Chains for a Slice of the Profits." Orange County Register, June 22, 1998.

Howard, Theresa. "Pizza's 'Big Three' Hold the Gimmicks, Serve Simplicity." Nation's Restaurant News, January 13, 1997.

Lutton, Christine. "Sizing up the Pies: When It Comes to Monster Pizzas, Big Does Not Mean Better, Our Tasters Say." Virginian-Pilot/Ledger-Star (Norfolk), August 5, 1993.

Merritt, Jennifer. "Fast Food: Chains Have Long History of Gimmicks." Knight-Ridder News Service, January 7, 1998.

Outhier, Craig. "Time after Time: Commercial Appeal." Orange County Register, June 22, 1997.

Prewitt, Milford. "Pizza Chains Ditch Discounts in Back-to-Basics Bake-Off." Nation's Restaurant News, August 1, 1994.

Rose, Peter. "Pizzeria Owners Find Their Niche in Crowded Boise Market." Idaho Business Review, April 9, 1994.

Rubenstein, Ed. "Size Matters in New Campaigns Set to Attack the Competition." Nation's Restaurant News, September 22, 1997.

Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

GRAND CANYON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Little Caesars, an international pizza chain of more than 4,800 units, is well known in the advertising industry for its quirky "Pizza! Pizza!" television commercials. Created with Cliff Freeman & Partners, the ads feature bizarre humor and absurd comic images while avoiding hard-sell directives.

A mainstay of Little Caesars pizza has always been value; the company provided customers with two pizzas for the price of one or bigger pizzas for less money than its primary competitors Pizza Hut, Domino's, and Papa John's. With the introduction of the "Giant Caesar" pizza in the fall of 1996, Little Caesars again demonstrated to consumers that it would always provide more pizza for the money, and to prove it the Giant Caesar pizza was more than 65 percent bigger than standard 14-inch large pizzas and sold for the very attractive price of $9.99 or $10.99 depending on the geographic area. The 8-slice, 18-inch pizza was also filled with larger-than-life ingredients, including three-inch pepperoni and giant-sized ham toppings.

The Giant Caesar pizza campaign revolved around the old adage that size does indeed matter, with the Little Caesars pizza dwarfing items generally considered huge or outsized, such as the Grand Canyon (from which the campaign took its name) and mainland China. The campaign even played on the most common "size" joke about male genitalia. The national television spot featured several straight-faced hayseeds eating the pizza in the first two (Grand Canyon and China) vignettes and an elderly couple in bed on their honeymoon in the third vignette. The ad had the tag line "The new Giant Caesar makes everything else look small." The 30-second commercial, launched on August 12, 1996, was run during popular prime-time television programming and during sporting events, and was accompanied by radio and print advertising.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Little Caesars franchise—owned by parent company Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc.—has been in business for 40 years. Founded by husband-and-wife business partners Michael and Marian Ilitch in Garden City, Michigan, the original restaurant served a variety of food items from spaghetti to french fries to fried chicken as well as pizza. But pizza was the most popular product, and the Ilitches sold nearly 300 in their first week as restauranteurs. With their low-priced, flavorful pizzas selling about as fast as they could make them, the Ilitches soon realized they had a winner. The first Little Caesars franchise store, serving mostly pizza, was opened in the Detroit area in 1962.

The recipe the Ilitches used in the 1950s is the same one used today, though the pizza has varied by size, crust type, and toppings. Little Caesars has always used natural ingredients, eschewing synthetics such as manufactured cheese products and artificial flavorings. In the years since Little Caesars was established, many competitors have emerged, including small independent pizzerias as well as chains like Pizza Hut, Shakey's, Domino's, and latecomer Papa John's, which took the industry by storm in the early 1990s.

Though like Pizza Hut the company began as a sit-down establishment and later added delivery services, Little Caesars went to carry-out only in 1971, the same year the two-for-one program was initiated. The now-famous "Pizza! Pizza! Two Great Pizzas! One Low Price!" slogan became a permanent part of Little Caesars' marketing campaigns in 1975. Two years later, the company added drive-through windows, and in two more years it installed a conveyor oven to increase its capacity. Although technological advances continued to change certain elements in the pizza-selling and delivery business, value and taste had remained Little Caesars' claim to fame—until a series of catchy and undoubtedly original television ads came along.

By the time Little Caesars hired Saatchi & Saatchi's Cliff Freeman & Partners in 1986, there were 1,000 company franchises across the nation, and the company was ready to devote some serious dollars (about 5 percent of its revenues, which had reached nearly $400 million) to becoming a serious competitor. Cliff Freeman & Partners was at the zenith of its popularity as well, having produced several award-winning advertising campaigns, including the popular "Where's the Beef?" television ads featuring Clara Peller for Wendy's. Freeman's first efforts for Little Caesars marked the company's television advertising debut, with seven 30-second spots filled with silly characters, unusual situations, and quirky humor that became Little Caesars' advertising trademark.

Given that the pizza carry-out and delivery industry had heated up considerably in the late 1980s and early 1990s, Little Caesars began experimenting with its service operations. The company went back to delivery services, again putting it head-to-head with Domino's. Though the national introduction of delivery services wasn't nearly as successful as hoped, the company left it up to the individual franchisees whether to continue the service or not. Yet a bigger hit came through a remarkable deal with Kmart in 1992, placing self-serve Little Caesars "Pizza Stations" in over 400 Kmart stores. The success of these units led to hundreds more, and though these locations were later renamed KCafe and began serving other food brands, Little Caesars pizza was still the mainstay of the menu, and the association with the discounter provided an excellent promotional venue.

The introduction of the Giant Caesar was technically nothing new, as larger-sized pizzas—some up to 24 inches—had been offered by Pizza Hut, Domino's, and Little Caesars as well as by independents. Size, however, had been scaled down across the board when two-for-one deals became the norm in the 1980s. Additionally, bigger pizzas were not always cost-effective as they required larger pans and more ingredients, took up greater oven space, and required special packaging.

TARGET MARKET

Little Caesars' advertising has generally targeted families and adults from 18 to 49 years of age. The Giant Caesar and its corresponding Grand Canyon spots were aimed especially at families with several mouths to feed, as the Giant would satisfy the needs of the average-sized family (four to six members). The product was also a potential success with college students with their traditionally large appetites and tight budgets.

In addition to the age range of its customers, Little Caesars always targeted those with a slightly offbeat sense of humor, those who would find its commercials—with zany situations and often absurd-looking characters uttering equally absurd lines—worth a good guffaw. Both audiences and the advertising industry came to expect much from the company, which was both a blessing and a burden as it became necessary for Cliff Freeman & Partners to continually top itself.

COMPETITION

Little Caesars' competition grew exponentially as geographic areas were saturated with a wide range of fast food restaurants, including a variety of pizza producers. Though the company's sales outpaced industry growth

SIZE VS. SHAPE

The pizza wars between Pizza Hut, Domino's, and Little Caesars are legendary and have sparked fierce competition within the industry. Competitors, both large and small, have tried to steal customers by experimenting with their pizzas' size (up to 36 inches for Little Caesars' Pizza by the Foot), shape (round, square, rectangular, and football shaped, the latter courtesy of Little Caesars), height (for example, the Triple-decker by Pizza Hut, which was a disaster), crust (cracker thin, cheese stuffed, pan, hand tossed, spice brushed, and double dough), toppings (from three-inch pieces of pepperoni from Little Caesars to rose petals, egg, peanut butter, squash, rattlesnake, ostrich, buffalo, gator, tuna, chocolate chips, and jelly beans in some pizza joints), and cheese (whole-milk, skim-milk, and artificial mozzarella, as well as cheddar, goat cheese, feta, and others types of cheese).

by 24 percent in the early part of the 1990s, the middle and later years of the decade were not as rosy; Pizza Hut and Domino's hit their strides and were better at steering customers away from Little Caesars. Convenience often seemed to play a greater role than taste or price in the fast food war. Little Caesars hoped customers would return not only because its products were cheap and convenient, but also because they were better tasting than those of its two primary rivals. Additionally, the company hoped its unusual, funny ads would help consumers remember the Little Caesars brand.

Pizza Hut was clearly a formidable competitor primarily because of its size (over 7,200 restaurants) and available capital. A former subsidiary of PepsiCo, Pizza Hut had spun off in 1997 but still had considerable clout, especially after introducing delivery service. Domino's, on the other hand, with about 5,400 outlets nationwide, was immensely popular with the college crowd. Yet Domino's wanted to capture the family market, too, focusing on busy working Moms too harried to fix a sit-down meal every day.

Little Caesars' earlier initiative to provide two pizzas for the price of one made competitors sit up and take notice and forced both Pizza Hut and Domino's to offer their own interpretation of this deal. While they did not offer two-for-one deals, each did offer a second pizza for a cut-rate price. Then came Papa John's, which made the fight for market share even more fierce, and though the fast food industry as a whole was growing, it was overcrowded.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Little Caesars had dubbed itself the "value king of the pizza industry," and the Giant Caesar was meant to demonstrate the indisputable truth of this statement. According to Sue Sherbow, Little Caesars' vice president of Corporate Communications, many people believed "bigger is better, so we developed our Giant Caesar to satisfy people's appetites and purchasing trends." In marketing the Giant Caesar, the pizza was not only significantly bigger but somewhat different than Little Caesars' other pizzas. It was considered more "New York"-styled, with a more pronounced or rolled-over crust, and it looked more "homemade" than mass produced. The pizza had to capitalize on its most important asset—value—during a slowdown in the $25 billion pizza market. To achieve this goal, Cliff Freeman & Partners came up with the Grand Canyon campaign, illustrating just what was "big" and what was not.

Another hallmark of Little Caesars' marketing was to promote fun; the company did not take itself too seriously and wanted its products and advertising to reflect people enjoying themselves. Some of its previous ad campaigns by Cliff Freeman & Partners clearly promoted this creed, like the well-known Conga Line (featuring dancing poodles and humans) or the Delivery training sequence (would-be delivery drivers being put through a rigorous program). These commercials had been immensely popular and not only earned awards and citations but plenty of brand recognition. Although Pizza Hut had tried a mega-pizza called "Big Foot" and Domino's had created the "Dominator" (both were short-lived), and with Papa John's International putting even more pressure on the three major pizza chains, Little Caesars really needed a winner—in terms of product and sales, as well as effective advertising. As Anthony Vagnoni, an Advertising Age editor, commented to USA Today in a July 1997 article regarding Little Caesars, "Anything less than a belly laugh isn't good enough." Vagnoni also stated that Little Caesars' advertising was consistently well done and was "still far superior to ads . . . for other pizza products."

Yet lower sales and an $8 million shortfall when a quarter of its franchisees were late on their national ad fund payments in 1997 (according to Competitive Media Reporting) caused Little Caesars not only to cut back significantly on marketing dollars but to be cautious with the dollars that were spent. In addition to its advertising support, Little Caesars was busy trying a myriad of new promotional ventures, including opening pizza kiosks in Holiday Inn's busiest hotels near Walt Disney World in Orlando, Florida; test-marketing the use of American Express cards in some of its Utah outlets; and offering slices at 39 cents each to celebrate its 39th anniversary.

OUTCOME

While the "Grand Canyon" campaign was clearly a success with consumers and the advertising industry, most viewers felt it was not as good as previous Little Caesars campaigns. The ads did propel sales, and the television and radio spots won 10 major awards, including both national and regional Addys, an Andy citation for best national campaign, and two Clios (a silver in the retail foods category and a bronze in the national campaign segment), all in 1997. Yet the industry's slump had weakened Little Caesars, resulting in rather flat sales for 1995, 1996, and 1997. Total or systemwide sales had hit $2 billion in 1994 and fallen to about $1.8 billion for the next three years.

Despite its many successes with Cliff Freeman & Partners, including the Grand Canyon spot, Little Caesars put the estimated $40 million account up for review in early 1998. The move prompted Freeman to resign and left several other agencies—including Bozell Worldwide; Grey, New York (who had previously pitched for Domino's); and the Minnesota-based Fallon McElligott—vying for the work. Though Cliff Freeman himself said it was time to move on—since he and Little Caesars' management no longer saw eye-to-eye on marketing strategy—he was quoted in a Brandweek article in February 1998 as saying, "They put us on the map and vice versa."

While it was not known what the next generation of Little Caesars promotions might be, consumers had come to expect a certain type of ad from this company. Given that Little Caesars had been voted the "Best Pizza Value in America" by Restaurants & Institutions magazine for 11 consecutive years, it seemed unlikely that their ads or their pizza would change much in the near future, despite any temporary difficulties. As for the Giant Caesar, although it was discontinued, Little Caesars increased the size of all its pizzas in response to positive reactions to the Giant Caesar.

FURTHER READING

"American Express Card Now Welcome at Utah Little Caesars Locations." PR Newswire, March 13, 1998.

Frank, Robert. "Marketing & Media: Building a Better Pie—Pizza Hut Is Topping Rivals with Cheese. . . ." Wall Street Journal, January 18, 1996.

Howard, Theresa. "Kmart Corp.: Attention Shoppers—Retail Giant Hails 'Caesars' as a Big Guy." Nation's Restaurant News, January 1998.

———. "Pizza's 'Big Three' Hold the Gimmicks, Serve Simplicity." Nation's Restaurant News, January 13, 1997.

"Little Caesars Celebrates 39 Years in Business with 39-Cent Slices of Pizza." Bison Franchise News, May 6, 1998.

"Little Caesars Named Best Pizza Value in America by Consumer Survey." Bison Franchise News, March 26, 1998.

"Pepperoni the Size of Ferris Wheels." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 1996.

Pittinger, Heather. "Popular and Profitable." Hotel & Motel Management, May 6, 1996.

"Pizza! Pizza!." Adweek, August 19, 1996.

"Pizzeria Rolls Out Extra-Large Pie." Tampa Tribune, August 14, 1996.

Rubenstein, Ed. "Size Matters in New Campaigns Set to Attack the Competition." Nation's Restaurant News, September 22, 1997.

Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

SAFETY VIDEO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Consumers know Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc. for its absurd, funny commercials created by Cliff Freeman & Partners, including the very popular and award-winning "Safety Video" campaign. Rolled out near the end of 1996 to introduce its new Pizza by the Foot, the Little Caesars campaign not only elicited laughs from audiences but once again proved humor in advertising translated into dollars and sense.

With more than 4,800 Little Caesars outlets throughout the United States and Canada, the Dominican Republic, Guam, Honduras, Korea, Puerto Rico, and the Czech and Slovak Republics, the company was selling more than four million pizzas per week by 1998. Say "Pizza! Pizza!" and everyone thinks Little Caesars, just as consumers and the advertising industry alike had come to expect the ribald humor and bizarre antics in the company's commercials from the mid-1980s into the late 1990s.

Cliff Freeman & Partners' "Safety Video" campaign, like its predecessors, was not heavy-handed salesmanship, but goofy situational comedy. This time, the comedy resulted from the selling and buying of Little Caesars' new Pizza by the Foot, a three-foot-long rectangular pizza sold in a specially designed box along with a complimentary order of eight Italian bread sticks. The campaign's television spot, focusing on "safety" instructions for handling this unusual product, began with a video shown to customers by a Little Caesars employee and manager. The video was simple and straight forward, explaining the possible hazards of mishandling this potentially "dangerous" pizza and how to "observe a safe turning radius."

Ludicrously loopy, the customer in the commercial ignored the video, and mayhem resulted: the television monitor crashed to the floor, glass was shattered in the pizza outlet's doors, a customer approaching the door was decked, a passing bicyclist was whacked by the box, and so on. The Little Caesars manager intoned, "I don't think he was paying attention."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Little Caesars' rollout of Pizza by the Foot was its latest example of giving consumers more for their hard-earned bucks. As an originator of selling two pizzas for the price of one back in the 1970s, Little Caesars introduced Pizza by the Foot close on the heels of another bigger-is-better product, the Giant Caesar. The Giant Caesar had been introduced in August 1996, a mere month and a half before Pizza by the Foot debuted. Both products were meant to assure customers that Little Caesars was always willing to give them more pizza for every dollar and that the company would keep finding new ways to do so. Launching two outsized products in succession was part of a marketing drive to keep "value" synonymous with the company's name and products. Pizza by the Foot further emphasized value by giving customers a free order of Little Caesars' latest garnish, the new Italian Bread (fresh-baked bread sticks lightly brushed with olive oil and sprinkled with an Italian blend of spices).

Little Caesars was no novice in the fast food industry, having been around for four decades. Founders Michael and Marian Ilitch had begun their trade in Garden City, Michigan, with a full-service restaurant serving such staples as fried chicken, pasta dishes, and pizza. After selling almost 300 pizzas in their first week, the Ilitches decided to open another restaurant that concentrated on low-priced pizza; the first Little Caesars franchise store opened in the suburbs of Detroit in 1962.

Throughout the rest of the 1960s and the beginning of the 1970s, Little Caesars grew throughout the Midwest. The "Pizza! Pizza! Two Great Pizzas! One Low Price!" marketing concept was initiated in 1971, the same year the company stopped delivery in favor of carryout only. Over the next decade, Little Caesars added drive-through windows, installed conveyor ovens, and broadened its menu. When it hired Cliff Freeman & Partners in 1986, Little Caesars had 1,000 outlets across the nation and was prepared to spend about 5 percent of its annual revenues (or $20 million that year) on advertising. Cliff Freeman & Partners was well respected in the ad business, having produced a number of successful and award-winning campaigns like Wendy's "Where's the Beef?" and Almond Joy's "Sometimes You Feel Like a Nut." The partnership turned the increasingly well-known pizza chain into a media giant with a series of quirky 30-second commercials, featuring odd vignettes with even odder characters.

Because the pizza carryout and delivery industry had heated up considerably in the late 1980s and early 1990s (because of the falling price of high-quality cheese), Little Caesars resumed delivery services, but was not pleased with the results. The company therefore returned to its mainstay—value—by rolling out the Giant Caesar and Pizza by the Foot in quick succession. The only downside to producing Pizza by the Foot was its special packaging; yet the unique, handled rectangular box seemed to provide almost as much fun as the pizza inside. The "Safety Video" commercial was launched during prime-time family-oriented television programming and sports events on October 28, 1996. Lasting 30 seconds (subsequent versions also ran at both 20 and 15 seconds), the television commercial was accompanied by print advertising and three separate radio spots.

TARGET MARKET

Throughout its history, Little Caesars aimed its marketing at families and adults from 18 to 49 years of age. Both Pizza by the Foot and the Giant Caesar were created for college students, parties, and averaged-sized families. Pizza by the Foot was especially accommodating, because each one-foot section could have a different topping—thereby pleasing everyone. Lastly, the meal came with free Italian bread and was sold for the low price of $10.99. Pizza by the Foot, Little Caesars made clear, was the perfect crowd-pleaser for anyone on a budget.

In addition to appealing to customers in a particular age group and income range, Little Caesars consistently targeted folks with a screwball sense of humor, those who would get a good belly laugh from Cliff Freeman & Partners' ads. Consumers and the advertising industry not only consistently rated Little Caesars ads as effective and funny but also came to expect those involved to top themselves with ever more outrageous, bizarre campaigns.

COMPETITION

When Little Caesars developed a new product and gave Cliff Freeman & Partners the necessary information, a finished ad campaign was usually ready within two months. In the mid- and late 1990s, this was especially crucial due to fierce competition. Little Caesars had knocked Domino's off its second-tier spot in the early 1990s, when the latter suffered losses of $68 million in 1991 and $55 million in 1992. In 1994 and 1995, however, Domino's came back with a vengeance (in part because of the defection of a 10-year Little Caesars

PIZZA PIZZA SQUARED

Little Caesars has long been known by its advertising, and its "Pizza! Pizza!" tag line, coined in the 1970s, became recognized around the world. Not only did the "Pizza! Pizza!" motto become synonymous with the Little Caesars franchise, but it also stood for the "double" value in receiving two pies for the price of one. Unfortunately for Little Caesars, one of its major competitors Canada is a chain called Pizza Pizza—a higher-ranked rival that received a boost every time Little Caesars advertised using its "Pizza! Pizza!" slogan.

executive who joined Domino's) just as Little Caesars started experiencing its own problems. Then came Papa John's International, challenging not only Little Caesars but Domino's and Pizza Hut as well. In 1996, when Little Caesars' market share declined from 14.5 to 13.4 percent and sales fell by nearly 8.1 percent, Papa John's had excellent same-store sales (up 10 percent) and a phenomenal unit growth of 32.1 percent for the year (all figures according to Nation's Restaurant News).

On top of stiff competition came an industry slowdown, which seemed to hurt Little Caesars more than Pizza Hut, Domino's, or Papa John's. In this flooded marketplace, where convenience and availability often counted for more than taste and price, Little Caesars, with its 4,800 franchises, needed more than ever to imprint its brand on the consumer's mind. To compete with Pizza Hut's 7,200-plus restaurants, as well as 5,400 from Domino's and another 1,500 or so from Papa John's, Little Caesars had to differentiate itself from the pack. The company chose to entice them with silly and irreverent advertising, and hoped to keep them with variety and exceptional value.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Larger pizzas for less money was certainly nothing new, especially because Little Caesars had used that strategy with the Giant Caesar a few months earlier. Pizza by the Foot had to make its mark in a different way. Back in 1993, Pizza Hut had introduced Big Foot pizza, which was two square feet of pizza cut into 21 slices, and it did not make much more than an immediate and short-lived splash. For its part, Domino's debuted the Dominator, which was 30 inches long, and a new garnish called Twisty Bread, almost a carbon copy of Little Caesar's Crazy Bread. At the time, Little Caesars was offering its Big! Big! pizza, which was two feet long and plugged by George Burns in television spots.

Three years later, at the end of 1996, Little Caesars was not only topping the competition, but also itself, with Pizza by the Foot. It was bigger than Domino's largest pizza by half a square foot and Pizza Hut's by a whole square foot and came with a different topping on each one-foot section. With free Italian bread sticks the deal was touted as a great value. But the real kicker was the unique carrying case; by placing the emphasis on the specially designed box and secondarily on the pizza, consumers were drawn to try it at least once—and this was the focus of a new $10 million ad campaign by Cliff Freeman & Partners.

The "Safety Video" television commercial came in three versions, with the original at 30 seconds and the other two at 20 and 15 seconds each. To accompany the television spot, Cliff Freeman & Partners produced three equally creative radio spots and print advertising in newspapers and direct mailers. The three radio spots, called "Family Dinner," "Megaphone," and "Timmy," were as off-the-wall as the "Safety Video" commercial, with the first running in both 60- and 30-second versions and the other two running at 30 seconds each. "Family Dinner" featured a family attempting to converse while eating Pizza by the Foot; their conversations were stymied by the vast distance they had to put between them to accommodate the gigantic pizza. The "Megaphone" radio spot took the same premise one step further by having the family use a megaphone to speak to each other. The "Timmy" spot featured a father and son (Timmy) dining on Pizza by the Foot, with the son tossing a slice of pepperoni from his end of the pizza all the way to his dad, who was duly impressed by his throwing skills.

The nuts and bolts of the Pizza by the Foot campaign were simple—touting the enormous size and value of this new product through effective, original, and quirky advertising. Cliff Freeman & Partners' use of the Pizza by the Foot box was a stroke of genius. Even though the old directives of value and "more pizza for your money" were in the commercial, concentrating on the box opened a new world of "safety" gags. Given most people's intolerance for instructional media (from putting together a bicycle to cooking in the microwave) and the ridiculous lengths to which some companies and manufacturers go to instruct customers on safety, portraying a customer who pays little or no attention to the Safety Video was a universal jab at consumers and companies alike, making the resulting havoc all the more credible and hilarious.

Because Little Caesars considered itself the ''value king of the pizza industry,'' bringing out a parade of bigger-is-better pizzas like the Big! Big!, the Giant Caesar, and Pizza by the Foot was supposed to propel the company's brand more decisively in the $25-billion pizza market. As company spokesperson Sue Sherbow commented in a January 1997 article in Nation's Restaurant News, ''Little Caesars has always tried to emphasize value; that's our niche—and we will continue to look at innovation, value and fun.'' The last word of this statement, ''fun,'' was a hallmark of Little Caesars ads—if the ads were fun and funny, consumers were entertained and apt to remember them longer.

OUTCOME

Pizza by the Foot fared well after its October 1996 debut. The item remained an optional menu item into 1998, and the Italian Breads pawned a sibling called Italian Cheese Bread. In its never-ending quest to provide more for less, Little Caesars went on to develop the Unlimited Pizza, offering any sized pizza and any topping for the low price of $6.99, and later bumping up the size of all its pizzas by four inches each.

Cliff Freeman & Partners' ''Safety Video'' television campaign was popular with both consumers and the advertising industry. The campaign won a slew of awards—in this sense reminiscent of previous Little Caesars winners like the ''Conga Line'' and ''Cheeser! Cheeser!'' campaigns—and was better received than the Giant Caesar's ''Grand Canyon'' commercials. ''Safety Video'' was voted Best TV Single by Adweek, garnered eight Addys (overall, national, and regional), two Andys, won Ad Age's Best of TV award, claimed two Clios (a silver in the retail foods category and a bronze in the national campaign segment), and was given the Silver Pencil from the One Show awards, all in 1997. The ''Family Dinner'' and ''Megaphone'' radio spots also won several awards, including Clio certificates, a Mercury award, and the Communication Arts' Radio Single award. Yet despite kudos from the advertising industry, Little Caesars was in a slump, with stagnant sales of about $1.8 billion for 1995, 1996, and 1997, after hitting over $2 billion in 1994 for systemwide sales.

Fraught with tepid sales, a shortfall in its national advertising fund, the layoff of 1 percent of its corporate workforce, and an oversaturated market, Little Caesars put its estimated $40 million advertising account up for review in January 1998. Cliff Freeman & Partners' response was to resign the account, stating that their objectives no longer matched those of Little Caesars. The Detroit office of Bozell Worldwide eventually won the account, and the advertising industry waited to see what direction Bozell and Little Caesars would take to shore up market share and renew the latter's brand in the minds of consumers.

FURTHER READING

Child, Charles. ''Domino's Preparing to Step Up Pizza War.'' Crain's Detroit Business, May 31, 1993.

Frank, Robert. ''Marketing and Media: Building a Better Pie—Pizza Hut Is Topping Rivals with Cheese. . . .'' Wall Street Journal, January 18, 1996.

Halliday, Jean. ''Variety Is the Spice of Life in Domino's Pizza-War Plan.'' Crain's Detroit Business, August 2, 1993.

Howard, Theresa. ''Pizza's 'Big Three' Hold the Gimmicks, Serve Simplicity.'' Nation's Restaurant News, January 13, 1997.

Lutton, Christine. ''Sizing Up the Pies When It Comes to Monster Pizzas, Big Does Not Mean Better, Our Tasters Say.'' Virginian-Pilot/Ledger-Star (Norfolk), August 5, 1993.

Polong, Travis E. ''Firms Spar for Bigger Slice of Pizza Market.'' San Antonio Business Journal, July 30, 1993.

Prewitt, Milford. ''Pizza Chains Ditch Discounts in Back-to-Basics Bake-Off.'' Nation's Restaurant News, August 1, 1994.

Rubenstein, Ed. ''Size Matters in New Campaigns Set to Attack the Competition.'' Nation's Restaurant News, September 22, 1997.

Walkup, Carolyn. ''Little Caesar Cuts 27 Management Posts at Headquarters.'' Nation's Restaurant News, July 14, 1997.

Weigel, George. ''Big's the Word in the Industry.'' Sunday Patriot-News (Harrisburg), August 1, 1993.

Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

TALKING PIZZAS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the late 1990s the pizza market had become saturated, and Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc., a value-oriented player that had grown dramatically during the 1980s, saw its sales and market share flatten. The company decided to change its marketing strategy and early in 1998 hired Bozell Worldwide Inc., giving the agency the task of developing a new advertising campaign that would emphasize product quality in addition to value.

The Bozell ''Talking Pizzas'' campaign ran on television in the fall of 1998 and in direct-mail solicitations. In the two 30-second television spots two pizzas had a humorous conversation. The campaign was similar to previous efforts in that it offered a value-oriented promotion; major differences were that the ads used a gentler humor and emphasized product quality through the dialogue and close-up shots of the pizzas. The direct-mail advertising offered a money-back guarantee. The campaign was a marked change from the zany approach of the past and got a subdued reaction from critics and consumers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Husband-and-wife team Mike and Marian Ilitch started their first restaurant in Garden City, Michigan in 1959. The restaurant served a variety of foods, including spaghetti and fried chicken, but pizza was clearly the most popular item. The Ilitches sold almost 300 pizzas during the first week of business. They eventually decided to make low-cost pizza the main item on their menu and opened the first Little Caesars franchise operation in Detroit in 1962. The small family pizza chain grew dramatically. Although it started out as primarily a sit-down restaurant, delivery services were later added. In 1971 Little Caesars changed to a carry-out only business and began offering two-for-one pizza deals. In the same year the slogan "Pizza! Pizza! Two Great Pizzas! One Low Price!" was introduced.

By the 1980s Little Caesars' business was booming, and in 1986 the company hired Cliff Freeman & Partners, known for its use of goofy humor in advertising, as its agency. The pairing resulted in award-winning ads and was widely regarded to have worked to the benefit of both parties. For more than a decade Little Caesars' advertising was known for its offbeat humor based on wacky sight gags and an animated toga-clad Roman who proclaimed "Pizza! Pizza!" and other double tag lines such as "Pan! Pan!" and "Big! Big!" at the end of each commercial. The advertising almost always revolved around the theme of getting more for the money at Little Caesars. "Value is our niche and emphasis and it's very valid for us," said Little Caesars spokesperson Sue Sherbow in January 1998. "It's how we expect to be doing business for years to come."

According to Crain's Detroit Business, by the late 1990s Little Caesars' sales had "stagnated" and its market share flattened. Evelyne Slomon, editor of Pizza Today, reported that the company was "feeling the financial pinch" from its unprofitable two-for-one specials. "I don't expect the company to go out of business, but their sales are going down, and they need to re-group," she said. The company cut its advertising spending by 22.8 percent in 1996 and overhauled its management. The Detroit Free Press reported in October 1998 that the company had downsized its staff twice in less than 14 months.

The company also had a history of bumpy relationships with its franchisees. In 1993 one group of franchisees sued the company in federal court, claiming that it had violated antitrust laws by overcharging them for supplies and not allowing them to deal with other suppliers. Franchisees reportedly worried about the company's financial situation and criticized its marketing approach as lacking in foresight, consistency, and effectiveness.

To make matters worse, Little Caesars was getting substantially less than rave reviews on quality. Brandweek reported in January 1998 that, regardless of value, "customers have to feel good about the pizza they get. And when it comes to taste, Little Caesars often loses. In its last pizza survey, Consumer Reports called Little Caesars offerings 'low in flavor, and the cheese can be so chewy it's almost rubbery.'" Bob Garfield, reviewer for Advertising Age, wrote in September 1998, "There's an old joke about a kvetching guest at a Catskills resort. Not only is the food terrible, he complains, but the portions are too small. It's supposed to be ridiculous, but with such a consumer in mind the Little Caesars marketing strategy was born." Garfield went on to compare the pizza to "wet flannel, minus the flavor." Nonetheless, Little Caesars received 11 consecutive awards for "best pizza value" based on consumer surveys by Restaurants & Institutions magazine.

When the company decided to rethink its marketing strategy, it began a quiet review of its advertising. This prompted Freeman to resign the account in February 1998, and Bozell was hired two months later. With the new advertising agency came a new emphasis on product quality that the company hoped would give it an edge in an increasingly competitive pizza market.

TARGET MARKET

Little Caesars had historically targeted families and adults in the 18-to-49-year age bracket. The value message was geared toward those who were conscious of budgets, including families with children and college students. The new campaign represented a shift in focus from value alone to one in which quality was also emphasized, although not to the exclusion of value. The campaign ran nationwide and featured two television spots that were shown during prime-time network and cable shows and during some college football games.

COMPETITION

Little Caesars ranked number three among the top four pizza chains. Pizza Hut, Inc., was number one, and Domino's Pizza, Inc., ranked second, with Papa John's International, Inc., in fourth place. Other, smaller players in the crowded pizza market included Sbarro, Italian Eatery, Round Table Pizza, ShowBiz Pizza Time, Inc.'s Chuck E. Cheese's, and Godfather's Pizza.

The pizza segment in general was stagnant in the late 1990s. Brandweek reported that pizza chain sales went up only a half of 1 percent in 1996, compared to the rise in total fast-food sales of 5.6 percent in the same period.

LITTLE CAESARS GOES FOR NEW LOOK

According to Nation's Restaurant News, in addition to promoting pizza quality, Little Caesars decided in 1998 to renovate its stores. At the annual convention of franchisees in early May, the company debuted a new prototype unit with higher ceilings, brighter colors and lighting, new countertops, and an expanded self-service drink station. "It incorporates our value and quality into the look of our stores, and it is a very family-friendly image that attracts customers," said Sue Sherbow, spokesperson for Little Caesars. She did not elaborate on the costs of the renovations but said that franchisees were not required to adopt the new design.

Bob Angona was one of the franchisees who liked the prototype. When Angona lost the lease on one of his two units, he relocated the store and used the new decor. While he would not discuss the cost, he said that sales were up 15 to 28 percent over the same period in the previous year. He attributed the increase to both the new design and the new location.

Other franchisees were concerned that the prototype had not been thoroughly tested and that the company might not stick with it. According to Nation's Restaurant News, the company had previously introduced unit models that did not pan out. Some franchisees said that the company should focus more on product quality than on a new store design.

During this time other segments fared significantly better than pizza, with burger sales rising 4 percent, chicken sales 10.5 percent, and sales of sandwich chains 4.8 percent. Nation's Restaurant News reported in September 1998, however, that Papa John's and Domino's had increased their market shares while Little Caesars' sales had lagged during the previous few years. The top three chains were particularly threatened by Papa John's, which, despite its relatively small size, had gained ground on its rivals through rapid nationwide expansion and growth in sales.

Large pizza chains, which historically had tried to boost sales with new product promotions, started to emphasize product quality, improve operations, and renovate units to revive business. They continued, however, to rely to some degree on promotions, with Pizza Hut adding new types of pizza to its menu, Domino's coming out with two new flavored crusts, and Little Caesars launching its "Big! Big!" campaign. Unlike its rivals, the up-and-coming Papa John's focused more on quality than on menu expansion. Chris Sternberg, Papa John's vice president of communications, said, "We continue to focus on our better-ingredients strategy. There are temptations to do line extensions and new-product rollouts, but we really believe that staying focused on doing one product better than anyone else helps us to continue to grow."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the Bozell campaign, which first aired on September 2, 1998, the action in the two 30-second television spots—"Mutual Admiration" and "Home Movie"—revolved around two talking pizzas. As before, the television commercials were humorous, but there was more emphasis on the quality of the pizza. They put the spotlight on the product rather than on sight gags. Each commercial ended with the traditional "Pizza! Pizza!" tag line. Observers noted that the humor was more subdued than in the zany approach of Freeman. Gary Topolewski, Bozell's executive vice president and chief creative officer, said that the primary goal of the television commercials was "putting in the personality that is exclusively Little Caesars . . . It's not belly laughs; it's whimsical and a wink of the eye. And it's palatable, as opposed to talking starkly about the ingredients." Topolewski went on to observe, "Humor is a tough nut to crack to really make sure it works. You don't want the humor to overshadow the quality message."

In "Mutual Admiration" the two pizzas traded profuse compliments in exaggerated New York accents about the quality of each other's toppings. The first pizza said, "Look at you! You are lookin' good!" The second pizza replied, "Me? No my friend. It is YOU that is looking good . . . look at all those toppings!" The first pizza came back with "My toppings! Forget about it!" The conversation continued in this vein, with interjections such as "You're killin' me" and "Oh, stop it" thrown in. Pizza was featured in almost every shot in the commercial, and the conversation was filmed with quick side-to-side camera movements.

"Home Movie" showed two pizzas reminiscing about their "childhood" while they watched a "home movie," which, in this case, was a training film for Little Caesars employees on how to make pizzas. One pizza said, "Oh, look at that little ball of dough. Is that you?" The other responded, "You've got a very good eye. That is me." Growing wistful as they saw themselves in their "youth," they mused about how they had "grown up so fast." When one pizza asked if the other was crying, the second replied, "No, it's the onion."

VF ROLLS OUT PIZZAS FOR EMPLOYEES

When VF Corporation, makers of such apparel brands as Lee and Wrangler, found that there was a communications gap between the home office and company employees, it put some dough into solving the problem—pizza dough, that is.

Workforce reported in December 1998 that, according to research done the previous year, employees lacked knowledge of the VF brands, the role of the parent company, and the extent of its operations. In response VF decided to have 15,000 Little Caesars pizzas delivered on the same day to 40,000 employees at 185 plants and offices around the United States.

For trivia buffs: making the pizzas required some five tons of tomatoes, six tons of flour, and enough cheese to fill 34 bathtubs. It took the equivalent of 2,000 hours, or 83 days, to cook the pizzas. If the pepperoni from the pizzas were laid end to end, it would have traversed the length of 125 football fields. The pizzas placed together on the ground would have covered half an acre.

While Workforce did not report how much the national pizza party cost, the magazine described it as "a drop in the bucket when you consider VF's 1997 sales totaled $5.2 billion."

In a company press release Topolewski said, "Pairing light-hearted, entertaining copy, with virtually 30-seconds of product, the ads clearly make the pizza the focal point and reinforces the quality product. Additionally, using the talking pizzas throughout all communications will create a synergistic message to consumers that Little Caesars is committed to maintaining its value and quality position in the marketplace."

Although the emphasis was on quality, the new commercials continued to offer value in a promotion of two 12-inch pizzas with up to three toppings for $10.99. Direct-mail advertising supported the television campaign by offering a money-back guarantee with the new slogan "If it's not right, we'll take the bite!" The direct-mail advertising focused on the pizza's ingredients and the fact that the company still used its "authentic 1959 recipe." The money-back guarantee was not part of the television spots according to company spokesperson Sherbow because it was feared that it would obscure the message on product quality.

OUTCOME

According to company vice chairman Denise Ilitch, Little Caesars' sales rose during September and October of 1998. In November, however, USA Today described consumer response to the "Talking Pizzas" campaign as "tepid." According to an Ad Track poll, only 12 percent said that they liked the campaign "a lot," compared with an Ad Track average of 21 percent. Fifteen percent of men liked the ads, compared with 9 percent of women, and no one liked it as much as the previous year's campaign. According to the poll, 24 percent of consumers liked the Freeman commercials featuring sight gags about product size. More people thought that the Freeman ads were likeable rather than effective, however. The Bozell commercials, on the other hand, produced the opposite reaction, with 13 percent of consumers stating that they thought the ads were effective.

Reaction from advertising industry critics to the new campaign was not overwhelmingly favorable. Denise Gellene wrote in the Los Angeles Times that making the pizzas so prominent in the advertising "might be a mistake. The pizzas . . . look fairly ordinary, raising questions about what makes Little Caesars special." Garfield of Advertising Age disagreed with the company's description of the dialogue in "Mutual Admiration" as "clever banter," comparing it instead to "cheesy imitations of Frank and Louie, right up to the New Yawk accent." Garfield was kinder to "Home Movie," calling the dialogue "more charming and witty . . . but still not exactly laugh-out-loud delightful." While he acknowledged that the ads did "make the pizzas look tempting," Garfield cautioned that "now that Little Caesars has opened the quality issue, it had better be prepared to deal with the consequences if the reality in the box doesn't match the pictures on the tube."

FURTHER READING

Benezra, Karen. "Caesars' Fall." Brandweek, January 26, 1998, pp. 21-25.

———. "Pizza Parting." Brandweek, February 23, 1998, p. 1.

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "Pizza, Pizza: Little Caesar Ad Campaign Focuses on Product." Nation's Restaurant News, September 14, 1998.

Garfield, Bob. "Caesars' Pizza Patter Doesn't Really Cut It." Advertising Age, September 7, 1998.

Gazdik, Tanya. "Pizza Work to Fatten Bozell Staff." Adweek (Midwest Edition), April 6, 1998, p. 6.

Gellene, Denise. "Advertising & Marketing Ad Reviews." Los Angeles Times (Home Edition), September 17, 1998, p. D6.

Kosdrosky, Terry. "Let's Talk Pizza: Quality Is New Caesar Pitch; Franchisees Wary." Crain's Detroit Business, September 21, 1998, p. 1.

"Little Caesars Ads Aim for Pizza Lust." USA Today, November 16, 1998.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Defend This?" Adweek (Eastern Edition), February 23, 1998, p. 3.

Petrecca, Laura, and Louise Kramer. "Little Caesars Calls Review; Freeman Out." Advertising Age, February 23, 1998, p. 1.

Teegardin, Carol. "Little Caesar's Tries to Reverse Sliding Pizza Sales." Detroit Free Press, October 16, 1998.

Zuber, Amy. "Pizza Hut-vs.-Papa John's Battle Signals Intensifying War among Segment Leaders." Nation's Restaurant News, June 22, 1998, p. 114.

Debbi Mack

Logitech International S.A.

Moulin du Choc
Vaud
CH-1122 Romanel-sur-Morges
Switzerland
Web site: www.logitech.com

■■■

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITH ALL THAT FREEDOM? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For many years Logitech International S.A. was well known among personal computer manufacturers, which bundled the company's computer mice with their machines, but to the general public Logitech was little known. Increasingly Logitech sought to build up its own brand identity as it tried to sell more upscale mice and keyboards under its own name rather than the brand of original equipment manufacturers (OEMs). Cordless mice and keyboards were ideal categories to pursue, and Logitech became the clear-cut industry leader. In the early 2000s Logitech needed to protect its franchise, threatened in particular by Microsoft. It also wanted to promote cordless products with a wider market. Hence in the autumn of 2003 it launched the "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" marketing campaign.

The new campaign, created with ad agency Collaborate of San Francisco, featured the first television commercials in Logitech's history. The three 30-second spots in the $10 million campaign portrayed humorous situations in which people struggled with wired mice and keyboards and then discovered the freedom that came with cordless peripherals. The campaign also featured print ads that relied on images from the television commercials. In addition the "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign included in-store promotions and online elements.

Logitech succeeded in increasing awareness of its cordless products, preparing the ground for the introduction of less expensive products in this category in 2004. Sales grew at a rapid pace, and cordless products became a major sales driver for Logitech. The "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, which ran into 2004, also won a prestigious Effie award in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Logitech was founded in 1981 by Stanford University classmates Pierluigi Zappacosta, born in Italy, and Daniel Borel, born in Switzerland, with the mission to design an electronic typesetting system. They soon learned about a Swiss watch-parts manufacturer that had developed a new computer mouse, which at the time was little more than a curiosity since communicating with a computer was commonly accomplished with a keyboard alone. Although the mouse was originally invented in 1964 for use in a graphical interface with computers, there was no market for such a device until the rise of the personal computer industry and Apple Computer introduced a user-friendly graphical interface. Zappacosta and Borel licensed the U.S. rights to the Swiss mouse and began selling mice to Apple for sale with their computers. The introduction of Microsoft's Windows operating system then opened up the market for Logitech to sell mice for IBM-compatible computers as well.

By the mid-1990s 17 of the top 20 computer companies were bundling Logitech mice with their systems, but few consumers were aware of the brand. Sales reached a plateau, earnings sagged, and Logitech was in danger of becoming a one-trick company. The company changed its fortunes in 1997 with the hiring of a new chief executive officer, Geurrino De Luca, who had served as the head of Apple's worldwide marketing. Logitech had always possessed top-notch engineering skills; it now had the marketing savvy to build the brand. De Luca recognized not only that PCs were becoming consumer-oriented appliances but that Logitech had to establish brand awareness with a mass audience. He pushed the company into the development of cordless input devices. "New generations of keyboards and remote controls will replace the mouse in the living room," he told David Einstein of the San Francisco Chronicle. "DVD and interactive digital TV will be integrated into the home computer, and this will create the need to have remote control functionality in the keyboard or in other types of control devices." Einstein added, "With that in mind, Logitech is putting a lot of effort into cordless mice, which can be used to control a PC from across the living room."

Logitech enjoyed a resurgence in the late 1990s, but as the new century dawned it faced the challenge of larger competitors, in particular Microsoft, looking to chip away at Logitech's core franchise of mice and keyboards. In 2002 the company conducted a search for a new advertising agency to launch a marketing push to ward off these challenges. It hired a small San Francisco shop called Collaborate, which had experience in promoting consumer products as well as computers.

TARGET MARKET

Logitech's target market had shifted over the years. Originally the company sold most of its mice to OEMs, which bundled the product with their PCs. In the 1980s a limited number of general consumers were willing to buy PCs, which still carried a high price tag, so sales came mostly from business customers. As prices came down, computers became easier to use, and the rise of the Internet provided further incentive to buy a PC for the home, the industry focus shifted to more of a mass market for both computer makers and providers of peripherals. Logitech sold most of its products to OEMs, but it also sold replacement and upscale items through retailers. These items were pitched toward consumers with more disposable income, people willing to pay more for sleek-looking, high-tech mice or keyboards. The "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign promoted Logitech's latest high-tech products, cordless mice and keyboards. Although the company hoped these would become mainstream items in time, the campaign targeted consumers more likely to buy the products at the time of the campaign: adults aged 25 to 54 with incomes of at least $75,000.

REMOTE POSSIBILITIES

Logitech's cordless mice and keyboards relied on radio-frequency technology. Unlike the competing infrared technology, which required a clear line of sight and had a range of about 30 feet, radio waves could penetrate walls and had a range of 150 feet. To prevent interference from typical cordless household telephones, which operated at a frequency of 900 megahertz, Logitech's cordless mice and keyboards operated at another part of the radio frequency spectrum, at 27 megahertz.

COMPETITION

In the 2000s people began to hold on to their computers longer, opting to buy peripherals to make them more versatile and useful. As a result competition for this business increased, expanding beyond the computer industry to include consumer electronics companies like Creative Technology and Philips Electronics. By building brand awareness Logitech was able to move beyond computer mice, keyboards, and joysticks (a product added for game players) to add speakers, headsets, microphones, and computer cameras. But Logitech's core products remained mice and keyboards, and it became the undisputed leader in wireless mice and keyboards. A major factor in hiring Collaborate was to protect this franchise and ward off giant Microsoft, which had decided to make a push on the computer component category by redesigning its products and becoming more aggressive in its marketing. Logitech was also threatened by smaller competition including Acer Inc. and Fujitsu Ltd., which were making strong bids to take away market share in the cordless category.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Because wireless products offered a higher profit and were the future of the category, Logitech, after a strategic review with Collaborate, chose to promote them as a way to drive sales in the "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, which was budgeted at $10 million. The goal

TALE OF THE TAIL

The prototype of the computer mouse was made by Douglas C. Engelbart in 1964. In 1970 he received a patent on his ''X-Y Position Indicator for a Display System'' device, which was little more than a wooden shell with two metal wheels inside. Because a wire came out one end and looked like a tail, Engelbart nicknamed it a mouse.

was to convince the target audience to upgrade its traditional wired mouse and keyboard. The marketers decided to use humor to portray people in real-life (albeit exaggerated) situations in which mouse and keyboard cords got in the way and then to present the Logitech solution. Because the products were cord free, the idea of freedom became the core of the campaign, leading to the theme ''What Will You Do With All That freedom?''

For the first time in its history, Logitech produced television commercials to anchor a campaign. ''Until now, we've focused on channel promotion and advertising in vertical print and online media,'' commented Robin Selden, the company's vice president of marketing, in a press release announcing the launch of the new marketing effort. ''What we've found, however, is that television is the ideal medium for this campaign, because sight, sound, motion and emotion help convey the benefits of our cordless products—and because it's time to reach out to a broader audience.''

The ''What Will You Do With All That Freedom?'' campaign featured three 30-second television spots, which were unveiled on ABC's Monday Night Football on September 8, 2003. The one called ''Multi-Tasker'' showed a woman in an office trying to take a phone order while working on more than one computer workstation using wired mice and keyboards. Unfortunately a cat tried to play with a computer mouse, forcing the woman to try to move the cat while balancing the keyboard on her lap. She dropped the telephone, presumably losing a sale. On-screen text read, ''Make multi-tasking less taxing.'' A voice-over common to all three spots declared, ''The Logitech cordless keyboard and mouse. No cords to tie you up, slow you down or hold you back.'' The spot then showed the woman's work area refitted with wireless products, freeing her to wheel across the office floor—and accidentally run over the cat.

A second spot, ''Lounge Chair,'' showed a man struggling to move a leather lounge chair into place. On-screen appeared the text ''Comfort is a very relative thing.'' The humorous conclusion of the commercial, accompanied by the voice-over, was the sight of the man working his computer from across the room, where he had a wireless keyboard on his lap and a wireless mouse on the padded arm.

The last of the three spots, ''Coffee Cup,'' showed a man working on his home computer but having trouble with his mouse, the cord of which had been knotted up and shortened. Because he could not pull the mouse into position, he spilled his paperwork, unintentionally highlighted text on his screen, and ultimately knocked over his cup of coffee. The complementary text read, ''Don't tangle with your mouse.'' The kicker to the spot was the man putting his feet on his desk to happily work with a wireless keyboard on his lap—only to spill his coffee anyway.

The print element of the ''What Will You Do With All That Freedom?'' campaign drew on images from the television spots. For example, the man from ''Coffee Cup'' was shown in the print ad surrounded by a vast number of coffee mugs, along with the copy ''Go ahead, live dangerously.'' Featured in another print ad was the man from ''Lounge Chair.'' Looking quite comfortable in his T-shirt and pajamas, he used a wireless mouse and keyboard to operate his computer from his recliner. The print ads appeared in mainstream publications, such as Time, Newsweek, Sports Illustrated, and BusinessWeek, as well as in major newspapers.

The ''What Will You Do With All That Freedom?'' campaign also included direct mail, in-store promotions, and Internet elements. It ran into 2004. In a complementary effort for the holiday season, Logitech launched a print campaign in 22 European countries and also took steps to beef up and integrate its marketing in the Asia-Pacific region.

OUTCOME

The ''What Will You Do With All That Freedom?'' campaign succeeded in building awareness of Logitech's cordless products and set the stage for the introduction of new products in the category. In March 2004 Logitech began selling a new line of less expensive cordless mice and keyboards, tailored for the wider market targeted by the campaign. The one-time province of ''early adopters,'' wireless devices were becoming a more mainstream peripheral and an important driver for Logitech's future growth. According to market research only 8 percent of the more than 250 million home PCs installed globally in 2003 used cordless mice and keyboards, providing Logitech with a large future sales opportunity. In fiscal 2005, for instance, Logitech reported that the sale of cordless mice had jumped by 69 percent over the previous year. The "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign was also successful creatively. It won the silver in the Computer Peripherals for Business/Personal Purposes category, presented by the New York American Marketing Association to honor creative achievement in the advertising industry.

FURTHER READING

"Collaborate Goes Free with Logitech." Shoot, November 28, 2003, p. 18.

Einstein, David. "Building a Better Mouse." San Francisco Chronicle, August 12, 1997, p. C1.

Flass, Rebecca. "Logitech Opts for TV's Motion and Emotion." Adweek, September 5, 2003.

Hall, William. "Logitech Proves No Mouse among Men." Financial Times, January 6, 2003, p. 15.

"Logitech Launches a New Television Ad as Part of Its $10 Million Campaign." Advertising Age, September 8, 2003, p. 93.

Murphy, Kate. "Cutting All the Cords: New Gadgets Let Your Computer Shed Its Wires." BusinessWeek, February 12, 2001, p. 100E1.

Norton, Justin M. "Logitech Review Narrowed to 4." Adweek (western ed.), October 7, 2002, p. 6.

———. "Logitech Taps Collaborate to Tout PC Components." Adweek, November 4, 2002, p. 4.

"Of Mice and Men." Economist, July 7, 1990, p. 69.

Rothman, Matt. "Logitech Inc.: Humanizing the Computer." California Business, February 1991, p. 9.

Saito-Chung, David. "PC Device Firm Grows Faster Than PC Makers." Investor's Business Daily, July 19, 2002, p. B08.

Ed Dinger

Lycos, Inc.

100 5th Ave.
Waltham, Massachusetts 02451
USA
Telephone: (781) 370-2700
Fax: (781) 370-3415
Web site: www.lycos.com

■■■

GO GET IT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Lycos, Inc. was founded in June 1995 and quickly grew into a vast Internet hub with services that included a search engine, comprehensive directories, personal home pages, E-mail, communities, and shopping functions. To help spur its growth, the company hired New York agency Bozell Worldwide to create an advertising campaign. The "Go Get It" campaign, which had the goal of attracting both new and experienced Internet users to visit Lycos.com, made its debut in November 1998 and continued into 1999. The $25 million campaign included television and print advertising.

In "Quick and Easy," the only 30-second spot in the campaign, a man showed a drawing to a black retriever and shouted, "Lycos, go get it!" The dog zoomed off and quickly returned with a frogman's flippers. The man showed Lycos another drawing, and this time he returned pulling a yellow sports car with his teeth. The voice-over said, "Unleash the new Lycos, and the Internet is at your command. So no matter what you're looking to retrieve, Lycos will hunt it down quicker and easier." In the final scene Lycos was shown a picture of fashion model Claudia Schiffer. The dog streaked off again, and viewers heard the voice of a woman saying, "Hi, I'm Claudia," as the Lycos logo appeared with its search button labeled "Go Get It."

The campaign included a 15-second version of "Quick and Easy" and two additional 15-second spots. In "Dinosaur" Lycos sped off in a black streak and returned with the skeleton of a dinosaur. A computer showed the Lycos search engine screen with the word "dinosaur" in the window. After the word changed to "investments," the spot ended with the company logo and search command key. The viewer heard the sound of coins and a voice saying, "Jackpot!" The other spot, "Earthquake," showed Lycos coming back apparently without anything until the scene shook, a rumble was heard, and a switch to the search engine screen revealed that the word being searched for was "earthquake." Next the word changed to "hockey," and the spot concluded with sounds of a stadium crowd and the voice-over saying, "Nice shot!"

A full-page print ad showed a stylized version of the dog, with one paw help up in an attentive, here-to-serve-you pose. Below appeared the headline "Now the fastest retriever in cyberspace." The ad copy read, "No matter what you're searching for on the Internet, from biographies to body piercing, you'll find it faster and easier when you unleash the new Lycos. All you have to do is log on to the Internet and say, 'Lycos, Go get it!' " The ad ended with the company logo, website address, and yellow search command key with the words "Go Get It!" in blue.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Jan Robert Horsfall, vice president of marketing for Lycos, said that the name came from a Latin word for a particular type of spider. Unlike most spiders, this one did not use a web to trap prey but instead left its web to hunt. The spider's unique approach and its aggressiveness fit the Lycos style.

Lycos's Labrador Retriever from the "Go Get It" campaign. BOZELL. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

In 1995 Lycos became one of the first companies to provide in-depth search services on the World Wide Web. Lycos became a publicly traded company on Nasdaq just 10 months after it was founded, making it the youngest company ever to go public. To grow, the company decided to expand by offering full services, with the aim of becoming one of the major destinations on the Web.

In early 1998 only 20 percent of Web users visited Lycos, but by the end of 1998 it was one of the most popular hubs on the Internet. A major reason for the growth was that Lycos bought up a stable of Internet properties. By 1999 it had built a network of linked sites that included Tripod, WhoWhere, Angelfire, MailCity,

RISE AND FALL

A Lycos news release in June 1999 showed that the audience for the portal had grown dramatically during the period from May 1998 to May 1999. Lycos had grown in audience reach from 39.4 to 48.4, an increase of almost 23 percent. Even though it remained the largest portal, the audience reach for Yahoo! had decreased 4.5 percent, from 53 to 50.6. Excite had an even more dramatic drop, of 16 percent, in audience reach, from 33.1 to 27.8.

HotBot, HotWired, Wired News, Webmonkey, Suck.com, and MyTime.com. Lycos had evolved from a search engine into an Internet hub that people could use not just to find something but also to chat, shop, send and receive E-mail, get news, and more.

TARGET MARKET

"Go Get It" aimed to attract both people who were new to the Internet and those who used other search engines. It also sought people who had not used the Internet but were considering doing so. Lycos kept an eye on category leader Yahoo! and, as it gained audience size and market share, was quick to compare itself to the larger company.

COMPETITION

In April 1996 Yahoo! launched its "Do You Yahoo!?" campaign in the New York, San Francisco, and Los Angeles markets. The $5 million television, radio and print campaign first aired on TV programs such as Saturday Night Live, Star Trek, Seinfeld, The X-Files, and Late Night with David Letterman. "Do You Yahoo!?" sought to convey both the benefits of getting on the Web and the irreverence and fun of the Yahoo! service. A 1997 spot, for example, poked fun at a young man's attempts to cover his baldness with a few remaining, lonely strands of hair. After conducting an Internet search, he was shown confidently bouncing down a busy street and turning heads with a bushy, three-foot-high Afro. Through 1998 Yahoo! remained the category leader, with the most recognized name and highly valued property on the Internet.

In July 1998 the NBC-owned portal Snap! began a campaign with the tag line "Don't suffer from information overload. Snap! out of it." One Snap! ad centered on a hearing-impaired boy who signed good-bye to his mother as he boarded the school bus. A classmate who witnessed the incident went on-line to look up sign language, and the next day he introduced himself using the signs he had learned on the Web.

Another competitor, Excite, which boasted strong search features, was the Web page for buyers of Dell computers. In October 1996 Excite introduced a $10 million campaign from Foote, Cone & Belding that featured the Jimi Hendrix song "Are You Experienced?" In December 1998 Excite premiered a new network and cable television campaign. Six 30-second ads showed people botching common activities in embarrassing, humorous ways. One spot told viewers that the woman pictured could send photographs to friends around the world using Excite. She then walked through a screen door she had just closed. In another spot a man was all thumbs as he installed an air conditioner, only to watch it plummet from his window. The spots ended with the suggestion that, if these people can use Excite, "you can too."

By 1998 the competition for Lycos had broadened beyond other search engines and portals to include major on-line services such as America Online (AOL) and Microsoft. The latter was spending $61 million on television ads built around the theme "Where do you want to go today?" Trying to outduel Microsoft, AOL spent $66 million on television advertising. AOL, with billions in Internet user fees, 15 million subscribers, and the longest track record as a content aggregator, had distinct advantages.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Lycos positioned itself as a network. Its mantra was that users could go to Lycos and find anything they wanted. The company differed from Yahoo! in that it did not put all of its properties under the same brand identity. Instead, Lycos built a system of distinct yet interrelated Internet services. According to an article in the Boston Globe, Lycos chief executive Bob Davis credited this cross-linking of sites for much of the company's rapid growth. Bo Peabody, a Lycos vice president and founder of the Internet community site Tripod, said, "We decided the best way to catch Yahoo! was to pursue a network of branded sites, rather than one megasite." The theory was to get people to use Lycos for its search capabilities and then to keep them there for the free Web pages. "This is the whole point about multiple brands. We don't care if we lose the user if they come to someplace we own," said Peabody.

Every Lycos site had links to the others woven into its fabric. From anywhere in the network a person could search the Lycos index. At the bottom of every Lycos search page viewers had the choice to run the same search on HotBot, another Lycos property that appealed to more experienced surfers. Viewers could not miss the many offers to sign up for free E-mail, do on-line shopping, look up phone numbers, or explore another Lycos service.

The company cast its net even wider and broke a written rule that portals only hosted, and did not develop, stores. In December 1998 it launched the Lycos store. This megastore offered a broad selection of consumer items from more than 200 brand name retailers, making Lycos the first major portal site selling directly to consumers.

The wide range of services helped make the "Go Get It" refrain ring true. In the "Go Get It" ads the black Labrador retriever named Lycos found anything the user was looking for and did so at speeds that made the search fun and easy. An earlier campaign had starred a Sherpa mountain guide, but Lycos decided that Sherpas were associated with dangerous situations. Danger might have been appropriate in the early days of the Web, when many users were concerned about getting lost and confused, but by 1998 people no longer viewed the Internet as a forbidding place. Lycos had considered using a bloodhound in the campaign, but focus groups showed that speed and friendliness were not considered traits of a bloodhound.

It was finally decided that a Labrador retriever gave the essential image—friendly, lively, fast, and great at going and getting what the master wanted. "I was worried initially about the dog," said Horsfall in USA Today. "You can bore people by using metaphors that are too basic. But from the first day the ad started airing, feedback has been overwhelmingly positive. It has given our brand real personality."

Speed, completeness, and fun rang through each spot. The dog found things fast. The items retrieved varied widely, from swimming flippers to investments to hockey to earthquakes. And the humor was evident. After retrieving the swimming gear, for example, the dog paused to shake the water out of his coat. At another point the dog appeared confused until the man realized that the drawing he was showing Lycos was upside down.

The basic theme of the campaign was to show people that there was more on the Web than they realized. Lycos tied the ads and its site together by using its search command key (yellow with the words "Go Get It" in blue) as the campaign tag line and as a signature element in all of the spots.

OUTCOME

In November 1998 Business Wire called Lycos's jump in audience reach (percentage of Internet users who touched down on the site) "unparalleled." A week after the campaign launch, Lycos experienced a 41 percent increase in traffic on its home page. Two months into the campaign Davis said that about 50,000 people were signing up for various Lycos Internet services every day, compared with a few hundred a day in early 1998. Lycos attributed much of the increase to the advertising campaign. USA Today, for example, reported that the first commercial was popular with consumers, with 22 percent of people who had seen it several times saying that they liked it "a lot."

On May 18, 1999, Lycos reported that revenues for the preceding quarter had been $35.1 million. This was a 132 percent increase over the comparable period from the previous fiscal year and a 15 percent increase over the quarter ending January 31, 1999.

FURTHER READING

Bray, Hiawatha. "Eyes Are the Prize: For Now a Transformed Lycos Looks to Boost Its Profile Not Profits, As It Seeks to Become a Destination for Net Users." Boston Globe, January 17, 1999, p. H1.

"Lycos Network Audience Reach Soars to 44.5%." Business Wire, November 18, 1998.

"The Lycos Network Launches First-of-a-Kind Program to Distribute Its Traffic-Building Services." Business Wire, December 13, 1998.

Reidy, Chris. "Lycos Unleashes $25 Million Ad Campaign." Boston Globe, November 2, 1998, p. B8.

Sparta, Christine. "Lovable Lab Takes Lycos Places." USA Today, May 3, 1999, p. B11.

Chris John Amorosino

Mail Boxes Etc., Inc.

6060 Cornerstone Ct., W
San Diego, California 92121-3795
USA
Telephone: (619) 455-8800
Fax: (619) 546-7488
Web site: www.mbe.com

■■■

SEE YOUR SMALL BUSINESS ON THE SUPER BOWL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mail Boxes Etc., Inc. (MBE), a network of franchise centers that provided products and services for small businesses, generated widespread excitement among its primary customers by offering them a chance to win a free television commercial in the ''See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl'' campaign. Entrepreneurs were asked to write a brief essay describing their businesses and explaining what they would like to tell the public in a national television commercial. From thousands of entries Mail Boxes Etc. selected semifinalists, announced a smaller group of finalists several weeks later, and then named the winner a few weeks before the Super Bowl. Mail Boxes Etc. paid more than $1 million for a 30-second commercial during the Super Bowl and gave the spot to the winner of the contest. The campaign allowed the company to demonstrate its dedication to the small businesses that made up the bulk of its clientele. Through news releases, promotions at Mail Boxes Etc. outlets, and word of mouth, the ''See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl'' campaign generated publicity for months before and after the single airing of the winner's commercial. The campaign was handled by Kenneth C. Smith Advertising. It was launched in 1997 and was still running in 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

''Making Business Easier. Worldwide,'' was the corporate slogan for Mail Boxes Etc., a company that provided one-stop business, communication, and postal services in convenient locations such as shopping centers and commercial complexes. The typical Mail Boxes Etc. center was an independently owned and operated franchise where customers could make black-and-white or color photocopies, send and receive fax transmissions, transfer money, purchase office supplies, have documents notarized, have passport photographs taken, use computer workstations, rent mailboxes, have items packaged and shipped, and receive packages delivered by companies such as United Parcel Service of America, Inc. (UPS). The firm had begun in 1980 when Anthony DeSio opened a small business where customers could rent mailboxes and buy postage stamps. The company soon began offering voice mail and other services for customers with home offices and small businesses, and within one year it sold its first franchise. Mail Boxes Etc. had 1,000 franchises in operation by 1990, double that number by 1993, and more than 3,700 by 1998, making it the largest operation of its type in the world. In November 1997 Mail Boxes Etc. became a subsidiary of U.S. Office Products Company, a firm that provided business services, office supplies, office furniture, and break-room products such as coffee to corporations, schools, and other organizations.

Early advertising for Mail Boxes Etc. included only sporadic use of television, but by 1996 the company was spending about $12 million annually for national television commercials. The tag line for most of its ads that year was, "It's not what we do, it's how we do it." A holiday campaign launched in November 1996 carried the tag line, "If you can dream it up, we can pack it up and get it there." Those television commercials emphasized that Mail Boxes Etc. could handle packages of any size or shape. Earlier in the year, during the Super Bowl, Mail Boxes Etc. had run a $1.2 million television commercial that featured the Oscar Mayer "Wienermobile," a 27-foot-long vehicle shaped like a frankfurter. The Wienermobile's driver was depicted as the "ultimate road warrior," a customer who depended on Mail Boxes Etc. to provide services that a business owner needed while making frequent trips. During the Super Bowl in January 1997 the company ran a pleasant television commercial that showed a seaplane charter service making photocopies, sending fax transmissions, and shipping salmon at a Mail Boxes Etc. franchise in an isolated Alaskan community. For the next Super Bowl the company emphasized its commitment to small business by giving its television commercial to one of its customers in the "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign.

THE AMERICAN DREAM

In November 1998 Mitch and Tracey Spence of Windsor, Wisconsin, won $50,000 when they mailed a package at a Mail Boxes Etc. (MBE) franchise and were given a scratch-off game card. They used the cash as down payment on a home. The owner of the Mail Boxes Etc. location commented: "It is such a thrill to be a part of this. I opened this MBE center about seven years ago, and it is really remarkable to be able to give something like this back to one of my customers. It's not every day that you help someone realize the American dream of owning a home." Among 7.5 million cards that Mail Boxes Etc. distributed during the promotion, the Spences' was the only one that awarded the bearer $50,000 in cash. Other customers won prizes such as free photocopies, a laptop computer, and a Hawaiian vacation.

TARGET MARKET

The "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" contest was open to U.S. companies with no more than 20 workers, self-employed entrepreneurs, and independent contractors who worked at home or in small offices. In a news release the company's president and chief executive officer, James Amos, said, "Mail Boxes Etc. is committed to serving the small-business market, and we wanted to demonstrate our dedication by featuring a small business during our commercial." In another news release Amos said: "Entrepreneurs . . . work long and hard to realize their dreams of owning a business. Small-business people are succeeding in every town in America. Their ambition and commitment deserve to be showcased on the Super Bowl, alongside commercials from some of the biggest companies in the world."

During the 1990s the number of small firms and home-based businesses in the United States increased rapidly. These consumers appreciated the convenience of a one-stop center where they could purchase office supplies, mail letters and packages, and use photocopy machines and other equipment that they did not have in their own offices. Many patrons used Mail Boxes Etc. to conduct business while they were away from home. In addition to its franchise outlets the company operated MBE Business Express centers in four major hotel chains for the convenience of business travelers. These unstaffed self-service centers—activated by the swipe of a credit card—featured photocopy machines, fax machines, computer workstations, Internet connections, and E-mail capabilities. Customers could also call a nearby Mail Boxes Etc. outlet from the business center to arrange for binding, packing, shipping, and other projects. In September 1998 Mail Boxes Etc. introduced MBE Online, an Internet site designed to help small-business owners with sales and marketing, business opportunities, human resources and management, professional and personal development, and strategies for investing money and retiring from a career. The package of services was intended to help entrepreneurs compete in the global marketplace.

COMPETITION

Mail Boxes Etc. dominated the business-services category. It competed with mail and parcel center franchise networks such as Pak Mail, Parcel Plus, PostNet, and Postal Annex+in addition to copy-service stores and office-supply stores. Companies that delivered letters and packages competed with Mail Boxes Etc. but sometimes also formed cooperative agreements with it. One of the nation's largest postal operations was the United States Postal Service, an independent government agency that reported sales of $60 billion in 1998. Mail and packages that customers brought to Mail Boxes Etc. outlets were transferred to the Postal Service or another carrier for delivery. Mail Boxes Etc. served as a drop-off point for UPS, one of the leading carriers. In 1998 UPS reported sales of $25 billion. Mail Boxes Etc. offered express shipping services through an agreement with another large transportation company, Federal Express Corporation (FedEx). For the fiscal year ended May 31, 1998, FedEx had revenues of $13.3 billion.

A primary rival for Mail Boxes Etc. was Kinko's, Inc., a network of business service centers with estimated sales totaling $1 billion in 1998. Kinko's had started by providing self-service photocopy machines to the public but had expanded into package mailing, binding and finishing, custom printing, computer rentals, and other business services. A large percentage of its customers operated small or home-based businesses. Kinko's installed high-speed Internet connections at its outlets and in 1997 formed a partnership with Microsoft Corporation's Hotmail to begin offering E-mail and communications services via the World Wide Web. Access to the Internet was included in the $12-an-hour fee that the company charged to use its computer workstations. The new service was publicized via online advertising, direct mailings to 300,000 customers, screen savers on computers at Kinko's centers, and promotional materials in Kinko's stores. The firm's general advertising slogan, "The new way to office," was introduced during the Super Bowl in 1996 and ran through 1998. The $20 million campaign was intended to emphasize the company's technological capabilities and to depict Kinko's as the best one-stop business center for consumers in the age of "virtual" offices.

Another major competitor, TRM Corporation, operated more than 33,000 TRM Copy Centers in outlets such as drug stores, hardware stores, convenience stores, gift shops, and stationery shops. Each TRM center featured a self-service photocopy machine, a machine stand, and promotional signs. TRM had sales of $57 million in 1998. In addition to photocopy centers Mail Boxes Etc. competed with office-supply stores, which often featured self-service photocopiers and other business equipment. One of the largest was Staples, Inc., which sold everything from pens and paper to telephones, computers, and software. Its humorous and popular "Yeah, We've Got That" advertising campaign, aimed at small-business owners and the general public, began airing on national television and occasionally on the radio in 1997 and continued into 1998. It was the second largest office supply store in North America that year, behind Office Depot, Inc., and ahead of OfficeMax, Inc.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign, owners of small businesses throughout the United States were invited to describe in no more than 100 words how their operations showed the entrepreneurial spirit, why they should appear in a Mail Boxes Etc. commercial, and what they would say about their businesses to Super Bowl viewers. Entry forms were available at Mail Boxes Etc. franchises and at the company's Internet site. For the 1997-98 contest each of three finalists received $1,000, while the winner received a 30-second commercial and an additional $10,000. For the 1998-99 contest the second and third place winners received $2,000 each, while the first place winner received $5,000 and a free commercial. In 1998 Mail Boxes Etc. budgeted $16 million for advertising, according to Adweek. The company also used news releases and media coverage to generate excitement among entrepreneurs as the sweepstakes progressed. "On Super Bowl Sunday, during the big game, after a grand half-time show, in front of a huge audience, and among commercials for some of the largest corporations in the world, a monumental event will occur for one very small business," said one news release.

From several thousand contestants who entered the sweepstakes during September and October of 1997, 10 semifinalists were filmed in mini-commercials as part of the screening process, and three finalists were selected in early January 1998. The first made unique dog carriers; the second made customized bicycles; and the third made pocket-size air pumps that could be used to inflate basketballs, the liners of football helmets, and other sporting equipment in locations such as playing fields, parks, and beaches. The winner, Pocket Pumps, was announced on January 21, 1998, at the Super Bowl media party hosted by Mail Boxes Etc. at Sea World California. Robert Lange and Charles Davey, the owners of Pocket Pumps, appeared in the $1.3 million television commercial within a commercial during the Super Bowl on January 25, displaying their hand-held, squeeze-action air pump. In addition to demonstrating how the pump could inflate sports balls, the ad used trick photography to show the pump inflating and deflating Davey's head. The spot was produced on a low budget but was seen by an estimated 140 million viewers at a particularly exciting moment in the third quarter of the game. "It may be the biggest advertising touchdown any small business has ever scored," a news release noted. "Pocket Pump may also claim the unofficial title of 'Smallest Business to Advertise on the Super Bowl.' "

During the spring of 1998 other press releases tracked the progress of Pocket Pumps after the airing of the commercial, and the continued media exposure maintained public interest in the sweepstakes. Mail Boxes Etc. followed with the "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl Search II" from August 1 through October 15. Twenty semifinalists were selected in November, 10 finalists were announced in December, and Jeremy's MicroBatch Ice Creams was named the winner on January 11, 1999. The home-based enterprise was owned by Jeremy Kraus, a 22-year-old entrepreneur who had used a mailbox at Mail Boxes Etc. as his business address when he sold ice cream during his years as a student at the University of Pennsylvania. Kraus wrote on his sweepstakes entry form: "Using MBE on the Penn campus made it possible for me to juggle school and my business. I am now my own boss, and heading a rapidly growing and delicious company." The $1.6 million commercial for Jeremy's MicroBatch Ice Creams aired during the second quarter of the Super Bowl on January 31. In conjunction with the second contest Mail Boxes Etc. also ran a national sweepstakes that awarded a trip for two to attend the Super Bowl game at Pro Player Stadium in Miami. The contest was not limited to owners of small businesses. The winner, announced in January 1999, was selected by random drawing from more than 18,000 entries. The prize included round-trip airfare, four days' and five nights' lodging, and tickets to the Super Bowl.

OUTCOME

Advertising Age called the "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign the best idea among all the commercials that ran during the Super Bowl in both 1998 and 1999. The first winner in the contest, Pocket Pump, had received about 10 telephone orders a day for its product before the commercial aired. After the Super Bowl the company's orders skyrocketed to more than 6,000 calls a day. Pocket Pump's revenues for the first quarter of 1998 were 150 percent higher than its total revenues for the previous year. When Pocket Pump donated $5,000 of its newfound wealth to a San Diego burn center in April 1998, Mail Boxes Etc. matched the donation, a gesture that generated news coverage in several publications. In 1997 Mail Boxes Etc. ranked eighth in Success magazine's "Top 200 Franchises." For several years Entrepreneur magazine listed Mail Boxes Etc. among the top 10 franchises of all kinds, and in 1997, 1998, and 1999 the magazine named Mail Boxes Etc. as the number-one postal and business service franchise.

FURTHER READING

Associated Press. "Advertisers Go Long in Super Bowl Spots." Chicago Sun-Times (Financial Section), December 9, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "High Voltage: A Shocking Development for the Budweiser Frogs: Bud Lizards Electrify Super Bowl Ads." Advertising Age, January 26, 1998.

———. "Super Bust: How Bad Were Bowl Ads? Best Starred Losing Candidate, Pigeons, Mosquito." Advertising Age, January 27, 1997.

Gantenbein, Barry. "Contest Can Give Small Business 30 Seconds of Fame." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (Business Section), October 13, 1997.

Goldfisher, Alastair. "Super Bowl Commercial up for Grabs." The Business Journal-San Jose, September 14, 1998.

Johnson, Christina S. "Local Entrepreneurs Pumped over Ad During Super Bowl." San Diego Daily Transcript, January 27, 1998.

"Mail Boxes Etc. Announces Second National Search for a Small Business to Feature on Super Bowl Commercial." Business Wire, August 3, 1998.

"Pocket Pump Named Winner in Mail Boxes Etc.'s 'See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl' Search: Small-Business Owners Featured in Mail Boxes Etc.'s Super Bowl Commercial." Business Wire, January 22, 1998.

"Super Bowl Ad Meter Results." USA Today, January 31, 1999.

"Ten Entrepreneurs Named Semi-Finalists in Mail Boxes Etc.'s 'See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl' Search." Business Wire, December 1, 1997.

Susan Risland

Malden Mills Industries, Inc.

46 Stafford Street
Lawrence, Massachusetts 01841
USA
Telephone: (978) 685-6341
Fax: (978) 975-2595
Web site: www.polartec.com

■■■

FORWARD FABRIC CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

From its inception in 1906, Malden Mills Industries, Inc., was a leading American textile company. The firm's Polartec brand all-season synthetic fabrics, which helped pave the way for high-tech textiles, found their way into clothing made by companies like Patagonia, Columbia, and North Face. Although a fire in late 1995 destroyed the company's headquarters and all of its machinery and corporate records, a rebuilding effort had the firm back on its feet by 1997. Company reports indicated that sales reached nearly $370 million in 1997, just slightly less than the $400 million in sales prior to the fire. But a $150 million debt, caused in part by the rebuilding effort, forced Malden Mills into bankruptcy in 2001. Two years later the company emerged from bankruptcy.

With the bankruptcy in its past, Malden Mills took a new approach to promoting its flagship product, Polartec fabrics. In 2005 the company's advertising agency, Nail Communications, based in Providence, Rhode Island, replaced a previous campaign that had no tagline but that focused on outdoor sports. The new international marketing campaign focused on the Polartec brand. The campaign, estimated to cost more than $10 million, included print and outdoor advertising, television spots, and campaign-specific websites. Its theme, ''Forward Fabric,'' was the first new tagline for the brand in more than five years.

The campaign was well received by the industry. Within weeks of the campaign's launch, Adweek published several articles praising the effort for its effectiveness and for being different from traditional advertising used by brands trying to connect with outdoor sports enthusiasts. In addition, the campaign reportedly received positive feedback from customers, such as Patagonia, that used Polartec fabrics in their garments.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Malden Mills, the textile company that became known for its Polartec all-season synthetic fabrics, had been founded in 1906 by Henry Feuerstein. In December 1995 a fire devastated the company. In addition to the 90-year-old building that housed the firm, all of the machinery used in its operations, along with the computer disks storing every textile design that had been created since the company's inception, also were lost. By June 1997, however, the company had rebuilt its facilities, and most of its 3,000 employees were back at work. But rebuilding the business was a greater challenge. Prior to the fire, the company had reported sales of about $400 million; in 1997 sales dropped to between $365 million and $370 million, according to a report in the Daily News Record. To establish an updated and a more fashionable image among consumers, Malden Mills shifted its advertising in 1997 away from special-interest publications to more mainstream and lifestyle magazines, such as Men's Health and Sports Illustrated. In addition, companies like Liz Claiborne and Polo agreed to include Polarfleece, an offshoot of Malden Mills' Polartec fabric, in their fall garment offerings.

Despite its efforts Malden Mills remained mired in a debt of more than $150 million, and in November 2001 the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Aaron Feuerstein, the company's chief operating officer and grandson of its founder, had spearheaded Malden Mills through the rebuilding following the fire, but he lost control of the firm after filing for bankruptcy. In 2004 Feuerstein resigned and was replaced by Michael Spillane. Despite fears that he was planning to close the business or move the operations offshore, the new chief operating officer forged ahead with the business. To make sure that the company's focus on high-tech fabrics was in the forefront of customers' minds, Spillane allocated more than $10 million in 2005 for a new advertising campaign to promote the Polartec brand. The campaign, which used the tagline ''Forward Fabric,'' was the first major advertising effort for the brand since 2000.

U.S. MILITARY PROTECTED WITH POLARTEC PRODUCTS

In 2000 Malden Mills entered into a $17 million, three-year contract with the U.S. military to provide Polartec fabrics for clothing made for members of the U.S. Marines. In the 2005 defense spending bill, the U.S. Congress approved $21 million to fund additional Polartec garments for American troops. The 2005 program was to include providing Polartec textiles for the Army Extended Cold Weather Clothing System, the Marine Corps Mountain Cold Weather Clothing and Equipment Program, and the Navy Air Warfare Center's Multi-Climate Protection System. Polartec textiles are also used to make garments for the U.S. Air Force and for Special Operations Forces.

TARGET MARKET

Alec Beckett, creative partner with Nail Communications, which handled the advertising for Polartec, said during an interview that marketing textiles to consumers was like marketing the chips used in a computer or the muffler on a new car. A connection must be made in the consumer's mind between the garment being bought and the fabric it was made with, just as, for example, a connection must be made between a computer and the chips inside. He compared Polartec to the Intel chips used in Dell computers. ''The idea of this campaign is to have consumers know Polartec is in it [the garment] so they want it, like when they buy a Dell computer because it has Intel inside,'' he explained. Customers might not fully understand the technology behind the fabric or the computer chip, but they understood that it was of good quality, which made them want to buy products that contained it.

Nate Simmons of Backbone Media, Malden Mills' public relations and marketing firm based in Carbondale, Colorado, further noted that the ''Forward Fabric'' campaign targeted active, outdoor enthusiasts of all ages. The advertising was designed to make athletes of any age and at any skill level aware of the ways in which the Polartec fabric in their garments could help make their activities more comfortable or could enhance their performance. He said that because of the campaign's launch in late fall, it particularly targeted skiers getting ready for the ski season.

Besides educating consumers about Polartec fabrics, the campaign also targeted clothing manufacturers by highlighting the brand's technological innovations. Beckett said, ''Polartec just makes the fabric, this advertising is aimed at the people who make the garments.''

COMPETITION

W.L. Gore & Associates, Inc., best known for Gore-Tex, a waterproof and windproof fabric used in garments preferred by white-water rafters and snow skiers, began to market its textiles directly to consumers as well as to manufactures in 1976. In 1989 Gore enhanced its marketing program when it gave financial backing to the participation of the American explorer Will Steger in the International Trans-Antarctica Expedition. This eight-month, 4,000-mile ski and dogsled journey across Antarctica served as the heart of the company's new promotional strategy. When the company signed a marketing deal with the Weather Channel in 2000, it shifted the promotion of Gore-Tex and of products made from the fabric back to average consumers. The agreement included having meteorologists and other members of the Weather Channel crew wear Gore-Tex shoes and outerwear during on-air broadcasts. Then, in 2002 the company launched a print and television campaign under the theme ''Comfort Is Where You Find It.'' This new advertising campaign featured people participating in a variety of activities while wearing garments made from Gore-Tex fabrics. Garments made of Gore-Tex, long a wardrobe staple of outdoorsy types, underwent a fashion makeover in 2004 when brands such as Polo RLX and London Fog began using the fabric in some of their outerwear and casual clothing.

Burlington Industries, Inc., another company known for its waterproof and oil-repellant fabrics, was on the lookout for new technologies to improve its textiles when, in 1998, it invested in a startup specialty chemical firm, NanoTex LLC. This company's scientists had developed several fabric treatments, including Nano-Care, which made fabric stain repellant, and Nano-Dry, which helped fabric wick moisture away from the skin. Burlington then licensed the NanoTex products for use by other textile mills and marketed what it called its "nanotechnology" directly to apparel brands and retailers. The company also undertook a consumer campaign, with ads in such magazines as Good Housekeeping. Despite efforts to expand its business, Burlington struggled financially, however. Burlington Worldwide was formed in 2001, but in December of that year the company, once the world's largest manufacturer of textiles, filed for bankruptcy protection. In 2003 WL Ross & Company acquired Burlington and Cone Mills, another bankrupt textile manufacturer. Ross then combined the two companies in 2004 to create the International Textile Group, with Burlington operating as a subsidiary.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Nail Communications, which served as the advertising agency for Polartec beginning in 2001, created the "Forward Fabric" campaign to increase consumer awareness of high-tech fabrics and to end confusion about what they were. The campaign also shifted the brand's traditional marketing strategy to clothing retailers like North Face and Columbia and away from promoting itself as a product element. The new global campaign included print ads, television spots, and an Internet component. Ads appeared on billboards and in airports in selected markets as well, and the advertising was translated into four languages for use in European markets.

Print ads appeared in such U.S. magazines as Outside, Shape, Freeskier, and Men's Journal and in numerous European publications, including Panorama and Terra. The ads used humor as they combined images of Polartec scientists working in their labs with images of people participating in a variety of activities while dressed in apparel made from Polartec. One ad, for example, showed a scientist on the right side of the page reaching up to write an equation on a dry-ink board with a marker, while on the left side a young man wearing Polartec athletic pants and shirt was rock climbing. The text read, "We're not all that different. You live for adrenaline. We live for moisture vapor transmission rates. Okay, we're pretty different. But we share a common goal, namely, to make your dreams possible. And while ours aren't as dramatic, we get to use big words. So there." Another ad portrayed a scientist on one side of the page writing in a notebook while on the other side a ski jumper was airborne. The text read, "You dream of fresh tracks, blue sky, and big air. Us? We get pumped about dimensional stability. Thermal transmittance. Hydrostatic resistance. Before you mention how dorky that sounds, remember—your dreams would be pretty cold and damp without ours."

Television spots used a similar format, with a split screen portraying the research and development and the production processes of Polartec on one side of the screen and athletes in a variety of outdoor pursuits wearing garments made of Polartec fabric on the other. The TV spots aired on the Resort Sports Network in ski resort towns such as Vail, Colorado, and Sun Valley, Idaho. Billboard ads were placed in Times Square in New York City, in areas that attracted heavy skier traffic, such as Salt Lake City, Denver, and Boston, and in European cities, including Grenoble, France, and Innsbruck, Austria. Other ads were located in selected airports, including Denver International and Reno/Tahoe International in Nevada.

The Internet component of the "Forward Fabric" campaign was designed to appeal to a younger audience of consumers. Nail Communications created two unconventional websites for the campaign. ShaveMyYeti.com was a game in which users used a virtual razor to shave a hairy, scowling yeti. When the creature was completely shaved and left standing hairless in his boxer shorts, the user could dress it in warm, comfy Polartec garments. The smiling yeti then happily set off on a series of adventures, from kite flying by San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge to ice skating in Manhattan's Central Park. The second website, SheepAreEvil.com, showed a sheep's head skull and crossbones against a black background. The text read as if it had been written by a bizarre conspiracy theorist who believed that sheep were plotting to take over the world. The introduction included the warning "We are the marionettes and they [the sheep] are the ones holding the strings." The site also included links such as "Nostradamus Prediction," "Crop Circles," and "Sheep and the Hindenburg."

OUTCOME

Although the biggest buying seasons for products made of Polartec were the fall and winter, shortly after the launch of the "Forward Fabric" campaign in September 2005 industry watchdogs were already praising the effort. An article in Adweek noted that the portrayal of outdoor enthusiasts participating in their favorite activities placed side by side with the Malden

Mills scientists in their offices designing the Polartec fabric used in the clothing worn by the athletes was a particularly successful strategy. Another Adweek article stated that the campaign took a "radically different approach—and to good effect." Simmons, of Backbone Media, noted that early in the campaign's run it also received positive feedback from manufacturers and retailers, such as Patagonia and REI, who used Polartec fabrics in their garments.

FURTHER READING

Bushnell, Davis. "Malden Mills Presses Product: Set to Launch Ads for Polartec." Boston Globe, June 9, 2005.

Carofano, Jennifer. "The Great Outdoors: Timberland Hits the Playground, Hi-Tec Sports Introduces a New Collection and Gore-Tex Take to the Tube." Footwear News, August 12, 2002.

Chirls, Stuart B. "Gore Is Hot on Marketing for the Cold." Daily News Record, March 27, 1989.

Dolliver, Mark. "Polartec High-Performance Fabrics." Adweek, September 19, 2005.

Fitzgerald, Michael. "Burlington's Future: Virtually Here." Textile World, March 1, 2003.

"Gore-Tex Dials into Weather Channel." Footwear News, August 28, 2000.

Greene, Joshua. "Textile Firms Try to Reel in Consumers." WWD, September 17, 2002.

Hye, Jeanette. "Malden Mills Rises from Ashes on Wings of Change: Fire Served as Catalyst for Creation of Greater Synergies." Daily News Record, April 4, 1997.

Malone, Scott. "New Textile Behemoth: Ross Forms $900M International Textile Group, Poised to Take on China." WWD, March 18, 2004.

———. "Spillane: Malden's Next Chapter." WWD, April 18, 2005.

Mitchell, Kim. "Versatile Fleece." Wearable Business, August 1, 2002.

"Nail Helps Polartec Move Fabric Forward." Create Magazine, August 15, 2005.

"Nail Helps Polartec Tell Left from Right." Adweek, August 17, 2005.

"U.S. Congress Awards Malden Mills Major Military Contracts for 2005: Polartec Fabrics and Electronic Textile R&D Funded in 2005 DOD Bill." PR Newswire, August 6, 2004.

Wilson, Claire. "The Gore-Tex Fashion Makeover: How W.L. Gore Slowly Took Its Brand Beyond—Way Beyond—Technical Activewear." Daily News Record, January 19, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

Marriott International

1 Marriott Dr.
Washington, DC 20058
USA
Telephone: (301) 380-3000
Web site: www.marriott.com

■■■

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE IMPORTANCE OF A GOOD NIGHT'S REST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Marriott Hotels Corporation changed its name to Marriott International. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

Marriott Hotels Corporation debuted a major television advertising campaign for its Courtyard by Marriott chain of hotels in May 1997. The five spots that made up the campaign showed hapless people making terrible blunders at work-related functions. Created by Lowe & Partners/SMS, the commercials were filmed in a grainy style reminiscent of home videos or live news broadcasts. Courtyard's forays into high-profile television commercials were part of its efforts to maintain its position in the extremely competitive mid-priced hotel market. Because other major chains such as the Hilton Hotels Corporation and Holiday Inn had entered the segment, travelers were faced with a dizzying array of hotel options from which to choose. With the ''Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest'' spots, Marriott sought to establish a memorable identity for the Courtyard brand, as well as to carve out a specific market niche for the hotel chain.

The humorous commercials all depicted the perils of working when not at one's best. In the award-winning ''Missed Cue,'' a person scheduled to speak at a business conference was shown losing his bearings at the function. After this speaker was introduced, he burst into applause along with everyone else, until the man sitting next to him reminded him that he was the one who was supposed to talk. Startled and flustered, he leapt up to the podium and belatedly began his presentation. Another commercial captured an on-the-scene reporter, oblivious to the fact that he was on the air, holding his microphone and staring vacantly at a camera. In a similar vein a third spot portrayed a man struggling to find his way through a thick, red stage curtain to speak in front of a large (and waiting) crowd. Every spot closed with the campaign's tag line, ''Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest.'' The implication was clear: unlike its competitors, Marriott's Courtyard hotels could ensure business travelers the rest that would allow them to function at an optimal level.

Courtyard by Marriott's campaign continued to run throughout 1998. In addition to receiving several major advertising awards, ''Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest'' was praised by industry critics and consumers alike for delivering its branding message in a lighthearted, yet powerful, way.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although the Marriott family built their first hotel in 1957, the Courtyard by Marriott chain was not founded until 1983. The Courtyard franchise represented the company's initial entry into the mid-priced segment of the lodgings market. Marriott's previous offerings had been multistoried upper-end hotels, often located downtown in urban districts. But the company recognized that many of the successful hotels run by other firms in the lower-priced category were aging and that a new market entrant with more modern facilities could have success in the field. Confident that it could triumph in this venture, Marriott conducted extensive market research for two years before breaking ground with Courtyard. After determining the attributes that consumers sought in a hotel in this price range, Marriott set out to ensure that Courtyard would provide these things. The hotels were designed to look like country inns, complete with interior courtyards featuring walking paths. Although smaller than the more spacious accommodations at Marriott's flagship hotels, Courtyard's rooms were comfortable and well-equipped.

Courtyard was an element of Marriott's aggressive overall plan for segmentation. In 1988 the company had launched Fairfield Inn, a budget chain, and followed this debut with the creation of several other chains, each targeting a specific market. For example, Towne Place Suites, Residence Inns, and Spring Hill Suites each catered to various types of long-term business travelers. According to the Wall Street Journal on October 13, 1998, Marriott "brand[ed] hotels as if they were packaged goods," as it "blanketed the country with a range of brands."

The Courtyard chain proved to be an unequivocal success for Marriott. After a spate of building in 1996, the company operated more than 300 Courtyard hotels not only in the United States and Canada but also in Australia, Austria, England, China, France, and Germany. Like most other hoteliers, Marriott advertised Courtyard primarily through print and radio. For instance, in April 1997 Marriott used the opening of its 300th location to break its print and radio campaign called "Courtyard Hits 300." As part of this campaign, Marriott tracked the best hitters in Major League Baseball and gave prizes away to the winners of weekly radio trivia contests. But facing increased competition, Marriott decided to step up its advertising efforts on television with "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest."

TARGET MARKET

The focus of Courtyard had always been on business travelers. In its bid to capture this market, the hotels eschewed the spacious lobbies and elegant restaurants of Marriott's flagship buildings. Instead, Courtyards provided fax machines, dual phone lines, comfortable in-room work environments, a semi-residential ambiance, and a reasonable price tag. As the Wall Street Journal noted on February 2, 1996, Courtyard's emphasis had always been "work first; play second." "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" targeted Courtyard's key clientele, which the Journal described as "road warriors," those frequent business travelers seeking affordable yet pleasant accommodations. This audience was a logical one, as the "mid-level business hotel ha[d] been one of the hottest segments of the hotel market," according to the January 11, 1996, Wall Street Journal.

"Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" directly and cleverly portrayed the worldview of this group. Every scene in the campaign was work related, focusing on public "on-the-job blunders," as USA Today noted. Rather than dwelling on the details of why a Courtyard Inn would leave the weary traveler rested and refreshed, the campaign subtly addressed the latent fears of business people everywhere. Unlike most other hotel advertising, which usually described the service and spacious rooms available, "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" spoke to the reality of life on the road for a business traveler. A business hotel, the ads acknowledged to its viewers, could be gauged by one factor: did it allow the traveler to work well, to work efficiently, and to work without regret. No mention of extraneous details was made. It did not really matter if a bellman brought up luggage or if the restaurant served caviar. What was essential, the ads suggested, was the degree to which a hotel enhanced—rather than detracted from—a business traveler's business.

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE IMPORTANCE OF A PLEASED EMPLOYER

M.D. Asherton-Pickett, editor of an eponymous travel newsletter, explained the appeal of Courtyards and other hotels in its class to businesses. "It's the kind of hotel a boss has to love," Asherton-Pickett told the Wall Street Journal on February 2, 1996. "They can probably demand more work."

COMPETITION

The mid-priced, business-oriented hotel category to which Courtyard belonged was one of the more competitive in the industry, and Marriott faced many threats to its continued success. After taking note of Courtyard's achievements, several of Marriott's larger competitors also developed similar chains. As the Wall Street Journal noted on January 11, 1996, "a number of company's have sought to replicate the success of Courtyard." Furthermore, established entrants in the sector were spurred at least in part by Courtyard's success to renovate their existing buildings. One of Courtyard's fiercest rivals was Holiday Inn, which had been the mid-priced mainstay before Marriott's arrival. In 1997 Holiday Inn launched a $30 million ad campaign created by Fallon McElligott to announce its massive hotel renovation projects. An ill-fated Super Bowl ad, which portrayed a middle-aged person returning to a high school reunion after having a sex change, spearheaded the campaign. Subsequent spots were less sensational and stayed more closely on message. The campaign's tag line was direct and to the point: "We are out to make every Holiday Inn like the best Holiday Inn." A company spokesperson explained the impetus behind the campaign to the January 20, 1997, Brandweek: "We are the biggest, [and] at the same time, it's easy for people to take us for granted."

Having hammered home the fact that the chain had been "made over," Holiday Inn broke its first campaign for its Holiday Inn Express, a chain of hotels that directly competed with Courtyard. Also created by Fallon McElligott, this $10 million campaign was launched in 1998 and used humor to convey the advantages of the hotels. The component ads presented vignettes in which ordinary people felt empowered to take charge in dangerous situations. These people's confidence was rooted not in actual skill, however, but in the fact that they had spent the preceding night at a Holiday Inn Express. In one spot a man approached a cyclist who crashed. "Just stay still," he told the cyclist authoritatively. After a brief examination he concluded, "You've dislocated your patella. I'm going to have to set it. Hang on." "OK. But you are an orthopedic surgeon?" the cyclist asked. "No, but I did stay in a Holiday Inn Express last night," the would-be doctor replied. Another execution portrayed a female hiker being menaced by a large bear at a National Park receiving cockamamy advice from a besuited man who strode through the on-looking crowd. The ads all closed with the tag line "It won't make you smarter. But you'll feel smarter." This tongue-in-cheek sentiment gracefully conveyed the salubrious effects that Holiday Inn believed its hotels offered. "Our primary goal was to give guests a reason to stay with us rather than our competitors," a company spokesperson told Advertising Age.

Wingate Inn, a property of HFS, also entered the fray and introduced an awareness-boosting radio campaign in 1997. Like Courtyard, Wingate Inn "hope[d] to lure business travelers with amenities like data ports, fax machines, and portable phones," explained Brandweek on September 15, 1997. The radio spots featured Anne Winn and Garrett Brown, the duo who had pitched Molson Golden until 1988, and incorporated the tag line "Built for Business." The Promus Hotel Corp. also dedicated a considerable marketing budget to its mid-range business hotel chain, Hampton Inn. In February 1998 Hampton released a DDB Needham cable television campaign that jokingly portrayed the "Insomniacs Club" and promised, "We make it easy to take it easy."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Like its competitors, Marriott sought to distinguish Courtyard from the slew of other mid-priced hotels. According to the April 17, 1996, Wall Street Journal, the proliferation of brands and sub-brands in the category left many consumers "bewildered." As an industry analyst told the Journal, "[p]eople are coming across these brands, and they don't have a clue what they are." Forging a powerful brand identity in the face of this chaos was a particular challenge for hoteliers as compared to other purveyors of consumer products. "Because consumers don't stay in hotels every day, it takes a long time for brand differentiations to sink in," noted the Journal. To overcome these obstacles Marriott opted to use television as the vehicle to carry the message of "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest," since television spots usually received far more notice than their print counterparts. To reinforce this strategy Marriott often ran the commercials during high-profile events, such as telecasts of National Football League games, to generate even more buzz and excitement about the campaign.

In keeping with its goal to make Courtyard stand out from its competitors, Marriott also strove to make the "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" spots distinctive and engaging. The style in which the commercials were filmed did much to accomplish this strategy. Unlike the bulk of television ads, which often relied on slick images and special effects, Courtyard's campaign was deliberately understated. One of the directors "took the low-grade video style of CNN footage and copied it bald-faced, as if the ads were actually chronicling people's out of step behavior," explained Shoot. Not only did the handheld camera footage provide the commercials with a unique visual feel, but—coupled with the potentially disastrous events unfolding in them—gave the spots an irresistible allure (viewers being unable to look away from the impending catastrophes). The humor of the campaign was also an essential element of its appeal. Its wittiness enabled Marriott to reach a diverse group of viewers across demographic lines. As the December 21, 1998, edition of USA Today put it in lauding the campaign, "[a]nyone who has suffered sleep deprivation can appreciate [the 'Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest'] campaign."

Marriott embarked on other promotional efforts to complement the "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign. To reward loyal customers and attract new ones across its diverse array of lodging options, Marriott unveiled its Marriott Rewards program in 1997. Marriott Rewards replaced the company's long-standing Honored Guest Awards program and differentiated it in a significant way. The Honored Guest program had let consumers accumulate bonus points for stays at individual Marriott brands. The new rewards program allowed consumers to amass points across the company's diverse holdings, thereby encouraging consumers to use Marriott brands regardless of their reason for traveling. At the same time Marriott co-branded credit cards with Visa U.S.A. and First Chicago Bank in order to put its name before consumers in a wider variety of situations. These cards also allowed consumers to accrue bonus points at the company's hotels.

OUTCOME

"Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" was well-received by advertising industry critics. Both USA Today and Advertising Age ranked the Courtyard campaign among the best of 1998. In addition to winning an ANDY award, a component commercial ("Missed Cue") garnered a Gold Lion at the prestigious International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France.

Correlating the campaign's popularity to the company's performance in its category was difficult (mainly because Marriott's hotel holdings stretched across several price categories and continents), but the company expressed satisfaction with the effort. Marriott's profits for the financial quarter immediately following the ads' debut were up 16 percent. By July 1998 Marriott's revenues per available room had increased 6 percent. Courtyard remained the second-most profitable hotel in the mid-price category behind Holiday Inn.

FURTHER READING

Bigness, Jon, and Jonathon Dahl. "Soon, Hotels Only a Boss Could Love." Wall Street Journal, February 2, 1996.

Binkley, Christina. "Hotels: Marriott Outfits an Old Chain for New Markets." Wall Street Journal, October 13, 1998.

"HFS Break First Ads for Wingate." Brandweek, January 15, 1997.

Orwall, Bruce. "Hilton to Create Hotels Targeting Budget Travelers." Wall Street Journal, January 11, 1996.

———. "Multiplying Hotels Brands Puzzle Travelers." Wall Street Journal, April 17, 1996.

Petrecca, Laura. "Holiday Inn Express Intros 1st TV Campaign, Via Fallon." Advertising Age, May 4, 1998.

Sanders, Lauren. "Special Report: Directors/Fall Edition." Shoot, October 16, 1998.

Wells, Melanie. "Ad Experts' Best and Worst of 1998." USA Today, December 21, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

Mars, Inc.

6885 Elm Street
McLean, Virginia 22101
USA
Telephone: (703) 821-4900
Fax: (703) 448-9678
Web site: www.mars.com

■■■

THE ENERGY YOU CRAVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In October 2003 renowned candy company Mars, Inc.'s newly created food division, Masterfoods USA, began a teaser campaign to let consumers know that a new energy bar was coming their way. Snickers Marathon bars, which came in two flavors, Multi-Grain Crunch and Chewy Chocolate Peanut, hit store shelves in January 2004. The new product was designed to appeal to the loyal candy-bar customer who already used the Snickers bar to satisfy hunger but wanted a healthier, protein-based energy bar more suited to their daily workout needs. The bars were aimed at taking some of the estimated $1 billion market away from industry leaders PowerBar and Balance Bar as well as an abundance of other nutrition-bar makers.

Advertising agency BBDO New York was responsible for generating high consumer awareness of the product in a short time. In fall 2003 print ads were placed in health and fitness magazines to pave the way for a comprehensive media campaign called "The Energy You Crave," which would coincide with the Marathon bars' retail appearance in January 2004. The budget for the campaign was estimated at $10 to $20 million. Television spots took up some 75 percent of ad dollars, with the rest split between print, outdoor, and online advertising as well as public relations, point-of-purchase displays, and promotional functions. The television spot that kicked off the campaign showed athletes at their limit, engaging in activities such as running and weight lifting. "Agony, anguish," said a female voice. A male voice took over, saying, "Despair. Pain. Words that should never define the taste of your energy bar." The spot was capped off by the campaign's tagline, "The Energy You Crave."

Mars, pleased with the performance of the campaign and product sales in the first months of 2004, introduced two more Snickers Marathon varieties at the end of that year. As 2004 came to an end, Snickers Marathon was among the top five fastest-selling energy bars in all stores. BBDO won a Silver EFFIE (a prestigious advertising-effectiveness award) for the campaign in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since its introduction in 1930 the Snickers candy bar had been a key building block in the Mars, Inc., confection empire begun by Frank Mars in the early twentieth century. Along with the M&M's candies brand, Snickers bars became a staple of American snacking life, making the McLean, Virginia–based Mars the second-largest candy maker in the United States by the year 2000. Unlike its colorful little round cousins, however, Snickers developed a following not only for its reputation as a sweet treat but also as a hunger tamer. This meal-like quality was emphasized by Mars advertising, which consistently referred to the protein-supplying peanuts in the bar. Ads shored up the concept with the longtime slogan "Snickers really satisfies" and later with "Hungry? Why wait."

Energy bars started appearing in the 1970s but did not hit their stride until two decades later. Formerly a small niche product found in health-oriented outlets, energy or nutrition bars made up one of the fastest-growing food-product segments in 2003, with sales estimated at more than $1 billion. The bars' expansion into the mainstream market had not gone unnoticed by Mars, which had consolidated its food brands in 2002 under one division, Masterfoods USA, located in Hackettstown, New Jersey. The Mars mission had always included strengthening core brands. Drawing upon the long history of Snickers to create its own version of a protein bar, the company was looking for a way to break into a market not traditionally associated with a candy brand. According to Masterfoods spokesman Jeffrey Moran, Mars had been working on a Snickers-based energy bar for years before introducing the Snickers Marathon line in January 2004. He explained to Drug Store News, "We saw people using the Snickers candy bar for protein because of the peanuts. We wanted to take the taste of Snickers and grow it into a new and different category instead of trying to make candy healthy." The bars featured a protein-heavy blend (trademarked QUADRATEIN) of soy, peanut, casein, and whey, which was combined with carbohydrates and other nutrients.

TARGET MARKET

The first Snickers Marathon bars, made available early in 2004, were aimed primarily at men in the 18-to-45 age range who were committed to physical fitness, working out during the week and possibly engaging in some amateur competition on the weekends. The ideal customer might be a fan of Snickers candy who was looking for a healthy alternative that would taste better than standard chalky nutrition bars. Mars was also looking to woo new customers, male and female, to the nutrition-bar market: people who had once thought that energy bars were only for professional athletes but were starting to consider them a mainstream snack-food choice.

The two original flavors, Multi-Grain Crunch and Chewy Chocolate Peanut, were aimed at men first but essentially at any active adult. In fall 2004 two subsequent bar recipes followed that had a different consumer target. The Snickers Marathon Protein Performance Bar was designed to attract the more focused athlete, while the Snickers Marathon Low Carb Lifestyle Energy Bar was offered with women in mind.

ANGLING FOR SNICKERS MARATHON FANS

In February 2004 FLW Outdoors, the world's leading competitive-fishing organization, announced that Snickers Marathon bars would sponsor its upcoming fishing tournament season. The Mars brands Snickers and M&M's had been sponsors of the annual competitions since 2001. Confident of a loyal consumer mentality among the nation's more than 52 million anglers and their families, Mars had already used the venues for two other Snickers brand-extension launches, Snickers Crunch in 2001 and Snickers Almond Bar in 2003.

COMPETITION

Traditional leaders in the energy-bar category were PowerBar, owned by venerable Mars competitor Nestlé, and Balance Bar, owned by megacorporation Kraft Foods. PowerBar was reporting more than $100 million in annual sales when Nestlé, then the world's largest food and beverage company, acquired the Berkeley, California, company in 2000. Nestlé CEO Peter Brabeck was keen to use the brand as a major component in his plan to remake Nestlé into the world's leading health and wellness company. In the wake of a glut of new competition PowerBar held its own but did not experience the growth that Nestlé had expected. Still, PowerBar's reputation of being an originator in the category made it a major competitor against Mars' own product. Another challenge for Mars was Balance Bar. Balance Bars, designed on the popular nutritional philosophy of 40 percent carbohydrates, 30 percent protein, and 30 percent fat (40/30/30), came on the scene in 1992 and enjoyed success into the next decade.

At the same time that Mars introduced its Snickers Marathon bars, another longtime rival, the candy company Hershey, unveiled its own entrant into the nutrition-bar segment. Hershey's SmartZone bar was based on the elements of the hugely popular, protein-centered Zone Diet that was created by biochemist Barry Sears and introduced to the public in 1995. Hershey, like Mars, was hoping that its association with candy would be an asset, creating customer expectations that it would taste good. The SmartZone bars promised a healthier controlled release of sugar (low glycemic index), which would also keep eaters satisfied longer. The idea of satiety was treading directly on Snickers' long-held territory, and low glycemic index was also a foundation for the new Snickers Marathon bars. The list of competition was formidable and diverse. When introduced later in 2004 the Marathon Low Carb Lifestyle Energy Bar would face off against Atkins Diet Advantage bars, which reported sales of $63.8 million in 2003, and Cliff Luna bars for women, which took in $42.4 million that same year.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Advertising agency BBDO New York was charged with the task of convincing discerning, health-conscious consumers that Snickers Marathon was a nutritiously credible energy bar with the great taste of a candy bar. The campaign the agency created, ''The Energy You Crave,'' began in fall 2003 with teaser print ads in health and fitness magazines. The ads emphasized the nutritional aspects of the coming Marathon bars while laying the groundwork for the mass-media assault that would follow in January 2004. A budget of $10 to $20 million was allotted to cover television, print, outdoor, and online advertisements. The bulk of the advertising money, about 75 percent, was spent on the TV aspect of the campaign, with a 30-second spot debuting on January 3 during the NFL Wild Card game. In the commercial athletes were shown running extreme distances, climbing dangerously high, surfing, and pumping iron with weights that had ''torture'' written on them. A female voice-over intoned, ''Agony, anguish.'' A male voice-over continued, ''Despair. Pain. Words that should never define the taste of your energy bar.'' The tagline that followed stated, ''The Energy You Crave.''

At about the same time that the first TV spot ran, print ads began appearing in general-interest magazines as well as in health and fitness publications. Billboard ads were placed in the top 10 energy-bar markets, regions that made up approximately 10 percent of the country's population. The campaign included an emphasis on public relations, point-of-purchase displays, and online banners placed on health-oriented websites. The multipronged media approach was necessary to achieve the much-needed name recognition that was so vital to a new product entering a well-established market segment. Ads and promotions relied on the Snickers name for that purpose. Speaking with the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, Scott Krugman, vice president of public relations for the National Retail Federation, the world's largest retail trade association, described this as a distinct advantage over other new category entrants. ''They're bringing something to the market that a lot of other products don't have—a recognizable name that will get people to pick it up in the first place.'' The Snickers name could also have been a liability, however, if the advertisements had not sufficiently communicated that Snickers Marathon was a true energy bar and not just a candy-bar pretender.

The first goal of the advertising strategy was to create product awareness, but the second part, to get consumers to buy them once and then again, was even more vital. The universal criticism of products in this food category had always been the taste and flavor experience. Consumers often settled for the lesser of two taste evils when choosing a nutritional bar, thinking that if it served one's nutritional requirements, it probably could not taste good as well. Mars felt that it could win repeat business on the taste factor. Jeffery Moran explained the company's thinking in a 2004 issue of Convenience Store News. ''We've seen continued focus on everyday energy, and Snickers has always had an underlying focus on endurance and sustainability.'' Moran continued, ''The taste of Snickers has always been our point of differentiation, and we can bring our history and background of how to make things taste good into the energy bar category.'' The tagline carried on all advertising, ''The Energy You Crave,'' perfectly conveyed that the bars were so tasty and energy-packed that consumers would actually look forward to eating them.

OUTCOME

In its first year Snickers Marathon lived up to the Mars company's consumer-awareness goals and sales expectations. According to Ipsos-ASI, an advertising-research firm, the Snickers Marathon TV spots scored a Copy Effectiveness Index of 232, well above the category norm of 70 to 130, which meant that viewers understood the message of the advertising copy ''The Energy You Crave.'' Surveys by Ipsos-ASI also revealed promising results, reporting a 50 percent ''intent to purchase'' level, which was more than double the typical 22 percent. Near the end of 2004, approximately 11 months after it was introduced to consumers, Snickers Marathon was among the top five fastest-selling energy bars in every outlet. Even more encouraging for Mars, Snickers Marathon was number one in the convenience store category when compared to its two major competitors, PowerBar and Balance Gold 5, a popular Balance Bar product.

BBDO New York also picked up accolades within the advertising industry, winning a Silver EFFIE Award (Snacks/Desserts/Confections category) in 2005 for its ''The Energy You Crave'' campaign. That year the agency also won three Gold EFFIEs for other campaigns, prompting BBDO New York's president and CEO, John Osborn, to proclaim in a company press release, ''This is like hitting a Grand Slam.'' Mars' Masterfoods USA division responded to the success of the first two Snickers Marathon flavors by introducing more bar variations. By the end of 2005 there were eight Snickers Marathon bars to choose from that were in three nutrition categories: energy, protein, and low carbohydrate.

FURTHER READING

"The A-List." Progressive Grocer, September 1, 2004, p. 35.

Anderson, Mae. "Flipping for Snickers." Adweek, August 9, 2004, p. 20.

Beirne, Mike. "Confectioners Unwrap Low-Carb Strategies." Brandweek, June 14, 2004, p. 14.

Brenner, Joel Glenn. The Chocolate Emperors: Inside the Secret World of Hershey and Mars. New York: Random House, 1999.

Brown, Sandy. "Hotlines." Adweek, January 5, 2004, p. 4.

Cole, Leslie. "Bars as Big Business." Portland Oregonian, January 27, 2004, p. FD01.

Eckstein, Sandra. "Snickers Serves Up Energy Bar." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, May 13, 2004, p. 7NW.

Embrey, Alison. "The Energy Train." Convenience Store News, July 12, 2004

Kirsche, Michelle. "Better-for-You Bars from Candy Makers Bring Flavor, Variety to Nutrition Aisle." Drug Store News, October 11, 2004, p. 39.

Squires, Sally. "Belly Up to the Bars." Washington Post, July 27, 2004, p. F01.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Nestle Makes Nutrition Its No. 1 Priority in U.S." Advertising Age, March 21, 2005, p. 3.

———. "Snickers Marathon: Masterfoods Launches Energy Bar." Advertising Age, June 23, 2003, p. 8.

Simone Samano

INNER BEAST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Whiskas, a cat-food brand in Mars, Inc.'s Masterfoods USA division, was the world's leading cat food. Its sales performance and brand identity was inconsistent from nation to nation, however, and in the United States at the turn of the millennium it was a middle-of-the pack brand in an increasingly competitive category. Having failed to energize the Whiskas brand through a variety of marketing techniques and packaging changes, Mars switched advertising agencies in 2002, hiring the Los Angeles office of TBWA\Chiat\Day. TBWA's first campaign for Whiskas, "Inner Beast," represented a departure from conventional cat-food advertising.

Budgeted at $20 million and employing the tagline "What Cats Want," the "Inner Beast" campaign sought to show cat owners that Whiskas understood and catered to the instinctual nature of their pets. Rather than conform to the industry model of depicting cats as cute, lovable, semi-humans who were utterly dependent on their owners' benevolence, TBWA\Chiat\Day dramatized the atavistic ferocity of even the smallest house cats by showing them hunting large prey on the Serengeti. The agency achieved this image by splicing new footage of house cats into stock footage directly reminiscent of nature documentaries. Suspenseful music highlighted the absurd juxtaposition of 10-pound house cats chasing water buffalo, zebras, and impalas that weighed several hundred pounds, and a voice-over proclaimed, "Your cat has an inner beast. Feed it."

In market-research tests the campaign scored well in terms of memorability and entertainment value, and it was considered a successful category-defying new approach to cat-food advertising. Mars handed over an increasing amount of its global advertising duties to TBWA\Chiat\Day, and Whiskas continued to position itself not just as a supplier of cat food but as a brand that understood the true nature of cats.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the 1990s and early 2000s Whiskas was the world's best-selling cat food, but its performance varied dramatically from market to market. While it was the leading cat food in the United Kingdom and Europe, it was only the sixth-best-selling in the United States and was in danger of becoming a stagnant brand there. Whiskas and its agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, which was also the lead agency for other brands in Mars, Inc.'s Masterfoods portfolio, had tried a variety of approaches to jumpstart sales growth and to make Whiskas stand out from competitors at the brand level. In general, however, they had failed at this task.

One of the most noteworthy among these divergent campaigns was a 1999 series of commercials designed not simply for cat owners but for cats themselves. Based on a concept first tested in Great Britain, where Whiskas was the leader in its category, the commercials opened with a 15-second intro asking cat owners to put their cats in a position to watch the sequence that would follow. What followed was a flurry of darting movements and geometrical patterns, with chirping birds, a scurrying mouse, and a mobile of reflective metal fish, among other images, running in tandem with a soundtrack that included noises undetectable by human ears. Though cat = were intrigued by the spots, according to animal behaviorists at the Mars-associated Waltham Center for Pet Nutrition in Leicestershire, England, their owners in America remained unmotivated to try the Whiskas brand in greater numbers.

In 2002 Mars relieved D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles of advertising duties on the various brands it serviced and renewed the search for marketing ideas that would help Whiskas rise above its middle-of-the-pack status in the United States. Mars hired TBWA\Chiat\Day's Los Angeles office to reinvigorate the Whiskas brand.

TARGET MARKET

The "Inner Beast" campaign targeted cat owners. Using the tagline "What Cats Want," the commercials defied industry trends emphasizing the cute and human-like attributes of cats—the unnatural attributes of cats, as TBWA\Chiat\Day saw it—focusing instead on convincing cat owners that Whiskas alone among cat-food brands understood the true nature of their pets. Cat owners, the ad agency felt, did not see their cats as stand-ins for children; rather, they prized the uniquely feline qualities of their pets, even when these qualities resulted in difficult or disturbing behavior. Cats' instinctual nature not only accounted for their most prized qualities, but it also directly dictated the foods they chose, allowing TBWA\Chiat\Day to tie the Whiskas brand logically to its concept. The "Inner Beast" spots attempted to communicate that Whiskas shared cat owners' appreciation for their pets, while raising the brand's profile through humorous, provocative imagery.

TBWA\Chiat\Day thus crafted spots that showed meowing house cats chasing water buffalo, zebra, and impalas on the Serengeti. One of the TBWA creative directors on the account, copywriter Gary Pascoe, told the New York Times, "Any cat owner will tell you, cats are unaware of their size and can't help the lion side of them from coming out. To 10-pound Fluffy at home, the couch is a gazelle and the carpet is the Serengeti."

COMPETITION

The leading cat foods in the United States at the time of the "Inner Beast" launch were Cat Chow, Iams, Friskies, Meow Mix, and 9 Lives. Industry-wide sales declines, together with a wave of corporate consolidation, beginning with Procter & Gamble's 1999 purchase of the premium brand Iams, had recently ratcheted up the levels of competition among these brands and made the Whiskas effort to craft a distinctive image all the more pressing. In 2001 Ralston Purina, the manufacturer of Cat Chow, Meow Mix, and Purina O.N.E. in addition to leading dog-food brands and other pet products, was purchased by Nestlé, the corporate owner of the Friskies brand. As part of the merger, federal regulators concerned about antitrust issues compelled Nestlé to sell the Meow Mix line, making Meow Mix one of the few independent cat-food companies. H.J. Heinz Company in 2002 sold the 9 Lives brand to Del Monte Foods.

Prior to the "Inner Beast" launch, Procter & Gamble was the only one of the major industry players to have recently increased its cat-food advertising budget. With the 1999 acquisition of Iams, the company immediately and drastically increased advertising spending on behalf of all Iams products for dogs and cats. As a result of its marketing and the moving of Iams beyond specialty pet-food stores and into supermarkets and mass merchandisers, Iams sales grew by roughly $200 million dollars during the brand's first year under the Procter & Gamble banner.

The newly independent Meow Mix Company went one better than the 1999 Whiskas commercial crafted for cats: in 2003 the company launched Meow TV, an actual show featuring segments designed for the enjoyment of cats. Budgeted at a miniscule $400,000, the series of two shows ran on the Oxygen cable network and created significant buzz around the brand. Sales, however, remained flat.

Nestlé, meanwhile, significantly scaled back total expenditures on its brands Cat Chow, Friskies, and Purina O.N.E. after the 2001 merger that placed them all under the same corporate umbrella. It allotted

BEHIND THE SCENES

John Payne and Gary Pascoe, the TBWA\Chiat\Day creative directors on the Whiskas account, had worked as an art director–copywriter duo for nearly a decade prior to the "Inner Beast" campaign. The two got to know one another in 1994 while taking cigarette breaks at their then-employer, advertising agency the Richards Group of Dallas. They were first assigned to work together on a table-card promotion for TGI Friday's jalapeño poppers and went on to work as a team on beer advertising as well as accounts for Motel 6 and Continental Airlines. They moved together to TBWA\Chiat\Day's Los Angeles office in 1997, where they won assignments for Taco Bell, Sony PlayStation, Infiniti, Levi's, and Nissan. Both credited their ability to come up with the "Inner Beast" concept—showing house cats hunting on the Serengeti—to the fact that they were cat owners. As Creativity reported, Payne had a black short-haired cat named P.T., and Pascoe had an "obese, mentally challenged calico named Barkley."

$29.9 million to the trio, down from pre-merger totals amounting to $39.9 million. In 2004 Nestlé's Purina lines were to be integrated into an unprecedented branded-entertainment effort on NBC. Created by ad agency Fallon Worldwide in concert with prominent network TV producers and writers, the show was to be a satire of the 2004 U.S. presidential election featuring the Cat and Dog parties, with Purina brands heavily integrated into the program. Despite significant excitement over the fact that the show would represent a new format for advertisers, the venture was scuttled because of Purina's financial difficulties.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Inner Beast" represented not just a conceptual shift in Whiskas' advertising but also a return to its pre-2001 levels of ad spending. After spending only $14 million on Whiskas in 2002, Mars allotted TBWA\Chiat\Day an estimated $20 million a year for Whiskas. The campaign, which was launched in June of 2003, consisted of three TV spots—"Buffalo," "Zebra," and "Impala"—as well as print ads that conformed to the "Inner Beast" theme.

TBWA\Chiat\Day creative directors John Payne and Gary Pascoe, who helmed the "Inner Beast" effort as art director and copywriter, respectively, attributed their understanding of cat behavior in part to the fact that both of them were longtime cat owners. "Cats haven't sold out like dogs have," Pascoe told Shoot. "You can't get cats to lay down or roll over or do any of that silly stuff. They're true to their instinctual nature." When they spent time studying a large body of clips, however, Pascoe and Payne found that this understanding of cats was at odds with the bulk of the cat-food industry's advertising. Noticing the prevalence of unnatural behaviors—singing and dancing, for instance—fallaciously imposed on cats by industry advertisers, the team settled on a working concept of showing cats as they really were. This led them to the idea of dramatizing cats' instinctual aggressiveness in an over-the-top, humorous fashion, by depicting small domestic cats in predator-prey chase scenes reminiscent of nature documentaries.

Director Noam Murro of Biscuit Filmworks, Los Angeles, settled on the strategy for filming the "Inner Beast" spots. Because shooting on location in Africa was not a reasonable option, Murro used stock footage from nature documentaries and edited out the lions in pursuit of their quarry. Trained house cats were then filmed on California ranch land chosen for the similarity of its flora and fauna to that found in the stock footage. Shooting challenges included matching the cats' angles of pursuit in real time to that of the filmed lions, and the primary task confronting editors and effects technicians was the splicing of the individual cats into the chase scenes in a seamless fashion.

"Buffalo," "Zebra," and "Impala" each followed the same template, their primary differences being that of the species of quarry pursued by the house cat in each spot. The commercials opened with footage of groups of animals going about their daily routine, while suspenseful music reminiscent of soundtracks habitually employed in nature documentaries provided an obvious cue to viewers that a predator was lurking somewhere nearby. The suspense built as the hunted animals began betraying signs of fear, so that the revelation that the predator was a small, meowing house cat achieved maximum comic effect. The absurd chase scene then played out after the fashion of the genre, with the music building toward a crescendo as the tiny cat hid behind rocks, bounded across open plains, and closed in on animals that weighed several hundred pounds. A voice-over underscored the campaign's message: "Your cat has an inner beast. Feed it." Whiskas products then appeared onscreen, arranged on top of a rock, and the voice-over added, "Whiskas: made to satisfy a cat's natural instincts." Each spot ended with a purple screen on which the Whiskas logo and the tagline "What Cats Want" appeared.

Accompanying the "Inner Beast" TV spots were print ads that ran in newspapers with coupon inserts. These featured the "What Cats Want" tagline along with a predatory-looking cat lying in the grass as though waiting for its prey.

OUTCOME

According to testing undertaken by the prominent market-research firm Millward Brown, the "Inner Beast" campaign rated far higher in terms of memorability than other cat-food commercials; 63 percent of viewers enjoyed the spots (versus an advertising norm of 37 percent), and 81 percent felt that the work was superior to other cat-food advertising. Market research also revealed that the key message transmitted by the campaign was the one that TBWA\Chiat\Day had hoped to communicate: that Whiskas was the food that suited cats' instinctive preferences.

Mars was so enamored of TBWA\Chiat\Day's "Inner Beast" work for Whiskas that, over the next two years, it awarded the agency's worldwide network more than 40 percent of its international Masterfoods advertising business, including assignments in 70 different countries. Whereas Whiskas had been a minor account for the storied advertising agency, Mars's Masterfoods subsidiaries eventually became one of its most significant clients. The "Inner Beast" campaign was considered groundbreaking for its industry, and the theme of depicting cats' true natures remained in place in subsequent Whiskas marketing initiatives.

FURTHER READING

Champagne, Christine. "Dir. Murro Hunts Big Game for Whiskas." Shoot, July 18, 2003.

Diaz, Ann-Christine. "Gary Pascoe and John Payne, TBWA\Chiat\Day\LA." Creativity, February 2004.

Elliott, Stuart. "A New Pitch for Cat Food Is Based on Celebrating Fluffy's Inner Beast." New York Times, July 8, 2003.

Fera, Rae Ann. "Whiskas Feeds the Inner Beast." Boards Online, July 10, 2003. Available from <http://www.boardsmag.com/articles/online/20030710/whiskas.html>

O'Leary, Noreen. "U.S. Agency of the Year: TBWA\Chiat\Day." Adweek, January 10, 2005.

Pappas, Ben. "Transparent Eyeball." Forbes, June 14, 1999.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "The Tao of Clow: How a Surfer from West Los Angeles Became the Art Director of His Generation and the Soul of Chiat/Day." Adweek, November 17, 2003.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Category Spending Still Stagnant." Advertising Age, June 23, 2003.

———. "Mars Dumps D'Arcy, Citing Office Closure." Advertising Age, May 13, 2002.

"Whiskas: 'Buffalo.' " Adweek, July 14, 2003.

Mark Lane

M&M'S NEW MILLENNIUM CAMPAIGNS

OVERVIEW

In the years 2000 through 2005 M&M's candies remained a brand giant for Mars, Inc., manufacturer of other popular candies, including Skittles, Twix, Starburst, and Snickers. Several ad campaigns for M&M's were released during this period, including the "Global Color Vote" in 2002 and "Help Us Find Our Colors" in 2004. It was during this period that Mars embraced an integrated media philosophy that ensured that a product's television advertising, print ads, Internet elements, and point-of-purchase displays were coordinated seamlessly with packaging, public relations, and other media. Mars executive Peter Littlewood orchestrated the company's many media agencies that were responsible for different aspects of each campaign.

Often promotional in nature, the new integrated campaigns were usually linked to high-profile national events. Promotions also centered on the chocolate candies' famous colors and featured the characters known as the M&M's Spokescandies. The "Global Color Vote" asked consumers worldwide to vote on a new color in 2002. The campaign worked hard to portray this as a news event and succeeded when victorious purple was announced on news outlets such as CNN. Television advertising buys were concentrated on programs with notably huge audiences. For instance, the "Find Our Colors" tie-in campaign showed partying Spokescandies on the Dick Clark's New Year's Rockin' Eve telecast. When the clock struck midnight, the candies' colors vanished. For subsequent months in 2004, black-and-white M&M's were sold in special packaging until their colors were reclaimed on commercials that aired the night of the Academy Awards telecast in March.

The fiercely independent, privately held company generally kept profit details to itself, but Investors Business Daily reported in 2002 that M&M's was responsible for a healthy $2 billion-plus in company revenue, up from $1.5 billion the previous year. The "Global Color Vote" achieved results in the first three months of 2002, with growth reaching double digits for M&M's, while the category as a whole only grew by 3 percent. Most of the M&M's campaigns ran a cycle of about six months before moving onto the next promotion.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Mars, Inc., began as a privately owned family business captained by Frank Mars in the early decades of the twentieth century. M&M's milk chocolate candies got their start in Europe, however. Frank's son Forrest Mars was discouraged by his father's conservative business view, so the two parted ways in the 1930s. Forrest went to stake his claim in Europe. There he noticed a unique candy product: lentil-sized pellets of chocolate with a hard sugar coating that kept them from melting. Company legend had it that he saw soldiers with the candy during the Spanish Civil War. He brought the idea back to the states and, working independently of his father's company, introduced the first M&M's candies in 1940. Forrest was an innovator and a shrewd student of business. In what might be described as his first promotional tie-in coup, he managed to get M&M's included in U.S. soldiers' rations in World War II. Upon his father's death Forrest Mars took over Mars, Inc., and merged it with his own candy company.

The brown, yellow, orange, red, green, and violet (a color that was later replaced with tan) candy shells prevented the candies from melting and were a hit with consumers. Hence the memorable longtime slogan "The Milk Chocolate Melts in Your Mouth—Not in Your Hand" was born in the 1950s. Peanut M&M's soon followed as the company's first brand extension. The slogan was used for decades and only began to be phased out when a new long-term device emerged in the form of "Spokescandies," cartoon M&M's candies with faces, arms, and legs. These brand characters were first used in advertisements in 1954 and finally appeared on packages in 1972. The original Red and Yellow characters were one-dimensional images. Later the characters became animated in three dimensions using Claymation techniques. Commercials using the Spokescandies were humorous or cute, intended to appeal to children in particular. There was a significant shift through the 1980s and into the next two decades, when the characters—rather than taste or eating experience—became the focus of the candies' advertising. Television spots in the 1990s paired the Spokescandies with such celebrities as actress Halle Berry and comedian Dennis Miller.

M&M Mars's Spokescandies. IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

The M&M's brand was a pioneer in the world of advertising with its unique approach to promotions, tie-ins, and cohesive advertising strategies. In 1982 M&M's candies were first provided for astronauts on United States Space Shuttle trips. To highlight M&M's introduction to the international market in the 1980s, the candies became the "Official Snack Food" of the 1984 Olympics. It was in this period that color became another ongoing theme of M&M's advertising and promotion. Holiday-themed candies were introduced: red and green were packaged together at Christmastime, and pastels were sold for Easter. The 1995 color-vote promotion caught the attention at least 10 million Americans, who chose blue to enter the mix. As the year 2000 approached, the M&M's ad team was already thinking ahead. In 1998 it declared M&M's "the official candy of the new millennium." Capitalizing on the Roman numeral M, which meant 1,000, and a preoccupation with the coming millennium, it tied the product in with an enormous worldwide event without having to spend a cent on rights. "M&M's—blatantly exploiting the new millennium," was how one sarcastic, self-deprecating TV spot ended.

TARGET MARKET

M&M's advertisements and promotions were designed to appeal to a wide variety of consumers. Historically the brand's multifaceted campaigns had always considered every age group. The Spokescandies fit the bill perfectly and were honed with every new campaign to attract a broad range of consumers. Their appearance was designed to be cute for little kids, while their attitude was often wisecracking for teen appeal. M&M's aimed television spots in particular at an older audience. Spots that featured the Spokescandies in adult environments or situations were featured in 2001. For instance, satires of an upscale hotel visit or the traditional big box of valentine chocolates that a husband gave a wife were rife with mature subtext. Voting promotions and games on the company website were carefully crafted to appeal to all ages.

PET FOOD PROFITS

Forrest Mars invented the canned-pet-food business back when he was in Britain in the 1930s. He convinced pet owners that it would be healthier for their animals than the usual table scraps. A new industry was born, resulting in the Kal Kan, Pedigree, and Whiskas brands that eventually made up 50 percent of sales for Mars, Inc.

COMPETITION

The leaders in chocolate convenience foods had for years been Hershey, Mars, and Nestlé, in that order. In 2001 Hershey's share of the U.S. confectionary market was 30.3 percent, nearly twice that of Mars (16.9 percent) and well above Nestlé (6.3 percent), according to Information Resources, a Chicago research company whose figures did not include sales at Wal-Mart. Hershey, wishing to create even more distance between itself and Mars, adopted Mars's business model of putting the bulk of ad dollars behind its top-three brands. In the October 29, 2001, issue of Advertising Age, Credit Suisse First Boston analyst Dave Nelson observed that Hershey's new president and CEO was "in line with how (Mars) sees the world." He continued, "By marketing big brands, you don't have to spend as much to connect with the consumer, so return on investment is naturally higher." Hershey may have been emulating its nearest competitor's ad strategies, but the advertising philosophies of the number one and number two candy makers remained unique. Hershey concentrated on branding, while Mars continually sought to create an emotional connection with the consumer.

Henri Nestlé invented milk chocolate in 1875, but it was Milton Hershey who made the sweet snack food a household name. Nestlé's lack of diversification of its chocolate offerings had kept it comfortably behind Mars for decades. In 2002, however, Mars had reason to be concerned when reports surfaced that Hershey was for sale. Nestlé was considered to be the prime candidate to snap up the iconic Pennsylvania company. But the sale did not materialize, and Hershey regrouped. Over the next two years the market-share ratios remained roughly the same for chocolate's big three. In 2005 Hershey introduced a new product called Kissables that was remarkably similar to M&M's candies.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Mars spent $195 million on U.S. confection brand advertising in 2000, much of that concentrated on its three top brands, which generated 67 percent of sales. It was at this time that Mars made a shift in how it drove and oversaw media functions, giving its marketing division a more "in-house agency" feel. Executive Peter Littlewood was the man credited with successfully coordinating the vast and various print, TV, public relations, Internet, and other media saturations that accompanied each new M&M's push. In a September 2002 issue of Advertising Age, Bob Gamgort, president of the North American division of Mars, described Littlewood as perfect for the job because of his "terrific experience in brand marketing and his strong interest in broadening outside traditional arenas." M&M's advertising methods for the new millennium were even more creatively geared toward the elements that had brought the brand success in the previous century: high-visibility promotions using the Spokescandies and the color theme in fully integrated cross-media campaigns.

In 2000 M&M's Spokescandies, introduced 50 years before and evolving ever since, were on their way to becoming iconic characters. Each one had a personality and had been growing along with consumers. The two originals were Red, a loveable and slightly pompous milk chocolate, and Yellow, an endearingly absentminded Peanut M&M. Later came supercool Blue and anxiety-ridden Crispy. The only female character, vivacious Green, was created with a wink at rumors suggesting that the green candies were aphrodisiacs. A fall 2001 campaign entitled "What Is It about the Green Ones?" featured a spot in which Green, a glamorous movie star, had her candy shell off when a producer entered her trailer. In another commercial she was a pinup girl on a poster in a teen boy's room. Her picture was stamped on the green candies during the campaign as well.

Color changes were a key tactic for generating interest. Color votes made consumers feel that they had a personal stake in the product. Blue became a permanent M&M's color by popular U.S. vote. The company had wanted M&M's to be part of the fabric of American life throughout the twentieth century, and with the turn of a new century M&M's was looking beyond U.S. borders. The year 2002 gave rise to the "Global Color Vote" campaign, a six-month effort. M&M's asked citizens of more than 200 countries to pick a new candy color; the choices were pink, purple, and aqua. Purple's victory, revealed on June 19, 2002, was covered on major news outlets such as CNN and on popular TV shows, including The Tonight Show with Jay Leno. Mars even conducted a poll that demonstrated that 40 percent of those polled were aware of purple's win.

Mars continued to find innovative color-themed promotions to renew interest or inspire continued loyalty in the M&M's brand. On a popular New Year's Eve show in 2003 the Spokescandies cavorted with host Dick Clark until the clock struck midnight, and then their colors dramatically disappeared. For the next two months all M&M's packages contained black-and-white candies only. A supporting sweepstakes was held proclaiming, "Help us find our colors." Each winner received cash or a Volkswagen Beetle in a color matching that of the candy they had found in the black-and-white packages. The colors returned to coincide with the Academy Awards ceremony in March 2004. Commercials featuring more vibrantly colored M&M's spokescharacters at a big Hollywood party introduced the slogan "Chocolate is better in color," which ran through May. This exemplified the kind of all-fronts campaign for which M&M's had become known. A buildup of advertisements and promotions that culminated in a focused event ensured high visibility throughout the first half of 2004.

Wherever an event of national significance occurred, Mars seemed to make sure that M&M's was linked to it. A noteworthy 2002 Super Bowl spot was called "Hotel." A man checked into a fancy hotel that promised a complimentary chocolate on the pillow. The next scene showed the man terrified to discover that he was sharing his bed with the Red M&M's spokescharacter. This spot not only stood out for its situational humor but also was even more effective because the audience had come to know Red's persona. "We continue to develop their personalities," said Scott Hudler, brand communications manager for Mars, in a February 2002 issue of Brand Marketing. He further explained, "We don't want them spouting the same lines over and over again." That year 30-second Super Bowl advertising slots were selling for a reported $1.9 million, but Mars purchased last-minute for a cut rate that was worth the high visibility. BBDO New York was responsible for the "Hotel" spot, but the company's integrated marketing campaigns also used the agency Grey Worldwide, New York. Other promotional support work for the brand had come from an unusually large variety of media firms, including but not limited to TJ Paul, Marketing Drive Worldwide, Mediaedge:cia, and Starcom MediaVest Group.

OUTCOME

Mars, Inc., continued to be committed to its private status, and at the close of 2005 it described itself as an $18 billion business. For the company's most celebrated brand, M&M's, the first five years of the new millennium were marked by global success. One of the largest M&M's promotions during that period, the "Global Color Vote" of 2002, produced a U.S. sales increase of 21 percent for the colored candies that year, an admirable feat when compared to category growth of only 3 percent overall. Profit details for the privately held company were rarely disclosed, but Investors Business Daily reported in 2002 that M&M's accounted for more than $2 billion in company revenue, up from $1.5 billion the previous year. In 2005 Mars continued to expand the brand by introducing Dark Chocolate M&M's and Mega M&M's with adults in mind.

FURTHER READING

Angrisani, Carol. "Character Traits." Brand Marketing, February 2002, p. 6.

Baker, Olivia, Maria Puente, and Jerry Shriver. "M&M Embraces Rumors about Those Green Ones." USA Today, p. 1D.

Beirne, Mike. "Calling All Candy Makers." Brandweek, February 4, 2002, p. 23.

———. "Tie-Ins: Masterfoods Sweetens '04 with M&M's, Shrek 2 Pushes." Brandweek, December 1, 2003

Deutsch, Claudia. "M&M's the Top Star on an Ad Walk of Fame." New York Times, September 20, 2004, p. C11.

Elliott, Stuart. "Despite Millions of Viewers, the Super Bowl Is Not Quite So for Madison Avenue." New York Times, February 1, 2002, p. C2.

———. "From Monkeys to M&M's, Madison Ave. Mostly Opts to Entertain the Super Bowl's TV Fans." New York Times, February 5, 2002, p. C6.

Hisey, Pete. "A Taste Explosion." Retail Merchandiser, February 2002, p. 58.

Linnett, Richard, and Jack Neff. "Media Consolidation: Masterfoods Starts Scrap for $300M Account; Review to End by December." Advertising Age, November 3, 2003, p. 1.

Richman, Michael. "Mars Found the Sweet Spot Innovate to Succeed: Candy Maker Crafted M&Ms, Snickers into Snack Staples." Investor's Business Daily, July 12, 2002, p. 3.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Peter Littlewood; VP-Marketing Services, Masterfoods USA." Advertising Age, September 30, 2002, p. S6.

Simone Samano

SNICKERS CRUNCHER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mars, Inc., which entered the candy business in 1922, has long been one the top sellers of candy bars in the world. Also notable was that Mars, founded by Forrest Mars, Sr., has remained a privately owned family business, and the company has historically been run in an atmosphere of mystery. Mars has kept its formulas and business practices behind a wall of secrecy, and it has also ventured into new products with extreme caution. Yet the Snickers Bar, introduced in 1930, had long been the top-selling candy bar in the United States, and by 2001 an extension of the product seemed warranted. Mars initiated the expansion of the line that year by introducing the Snickers Cruncher, supporting it with a $40 million television and print campaign.

Mars hired ad agency BBDO New York to introduce the new addition to the Snickers family. In print and television advertising BBDO used the tagline, ''Hungry? Crunch this,'' to portray the candy bar as a positive way to alleviate stress. Such television ads as ''Car Alarm,'' in which a woman shoved a sofa out her apartment window to stop an annoying car alarm below, recommended the Snickers Cruncher as an alternative way to experience a satisfying ''crunch.''

Within a mere six months after its launch, the Snickers Cruncher became a top-10 candy bar in the chocolate confection category. While the popularity of the original Snickers Bar largely accounted for this success, the humorous campaign also played a role. In 2001 one of USA Today's Ad Track surveys indicated that, within the 18- to 24-year-old age bracket (largely representing the target market of the campaign), 61 percent liked the ads ''a lot.'' The launch of the Snickers Cruncher was so successful that it inspired the usually cautious Mars to introduce another new product in the Snickers line, the Snickers Almond Bar, the following year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In her book The Emperors of Chocolate: Inside the Secret World of Hershey and Mars, Joël Glenn Brenner wrote, ''Mars spends an estimated $400 million a year to advertise its products across America, but since its founding, the company itself has operated inside a fortress of silence.'' In 1989 Brenner was only the third member of the press known to interview anyone inside Mars since its founding in 1922. Established by Forrest Mars, Sr., the son of a struggling candy maker named Frank Mars, the family-owned business was one of the most secretive companies ever to exist.

The company found incredible success, making the Mars family one of America's wealthiest. Its first candy success was M&M's, introduced in 1940. Mars subsequently increased its offerings, although it did so with an air of caution. The addition of the Snickers Bar was one change that seemed to pay off spectacularly. An early model of the nougat-and-peanut candy bar was introduced in 1923, but without a chocolate coating. In 1930 Mars launched a milk-chocolate-coated version, which was an immediate success. The Snickers Bar continued to gain widespread recognition, especially from 1948 to 1952, when it sponsored The Howdy Doody Show.

The Snickers product line eventually expanded. In 1968 a small, fun-size version of the candy bar became available; two years later, the Snickers Munch bar, a candy bar modeled after peanut brittle, was launched. From 1989 to 1990 two more Snickers products hit stores: the Snickers Ice Cream bar and Snickers Miniatures (which were even smaller than the fun size). The Snickers Ice Cream Cone came around in 1996. Still, these products were developed not as new versions of Snickers but as separate products carrying the same theme. In 2001 the Snickers Cruncher, which got its crunchy texture from crisped rice, became the first product offered as a direct extension of the original Snickers bar.

Like many past Snickers products, the Crunchers were marketed with a theme of universal humor that both kids and adults could understand. The debut Cruncher ads, which showed consumers how they could ''crunch'' out their frustrations, used a similar approach to the then-current Snickers campaign, ''Hungry? Grab a Snickers.'' One such Snickers ad portrayed a hungry football team that was too pumped up to find its way onto the field. This kind of wit was used in Snickers Cruncher advertisements.

TARGET MARKET

Snickers had become America's best-selling candy bar, not only among kids, but among adults, too. Therefore its advertising had to take an approach that would appeal across generations. To achieve this Mars promoted Snickers with a specific kind of humor that involved elements of silliness and wit, which made it appealing to both children and adults. In ''Car Alarm,'' for instance, a woman threw her couch out of her apartment window onto a car below to stop an annoying car alarm. While children might laugh over the sheer ridiculousness of the situation, an adult could better relate to the satisfaction one might achieve from doing such a thing. Mars had established that the core target audience for Snickers was 12- to 24-year-olds, but at the same it kept its older snackers in mind. Such taglines as ''Hungry? Grab a Snickers,'' or ''Hungry? Why Wait,'' coincided with moments that both kids and adults would find funny. It was with a similar approach that Mars targeted the Snickers Cruncher Bar.

COMPETITION

The dramatic rivalry between Mars and the Hershey Company appeared to have been created in fiction. Between them, insults were traded and rumors were

EVERY LAST ''M''

Mars Inc. aimed for perfection in the manufacturing of its products. Total cleanliness and meticulousness were essential at the company. According to Joël Brenner's book The Emperors of Chocolate: Inside the Secret World of Hershey and Mars, it was said that the bacteria level on a Mars factory floor was less than the average level in a household sink. Such perfection was a goal in all aspects of Mars's manufacturing. Every m on an M&M and each squiggle on top of a chocolate bar were scrupulously tracked. The slightest imperfection on a piece of chocolate caused it to be tossed into the trash, leading to the discarding of millions of M&M's candies on any given day.

spread. They battled for the spot of America's top candy maker, the world's top candy maker, and even the U.S. military's top candy maker. Mars had placed itself inside a fortress, guarded and mysterious. As a private company, it was able to sustain this image more easily than most. Hershey, too, maintained an element of mystery, especially when guarding its chocolate secrets. But as a public company, much more information was made available.

This public information did not appear to have hurt the Hershey Company, which had become the top candy seller in North America. With sales near $4.5 billion (with more than half of this from chocolate alone) and a net income of nearly $600 million, the company had been a phenomenon ever since it sold its first nickel bar in 1900. Over the decades Hershey expanded dramatically, ultimately producing many of the world's favorite indulgences, including Reese's Peanut Butter Cups, Twizzlers licorice, Mounds/Almond Joy bars, York peppermint patties, and Hershey's Kisses chocolates. The company also ventured into the grocery-goods business by selling such products as baking chocolate and peanut butter.

While Mars promoted its new Snickers Cruncher, Hershey was marketing several new products of its own. In 2001, for example, Hershey launched the Big Kat chocolate wafer bar (a larger version of its Kit Kat), which immediately competed with the Snickers Cruncher. But even more significant was Hershey's continual extension of its Reese's line, which represented the biggest competition for Snickers. The Reese's products had been expanding since the peanut butter cup was first introduced in the 1920s. New editions of the product included Reese's Fast Break as well as alternate versions of the peanut butter cup.

Meanwhile, the food giant Nestlé, which offered such chocolate treats as Nestlé Crunch and Smarties, had become the world leader in chocolate sales. In 2004 its sales of candy and cookies reached $7.1 billion. With overall sales exceeding $76 billion, Nestlé had become not only the world's top seller of chocolate but also the number one distributor of food. Among Mars's other competitors was London-based food giant Cadbury Schweppes, which took its own share of the chocolate market. The company, largely known in the United States for its Cadbury Creme Egg, also sold chocolate bars as well as soft drinks, juice products, and gum. In 2004 its total sales neared $13 billion.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Snickers added incredible wealth, in the form of over $250 million a year, to the already lucrative Mars, Inc. The Snickers Bar was first introduced in 1930, when it was sold for a nickel. Soon thereafter, it became an American favorite. In an attempt to reap further benefits from its popularity, in 2000 Mars launched an effort that would add several new products under the Snickers name.

In a $40 million television and print campaign, Mars and its ad agency, BBDO New York, launched Snickers Cruncher, which the Snickers website described as a ''crispy, crunchy chocolate bar packed with roasted peanuts, caramel and milk chocolate that's not just crunchy. It's beyond crunchy.'' Filled with crisped rice, the candy bar seemed to have mimicked Hershey's Whatchamacallit, which was introduced in 1978. But although a goal of the campaign was to steal market share from rival Hershey's, competing with the Whatchamacallit was not the primary focus. In creating a new Snickers line of goodies, Mars intended to do with Snickers what Hershey had done to expand its Reese's line.

BBDO developed a series of creative and witty ads and commercials to promote the Snickers Cruncher. The television spots, including ''SUV,'' ''Telemarketer,'' ''Car Alarm,'' and ''Popular Phrases,'' provided humorous examples of people smashing or shattering things in order to alleviate frustration. In ''Car Alarm'' a woman, irritated by the sound of a car alarm, shoved a sofa out her apartment window, crushing the offending car. Another spot showed people buying annoying talking dolls from a street vendor, only so that they could stomp them to pieces. After each scene, a voice-over stated the tagline, ''Hungry? Crunch this,'' which suggested that eating the Snickers Cruncher was a more positive way to act on one's urge to ''crunch'' something.

Mars also considered it important for the campaign to be consistent with advertising for the original Snickers Bar. As Bob Gamgort, the company's general manager for chocolate, explained to USA Today's Theresa Howard, ''The feel and humor of the Cruncher ads feels like Snickers. . . . This is a way to keep them within the Snickers franchise when they are looking for a crunchy texture. That is why the spots have a very simple message.'' The spots represented the new candy bar as the Snickers that consumers were already familiar with, but with a satisfying crunch.

OUTCOME

Snickers Cruncher met with immediate success. Within six months of its launch it became a top-10 candy bar in the chocolate confection category, according to the Chocolate Manufacturers Association of the United States. While the Snickers name helped to boost the new candy bar to the top, the multimillion-dollar ad campaign also played a role. The television spots, which used the clever humor of regular Snickers campaigns, were hugely successful with viewers. Six months after the campaign's debut, USA Today reported that 34 percent of respondents to its Ad Track survey liked the ads ''a lot.'' This was significantly higher than the Ad Track survey average of 22 percent. Among those aged 18 to 24, the ads were incredibly popular, with 61 percent giving them positive ratings. Because the target market was 12- to-24-year-olds, this latter number marked a triumph of the campaign.

The ''Snickers Cruncher'' campaign's success contributed to the continuation of the new Snickers line. In 2002 Mars introduced the Snickers Almond Bar. This marked a time of expensive marketing efforts by Snickers. Simultaneously, the Snickers brand became a sponsor of the immensely popular Survivor reality-television show as well as an official sponsor of the NFL. In 2004 the Snickers line was expanded in a way that catered to healthier eaters, with the introduction of Snickers Marathon, an energy bar that boasted of 16 vitamins and surplus of protein. According to Mars, Snickers Marathon was ''the first energy bar in history with a taste worthy of the Snickers brand name.'' The continued expansion of the line sparked new advertisements, which followed the old Snickers theme of smart humor.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. ''Snickers Gives Birth to Cruncher.'' Brandweek, June 5, 2000.

''Beloved Bars Will Bounce Right Back.'' Australian (Sydney), July 4, 2005, p. 14.

Brenner, Joël G. The Emperors of Chocolate: Inside the Secret World of Hershey and Mars. New York: Bantam Dell Publishing Group, 2000.

Buckley, Neil, Jeremy Grant, and Juliana Ratner. ''Candy's Dandy but Strategy Remains the Key.'' Financial Times, August 2, 2002, p. 24.

Elliott, Stuart. ''Mars Unit Looks to Merge Marketing.'' New York Times, November 3, 2003, p. 13.

Fairclough, Gordon. ''Mars Inc. Faces Unclear Future Due to Death.'' Wall Street Journal, July 6, 1999, p. 22.

Falcon, Mike. ''Super Bowl Ads Neglect Nutrition.'' USA Today, January 29, 2001.

Guy, Sandra. ''Chicago Hosts a Taste of Candymakers' Latest.'' Chicago Sun-Times, June 6, 2000, p. 54.

Hoffman, Ken. ''Candy Bar Ice Cream Best of Both Whirls.'' Houston Chronicle, June 23, 2000, p. 7.

Howard, Theresa. ''Candy Bar Breaks Crispy New Ground.'' USA Today, June 4, 2001.

Laucius, Joanne, and Zev Singer. ''Mars Bars: The Tyrant's Chocolate of Choice: Sweet Treats Found in Tiny Hideout.'' Ottawa (Ontario) Citizen, December 16, 2003, p. A3.

''Mars Inc.'' Washington Post, April 25, 2005, p. T60.

Pandya, Nick. ''Rise: Cool Companies: No 84 Mars Inc.'' Guardian (Manchester), July 27, 2002, p. 5.

''2 Candy Makers Raising Wholesale Prices.'' New York Times, December 12, 2002, p. 14.

Candice L. Mancini

Maryland State Lottery Agency

Montgomery Park Business Center
1800 Washington Blvd., Ste. 330
Baltimore, Maryland 21230
USA
Telephone: (410) 230-8800
Fax: (410) 230-8800
Web site: www.mdlottery.com

■■■

CASH IN HAND CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

As the Maryland Lottery, run by the Maryland State Lottery Agency, entered its 25th year in 1998, it found itself struggling. After the lottery first began in 1973, sales and popularity grew rapidly. By the mid-1990s, however, players had begun to lose interest, and they seemed inclined to hold out for enormous jackpots rather than play regularly. Despite new games and promotional efforts, the Maryland Lottery suffered from a 7 percent decline in ticket sales between 1996 and 1997. To turn around the ailing lottery, which had become the state government's third-largest source of revenue, a new director was brought on board, new games were introduced, and a new advertising agency, Eisner & Associates, Inc., was hired in 1997. In addition, Maryland's governor, Parris N. Glendening, proposed adding $2 million to the lottery's advertising budget for 1998, raising it to $13.7 million.

The lottery's new director, Buddy Roogow, explained to the Baltimore Sun that the lottery agency would adopt a new strategy for attracting customers and would stress the amusement aspect of playing the lottery over the possibility of becoming rich. Roogow stated, "We're fighting for the entertainment dollar." Eisner & Associates created the "Cash in Hand" campaign, which introduced a new game launched in early 1998. It was one of several promotions for various Maryland Lottery products. In keeping with Roogow's mission, the two television spots developed for the campaign were entertaining and humorous. They featured animated characters attempting to explain the basic concept of the Cash in Hand game—that the top prize of $500,000 was awarded in one lump sum, "all at once," rather than in annual allotments. The amusing spots aired on major network affiliates and cable channels during prime-time viewing hours.

The "Cash in Hand" campaign played a major role in reviving the fortunes of the Maryland Lottery, which, despite increased competition from Powerball and other multistate jackpots, was able to increase revenues in 1998. The campaign also received recognition from the advertising industry.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Citizens took to heart the Maryland Lottery's marketing slogan of the 1970s, "You've Gotta Play to Win!," making the lottery an instant success. When a daily game was introduced in 1976 to accompany the weekly drawing, lottery sales increased almost fivefold during the following two years. Annual sales of the daily game, Pick 3, reached a high point in 1985 at nearly $475 million. Proceeds from lottery sales went into the state's general fund and helped support such government services and programs as education, human resources, and public health. And as the third-largest revenue source for the state, after income and sales taxes, the state grew accustomed to and dependent upon the income.

The days of lottery fever, however, inevitably began to dwindle. In the mid-1990s the Maryland Lottery faced growing competition from ever-increasing casinos and other forms of gambling and gaming as well as from lotteries that cropped up in neighboring states and regions. As reported by Maryland's Department of Fiscal Services, lottery sales through April 20, 1997, were off by $56.5 million compared to the previous fiscal year. To boost sales, lottery director Roogow implemented an aggressive new strategy to renew enthusiasm and inject energy into the lottery. Roogow not only altered the prize rules of some games to enable more players to win smaller prizes, but he also developed cooperative business partnerships with private companies to transform losing lottery tickets into coupons and introduced several new games, including Cash in Hand. The agency also joined forces with several other states in 1996 to offer the Big Game, a jackpot game.

The Maryland Lottery, Roogow believed, also needed a change in image to generate interest, and the most effective means of accomplishing this was through advertising. To that end the lottery broke with its agency since 1982, Trahan, Burden & Charles Inc., and granted Baltimore-based Eisner & Associates a three-year contract. Roogow planned to do away with traditional lottery ads that showed mansions and fur coats and other luxuries. "We want to portray excitement," Roogow told the Baltimore Sun, "... and move away from the dreams and fantasies of other campaigns... Those images of mansions promote unrealism to people." With an increase in the advertising budget of 16 percent in 1998, Roogow hoped to promote the many products offered by the Maryland Lottery, rather than focusing on jackpot games, and to create an atmosphere of fun.

IT COULD BE YOU... BUT IT PROBABLY WON'T

Buddy Roogow, director of the Maryland State Lottery Agency, was vocal and blunt about the remote chances of winning large jackpots and had a slogan of his own—"It could be you... but it probably won't." "It's not fair to give the implication that it's easy to win $1 million," Roogow told the Wall Street Journal. "There's a one in seven million chance to win the jackpot in the Lotto game. That's why we emphasize the fun of playing. A government body has to be socially responsible." To encourage people to play more frequently, Roogow shifted the Maryland Lottery's efforts toward instant-win games and scratch-off tickets, offering more players more chances to win.

TARGET MARKET

The Maryland Lottery hoped to attract new players as well as those who had abandoned lottery games because of disinterest or for gaming alternatives, such as casino gambling. The agency also intended to lure players living in nearby communities, such as the Washington, D.C., area. Roogow told the Washington Post, "One of the important thrusts of new advertising money is to try to improve our presence in the Maryland suburbs of Washington... We believe that we can and should be able to do better there." In addition to more advertising, Roogow believed that offering more "winning experiences," albeit smaller prizes, would also attract additional players, as studies had demonstrated that one of the reasons people stopped playing lottery games was because they did not win.

Although Roogow claimed that the Maryland Lottery did not direct its marketing toward a particular demographic group, reports indicated that those who played heavily and regularly tended to come from lower-income brackets. An annual survey conducted for the Maryland Lottery by Market Facts, Inc., found that in 1997, of heavy players (those spending at least $10 per week), nearly half did not hold a high school diploma, about half earned less than $20,000 a year, and more than 60 percent were of African-American descent. The study also noted that the state's players were "more likely to be male, less educated and more downscale" than nonplayers. Although the actual market for lottery products could be quantified, Roogow insisted in the Washington Post, "We do not try to appeal to a specific group of people."

COMPETITION

Lotteries were illegal from 1894 to 1964, but by the late 1990s more than 35 U.S. states offered state-run lotteries. Between 1970 and 1996, according to the Atlantic Economic Journal, lottery sales rose from $49.2 million to $34 billion, producing net revenues of $34 billion in 1996. With the possibility of such profits, it was no surprise that the Maryland Lottery found itself facing strong competition from neighboring states and communities, particularly Washington, D.C., and Virginia. The District of Columbia's lottery, which began in 1982, presented a threat to Maryland particularly between 1992 and 1995, when sales grew 57 percent, but beginning in 1996 its sales began to drop. Still, in 1996, according to La Fleur's 1996 World Lottery Almanac, the District of Columbia was the third-ranked state lottery in terms of per capita sales, while the Maryland Lottery was ranked eighth. And though the Virginia lottery, which started in 1988, made it only to number 19 on the list, it advertised aggressively and had a well-known marketing character known as Lady Luck.

Not only did the Maryland Lottery face competition from other lotteries, but it also struggled against those opposed to gaming. Economist Peter Reuter of the University of Maryland said to the Journal Record, "This is a large, terribly regressive tax on a service sold by a state monopoly." The prolottery contingent maintained that the lottery benefited the community by providing funds for education and other civic services and that playing the lottery was voluntary, but its arguments often fell flat. The University of Maryland's Julian Simon told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, "The states do not simply offer their product to the public. They promote hard. Lottery advertisements are beguilingly seductive, and misleading to boot." And consumer activist Ralph Nader commented in the Washington Post, "The whole thing is unseemly, for the state to encourage gambling."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Cash in Hand" campaign, launched in early 1998, consisted of two television spots as well as some radio and point-of-sale promotions. The television commercials ran during such popular prime-time programs as ER and NYPD Blue. Eisner creative director Bill Mitchell discussed the concept behind the Claymation commercials in Adweek and said, "The key concept for this product is that if you match seven numbers between one and thirty-one, you win all the cash, all at one time." The agency's research had demonstrated that most people wanted to receive their prize money all at once rather than in increments. "We were looking for a simple, endearing and demonstrative way to communicate this message," Mitchell explained. Mitchell stated that he and writer Brian Kelley had come up with the idea behind the campaign while eating in a restaurant. "Surrounding us were all these great containers full of ketchup, sugar, oatmeal and syrup that could be used to demonstrate a lot pouring out—all at one time," Mitchell explained.

One of the spots, entitled "Diner," featured two male Claymation characters seated at a counter with large plates filled with breakfast foods. The brunet male put his newspaper down and said, "Imagine getting half-a-million dollars all at once." The blond male then asked, "All at once? What do you mean?" The brunet replied, "You know, all at once," and then, to demonstrate, he emptied an entire container of sugar into the blond's coffee cup. "Oh, I see. So this isn't all at once," the blond replied, putting some ketchup on the brunette's eggs, "but this is all at once." He then squeezed the ketchup bottle so that the entire contents squirted up into the air and landed on the brunet's head. The interplay continued, with the brunet placing a whole bowl of oatmeal in the blond's lower lip. The blond then picked up a meringue pie, ready to demonstrate "all at once" in the brunet's face. As the Cash in Hand logo appeared on the screen, the voice-over said, "Play Cash in Hand from the Maryland Lottery. It pays you half-a-million dollars all at once. Just like that." The spot then cut back to the Claymation characters, the blond still holding the pie. A third character walking by the counter overheard the two males and asked, "All at once? What do you mean?" To which the eyes of the two mischievous males grew wide.

The second spot, "Missed It," was also set at the diner counter and also starred two male Claymation characters. A heavyset character told his neighbor, "If my numbers win, I get half-a-million all at once." The thinner male, seated before a large salad, asked, "All at once?" The first male then attempted to demonstrate the concept by placing an entire baked potato in his mouth. The thin character was momentarily distracted, however, and looked away while the feat was being accomplished. When he turned back, he prompted the heavyset male, "Go ahead." The male then swallowed his steak all at once, but the thin man was once again looking away. At the end of the spot the heavyset male had a stack of empty plates in front of him, but his neighbor still had not seen him consume anything "all at once."

Aside from the creative success of the "Cash in Hand" campaign, Eisner made a fundamental change to the Maryland Lottery brand. Instead of focusing on the promise of riches, as embodied by the tagline from previous campaigns, "It Could Be You," the Maryland Lottery now emphasized the fun of playing lottery games, reflected by the new tagline: "Let Yourself Play." Not only was it a more honest approach, since the odds of winning remained low, but it also gave consumers "permission" to play lottery games even when they knew it was in many respects a poor investment.

OUTCOME

Thanks in part to clever and entertaining marketing, the Maryland Lottery enjoyed a stellar 1998. While other states were placing increased efforts on multistate jackpots such as Powerball, rather than investing in their own lotteries, the Maryland agency chose to advance its state lottery products. Although state lotteries that were not part of Powerball experienced about a 5 percent decrease in revenue in 1998, Maryland's lottery sales rose 3 percent, to $1.07 billion. And for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1998, Maryland gained profits of more than $400 million, a record and an increase of 2 percent over the previous year. Gross ticket sales grew 2.8 percent, reaching nearly $1.1 billion. The Maryland Lottery reported that more than $367.6 million was deposited into the state's general fund and that more than $566.1 million, 53 percent of gross sales, went toward prize monies. Cash in Hand players, for example, received a total of $5.8 million in prizes.

The "Cash in Hand" campaign succeeded in launching the Cash in Hand game, which proved popular enough to be offered until September 2002. The campaign was also recognized with a number of awards, including a Clio for "Diner" and recognition from the New York Festival's 41st Annual Television Advertising Awards. Moreover, Eisner continued to create winning campaigns, as well as products, for the Maryland Lottery. A television spot created for the "Pumpkin Chunkin" campaign was honored with the Best of Show award at the 27th Annual Best in Baltimore ADDY Awards in 2001. Every year that Eisner held the account, the Maryland Lottery increased sales and exceeded goals. The ad agency also succeeded in repositioning the lottery brand. Marketing surveys showed steady increases in important measures, in particular when respondents were asked if they agreed with the statement "the games are fun even if you don't win." After five years the Maryland Lottery account was put into review in 2002 as mandated by law, but no one was surprised when Eisner retained the business. "I believe they've done an outstanding job in the five years they've had the contract," Buddy Roogow, director of the Maryland State Lottery Agency, told the Baltimore Sun. "I'm very excited about the direction we've been going and where we're going in the future."

FURTHER READING

Arney, June. "Doner and Eisner Share Best-of-Show at Addys." Baltimore Sun, March 13, 2001.

———. "Eisner Wins Md. Lottery Deal." Baltimore Sun, April 18, 2002.

Babington, Charles. "Md. Trying to Attract More Lottery Players." Washington Post, September 24, 1997, p. B1.

Chinoy, Ira, and Charles Babington. "Lotteries Lure Players with Slick Marketing." Washington Post, May 4, 1998, p. A1.

———. "Low-Income Players Feed Lottery Cash Cow." Washington Post, May 3, 1998, p. A1.

Conklin, J.C. "Winning Lotto Motto: 'Could Be You . . . Probably Won't,' " Wall Street Journal, May 24, 1999, p. B1.

Fitzgerald, Nora. "All in One Lump Sum." Adweek, May 25, 1998, p. 4.

———. "Eisner's Creativity, Prize Are Right as It Captures Maryland Lottery." Adweek, May 5, 1997, p. 3.

Kappalman, Samantha. "Ad Firm Won Lottery Betting on Consumers." Baltimore Sun, October 3, 1997, p. C1.

Kline, Alan. "Lottery Seeks Firm that's Just the Ticket." Washington Times, January 13, 1997, p. D8.

Reed, Keith T. "Lottery Ad Campaign in Review." Baltimore Business Journal, January 21, 2002.

Mariko Fujinaka
Ed Dinger

MasterCard International

2000 Purchase Street
Purchase, New York 10577
USA
Telephone: (914) 249-2000
Fax: (914) 249-2000
Web site: www.mastercard.com.

■■■

PRICELESS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997 MasterCard International, the largest subsidiary of the credit card company MasterCard Incorporated, was reeling from years of unfocused campaign strategies. The industry leader, Visa International, posted sales of $1.65 billion in 1996, nearly double MasterCard's posted sales. In a saturated credit card market where companies jostled to find a place in consumers' wallets, it was essential for MasterCard to forge a powerful brand image that would bring new customers to MasterCard and convince current cardholders to use their MasterCards more often. "The bottom line is that we want people to like us, and we want MasterCard to be the first card they pull out," Lawrence Flanagan, the company's vice president of advertising, told American Banker. Hoping to develop an emotional bond with consumers and improve the MasterCard brand image, the company released its "Priceless" campaign.

With an estimated cost of $85 million to $100 million, the television, print, Internet, and billboard campaign was created by the ad agency McCann-Erickson New York. The campaign broke in October 1997 with TV spots that presented a number of scenarios in which intangible rewards were obtained by virtue of the purchase of various items. For instance, "Father/Son" depicted a father taking his son to a baseball game. The prices of various items were listed: "two tickets ($28); two hot dogs, two popcorns, and two sodas ($18); one autographed baseball ($45)." The final item, "Real conversation with 11-year-old son," was tallied as "Priceless." The versatility of both the tagline and the concept enabled McCann-Erickson to target nearly any market with advertising that was either humorous or sentimental.

By 2004 the campaign had appeared in 96 countries and had been translated into 46 languages. In addition to winning more than 100 awards, including advertising awards, by 2006 "Priceless" was credited with boosting MasterCard's market share in the intensely competitive credit card sector. Adweek referred to "Priceless" as "one of the industry's most admired campaigns."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

While MasterCard's chief competitor, Visa USA, had used the "It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign since 1985, MasterCard had struggled to devise a lasting brand image. MasterCard's "Master the Moment" campaign, which ended in 1993, attempted to position the card as a more upscale product. Component ads portrayed celebrities and other glamorous folk spending with carefree abandon. With its next campaign, however, MasterCard swung to another extreme. This effort, titled "It's More than a Credit Card: It's Smart Money," stressed the practicality of MasterCard. Rife with scenes of "everyday" people using MasterCard at ordinary places like the supermarket, "Smart Money" was MasterCard's attempt to carve out a unique niche for itself that distinguished it from the more aspirational messages of Visa and American Express Company (AmEx).

A still from Mastercard's "Priceless" campaign. IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Although MasterCard had sought to glorify middle-class values, the result was less than desirable. Its image seemed mired in stolid and unexciting connotations. While Visa had successfully represented itself as the universally accepted "globe-trotting card," "MasterCard was the everyday hardware-store card," a McCann-Erickson executive told Adweek. With its share of the domestic charge card market slipping to about 26 percent in 1996 (compared to Visa's 52 percent), MasterCard fired Ammirati Puris Lintas—its most recent ad agency—in March 1997 and turned to McCann-Erickson to revolutionize the way consumers perceived MasterCard.

TARGET MARKET

"Priceless" was a particularly strong campaign because it allowed MasterCard to address distinct audiences with individual commercials tailored to suit each market niche. With its broad goal of targeting consumers aged 18 to 54, MasterCard was faced with a seemingly formidable task of spanning generational and demographic divides. McCann's innovation was to maintain the overarching unity of "Priceless" at the same time that it pursued radically different groups. One important market for MasterCard was the massive baby-boom generation. The benefits of connecting with this audience were obvious. Not only were boomers vast in number, but they also wielded considerable spending power as they reached the pinnacles of their careers (and earning power). This niche of wealthy 40- and 50-somethings was the most sought-after segment in the credit card industry, according to Advertising Age. Catering to this population was challenging, though, and involved "subtly celebrat[ing] experience [while] squeamishly avoid[ing] terms like middle-aged," explained the Washington Post.

One way "Priceless" targeted boomers was to incorporate the realities of the generation into the campaign. Many of the advertisements featured attractive people in their 40s and 50s celebrating the rites of passage of mid-life. "India" portrayed an American couple escaping to India for their 25th wedding anniversary, while "Ireland" narrated a woman's return visit to her homeland with her adult daughter. Even more important, though, was the fact that component "Priceless" ads presented the values and mind-sets of this crucial demographic group. As an industry analyst told the Post, for boomers, "[l]ife is supposed to be a series of new adventures." Accordingly, "India," which first ran in January 1998, showed the anniversary couple boldly exploring India as a means of marking their time together, not simply cozying up in a restaurant close to home. MasterCard rejected Paris as the couple's destination because "that was deemed insufficiently exotic for adventure-minded boomers," noted the Post. A print ad with the "Priceless" moment described as "learning Mozart at 48" (on a $7,000 baby grand piano, no less) subtly flattered boomers: not only were they spirited enough to embark on new challenges, but also, they were not too old to be able to do so.

Other demographic groups were important to MasterCard as well. While boomers controlled a substantial portion of the market, consumers in their 20s were in the process of forming lifelong brand allegiances. As USA Today noted, younger consumers "tend to stick with the first card they use." "Zipper," which debuted at the same time as "India," specifically targeted "people in their early twenties," a MasterCard spokesperson told American Banker. The commercial employed a wry humor in its portrayal of a young man clumsily trying to strike up a conversation with an attractive woman in a coffeehouse. Many "Priceless" ads opted for more universal appeals altogether. In September 1998 MasterCard used the backdrop of the race between baseball sluggers Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa to break Roger Maris's long-standing home-run record. After cataloging the costs of the home-run extravaganza to scenes of the two players smacking long drives, the spot concluded "Sixty-two: Priceless."

COMPETITION

MasterCard's quest to bolster its brand and to incorporate its various products under one unified campaign was shared by its primary rivals, Visa and American Express. In the cutthroat credit card market, with consumers being constantly bombarded by new card offers, building a brand was the best way to remind consumers to use a specific card. Visa had mastered this strategy. Since 1985

A LITTLE TOO FLATTERING

In 1999 MasterCard International sued Home Box Office (HBO) over a "Priceless" parody the cable channel aired to promote its original series Arliss. The show featured a slimy and corrupt sports agent as its title character. The offending commercial portrayed Arliss engaging in various shady transactions and concluded with the tagline: "There are some men money can't buy. Arliss isn't one of them."

the company's "It's Everywhere You Want to Be" ads unstintingly trumpeted that Visa was the most universally accepted card in the world. Although this campaign directly attacked AmEx, it had also succeeded in marginalizing MasterCard. "Everywhere" had implied "that if Visa targets AmEx, then Visa makes MasterCard irrelevant," an industry analyst told Card News. "Everywhere" ads in 1998 pursued niche markets such as Generation X consumers, Internet shoppers, and affluent baby boomers.

In addition to "Everywhere," Visa launched its "Works Like a Check" campaign in 1997 to boost usage of its debit card, the CheckCard. These commercials, created by ad agency BBDO (which also handled the "Everywhere" account), featured easily recognizable celebrities, such as Bob Dole and Shirley MacLaine, who were thwarted in their efforts to write a check because they did not have identification handy. "Our long-term strategy is to move from being the world's best credit card to the world's best way to pay," a Visa spokesperson told Advertising Age. Visa also had several high-profile sponsorships, which further highlighted its name and brand messages. Especially effective were its affiliations with the National Football League, the Olympic Games, and horse racing's Triple Crown races—the Kentucky Derby, the Belmont Stakes, and the Preakness. But in a testament to the brutally competitive nature of the industry, Visa's share of the market declined slightly in 1997 despite all these efforts.

In 1996 AmEx began a massive branding campaign conceived by ad agency Ogilvy & Mather that sought to bring new customers to the American Express flock. Like "Priceless," AmEx's "Do More" strove to use the overarching campaign to promote all of AmEx's services and cards. Although it had long prided itself on its elite consumer core, AmEx had experienced a dramatic loss of market share in the early 1990s. To reverse this trend the company used "Do More" as a vehicle to attract younger consumers as well as a more diverse base of cardholders. Print ads and television spots in 1998 featured multiracial golf sensation Tiger Woods, comedian Jerry Seinfeld, snowboard pioneer Jake Burton, and basketball legend Earvin "Magic" Johnson. "The message is that American Express has a broad range of financial services for various life stages and lifestyles," said American Banker. After years of slippage AmEx's share of the market rose to 17 percent in 1997 from 16.4 percent the year before. In 1998, however, AmEx once more lost ground to Visa and MasterCard.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The hallmark of the "Priceless" campaign was its consistency. Every MasterCard commercial, regardless of the specific product touted or the intended target audience, bore the same tagline and the same format of "shopping list" and "priceless" moment. The reason was clear. In the ultracompetitive market staying "on message" was essential to convincing consumers to pull out MasterCard from their card-stuffed wallets. As one analyst told Direct, the key to credit card marketing was "to do something habit forming to build use of the card." MasterCard wanted its products inextricably linked to the "Priceless" theme in consumers' minds. To this end the company crafted "Priceless" ads for an array of offerings. For example, a commercial that debuted in June 1998 touted MasterCard's debit card: after showing a hardware store checkout line moving with glacial speed as a supervisor was called to approve a routine check purchase, the "Priceless" moment was described as "Never having to wait for Al"—the hapless manager—"again." MasterCard's Platinum card was the focus of both the "Ireland" and "India" spots. Even the company's corporate sponsorships were included. As the official sponsor of Major League Baseball MasterCard seamlessly incorporated its baseball-themed spots into "Priceless." In addition to the Sosa/McGwire commercial, MasterCard released a touching vignette about taking children to their first ball game in time for the 1998 World Series. MasterCard's sponsorship of World Cup soccer was the focus of yet another "Priceless" ad that used the patriotic image of the American flag as its "priceless" episode.

To keep its marketing message foremost in consumers' minds the company selected high-profile media venues to carry "Priceless" commercials. "Zipper" and "India" debuted during the 1998 Super Bowl because that game "is the showcase event . . . to reach the largest audience in one shot," a MasterCard executive told American Banker. Acquiring this massive viewership was crucial if MasterCard was to succeed in its quest "to become the Coca-Cola of currency," he added. Other "Priceless" commercials were aired during subsequent Super Bowls. On the broadcast of the 2004 game the cartoon character Homer Simpson appeared in a spot, using his MasterCard to purchase items at a convenience store. The next year a 30-second spot depicted more than 10 advertising icons, such as Count Chocula and the Pillsbury Doughboy, gathering around a dinner table. The spot ended with the voice-over "Getting everyone together for dinner? Priceless." The 2006 Super Bowl featured the actor Richard Dean Anderson, who in the 1980s had starred in the popular TV adventure series MacGyver, escaping from a bomb-rigged building by using everyday items that he purchased with his Debit MasterCard.

MasterCard opted to debut its first-ever Internet-oriented ad on another prominent television program—the final episode of the popular show Seinfeld. This commercial, which hyped MasterCard's alliance with Excite, was MasterCard's attempt to introduce television viewers to the ease of online shopping. The commercial was a perfect illustration of MasterCard's plan to expand its markets through the "Priceless" campaign. The spot depicted a busy mother who purchased her children's clothes on Excite's shopping channel with her MasterCard. The time she has saved provided her with a "Priceless" moment of being able to relax. E-commerce afforded credit card companies tantalizing opportunities. Unlike typical retail transactions, Internet purchases were almost entirely made with credit cards. Even though only a small fraction of consumers had ever tried buying products online, many analysts foresaw an explosion of online retail business. Debit cards were becoming more common as well and—like Internet commerce—offered MasterCard the chance to win new customers without cannibalizing its base, as debit cards mainly competed against cash and checks as payment options.

The campaign branched out with side storylines carrying the "Priceless" theme. In 2004 the "Dog Trilogy" featured three spots telling the story of a lost puppy who was helped back home by various do-gooders. One of the commercials earned Adweek's Best Spot recognition. The same year MasterCard released its first Ramadan-themed campaign that targeted consumers in the Middle East. One spot featured a traveling Arab businessman who used his MasterCard to spend time with his family.

OUTCOME

The campaign was an undisputed success. After only three months MasterCard noted a rise in consumer awareness about the brand. The company told American Banker that its "share of wallet" increased 0.4 percentage points in the first six months of "Priceless." The magazine attributed this to "MasterCard steadying its course." The company reported that its share of the domestic credit card market reached 26.9 percent in 1998, up from 26.4 percent in 1997. From 1997 until 2002 MasterCard's sales increased from $1.08 billion to $1.89 billion. "They've hit a grand slam with this one," an industry analyst told American Banker. If imitation was the sincerest form of flattery, the campaign's ability to boost consumers' awareness was also evidenced by the number of spoofs of the campaign that cropped up on programs such as Saturday Night Live, the Late Show with David Letterman, and The Simpsons. Joyce King Thomas, deputy creative director at McCann-Erickson, estimated in 2004 that the campaign had been parodied about 50 times. "It just says that it's part of popular culture when it's used on programming," she said in Adweek.

By the start of 2006 the "Priceless" campaign had aired in 105 countries and had been translated into 48 languages. The campaign collected more than 100 awards, including both a 2001 and 2006 Gold EFFIE Award in the Sustained Success category, which recognized campaigns with three or more years of sustained growth. It also won a Bronze Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival, Adweek magazine's Spot of the Year award, and an Advertising Women of New York "Good" Award. In 2002 there were 590 million MasterCards in circulation. Nonetheless, an effective brand campaign from Visa had helped MasterCard's fiercest competitor remain number one as "Priceless" entered its fifth year. In 2002 Visa posted sales of 4.8 billion, more than double the $1.89 billion recorded by MasterCard.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "National Lampoon." Adweek, August 9, 2004, p. 18.

Arndorfer, James. "Credit Card Industry Attempts to Build Usage in Tight Market." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998.

Bloom, Jennifer Kingston. "Card Brands to Clash in Super Bowl of Advertising." American Banker, January 23, 1998.

Boorstein, Jonathon. "Credit Card Crisis." Direct, December 1, 1998.

Chester, Rodney. "It's Been Parodied." Courier-Mail (Brisbane, Australia), July 1, 2004, p. 3.

Coulton, Antoinette. "MasterCard Ads Push for a New Consistency." American Banker, October 28, 1997.

Farey-Jones, Daniel. "MasterCard Takes to the Air and Online for Brits Campaign." Brand Republic, January 17, 2005, p. 1.

"Issuers' Advertising Strategies Target Consumer Values." Card News, May 25, 1998.

Kim, Hank. "Inside Priceless: MasterCard Moments." Adweek, April 12, 1999.

"MasterCard 'Dog Trilogy.'" Advertising Age's Creativity, April 1, 2005, p. 22.

Meece, Mickey. "Career Tracks: AmEx Goes Well Beyond Cards with New TV Spots Series." American Banker, June 18, 1996.

Span, Paula,"A New Wrinkle for Madison Avenue." Washington Post, March 24, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

Mattel, Inc.

333 Continental Boulevard
El Segundo, California 90245-5012
USA
Telephone: (310) 252-2000
Fax: (310) 252-2180
Web site: www.mattel.com

■■■

PLAY. LAUGH. GROW. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With the popularity of video games infringing upon the children's-toy industry, the largest toy manufacturers reported that the maximum age of children playing with toys dropped from 12 years old in 1981 to 8 years old by 2001. Even for children under 8, traditional toys were losing ground to electronic learning toys, a category that increased by 60 percent in four years. The rise was attributed to the developing population of Generation X mothers, who valued toys that combined playing with learning. Mattel, Inc., led the toy industry with brands such as Hot Wheels, Barbie, and Fisher-Price, but LeapFrog Enterprises, Inc., was one of the industry's fastest-growing competitors with its smash hit, the LeapPad, an electronic book that attempted to make learning fun. To rebrand itself as a toy maker that also fused playing with learning, Fisher-Price released its "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign.

Created by ad agency Young & Rubicam Brands, "Play. Laugh. Grow." was estimated to cost $25 million, making it the most expensive campaign in Fisher-Price's history. It started in September 2003 and used print ads and television spots. Ten commercials appeared across network and cable channels to tout the brand's latest products, which included the PowerTouch, an electronic book-holder that taught preschoolers reading as well as subjects such as science, geography, and mathematics. One television spot showed preschoolers giggling and learning to read with PowerTouch. By 2004 the campaign had refocused on the burgeoning demographic of Latina mothers, and commercials began airing in Spanish across television and radio.

Even though the toy industry had been waning for years and Mattel posted a sales decrease in 2004, "Play. Laugh. Grow." helped Fisher-Price's sales increase 7 percent, making it one of Mattel's most successful brands. The campaign also won a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005. John Taylor, a toy analyst at Arcadia Investment, an institutional research group in Portland Oregon, explained in the Wall Street Journal, "This is Mattel's first salvo in a market LeapFrog dominates and is likely to dominate for a long time. But Fisher-Price isn't going away, and the final outcome of this battle won't be determined for some time."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Mattel purchased Fisher-Price, a toy manufacturer for preschoolers, in the early 1990s, Mattel already owned such brands as Barbie and Match Box. The acquisition soon paid off for the industry leader. Top-selling Fisher-Price items, such as the brand's trademark lines Activity Table, Little People, Rescue Heroes, and See 'N Say, helped Fisher-Price increase sales by 26 percent in 2001. Fisher-Price formed strategic alliances with companies such as Procter & Gamble, which solicited new products to mothers in prenatal education classes. That same year ad agency Young & Rubicam formulated a campaign titled "Oh, the Possibilities!" which utilized print, including a direct mailer for expectant mothers entitled "The First Year." Fisher-Price began reducing its dependency on colossal retailers like Wal-Mart and Target by selling merchandise online and through direct-mail catalogues. By 2002, even though Fisher-Price was still increasing its sales, LeapFrog had gained significant market share by developing electronic learning toys, such as the LeapPad. From the mid-1990s to 2002 more than nine million LeapPads were sold, an achievement connected to the growing population of Generation X mothers, who preferred toys that combined playing with learning. A generation earlier baby-boomer mothers had treated learning and playing as two separate activities.

In 2003 toy brands were also rethinking their entire marketing strategies. Big sales on one-hit items such as Beanie Babies and Razor Scooters had become less frequent. "We're all transitioning from a phenomena-based, hit-driven business to a brand growth business as our center ground," Brian Goldner, president of the U.S. toys unit of toy company Hasbro, told Brandweek. "We're rediscovering the power of brands. The basics still ring true."

Young & Rubicam wanted to create a campaign that proved Fisher-Price was just as viable as LeapPad when it came to designing educational toys. "We want to remind today's mom that Fisher-Price is relevant and it's still important to their child," Chuck Scothon, senior vice president of marketing at Fisher-Price, told the Wall Street Journal.

SCIENCE OF PLAY

Fisher-Price, the maker of toys for preschool-aged children, was one of the few toy makers in the United States with laboratories to study what toys children liked. "The company has long realized and championed the importance of play in a child's development," the brand's United Kingdom marketing manager, Ruth Clement, told New Media Age, a magazine that covered the business of interactive media. "In the laboratories, children are observed by our researchers so we can get a better idea of the stages a child goes through and what toys can aid them in that."

TARGET MARKET

"Play. Laugh. Grow." initially targeted mothers who were part of Generation X, a classification of Americans and Canadians born between 1965 and 1976. By 2003 mothers in this age range were purchasing 65 percent more toys than baby-boomer (born in the 1940s through early 1960s) mothers. When it came to toy selection Generation X mothers preferred electronic learning toys that combined the process of learning with playing. Baby-boomer mothers tended to separate their learning toy purchases from play toys. Fathers from Generation X were also more involved with toy purchasing than baby-boomer fathers. To specifically target Generation X mothers, however, Fisher-Price created commercials that showed preschool children having fun while learning with Fisher-Price products.

In 2004 the campaign refocused on another target market. Influenced by research conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau, which stated one out of every five U.S.-born child was Hispanic, "Play. Laugh. Grow." began targeting the Latino communities of Los Angeles, Houston, and Chicago. It was predicted that by 2010 the number of Hispanic children under nine years old would increase by 22 percent, while the same age of non-Hispanic children would decrease by 1 percent. Fisher-Price contracted Market Vision, an Hispanic advertising agency, to create Spanish television and radio spots for the campaign. Bonnie Garcia, president of Market Vision, told the PR Newswire, "The Latina mom is young. Her child is at the center of her universe and she's very much involved in her family and in her community. As a brand of toys and juvenile products, Fisher-Price is uniquely positioned to offer her everything she needs to give her family the best possible start in life."

COMPETITION

Founded in 1995, LeapFrog developed electronic learning toys that used interactive games to teach children subjects such as phonics, reading, math, writing, music, geography, and spelling. Generation X mothers, looking for toys that made learning fun, quickly became fans of the brand's LeapPad, an electronic toy into which a book was placed; it taught preschoolers different subjects depending on what cartridge was inserted. LeapPad's popularity catapulted the brand's earnings. Net sales rose from $160.1 million in 2000 to $313.7 million in 2001. LeapFrog's success prompted Fisher-Price to strategize its own advertisement for the electronic-learning toys category. "People get the impression that Fisher-Price will

POPULAR BRANDS

Wunderman, a unit of advertising agency Young & Rubicam Brands, conducted a survey in 2002 to discover what brands were most popular with women. Fisher-Price was selected as one of the most popular, along with Starbucks, Tylenol, Google, and Discover. Among the least popular were Hertz, adidas, RadioShack, Avis, and PlayStation.

buy their way into the category,'' Mike Wood, LeapFrog's founder and chief executive, told the Wall Street Journal. ''But we've got nine million parents telling other parents about how their children learned to read on the LeapPad.''

As LeapFrog's popularity grew, so did its product line. The company continued developing products for newborn children all the way up to children 16 years of age. In 2003 the ad agency Ackerman McQueen, Inc. released a wildly successful campaign titled ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' The campaign earned a Grand EFFIE Award in 2004 and cost LeapFrog more than $20 million. While other brands ran ads on Nickelodeon networks and during Saturday-morning cartoon shows, commercials for ''Learn Something New Every Day!'' targeted 25- to 49-year-old-mothers by appearing during such shows as Oprah and The View and on the Oxygen Network. Television spots showed parents, grandparents, and neighbors eager to give LeapFrog products as gifts to children.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In September 2003 the $25 million ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' campaign appeared in print and on television. The TV spots aired across network and cable stations. It was the largest campaign in Fisher-Price's history and positioned the brand to attract 20- to 30-year-old mothers. Ten initial television spots were created by Young & Rubicam, each depicting preschoolers playing and learning with Fisher-Price products. One commercial featured children playing with Fisher-Price's Little People, plastic figurines that taught children about farming, transportation, and even historical subjects such as the Middle Ages.

Another 30-second spot featured Fisher-Price's new PowerTouch toy, a product similar to the LeapPad. When a PowerTouch book with embedded software, such as Dora's Alphabet Adventure Game, was placed into the PowerTouch cradle, the cradle would talk children through the book's storyline. Children could then interact with the book by pressing down on certain words, objects, or colors. The spot promoting the PowerTouch began with the copy: ''Learning to read is easier . . .'' with an off-screen woman also reading the words. Next, a preschool-aged girl exclaimed to a preschool-aged boy, ''Look, my finger is magic!'' She then placed her finger upon the word ''cat,'' and PowerTouch pronounced the word through its small speaker. After the girl effortlessly taught the boy how to use PowerTouch, the spot ended with the Fisher-Price logo above the word ''Learning.'' The words ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' appeared on the lower half of the white screen.

After the U.S. Census Bureau released information showing the Hispanic population to be the fastest-growing ethnic group in America, Fisher-Price altered its marketing strategy. On October 15, 2004, television and radio spots created by Market Vision and Young & Rubicam began appearing across Spanish channels. The Hispanic portion of the campaign was initially launched in Los Angeles, Chicago, and Houston. Outdoor ads appeared with the following tagline in Spanish: ''Play with Them. Laugh with Them. Grow with Them.''

At the beginning of the campaign Fisher-Price attempted to convince Generation X mothers that Fisher-Price could integrate playing and learning. Once the campaign shifted toward Latina mothers, Fisher-Price also had to overcome two common beliefs held by their new target market. One was that Fisher-Price was too expensive; the other was that Fisher-Price toys were for elementary school–aged children. ''Our recommendation to Fisher-Price was to focus on these three top markets and make a deep connection with Hispanic families. Through traditional and non-traditional marketing vehicles, we can reach the Latina mom in her home, her neighborhood and even in her pediatrician's office,'' Bonnie Garcia stated in the PR Newswire. To increase brand loyalty with Latina mothers, Fisher-Price released heartfelt ads that emphasized the mother-child bond.

By 2005 ''Play. Laugh. Grow.'' had been extended to Hispanic festivals across the United States, where children could sample Fisher-Price toys inside two 60-by-60-feet ''play pens.'' Actors dressed as life-sized Fisher-Price toys interacted with children at the festivals as well. The 2005 portion of the campaign coincided with the brand's 75th-anniversary celebration.

OUTCOME

Even while Mattel's other brands reported losses in 2004—Barbie, for instance, was down 13 percent—Fisher-Price reported a 7 percent increase in sales. Much of the toy industry was suffering from a phenomenon that analysts called ''age-compression,'' in which children stopped playing with toys at a younger age.

Brandweek reported that in 1981 the average age at which kids stopped playing with toys was 12 but that by 2003 the age had dropped to 8. Despite the change, the new age ceiling of 8 was still above Fisher-Price's preschool age. Mattel brands such as Pictionary, Tyco Electric Racing, and Barbie were more affected by age-compression, which explained why Fisher-Price performed better. Matt Bousquette, president of Mattel's boys division, told Brandweek that to overcome age-compression, "You've got to reinvent 80 percent of your base volume on an annual basis. You've got to continue to reinvent and keep the brand fresh every year."

In 2005 the campaign garnered a Silver EFFIE Award (Children's Products category) from the New York American Marketing Association. Overall the campaign helped Fisher-Price transition its brand from baby-boomer mothers to the developing Generation X market, and eventually, the even faster growing market of Latina mothers. "Play. Laugh. Grow." also branded Fisher-Price as a toy maker that melded playing with learning.

FURTHER READING

Bain, Helen. "Brand Gestures." Dominion (Wellington, New Zealand), April 26, 2001, p. 17.

Bellantonio, Jennifer. "Big Y&R Gets Bigger with Mattel Boys' Account Win." Irvine (CA) Orange County Business Journal, August 26, 2002, p. 45.

———. "Crossover Eyeing Second, Third Generation Hispanics." Orange County Business Journal, June 17, 2002, p. 12.

Coleman-Lochner, Lauren. "Despite Discounters, Game Isn't Over for Toymakers." New York Times, December 30, 2003, p. 13.

———. "Hunting for Value inside the Toy Box." New York Times, December 28, 2003, p. 7.

Finnigan, David. "A Knock-Down Drag-Out Fight." Brandweek, February 12, 2001, p. 21.

Flass, Rebecca. "Y&R Wins Big in Mattel's 3-Way Toy Review." Adweek (Southwest ed.), August 19, 2002, p. 5.

Goetzl, David, "Media Edge Media Agency of Year." Advertising Age, February 28, 2000, p. S2.

Hays, Constance. "Toy Retailers Find Prices at Wal-Mart Tough to Beat," New York Times, December 23, 2003, p. 1.

Kim, Queena Sook. "Advertising: Fisher-Price Courts Gen-X Mothers." Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2003, p. B3.

Lomartire, Paul. "Toronto Firm's Toys Are Hot." Milwaukee (WI) Journal Sentinel, December 28, 2003, p. 10B.

Pearlman, Jonathan, and Gerard Ryle. "Revealed: Deadly Bath Cradles in Thousands of Homes." Sydney Morning Herald, May 24, 2004, p. 1.

Sampey, Kathleen. "FCB Taps Y&R Exec: Corrigan to Steer J.P. Morgan Chase Account." Adweek (eastern ed.), May 27, 2002, p. 4.

Seckler, Valerie. "Study Reveals Women's Top 10 Favorite Brands." Women's Wear Daily, November 11, 2002, p.15.

Kevin Teague

McDonald's Corporation

McDonald's Plaza
Oak Brook, Illinois 60523
USA
Telephone: (630) 623-3000
Fax: (630) 623-5004
Web site: www.mcdonalds.com

■■■

CAMPAIGN 55 CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1996, McDonald's, the world's biggest fast food restaurant chain, found itself in a proverbial pickle. A tight labor market, additional costs resulting from minimum wage increases, and price pressures on raw materials sent the burger giant's operational costs spiraling upward, which in turn helped to depress profits. All this came at a time when McDonald's major rivals, Wendy's International and Burger King Corporation, were using innovative marketing strategies to eat into the Golden Arches' share of the pie.

McDonald's first attempt to arrest these trends was the May 1996 introduction of the Arch Deluxe, a "premium" sandwich targeted at adult consumers. The strategy seemed valid at a time when inflationary forces were ascendant in the economy. In order to sustain profits, McDonald's needed to develop a product consumers would be willing to spend more money on. The only problem was that the Arch Deluxe proved to be unpopular with consumers. Furthermore, the ad campaign designed to promote the new entree featured grimacing children clearly turned off by the new "grown-up" burger. McDonald's had consequently alienated one of its core markets—little kids—in pursuit of invigorated sales to adult customers. As Arch Deluxes piled up on warming racks waiting for consumers who were not buying them, the burger giant scrambled to rethink its approach.

The result was an ambitious price-cutting promotion that seemed to fly in the face of the economic winds that had spawned the Arch Deluxe. The new campaign was heralded by months of anxious anticipation. In a statement to the press at the end of 1996, McDonald's announced that it was "on the threshold of an unprecedented value offering that will be good news for our customers, our franchisees, and our business . . . and bad news for the competition."

Consumers across the country got a taste of the new direction almost immediately. As of April 11, 1997, price promotions began to figure more prominently in McDonald's national advertising. Before then, these efforts were usually focused on the local or regional level. After two weeks of "national price point advertising," the new national campaign began on April 25, 1997. Dubbed "Campaign 55" for the year McDonald's was founded, the promotion lowered the price on a rotating slate of sandwiches with the purchase of french fries and a soft drink. A similar deal was launched on a rotating basis through the chain's breakfast menus. The value pricing plan was accompanied by a new advertising campaign, "My McDonald's," created by the Leo Burnett Agency, McDonald's longtime ad partner. As the overall architect of the campaign, Burnett received the bulk of the ad work, although McDonald's other roster shops, DDB Needham Worldwide and Burrell Communications, also received some assignments.

The stakes were enormous. McDonald's was luring its customers into restaurants with a 55-cent promise and risking their anger when they were hit with a $1.79 actual price tag after the mandatory purchase of fries and a drink. If consumers refused to accept the deal, they could view McDonald's as having reneged on a promise. More importantly, the chain's pursuit of sales volume came at the expense of franchisee profitability—a strategy that threatened to erode the sometimes tenuous bonds of trust between the parent company and its retail partners. "Campaign 55" would prove to be a marketing debacle for McDonald's and its partners at Leo Burnett. When the dust settled, the landscape of two of America's signature industries—fast food and advertising—had been dramatically changed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1982 McDonald's, citing the need for a bigger agency, jettisoned Needham in favor of its crosstown Chicago rival, Leo Burnett. One of Burnett's first campaigns introduced consumers to the children of "Camp Nippersink," solidifying the burger giant's hold on the kids' market. By 1988, however, the Golden Arches began a long-term effort to win the hearts and minds of the adult dinner crowd. One of the first campaigns in this initiative, "Mac Tonight," parodied a familiar Brecht-Weillsong—to little apparent effect. The Arch Deluxe failure was thus only the last in a series of unsuccessful attempts to secure the adult market. That misstep, compounded by eight straight quarters of declining sales, prompted McDonald's executives to rethink its marketing approach. The end result was "Campaign 55."

In a December 1996 memo, McDonald's Chairman Jack Greenberg outlined the burger maker's overall market strategy. He wrote of the company's intention to "reenergize and focus . . . U.S. marketing efforts and develop a national value proposition." It was a significant departure for a company that had always offered its price promotions on the local and regional level. In late February 1997, several senior Burnett executives met at McDonald's Oak Brook, Illinois, headquarters to map out an advertising strategy for "Campaign 55." At the same time, McDonald's franchisees were being briefed on the new pricing strategy via closed-circuit television. Shortly thereafter, franchisees were given a chance to approve the national discount plan. At least 75 percent of the burger maker's 2,700 owner-operators needed to give a thumbs-up in order for the plan to go forward. They did so, but not without trepidation. Many owner-operators viewed the pricing plan as a drastic, even desperate move and an overreaction to the sales slump. Some expressed skepticism about whether the "home office" had done the research to make certain this was what consumers wanted. Many of these reservations would prove to be prescient in the weeks and months to come.

On April 4, 1997, McDonald's restaurants across the United States began offering 55-cent Egg McMuffin breakfast sandwiches with the purchase of hash browns and a drink. Three weeks later, on April 25, the promotion was expanded to Big Macs as well. Quarter Pounders were next up in the rotation, with their price reduction commencing in mid-June. McDonald's dedicated $66 million worth of national advertising to the value-pricing plan, much to the dismay of some regional shops, which had benefited enormously when McDonald's diverted $150 million from national to regional advertising in 1996.

TARGET MARKET

As a national campaign with an enormous advertising budget, "Campaign 55" was theoretically aimed at all fast food consumers across the United States. But in a fast food market dominated by large chains, the real target was those consumers who had strayed to other burger purveyors on the issue of value pricing. In the late 1990s, fast food was one of the most developed sectors in the restaurant industry, with the fast food hamburger category being perhaps the most competitive; there seemed to be McDonald's, Wendy's, and Burger King outlets on most every corner. And consumers were using increasingly sophisticated criteria to decide where and how to spend their money. In this environment the goal for these companies was market share gain.

McDonald's aim with "Campaign 55" was to convince customers to visit its restaurants instead of its competitors. Very often a promotion like a price-cutting program can play a big part in convincing the customer. Wendy's, with its 99-cent Super Value Menu, and Burger King, with its 99-cent Whopper and $2.99 Whopper Meal Combo, had stolen away some of McDonald's pricing edge, and had scored notable market share gains. McDonald's hoped that customers who had been wooed away by the promise of value would respond favorably to "Campaign 55."

COMPETITION

For quite some time, McDonald's had understood the root of its troubles: smaller chains were using seemingly tastier, more diverse menus and shrewd marketing to eat into their market share. Burger King in particular relied on product-focused ads to score sales increases of 2.6 percent per store for the year ending September 30, 1996.

While McDonald's overall sales remained strong, the company felt it had to do something to stem the market

LATE-NIGHT PUBLICITY

An old adage says that there is no such thing as bad publicity. But some say that an even older adage dictates: stay out of the monologues of late-night talk-show hosts. The latter could be a sure sign that one has turned into a national joke. And yet that is just what happened to venerable national icon McDonald's in the wake of its much maligned "Campaign 55" promotion. Late Show gabber David Letterman was the emcee for a round of good-natured knife twisting that took the form of a Top Ten List citing "Other Failed McDonald's Promotions." Among the "promotions" on Letterman's list were: "Happy Meals include small containers of nitrous oxide"; "Get 500 Quarter Pounders for the price of 499"; and "Buy any sandwich and have clown makeup permanently tattooed on your face." "The 55-cent McCoronary" topped the list.

share erosion. It responded initially by opening more restaurants. The thinking was that even if store volume did not increase, sales would go up because of the increased number of stores. In addition McDonald's could collect more rent and franchise fees. But franchisees soon called for a halt in expansion. They found their own profits plummeting as new outlets opened up close by, cannibalizing their sales. A program to introduce new sandwich items, such as the Arch Deluxe, also failed. McDonald's seemingly was left with no alternative but to slash prices.

As word leaked out about the nature of the promotion, industry observers began to fear a burger price war. The prospect of falling profit margins helped to depress stock prices for McDonald's and its major competitors, Wendy's International and Grand Metropolitan, the parent company of Burger King Corporation. Both companies rushed to announce that they had no plans to match McDonald's price cuts. "We've attached ourselves to a strategy that states it's not a great value if it's not a great tasting burger," said Andy Bonaparte, Burger King's director of advertising.

While the Golden Arches was using its partnership with the Walt Disney Corporation to tie into that company's 1997 summer movie releases, Burger King returned fire with adult-targeted tie-ins to the blockbuster film Jurassic Park: The Lost World starting on Memorial Day weekend. Ads for that onslaught were created by Ammirati Puris Lintas of New York. In a special promotion aimed at children, BK Kids Meals were offered with giveaway toys from director Steven Spielberg's The Land Before Time video series.

MARKETING STRATEGY

McDonald's marketing officials expected the value price promotion to spur consumer traffic and nudge patrons into paying full price for the chain's higher-margin french fries and soft drinks. Accordingly, the chain advised its franchisees to increase on-hand packaging and food supplies by 10 to 15 percent in anticipation of a corresponding hike in sales.

While the focus of the campaign was national, the media plan called for a window of local spot promotions in April 1997. McDonald's envisioned "Campaign 55" as an integral part of a summer marketing blitz tied to the June release of the Walt Disney Company's animated feature Hercules and the comedy-adventure film George of the Jungle in July. "Campaign 55 is not a short-term promotion," declared McDonald's spokeswoman Anna Rozenich. "It's designed to increase restaurant profit and cash flow over a long period of time." Indeed, the burger giant planned its marketing calendar around "Campaign 55" well into 1998, the idea being that every month or so a different sandwich would be featured at the discounted price. Initially, the price reduction was to be accompanied by a promise to offer the customer free food if an order was not served within 55 seconds. After complaints from owner-operators about the feasibility of this and all aspects of the marketing plan, however, this feature was abandoned.

Coincident with the April 4 price reduction promotion was the debut of the "My McDonald's" national television campaign created by Leo Burnett. The commercials showed McDonald's owner-operators and restaurant workers expressing the company's core values. Its only seeming relation to the price promotion was the emphasis on the year 1955—the year McDonald's was founded and when the "core values" presumably were formulated. "This is not in the least a price promotion," remarked McDonald's senior vice president of marketing Brad Ball.

The new strategy carried with it a number of inherent risks. First, it seemed to run counter to the economic trends of the day. With operational costs rising, a drastic cut in prices put McDonald's two strikes down in the effort to spur profit margin increases. This was difficult, especially for franchisees, who had already seen their margins erode due to the company's aggressive expansion program. Another risk McDonald's had taken was embarking on a dual campaign. In doing so, they faced one of marketing's toughest challenges: boosting sales while building a brand identity at the same time. There seemed to be little doubt that McDonald's needed to do both. Superior brand advertising by Burger King and Wendy's was having the effect of luring away once-loyal McDonald's customers; the accompanying drop in sales meant McDonald's had to sell more food. But the quest for a quick sales spike is not always consistent with the long-term goal of building a brand identity.

OUTCOME

Reaction to "Campaign 55" was sharply negative from its inception. Many observers were taken aback by the degree of discounts offered. Others saw the abrupt shift in strategy as a sign that McDonald's was confused about its marketing direction. "For the past year, McDonald's has bounced around in terms of its marketing strategy," said Stacy Jamar, a restaurant analyst with Smith Barney, "from last year taking the high road with deluxe sandwiches to this year's pseudo price discount." "I don't think it's a viable long-term solution to the problem they have in the U.S., which is a product problem," declared Damon Brundage of NatWest Securities. Indeed, many analysts saw "Campaign 55" as little more than a quick-fix—a pricing gimmick designed to stop the decline in sales while the company scrambled to devise and implement a real solution to its long-term problems.

For a while, the burger giant ignored these brickbats. The program had achieved some success at the breakfast level, because it spurred sales of combo meals, raising the average customer's bill. And in mid-May, McDonald's announced that unit sales of its Big Mac sandwich had more than doubled since the price reduction. The company enjoyed its strongest comparable April store sales in years. But part of that boost could be attributed to a popular "Teeny Beanie Baby" toy giveaway promotion that same month.

While official figures showed a spike in sales, there was anecdotal evidence to suggest that restaurants were not, in fact, selling more Big Macs than when the promotion began. And any increase in traffic was offset by customer confusion about where the deal actually was. "It's a price promotion that doesn't tell you the price," scoffed Ron Paul, an industry analyst and president of Technomics. His concerns were echoed by McDonald's owner-operators. "I think it's because the offer is confusing," said Dick Adams, the chairman of an independent association of about 100 McDonald's franchisees. "Customers come in expecting to buy a 55-cent Big Mac and they have to buy a conventional meal package." Many customers complained that they did not realize they had to buy fries and a drink to get the 55-cent price deal on their sandwich. Some customers quickly learned to supplement their entree with just a small drink and small fries. Under this arrangement franchisees found they actually lost money.

The ad campaign also proved to be ill-fated. There was considerable confusion over how the pricing plan tied in to the brand-building "My McDonald's" ad theme. As many analysts had predicted, the objectives of the dual ad campaign were not always complementary. While "My McDonald's" tried to build up an image for the brand, "Campaign 55" seemed to drag that image down by concentrating on dollars and cents details.

Finally, in mid-June, following an avalanche of bad press and a near revolt among franchisees, McDonald's discontinued the lunch and dinner components of "Campaign 55." The burger giant moved rapidly to devise a local price initiative to replace the national discount program. That move came as McDonald's prepared to implement a decentralization plan that divided the United States into regions in order to allow regional executives more power to make marketing decisions. And in August 1997, the other shoe finally dropped on "Campaign 55." Following a lengthy review process, McDonald's dropped Leo Burnett as its lead national ad agency and awarded the bulk of the estimated $350 million account to DDB Needham. This closed the book on what analysts considered one of the biggest misfires in marketing history.

FURTHER READING

Benezra, Karen. "McDonald's Looks for Rebound after Campaign 55 Flop." Adweek, June 9, 1997.

Edwards, Cliff. "McDonald's Franchisees Are Formidable Adversaries." Star Tribune, June 5, 1997.

"McDonald's Corp. Says Unit Sales of Big Macs Are Soaring Since It Cut Price of Sandwich." Star Tribune, May 12, 1997.

Whalen, Jeanne. "Beleaguered McDonald's Looks to Local Price Effort." Advertising Age, June 9, 1997.

———. "McDonald's 55 Cent Price Ads to Snare Most of Budget." Advertising Age, April 7, 1997.

Robert Schnakenberg

DID SOMEBODY SAY MCDONALD'S? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The world's largest fast-food chain by a sizable margin, McDonald's had experienced many years of unbridled growth, but it had faltered in the mid-1990s. Many blamed errors of judgment in marketing, including the introduction of an unpopular burger called the Arch

Deluxe in 1997 as well as a confusing discount offer on the chain's signature Big Mac hamburger in 1998. McDonald's, it seemed, had lost sight of the strengths that had made it the industry leader, most notably a keen sense of image that had been burned into customers' minds in the 1970s with classic advertising campaigns such as "You Deserve a Break Today."

As part of its efforts to rejuvenate its image, the company in late 1997 introduced the "Did Somebody Say McDonalds?" campaign with television spots aired throughout the United States. This marked the return of DDB Needham, the advertising agency that had worked with McDonald's from 1971 to 1981 during some of the company's best advertising years. DDB creative director Bob Merlotti created the tagline for the campaign, which ran throughout 1998 and into 1999. Specific spending on "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" was not disclosed, but McDonald's reportedly spent $604 million on advertising from June 1996 to June 1997. This represented a 12 percent increase over the previous 12-month period.

With "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" the company sought to return to the ground it had lost—both in the market and in the hearts of its once-loyal customers. But despite the optimistic outlook for the campaign, it failed to drive business and increase sales. In 1999 the company built on the campaign when, at a cost of $100 million, it introduced a local brand-building effort featuring singer Donna Summer. The following year a new campaign, "We Love to See You Smile," was released, replacing the "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1948 brothers Dick and Mac McDonald opened the first McDonald's restaurant in San Bernardino, California. Several years later Chicago entrepreneur Ray Kroc happened to stop at the restaurant while on a business trip to Chicago and was instantly taken with the idea. Kroc inked a franchise agreement with the McDonald brothers in 1954 and the following year opened a McDonald's of his own in Des Plaines, Illinois. Fascinated by the idea of mass-producing and selling hamburgers, Kroc improved handsomely on the McDonald brothers' marketing ideas and by 1957 owned a string of McDonald's in the Midwest and California. Four years later he paid the McDonald brothers $2.7 million for their share.

Already by 1962 the chain had sold one billion burgers, and it charted its sales progress with a sign proudly displayed beneath the distinctive "Golden Arches" logo that set its facilities apart from all other fast-food chains. Of course, McDonald's had much more that set it apart: from the beginning Kroc had been taken with the simplicity of the McDonald brothers' stores, most notably the fact that these lacked the clutter typical of most roadside hamburger stands. As he began franchising units—which he did at a rate of more than 500 a year during the 1970s—Kroc issued stringent guidelines regarding virtually every aspect of restaurant operations.

McDonald's signature clown, Ronald McDonald, made his first appearance in 1963, and future years would find him with an array of friends, such as Mayor McCheese. Also in 1963 McDonald's offered its first menu extension, the Filet-O-Fish. Ronald and the expanded menu—which later included breakfast, chicken items, and salads—would become such fixtures of McDonald's that it was hard to imagine a time when they did not exist. Similarly, by the 1990s it was difficult to picture a McDonald's without a drive-through window, but these only made their appearance in 1975.

With the death of Kroc in 1984, McDonald's entered a new era. It expanded rapidly overseas as its U.S. operations began to run up against the inevitable: McDonald's had been so successful in the United States that it seemed likely, or at least possible, that the market would become saturated. Indeed, McDonald's executives would boast that the average customer had to drive no more than four miles to get to the nearest McDonald's. With more than 12,460 restaurants in America by the 1990s, there was one McDonald's for approximately every 290 square miles of U.S. territory; given the fact that the American landmass included vast uninhabited areas in Alaska and the West, this was an impressive figure indeed.

TARGET MARKET

Still, McDonald's sought to work its way into new U.S. markets. Thus in 1993 it began placing restaurants inside the ultra-popular Wal-Mart stores, following a trend toward fast-food restaurants in large retail facilities. By the mid-1990s, however, it seemed that McDonald's had lost sight of its market, as two costly marketing failures seemed to suggest. In 1996 there was the Arch Deluxe, promoted as a burger for adults—as opposed to most McDonald's fare, which, like Ronald McDonald himself, was targeted to children.

The problem with the Arch Deluxe was its relatively high price tag of $2.29, making it the most expensive single item on the McDonald's menu. Marketing for the Arch Deluxe, including billboards featuring children complaining about the "grown-up" burger, did little to spur sales. McDonald's followed this in 1997 with "Campaign 55," a discount promotion offering the signature Big Mac burger for a mere 55 cents. Instead of drawing in more customers, according to Harry Berkowitz of Newsday, this promotion merely "confused and annoyed" them.

ALGUIEN DIGO MCDONALD'S?

In March 1998 McDonald's unveiled six new Spanish-language spots designed to appeal to Hispanic customers. All featured the company's tagline, "Did somebody say McDonald's?," only in these commercials, created by del Rivero Messianu of Coral Gables, Florida, it was "Alguien digo McDonald's?" Three of the spots were tied to a recent Monopoly game promotion, and others promoted Happy Meals, French fries, and breakfast items. In "Point of View," which, according to Katy Eckmann and Scott Hume of Adweek, was the company's first image ad for Happy Meals, a man harangued his wife with a tale of a tough day on the job. All the while his young son listened thoughtfully, and then he offered his father a McDonald's Happy Meal.

"Some marketing experts," Berkowitz wrote in September 1997, "say McDonald's is wrong to focus on whether its burgers are better than the competitions, rather than on its warm, all-American family image." Said industry analyst John Grace, "They lost sight of what the brand stood for. They need to recapture the essence of the McDonald's brand, which is not in the products but in the consumer's mind." Louise Kramer of Advertising Age wrote in May 1999 that many consumers and others rooting for McDonald's in the burger wars wished for a return to the values expressed in the brand's classic "You Deserve a Break Today" campaign created by 1971 by Needham, Harper & Steers, an earlier incarnation of DDB Needham.

As McDonald's faltered during the 1990s, however, it was easy to put too much focus on what the company lacked and not enough emphasis on what it possessed. This was the position of Newsweek International, which in November 1997 listed a number of assets. Among these was "Happy hunting abroad." In contrast to the threatened saturation of the U.S. market, "each day, less than 1 percent of the people on the planet eat McDonald's. That's a lot of mouths yet to feed." There was also "A bodacious brand name. Last year McDonald's trumped Coke as the best known worldwide." And then there was perhaps the most important asset of all: "A lock on the hearts and tummies of American kids—and exclusive rights to Disney promotions through 2006. By then, the population of school-age kids could hit record highs—with record allowances."

COMPETITION

McDonald's was unquestionably the leader of the U.S. burger-chain market and of the fast-food market as a whole. In 1996 it had sales of $16.4 billion, dwarfing the $7.3 billion of Burger King. In fact, McDonald's sales exceeded the combined receipts of Burger King, third-place Pizza Hut, and fourth-place Taco Bell. Fifth in the fast-food market, and third among burger chains, was Wendy's, with $4.4 billion in sales. Next came KFC, followed by seventh-place Hardee's, a burger chain with $3.1 billion in sales in 1996. Below Hardee's were three non-burger chains: Subway, Domino's, and Arby's. In the burger market McDonald's in 1996 held a whopping 42 percent share, compared to Burger King's 19 percent and Wendy's 11 percent. Hardee's held a little more than 7.5 percent, and California-based Jack in the Box an additional 3 percent. All other burger chains rounded out the segment, with a 17 percent share.

Yet by the time it released "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?," the company faced extraordinarily stiff competition from Burger King. Berkowitz wrote, "Customers are gobbling up so many Big Kings—the chain's new, beefed-up version of its archrival's Big Mac—that [New York franchise owner Joe Della Monica] had to take down store signs promoting it at a sale price of 99 cents to avoid running out." This was welcome news to Della Monica, who said that four years earlier, in 1993, "We were in survival mode." At that time Burger King, owned by Britain's Grand Metropolitan PLC, was suffering under an advertising campaign "featur[ing] MTV grunge star Dan Cortese and the loud slogan 'I Love This Place,'" Berkowitz noted. In 1997, by contrast, it ran appealing commercials built around classic songs such as the Troggs' 1960s hit "Wild Thing."

Meanwhile, McDonald's floundered. In an effort to counter the Big King, it test-marketed the Mega Mac, an imitation of Burger King's Whopper that went nowhere. But the Whopper was flame-broiled, while the Big Mac was fried—another negative in the eyes of many consumers eager to minimize fast-food fat. Worse, McDonald's could not compete adequately with either Burger King or Wendy's in the area of special orders. The setup in McDonald's stores was simply too rigid to make special requests anything but a time-intensive exception to the rule; Burger King, by contrast, had proudly announced its ability to handle special orders with the "Have It Your Way" advertising campaign of the 1970s, which had imprinted on the consciousness of millions of customers. McDonald's in 1998 and 1999 experimented with new systems to aid in preparing special orders and to allow it to serve fresher product, as Burger King and Wendy's did, rather than allowing burgers to age under a warming lamp until someone bought them.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" spots first aired in October 1997. One showed a young man and young woman on a date in a movie theater; when the man turned to the woman and asked if she wanted to go to McDonald's after the movie, an actor on the movie screen asked, "Did somebody say McDonald's?" This caused a general stampede out of the theater, as moviegoers abandoned the feature in favor of the nearest Big Mac. Another spot showed an office worker who innocently announced to his colleagues that he was stopping by a McDonald's and would pick up a burger for anyone who needed one; before he could get out the door, he was besieged with requests.

Of the spots, which would continue airing throughout 1998, an industry analyst told Heather Pauly of the Chicago Sun-Times, "McDonald's has been playing by the other guy's rules by getting overly involved in price rather than reminding people of the emotional part of the product. I think this campaign does that." Likewise Courtney Kane, reporting for the New York Times, noted that "The goal of the campaign . . . is to bring back warm, fuzzy feelings about the purveyor of Quarter Pounders and Chicken McNuggets."

Meanwhile, McDonald's management and staff at its research kitchens worked on a reconfiguration of the production process so as to provide customers with fresh—and custom-made—burgers. They also experimented with a product called the Big Xtra, or MBX, as it was called at corporate headquarters. If successful, the Big Xtra would simultaneously replace the failed Arch Deluxe and take on Burger King's Whopper. McDonald's CEO Michael Quinlan also expressed an interest in revamping one of the company's most recognizable symbols, Ronald McDonald. "I think we can punch him up a little," Quinlan told Ralph Raffio in Restaurant Business. Raffio noted that the head of McDonald's marketing had indicated that Ronald might be due for a "tweaking." In the future, he suggested, McDonald's famous clown might even age a bit.

OUTCOME

In March 1999 McDonald's announced that it would invest a staggering $100 million in new local brand-building advertisements featuring singer Donna Summer. The latter would sing a version of her 1983 hit "She Works Hard for the Money," only instead of "She works hard for the money / so you better treat her right," the McDonald's jingle would say, "You get more for the money / 'cause McDonald's treats you right." It was the first time Summer—best known as the sexy queen of 1970s disco—had ever rerecorded a song for a commercial. In fact, she recorded it several times, in eight different styles, including swing, big-band, and country versions.

Arnold Communications, which handled local advertising for McDonald's, created the Summer commercials, but the idea of using the song was the brainchild of Maryland franchisee Cathy Bell. When she suggested it before a cooperative of local McDonald's franchisees, response was enthusiastic. Summer proved agreeable to the idea, and Bell told June Arney of the Baltimore Sun, "When I was told [Donna Summer] had agreed to a contract, I said, 'Wow, is this really happening?' Even if you didn't grow up when that song was around, you can relate to it. It's hip. It brings a jazzy overtone to the lyrics." At the end of the commercial Summer whispered, "Did somebody say McDonald's?"

From the introduction of the tagline in 1997, responses to the campaign had been mixed. Yet "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" harkened back to the classic McDonald's image campaigns of the 1970s as few campaigns since then had managed to do. The company hoped that, given time—and some restructuring both in corporate operations and kitchen management—the tagline would capture popular sensibilities. But in 2000, as McDonald's dismal sales trend continued—a report in Crain's Chicago Business noted that sales averages were up 1.5 percent as a result of increased prices but that actual transaction counts were down about 6 percent—the "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign was discontinued. Replacing it was "We Love to See You Smile.," a $500 million effort created by DDB Needham.

FURTHER READING

Arney, June. "New McDonald's Ad Owes Idea to Howard Woman; TV-Radio Campaign Starts Today Here and in 9 Other Areas." Baltimore Sun, February 26, 1999, p. 1-C.

Berkowitz, Harry. "Battle of Burgers: McDonald's, Burger King Battle for Fast-Food Throne." Newsday, September 21, 1997, p. F-10.

"DDB Needham Worldwide: Did Somebody Say DDB Needham?." Advertising Age, March 30, 1998, p. S-16.

"Did Somebody Say McDoomed?." Newsweek International, November 17, 1997, p. 31.

"Donna Summer Stars in $100 Mil McD's Push." Advertising Age, March 8, 1999, p. 48.

Eckmann, Katy, and Scott Hume. "McDonald's Making Changes." Adweek (midwest ed.), March 23, 1998, p. 8.

Galloro, Vince. "McDonald's Debuts New Commercials (Did Somebody Say New Commercials?)." Arlington Heights (IL) Daily Herald, July 1, 2000.

Jensen, Trevor. "Scoring Touch." Adweek (eastern ed.), November 2, 1998, p. 28.

Kane, Courtney. "McDonald's Starts a Big Campaign to Revive Its Brand Image." New York Times, October 2, 1997, p. 5.

Kramer, Louise. "DDB's McPlan: Did Somebody Say Evolution? McDonald's Lead Shop Considers Ad Tweaks, Meeting Attendees Say." Advertising Age, May 10, 1999, p. 1.

MacArthur, Kate. "McD's Poised to Launch New Attack Strategy; Recruits Military-Style Consultancy to Battle Slump." Crain's Chicago Business, September 4, 2000.

———. "McD's Serves Up $500 Mil Smile with a New Logo; Slice-of-Life Commercial Kicks Off Long-Awaited Campaign This Week." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

Oestricher, Dwight. "Buffett Selloff Seen Making Buying Opportunity in McDonald's Stock." Dow Jones News Service, March 16, 1998.

Pauly, Heather. "Big Mac's New Ad Attack." Chicago Sun-Times, October 2, 1997.

Raffio, Ralph. "Did Somebody Say... McDonald's Was Hurting?." Restaurant Business, February 15, 1998, pp. 28–38.

Judson Knight
Rayna Bailey

I'M LOVIN′ IT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2003, after nearly 50 years as the king of fast food, McDonald's Corporation was suffering an identity crisis. As Time magazine reported, "The challenges facing McDonald's come supersized. Its home market is all but saturated, its sterling reputation for fast, friendly service and cleanliness is tarnished, and customers are putting a growing premium on freshness and taste, neither of which McDonald's is renowned for." In addition, the company's revenues were shrinking, and it had lowered its earnings expectations for 2002. To reconnect with customers, the company planned remodeling projects in more than half of its U.S. stores, it revamped its menu offerings to include healthier choices, and, to rebuild brand identity, it launched a worldwide marketing campaign, "I'm Lovin' It," featuring singer Justin Timberlake.

Timberlake, however, was suffering his own identity crisis—he had been booed and pelted with water bottles by concertgoers during a performance in Canada—and some McDonald's executives were initially reluctant to sign a spokesman who was unpopular with the type of consumers the company was trying to reach. Nonetheless, Timberlake received a contract worth almost $6 million, and the "I'm Lovin' It" campaign was launched in 2003. Developing the campaign was a combined effort by McDonald's, ad agency DDB Chicago, and the German-based agency Heye & Partner, a division of DDB Worldwide. The campaign featured five television commercials with appearances by Timberlake that focused on the adult market. There were other spots created to "maintain the emotional connection the McDonald's brand has with families and kids," according to a report in the New York Beacon. In addition to the television spots, the campaign included window posters, signs on outdoor poles, ceiling danglers, and special kiosks. Advertising Age estimated the total budget to be $100 million.

The worldwide campaign, the first-ever global marketing effort for McDonald's, was introduced in Germany rather than the United States. As David McHugh reported in the Bergen County (NJ) Record, "Germany was chosen as launch venue because the slogan was dreamed up by a German ad agency, Heye & Partner." The new slogan replaced the company's previous tagline, "We Love to See You Smile," which had been introduced in 2000. Following its launch in Germany, the campaign kicked off in 100 other countries, including the United States. In 2004 the new marketing strategy paid off when Advertising Age named McDonald's the Marketer of the Year for the "brand's marketing achievements around the world."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

As McDonald's celebrated it 50th anniversary in 2005, the company also could celebrate maintaining its lead in the fast-food burger race. According to PR Newswire, the company had grown from one restaurant in Des Plaines, Illinois, to more than 30,000 restaurants, most independently owned and operated, that served almost 47 million people in more than 100 countries every day. In a

A still from McDonalds' "I'm Lovin' It" television campaign.
IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

2002 Time magazine article Daniel Eisenberg wrote, "McDonald's opens a new store somewhere around the globe every eight hours." Sales had climbed from $366.12 on opening day at the first restaurant to more than $19 billion in 2004.

In response to competition from other fast-food chains, such as number-two Burger King, and a crowded restaurant market that offered consumers upscale "fast-casual" dining options, McDonald's went on a mission to win customers and revitalize its business. Eisenberg reported that the company planned to bulldoze as many as 1,000 of its aging restaurants and give face-lifts to about 6,000 others. "Remodeling more than half its 13,099 U.S. restaurants, which could cost the company as much as $800 million over the next two years, is only part of CEO Jack Greenberg's latest plan to get bloated old Ronald McDonald back in shape," Eisenberg said.

Greenberg's plans included rolling out a "dollar value menu" for price-conscious customers, adding healthier choices to the menu, and developing new restaurant formats. The last included sit-down diners that would offer home-style menu items like meatloaf and chicken-fried steaks or three-in-one stores that would serve traditional burgers and fries along with Boston Market chicken and Donatos pizzas, both of which, as Eisenberg noted, were owned by McDonald's. In addition, Greenberg proposed launching a $20 million national ad campaign to promote its dollar menu items.

Dave Carpenter, business writer for AP Worldstream, reported that when James Cantalupo took over as McDonald's CEO in 2003 he introduced additional changes, including renewed efforts to "eliminate shoddy service, improve speed and add new menu items, including an entrée-sized salad and the McGriddle breakfast sandwich." Among other changes was the launch of the company's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, designed to work in all languages and to dispel the chain's image as a fading icon by portraying it as "forever young."

TARGET MARKET

According to Carpenter, the "I'm Lovin' It" campaign was designed to attract "younger and hipper consumers. . .It's aimed at helping the restaurant chain connect better with customers—especially young adults, moms and kids." He reported McDonald's chief marketing officer as saying, "We know we need to be more modern and more relevant in how we communicate to today's consumers." Charlie Bell, the company chief operating officer, added that, besides appealing to young consumers, the campaign would "be fun, it'll be relevant, it'll be hip, it'll be compelling, and it will connect with people of all ages."

Rance Crain, writing in Advertising Age, said that McDonald's "all-or-nothing bet on the youth market" was a risk. Referring to an ad featuring a cameo by singer Timberlake, Crain wrote, "I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the commercial is off-putting to most of the non-target market . . . If it doesn't register with kids, the corporate campaign could have a negative impact overall, and McDonald's will have spent $100 million for the privilege of alienating vast swatches of its customers."

COMPETITION

As the Evansville [IN] Courier & Press reported, "McDonald's and Burger King have been going burger-to-burger for more than 30 years, with Wendy's and smaller companies also fighting for consumers' hearts and appetites." Faced with its own declining sales and with competitor McDonald's increasing sales, explained in part by its "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, number-two Burger King launched a counterattack in the burger wars with the reintroduction of its popular "Have It Your Way" slogan and with its "Lunch Break Gang" television ads, which featured a group of 20-something coworkers ordering lunch their way.

The Burger King campaign did not have strong positive results with consumers, however, with USA Today reporting that only 14 percent of those familiar with the ads liked them and thought they were effective, while 30 percent of the people polled said that they did not like the ads. Nevertheless, the Burger King campaign won the Silver Award at the 2004 Cannes Lions and a Bronze Award at the Clios. More importantly, the campaign had a positive effect on Burger King's sales, with increases reported for 10 consecutive months following its launch in February 2004.

Number-three Wendy's responded to declining sales and the 2002 death of company founder and spokesman Dave Thomas by launching a marketing campaign in 2005 that AdAge.com reported was created to help the company "shed its folksy image and one-size-fits-all message." The new theme, "Do What Tastes Right," also was designed to appeal to the chain's core customers—baby boomers—as well as to attract young adults and those in their early teens, Wendy's customers of the future. The marketing budget was increased, and for the first time the company ventured into Internet advertising.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As PR Newswire observed, the "I'm Lovin' It" campaign was "a key part of McDonald's business strategy to connect with customers in highly relevant, culturally significant ways around the world." Part of that strategy was to shoot the "I'm Lovin' It" commercials in various locations worldwide. Jim Kirk reported in the Chicago

NOT EVERYONE LOVED MCDONALD'S "I'M LOVIN' IT"

In markets where McDonald's had earned a reputation for bad service or where the stigma of junk food hung over the company's restaurants, its "I'm Lovin' It" campaign was not necessarily loved by consumers. According to Kate MacArthur, writing in Crain's Chicago Business, England was one of those markets. "To win over skeptical Britons," MacArthur said, McDonald's launched a new campaign with the theme "Changes": "The campaign replaces the famous Golden Arches logo with a yellow question mark and carries the line, 'McDonald's. But not as you know it.'" The new campaign, created by the London office of Leo Burnett, McDonald's Chicago-based agency, was designed to replace the negative image British consumers had of the fast-food giant. It was followed by a direct-mail campaign informing people of the chain's new healthful menu choices and smaller portions. Larry Light, McDonald's executive vice president and chief global marketing officer, told MacArthur that the "Changes" campaign was designed "to encourage people to think of us differently and make them aware of new products. There's no intention to abandon either the Arches or 'I'm lovin' it.'"

Tribune that filming was done in Prague in the Czech Republic, Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, Johannesburg in South Africa, Singapore, and other international locations. Larry Light, executive vice president and chief global marketing officer for McDonald's, told the New York Beacon, "The high energy launch in the U.S. is further proof that this global campaign is far more than just advertising or a new theme line. It is a multidimensional approach to customers around the world that goes from television sets and computers to our restaurants . . . and everything in between."

Mike Roberts, president of McDonald's USA, told PR Newswire that the "theme and attitude of this full-scale campaign is being integrated into every aspect of the business . . . from crew training and the overall restaurant experience to national sponsorships, promotions and all new local street marketing." He added that the company was "focused on bringing the 'I'm lovin' it' theme to life not only in our advertising but also for every customer who visits our restaurant. This world-class marketing strategy is the latest element of our overall plan to continue revitalizing McDonald's."

In an interview reported by PR Newswire, Timberlake commented on his role in the McDonald's advertising campaign: "I love what McDonald's is doing with this new campaign and it's cool to be part of it. We share the same crowd . . . people who like to have fun. . .and that's what this new partnership is all about." In addition to the television spots featuring Timberlake, appearances by the singer were scheduled in selected markets in the United States and Europe, and he performed in a U.S. concert tour titled "McDonald's Presents Justin Timberlake Lovin' It Live." Dean Barrett, McDonald's senior vice president for global brand business, told Advertising Age, "Surprise is a key part of this campaign. The idea is to take 'I'm Lovin' It' to new heights." Writing in AP Worldstream, Carpenter said, "Once packaged with music, video and other creative aspects, McDonald's executives promised that the new campaign will generate a 'wow' effect with consumers and restaurant operators. The intent, they said, is not only to attract more customers but to persuade them to come more often and to build brand loyalty."

OUTCOME

If success can be measured by awards, recognition, and increased sales, McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign hit the jackpot. In 2004 Advertising Age named the company Marketer of the Year for its achievements. In response to the award Jim Skinner, McDonald's new CEO, said, "I'm lovin' it! We're honored to be recognized with one of the most coveted awards in the advertising and marketing world."

McDonald's Light said that awareness of the "I'm Lovin' It" campaign reached 86 percent of consumers in the top 10 countries tagged by the company. The success of the campaign was "another sign that we're connecting with customers like never before," he said. Noting the international success of the campaign, the Scottish Daily Record & Sunday in Glasgow reported that "McDonald's advertising slogan 'I'm lovin' it' has been crowned king of the catchphrases. The fast-food giant's jingle is being repeated in 43 percent of workplaces, says a new survey."

The Cincinnati Post wrote in November 2003, "The biggest single-month increase at its U.S. restaurants in more than five years lifted McDonald's Corp. to an impressive 8.4 percent gain in comparable sales last month . . . [The company] attributed the increased business in part to benefits of the first full month of its exhaustive new advertising campaign, featuring the tag line 'I'm lovin' it.'" In addition, the newspaper noted that sales in France, Germany, and Britain, the company's three biggest European markets, also showed increases over the previous year.

FURTHER READING

Carpenter, Dave. "McDonald's New Advertising Tag Line: 'I'm Lovin' It.'" AP Worldstream, June 11, 2003.

Crain, Rance. "Does McD's Need 'Lovin' It'? Wary Kids the Big Unknown." Advertising Age, September 22, 2003.

Eisenberg, Daniel. "Can McDonald's Shape Up? The Fast-Food King Thinks Better Service, Nicer Décor and Bigger Bargains Will Get Business Cooking Again." Time, September 30, 2002.

"'I'm Lovin' It' Pays Off for McDonald's." Cincinnati Post, November 8, 2003.

MacArthur, Kate. "McD's Taps Timberlake for 'I'm Lovin' It' Tie-In: Fast-Feeder to Pay Pop Star $6 Mil." Advertising Age, August 4, 2003.

———. "No Love for McD's Tagline in U.K.: 'I'm Lovin' It' Tough Sell Overseas; Takes Fortnight Off, New Spots Filling In." Crain's Chicago Business, November 1, 2004.

———. "Wendy's Overhauls Marketing Strategy." May 19, 2005. Available from <http://www.AdAge.com>.

McCarthy, Michael. "Burger King Tries Old Slogan Again: 'Have It Your Way' Returns to Some Mixed Reviews in Kitschy New Ads." USA Today, May 23, 2005.

"McDonald's and Justin Timberlake Team Up for U.S. and European Concert Tour: 'McDonald's Presents Justin Timberlake Lovin' It Live' Latest Extension of McDonald's Global 'I'm Lovin' It' Brand Campaign." PR Newswire, October 10, 2003.

"McDonald's Named 'Marketer of the Year.'" PR Newswire, December 13, 2004.

"McDonald's USA Launches 'I'm Lovin' It' Brand Campaign: New Partnerships. . .New Commercials . . . Relevant to Today's Consumers." PR Newswire, September 23, 2003.

"McDonald's Widens Gap over Burger King in Fast-Food Wars." Evansville [IN] Courier & Press, January 28, 2004.

McHugh, David. "McDonald's Hopes Young Customers Are 'Lovin' It.'" Bergen County [NJ] Record, September 3, 2003.

"Not Lovin' It That Much." Delaney Report, October 27, 2003.

"Office Staff Are 'Lovin' It.'" Scottish Daily Record & Sunday, August 28, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

WE LOVE TO SEE YOU SMILE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

McDonald's Corporation, with more than 26,000 restaurants serving 43 million customers every day in 2000, was the world's number one fast-food burger chain and also the best known. But despite its brand recognition and international reach, the nearly 50-year-old chain was struggling through an inexplicable sales slump that had industry experts scratching their heads and wondering what the problem was. In an effort to revive its image and boost sales, McDonald's upgraded its restaurants. The overhaul included upgrading the interiors, repainting the exteriors, introducing new menu items and a new food-cooking system, and dressing employees in trendy new uniforms.

To promote the reinvented McDonald's brand and drive consumers into the chain's restaurants, the company had advertising agency DDB Chicago develop a new marketing campaign. Themed "We Love to See You Smile," the $500 million campaign began in June 2000 with a series of eight television spots that emphasized how McDonald's fit into consumers' lives. The first spot featured the chain's famous spokescharacter, Ronald McDonald, interacting with people in various settings. Subsequent spots focused on people going about their lives, but with visits to McDonald's playing a role in their day-to-day activities. Other commercials emphasized different aspects of McDonald's restaurants, such as their drive-through windows or customer service.

Although there were high expectations for the new campaign, it failed to achieve its goals. One year after it began, sales at the chain's restaurants remained stagnant. Further, negative comments about the campaign included the Delaney Report deeming it "ineffective" and Advertising Age noting that it was irrelevant to consumers. In 2001 DDB modified the campaign and introduced a companion tagline, "Variety Is the Smile of Life," which ran along with the original "We Love to See You Smile." The campaign was revised again in 2002, and the tagline was shortened to "Smile." As the chain's sales slump continued, McDonald's charged its two key agencies, DDB Chicago and Leo Burnett, to develop a new campaign. In 2003 Leo Burnett's effort, "I'm Lovin' It," replaced DDB's "Smile" campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Ray Kroc opened his first McDonald's restaurant in Des Plaines, Illinois, in 1955 and rang up just over $360 in sales the first day. From those beginnings McDonald's evolved into a chain of fast-food restaurants with a reputation for providing a family-friendly dining environment and for quickly serving a selection of good food. By 2000 the McDonald's chain had grown to become the number one fast-food burger chain, with 26,800 restaurants in 119 countries, serving some 43 million people each day. The chain's iconic spokescharacter, Ronald

© BO ZAUNDERS/CORBIS.

McDonald, was recognized by 96 percent of children, falling in second behind Santa Claus.

Despite the numbers and worldwide brand recognition, in 2000 McDonald's was suffering through another year of stagnant sales—both in the United States and its international markets—that had industry analysts asking what was going wrong. For July and August 2000 McDonald's reported that sales averages were up 1.5 percent, an increase that was attributable to the higher prices being charged for menu items. But the chain's overall sales transactions for that period were down 6 percent. The company cited a variety of reasons for its below-market sales performance, including currency fluctuations in foreign markets and unsuccessful marketing and advertising in the United States.

To reestablish its brand, to stand out in the oversaturated fast-food arena, and to win back its fleeing customers, McDonald's initiated a makeover of its restaurants. Included in the revamp was repainting the chain's restaurant exteriors in bright, eye-catching colors, upgrading restaurant interiors, installing a new cooking system, adding new menu items, and updating employee uniforms. To promote the changes and assure consumer awareness of the new McDonald's, the company replaced its nearly three-year-old advertising campaign and tagline, "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" with a campaign created by its agency DDB Chicago. The new campaign, with the theme and tagline "We Love to See You Smile," was released in June 2000.

TARGET MARKET

When planning its campaign, McDonald's identified three specific target markets: mothers, young adults, and families with children. The campaign's goal was to reach each of these demographics and show them that when it was mealtime, McDonald's had a place in their lives. Also targeted by the campaign, with special television spots, were Hispanic and African-American consumers of all ages. Additionally, "We Love to See You Smile" was designed to reach what the company described as "veto-voters," women who did not typically eat at McDonald's and usually made the decisions about where their families would eat when they dined out. Always remembering that primary among its core customers were kids—preteens and teens—the campaign featured spots that would appeal to that age group as well.

COMPETITION

The number two burger chain, Burger King, was founded in 1954 with its first restaurant in Miami. By 2000 it had grown into a chain of more than 11,180 restaurants. But also by 2000 the company had fallen into a sales slump in the United States. Although Burger King reported that overall sales increased 5 percent in 2000, the growth was driven by its international business (which was up 2 percent in the United Kingdom, 8 percent in Spain, and 4 percent in Latin American). In North America sales were stagnant, up just one-tenth a percentage point. After several failed U.S. marketing campaigns—including "Going the Distance," which was released in 1999, and "Got the Urge?" which began in early 2000 and featured the voice of actress Kathleen Turner—the chain noted that it was time for a change. In a Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News report Burger King president Mikel Durham was quoted as saying that the company "didn't feel like the advertising was moving the needle enough. We're not confident that we're driving sales and getting across the key brand message."

To try and reverse its downward sales trend, Burger King put its $400 million advertising account up for review in 2000. Its creative agency at the time was Lowe Lintas & Partners (previously Ammirati & Puris). The agency had created the successful "It Just Tastes Better" campaign, which began in 1996 and ran through 1998. Following the review Burger King awarded McCann-Erickson its U.S. adult general advertising account. In early 2001 Burger King released a new national advertising campaign created by McCann-Erickson. Themed "The Whopper Says," the effort targeted burger lovers of all ages and included two television spots. It gave the chain's Whopper sandwich a personality that the company described in a press release as "entertaining, fun, and confident." Its new tagline was "In the land of burgers, Whopper is king."

In 2000 Wendy's International, founded in 1969 in Columbus, Ohio, was the number three fast-food burger chain with some 6,000 restaurants. While competing fast-food restaurants were reporting sales declines in 2000, Wendy's had the distinction of increasing sales. The chain reported same-store sales increases of 3 percent in its U.S. restaurants in November 2000. For 2001 the chain's same-store U.S. sales continued to increase, inching up a reported 1.6 percent. Helping drive the upward sales trend was the company's marketing program, created by ad agency Bates USA New York. For 11 years its advertising efforts featured Wendy's founder and chairman-CEO, Dave Thomas, and he had become one of the nation's most recognized corporate spokesmen. His affable approach to promoting his company's burgers and other menu items encouraged hungry, time-strapped consumers to stop in for a quick, tasty meal. Things took a sudden turn in 2002, when Thomas died of liver cancer. What followed was an effort described by the company as "Life after Dave," which included boosting the media budget 30 percent to about $308 million in an effort to keep the sales and earnings growth momentum going. Don Calhoon, Wendy's executive vice president of marketing, told Advertising Age that the chain stood out with consumers either with or without the presence of founder and spokesman Dave Thomas. He added that the chain's new advertising would have the "continuity, brand recognition, and emotional ties that Dave has brought us over these years. The perfect replacement for Dave is the Wendy's brand."

MCDONALD'S FLASHY RETRO COLORS GET ATTENTION AND COMPLAINTS

In an effort to stand out in the crowd of fast-food chains cluttering the landscape, McDonald's returned to its roots with a new paint scheme for its restaurants. While McDonald's may have considered nostalgic the bright red, yellow, and white colors that began appearing on the exterior walls of the restaurants, some people considered the colors to be garish or tacky. Many communities that were more comfortable with the muted colors the chain had previously used on its buildings took a stand against the new paint. Planning and zoning officials in some smaller cities turned to their ordinances and refused to allow the chain to repaint the restaurants in the new colors. McDonald's restaurants located in the busy commercial areas of bigger cities met with few complaints about the new colors, however. McDonald's executives agreed that in some places the new color scheme may not have been appropriate and left the old colors in place. In a Crain's Chicago Business report a company spokesman was quoted as saying, "We want to make sure we're good neighbors wherever we are."

MARKETING STRATEGY

McDonald's moved into 2000 looking for a new marketing campaign and slogan to replace its nearly three-year-old theme and tagline, "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" Although according to McDonald's executives the long-running campaign was a success, the chain's earnings and sales had been slipping for several years. The company hoped that a new marketing effort would boost its sagging sales numbers in the second half of 2000. A new campaign was also necessary to promote the changes that McDonald's had made to its restaurants over several years, from a new cooking system and new menu items to updated uniforms for employees and revamped restaurant interiors and exteriors. To help achieve the company's goals, ad agency DDB Chicago created the campaign and tagline "We Love to See You Smile." The campaign, with a reported $500 million budget, included radio spots and eight television commercials that began airing in June 2000. More than 80 different versions of the original spots were also planned to follow the initial ones.

Each television spot portrayed the different ways that McDonald's connected with a variety of consumers in their daily lives. The kick-off spot was described by Advertising Age as a "slice-of-life commercial" that featured a dancing Ronald McDonald in a parade, then at an outdoor wedding, and finally with a construction crew (one burly member of which was about to enjoy a Happy Meal). The chain's mascot did not appear in subsequent spots, but each maintained the slice-of-life format. In one spot a doctor was shown leaving home to complete her morning rounds at a hospital. When she reached her car, she noticed a message from her children reminding her about breakfast: an M drawn in the condensation that had formed on the car window overnight. Another spot showed a mother and a father preparing to go out for the evening and discussing with their preteen kids which babysitter they should call. When the kids' preferred sitter arrived, she was still dressed in her McDonald's uniform. Other spots featured a McDonald's drive-through; in one, for instance, a teenage couple pulled into the drive-through and placed their order. The girl ordered a Big Mac without onions. Her date followed her lead, looking forward nervously to what not eating onions could mean. Another commercial showed a father sitting at a McDonald's drive-up window in his car while taking dinner orders from his kids on a cell phone. A spot developed for the Hispanic market emphasized the chain's service by following a customer from the time he entered the restaurant until his order was delivered to his table by a McDonald's staffer. Throughout the spot everyone was smiling, emphasizing the "We Love to See You Smile" tagline.

OUTCOME

The 2000 introduction of the much-anticipated "We Love to See You Smile" McDonald's campaign did little to help restore momentum to the chain's earnings. The campaign also only boosted sales slightly. According McDonald's, in the year following the campaign's launch, third-quarter earnings dropped 1 percent, while sales increased just 3 percent. The chain also noted that sales and earnings were expected to remain flat through the end of 2001. "We Love to See You Smile" also led to negative comments from industry insiders as well as from some McDonald's officials and franchisees. The Delaney Report, an ad-industry newsletter, described the campaign as "ineffective," while an unidentified McDonald's source stated that the chain's advertising was "a sad situation." Kate MacArthur of Advertising Age reported in 2000 that responses to the television spots by some of the chain's franchisees were "lukewarm"; in a 2002 article she pointed out that many observers had criticized the campaign, along with past efforts, for being "too milquetoast and conservative to be relevant to contemporary consumers."

In 2001 DDB revamped the McDonald's campaign to help promote additional changes to the chain's menu and again attempt to drive sales. Included in the effort were three new television spots. The spots concluded with two taglines: "Variety Is the Smile of Life" was followed by the original "We Love to See You Smile." Another makeover followed in 2002 with 13 new spots that had an edgier tone and a shortened tagline, "Smile." Despite the revised marketing efforts, by 2003 the chain was still struggling to boost sales and earnings. McDonald's began testing different advertising approaches created by its two key agencies: DDB, which had developed the "We Love to See You Smile" and "Smile" campaigns, and Leo Burnett USA. Later that year the campaign developed by Leo Burnett, "I'm Lovin' It," replaced the "Smile" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Galloro, Vince. "McDonald's Debuts New Commercials." Arlington Heights (IL) Daily Herald, July 1, 2000.

Gallun, Alby F. "McD's Splashy Look; Some Towns Cringe at the Chain's New Color Scheme." Crain's Chicago Business, August 21, 2000.

Kirk, Jim. "2 Agencies Battle to Set McDonald's New Theme." Chicago Tribune, April 14, 2003.

"Let's Try It This Way." Delaney Report, October 29, 2001.

MacArthur, Kate. "McDonald's Varies Menu, Promos." Advertising Age, January 22, 2001.

———. "McD's Poised to Launch New Attack Strategy; Recruits Military-Style Consultancy to Battle Slump." Crain's Chicago Business, September 4, 2000.

———. "McD's Serves Up $500 Mil Smile with a New Logo; Slice-of-Life Commercial Kicks Off Long-Awaited Campaign This Week." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

———. "McMakeover; Ad Age's Kate MacArthur Reports on McDonald's Recent Media Road Show Staged to Trumpet the Fast-Food Giant's 'Brand Reinvention' Efforts." Advertising Age, July 17, 2000.

———. "New Tone at McD's." Advertising Age, February 2, 2002.

Walker, Elaine. "With Sales Slumping, Burger King Seeks New Ads, Puts Out Account for Review." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, September 13, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

MCI LLC

22001 Loudoun County Pkwy.
Ashburn, Virginia 20147
USA
Telephone: (703) 886-5600
Web site: www.mci.com

■■■

1-800-COLLECT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Before the 1980s the telecommunications giant American Telephone & Telegraph Corp. (AT&T) dominated the collect-call market by simply owning the majority of America's pay phones. After pressing "0" to make a collect call, consumers were automatically routed to AT&T operators. In 1993 MCI Communications Corporation changed the landscape with its 1-800-COLLECT program. By dialing MCI's toll-free number, callers were routed to MCI operators and bypassed AT&T's inflated rates. Hoping to undermine further AT&T's stronghold on the collect-call business, MCI released its "1-800-COLLECT" campaign, which targeted college students, military personnel, and the parents of both groups.

Created by the ad agency Messner Vetere Berger McNamee & Schmetterer (MVBMS), the "1-800-COLLECT" campaign included television, radio, and print mediums. Spots for the $112 million campaign first aired on May 19, 1993. Most collect calls were being made by young people calling home, and MCI hoped to encourage their families to pressure them into choosing the most affordable carrier. One print ad featured the headline "What's Out" above an earring in a pierced ear, a torso clothed in leopard-skin briefs, and an "OPER 0" telephone button. Below the headline "What's In" was a ring in a pierced nose, a torso clothed in stylish boxer shorts, and the slogan "1-800-COLLECT. America's inexpensive way to call someone collect." The text added, "Dial it instead of '0' and save up to 44 percent." MVBMS filmed commercials with celebrities such as the former talk-show host Arsenio Hall, actor David Spade, sitcom actress Alyssa Milano, and basketball legend Michael Jordan—all pitching the low cost of 1-800-COLLECT. Later spots did not even mention MCI, because the company believed that its brand was not needed to advertise the service. "1-800-COLLECT" spots aired until the end of 2001.

The USA Today Ad Track survey revealed that the first "1-800-COLLECT" spots were most popular among consumers 25 to 29 years old. The company reported a 50 percent increase in annual revenues between 1994 and the late 1990s. Even though collect calls were losing ground throughout the telecommunications industry in 2001, MCI still generated profits with its collect-calling service.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Microwave Communications, Inc., later known as MCI Communications Corporation, was founded in 1963 to provide microwave communications to a limited service area. The company later installed a nationwide network of fiber-optic telephone cables and invested in other types of communications equipment. After years of legal disputes, MCI gained the right to compete with AT&T, a government-regulated public utility that had essentially monopolized the long-distance telephone industry since 1913. MCI began offering long-distance services in 1980 and launched a series of advertisements that spoofed AT&T's poignant "Reach Out and Touch Someone" campaign. MCI's low prices were the focus of these and subsequent humorous advertisements during the 1980s. "Sure, reach out and touch someone. Just do it for up to 30, 40, even 50 percent less," said one television commercial. In an era when negative and comparative advertising was not common, MCI brashly compared its prices and services to those of its primary rival. AT&T frequently responded with similar tactics.

MCI's irreverent, wisecracking ad campaigns increased revenues substantially and helped generate a corporate image, but by 1991 the public was growing tired of negative advertisements from telephone companies. MCI softened its image that year with the warmhearted "Friends & Family" campaign, which offered significantly discounted prices for consumers who persuaded their acquaintances to designate MCI as their long-distance carrier. The campaign established such a strong brand identity for the Friends & Family calling plan that long-distance calling plans were thereafter marketed with more emphasis on brands and less on prices. In the $3 billion market for collect calls, however, price continued to be an important consideration, because those calls were often among the most expensive. Although most collect calls were made through AT&T, MCI conducted market research and devised a way to persuade consumers to use its new 1-800-COLLECT service.

TARGET MARKET

Collect calls, placed 300 million times annually, could be up to twice as expensive as calls dialed directly. MCI's research revealed that consumers under the age of 30 placed 70 percent of collect calls. Consumers 18 to 24 years old were most likely to make collect calls. College students and other young people contacting their parents accounted for 33 percent of collect calls, and military personnel calling home accounted for 24 percent. Although it was generally believed that price was not a concern to people who made collect calls, since the bill would be paid by someone else, MCI reasoned that pressure from family members could persuade callers to choose a less-expensive carrier. The "1-800-COLLECT" campaign emphasized price with the slogan "Save the people you call up to 44%." Its contemporary, offbeat style was intended to appeal to young people and to convince them that dialing 1-800-COLLECT was a shrewd choice that demonstrated their knowledge of current culture.

LOW PROFILE

People who initiated a collect call by dialing 1-800-COLLECT reached an operator who made the connection without mentioning that the carrier was MCI Communications Corporation. To ensure that consumers would not assume the service was available only to MCI's long-distance customers, the "1-800-COLLECT" advertising campaign avoided direct mention of the firm's name. Angela Dunlap, president of MCI's consumer markets unit, said that the MCI name was not included in the campaign because the name had nothing to do with the way people made collect calls. Rival company American Telephone & Telegraph Corp. (AT&T) contended that MCI was deliberately confusing people who assumed that when they made a collect call it would be routed through AT&T. According to AT&T's research, more than 50 percent of consumers had no idea who owned 1-800-COLLECT, almost 40 percent thought it was operated by AT&T, and only 5 percent realized it was an MCI enterprise.

COMPETITION

The procedure for placing a collect telephone call had not changed much since the invention of the telephone during the 1870s. Consumers had traditionally dialed "0" on their telephones, and an operator had reversed the charges for them. Most collect calls were routed through AT&T, including many calls made from pay phones. In contrast, MCI's 1-800-COLLECT service allowed people to connect directly with MCI and circumvent the carrier that normally handled collect calls from any given phone. When MCI launched its "1-800-COLLECT" advertising campaign in 1993, AT&T first responded by criticizing the service, but it then introduced its own 1-800-OPERATOR service, which was discontinued in 1994. At the same time AT&T responded to MCI's Friends & Family residential calling plan by introducing its own "i" plan (which was also discontinued in 1994) and by running advertisements saying that "Friends & Family" invaded the privacy of MCI's customers. AT&T had revenues of $37 billion in 1990 and $80 billion in 1995. Advertising Age reported that in 1994 AT&T spent about $259 million on advertising. Of that amount, $174 million went to television commercials, $10 million to radio commercials, $40 million to magazine ads, and $35 million to newspaper ads. By 1995 AT&T had 60 percent of the overall long-distance market (down from 63 percent in 1991), MCI was in second place with 20 percent (up from 16 percent in 1991), and Sprint Corporation was third with 10 percent (up from 9.5 percent in 1991). AT&T's advertising budget that year was $700 million.

Instead of using negative and comparative advertising, Sprint usually focused on cultivating a consistent, pleasant corporate image. During most of the 1990s its promotions featured actress Candice Bergen as spokesperson. Bergen became known as the Dime Lady when she starred in advertisements for Sprint Sense, a calling plan that offered a simple, flat rate of 10 cents a minute. Many consumers switched to Sprint Sense because they had never been sure of the price of calls they made through other carriers that used complex rate schedules and confusing calling plans. Another of Sprint's residential long-distance plans, The Most, resembled MCI's Friends & Family plan, but instead of recruiting customers to help sell the service, it offered half-price calls to the person each customer called most frequently. In 1997 Sprint introduced a collect-calling service named 1-800-ONE-DIME, which charged a flat rate of 10 cents a minute plus a $1.59 set-up charge during certain hours, in contrast to the various rates used by MCI and AT&T. One television commercial showed a family locking their son in a room and confronting him about his habit of using MCI's 1-800-COLLECT instead of Sprint's 1-800-ONE-DIME to call them. Another showed two teenage boys stopping their car on a dark street and rushing to catch their younger brother at a pay phone, dialing 1-800-COLLECT instead of 1-800-ONE-DIME. Advertising Age reported that Sprint spent about $63 million on advertising in 1994, with $44 million going for television commercials, $12 million for magazine ads, and $6 million for newspaper ads. By 1995 Sprint's advertising budget was $189 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

MCI executives Angela Dunlap, Patricia Proferes, and Paul Erickson spearheaded the development of the 1-800-COLLECT plan in 1993. After brainstorming sessions that included MCI employees from departments such as finance and operations, the service was launched 11 weeks later, on May 19, 1993. To ensure that AT&T would not learn the details of the plan prematurely, MCI did not train its operators to handle the incoming calls until just two days before the new service was announced. Instead of using telemarketers or sales representatives, MCI promoted 1-800-COLLECT entirely through advertising handled by MVBMS. Fun, interesting advertisements for print media, radio, and television were designed to command attention and generate a personality for the brand. Each spot featured the 1-800-COLLECT number prominently, often repeating it several times to help consumers memorize it for future use.

One visually arresting advertisement in People consisted primarily of a bold headline in a hodgepodge of typestyles and sizes, as if someone had cut individual letters from various printed sources, jumbled them together to make words, and glued them to the page beside an old-fashioned rotary telephone (to indicate outdated thinking) and an alarm clock (to indicate an awakening and the passage of time). The words seemed to bounce up and down instead of resting on evenly spaced, horizontal lines. "You still dialing," it began, and a graphic image was inserted to depict the telephone button marked with the letters "OPER 0" for dialing the operator. The headline continued, "To call people collect? Time to retrain your finger." The size of the last two words was much larger than the rest of the headline, making them seem to leap out at the reader. Numerous graphic lines radiating from the headline at all angles emphasized this effect. Below, a drawing of a hand pointed at the words, "Dial 1-800-COLLECT instead. Save the people you call up to 44%." Small type added, "Use it every time you make a long distance collect call." Tiny type aligned vertically in an upper corner said, "Savings based on a 3 min. AT&T operator dialed interstate call."

Another magazine advertisement showed a woman carrying an armload of laundry. Her clothing and hairstyle suggested that the photograph had been taken decades earlier, when she was a young mother. The headline read, "She gave you life. She gave you clean underwear. The least you can do is give her a call." The text urged consumers to commemorate Mother's Day by purchasing savings certificates that would give their mothers $9 worth of 1-800-COLLECT calls. In reverse type against a dark box, the 1-800-COLLECT logo was positioned in a lower corner. Text below said, "Save the people you call up to 44%. Use it every time you make a long distance collect call." The ad concluded in tiny type, "Savings based on a 3 min. AT&T operator-dialed interstate call." Television commercials in the campaign starred celebrities such as actor Wayne Knight (who played Newman on the situation comedy Seinfeld) courting beautiful women, actor Ed O'Neill (who played Al Bundy on the sitcom Married with Children) as a sort of telephone policeman chastising strangers for not using 1-800-COLLECT, and New Orleans Saints football coach Mike Ditka.

MCI spent about $112 million on advertising in 1994, up from $56 million in 1990. Of that amount, $98 million went to television commercials, $6 million to radio commercials, $4 million to magazine ads, and $4 million to newspaper ads. In 1995 MCI's total advertising budget was $325 million. According to USA Today, the company spent about $70 million in 1996 and $148 million in 1997 to advertise 1-800-COLLECT. Celebrities continued to surface as 1-800-COLLECT pitchmen. Arsenio Hall and comedic actor David Spade were featured in 2000 explaining how much consumers could save by dialing 1-800-COLLECT. The next year new celebrities were featured with pseudonyms. The Who's the Boss? actress Alyssa Milano starred as "Eva Savealot" in four spots, and Mr. T of A-Team fame took on the name "Inspecta Collect" to let people know that they could "save a buck or two" with 1-800-COLLECT. The final celebrities for the campaign were the six-feet-five basketball star Michael Jordan beside the two-feet-eight actor Verne Troyer (best known for playing Mini-Me in the Austin Powers movies). Both touted the "Big Savings" of 1-800-COLLECT. Spots for the campaign stopped airing in the fall of 2001.

OUTCOME

MCI's annual revenues from 1-800-COLLECT amounted to $200 million by 1994 and $300 million by the late 1990s. At that time consumers were using the service for almost a third of their collect calls. According to Fortune magazine, MCI sales rose from $11.9 billion in 1993 to more than $18 billion by 1996. MCI's share of all long-distance calls increased from 17 percent in 1993 to 20 percent in 1995, but by 1997 it had slipped back to 18 percent. MCI merged with WorldCom that year to form one of the nation's largest communications companies, MCI WorldCom.

A 1998 survey by USA Today found that the "1-800-COLLECT" campaign was most popular among consumers 25 to 29 years old. The primary target group of consumers 18 to 24 years old liked the ads less, but 18 percent said that the campaign was "very effective." Of the ads that MCI ran concurrently to promote its other services, the musing, surreal "Defining the Future" campaign of 1994 and 1995 won widespread acclaim and positioned MCI as a capable, knowledgeable corporation that could help its customers make the best use of the Internet and other technological innovations.

Although the long-distance industry was collectively slipping in 2001, MCI reported that its 1-800-COLLECT service still generated substantial revenues. The campaign's later spots starring Michael Jordan and Verne Troyer, however, were generally disliked, according to USA Today's Ad Track survey. Nevertheless, MCI representatives claimed that the final spots bolstered 1-800-COLLECT's growth. "Effectiveness relative to the collect-caller marketplace is what's important for us," Jeff Grosman, director of 1-800-COLLECT, said, explaining that those surveyed by USA Today were not in the campaign's selected target. "When you're polling a broader audience, [Ad Track results] may not be as relevant," Grosman explained. The campaign ended in late 2001. A few months later MCI awarded its $100 million ad budget to the agency Deutsch Advertising, a unit of the Interpublic Group of Companies.

FURTHER READING

"Cable Makes the Connection." Brandweek, April 25, 1994, p. S4.

Carlson, Tracy. "The Race Is On." Brandweek, May 9, 1994, p. 22.

Fass, Allison. "AT&T and Sprint Try to Lure Business from MCI Customers by Emphasizing Their Longevity." New York Times, July 23, 2002, p. 7.

Howard, Theresa. "Jordan's Ad Star Flickers." USA Today, January 25, 2002, p. B02.

Lazare, Lewis. "MCI Calls on Jordan for 'Collect' Spots." Chicago Sun-Times, July 23, 2001, p. 59.

Lefton, Terry. "800 Ways to Call Long-Distance." Mediaweek, October 18, 1993, p. S106.

———. "The Future Is Now: MCI: Warm and Fuzzy Technology." Brandweek, November 29, 1993, p. 18.

"Ma Bell's Rival." Time, February 23, 1981, p. 99.

Sellers, Patricia. "Yes, Brands Can Still Work Magic." Fortune, February 7, 1994, p. 133.

Spurge, Lorraine. MCI: Failure Is Not an Option, Encino, California: Spurge Ink!, 1998.

Weil, Ulric. "MCI Strives to Win on Services, Not Prices." Government Computer News, September 14, 1992, p. 23.

Vranica, Suzanne. "AT&T Collect-Call Ads Reach Out to Teens." Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2001, p. B13.

Susan Risland
Kevin Teague

DENNIS MILLER ADS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, MCI WorldCom changed its name to MCI LLC. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

To promote its 10-10-220 "dial-around" plan in television and print ads, MCI WorldCom Inc. enlisted comedian and former Saturday Night Live cast member Dennis Miller. The sneering funnyman appeared in a series of commercials beginning in 1998 in which he extolled the virtues of the company's dial-around service to dubious consumers. The Miller ads, created by Messner Vetere Berger McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG, New York, were in keeping with the emerging practice of using celebrity spokespersons to endorse dial-around services. Television fixtures Miller, Tony Danza, and John Lithgow were just a few of the stars who agreed to lend their genial personas to the cause of long-distance savings in the 1990s.

Through its subsidiary Telecom USA, MCI WorldCom was one of the pioneers of the lucrative dial-around market in the 1990s. Dial-around numbers were access codes that allowed users to bypass their primary long-distance carrier for an alternative firm on a call-by-call basis. Ironically, many dial-arounds were operated by the same carriers, although their ads generally did not say so. By the late 1990s MCI WorldCom had established two popular dial-around numbers—10-10-321and 10-10-220—which helped it achieve a dominant position in this growing market.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

America's long-distance telephone rates began declining in 1984 with the government- mandated breakup of the Bell System. Suddenly the once monolithic ''phone company'' was subject to the same vicissitudes of competition as other businesses. A host of smaller companies, such as MCI and Sprint, emerged to pose a challenge to ''Ma Bell's'' hegemony.

MCI Communications Inc., as it was then known, was the first to gain a foothold in the market when it managed to snag millions of AT&T residential customers through the clever marketing of its Friends and Family calling plan, a long-distance scheme that provided discounts for frequently dialed numbers. A series of feel-good television ads spelled out the virtues of the service and established the equity of the MCI brand.

MCI's success prompted Sprint and other small carriers to develop a wide range of calling plans, all with low monthly fees and sharp reductions in basic per-minute long-distance rates. In time some carriers came out with plans that offered a single discounted rate 24 hours a day. Despite all of the price slashing, however, by the 1990s the majority of America's residential phone customers—upward of 60 million households—had not signed up for a low-cost calling plan. In most instances these customers made few long-distance calls, less than $20 worth per month.

This unfilled niche created an opportunity for the emergence of dial-around carriers. Hoping to attract infrequent callers without a strong allegiance to a long-distance carrier, small phone companies jumped into the dial-around market on a regional basis beginning in 1990. The dial-around, or ''10-10,'' phenomenon did not fully bloom, however, until MCI began to expend its resources in order to promote the idea and its own brand. The company unveiled its 10-10-321 program (originally known as 10-321) in January 1997, supported by a large-scale ad campaign starring movie and television actor Lithgow.

Comedian Dennis Miller. THE KOBAL COLLECTION. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

In October 1998 MCI WorldCom debuted a second dial-around program—10-10-220—this time with Miller as its spokesman. MCI officials believed that the two numbers could coexist and even complement each other. ''10-10-321 took off like a rocket,'' said MCI WorldCom spokesman Brad Burns. ''After charting very healthy growth with 3-2-1, we launched a second product [10-10-220], which is aimed at a younger, edgier audience.''

Dial-around business provided a tremendous boost to MCI WorldCom's bottom line, enabling the company to report revenues of $30.4 billion for 1998, a 15 percent increase over 1997. ''We're in front of a parade that's got tremendous momentum and accelerating power. It's literally unstoppable,'' said Tim Price, MCI WorldCom's chief executive officer for U.S. operations.

Indeed, in the late 1990s the rising tide of dial-around service appeared to be lifting all boats. Industry analysts forecast dial-around revenues at $3 billion for 1999. The figure represented an increase from $2 billion in 1998 and $1.5 billion in 1997. The dial-around service thus represented a sizable chunk of the $40 billion dollar consumer long-distance industry in 1998, according to Fred Voit, a consumer communications analyst with the Yankee Group in Boston.

By the end of the 1990s MCI WorldCom Inc. was providing voice, data, and Internet communications services around the world. The company, based in Jackson, Mississippi, was the second largest provider of long-distance telephone service in the United States, ranking behind only industry leader AT&T. MCI WorldCom operated a nationwide fiber-optic network more than 45,000 miles long. The company employed 75,000 people in more than 300 offices in 65 countries, and its revenues in 1998 exceeded $30 billion.

TARGET MARKET

It might appear at first glance that MCI WorldCom was cannibalizing its own customers by offering two competing dial-around programs, not to mention its conventional long-distance service. But the primary target market for 10-10-220 was the large pool of those who used AT&T for their long-distance calls. Even in the highly competitive long-distance industry, AT&T still commanded the allegiance of more than 70 percent of customers. As a minority player in the long-distance game, MCI WorldCom had everything to gain by picking off AT&T customers, even if it was only on a once-a-month or once-a-year basis.

Marketing officials at MCI WorldCom placed a special emphasis on targeting the substantial number of AT&T customers who, for whatever reason, had stuck with standard long-distance service. These consumers tended to pay higher rates for long-distance calls than those who had chosen plans customized to their individual calling habits. "There's no question we're targeting AT&T's standard rate customers," said MCI WorldCom spokesman Burns. "When we make our promise of significant savings, they are the callers we're reaching out to. We can and do save them a lot of money."

How much of a savings did 10-10-220 offer? According to MCI WorldCom figures, it cost an AT&T standard-rate customer $2.80 to make a 10-minute call from Los Angeles to New York during peak hours. The same call would cost $1.41 if the customer bypassed AT&T and dialed 10-10-321. The longer the call, the greater the savings, claimed MCI WorldCom ads. With the 10-10-220 program, for example, the AT&T customer calling from Los Angeles to New York would pay 99 cents for a 20-minute call, compared to $3.20 with AT&T.

NUMBERS GAME

Confused about the savings claims made by dial-around services? You were not alone, said some long-distance industry observers. But the array of calling plans on the market—and the attendant parade of celebrity endorsers—also could be bewildering. Herewith a handy guide to some of the more prominent players in this vibrant segment of the telecommunications industry:

Access Code: 10-10-220 Owned by: Telecom USA (a wholly owned subsidiary of MCI WorldCom Inc.) Celebrity Endorsers: Dennis Miller, Doug Flutie, George Carlin

Access Code: 10-10-321 Owned by: Telecom USA (a wholly owned subsidiary of MCI WorldCom Inc.) Celebrity Endorsers: John Lithgow, Tony Danza

Access Code: 10-10-345 Owned by: AT&T Corp. Celebrity Endorsers: None; used Lucky Dog mascot

Access Code: 10-10-457Owned by: Telco Communications Group Inc. Celebrity Endorsers: None; relied on a no-frills theme embodied in the tag line "No fine print. No bull"

Access Code: 10-10-502Owned by: WorldxChange Communications Celebrity Endorsers: None; used the tag line "Talk Cents"

Access Code: 10-10-811Owned by: VarTec Telecom Inc. Celebrity Endorsers: Sugar Ray Leonard

How large was the market being targeted by MCI WorldCom? Potentially enormous, said industry analysts. Nearly 50 percent of long-distance users were under no rate plan at all. Instead, they simply signed up with a long-distance carrier without specifying a plan. One study put the number of U.S. households without rate plans as high as 56 percent and estimated the added cost to consumers at $2 billion annually. "I think we make it clear that these are programs designed for people who plan to spend a lot of time on the phone. They save money and they are very satisfied," Burns said.

COMPETITION

The $85 billion domestic long-distance market was largely divided among three companies—AT&T, MCI, and Sprint—which among them controlled between 85 percent and 90 percent of the business. MCI

WorldCom was the first of the three to sense the market potential of dial-around services, something that smaller regional players in the long-distance industry were already exploiting in the early 1990s. ''The major long-distance companies were losing minutes of usage to smaller carriers, some offering dial-around, others with prepaid calling cards, and realized they had to respond,'' remarked Robert Fox, a telecommunications analyst with Mercer Management Consulting.

MCI's success with 10-10-321 prompted AT&T, which had once dismissed the dial-around business, to belatedly enter the fray with the introduction of its Lucky Dog 10-10-345service. Lucky Dog was an AT&T subsidiary whose 10-10 rates were low enough to siphon customers from the company's established calling plans. ''We just did not think customers would spend the time to dial the extra digits,'' said Howard McNally, president of Lucky Dog. ''We were simply late,'' conceded AT&T chairman C. Michael Armstrong.

MARKETING STRATEGY

With the advent of dial-around service, long-distance companies switched their marketing efforts from signing up permanent subscribers to selling service one phone call at a time. And consumers, attracted by the novelty, responded to the marketing efforts, even though the major phone companies offered calling plans that in many cases were cheaper than their 10-10 services.

The first selling point of MCI WorldCom's 10-10-220 was the savings, as comedian Miller repeatedly pointed out in commercials for the service. Under the dial-around arrangement, customers paid a flat 99 cents for all calls under 20 minutes and 10 cents a minute thereafter. There were a number of caveats to this seemingly simple equation, however. For example, although a 20-minute call cost an inexpensive 5 cents a minute, a 1-minute call to the same recipient was an exorbitant 99 cents a minute. But the use of celebrities such as Miller and Lithgow in dial-around ads was designed to cut through the clutter of normal long-distance advertisements—not to mention the fine print of the plans themselves—and to plant the numbers themselves in the forefront of consumers' minds. ''The brand name is the product name,'' said Kelly Seacrist, a spokeswoman for MCI WorldCom, in explaining the approach.

One of the reasons dial-arounds became prominent in the 1990s was that consumers were increasingly tuning out the traditional ads for telephone service. ''The industry found out that residential customers believe very little of what they hear any more,'' said Robert Self, publisher of Dr. Bob's Long Distance for Less, an industry newsletter. ''You about have to take a 2-by-4 and hit people over the head to get new customers.''

The celebrities in the ads invariably extolled the simplicity of the plan's savings features while avoiding discussion of details that might confuse consumers or dissuade them from using the dial- around service. When an inquisitive long-distance caller asked in one of the ads how exactly dialing around could save him money, the sardonic Miller quipped, ''How does popcorn pop?'' His ''What am I, a genie?'' pose helped put viewers at ease and made them feel that they were not merely being tricked into entering into an arrangement so labyrinthine in its restrictions that they could have no idea whether or not they were saving money. In another MCI WorldCom ad Buffalo Bills quarterback Doug Flutie sounded a similar tone when contrasting 10-10-220's dialing restrictions to his offensive playbook. ''If only football were this easy,'' a grinning Flutie pronounced.

OUTCOME

According to MCI WorldCom spokeswoman Seacrist, consumer response to the proliferation of dial-around ads in the 1990s was ''huge.'' Even impartial observers of the long- distance industry tended to agree with this assessment. Dial-arounds ''seem to be popular with consumers because they can use a different phone company on a call-by-call basis—they don't have to commit to leaving their own carrier,'' said Becky Sachs, a spokeswoman for Telecommunications Research and Action Center, a consumer advocacy group that monitored the industry. ''Also, there is very aggressive advertising that intrigues people.''

Sachs pointed out, however, that there was also a lot about the ads featuring Miller and other celebrities that confused consumers. ''It is very difficult for the average consumer to really decipher what is going on in these ads,'' she cautioned. Among the many catches that Miller and his fellow spokespersons failed to point out, according to critics, was that, while some ads referred to a ''50 percent'' savings, they failed to specify the base on which the savings were calculated. In addition, some dial-arounds charged a service fee in any month a user made a call, with some fees as high as $4.50, so that a single 99-cent call could cost as much as $5.49, or upwards of 27 cents a minute.

Despite these complaints MCI WorldCom claimed that its customers were well served by the dial-around service. An internal customer survey conducted in 1998 revealed that 88 percent of MCI WorldCom's clients rated themselves as ''satisfied to very satisfied'' with the 10-10-321 and 10-10-220 programs. A similar poll conducted by the independent group J.D. Power & Associates, however, found that only 36 percent of those dialing around were ''extremely or very satisfied.'' The most satisfied dial-around customers tended to be those who took the time to review their calling habits and acquaint themselves with the rules of the calling programs before they picked up the phone. "MCI is not the Salvation Army," cracked industry watchdog Voit. "They are a publicly traded company that operates to make money for the stockholders. They can't do that if they are giving away long distance services."

Satisfied or not, more and more people were trying the dial-around alternative. According to the Yankee Group, as of 1999 about 11 percent of U.S. households were using one or another 10-10 number. Of these about 47 percent said that they had saved money with the service; about 29 percent said that they were not sure if they had saved money; and 20 percent said that they had not saved money. The future looked even brighter for the dial-around market. "There's no question it's growing, and as long as the providers keep hammering away with promises of big savings, the trend should continue," Voit said.

FURTHER READING

Hall, Jason. "Dial-Around Market Confusing for Consumers: Phone Companies Often Lure Customers with Promises of Big Savings—Savings That Sometimes Aren't Delivered." Sarasota Herald-Tribune, February 21, 1999.

Tahmincioglu, Eve. "Dial Around Plans: The 411 on 10-10 Plans." St. Petersburg Times, May 30, 1999.

Van Bakel, Rogier. "No Funny Business." Advertising Age, April 1, 1998.

Robert Schnakenberg

McIlhenny Company

601 Poydras St., Ste. 1815
New Orleans, Louisiana 70130-6037
USA
Telephone: (337) 365-8173
Fax: (504) 596-6444
Web site: www.tabasco.com

■■■

MOSQUITO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, the E. McIlhenny and Sons Corp. changed its name to McIlhenny Company. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

Although its Tabasco brand hot pepper sauce had been around since 1868, E. McIlhenny and Sons Corp. had never before used national, high-profile television advertising to promote the product. Instead, its strategy had been to build the hot sauce category, of which Tabasco owned by far the largest share, primarily through recipe-driven marketing. By the mid-1990s, however, research conducted by McIlhenny's advertising agency revealed a widening gap between existing users, for whom Tabasco was the only hot sauce, and the younger generation of potential users, who were more open to the marketing efforts of competing brands.

This younger market, famously sought after by advertisers of products like soft drinks and sports shoes, was made up of consumers raised on television and television advertising, with its emphasis on humor, irony, and visual sophistication. It could not be expected to respond to, or even see, recipe ads. With an 18-34 age group in mind, the agency developed a single 30-second television spot in which a young man was seen eating a pizza that had been liberally doused with Tabasco sauce. He watched as a mosquito landed on his leg, drew blood, and flew away into the night only to explode in midair, presumably from the Tabasco. The man gave a smug smile of satisfaction. The whole campaign consisted of the single commercial plus one billboard that shared the same attitude and focus toward the younger consumer, if not the mosquito.

The spot tested well in several local media markets during 1997 and then was aired during the 1998 Super Bowl, traditionally a showplace for new advertising. Despite a favorable response by the huge audience and numerous prestigious awards for excellence, the "Mosquito" spot was not aired again nationally, nor was it followed up with similar spots, although it could continue to be seen at the company's website. Instead, McIlhenny chose to put its marketing budget into NASCAR racing promotions.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Tabasco brand hot sauce was a classic American product in a way that many similar packaged goods would like to be but few actually were. It had a long and colorful history, it was made the same way it was 130 years ago, and it dominated the category it had created. Edmund McIlhenny, whose descendants still owned the company along with all of Avery Island in Louisiana, where the sauce was bottled, began brewing the savory condiment to give to friends. Company legend maintained that the peppers were grown from seeds originally given to McIlhenny by a guest on the island before the Civil War. Although the war took a heavy toll on the plants, leaving only a single surviving pepper, by 1868 they had rebounded to the extent that McIlhenny could produce enough sauce to fill a hundred discarded cologne bottles. (Their shape, it was said, closely resembled the distinctive glass bottles still in use.) The only other ingredients besides the peppers were vinegar and salt, mined from an enormous salt dome that underlay Avery Island.

DDB/NEEDHAM, DALLAS. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Demand for the sauce soon turned it from a novelty to a local industry. The family-owned company was mostly content to let demand dictate supply, during most of its history avoiding aggressive marketing strategies. This was a viable approach for much of its 130 years because, unlike other home recipes made good, such as Coca-Cola, there was no pressing competition, and sales continued to support the company's operations. In 1986, however, McIlhenny hired DDB/Needham, Dallas, to work with the company's in-house marketing department based in New Orleans. Nonetheless, the company's overall approach to marketing remained conservative, being mostly recipe driven. This strategy attempted to increase sales of the product by increasing its consumption among existing buyers through ads that offered tempting new ways to use it. Thus, the familiar bottle of Tabasco that sat in the kitchen cabinet and was gradually used up over the course of a year, say, would now get replaced every six months thanks to all of the new uses to which it was put. In this way sales could be doubled without adding any new consumers. With such a low-profile marketing history, it was perhaps surprising that the company was willing to make a radical departure from its usual style, but that it did highlighted the role of the modern ad agency as an instigator of change for established companies.

TARGET MARKET

The "Mosquito" campaign arose largely out of the realization that the average age of Tabasco users was rising, indicating that younger consumers were not buying it as frequently as their parents did. Such a trend was always worrisome to the makers of consumer products and their advertising agencies, for in the long term it forecast diminishing sales and in the short term left the door open to competitors. According to Stephanie Dieste, account supervisor on the McIlhenny account at DDB/Needham, "The younger generation needed to be brought into our franchise, but without alienating current users." Rick Dunn, vice president of sales and marketing at McIlhenny, described the consumer his company was looking for as the 18 to 34 age group, a much more finely tuned demographic profile than the 18- to 49-year-old category the company had previously targeted. The sharper focus allowed the agency to craft a message likely to appeal to this mediawise cohort.

COMPETITION

Tabasco's 30 percent share of the $100 million dollar hot sauce market made it by far the largest brand in the category. Indeed, asserted DDB/Needham's Dieste, "Tabasco is the only national hot pepper sauce." It was distributed in more than 100 countries and marketed in 18 languages. Even such brands as Red Hot, Tabasco's main competitor, and Cholula, marketed in conjunction with its tequila, were far behind, and some brands were regional sauces that had come into existence only in the previous decade as the national taste for salsa and spicy food in general took firm root. Yet so firmly established was Tabasco's name that, although fiercely protected by the company as a trademark, it was close to entering the language. The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, for example, offered "a trademark for a pungent sauce made from the fruit of a pepper" as its first definition of the word "Tabasco." No other hot sauce came anywhere near this kind of universal recognition. Its dominance of both the category and the culture clearly put McIlhenny in a rare position from which to launch its marketing initiatives.

NO MOSQUITOES WERE HARMED

In E. McIlhenny and Sons Corp.'s "Mosquito" commercial, the pizza-eating man, played by actor Steve Monroe, watched amused as the hungry insect hovered and then landed on his leg. It was no doubt an uncomfortable moment for many viewers when the camera zoomed in for a tight close-up of the mosquito among the man's leg hairs, preparing to plunge its proboscis into his vulnerable flesh. But never fear, for neither Monroe nor any mosquitoes suffered during the filming, at least not from bites or angry slaps. In fact, the agency obtained a still photo of a mosquito and then animated it. Galen Greenwood, writer and creative director of the spot, described the process at McIlhenny's website: "No mosquitoes were harmed during the production of this commercial. We ended up recycling the same mosquito from a print ad, but it had to be reconstructed so its legs could move for the shoot."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The new campaign signaled a departure from McIlhenny's strategy of enlarging the hot sauce category through its recipe-centered ads and promotions. It now set about building its image within that category. And with the target market redefined as 18- to 34-year-olds, the team at DDB/Needham knew that they would have to present a hip image, yet one that did not appear to be self-consciously striving for hipness. In the words of DDB/Needham's Dieste, "You can't tell them it's cool. They have to decide that for themselves." With several potential candidates—for example, company history, a secret recipe, the special enhancement of food that Tabasco provided—the agency settled on the sauce's hotness as its unique selling point. Heat in peppers was measured in Scoville units, and Tabasco peppers fell somewhere between the familiar jalapeno and the scorching hot habaneros and scotch bonnets. Tabasco sauce already had the reputation of being hot—too hot for some consumers—and the agency decided that this reputation for extreme heat was exactly the right key for appealing to a generation known for its extreme pastimes, from bungee jumping to sky surfing.

Yet the agency's creative team of writer Galen Greenwood and art director Tom Moudry avoided making the only human in the spot into a glamorous character. Indeed, as played by actor Steve Monroe, he had a simple backwoods persona. Likewise, they cut against the prevailing trends of quick edits, recycled rock and roll, and clever dialogue to create a commercial that had no spoken words, no music, minimal sound effects, and only a small, tasteful logo at the end. All of this understatement served to make the spot's climax—a small but fierce fireball and accompanying bang when the mosquito exploded—all the funnier and more memorable. The message that Tabasco sauce was hot, though unmistakable to any viewer of the spot, had become secondary to the real message—that Tabasco was smart, funny, cool, just like the audience it was seeking to reach. The commercial tested well with both the target audience and with Tabasco's traditional consumers, which satisfied the company's stipulation that any new advertising not alienate its older users. Although somewhat nervous about the commercial's radical departure from the its traditional marketing style, the executives at McIlhenny were pleased, and the spot was rolled out in selected regional markets during 1997. Then, on January 25, 1998, it received its first and only national airing during the Super Bowl.

OUTCOME

The public's response to the "Mosquito" spot was immediate and overwhelmingly positive. Because of the Super Bowl's huge audience—133 million Americans tuned in, making it the third most heavily watched television show in history—and reputation as an advertising showcase, it was, as always, heavily polled to find out which commercials were most effective in terms of such factors as impact, memorability, and likability. USA Today's Ad Track poll, one of the most closely watched, gave the spot a fourth place ranking out of 52 national commercials aired during the broadcast. Various other regional and national rankings placed it as high as first among viewers. Advertising pundit Bob Garfield, reviewing the Super Bowl's crop of commercials in the industry journal Advertising Age, gave it three and a half stars and said of the spot, "Simple. Visual. Splendid."

In addition to public acclaim, the spot also won many of the industry's most prestigious awards for creativity, including an Addy, a New York Art Director's Club Award, and a Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, generally held to be the pinnacle of peer recognition in advertising. According to McIlhenny spokesmen, the spot continued to draw nearly universally favorable comments at the company's website, where it could be seen in its entirety. According to DDB/Needham's Dieste, the campaign achieved all of its goals. Domestic sales of Tabasco sauce rose, along with usage by younger consumers. Thus, the impact of the campaign was enormous, especially considering the fact that the marketing budget was tiny—estimated at 10 percent of annual sales of $30 million—compared to typical national advertising budgets that could run into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Considering the positive response, the company's next move was puzzling from a marketing point of view. Instead of putting what was by national standards a fairly limited budget to work supporting what had been achieved with a single, brilliantly conceived, perfectly placed commercial, it chose to pull all of its marketing dollars out of advertising and put them into NASCAR racing promotions. In doing so, it abandoned a campaign that had already achieved what other companies routinely spent many times as much to achieve but never did—widespread, positive recognition for its product among the target audience as well as with the wider market.

FURTHER READING

"The Best Awards: Grocery Products: 'Mosquito' Shows Tabasco Bite." Advertising Age, May 26, 1997.

"Broncos & Packers." Government Press Releases, February 6, 1998.

Elbert, David. "'Net Poll Shows Iowans Hot for Tabasco Spot." Des Moines Register, January 29, 1998.

Garfield, Bob "Bob Garfield's Ad Review: Bud Lizards Electrify Super Bowl Ads." Advertising Age, January 26, 1998.

"InterVU Heats Up Online Advertising Campaign for McIlhenny Company, Makers of Tabasco Brand Pepper Sauce." PR Newswire, March 24, 1998.

Krajewski, Steve. "DDB Dallas Southwest Agency of the Year." Adweek (Eastern Edition), February 9, 1998.

———. "DDB Heats Up Tabasco in Spot TV Hot Shots." Adweek Southwest, January 20, 1997.

Neilan, Edward. "Hottest Story in Marketing (Success of American Tabasco Pepper Sauce in Japan)." Tokyo Business Today, March 1994, p. 48.

Wentz, Laurel. "Swedish Spots for Diesel Jeans Take Grand Prix." Advertising Age, June 30, 1997.

Patrick Hutchins

Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC

1 Mercedes Dr.
Montvale, New Jersey 07645-0350
USA
Telephone: (201) 573-0600
Fax: (201) 573-0117
E-mail: mailmaster@mbusa.com
Web site: www.mbusa.com

■■■

MERCEDES-BENZ CORPORATE BRANDING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Mercedes-Benz of North America was at the peak of its game in 1997 when it launched a comprehensive print and television brand campaign. Its sales were generally strong, its products were highly rated by industry analysts, and its market was loyal. This last point, though, held the seed of trouble; Mercedes knew enough not to remain complacent about its market. The plateau was illusory, because markets are dynamic: if Mercedes did not expand its market, and at the same time continually romance its existing market, eventually the market would be lured elsewhere. That year, Mercedes introduced its largest product line ever. New offerings included the M-class sport utility vehicle, the SLK roadster, the CLK coupe, and the E-Class station wagon. These joined the Mercedes classics, the S-, E-, and C-Class cars.

One unique aspect of the new brand campaign, created by Lowe & Partners/SMS, New York, was that it had no tag line. ''One of the reasons we don't use a tag line is to bring new attributes to the [Mercedes] star,'' explained Michael Jackson, executive vice president of marketing for Mercedes, in Advertising Age. ''The star is already one of the most admired logos in the marketplace.... This is going to be a remarkable defining of brand Mercedes in new ways.'' That assertion was no overstatement; the ads targeted a new younger market, emphasized visuals and sometimes music over dialogue, dispensed almost completely with product descriptions, and incorporated such elements as humor, whimsy, and even raciness.

The brand campaign, Mercedes' first since the early 1990s, was intended to lay the foundation for specific product launches later in the year. It broke in mid-February 1997 with a 30-second commercial on prime-time network and cable television. The television component was accompanied by six print ads, as well as outdoor, transit, and airport ads. It comprised five ad spots: ''Symbols,'' ''Press Conference,'' ''Mercury,'' ''Falling in Love,'' and ''Don't Fence Me In.'' The spots ran initially for nine weeks and then reappeared later in the year. Each of the print ads featured an object that incorporated the Mercedes star, with one descriptive word, such as ''fun,'' that related to the brand. Not once was the word ''Mercedes'' used.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

By the end of the 1980s, U.S. sales had dropped for most European luxury car makers, including Mercedes. The economic recession, the luxury tax, and the dollar/mark valuation were part of the problem. In addition, Honda,

Mercedes is one of the most recognized luxury brands in the world. © FREDERIC PITCHAL/CORBIS SYGMA.

Toyota, and Nissan were launching their first luxury lines in the United States, a move that split the luxury market three ways—American, European, and Japanese—instead of the previous two. A June 1991 report by the automotive market research firm J.D. Powers & Associates revealed that luxury owners appreciated status and prestige but "bought reliability." Reliability was the area in which Japanese cars excelled, even though Mercedes used about six times as much labor per car as did Toyota. The Powers study found that luxury buyers ranked Mercedes (and archrival BMW) higher for status than as cars they actually wanted to own. Among the reasons was that Mercedes were harder to maintain than the Japanese brands—the result of their being crafted more than manufactured.

The mind-set behind Mercedes' approach to production and its markets was expressed by Edzard Reuter, then chairman of Daimler-Benz: "We constantly study our position and we always come to the conclusion that we should stay away from mass production. The economies of scale wouldn't help us. Besides, we have a culture of engineering and product differentiation that would make it difficult." The cars were expected to last at least ten years, and some models could travel smoothly at 150 m.p.h. Although Germans and other Europeans were willing to pay for this hyperengineering, Americans increasingly were viewing it as irrelevant. By 1991, Mercedes was only beginning to pay attention to what the customer, and the American customer in particular, wanted. Before that, reports Alex Taylor in Fortune, Mercedes' motto was "The best or nothing." In 1990, the company changed it to "The best for our customers." This rewording coincided with a move to start improving production efficiency.

Turning some the focus from engineering to the customers prompted the recognition by Mercedes of North America that the future lay with the baby boomers. This group had a vastly different sensibility than did the traditional Mercedes customer base. Mercedes made its first deliberate attempt to reach this boomer audience in 1994 with a TV ad by Lowe & Partners/SMS using Janis Joplin's song about a Mercedes, with the famous line, "Lord, won't you buy me a Mercedes-Benz?" The ad received mixed reviews from industry watchers: Bob Garfield of Advertising Age considered this ad to be "an unspeakable misappropriation of '60s iconography . . . in support of the bourgeois trappings [Joplin] soulfully rejected." The Dallas Morning News noted that "while a risky departure from Mercedes' staid image," the ad "turned out to be wildly popular with the baby boomers the company was targeting." Cordell Koland of the Business Journal Serving San Jose & Silicon Valley called it "a breath of fresh air" and said "it was almost like seeing an ad for the Vatican featuring the Dallas Cheerleaders."

Mercedes continued in the same general direction with its 1995 campaign, also by Lowe. In the midst of a "demographic and cultural transformation," as Garfield described it, Mercedes still was not entirely natural with a hip stance. One commercial, set in New York, featured cameos of the designers Donna Karan, Bill Blass, and Isaac Mizrahi admiring a new Mercedes. However, the spot was full of inside jokes that would mystify most non-New Yorkers. Another commercial in the campaign depicted three cupids trying to help the owner of a Mercedes fall in love with his car. The message, presumably, was that it is okay to have a passion for your car. A third spot showed a Mercedes driving down the road, passing supermodel Paulina Porizkova, then space aliens, then Ed McMahon beckoning with a $10 million check. The voice-over says, ''The new E-Class is so much fun to drive, what would you possibly want to stop for?'' Particularly surprising for Mercedes, given its staid image, was the TV spot ''Paradise Woman,'' featuring actor Michael Richards, who played Kramer on Seinfeld, in a racy bedroom scene. The final spot in the series takes place during an unusual rush hour; a Mercedes is surrounded by a herd of computer-generated rhinos. When one rhino kicks the door, the side air bag inflates. ''Heaven knows,'' the voice-over muses, ''there are animals on these roads.''

Albert Weiss, director of national marketing communications for Mercedes-Benz of North America, stated to Koland that the goal of the campaign was to reconnect with the marketplace and establish relevancy with it. ''The common thread throughout all these TV spots is relevancy—the things that our buyers relate to.'' In less than 10 years, Mercedes had gone from telling its buyers what they should value and presenting the product to them as a given, to trying to address their lifestyles and needs through the style as well as the content of its ads.

TV SPOTS AND ASSOCIATED EMOTIONS OR EXPERIENCES, FROM THE MERCEDES-BENZ 1997 ''CORPORATE BRANDING'' CAMPAIGN

''Symbols'': Brings together the many positive aspects of Mercedes ownership, including performance, excellence, fun, power, prestige, beauty, safety, innovation, value.

''Press Conference'': fun.

''Mercury'': performance.

''Falling in Love Again'': passion.

''Don't Fence Me In'': joy.

TARGET MARKET

When Weiss discussed the 1994 and 1995 ad campaigns with Koland, he explained the need to communicate to a ''broader, more diverse universe of customers.'' Those ads therefore targeted ''a new generation of buyers—the baby-boom generation who are now entering our demographic segment.'' He further noted that the ads also reinforced the attributes that appealed to the current Mercedes-Benz owners. The 1997 brand campaign by Lowe continued to target these two groups, with growing emphasis on the baby boomers. The continuity among the various campaigns indicated that Mercedes recognized the need for persistence and steadfastness in communication, as well as ongoing efforts to understand the baby boomers. With those campaigns Mercedes was in essence building a relationship almost from scratch.

These ''younger buyers'' were people in their 40s. Most of Mercedes' current customers were in their 50s—in 1997 the average age of a Mercedes buyer was 52. The company expected the age of those who would buy the newer models, such as the SLK, the CLK, and the M-Class, to be in the 40-to-45 age range. If they had made enough money to purchase a Mercedes, these boomers could be considered part of the ''establishment''—executives and professionals, but they did not necessarily start out that way. Often their path to financial security wound through the cultural upheavals that began in the 1960s. Even though on the outside the boomers may have resembled the more established customers, their perspective would always be a little ''outside'' and irreverent; Mercedes could not sell them with status and tradition alone. Connecting with the baby boomers took a slightly offbeat approach. Mercedes got it.

COMPETITION

On one level any luxury car marketed in the United States could be considered competition for Mercedes—the American makes, such as Cadillac and Lincoln, and the Japanese makes, such as Lexus (Toyota) and Infiniti (Nissan). Certainly their markets overlapped with Mercedes, especially those of the Japanese, who entered the fray in the late 1980s.

Mercedes' most significant competition, however, came from BMW. Headquartered only 120 miles apart from each other, the two German companies were known for their rivalry. Eberhard von Kuenheim, BMW's chairman for 21 years, said in 1991, ''When we take a global view of our competitors, in Los Angeles, Tokyo, and Rome, we always see Mercedes-Benz.'' In 1996, the two rivals moved in opposite directions. Mercedes was trying to shed its stuffy image and ''appear hip with new designs, new models, and new advertising,'' noted Alex Taylor in Fortune. He quoted chairman Helmut Werner, ''We had to understand that the world had changed, and that the philosophy Mercedes had pursued so successfully had come to an end.'' At that time BMW, which already had a younger market than Mercedes did, was turning more conservative.

In the United States, the two German luxury car makers had not been competing for exactly the same customers. Mercedes' buyers tended to be wealthier, older, and more conservative. According to Taylor, they were interested primarily in "engineering, prestige, and safety." BMW buyers were "less often married and . . . more often female." Taylor quoted Susan Jacobs, a luxury car marketing consultant in New Jersey: "BMW had the image everybody wants—performance, handling, fun to drive." In 1995, BMW surpassed Mercedes in worldwide unit sales for the first time, although Mercedes continued to lead in revenue due to the higher price of its cars.

Mercedes' ad efforts through 1994 and 1995 therefore took aim at a segment of BMW's market. In 1995, BMW produced an ad introducing its Z3 roadster that starred Pierce Brosnan as James Bond. In November the movie "Goldeneye" opened, and in it Bond drove a Z3 instead of his usual Aston Martin. The two television spots were created by Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, using film footage. Dealers were sent "BMW 007 kits," and their customers were given an opportunity to preview both the movie and the car before they were released. The media exposure was unprecedented: more than 16 million Americans saw the Z3 roadster on the screen within four weeks of the movie's opening. By the end of 1995 more than 9,000 Z3s had been ordered, exceeding the target of 5,000. The goal, according to Jim McDowell, was to "establish the Z3 as an icon in the American cultural landscape."

The approach was so successful that BMW did the same thing in 1997 with the James Bond movie "Tomorrow Never Dies." The agency incorporated movie footage into three spots, four print spreads, and a newspaper ad. Secret agent Bond drove BMW's 750iLsedan and R 1200 Cruiser motorcycle.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Mercedes' brand campaign of 1997, at $45 million, represented the most expensive marketing initiative Mercedes had ever undertaken in the United States. The campaign aired on such top-10-rated network TV shows as Seinfeld, Friends, and ER, as well as prime-time cable. Mercedes saw the campaign as an investment in the relationship with baby boomers that it had been nurturing over the previous three years. In some ways it was not a typical brand campaign, however. "Mercedes is using its brand equity to create an umbrella over the new models," explained Frank S. Washington of Automotive News. Doing a separate launch for each new product would have led to confusion, noted Mercedes-Benz president Michael Basserman.

To entertain the target audience while informing them, Mercedes took a two-layered approach with the ads. The campaign was intended to highlight the attributes of the various models and the emotions they inspired in drivers. Basserman explained that Mercedes wanted to "tell the story about the vehicles, their value, performance and quality. But we want to add the dimension of emotion, passion and fun." Such qualities were essential to capture the attention of baby boomers, for whom status and self-importance would not be compelling—indeed, could possibly be a negative. Conversely, it was important, while conveying a new, youthful image, to "be respectful of our 100-year-old heritage," as marketing executive vice president Michael Jackson put it. To achieve this goal, the ads did not talk about quality but tried to embody it through elegance and wit.

Four of the five television spots focused on a specific emotion that expressed an aspect of ownership of a Mercedes. The fifth, "Symbols," illustrated how Mercedes embodied a breadth of fundamental qualities. In "Press Conference," engineers in white coats act as backup singers. Lyrics at the bottom of the screen are followed by a bouncing Mercedes star logo. In "Mercury," the god Mercury chases a cannonball; both are overtaken by a Mercedes driven by two women, one of whom snaps a photo of Mercury as they pass. The god is perplexed. In "Passion," historical footage of Mercedes cars, owners, and employees is digitally enhanced to mouth the words "falling in love again," sung by Marlene Dietrich. In "Don't Fence Me In," a couple in the Southwest views a smiling moon from an SLK convertible while animals sway to the Gene Autry song. In "Symbols," familiar images, some nostalgic, flash onto the screen: Superman, the game Twister, a bald eagle, a pyramid, a light bulb, and a smiley face. They represent performance, excellence, fun, safety, innovation, and value. "Can a symbol stand for all of these things?" a voice-over asks. "It depends on the symbol," comes the reply, as the Mercedes star comes on the screen.

Each of the six print ads showed an object that incorporated the Mercedes star logo. A single word tied it to the Mercedes brand. For example, a yellow rubber duck, with the logo in it eyes, was paired with the word "fun." A monarch butterfly had the logo in its wings and was connected with the word "beauty."

The Mercedes logo, ubiquitous throughout the campaign, represented masterful use of brand equity. For those who cared most about status and prestige, there it was. For those who cared most about quality, there it was. For those who cared most about performance, there it was. In this campaign the Mercedes star was not just a symbol; it became a mirror as well.

OUTCOME

"The finest car campaign on the air and the best Mercedes advertising ever done," wrote Bob Garfield in Automotive News. He concluded his piece, "You take the high road. I'll take the Lowe road. And I'll be in the showroom before you.'' Praise for the campaign was practically universal. Lee Clow, chairman and chief creative officer of Lowe competitor TBWA Chiat/Day, wrote in Advertising Age regarding the ''Falling in Love'' spot, ''This is one of those commercials where you say, 'Damn, I wish I'd done that.' The brilliant recreation of historic film, combined with the song . . . is elegantly irreverent. It's good, it's smart, it's entertaining. It captures so much of the soul of the brand in a very special way.''

Mercedes' sales continued to increase through 1997—14.4 percent by August. In March 1998, almost exactly one year after the branding campaign was launched, sales were up 69 percent from the previous March. The multiyear advertising strategy for reaching the baby boomers, which started tentatively and achieved maturity with the 1997 branding campaign, made a major impact on those sales and on the willingness of baby boomers first to consider and then to buy Mercedes.

FURTHER READING

Garfield, Bob. ''Mercedes Ads Find Their Voice, Their Style.'' Automotive News, March 3, 1997, p. 13.

———. ''Mercedes Bends, Uses Quirky Humor to Lure Baby Boomers.'' Advertising Age, December 11, 1995.

Halliday, Jean. ''Ads Focus on Star Logo with No Tagline, Few Voice-Overs.'' Advertising Age, February 10, 1997, p. 16.

Kazenoff, Ivy. ''In a High Performance Pursuit of Youth, Mercedes-Benz Gets Slightly Undignified.'' Advertising Age, March 1997, p. 27.

Koland, Cordell. ''Coming Down to Earth.'' Business Journal Serving San Jose & Silicon Valley, December 30, 1996-January 5, 1997, pp. 18-19.

''Road Show for Mercedes: German Automaker Livens up Advertising Campaign in the U.S.'' Dallas Morning News, February 5, 1997, p. 2D.

