The sharing of cable caused so much neighborhood tension that when a child's balloon floated into an older woman's yard, she popped it with her gardening tool. Beside a garage door spray painted with the words "Web Hog," neighbors were shouting at each other, "You're a Web hog!" "No, you're a Web hog!" When a delivery boy lobbed a newspaper onto a house's doorstep, the paper came flying back to smack him off his bicycle. Similar exchanges occurred back and forth, revealing Laurel Lane as a complete donnybrook. One man attacked his neighbor's flower bed with a hedger. Another neighbor snipped the next-door cable coaxial line. The spots ended with the tagline "Don't share a cable line. Get Pacific Bell DSL. Always fast. Never shared." It was later revealed that DSL was in fact shared and its speed sometimes slowed during high Internet traffic periods.

"DSL is a critical product to us, and one way to achieve greater advertising advantage is to point out the differences between your product and the consumer's other choices," Charlene Lake, SBC's vice president of advertising, told Advertising Age. "It's just Advertising 101." The three spots were aired just long enough to sweep award ceremonies and bump DSL sales so high that SBC Pacific Bell was forced to install more Internet hubs within some neighborhoods. After the cable provider Excite At Home Corp. proved to a U.S. district court judge that "Laurel Lane" claims were untrue, a disclaimer was added to the spots: "Guaranteed speed is from your home to central office." Undaunted by the backlash from cable service providers, Venables told Advertising Age, "We're dealing with a public utility, a monolithic beast. And we take a small point and make a human story around it. We were kind of planting a seed of doubt. I think it's kind of deep. It's smart. And it worked like hell. I'm real proud of it."

OUTCOME

The premise of "Laurel Lane" was considered such a lucid, humorous portrayal of its competition that it collected a Gold Effie from the American Marketing Association, the Best of Show award from Advertising Age's 2001 Best Awards, and a Gold Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival. It reaped so many awards at the San Francisco Advertising Association's 15th annual show that the campaign helped Goodby, Silverstein & Partners win the prestigious Bellringer award, given to the agency with the most awards. In regard to the spot "Neighborhood," Bob Garfield from Advertising Age wrote, "Seldom has a commercial better framed a supposed problem and a clear-cut solution, while simultaneously turning a widely loathed institution into a protagonist." Although initially praised, the campaign's premise, suggesting that DSL never lagged during high traffic times, later proved to be untrue.

Despite the fact that the spots later posted a disclaimer and the entire campaign disappeared after a few months, the campaign's financial success nearly rivaled its ad industry success. Sales in 2000 for SBC Communications climbed $2 billion over the previous year's sales. Venables told Advertising Age, "The orders they got just overloaded their ability to fill them. It was really, really effective. By the end of the campaign running its course, Pac Bell itself was forced to install a few hubs."

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Festival Honors Comic Spots." Adweek (eastern ed.), February 5, 2001, p. 30.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Creative That Endures." Advertising Age, January 29, 2001, p. 1.

———. "Pacific Bell: Charlene Lake." Advertising Age, October 8, 2001, p. S24.

DeSalvo, Kathy. "Bryan Buckley." Shoot, March 23, 2001, p. 20.

Dill, Mallorre. "Story Selling." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 30, 2001, p. 20.

Garfield, Bob. "Cannes-do's, Cannes-don'ts." Advertising Age, June 18, 2001, p. 1.

———. "There Goes the 'Neighborhood': Ad Age 's Best Commercial, Goodby Silverstein's Spot for Pac Bell, Shows Ugly Side of Sharing." Advertising Age, May 28, 2001, p. S2.

Lazare, Lewis. "Spotting Winners? Exec Picks Ads for Burnett's Cannes Prediction Reel." Chicago Sun-Times, June 13, 2001, p. 63.

Michaelson, Elizabeth. "DDB, Goodby, FCB Top N.Y. Fest Ad Field." Shoot, February 9, 2001, p. 1.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "The Best Creatives You Don't Know: You've Admired the Work. Now Meet the Rising Stars behind It." Adweek, September 22, 2003, p. 20.

Raine, George. "Goodby Loses SBC Ad Account/Telecom Giant Says It Will Divide Business among Different Agencies." San Francisco Chronicle, February 7, 2003, p. B1.

Vranica, Suzanne. "Broadband Brouhaha Heats Up Offline." Wall Street Journal, September 12, 2000, p. B8.

———. "Hard Sell: In 2000, Good Taste Was Optional—Fewer Dot-Coms, but Wackiness Ruled." Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2000, p. B3.

Wilkinson-Ryan, Tess. "The Buzz." Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2001, p. 10.

Kevin Teague

Schick-Wilkinson Sword

10 Leighton Road
Milford, Connecticut 06460-3552
USA
Telephone: (203) 882-2100
Fax: (203) 882-2415
Web site: www.schickintuition.com

■■■

SHAVING MADE SIMPLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For many years Schick-Wilkinson Sword was a distant second to Gillette Company in all categories of the global market for shaving products, but in the late 1990s Schick recognized an opening in the women's grooming category. Shaving razors specifically marketed to women was a relatively new category. Previously women had used men's razors to shave their legs, and even women's products were nothing more than a men's product in a feminine package. But then Schick decided to develop a shaving product specifically intended for women. The result was Intuition, a three-blade pivoting razor with a conditioning soap that provided its own lather, ideal for use in the shower.

The $120 million "Shaving Made Simple" campaign to introduce Intuition was launched in April 2003 and ran through the rest of the year. It featured television, radio, and print elements, all of which took a humorous approach to the problems women had shaving the traditional way. The song "Intuition," released by popular music star Jewel, was also licensed at the cost of $500,000.

The "Shaving Made Simple" campaign succeeded in doubling Schick's share of the women's shaving market and was an important step in Schick becoming a greater challenge to Gillette in the global shaving market. The campaign also won a prestigious award, a 2005 bronze EFFIE in the Beauty Ads category of the annual EFFIE Awards sponsored by the New York American Marketing Association.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For years women used men's shaving razors, and even as razor companies recognized that women's shaving products was a distinct category, the products made for women were little more than variations of men's products. As Charles Forelle wrote in the Wall Street Journal, "Women's razors weren't much more than men's versions with a pink handle." Schick, which was looking to make inroads against its larger rival and industry leader Gillette Company, recognized in the late 1990s that there was an opening to exploit in the women's shaving category. In 1999 Schick convened worldwide conferences where employees brainstormed about the way women shaved their legs. The primary conclusion was that they shaved in the shower, where they often fumbled with shaving gel. According to Forelle, "Back in her room one evening after a session in Greenwich, Connecticut, Glennis Orloff, a Schick razor engineer, saw a small bar of hotel soap on the edge of the tub and wondered if she could figure out a way to lather up and shave at the same time. Ms. Orloff took the bar back to the lab, carved a hole in it, and stuck a razor cartridge in the hole. 'It worked really well considering how crude it was,' she said.''

Orloff's idea was put into development along with a number of other projects, but it soon received greater attention in 2000 after Pfizer Inc. acquired Schick's owner, Warner-Lambert. Executive Joe Lynch, who subsequently became Schick's president, was dispatched along with a colleague to take stock of the blade company. Lynch told Forelle that he found a company with world-class capabilities but little direction. According to Forelle, ''It lagged sorely in high-end replacement razors and had missed two opportunities to capitalize on Gillette's delays in releasing women's razors—a two-year gap between Sensor and Sensor for Women, and a three-year gap between Mach3 and Venus . . . So Mr. Lynch put the brakes on scores of research projects and told engineers to start building prototypes of the two ideas he considered most promising: a four-bladed men's razor and the Intuition concept.''

Orloff's crude idea was developed into a new Schick women's shaver called Intuition, a one-step product that featured a cartridge with a pivoting triple-blade razor surrounded by a skin-conditioning solid that contained aloe, cocoa butter, and vitamin E to produce a soft, smooth finish. The skin was lubricated with each pass, and the shower washed away the hair. Initially the skin-conditioning solid came in two varieties: fresh-scented Normal to Dry formula and a fragrance-free Sensitive Skin formula. In addition a razor kit was developed that included a refillable handle, a pair of cartridges, a protective travel cap, and a shower hanger for storing the shaver.

Intuition was ready for market in the spring of 2003, timed to launch in the middle of a Gillette product cycle, at a time when the latest Gillette offering was beginning to look old and a new product could not be quickly launched to counter Schick's move. In this way Schick avoided going head-to-head with its more powerful competitor. In the spring of 2003, with J. Walter Thompson handling the advertising, Schick launched the $120 million ''Shaving Made Simple'' campaign to introduce Intuition, the largest marketing launch in the company's history.

TARGET MARKET

In general, Intuition targeted a mass audience: women who shaved their legs in the bath or shower, a group that ranged widely in terms of age and income. Because the potential Intuition customer had to be willing to fundamentally change her shaving behavior, the focus of the advertising was on younger women, whose habits were not as longstanding and who were by nature more open to try a new product and were willing to pay extra for the added benefits. They were also generally more interested in beauty, and increasingly shaving products were being marketed as part of a greater beauty category, which appealed to the younger demographic. According to Intuition brand manager Lynne Macchiarulo in an interview with Stephanie Loughran and Dan Alaimo for Supermarket News, the Intuition target market was ''looking for products that make their lifestyle easier and products that take care of their skin better. Women look for products with multiple benefits, while men are interested in the technology in shaving.''

ABOUT FACE

The man behind the Schick name was Jack Schick, a U.S. Army lieutenant colonel who retired from the military in 1910 and staked mining claims in Alaska and Canada. With a lot of free time on his hands during the long, cold winter nights, he conceived of a dry razor that did not need water or lather. He found no backers for the idea but had more success with the magazine repeating razor, inspired by his military training. Like a rifle that used a clip of bullets, Schick's razor stored replacement blades in a clip in the handle that could be fed into position as needed. His idea led to the highly popular Schick Injector Razor, which featured a separate clip of blades that could be slipped into the razor, the forefather of all razor systems.

COMPETITION

Schick's Intuition product competed against all methods used by women to remove leg hair, including depilatories, like Nair, which used chemicals to disintegrate hair; waxes, which caused pain when peeled off but lasted four to six weeks; and epilators, essentially wax-free waxing machines that gently plucked out the hair. Schick's direct competition, however, came from Gillette and Société BIC. Gillette had dominated the women's shaving category, first with Sensor for Women and later with its top-selling Venus product, a woman's three-blade system akin to the men's Mach3 product introduced in 2000. In 2002 Gillette generated $37 million in sales of Venus razors and another $86.9 million in refill razor blades, compared to Schick and Intuition's predecessor, Silk Effects Plus, which accounted for $7.2 million in razor sales and $13.5 million in refill blades. It was from Venus that Schick hoped to take away considerable business and begin to make inroads against Gillette on the world stage, where Gillette controlled about 70 percent of the men's and women's razor market and Schick just 18 percent. The only answer to Intuition that Gillette had available was Pink Passion Venus, which offered more of a fashion statement than an innovative concept like Intuition. But Gillette had plenty of money to promote Pink Passion and developed a campaign using the tagline "Passion for Life" and even sponsored a fashion show in which pop star Christina Aguilera modeled a hot pink gown inscribed with the words "Venus Passion." It would take another year, however, before Gillette would be able to take on Schick directly by launching a new product, called Venus Divine, which included an aloe-enriched moisture strip.

Flying somewhat under the radar was BIC, which had not advertised much in recent years and concentrated on disposable razors. Both Gillette and Schick were reluctant to promote their disposable products, afraid to take away sales from their more profitable systems business. In 2003 BIC finally launched its own three-bladed model, BIC Comfort 3, for men and women. As a value-priced product, it did not figure to offer serious competition for Intuition, which was aimed at target customers willing to pay a premium for additional benefits.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The goals of the "Shaving Made Simple" campaign were to introduce the Intuition product, educate women about how it worked, and motivate them to change their shaving behavior and try the product. According to Suzanne Vranica, writing for the Wall Street Journal, "Schick took the advice of a creative team composed entirely of young women—and embraced a campaign that uses humor to make its points . . . [it] pokes fun at the mishaps that women experience when trying to shave, such as continuously losing the soap in the tub. The tagline for the effort is 'Trust Your Intuition.' "

To ready the market for the introduction of Intuition, Schick first launched a teaser campaign to familiarize consumers with the product. Before the April 2003 launch of the main campaign, the company also sponsored an overnight event at a New York hotel for magazine beauty editors, who were able to try out the razor themselves. The product was officially unveiled in Central Park, where musical artist Jewel gave a free concert and sang her newly released song "Intuition," and free product samples were given out to 5,000 attendees. Schick also paid about $500,000 to license the Jewel song for use in commercials.

The "Shaving Made Simple" campaign included television, radio, print, Internet, and outdoor elements, such as renting Times Square signage. Intuition would also become an official sponsor of the LGPA, participating at every women's golf tournament, offering product demonstrations, samples, and interactive games. In addition four LGPA golfers became "ambassadors" for the product. Another aspect of the campaign would be the sponsorship of Speaking of Women's Health, an organization dedicated to educating women to make informed decisions about their health, well-being, and personal safety.

The campaign's television spots began airing on such shows as ABC's All American Girl and NBC's ER. An example of the TV spots was "Soap Slip." It showed a woman in a bathtub, with a plastic razor in her mouth, attempting to lather her legs with a bar of soap, only to have the soap slip from her grasp and fall to the floor. The voice-over asked, "Shouldn't shaving be simpler? It is with Schick Intuition." Another woman was then shown using the product in the shower. A second spot, "Shaving Follies," included the same woman in the tub as she fumbled for the soap on the floor, along with another woman struggling to shave her legs with a foot in the sink and eventually losing her balance and kicking the shaving can across the room, and a third who tried to lather her legs with shaving cream but sprayed her face instead. The voice-over asked, "Why shave the old way? When millions of women have already found a simpler way with Schick Intuition." Images of some of the same women were also used in print ads. "Soap Slip" featured the woman in the tub with the headline "Now there's a solution to the soap opera of shaving," while "Wobbler" showed the young lady attempting to shave her legs over the bathroom sink with the headline "Now you can kick the shaving cream can . . . permanently." A representative radio spot from the campaign used the sound of a sputtering, near-empty can of shaving cream to make the point that Intuition offered greater convenience than the traditional shaving method.

OUTCOME

The "Shaving Made Simple" campaign won a 2005 bronze EFFIE in the Beauty Ads category in the annual competition sponsored by the New York American Marketing Association, one of the most prestigious awards in the advertising industry. More importantly Intuition enjoyed strong sales, resulting in Schick doubling its share of the women's shaving market. Gillette fought back, as was to be expected, and launched Venus Divine in the spring of 2005 along with a Venus disposable, supported by an abundance of marketing muscle to win back lost business. Schick countered by adding a new Intuition skin-conditioning solid, cucumber melon, and Quattro for Women, a four-blade shaver based on the successful men's product. Gillette increased the stakes even higher with the introduction of Venus Vibrance, a battery-powered shaver using the technology developed for the men's M3Power product, which sent out vibrations to the skin to raise hairs for a closer shave. The razor wars were still tilted in Gillette's favor, but Schick had established itself as a more formidable opponent with the introduction of Intuition.

FURTHER READING

Feldstein, Mary Jo. "Razor Wars Shave Profits at Energizer Holdings." St. Louis-Post Dispatch, November 16, 2004.

Forelle, Charles. "Schick Puts a Nick in Gillette's Razor Cycle." Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2003, p. B7.

Howard, Theresa. "Gillette Hopes to Power Shaver Sales to Women with Vibrance." USA Today, October 22, 2005.

Loughran, Stephanie, and Dan Alaimo. "Getting the Edge." Supermarket News, April 21, 2003, p. 41.

McTaggart, Jenny. "Three-in-One Shaver: Schick's Triple-Blade Wet Shaver for Women Cuts Out the Need to Lather Up." Progressive Grocer, May 15, 2003, p. 58.

Neff, Jeff. "Gillette Flexes Its Muscle." Advertising Age, August 2, 2004, p. 1.

———. "$120 Mil in Spending: Gillette, Schick, BIC Launch Blades." Advertising Age, February 24, 2003, p. 8.

Prior, Molly. "Fighting for the Edge in Shaving." DSN Retailing Today, March 8, 2004, p. 21.

"PR Plays Prominent Role as Schick Introduces Intuition." PR Week, May 19, 2003, p. 5.

Tritto, Christopher. "Energizer Gets Boost from Razor Unit." St. Louis Business Journal, May 14, 2004, p. 1.

Vranica, Suzanne. "Schick Challenges Gillette with $120 Million Campaign." Wall Street Journal, April 7, 2003, p. A18.

Wasserman, Todd. "Schick's Intuition Prompts New Quattro." Brandweek, March 21, 2005, p. 8.

Ed Dinger

Scotts Miracle-Gro Company

14111 Scottslawn Road
Marysville, Ohio 43041
USA
Telephone: (937) 644-0011
Fax: (937) 644-0011
Web site: www.scotts.com

■■■

NEIGHBOR TO NEIGHBOR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Scotts Company, later to be named Scotts Miracle-Gro Company, had been a leading manufacturer of lawn- and garden-care products since 1868. It sold grass seed, fertilizers, herbicides, and potting soils from its family of brands, which included Ortho, Miracle-Gro, Hyponex, and Turf Builder. Even though it was one of the largest garden and indoor plant-care companies in America, Scotts's marketing efforts floundered during the early 1990s. After Scotts acquired Miracle-Gro in 1995, the founder of Miracle-Gro, Horace Hagerdon, helped solidify the Scotts brand and orchestrated the removal of Scotts CEO Theodore J. Host, whom Hagerdon considered ineffective. Hoping to improve sales and further build the Scotts brand, Scotts released its ''Neighbor to Neighbor'' campaign.

Created by the ad agencies Wolf Group and Partners & Shevack, the $2 million campaign began in 1996. The budget was soon increased to $20 million. The campaign initially entailed television and radio spots, but in 2003 it expanded with print executions. ''Neighbor to Neighbor'' featured real customers who raved about their successes in attaining a lush, green yard by using different Scotts products. Each of the television commercials focused on a specific Scotts lawn-care product, and they incorporated humor to make the often intimidating task of lawn care seem less threatening. The advertisements also all included Scotts's formal guarantee of its products' efficacy. The company viewed the guarantee as ''more of a promise than a traditional tag line,'' as Gordon Hecker, Scotts's vice president of advertising, told Adweek. Scotts recognized that ''consumers depend on the company for advice on lawns and gardening, as well as for the product.'' In 2003 the Wolf Group, by then the sole agency handling the Scotts account, closed its doors, and the campaign continued under the ML Rogers Agency.

Although the campaign scored unusually low on USA Today's Ad Track consumer survey, ''Neighbor to Neighbor'' was deemed a success by Scotts and its agencies. The campaign garnered some ad-industry awards and helped Scotts increase its sales by double digits throughout a majority of the campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

By the time Scotts inaugurated ''Neighbor to Neighbor,'' it was already the market leader in the consumer lawn-care industry. Founded in 1868 by O.M. Scott, the company had initially introduced its Turf Builder fertilizer in 1928. Despite this long history, however, Scotts's marketing efforts had been chaotic before it teamed up with ad agency Partners & Shevack. Although it was a national brand, for many years Scotts poured most of its Six stills from the "Three Amigos" television spot from Scott's "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign. PARTNERS & SHEVACK INC. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Six stills from the "Looby Lawn" television spot from Scott's "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign. PARTNERS & SHEVACK INC. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

media dollars into scattershot local and regional ads. Using taglines such as "The Scotts Difference," the company often stressed the science behind its products rather than their uses in everyday life. People were absent from most of the commercials, which relied heavily on animated drawings that depicted the nitrogen of Scotts's fertilizers nourishing a lawn. The company's efforts to connect directly with consumers were also thwarted by its tendency to rely on a network of retailers to market its products and by its slim profit margins.

Scotts's fate changed in 1995, however, when the company acquired Miracle-Gro, a flourishing plant-food company that had used savvy marketing to its advantage. "It was a classic case of a lean entrepreneurial company indirectly taking over a sluggish old tortoise company," explained Forbes magazine. Miracle-Gro's enthusiastic founder and chief, Horace Hagerdon, exerted a powerful influence over his new parent company. "The truth of the matter is, Scotts didn't buy Miracle-Gro . . . we bought Scotts," he proudly told the Wall Street Journal. After Theodore J. Host, then Scotts's CEO, implemented a disastrous marketing scheme that resulted in the company having to restate its 1996 earnings (which promptly led to a 16 percent drop in its stock price), Hagerdon engineered to have him replaced by Charles Berger, a former H.G. Heinz executive. Berger had big plans for the company, which included expanding its presence in the marketplace. "I'd like to create the Procter & Gamble of law and garden," he revealed to the Columbus Dispatch. Thus, 1996 was a rebuilding year ("a memorable year we'd like to forget," as Berger told the Dispatch), in which the company reported a loss of $2.5 million. One of Berger's first steps was to restructure Scotts and its marketing program. He chose to emphasize the consumer lawn business, which then accounted for about one-third of Scotts's revenues, and it was during this transition period that "Neighbor to Neighbor" was initiated.

TARGET MARKET

Another of Berger's innovations was to target Scotts's lawn-care advertising at the people who actually bought the products. "I restored a consumer orientation to the company," he told the Columbus Dispatch. The primary vehicle for this change was the "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign. It had a wide audience to reach. The company wanted to persuade homeowners across racial and demographic lines to try Turf Builder and its siblings. In addition to capturing consumers from other brands, Scotts sought to bring lawn-care novices into the Scotts fold. The profit potential for this strategy was considerable. According to Forbes, Americans spent an astonishing $2.7 billion on lawn and garden products each year. The consumers of such products were skewed slightly toward males, according to Partners & Shevack's Tim Roan. Instead of hiring actors, Partners & Shevack commissioned genuine Scotts's customers, whom it discovered on scouting trips through leafy residential neighborhoods. Out went the drawings of nitrogen molecules. In their place were impassioned, and often quirky, Scotts users who conveyed the benefits the company's products had brought them. The "Neighbor to Neighbor" stars were excited about their lawns and even more excited about the Scotts products that made their grass greener and thicker. The commercials showcased an array of lawn aficionados that included people of different ages and races and both men and women. In the spots Scotts's impromptu spokespeople were interviewed standing on lawns in front of everyday houses in everyday neighborhoods. The "Neighbor to Neighbor" theme expressed the idea that these folks with impossibly green grass were "just like you" and "just like your neighbor."

ALL SCOTTS, ALL THE TIME

According to Partners & Shevack's Tim Roan, Scotts's marketing efforts made up 80 percent of the lawn-care industry's total 1998 advertising. This dominance played a major part in helping Scott expand its lead in the lucrative industry and ensured that the company outpaced its rivals.

In addition to encouraging viewers to relate to the spokespeople, "Neighbor to Neighbor" strove to make lawn care less intimidating. Many people limited their lawn-care activities to mowing and watering because anything more extensive was often perceived as requiring arcane knowledge possessed only by a few. Much of the advice available to would-be homeowners seemed designed to perpetuate this myth. A lawn-care article published in the Des Moines Register, for instance, discussed such seemingly complicated concepts as "fertilization regimes that vary for different types of grasses and lawn use" and suggested that people's lawns would benefit if they raked "about one-quarter inch of compost or aged manure onto the lawn each spring and fall." Assuming that anyone had made it that far, the article went on to discuss raking, mulching, and aerating techniques. "Neighbor to Neighbor" was the antithesis of this sort of approach. In the spots Scotts's products were depicted as easy to use and effective. "In late spring, I put [Turf Builder with Plus 2 Weed Control] in my spreader, [and] a couple of days later the weeds are looking sick and the lawn's looking green," one satisfied Scotts's customer related in a television spot.

COMPETITION

Scotts's efforts to build its brand met with little concerted resistance. For the most part the lawn-care business was a "regionalized, fragmented industry," according to the Columbus Dispatch. Scotts's closest competitor was Vigoro, which was acquired in 1998 by Alabama-based Pursell Industries. Once a more powerful brand, Vigoro's market share had fallen far behind Scotts's. In 1997 Vigoro sought to return to the national stage and challenge Scotts. As part of this strategy, Vigoro entered into a relationship with the popular Home Depot chain, which had more than 500 stores across the United States and which attracted the sort of consumers most likely to lavish time and energy (and money) on their lawns. As a part of the arrangement, Home Depot obtained the exclusive right to sell Vigoro's line of lawn-care products. The deal proved to be a boon for Vigoro, as Scotts quickly discovered that its high-profile advertising—which motivated customers to think about lawn care and drove them into megastores like Home Depot—could actually run the risk of boosting the sales of its competitors. Although Vigoro did not pursue the same sort of national and regional marketing efforts as Scotts did, it did have considerable support from the staff at Home Depot. Because Vigoro was Home Depot's private-label brand, the chain's employees were more apt to recommend the slightly less expensive Vigoro over Scotts. In-store displays and shelf arrangements also aided Vigoro's Home Depot sales.

Pursell produced a number of other lawn-care products as well. In addition to manufacturing private-label brands for Kmart and Lowe's, Pursell produced Sam's Choice Lawn Food for Wal-Mart and a line of six organic garden fertilizers sold in the Martha Stewart Everyday gardening line at Kmart. In 1996 Pursell achieved $100 million in sales. To support is flagship product, the Sta-Green brand, Pursell ran 60-second commercials on the Home and Garden cable television network in 1996. Its primary target was aging baby boomers, who were apt to spend more time on lawn maintenance and gardening.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Scotts had two overarching goals for the "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign. The company wanted to drive sales of its Turf Builder line and to strengthen the entire Scotts brand. Before it launched its barrage of consumer-centered advertisements, Scotts was perceived primarily as a "fertilizer company," Hecker told the Columbus Dispatch. The impetus behind "Neighbor to Neighbor" was to transform Scotts into a "consumer branded company." The television spots did much to further this goal. With their almost paternalistic tones, the spots presented the company as a knowledgeable neighbor offering advice not only about which brand to use but also about how to care for a lawn. Furthermore, by airing "Neighbor to Neighbor" nationally during prime-time shows and sports telecasts and on a variety of cable programs, Scotts strove to make more consumers aware of the brand. In the commercials Scotts positioned itself not just as a fertilizer company but also as a "lawn educator." Of course, this kind of saturation strategy required considerable expenditures. Although "Neighbor to Neighbor" was initially budgeted at only $2 million, by 1998 Scotts, which recognized that brand building required expensive, high-exposure media buys, was dedicating $20 million to the campaign.

Scotts complemented the brand-oriented television commercials with radio spots that were geared more toward stimulating the sales of specific products. Ashton Ritchey, the voice behind the radio commercials, advised listeners on which Scotts product was ideal for lawn care "this weekend." The spots, which ran in 78 markets, allowed Scotts to focus its message and closely tie its product recommendations to season and climate, since different products were obviously needed to care for a lawn in Maine in September as opposed to a lawn in Florida in June. According to Tim Roan of Partners & Shevack, the radio component of the campaign was especially effective because it "created urgency" and sent listeners into stores intent on buying specific products.

In 1998 Scotts coordinated its television and radio components in an innovative move to increase its fertilizer sales. Most homeowners typically fertilized their lawns in the spring, which resulted in a 10-week buying period for the company's fertilizer offerings each year. In an effort to increase its Turf Builder sales, Scotts promoted its products from Labor Day until October, a strategy "which hardly anyone had done before," noted Forbes. The "Three Amigos" TV commercial was part of this effort. In it, real-life customers named Jay, Al, and Rich advocated fertilizing with Scotts Turf Builder Lawn Fertilizer in autumn. The spot closed as the words "A Great Fall Lawn. Guaranteed" appeared on the screen. The maneuver was only one example of Scotts's foray into new territories. As the uncontested market leader, its growth potential was limited if it aimed only to cannibalize consumers from its rivals. Through user-friendly commercials played in heavy rotation, the company sought to bring new consumers into the lawn-care industry and to encourage existing consumers to think about their lawn-care needs in new ways. As Berger told Forbes, Scotts's underlying agenda was to "grow the total market dynamically and then take all the growth."

In 1999 Scotts executives feared that the branding campaign was not explaining enough about the product. "We had to develop new informative packaging to help consumers better identify the right product for their own lawns," Scotts senior vice president Gordon Hecker said in Advertising Age. To solve the problem without loading the television spots down with product information, tear-off fliers were distributed at selling points.

Ashton Ritchie, the voice behind Scotts radio spots for six years, began appearing in television spots in 2002. Scotts executives and even Ritchie were not sure if he was the right choice. ''I think the TV commercial is a surprise to some people,'' Ritchie said in the Columbus Dispatch. ''After all, it's common knowledge here I have the face for radio.'' Jeff Williamson, the senior vice president and associate creative director for the Wolf Group, insisted that Ritchie's approachable deposition was perfect for the brand.

Because of the American military invasion of Iraq in 2003, advertisers reduced their ad spending, especially during news time. In contrast Scotts increased marketing expenditures by 20 percent and, because of discounted advertising rates, was able to purchase more airtime than it could have before the war. The campaign also expanded with inspirational print ads that read, ''Green is part of the dream'' to celebrate the fertilizer Turf Builder's 75-year anniversary. The campaign continued into 2006.

OUTCOME

The company achieved its 1998 goal of convincing customers to shift from the traditional spring-only pattern to year-round lawn fertilization. According to Discount Store News, Scotts's sales of fertilizer during the fall of 1998 ''went through the roof,'' growing 50 percent. Hecker explained to Adweek how these outstanding gains had come about. ''We've been able to experience these double-digit increases really without a lot of new products. It's come through more marketing.'' Partners & Shevack's accomplishments in conceiving the ''Neighbor to Neighbor'' campaign were recognized by the advertising industry, with the firm receiving a 1998 EFFIE Award for its work.

Even though the campaign bolstered sales for Scotts, the commercials were not necessarily popular with the general public. Only 13 percent of those surveyed by USA Today's Ad Track consumer poll liked the spots ''a lot,'' versus the poll average of 21 percent. Lee Reichart, vice president of advertising for Scotts, explained to USA Today that the company did not consider the low score to be extremely important. ''For people who aren't involved in caring for lawns, this has no relevance,'' he stated. Scotts's sales for lawn products had increased from $280 million in 1996 to $525 million in 2002.

In January 2004 the Wolf Group, by then the only agency creating advertising for the $80 million Scotts account, closed its doors because of financial problems at its Toronto headquarters. Mike Rogers, who was once president of the Wolf Group's New York office, quickly founded the new ad agency ML Rogers. He then recruited most of his previous Wolf Group employees and continued the ''Neighbor to Neighbor'' campaign. ''We were informed that Wolf was shutting down on a Friday morning, and by Monday morning, Mike was up and running,'' Bill Burke, Scotts vice president of marketing services, told Adweek. ''Mike really made the transition seamless for us.'' The campaign continued into 2006.

FURTHER READING

Dini, Justin. ''Homeowners: Scotts Co.'s Advertisement for Its Fertilizer.'' Adweek, August 24, 1998.

Fowler, Veronica. ''Grow the Perfect Lawn.'' Des Moines Register, April 18, 1999.

Freeman, Laurie. ''Scotts.'' Advertising Age, June 28, 1999, p. S28.

Gomez, Henry. ''Wolf Trio Pitches Buyout.'' Crain's Cleveland Business, March, 15, 2004, p. 3.

Howell, Debbie. ''Savvy Marketing Feeds Fertilizer Sales.'' Discount Store News, April 5, 1999.

Jaffe, Thomas. ''Lean Green Machine: A Few Years Ago, Scotts Co. Was a Slow Moving Company.'' Forbes, November 16, 1998.

McCarthy, Michael. ''Scotts 'Lawn Envy' Spots Get Mixed Reaction.'' USA Today, May 19, 2003, p. B7.

Murray, Matt. ''Turning the Tables: Miracle-Gro Family Seeds Ranks of Firm that Bought It Out.'' Wall Street Journal, July 23, 1996.

Williams, Brian. ''A Blooming Success.'' Columbus Dispatch, July 27, 1997.

Wolf, Barnet D. ''Visibility to Grow for Scotts Pitchman.'' Columbus (OH) Dispatch, May 29, 2002, p. 1G.

Zammit, Deanna. ''Amid Crowds and Chaos, ML Rogers Sees 'Fresh Air.' '' Adweek, May 24, 2004, p. 15.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

Sears, Roebuck & Co.

3333 Beverly Road
Hoffman Estates, Illinois 60179
USA
Telephone: (847) 286-2500
Fax: (847) 286-7829
Web site: www.sears.com

■■■

COME SEE THE SOFTER SIDE OF SEARS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The impressive comeback of Sears, Roebuck and Co. was one of the major success stories of the 1990s. Sears was losing billions of dollars a year in the early 1990s but recovered to become one of the top retailers in the nation by 1997. Under the leadership of Arthur C. Martinez, its new chief executive officer, Sears had divested itself of various peripheral businesses, focused on its strengths, updated its stores and merchandise, and publicized the changes by releasing one of the largest advertising campaigns in its history: ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears.''

The campaign, which began in 1993 and ran until the summer of 1999, featured print ads and an appealing, memorable jingle on television that invited consumers to ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears.'' This helped the floundering, 109-year-old department-store chain emphasize that it offered more than the Kenmore appliances, DieHard car batteries, Craftsman tools, and other ''hard'' merchandise for which it was best known. The advertising contrasted ''softer side'' clothing and accessories with the store's ''hardline'' products. For example, a two-page print ad showed a car battery against a simple white background and under the words ''I came in for a DieHard.'' The other half of the ad concluded with the line ''And left with something drop dead,'' which was superimposed over a warm, color photograph of a woman in an elegant cocktail gown.

For a while the store's transformation and marketing efforts paid off handsomely as women responded well to the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign. A study by Fortune magazine found that from September 1992 to April 1997, the total return to investors from Sears was 300 percent. Competitors J.C. Penney and Wal-Mart returned closer to 75 percent and 10 percent, respectively. In addition, apparel sales at Sears tripled over the course of the campaign. But Sears faced a host of challenges in the late 1990s, including a younger market with which it failed to connect and competition from upscale department stores, specialty stores, and discounters. As a result, the venerable retailer was once again struggling to remain relevant.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sears's advertising slogans in the past had not been particularly memorable. ''Where America shops'' and ''Everyday low prices'' had not caught the public's fancy in the way that the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign did. After a hundred years in business, the company fell into a worsening sales slump for two decades while many of its competitors quickly gained market share.

Sears hit its peak in 1972 and was in a steep decline when Martinez took the helm in 1992. He promptly closed more than a hundred stores that were not performing well, laid off 50 thousand workers, and discontinued the famous Sears Catalog. ''Those were very, very difficult decisions, but they were necessary,'' said Paula Davis, a public-affairs specialist with Sears. If Martinez had not made those tough choices, she added, more employees probably would have lost their jobs as the company continued to flounder. Further, Martinez tightened the company's focus by selling the Allstate insurance company, the Discover credit card, and other financial-service businesses. He also hired John H. Costello to head Sears's marketing efforts.

Information about millions of households was compiled from the company's credit database, consumer research contacts, and sales personnel at Sears stores. The data was analyzed to identify the company's strengths, primary customers, and main competitors. This research revealed that Sears had a solid reputation for trustworthiness. Its brands, including Kenmore, Craftsman, and DieHard, were known for their quality and affordable prices. Unfortunately, however, women were not particularly enthusiastic about the store's clothing, shoes, and accessories. In general, Sears was perceived as an old, reputable company with stores that looked somewhat outdated in comparison to the Home Depots and Wal-Marts that had sprung up to challenge it.

OTHER MARKETING APPROACHES

Sears did not depend entirely on advertising to attract customers and cultivate a positive image for itself in 1997. As part of its marketing efforts during 1996 and 1997, the company was the exclusive sponsor of a concert tour by pop singer Gloria Estefan. Sears was also a sponsor of the Women's National Basketball Association, the Trans-Am Championship, and the Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey Circus.

In addition, Sears was the only retail outlet selling ties and scarves for Gilda's Club, a nonprofit organization for people with cancer. The club—named for Gilda Radner, a well-known comic who died of cancer—received 10 percent of the proceeds from Gilda's Club neckwear. Sears also contributed funds from other promotions to Gilda's Club.

TARGET MARKET

One of the basic problems was that Sears had no profile of its key customers. Identifying primary consumers was not easy for a company with hundreds of individual stores selling a wide range of merchandise to many types of people. For years Sears had assumed that its key customers were men, about 45 years old, who needed items such as power tools and car tires. As the company reevaluated its operations, however, research showed that its core customers were actually working mothers 25 to 54 years old with household incomes of $25,000 to $60,000. Most of them were already making some purchases at Sears, and they often made most of the buying decisions for their families. For example, it was noted that women bought more than 70 percent of men's clothing.

Therefore, Young & Rubicam designed an advertising campaign that appealed specifically to women by emphasizing the ''softer side'' of the store, in contrast to its hardware. Some of the early spots added, ''We're not who you think we are.'' The advertising focused on stylish, affordable, comfortable clothing of good quality that women could wear at work, at home, or at social events. At the same time Sears had softer lighting installed in its stores, modernized apparel departments, and moved them near the stores' doorways in shopping malls, where women could spot the clothing, shoes, cosmetics, and related items as they walked past. ''Sears apparel has been our best-kept secret,'' said Robert L. Mettler, president of Sears Apparel Group. ''We've taken dramatic steps to improve our apparel quality, value, selection, price, and fashion levels. This campaign is aimed at communicating those changes and inviting women into our departments to see our progress first hand.''

''Our new campaign is designed to close the perception gap between what our customers expect to find in our stores and what we actually have in our stores in fashionable and affordable apparel,'' said John Costello, senior executive vice president and general manager of the marketing division for Sears. ''Based on extensive customer research, we expect our women customers to react very favorably to the new campaign.''

COMPETITION

Sears was not the only long-established department store struggling to change with the times. At least one rival followed Sears's lead and began an attempt to change its image in 1997. While under the protection of Chapter 11 bankruptcy, Montgomery Ward launched a $50 million advertising campaign with the tagline ''Shop Smart, Live Well. Ward's.'' The commercials, which ran on radio and on prime-time television during programs such as Friends, resembled the Sears campaign in many ways. The characters were mainly women who discussed their reasons for purchasing apparel, household goods, and other products from Ward's. In a move away from its previous advertising, which had tended to emphasize attractive prices, the company called attention to its wide selection of quality merchandise.

Another old competitor, the J.C. Penney Co., ran a holiday promotion intended to offer "convenience, speed, and hassle-free" shopping for "time-starved women." Penney's called its sales associates "gift experts" and ran television commercials encouraging customers to use the store's suggestion lists for purchasing gifts.

In contrast, Gap's stylishly stark television spots during 1997 featured celebrities performing music that always concluded with the jingle "Fall into the Gap." For example, during the holiday season the clothing store's commercials included performances by Lena Horne singing "Winter Wonderland" and pop stars singing other Christmas carols.

The message was different at Kmart Corporation, where holiday advertising included humorous television spots with celebrities Penny Marshall and Rosie O'Donnell as average American friends shopping together at the North Pole and other unlikely locations. The ads were part of a popular campaign, launched in 1995, that conveyed the message that Kmart understood who its customers were and how they shopped. In that year Kmart had, like Sears, begun to overhaul its image and change its marketing tactics.

Marshall directed another campaign in 1997 to promote the company's new Big K retail centers. It featured celebrities such as model Kathy Ireland and home improvement guru Martha Stewart running, walking, and riding to the stores. At the same time the company launched a separate campaign that targeted minority customers for its Big K outlets in certain locations.

Early in the year Kmart also formed an alliance with Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia LLC to design, promote, and sell Martha Stewart Everyday bed and bath products. "Customers trust Martha Stewart to inspire a sense of style that they can confidently and comfortably bring to life in their own homes," said Floyd Hall, chairman, president, and chief executive officer of Kmart. The marketing campaign for the products, which underscored their mix-and-match styles, included television spots and advertising in women's magazines and home-and-garden publications.

OTHER ADVERTISING

Sears's multifaceted approach to advertising included a campaign called "Todo para ti" ("everything for you") that targeted Hispanic consumers. In addition, the company circulated 800,000 copies of its magazine, Nuestra Gente, which featured articles along with ads and other promotional material. Nuestra Gente, in its fifth year of publication, was one of the largest Spanish-language magazines in the nation. In 1997 Sears also launched its first advertising campaign promoting apparel for African-Americans. The campaign included ads in magazines and spots on television and radio. The company also used direct marketing to place promotional materials in consumers' households. Sears mailed more than 150 million catalogs, including millions of Wish Book catalogs during the holidays. Another 90 million advertising preprints were inserted in newspapers, and 180 million mailers were sent directly to households. Finally, Sears began marketing its products via the Internet. Customers could order Craftsman tools and other merchandise from the Sears website.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign ran on television and in major publications, including women's magazines and general interest publications, to reach the women who were the campaign's primary target. "The company really needed to get the woman back into the store," Davis explained. "We wanted an advertising campaign that would speak to her." The thinking was that once women had been persuaded to shop in the apparel department the advertising slogan could be expanded to publicize other attractions at Sears.

Young & Rubicam had designed other campaigns for Sears and was chosen from a field of other agencies that submitted ideas for campaigns that could help change Sears's image. Young & Rubicam was known for creating focused, uncomplicated ads that hinged on "inspired simplicity" and clearly distinguished the agency's clients from competitors.

For its part, Sears made a financial commitment that helped make the venture a success. The company increased its total spending on marketing apparel to more than $200 million a year, invested about $4 billion in store renovations, and allocated about $40 million annually to advertise the changes. "Through our 'softer side' campaign, we want to tell American women that we have upgraded our apparel assortments and that we have what they are looking for," Martinez said. "We want the campaign to disarm the skeptics and pleasantly surprise our customers and feature the kind of merchandise that's on our sales floor right now.''

By 1997 the campaign had been running successfully for four years without deviating from the primary message that women should come in and see the modernized apparel department and home furnishings at Sears. The initial phases of the commercials had focused mainly on women's apparel and related merchandise. As the years passed, the focus expanded to include apparel for men and children, footwear, holiday purchases, and other aspects of the store. One big-budget campaign publicized ''the service side of Sears,'' a new division that provided appliance repair and other services in customers' homes.

A companion campaign, ''The Many Sides of Sears,'' was launched in 1993 and also was incorporated through the years as a slogan within the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign, in other advertisements, on the company's Internet site, and in Sears outlets nationwide. It depicted Sears as a store that met the needs of everyone in the family, with a broad range of merchandise and a new image. The women who were Sears's new target market had busy schedules, and Sears thought they would appreciate a store that offered the opportunity to purchase everything from makeup to a new washing machine to gifts for their husbands. ''We are one of the last traditional department stores,'' Davis noted. With the ''many sides'' campaign the company was also reaching out to the men who had always been an important part of its customer base.

In August 1997 Sears expanded both the ''Many Sides of Sears'' and ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaigns with simultaneous television debuts in Canada as part of a $300 million capital investment undertaking. The Canadian marketing effort included radio spots and print advertisements.

In the fall of 1998 the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign turned to humor to get its message across. In print ads that appeared in women's magazines and three 30-second television spots, outdated fashions were compared to the modern look of Sears's apparel. Women were urged to ''take another look'' at Sears.

By 1999, however, it was becoming clear that the message ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' was losing its effectiveness. A new marketing chief was hired and a major creative overhaul was begun, but not before one last execution of the campaign, albeit muted, was introduced in spring 1999 and ran through August. The slogan was never spoken in these television spots and was instead relegated to a graphic at the end. Furthermore, the ''softer side'' jingle was modified and only made a token appearance in the closing moments of the dozen or so 15-second fashion spots released in the effort. The emphasis was now on price, in keeping with a Sears's announcement that it would attempt to bolster apparel sales by cutting prices by 15 percent on average. Hence, each of the new spots promoted a specific sale, such as 25 percent off swimsuits. Attempting to compete on price with discounters such as Wal-Mart was not a winning strategy, however, and Sears struggled in the new century to settle on a new marketing theme that provided the traction that ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' had given the company through much of the 1990s.

OUTCOME

Response to the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign at its height was so positive that it became part of the company's overall image. It provided a much-needed morale boost to Sears's employees, many of whom had become despondent after seeing 50 thousand of their coworkers laid off and many Sears stores closed. Davis explained, ''This was the rallying cry that things were changing at Sears. It was a signal that Sears was in touch with who our customer was; we were upgrading; things were changing. Also, we had a new management team coming in, people who were the best at what they did. Increasing employee morale was extremely important.'' Employee attitude improved, which led to an improvement in customer service, which in turn led to additional sales.

The campaign also increased profits more directly by convincing consumers to visit Sears and see the changes for themselves. ''The campaign increased traffic, increased sales, and increased market share,'' Davis said. The ads were particularly popular with the women customers who were their main target. According to a 1997 survey conducted by USA Today, 24 percent of all respondents and 30 percent of women gave the ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' ads the highest popularity rating, and 32 percent said the campaign was very effective. Only 4 percent disliked the campaign, well below the survey average of 13 percent.

According to Ad Track, ''Store revenues for the 43 weeks ended November 29 were $32.2 billion, up 6.9 percent from the same period in 1996.'' The Advertiser reported that Sears had lost $2.9 billion in 1992 but was operating at a profit of $890 million within two years, just after the campaign was first launched in 1993. Earnings peaked in 1995, when Sears posted a record $1.8 billion. But this would prove the high-water mark, as income began to tail off.

The ''Come See the Softer Side of Sears'' campaign and its spin-offs received various honors for excellence in advertising, including the Ogilvy Award in 1996 and EFFIE Awards in 1994, 1997, and 1998. And if imitation was a reflection of success as well as the sincerest form of flattery, Wal-Mart appeared to pay Sears the ultimate compliment in 2006 when it began its "Look Beyond the Basics" campaign, which was eerily similar to "Come See the Softer Side of Sears." Not only did Wal-Mart target women and try to convince them to consider Wal-Mart apparel and not merely shop there for household staples, but also, the execution of some ads were all but identical to the Sears effort. For example, a two-page print Sears ad stating, "We were looking for a refrigerator. But I found something much cooler," was matched by a similar two-page Wal-Mart testimonial with the text "I went in for eye drops and found something eye-opening."

In the end "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" was somewhat memorable but proved not to be the turning point in the history of Sears that many had thought. The message, however well delivered, could not overcome the reality that once women were lured into the apparel aisles, they were generally disappointed with the fashions. This was especially true of younger consumers. Moreover, Sears had to contend with increasing competition from all sides: from specialty stores such as Gap, from more upscale department stores such as Nordstrom and Neiman Marcus, from discounters such as Wal-Mart and Target, and from category-killers Circuit City, Best Buy, Home Depot, and Lowe's. In 2001 Sears tried out the theme "Sears. Where else?" Unfortunately for Sears, consumers could think of a number of alternatives.

FURTHER READING

Altaner, David. "Sears Remains a Factor, after All These Years." Sun-Sentinel Fort Lauderdale, December 7, 1995.

"Ample Dollar Support Has Five Retailing Powerhouses Heading in Different Directions." Advertising Age, 1995.

Barbaro, Michael. "Wal-Mart Shows a Similar Side to Sears." New York Times, March 31, 2006, p. C2.

"Clothing Comeback: Sears' Softer Side Strengthens Sales." Apparel Merchandising, December 5, 1994.

Cuneo, Alice Z.. "Penney's, Others Pitching Gift Ideas for Busy Shoppers." Advertising Age, November 1997.

———. "Sears Breaks 'Interim' Spring Ads." Advertising Age, March 15, 2006, p. 56.

Dobrzynski, Judith. "Reinventing the Sears Corporation." Ottawa Citizen, April 20, 1996.

Dolbow, Sandra. "Mid-Tier Muddle." Brandweek, April 10, 20006, p. 36.

Elliott, Stuart. "Sears to Focus on Variety Not Price." New York Times, August 21, 2001, p. C1.

Enrico, Dottie. "Sears' Softer Approach: Consumers, Especially Women, Take to Ads." USA Today, December 15, 1997.

Evans, Keith. "Use One-Shot, One-Idea Approach to Advertising." Angus Journal, December 1996.

Kirk, Jim. "Success of 'Softer Side' May Tilt Sears Budget to Broadcast." Adweek (midwest ed.), September 4, 1995.

Malmo, John. "First, Truly Change; Then Advertise." Commercial Appeal, January 7, 1996.

McMurray, Scott. "Sears Fashions a New Future for Itself." U.S. News & World Report, May 13, 1996, p. 61.

Podmolik, Mary Ellen. "Ward's Airs New Ad Pitch." Chicago Sun-Times, August 29, 1997.

"Sears Finds Success with 'Softer Side,'" USA Today, 1996.

"Sears Unveils Its Many Sides." Canada NewsWire, August 29, 1997.

Sellers, Patricia. "Sears: The Turnaround Is Ending: The Revolution Has Begun." Fortune, April 28, 1997, p. 106.

"The Transformation of Sears: A Marketing Perspective." Advertiser, Fall 1995.

Susan Risland
Ed Dinger

SEARS. WHERE ELSE? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the 1990s Sears, Roebuck & Co.Company, a massive retail chain selling thousands of products, was in serious trouble from the loss of market share to big-box stores such as Wal-Mart, Target, and Home Depot. In response Sears spent large amounts of money on advertising campaigns that touted what was special about its stores. Through various campaigns involving hundreds of television commercials, print ads, and newspaper circulars, Sears hoped to overcome the increasing threat to its business. From the "Softer Side of Sears" (1993) to the "Good Life at a Great Price" (1999) and the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign (2001), the company advertised many things about itself: its affordable prices, vast range of merchandise, heritage, and strong family values. Especially with the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign, which spoke to all the above, Sears attempted to set itself apart from competitors by portraying the company as a place that simply could not be matched.

The "Sears. Where Else?" campaign made its debut in September 2001, the same month in which terrorist attacks took place in the United States. Thus, the campaign was introduced at a time of economic distress. Nonetheless, during the four years it ran Sears spent between $600 million to $1 billion annually on the campaign. During the 2001 holiday season alone, 40 different television spots were released. For the television commercials Sears and its ad agency, Young & Rubicam Chicago, used humor to convey its message: that for many generations Sears had been dependably providing families with everything they needed to run a home. The target market was the "mission-focused" woman, the household shopper who was under time constraints. In the ads Sears called attention to its diverse selection of merchandise, which included clothing for the entire family, jewelry, electronics, appliances, tools, auto supplies, and much more. While some previous campaigns had showed only snippets of what the store offered, the ''Sears. Where Else?'' campaign portrayed Sears in its entirety. Although newspaper circulars were the main medium for the print ads, the campaign also appeared in a number of magazines oriented toward families and women. It was the first time in many years that Sears had advertised in magazines.

Sears store in the Woodbridge Mall, Woodbridge, New Jersey. © NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

Early numbers seemed to confirm that the ''Sears. Where Else?'' campaign was having some success. The 2001 holiday season ended a tough economic year for most American retailers. Although Wall Street analysts predicted a decline of up to 5 percent for same-store holiday sales, Sears's decline was just under half that. In addition, the local advertising industry liked the campaign. The use of humor in the ads, a new approach for Sears, won several Windy Awards, given to Chicago-area agencies. In the end, however, it was difficult to know whether or not the ads helped Sears long-term. While Sears's 2002 sales increased $1 billion over the previous year, from $40 to $41 billion, by 2004 its sales had fallen to $36 billion. Competition from big-box bargain stores continued to increase during the ''Sears. Where Else?'' campaign. Then, in March 2005 Sears was acquired by Kmart Holding Corp., one of its big-box competitors.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From its beginnings in the nineteenth century, Sears marketed to average American consumers. Early 500-page catalogs that sold such items as women's garments, shoes, watches, baby carriages, stoves, wagons, and firearms were directed toward farmers. These catalogs, which offered farmers a cheaper alternative to rural stores, where the markup on goods was often as much as 100 percent, served as highly effective advertising for Sears. Still, the company undertook additional advertising efforts. In 1905, for instance, Sears wrote to its most loyal customers in Iowa to ask that each person distribute 24 catalogs to friends and neighbors. In return, when each of the recipients sent in an order, the original customer received premiums, including such items as stoves or bicycles. The marketing program in Iowa was successful and was later repeated in other states.

Although Sears stopped enlisting customers to distribute catalogs, its campaigns in the twentieth century carried similar themes. For one, the focus on prices remained at the core of its advertising. As well, Sears ads continued to be directed primarily toward ordinary Americans. A 1976 campaign tagline claiming that Sears was ''Where America shops'' captured this focus. Over the following decade, however, it became clear that Sears benefited more from the loyalty of seniors than from other age groups. By the 1980s Sears had begun to shift its focus to entire families, in particular to women as heads of households. Advertising portrayed Sears as a place where a woman could find all of her family's needs. The introduction of the KidVantage WearOut Warranty and Frequent Purchase programs, both of which reduced the cost of children's clothes, appealed directly to mothers. Soon afterward, however, the focus shifted again, this time to the woman herself.

The "Softer Side of Sears," a campaign introduced in 1993, epitomized this change. The ads invited women to "come see the softer side of Sears," referring to women's clothing and accessories. The campaign told women that, although they could still find clothing for their kids and power tools for the men in their lives, they should not neglect their own needs and wants. From then on the emphasis in marketing was balanced among families, prices, diversity of merchandise, and Sears's heritage, but always with a female target market. The campaign ran until 1999, when it was replaced by "Good Life at a Great Price," which returned full circle to the company's heritage but which continued to focus on the American woman. In another two years this campaign was replaced by "Sears. Where Else?" which, once again, shifted the focus by highlighting Sears's ability to offer customers virtually all of their household needs.

TARGET MARKET

Beginning in the 1980s, Sears's advertising began to center on families, with ads heavily promoting its ability to meet the needs of entire households. In 1993, however, with the "Softer Side of Sears" campaign, the focus shifted from the family to the woman of the household. These ads asked customers to take another look at Sears's apparel for women. Because women had long been the primary shoppers for families, the shift was seen as being a shrewd one. The campaign "Good Life at a Great Price," which in 1999 replaced "Softer Side of Sears," continued to target women but focused more on affordability. The campaign clearly was an attempt to compete with such successful discount giants as Wal-Mart and Target.

By the time the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign was launched in 2001, women accounted for more than 70 percent of Sears's sales. The company had come to refer to its core customer as the woman who was a "mission shopper." According to Sears, time constraints brought a woman to its stores, where she could find anything she needed for herself and her family. While the focus remained on the woman as shopper, products for the whole family once again came to be emphasized. Sears wanted to appeal to customers who might be more concerned with saving time than money. "Where else," asked Sears, could a woman find all of the products she and her family needed?

MASSIVE CONSTRUCTION

In 1973 the completion of the Sears Tower gave the big chain store a brand new headquarters in downtown Chicago. The 110-story tower, then the world's tallest building at 1,456 feet, required a massive amount of materials in its construction. Included were 76,000 tons of steel, 2 million cubic feet of concrete, 16,000 tinted windows, 80 miles of elevator cable, and 1,500 miles of electrical wiring, which was longer than the entire western coast of the United States.

COMPETITION

Sears was not the only retailer trying to convince women that they could find all of their needs under one roof. Advertising for JC Penney stores, for example, took a similar approach. By the time Sears introduced the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign, the J. C. Penney Company, Inc., had been running the campaign "It's All Inside" for a year. This campaign focused on women and on the many roles they played in their daily lives. Nonetheless, even as JC Penney stores took some market share from Sears, the company's own numbers began to dwindle. In 2002 J. C. Penney had more than $30 billion in sales, with net profits of $405 million. In the following year, however, the company's sales plunged almost by half, and it suffered a loss of nearly $1 billion in net profits.

Like JC Penney, Sears was being squeezed on both sides, on one hand by higher-end department stores such as Macy's and on the other by deep discounters such as Wal-Mart. Sears's net profits began to fluctuate dramatically. In 2001, when the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign was launched, the company's net profits were $735 million, down from more than $1.3 billion the year before. In 2002 the number rose to almost $1.4 billion, and in 2003 it rose again, to nearly $3.4 billion. At the same time, however, Sears's sales had remained virtually stagnant, at about $40 billion from 1997 to 2003.

Other retailers, especially deep discounters such as Wal-Mart, Target, and Kohl's, were meeting with greater success. A shift had occurred in U.S. spending, reflecting shoppers' high priority on low prices. Wal-Mart seemed to embody this trend best, as was confirmed by its sales numbers. In 2002 Wal-Mart's sales exceeded $217 billion, representing a 16 percent increase from the year before, and this was followed by a 14 percent increase in 2003. The company's annual net profits, both in 2001 and 2002, exceeded $6 billion. In 2003 its profits jumped to more than $8 billion.

In the category of household appliances, Sears suffered from the success of other big-box stores. Such discounters as Best Buy and Home Depot, for example, were experiencing healthy growth. In 2002 sales for Best Buy, at nearly $18 billion, showed an increase of almost $3 billion over 2001. The retailer had even greater success in 2003 and 2004, with sales at $21 billion and $24.5 billion, respectively. Thus, with deeply discounted appliances in its more than 700 store in the United States, Best Buy was giving other appliance retailers serious competition. Home Depot's numbers during the same time period were even more impressive. From 2002 to 2004 its net sales grew from $58 billion to $73 billion. Both retailers were dominant in marketing, with their ads focusing on the many products offered in their stories at affordable prices.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In September 2001 Sears returned to its heritage with the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign. Led by Mark Figliulo, the chief creative officer at Young & Rubicam Chicago, the campaign also involved seven other agencies, including Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, and Burrell Communications Group, Chicago. With an advertising budget that ranged between $600 million and $1 billion a year, Sears set out to remind customers of everything it had to offer. As Figliulo put it, the campaign simply let "Sears be Sears." The television campaign, which included 40 spots that ran during the 2001 holiday season alone, was concentrated in prime-time and early morning slots. Although newspaper circulars represented the heart of the print campaign, ads also appeared in magazines catering to families and women. These included People and TV Guide, as well as O,, the magazine published by Oprah Winfrey.

To spread its message, Sears and Young & Rubicam used humor that had a slight edge to it. For example, the 2001 holiday ads, which played on women's fantasies, were sexy in a humorous way, representing a strategy that was different from any previous Sears campaign. In the ads women were shown fantasizing about various men: a sexy lumberjack or a man in Levi's helping repair a woman's car with Craftsman tools. The women's fantasies helped them decide what to buy their own men for Christmas. Other ads in the campaign were more centered on reality, but they still used a touch of humor. For example, in "Everything for Baby," an ad for a video camera, a mother was trying to soothe her crying child when the father tripped over the baby gate, which made the baby laugh.

A year later, under the same "Sears. Where Else?" theme, the campaign shifted gears in order to convey the company's long heritage more strongly. These new commercials, which debuted in August 2002, were augmented by what was called "now and then" spots. As Figliulo said, "We're not changing our voice as much as adding a new tone of voice. There's still humor in it, but it's a little more emotional." In the ads black-and-white images of customers from earlier years were interspersed with color images of contemporary customers. The customers of the past were seen using vintage products from different periods, bought at Sears, of course, while their contemporaries asked for such things as video games. The aim was to remind people how reliable Sears had been throughout the years for all of the needs of the family. The "Sears. Where Else?" ads continued throughout 2004, when they began to be replaced by a new campaign that featured Ty Pennington, the host of ABC's Extreme Makeover: Home Edition.

OUTCOME

Numbers seemed to confirm that the "Sears. Where Else?" campaign had some initial success. The 2001 holiday season, which followed the terrorist attacks on the United States in the previous September, was a tough period for most department stores. Nonetheless, same-store holiday sales for Sears declined only 2.4 percent, less than the 3 to 5 percent that financial analysts had predicted for department stores generally. Overall the 2001 holiday season accounted for approximately 40 percent of Sears's annual profits.

Ad Track surveys showed that the new ads gained recognition with the public, especially among the target market. When asked if they liked the ads "a lot," 21 percent of the respondents said yes, just below the average of 22 percent for all ads. Among women, who represented Sears's primary target, 28 percent claimed that they liked the ads. Of all respondents, however, only 12 percent thought that the ads were "very effective," much lower than the average of 23 percent. Judges for advertising awards, on the other hand, thought that the ads were effective in using humor. In 2002 the early "Sears. Where Else?" television ads won several Windy Awards, which recognized the top advertising efforts from Chicago-area agencies.

Whether or not the ads were finally effective for Sears was hard to determine. In a market that increasingly favored discount stores like Wal-Mart, such department stores as Sears struggled. In 2001 sales at Sears were at $40 billion, and in 2002 they grew to exceed $41 billion, an increase that may have been partly a product of the "Sears. Where Else" campaign. In 2003, however, after the campaign had shifted its focus to the Sears heritage, the company's sales were virtually unchanged. In 2004, it dropped dramatically, to $36 billion. Perhaps the "Sears. Where Else?" ads were effective enough to keep the company afloat for a while. In March 2005, however, Sears was acquired by Kmart and a new parent company, Sears Holding, was formed. The merger directly connected Sears to the discount-store world that had provided its greatest competition.

FURTHER READING

Carpenter, Dave. "Dowdy Sears Tries on Makeover, Lands End." Seattle Post-Intelligence, November 30, 2002.

Elliot, Stuart. "Sears, Riding Wave of Nostalgia, Emphasizes Heritage in Campaign." New York Times, August 23, 2002.

Guy, Sandra. "Sears Readies More Cost Cuts." Chicago Sun-Times, October 21, 2002, p. 53.

Howard, Theresa. "Sears Marketing Strategy Goes Back to Basics." USA Today, January 1, 2002.

———. "Sears Sees Shopping Rise with Ty Pennington Ads." USA Today, November 15, 2004.

Hutchinson, Katherine. "Sears Launches Comic Campaign Positioning as One-Stop Destination." DSN Retailing Today, September 3, 2001.

Lazare, Lewis. "Sears Ads Play for Cheap Laughs." Chicago Sun-Times, August 27, 2001, p. 45.

———. "Sears Sticking with Humor for Holidays." Chicago Sun-Times, November 15, 2002, p. 71.

———. "Sears to Start Campaign." Chicago Sun-Times, August 22, 2001, p. 71.

Monks, Robert A.G., and Minow, Nell. "Sears Case Study." Available from <http://www.lens-library.com/info/sstan.html>

"New Sears Ad Campaign to Feature Ty Pennington: Celebrates Renewed Energy, Excitement of Stores." PR Newswire, September 20, 2004.

Candice Mancini

Sega of America, Inc. & Take-Two Interactive Software, Inc.

Contact information for Sega of America, Inc.:
650 Townsend St., Ste. 650
San Francisco, California 94103-4908
USA
Telephone: (415) 701-6000
Web site: www.sega.com

■■■

Contact information for Take-Two Interactive Software, Inc.
622 Broadway
New York, New York 10012
USA
Telephone: (646) 536-2842
Web site: www.take2games.com

■■■

BETA-7 CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When Electronic Arts (EA) held the position as the world's largest independent video game publisher in 2003, a bilateral effort was made by Take-Two Interactive Software and Sega of America to overtake EA's number one selling football game with their own ESPN NFL 2K5. Created by Take-Two and distributed by Sega, the football game could be played on two video game consoles, Xbox and PlayStation. Besides gaining ground on Madden NFL 2005 (EA's football game), ESPN NFL 2K5 sold at the unusually low price of $19.99 and was also marketed with an unprecedented campaign titled "Beta-7."

Portland-based Wieden+Kennedy named the "Beta-7" campaign after a fictitious game tester who, W+K claimed, once tested games for Sega. W+K hired an actor to play the Beta-7 character, who supposedly became so traumatized while testing ESPN NFL 2K5 that he suffered frequent blackouts and uncontrollably tackled bystanders. Crusading fiercely against Sega, the Beta-7 character posted an anti-Sega website and blog in an attempt to prevent the game's release. Other fictional game testers created by W+K surfaced to support Beta-7's claims, while Sega pretended to refute the game's malefic effects. Speculation fanned across the Internet, with gamers attempting to decipher Beta-7's authenticity.

The four-month-long campaign helped Sega and Take-Two surpass the sales forecast of ESPN NFL 2K5 by 20 percent. Although "Beta-7" assisted Sega's immediate need in 2004, EA retaliated in 2005 by purchasing exclusive five-year rights to NFL logos and player names and 15-year rights to ESPN's programming and personalities. By capitalizing on the gaming community's need for current team content, EA would monopolize all football video games, according to analysts, for the next five years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sega's ongoing hot-or-cold video game success began in the late 1970s groundbreaking console game hits like

Turbo, Frogger, and Zaxxon followed by a lackluster string of arcade games. In the latter part of the 1980s, Sega had hits like Out Run and After Burner. The games' success spurred Sega to develop its first home console, the Sega Master System, a U.S. commercial flop. Determined to capture some of the Nintendo Entertainment System's (NES's) market, Sega released its second home console, Sega Genesis, which Sega promoted as being "far superior to the NES." Within the home console market, Sega Genesis was Sega's only commercial success throughout the 1990s. The company developed the Sega Saturn to compete with PlayStation in 1995 and then the 128-bit Sega Dreamcast in 1998. Both consoles yielded meager sales, forcing Sega to focus primarily on software game development.

Take-Two was founded in 1993 by Ryan Brant, who was chairman for the company until litigation forced him to step down in 2004. Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas, a game launched under Take-Two's subsidiary Rockstar Games, was the top-selling video game for 2004. To counter EA's five-year NFL rights procurement, Take-Two purchased its own two-year license to use Major League Baseball team likenesses, a harsh blow to EA's successful MVP Baseball.

As one video game industry source told the Delaney Report in 2005, "Like a lot of other video-game marketers, advertising has become formulaic. A lot of the video-game advertising now looks like movie theatrical trailers, 30 seconds of game play. Advertising is visible, but it's not very compelling and it has no edge." Sega and Take-Two wanted W+K to create a campaign that stepped outside of traditional video game advertising and generated its own buzz within the gaming community.

TARGET MARKET

Ty Montague, a creative director for W+K, told the Financial Times, "The campaign worked because its target audience of video-game enthusiasts was hip enough to get the jokes but playful enough to keep on reading what Beta-7 wrote." The campaign was aimed toward the broadening age of video game players—or gamers, as they were called—which was quickly diversifying at the time of launch. In 2005 an Entertainment Software Association survey showed that the average gamer's age was 30, while the average game purchaser was 37 years old. "Computer games aren't relegated to 12-year-old boys who are playing in their parents' basement," Dan Hewitt of the Entertainment Software Association told the Arkansas Democrat Gazette.

"Beta-7" did not specifically target demographics within the gaming community as much as two subgroups: gamers susceptible to Internet hoaxes and gamers impervious to them. Conflicting believability between these two subgroups spurred the campaign's success across the Internet. "Gamers are predisposed to stories that they can actually participate in," Montague explained to Advertising Age's Creativity. "It's also important to remember that it's only a hoax in retrospect. While the experience unfolded the goal was to make it feel plausible, at least to part of the target. We also wanted some people to dismiss it immediately. It was the argument between those two groups that powered the campaign."

After the event some judges for the 2004 Grand Clio explained that their partial impetus for awarding "Beta-7" the Grand Clio was because of the campaign's ability to successfully target gamers. Nick Brien, Grand Clio judge and CEO of Arc Worldwide Chicago, told Creative Review, "The gaming community is highly cynical and media savvy, they don't want to be marketed to. The campaign really was an experience and the agency went out of their way to completely fuse content and contact thinking and pulled it off brilliantly. They never forgot about the gamer."

IT'S NOT ONLY YOUNG BOYS

According to statistics released by Entertainment Software Association in 2005, 74 percent of U.S. heads of households were game players. Surprisingly enough women over the age of 18 represented a greater portion of the game-playing population than boys ages 6 to 17. To further debunk the assumption that all gamers are young boys, the average age of a game player was 30, while the average age of a game buyer was 37.

COMPETITION

EA, despite criticism for producing fairly mediocre games, sold more video games than any other competitor in 2004. From 1995 to 2005 EA relied on San Francisco–based See Advertising to market most of its titles. In 2004 EA's best-selling Madden NFL 2005, the third highest-selling video game of the year, was seriously threatened by Sega and Take-Two's ESPN NFL 2K5. To reduce future competition EA signed an exclusive five-year license (to begin in 2006) with the NFL, giving EA exclusivity on using NFL stadiums, players, teams, and colors in its games. EA also signed a 15-year private contract with ESPN to exclusive use of ESPN's name, programming, and personalities, just like Sega and Take-Two had done previously with ESPN NFL 2K5. Recognizing the advantage that "Beta-7" gave ESPN NFL 2K5, EA also ended its 10-year contract with See Advertising and signed all marketing over to W+K in 2005.

Microsoft's Halo 2, designed exclusively for Xbox, was the second highest-selling video game of 2004. Halo 2 launched with its "I Love Bees" campaign, created by Microsoft's Elan Lee and Steven Spielberg. "I Love Bees" utilized normal, educational websites about bees and through manipulation made them appear hijacked by an artificial intelligence. The campaign required participants to work collectively and answer random pay phone calls, which eventually revealed the involvement of artificial intelligence.

Many analysts judged a video game's success by the quantity purchased by America's second-largest video game retailer, Electronics Boutique Holdings Corp. (EB). Despite Take-Two's release of Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas, the top-selling game of 2004, the company accounted for only 7 percent of EB's games at the start of 2005. With 31 games to its name, EA accounted for 14 percent of EB's games in 2004, according to Warren's Consumer Electronics Daily. Nintendo came in second with 12 percent, followed by Microsoft at 10.3 percent. The future of ESPN NFL 2K5 was not hindered so much by the competition's advertisement but by EA's savvy NFL and ESPN licensing agreements.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Beta-7, a fictional former game tester, surfaced on www.Beta-7.com during the summer of 2003. W+K, Haxan Films (producers of The Blair Witch Project), and Chelsea Pictures cast actors to play parts for the campaign's four-month duration. Each actor, including Jim Gunshanan (who played Beta-7), replied to blogs, sent E-mails, left voice mails, posted messages on independent gaming sites, and even conducted interviews with the gaming press to authenticate Beta-7's existence.

The website served as the campaign's hub. Beta-7 claimed to have suffered so much duress from testing the football game that he regularly blacked out and tackled people. To prove it Beta-7 set up cameras at the beach and at an office where he delivered mail that hilariously showed him exhibiting "symptoms." Throughout the website Beta-7 ceaselessly called out for ESPN NFL 2K5 testers who also suffered from the same conditions to come forward and testify on his website. He claimed too that Sega was threatening to shut him up. The "threats" grew so malevolent that Sega eventually razed his tiny, frumpy apartment. Photos to prove it were published on the website. At one point Beta-7 even mailed unauthorized, prereleased versions of the game to gamers so they could experience the effects themselves.

Authenticity became a major constituent of the campaign. Instead of making them in-house, W+K paid a Kinko's clerk to design Beta-7's flyers (warning of the psychological trauma inflicted by the game), which were passed around San Francisco. The project's art director, Robert Rasmussen, told Adweek, "It was more work than any project I'd done before. It was eight hours a day for four months while we were doing a million other jobs at the same time. You never knew if things were going to work. We were taking a lot of chances."

To fuel the conspiracy W+K had Sega play Beta-7's antagonist. Immediately after Beta-7 mailed unauthorized games, Sega sent letters demanding them back. On ESPN W+K broke an ESPN NFL 2K5 spot starring Tracy Morgan. At the commercial's end Sega posted a disclaimer saying that excessive playing of the game would not lead to violent or erratic behavior.

The gaming community's debate over the legitimacy of Beta-7 became integral to the campaign's success. "The idea for the campaign was to create an experience for gamers that would cause them to debate its accuracy," Montague told the Financial Times. "We never said it was true or not true." In the "FAQ" section of www.Beta-7.com, the fictional youth wrote, "I don't work for Sega, or anyone for that matter. This is not a marketing campaign, it is a campaign to make a deceitful and dangerous corporation be held accountable for its actions. I'm sure Sega would like you to believe it's a marketing campaign or a hoax, because then they will not have to take responsibility for what they have done."

OUTCOME

"Beta-7" yielded substantial success with ESPN NFL 2K5 sales and struck a positive chord within the advertising industry. W+K earned a Yahoo! Big Idea Chair and Silver at the Andy Awards, a Gold Pencil at both the One Show and the One Show Interactive, a gold medal from the Art Directors Club, and a Grand Clio. Others in the advertising industry were outraged by the disingenuousness of "Beta-7." Gary Ruskin, director of Commercial Alert, told the Oregonian that "Beta-7" was "deeply sleazy and part of the creep of advertising into every nook and cranny of our lives and culture." W+K shrugged off the condemnation, stating that the actual "engine of the campaign" was the contention between praise and criticism, between belief and disbelief.

Quantifying the campaign's effectiveness outside the advertising community was more difficult. Steve Raab, senior vice president of marketing for Sega's ESPN Videogames, told Adweek, "I think it's really tough to tie it back to the ultimate objective, which is sales and getting people to sample the games. Other measurements, however, what kind of traffic Web sites are getting, how much time people are spending with this, those are very successful. The average person who checked out 'Beta-7' during its first month or two spent more than 10 hours on the site." According to Creative Review, www.Beta-7.com received 2.25 million hits by August 2004.

According to Sega even though the game's launch came inadvertently after Madden NFL 2005, sales of ESPN NFL 2K5 exceeded projection by 20 percent. The game was the fourth highest-selling video game for 2004. Unfortunately, with the gamer's demand for current sports game content, ESPN NFL 2K5 was crushed under EA's five-year exclusive license agreement with the NFL and 15-year procurement of ESPN content.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Tall Tales: Advertising Steps into Interactive Fiction, Where the Buzz Is Real—Even When the Stories Aren't." Adweek, October 11, 2004, p. 28.

Arango, Tim. "Electronic Arts Reaches 15-Year Deal with ESPN." New York Post, January 18, 2005, p. 31.

Buchanan, Matt. "Commentary: EA Corrupting Game Industry." U-Wire, February 2, 2005.

Cooper, Ann. "One Show Divides the Judges on Quality of Traditional Work." Campaign, May 21, 2004, p. 22.

Eastwood, Alison. "Special Report: Festival Report Card—Tonight We're Gonna Party like It's 1984." Boards, August 1, 2004, p. 23.

Hanas, Jim. "Cannes Predictions: Will 2004 Be the Year of the Hoax?" Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2004, p. 22.

Lippert, Barbara. "Wieden's Great Hoax: Award-Show Fave 'Beta-7' Turns Advertising on Its Head." Adweek, May 24, 2004, p. 25.

Read, Richard. "Guerrilla Marketing Raises Questions about Deception." Oregonian, September 13, 2004, p. A09.

Sherman, Gabriel. "End of the 30-Second Spot." New York Observer, December 20, 2004, p. 20.

Silverman, Gary. "After the Break: The 'Wild West' Quest to Bring the Consumers to the Advertising—Companies Are Moving Closer to the Entertainment Industry as They Try to Promote Their Products to Jaded Customers." Financial Times, May 18, 2005, p. 17.

Wahl, Andrew. "My Pick: EA, By about a Billion." Canadian Business, January 31, 2005, p. 17.

Woolmington, Paul. "Unbundled Bundling: P&G Again Sends the Media-Agency Business a Wake-Up Call." Adweek, July 26, 2004, p. 23.

Kevin Teague

Serta International

5401 Trillium Boulevard
Hoffman Estates, Illinois 60192-3411
USA
Telephone: (847) 645-0200
Fax: (847) 645-0205
Web site: www.serta.com

■■■

COUNTING SHEEP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

At the beginning of 2000 mattress maker Serta International had three advertising goals in mind: increase brand awareness, win consumer loyalty, and entice retailers to stock more of the company's products. Traditionally an unexciting category, mattress advertising did not generate much consumer passion. Buyers tended to feel that there was little difference between the companies that manufactured mattresses. This was not helped by the fact that Serta's biggest competitors, Sealy and Simmons, also had names beginning with S. Michigan advertising agency W.B. Doner & Company (known as Doner) sought to remedy Serta's image and advertising problems with the "Counting Sheep" campaign.

Claymation company Aardman Animations was enlisted to create original and lovable sheep characters to inhabit TV commercials that would tout the comfort and quality of Serta mattresses. In the launch spot of July 2000, sheep with numbers on their sides arrived at the home of an insomniac couple so that they could "count sheep" to fall asleep. The couple informed the bewildered sheep that they were so comfortable on their new Serta bed that the sheep's counting services were no longer required. This and similar television commercials ran nationally at bedtime and on the weekends, when most mattresses were purchased. The campaign's budget of $24 million primarily bought television time on networks and cable channels. Print ads, in-store displays, and Internet elements were also included in the budget.

Results of the campaign were immediately measurable. In 2001 a survey by polling-services company Roper Starch Worldwide showed that more women who had a mattress brand in mind had settled on Serta than on industry leader Sealy (58 percent to 18 percent respectively) for their next mattress purchase. This was a significant change from a precampaign Roper survey that put both companies at an even 39 percent. The campaign itself garnered a Gold EFFIE Award in 2002 for the ad agency, and the spots themselves won other industry recognition.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Serta International, headquartered in the Chicago suburb of Hoffman Estates, Illinois, was founded in 1931 by 13 mattress makers who joined together to license the Serta name. The privately owned company expanded, reconfiguring many times through the years. By 1997 Serta had become a private mattress-licensing entity with 28 factories in the United States and 20 internationally. The company's Perfect Sleeper mattress was listed then as the one most purchased by American hotels, and it was third in the country for mattress market share. In 1990 Serta had achieved an industry coup when Ed Lilly, formerly of the number one mattress maker, Sealy, joined the company as president and CEO. During the 1990s, under Lilly's guidance, advertising on a national level included television, print, and support of National Public Radio. The "We Make the World's Best Mattress" campaign began in 1993 and continued for the rest of the decade. It was designed to heighten brand awareness by creating emotional connections with the mattress-buying audience (in contrast to the product-focused ads of its top competitors). In 1997 the company spent $17 million on national campaigns.

By the year 2000 Serta had reached $729 million in mattress sales. It had for the moment pushed past Simmons. The Atlanta-based Simmons had been accustomed to the number two spot in the field, but it recorded $2 million less than Serta in sales that year. Slipping into second place by a narrow margin, Serta was looking to put some distance between itself and Simmons while gaining on the other "Big S," Sealy. Doner, which was headquartered in a Detroit suburb and was the country's largest independent advertising agency, was given the task of refreshing the company's national presence. It met the challenge by creating the hugely successful "Counting Sheep" campaign.

TARGET MARKET

As the 1990s came to a close, the consensus in the mattress industry was that women were either more likely to buy new mattresses for themselves or were responsible for initiating the purchase of a new mattress for their family. Thus Serta aimed its "Counting Sheep" campaign at women aged 25 to 54. Satirical humor was combined with an approachable cute factor in an attempt to win women's dollars and brand loyalty. Because a mattress was not a frequent purchase for most customers, Serta needed to make a lasting impression in women's minds. A sensitivity toward women was reflected in the company's website. For instance, a "Pillow Talk" section described the various stages of life and sleeping patterns, singling out children's as well as pregnant and menopausal women's sleeping needs. Men's sleeping needs were not specifically mentioned at all but rather were covered under the umbrella of stages for adolescents, adults, and seniors.

In the industry as a whole a new trend toward catering to the female audience began to emerge in mattress marketing and design. Furniture designer and former supermodel Kathy Ireland launched her own mattress line that was made by Lady Americana. Actress Lindsay Wagner (perhaps best known for playing the title character of the 1970s TV show The Bionic Woman) was made spokeswoman for Select Comfort, while Simmons tapped designer Karen Neuberger for a top-of-the-line mattress tie-in. Not to be outdone, Serta designed a mattress specifically for women, called Perfect Day, which made its debut in 2005. This product not only featured attractive embroidered details but also, and more importantly, promised to help address the energy deficit that busy women so often experienced. The Serta ad pitch toward women was maintained by the "Counting Sheep" commercials through the early 2000s, and it seemed to hit the target. A 2002 survey by polling firm Roper Starch Worldwide indicated that 75 percent of women in the 25-to-54 age group said that they had seen or heard of the sheep commercials.

LESS FIREPOWER FROM SERTA

Serta received national attention in spring 2004, when it introduced FireBlocker, a flame-dampening material, on all Serta mattresses. The launch of the flame-resistant products had come well ahead of the January 2005 deadline for a new bedding standard mandated by law in California and was expected to be an effective selling point for retailers.

COMPETITION

Sealy had long been the number one company among the top three mattress producers: Sealy, Serta, and Simmons. Throughout the period of 2000 to 2005 Serta and Simmons had been trading the second and third spots back and forth. In 2000, when Serta's "Counting Sheep" first hit the national scene, the North Carolina–based Sealy pulled in a hefty $1.102 billion compared to Serta's $729 million and Simmon's $727 million. Sealy, in business since 1906, was the first mattress maker to focus on back support, introducing its Posturepedic line of mattresses in the 1950s. Advertising in the mattress industry had always been notoriously dull, but with the success of the "Counting Sheep" campaign, even Sealy took notice. By 2002 it had released its own creative ad campaign using the tagline "It's made for sleep. It's a Sealy." The premise of the TV commercials for this campaign was that if Sealy made other products, they would be so comfortable that buyers would fall asleep in the showroom. One TV spot featured a car buyer who could not stay awake once he sat in a "Sealy" car at the dealership. The voice-over that followed stated, "This is why we don't make cars."

At this time Simmons, the perennial thorn in Serta's sales side, focused advertising on its longtime message "Better Sleep through Science." Always positioning itself as an innovator, Simmons touted the "no-flip" mattress design of its flagship brand, Beautyrest, as well as the advent of the Olympic Queen, which fit on a queen-size frame but allowed 10 percent more sleeping space than the traditional queen-size mattress.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2000 the ad agency Doner devised the Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign to do three things: measurably increase brand awareness by communicating an identifiable image for Serta; achieve preference on the part of female buyers so that they would go into a store intending to buy a Serta; and make sure more retailers were stocking Serta's product lines. The campaign was a full-scale integration of television, industry publications, point-of-sale, and online media. Most of the $24 million advertising dollars that Serta budgeted for 2000 went toward buying airtime for its newly crafted television spots. Created by Aardman Animation, the Claymation company behind the hit animated feature Chicken Run (2000), the spots featured adorable sheep that arrived to provide their counting services for a couple who was usually sleep-challenged, only to be turned away because of the superior comfort provided by the couple's new Serta mattress. The commercials were a mix of animated characters and live actors. The sheep themselves had the familiar widemouthed look of the animals from the popular film, which conveyed the kind of charm and appeal that every advertiser hoped for. The personality-driven "Counting Sheep" campaign was a deliberate move away from previous Serta advertising imagery of anonymous people sleeping on clouds or awakening from a restful, refreshing sleep.

Released in July of 2000, the spots aired on cable channels and national network hit shows, such as the female-oriented comedy Ally McBeal, the family-focused game show Who Wants to Be a Millionaire, and the late-night comedy staple Saturday Night Live. Airing at nine o'clock p.m. or later, Wednesday through Saturday, these shows were chosen because of their proximity to bedtime and weekend mattress shopping. The company's old tagline, "We Make the World's Best Mattress," gave way to a new message, "So Comfortable, You'll Feel the Difference the Moment You Lie Down." Rather than emphasize the long-term benefits of back health or good sleep, Serta wanted to convince potential buyers that they would experience immediate satisfaction if they tested a Serta out at a retailer.

The counting sheep were well received and came back for more pitching duties in subsequent years. They became the face of Serta and were used on all advertising materials. In an August 2002 issue of Furniture Today, Susan Ebaugh, Serta chief brand officer, expressed her confidence in the campaign: "Based on the outstanding results we're getting, the Counting Sheep campaign will be around for a long time. . . . There is virtually no limit to the story extensions that can be developed." The campaign continued in 2002 with a $21 million dollar budget for national advertisements, which Serta intended to reach nearly all U.S. adults. The new spots showed the numbered sheep becoming increasingly frustrated by the fact that Serta's comfort and quality caused their employment prospects to dwindle. One fed-up sheep committed the unlawful act of ripping a mattress tag off with his teeth. Another spot featured the sheep attempting to sue Serta for emotional distress. More TV spots were introduced in 2003 and 2004. In each of the 2004 spots a voice-over at the end announced Serta's Web address and mentioned that "counting sheep" merchandise was available at the site. In a September 2004 issue of Furniture Today, Serta's Ebaugh restated the company's commitment to the effort, saying, "Each year, Serta's Counting Sheep campaign continues to expand consumer awareness of and preference for the Serta brand."

OUTCOME

Serta's goals of gaining more favorable brand recognition, creating a higher percentage of buyer preference, and increasing retail demand were beginning to be met by "Counting Sheep" in the first two years of the effort. In 2001 HFN, a publication for the home-products industry, listed Serta in the number 12 spot on its survey of the 100 most recognizable home brands, a dramatic rise from its position as 17th in 1999. Also in 2001 Roper Starch Worldwide, a polling-services company, released results of a survey showing that, among women who expressed a brand choice for their next mattress purchase, more intended to buy a Serta (58 percent) than a Sealy (18 percent). A similar Roper study prior to the campaign had put intent to purchase for the two brands at an equal 39 percent.

Retailers responded to the campaign by readily using sheep-themed support items, such as Serta Sheep poster displays in the showrooms and a giant sheep balloons floating over the stores. In 2002 Doner won a Gold EFFIE Award—an esteemed advertising prize rewarding campaign efficacy—for the campaign in the Household Furnishings category. Other awards included a first-place award for one sheep commercial in the London International Advertising Festival in 2001. Serta looked healthy as 2005 approached, registering a 5.5 percent increase in shipments, which had totaled $783 million the previous year.

FURTHER READING

Buchanan, Lee, and Nancy Meyer. "That Peaked Feeling." HFN, March 12, 2001, p. 55.

"Conveying the Message—with Feeling." HFN, July 14, 2003, p. 50.

Ebenkamp, Becky. "The Flock Gets Fleeced." Brandweek, July 10, 2000, p. 60.

Kunkel, Karl. "The Brands Play On: Companies Continue to Explore Methods of Getting Their Name Out to the Masses." HFN, July 12, 2004, p. 46.

———. "Commercial Success." HFN, August 19, 2002, p. 46.

———. "An Industry Awakens: Sales in the Category Rise as More Retailers Realize the Benefits of Bedding." HFN, July 12, 2004, p. 42.

"National 2001 Agency Report Cards." Adweek, April 15, 2002, p. 20.

Perry, David. "Big 'S' Brands Still Top List of Bedding Majors." Furniture Today, November 28, 2005 p. 3.

———. "More Counting Sheep Are B-a-a-a-ck." Furniture Today, August 5, 2002, p. 47.

———. "Sheep Take Another Prize." Furniture Today, June 17, 2002, p. 26.

———. "Sherman: Serta Committed to FR." Furniture Today, October 25, 2004, p. 53.

Simone Samano

Sharp Corp.

22-22 Nagaike-cho
Abeno-ku
Osaka, 545-8522
Japan
Telephone: 81 6 66211221
Fax: 81 6 66271759
Web site: www.sharp.co.jp

■■■

MORE TO SEE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Japanese electronics company Sharp Corp. had experienced limited success in television manufacturing and was a lackluster brand in the United States until a change in leadership in the late 1990s resulted in the company focusing on liquid crystal display (LCD) technology, in which it had been a leader for more than 25 years. In 2001 Sharp introduced the Aquos line of flat-panel LCD TVs. To improve brand perception in the United States and drive sales globally, the company, with ad agency Wieden & Kennedy, launched the ''More to See'' campaign in September 2004.

Not only did the campaign consist of television, print, and Internet components, it was integrated with an ''alternate reality game'' sweepstakes called ''Legend of the Sacred Urns.'' Consumers were invited to solve a mystery: the location of the urns hidden by a game fanatic. The television spots and print ads were teases, urging the audience to visit a network of websites to unearth clues and learn more about the Aquos line of flat-panel TVs along the way.

The ''More to See'' campaign, which ran through the holiday season of 2004, won a Clio Award in 2005 and was also instrumental in increasing brand awareness for Sharp in the United States and in improving Aquos sales around the world. But the mystery element proved frustrating to many consumers and in some ways overshadowed the brand itself. Sharp elected in subsequent campaigns to return to a more traditional marketing approach.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For many years Sharp was an also-ran in television manufacturing, limited because it did not produce the most important component, the cathode-ray tube (CRT). ''Forced to cobble together parts bought from competitors,'' wrote Jim Frederick in a Time International article. ''Sharp was essentially an assembler, cranking out televisions that were always a little too expensive and too poorly engineered to attract many customers.'' But Sharp was a pioneer in liquid crystal display (LCD) technology, which it introduced in 1973 as part of a mass-produced calculator. The technology was later used in computer monitors, handheld computers, portable game systems, and wireless phones. In 1987 the company offered it first flat-panel LCD televisions, but it did not make a commitment to the technology until Katsuhiko Machida took over as president of Sharp in 1998. The former head of Sharp's television unit, Machida concentrated the company's resources on a new LCD television design called Aquos, introduced in January 2001. It was priced lower than Sharp's earlier LCD TVs and was the first to be sold by big-box retailers (large, warehouse-type stores) such as Best Buy.

Sharp quickly established itself as the leader in the LCD TV category and increased its U.S. sales in 2002 with the ''Be Sharp'' brand campaign, which included in-store displays and print advertisements. Despite Sharp's status, however, Sony was, according to marketing surveys, the only LCD TV brand that American consumers could name. In fact, Sony, the longtime leader in overall television sales, was slower than the competition to embrace LCD and plasma technologies. It was clear that Sharp needed to improve its image in the U.S. market, but it was also facing a global challenge from both major and small electronic companies and even from computer makers Dell and Gateway, all eager to grab market share in the fast-growing LCD TV sector.

Sharp looked for a new agency to create a global marketing campaign that would both promote the Aquos line of LCD televisions and protect its leading position. To satisfy the increasing demand for larger televisions, Sharp planned to introduce a 45-inch Aquos, which would be the largest LCD TV on the market at the time. Moreover, the company wanted to improve the perception of its brand in the key U.S. market, where Sharp was perceived as a value brand rather than a high-end one (as it was considered elsewhere in the world). Rather than turning to the large Japanese agencies it had worked with in the past, in January 2004 Sharp looked to the United States, and without conducting a review it hired advertising agency Wieden & Kennedy. Although it was an independent firm based in Portland, Oregon, Wieden & Kennedy was well positioned to launch a global effort because it maintained operations in New York, London, Amsterdam, Shanghai, and Tokyo. Nine months after winning the Sharp account the agency was ready to unveil the ''More to See'' campaign.

TARGET MARKET

In general the ''More to See'' campaign was geared toward the mass market in hopes of educating people about the benefits of LCD technology. Given that the new 45-inch set cost $10,000, however, the campaign targeted affluent consumers between the ages of 25 and 54. Within this group the marketers tried to appeal to sports fans, who had proven over the years that they were willing to pay top dollar for televisions offering a more vivid experience of sporting events; to entertainment ''junkies,'' who liked the experience of watching movies and other television fare on a large set; to design aesthetes, who would appreciate the sleek look of the Aquos models; and to technology aficionados, who would not only be interested in the advanced LCD technology used in the Aquos sets but also would be attracted to the interactive aspect of the ''More to See'' campaign.

TECHNICALLY SPEAKING

The Aquos line of flat-panel televisions relied on liquid crystal display (LCD) technology. Behind an LCD screen was a light, and the liquid crystal cells on the display either allowed the light to pass through or blocked it to form an image on the screen. LCD's greatest rival in flat-panel TVs was plasma technology, which worked much the same way as neon lighting. Plasma screens consisted of rows of pixels, each of which contained xenon and neon gases and were capable of shining red, green, or blue (the basic elements of color television), depending on the electric charge delivered to it.

COMPETITION

Sharp faced competition on any number of fronts. LCD TVs still competed with CRT-based products, although as consumers increasingly opted for wide-screen high-definition TVs, the size and weight of CRT televisions became problematic. A 40-inch widescreen CRT TV could easily weigh more than 300 pounds and measure 26 inches deep. Rear-projection TVs, another type of television, were thinner and lighter than CRT TVs but were still much heavier and thicker than comparable LCD models. But rear-projection TVs challenged LCD TVs because they were much cheaper and provided good quality. Offering even more competition were flat-panel plasma TVs, which could be made in larger sizes than LCD TVs. Plasma technology had its drawbacks, however: it was buggy, subject to ''burn in'' (the creation of a ghost image if a graphic, such as a network logo, remained on the screen for too long a period of time), and the picture had a tendency to degrade more quickly than with televisions employing other technologies.

In the LCD sector itself, Sharp was not lacking in rivals. There were computer manufacturers Dell and Gateway in the United States, Dutch giant Philips Electronics, Samsung Electronics of South Korea, and Japanese companies Hitachi, Sony, and Toshiba. In addition Sharp had not been as willing as the competition to spend on advertising; the company tended to emphasize product development over brand building. The ''More to See'' campaign was a first step in shifting that focus while warding off the advances of Sharp's many rivals.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The premise of the ''More to See'' theme was that, just as television was the most powerful storytelling device (with perhaps a tip of the hat to cinema), Sharp's Aquos product line offered the most advanced televisions, providing viewers with a more vivid experience through its superior color, detail, and sound. One of the campaign's five television spots showed people—a mother dressing her daughter, a man cooking, an audience at a movie theater—going about their lives with their eyes closed. Finally a woman opened her eyes in an art museum in front of Victor Meirelles's painting Battle of Guararapes. A voice-over then said, ''The Sharp Aquos liquid crystal television. Suddenly there's more to see.'' Some critics took exception to the underlying concept. Writing in Brandweek, Barry Janoff commented, ''Taking the spot's premise literally means to imply that people can't really see or appreciate their lives unless television is there to help them. And, more so, they won't truly value their own lives unless they trade in their ordinary TVs for an Aquos. Of course, Sharp can't tell people to get out and enjoy life by turning off their TVs.''

The message of ''More to See'' may have been simplistic and even illogical, but the method by which the centerpiece of the campaign was delivered was as innovative as Sharp's LCD technology. The campaign was more than multifaceted; it was in many ways an example of interactive fiction, using the different elements—television spots, print ads, websites, and an ''alternate reality game'' contest—to engage the audience and keep it involved in the campaign for months on end. Such an approach was intended to counteract the resistance that consumers had built up to 30-second commercials after years of being bombarded by them, not to mention the ability of digital-video-recorder owners to skip over commercials. The pioneering effort in this type of promotion was the independent film The Blair Witch Project, which created a buzz by dropping hints in the media that the film was a student documentary project that went horribly awry. The curious were led to the producer's website, and a large number of people began to debate among themselves whether the ''found footage'' of the student filmmakers was real or fake. When the low-budget film opened, it became the surprise hit of the summer of 1999, generating an impressive $150 million in domestic box-office sales.

Sharp engaged the services of the Blair Witch producers, Haxan Films, to help create the mystery story around which the ''More to See'' marketing campaign and contest would revolve. The resulting tale was called ''Legend of the Sacred Urns,'' and consumers were invited to solve the mystery of where an eccentric millionaire had hidden three prized urns. The three television commercials that developed the storyline—''The Key,'' ''The Pool,'' and ''The Tooth''—weaved a ''cinematic mystery,'' in the words of Shoot magazine's Bill Dunlap, ''set in a country estate, involving a beautiful woman, an older man in a swimming pool and a careless driver in a Volkswagen Karmann Ghia.'' Marcus Robinson, writing for Boards Magazine, offered his own summary of the setup: ''A guy, Peter Lindeman, is swimming in the pool of his big French chateau, and his babe girlfriend wanders out on the road to meet her lover. Unfortunately, he's massaging a toothache and had his eyes on the rearview, which forces him to swerve to avoid hitting her. He ends up launching his red sports car into the pool.''

All three spots showed the same incident from a different point of view. In ''The Pool,'' for example, a woman from a bedroom window watched Lindeman swimming in the pool when a car suddenly flew through the air and landed in the water. A Sharp television was then shown, and on its screen viewers were directed to the campaign's website, Moretosee.com. The site provided audio and visual clues, and featured blogs, purportedly written by the three characters engaged in the hunt for the three mystery urns. Chat rooms were also available for people to ponder the mystery together. Once viewers were at the website, they had to opportunity to learn more about LCD technology and Sharp's Aquos line of televisions. Participants were also directed to other websites to uncover clues. The spots were directed by award-winning documentary filmmaker Errol Morris, whose credits included Gates of Heaven, The Thin Blue Line, and Fast, Cheap, and Out of Control.

The television spots began airing in September 2004 and were shown on a variety of network and cable programming, including ABC's Monday Night Football and CBS's 60 Minutes. The ''More to See'' campaign also included print ads, executed by Wieden & Kennedy's Amsterdam office, that also attempted to drive people to the website. After starting in the United States, ''More to See'' was rolled out to 18 other countries. In an ancillary component of the campaign, Sharp opened a storefront in New York City, where consumers could experience the Aquos product line and where further clues were made available. The campaign ran for four months, through the critical holiday season, with bits of the mystery parceled out over time. In the end, Ken Floss of Ohio solved the puzzle and won the grand prize, an Aquos television and other home theater equipment.

OUTCOME

''More to See'' was successful in a number of ways. Advertising awareness in the United States increased from 30 percent to 57 percent, according to market-research surveys conducted by Sharp. The advertising industry also recognized the campaign's creativity; it won a Bronze in the Television/Cinema category of the prestigious Clio Awards in 2005. The contest was also successful in that it attracted more than one million website visitors over a four-month period, but the marketers were disappointed because it failed to engage all segments of the target audience. Bob Scaglione, senior vice president of marketing for Sharp, told Mae Anderson of Adweek, "We really focused on the techno-geek portion and alienated the other three [target markets] to some extent." He added, "Along the way, I think we confused a lot of people."

In a follow-up campaign launched in 2005 Sharp elected to go with a more traditional approach, relying on television spots and print ads without the extra elements. "You run the risk of alienating consumers with a more creative campaign," Scaglione explained. "We think the complexity of the creative last time may have overpowered the brand message."

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "The Age of Engagement." Adweek, August 22, 2005, p. 18.

———. "Tall Tales." Adweek, October 11, 2004, p. 28.

Dunlap, Bill. "Errol Morris: Reel Life." Shoot, March 25, 2005, p. 27.

Dvorak, Phred. "Sharp Pursues Big-Screen Ambitions." Wall Street Journal, June 9, 2005, p. B10.

Frederick, Jim. "A Sharper Focus." Time International (Asia ed.), May 9, 2005, p. 36.

Janoff, Barry. "What You Really See Is What You Should Get." Brandweek, October 4, 2004, p. 34.

Oser, Kris. "Sharp Touts TV in Net Mystery Adver-Blog." Advertising Age, November 1, 2004, p. 54.

———. "Web Wizards Take the Lead in Creative Process." Advertising Age, December 6, 2004.

Parry, Caroline. "Turning Viewers On to LCD Technology." Marketing Week, September 16, 2004, p. 24.

Robinson, Marcus. "Sharp Puzzles Up Global Brain Teaser." Boards Magazine, November 1, 2004, p. 19.

Roha, Ronaleen R. "Thin Is In." Kiplinger's Personal Finance, September 2004, p. 92.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Sharp Hands Aquos Work to Wieden." Adweek, January 21, 2004.

"Sharp Rolls Out Global Branding Campaign." Wireless News, September 10, 2004.

Vranica, Suzanne. "Sharp Aims to Enhance Aquos Brand." Wall Street Journal, September 10, 2004, p. B3.

Ed Dinger

Sierra Club

85 Second St., 2nd Fl.
San Francisco, California 94105
USA
Telephone: (415) 977-5500
Fax: (415) 977-5799
Web site: www.sierraclub.org

■■■

HYBRID EVOLUTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the early twenty-first century, the Sierra Club, one of the oldest and largest environmental advocacy groups in the United States, boasted a membership of more than 700,000. One of the principal concerns of the organization was the low gas mileage of U.S. automobiles. The popularity of inefficient sport-utility vehicles (SUVs) meant that U.S. cars averaged only 21 miles per gallon. Because fossil fuels were believed to be the number-one cause of global warming, this had serious consequences for the environment. Hybrid cars, which got up to 47 miles per gallon and thus burned less gasoline, could help alleviate the problem. It was for this reason that the Sierra Club acted as an advocate for hybrid cars, encouraging more automakers to sell them and trying to convince the U.S. government to promote their use.

The Sierra Club worked with the Change, an advertising agency based in Raleigh, North Carolina, to promote energy conservation. On Memorial Day in 2004 the organization launched the "Hybrid Evolution" campaign. The Sierra Club often undertook campaigns designed to influence behavior, as opposed to self-promotion, and "Hybrid Evolution" was one such effort. The campaign featured print and Web-based advertisements targeted at young trendsetters, encouraging them to drive hybrid cars. The key element in the campaign, however, was three long-distance tours on which Sierra Club members drove hybrid vehicles across interstate routes in the United States, stopping for rallies and posting updates about the trips on the campaign's website. The campaign also spotlighted the organization's opposition to the energy policies of George W. Bush, the incumbent U.S. president who was running for reelection in 2004.

Since the campaign was geared toward changing behavior, not promoting the Sierra Club, its success was difficult to gauge. Bush was reelected in November 2004, but the fuel efficiency of automobiles was not a significant issue in the campaign. The number of hybrid models offered by automakers continued to rise, however, and the cars gained in popularity. While only 47,000 hybrid vehicles were sold in the United States in 2003, by 2004 the number had risen to more than 88,000, and in 2005 it rose to 200,000.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Sierra Club was founded on May 28, 1892, by a group of 182 conservationists. The environmental pioneer John Muir was the club's first president. Its first major undertaking was an effort to defend the borders of Yosemite National Park. Over the ensuing decades the Sierra Club became one of the most prominent and successful environmental organizations in the United States, with approximately 700,000 members by the first decade of the twenty-first century. Its stated purposes were to explore and protect wilderness land, to educate the public about conservation, and to promote conservation generally. Previous advertising campaigns had spotlighted the group's key role in promoting environmental conservation over the years.

One of the Sierra Club's most important goals in the early twenty-first century was to promote energy efficiency. Because of the increasing demand for energy from developing nations like China and India, the international market for oil and gasoline was steadily rising. In addition, the United States was in the midst of a protracted military engagement in the oil-rich Middle Eastern nation of Iraq. The conflict put additional pressures on oil markets, and as a result, by 2004 gasoline prices in the United States were higher than they had been for several years. More important from the Sierra Club's point of view was the impact on the environment of the burning of fossil fuels like gasoline. The organization was particularly concerned about global warming. Most scientists agreed that when fossil fuels like oil and coal were burned they released so-called greenhouse gasses, which trapped heat inside the Earth's atmosphere, causing temperatures to rise.

The United States, however, was noted for its ''car culture.'' With the rise in popularity of SUVs in the 1990s, the average fuel efficiency of American cars had fallen to only about 21 miles per gallon. The more gasoline used, the more greenhouse gasses emitted into the air. The Sierra Club considered this to be a major issue and argued that hybrid vehicles, especially hybrid cars that could get upwards of 47 miles per gallon of gasoline, were the best way to reduce this figure. Hybrid cars combined elements of gas-powered and electrical engines. It was the electrical engine that handled most of the work when the car was moving at a constant speed, with the gasoline engine coming into play to help the car accelerate. When the driver stepped on the brake pedal, the energy thus created charged the electrical engine. By 2004 three hybrid models were available in the United States: the Toyota Prius, the Honda Insight, and the Honda Civic. Both Toyota and Honda were Japanese-based companies. The Prius proved particularly popular, with a six-month waiting list for the vehicle, but this was in part because Toyota limited itself to making 47,000 units of the vehicle in 2004.

THE KYOTO PROTOCOL

During the 2004 presidential campaign, the Sierra Club and other environmental groups voiced strong opposition to the policies of U.S. President George W. Bush on climate change. Relations between Bush and such groups had been severely strained since his decision in March 2001 to withdraw the U.S. signature from the Kyoto Protocol. This agreement, named for the Japanese city in which it had been negotiated, was a UN-sanctioned effort to create a general international protocol for addressing global warming. It committed all of its signatories, especially the 39 industrialized nations that ratified it, to reduce the levels of greenhouse gases they were emitting to about 5 percent below the levels of 1990. After objections from Russia, the reduction was renegotiated downward to about 2 percent. The agreement would be toughest on the United States, since at the time of the protocol's inception in 1990 it was producing 36 percent of all such emissions. Bush objected to the agreement on the grounds that it would harm the U.S. economy. Environmentalist countered, however, that Bush was merely protecting large companies in the energy industry, especially oil companies. These critics pointed out that Bush and his vice president, Dick Cheney, had both previously worked in the oil industry.

TARGET MARKET

The ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign was geared mostly toward young people, particularly college students and people in their 20s. In an effort to convince young people to buy hybrids, one of the Sierra Club's goals was to help make the cars seem cool and trendy. To this end, each of the print ads in the campaign featured a hip young person, someone who represented a likely hybrid driver.

The campaign was also aimed at auto manufacturers. At the time the campaign was introduced, none of the so-called Big Three automakers in the United States—General Motors, Ford, and DaimlerChrysler—offered hybrid automobiles. In addition, the companies that offered hybrids did so only in limited quantities. As a result, by 2004 the Toyota Prius, for example, had a six-month waiting list. The Sierra Club wanted to pressure automakers to offer more hybrid models and to increase the production of the lines that were already available. Though the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign featured the Toyota Prius and the Honda Civic hybrids, the automakers were not involved in the campaign in any capacity.

The fact that 2004 was a presidential election year in the United States was also a factor in the Sierra Club's campaign. Though the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign did not overtly endorse particular candidates, it was meant to encourage both young people and undecided voters to focus on issues of fuel efficiency in the midst of the campaign and to encourage politicians to take fuel efficiency seriously.

COMPETITION

The Sierra Club's primary goal for the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign was to promote the energy efficiency of hybrid cars, not the organization itself. Since Bush, the incumbent president, was seen as hostile to the position of the Sierra Club on environmental matters in general and not supportive of efforts to improve the efficiency of motor vehicles through public policy, the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign also served to counter the administration's environmental policies. Though the campaign did not attempt to promote the candidacy of Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, who challenged Bush in the 2004 election, the Sierra Club was open in saying that the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign was opposed to the environmental policies of the incumbent administration. Some ads, in fact, questioned the president's policies by name.

The Bush administration had withdrawn from the Kyoto Protocol, which required signatories to reduce the use of fossil fuels. Further, Vice President Dick Cheney had gone on record as saying that energy conservation was a matter of private choice, a position that many people felt implied that the administration had no interest in promoting energy conservation in general or hybrid cars in particular. The Bush administration was not inclined to provide subsidies or other types of government support for the development of hybrid vehicles.

In a sense, therefore, the campaign's main competition was the Bush administration, which the Sierra Club saw as unresponsive to conservation issues. The organization was also seeking to counter certain members of Congress, including Representative Bill Thomas of California. Thomas, the chairman of the Means and Ways Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives, was seen as opposed to providing tax incentives to consumers who bought hybrid vehicles.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Sierra Club developed the ''Hybrid Evolution'' campaign in conjunction with the advertising agency the Change, which was based in Raleigh, North Carolina. The Change was experienced in working with nonprofit organizations like the Sierra Club. The campaign was built around print and online ads, but the focus was on a series of tours across the United States that featured hybrid cars. Members of the Sierra Club drove hybrid vehicles on three separate tours along different routes. One route extended from Key West, Florida, to Portland, Maine, with stops for rallies in 25 major metropolitan areas along the way. The second followed U.S. Route 66 from Chicago, Illinois, to Los Angeles, California, with more than 15 stops. The final route extended from Seattle, Washington, to San Diego, California, with 9 stops.

The tours featured only two of the three hybrid cars on the market, the Toyota Prius and the Honda Civic hybrid. The club decided not to use the Honda Insight, which offered only two seats, feeling that a larger car would be better for the tours. The club also used the West Coast tour to promote the new Ford Escape, a hybrid SUV that was to be introduced in 2005. The Escape would be the first American-made hybrid vehicle. None of the automakers were directly involved in the campaign. In fact, one of the campaign's goals was to pressure the automakers into manufacturing greater numbers of hybrid cars. The campaign did, however, benefit the automakers by giving them free publicity.

In conjunction with the campaign, on May 28, 2004, the Sierra Club launched the I Will Evolve website (www.iwillevolve.org). The site gave reports on the three tours, and it had ads and banners that could be downloaded free of charge. This served as a low-cost way of distributing campaign material among Web users. All of the Web ads featured young people wearing campaign T-shirts, part of the effort to appeal especially to a young demographic. In addition, the campaign had a print component, which also appeared on the I Will Evolve website. Each print ad included a shot of a young person wearing a T-shirt with the slogan ''I Will Evolve.'' The ads also featured text that highlighted the benefits of hybrid cars. They focused on the environmental advantages of hybrids and, in addition, touched on economic concerns. One ad, for example, forecast that an energy-efficient economy built around hybrid cars would create 3.3 million jobs. The forecast was meant to rebut claims by opponents that greater fuel efficiency would hurt the U.S. economy. The ads also encouraged consumers to test-drive a hybrid car so that they could experience the technology in action.

Each ad specifically criticized the Bush administration for its policies. One ad, for example, accused the White House of wanting to give $23.3 billion in subsidies to the fossil fuel industry while earmarking only $5.9 billion to promote the further development of energy-efficient technologies. Each ad closed with the tagline ''Is the Bush administration for evolution OR AGAINST IT?'' The tagline was an attempt to ensure that energy issues were not lost amid the election year campaigning. While the ads did not mention Kerry by name and did not openly advocate his election, they did echo one of his campaign themes. Kerry supported greater investment in hybrid vehicles and energy efficiency, and he had supported legislation in the U.S. Senate that would offer incentives to drive hybrid vehicles. Environmental policy was thus a key point of difference between the two candidates, and this was something the campaign made note of.

OUTCOME

Since the intent of the "Hybrid Evolution" campaign was to change people's lifestyle, its success was not easy to measure. Bush was reelected in November 2004 by more than 3 million votes, but environmental issues were not particularly important for many voters. Nonetheless, hybrid vehicles were selling in ever-increasing numbers in the United States. Although only about 47,000 units of hybrid vehicles had been sold in 2003, some 88,000 units were sold in 2004, with more than 200,000 the following year.

More important, additional automakers began manufacturing hybrids. Toyota's Lexus brand unveiled the RX 400H, an SUV hybrid, and Honda introduced a hybrid Accord as well. By 2005 more than 1 percent of all new cars sold in the United States were hybrids. ExxonMobil, the world's largest oil company, forecast that by 2030 as much as 30 percent of the U.S. auto market could consist of hybrid vehicles.

FURTHER READING

Aldershot, Ulf Hjelmar. The Political Practice of Environmental Organizations. Brookfield, VT: Ashgate, 1996.

Fonda, Daren. "Make Vroom for the Hybrids." Time, April 9, 2004.

Gross, Jane. "From Guilt Trip to Hot Wheels." New York Times, June 13, 2004.

Hakim, Danny. "Energy-Saving Spots Give Cars Short Shrift." New York Times, June 25, 2004.

———. "A Fuel-Saving Proposal from Your Automaker: Tax the Gas." New York Times, April 18, 2004.

Justice, Glen, and Jim Rutenberg. "Senators Say Political Groups Are Circumventing Finance Law." New York Times, March 11, 2004.

Lemonick, Michael D. "Life in the Greenhouse." Time, April 9, 2001.

Motavalli, Jim. "Speaking Up for Cleaner Air." New York Times, April 26, 2004.

Turner, Tom. Sierra Club: 100 Years of Protecting Nature. New York: HN Abrams, 1991.

Westbrook, Michael H. The Electric Car: Development and Future of Battery, Hybrid, and Fuel-Cell Cars. Warrendale, PA: Society of Automotive Engineers, 2001.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

Sims Sports, Inc.

22105 23rd Dr. SE
Bothell, Washington 98021
USA
Telephone: (425) 951-2700
Web site: www.simsnow.com

■■■

BE FREE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Sims Sports, Inc., maker of Sims Snowboards, asked its advertising firm, Seattle-based Hammerquist & Halverson, to create a campaign for the 1997-98 winter season that would "return to the roots of snowboarding," according to agency copywriter Ian Cohen in Advertising Age's Creativity. "Sims wanted to shake up the market," explained Cohen in an article by Margaret Richardson in Print. Cohen said that Sims "had run ads for years on the back cover of snowboard magazines and were coming in dead last in reader-recall surveys. We wanted a different perspective than the typical jumping snowboarder ad. So we created a mantra: 'Be Free.' We didn't want to say a lot, but we wanted to say it up front."

The centerpiece of the "Be Free" campaign, even though it ran only in niche magazines such as Snowboarder and Transworld Snowboard, was a print execution that played off the famous photo of the standoff between a Chinese student protesting for democracy and military tanks in Tiananmen Square. Hammerquist & Halverson hired photojournalist Bob Peterson of Streetsmart, who had worked as a staff photographer for Life magazine, to give the shot an air of authenticity. Creative director Fred Hammerquist and art directors Matt Peterson and Mike Proctor then mocked-up the ad to make it appear as if it were a newspaper clipping, complete with a half-ripped caption extolling the "courageous act" of a single snowboarder standing off a lineup of Snowcat grooming machines.

On the one hand it was a soft-sell ad in the sense that the product name, Sims Snowboards, appeared only as a half-ripped headline, with the Sims logo just discernable on the bottom of the renegade's snowboard. On the other hand it was a hard-sell ad in the sense that it politicized the struggle of snowboarders. Whereas the Chinese student had stood up for freedom of political expression, the snowboarder was standing up for the freedom to have powder snow. Snowboarders were renowned for the lengths they would go to for fresh, ungroomed powder snow, which they could ride as a surfer rode a wave. The ad walked a tight line—gaining from the symbolic power of Tiananmen Square while retaining an edge of sarcasm—in comparing the struggle for political freedom with the struggle of a recreational sport. It had an air of absurdity that rang through the execution. The rest of the ads in the campaign similarly walked the line between the serious and the humorous.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Colorado Snowboard and Ski Museum in Vail had on permanent display the first snowboard, made in 1963 by Tom Sims in his high school woodworking class in Haddonfield, New Jersey. It measured 34 by 8 inches, with carpet covering the top and aluminum the bottom.

The first snowboard like device to be marketed, however, dated to 1965, when Sherman Poppen, a businessman based in Muskegon, Michigan, fastened together two snow skis to form a single wide board for his children to slide on as they held on to a rope tied to the front for balance and steering. Recognizing the potential marketability of such a piece of equipment, Poppen licensed what he called the Snurfer (from "snow surfer") to the Brunswick Corporation. Brunswick marketed Snurfers for $10 apiece until the middle of the 1970s, when the company discontinued production. Brunswick never capitalized on the concept by improving the design and technology of the snow board, and it almost died from undermarketing.

As the Snurfer was dying out as a toylike fad, concerted efforts were being made to establish snowboarding as a more serious sport. Sims marketed his first snowboard in 1976. Jake Burton, the other major snowboard pioneer, who founded Burton Snowboards in 1977, built prototypes in the woodworking shop of his friend Emo Henrich, the director of the ski school at Stratton Mountain in Vermont. Burton tested more than 100 designs before he happened upon the combination of shape, wood laminates, and binding style that worked best. Burton, who got a Snurfer when he was 14 years old, spoke of the aborted beginnings of snowboard history in an article by Michael Finkel in Sports Illustrated: "I always felt there was an opportunity for [the Snurfer] to be better marketed . . . for serious technology to be applied to it, so Snurfing could become a legitimate sport instead of a cheap toy. I knew there was an opportunity there. I couldn't believe Brunswick never took advantage of it."

At the beginning of the 1980s most ski resorts banned the use of snowboards, claiming that snowboarders created an insurance liability. The ski resorts, which catered to those who could afford expensive lift tickets and ski equipment, remained reluctant to open up their slopes to the reputed counterculture associated with snowboarding. When the insurance excuse proved flimsy and snowboarders persisted in their demands that they be allowed on the slopes, ski areas acquiesced and opened their snow up to the sport. According to Finkel's article in Sports Illustrated, Paul Johnston, the manager at Stratton Mountain, reportedly stated that "nobody wants [snowboarders] on our mountain, but nobody has a good reason why [snowboarders] shouldn't be allowed on."

The trend toward banning snowboarding was reversed in the late 1980s, and as of 1997, 95 percent of ski areas in the United States allowed snowboarding. According to the National Sporting Goods Association, over the prior decade, since 1988, the number of snowboarders had risen 77 percent, while the number of skiers had fallen 25 percent. Clearly, snowboarding was filling its ranks at the expense of the skiing population. As of 1997, snowboarders numbered 2.3 million in the United States, accounting for 20 percent of the traffic at ski resorts. The final legitimization of the sport came in 1998 when the Winter Olympics in Nagano, Japan, included two snowboarding events—the halfpipe freestyle event and the giant slalom racing event—reflecting a decision made in 1995 by officials of the International Olympic Committee.

TARGET MARKET

Snowboarding had its roots in the maverick sports of surfing and skateboarding. The Alpine skiing community viewed these as illegitimate sports and consequently looked down on snowboarding as an bastardization. In addition, snowboarders were seen as punks. For their part, snowboarders embraced the image as rebellious outsiders, and when ski resorts banned snowboarding, this reinforced the image of snowboarders as outlaws. Ironically, the stereotype benefited snowboarders. If they were banned, they became martyrs (at least in their own eyes) for the freedom of athletic expression, and if they were not banned, they got to ride on the slopes, which was their ultimate goal. Snowboard manufacturers played up this maverick image as a means of paying tribute to snowboarders who fought the system while also enticing nonparticipants into the counterculture of snowboarding.

"This audience is so sensitive," said Hammerquist & Halverson's Cohen in Richardson's article, a statement that seemed counterintuitive to snowboarders' tough image. What these 14-to-28-year-olds were sensitive to was the nuanced representation of their sport and themselves. They greeted mainstream advertising with the same enthusiasm they would have for spending a gondola ride with a dozen mediocre skiers from New York City. The "Be Free" campaign from Sims and Hammerquist & Halverson spoke to snowboarders on their own terms, capturing the irreverent spirit of the sport.

COMPETITION

The snowboard market began with two companies based on either coast—Sims Snowboards in the Northwest and Burton Snowboards in the Northeast. Although Sims started making and marketing snowboards well before Burton, the latter managed to gain a commanding lead in the snowboard market early on. As of 1997, Burton Snowboards dominated with a 45 percent share of the market and with sales of more than 100,000 boards per year. Nonetheless, this represented a decline from earlier in the 1990s, when Burton owned the majority of the market. This kind of domination, however, risked the appearance of the mainstream commercialism that snowboarders avoided. Burton's lead proved unsustainable

NOT AVAILABLE ANYWHERE—PLEASE SEND NO MONEY NOW

Hammerquist & Halverson poked fun at mainstream marketing techniques with two mock product offers. One print ad, which urged viewers to "collect all three today," featured three plastic cups like those fast-food restaurants gave away to promote Hollywood megahits. Instead of picturing Batman or characters from the latest Star Wars epic, the cups pictured endorsers Allan Clark, Noah Salasnek, and Tina Basich in action shots riding their Sims Snowboards, with short blurbs on the opposite side of the cups describing the snowboard models they had designed. Fine print in the corner revealed the ad to be a sham: "Sorry, these cups are not available anywhere."

A second execution went further over the top by promoting a porcelain plate like the ones featuring puppy dogs and furry cats that were advertised in supermarket tabloids. The headline of the ad read, "The Sims Mint Proudly Presents the Mark Fawcett Commemorative China Plate," with the copy reading, "The front of this beautiful plate features Mark Fawcett engaged in big air on his beloved T. Sims board." A candle cast glowing light on the plate. Hammerquist & Halverson captured all of the tacky elements of this genre of advertising, which was conspicuously at odds with the elements of snowboarding culture. The cutout order form revealed the ad to be a farce: "Please Send No Money Now. If you want to order the Mark Fawcett commemorative plate, you can't. They will never ever be sold, in order to protect the as-yet-untarnished image of Mark Fawcett."

anyway, as the number of entries into the snowboard market multiplied. Ski manufacturers such as American-based K2and French-based Rossignol entered the market, increasing the competition with advertising budgets that dwarfed those of most snowboard manufacturers. As of 1997, approximately 250 companies competed in the snowboard market, which boasted more than 2,500 individual models.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Hammerquist &Halverson's "Be Free" campaign sought to recapture the original spirit of snowboarding and its culture of the outsider. In the print ad entitled "Mantra," Hammerquist & Halverson stated the snowboarder's philosophy: "The time has come to slash the jugular of mainstream mentality. To dismantle the notion of boundaries. To reclaim the mountains bastardized by conformity. The time has come to be free." The motto appeared to be handwritten on a poster bearing a cartoon silhouette of a figure who, having cut himself free from a ball and chain that had shackled his ankle, held a Sims snowbird above his head. To add to the political dimension of the ad, Bob Peterson used a curved lens to shoot a wide-angle photograph that revealed the man who had been plastering the message over other posters on Seattle's Pioneer Square and who was fleeing the scene with squeegee and glue bucket in hand, as if he were a fugitive. The execution created a sense of political urgency to the message, as if holding the tenets central to snowboarders' beliefs carried a risk.

A similar execution featured a snowboarder dressed in signature knee-length shorts and skateboarding sneakers who was fleeing the scene of a prank to an awaiting car with snowboards strapped on the roof rack. His crime was that he had rearranged the lettering on a restaurant sign that had read, it could be surmised through reconstruction, "Welcome Skiers Egg and Bacon Breakfast $2.99" to read "Sims Be Free." He had also slapped a Sims sticker on a telephone pole during his flight. Another print ad advanced a less subtle message. It featured five snowboards of differing lengths arranged to resemble fingers folded into a fist, with the middle snowboard longer than the rest, like an extended finger sending the universally understood message. The copy, which seemed haphazardly glued onto the picture, which was itself haphazardly stapled at the corners, read, "Tell your inhibitions, insecurities and fears where to go." The gesture suggested by the ad epitomized snowboarders' philosophy.

A television spot went in the opposite direction by playing off the familiar plot twist of a popular Saturday morning cartoon program. The commercial began unassumingly at a ski resort on a beautiful day, when the calm was suddenly broken by the appearance on-screen of a huge six-foot rabbit sporting giant fangs and seeking snowboarder blood. In slapstick fashion a snowboarder knocked the bunny over, revealing it to be the resort owner Mr. Jenkins. In the familiar words repeated at the end of every episode of Scooby Doo, the villain boasted that he would have gotten away with his crime "if it weren't for you meddling kids!" The ads thus returned to the history of the sport, pitting snowboarders against the establishment. The humor of the spot, however, arose from the fact that snowboarders could now joke about the past enmity of resort officials, whom the snowboarders had essentially defeated in reality as they had in the mock commercial.

OUTCOME

Advertising critics appreciated the "Be Free" campaign and showered it with laurels. The Hammerquist & Halverson team, which in addition to art directors Peterson and Proctor, included copywriters Cohen and Grant Holland and creative directors Hugh Saffel and Hammerquist, won a Gold Pencil at the One Show in New York for the Sims campaign. The agency as a whole won 22 awards at the 1998 Seattle Show, including the best of show commendation for its print work for Sims. In addition, the campaign won a silver ADDY in the print category, and Graphis magazine included the campaign in its annual edition surveying the best in graphic advertising for the year. But it was Hammerquist & Halverson's Cohen who, in Richardson's article, summed up the most important result of the campaign: "The outcome was that the consumers were digging it."

FURTHER READING

Atkin, Ross. "A Man Who Helped Skiers Get on the Snowboard." Christian Science Monitor, February 11, 1998.

Finkel, Michael. "Chairman of the Board Jake Burton Took a Childhood Toy and Launched an International Craze." Sports Illustrated, January 13, 1997.

Kim, Nancy J. "Marketing and Media." Puget Sound Business Journal, December 18, 1998.

Richardson, Margaret. "Snow Business." Print 53, no. 3.

"Upfront." Advertising Age's Creativity, December 1, 1997.

"The Works This Month: Amateur Hour 5." Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 1998.

William D.Baue

Six Flags, Inc.

11501 Northeast Expressway
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73131
USA
Telephone: (405) 475-2500
Fax: (405) 475-2555
Web site: www.sixflags.com

■■■

IT'S PLAYTIME CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With 30 theme parks in North America and 8 in Europe in 2004, Six Flags, Inc., was the world's second-largest operator of theme parks, surpassed only by Walt Disney Parks and Resorts. But the company's parks were showing their age, attendance was on a downhill slide (falling 2.7 percent in the first nine months of 2003), and Six Flags was mired in a $2.3 billion debt. Six Flags announced that, to help pay down its debt, it would sell its European parks for $345 million and its park in Cleveland, Ohio, for $145 million. To help rebuild brand identity and drive up attendance, the company planned a national marketing campaign, its first such effort in seven years.

The first step in Six Flags' marketing strategy was to replace its agency, Ackerman McQueen, based in Oklahoma City, with independent agency W.B. Doner & Company (which did business as Doner) of Southfield, Michigan. Doner's new campaign for Six Flags, "It's Playtime," began in March 2004 with a television spot that featured an elderly, balding, bespectacled, and extremely vigorous spokesman referred to as Mr. Six. No specific budget for the campaign was available, but Adweek estimated the amount to be $70 million.

The "It's Playtime" campaign met with mixed results. In the months following its launch the campaign's spots repeatedly were included among Advertising Age magazine's list of top spots. Further, curiosity about Mr. Six fueled an onslaught of customer calls to the Six Flags offices. Although the campaign generated buzz, it failed to drive up park attendance. By June 2004 attendance at the parks had dropped 4 percent from the same period the previous year. Also, some people had begun to take a second look at Mr. Six and were finding him creepy rather than humorous. Standing by their man, Six Flags introduced new spots featuring Mr. Six in early 2005, but a proxy takeover of Six Flags later that year resulted in the company's new executive team putting Doner in review and ceasing use of the Mr. Six character.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Angus Wynne, a Texas oil baron, opened the first Six Flags park in 1961 in Arlington, Texas. At the time Wynne's goal was to develop large regional amusement parks in close proximity to where people lived. Just over 40 years later Six Flags counted 30 parks in the United States that served people living in or visiting 34 of the country's 50 largest metropolitan areas. By 2004 Six Flags was the second-biggest theme-park organization in the world, based on attendance, falling in just behind Walt Disney Parks and Resorts.

Prior to 1995 Six Flags' marketing efforts were handled by more than 10 different agencies. In December

Six Flags. © LARRY LEE PHOTOGRAPHY/CORBIS.

1995 the company announced plans for a national expansion, and in conjunction with that effort its media buying and advertising were consolidated, with McCann-Erickson New York named the agency of record. McCann-Erickson created a new advertising campaign that began in 1996 and targeted teens and young adults in addition to parents and kids. In 1998 Premier Parks, then the world's second-largest theme-park company based on attendance, acquired the Six Flags theme parks for $1.8 billion. Following the acquisition Six Flags' advertising duties shifted to Premier's longtime agency, the independent firm Ackerman McQueen, based in Oklahoma City. Premier's marketing technique was oriented toward promotions, and as a result traditional advertising for Six Flags dwindled. Recognizing the value of the Six Flags brand and name recognition, in 2000 Premier Parks changed its name to Six Flags, Inc. Four years later, as it planned to resume national advertising, Six Flags announced a review of its advertising agency. Soon afterward it replaced Ackerman McQueen with the Michigan agency Doner, and development of the ''It's Playtime'' campaign was underway.

TARGET MARKET

Family entertainment was big business, and Six Flags promoted itself as a destination for families in search of a good time. When Six Flags released the campaign ''It's Playtime,'' its goal was to reach families and assure them that Six Flags theme parks were the place to go for family fun and entertainment for all ages. According to the company 70 percent of its annual media spending targeted women aged 25 to 49 years old, many of them mothers who made the plans for their children's entertainment. Teens and young adults were also in the company's marketing sights. In a press release Six Flags executives stated that the company's new marketing effort was intended to make families aware that Six Flags could provide the ''ultimate release'' for parents with busy home and work schedules as well as for kids, who felt the pressures of their school-related responsibilities and chores at home. In the same press release Charles Salemi, the company's vice president of marketing, said, ''Our new campaign shares the excitement of a day at Six Flags, giving everyone, parents included, the freedom to let loose and enjoy the benefits of playtime.''

COMPETITION

Walt Disney Parks and Resorts' Disneyland theme park, located in Anaheim, California, opened its doors to visitors in 1955. Despite shaky beginnings—on opening day the public toilets clogged, restaurants ran out of food, and the spike heels on women's shoes sank in the still-wet asphalt on the walks and streets—within 10 years of that first day 49 million people had made the trip to Anaheim for a visit to Disneyland. It became the gold standard for family theme parks and attracted a growing number of visitors. In 2004 Disneyland was the world's second-most-popular theme park based on attendance. That year 13.4 million people strolled through its gates. The number one theme park in the world was also a Disney facility: the Magic Kingdom at Disney World in Orlando, Florida, which had 15.2 million visitors in 2004. As Disney prepared to celebrate the 50th birthday of its first theme park in 2005, the company embarked on a year of planning that included a marketing campaign to invite the world to its party. Billed as the ''Happiest Celebration on Earth'' (a play on Disney's familiar slogan ''The Happiest Place on Earth''), the campaign began on New Year's Day 2005. Developed by Disney's longtime agency, Leo Burnett, it was Disney's first global advertising effort and expanded on its traditional advertising.

The company Universal Parks & Resorts got its start in the 1960s by providing tourists with tours of the facilities of Universal Studios Hollywood, near Los Angeles. From those first trolley rides around the back lots where movies and television programs were filmed evolved an international company with theme parks in Osaka, Japan; Salou, Spain; Orlando, Florida; and the original park in Universal City, Los Angeles County (though surrounded by the city of Los Angeles, Universal City remained unincorporated). In 2003 the combined attendance for the four parks was 23.25 million, a 12 percent drop from the previous year. That year the NBC Television Network merged with Universal Studios to become NBC Universal. The company, 80 percent of which was owned by General Electric and the rest by Vivendi Universal France, included the struggling Universal Studios theme parks. By 2004 NBC was contemplating selling the money-losing theme parks, but instead it created a separate division under the name Universal Studios Partnerships to help integrate the parks into the NBC structure. Although one year later it was still uncertain whether or not General Electric would eventually sell the theme parks, at least one of the facilities, Universal Orlando, reported that in 2004 attendance had jumped 14 percent to 12.1 million visitors. To help draw even more visitors Universal Orlando released a national advertising campaign in 2005 that broke the rules usually applied to theme-park advertisements: the spots did not depict families having fun on the park's rides, and they did not include a phone number or website address for people wanting additional information before visiting the park. Described by the company as "un-branded" advertising, the "Have a Life" campaign was created by Los Angeles–based independent agency davidandgoliath. It was aimed at people who, according to a Gallup poll, skipped vacations because they often felt guilty if they took time off from work, encouraging them to take back their vacation time and to visit specially designed websites such as www.iwantmycacation.com. The site provided data about the importance of vacations and described options offered by Universal Orlando.

The Titan at Six Flags Over Texas, Arlington, Texas, August 5, 2001. AP IMAGES.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2004, when Six Flags planned to improve attendance at its theme parks and rebuild its brand through a new marketing campaign, its first since 1996, the company hired independent agency W.B. Doner & Company (Doner). The Southfield, Michigan–based agency created an unusual spokesman, known first as a "dancing ambassador of fun," then as Mr. Six, to star in television spots promoting Six Flags. Mr. Six was a strange little senior citizen with a bald head and a gaping, toothless grin, who wore oversized black-framed glasses, a bow tie, and a tuxedo with the trousers hiked up high above his waist.

The "It's Playtime" campaign's initial spot hit the air in March 2004, running during popular prime-time programs such as Fox television's American Idol, ABC's Hope & Faith, and NBC's Law & Order SVU. During the spot Mr. Six slowly shuffled out of a colorful vintage bus that had stopped in front of a house where a tired-looking family was doing yard work. With the strains of the 1998 hit song We Like to Party by the Latin band Vengaboys reverberating in the background, Mr. Six suddenly began dancing with an energy and enthusiasm unexpected in an octogenarian, enticing the family, in true Pied Piper style, to drop their rake and garden hose, turn off the lawn mower, and join Mr. Six for a day of fun at Six Flags. The spot ended with Mr. Six leading a conga line into the theme park as the tagline ''It's playtime'' appeared on the screen. A subsequent spot portrayed the wildly dancing Mr. Six convincing two caddies, who were schlepping heavy golf bags at a busy course, to drop the bags and run off with him for a little fun. The tagline said, ''There's time for work and time for play. It's playtime.''

In 2005 a new national TV spot kicked off that gave viewers a peek at where Mr. Six spent the winter and how he was helping prep the theme parks for a new season. Titled ''Retirement Home,'' the spot opened with a shot of a retirement home; a staff nurse opened the curtains to let in the sunshine. Mr. Six was shown getting dressed in his tuxedo and bow tie, climbing into his signature bus, and driving to Six Flags, where he began preparing the park for its opening-day visitors. With the entrance turnstiles oiled, windows washed, roller coaster polished, and the grounds pruned, Mr. Six turned on the lights, and his theme song, ''We Like to Party,'' began playing. The voice-over stated, ''There's a new level of excitement throughout the park.''

SIX FLAGS PARKS INSTALLS ''NO SMOKING'' SIGNS

In late 2005 the Six Flags theme parks chain was under new ownership, and with that came new policies, including banning smoking in all 32 of its facilities. The smoking ban was intended to make the parks more family friendly. The Washington Post reported that, according to Six Flags' new owner, Daniel M. Snyder (also owner of the Washington Redskins football team), parents waiting in line with their kids to get on a ride were not the smokers: ''It's the young adults who hang out in packs, puffing,'' Snyder said, adding that this was the element he wanted removed from the parks.

OUTCOME

The ''It's Playtime'' campaign quickly generated buzz, most of it related to Mr. Six. Two months after the first television spot aired, Six Flags reported being inundated with calls to their offices by fans of the mysterious Mr. Six who wanted to know who or what the character was. Speculations about the spry octogenarian ranged from whether he was actually a young man or a woman to rumors that he was really actor Martin Short or Jaleel White, best known for playing the nerdy character ''Urkel'' on the 1990s television comedy Family Matters. Debbie Nauser, a Six Flags spokeswoman, told the Baltimore Sun, ''It was just amazing. In all the time I've been at this company, we've never gotten letters and calls like the ones coming in for this spot.''

Several of the campaign's commercials were named ''Top Spots'' by Advertising Age in 2004, including in April, May, and July. The distinction was based on brand-recall studies conducted by the marketing-research firm IAG. The publication's 2004 quarterly survey also rated the Six Flags spots number one for likability. USA Today rated the spots number two for effectiveness in its year-end Ad Track consumer poll. As Mr. Six's popularity soared, he was discussed on radio talk shows and television news broadcasts. The Mr. Six character also appeared as a guest on Good Morning America.

Despite the success of the campaign, it failed to achieve its goal of increasing visits to the Six Flags theme parks. In the six months following the introduction of the campaign, combined attendance at the parks dropped 4 percent. For all of 2004 attendance dropped 3.4 percent to 33.5 million. Further, while Mr. Six resonated with some consumers, he irritated—or worse, alienated—others. The Chicago Tribune called Mr. Six ''a fascinating figure,'' but the Columbia Daily Tribune described him as ''a major blight on society.'' Additional bad news came from a survey conducted by the Los Angeles–based teen-marketing company StreetWise Concepts & Culture. In 2004 the company asked 700 teens to rate recent commercials, including those for Six Flags, as either ''totally great'' or ''really terrible.'' The kids deemed the entire Six Flags campaign terrible and commented that it ''really needs to die.'' And although Six Flags dubbed Mr. Six as a ''dancing ambassador of fun'' and a pop-culture icon, he also was referred to in the media, including a report in Advertising Age, as creepy, unwholesome, and not to be trusted.

In late 2005 a corporate battle arose within Six Flags. Washington Redskins owner Daniel Snyder—whose investment firm Red Zone LLC was the largest Six Flags shareholder—announced plans to take over the company. The board of directors tried to prevent the takeover by putting the company up for auction, but the effort failed when there were no bidders. Amidst charges of mismanagement and poor marketing, and with a new president and chief operating officer at the helm, the company announced the creation of an entertainment and marketing department, and its advertising account was put up for review, with the incumbent agency, Doner, invited to defend. As part of the change Mr. Six danced off into history.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Doner's Mr. Six Earns Return Engagement." Adweek, March 24, 2005.

Feuer, Jack. "The Kids Have Spoken." Adweek, September 13, 2004.

Haberkorn, Jen. "Six Flags Offers Icon; Dancing Pitchman Rises in Recognition Via TV Ads." Washington (D.C.) Times, July 6, 2004.

Himmelberg, Michele. "First Advertisement for Disneyland's 50th Birthday Party to Air New Year's Day." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, December 31, 2004.

Ho, Rodney. "Commercial's Buzz Is a Boon for Six Flags." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 15, 2004, p. NW10.

Klaasen, Abbey. "Six Flags Takeover Duo Could Deep-Six Mr. Six; Snyder's RedZone Enlists Shapiro to Control Board and Revamp Marketing." Advertising Age, August 22, 2005.

Knight, Jerry. "Six Flags Gains Ground under Redskins' Snyder." Washington Post, January 23, 2006.

MacArthur, Kate, and T.L. Stanley. "Does Six Sell? Despite the Ubiquity of Its Mr. Six Ad Icon, Six Flags Attendance Has Dropped 4% This Year." Advertising Age, July 26, 2004.

Simons, Andrew. "Thrill Ride? NBC to Take Control of Universal as Revenues Freefall at Theme Parks." Los Angeles Business Journal, May 3, 2004.

"Six Flags Launches First National Ad Campaign in Seven Years; New Brand Character Transports Overscheduled, Stressed-Out Families to a Day of Ultimate Fun!" PR Newswire, March 19, 2004.

"Six Flags Launches Year Two of National Ad Campaign Featuring Mr. Six; The Be-Spectacled, Dancing, Nationwide Phenomenon Is Back—New TV Spot Reveals His Winter Home." PR Newswire, March 24, 2005.

Stafford, Leon. "Six Flags Ad Draws Calls from All Over." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, May 8, 2004, p. F2.

"Universal Orlando Takes Radical Approach to New National Ad Campaign; 'Have a Life' Television Campaign Combines Blunt Messages, Humor and Un-Branded Ads to Urge Americans to Take Back Their Vacations." PR Newswire, February 14, 2005.

"U.S. Advertisers Use New Tactics of Cutting 'Clutter' to Reach Target Audience." Baltimore Sun, May 12, 2004.

Yoshino, Kimi, and Dave McKibben. "The Kingdom Was His Glory." Bergen County (NJ) Record, July 31, 2005.

Rayna Bailey

Sony Corporation

6-7-35 Kitashinagawa
Shinagawa-ku
Tokyo, 141-0001
Japan
Telephone: 81 3 54482111
Fax: 81 3 54482244
Web site: www.sony.com

■■■

FUN, ANYONE? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Games consoles, the electronic devices that play video games, became big business after their introduction in the 1970s. Originating with Nintendo and Sega, the gaming industry was lucrative from the start, and it grew dramatically. In 1988 Sony Corporation entered the field, although the company was slow to make a name for itself. By the time Sony had introduced its state-of-the-art PlayStation console in 1994, however, success was snowballing for the company. By 2004 more than 100 million units of PlayStation had been shipped worldwide, making it the biggest selling games console in history. When Sony introduced PlayStation 2 in 2000, customers lined up outside stores to buy it. By 2003, largely owing to the success of PlayStation 2, Sony held 74 percent of a market worth nearly $13 billion. But with Nintendo and Microsoft, Sony's biggest competitors, spending huge amounts of money on marketing and research, Sony could not be complacent. To further promote the PlayStation 2 and its software and to help maintain its position in the market, Sony launched the "Fun, Anyone?" campaign in 2003, and it ran through 2004.

The highlight of the "Fun, Anyone?" campaign was the "Mountain" television commercial. Shot in Brazil, "Mountain" showed an excited mob of people climbing on top of one another, with Shirley Temple's recording of "Get on Board, Lil' Children" on the sound track. The human "mountain" was meant to symbolize a highly social experience. Other "Fun, Anyone?" ads, such as the silly cartoon spots "Dancing Robot," "Laughing Mouths," "Winners and Losers," and "Wobble," helped to create a new image for Sony. They were an effort to replace the image of gaming as an insular, aggressive, largely male adolescent activity with a focus on sociability.

The campaign, created by TBWA\London, was highly successful. The "Mountain" television commercial in particular gained international praise. With the new focus on sociability, Sony widened its consumer base, from primarily 18- to 39-year-old-males to a larger family demographic. By making PlayStation more appealing to a wider public, Sony exceeded its sales targets and dramatically reinforced its position in the market for games consoles. A year after "Fun, Anyone?" began, Sony's share in the market had increased from 74 to 77 percent.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The introduction of the Sony PlayStation 2 in 2000 had caused a sensation in the gaming world. Sony could not get the consoles onto shelves quickly enough, and stores could not keep them in stock. Consumers virtually staked out stores that announced a shipment. According to Kiplinger's Personal Finance Magazine, no retailer was taking back orders, and even Amazon.com could offer little hope to wold-be buyers. All of Amazon.com's allocation of PlayStation 2 for 2000 apparently sold out in less than 10 minutes. A one-day record of $150 million in sales was an indication of the success of PlayStation 2.

To market PlayStation 2, Sony used advertisements that were dark and mysterious. They appealed to a largely male audience, especially to those who preferred to spend time alone with their games consoles. The focus was not on social activities or on the real world but rather on exclusion and on the shadowy world created by PlayStation. This focus could be seen, for example, in the "Signs" trailer, part of a $250 million marketing promotion in 2002 that was included in the campaign "Live in your World. Play in Ours." Appearing on more than 5,000 cinema screens, "Signs" showed a young man walking the streets of a city alone. As Andrew House, Sony's executive vice president for marketing, explained in Advertising Age, "The lead character is almost like he's in the midst of his own role-playing game. He needs to follow clues to save the heroine. There is a sense that he's being drawn into our world."

This marketing approach was enormously successful. Barely three years after the introduction of PlayStation 2, Sony had shipped 50 million units worldwide, and sales numbers continued to rise. During November and December 2002, for example, sales were up 42 percent over the same months in the previous year. By 2004, 70 million units had been shipped worldwide. Given this level of success, straying from its marketing approach was risky, but by 2003 Sony decided that it was time to make a shift. One of the factors in making a change was the increasing wariness about antisocial behavior, especially among the young.

A "MOUNTAIN" OF AWARDS

"The Mountain" television commercial won more than 40 awards and nominations in advertising, most notably the 2004 Grand Prix at the Annual International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. By 2005 PlayStation had won 26 Cannes Lions, including three Grands Prix, the most prestigious award bestowed by the organization. In recognition of its overall contribution to advertising, Sony's PlayStation was named Advertiser of the Year at the 2005 Cannes festival. As Terry Savage, CEO of the festival, noted, "When one brand wins so many Cannes Lions honours, it's not a difficult process to select them for this prestigious award. We honour a client who honours us with great creative executions over a number of years."

TARGET MARKET

The gaming industry traditionally focused its primary marketing toward 18- to 39-year-old males. Sales numbers supported this approach. In 1999, for example, males accounted for an estimated 89 percent of the market for games consoles and 94 percent of the market for gaming magazines. As a result games almost exclusively featured male protagonists, with females playing more subservient roles, for example, being saved from an enemy by a male hero. In addition, the themes of games—including sports, action, and violence—reflected society's view of male interests. Thus, the gaming industry displayed a significant gender gap.

Sony's "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, and especially the "Mountain" television spot that embodied it, represented the beginning of an effort to lessen this gap. Although the campaign did not focus on female gamers in particular, neither was it exclusively focused on males. Rather, it was much more gender-neutral than previous PlayStation campaigns had been. Although achieving gender-neutrality may not have been Sony's main concern, it was part of the change of focus to sociability and community.

Thus, the new marketing approach for PlayStation targeted a different gamer than in the past. Marketing magazine reflected on this change, stating that consumers had begun to identify less with solitary pursuits and more with activities that involved socializing. It was becoming out of fashion, for instance, to lock oneself up in a room with a video game. Recognizing this trend, Sony shifted its attention from a target market of solitary young men to a more general, and a more sociable, public. Not only were women now part of the PlayStation market, but so were entire families. "Mountain" particularly was focused on broadening the gaming market. TBWA\London representative Sue Ellen Craig was quoted in Game Planet, a New Zealand publication, as saying, " 'Mountain' reflects and acknowledges the current PlayStation 2 audience as well as inviting the new and emerging customer markets to 'get on board'. It brings out the player in everyone, and hooks strongly into the idea of simple, permissible fun."

COMPETITION

Driven by a highly lucrative market, the competition between games consoles, sometimes called the "console wars," was fierce. At the beginning of gaming, in the 1970s, only two companies, Nintendo and Sega, were in the market. Sony entered the business in 1988, ironically in a partnership with Nintendo. At the time the two worked together on the development of the Super Disc, a CD-ROM attachment. Eventually, however, they ended their partnership, and Sony moved on to use a modified version of the Super Disc as part of its newly developed games console. By the time Sony had released its first PlayStation, in 1994, it had made a clean break with Nintendo. Sega, meanwhile, had fallen behind. For a short time, the company rebounded, with huge earnings from the introduction of the Dreamcast console in 1998–99. By 2001, however, Sega had discontinued production of the Dreamcast and had left the console market altogether.

By this time Microsoft had entered the business with its own games console, while Nintendo and Sony were preparing to introduce new consoles of their own. At the 2001 Electronic Entertainment Expo, the gaming industry's major convention, there were three undisputed participants in the console wars: Sony PlayStation 2, Nintendo Game Cube, and Microsoft Xbox. Sony left the 2001 exposition as the clear champion and continued to hold its lead. By 2003 Nintendo, who a few years earlier had held more than 70 percent of the market, was suffering disastrous results with its Game Cube and had a mere 13 percent share. Microsoft's share also was at 13 percent, even though it had just entered the market. This left Sony with an astonishing 74 percent of the market in 2003. Nonetheless, Nintendo and Microsoft did not leave the business. Given the size of the games console market, approximately $13 billion in 2004, there were profits to be made even if a company held only a small percentage of the business.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Mountain'' advertisement embodied the message of the ''Fun, Anyone?'' campaign. Asking consumers to ''get on board,'' the commercial represented fun that was accessible to everyone. Shot over six days in Rio de Janeiro, the big-budget ad involved more than 500 extras, 50 stunt people, and a 300-person production team. With cinematography suitable for a high-budget feature film, ''Mountain'' followed a crowd of excited people through town, while Shirley Temple sang ''Get on Board, Lil' Children'' in the background. Following this opening scene, the throng of people began clambering on top of one another. In the end they formed a human ''mountain,'' creating a symbol of cooperation in society. In the words of Sony, ''even as countries fight each other, people from around the world are finding new ways to come together by playing online digital games on systems such as PlayStation 2.'' The commercial, which was referred to as ''art'' by many viewers, won more than 40 awards and nominations in the field of advertising.

''Mountain'' was produced by Trevor Beattie, the creative director of TBWA\London, the advertising agency for Sony Computer Entertainment Europe, and Liz Browne, producer for the Mill, one of the world's leading visual-effects company. The 60-second television commercial originally aired in 30 countries throughout Europe and Asia in November 2003, and it ran through 2004. The commercial could also be viewed on various websites long after its original airing.

Before launching ''Mountain,'' TBWA\London, aired four ads that served as a opening for the ''Fun, Anyone?'' campaign. These 30-second spots—titled ''Dancing Robot,'' ''Laughing Mouths,'' ''Winners and Losers,'' and ''Wobble''—featured line-drawn cartoon characters. The opening ads won honors of their own, with ''Laughing Mouths,'' for example, taking three awards, including an Advertising Creative Circle Memorial Award for Best Use of Humor. With their focus on fun, the four spots thus marked the beginning of the shift by Sony from dark, enigmatic ads to ones that were lighter and more amusing. The message of the new ads was endorsed in August 2003 at the PlayStation Experience in London. This four-day event provided Sony with the opportunity to promote its new campaign and slogan, not simply by telling consumers but also by showing them. For this purpose Sony created areas in which gamers could play one other, thus creating a sense of gaming as a social activity. The event was covered by local television and print news, which helped to spread PlayStation's new image.

The British trade magazine MCV reported that during the 2003 Christmas season Sony spent 5 million pounds (more than U.S.$8 million) on advertising. This included a six-week television campaign featuring the ''Fun, Anyone?'' ads. The campaign ran during 2004, with promotions made through cinema, television, print, merchandise, and public events. Even after the promotional period for the ''Fun, Anyone?'' campaign had ended, the slogan continued to represent the Sony PlayStation console.

OUTCOME

Sony's decision to transform the image of its PlayStation console and of gaming, from one that was dark and mysterious to one that was light and fun, turned out to be successful. The ''Fun, Anyone?'' campaign, particularly the ''Mountain'' television spot, achieved success on all levels. Not only did the ad win a number of awards in advertising, but it also gained popularity for PlayStation and helped increase sales, thus helping to confirm the logic behind the ''Fun, Anyone?'' slogan.

By promoting the idea that gaming could be a social, as well as a solitary, experience, the ''Fun, Anyone?'' campaign was successful in expanding the market for gaming. Without abandoning its edginess and ''cool'' status, PlayStation was appealing to a much broader audience. As a result the Sony PlayStation further established its number-one position in game consoles, boasting 77 percent of the market share after the campaign. The "Fun, Anyone?" tagline appeared to work its magic on consumers, and in 2004 Sony celebrated the milestone of more than 70 million PlayStation 2 units shipped. With the sales of consoles, hardware, and software combined, PlayStation 2 brought in an astounding $2 billion in revenue during the 2003 holiday season alone.

FURTHER READING

Deok-hyun, Kim. "Microsoft Faces Tough Challenge on Video Game Market." Korea Times, June 25, 2003.

Elkin, Toby. "Signs' Trailer Is Part of $250 Million Effort for PlayStation2 Line." Advertising Age, September 2, 2002, p. 4.

Elliot, Stuart. "The Media Business: Advertising—Addenda; Campaign Disqualified at 'Advertising Festival.'" New York Times, June 19, 2003, p. 4.

"Fun, Anyone?" Game Planet, December 8, 2003. Available from <http://www.gameplanet.co.nz/mag.dyn/Features/2156.html>

"Girls Got (Video) Game." Available from <http://www.abcnews.go.com>, March 27, 2005.

Hall, Emma. "Spotlight: Sony PlayStation." Advertising Age, November 17, 2003, p. 14.

Lankford, Kimberly. "How to Get Game." Kiplinger's Personal Finance Magazine, April 2001, p.123.

"The Mill Builds a People Mountain for Playstation." Mill Publicity, May 20, 2004. Available from <http://features.cgsociety.org/cgfilms/cgfilm.php?story_id=2097>

"PlayStation Mountain Spot Takes British Ad Craft Awards." Animation World Network, November 3, 2004. Available from http://news.awn.com/index.php?ltype=top&newsitem_no=12350>

"PlayStation Promotes the Experience." Revolution, September 4, 2003, p. 9.

Price, Amy L. "The 'Battle of the Boxes.'" Point Of Purchase Magazine, April 2001, p. 38.

Sanchanta, Mariko. "PlayStation 2 Sales Hit 50m Worldwide." Financial Times, January 17, 2003, p. 29.

Sweney, Mark. "Budgen Directs Latest PlayStation Campaign." Campaign, November 7, 2003, p. 7.

———. "TBWA Uses Humorous Tone in Its New PlayStation Campaign." Campaign, July 18, 2003, p. 2.

Veldre, Danielle. "PlayStation Warms Up." B&T Weekly (Australia), November 27, 2003.

Candice Mancini

SONY BRAVIA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

During the second half of the twentieth century the Tokyo-based Sony Corporation developed a reputation as a global leader in consumer electronics, thanks to its numerous iconic products, such as the Trinitron color television, the Walkman portable cassette player, and the Betamax videocassette recorder. In the early years of the twenty-first century, however, the company misjudged the speed at which consumers were ready to adopt liquid crystal display (LCD) and other flat-panel TV technologies, and its TV sales, strongly tied to its formerly cutting-edge cathode-ray-tube (CRT) technology, began eroding steadily. Sony attempted to rectify its product-development oversight by partnering with rival Samsung to produce the next generation of LCD TVs, and in fall 2005 Sony introduced what it hoped would be the industry's leading LCD product and a new Sony icon: the BRAVIA line. Among the campaigns supporting the BRAVIA line's global launch, the European effort, crafted by the London office of ad agency Fallon Worldwide, was the most noteworthy.

The European campaign ran not only on the continent and in the United Kingdom but also in Australia and New Zealand. It centered on one commercial (edited to three different lengths) that cost several million dollars to produce. It debuted in the United Kingdom in November 2005 as part of an estimated $30 million marketing push to drive BRAVIA sales during the holidays. The spot dramatized the BRAVIA theme "Colour like.no.other" by showing 250,000 brightly colored rubber balls bouncing hypnotically down a steep San Francisco street.

The worldwide BRAVIA launch was a success, although U.S. sales overshadowed those in Europe. This was at least partly a function of the fact that Sony Europe was unable to keep pace with demand for BRAVIA TVs.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sony was founded as Tokyo Tsushin Kogyo (Tokyo Telecommunications Engineering Corporation) in 1946 by Masaru Ibuka and Akio Morita, an engineer and a physicist, respectively. When, in the early 1950s, the company won a license to build products using the newly invented transistor (an electronic device that allowed for amplification, switching, and voltage regulation, among many other functions, but that occupied far less space than the vacuum-tube technology that had driven consumer electronics in previous years), Tokyo Tsushin Kogyo's founders saw the opportunity to attract a global consumer base. Because the original company name had no resonance outside of Japan, Ibuka and Morita renamed their enterprise Sony, an invented word meant to transcend nationality (the name came from sonus, the Latin word for "sound," and was meant to evoke the American expression "sonny boy," which was then a slang term used in Japan to mean "whiz kid"). While other companies focused on the military and computing applications of the transistor, Sony found great success in applying the technology to mass-produced pocket radios. Later entertainment-based applications of new technologies—such as the Trinitron color television (first sold in 1968), the Betamax videocassette recorder (1975), the Walkman portable cassette player (1979), and the world's first compact-disc player (1982)—made the Sony brand synonymous with high-quality, cutting-edge electronics.

The company made high-profile entries into new economic sectors (including, most prominently, film production and music recording) in the 1980s and 1990s, but consumer electronics remained Sony's core business and the source of its brand identity. At the start of the new century, however, Sony hesitated to enter both the flat-panel-television market and the digital-music market, betting instead on its mainstay CRT television products and its traditional line of portable music devices. (The company also resisted the digital-music zeitgeist in part because of the threat it posed to recording artists in Sony's music division.) Meanwhile other electronic brands invested more quickly and heavily than Sony in LCD and plasma TV technology, and a host of new competitors emerged in this market, complicating Sony's efforts to defend its brand positioning. As sales began to slide, Sony was further eclipsed, in the minds of many consumers, by Apple Computers as the industry's foremost maker of cutting-edge electronics. Apple's introduction of the enormously successful iPod, a handheld digital-music player, quickly made traditional equivalents all but obsolete.

Sony's declining consumer-electronic sales were accompanied by a series of upheavals at the corporate level, and Sony struggled to regain its footing, depending for a disproportionate amount of its revenues on its Sony PlayStation video-game console as well as the studio movies it produced. Having fallen behind in LCD technology, Sony entered into a partnership with its rival Samsung, according to which Samsung would manufacture the flat-panel displays for a new line of Sony televisions. In early 2005, as Sony recalibrated its global marketing to address its ongoing sales and image problems, the company unveiled a new long-term positioning for its European electronics markets, tagged "like.no.other." In September 2005 Sony conducted the global introduction of its next-generation LCD TVs, called BRAVIA (an acronym standing for "best resolution audio visual integrated architecture"), a line that included the first products to emerge from the Samsung partnership. Of the simultaneously running global campaigns in support of the BRAVIA line, the most ambitious, in creative terms, was one designed to run in the European market (as well as in Australia and New Zealand) under the "like.no.other" tagline from November 2005 through the holiday season.

TARGET MARKET

Sony consumer electronics traditionally cost more than other mainstream brands worldwide, giving the company a brand positioning at the high end of the mass market. The BRAVIA line of LCD TVs was no exception. Sony had always depended on its industry-defining models, such as the Trinitron and, later, the Trinitron WEGA, together with its overall reputation for engineering excellence, to encourage mainstream consumers to spend the extra amount of money necessary to purchase a Sony TV. The WEGA line, however, was predominantly associated with the CRT technology to which Sony had remained committed in spite of the growing consumer preference for flat-panel TVs, and the company understood the need, in 2005, to reinforce Sony's reputation as a forward-looking brand. The introduction of the BRAVIA line was thus an attempt to create a new and enduring icon product for Sony, after the fashion of the Trinitron or the Walkman. The European BRAVIA campaign, headlined by the high-profile commercial "Balls," was accordingly meant to send the mass-market message that Sony was, as Sony Europe senior vice president for communications David Patton told the International Herald Tribune, "a committed and powerful brand," while simultaneously serving as "a statement to the investment community that we will continue to develop and market innovative products." "Balls" and the campaign's accompanying print ads ran in European countries and in Australia and New Zealand as well.

COMPETITION

The fact that Sony had not kept pace with LCD technology and manufacturing in the first few years of the twenty-first century left it reliant on exterior suppliers for its LCD screens. As a result Sony had to pay higher prices, and its profit margins were thinner than would have been the case if it manufactured its own screens, an especially undesirable position in a climate of falling prices for LCD TVs. This arrangement also fostered a perception among consumers (putatively abetted by salespeople) that the higher prices Sony commanded could not be justified if the company itself did not manufacture the most important part of the TV. Sony entered into a partnership with one of its leading rivals in the flat-panel sector, South Korea's Samsung, thus substantially lowering production costs for its LCD TVs, effective with the BRAVIA launch in September 2005. This was a striking partnership given the fact that Samsung was Sony's top global rival in the wider electronics industry. Samsung was, moreover, the best-selling LCD TV brand in Europe prior to and during Sony's BRAVIA campaign.

IN THE UNITED STATES

The U.S. launch of Sony's new BRAVIA line of LCD TVs was not accompanied by an advertising campaign as visually exciting or as critically lauded as the one simultaneously mounted by Sony Europe in late 2005, but the product launch itself was far more successful. While the U.S. BRAVIA campaign was less conceptually ambitious than its European counterpart, it was credited with driving sales by pointing out the quality differences between Sony's BRAVIA and competitors' LCD offerings. Also, the far larger amount of revenue generated by the BRAVIA line in the United States was a function of a more mature LCD market: Europeans were, on the whole, slower than their American counterparts to make the switch from cathode-ray-tube to flat-panel TVs. Additionally, Sony was able to keep pace with demand in the United States, as it was not able to do in Europe.

One area in which Samsung had not begun to rival Sony, however, was advertising. Samsung attempted to integrate its global advertising and to position itself as an increasingly upscale brand during these years, but it failed to settle on a consistent strategy or creative direction in Europe and elsewhere, as reflected by its searches for new global agencies in both 2004 and 2005.

The Philips brand of LCD TVs also outsold Sony in Europe during this time. Beginning in 2003 Philips consolidated its global advertising, budgeted at $600 million, with the agency DDB Worldwide, which already held approximately half of that business. In addition to consumer electronics, Philips sold medical equipment and lightbulbs, among other product categories. Like Sony and other consumer-electronics brands, Philips had to deal with the difficulty of successfully advertising its diverse range of products without resorting to bland imagery and rhetoric. The company's long-running European brand message, "Let's make things better," was often derided for its dullness and lack of specificity.

MARKETING STRATEGY

All Sony communications in Europe during this time were to be organized around the "like.no.other" theme, setting Fallon London the challenge of creating a campaign that was literally unlike anything else in the advertising industry. In its research Fallon had found that the primary idea in consumers' minds when they considered buying a TV was the quality and vibrancy of the colors delivered by the set. For the BRAVIA campaign Fallon thus settled on the theme "Colour like.no.other" and centered its communications on a single commercial titled "Balls," which was edited to run in a 180-second flagship version, a 60-second version, and a 30-second version. This spot indeed broke with all contemporaneous advertising on behalf of TV brands, dramatizing the "Colour like.no.other" idea with an image never before captured on film: that of 250,000 brightly colored "superballs" bouncing en masse down the hilly streets of San Francisco.

Fallon negotiated for months with San Francisco city officials and the police department in order to secure approval for the three-day shoot, which required closing 12 of the city's hilliest streets. The balls were dropped by the thousands from bins lifted high into the air by heavy machinery, while smaller batches were shot from cannons. Twenty-three camerapersons were positioned along the balls' paths (in comparison, only four were required for a standard commercial shoot), and each time a set of balls was released into the streets, the camerapersons had only one take to capture the resulting images. Fallon had set itself the goal of using only live footage, avoiding any digitized manipulation of the images in an attempt to endow the spectacle with more "soul."

The finished spots opened with a panoramic view of San Francisco and then cut to a cloudlike mass of bright rubber balls filling the entire width of a city street at the crest of an enormous hill. The commercial then tracked the balls as they bounced, in slow motion, all the way down the road and pooled in the streets below. Individual shots at times focused on the hypnotic movements of the vivid mass of balls making its way down the hill and at times singled out particular balls and subgroups of balls, emphasizing the unique coloring and bouncing behavior of each. There was no dialogue or narrative element beyond the balls' bouncing and their resultant interaction with the characteristically San Franciscan surroundings (including Victorian homes, vintage automobiles, street gutters, and sidewalks). Each version of the commercial used the José González song "Heartbeat," an emotionally resonant, lullaby-like song featuring hushed singing and acoustic guitar. The spots closed with the "Colour like.no.other" tagline and an image of the flat-panel BRAVIA television.

"Balls" was filmed in July 2005, in preparation for a November U.K. launch. The pronounced interest on the part of San Francisco spectators, however, resulted in a productive level of viral buzz dating from the commercial's filming. Many advertising-focused bloggers took photographs or videos of the shoot itself and posted them on their websites, so that before the commercial had even officially premiered, ad-industry observers in the United States were already predicting that "Balls" would be an award-winning commercial. The spot premiered in the United Kingdom in its 180-minute version, occupying an entire commercial break just prior to a high-profile soccer game between Manchester United and Chelsea. Although the commercial never aired in the United States, Sony made it available on the Internet at www.bravia-advert.com, which allowed it to further circulate beyond its target regions. Additional online material included a behind-the-scenes featurette focusing on the film shoot, information about the Swedish singer-songwriter José González, and photographs and downloadable images. After the initial long version ran in the United Kingdom, the shorter versions aired through the holiday season across the campaign's entire geographic range. According to Sony Europe's Patton, "Balls" alone cost several million dollars to produce, and Sony's budget for the BRAVIA campaign during fall 2005 approached $30 million. Print, outdoor, and in-store executions maintained the "Colour like.no.other" theme.

OUTCOME

Sony leapfrogged competitors to become the best-selling brand of LCD TVs globally in early 2006, up from the fourth-place spot prior to the BRAVIA launch. In Europe Sony increased its share of the LCD market to 14 percent from 10 percent, but it did not surpass Samsung and Philips in sales. This was at least partly a function of lack of inventory; Sony was unable to keep pace with product demand and was still filling December 2005 back orders in March 2006. Sony predicted that it would double European LCD sales in 2006 amid a projected 60–70 percent expansion of that continent's market for LCD TVs, and the company set a goal of reaching a 20 percent market share by the end of the year. Though the European BRAVIA launch was considered successful, it was overshadowed by the line's overwhelmingly successful reception in the United States, which led many analysts to predict that Sony was poised to reclaim its spot as the world's preeminent consumer-electronics brand.

FURTHER READING

Brook, Stephen. "Sony Bounces Back for New Campaign." Guardian Unlimited, October 25, 2005. Available from <http://media.guardian.co.uk/advertising/story/0,,1600198,00.html>

Dvorak, Phred. "Sony Plans Ad Blitz to Boost Ailing TV Unit." Wall Street Journal, August 29, 2005.

Hall, Emma, and Laurel Wentz. "Spotlight." Advertising Age, October 31, 2005.

Lippert, Barbara. "The Old Ball Game." Adweek, November 7, 2005.

Nicholson, Kate. "Fuglsig Lets the Balls Fly for Sony Bravia TV Ad." Campaign, November 4, 2005.

Palmer, Jay. "Sony's Brighter Picture." Barron's, January 23, 2006.

Pfanner, Eric. "On Advertising: Sony Tries to Show It Has 'Bounce.'" International Herald Tribune, October 30, 2005.

Shannon, Victoria. "Sony Looking to Add Glitter in Europe." International Herald Tribune, April 15, 2005.

"Sony Announcing Turnaround Strategy." Associated Press, September 21, 2005.

Van Grinsven, Lucas. "Reuters Summit—Sony Targets 20 Pct of European LCD TV Market." Reuters, March 1, 2006.

Mark Lane

Sony Corporation of America

550 Madison Ave.
New York, New York 10022
USA
Telephone: (212) 833-6800
Fax: (212) 833-6956
Web site: www.sony.com

■■■

WHAT'S NEXT? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

At least four factors converged to make April 1997 the time for Sony Corporation of America to introduce a new brand-advertising campaign. Sony knew that as electronic technology continued its rapid pace of change the importance of a strong brand name would increase. Companies built around a product today might be unknown tomorrow if technology made that product or its category obsolete. A second factor was that Sony stood poised to unleash several major new digital products. This change would bring Sony into competition with new, powerful Internet and computer companies with high name recognition and vast resources of their own. Thirdly, Sony was better known among baby boomers than with younger generations. It wanted to groom its future customers for a lifetime relationship with Sony. A fourth factor was the desire to capitalize on a Sony strength while humanizing it. For 50 years Sony was a leading innovator in consumer electronics—a history of accomplishment worthy of being touted—but not without stressing the importance of people.

The "What's Next?" campaign broke in the April 14, 1997, issue of U.S. News and World Report. Lowe & Partners/SMS of New York created the print campaign, its first major effort for Sony after winning the $50 million account two years earlier. The six double-page print ads all featured black-and-white photography of children. Copy was minimal. Each ad closed with a chronological list of four electronics products followed by the phrase "What's next?" and the Sony name. Industry sources listed the budget as $10 to $15 million.

One ad featured a young child, wading in waist-high water, peering down into the water. Six short lines of small copy read: "He doesn't know what a phonograph is. He's never heard of 8-track. The only time he saw an LP was in his grandparents' attic. CDs and diskettes are his parents' toys. What will be his?" In one small line below were the words "Walkman Home VCR CD Digital Satellite System What's next? Sony." A second ad showed two bare-chested boys standing back to back as they glared out at the reader. The four lines of copy read: "Their grandfathers fought over toy trucks. Their fathers fought over electric trains. They fight over the remote. What will their kids fight over?" Small type below continued, "Transistor Radio Trinitron Home VCR Digital Satellite System What's Next? Sony." A third in the series showed three girls sitting on a stone wall with their backs to the viewer and their arms around each other. Among the banks of billowing clouds that composed most of the ad, the copy read: "Their grandparents used letters to share a funny story. Their parents used a wire to confess an intimate thought. They use a cell phone to reveal a piece of gossip. What will their kids use to make each other smile?"

"What's Next?" was unusual in that most Sony advertising was product-specific. It also was the first time Sony tied brand and product advertising together. Each double-page ad led into a third full-page, product-specific ad. According to Patrick Flaherty, Sony Electronics senior vice president of marketing services, this technique allowed Sony to not only raise an important question but also to supply the answer. The third product page was continually updated with new products like Sony's WebTV Internet terminal. Gary Goldsmith led the creative team, while Dean Hacohen wrote the copy.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The company founders combined two words to come up with the word "Sony," which means a very small group of people with the energy and passion for unlimited creation. Sony Corporation of America was a subsidiary of Sony Corporation of Tokyo. Engineer Masaru Ibuka and physicist Akio Morita formed Sony on May 7, 1946, to develop and produce communications equipment. Soon the company began a history of making electronic breakthroughs. In 1950 it introduced Japan's first tape recorder. Five years later the company brought Japan's first transistor radio to market. The world's first transistor TV was a 1960 Sony breakthrough. Other innovations have included the 3/4-inch U-matic VCR, 1974; the Walkman headphone stereo, 1979; compact-disc player and Watchman television, 1982; 36-inch color HDTV for home use, 1990; and the MiniDisc system, 1992.

Few other companies metamorphosed as often as Sony. The company frequently transformed itself through one of its new, instantly popular products. Examples included the transistor radio, the Walkman, the camcorder, and the PlayStation. Part of the reason for the changes at Sony was the markets it served. Consumer electronics advanced quickly. To stay a viable business, manufacturers had to keep pace with the technology or die. In the 1960s the company's main product was the transistor radio. The next profit driver for Sony became the small television. After that came tape recorders, then VCRs, and compact discs. Every five to seven years Sony had a new core product. By 1998 the PlayStation had taken center stage at Sony. In one week of December 1998 Sony sold 4 million PlayStations in the United States. From 1995 through 1998 Sony sold more than 50 million PlayStations. The product was so key to company success that Sony announced a $100 million marketing campaign to tout PlayStation and its software in June 1997. It was the largest marketing campaign ever for both Sony and the video-game industry.

Along with its success Sony did hit some bumps in the road. Some innovations, like the Betamax VCR, never delivered on their promise. When Nobuyuki Idei took the reins as Sony president in 1995 times were difficult. Sony had recently made the strategically sensible but badly executed purchase of the Hollywood movie studios Columbia and Tristar Pictures. Sony's music division, by then the world's fourth largest record company, fell out of the music industry's good graces after a public battle with one of its leading artists, George Michael. Idei himself was an unusual choice for Sony's top spot. He had worked for Sony since 1960, but he ascended through the ranks on the marketing side, not the technological side, which had always been the pride of the company. Idei recognized the importance of the U.S. market and set about westernizing the company. He hired outsiders for several key spots. He also changed the company mindset and focus. Previously Sony described itself as a consumer electronics company or an entertainment company. In 1998 Idei said the company would be a digital entertainment company supplying both technology and software.

Sony was now one of the world's largest entertainment and electronics companies and the world's thirtieth largest corporation. Sony Electronics, the division "What's Next?" was created for, generated more than a fifth of the Sony Corporation's global sales. In fiscal year 1996 Sony Electronics had revenues of $9.6 billion, while total Sony revenues reached $43.0 billion. The company had divisions focused on music, movies, computer entertainment, electronics, and online entertainment. It also entered into the life insurance business.

TARGET MARKET

"What's Next?" was designed with opinion leaders, early adopters, and technologically advanced families in mind. Sony wanted to hit consumers age 25 to 54 through publications including Time, Forbes, Scientific American, the Smithsonian, the New York Times Magazine, the New Yorker, U.S. News & World Report, and Wired. The company wanted high recognition among those consumers most likely to enthusiastically embrace new developments in digital convergence technologies like WebTV and digital cameras. Part of the rationale was that many of these consumers also made technology-buying decisions in the workplace.

COMPETITION

Although Sony was the largest consumer electronics company in U.S. sales and market share, it ranked second worldwide behind Matsushita, a $60.0 billion revenue company in 1998. An important part of Matsushita's empire in America, Panasonic, was one of the most recognized names in consumer electronics and a leader in VCRs, color televisions, and personal stereos. Toshiba America, a $6.2 billion diversified electronics and

WHAT ELSE IS NEXT?

About the same time that "What's Next?" ran, Sony Corporation of America conducted several other major advertising campaigns. On February 5, 1998, during NBC's top-rated Thursday night prime-time lineup the company launched "Make It With MD," a $35 million campaign for MiniDisc, a tool that made digital personal recordings. The campaign targeted adult music enthusiasts age 20 to 35. In June of that year Sony announced an advertising and marketing campaign for Metal Gear Solid, a product made by its strategic partner, Konami of America, and available exclusively on Sony PlayStations. Young & Rubicam developed a 60-second television spot in the fall of 1998 that tried to develop an image for Sony that would unify its electronics and entertainment business segments. That spot showed an egg that falls off a truck and picks up colors as it rolls across a sidewalk chalk drawing, a road's yellow lines, and flower petals. Now with a Faberge-like look, the egg is discovered outside Christie's auction house by a young girl who auctions it and reaps millions. A tagline at the spot's end read, "Do you dream in Sony?"

high-technology company with 10,000 U.S. employees, was a leader in the retail notebook-computer market and part of the worldwide Toshiba Corporation, a $54.0 billion revenue, 190,000 employee giant. Electronics rival Pioneer could closely match Sony's history of innovation. It offered products that often led their categories in the 1970s and early 1980s. Then Pioneer fell behind Sony with less-than-average marketing efforts. In 1998 Pioneer announced a seven-year goal to use digital technology to double the company's size. It updated its 30-year-old logo and said advertising and sponsorship spending would be greatly increased.

But "What's Next?" viewed companies other than those traditional rivals as the main competition. Sony saw its core consumer electronics industry blending into other industries. Traditional consumer electronics companies began bumping into companies in the computer, communications, or entertainment businesses. For example, Sony's then up-and-coming PlayStation II was billed as a new kind of computer. "As we're moving into this digital world you've got companies like Microsoft already ingrained as your top of mind, high-technology companies. Companies like Sony that used to occupy that space are drifting into the past," said Gary Goldsmith, vice chairman and executive creative director at Lowe & Partners.

So once again in 1997 Sony shifted its product focus. It announced cutbacks in some traditional businesses such as TVs, video players, and hi-fis and high concentration in the new digital markets for products like DVD audiovisual systems. Sony also set the stage to market its Emotion Engine chip, a computer chip it claimed was three times faster than Intel's Pentium III processor. The Emotion Engine chip would serve as the foundation for Sony's next generation of products.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although baby boomers fondly thought of Sony as an innovative producer of quality products like the Walkman, younger people did not have the same attachment. The oldest baby boomers were in their early 50s by 1998, and Sony did not want its image to age along with them. Many in the younger crowd did not remember the days before compact discs or other recent innovations. Sony was ready to introduce new products like digital video and audio disc players, more advanced video games, and high-definition televisions. The company wanted to capture the attention of these up-and-coming consumers. Sony also wanted to build on its strength—a long history of electronic product innovation. To meet these objectives each "What's Next?" execution carefully blended nostalgia with a glimpse of the future.

Beyond the advertising, Sony learned marketing lessons from the eyebrow-raising successes of several new high-flying technology and Internet companies. Idei became convinced that his company had to change and adapt to the merging worlds of consumer electronics, computing, and the Internet. He wanted the company to behave more like a Silicon Valley company—quick, aggressive, and prominent on the Internet. Some of the growth and success these companies achieved came from good marketing and advertising. The "Intel Inside" brand-marketing campaign helped Intel move from 20 percent name recognition among home computer buyers in 1992 to 80 percent by 1996.

Idei believed breakthrough technology alone was not enough. A strong brand name had always helped retain customers and boost credibility when a company introduced a new product or entered a new market. Idei also saw how strong brand names helped build America Online and Yahoo! Sony, a company that had shunned image campaigns for many years, recognized that with the ever-increasing speed of product obsolescence, a strong brand would be one of the company's most vital attributes.

Lowe & Partners built "What's Next?" to not only popularize the Sony brand name, but also to humanize the company. It wanted to package the technology and innovation Sony was known for with a human, emotional face. Sony's competition tended to focus on "bits and bytes and zip and zap aspects of technology," according to Goldsmith. "We really wanted to find shots that captured the emotion," he told Advertising Age. "The idea was to . . . really go in the opposite direction and not talk about technology but bring the human aspect into it." The campaign aimed to demonstrate Sony's 50-year history of innovation while focusing on how that innovation affected people's lives. Showcasing children was seen as a good way to represent the future.

OUTCOME

Communication Arts selected "What's Next?" as one of the best consumer magazine ad series of the year. Other honors bestowed on ads in the campaign included a Gold Pencil at the One Show; a 1998 Andy Award for magazine advertising; Best of New York 1998 Addy Awards for print, posters, and a magazine campaign; and two 1998 Addy Citations. The print ads got such a strong reaction that Lowe & Partners created a television spot on spec that test-marketed well in Wisconsin. However, by 1999 Sony had switched advertising agencies so the campaign ended after about a 12-month run.

As with any brand-image campaign, Sony's internal audience was important. The company did embrace "What's Next?" In November 1997 giant versions of the ads were wrapped around Sony's 550 Madison Avenue building in Manhattan. And Sony turned the ads into posters and other types of collateral.

In a large global company like Sony, the effect of a single campaign running in one country for less than a year was difficult to measure. Fiscal-year sales for Sony's electronics business declined worldwide about 3 percent in 1998–99, but Sony attributed the decline to intensified price competition and sluggish non-U.S. sales. In the video category revenues jumped 11.3 percent as sales of home-use camcorders, digital still cameras, and DVD players grew mainly in the United States and western Europe.

FURTHER READING

Comiteau, Jennifer. "Sony Says Bye to 'Bits and Bytes'; Lowe's New Print Ads Give the Technology an Emotional Content." Adweek (Eastern Edition), April 7, 1997.

Nakache, Patricia. "Secrets of the New Brand Builders." Fortune, June 22, 1998, p. 167.

Nisse, Jason. "Sony Enters Next Generation." The Times (London) (Business Section), March 13, 1999.

Ono, Yumiko,"Sony, in Bid to Woo the Young, Launches Global Image Campaign." Wall Street Journal, August 14, 1997, p. B8.

Schlender, Brent. "Sony's New Game: Idei's Silicon Valley Makeover." Fortune, April 12, 1999, p. 30.

Chris John Amorosino

Southwest Airlines Company

2702 Love Field Drive
Dallas, Texas 75235
USA
Telephone: (214) 792-4000
Fax: (214) 792-5015
Web site: www.southwest.com

■■■

MUST BE FOOTBALL SEASON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Southwest Airlines Company began as a carrier connecting the Texas cities of Dallas, Houston, and San Antonio and remained a regional airline for nearly two decades before taking its short-haul, small-airport, ticketless model across the country. In doing so it changed the airline industry, forcing full-service carriers to match its low fares even though they could not afford to do so. As Southwest expanded in the 1990s, so did its advertising budget. Having begun full-scale national branding work in 1996, Southwest became a National Football League (NFL) sponsor in 1997. Always known for its offbeat, down-to-earth brand image, Southwest and its agency, GSD&M of Austin, Texas, crafted a series of humorous football-themed ads to be aired during national telecasts of NFL games.

The campaign, the first-year budget of which was estimated at $30 million, was called "Must Be Football Season." It ran for three football seasons, starting in the fall of 1998. Four new 15-second spots were created in the first two seasons, and the third season consisted of a best-of selection of the previous eight spots. Taking the idea of fanaticism to comic extremes, the spots featured fans, usually women, whose enthusiasm for the sport led them to reproduce football behavior in everyday settings. One spot, for instance, showed women piling on an errant watermelon in a grocery store, while another featured a woman crouching in a quarterback's stance behind a man bent over to retrieve something from the floor of a movie-theater lobby.

"Must Be Football Season" was highly popular with football fans, generating more talk value, according to GSD&M, than any campaign the agency had produced in its 18-year relationship with Southwest. After discontinuing the campaign Southwest expanded its strategy of sports sponsorships and related advertising with a similar National Hockey League agreement. As the rest of the airline industry struggled, Southwest continued to expand, remaining profitable through some of the toughest times the industry had ever seen.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Started by Texas businessman Rollin King and his lawyer Herb Kelleher as a carrier linking the cities of Dallas, Houston, and San Antonio, Southwest Airlines began flying out of Dallas's Love Field in 1971. "Love" became the centerpiece of the company's initial ad campaigns, and the airline continued to fly out of Love Field even as most of its competitors moved to the Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport. Southwest remained a regional carrier throughout its first two decades, but it expanded rapidly in the 1990s. By focusing on short flights and small airports, reducing turnaround time on the ground, flying only one type of plane (the Boeing 737), and offering a single class of unassigned seats, Southwest was able to keep its overheard lower than other airlines. Southwest was known among consumers for its friendly service, its casual atmosphere, and, especially, its low fares. As it established nationwide service, it transformed the airline industry, spawning a host of low-fare imitators and forcing the major full-service carriers to match Southwest fare prices despite their much higher operational costs.

Two women pounce on a fumbled watermelon in Southwest Airlines's "Must Be Football Season" television campaign. PHOTO COURTESY OF GSD & M.

In 1996 Southwest, then the country's seventh-largest carrier, began diverting a significant portion of its advertising resources away from its bread-and-butter strategy—running local advertisements about fares—and into national branding campaigns. Consolidating its accounts with GSD&M of Austin, Texas, its primary agency since 1980, Southwest launched the "Symbol of Freedom" campaign, intended to build brand loyalty over time while fare ads helped to keep seats full in the short term. Because of Southwest's rapid expansion in the 1990s, a rare feat among airlines at that time, its advertising budget grew accordingly, surpassing that of any carrier in the industry. Midway through the 1997 NFL football season Southwest enhanced its marketing profile by signing a sponsorship agreement with the league. In the fall of 1998, in concert not only with fare-oriented marketing but also with its other ongoing branding spots, Southwest prepared a major advertising push, leveraging its status as an NFL sponsor and the "Official Airline of the Super Bowl."

TARGET MARKET

Southwest had always prided itself on its divergence from industry norms and on its friendly, no-frills image. As a GSD&M spokesman put it, "They take their business, but not themselves, seriously." Southwest advertising had historically supported this fun, quirky brand image, and "It Must Be Football Season" extended this message to a new national audience, relying on comedy to forge a connection with viewers. Each spot featured fans, most of whom were women, going to humorous extremes of football-related excitement in incongruous everyday settings.

Southwest's heavy commitment to sports sponsorships and sports-programming ad buys was a means, in the airline's view, of establishing a personal connection with consumers. "Generally, people are passionate about sports, and we hope they transfer some of that passion to us because we're associated with something that they love," Christy Hall, senior manager for sports and licensing at Southwest, told Advertising Age. With its NFL sponsorship Southwest was able to target a predominantly adult-male audience and hence to communicate its brand message to a large number of business travelers. The fact that the commercials featured women allowed for a greater sense of comic surprise given the football-oriented antics on display, but Southwest also believed that the airline potentially served 5 percent to 7 percent more women than other airlines. Further, national sports sponsorships and advertising made sense for a growing airline like Southwest because they reinforced brand recognition in current markets while laying the groundwork for entry into new markets.

HOCKEY IN TEXAS, SOUTHWEST IN THE NORTHEAST

Southwest had long been a sponsor of sports teams in the local markets it serviced, and its National Football League sponsorship was several years old in 2000, when the airline inked a deal with the National Hockey League (NHL). The agreement gave Southwest the chance to spread brand recognition by running commercials during NHL games, by occupying billboard space around rinks in prime camera-coverage spots, and by linking the Southwest name with the "GoalCam" responsible for rink-level shots during telecasts. Odd though it may have sounded for a Texas-based company to establish a relationship with the most northern of North American sports, it made sense for at least two reasons. First, Southwest was in the process of expanding into lucrative Northeastern markets; and second, the NHL was expanding into the Southern states. In fact, at the time of the sponsorship agreement, 7 of Southwest's 10 biggest markets had NHL teams.

COMPETITION

UAL Corp.'s United Airlines, the number two carrier during this time, had recently changed advertising agencies, as well as its long-running tagline "Fly the Friendly Skies." In May 1997 United launched a major new branding campaign called "Rising," conceived by its new agency, Fallon McElligot. Breaking with industry tradition, "Rising" acknowledged many of the complaints consumers had about air travel and indicated that United, alone among carriers, was intent on correcting these problems and moving in a new direction. In one spot, for instance, recreated footage of the Wright brothers' first flight was shown, while on the soundtrack a contemporary airport's public-address system informed travelers of flight cancellations. "If Orville and Wilbur had to go through what you do just to fly," the voice-over intones, "they would have stayed in the bicycle business." In 1998 United extended "Rising" beyond a critique of current problems and began to use it to show evidence of the changes the airline was making to improve the flying experience.

Delta Air Lines, Inc., was number three in the airline wars, and it used the tagline "On Top of the World" in a branding campaign that broke almost simultaneously with the United "Rising" ads. In stark contrast to United's admission of difficulties, Delta and its agency, Saatchi & Saatchi, used dream scenarios in which passengers had a whole jetliner to themselves and were being extravagantly pampered by a staff of professionals. When the dreamers awoke to find themselves in business class on a Delta transatlantic flight, they were not disappointed by the reality of their comfort level.

AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the world's number one airline and Southwest's hometown rival, in 1997 ran a local advertising campaign criticizing a change in federal law that, by allowing more flights at Love Field (and thereby benefiting Southwest), threatened to weaken Dallas/Fort Worth airport, American's hub. The campaign was pulled in 1998 over fears that it might be hurting the airline's image. In 1998 American spent an estimated $10 million on advertising in the New York area, offering itself as "New York's bridge to the world." The campaign was quickly answered by a New York–focused Delta campaign. In 2000 American unveiled national branding work touting its additional room in coach and business class.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Created by GSD&M, the "Must Be Football Season" commercials ran during the 1998–1999, 1999–2000, and 2000–2001 NFL football seasons on national television broadcasts of games on CBS, ABC, Fox, and ESPN. An NFL sponsor and the "Official Airline of the Super Bowl," Southwest wanted the spots to be "on every game people see," according to company executive Joyce Rogge. GSD&M produced four 15-second spots in each of the first two seasons of the campaign's run. In the second season the new creative was supplemented by two reruns from the season before, and in the third season, rather than budget for new creative, Southwest reran selected spots from the previous two seasons.

"Must Be Football Season" was built on the common notion of people becoming fanatical about football with the season's arrival each fall. By acknowledging this experience, GSD&M's Brian Brooker told Advertising Age, "[We] hope that we've tapped into the mindset of the fan and that would rub off on Southwest." The agency appealed to the fan's frame of mind by taking the phenomenon to comic extremes, by playing against stereotypes through the use of female characters, and by using ordinary life as a springboard for the overt absurdity of the characters' behavior. "We tried to find everyday situations that would not telegraph the football scenario that was coming," Brooker explained to Adweek, "so it would be a real rewarding surprise for the viewer."

Using "Must Be Football Season" as a tagline, the campaign's first season, with an estimated $30 million price tag, included spots featuring female grocery shoppers piling onto a dropped watermelon, two businesswomen head-butting each other in preparation for an office conference, and two wedding ushers emptying the contents of a punch bowl over the heads of a just-married couple. The concept and execution of the spots remained the same in the campaign's second season, with spots including one in which a woman leaving a crowded shop ran and spiked a crystal vase; one in which a woman in a movie-theater line assumed the quarterback stance behind a man who had bent over to pick something up off the floor; and one in which a woman in a shoe store, seeing a salesman holding a shoe for another customer, dashed up and kicked it, as though for a field goal. An additional element appeared during the campaign's second season as well. At the end of games, 15-second commercials with the tag "The game is now over" ran, offering advice such as, "The game is over. Wipe the buffalo wings off your chin," and "The game is over. You can stop yelling at the TV." Because Southwest believed that the first two seasons' spots still resonated with viewers, and because of cost considerations stemming from rising jet-fuel prices and an actors' strike, the third season consisted of a mix of spots from seasons one and two. Southwest renewed its NFL sponsorship prior to the campaign's third season.

OUTCOME

"Must Be Football Season" was an immediate hit with viewers. Audrey Moss, GSD&M account supervisor for Southwest, told Adweek, "We've had this account for 18 years and we've never had anything this successful in terms of talk value. The reaction was just phenomenal." Some commentators, however, such as Advertising Age columnist Bob Garfield, questioned the value of a campaign that, while entertaining, had little to do with the airline itself. Southwest continued to emphasize sports sponsorships on both the local and the national level, bolstering its NFL deal with a similar NHL agreement and a corresponding media buy.

Southwest continued to expand its fleet and geographical range during the years that "Must Be Football Season" ran. It initiated transcontinental flights in 1998 and continued to expand its East Coast presence in 1999. It placed its largest-ever order for jets in 2000. Southwest remained profitable and even expanded its operations during the years following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, which decimated the industry and forced other airlines to file for bankruptcy.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "American Air Stretches Its Legs, Seats." Brandweek, June 26, 2000.

Ebenkamp, Becky. "Southwest Airlines." Brandweek, March 24, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "New Delta Ads Can't Stay Aloft; United 'Rising' Hinges on Service." Advertising Age, May 26, 1997.

———. "Punting Brand Mention a Funny Waste of Money." Advertising Age, October 4, 1999.

Goetzl, David. "Southwest Works Up NHL Ad Effort." Advertising Age, August 28, 2000.

Goetzl, David, and Laura Petrecca. "Southwest Airlines Signs Up for 3-Year NFL Sponsorship." Advertising Age, July 17, 2000.

Hill, J. Dee. "Southwest Looks for More Grid Fame." Adweek, September 13, 1999.

Krajewski, Steve. "Account Tree." Adweek (western ed.), March 17, 1997.

Martin, Ellen Rooney, and Michael McCarthy. "New Delta and United Ads Take Flight, Target Business Travelers." Adweek, May 5, 1997.

"NFL Signs Southwest for Airline Sponsorship." Advertising Age, November 3, 1997.

Wilke, Michael. "Southwest May Shift More Spending to Nat'l." Advertising Age, March 10, 1997.

———. "Southwest Ties $30 Mil Effort to NFL." Advertising Age, August 31, 1998.

Mark Lane

Specialized Bicycle Components Inc.

15130 Concord Circle
Morgan Hill, California 95037-5428
USA
Telephone: (408) 779-6229
Fax: (408) 779-1631
Web site: www.specialized.com

■■■

SPECIALIZED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

One of the originators of the mountain bike, Specialized Bicycle Components Inc. continued to excel in that bike niche with a combination of frequent innovation, deep devotion to biking, and award-winning advertising. The ''Specialized'' campaign reflected the frenzied dedication that its target market exhibited for the sport of mountain biking. With a stylized clean look and humor, the ads showcased the benefits of Specialized products and sounded as if the bikers themselves had written them.

One ad introducing a full-suspension bicycle featured an image of a biker navigating a steep mountain grade, and that was accompanied by a single line of small copy: ''Mountains should take millions of years to form. Not climb.'' The name ''Specialized'' appeared on the bike but only the company's stylized ''S'' logo served as a signature. In another ad an intense biker sped down a steep S-curved hill. The copy read: ''The unmatched cornering, durability and speed of the 1998 Turbo Tire. It'll make the hair on the back of your neck stand up, unless you've already shaved that too.'' A third ad looked ancient and stained. The headline dominated: ''In 1974, Mountain Biking Was in Our Blood. Along with a Lot of Other Crap.'' The ad included dated photos, an old schematic drawing of a bike, and the body copy: ''We started building mountain bikes over 20 years ago. Back when all we had was a love for riding, a desire to build a better bike, and, well, a lot of other stuff we can't seem to remember.''

Creators of the 1996–98 campaign, Butler, Shine & Stern of Sausalito, California, placed the bulk of this all-print campaign in bike-enthusiast magazines like Bicycling, Mountain Bike, and Bike. Some ads ran in active lifestyle publications like Men's Journal.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the early 1970s an unreliable van caused Specialized founder Mike Sinyard to start commuting by bike from his trailer home to San Jose State University. After graduation Sinyard sold the van for $1,500 and took a bike tour of Europe. He bought bike components from several manufacturers of Italy's classic touring and racing bikes. Sinyard reasoned that his $1,100 investment in chains, handlebars, stems, and other components would sell fast back home because parts for high-end 10-speed bikes were in short supply. With a handwritten catalog he did sell out quickly to local bike shop owners, but then he wanted to continue along the same business path.

Sinyard got dealers and customers to pay upfront for their next order and he restocked. In 1974 he officially founded Specialized. A few years later, when he became uneasy about only selling other manufacturers' wares, he began designing his own bike components. The first, born in 1978, was a durable, high-performance tire Sinyard named the Turbo. Specialized sales jumped. But the company's biggest early breakthrough came in 1981 when it introduced the "Stumpjumper," the world's first production mountain bike. This hybrid of the lightweight 10-speed and the durable, wide-tire, no-frills bikes of Sinyard's childhood later swept the country. By 1994 mountain bikes made up 64 percent of all bike sales. An original Stumpjumper was enshrined in the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

In 1985 the company created the first professional mountain-bike racing team. In a joint venture with DuPont, Specialized introduced the three-spoke composite wheel in 1989. Other innovations like metal-matrix composite technology for bikes, lighter helmets, advanced full suspension, and extruded-frame technology followed.

THE ANGLE ON BODY GEOMETRY

Sales of Specialized's impotence-fighting Body Geometry seat were boosted by an eye-catching poster featuring President Bill Clinton. The poster showed the president's head superimposed on the body of a muscular, much younger cyclist carrying a bicycle equipped with the seat. The copy read: "The new Body Geometry saddle was medically designed and tested to eliminate numbness while still providing support. You go all day. . . . And you go all night." Earlier in the 1990s a Specialized ad put Mikhail Gorbachev, then leader of the U.S.S.R., on a Specialized road bike and stylized the birthmark on his forehead to resemble the Specialized logo.

TARGET MARKET

Buying a bike changed in the 1970s. Consumers used to have three or four choices, much like buying a major appliance. The number of different makes, models, designs, and companies exploded in the late 1970s and 1980s. By the 1990s serious bikers had a wide array of expensive high-performing alternatives. Many bikers started with a good off-the-rack model from Trek, GT, or Specialized. The serious rider would then purchase new parts so that after a while the entire bike might be different from the one originally purchased. Hundreds of bike component manufacturers lifted technology and manpower from defense contractors and learned to use exotic materials and $100,000 milling machines to design parts. In this environment Specialized appealed to the most serious of bikers.

Specialized promoted itself as a company full of bike fanatics and a company for bike fanatics. Its advertising targeted mountain-bike enthusiasts and opinion leaders. The company wanted to reach those people most likely to buy new mountain bike products and those who set the stage for trends. To some degree the campaign targeted bike dealers because they often made recommendations to potential bike buyers.

The profile of the Specialized target market was at least as psychographic as it was demographic. Specialized aimed to attract people who biked three to four days a week and spent a lot of their free time immersed in the sport of mountain biking. Often they were experienced mountain bikers between 20 and 40 years old. The average age of Specialized's buyers in 1998 was about 35. The profile skewed toward males and toward people in the Western states where mountain biking was more popular.

Although Specialized priced bikes as low as $400 to $500, its advertising and marketing efforts went more into its higher-end $3,000 bikes. That's where the influencers or enthusiasts bought. "If we sell to them they will spread the word about the Specialized brand," said Chip Smith, Specialized's advertising manager.

COMPETITION

Specialized competed with companies like Trek, Cannondale, and GT in the mountain-bike category. Cannondale began in 1971 when it introduced the cycling industry's first bicycle trailer. The company produced its first bike in 1983, an aluminum model in an industry then dominated by steel. In 1998 Cannondale, with a reputation for innovation, was the leading manufacturer of aluminum bicycles and tallied $171 million in total sales. Trek often used the line, "your source for the ultimate cycling experience." Begun in a Wisconsin barn in 1976 the company grew into a mountain-bike leader and boasted of its own advanced technology and innovation. In June of 1998 the makers of Schwinn bikes bought GT Bicycles of Santa Ana, California, for $78.6 million, instantly creating one of the world's largest bike manufacturers. The company boasted annual sales of $400 million. In an article in the Los Angeles Times the executive director of the National Bicycle Association called it a powerful combination that Trek, the number-one company selling through bicycle shops, would not have an easy time overcoming. GT led the industry in BMX bikes with 40 percent of the market. Schwinn had long-term brand awareness and a strong share of sales in the $200 to $400 range.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Butler, Shine & Stern reviewed the competition it concluded that everyone was claiming authenticity. Authenticity in the mountain-bike category should belong to Specialized, the agency felt, because Specialized's roots went back to the foundation of the sport, and the company was still a leader and innovator. Many of the company's ads pointed to its role in founding the mountain-bike category and its technological innovations, like the Body Geometry saddle. ''We wanted to take advantage of their heritage and proclaim loudly that this is the originator; they're still on top as an innovator in terms of technology and bike design and therefore this is the bike you should consider,'' said Greg Stern, an agency principal.

To demonstrate serious dedication to mountain biking, Specialized took an active stand in resolving trail disputes among bikers, hikers, and equestrians. It contributed financially to the International Mountain Biking Association, an advocacy group, and for several years was one of only two companies with a full-time advocacy coordinator on staff. Specialized also supported the Bikes Belong Coalition, a national lobbying group.

Another important component of the marketing strategy was the professional bike team. The company felt that unique personalities like cyclist Shawn Palmer added allure to the Mountain Dew/Specialized bike team and to the company. Palmer was a five-time world snowboard champion who decided to take up downhill mountain biking and earned the world's second ranking in his first full year in the sport. People, GQ and USA Today all published features on Palmer. ''He's a real character, a real personality with a lot of tattoos and he gets a lot of attention,'' Smith said. Another Specialized team member, Bart Brentjens, won the first gold medal for mountain biking at the 1996 summer Olympic Games in Atlanta. The media exposure Specialized received from such big-name professional bike athletes, in addition to the cyclists' input on product innovations, contributed substantially to the company's success.

When Brentjens and Palmer joined the team a full-page print ad fashioned to look like a birth announcement appeared in trade journals. The copy proudly announced the bikers' weight and length while directing readers to go to the Specialized website to see for themselves ''how our sweaty little bundles of joy are doing.'' A teddy bear riding a tricycle with ''Specialized'' on the frame and wearing a bib with the company logo smiled and waved at the reader.

Specialized also fostered a quality look and image in its advertising by using a visually rich, copy-sparse approach. Ads were designed to be clean and stylized. For the 1998–99 ads Specialized took this concept one step further. The ads showed the company's website address, often directing readers to a specific address relating to the particular bike or other product being promoted. Readers who typed in the address in the ad for the Specialized helmet found themselves not at a home page but at a page devoted to that helmet.

Certain touches to the ads—such as not signing off with a large company name, address, and logo—kept the layouts clean. Some ads did not use the company name, relying instead on the simple logo to communicate the company's identity. Phone numbers and addresses did not appear. When the website address appeared it was always in tiny type. The visual, often a bike and rider in the heat of action, dominated. Sometimes the word ''Specialized,'' while not in the copy, appeared in the visual—on a tire or another bike part. Smith also said that within the mountain-bike community the stylized ''S'' logo had recognition similar to the Nike ''swoosh'' logo. Repeating the company name was not deemed necessary in the United States while it did appear in the ads used in Europe.

The ads tried to capture a humorous, fanatical attitude—the same 110 percent-devoted attitude that the target audience expressed for its sport. ''After all, when you've been riding as long as we have, you tend to have something to show for it. Besides missing teeth,'' read copy in one ad. For a Specialized helmet the copy read, ''Good News: The New Air Cobra Lets You Crash Into Stuff With Less Wind Resistance, Lighter Weight, And A Cooler Scalp.''

The ''Specialized'' campaign served a dual purpose, Stern said. It was used to introduce new products (bikes and bike equipment such as helmets and shoes) and to build the company's image. ''We tried to create a brand image that took advantage of their history and authenticity within the sport,'' Stern said. One example of brand building was a 1997 ad announcing the fact that a Specialized bike was part of the Smithsonian collection: ''Some Bikes Are Stored In the Garage. Some Bikes Are Stored In The Smithsonian.'' Another image ads featured one of the company's professional riders. An ad picturing Ned Overend used this headline: ''Now You Too Can Wear Ned's Shoe. A New One, We Mean. Not An Old One. (That Would Be Gross.)''

To portray the right personality and style in the ads, Butler, Shine & Stern went directly to the target audience: The agency attended bike races. Staffers would travel up a local mountain with a video camera, ads, and water. They would stop bikers to ask for feedback on the ads, Specialized, and mountain biking.

OUTCOME

The Butler, Shine & Stern campaign won several awards, including several merit awards in the One Show. Ads were also finalists for the Prints Sports and Entertainment Award and the Kelly Award.

In the 1996-97 bike-sales season, Specialized sales went down, partially because of a recall that hurt the brand image. In 1998 the company had a stronger product, the FSR XC, the lightest dual-suspension cross-country bike. USA Today named it one of the hottest models of the year. The FSR XC and the new advertising both contributed to a substantial sales increase, according to Smith. "In a declining market we've taken market share away from the competition in 1999," he said in July 1999. "For this year we're ahead a little over 20 percent."

FURTHER READING

Holzinger, Albert G. "A Cyclist Who's Riding High," Nation's Business, August 1992, p. 16.

Ruibal, Sal. "Happy Trails: New Bikes Enflame Passions." USA Today, September 25, 1998, p. 20C.

———. "Bike Seat Offers Help For Unspoken Problem." USA Today, December 10, 1998, p. 9C.

Chris John Amorosino

Sprint Nextel Corporation

2001 Edmund Halley Dr.
Reston, Virginia 20191
USA
Telephone: (703) 433-4000
Web site: www.sprint.com

■■■

DIME ZONE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, the Sprint Corporation merged with Nextel to become Sprint Nextel. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

It was in 1995 that Sprint Corporation launched its national "Sprint Sense," an advertising and marketing campaign to sell long-distance phone service. The idea behind "Sprint Sense" was simplicity for the customer: give consumers one flat long-distance rate to anyplace they called during evenings and weekends. This flat rate—one dime for one minute—became known as "Sprint Sense," an umbrella term for the company's flat-rate long-distance calling product and used the tag line "It All Makes Sense." According to Sprint, the flat rate revolutionized long-distance calling with an easy-to-understand pricing system that people loved. The 1995 "Sprint Sense" campaign, handled by J. Walter Thompson of San Francisco, introduced Candice Bergen as Sprint's spokesperson. The following year, in 1996, the "Dime Lady" campaign featured Bergen assuring consumers that it was indeed "one minute, one dime, no kidding."

Selling long-distance phone service to the public with flat-rate pricing paid off for Sprint. A customer satisfaction survey released by J. D. Power & Associates in August 1996 showed Sprint to be number one in customer satisfaction, with AT&T second and MCI third. In 1995, the first year of the survey, Sprint had been number one with high-volume users, but it trailed AT&T with the 80 percent who spent less than $50 a month on calls. In the second year of the poll, however, Sprint beat AT&T, its main competitor, and MCI in all categories.

"Sprint Sense" introduced a new campaign in 1997, the "Dime Zone," which premiered on May 5. This campaign promoted the dime zone as the time people called long distance the most—nights and weekends—and featured three new commercials. The first two spots advertised Sprint's dime-a-minute rate for long-distance calling, and the third added another product, Sprint's $10-a-month pager. The campaign, which showed people finding a dime and then being whisked away to a place where everything went their way, did not, however, prove to be popular with consumers in USA Today 's 1997 Ad Track survey. Only 9 percent of those polled liked the "Dime Zone" ads "a lot," while 23 percent disliked them. Nonetheless, the same poll showed that people remembered the ads even though they may not have liked them. Those polled in 1997 tended to favor ads that "were laden with reality and light on fancy," wrote Dottie Enrico in USA Today. "The most effective campaign was a social commentary starring golf phenomenon Tiger Woods for Nike."

"Dime Zone" was created as an answer to competitors who were offering their own flat-rate long-distance calling systems. "The competition realized Sprint had struck an emotional chord with consumers," said the creators at J. Walter Thompson, "and followed suit with their own flat-rate product." According to Sprint, this left them to defend the "position of the dime," which resulted in the "Dime Zone" campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1984 United Telecommunications (United Telecom), which later became Sprint, announced that it would build the first nationwide fiber-optic long-distance system. Transmitting messages via light pulses, fiber-optic networks were more durable and could carry greater amounts of information than conventional cables. They were used especially for delicate and intricate systems like computers and the Internet. At the same time, AT&T had billions of dollars invested in copper wire, putting the company that would become Sprint on the cutting edge of telecommunications technology. In a 1995 Forbes article by Subrata N. Chakravarty, Sprint chief executive William Esrey was quoted as saying, "We were starting with a clean piece of paper, and we could build a nationwide network that would give superior quality to the product we were selling." According to Chakravarty, however, it was a big risk for a small rural telephone company to invest in new technology. For this reason United Telecom teamed up with GTE-Sprint to build its fiber-optic network, and in 1990 United Telecom purchased Sprint from GTE and took its name. Since then, Sprint has continued to build its long-distance calling business while taking the lead in telecommunications technology.

In January 1997, four months before "Dime Zone," Sprint began a campaign advertising its Internet service, Sprint Passport. Then in May the company introduced the "Dime Zone" campaign, featuring Sprint's long-distance "dime sense" flat calling rate as well as its $10 flat-fee offer for a numeric pager, a product that displayed only the number of the person who called. "Within the consumer services group that Sprint offers is long-distance calling, paging, and Sprint's Internet service Passport," said Daniel Gallagher, senior partner and associate planning director at J. Walter Thompson. "We're trying to establish that Sprint is more than just a long-distance company."

By 1998 Sprint's local calling business, still its main enterprise, had 7.5 million customers in 19 states, and it had 10 percent of the yearly $85 billion U.S. long-distance calling market. According to Fortune magazine, in the third quarter of 1997 Sprint's calling volume climbed 14 percent, and profits increased 8.1 percent, outdistancing both AT&T and MCI.

HUMBLE ORIGINS

In the rural Midwestern and Plains states telephone service by the Bell Telephone Company proved expensive and was often slow to arrive. Many independent companies sprang up to provide local service, and these states came to have the highest percentage of non-Bell telephone companies in the United States. What eventually came to be Sprint was started in 1899 by Cleyson L. Brown as the Brown Telephone Company, a small local business in Abilene, Kansas. In 1900 Brown Telephone connected its first long-distance circuit. In 1903, in order to provide long-distance service to Kansas City, 14 independent phone companies in the state joined with Brown to form the Union Telephone and Telegraph Company, and in 1911 Brown merged his company with three others. The merged companies, which took the name United Telephone Company, became the second largest telephone company in Kansas. By 1976 United Telephone had become United Telecommunications, a system that served more than 3.5 million local telephone customers coast to coast, and in 1990 it became Sprint.

TARGET MARKET

The "Sprint Sense" strategy, which included the "Dime Zone" campaign, targeted an audience of well-educated, high-income adults between the ages of 18 and 49. "The flat rate appeals to a higher spender," said Gallagher, "and we don't target people who are much over 50." According to Gallagher, people over the age of 50 tended to buy long-distance service from AT&T, a company they had been with for a long time. For these consumers, Gallagher said, switching companies was too much trouble, and people would stay where they were comfortable.

Younger consumers, however, were more apt to shop around and to look for what made sense to them, which was why Sprint appealed to this particular audience with its flat-rate marketing. According to J. Walter Thompson, the targeted consumers "know the dime rate is good [but] they have not switched because they are uncertain about the peak/off-peak pricing. They need to be reassured that the dime rate is available when they call the most."

COMPETITION

Sprint's main competition, according to Gallagher, was AT&T. "All the apples tend to fall off the tree into one of our baskets. We don't share too many baskets with MCI.'' Marketing analysts, however, usually discussed the so-called big three telecommunications companies—AT&T, Sprint, and MCI—together when talking about market shares for long-distance calling. By 1996, one year after introducing ''Sprint Sense,'' the market share for long-distance calling was growing faster for Sprint than for the competition. According to Business Week, Sprint's net income in 1996 rose 29 percent to $317 million, while profits grew 12 percent to $3.5 billion. The magazine further said: ''Long-distance calling volume rose a stellar 19% over the year-ago period, compared with 15% for MCI and a dismal 5% for AT&T.... Sprint was the only one of the Big Three whose calling volumes grew more in the second quarter than in the first.''

In 1997 WorldCom acquired MCI. But an even more important development occurred the year before with the Telecommunications Act of 1996. Under the new law Baby Bell companies would be able to offer long-distance services in their regions, making it likely that both AT&T and WorldCom/MCI would lose more of their declining long-distance market. ''Sprint may be in a better position than AT&T and MCI,'' wrote Peter Elstrom in Business Week. ''The Bells are focusing on residential customers who account for only a third of Sprint's business. And Sprint has cut deals with Nynex, Bell Atlantic, SBC Communications, and Pacific Bell—which are loath to give business to giant AT&T—to carry their long-distance calls.''

In 1998 Sprint remained number three in the long-distance business, with about 10 percent of the market, behind AT&T, with 52.6 percent, and WorldCom/MCI, with 18 percent. According to a 1998 Forbes article, however, Sprint continued to grow faster than both of these competitors.

MARKETING STRATEGY

A 1997 Fortune article by Henry Goldblatt characterized Sprint's marketing as the best in the business. ''Its innovations, like flat-rate pricing plans, are aped by everyone else,'' wrote Goldblatt. ''Sprint just has a way of getting its name out there.'' According to Sprint, it recognized long ago that customers wanted easy-to-understand long-distance rates, which was what led to the ''Sprint Sense'' strategy in 1995.

In late 1996 Sprint faced new challenges. In September AT&T introduced a flat rate of 15 cents that was available seven days a week and 24 hours a day. The company's spokesperson was television star Paul Reiser from the 1990s hit Mad About You. AT&T eventually withdrew the offer in its advertising campaigns, but Sprint felt that the ads had created doubts in the minds of customers about its own peak/off-peak pricing for evenings and weekends. Sprint believed that, even though its competitor's pricing was more expensive, people perceived it as being simpler. The ''Dime Zone'' campaign was created to defend Sprint's flat calling rates on evenings and weekends and to assure customers that there was nothing complicated about it.

The creators at J. Walter Thompson felt that they needed to find a new way to make ''Sprint Sense'' relevant to people's lives. ''We had been doing dime sense for a while,'' said Gallagher, ''and wanted to find another way to make the dime relevant.'' The real genesis of the campaign, according to Gallagher, was learning the time of day most people made long-distance calls. After studying the consumer base, it became clear that 70 percent of Sprint's customers called long-distance in the evenings after work and during weekends. ''That statistic inspired the team,'' said Gallagher. They came up with the concept that ''dime time'' was one's own time. ''We tried to link up dime time with leisure time and being in the dime zone,'' said Gallagher. ''If you went with Sprint's 10 cents a minute, things would just go your way. At work time things don't always go your way, but during dime time things go right.''

The ''Dime Zone'' campaign included three 30-second spots and two 30-second direct-response ads for national cable television. In the first ad a man finds a dime in his car. ''I'm heading home from work, and suddenly I'm in the dime zone,'' he proclaims. When he arrives home, everything is perfect: dogs stop barking, and blowing leaves miss his yard. Lying on a diving board at a swimming pool, he reiterates the Sprint dime-a-minute rate: ''Best of all, my calls are just 10 cents a minute.'' Just then Candice Bergen appears with a cordless phone. ''You'll probably need one of these,'' she says.

The second spot was similar to the first, with a woman finding the magic dime and heading into the dime zone, where everything miraculously goes her way. ''Best of all,'' she says while talking on her deck, overlooking a beach, ''my calls are just 10 cents a minute all weekend long.'' In the third commercial a man finds a dime and is transported to a lovely mountain stream where he can fly-fish. Bergen appears out of nowhere and hands the man a Sprint pager. ''So now when I'm out, I'm always in touch,'' the man exclaims. A raccoon hands him his bill. ''Unlimited paging for just $10 a month,'' he says, ''a rate that's as easy to understand as my long distance.''

The emphasis was on placing the ''Dime Zone'' ads in prime-time slots and on highly rated programs. They premiered on the Today show and ran on such programs as Melrose Place, 48 Hours, and Chicago Hope. They also appeared on ESPN SportsCenter and on the final episode of Married with Children. Sprint's strategy was to reach as many viewers as possible in order to produce high sales and call volume.

The creators linked the "Dime Zone" campaign with other promotional efforts. On April 3, 1,000 gold-plated dimes, minted by the U.S. Treasury, were circulated throughout the United States. In the "Amazing Sprint Sense Dime Find" the 24-karat dimes were placed in locations where consumers made phone calls, and those lucky enough to find the dimes won money. One of the dimes was worth $25,000 and a year's worth of long-distance calling. "It was all part of the strategy of the dime zone," said Gallagher. "Find the dime, and you'll enter the dime zone, where good things happen." Viewers of the direct-response ads who called in to switch their long-distance service to Sprint received 100 free minutes of calling. Sprint spent $20 million for the entire campaign, including the promotional efforts.

OUTCOME

In the period May through August 1977, following the introduction of the "Dime Zone" campaign, calls placed through Sprint increased 34 percent over calls placed during the first four months of the year, exceeding the company's forecast by 17 percent. In comparison, calls increased 67 percent over the same period in 1996. According to a study by the international research firm Millward-Brown, brand recognition for Sprint was equal to AT&T's at the end of the campaign and was clearly higher than MCI's. In the months following the campaign, Sprint's churn figures—the number of customers it lost—was better than AT&T's and the industry in general. According to an analysis by NPD Study, a company that researches new products, in the last quarter of 1996 and the first quarter of 1997 Sprint's churn decreased 10 percent, while AT&T's increased 16 percent and the overall industry's increased 13 percent. In the first half of 1996 AT&T's churn was 117 percent, MCI's was 79 percent, and Sprint's was a low 27 percent.

The advertising industry recognized J. Walter Thompson twice for its Sprint campaigns. The agency won silver Effie Awards for effectiveness in 1996 and 1997 for the "Sprint Sense" and "Dime Lady" campaigns, respectively. The agency submitted "Dime Zone" for the 1998 Effie.

FURTHER READING

Chakravarty, Subrata N. "Nimble Upstart." Forbes, May 8, 1995, pp. 96–99.

Elstrom, Peter. "Did You Say Sprint Was No. 1?" Business Week, September 2, 1996, pp. 72–73.

Enrico, Dottie. "Consumers Bought into Real-World Ads in '97." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

Goldblatt, Henry. "Why Sprint's on the Block." Fortune, February 2, 1998, pp. 106–7.

Kupfer, Andrew. "The Telecom Wars: For Long-Distance Companies, Going Local Is a Grind." Fortune, March 3, 1997, pp. 136, 138, 141–42.

"The Quiet Comer." Forbes, February 23, 1998, pp. 76–77.

Anita Coryell

MONDAY NIGHTS FREE AND CLEAR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, the Sprint Corporation merged with Nextel to become Sprint Nextel. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

Sprint Corporation's "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign publicized free long-distance calling services that the telecommunications company offered during the last four months of 1997. Each month customers could make up to 500 minutes of telephone calls on Monday evenings at no charge. The two-part campaign began with a phase tied to the company's sponsorship of the National Football League (NFL); these commercials featured professional football players. The second phase featured a commercial called "Speak Freely on Monday Nights" in which people misunderstood Sprint's invitation to "speak freely" and ruined relationships with friends and families by voicing opinions they would not normally have shared. For example, in one segment a man said to a friend wearing a toupee, "Bob, you're not fooling anyone. It doesn't even look like hair." The two-part campaign was intended to persuade consumers to try Sprint's long-distance service and to publicize the company's flat rate of 10 cents a minute in the evenings and on weekends. Sprint's straightforward calling plan had helped increase the company's sales at a time when its primary competitors were alienating some consumers by airing ads that were perceived to be attacks on other telecommunications companies. Most advertisements for telecommunications services were not very popular with the public, but surveys showed that consumers liked the "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign more than Sprint's previous commercials.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sprint Corporation began as the Brown Telephone Company, founded in Abilene, Kansas, in 1899. By 1976 it had become the United Telephone system and served more than 3.5 million local telephone lines nationwide. In 1986 the company began offering long distance services under the Sprint brand name. By 1997 the organization was known as Sprint Corporation, a global communications company that carried the world's largest volume of Internet traffic. It provided long-distance and local telephone services, telecommunications equipment, security and alarm systems, and telephone directories. Together with Deutsche Telekom and France Telecom, Sprint offered a service called Global One for multinational corporations and travelers. Sprint Personal Communication Services (PCS) was a joint venture with Comcast Corporation, Tele-Communications, Inc. (TCI), and Cox Communications, Inc.—all cable television companies—to provide personal communications services across the United States. Sprint had an average of $14 billion in annual revenues and served more than 16 million businesses and residential customers. In 1997 Sprint was the highest rated telecommunications company in customer satisfaction surveys by J. D. Power and Associates and by the Yankee Group.

In 1988 Sprint had been the first company to provide a nationwide, digital, fiber-optic telephone network. Previously calls had been carried over copper wires or via microwave radio and satellite transmissions that used analog signals, and callers had frequently heard background noise and distortions in the sound. One of Sprint's early commercials showed a straight pin falling in slow motion and landing with an audible sound, demonstrating that the company's state-of-the-art technology provided calls with such clarity that customers could hear a pin drop over the telephone. The company's customer service number, 1-800-PIN-DROP, reminded consumers of that well-known campaign, and the falling pin was featured at the end of all Sprint commercials.

Sprint's next major campaign featured the actress Candice Bergen, who became known as the "Dime Lady" after she starred in commercials that promoted the company's dime-a-minute calling plan. Early in 1997 Bergen made cameo appearances in other campaigns publicizing Sprint's dime-a-minute plan. "The Power of a Dime" campaign followed a dime as it was passed from one person to another and magically improved their lives. In one spot a man found the dime on a subway platform. The train arrived on time, he found that someone had saved a seat for him, and, when he snapped his fingers, the train became an express that stopped at the best destination for him. When he arrived home, Candice Bergen was there to hand him a phone bill that was easy to understand because of Sprint's simple calling plan. The tag line was "Sprint. It All Makes Sense." A subsequent campaign with similar scenarios and the same tag line referred to the "Dime Zone," the evening hours when Sprint's dime-a-minute rate went into effect. In April 1997 the company also ran a promotional contest in which gold-plated dimes were placed in circulation nationwide, and consumers who turned them in had a chance to win up to $25,000.

THE MONDAY NIGHT MADNESS MOBILE

The "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign was supported by related promotions during the National Football League season. When the first game aired on Monday Night Football, Sprint introduced two fans, nicknamed "Free" and "Clear," who traveled the country and searched out other football fans in a vehicle called the Monday Night Madness Mobile. The traveling promotion provided a chance for the public to participate in Sprint Most Outlandish Fan contests and Monday Night FREE Frenzy events to sample Sprint products and services and to take home memorabilia. In addition, the Sprint PCS NFL Skills Pavilion was set up in malls before Monday night games. Fans were invited to sample Sprint PCS telephones and to participate in simulated football drills. Proceeds were donated to the charity United Way.

In the autumn of 1997, at the same time that Sprint was offering free calls on Monday evenings, it ran another campaign called "1-800-ONE-DIME" to publicize its flat rates for collect calling services. Surveys had revealed that three out of four consumers had no idea what a collect call would cost since other carriers figured their long-distance charges from complex rate tables and discount systems. By contrast, Sprint's rates were simply 10 cents a minute for night and weekend calls and 25 cents a minute for daytime calls Monday through Friday, plus a low connection fee of $1.59 for state-to-state collect calls.

TARGET MARKET

The "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign was designed to attract new customers to Sprint's dime-a-minute calling plan. The primary target group was consumers 20 to 45 years old, and the campaign was skewed somewhat toward women, who were more likely than men to make decisions regarding long-distance services. The company had conducted a national survey in which consumers named Monday as their least favorite day of the week because it marked the end of a fun-filled weekend without stress and the beginning of a new work week. When asked what would make them feel better about Mondays, many consumers mentioned free or discounted services.

In addition, surveys showed that many football fans made phone calls during the television show Monday Night Football, which featured highlights of NFL games. Fans would rush to the telephone to gloat or celebrate with friends when the players scored touchdowns, fumbled or intercepted the ball, were injured, or performed so well or so badly that the score became lopsided. Since Sprint was a sponsor of the NFL, its decision to offer free calls on Monday nights meshed perfectly with Monday Night Football and helped generate interest in NFL games. According to Tom Weigman, president of Sprint Consumer Services Group, "First, we always want to provide top-quality products and services while fulfilling our customers' telecommunications needs. Second, with the excitement of Monday Night Football, Sprint wants to make sure Monday nights will never be the same by not only bringing you closer to family and friends, but closer to live NFL action."

THE JETSONS CONNECTION

Sprint's "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign helped publicize Sprint stores located within the 6,000 U.S. outlets of RadioShack, a division of Tandy Corporation. Some ads with the theme "Welcome to the 21st Century" featured characters from The Jetsons, an animated science-fiction series. Part of the promotion featured actors in Jetsons costumes making a simulated spaceship landing in front of the Sprint Store at RadioShack in New York City's Times Square amid a cloud of smoke and a blaze of lights.

COMPETITION

Among long-distance telephone carriers in the United States, AT&T Corp. was in first place with 52.6 percent of the U.S. long-distance market in November 1997. MCI Communications Corporation was second with 18 percent, and Sprint was third with 10 percent, according to USA Today. In a time of rapidly expanding Internet services, AT&T had about 60 percent of the business communications market. AT&T estimated that there were 30 million Internet users in 1997, and it expected the number to increase to 13 billion within three years. AT&T spent about $300 million annually to advertise to consumers. Competitive Media Reporting calculated that in 1995 AT&T spent a total of $607 million for advertising, MCI spent $308 million, and Sprint spent $209 million.

For several years AT&T and MCI had been running campaigns that compared their prices and services. MCI had promoted its Friends & Family "calling circle," which provided reduced rates to the telephone numbers that members called most often. AT&T had responded with ads featuring people who said "I hate the circle!" and went on to cite details of AT&T's long-distance plans. MCI ran a campaign in which psychologist Dr. Joyce Brothers and fictitious consumers explained why they liked MCI better than AT&T. Although surveys showed that some of the commercials were effective, they were also perceived as mean-spirited mudslinging, and the barrage of information about complex calling plans had confused consumers. When Sprint introduced its "dime-a-minute" Sprint Sense calling plan in 1995, the company experienced record sales as consumers signed up for the simple, flat-rate service from a company that had not become so involved in talking about its competitors. In 1996 AT&T began airing ads that disparaged Sprint's calling plan.

By 1997 AT&T and MCI were airing more polite commercials that appealed to the emotions of consumers instead of focusing on competitors. Beginning in May AT&T spent between $90 million and $100 million on a popular series of advertisements that focused on life in the high-tech 1990s. The "It's All within Your Reach" campaign showed consumers how the company's products and services could improve their lives. One spot featured a mother who put her professional obligations aside for a while so that she could spend time with her daughters at the beach. In another commercial teenagers chatted via their home computers after an evening out together. The advertisements included well-known rock and roll songs and country music, such as Elton John's "Rocket Man" and Patsy Cline's "Walking after Midnight." Critics called the commercials some of the best for AT&T since the company's warm-hearted "Reach Out and Touch Someone" campaign, which had run years before.

Throughout 1997 AT&T also ran a campaign in which comedian Paul Reiser explained the company's new one-rate calling plan without attacking its direct competition, Sprint's dime-a-minute plan. Nearly one in five consumers in a USA Today survey said they liked the spots. In addition, AT&T aired a campaign during the spring that used the theme song from the old television series Hawaii Five-0 to promote its Internet services. The ads, which featured smartly dressed business people, drew a connection between the famous ocean surf of Hawaii and the slang term for on-line exploration, "surfing the Net." Fifteen percent of respondents in a USA Today survey said they "liked the ads a lot," but the commercials were popular with 29 percent of respondents 18 to 24 years old.

MOTION PICTURE TIE-INS

To publicize its long-distance calling rates, Sprint ran promotions tied to two adventure movies in 1997. In connection with the release of Dante's Peak, starring Pierce Brosnan and Linda Hamilton as people trying to survive the eruption of a volcano, contests on the radio awarded prepaid telephone cards worth 10 minutes of free calls from Sprint. (Sprint had sold more prepaid phone cards than any other company and had a 30 percent share of the prepaid card market in 1997.) Later in the year a Sprint campaign promised free tickets to the science-fiction comedy Men in Black, starring Tommy Lee Jones and Will Smith, for consumers who signed up for the Sprint Sense long-distance calling plan.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Sprint hoped to attract consumers to its Sprint Sense calling plan by offering them significant savings on their first few long-distance bills and by pointing out that Sprint Sense offered low prices and a simple rate schedule. New customers were allowed 500 free minutes each month for long-distance calls on Monday evenings for a limited time. Existing customers could also request the free calls. The company had estimated that the average long-distance bill for a household in the United States was about $25 a month. Sprint's offer of 500 free minutes was worth twice that amount, $50 at the Sprint Sense rate of 10 cents a minute. In addition, the campaign promoted the digital, wireless telephone technology available through an affiliated company, Sprint Personal Communications Services (PCS). New subscribers after September 1 received free local calls on Monday evenings until the end of the year, and their rates were as low as 10 cents a minute at other times. "By making local Sprint PCS calls free on Monday nights, we are giving new customers another reason to experience the clarity and benefits of Sprint PCS service," said Chuck Levine, chief marketing officer for Sprint PCS. "Whether people are at home watching the game, at a friend's house, or in their car, they can enjoy clarity virtually as good as their home phone." The spots that promoted Sprint PCS emphasized the word "clear" since clarity of sound was a selling point for digital communications equipment.

The "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign was rolled out in two phases. The first, also called "Monday Nights Free and Clear," was developed by Hal Riney & Partners/Heartland in Chicago in conjunction with NFL Films. The three advertisements in this part of the campaign featured professional football players promoting Sprint long-distance services and Sprint PCS wireless communications. In one spot Marcus Allen, a football star with the Kansas City Chiefs team, had not been playing well and had been pulled from the game when his wife called to tell him that his mother-in-law would not be moving in with them after all. Allen smiled broadly, went back into the game, and began making spectacular plays. The second stage of the campaign, "Speak Freely on Monday Nights," was created by the J. Walter Thompson ad agency. It consisted of a single commercial that showed people having telephone conversations in which they said more than they should have because they misunderstood Sprint's invitation to "speak freely." A young man told his mother, "It's not the dress that makes you look big. It's your hips." A girl told a friend, "Sure she thinks you're cute. You're rich." A woman looked at a photograph of a child and commented, "Yeah, I have seen cuter babies." The camera cut to Sprint spokesperson Candice Bergen, who remarked, "When they said speak freely, I don't think that's what they had in mind." Like all Sprint ads, each spot ended with the company's signature image of a pin dropping. The NFL spots aired only on the ABC and ESPN television networks, but the "Speak Freely on Monday Nights" commercial aired during a wide variety of network and cable television programs.

OUTCOME

According to Jerry Gramaglia, vice president of marketing for Sprint's consumer services, the "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign boosted sales. The company's call volume during the third quarter rose 34 percent higher than the volume for that quarter in 1996, and Sprint's tracking strategies revealed that many consumers called throughout the remainder of 1997 in response to the advertisements. The "Speak Freely on Monday Nights" campaign was more popular than previous Sprint advertisements, according to a consumer poll by USA Today's Ad Track. The ads were liked by 17 percent of respondents, compared to a survey average of 22 percent, and 17 percent said the campaign was very effective, slightly better than the survey average of 16 percent. The ads were more popular with consumers 18 to 24 years old, with 22 percent saying they "liked the ads a lot."

Fifteen percent of respondents said they disliked the campaign. Previous Sprint ads had scored no higher than 10 percent for popularity and 15 percent for effectiveness, and 28 percent of respondents had said they disliked the "Dime Lady" campaign.

But the Sprint campaign was not popular with many consumer awareness groups. The Consumer Federation of America criticized the campaign for misleading consumers because it failed to explain that customers would have to "jump through numerous hoops" to receive the free calls. The public interest group the Center for Science in the Public Interest agreed and gave a "lemon" award to Sprint. A Sprint spokesperson answered that those limitations applied primarily to existing Sprint customers and that the campaign had been intended mainly for people who had not yet signed on with Sprint.

FURTHER READING

"An Ad Blitz for the 21st Century; Sprint Store at RadioShack Launches Massive Ad Campaign with Over 2.3 Billion TV Impressions." PRNewswire, September 24, 1997.

Cleland, Kim. "Bergen Leaves Spotlight in Sprint's New 'Dime' Ads." Advertising Age, January 13, 1997.

Cleland, Kim. "Sprint Moving Beyond Product Ads." Advertising Age, May 12, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "AT&T's 'One-Rate' Ads Ring True with Viewers." USA Today Ad Track, February 10, 1997.

———. "MCI Ads Raise Hackles But Seem to Work." USA Today Ad Track, June 5, 1995.

———. "Sprint Leaps Forward with New Ad Campaign." USA Today, November 10, 1997.

———. "Sprint Sees Success in Dime Campaign." USA Today Ad Track, August 4, 1997.

———. "Viewers Give No Quarter to Sprint's 'Dime Lady.'" USA Today Ad Track, June 17, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie, and Lydia Gibson. "AT&T Makes Connection with Ad Campaign." USA Today Ad Track, May 19, 1997.

"Great Rates: Sprint Offers Free Calls Monday Nights and a New Collect Calling Service." PRNewswire, September 8, 1997.

Jensen, Jeff, and Kim Cleland. "Sprint Nears Connection with NFL." Advertising Age, April 29, 1996.

"Sprint Launches NFL Season Campaign to Boost Monday's 'Likeability' Index." PRNewswire, August 25, 1997.

"Sprint Ranking High on All Fronts, Say Three New Studies." PRNewswire, August 20, 1997.

"Sprint Unveils New Advertising; Campaign Goes Beyond Long Distance." PRNewswire, January 13, 1997.

Tanouye, Erik. "Advertisers Get 'Lemon' Awards; Public Interest Groups Knock Nine Ads They Claim Mislead Consumers." San Antonio Express News, December 6, 1997.

Susan Risland

NEXTEL. DONE. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since this essay was first written, Nextel Communications, Inc. merged with Sprint Corporation to form Sprint Nextel Corporation. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

The telecommunications industry underwent such fierce competition during 2003 that many analysts were comparing its advertising climate to the "cola wars" of the previous decade. The fifth-largest wireless-service provider, Nextel Communications, Inc., held 10.5 percent of the industry's market share and achieved revenues reaching $10 billion. The cumulative advertising budget from the top six providers (with Verizon Communications leading the pack) had reached a whopping $3.5 billion by 2004. To keep pace with one another, corporations catered to specific niches. Verizon tailored advertising around its large coverage footprint, while the Sprint PCS Group touted its wide range of features. Nextel, distinguished by its walkie-talkie feature called Push-to-talk, was used by construction crews, technicians, and government agencies that relied on Push-to-talk's quick capabilities. To continue within this niche, Nextel launched its "Nextel. Done." campaign to position itself as the most efficient work-related provider, one that allowed communication without interference.

With a starting budget of $200 million, the New York branch of ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day orchestrated "Nextel. Done." using television, print, radio, Web and outdoor advertising. In September 2003 bright-yellow outdoor ads with the word "Do" were posted in cities nationwide. Newspaper ads featured copy such as "Stop believing that whoever talks most in the meeting wins." Also, nine television spots humorously showed people using Nextel's Push-to-talk feature to accelerate their jobs and other life events, such as weddings. With the campaign's tagline, "Nextel. Done," TBWA\Chiat\Day hoped to communicate the speed and pragmatism of Nextel's service. The campaign continued into 2004.

By the end of 2004 Nextel had posted more than $13 billion in sales, a 23.5 percent increase over 2003. "Dance Party," the campaign's most acclaimed television spot, earned a Bronze Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival and a Silver Award at the D&AD (Design and Art Direction) Awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Mullen Advertising, part of the Interpublic Group of Companies, provided Nextel's advertising until 2003.

The agency's last Nextel campaign, ''Coast to Coast Walkie Talkie,'' exaggerated the mechanics of Nextel's nationwide Push-to-talk technology with television spots showing Nextel repeaters (devices that amplified the range of a radio signal) fastened to the antlers of antelopes and clamped to the legs of pigeons. One spot, ''Giant Antenna,'' suggested that Nextel provided service with the help of a 400,000-foot radio antenna that could transmit coast-to-coast. Mullen also bolstered Nextel's brand in an advertising war with Verizon. Verizon first discredited Nextel's inferior coverage area, which prompted Mullen to release copy such as ''We have push-to-talk. They have push-to-wait.'' The last television spot Mullen created for Nextel was released in June 2003.

A Nextel spokeswoman, Audrey Schaefer, explained to the Boston Globe that Nextel changed ad agencies simply because it had outgrown Mullen. Nextel's revenue rose from $333 million in 1996 to $8.72 billion by 2002. ''We're looking to take it to the next level,'' she said, referring to Nextel awarding TBWA\Chiat\Day the advertising account in 2003.

TBWA\Chiat\Day formulated a campaign that contrasted with the format that both Verizon and Sprint employed: using the same actor as a spokesman in every commercial. As Barbara Lippert wrote for Adweek, ''I'm so glad that in this first campaign for Nextel from TBWA\Chiat\Day, the agency avoids all the usual telecom suspects: no obsessive guys in trench coats, no repetitive catchphrases, no B-list celeb endorsers or once-proud A-listers interrupting and/or hang gliding and break dancing.'' Instead, TBWA\Chiat\Day wanted ''Nextel. Done.'' to continue Nextel's popularity within working environments that relied on quick, effortless communication. A spokesperson for the ad agency told Adweek, ''The whole category is about talk, but Nextel is going to be about doing.''

PUSH-TO-TALK

Nextel was the first major wireless service to provide Push-to-talk, a technology borrowed largely from the walkie-talkie. In addition to making wireless calls that allowed both parties to talk and hear simultaneously (a mode termed ''full-duplex calling''), Nextel phones were also capable of Push-to-talk, allowing only one party to talk at once. The feature made calls cheaper and faster to place than traditional full-duplex calling. A Nextel subscriber could simply push a button or buttons that corresponded to another Nextel subscriber's phone number. The subscriber receiving the call would immediately hear a chirp on his or her phone and could then choose to answer, queue, or clear the call alert. If it was answered, the two subscribers alternated between using the microphone with a speak-button. Depending on how callers toggled the button, Nextel's infrastructure knew in which direction the signal should be traveling.

TARGET MARKET

''Nextel. Done.'' focused on branding Nextel as a business-to-business service provider that targeted working adults such as construction workers, technicians, and government agencies. Jobholders who valued efficiency and work speed were targeted as well. ''Our customers put a premium [on] getting things done,'' Mark Schweitzer, senior vice president of Nextel, was quoted in Total Telecom. The tagline ''Nextel. Done.'' attempted to capture Nextel's startup, accelerated attitude.

Push-to-talk, a service only offered by Nextel until Verizon released its own version in August 2003, allowed mobile-phone users to contact other Nextel subscribers cheaply and quickly with the push of a button. The service ranged nationwide and worked like a long-ranged walkie-talkie service. Many of the campaign's television spots featured white- or blue-collar workers using their Push-to-talk feature in job interviews and business meetings and accomplishing other tasks with their Nextel phones. ''Nextel is positioned as a tool for people who need to get things done instantly,'' one Nextel executive was quoted as saying in Adweek. Another executive added, ''It's not about empowerment, it's about accomplishment.'' During the campaign's first week, bright yellow posters with ''Do'' in thick, black copy appeared around New York and other cities.

COMPETITION

Verizon reigned as America's largest wireless-service provider in 2003. Besides ranking highest in service quality, Verizon also scored higher in customer satisfaction than any of its six closest competitors. To reinforce its positioning Verizon spent $1 billion every three months just to improve its network. In 2003 Verizon was spending $300 to $400 million on its ''Can You Hear Me Now?'' campaign, which featured actor Paul Marcarelli as the brand's ''Testman,'' who was shown, in more than 100 television spots, testing Verizon coverage across America. Verizon spent an additional $700 to $800 million on direct-mail and in-store promotions, making it the largest advertising spender out of all American brands. Verizon led the industry until February 2004, when Cingular

JOE PYTKA

Joe Pytka, who directed the first four television spots of "Nextel. Done," was credited with directing more than 5,000 commercials. His influence encompassed Ray Charles's "Uh-huh" campaign for Diet Pepsi along with the McDonald's campaign "Nothing But Net," which featured basketball greats Larry Bird and Michael Jordan.

Wireless LLC purchased AT&T Wireless Services for $41 billion.

Before Cingular acquired AT&T, it stood as the second-largest wireless service provider and spent an estimated $500 million on advertising in 2003. The company launched its enigmatic "mLife" campaign, which ran into trouble after consumers confused it with MetLife Insurance. When Cingular later acquired AT&T, Cingular's coverage area enlarged, and the company initiated a campaign called "Raising the Bar," a phrase that referred to the phone's signal-strength meter. Despite the fact that the acquisition gave Cingular more subscribers than any other competitor, the provider only ranked fourth in customer satisfaction, and it received four times as many service complaints as Verizon.

Similar to Verizon with its "Testman," Sprint PCS created more than 100 television spots with its own spokesman, "Sprint guy," who explained various Sprint features and service plans to consumers. In 2003 Sprint spent an estimated $550 million on advertising and posted $1 billion in revenues. In December 2004 Sprint and Nextel announced plans for a $36 billion merger to challenge their two larger rivals. "Even with the combined resources of Sprint and Nextel, we are up against two Goliaths in Cingular and Verizon," Mark Schweitzer, Nextel's senior vice president, told Advertising Age.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In September 2003, during the campaign's first week, bright-yellow posters with the word "Do" began appearing in cities. The posters served as teasers for the upcoming campaign, which would continue across print, radio, television, and the Internet. Four 30-second television spots, all directed by seasoned commercial director Joe Pytka, aired during September. Print and Internet ads and radio spots also began appearing. New television spots were released at the beginning of 2004.

The campaign's most-awarded commercial, "Dance Party," aired in January 2004. The 30-second spot, directed by Jim Jenkins, featured three tie-wearing office workers grooving to hip-hop's Salt-N-Pepa playing on a portable stereo. When their boss walked in to discover all three not working, he snapped, "What's going on? We don't know how many converters we have in stock. We don't know where our trucks are. No one knows where Mackler is." Despite their boss' irritation, the three did not turn off the music or stop dancing until he finished his scolding. Then, with the quick flip of a Nextel phone and keystroke of a laptop, the three answered the boss' questions within three seconds, after which they restarted the music and continued dancing. Deviating from its competitors, Nextel focused on "the concept of 'done' rather than talk," TBWA\Chiat\Day group creative director John Hunt told Campaign.

Continuing within the same vein, another 30-second spot, "Meeting," appeared in September 2003. The commercial began with an elderly boss entering an office and everyone around the table flipping open their Nextel phones. Throughout the short meeting, attendees communicated rapidly with Nextel's Push-to-talk feature. To amplify the spot's absurd humor, it was scripted with tongue-twisting dialogue such as the boss saying, "Pittsburgh? Pursue the potential pitch for property pronto."

One television spot without a work-related storyline, "Wedding," featured a bride and groom rushing through wedding vows using Nextel's Push-to-talk feature. The spot attempted to exemplify humorously the speed of Nextel's service. Another 30-second spot, "Romeo and Juliet," showed teens rushing through a Nextel rendition of the Shakespeare play while their phones flipped open and closed.

Ads appeared in print publications such as USA Today, with copy conveying a similar theme of efficiency. One ad stated, "Stop believing that whoever talks most in the meeting wins." Other ads only featured Nextel's "finish line" symbol, a straight vertical line placed upon a yellow background. The symbol notified Nextel subscribers of a message's end. Other ads, using the same yellow background, featured short copy such as, "Cancel dance class," "Call dog walker," and "Book a flight," to convey Nextel's get-it-done positioning. "Nextel. Done." commercials continued into 2004.

OUTCOME

Nextel's sales increased 23.5 percent (to $13 billion) during a majority of the campaign's lifespan. Some analysts criticized the campaign for not explaining the Push-to-talk service, which most wireless customers did not use. As Adweek's critic Barbara Lippert wrote, "Unless you already know about Nextel's 'Push-to-talk' service . . . it's hard to figure out what benefit is being sold, since the p-t-t phrase is never mentioned.'' Other critics accused TBWA\Chiat\Day of dehumanizing face-to-face communication in the campaign's television spots. Nevertheless, the campaign, overall, garnered a fair amount of ad-industry praise. It earned TBWA\Chiat\Day a gold award at the American Association of Advertising Agencies' account planning conference in New Orleans. ''Dance Party'' was considered one of Adweek magazine's ''best spots'' during October 2004. ''Dance Party'' also earned a Bronze Lion at the Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival and a Silver Award at the D&AS Awards, given out by Design & Art Direction, a London-based professional association and charity.

In an ad review for Advertising Age's Creativity, Kevin Moehlenkamp, cochief creative officer at McCann-Erickson San Francisco, remarked on the first four television spots. ''They're beautifully shot and hard not to watch. Using the phones in ordinary situations like a wedding to get across the idea that 'these little suckers just work and get the job done' is a nice, memorable device.'' Reviewing the campaign for Adweek, Mae Anderson stated that ''Dance Party'' was ''one of the best positioning/tags that I've seen in a long time. This spot is well directed, cast, written and shot. And it builds off of a positioning that is relevant and different.''

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. ''September.'' Adweek, October 25, 2004, p. 22.

Bischoff, Glenn. ''Nextel, Zetron Intro Interop Solution.'' Mobile Radio Technology, January 1, 2005, p. 38.

Charski, Mindy. ''Ad Exec by Day . . . for Some Agency Staffers, Two Careers Are Better than One.'' Adweek, September, 22, 2003, p. 30.

Cuneo, Alice. ''CMO Merges Conflicting Cultures into One $35B Wireless Behemoth.'' Advertising Age, July 11, 2005, p. 32.

Cuneo, Alice, and Lisa Sanders. ''Street Cred for Prepay: Nextel's Boost Dials Up Rappers to Pump Sales.'' Advertising Age, September 6, 2004, p. 10.

Donker, Anne ''Sprint-Nextel Merger: Cellular Change.'' Optimize, January 1, 2005, p. 58.

Elliott, Stuart. ''Forecasts of an Ad Blitz by Wireless Services Providers ahead of a Key Rule Change May Prove Wrong.'' New York Times, November 7, 2003, p. 3.

Jackson, Donnny. ''FCC Lowers Nextel's Rebanding Cash.'' Mobile Radio Technology, January 1, 2005, p. 10.

Lippert, Barbara. ''Nextel's Cell Block: 'Done' Campaign Takes a New Tack—but to What End?'' Adweek, September 22, 2003, p. 26.

McMains, Andrew. ''Nextel Bets It 'Done' in 1st Campaign from TBWA\C\D.'' Adweek, September 8, 2003, p. 9.

Moehlenkamp, Kevin. ''The Work.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, November 1, 2003, p. 36.

Reidy, Chris. ''Ad Shop Mullen to Lose Nextel, Its Biggest Client.'' Boston Globe, May 2, 2003, p. E1.

Sabatini, Patricia. ''Nextel Television Commercial Singles Out Pittsburgh.'' Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 24, 2003, p. B1.

Steinberg, Brian. ''The Advertising Report: Spurning Ad-Company Throne for a Comfortable TBWA Home.'' Wall Street Journal, August 3, 2005, p. B3B.

Kevin Teague

SPRINT PCS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the time of this campaign's launch, the Sprint Corporation merged with Nextel to become Sprint Nextel. The essay refers to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

During 2002 competition between wireless-telecommunication providers grew so fierce that the top four were spending $1.5 billion on media outlays, a leap above the $435 million spent in 1999. With more subscribers than AT&T Wireless Services, Inc., Cingular Wireless LLC, or the Sprint PCS Group, Cellco Partnership's Verizon Wireless spent more on advertising than any other American brand. Analysts feared that the industry's competitive pricing and excessive advertising would cripple profitability. Hoping to remain the fourth-largest provider, Sprint PCS retrofitted its network with high-speed data capabilities in 2002 and heralded their improved network with a campaign titled ''Sprint PCS Campaign.''

On June 24, 2002, the San Francisco–based ad agency Publicis & Hal Riney (PHR), a longtime collaborator with Sprint PCS, released the campaign on an estimated $400 million budget across television, radio, print, and in-store promotions. In 1999 PHR had conceived ''Sprint Guy,'' the trench coat–clad actor that became Sprint PCS's widely recognizable spokesperson. ''Sprint PCS Campaign'' continued with the same handsome, witty character played by actor Brian Baker. Cross-promotion with Hollywood served as a major constituent for the campaign. In the movie Men in Black II, released by Sony Pictures Entertainment in July of 2002, Sprint PCS phones were used by the on-screen heroes. In turn, Sprint PCS's 30-second television spot ''MIBII'' showed the Sprint Guy clarifying the words ''trampoline'' and ''tangerines'' for alien worms that had been featured in the movie.

The campaign helped Sprint PCS remain America's fourth-largest wireless provider throughout 2002. Sales for the Sprint Corporation, of which Sprint PCS made up almost half, increased $563 million between 2001 and 2002. Sprint PCS's high ''customer churn rate,'' the industry term referring to customers frequently changing providers, forced the company to cut back 6 percent of its employees and to require nonrefundable deposits for certain wireless customers. Some of the campaign's television spots earned Gold and Silver ADDYs at the American Advertising Awards. The campaign also earned a Silver award at the Design & Art Direction Awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sprint PCS created the nation's first all-digital, fiber-optic network that was void of analog-only calls. Most wireless providers mixed their digital infrastructure with an antiquated analog infrastructure. The older technology was notorious for quickly draining phone batteries, increasing electromagnetic radiation, lacking call security, and usually emitting high static during phone calls. Since 1999 Sprint Guy had served as Sprint PCS's spokesperson, who explained the network's clarity in typically zany commercials. Publicis & Hal Riney (PHR), the agency that created the character, filmed one spot in which Sprint Guy helped a small town where everybody spoke with garbled analog static. In another commercial Sprint Guy aided a woman who, after rushing through long-distance calls on her expensive calling plan, habitually rushed everything else in life.

''It's always had a certain level of absurdity, so over time you always have to look for fresh ways to attack the same problem,'' Mike Mazza, creative director at PHR, told Advertising Age's Creativity. ''Originally, the campaign had a different type of humor. A lot of it was parody; a lot of it was underplayed, and with the exception of one or two spots, it wasn't all that broad. What we've done over time is broaden out the humor, and the more we've done that, the more people are talking about the spots.'' In addition to emphasizing Sprint's clarity, Sprint Guy also explained features such as text messaging and voice mail.

In the summer of 2002 Sprint PCS rolled out its PCS Vision network, which was similar to Verizon's updated broadband network. The retrofitted PCS Vision increased Sprint PCS's bandwidth to allow more callers on its network and 10 times the amount of data throughout it. The updates were necessary for phone features like photo messaging, high-graphic games, sending and receiving E-mail, and downloading music. PHR crafted the ''Sprint PCS Campaign'' to announce the new features, which many executives hoped would bolster Sprint's subscriber base. ''It's a precursor to our upcoming launch of our third-generation network,'' Chip Novick, Sprint PCS's vice president of consumer marketing, explained to Reuters News in regard to the campaign. ''It's really helping people to see that wireless is not just about phone calls anymore and the next trend in wireless is wireless for your eyes as well as for your ears.''

WIRELESS INTERNET

Sprint PCS's improved Third Generation (3G) network that rolled out in 2002 allowed subscribers to access wireless broadband Internet service in most areas that had previously only supported wireless phone service. PC wireless-connection cards were released by Sprint PCS to allow customers to use their laptops to surf the Web faster than the 56 KB-per-second speed of a dial-up connection. Subscribers could also connect to the Internet using Sprint PCS phone Web browsers.

TARGET MARKET

The ''Sprint PCS Campaign'' involved television spots that blended absurd situations and the Sprint Guy's deadpan humor to capture the target market, which, depending on sources, ranged from 18 to 24 years old. In a quarterly survey conducted by Intermedia Advertising Group (an advertising-performance-assessment firm) after the campaign, a spot in which Sprint Guy consoled a group of disgruntled mobile-phone users ranked as the wireless-provider commercial that television watchers found most memorable.

During the campaign, research conducted by Sprint PCS's largest affiliate, Alamosa PCS, discovered that the 18- to 24-year-old age range only constituted 6 percent of the overall market share. The largest consumer base had a median range of 44 years old. During the campaign Alamosa PCS expanded its target market to include 25 to 54 year olds by reducing ''Spring PCS Campaign'' radio spots in the top six youth radio stations and refocusing on talk radio.

With just over 18 million subscribers, Sprint PCS was recognized worldwide as the foremost provider to develop, manage, and implement a nationwide, all-digital wireless network. Sprint PCS appealed to technology enthusiasts looking for mobile phones loaded with extra features. ''We are focusing our marketing on innovation to differentiate from the pack,'' Sprint spokesman Dan Wilinsky stated in a press release. ''You can do more things with your Sprint PCS phone than with any other network.'' The June 2002 campaign aired commercials

THE ''CELL PHONE'' MISNOMER

As mobile telephones grew popular during the 1990s, it became common to call any such phone a ''cell phone.'' This was a misnomer; the word ''cell'' actually referred to the cellular band of radio frequencies partitioned by the Federal Communications Commission. About half of the nation's mobile phones resided within this radio band, whereas the other half operated on the personal communication services (PCS) band. The analogy between FM and AM radio waves was commonly used to explain the PCS and cellular relationship. In 2002 Verizon Wireless was the largest provider operating within the cellular band. Sprint was one of the largest operating within the PCS band.

that featured Sprint PCS phones performing photo messaging and other cutting-edge capabilities. Many of the features were also used by Will Smith and Tommy Lee Jones's characters in Men in Black II, which featured Sprint PCS phones.

COMPETITION

Verizon reigned as America's largest wireless provider in 2002. Besides ranking highest in service quality, Verizon also scored higher in customer satisfaction than any of its six closest competitors. Similar to Sprint PCS, Verizon used C.D.M.A. (Code Division Multiple Access), a technology developed by Qualcomm Incorporated, to increase network bandwidth and subsequently handle more phone traffic in 2002. Verizon network updates rolled out months before Sprint's PCS Vision did, so Verizon preceded Sprint PCS to the market with such services as high-speed wireless Internet. To maintain its lead in service quality, Verizon spent $1 billion every three months just to improve its network. The expensive network meant higher prices for Verizon calling plans, so the provider targeted consumers who would pay for the better service. Verizon also used actor Paul Marcarelli to play Test Man, a nerdy version of the Sprint Guy, in more than 100 television spots. By 2003 Verizon was spending $700 to $800 million on direct-mail and in-store promotions, making it the greatest advertising spender out of all American brands.

In contrast to Verizon's pitch to higher-paying consumers, AT&T, the third-largest wireless-service provider, advertised its lower-cost calling plans with features such as rollover minutes and anytime minutes. In 2002 the corporation launched its enigmatic ''mLife'' campaign, which ran into early trouble after consumers confused it with MetLife Insurance.

Fifth largest in the nation, Nextel Communications, Inc., was distinguished by its walkie-talkie feature called ''push-to-talk,'' which was widely used by construction crews, technicians, and government agencies. ''Push-to-talk'' worked nationwide and allowed callers to communicate faster and cheaper than with traditional wireless calls, but it only permitted one caller to talk at a time. To promote the service's efficiency, Nextel spent $200 million on its ''Nextel. Done.'' campaign in 2003.

MARKETING STRATEGY

During the rush in 2002 to bring broadband features to wireless-phone subscribers, Sprint PCS placed a large portion of its operating budget into transforming its Second Generation (2G) network—which supported digital voice calls, text messaging, and voice mail—into a Third Generation (3G) network that boasted photo messaging, music downloads, rapid Web browsing, and color-graphic games. ''Our customers tell us they're ready for a wireless device that does more than make a phone call,'' William T. Esrey, chairman and chief executive officer of Sprint, told the PR Newswire. On June 24, 2004, Sprint PCS released the ''Sprint PCS Campaign'' across television, radio, print, and in-store promotions to herald its network's upcoming features.

Sprint Guy starred in the television spots just as in previous commercials, but PHR broadened the humor. Past spots had used humor specific to phone technology, such as a town whose speech was troubled with analog static or people confused by roaming fees. The newer ''Sprint PCS campaign'' usually depicted characters misunderstanding words over the phone, resulting in ridiculous scenarios such as cowboys herding dachshunds and a soap-opera star invading suburban homes.

The campaign also tied in with the summer blockbuster Men in Black II, starring Tommy Lee Jones and Will Smith. Sprint PCS subscribers could enter contests for free tickets, and their phones were capable of downloading images and songs from the movie. In turn, Sprint PCS phones assisted the movie's protagonists, two government agents who monitored aliens living on earth. ''The agents use many wireless applications—digital imaging, voice command, wireless Internet access, phone calls and more to accomplish their mission,'' Novick told the Kansas City Star. ''The wireless applications . . . form a bit of a precursor to how people will be able to do more with the launch of 3G.''

Men in Black II attracted more than $35 million from other brands hoping to tie their product in, including Burger King, Mercedes-Benz, Mountain Dew, RayBan, and Hamilton Watches. The original Men in Black movie grossed more than any other movie in 1997. The saturation of product placement in its sequel, however, drew criticism from movie critics. Novick of Sprint PCS disagreed. "It's a naturally organic integration and not one directed by the company, rather one that fit with the story line and the plot of the movie," he told the Kansas City Star. "The last thing we'd want . . . is for the interaction to be forced."

PHR also created a spot, "MIBII," in which Sprint Guy clarified the words "trampoline" and "tangerines" for alien worms from the movie. One campaign spot that deviated from the themes of Men in Black II and word confusion was titled "Microwaveable Burrito." It featured a woman standing inside a mini-mart, who said into her Sprint PCS phone, "You're not going to believe what I'm looking at. I can't even tell you." Sprint Guy appeared to explain, "You don't have to tell her, you can show her." Sprint Guy then photo-messaged what the woman found so astonishing: the Las Vegas entertainers Siegfried and Roy microwaving a burrito.

Some analysts criticized the lackluster quality of the campaign's print ads. A critic for Adweek stated, "The idea behind humorous Sprint PCS work—trench-coated spokesman clarifies absurd miscommunications caused by static—may be four years old, but writing keeps jokes fresh. Sprint print [is] surprisingly bland by comparison."

OUTCOME

Sprint PCS composed almost 50 percent of its parent company, Sprint Corp., which posted a $563 million sales increase for 2002. Unfortunately, Sprint PCS's high customer churn rate during 2002 forced a 6 percent cutback in workforce and a reduction of early subscriber growth forecasts. For many providers fervent competition became the industry's most destructive force. "The competition is out of control. Irrational competition in the industry will almost preclude anybody from operating profitably," Gary Stibel, founder and principal of the marketing-consulting firm New England Consulting Group, told Advertising Age.

Sprint did maintain its position as the fourth-largest wireless provider, and the campaign continued branding the service in conjunction with voice clarity and a broad set of features. Besides the campaign's bottom-line success, more than one television spot earned a Gold and Silver ADDY at the American Advertising Awards. Jim Hanas of Advertising Age's Creativity wrote, "One of the more unexpected successes of the season has been Publicis & Hal Riney's Sprint PCS campaign . . . The campaign isn't so well respected domestically, because, frankly, it started out so bad. But it's gotten better as the misunderstandings that Sprint claims to prevent have gotten more absurd." The campaign also earned a Silver Award at the Design & Art Direction Awards, an international competition based in the United Kingdom.

FURTHER READING

Brune Mathis, Karen. "In the Pipeline." (Jacksonville) Florida Times-Union, March 11, 2002, p. FB-14.

Cox, Jonathan. "Have We Got a Deal for You." Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, November 22, 2002, p. D1.

Cuneo, Alice. "Cell Giants Plot $1.5B Ad Bonanza; New FCC Rules Spark Battle to Entice Rivals' Customers." Advertising Age October 6, 2003, p. 1.

———. "Sprint Consolidates." Advertising Age, March 8, 2004, p. 49.

Davies, Jennifer. "Where Do Films Start, Ads Stop?" San Diego Union-Tribune, August 3, 2002, p. C1.

Hanas, Jim. "Other Spots to Watch." Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2003, p. 24.

Laughlin, Kirk. "Desperate to Be Different." America's Network, December 1, 2002, p. 26.

Mazza, Mike. "Special Report: Creative Directors." Advertising Age's Creativity, March 1, 2002, p. 38.

Meyer, Dan. "Carriers Wary of Wi-Fi Hype, but Invest Nevertheless." RCR Wireless News, November 25, 2002, p. 8.

Muraskin, Ellen. "Multimodality Starts Walking and Talking." Communications Convergence, December 1, 2002, p. 18.

Myers, George, Jr. "Tech the Halls for the Holidays." Columbus (OH) Dispatch, November 15, 2002, p. 16.

Noguchi, Yuki. "Cell Phone Carrier Switches May Encounter Hang-Ups." Washington Post, November 19, 2003, p. E01.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Riney's Rebounder: Can Kirk Souder 'Rediscover the Greatness' of the San Francisco Shop?" Adweek, August 18, 2003, p. 20.

Rose, Marla Matzer. " 'MiB2' Lines Up Promo Partners." Hollywood Reporter, February 4, 2002, p. 1.

Kevin Teague

Stanley Steemer International, Inc.

5500 Stanley Steemer Parkway
Dublin, Ohio 43016
USA
Telephone: (614) 764-2007
Fax: (614) 764-1506
Web site: www.stanleysteemer.com

■■■

LIVING BRINGS IT IN. WE TAKE IT OUT. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Stanley Steemer International, Inc., a carpet-cleaning service with franchises across the United States, began seeing sales declines in 2002. Wanting to change its marketing profile to address these declines as well as to integrate messages about new services beyond its carpet-cleaning business, the company asked agencies to submit pitches for a new campaign. Young & Laramore, based in Indianapolis, won the account with a proposal to move Stanley Steemer away from its previous positioning as a service to be used only when carpet was visibly stained. The resulting campaign, ''Living Brings It In. We Take It Out,'' aimed to stimulate more frequent use of professional carpet-cleaning services.

With an estimated $20 million budget in its first year, the ''Living Brings It In. We Take It Out'' campaign targeted working women who were homeowners and parents and encouraged them to think about the overwhelming amount of hidden dirt in their homes. Television spots and print ads used humor and imagery that suggested the innocent ways in which adults, their children, and their pets routinely brought dirt from the outside world into their homes. Copy read by voice-over in the TV spots and appearing on the page in the print ads suggested, ''Maybe cleaning your carpets once a year isn't enough.'' The campaign's tagline likewise underscored the ideas of blameless accumulation of dirt and the corresponding need for professional service.

Stanley Steemer not only reversed its sales decline during the first 16 months of the campaign but also saw an 11 percent increase, which many observers attributed to the repositioning accomplished by ''Living Brings It In. We Take It Out.'' The campaign won a Gold EFFIE and was extended and adapted to additional Stanley Steemer service offerings in subsequent years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1947, Stanley Steemer grew consistently throughout the second half of the twentieth century to become America's leading professional carpet-cleaning service, with 270 franchises across the country and the best-established brand name in its business category. In 2002, while experiencing some of the first sales declines in its history, Stanley Steemer bolstered its core carpet-cleaning business with new services that included duct cleaning, tile and grout cleaning, and water removal. In July of that year, with an eye toward reviving sales and incorporating these new capabilities into its brand image, Stanley Steemer formally initiated a review of its advertising account. The company invited new agencies as well as its current national and franchise agencies to submit creative and strategic marketing ideas.

A still from Stanley Steemer's "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign. CAMPAIGN CREATED BY YOUNG & LARAMORE. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Stanley Steemer's advertising at both the national and the franchise levels, using the long-running tagline "Tough on dirt, gentle on carpet," had traditionally focused on images of dramatic stains and their removal. At the time of the account review, for instance, a national TV spot featured a young boy jumping on a plastic bottle of chocolate syrup atop a white carpet. Though images of Stanley Steemer employees and equipment easily vanquishing such stains positioned the company as an effective cleaning service, these images also gave the impression that such cleaning was only occasionally and in extreme circumstances truly necessary. The Indianapolis agency Young & Laramore won the Stanley Steemer account in August 2002 thanks to a strategy that effectively challenged this stain-based model for driving business.

TARGET MARKET

Stanley Steemer had long understood that its most consistent customers were women aged 35 to 65 who were married, owned their own homes, and were parents as well as pet owners. In crafting the new campaign, "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out," Young & Laramore used this target market as the starting point, but the agency found in its research that an overlapping group of women served as the most likely pool for generating new and consistent Stanley Steemer business. This group consisted of working women between the ages of 25 and 49 who were homeowners and parents.

These women were extremely busy, Young & Laramore observed, but cared deeply about keeping their homes clean for their families. They had become accustomed, however, perhaps partly because of the carpet-cleaning industry's reliance on stain-based advertising, to presume that they did not need to have their carpets professionally cleaned more than once a year or when there were visible stains. Young & Laramore thus set out to convince these women that their carpets needed regular cleaning, rather than only sporadic cleaning to remove stains. Young & Laramore found that, while 33 percent of its target claimed they had their carpets professionally cleaned once a year, the true figure was actually closer to 9 percent. This figure of 9 percent, however, well eclipsed the percentage of people in the population at large who were conscious of carpet cleaning.

Five stills from Stanley Steemer's "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign. CAMPAIGN CREATED BY YOUNG & LARAMORE. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

COMPETITION

Among Stanley Steemer's national rivals during this time were ServiceMaster Clean and Chem-Dry. These companies operated with the same franchise-based model as Stanley Steemer, but unlike Stanley Steemer they typically advertised primarily on the local and regional levels. Stanley Steemer's national marketing profile, as engineered by its corporate office, was unique in the industry.

ServiceMaster Clean was part of a larger ServiceMaster family of brands that included Terminix, Merry Maids, TruGreen ChemLawn, and a range of other residential and commercial services. The parent company, ServiceMaster, had helped create the practice of outsourcing, the contracting out of labor-intensive services by companies and institutions, when it began partnering with health care and educational facilities to perform janitorial duties in the 1960s. ServiceMaster Clean offered commercial janitorial as well as commercial and residential carpet-cleaning and disaster-recovery services. Though it did not match Stanley Steemer's carpet-cleaning sales volume, it was a larger entity overall, operating a worldwide network of more than 4,500 franchises. While not typically an advertiser on national television, ServiceMaster Clean provided franchisees with already developed ad content ready for placement in local media or for use in a wide range of promotional contexts.

Chem-Dry Cleaning was founded in the 1970s on the strength of a new carbonated solution that allowed carpet to be cleaned by using significantly less water than steam-based systems like those employed by Stanley Steemer and ServiceMaster. The Chem-Dry slogan, "Drier. Cleaner. Healthier," made direct, comparative reference to its competitors, as did virtually all of the company's promotional materials.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Living Brings It In. We Take It Out" was a national television campaign initially consisting of three spots, and there were supporting print, direct-mail, and promotional components. The estimated first-year budget of $20 million represented no significant increase over Stanley Steemer's spending on advertising in a typical year.

In an attempt to motivate more frequent use of the service, however, the new campaign, unlike typical Stanley Steemer advertising, moved away from a stain-centered pitch. Young & Laramore thus sought to convince people that the everyday accumulation of dirt was reason enough to have carpets professionally cleaned and that keeping carpets clean required more than the once-a-year treatment that had been traditionally recommended. As the campaign's creative director, Carolyn Hadlock, told Shoot, "It's really not about seeing dirt on the carpet . . . It's more the Hitchcock approach of letting somebody imagine what's there." While trying to persuade consumers that their homes were dirtier than popularly acknowledged, Young & Laramore wanted to avoid turning its Stanley Steemer pitch into a guilt trip. It was necessary therefore to introduce humor and sympathy into the individual ads of the campaign and to make the central issue one of raising awareness rather than suggesting that the target market's cleaning practices were deficient. Though the pitch did not specify reasons for choosing Stanley Steemer over its competitors, Young & Laramore was counting on the logic that, as the market leader, Stanley Steemer would be the principal beneficiary of an industry-wide increase in sales volume.

The TV spots thus used everyday scenarios that humorously emphasized the impossibility of living without accumulating unseen dirt in a home. In one spot, for instance, a woman speed walking in a normal suburban neighborhood was shown to be unconsciously traversing a veritable obstacle course of filth; she traveled through water, packed dirt, and a steaming construction area and along a trash-strewn commercial strip before entering her otherwise well-maintained house without wiping her feet. In another spot a young boy was shown pulling his backpack through a milk-splattered school cafeteria and across long stretches of puddle-dotted asphalt and billowing dirt and then using the bag as a footstool to help him reach a drinking fountain before casually dragging it into his house and up the carpeted stairs to his room. The third spot in the first year of the campaign compressed a small house dog's daily routine into 30 seconds, showing its numerous and varied missions outdoors from a vantage point at eye level with the home's dog door. The action in each spot ran against a sound track of lighthearted, propulsive music, with the only commentary coming at the end when a gentle female voice-over suggested, "Maybe having your carpet cleaned once a year isn't enough." The voice-over then intoned the tagline, "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out," which also appeared as text on the screen.

The direct-mail and newspaper components of the "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out" campaign, which appeared in all Stanley Steemer markets in 2003, typically included coupons for special rates on multiple room cleanings. Print ads in targeted consumer magazines conformed to the message and imagery of the TV spots. The "Dog Door" spot, for example, had a print companion that showed a still of the terrier's head poking through the dog door to inspect a soiled toy, with the text spelling out the message that had been dramatized in real time on television: "1 terrier. 37 daily round trips. 2 dozen 'gifts.' Maybe having your carpet cleaned once a year isn't enough." Another print ad consisted of a cropped photo of a woman's legs as she stood on the wet pavement of a service station while filling her car with gas. The copy read, "1/2 gallon of gas. 44 ounces of slurpo. 3/4 quart of anti-freeze. Maybe having your carpet cleaned once a year isn't enough."

STEAMER/STEEMER

The Stanley Steamer was a steam-powered automobile invented by Francis Edgar Stanley and variously called "the locomotive of the highway" and "the flying teapot." First manufactured in 1897, the Stanley Steamer was the fastest automobile of its time, setting a land speed record of 127.7 mph in 1906. Production boomed in the early 1900s, but as improvements in the design of the internal-combustion engine made it a far more practical machine, steam automobiles became obsolete, and the last Stanley Steamers were produced in the mid-1920s. When, in 1947, Jack Bates, the founder of Stanley Steemer International, Inc., began using steam-powered vacuums to clean carpets, he was reminded of the Stanley Steamer automobile. He liked the name and made it his company's own with a strange, albeit slight, alteration in spelling.

OUTCOME

Without increasing its advertising budget, Stanley Steemer saw an 11 percent increase in sales over the first 16 months of the "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out" campaign. Young & Laramore, as well as industry analysts, took this as clear evidence of the effectiveness of the strategy and the message of the advertising. In recognition of the campaign's perceived effect on sales, the New York American Marketing Association presented "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out" with a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005 in the Household Supplies and Services category.

The success of the campaign during its first year translated into an extension of the tagline and theme in 2004, as print ads continued to push the notion that daily life itself was enough to warrant the intervention of cleaning professionals. For instance, one ad showing a young girl with dirty bare feet on a park swing featured copy that read, ''1 certified tomboy, 10 little piggies, 93 days of summer,'' along with the tagline and the exhortation to more frequent carpet cleaning: ''Maybe having your carpet cleaned once a year isn't enough.'' Another ad showed a foot-level, under-the-table view of two parents' shoes amid the food-strewn tile floor below an infant's high chair. Pitching one of the new Stanley Steemer services that the company had begun introducing in 2002, the copy read, ''Life goes on. Most days it goes on your tile and grout,'' while also including the ''Living Brings It In. We Take It Out'' tagline. Meanwhile, television spots in 2004 applied the campaign's theme to the company's Emergency Water Damage Service. Among the most popular spots that year was ''Dishwasher,'' which followed the second-by-second progress of an overflowing dishwasher and of the water inching its way toward the carpet in an adjacent room. Text reading ''Not all floods make the national news'' appeared on the screen, followed by the ''Living Brings It In. We Take It Out'' tagline.

The Stanley Steemer campaign was credited with hastening the death of stain-based advertising in the carpet-cleaning industry and for thereby altering the playing field within the business category as a whole. The strategy of encouraging target consumers to think of Stanley Steemer as part of a regular household cleaning routine remained in place in subsequent advertising.

FURTHER READING

Bittar, Christine. ''Stanley Steemer Comes Clean about Life's Dirt.'' Brandweek, March 17, 2003.

Gaylin, Alison Sloane. ''Young and Laramore.'' Shoot, July 5, 2004.

O'Loughlin, Sandra. ''Stanley Steemer Digs Up Dirt.'' Brandweek, May 3, 2004.

Panczyk, Tania D. ''Dirt Bedevils Homes in Stanley Steemer Ads.'' Adweek, March 17, 2003.

———. ''Stanley Steemer Kicks Off $35 Mil. Review.'' Adweek, July 15, 2002.

———. ''Y & L Sweeps Up Stanley Steemer.'' Adweek (Midwest ed.), September 23, 2002.

''Y & L Calls Stanley Steemer.'' Shoot, June 4, 2004.

Mark Lane

Staples, Inc.

500 Staples Drive
Framingham, Massachusetts 01702
USA
Telephone: (508) 253-5000
Web site: www.staples.com

■■■

THAT WAS EASY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 three retailers, Office Depot, Inc., Staples, Inc., and OfficeMax, Inc., were America's largest office-supply superstores, with Staples trailing closely behind Office Depot, the industry leader. Advertising analysts criticized the trio for not differentiating their brands. Each offered an abundance of office products, furniture, computers, and printing services at competitive prices. All three used humorous ad campaigns during the back-to-school season and targeted small businesses throughout the year. In February 2002 Ron Sargent was appointed as Staples' new chief executive officer. After research revealed that consumers did not want just low prices but also an effortless shopping experience, Sargent had the store layouts changed so that every aisle could be viewed from the main entrance. Printer cartridges were made more accessible. Unpopular items were removed from Staples' inventory to reduce clutter. To herald its more convenient in-store environment, Staples released the "That Was Easy" campaign in 2003.

The $73 million print, online, radio, and television campaign was created by Omnicom's ad agency Martin/Williams of Minneapolis. The first two commercials ran during the CBS program 60 Minutes on March 2, 2003. Both spots exaggerated the frustration some customers experienced at office-supply stores. In one spot, titled "Ink Cartridge Bingo," a frazzled office-supply worker called out printer cartridges as if they were Bingo letter-number combinations. Later spots aired during programs that included the Major League Baseball playoffs, prime-time premieres, Monday Night Football, NFL football games on CBS, and the 2004 Super Bowl. Staples ended its relationship with Martin/Williams in July 2004 but continued using the "That was easy" tagline for later campaigns.

Just days after "That Was Easy" began, Staples posted 2002 fourth-quarter earnings that repositioned Staples as the new industry leader over Office Depot. The campaign's spot "Ink Cartridge Bingo" was awarded Adweek magazine's Best Spot honor in April 2003. The campaign was also credited with boosting sales for Staples' printer cartridges by 14 percent. Additionally, sales for printing services more than doubled during the campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Thomas Stemberg was credited with starting the first office-supply superstore, Staples, in 1986 after realizing that small businesses paid too much for office supplies. Before Staples existed, large businesses could buy discounted office supplies in bulk, but smaller businesses purchased their supplies from small, expensive retailers. The average price for one case of copy paper in 1986 was $65. As a result of the emergence of office-supply superstores, 20 years later the price had dropped to $23.

In 1994 Staples awarded its advertising budget to Cliff Freeman and Partners, an ad agency based in New © NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

York. The agency's long-running campaign, "Yeah, We've Got That," which promoted the breadth of Staples' merchandise selection, became insignificant after OfficeMax and Office Depot boasted a similar selection. Staples' sales slowed from 2000 to 2001. Not only had the waning economy affected the retailer, but customers were also complaining about the stores' confusing merchandise layouts.

When longtime Staples executive Ron Sargent replaced founder Stemberg as CEO in 2002, employees were already aware of the new CEO's modesty. Even after the promotion, Sargent commuted to work every day in an older Toyota Corolla. Two months later the company's advertising account was reassigned to Martin/Williams. Hoping to take the industry's lead position away from Office Depot, Staples conducted a survey to identify what its own stores were lacking. The survey revealed that the main reason customers chose an office-supply store was not price or selection but in-store convenience.

Staples replaced 700 of its low-end items, such as $9 paper shredders and vegetable-shaped pens, with products more suitable for small businesses. After the survey revealed that convenience outweighed selection in the minds of consumers, newer Staples outlets were opened with less space and fewer items. The aisles were repositioned so that customers could view the entire store from the entrance. In early 2003 Martin/Williams developed the tagline "That was easy" to herald the new store format.

TARGET MARKET

Prior to the "That Was Easy" campaign, marketing analysts criticized Staples for catering to the "casual customer" with cheap, eccentric items such as glitter markers and glow-in-the-dark magnets. "Casual customers" were infrequent buyers who added little to Staples' bottom line. After the 2002 Staples survey revealed that small businesses spending at least $500 annually on office supplies accounted for 90 percent of Staple's profits, Martin/Williams created "That Was Easy" to target small business customers. The survey also revealed that price was not the main impetus behind what office-supply stores small businesses chose; customers simply expected Staples, OfficeMax, and Office Depot to offer the same low prices. In a 2002 earnings conference call Sargent explained the needs of small businesses to investors. "...[W]e asked the customer[s] what they thought and what they needed. What we found out . . . is that customers wanted us to be in stock," he said. "They wanted to us have helpful associates. They wanted to us have quick checkout. If they had a problem, they wanted it fixed easily."

One of the campaign's first commercials, "Ink Cartridge Bingo," showed small-business customers waiting impatiently for printer cartridges. The spot was derived from customer feedback. "Based on customer research, 84 percent of small businesses surveyed said a critical aspect of shopping for office products is having the toner or ink cartridge they need in stock," Shira Goodman, executive vice president of marketing at Staples, said in a Business Wire press release.

NOT THAT EASY

One month after the office-supply chain Staples released its "That Was Easy" campaign in 2003, the Idaho-based office-supply company Boise Cascade filed a lawsuit against Staples. Executives at Boise Cascade claimed that Staples was unfairly capitalizing on its older slogan, "Boise. It couldn't be easier."

In August 2003 and again in July 2004, the campaign's target market was expanded to include the parents of children returning to school. One humorous spot featured a father interacting with a cardboard cutout of his wife at his daughter's soccer game. The mother's absence was attributed to her having to wade through school supplies at a non-Staples office-supply store. Goodman explained in the press release, "Our customers have told us they are time starved. We've responded this back-to-school season by making it easy for them to get the supplies they need quickly."

COMPETITION

OfficeMax's successful "What's Your Thing?" campaign, which began in December 2003 with a 60-second commercial sharing the campaign's title, featured a lively character called Rubberband Man delivering office supplies inside an office building. In the spot the Afro-sporting character danced to the 1970s Spinners hit "Rubberband Man" while tossing office supplies to employees and pushing an OfficeMax cart. The spot proved so successful that it was parodied on NBC's The Tonight Show and was even nominated for a 2004 Emmy within the "Outstanding Commercial" category. Omnicom Group's ad agency DDB Chicago created the campaign with an annual budget of $49 million, helping OfficeMax remain third-largest in the office-supply industry. OfficeMax posted $4.7 billion in sales for 2003. In comparison, Staples posted $11.6 billion in sales that year.

The campaign initially targeted businesses, but after the Rubberband Man character, played by Eddie Steeples, resonated so well with other demographics, further spots promoted back-to-school supplies. "The first 'Rubberband Man' ad established OfficeMax as the best source for business office supplies. These new spots show that OfficeMax is the best place to go for back-to-school shopping because we have a large selection year-round," Dave Goudge, executive vice president of marketing at OfficeMax, said in a PR Newswire press release. "The 'Rubberband Man' appeals to kids, teens, college students and parents, giving us a perfect opportunity to make our point in a highly memorable way."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The $73 million Staples campaign's first two commercials aired during the CBS program 60 Minutes on March 2, 2003. Both spots depicted customers who were frustrated with non-Staples office-supply stores. "Our new work for Staples takes an experience that every small business person can relate to and exaggerates it," John Karlson, senior vice president of strategic development for Martin/Williams, said in a Business Wire press release. "It's humorous and memorable, and it differentiates Staples as a brand that makes life easier, saves time, and delivers products consumers need and trust."

One of the first commercials, "Meeting Paper Shuffle," touted Staple's improved three-step printing and photocopying service. The spot began with a business presentation that suddenly went awry due to grossly misprinted handouts. "Before we start, if everyone could move page 15 up two pages," one executive apologetically said. "And if your page 5 in the deck is fuzzy, just pass it down." The camera revealed page 8 to be a misplaced invitation to a luau. "Page 8 . . . just remove it," the executive said. The commercials' voice-over explained, "Unprofessional documents lead to messy meetings. But at Staples, you'll get professional copying and printing."

The campaign's commercials dropped Staples' previous closer, in which a stapler stapled around the corporate logo. Instead Martin/Williams ended "That Was Easy" spots with images pertinent to the service advertised. "Meeting Paper Shuffle" concluded with the Staples logo being scanned inside a photocopier. The campaign's other debut spot, "Ink Cartridge Bingo," which promoted Staples' commitment to a wide selection of printer cartridges, ended with the Staples logo emerging from a printer.

The campaign suggested that Staples did not offer just office supplies but also competent service and advice. "Our new tagline, 'Staples. That was easy' goes far beyond an advertising campaign," Goodman said in the Business Wire. "It represents a fundamental shift in our approach to selling office products. It is evolving the Staples brand and guiding every business decision that takes place at the company."

In August 2003 Staples modified the display of its school supplies much as it had done its office products. "Grab and Go" bins with essential school supplies were placed near the stores' entrances. Each store was stocked with ample amounts of filler paper, pencils, and folders to ensure that parents could get everything they needed in one trip. One back-to-school commercial featured a

A PAPER CLIP IS A PAPER CLIP

Competitive pricing between America's largest office-supply chains, Staples, OfficeMax, and Office Depot, was credited with lowering the nationwide cost of office supplies. Kurt Barnard, president of Barnard's Retail Consulting Group, explained to the Providence Journal Bulletin that the stores did this by treating office supplies as commodities. "A paper clip is a paper clip is a paper clip is a paper clip," Bernard said. "It doesn't matter where you buy it. It doesn't come with aroma. It doesn't come in flavors. It's like selling pork bellies."

father interacting with a cutout version of his wife at their daughter's soccer game. It ended with the tagline "Back to school shopping at Staples. That was easy." The spot implied that, by shopping for school supplies at Staples, parents could spend more time with their children.

In 2004 Staples also spent $2.25 million to air its first Super Bowl spot. The commercial featured a mean-spirited distributor of office-supplies making his employees provide him candy before he would issue supplies. The commercial concluded with the modified tagline "Staples. That was easy," and targeted a broader audience of consumers that did not typically watch television.

OUTCOME

In July 2004 Staples ended its relationship with Martin/Williams, citing "creative differences," and instead awarded its advertising account to McCann-Erickson New York. The new agency continued using "That was easy" as a tagline but introduced the "Easy Button" campaign, which referred to a device that solved life's problem in the same way that Staples solved office-supply problems. Despite the fact that the Martin/Williams campaign had lasted for only two years, it helped Staples outpace Office Depot from late 2002 to 2004. Adweek magazine named the commercial "Ink Cartridge Bingo" a Best Spot of April 2003, commenting, "It's a clever way to promote a dull and frustrating product." Sales of Staples' printer cartridges increased by 14 percent during the breadth of the campaign, and the company's printing-services business more than doubled.

Advertising critics and Staples executives, including Staples' CEO Ron Sargent, initially praised Martin/Williams for reflecting in-store changes so succinctly in the campaign's message. The tagline "That was easy," however, was soon criticized. In late 2003 the Dow Jones News Service released results from a survey that determined which corporate slogans were most recognized by the American public. Out of the survey's 1,021 respondents, not one correctly identified Staples with "That was easy." Nonetheless, Staples executives considered the slogan worthwhile and continued using it after parting with Martin/Williams.

FURTHER READING

Adams, Steve. "Easy Does It: Staples Sued over Phrase." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, April 16, 2003, p. 36.

Arndorfer, James B. "Stretching into an Icon." Advertising Age, May 31, 2004, p. 3.

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Martin/Williams 'Easy' Approach to Ads Pays Off." B to B, March 8, 2004, p. 28.

Cardona, Mercedes M. "Staples' Holiday Wish List: Humor." Advertising Age, July 19, 2004, p. 8.

Conklin, Melanie. "Pressing People's Buttons." Madison (WI) Capital Times/Wisconsin State Journal, November 20, 2005, p. A2.

Deutsch, Claudia H. "Big Office Supply Retailers Try to Build a Smaller Box." New York Times, August 12, 2004, p. 1.

Eckelbecker, Lisa. "Staples Is Now World Leader." Worcester (MA) Telegram & Gazette, March 6, 2003, p. E1.

Elliott, Stuart. "ING Retires Fresh Thinking to Focus on the Simpler Life." New York Times, January 12, 2006, p. 4.

———. "Staples Is Changing Its Slogan to Stress the Ease of Shopping for Office Supplies in Its Stores." New York Times, February 27, 2003, p. 6.

———. "Staples Plans to Replace Martin/Williams." New York Times, May 3, 2004, p. 8.

Gatlin, Greg. "Staples Rethinks, then Resurges." Boston Herald, April 24, 2003, p. H13.

Hanrahan, Tim. "When Worlds Collide." Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2003, p. R1.

Lee, Thomas. "It's An Ad, Ad, Ad, Ad World." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 26, 2004, p. A1.

Randy, Ray. "Is It Mainly Because of the Tag Line?" Toronto (Ontario) Globe and Mail, November 7, 2003, p. B11.

Vranica, Suzanne. "The Advertising Report: 'RubberBand Man' Breathes New Life into OfficeMax." Wall Street Journal, August 11, 2004, p. B5.

Williams, Helaine R. "Let's Talk Wanted: Big Button to Make Life Easier." Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, October 16, 2005, p. 61.

Kevin Teague

YEAH, WE'VE GOT THAT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Staples, Inc., was one of three office-supply-superstore chains to emerge in the 1980s, each vying to differentiate itself from the others. In 1994 Staples launched its first full-fledged television campaign, airing a pair of 30-second spots produced by its new ad agency, Cliff Freeman & Partners, New York. Targeting people who worked at home, the spots used the tagline "Yeah, We've Got That," a phrase that expressed the breadth of products a Staples superstore had to offer. In 1997 Staples would use the tagline as an anchor for a national campaign.

The "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign targeted small-business owners but also hoped to appeal to general consumers, such as parents shopping for school supplies. While the campaign included radio spots, it was primarily a television campaign. The humorous TV spots attempted to use real-life situations to appeal to their audience. Perhaps the most popular of all the commercials was the back-to-school spot that featured upbeat parents, dour children, and the song "It's the Most Wonderful Time of the Year" playing in the background.

The "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign ran for eight years. It won several advertising awards and played a major role in driving Staples' sales beyond the $10 billion mark. A change in management and a desire to reposition the brand led to the departure of Cliff Freeman and the introduction of a fresh marketing campaign in 2002.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Staples was the original office-supply superstore in the United States. It opened its first store in 1986 and grew rapidly, by the end of 1996 operating about 600 stores throughout the United States and Canada. It also had 40 stores in the United Kingdom and 16 in Germany. Depending on the location and the services they offered, the North American stores were called Staples, Staples Express, Business Depot, or Bureau En Gros. In 1997 Staples had the second-largest market share in the United States, behind Office Depot but ahead of OfficeMax, and was the largest operator of office superstores in the world.

Staples filled a market need by providing office supplies, furniture, computer hardware and software, and related items for small businesses at the same substantial discounts previously available only to large corporations. In addition, it offered Staples Direct delivery service, a mail-order business, and contract stationer operations called Staples Business Advantage and Staples National Advantage, which mainly served large companies.

TARGET MARKET

Most people who shopped at Staples fell into one of three categories. The company's primary customers were from 27 to 54 years old and owned small businesses, with many having home offices. Staples estimated that it had 3.5 million customers in this category. "We mostly target the small-business customer, because that's really what Staples is all about. We're sort of the champion of the small-business person," said Dwight Garland,vice president of retail advertising. Staples calculated that small businesses were growing at four times the rate of large businesses and that half the households in the United States would have home offices by the year 2000. Other people shopped at Staples for items such as school supplies for their children. These customers created a strong seasonal market for certain products. In addition, the company's contract and commercial division served large regional and national businesses. These three categories left ample room for growth in the office-supply business. The company noted in its annual report that the U.S. office-products market was estimated at $205 billion and was increasing by 10 percent each year.

The primary target of the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign was small businesses and individual consumers. "The idea is to engage these targeted customers by touching on real-life situations," Garland explained. The commercials conveyed the message that Staples understood its customers, and the use of gentle humor worked to create a friendly, helpful image for the company. The stores offered a wide variety of products to help customers organize and streamline their businesses and work, and the prices were typically lower than those of most competitors, an important selling point for owners of small enterprises. Some Staples locations also featured Federal Express shipping stations, photocopy centers with printing capabilities, and bindery equipment, thus providing one-stop convenience. "It comes back to the mission of finding ways to cut the prices and hassles for our customers," said Garland.

HUMOR SELLS

Cliff Freeman & Partners, the ad agency that developed the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign for Staples, was known for its use of offbeat humor. The agency had done a campaign for the Little Caesar pizza chain in which a cartoon Caesar cheerfully said, "Pizza! Pizza!" According to a survey by the Wall Street Journal, that campaign was the best remembered and most popular in the United States in 1992. The agency also created a well-known campaign for Wendy's in which a woman examining a competitor's hamburger demanded, "Where's the beef?" In addition, the agency developed the "Sometimes You Feel like a Nut, Sometimes You Don't" campaign for Mounds and Almond Joy candy bars and the "Get the Sensation" campaign for York peppermint patties. The agency's chairman and chief creative officer, Cliff Freeman, had won 22 Clio Awards for excellence in advertising, including three awards for the best campaign of the year.

COMPETITION

According to Time magazine, when the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign began, Office Depot was the number one office-supply superstore in North America, with about 6 percent of the market, and OfficeMax was third, with about 3 percent. Staples was second, with 4 percent of the $92 billion retail market and 2 percent of the $63 billion contract and commercial market. There also were numerous independent office-supply stores and retail outlets that sold computers and other office machines. In addition, large chains such as Wal-Mart sold office supplies, business machines, furniture, and related products.

During 1997 Office Depot ran a marketing campaign that featured the popular comic-strip character Dilbert, known for his wry observations on the absurdities of office life. The tagline was "Business Is Crazy, but Office Depot Makes Sense." USA Today's Ad Track found that the ads were slightly less popular than the average campaign surveyed, with 7 percent of women and 14 percent of men saying that they disliked the commercials. Office Depot maintained that its research indicated that the Dilbert commercials were popular with its target market and that they had increased brand awareness for the company. Nevertheless, in 1999 it shelved Dilbert, concluding that the popular cartoon character overshadowed the brand and did not produce the desired results.

OfficeMax was founded later than Staples and Office Depot, but it enjoyed a strong run in the first half of the 1990s. Although by 1995 it ranked second behind Office Depot, it was soon eclipsed by Staples and relegated to the number three position in the office-superstore category. Not until the first decade of the new millennium did OfficeMax begin to develop its own brand identity, aided in large part by the creation of its Rubberband Man character, who served to anchor its marketing efforts.

MARKETING STRATEGY

With its "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, Staples focused on customers who owned small businesses. During 1997 the commercials placed new emphasis on the fact that Staples offered low prices as part of its basic mission. Since the campaign's inception in 1994, there had been slight variations in the message and target audience for some of the advertisements, but the general concept had remained the same. Garland explained that the commercials were developed with a clear goal—to create an image for the company. When customers laughed at an advertisement, they would be apt to make an association with Staples and expect to find a friendly attitude there. The slogan "Yeah, We've Got That" at the end of each commercial referred especially to the company's wide selection of merchandise and attention to customer service. "Cliff Freeman came up with that tag line, and we still use it today," Garland said. "We've done research in many markets, and people remember it." The tagline was mentioned at the end of every broadcast spot but was used in only a few print ads, because its effectiveness depended to a large extent on voice inflection and facial expression. Garland said that customers also tended to comment on the sequence at the end of the commercials, in which a "kchink, kchink, kchink" sound accompanied the visual of a stapler spelling out "Staples."

The company's broader marketing plan included circulars, direct mailings, catalogs sent to customers, and other promotions in print media, but the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign was developed for television. In addition, a few of the spots with the most focused messages were broadcast via radio. The promotions in print media gave details about the company's products, services, and prices. In contrast, the television commercials were intended to make the public aware of Staples in general. "TV is the best vehicle to generate awareness, and awareness is a key component of growth," Garland noted. The television commercials supported the print promotions by calling attention to various aspects of Staples. For example, the Staples mail-order catalog figured prominently in the "Intern" spot.

There had been about 40 spots in the campaign since 1994, and a quarter of them ran in 1997, the first year the commercials were seen on national network television. Some spots in the campaign targeted a broad audience, while others, such as "Intern," were aimed at a narrower market. In the "Intern" spot an ambitious office administrator asked a young woman what she was doing. She held up a Staples catalog and explained, "A cost analysis. I think we're spending too much on office supplies." He sent her to polish a refrigerator while he hurried to show the catalog to his boss and underhandedly take credit for the intern's work. As the two men walked past the intern, the boss said, "Oh, I see you've met my daughter." At the end of the commercial appeared the campaign's tagline, "Yeah, We've Got That." Of the 122 advertisements featured in USA Today's Ad Track consumer polls in 1997, the "Intern" spot scored among the most popular.

The first spot developed for the back-to-school season won a Clio Award and was so popular that the company subsequently ran it at the end of every summer. It featured a father, son, and daughter shopping for school supplies at Staples while "It's the Most Wonderful Time of the Year" played in the background. Although the song actually referred to Christmas, the sentiment reflected the father's elation at seeing his children going back to school. The children, however, were glum because their summer vacation was ending. "It touches an emotion everybody feels," said Garland. "This spot really strikes a chord." He added that the commercial was so popular that customers frequently called Staples at other times of the year to find out when it would be aired again. Even as new back-to-school spots were created for the campaign later in the 1990s, Staples continued to mix in this perennially popular commercial.

Later in the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, Staples targeted entrepreneurs with a television spot that featured a businessman standing on a mountain peak. A voice-over declared, "There is a new breed of businessperson who had decided to go it alone." The man then threw his briefcase, tie, jacket, and shoes into the valley below before stepping into an SUV stuffed with Staples office supplies and driving away. Next, a hiker with a shoe imprint on his forehead was shown. "What hit me?" he asked a friend, who replied, "Wingtip." As usual, the spot concluded with the "Yeah, We've Got That" tagline.

OUTCOME

In addition to the Clio and EFFIE awards, over the years the Staples commercials won numerous other advertising honors, including several ADDYs, an ANDY, and a Mercury Award for a radio spot. The "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign was among the five most popular surveyed by USA Today's Ad Track from June 1996 to June 1997. In another USA Today survey in December 1997, the campaign's "Intern" spot received an effectiveness score of 32 percent and a popularity score of 37 percent, the highest of the 122 advertisements studied that year. Only 7 percent of respondents said that they disliked the ads. Almost 45 percent of respondents 30 to 49 years old and 33 percent of respondents 18 to 29 said that they "liked the ads a lot." The campaign was most popular with women, with 35 percent giving it high scores for effectiveness, compared to 28 percent of the men surveyed. "It's been a very successful campaign. On the whole, it's run very smoothly. We know people like the work, because we do a great deal of research," said Garland.

While the "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign drove sales, Staples continued to trail Office Depot. In 2001 Office Depot generated $11 billion in sales, compared to $10.7 billion for Staples. Believing that "Yeah, We've Got That" had run its course, Staples, which had also undergone a change in management, put its advertising account up for review with the intent of repositioning the brand. Cliff Freeman & Partners was invited to defend but chose not to participate in the process. The Minneapolis ad agency Martin/Williams won the business in 2002, and that year it released the first Staples campaign in eight years that did not rely on the "Yeah, We've Got That" tagline.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Staples Issues 'Apologies' in New TV Campaign." Adweek (New England ed.), October 7, 2002, p. 3.

Baumohl, Bernard, John Greenwald, Joseph R. Szczesny, and Adam Zagorin. "March of the Superstores." Time, September 16, 1996.

"The Best Awards: Family Affair Highlights Humor Ploy for Staples." Advertising Age, May 27, 1996.

Brown, Ed. "Why the FTC Needs to Chill." Fortune, April 14, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Staples Nails Office Images." USA Today, June 9, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Ad Review: Office Depot." Advertising Age, August 19, 1996.

"How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

Sampey, Kathleen, and Ann M. Mack. "Staples Shifts Gears." Adweek (western ed.), April 15, 2002, p. 4.

Taylor, Cathy. "For Office Homebodies: Staples TV Spots Target At-Home Workers." Adweek (eastern ed.), April 11, 1994, p. 4.

Susan Risland
Ed Dinger

State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company

One State Farm Plaza
Bloomington, Illinois 61710-0001
USA
Telephone: (309) 766-2311
Fax: (309) 766-3621
Web site: www.statefarm.com

■■■

TRUE STORIES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The leading automobile insurer since World War II, State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company had relied for many years on advertising that took a serious tone and was anchored by its longtime slogan, ''Like a good neighbor, State Farm is there.'' But in the 1990s the industry was turned upside down by direct marketer GEICO, which emerged from obscurity to blanket the television airways with a bevy of humorous commercials promoting the low price of its car insurance, which it was able to offer largely because it did not maintain the extensive agent network of a company such as State Farm. The Progressive Corporation also beefed up its marketing budget to make its own price pitch. State Farm and its closest competitor, Allstate, shied away from the insurance price war that developed, but by the first decade of the new millennium, price had become paramount in the mind of consumers, and State Farm, which had always promoted customer service over price, found itself losing market share. In 2004 State Farm released a new advertising campaign created by ad agency DDB Chicago. Called ''True Stories,'' it made the case that an agent-client relationship was important.

The ''True Stories'' television spots were humorous depictions of unusual ways that actual State Farm agents helped their customers. The agents played themselves, while the customers and supporting cast were portrayed by actors. One spot, for example, concerned a Wisconsin State Farm agent who was also the local diver. When an out-of-town driver accidentally drove his car into a lake, the agent simultaneously settled the claim and salvaged the car. The budget for ''True Stories'' was not made public.

State Farm was pleased enough with the campaign to continue producing new television spots, including one that first aired during the pregame show for the 2006 Super Bowl. State Farm began to reverse the trend of losing market share, and in 2005 the company exceeded its sales quota by a large margin.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since 1971 State Farm had centered its marketing around the slogan ''Like a good neighbor, State Farm is there.'' The advertisements of State Farm and such rivals as Allstate and Nationwide touted their networks of agents and the customer service they provided, while avoiding any mention of price. In the 1990s GEICO, a direct marketer with no agents at all, began to upset the balance of the industry. The broad humor it employed in its commercials was a complete departure from the warm and serious tone adopted by State Farm and the old-guard insurers. More importantly, GEICO and the Progressive Corporation began bombarding the media with advertising that focused solely on price. They had everything to gain by such an approach, and both added market share during the 1990s and into the new century. State Farm, on the other hand, refused to contend for business on those terms, fearful that auto insurance would be reduced to commodity status: a low-profit item, only the cheapest of which customers bought. Instead the company continued to emphasize the level of customer service that its agents provided, maintaining that it warranted the higher costs of its premiums.

Although State Farm maintained it top position in the auto-insurance market, it began to experience erosion in the first years of the new millennium. It enjoyed a 19.3 percent share of the private-passenger auto-insurance market in 2002, but that number dipped to 19 percent in 2003 and continued to decline in 2004. Through their constant advertising GEICO and Progressive had changed the terms of the debate about shopping for auto insurance: price had become paramount, and the value of having a relationship with a agent was relegated to secondary status. In many ways the auto-insurance field was engaged in a battle of business models. Writing for Advertising Age, Mya Frazier reported that the fight was ''pitting the call-center row of headset-wearing operators taking claims and signing on new customers against neighborhood agents who know a customer's kids and may even be a neighbor. It's pitting Internet price quotes vs. in-office consultations and the yearly search for a best price vs. a lifetime relationship with an agent.'' The direct model was enjoying faster growth than the agent-based approach. In an effort to return the focus to service and differentiate between price and value, State Farm in 2004 released its ''True Stories'' campaign, a lighthearted depiction of the lengths to which actual State Farm agents would go in service of their customers. While State Farm did not give in to GEICO and adopt a price message, it did drop its usual serious tone in favor of humor.

A SPECIALIST IN TRUE STORIES

The first television spots in State Farm's ''True Stories'' campaign were directed by Academy Award–winning documentary filmmaker Errol Morris. He received his Oscar in 2004 for The Fog of War, concerning the life of Robert S. McNamara, U.S. secretary of defense during the Vietnam War. Morris's other documentaries included Gates of Heaven, The Thin Blue Line, A Brief History of Time, and Fast, Cheap, and Out of Control.

TARGET MARKET

Auto insurers had to contend with one of the broadest target audiences in all of marketing. The law required every driver to be insured, creating a massive pool of potential clients that encompassed all genders, races, and ages. The younger demographic, however, was more price-conscious and had not grown up with the assumption that one did business with an agent. In fact, many of them preferred not to have a relationship with an agent and were more than willing to switch insurance companies if the price was right. It was the older, less price-sensitive driver who was a more appropriate target for State Farm's ''True Stories.'' Many of these people were already State Farm customers, and the company was eager to keep their business by reminding them of the value of an agent relationship. The campaign also sought to persuade other older drivers of the importance of what State Farm had to offer. At the same time the company was not writing off younger customers. One of the television commercials focused on a young woman who had two accidents within her first hour of having a driver's license. The spot appealed to both young people and parents.

COMPETITION

State Farm's closest rival was Allstate, which had about 10 percent of the auto-insurance market in 2004. Next came Progressive with 7.1 percent and GEICO with 5.5 percent, followed by Farmers Insurance Group, Nationwide Group, United Services Automobile Association Group, American International Group, Liberty Mutual Group, and American Family Insurance Group. Because of GEICO's attention-grabbing advertising and Progressive's willingness to spend exorbitant amounts of money on television advertising, every company in the industry was forced to follow suit. The bulk of the advertisements were price appeals, and even Allstate, which, like State Farm, had always avoided such a message, made a concession to the prevailing trend. Its ''Our Stand'' campaign, featuring actor Dennis Haysbert, who played the U.S. president in the hit television series 24, began in November 2003. It promoted Allstate's good-driver discount and touted statistics showing that people who switched to Allstate saved $200 a year on average.

There was another compelling reason that insurers were padding their marketing budgets in an effort to poach customers from one another: the car-insurance business had become more profitable than ever. Cars were better built and safer. There were fewer accidents caused by mechanical problems, and as a result insurers paid out fewer claims. The U.S. population was also growing older. Older drivers tended to drive slower and more cautiously, again resulting in fewer accidents and claims and greater profits for insurers. Hence, State Farm's eroding market share was costing it a great deal of money. The company wanted not only to hold the line but also to build on its number one position and post even greater profits in the years to come.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The purpose of the "True Stories" campaign was to demonstrate the personal care that State Farm agents offered their customers. The company's advertising agency, DDB Chicago, said that to develop the campaign it had contacted State Farm's 13 regional zones, asking agents to submit actual customer experiences that revealed exceptional and highly unusual service. About 250 agents responded; 15 were determined to be of interest, and of them 6 were chosen to be dramatized. While actors would play most of the roles, the State Farm agents played themselves.

How the agents appeared on film, however, may have played a major part of the selection process. According to About Business, published by the city of Edina, Minnesota, one of the State Farm agents featured in "True Stories," local woman Joan Roisum, was nominated by a State Farm regional vice president. Next she was videotaped to determine if she was photogenic enough for the commercial. According to writer Cheryl Anderson, "She then needed to have a 'true story' to capture the interest of both State Farm and its advertising agency. They called her periodically for a year to ask if she had a story about a particular topic, but her stories had not interested them." Roisum finally caught the agency's attention when she was asked if she had any stories about people who switched from another insurer to State Farm. She told them about a newly married couple with whom she had worked: they had two of everything, including dogs, but the wife was a GEICO customer and the husband a State Farm customer. In the end they kept State Farm. A few weeks later Roisum was in Hollywood to shoot her commercial.

The 30-second television spots were first shown during baseball's World Series, which was telecast on the Fox network on October 23, 2004. Subsequently the commercials aired on major network shows and cable programming. In addition to the general-market spots, the campaign included the creation of single spots aimed at the African-American, Hispanic, and Chinese-American markets (for the latter separate spots were filmed in Cantonese and Mandarin). The spot called "Diver" featured Wisconsin State Farm agent Larry Bitterman, who served an out-of-town State Farm driver whose car had somehow fallen into a lake as a result of a faulty map. Not only did Bitterman settle the claim, but he also helped raise the car from the lake in his capacity as local diver. The "New Driver" spot showed a State Farm agent providing counsel for a San Jose, California, teenager who crashed her car twice in 10 seconds, within 45 minutes of receiving her driver's license. Her tale was interwoven with commentary from her parents and brothers. Other spots included Roisum's newlyweds as well as twin sisters who had accidents in the same intersection. The six agent stories were also fleshed out on the Internet as interactive ads. Radio versions of the television spots were created, and the campaign included a handful of print ads, but television was far and away the main messenger. Although one spot touted State Farm's financial services, the campaign focused on car insurance.

OUTCOME

State Farm considered the "True Stories" campaign a success and continued to air the television spots, along with new executions, into 2006. One of the new spots made its debut during the pregame ceremony of the 2006 Super Bowl. In 2004 State Farm's market share fell further, to 18.2 percent. In the company's annual report chairman and chief executive officer Edward B. Rust, Jr., made note of the poor showing of State Farm's auto division, writing, "Although we wrote 5.6 million auto applications and added more than 375,000 policies and accounts to our total book of business, we fell short of our growth goals in our core auto business. Our toughest competitors increased their share of the auto market—we did not." The situation improved in 2005, however, when State Farm made great strides in reversing the trend. The company set a goal of 400,000 new policies and exceeded that number by 225,000. Consumers surveys conducted after the start of the campaign also revealed significant improvement concerning positive brand image and likelihood for a non–State Farm customer to consider State Farm as an insurer.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Cheryl. "National Television Ad Features True Story of Edina Insurance Agent." About Business, Winter 2006, p. 14.

Cavanaugh, Bonnie Brewer. "Price Wars." Best's Review, October 2005, p. 37.

Dunlap, Bill. "Errol Morris: Reel Life." Shoot, March 25, 2005, p. 27.

Frazier, Mya. "Progressive, Geico Prod Auto Rivals into Price War." Advertising Age, February 28, 2005, p. 4.

Goch, Lynna. "State Farm's Commercials Feature Agents on the Job." Best's Review, December 2004, p. 69.

Lazare, Lewis. "Stunt to Sell Taste if Tasteless." Chicago Sun-Times October 22, 2004.

"State Farm Spots Tell 'True Stories." Adweek (midwest ed.), October 22, 2004.

Waggoner, Judy. "Appleton Insurance Man Stars in TV Ad." Appleton (WI) Post-Crescent, June 13, 2005.

Wasserman, Todd. "Risky Business." Brandweek, November 15, 2004, p. 6.

Ed Dinger

Steelcase, Inc.

901 44th Street, SE
Grand Rapids, Michigan 49508
USA
Telephone: (616) 247-2710
Fax: (616) 475-2270
Web site: www.steelcase.com

■■■

WORK EFFECTIVENESS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The world's leading contract seller of office furniture at the end of the twentieth century, Steelcase, Inc., was closely associated with one of its pioneering products, the Series 9000 Systems Furniture line. Introduced in the 1970s, it became the building block of the modern-day corporate cubicle environment. Steelcase was so closely tied to the cube and its often dehumanizing deployment that the company was stigmatized as being uncreative. Aside from that image, considered unfair by the company, Steelcase had to contend with a corporate mind-set that viewed office furniture as a cost to contain, a necessary but not imperative expense that could be put off during bad times. As a result of this thinking, office furniture competed mostly on the basis of price, and profit margins were trimmed. As the economy stalled at the start of the new century, Steelcase launched the "Work Effectiveness" campaign to recast itself not only as an innovative company offering stylish furniture but also as a corporate partner who could help customers improve the work conditions of employees, thereby increasing productivity and having a positive impact on the bottom line.

The "Work Effectiveness" campaign, developed by Minneapolis-based advertising agency Martin/Williams, focused on two audiences: the traditional target of designers and facility managers along with corporate executives, the decision makers to whom Steelcase wanted to make the pitch that top-of-the-line office furniture not only paid for itself but could make the company money and help in attracting workers. This notion was backed by research Steelcase conducted showing that a good work environment improved employee productivity and could be even more effective in improving profitability than a comparable investment in technology or even research and development. To make its case the campaign offered three ads. To target the conventional audience the ads ran in trade publications, but to reach the corporate suites Steelcase turned to more mainstream business and technology publications, the likes of Forbes and Fortune.

The "Work Effectiveness" campaign succeeded in improving Steelcase's image with designers and facility managers but failed to register with corporate executives. After the tech bubble collapsed and the marketplace was glutted with used furniture, executives, who were themselves tightening their belts, had little incentive to buy new furniture, no matter how good it was. The contract office furniture industry slipped into its worst slump in 50 years. Steelcase was able to maintain its dominant market share, however. The "Work Effectiveness" campaign was honored with a major award, the 2002 Grand CEBA.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

A pioneer in office furniture since 1912, Steelcase was the undisputed global leader in the contract office furniture business at the start of the 2000s, but in some ways it was a victim of its own success. In the early 1970s Steelcase unveiled the Series 9000 Systems Furniture line, introducing white-collar workers around the world to cubes. The functional but hardly aesthetic furniture became ubiquitous in the corporate workplace and made a lot of money for Steelcase over the next 30 years but led to perception problems for the company at the dawn of the new century.

The image of the contract furniture industry was closely tied to cubicles, which as they were assembled into endless bays became a dehumanizing environment that did not engender positive associations. Rather, they became fodder for the Dilbert comic strip, which chronicled the foibles of the modern corporate workaday world. As a result Steelcase, the father of ''Dilbertville,'' was seen as anything but an innovative company. Perhaps of more importance was that office furniture in general had been reduced in the eyes of corporate executives as a mere cost center, an expense to reduce as much as possible, and something that did not make any positive contribution to a business. As long as the economy was strong, companies paid out money for new furniture, but during slumps costs were contained and office furnishings became a vulnerable line in the budget. After a 20-year boom in office furniture sales, Steelcase experienced a slump in the early 1990s. Business picked up as the economy rebounded, then as the economy again faltered in the early 2000s Steelcase once more had to contend with companies cutting back on the purchase of new office furniture. The debate about office furniture rarely ventured beyond the questions of price and efficiency.

In the fall of 2000 Steelcase hired Minneapolis-based advertising agency Martin/Williams, which soon concluded that executives at corporate customers were being shortsighted, a thought supported by extensive studies Steelcase commissioned on the importance of the work environment on white-collar workers. The research indicated that a comfortable, efficient work environment could have a profound effect on productivity and in turn make as great an impact on the bottom line as investments in information technology, research and development, or human capital. In a nutshell people could not concentrate on their work if they were forever adjusting their chair or their lamp, and an uncomfortable setup could tire workers and hinder their effectiveness. Martin/Williams and Steelcase then developed the ''Work Effectiveness'' campaign as a way to change the image of Steelcase and reframe the debate about the importance of office furniture—from cost containment to an investment in productivity.

FURNITURE CITY

Grand Rapids, Michigan, the home of Steelcase, Inc., was founded in 1850. The city became a major lumbering center, so it was no surprise that some of that wood ended up being used to make furniture. The furniture-making industry thrived in Grand Rapids, which would be dubbed Furniture City.

TARGET MARKET

''Work Effectiveness'' was a business-to-business campaign that focused on two audiences. The first was Steelcase's traditional target reached through trade publications: facilities managers, designers, and architects. To these people Steelcase wanted to make the case that it was more than a provider of cubes, that it also sold stylish products that were ergonomic and offered enhanced technology capabilities (such as a computer desk that offered an innovative sheath to house the many computer and telecom cables that created a tangle and bedeviled the modern worker). The second target audience resided in the corporate suites: CEOs, COOs, CFOs, and the like. While the first audience might recommend that a Steelcase product be purchased, it was the second audience that had to be convinced that the corporation would get enough bang for its buck to justify signing off on the request. To them style was nice, but productivity that impacted the balance sheet was what mattered.

COMPETITION

Steelcase was the global leader in its field. Its largest competitors were HNI Corp.; Haworth, Inc.; and Herman Miller, Inc. All of them had traditionally relied on a network of dealers to move their products and limited their advertising budgets to trade publications, but now retailers like OfficeMax and Staples were spending millions on advertising to reach a general audience. According to Rob Kirkbride, writing for the Grand Rapids Press in 2001, this new competition was ''forcing the [contract furniture] companies to reach out to mass markets.'' Steelcase's director of corporate communications, Allan Smith, told Kirkbride that the company recognized that advertising was an incredibly important tool to show corporate decision makers that Steelcase could help them work more effectively. Steelcase was not alone in spending money on more general publications. Herman Miller had recently placed ads in the Wall Street Journal and Adweek. And Haworth had in previous years launched a campaign that included ads in Forbes

WOULD THAT IT WERE METAL

Steelcase, Inc., was founded in 1912 in Grand Rapids, Michigan, as the Metal Office Furniture Company. It fabricated furniture out of sheet metal, the main advantage of which was that it was not flammable. At the time offices were cluttered with wooden furniture and still heated and lit by open flame appliances.

and Fortune as well as television spots. In fact, in 1995 Steelcase had funded a print and television campaign. But times were different now. The economy had slipped into a recession, and although Steelcase maintained that the "Work Effectiveness" campaign was not designed to combat difficult times, it was important that Steelcase stake its claim as a vibrant and innovative company to at least fend off the competition from making inroads into its dominant share of the market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Work Effectiveness" campaign sought to change what the marketers called a category debate, to shift the focus from price and depth of product line to how furniture and workplace design helped people improve their productivity. And as long as corporate decision makers considered office furniture as a cost center, furniture would be lumped into the same category, almost reduced to the status of a commodity, and with that attitude came greater price competition in the marketplace and lower profit margins for Steelcase. Instead the marketers wanted to position Steelcase as a partner, someone who brought more value to a customer than just selling them a desk and chair. Steelcase wanted to portray itself as providing workplace solutions, helping to create environments in which employees could flourish—and ultimately make more money.

The "Work Effectiveness" campaign, limited to the print medium, was launched with a series of three ads. To reach the architects, designers, and facilities managers, the ads were run in trade publications: Architectural Record, Interior Design, and Facility Manager. To catch the attention of corporate executives, Steelcase also advertised in mainstream business publications, including Forbes, Fortune, and the Wall Street Journal as well as Harvard Business Review. In addition it bought ad space in technology-oriented publications, such as Wired, Fast Company, and Metropolis.

The three print ads focused on a particular product design element, and the copy made the case that the product made life easier and improved an employee's overall effectiveness. One of the ads featured a close-up picture of the curved back of the Steelcase Leap Chair. The headline read, "Ergonomic chic." A second ad featured a trash can that hooked beneath the desk surface. The copy read, "Furniture design to make you think better. A built-in trash can in case you don't." The final ad showed a picture of a computer desk that used an S-shaped "spine" that organized computer cables. "It has a spine," read the copy. "Therefore, it must have a brain."

The ads directed readers to the Steelcase website, where more information could be found. For the most part the ads were lean, but in some publications additional information was adjacent to the ad. An example of a page-and-a-third ad, a relatively new concept in print advertising, was the trash can ad supplemented with a sidebar titled "Can a piece of office furniture raise your IQ?" The copy then offered the results of a work environment research study that emphasized the need for a good work environment and made the case that Steelcase designed products with the users' needs and desires in mind, "even with clever details like the trash can attached to the side of the desk."

OUTCOME

Research indicated that the two-year "Work Effectiveness" campaign succeeded in changing the perception of Steelcase among architects, designers, and facility managers, which began to view the company as more innovative than previously thought. But the campaign failed to have any kind of impact on the other target, the executives residing in the corporate suites. The advertising budget was simply too small to have the kind of impact that would dent the perception of this audience, and the ad buys shifted entirely to the trade publications. It was unlikely that given economic conditions any amount of advertising was going to convince executives to buy new office furniture, no matter how stylish and technically advanced. Following the bursting of the technology bubble, a lot of companies folded and their unneeded furniture, churned out by furniture manufacturers during the heady days of the late 1990s, now created a huge aftermarket for office furniture. The question for executives was simple: why buy new when you could buy used—and cheap? As a result the bottom fell out of the contract furniture industry, which experienced the worst slump in half a century, losing about two-thirds of its market. One of the few positives for Steelcase was that its "Work Effectiveness" campaign was effective enough that the company maintained market share under these difficult conditions. Moreover it was able to successfully introduce two new products and a workplace-planning tool.

The "Work Effectiveness" campaign was also a success creatively and was honored by the advertising industry. In 2002 the campaign, beating out 420 competing campaigns, was recognized as the best business-to-business advertising in the United States for that year by the American Business Media when it awarded Martin/Williams the Grand CEBA (Creative Excellence in Business Advertising).

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Martin/Williams Wins Grand CEBA Award." Adweek, October 31, 2003.

———. "M/W Kicks Off Steelcase Work." Adweek, May 28, 2001.

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Martin/Williams 'Easy' Approach to Ads Pays Off." B to B, March 8, 2004, p. 28.

Jensen, Trevor. "Steelcase Seats Martin/Williams." Adweek, August 28, 2000, p. 8.

Kirkbride, Rob. "Office Furniture Firms Using More Mass Market Ads." Grand Rapids Press, July 13, 2001, p. A13.

"Martin/Williams Wins Grand CEBA." B to B, November 11, 2002, p. 2.

"Steelcase, Inc." International Directory of Company Histories, vol. 27. Farmington Hills, Michigan: St. James Press, 1999.

"Steelcase Survey: Comfort + Collaboration = Productivity." Facilities Design & Management, February 2003, p. 13.

Ed Dinger

Suburban Auto Group

36936 Highway 26
Sandy, Oregon 97055
USA
Telephone: (800) 691-4204
Web site: www.suburbanautogroup.com

■■■

TRUNK MONKEY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003 Carlson Chevrolet Co., Inc., a Chevrolet car dealership located in Sandy, Oregon, just a few miles southeast of Portland, represented the Chevrolet-selling half of the Suburban Auto Group. On the other side of U.S. Highway 26 the car dealership Suburban Ford, Inc., represented the Ford-selling half. Nancy Jaksich controlled the Chevrolet dealership, and her husband, Jerry Jaksich, managed Suburban Ford. Compared to other dealerships in Oregon, the Suburban Auto Group was ''not even in the top 10 in terms of money spent on advertising by car dealers in the Portland area,'' reported the Portland Business Journal. Hoping to stand out amongst the clutter of local car dealership advertising, the Suburban Auto Group launched its ''Trunk Monkey'' campaign.

''Trunk Monkey'' was created by the ad agency R/West for less than $50,000. The campaign's first spot, ''Road Rage,'' cost only $3,000 and debuted during the 2003 Super Bowl in the Portland region. The 30-second spot featured a timid man cowering inside his Ford sedan while another man berated him from outside the sedan's driver-side window. When apologies did not placate the raging man outside, the man inside the car pressed a button labeled ''Trunk Monkey.'' Suddenly a chimpanzee wielding a tire iron emerged from his trunk and clobbered the road-raging loudmouth. The Suburban Auto Group's logo then appeared while a voice-over explained, ''The Trunk Monkey. A revolutionary idea you'll find only at Suburban Auto Group—pending approval by the attorney general.'' The campaign featured five more ''Trunk Monkey'' spots and one radio advertisement.

According to one Suburban Auto Group representative, gauging the ''Trunk Monkey'' campaign's effect on car sales was difficult. It received recognition from the ad industry: the campaign earned a silver award at the One Club's 2003 One Show awards in the category of commercials made with less than $50,000. In one period of seven days the Suburban Auto Group's website recorded 3 million downloads of the first commercial.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Nancy Jaksich got into the auto-retail business by selling cars for her father, Pete Carlson, who first owned a Portland used-car lot and later the Carlson's Chevrolet dealership in Sandy, Oregon. Nancy's husband, Jerry Jaksich, had a similar background, having been raised around his uncle's car dealership in Sacramento, California. Nancy and Jerry later worked for Nancy's father at the Carlson's Chevrolet dealership until they opened a Ford dealership in 1984. Sixteen years later Nancy and Jerry purchased her father's Chevy dealership. Nancy ran the dealership, which conducted business as Suburban Chevy, and worked side by side with Jerry's

Suburban Ford dealership, located on the other side of Highway 26. Together they functioned as the Suburban Auto Group.

In 2000 the husband-and-wife partnership hired the Portland ad agency Big Ads, which later changed its name to R/West, to create two television commercials: ''Return Buyer'' and ''Beep Beep.'' The president of Big Ads, Sean Bilxseth, contracted Derek Barnes, a copywriter for the ad agency Wieden + Kennedy, to direct the spots. ''The client was very accommodating creatively,'' Barnes said to Shoot magazine. ''It was a great learning experience.''

In December 2002 the Suburban Auto Group asked R/West ''go out on the edge'' for the next campaign. Jerry and Nancy Jaksich believed that, to compete with the larger advertising budgets of Portland's car dealerships, their commercials needed to be outrageously creative. R/West first proposed a commercial that featured a man about to jump to his death. The suicide would be thwarted by a second man who would feign compassion merely to protect his car parked below. According to the Oregonian, Jerry Jaksich passed on the concept and asked R/West for a wackier and edgier commercial.

The idea for ''Trunk Monkey'' was conceived after R/West creatives pondered the many features available on most new cars. The Oregonian quoted the R/West creative director Hart Rusen, who remembered thinking, ''Wouldn't it be funny to have a feature that addressed some of the other problems of the road?'' The ''Trunk Monkey'' became an all-purpose feature that assisted with ''other problems,'' such as chaperoning, roadside baby delivery, and even road rage.

FAMOUS CHIMP

In 2003 the Suburban Auto Group, which was composed of two Oregon car dealerships, released an advertising campaign titled ''Trunk Monkey.'' The campaign featured a helpful chimpanzee that lived inside the trunks of cars and could be released at the touch of a button. The chimpanzee that played ''Trunk Monkey'' in the first few spots was named Jonah. Jonah, who was paid union wages, was also featured in the 2001 remake of the film Planet of the Apes.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted potential Oregon car buyers with a healthy sense of humor and a penchant for offbeat comedy. Neither R/West nor the Suburban Auto Group foresaw the campaign's later success. Several months after the ''Road Rage'' spot debuted in Oregon, an out-of-state company, the Byers group of auto dealerships, paid $10,000 to use the spot for six months in the central Ohio region. Reporting for the Columbus Dispatch, Barnet D. Wolf wrote that the spot was extremely popular with young professionals. The journalist described his experience of being at a tavern in Easton, Ohio, when the ''Road Rage'' spot played on the bar's television set: the audience grew attentive, and people in the bar stopped talking.

The Chevy and Ford duality of the Suburban Auto Group catered to the loyalties of two distinct customers. The rivalry between Chevy and Ford owners had persisted for decades. For instance, in the mid-1980s an argument about which was better, Ford or Chevy, took place inside a bar in Scio, Oregon. After a man was slapped because of the truck he drove, he walked home and returned with a hunting rifle to murder the man who had struck him. Nancy Jaksich explained to the Oregonian that this rivalry between Ford and Chevy owners had always been good for business.

According to R/West, the humor in the campaign relied on storylines that the audience could readily connect with. ''We've all seen people out there like that,'' Rusen said to the Oregonian. ''We've all seen the guy in the beat-up pickup truck, driving around looking like he wants to kill someone.'' R/West executives believed that if the target found the spots funny, the audience would be more inclined to trust the Suburban Auto Group brand.

COMPETITION

Thomason Auto Group, Portland's largest car dealership, was created by the charismatic Scott Thomason. The company began as one dealership in 1983 and by 1998 had expanded into a chain posting revenues of $550 million. Its founder was credited with changing dealership advertising in the Portland area during the 1990s. Advertising analysts observed that, before the success of Thomason Auto Group, most Portland dealerships advertised low prices and let their car manufacturers advertise the car brands. Thomason Auto Group was the first to advertise the dealership's brand and car prices simultaneously. Until he left Thomason Auto Group in 2003, Scott Thomason starred as the brand's bespectacled mouthpiece in most of the chain's print ads and television spots. He typically made wisecracks such as ''We finance anyone the law allows'' or ''If you don't come see me today, I can't save you any money.'' Explaining his strategy, Scott Thomason said to the Oregonian, ''When customers in my market thought of buying a car, I wanted them to think of Thomason first.''

DOUGHNUT

In a humorous commercial for an advertising campaign titled "Trunk Monkey," a chimpanzee emerged from a car trunk after its owner was pulled over for speeding. When the highway patrol officer asked the driver for "license and registration," the chimpanzee tried bribing the officer with a doughnut. According to the Oregonian, the chimpanzee kept eating the doughnut he was supposed to use for bribing the officer. Handlers for the monkey solved the problem by substituting a plastic doughnut for the real one.

The chain of car dealerships known as Lithia Motors, Inc., based in Medford, Oregon, attributed its success not so much to advertising as to making its dealerships conform to similar standards. Standardizing all Lithia dealerships proved wildly successful. Lithia grew from one dealership in 1946 into a chain of 84 dealerships nationwide that collectively posted revenues of $2.51 billion in 2003. That same year Lithia was acquiring outside dealerships at an average rate of two per month. After an acquisition Lithia typically closed its new dealership for 24 to 48 hours so that a team of 25 to 30 people could redesign it to reflect Lithia's image.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The first "Trunk Monkey" commercial, titled "Road Rage," cost less than $3,000 and was filmed in one day. It debuted in the Portland region during the 2003 Super Bowl. The spot featured a man trapped inside his car with another man screaming at him from the street. "Who do you think you're honking at, huh?" the antagonist yelled. Insults continued until the man inside the car pressed a button labeled "Trunk Monkey" that was located next to the rearview mirror. The car's trunk opened to reveal a chimpanzee armed with a tire iron, who struck the antagonist in the head. The Suburban Auto Group's logo was then displayed while a voice-over explained, "The Trunk Monkey. A revolutionary idea you'll find only at Suburban Auto Group—pending approval by the attorney general."

Speaking with Shoot magazine, Barnes said, "['Road Rage'] was a great script. . . . We shot on the shortest day of the year, sundown was at 4:02 p.m., and we felt under-the-gun. But the chimp, Jonah, was money every time." The spot's greatest expense was hiring the chimpanzee. According to an R/West spokesperson, Jonah required transporting fees, and his handlers needed to be flown from Los Angeles to Portland to film the commercial. To reduce costs some spots were later filmed in Los Angeles. A female chimpanzee named Bella was also used in other spots.

One of the campaign's less violent spots, "Throwing Eggs," began with three boys tossing eggs at a man's car. After the assaulted driver pressed his "Trunk Money" button, a chimpanzee leaped from the trunk and chased the boys. Two of the perpetrators successfully jumped over a fence, but the "Trunk Money" grabbed the third boy by his legs. The spot ended with the Suburban Auto Group's logo and a final shot of the boys cleaning eggs off the man's car. "Two endings were done for that one," Erinn Sowle, the general manager at Suburban Auto Group, said to Ward's Dealer Business. "The one we didn't use simply ended with the kid being dragged down off the fence."

Later commercials included "Pediatric Edition." This 30-second spot featured a pregnant woman in the backseat of a Ford sedan while her husband sped toward a hospital. When the woman screamed that she would not make it to the hospital, the "Trunk Monkey" appeared to help her deliver the baby. Another commercial featured the "Trunk Monkey" theft-retrieval system. After a car thief shattered the passenger-side window of a car, the "Trunk Monkey" emerged from the trunk, accosted the robber, and heaved his body off of a bridge. A less violent spot, titled "Chaperone," began with a teenage girl and her boyfriend parked at a scenic overlook. The girl said, "I can't believe my dad even let us touch his new car." Just as she leaned in for a kiss, a "Trunk Monkey" hiding in the backseat threw a banana peel at the teenage boy's face. Then, after hearing the chimpanzee loudly cock a shotgun, the frightened boy hurried out of car and ran away screaming.

Speaking with the Oregonian, Marian Friestad, a marketing professor at University of Oregon's Lundquist College of Business, explained the risk of using humorous advertising. "Nothing's more irritating or uncomfortable than a bad joke," Friestad said. Also according to Friestad, humor was not a unanimous phenomenon. What one person found funny could be considered offensive by others. "The ads are a big hit here," Sowle of Suburban Auto Group boasted to Ward's Dealer Business, referring to the spot's success in Sandy, Oregon. "People love them. We've had only a couple of complaints. Some thought 'Road Rage' was too violent."

OUTCOME

Many other car dealerships paid for syndicated use of the spots, and some advertising analysts noted that this fact alone was a measure of the success of the "Trunk

Monkey'' campaign. The commercials aired just as they were used originally, but with other dealerships' logos and voice-overs at the end. By 2004 ''Trunk Monkey'' spots were syndicated across 31 markets in the United States, Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand. R/West and the Suburban Auto Group divided the syndication profits, helping the Suburban Auto Group offset the original cost of the campaign. The campaign's effect on car sales, however, was more difficult to measure. ''It's hard to quantify how many actual sales are a result of the ads,'' Sowle told Ward's Dealer Business. ''They're not your standard call-to-action dealership ads. But they've given us a lot of name recognition.''

The ad industry first took notice of ''Trunk Monkey'' after Shoot, a publication focused on advertising, listed ''Road Rage'' in its February 2003 gallery of ''The Best Work You May Never See.'' Months later the One Club, a nonprofit organization that sponsored annual advertising competitions, honored ''Trunk Monkey'' with a silver award in the category of commercials made with less than $50,000. So many ''Trunk Monkey'' video files were downloaded from the Suburban Auto Group's website the day after the commercial appeared, the website had to be taken off-line. Later the commercials were placed on their own website. In one seven-day period the new site recorded 3 million downloads. Advertising critics praised the campaign for its ''viral'' success, or ability to be spread through word of mouth. Many consumers forwarded the commercials via E-mail to friends, colleagues, and family. ''It did go past where we thought it would go, in a good way,'' R/West art director Chris Sauer, who worked on the campaign, said to the Oregonian. ''You get lucky once in a while.''

FURTHER READING

Champagne, Christine. ''Laugh Factory.'' Adweek, April 4, 2005.

Finlay, Steve. ''Monkey Shines in Ads.'' Ward's Dealer Business, May 1, 2004, p. 5.

Fitting, Beth. ''Local Economy Makes Small Gains in 2004.'' Central New York Business Journal, December 24, 2004, p. 14.

Goldrich, Robert. ''Out of the 'Trunk.' '' Shoot, May 16, 2003, p. 4.

———. ''Recognition.'' Shoot, June 13, 2003, p. 4.

Goodale, Gloria. ''Youth Powers TV, but Is That Smart Business?'' Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2002, p. 18.

Mortenson, Eric. ''More Proof Opposites Attract.'' Portland Oregonian, October 6, 2004, p. B02.

———. ''Monkeyshines.'' Portland Oregonian, October 26, 2004, p. C01.

Muldoon, Katie. ''Customer Bait.'' Direct, August 1, 2004, p. 65.

Wilcha, Kristin. ''Mini Cooper Scores Major Coup at the One Show.'' Shoot, May 16, 2003, p. 1.

———. ''RSA USA Reaches 'Hire' Ground at the AICP Show.'' Shoot, June 13, 2003, p. 1.

Williams, Chambers G., III. ''Ford, General Motors Introduce Luxury Pickup Truck Models.'' San Antonio (TX) Express-News, August 24, 2001.

Wolf, Barnet D. ''A Little Trunk Monkey Business Is Paying Off.'' Columbus (OH) Dispatch, July 18, 2003, p. 01A.

Kevin Teague

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth

PO Box 26184
Alexandria, Virginia 22313
USA
E-mail: media@swiftvets.com
Web site: www.swiftvets.com

■■■

SWIFT BOAT VETERANS FOR TRUTH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

It was generally acknowledged that the ad campaign having the greatest impact on the 2004 U.S. presidential election was that run by the political action group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. The group, which counted 275 Vietnam War veterans among its ranks, strongly opposed Senator John Kerry's presidential bid, charging him with being unfit to lead America as its commander in chief. To that end they created, with the help of the Virginia-based advertising agency Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, a series of damning television ads calling into question Kerry's war record, the medals he had been awarded, and even his patriotism. The attacks were direct, personal, and highly effective.

Over the course of six months, from May through October 2004, the Swift Boat Veterans, led by fellow Vietnam veteran John O'Neill, raised $6.7 million, all but $800,000 of which was spent producing and airing its television spots. The ads were simple in design and clear in purpose. Each featured a number of real veterans, all members of the Swift Boat Veterans organization, explaining in their own words why they felt that Kerry was ill-equipped to be president. In one ad the veterans repeatedly used words and phrases such as "not been honest," "lied," "lying," "dishonored," "cannot be trusted," and "betrayed" in reference to Kerry. While most major news outlets debunked or refuted the claims of the Swift Boat Veterans, and although only a very few of their ranks had ever actually served with Kerry in combat, their message was played and replayed throughout the national media, garnering them far more exposure than their limited budget ever could have allowed. Indeed, this was part of their overall strategy.

Regardless of the accuracy of their claims, or perhaps because of their inflammatory nature, the Swift Boat Veterans were successful in casting doubt on one of the cornerstones of Kerry's campaign: his war record. President George W. Bush was reelected for a second term, but more importantly for the Swift Boat Veterans, Kerry was defeated. The group all but disbanded once the election was over and chose to use what little money remained from their fundraising to help disabled veterans and the families of soldiers killed in action.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Both Kerry and O'Neill served in Vietnam in the late 1960s, both served on small river patrol craft, or "swift boats" (O'Neill took over the command of Kerry's boat once Kerry had completed his tour of duty), and both were decorated for valor and service in combat. Soon after Kerry returned to the United States, however, he became vocal in his opposition to the war. Despite having served in Vietnam—or perhaps because of what he had witnessed there—he came to feel that the war was both immoral and unwinnable. After meeting with a group of Vietnam veterans in early 1971 to hear their eyewitness accounts firsthand, Kerry testified in April of that year before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as an outspoken member of Vietnam Veterans against the War. His testimony detailed atrocities, war crimes and violations of the Geneva Convention that had taken place during the conflict. Many veterans felt that Kerry was betraying and dishonoring them by making sweeping accusations about the conduct of soldiers in the field. In truth, Kerry's primary goal was not to denigrate the actions of his fellow soldiers but rather to condemn those of higher rank who, he felt, either sanctioned or turned a blind eye to crimes being committed against the civilians of Vietnam. U.S. soldiers, Kerry testified, "personally raped, cut off ears, cut off heads, cut off limbs, [and] randomly shot at civilians." He claimed that these acts "were not isolated incidents but crimes committed on a day-to-day basis with the full awareness of officers at all levels of command."

In support of those who opposed Kerry's position, O'Neill joined the group Vietnam Veterans for a Just Peace, and in June 1971 he and Kerry appeared in a one-on-one televised debate on The Dick Cavett Show. Kerry defended his Senate testimony, while O'Neill blasted him for turning his back on the very men with whom he had served. "Never have so many been libeled by so few," said O'Neill, referring to Kerry and other former soldiers who had spoken out against the war.

O'Neill's ire was rekindled in February 2004 when it became clear that Senator Kerry was poised to win the Democratic nomination for U.S. president. "It was important for me to be involved in this because everything is not just politics," O'Neill told the Washington Times. "Kerry is a guy who deeply lied about what happened and that has been demeaning to those of us who were really there." Soon thereafter he became one of the prime architects of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. O'Neill succinctly summed up the group's guiding principle in the Wall Street Journal: "We formed Swift Boat Veterans for Truth for one purpose: to present to the American public our conclusion that John Kerry is not fit to be commander in chief."

TARGET MARKET

The 2004 presidential election was extraordinarily close; in any given poll either candidate's lead often was within the margin of error. On one hand this meant that even the slightest gain from any single demographic could influence the outcome of the election; on the other it meant that the majority of voters had already made up their minds.

In order to differentiate himself from President Bush, who served in the Air National Guard during the Vietnam War but was never called up for active duty, Senator Kerry made his Vietnam service and decorated heroism a cornerstone of his political campaign. He drew as much attention as he could to his wartime conduct, often appearing with fellow veterans at campaign stops and even saluting the audience as he walked onstage at the Democratic National Convention. Unfortunately for Kerry, this served to make the attack of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth on his honor and character all the more potent. By casting doubt on Kerry's war record and by bringing attention to his own antiwar protests in the early 1970s, the Swift Boat Veterans successfully targeted those Kerry supporters for whom his war record and numerous medals were decisive factors in their support.

A "SWIFT BOAT" PRIMER

The term "swift boat" referred to a type of 50-foot aluminum-hulled craft used to patrol rivers and deltas throughout Vietnam during the war. The official Navy term for the boat was PCF, or Patrol Craft, Fast. The origin of the nickname remained in doubt, however. Some claimed that it came from the manufacturer of the boats, Sewart Seacraft, which named its products after seabirds, in this case a swift. Others said that SWIFT was an acronym for Shallow Water Inshore Fast Tactical Craft. Still others claimed that it was a nickname applied after a Navy admiral had watched a demonstration of the boats and offhandedly called them "swift."

COMPETITION

The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth was not the only independent political group on the offensive in 2004. In fact, so-called 527 groups—named for the section of the Internal Revenue Code that governed their operations as nonprofit groups without political affiliation—proliferated after the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform law was enacted in 2002. The law capped donations to political candidates and their campaigns at $2,000; it also capped donations in the same manner for any political group directly affiliated with a candidate or campaign. The 527 groups circumvented this rule by remaining independent of the candidates, even though groups on both sides pulled no punches when it came to divisive politics. On the liberal side MoveOn.org, the Media Fund, and America Coming Together all funded or produced TV ads blatantly in support of Kerry or against Bush, while conservative groups such as the Club for Growth and Progress for America spent millions of dollars in support of Bush's reelection.

Once the ads of the Swift Boat Veterans had begun to appear, both MoveOn and the Kerry campaign itself were quick to produce ads in response. MoveOn's spot featured one of the Swift Boat Veterans' ads in the background, with a voice-over calling its allegations into question and ending with a call to President Bush to "take that ad off the air." The trouble with this approach was that, as much as the Swift Boat Veterans' ads were helping Bush by harming Kerry, the Bush campaign was not responsible for them. MoveOn was trying to establish a tenuous link between the Swift Boat Veterans' ads and Bush, but there was no such verifiable connection.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Swift Boat Veterans for Truth had set out to host a single press conference to voice their opposition to Kerry and his bid for the White House. Nearly 200 veterans met in Washington, D.C., on May 4, 2004, to issue a press release outlining their concerns about Kerry's war record and his ability to lead. The veterans did not expect to make a big splash as a result of the press conference, but they were surprised by the complete lack of coverage by the mainstream media. Not surprisingly, some smaller cable shows and news networks ran their story, but the major media paid little attention to it.

"The mainstream media can ignore a press conference," Chris LaCivita, one of the lead creatives behind the Swift Boat Veterans' ad campaign, told the National Review, "but they can't ignore an ad." With Rick Reed, LaCivita subsequently developed the first ad of the campaign in conjunction with the Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm agency. The ad itself was straightforward. It featured overlapping testimony by numerous swift boat veterans that impugned Kerry's heroism and cast doubt on the actions that led to his being awarded the Silver Star and the Bronze Star as well as one of his three Purple Hearts. As Reed told Brandweek, "The key was to let these guys talk. What made the campaign work was that these were credible men, telling credible stories, with no agenda outside the truth."

The first ad was inexpensive to produce, but the Swift Boat Veterans had little funding to put it on the air where it would count. At the time their advertising coffers contained only $500,000. Instead of buying airtime in major markets, something they could ill afford anyway, they chose to release the ad at the beginning of August in minor television markets in only three states: Wisconsin, West Virginia, and Ohio. To help ensure that the ad received the media attention the original press conference on May 4 had not, the group worked with the conservative political consulting firm Creative Response Concepts, which sent press releases and extensive background material to conservative radio talk shows, cable news programs, and journalists, hoping that the controversial content of the ad would become a story that the mainstream media would subsequently pick up and disseminate. The plan worked. "By the time the ad made its debut," wrote Jason Zengerle of the New Republic, "the conservative media was primed, and the group's allegations against Kerry spread like wildfire through it."

OUTCOME

The upshot of the media attention was not just that the message of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth got out to a wider audience but that it also brought in scores of new donations. By the time the group rolled out its second television spot, titled "Ravaged," it had $2.5 million to spend. And for the final ad, called "Questions," it had over $3 million at its disposal.

Through the creative leveraging of conservative media channels, the group was also able to turn its controversial political advertisements from simple television spots into a national news phenomenon. No other group received the same media attention for its ads. Even MoveOn.org, which at one point had two member-created ads posted to its website likening President Bush to Adolf Hitler, failed to generate a comparable buzz among journalists.

As for achieving its goal of defeating Kerry's presidential aspirations, the Swift Boat Veterans played a significant role in the election's outcome, although a precise measure of the group's impact was difficult to determine. While media analysts and political observers gave the group a good deal of the credit for helping to erode support for Kerry, O'Neill remained modest. When asked by Fox News if he thought that his group had contributed to Kerry's defeat, he replied, "No, not really. I think we had two significant effects. First, I think John Kerry was unable to run simply as a war hero. And second, I think that we reclaimed, I believe, the honor of our guys living or dead who served in Vietnam. I don't think anybody will claim again that we're war criminals."

Having seen its goal fulfilled on November 2, 2004, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth used the remaining $800,000 worth of donations to help both the families of soldiers killed in action and wounded veterans through a charitable foundation.

FURTHER READING

Cummings, Jeanne, and Joe Flint. "Small Ads Win Big Uproar in New Political Media Game." Wall Street Journal, September 17, 2004, p. B1.

Gizzi, John. "Swift Boat TV Ads Packing Punch, Says Leading Pollster." Human Events, August 23, 2004, p. 5.

Graber, Doris A. Media Power in Politics. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 2000.

Justice, Geln, and Eric Lichtblau. "Windfall for Anti-Kerry Veterans' Group, with Texans among Those Giving Most." New York Times, September 11, 2004, p. A13.

Kaid, Lynda Lee, and Anne Johnston. Videostyle in Presidential Campaigns: Style and Content of Televised Political Advertising. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2001.

Miller, John J. "What the Swifties Wrought." National Review, November 29, 2004, pp. 18–22.

O'Neill, John. "We're Not GOP Shills." Wall Street Journal, August 27, 2004, p. A12.

O'Neill, John, and Jerome R. Corsi. Unfit for Command. Washington, D.C.: Regnery Publishing, 2004.

Rutenberg, Jim, and Kate Zernike. "Going Negative: When It Works." New York Times, August 22, 2004, sec. 4, p. 1.

Seper, Jerry. "O'Neill Leads Charge against Kerry's 'Lies.' " Washington Times, August 27, 2004, p. A1.

Teinowitz, Ira. "Ubiquitous Anti-Kerry Ad Proves PR as Political Tool." Advertising Age, August 23, 2004, p. 3.

Thomas, Evan. Election 2004: How Bush Won and What You Can Expect in the Future. New York: PublicAffairs, 2004.

York, Byron. "Vietnam Veterans against Kerry." National Review, May 31, 2004, pp. 32–34.

Zernike, Kate, and Jim Rutenberg. "Friendly Fire: The Birth of an Attack on Kerry." New York Times, August 20, 2004, p. A1.

Jonathan Kolstad

Swiss Army Brands, Inc.

1 Research Dr.
Shelton, Connecticut 06484
USA
Telephone: (203) 929-6391
Fax: (203) 929-3786
Web site: www.swissarmy.com

■■■

SWISS ARMY EQUIPPED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, created by Mullen Advertising for Swiss Army Brands, Inc., established a single brand image that unified advertisements for an assortment of merchandise. The company marketed watches, sunglasses, pens, and other items, but its best-known product was the Original Swiss Army Knife, a multiblade pocketknife that included implements such as a fish scaler, a nail file, a wood saw, a screwdriver, a bottle opener, a wire stripper, and a corkscrew. One advertisement for the Original Swiss Army Knife pointed out the product's many uses with the headline "The Swiss never begin sentences with 'If only I had a . . .' " The "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign used the popularity of Swiss Army knives to promote other products. In addition, its military tone and references to Switzerland called attention to the company's name and stressed the idea that the products were built to precision standards, suitable for use by the Swiss Army. The "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign was launched in print media in April 1998 and continued running into 1999.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Swiss Army Brands began as a firm that sold butcher scales in New Britain, Connecticut. When the company's founder, Charles Forschner, died in 1877, his son Richard moved the business to New York City and named it R.H. Forschner. During the 1920s the company imported high-quality cutlery from Germany, but supply problems in the years shortly before the outbreak of World War II prompted Forschner to begin buying cutlery and what was later called the Victorinox Original Swiss Army Knife from a Swiss company named Victorinox. During World War II thousands of American soldiers were stationed in Europe, where they observed that the Swiss Army was equipped with multipurpose pocketknives that the Americans called Swiss Army knives. After World War II there was great demand for Swiss Army knives in the United States, and R.H. Forschner marketed the product through hunting and camping stores and a few specialty retailers. The Forschner family sold the business in 1957, and it changed hands again in 1974. At that point pocketknives accounted for $800,000 (about 20 percent) of the company's annual sales of nearly $4 million.

The new owner, Louis Marx, Jr., began marketing Swiss Army knives through Wal-Mart, Target, and other mass merchandise outlets. In 1983 the company moved back to Connecticut and was renamed the Forschner Group, Inc. In 1989 it introduced the Swiss Army Brand Watch. By 1994 the firm's watches were selling for $75 to $500 each for a total of about $30 million a year, but pocketknives accounted for half of the company's annual sales of $125 million. In 1996 the firm changed its name to Swiss Army Brands, Inc., and began marketing Swiss Army brand sunglasses and writing instruments imported from Switzerland. It also marketed Victorinox Watches, Swiss Air Force Watches, and R.H. Forschner cutlery for commercial food operations. Late in 1997 the company introduced Victorinox multi-tools, which resembled Swiss Army knives but were built around a primary implement such as pliers or scissors instead of a knife blade. Unlike competing brands, the Victorinox SwissTool, was designed with individual springs to move each implement, locking devices to hold the implements securely as customers used them, and housing for the implements on the outside of the handle so the consumer did not need to open the entire unit to use one part.

As the company expanded its product line, its image became less clearly defined. Some advertisements used the popularity of Swiss Army knives to promote other merchandise, but the campaigns were not unified, and at times they used three different logos. The company was designing some of its own advertisements and hiring various agencies to develop campaigns for specific products. In the fall of 1997 Mullen Advertising was hired to create a strong, sharp brand image that would harmonize all the company's marketing efforts.

TRADEMARK DISPUTE

The term "Swiss Army knife" was not trademarked in the United States and was not clearly defined. To further complicate matters, in the early 1900s the Swiss Armed Forces had split the contract for its military knives between a Swiss company named Victorinox (which eventually called its product the Victorinox Original Swiss Army Knife) and a French company named Wenger (which called its product the Genuine Swiss Army Knife). The rival firms operated under a gentleman's agreement regarding the use of the name until 1992, when Arrow Trading Company began marketing an inferior Swiss Army knife that looked almost the same as theirs but was made in China. Swiss Army Brands, the U.S. marketer of Victorinox products, sued Arrow, but the court ruled that "Swiss Army knife" was a generic term that could be used by anyone. The Swiss Federal Defense Department registered a trademark containing the words "Swiss Army" and in 1996 granted Swiss Army Brands the right to its use outside the United States and its territories, Canada, and the Caribbean. The company continued to press for exclusive rights to the term "Swiss Army" in U.S. courts during 1996 and 1997.

TARGET MARKET

Swiss Army Brands referred to itself as the company that could equip people for life's adventures, and it described its target market as "people with a live-on-the-edge attitude at work and play" and "people who define themselves by their avocation, are passionate about what they do, and love strong brands." Its products were used by sports enthusiasts who participated in hiking, snowboarding, golf, and other outdoor adventures. The multipurpose knives were popular among backpackers and travelers who wanted equipment that took up little space but could be used for everything from opening cans to sawing small pieces of wood. Workers in specific trades, such as plumbers and electricians, also used the company's tools and other multipurpose products. The firm's merchandise was sold at outdoor, sport specialty, and hunting outlets, in addition to some department stores.

The firm's rugged military image tended to appeal more to men than to women. The Swiss Army name carried a certain mystique, and the company's products were noted for being durable and functional. Corporations frequently had their names and logos imprinted on Swiss Army knives to be distributed as promotional gifts. (This was a particularly common practice among pharmaceutical sales representatives, who gave the knives to doctors as they discussed the latest information regarding prescription drugs.) In general, the company's customers liked to view themselves as people who could cope with any situation. With tongue-in-cheek humor the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign acknowledged that consumers tended to fantasize that they could depend on the products to survive a dangerous adventure, but in fact the items would often be put to more mundane use such as tightening the screws in a pair of eyeglasses, removing the cork from a bottle of wine, or slicing cheese.

COMPETITION

Original Swiss Army Knives controlled about 75 percent of their category, but the company's other products faced strong competition. In the $300 million market for multi-tools—a relatively new segment that had great potential for sales to industrial customers—Leatherman Company was a major contender. Leatherman had begun making innovative multi-tools in 1983, long before Swiss Army Brands entered the category. Another primary rival, Wenger, was based in Switzerland, but its products were marketed in the United States through a New York company named Precise International. In 1998 Wenger announced that it would spend $40 million over a five-year period to develop a global brand image and marketing strategy for its Genuine Swiss Army Knives and Wenger Swiss Military Watches.

Some advertisements for watches focused on their rugged construction. A campaign from the Magellan Group, Inc., featured the headline "The watch issued to U.S. troops during Desert Storm." The text cited the durability and functional features of the products, particularly their luminous dials, which glowed in the dark because they contained phosphorous. The "Irony" campaign for watches made by Swatch Group showed timepieces being lifted out of liquid mercury. Advertisements for Timex Corporation's Ironman watches maintained that they could withstand extreme conditions. Bulova Corporation emphasized the fine Swiss craftsmanship of its Accutron Swiss watches by superimposing a close-up photograph of two timepieces over a panoramic view of majestic mountains and cabins covered in deep snow.

Other campaigns revolved around the use of watches in sporting events and outdoor adventures. The Timex Expedition was advertised with the slogan, "The watch you wear out there," below vivid color photographs of average people exploring in wide open spaces. Each ad showed a selection of watches strapped to items such as canoe handles and large rocks. A black-and-white magazine ad for Timex's stainless steel watches included a snapshot of five smiling young people on a boat above a selection of five watches and the headline "So much about a family is revealed in its faces." In 1998 TAG Heuer International SA ran a $10 million print campaign called "Inner Strength," which showed the company's watches beside portraits of famous athletes such as tennis star Boris Becker. Each included a quote that revealed the celebrity's attitude about winning. "I drew my strength from fear. Fear of losing. I don't remember the games I won, only the ones I lost," said the quote from Becker. A National Geographic ad for watches made by the Swiss company Montres Rolex SA featured a photograph of a diver above the headline "Deep beneath the ocean, Dr. Sylvia Earle's Rolex is an indispensable piece of oceanographic equipment. Back on dry land, it's an indispensable piece of jewelry." The text explained that the watch was an "officially certified Swiss chronometer" used to time each dive, crafted for precision performance but also nice looking.

In the market for sunglasses Swiss Army competed with established brands such as Ray-Ban, made by Luxottica Group S.p.A. Oakley, Inc., marketed a wide assortment of high-tech sunglasses and goggles that were popular among tennis players, skiers, basketball players, and other sports enthusiasts. AAi. FosterGrant ran an advertising campaign that showed celebrities wearing sunglasses above the headline "Who's that behind those FosterGrants?" The text in one magazine advertisement answered, "Someone who wants a wide range of styles for a diverse, active lifestyle. Someone who's as smart about how much they spend as how they look."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Mullen Advertising created the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign to define an identity for Swiss Army Brands and to promote the company's various product lines, including its pocketknives, multi-tools, watches, sunglasses, and writing instruments. The advertising budget for Swiss Army Brands was estimated at $10.0 million in 1998, up from $4.9 million in 1997, according to Adweek. Replacing the three insignias that Swiss Army Brands had used previously, Mullen created a new logo with a white cross on a red background, a design that resembled the silver cross on the red handles of Original Swiss Army Knives. Advertisements in the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign featured a dark red background that contrasted with the white cross in the new logo. The campaign emphasized the company's long, reputable history of marketing Original Swiss Army Knives and other merchandise imported from Switzerland, a country known for its fine workmanship. The ads had a military look, with the company logo and tag line in separate compartments.

The campaign used sly humor to point out that Swiss Army Brands products could be invaluable during grand adventures but could also be applied to less dramatic, everyday problems. One magazine advertisement showed light glowing inside a ski hut at night. The headline read, "A Swiss patrol is prepared to overcome any situation. A fallen bridge, a crushing avalanche, a stubborn cork." The text added that Swiss Army products were useful "whether you need to battle a perilous blizzard or a tightly sealed bottle of vintage Pinot Noir." An ad for watches suggested, "The luminous hands and hour markers are ideal for timing midnight maneuvers during a blizzard in perilous terrain. Handy at the movies too." Another advertisement said, "Tightening a screw. Slicing a well-aged cheese to accompany wine. In Switzerland, it's natural to be equipped for the task at hand. And if someone here is found to be lacking the right tool, it only means he's a tourist."

The ads ran in magazines for outdoor enthusiasts and general consumers, including Outside, Backpacker, Conde Nast Sports for Women, Vogue, Rolling Stone, and Men's Journal. The company designed its Internet site around the "Swiss Army Equipped" theme and sponsored sporting events such as the U.S. Open Snowboarding Championship, the Crested Butte Extreme Skiing Championship, and the Franklin Templeton Tennis Classic. Swiss Army products were placed conspicuously throughout Armageddon, a blockbuster science fiction film released in the summer of 1998. Actor Bruce Willis and other stars in the motion picture wore space suits with built-in Swiss Army sunglasses, and the Swiss Army logo was displayed on helmets and lunar-landing vehicles used in the production. Swiss Army Brands advertised extensively and sponsored consumer contests to publicize its connection to the film. In 1998 the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign supported the launch of two new products: the SwissTool, a multipurpose item that featured an assortment of blades and instruments, and the SwissCard, a slim variation of the Swiss Army knife that could fit inside a purse. Swiss Army Brands also became the worldwide licensee for St. John Timepieces, a product line with prices ranging from $50 to $18,000, which targeted sophisticated women.

OUTCOME

In September 1998 the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign won 24 awards, including best of show honors, at the thirty-eighth annual Francis W. Hatch Awards, sponsored by the Ad Club of Greater Boston. In May 1999 at One Show, a gathering to recognize excellence in advertising, Mullen won a print advertising award for the "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign. To publicize its many products, Swiss Army Brands dispatched two promotional trailers on a mobile marketing odyssey, the Equipped Tour, which crisscrossed the United States and sent back reports that were posted on the company's Internet site. Each trailer was outfitted with a giant Victorinox Original Swiss Army Knife on its roof. The promotion included the inauguration of the Swiss Army Equipped Awards, a national program that recognized the achievements of people who exhibited the resolve and leadership to complete difficult tasks.

Field and Stream magazine nominated the new SwissTool as the "best of the best" multi-tool on the market. In April 1999 Swiss Army Brands acquired the assets of Bear MGC Cutlery, Inc., an Alabama company that made knives and multi-tools. New Swiss Army Brands multi-tools introduced that year were designed for consumers with specific interests. The board sport tool featured components that could be used to adjust snowboards, skateboards, and in-line skates. The business tool featured a flashlight and a travel alarm clock. The auto tool included a tire gauge and an ice scraper. New sunglasses that the company introduced in 1999 had names such as Hurricane, Squall, Windstorm, and Tornado.

Swiss Army Brands had net sales of $127.0 million and profits of $1.5 million in 1998, compared to sales of $119 million and a loss of $4 million in 1997. The company attributed the growth primarily to sales of its new products. By December 1998 the Swiss Army brand of watches, sunglasses, and writing instruments accounted for about 50 percent of the company's sales. Revenues from the Victorinox brand, including Swiss Army knives and multi-tools, amounted to about 35 percent of sales, and R.H. Forschner commercial cutlery items amounted to about 15 percent.

FURTHER READING

Dimock, Christina. "Traveling Light: Manufacturers Offer Young Travelers More Bang for Their Buck with Multipurpose Travel Gear." Daily News Record, July 9, 1999, p. 10.

"Finding Riches in Business Niches." Money, August 1994, p. 38.

Flamer, Keith. "Swiss Army Brands Fights Back." Jewelers Circular Keystone, April 1998, p. 52.

———. "Watch Brands Face Off with Creative Ads." Jewelers Circular Keystone, October 1998, p. 132.

Kauffman, Matthew. "Business Rivals Take Stab at Market for Swiss Army Knife." Hartford Courant, November 13, 1998.

"Making a Lunge for Swiss Army." Business Week, July 12, 1999, p. 155.

Meeks, Fleming. "Blade Runner." Forbes, October 15, 1990, p. 164.

Shannon, Thomas. "Sharp Colors." Sporting Goods Business, November 1993, p. 51.

Susan Risland

Taco Bell Corp.

17901 Von Karman Avenue
Irvine, California 92614
USA
Telephone: (949) 863-4500
Fax: (949) 863-2252
Web site: www.tacobell.com

■■■

THINK OUTSIDE THE BUN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite being the number one fast-food chain serving up Mexican-style items like tacos and burritos, Taco Bell Corp. in 2001 had an image in need of a boost and sales that were in a steady decline. A former Taco Bell customer who had been eating at the fast-food chain for 10 years told Andrew Bluth of the Tribune Business News, "About six months ago, we just got fed up with Taco Bell . . . I'm not sure what's contributing to the problem, but I won't be back until they make some changes." In addition, Taco Bell in 2000 had canceled its long-running ad campaign featuring a Spanish-speaking dog described by Bluth as a "tired marketing strategy epitomized by an overused Chihuahua." To regain a marketing identity and win back customers, Taco Bell in September 2001 launched a campaign that featured the slogan "Think outside the Bun."

Created by Taco Bell's agency, Foote, Cone & Belding San Francisco, the $200 million advertising campaign was designed to encourage consumers to do what the slogan suggested and "rethink their eating habits and demand bold, innovative menu items like those found at Taco Bell . . . not to 'just settle for another burger or sandwich,'" reported Business Wire. The first ad in the campaign, a television spot, highlighted the technology popular with Taco Bell's core customers, young men. It featured Jeff Bezos, Amazon.com's chief executive officer, joined by other staffers discussing Taco Bell's newest "handheld," a chicken quesadilla. Continuing with the tech theme other TV spots included descriptions such as "three-cheese upgrade," "gooey interface," and "ergonomic design." Subsequent advertising, which included a multilevel sweepstake for gamers as well as television and print ads, featured tie-ins to Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox.

At the launch of the campaign, Taco Bell reported that same-store sales had dropped 24 of the previous 35 months, including a 2 percent drop for the quarter ending September 8. In May 2002, about eight months after the campaign's launch, Taco Bell reported an 8 percent increase in same-store sales for the first quarter of the year. The company cited the "Think outside the Bun" campaign as one of the reasons for the increase in sales.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Taco Bell founder Glen Bell's first effort at selling fast food was in the early 1950s when he opened a stand offering hot dogs and burgers. Perhaps seeing the success of the McDonald brothers on the horizon, Bell turned his attention to alternative menu items and his personal favorite: tacos. He opened Taco Tia in 1954 and sold it in 1956 when he acquired El Tacos, which grew to 100 units by 1958. Preferring independent ownership—Bell said, "It's tough to share a dream"—he sold his share of El Tacos to his partners and built the first Taco Bell in 1962. After 13 years at Taco Bell's helm, Bell resigned as chairman of the board, and in 1978 he sold the 868-restaurant chain to PepsiCo, Inc.

Under PepsiCo's ownership Taco Bell went head-to-head with big burger chains, like McDonald's and Burger King, and developed both a marketing niche and a national presence by attracting its core customers, college students, with affordable menu items. Some analysts, however, believed Taco Bell's problems could be traced back to its time as a division of PepsiCo. Bluth reported in the Tribune Business News, "Sales hit record levels, and the chain found a niche. Then came Pepsi's attempt to have Taco Bell run a hamburger chain, Hot n' Now, and some sit-down restaurant concepts. Then the big mistake: 'Border Lights,' an attempt at a healthier Taco Bell menu. The dramatic 1995 food addition was a total flop."

Bluth wrote in 2000 that Taco Bell's sales suffered a two-year decline under "Border Lights" and did not experience a slight increase until the strategy was eliminated in 1997 and the talking Chihuahua was introduced with the "Yo Quiero Taco Bell" theme. But, he said, "sales were flat [in 1999] and by all accounts 2000 is even uglier." To turn around its falling sales and compete in a market saturated with fast-food and casual-dining chains, Taco Bell dropped the Chihuahua and "Yo Quiero" theme, upgraded the quality of its menu items, and introduced "Think outside the Bun."

TARGET MARKET

Taco Bell defined its core customers as young men who typically went out for fast food at least a dozen times each month. Bob Sandleman, of the market research firm Sandleman & Associates, said in an interview with the Orange County Register that the chain's new "Think outside the Bun" advertising efforts seemed perfectly planned to resonate with its target audience and the chain's core customers, young men. In an effort to further boost sales, company president Emil Brolick broadened Taco Bell's target audience to also include older consumers with more expendable income and with higher expectations that the food they purchased would be good quality.

Some analysts believed that Taco Bell's shift in marketing focus from its core customer to a broader audience could fail to achieve its intended goal of increased sales. Douglas Christopher, an analyst with Crowell, Weedon & Co., told the Orange County Register, "Targeting too many audiences at once might prove difficult. Becoming all things to all people never works." Other analysts, however, including Technomic Inc., believed that Taco Bell had the financial resources to pull off the strategy as long as the marketing included advertising that would resonate with the separate audiences.

ONLINE MUSEUM PAYS TRIBUTE TO FOOD IMAGE SIGHTINGS

You never know what you will see looking back at you when you sit down with a slice of pizza, a piece of toast, or a bowl of nachos, but diners have been spotting images of everything from butterflies to the Liberty Bell to the Virgin Mary and Jesus in their food. To pay tribute to this unusual phenomenon, Taco Bell "launched a home for these edible 'visions' via the first online Food Sightings Museum at Tacobell.com," Amy Johannes reported in Promo. According to Johannes, the website was launched after consumers reported seeing images in the chalupa shells they purchased at Taco Bell. The website encouraged customers to submit photos of their food images online. Any food, not just Taco Bell's menu items, was admissible. People were also able to vote for their favorite image as well as whether the images were real, altered, or unrecognizable as anything other than the food pictured. "People are finding visions in many things," said a company spokesperson. "A customer a few years ago said he found Jesus in his Chalupa. We're playing off the phenomenon. We hope we get a lot of fun submissions."

COMPETITION

In 2000, as Taco Bell dumped its talking Chihuahua and was rethinking its marketing strategy, Del Taco, Inc., Taco Bell's number two competitor, was also restructuring its marketing and preparing to launch a new advertising campaign. Tim Hackbardt, Del Taco's vice president of marketing, told Nation's Restaurant News that the company would continue to target consumers 18 to 34 years of age, but the new advertising would be more focused on the chain's menu offerings. Hackbardt added that the Del Taco character, which, because if its resemblance to Zorro, had gotten the chain into legal trouble, had been eliminated. Additionally, although the company had traditionally turned to radio for its advertising, the new campaign would be focused on television spots with some radio support.

Del Taco replaced its Zorro-like spokescharacter and launched its new ad campaign using another spokesman, Dan the Product Guy, for its new TV spots. By featuring the self-effacing product-development character Dan, Del Taco hoped to reach fast foodies, usually 18- to 34-year-old men, but not to alienate women. The marketing also was designed to focus on what Taco Bell did not offer and to clearly communicate the differences between the two chains.

In 1998 McDonald's Corp. entered the quick-service Mexican food competition when it acquired a minority interest in the Denver-based gourmet-burrito chain Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc. With financial backing from McDonald's, Chipotle nearly tripled its size, growing to 100 units by the end of 2000 and claiming the number three spot in Mexican fast-food eateries, behind Taco Bell and Del Taco. The difference with Chipotle was it offered food that was not only spicy but freshly prepared daily. In addition, every restaurant had a unique design, and there were no children's menus. Chipotle's founder, Steve Ells, told BusinessWeek, "This is not the typical fast-food experience. This is something grown-up."

As part of its plan to develop branding and a corporate identity, Chipotle executives visited its different restaurants to talk with customers and created a website allowing consumers to submit comments about the chain. Based on the information gathered, Chipotle planned to increase the advertising promoting the freshness of its ingredients and to continue its "Food with Integrity" theme.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Taco Bell's "Think outside the Bun" theme was more than an ad campaign. It was also a brand repositioning effort that covered everything from marketing to food quality to how the company was run. It was designed to assure that consumers were aware of how Taco Bell differed from chains serving up burgers and sandwiches. In a move to further differentiate Taco Bell from other chains, its stores began offering a 98-cent value menu with a crunchy taco and a bean burrito, while burger chains were charging 99 cents for their value menu items. Another part of the new marketing strategy was that Taco Bell installed grills in its restaurants, enabling it to upgrade the menu and compete more effectively against "fresh Mex" chains, such as Chipotle. In addition, Taco Bell used tie-ins to high-tech products like Microsoft's Xbox to appeal to its core customers.

Moving the brand away from a campaign based on a chatty Chihuahua to a campaign that was food focused was also part of the strategy. San Francisco–based Foote, Cone & Belding Worldwide created Taco Bell's campaign, which connected fast food with the Internet and dot-coms and was designed to appeal to tech-savvy young men. The $200 million campaign launched with a television spot that featured two computer geeks eating lunch outside their office building and using computer-operating letter code to discuss their meals. In another spot the chain's chicken quesadilla was described as a hand-held device with an ergonomic design and gooey interface. Maintaining the technology theme, a print ad for the introduction of the chain's steak quesadilla tied it to the release of Microsoft's Xbox. The ad read, "The Xbox era begins at Taco Bell, 10.18.01."

OUTCOME

Taco Bell's "Think outside the Bun" campaign was a hit. The slogan and advertising received positive reaction from both frequent and casual customers of the chain. The success of the campaign was reflected in Taco Bell's sales numbers as well. After nearly three years of slipping sales, Taco Bell reported sales were up five straight months following the campaign's launch. Tricon Global Restaurants, the parent company of Taco Bell, said that fourth-quarter sales at Taco Bell stores open for more than one year rose 8 percent in 2001 over the same period in 2000. The company's marketing chief, Greg Creed, told the Orange County Register that "Think outside the Bun" was more than a clever slogan. Rather, he explained, the slogan was the "phrase that company leaders decided defines the brand. It's another reinforcement that we're not like the other guys." Based on the success of the campaign's youth-oriented and technology-based theme, Taco Bell expanded it through sponsorships such as the MTV 2002 Video Music and 2003 Movie awards.

FURTHER READING

"Better Beans, Tastier Tortillas and Meatier Marketing for Taco Bell." Business Wire, January 9, 2002.

Bluth, Andrew. "Analysts Say Chihuahua Ad Campaign Not Sole Cause of Taco Bell Slump." Tribune Business News, August 1, 2000.

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "Chipotle Airs New Radio Spots, Plans More Ads under 'Integrity' Theme." Nation's Restaurant News, December 2, 2002.

———. "Del Taco Restructures Marketing Duties, Plans More TV Advertising," Nation's Restaurant News, May 8, 2000.

———. "Taco Bell TV Spots Push Envelope—If This Were 1985." Nation's Restaurant News, October 15, 2001.

Hamstra, Mark. "McD's Buys Stake in Chipotle Mexican Grill." Nation's Restaurant News, February 23, 1998.

Johannes, Amy. "Taco Bell Launches Online Food Sightings Museum." Promo, June 6, 2005.

Kramer, Louise. "Del Taco Barks Back with Its Own Spokescharacter: Eponymous Pitchman Uses Western Theme to Tout Value." Advertising Age, June 21, 1999.

Leonhardt, David. "The Corporation: Strategies: Mickey D Wakes Up and Smells the Cilantro." BusinessWeek, February 22, 1999.

MacArthur, Kate. "Chipotle Mexican Grill." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

———. "Games People Play: Looking for Lift, Taco Bell Stakes $70 Mil on Xbox." Advertising Age, October 1, 2001.

———. "Taco Bell: Brands in Demand; After Ditching the Dog, Taco Bell Becomes Yum's Strongest Chain by Focusing on the Food." Advertising Age, March 24, 2003.

———. "Underdog vs. Chihuahua in Mexican Chain Battle: Del Taco Effort Pits Chicken Taco against Rival Taco Bell's Gorditas Line." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

Montgomery, Tiffany. "Taco Bell Debuts $200 Million Ad Campaign." Orange County Register, September 22, 2001.

———. "Taco Bell Notes 8 Percent Jump in Fourth Quarter Sales." Orange County Register, February 12, 2002.

Zuber, Amy. "Tricon on Rise: BK Not in Picture; Sees Italian, Asian and Sandwiches on Multibranding Horizon." Nation's Restaurant News, May 13, 2002.

Rayna Bailey

WANT SOME? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997 Taco Bell Corp. was the sixth-largest fast-food chain in the United States and the only Mexican-style fast-food restaurant operating nationwide. But in the previous two years the chain had experienced declining revenues. To repopularize itself and cement its brand image as a fun, appealing quick-service restaurant, in mid-1997 Taco Bell released a new marketing campaign created by ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day of Venice, California.

The $200 million campaign included a number of television commercials, several of which were set in a pink room intended to depict the inside of a hungry person's stomach. Each spot ended with the tagline "Want some?" and displayed the Taco Bell logo. The final spot in the initial campaign, "Chihuahua," starred a talking dog. Because it was not expected to be popular, it was televised only in the northeastern United States in September 1997. In the spot a male Chihuahua named Dinky sniffed his way down a street, seemingly in search of a female companion. Instead he passed by a female Chihuahua to approach a human eating food from Taco Bell. Dinky then said in Spanish, "Yo quiero Taco Bell" (I want Taco Bell).

Public reaction to the "pink room" spots was lukewarm, and they were short-lived. Because of the excitement surrounding the regional spot featuring the Chihuahua, however, Taco Bell chose to air it nationally in October. The company followed it up in late December 1997 with a campaign that focused exclusively on the hungry little dog. The spots promoted the value pricing of certain Taco Bell items while solidifying the Chihuahua's role as Taco Bell's brand icon and marketing mascot. In May 1998 Dinky returned as part of a $60 million campaign to promote Taco Bell's Gorditas, a new menu item. Dinky's position as top dog began to fade in 1999, when he was reduced to a supporting character in the chain's commercials, and in 2000 insiders were calling Dinky "overused." Later that year Taco Bell dropped the Chihuahua along with TBWA\Chiat\Day.

The Taco Bell Chihuahua. © MITCHELL GERBER/CORBIS

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although it was the only nationwide Mexican-style fast-food restaurant in the United States, in 1995 and 1996 Taco Bell suffered declining revenues, which was largely attributed to increased competition in the industry. In addition, the company's marketing campaigns were not successful in increasing sales or meeting company expectations. In an article in USA Today Taco Bell president Peter Waller stated, "We spend $200 million a year on advertising, and I really want that investment to pay off." He added, "We had a strong campaign in the late '80s, but since then, we haven't made a connection with the consumers.'' Analysts in the fast- food industry concurred, indicating that Taco Bell's image needed updating. A PaineWebber analyst remarked that ''Taco Bell ha[d] gotten stale'' and lacked new ideas.

In 1997 Taco Bell sought to reverse the drop in sales and give its image a face-lift. In March 1997 Taco Bell awarded advertising agency TBW\Chiat\Day of Venice, California, the creative portion of its marketing account. Industry executives shared with the Wall Street Journal their belief that ''the biggest problem facing Taco Bell is its image, and it's one the people at TBWA Chiat/Day will need to work hard at.'' The Costa Mesa, California, office of the agency that had represented Taco Bell from 1994 to 1997, Bozell Worldwide, maintained media-buying responsibilities, and its managing partner, Peter Stranger, stated, ''We lost the creative portion because Taco Bell is looking for magic in the creative areas which we have not struck with them to date. If they can find magic, we support that.''

TARGET MARKET

TBWA\Chiat\Day chose to focus its marketing efforts on men between the ages of 18 and 34, the group that accounted for the majority of fast-food sales. According to an article in the Los Angeles Times, Taco Bell's ''advertising and marketing gradually shifted toward a more general audience—and away from its most important customers, the hungry young males who drive fast-food sales.'' Taco Bell had hoped to expand its consumer base, but when the strategy proved ineffective, the company chose to focus again on its core consumer group. The new campaign by TBWA\Chiat\Day aimed to use off-beat, catchy commercials to gain the attention of Taco Bell's core market of young males.

The chain reported that its target market consisted of consumers aged 18 to 34 who were loyal customers of Taco Bell. Vada Hill, Taco Bell's chief marketing officer, stated, ''Our consumers have an intense emotional tie with the Taco Bell brand and associate great memories and experiences with eating our food.'' TBWA\Chiat\Day's research revealed that Taco Bell's consumers were ''incredibly savvy, individualistic and pragmatic,'' and thus the agency sought to create a campaign that would be appreciated by this target group. Lee Clow, TBWA\Chiat\Day's chief creative officer, said, ''Taco Bell's consumers have grown up in a media-saturated environment and respond to brand messages that are direct, honest and funny . . . We wanted to create a campaign that incorporates those key elements and breaks through the clutter by speaking directly to our audience about the desire for Taco Bell in a fun, humorous and memorable way.''

HISPANIC REACTION

Not everyone was thrilled by Taco Bell's ''Chihuahua'' campaign. Many in the Hispanic community found the Dinky commercials insulting and inappropriate. Gabriel Cezares, the president of the Tampa Bay, Florida, chapter of the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), was quoted in the Tampa Tribune as saying, ''They have a little Mexican dog to represent Mexican people who work like dogs and are treated like dogs and don't even get a burrito from Taco Bell to put on their tables.'' Cezares proposed a boycott of Taco Bell and urged Hispanics to write protest letters to the company's headquarters. Others in the Hispanic community, however, disagreed. Belen Robles, LULAC's national president, told the Tampa Tribune, ''LULAC has a good working relationship with Taco Bell. I seriously doubt they would intentionally air something that is offensive to the Hispanic community.''

Peter Stack, Taco Bell's vice president of public affairs, stated that precautions had been taken and that Hispanic focus groups had responded positively to the spots. He said, ''This research is done to ensure that our ads are received in the manner that they are intended: to entertain and inform, never to offend.'' Campaign creators Chuck Bennett and Clay Williams explained that they tried to be careful not to offend anyone, that the Chihuahua was portrayed as smart and heroic, and that Hispanic actors were used to provide the dog's voice.

In an effort to appeal to a broader audience and include potential customers outside the target group, Taco Bell also began to offer a 100 percent guarantee on its food items and service: ''You'll love it, or we'll eat it.'' The guarantee was incorporated into commercials and was designed to lure new customers by informing them that the quality of Taco Bell's food had improved.

COMPETITION

With more than 6,500 units in the United States, Taco Bell had no national competitors in the Mexican fast-food category. In 1997 it dominated the market, claiming more than two-thirds of all sales in Mexican quick-service food. Independent restaurants, with a share of 19 percent, followed Taco Bell. Regional chains such as Taco John's, Del Taco, Taco Time, and Taco Bueno made up less than 10 percent of Mexican quick-service sales.

In the overall fast-food market, Taco Bell held 2.1 percent of the national share in 1996 and ranked fourth, following McDonald's, Burger King, and Pizza Hut. Rounding out the top 10 fast-food restaurants were Wendy's, KFC, Hardee's, Subway, Dairy Queen, and Domino's Pizza. Thus, three divisions of Tricon Global Restaurants—Pizza Hut, Taco Bell, and KFC—were in the top 10, and their combined market share of 6.2 percent placed them second after McDonald's, which in 1996 had a market share of 7.7 percent.

Some of Taco Bell's competitors capitalized on the Chihuahua spot by creating marketing campaigns that included a Chihuahua. El Pollo Loco, a regional Mexican-style fast-food chain in southern California, aired a spot that mocked the talking Chihuahua by indicating that its growth might be stunted if it continued to feast on tacos. The spot was part of a series of spoof advertisements by El Pollo Loco. Jack in the Box also created a parody that featured a talking Chihuahua. The spot pitted the dog, visibly pudgier than Taco Bell's, against Jack in the Box's ball-headed Styrofoam Jack character and attempted to direct attention to Jack in the Box's specialty items.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the late 1980s and early 1990s Taco Bell enjoyed growth in sales and continued to expand its locations. In 1995, however, earnings began to suffer. Same-store sales fell by 4 percent in 1995 and by 2 percent in 1996. Taco Bell appeared ready for change when it gave TBWA\Chiat\Day, an agency known for its innovative work, creative responsibilities for advertising in March 1997.

In planning the $200 million marketing campaign, Taco Bell hoped to update and build its brand image and to solidify its rank as one of the top fast-food chains in the country. It also wanted to boost store traffic and reverse the two-year sales slump. In the Los Angeles Times Hill discussed Taco Bell's goals by explaining, "The challenge isn't getting this core group to eat fast-food ... The challenge is getting them to turn right into a Taco Bell as they drive down fast-food row instead of McDonald's or Burger King." Hill also noted, "It's not that they're not coming to our restaurants ... It's just that we want them to come more often."

The new campaign was released in July 1997 on prime-time network television with several of the "pink room" spots, which were intended to convey the message "There's something inside you that's hungry for Taco Bell." The first commercial that appeared on network television showed two young men in an apartment who were awakened by their growling stomachs. Another spot featured a throng of youths dancing and thrashing about in a pink room, with the chaotic activity meant to symbolize the rumblings of an empty stomach. The final spot in the initial campaign, developed by the TBWA\Chiat\Day creative team of Clay Williams and Chuck Bennett, featured Dinky the male Chihuahua. Bennett explained the development of the spot in PR Newswire: "We wanted the Chihuahua's character to be perceived as a 19-year-old guy in a dog's body who primarily thinks about food and girls. We were able to craft the spots in such a way as to bring this character out and convey the message that the dog was on an undying quest for Taco Bell."

Williams and Bennett had come up with the Chihuahua concept while eating together at a Mexican restaurant in Venice, California. They spotted a determined-looking Chihuahua walking down the street by itself. Bennett explained, "He was a little dog totally on a mission, on full cruise mode to something only it saw ... He appeared to have no concept that he was a [three]-pound dog in a giant world." Bennett and Williams decided that the Chihuahua could play an entertaining and effective role in the Taco Bell campaign.

In May 1998 new television spots starring Dinky began airing to promote Taco Bell's new food offering, Gorditas. The spots were tied to the release of the new Godzilla movie; one featured the feisty Chihuahua trying to trap the giant monster with a cardboard box and a few Gorditas while he beckoned, "Heeere, LEE-zard LEE-zard." The little dog also starred in a music video to promote a new rap/urban-pop album by Los Angeles Lakers basketball star Shaquille O'Neal.

The campaign was modified in 1999, with Dinky still playing a part but in a supporting role rather than as the star. A new tagline also replaced the popular "Yo quiero Taco Bell." Television spots that began airing in December 1999 used the tagline "Grande taste. Loco price. Only at Taco Bell," and in them the chain's food upstaged Dinky. One spot, titled "Bus," showed Dinky taking over a public bus in hot pursuit of a working mom on her way home in a minivan with a Taco Bell Grande Meal beside her on the front seat. The meal was meant to feed the mom's hungry family, but the Chihuahua had other plans for the dinner: claiming it for himself.

OUTCOME

Although the public did not embrace the original spots featuring the pink room, Taco Bell had a winner with the talking Chihuahua. The Licensing Letter quoted Peter Stack, Taco Bell's vice president of public affairs, as saying, "This is a phenomenon; it's safe to say it happens once in a brand's lifetime." "Yo quiero Taco Bell" became the mantra of the masses, the Chihuahua breed grew in popularity, and Taco Bell's two-year sales decline ended. In 1997 the chain enjoyed a 2 percent increase in same-store sales.

Taco Bell's Hill stated, "These ads are just the kind of break-through advertising that we challenged TBWA Chiat/Day to create." The Chihuahua spot was so successful that Dinky became the star of subsequent Taco Bell ads. Hill explained, "The original commercial captured the imagination and excitement of our consumers and the catch phrase 'Yo Quiero Taco Bell' is also becoming part of our target market's vernacular. The response has been so overwhelming that we had no choice but to bring back the Chihuahua." TBWA\Chiat\Day's Williams commented on the spot's effectiveness. "After the launch of the first Chihuahua commercial," Williams recalled, "it became apparent that this spot was creatively right on the mark. It was able to connect with our target market while at the same time being broad based enough to speak with the entire market as a whole."

The Chihuahua spots ranked among the top three most popular campaigns ever analyzed by Ad Track, USA Today 's weekly poll designed to measure a campaign's popularity and effectiveness. Ad Track had covered more than 140 marketing campaigns since 1995. Only 8 percent of the poll's 566 respondents stated that they disliked the Dinky commercials, while 47 percent said that they liked them. Among the target group of 18- to 24-year-old consumers, 53 percent of the females and 40 percent of the males polled stated that they liked the spots. Minority groups surveyed also enjoyed the Chihuahua spots. Among Hispanic consumers 55 percent said that they liked the commercials, and 57 percent of black respondents gave their approval. When polled regarding the campaign's effectiveness, 36 percent considered the commercials to be effective. Entertainment Weekly rated a Chihuahua spot as one of the top 10 television commercials of 1997.

Billboards emblazoned with the Chihuahua's image appeared across the United States, and Taco Bell implemented a toll-free telephone number for customers who wanted to order Dinky T-shirts. Posters and cardboard cutouts of Dinky were displayed at Taco Bell restaurants, but Dinky proved so popular that the posters were frequently stolen. Taco Bell reaped the benefits of the Chihuahua craze with increased revenues and immense recognition in 1997 and intended to ride the Dinky wave as long as possible. According to the Virginian-Pilot and Ledger-Star, Taco Bell public relations manager Laurie Gannon stated, "When the commercials run their course, we'll move on to something else."

Despite earning accolades as one of the "most memorable ad campaigns in recent history," according to Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, by 2000 Dinky the Chihuahua had worn out his welcome. The Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News article described the campaign as a "tired marketing strategy" and Dinky as an "overused Chihuahua." In mid-2000 Taco Bell reported that same-store sales had dipped 6 percent for the second quarter compared to the previous year. In response, the chain replaced its president, Peter Waller, and fired its ad agency and Dinky's creators, TBWA\Chiat\Day. In 2001 Taco Bell released a new marketing campaign, "Think Outside the Bun," created by the chain's new agency, San Francisco–based Foote Cone & Belding.

FURTHER READING

Bluth, Andrew. "Analysts Say Chihuahua Ad Campaign Not Sole Cause of Taco Bell Slump." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, August 1, 2000.

Bonko, Larry. "Yo Quiero Chihuahua! Taco Bell Commercials Boost Breed's Popularity." Virginian-Pilot and Ledger-Star, March 30, 1998, p. E1.

Brownfield, Paul. "Where's the Pitch." Los Angeles Times, May 3, 1998.

Enrico, Dottie. "Viewers Sit Up and Notice Taco Bell Ads." USA Today, March 30, 1998.

Garfield, Bob. "Perspicacious Pooch Scores for Taco Bell." Advertising Age, March 9, 1998.

Hardesty, Greg. "El Pollo Loco Parody Ads Are Skewering the Competition." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, February 27, 1998, p. C2.

Montgomery, Tiffany. "Taco Bell Debuts $200 Million Ad Campaign." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, September 22, 2001.

———. "Taco Bell Refocuses on Hungry Young Males." Los Angeles Times, July 24, 1997, p. D7.

———. "Taco Bell Rehires Talky Chihuahua." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, December 30, 1997, p. C1.

Reddick, Tracie. "Dinky Strikes a Sour Note." Tampa Tribune, March 7, 1998, p. 1.

———. "Hispanic League's National Leader Says 'Si' to Taco Bell's Dinky." Tampa Tribune, March 11, 1998, p. 1.

"Taco Bell Consumers Say 'Yo Quiero More Chihuahua!" PR Newswire, December 29, 1997.

Weiner, Jennifer. "Biting Image? Taco Bell's Chihuahua Is One Hot Dog." Philadelphia Inquirer, April 23, 1998, p. A1.

Wells, Melanie. "Taco Bell Cooks Up $200M Ad Campaign." USA Today, July 23, 1997, p. B8.

Mariko Fujinaka
Rayna Bailey

Target Corporation

1000 Nicollet Mall
Minneapolis, Minnesota 55403
USA
Telephone: (612) 304-6073
Fax: (612) 696-3731
Web site: www.target.com

■■■

NEW YORKER MAGAZINE SPONSORSHIP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In a bold move designed to attract an upscale clientele and garner widespread media attention, the Target Corporation purchased all of the advertising space in the August 22, 2005, issue of the New Yorker magazine. Target had always aimed for a more affluent demographic than its main competitors, Wal-Mart and Kmart, but in grabbing the attention of the New Yorker's readership, Target was seeking to lure an even higher-end consumer to its stores.

The campaign, created by Peterson Milla Hooks, was limited to the single issue of the New Yorker and consisted of 21 different illustrations created by as many artists. The ad space alone cost in excess of $1 million. Each ad used only the colors black, red, and white, and each featured the Target bull's-eye logo incorporated into a New York scene or theme. The ads ranged from loose, hand-drawn sketches to computer-generated geometric cityscapes. One ad featured a low-angle view of a leather-clad female motorcycle rider in the foreground with a giant bull's-eye rising behind the Brooklyn Bridge in the background, while another depicted a crowd of martini-sipping gallery-goers crowded into a room whose paintings were pop art versions of the Target logo. Not a single line of text or image of a specific product appeared in any of the ads. Instead of selling its wares, Target was selling an urbane, artistic impression of itself to a sophisticated audience it had not reached quite so directly in previous campaigns.

The single greatest success of the campaign was its ability to generate media coverage and to create controversy far beyond the readership of the magazine itself. Almost every national newspaper covered the story of Target as the sole advertiser in the magazine—the first time in its history the magazine had been sponsored by one advertiser—and National Public Radio ran two spots about the phenomenon. And while the American Society of Magazine Editors issued a reprimand to the New Yorker for not following its guidelines for single-sponsor issues, this merely led to additional press coverage and sparked a debate in industry circles about the merits of such an undertaking.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1962 as a subsidiary of the Dayton Company, Target quickly became the most profitable of the parent company's retail chains. From the beginning the idea behind Target stores was to appeal to customers on the basis of the style of its merchandise and the design of its stores rather than low prices alone. As Bryan Curtis wrote in the online magazine Slate, the founders decided that Target would PHOTOGRAPH BY KELLY A. QUIN. THOMSON GALE.

''exude the mild pretension of a low-end department store rather than the folksiness of a high-end dime store.''

By the mid-1980s Target executives were referring to the company's positioning in the marketplace as ''upscale discount.'' Creating this market niche was a way to differentiate Target from its main rivals, Wal-Mart and Kmart, whose sole emphasis was on having the lowest prices in the industry. In keeping with this slightly upscale approach, Target stores were designed with brighter lighting, wider aisles, and more available checkout lines than the competition.

Additional reinforcement of the ''discount luxury'' concept came in 2000 when Target hired the noted architect and designer Michael Graves to create a line of exclusive household goods for its stores. Graves had previously won an industry award for a tea kettle he designed in 1985 for the Italian firm Alessi, which retailed for $140. The tea kettle he designed for Target, which subsequently became a top seller for the chain, bore a passing resemblance to his previous piece but sold for only $40.

The combination of national branding and upscale designer housewares propelled both Target's sales and its reputation to such heights that in 2000 the company that had founded it (by then Dayton-Hudson Corporation) formally changed its name to Target Corporation. Within a year the company had sold off its other, less-profitable retail divisions.

TARGET MARKET

For Target's ''upscale chic'' approach to translate into increased revenue, it needed to attract a similarly upscale clientele to its stores. Target had high consumer awareness and strong customer loyalty among lower- and middle-income shoppers, but what the company yearned for was to turn its ''more-stylish-than-the-competition'' image into a shopping reality for upper-income consumers. To that end, in 1997 Target began to advertise heavily in New York City, mainly through billboards and outdoor signage, even though at the time there were no Target stores in the city or the surrounding metropolitan area. The company was expanding its presence in the northeastern United States, however, and believed that building brand awareness well before the stores were actually open would pay off in the end. In addition, Target hoped to attract a more hip, urban, and wealthy group of customers to its stores, banking on the idea that once trendy New Yorkers were seen wearing Target's clothing lines or using its household goods this would up its cachet among other urbanites nationwide.

It was this that led Target to advertise in the New Yorker. Generally regarded as one of the most prestigious magazines in the United States, this weekly publication was filled with extraordinarily literate journalism mixed with topically relevant New York–themed articles and current events. (It should be noted, however, that despite the magazine's New York area bias, it had more subscribers in California than in New York State.) A casual glance through other issues in August 2005 revealed ads for Jaguar, NetJets, Chanel, Level vodka, BMW, Mercedes, Hartford mutual funds, and Rolex watches, among various high-end products. The average New Yorker reader was hardly a demographic match for the average Target shopper, which was exactly the point. It was among those consumers who could afford to purchase such high-end merchandise that Target hoped to position itself.

The monopolizing of advertising space in the New Yorker made Target's presence in the magazine almost impossible to ignore, but in order to appeal to the tastes and desires of the New Yorker readership the ads themselves did not hawk any particular product or service but instead reinforced Target's branded bull's-eye logo in a variety of subtle and creative ways. Through the Minneapolis-based agency Peterson Milla Hooks, 21 artists were hired to create the full- and partial-page ads for the magazine. No two were alike, and each artist had extraordinary creative license in illustrating the ads. The hope was that the ads, some drawn by the same artists whose work had appeared previously in the editorial portion of the magazine, would attract attention not because of their content but because of their look and style. In short, Target's tastefully creative ads were designed to impress a refined, rather than a bargain-hunting, consumer.

SINGLE-SPONSOR ADVERTISING

In the early days of both radio and television entire shows were run under the banner of a single advertiser. Ford Theater, General Electric Theater, General Mills Radio Adventure Theater, and Kraft Music Hall were just a few of the programs whose entire content was "brought to you" by one company. As television increased in popularity beginning in the 1960s and as broadcasters became more powerful, the price of advertising on television skyrocketed, and eventually sales of single 30-second spots became the norm. In the fall of 2005, however, despite the enormous costs involved, a number of companies gambled on the relative "newness" of the idea and bought all of the ad spots during a number of shows, including CBS's 60 Minutes (Philips Electronics), NBC's The Tonight Show (Chevrolet), and FX's Nip/Tuck (Sony Pictures). At upwards of $2 million for a complete program, these companies were betting that saturating the airwaves with their products would catch the attention of viewers in a way not seen for two generations.

COMPETITION

In 2005 Target was the number-two discount retailer in the United States, behind Wal-Mart and with Kmart number three on the list. Target's overall strategy of emphasizing style and not just price had helped to propel it to the number-two spot, but Wal-Mart's size and ruthless determination to slash prices by every available means meant that Target could hardly hope to compete on price alone.

While Wal-Mart's advertising strategy simply reinforced its low-price approach, with ads and television spots literally showing "falling prices," Target chose to promote style and youthful attitude in its marketing efforts, in large part to differentiate itself from its rival. Thus, while Wal-Mart was Target's number one competitor, Target's strategy was not to lure shoppers away from Wal-Mart but rather to lure shoppers away from even higher-end stores than its own.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1999 Target decided to launch an ambitious ad campaign to capitalize on its success as a stylish retail chain by solidly branding the company with its simple red and white bull's-eye logo. The hope was to increase consumer awareness of the logo, thereby creating national iconographic recognition for the company. Target aimed to have the bull's-eye join the ranks of McDonald's "golden arches" or Nike's "swoosh" logos, and it succeeded. The campaign ended up yielding a 96 percent awareness of the bull's-eye logo among consumers. The company continued to make the logo a feature of all of its campaigns in all media, reinforcing the connection between the logo and the store.

The success of this campaign, and of others in the interim, allowed Target to feature only its logo, without its name or any other identifying text, in the ads it placed in the New Yorker. The criteria for the illustrations were simple: each ad could consist of only the three colors black, white and red; each was to feature a New York theme or location of some kind; and each needed to feature the Target logo somewhere in the ad. Beyond that the 21 illustrators were allowed to pursue their creative impulses in designing the content of each ad. In what was an unusual move, the agency did not contribute to the look or feel of any of the ads but was responsible only for hiring the illustrators and thereby shaping the overall stylistic mode.

No single ad looked like any other. The ad by Andre Dubois, for example, featured a drawing of a giant high-heeled red shoe, decorated with white Target bull's-eyes, that was positioned over the water as a bridge or gateway into lower Manhattan. Another, by Milton Glaser, depicted a series of flying red bull's-eyes emerging from the distant night sky and leading up to and encircling the spire of a skyscraper in a cosmic version of the game of ringtoss. The first 19 pages of the magazine featured 10 pages of Target ads, 7 of them a full page, and within these 10 pages the Target logo was featured more than 200 times. In all there were 21 pages of ads in the magazine's 90 pages.

Some of the artists chosen, most notably the illustrator Robert Risko, were regularly featured in the New Yorker as part of the editorial content rather than the advertising. This fact alone generated controversy among industry insiders who felt that Target, with the tacit approval of the New Yorker, was blurring the line between advertising and content. None of the ads was labeled as such, and there was no explanation of the single-sponsorship phenomenon anywhere in the magazine. In fact, the only text devoted to the ads at all came in a sidebar on page 87 that stated, ''Our thanks to all the talented illustrators who brought this project to life,'' followed by a complete list of the illustrators and the pages in the magazine on which their work could be found. Referring to the advertising blitz as a ''project'' contributed to the outcry from the likes of Lewis Lazare, who wrote in the Chicago Sun-Times that the advertising ploy was ''the most jaw-dropping collapse of the so-called sacred wall between editorial and advertising in modern magazine history.'' Despite his distaste, Lazar could not help but give a nod to the actual efficacy of the ads: ''Target . . . has had its image immeasurably burnished by the practically seamless blending of its ads into The New Yorker editorial product.''

OUTCOME

Industry experts estimate that Target spent between $1.1 and $1.3 million for the ad space alone, and according to most analysts Target got its money's worth. ''On a simple, immediate level, the campaign worked because it [was] sufficiently unusual to have the disruptive, first-mover advantage that is central to many of today's best campaigns,'' wrote Jonah Bloom in Advertising Age. By attaching itself to a ''high-brow'' magazine such as the New Yorker and by creating ads that were promoting nothing but an artistic sensibility and a logo, Target created a whirlwind of media attention. Overall, the reaction in the national press was positive. The ads themselves were praised for their tasteful imagery, understated message, and creative diversity. Barbara Lippert wrote in Adweek that Target's sponsorship of the New Yorker was ''the most exciting example of branded entertainment I've ever seen.'' The New York Times, the Boston Globe, and the San Francisco Chronicle joined the chorus of supporters. At the other end of the spectrum, although much in the minority, was Edward Wasserman, who held that ''the bottom line is that The New Yorker 's deal with Target transformed the look and feel of the country's most highly regarded magazine into a promotional vehicle for a retail chain.'' This last comment betrayed the double-sided nature of Target's sponsorship of the New Yorker. Many of those who held the magazine in high regard found the ad buyout by a discount retail chain a sullying move for a literary icon, while those who viewed the retailer positively to begin with were more likely to find the ads both provocative and tasteful. In either case both readers of the magazine and readers of the national press were treated to what every advertiser hoped for—a heavy dose of media attention.

By the time of the publication of the New Yorker issue, Target had 5 stores in New York City, although none in Manhattan, and 53 in the New York metropolitan area, plenty to choose from for those consumers whose curiosity was piqued by the ads. Beyond New York, however, the ads contributed to an increased, albeit enigmatic, awareness of Target among the magazine's mostly affluent, urban readers and sparked a months-long debate in the media over the artistry and ethics of such an approach.

FURTHER READING

Abelson, Jenn. ''And Now, a Few (More) Words from Our (One) Sponsor.'' Boston Globe, October 24, 2005, p. E1.

Bloom, Jonah. ''On Target: Why Presenting Sponsorship's Time Has Come.'' Advertising Age, August 22, 2005, p. 18.

Curtis, Bryan. ''Target: Discount Retailer Goes to the New Yorker.'' Slate, August 17, 2005. Available from <http://www.slate.com>

Denitto, Emily. ''Target Stores Gun for NYC Market.'' Crain's New York Business, May 26, 1997, p. 3.

Elliott, Stuart. ''And What Would Thurber Say? A Single-Sponsor New Yorker.'' New York Times, August 12, 2005, p. C5.

Gladwell, Malcolm. The Tipping Point: How Little Things Can Make a Big Difference. New York: Little, Brown and Company, 2000.

Lazare, Lewis. ''Target, New Yorker Cross Line.'' Chicago Sun-Times, August 19, 2005, p. 69.

Lippert, Barbara. ''Barbara Lippert's Critique: Hitting the Bull's-eye.'' Adweek,, August 22, 2005.

New Yorker 81, no. 24 (August 22, 2005).

Rowley, Laura. On Target: How the World's Hottest Retailer Hit a Bull's-eye. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley, 2003.

Wasserman, Edward. ''Turning an Esteemed Magazine into an Ad Tract.'' Journalism and Mass Communications, Washington and Lee University, September 9, 2005. Available from <http://journalism.wlu.edu/knightcom/09-19-05.html>

Jonathan Kolstad

TAKE CHARGE OF EDUCATION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With more than 860 stores and sales of $20.4 billion, Minneapolis, Minnesota–based Target in 1998 pursued a broad-based advertising and marketing effort designed to further an upscale image and bring in wealthier consumers. Thus it sought to distinguish itself from other companies in the discount-retail niche, and, in fact, its overall advertising strategy made it a standout: in line with the policies of parent company Dayton Hudson of Minneapolis (since renamed Target Corporation), the retailer had not had an agency of record. Rather, it had pursued a number of campaigns, the most prominent of which was its "Take Charge of Education" program, a television effort largely overseen by Martin/Williams of Minneapolis. Total spending for television, radio, print, and other forms of advertising by Target in 1998 was estimated at $50 million.

With "Take Charge of Education," the company promoted the fact that it would donate 1 percent of all purchases that customers made using its charge card, the Target Guest Card, directly to customer-designated schools, kindergarten through high school, as well as to a variety of other educational initiatives, including scholarships and arts programs. One of the principal offerings of the campaign was a 30-second spot in which a hapless boy played by child actor Alan James Morgan made a mess of customers' cars at a school-sponsored car wash. The humorous commercial promoted the Target program as a more efficient way to give money to schools.

The "Take Charge of Education" program successfully launched Target's school-funding initiative, which benefited local communities while also enhancing Target's brand equity by associating the brand with a relevant cause. The company expanded the program to include a Target Visa card that also made contributions on purchases made outside of Target stores. By 2006 the "Take Charge of Education" program had donated about $155 million to more than 108,000 schools.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1962 Dayton's, a Minneapolis-based department store chain, opened its first Target store in Roseville, Minnesota. It was a good year for discount chains: Wal-Mart and Kmart, Target's leading competitors, also began business in 1962. From the beginning, however, Target pursued a strategy that set it apart from other discounters, emphasizing an image of high quality alongside its low prices.

Dayton's in 1969 merged with another retailer, Hudson, to create Dayton Hudson. Meanwhile, Target grew rapidly, from four stores at the end of 1962 to a chain of 24 stores eight years later. In the 1970s and 1980s growth accelerated rapidly through acquisitions. With the purchase of a 16-store chain in the western United States, Target in 1971 moved into Colorado, Iowa, and Oklahoma, and purchases in 1980 and 1983 expanded it throughout the Midwest and West Coast, respectively.

In 1990, with 420 stores nationwide, the company opened the first of its Target Greatland stores, which were half again as large as regular Target facilities up to that time. Target stores became even bigger in 1995, with the introduction of the first SuperTargets, 175,000-square-foot units that offered groceries in addition to the items traditionally available in a department store. By the late 1990s, as it expanded rapidly along the East Coast, Target had begun to position itself as a fashionable discount chain, one that appealed to customers whose purchases were driven as much by a sense of style and quality as by price.

The founder of Target's parent company, George Draper Dayton, set the tone for Target's philanthropy. In 1918 he founded the Dayton Foundation, and his family would later commit the predecessor of Target Corporation to donating 5 percent of profits to charity. In fact, his grandsons, Bruce and Kenneth Dayton, who ran the family business in the 1960s and 1970s, were veritable zealots when it came to urging other companies to give back to their communities. Thus, it was no mere marketing ploy for Target in the 1990s to establish the "Take Charge of Education" program, in which the company pledged to donate 1 percent of all consumer purchases on a Target Guest Card to any school (kindergarten through 12th grade) of the customers' choice. In 1998 Target began a marketing effort to promote the program.

TARGET MARKET

From the beginning, Target's image was that of a high-end discounter, with an appeal somewhere between that of dollar stores and bargain basements on the one hand and pricey chains such as Bloomingdale's or Marshall Field's on the other. Certainly a niche existed between these two extremes, and Target sought to fill it by offering customers a pleasant shopping environment. Stores were designed so as to be well lit, with broader aisles than those of a typical discount chain. During the 1990s the company increasingly offered more fashionable lines of housewares and clothing, designed to appeal to a younger, wealthier clientele.

Company surveys had found that the typical Target shopper was about 40 years old and enjoyed a household annual income of just under $50,000. Hence the thrust of its "Grab Your Own Style" marketing in 1998, which, in the words of Lisa Vincenti in HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, "downplays [the company's] hallmark bull's eye," a logo associated in many minds with low prices. Instead, Sunday newspaper inserts in May 1998 "sent a new message to American households: contemporary, sophisticated, and coordinated home decorating ideas." As Vincenti noted, customers had come to jokingly refer to Target as "Tar-jay" or "Tar-zhay," with a French-style pronunciation to indicate its newer upscale image.

According to Jeffrey Arlen in Discount Store News, Target was at the front end of an industry-wide move "to change the long-time retailing mantra from 'location, location, location' to 'image, image, image.'" As Arlen observed, "No mass merchant has taken this concept to heart with more sincerity than Target Stores. By coupling clever, sophisticated advertising with sharp on-trend merchandising in a mutually beneficial way, it can be argued that the store has successfully created a niche of its own." An industry executive told Arlen that Target "truly understands the importance not just of merchandising . . . but of combining the merchandise with marketing for their customers . . . No matter what your income demographic, there is no negative to shopping in the Target stores."

COMPETITION

The largest retail chain in America, and the largest retailer of any kind, was Wal-Mart Stores, which in 1998 had an annual budget of $172 million in measured media—more than three times Target's advertising budget. Far behind the massive Arkansas retailer was Kmart, putting Target in third place, well ahead of J.C. Penney and the ailing giant Sears Roebuck. Significantly, in December 1997 Sears hired Robert Thacker, former vice president of marketing for Target, to run its strategic marketing and promotion.

According to Bob Geiger of the Minneapolis–Saint Paul Star Tribune, Thacker was responsible for the "seamless" look of Target's marketing, a feat in itself since the company had accounts with more than a dozen advertising agencies and other creative sources. Thacker's move to Sears came at a critical time for that company, which sought in part to imitate Target's winning strategy: as with Target, Geiger wrote, "image is an equally critical issue for Sears, which has attempted in recent years to lure more upper-middle-class shoppers to its stores."

Target pursued a strategy of keeping prices lower than those of Sears or Kohl's Department Stores, another strong competitor, but higher than Wal-Mart's or Kmart's. It also increasingly pursued a strategy of providing a whole range of furnishings, just as Sears, Montgomery Ward, and J.C. Penney had once done. Target, with its line of housewares designed by architect Michael Graves, went head to head with Kmart's Martha Stewart collection—and with the offerings of high-end retailers such as Pottery Barn, Crate & Barrel, and Bed Bath & Beyond. Hence a retail consultant's appraisal of the last-named retailer's reaction to Target's massive "Grab Your Own Style" promotion, as quoted by Vincenti in HFN: it "runs right into their underwear."

TARGET ON THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT

In January 1999 Target ran a full-page ad in USA Today showing the Washington Monument alongside the company's well-known bull's-eye logo. This followed advertising for American Airlines using photos of natural wonders in Utah as well as scenes from the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, all of which prompted Mark Johnson of the Seattle Times to write, "Corporate advertisers have cut deals to use national monuments in ads that, at first glance, look like Smokey the Bear has sold his soul."

In fact both ads promoted preservation of monuments, and indeed both Target and American Airlines—along with other companies using similar advertising—had donated millions of dollars to the nonprofit National Park Foundation. Target, for instance, had made a gift of $6.5 million for the restoration of the Washington Monument. "It's kind of a two-pronged win for us," Target spokeswoman Carolyn Brookter told Johnson, "being able to help a good cause and get the visibility." This type of "cause-related marketing" began in 1984 with advertisements for American Express that noted that for every time consumers used their American Express cards, the company would donate a small percentage of their purchases to the restoration of the Statue of Liberty.

Foundation rules, along with federal guidelines, dictated that tobacco manufacturers, liquor companies, and corporations involved in litigation with the Department of the Interior were not allowed to use national monuments in their advertising; furthermore, use of corporate logos should be limited. These rules, Johnson wrote, "may seem a little silly given the commercials that already exist, such as the Statue of Liberty picking up and admiring an Oldsmobile or the United Airlines ad depicting a Thomas Jefferson statue pulling a carry-on suitcase."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the late 1990s Target's marketing seemed to be everywhere. Thus the company in 1997 moved increasingly into a relatively new field, running a 90-second commercial aired in movie theaters nationwide. Such advertising was much less expensive than airing a traditional television spot, and with the increasing segmentation of the television market, it helped the company reach sometimes elusive consumers. Yet even Rod Eaton, Target's national director of sales promotion, professed surprise when a Target spot actually drew cheers from a movie audience. After all, audiences who had paid as much as $8 for a movie ticket might be inclined to consider commercials an intrusion. The spot, created by HMS partners, featured "a blonde woman in a 'North African' bazaar," according to Diane Richard of Minneapolis–St. Paul CityBusiness, "who exchanges a mysterious note for a package that, lo and behold, contains chocolate chip cookies, a note from Mom, and a Target Sunday circular."

Target also pursued joint advertising with other companies, a strategy already adopted in 1997. Thus it teamed with Revlon and Hachette Filipacchi Magazines, Inc., for an advertising supplement to the December 1998 issue of Elle magazine. The nine-page section, entitled "C'est Target," showed models wearing Revlon cosmetics and clothing from Target. In November 1998 Target joined Columbia TriStar Television Distribution (CTTD) in a $10 million cross-promotional deal tied to the variety talk show Donny & Marie, starring singers Donny and Marie Osmond. In part through Target the Family, its in-store publication, the company heavily promoted the Donny & Marie tie-in.

December 1997 had seen Target's first-ever network television special, Snowden on Ice, which aired on CBS. The show was built around a snowman character, and throughout 1998 Target promoted Snowden spin-offs such as a $15 plush toy. More Snowden marketing followed at Christmas of 1998, along with a 30-second Christmas spot created by Peterson Milla Hooks of Minneapolis, the latter featuring the Rosemary Clooney song "Come On-a My House."

A number of these campaigns were tied in some way to Target's community-service efforts on behalf of schools. The latter was most forcefully promoted in "Take Charge of Education," for which Martin/Williams had created a spot called "Ding Dong" in 1997. "Ding Dong" starred Morgan, who went from door to door selling products that ranged from candy bars to birdseed in order to raise money for his school. Morgan had "charmed viewers with his nervous sales pitches," Aaron Baar wrote in Adweek, and in a 1998 spot the boy was shown to be "up to the same old tricks . . . working at a school car wash, backing one car into another and soaking everything." According to Baar, "His bumbling antics and commentary . . . are intended to remind viewers that Target's Guest Card . . . is an easier way to support education."

"Take Charge of Education" became a mainstay of Target's community-outreach programs. It was expanded to include a school-uniform program in which Target credit-card holders received 10 percent off, and in 1999 the company worked with Golden Books Entertainment on the "Read-In" literacy program, which provided books for children to read in Target stores while their parents shopped. For its part, Target produced nearly 100,000 flyers about the program, which were distributed to elementary-school teachers. In 2001 Target introduced a Target Visa card, aimed at customers who preferred not to carry several charge cards. Target took advantage of the new card to benefit the "Take Charge of Education" program. As with the Target Guest Card, by using the Target Visa for purchases at Target stores, customers donated 1 percent of the total to the school of their choice, but in addition, purchases on the card outside of the store also resulted in a one-half percent donation to the school. Target sweetened the pot even more in 2005 with the "Twice as Nice for Your School" promotion. All program donations were doubled on purchases made from July 24 through September 10, 2005. The concept was also extended to another Target charity. All health-related or pharmacy purchases resulted in a donation to St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, the United States' largest center for treating children with pediatric cancer and other serious illnesses.

OUTCOME

The "Take Charge of Education" program and the marketing effort behind it were successful on a number of levels. From the time the program began, in 1997, through 2006, Target donated in excess of $154 million to schools and other educational programs. All told, 9 million Target customers enrolled in the "Take Charge" program, and more than 108,000 schools received twice-yearly checks from Target to be used in any way they chose, whether it be for books, basic supplies, computers, or grants. Not only was the program worthwhile philanthropy, but it also served Target's business interests. Target officials were, however, generally reluctant to boast about the program, and it was clear that charitable giving had been part of the corporate culture for decades. Frank Clancy of the New York Times reported, "Internal research showed that customers enrolled in this program spent significantly more at Target than other charge card customers." Moreover, Target's commitment to education and other charitable causes helped to elevate its brand, creating value that was likely worth far more than what the company donated. Finally, the "Take Charge of Education" marketing campaign succeeded on a creative level. In October 1998 ad agency OptionOne was recognized in Promo magazine's annual World PRO Awards of Excellence for its "School Fundraising Made Simple" and "School Connection" programs, both tied to "Take Charge of Education."

FURTHER READING

Arlen, Jeffrey. "Target: Aiming for a Niche of Its Own." Discount Store News, April 19, 1999.

Baar, Aaron. "Target Stores." Adweek (midwest ed.), January 5, 1998, p. 25.

———. "Target's New Style." Adweek (midwest ed.), April 13, 1998, p. 8.

"Brand Building." Chain Drug Review, February 15, 1999.

Clancy, Frank. "Concern in Minneapolis as Target Remakes an Icon." New York Times, November 20, 2000, p. F14.

Cuneo, Alice Z.. "Retailers Put Extra Polish on Their Brand Image, Retail: TV Ads More Important than Ever for Target Stores." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998, p. S22.

Friedman, Wayne. "'Donny & Marie' Gets Targeted." Hollywood Reporter, November 19, 1998, p. 40.

Geiger, Bob. "Target Vice President Robert Thacker Moves to Sears." Minneapolis–St. Paul Star Tribune, December 29, 1997, p. D2.

Halkias, Maria. "Penney Brings in Da Noise: Retailer's Magazine Aimed at Teen Market." Dallas Morning News, April 6, 1999, p. D1.

Johnson, Mark. "Ads Feature National Parks, Landmarks in Dual Publicity." Seattle Times, February 14, 1999, p. A18.

Richard, Diane. "Target Debuts Ad Campaign on the Big Screen." Minneapolis–St. Paul CityBusiness, May 30, 1997, p. 1.

"Target Takes Charge of Education." Science Activities, Winter 2006, p. 42.

Tellijohn, Andrew. "Target Visa Tested in 3 Markets." Minneapolis–St. Paul CityBusiness, May 25, 2001, p. 1.

Vincenti, Lisa. "Aggressive Target Launches a Marketing 'Glitzkrieg,'" HFN: The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network, May 18, 1998, p. 1.

Warner, Fara, and Joseph B. Cahill. "Republic Industries Names an Executive from Sears, John Costello, as President." Wall Street Journal, December 7, 1998, p. B9.

Judson Knight
Ed Dinger

Thomas Cook Tour Operations Ltd

The Thomas Cook Business Park
Coningsby Road
Peterborough, PE3 8SB
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 8702 430416
Web site: www.flythomascook.com

■■■

PERSPECTIVES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 approximately 120,000 young European vacationers, mostly British, booked their vacations through Thomas Cook Tour Operations Ltd's Club 18-30, the United Kingdom's largest booking agency for 18- to 30-year-olds. The service offered Britons more than 14 sun-drenched destinations, including Spain, Greece, the Canary Islands, Ibiza, and Turkey. The company had previously gained notoriety for its risqué advertising. In 1995 the British Advertising Standards Authority (ASA) forced a Club 18-30 campaign, created by ad agency Saatchi & Saatchi and titled "Beaver España," to cease after hundreds of complaints were made regarding the campaign's sexual implications. Undeterred, in 2002 Club 18-30 released a similarly suggestive campaign titled "Perspectives" that attempted, as its executives explained, to present an "honest reflection" of what young people did on vacation.

Created in late 2001 by Saatchi & Saatchi with an estimated $1 million budget, "Perspectives" consisted of three print spots, "Pool," "Beach," and "Bar." At first look, each print ad portrayed beautiful young people engaged in normal resort activities such as throwing a Frisbee at the beach, sunbathing poolside, or socializing inside a bar. Upon closer inspection the youth in each photograph were juxtaposed to suggest various sexual acts. To avoid the backlash "Beaver España" had received from older consumers, "Perspectives" appeared only in magazines targeting young males.

The campaign helped Club 18-30 maintain its position as industry leader, but its sexual content elicited a range of negative responses from critics and advertising judges. Nancy Vonk, a judge for the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, said that she hated the ads. Enough festival judges in 2002 favored the ads, however, to award "Perspectives" the Grand Prix award and a Gold Lion in the poster category. Another festival judge, Olivier Altmann, told Brand Republic, "They were fresh, enjoyable and enthusiastic. You can stay in front of them for 10 minutes and have a deep relationship with each ad."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Club 18-30 had been targeting partygoers long before "Perspectives" came to fruition. Founded by David Heard in 1965, Club 18-30 first booked 580 vacationers to Costa Brava, Spain, under the tagline "Your granny wouldn't like it." In 1994 Saatchi & Saatchi won Club 18-30's advertising account and released a campaign with the tagline "Holidays your mother wouldn't like." Moray MacLennan, Saatchi & Saatchi's joint managing director, told Campaign in 1994, "Our task is to build the profile of Club 18-30, which has been out of the market for some time. The company has to make a lot of noise."

The next year Club 18-30 released its highly controversial ''Beaver España'' campaign, which used print and outdoor mediums. One image featured a close-up of boxer shorts with the tagline ''Girls, can we interest you in a package holiday?'' Another ad's copy stated, ''It's not all sex, sex, sex. There's a bit of sun and sea as well.'' After the ASA received more than 500 complaints regarding the campaign's indecency, the advertising watchdog banned ''Beaver España'' billboards and posters. Much to Club 18-30's delight, the order was carried out on the exact day the campaign was scheduled to end. Saatchi & Saatchi continued to handle the company's advertising. In a 1995 television spot it created for Club 18-30, titled ''Mosquito,'' a mosquito drank the blood from a young man's buttock. After drinking its fill of alcohol-rich blood, the intoxicated insect buzzed off and smacked into a window.

Leading up to ''Perspectives,'' Saatchi & Saatchi wanted to release a campaign that, in the ad agency's opinion, honestly depicted what young partygoers did on vacation. James Griffiths, a director at Saatchi & Saatchi, explained to the Sunday Telegraph, ''If you get a lot of young people on holiday, sex happens. It's just that nobody talks about it, and Club 18-30 are not afraid of being honest and saying, 'This is what happens; this is what we're about.'''

JUXTAPOSED

In late 2001 eight young women and eight young men were photographed on the Mediterranean island of Ibiza for the controversial ''Perspectives'' campaign. After photographing the models on the beach, beside a pool, and inside a bar, the ad agency Saatchi & Saatchi flew the models back to London. Their photographs were later juxtaposed for three print ads titled ''Pool,'' ''Beach,'' and ''Bar.''

At first glance, the young people shown in the three ads seemed to be participating in wholesome activities. For the print ad ''Pool,'' two young men tossed a beach ball back and forth. Upon closer inspection, however, one of the men seemed to be groping a girl standing poolside. The 16 models chosen for the shoot did not know how their images would later be used. One of the models, Mark Kavanagh, told the Liverpool Echo in October 2001, ''I still haven't seen the photos and they won't tell us what the adverts will be like, so I won't see them until everyone else does.''

TARGET MARKET

''Perspectives'' targeted vacationing partygoers over the age of 18. Saatchi & Saatchi purposely photographed 16 models with whom its audience would hopefully identify. Club 18-30 marketing manager Clare Burns explained to the Liverpool Echo why Mark Kavanagh, one of the models featured in ''Perspectives,'' was chosen. ''He's got lovely eyes which twinkle and he's good looking with a decent body. But not so good looking that lads looking for a holiday would think he's a model, rather than someone like themselves.''

The campaign's cheeky, sexual humor was something Saatchi & Saatchi believed its target would appreciate. Reuters News quoted Griffiths as explaining, ''The intention was to present an honest reflection of Club 18-30 in a humorous way. People go on these holidays to have fun. And when you talk about fun for people of that age group, sex and getting drunk tend to coincide.'' Using sexually suggestive imagery may have effectively resonated with young consumers, but it also incited a backlash from older audiences, including advertising-festival judges and international ad critics. Kirk Carr of Advertising Age wrote, ''It's been argued these ads are not offensive in the context of the media in which they ran or to the audience to which they were directed. Even so, honoring these ads as among the best that advertising has to offer is an embarrassment to the global advertising community.''

Pre-campaign research conducted by Saatchi & Saatchi suggested that Britain's youth was comfortable with sexual topics that had previously been considered taboo. A Club 18-30 spokesman explained in the Sunday Telegraph, ''Girls in particular are more liberated than boys were, even 20 years ago. Without a doubt the girls are more confident than before.'' Despite the spokesman's observation about liberated youth, much of the United Kingdom's general population was offended by such advertisements. According to a survey conducted by the ASA in July 2002, 19 percent of those surveyed were personally offended by ads they had viewed during the previous year, and 32 percent believed that ads they had witnessed would be offensive to someone they knew.

COMPETITION

Style Holidays, a U.K.-based vacation-booking agent, tried capturing Club 18-30's market with stylish brochures and low-priced vacation packages. Its sales for the Spanish beach areas of Costa Blanca grew 57 percent in 2001, and its bookings for Spain's island of Majorca rose 42 percent. Style Holidays' marketing manager, John Heyes, commented on the company's success in Travel Trade Gazette UK & Ireland: ''It is because of the quality of our product and because we're not greedy in terms of prices. There has been very little movement—less than two percent increases.'' Analysts believed that the increased number of bookings may have also resulted from the strengthening British currency and a spike in youth travel.

In 2002 British travel company First Choice's youth travel brand, 2wentys, rebranded its booking service to attract the ''sophisticated partygoer who wants a higher level of flexibility on holiday.'' The brand hired ad agency Main Artery to revamp its direct mailers, brochures, and website. Clare Tobin, the head of 2wentys, told Travel Trade Gazette UK & Ireland, ''We will highlight things that differentiate us from other brands, such as our customer service.'' The booking service devised a three-year strategy to grow 20 percent and overtake Club 18-30's industry lead. In 2001 the booking service's sales rose 15 percent over the previous year. The company also heavily promoted its November reunion parties, which attempted to re-create the party atmosphere of summer getaways.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In late 2001 Saatchi & Saatchi selected eight females and eight males to fly to Ibiza, a Spanish island and popular vacation destination located along the Mediterranean Sea. The 16 models, chosen for their modest attractiveness, were then photographed in different island locations. Three print images, ''Beach,'' ''Pool,'' and ''Bar,'' were chosen for the campaign. In the print ad ''Beach'' the models appeared on a sunny beach along the Mediterranean Sea. At first glance the bikini- and swim-trunk-wearing models were engaged in wholesome beach fun, such as throwing a Frisbee, playing paddleball, and lying out to sunbathe. Upon closer inspection the posture of each model intimated a different sexual act. A man preparing to swat an incoming paddleball also appeared to be spanking a bikini-clad girl. One man innocently gazed into the horizon, but his face was juxtaposed between the legs of a woman sunbathing. ''Usually photographs in ads have a single point of focus,'' Donald Gunn, creator of the Gunn Report, an ad-industry publication, told Advertising Age. ''These are like murals, or tableaux. You're likely to spend a minute with them rather than 10 seconds.''

In another spot, titled ''Bar,'' six young men and eight women were shown at a bar. The models seemed to be participating in typical bar behaviors, such as dancing, talking, and drinking beer. The models' expressions conveyed a relaxed and gregarious demeanor. When the ad was viewed more carefully, those featured could also be perceived as engaging in sexual acts ranging from groping to oral intercourse. Even though the ads' content was considered obscene by many, the ASA did not entirely ban them, allowing them to appear in magazines that targeted young males, such as Maxim and FHM. A Club 18-30 spokesman told the News of the World, ''There was no intention to offend. They are tongue in cheek.'' The ASA did register some complaints about the campaign, but not enough to warrant its cessation. Despite criticism, Club 18-30 and its agency stood behind the campaign's message. Griffiths of Saatchi & Saatchi told the Globe and Mail, ''It's honest. It doesn't try to pull the wool over anyone's eyes.''

In the third print ad, ''Pool,'' a mixture of 15 males and females were shown socializing around a luxurious swimming pool. Two males played pool at a nearby table. Everyone's expressions appeared innocent. As in the other two ads, the models' actions took on double meanings. One young man reaching for a beach ball also appeared to be groping a bikini-clad woman. Other images implied oral sex and masturbation.

OUTCOME

Not only did ''Perspectives'' help Club 18-30 maintain its position as Britain's leading vacation-booking company for partygoers, it also managed to be controversial enough to generate publicity for the brand yet tame enough to escape reprimand by advertising watchdogs. At the 2002 International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, several judges criticized the campaign for its provocative material and later lambasted the judges who awarded it the Grand Prix award. Cannes judge Nancy Vonk, cocreative director at ad agency Ogilvy & Mather in Toronto, told the Globe and Mail that she hated the campaign. She criticized her fellow judges who gave it the Grand Prix, stating, ''It's like giving Austin Powers an Oscar. It's a cheap pee-pee joke.'' Mike Hughes, another of the festival's judges, told Adweek, ''It's easy sex jokes. I'm not a PC type of guy, but I think a club that sells itself as a place to go for sex is coarse and rude.'' Judges who appreciated the print ads included Olivier Altmann, who explained to Adweek, ''It was the most fresh and the most enjoyable. They know the purpose [of such vacations] is to have sex. It's very honest advertising.''

FURTHER READING

Aaronovitch, David. ''It's People, Not Dogs, Who Are Being Demeaned.'' Independent (London), May 7, 2002, p. 15.

Burrell, Ian. ''The Ten Most Controversial Billboards.'' Independent (London), July 27, 2005, pp. 12–13.

Byrne, Ciar. ''It's No Longer 'Sex, Sex, Sex' as Club 18-30 Goes Upmarket.'' Independent (London), April 2, 2005, p. 15.

Faulkner, Scott. ''Mark's the Face of Fun in the Sun for 18-30 Jetsetters.'' Liverpool Echo, October 12, 2001, p. 3.

Hall, Emma. ''Club 18-30 Switches to Grown-Up Approach.'' Advertising Age, April 18, 2005, p. 22.

Heinzl, John. "Beautiful Bodies and British Cheek Catch Cannes Prize." Globe and Mail (Toronto, Ontario), June 21, 2002, p. B9.

McIntyre, Paul. "Furore over Sexy Ads." Ad News, June 21, 2002, p. 3.

Michael, Neil. "It's Club 18-Dirty." News of the World (London), April 28, 2002, p. 30.

Miller, Phil. "It's Sun, Sea, Sex, Sand and Celluloid for 18-30." Scotsman (Edinburgh), March 4, 2000, p. 3.

Milner, Catherine. "News: Club 18-30's 'Dog Porn' Advert Condemned." Sunday Telegraph (London), May 5, 2002, p. 6.

———. "Saatchi's Grand Prix Win a Close-Run Thing." Brand Republic, June 20, 2002, p. 1.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Sex, Studs and Deadly Sins." Adweek (eastern ed.), June 24, 2002, p. 28.

Pearlman, Julia. "Less 'Aggressive' Image Scores Results for Club 18-30 as Sales Climb." Brand Republic, March 16, 2005, p. 1.

Wentz, Laurel. "Sex Sells and Wins." Advertising Age, June 24, 2002, p. 76.

Kevin Teague

Time Warner, Inc.

1 Time Warner Center
New York, New York 10019-8016
USA
Telephone: (212) 484-8000
Web site: www.timewarner.com

■■■

CARTOON NETWORK PROMOTIONAL AND BRANDING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 Time Warner Inc.'s Cartoon Network, second in children's programming to Viacom Inc.'s Nickelodeon Network, was a 24-hour basic-cable service offering nonstop animated entertainment. Cartoon Network created and showcased original programming such as Dexter's Laboratory, Johnny Bravo, and Space Ghost Coast to Coast. Drawing from the world's largest cartoon library, it also relied heavily on reruns of such classic cartoon series as The Flintstones and Scooby-Doo along with the entire Warner Brothers cartoon archive. Time Warner and vice chairman Ted Turner hoped that Warner Brothers' material and its own ad campaigns would make Cartoon Network a top channel, with 60 million-plus subscribers, by the first years of the twenty-first century.

For the first time in the Cartoon Network's six-year history, advertisements for the network appeared outside of the channel's own programming, in the form of small television campaigns and cross-promotions with other brands. March 31, 1998, marked the debut of "Get Tooned," a campaign that resulted from the partnership between the Cartoon Network and food company Kraft Foods, Inc. Cartoon characters appeared on Kraft packaging. Several "Get Tooned" spots were created with the Cartoon Network's $53 million on-air budget. The network's senior vice president of on-air promotions, Michael Ouweleen, developed the fictional Cartoon Crisis Center for the spots, in which phone counselors humorously guided cartoon characters through the stress of cartoon stunts. The tagline for all the spots was "Screwy, Ain't It?" The next year the Cartoon Network released a nationwide promotion titled "Coaster 2 Coaster" in conjunction with Six Flags theme parks. In 1999 the network formed a cross-branding campaign with the snack maker Pepperidge Farms titled "Ultimate Cartoon Hangout." Similar promotions and branding campaigns continued into 2006.

In November 2000 the Cartoon Network met its goal with 67.5 million U.S. subscribers and 145 million subscribers worldwide. The campaigns also earned several ad-industry awards, including a 2002 Gold One Show award in the category of Consumer TV (Various Lengths). In 2004 one spot garnered a gold medal for media promotion at the Golden Award of Montreux, an advertising festival held in Switzerland.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cartoon Network was launched in 1992 when Turner Broadcasting, Inc., acquired the 8,500-cartoon Hanna-Barbera and MGM cartoon libraries. After a tough start, Cartoon Network began to grow rapidly during the mid-1990s. The network was able to challenge the cable children's channel Nickelodeon, in markets where they competed, with little more than reruns of old Hanna-Barbera cartoons like Scooby-Doo and The Jetsons. Early in 1994 the burgeoning cable channel finally broke even thanks to high ratings. Limited channel capacity and re-regulation, however, meant its subscriber base faced a challenge in moving much past 11 million homes.

In 1995 Turner Broadcasting merged with international media conglomerate Time Warner. That alliance brought additional material from the vast Warner Brothers library, including a complete set of Bugs Bunny and Daffy Duck cartoons. The merger, with its influx of new programming, helped propel Cartoon Network to even more robust growth. ''Cartoon Network may have just turned 4 years old, but it's not acting like a toddler,'' announced network president Betty Cohen in 1996. ''Where we aren't on yet, we're usually either first or second in line. You're never happy [with your subscriber count], but at least those 30 million homes are real homes that haven't been acquired through cash payments or retransmission-consent deals.''

The network added 16 million subscribers between December 1996 and December 1997 alone. By the end of 1997 the channel was available in nearly 50 million homes nationwide. Viewership grew correspondingly, according to Nielsen Media Research; by February 1998 it was in seventh place in prime-time ratings among the top 20 cable channels. That growth enabled Cartoon Network to embark upon an aggressive promotional push for 1998, many aspects of which involved cartoon characters in lieu of flesh-and-blood stars.

FLIGHT OF THE BOOMERANG

How many cartoon networks could one market sustain? In July 1999 Turner Broadcasting decided to try answering that question when it announced plans to introduce a second cable television channel featuring all-day and all-night cartoons. The new channel, to be called Boomerang, was scheduled to begin airing on April Fools' Day, 2000.

The launch of Boomerang marked a shift in strategy for Cartoon Network. The first network would now focus on airing original cartoons, while Boomerang featured cartoons from the company's Hanna-Barbera library. ''Boomerang would serve baby boomers and kids ages 2 to 7,'' explained Cartoon Network president Betty Cohen. ''These people have told us they want more of the old Hanna-Barbera cartoons.'' In contrast, Cartoon Network would be marketed more to middle-graders, teenagers, and young adults who, studies showed, favored contemporary animation. To boost original production, Turner Broadcasting planned to create a separate animation studio for Cartoon Network. The Atlanta-based cable giant hoped to lease a building and renovate it into a state-of-the-art facility in Los Angeles.

Boomerang's creation reminded many cable industry analysts of a strategy Turner Broadcasting followed with its TNT and Turner Classic Movies channels. At first, TNT featured old movies from Turner Broadcasting's vast film library. Then the channel switched to airing films made in the 1970s and 1980s and live sports programming. The company then moved its old movies to a new channel, Turner Classic Movies.

TARGET MARKET

Cartoon Network saw its marketing mission as selling ''the cartoon spirit, its zaniness,'' according to Cohen. ''That way we appeal to the kid in everyone, even the adult market, which is crazy for cartoons.'' While the principal market for cartoons was children ages 2 to 11, the network was able to broaden its base considerably by playing on the nostalgia of adult viewers as well. Worldwide, more than 35 percent of Cartoon Network's audience were adults, a fact that made it especially attractive to advertisers. Besides such traditional children's show advertisers as Nestlé and Procter & Gamble, companies that focused on adults, such as Max Factor, bought time on the Cartoon Network.

As an illustration of this trend, one of the Cartoon Network's top-rated shows was Scooby-Doo, a 1970s Hanna-Barbera series about a group of teenage sleuths and a dim-witted Great Dane who drove around in a psychedelic van solving mysteries. Children ages 2 to 11 made up 68 percent of the audience for Scooby-Doo, while adults comprised 25 percent. Nostalgia for the animated characters of their youth explained the show's appeal to adults. ''From 1969 to 1991, Scooby was never out of production,'' explained Fred Seibert, Hanna-Barbera's president. ''You have 22 years of audiences with fresh Scooby-Doo episodes in their minds. All those people are now at the age where they have enough time, enough memory, and enough money to capture the parts of their lives they enjoyed the most.''

COMPETITION

Nickelodeon was the reigning king of cable television children's programming in the 1990s, capturing over 50 percent of the children's television market. As of 1999 Nickelodeon's Rugrats was entrenched as the most popular cartoon program on television (most weeks the show was among the top 15 basic cable programs, with a typical audience of more than 3 million). Several channels posed a challenge to Nickelodeon's dominance, however, including Walt Disney, Fox, the Cartoon Network, and the three major networks.

Historically, Cartoon Network provided the stiffest competition for Nickelodeon. As early as 1996 independent research showed that, in homes that got both Nickelodeon and Cartoon Network, Nickelodeon's ratings were lower among viewers ages 2 to 11 than in homes that did not have Cartoon Network. The two cable networks employed similar methods in competing for the same audience. Like Nickelodeon, Cartoon Network worked extremely hard to market itself as a safe and fun television haven for children. "It's like the reruns that do better on [Nickelodeon spin-off] Nick at Nite than they would somewhere else—the network has created a destination," said Cohen. "A cartoon that runs on our network and that also runs on another Turner network, like TBS or TNT, will do better with us, because we're a destination."

On the other hand, there were also some salient differences in the ways Nickelodeon and Cartoon Network pursued their viewers. "If Nickelodeon is about empowering kids, Cartoon Network is about freedom to be wacky and zany," explained Joe Uva, president of sales and marketing for Turner Broadcasting. Cartoon Network also gained a competitive advantage against Nickelodeon because it was the only network devoted to full-time children's programming.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"We are the champions of all things 'cartoony,'" Craig McAnsh, Cartoon Network's senior vice president of marketing, said in explaining the cable channel's personality. "If something can come from the world of cartoons, smash through the glass of a TV set, and somehow penetrate a kid's life, then we've achieved that personality. We are cranky, surprising, and a little irreverent. Our tonality tries to reinforce all those things."

Cartoon Network's 1998 television advertising campaign was designed to reflect that iconoclastic "tonality." In one series of spots, "Cartoon Crisis Center," created in-house by Michael Ouweleen, creative director and senior vice president of on-air promotions for the network, telephone counselors manned emergency hotlines in a Cartoon Crisis Center. In one representative spot, "Ledge," a crisis counselor was depicted talking to a cartoon character who had walked off a ledge. He told the animated creation what to expect: first his legs would run in place while funny music played, then he would fall to the ground, creating a hole in his exact outline, and finally, he would walk off making accordion noises. The tagline for all the spots was "Screwy, Ain't It?" "That campaign went a long way to helping define our personality," said McAnsh.

In addition to these commercials, Cartoon Network ran $53 million worth of on-air sponsored promotions in 1998. That year the network completed its on-air promotional calendar by mid-April, achieving its earliest and most profitable yearlong schedule of corporate-sponsored on-air events to date. In one such promotion, Cartoon Network and Kraft Foods—a major children's advertiser that had been a mainstay partner with Nickelodeon—struck a $10 million deal to feature the Cartoon Network logo and animated characters on some 80 million boxes of macaroni and cheese, cereals, and other foods popular with children. Cartoon Network characters appeared on Kraft products through March 31, 1998, as part of a publicity campaign called "Get Tooned." Among those products were Post brand cereals, Hand-Snacks, Kool-Aid, and Kraft Singles. Cartoon Network also conducted a contest that awarded one lucky child a free trip to Hollywood. The winner was featured in an original two-minute cartoon produced by the channel's animators. "This helps us plant our brand name in areas where we're not always visible," said Jodi Tull, the channel's director of promotion marketing. "We're also partnering with a brand that is already powerful with kids."

The "Get Tooned" promotion was a breakthrough in several ways for Cartoon Network. It was the first time the channel had promoted itself outside of television advertising. The Kraft deal also represented the first time Cartoon Network used characters from both its Hanna-Barbera and Warner Brothers Looney Tunes libraries in a promotion campaign. Daffy Duck, the Tasmanian Devil, and Marvin the Martian were among the Looney Tunes characters. The Hanna-Barbera characters included Scooby-Doo, Yogi Bear, and a new one called Dexter.

Dexter was also featured in a giveaway featuring Dexter-related toys and a Dexter Laboratory built in the winning child's bedroom as the grand prize. Cartoons tied in with Discovery Zone for on-air spots in this promotion, which also featured the zany Dexter Mobile, a specially equipped bus that toured 25 cities and 64 stops in 90 days, including Discovery Zone locations, Six Flags theme parks, and various malls. The Dexter Mobile events were organized in conjunction with Beyond DDB, Chicago, a division of the ad agency DDB Needham Worldwide. Additional tour sponsors included Schering-Plough Corp.'s Coppertone, Gardetto's, and Nestlé Foods. The Dexter tour provided another example of the way in which Cartoon Network branded itself.

"The promotion was very much about treating our characters as stars," said Cohen.

Cartoon Network's other on-air sponsored promotions in 1998 included Coaster 2 Coaster, a spring contest to send children on a roller coaster journey across the United States sponsored by Six Flags Theme Parks, got milk?, and Zoinks!; an October celebration of the ever-popular Scooby-Doo and the 25th anniversary of Lego; and Say When!, an annual toy-driven holiday fantasy from Hasbro Toys and Games. Finally, Toonami, Cartoon Network's afternoon adventure programming block, provided a launching ground for instant on-air giveaways for premiere toy manufacturers Nintendo, Bandai America, and Hasbro Toys and Games. "We could not ask for a more prominent list of sponsors to be involved in Cartoon Network integrated promotions," declared McAnsh. "It's a compliment to us that recognized industry leaders such as these choose to align themselves with our emerging brand of cartoon entertainment."

To supplement the on-air promotional spots, Cartoon Network's Cartoon Branding Group created a number of major brand extensions in 1998, including retail, music, theme parks, and publishing. On the retail side, the network partnered with Six Flags Over Georgia in Atlanta for the 31,000-square-foot Cartoon Network Superstore. There was also a Camp Cartoon Network section at Six Flags Great America park in Gurnee, Illinois, featuring a number of rides tied to cartoon characters. On the music side, Cartoon produced character-titled music CDs in a partnership with Kid Rhino Records.

Time Warner connections also played a key part in Cartoon Network's 1998 marketing strategies. The network experimented with stand-alone, branded sections inside some Warner Brothers Studio stores. Publishing partner DC Comics, also owned by parent Time Warner, produced comics and activity books featuring Cartoon Network characters. And in a major Warner Brothers children's direct-to-home video release, Scooby-Doo on Zombie Island, Cartoon Network inserted a trailer hyping its upcoming new series The Powerpuff Girls and Ed, Edd n Eddy.

In 1999 Cartoon Network partnered with another provider of children's snacks, Pepperidge Farm, for the "Ultimate Cartoon Hangout" campaign. Characters from cartoons were placed on two million packages of Pepperidge Farm Flavor Blasted Goldfish Crackers. A 60-second commercial that mixed cartoons with computer-animated Pepperidge Farm Goldfish also aired on the network. To promote its popular Powerpuff Girls cartoon, Cartoon Network joined with Nintendo in 2000 to create a Game Boy video game featuring Powerpuff characters. Cartoon Network then gave away 500 Game Boy Color systems and Powerpuff Girls games via an on-air promotion.

In early 2002 Cartoon Network serviced 77.7 million subscribers and was about to campaign for one of the highest-grossing movies of the year. Movie critics predicted failure for the feature-length film Scooby-Doo, which was based on one of the Cartoon Network's most popular cartoons. The movie lacked A-list actors and was financed by AOL Time Warner, one of the smaller studios in the movie industry. Nonetheless, on its opening weekend the movie earned $56.4 million, more than any other movie that month, according to the Wall Street Journal. The film's success was partially credited to its heavy promotion on Cartoon Network. Scooby-Doo advertisements targeted not only children but also adults who had watched the show during the 1970s and 1980s. Time Warner specifically advertised Scooby-Doo to adults by featuring ads on AOL's website.

OUTCOME

Cartoon Network's advertisements and its on-air and off-air promotions helped it achieve exceptional ratings and delivery gains in 1998. The campaigns helped propel Cartoon Network to second place among basic-cable networks in the 6- to 11-year-old demographic group in total day Nielsen ratings during the summer, right after Nickelodeon. One successful campaign, "Dexter's Duplication Summer," promoting the network's original animated series Dexter's Laboratory, drew 35 million phone calls over eight weeks—despite the fact that the toll-free phone number was only flashed on the screen once a day.

The strong performance of Cartoon Network's marketing programs and brand campaign earned the cable channel widespread industry recognition, including several awards. Advertising Age magazine named Cartoon Network its 1998 Cable TV Marketer of the Year. At the 22nd annual One Show Awards in New York, sponsored by the One Club for Art & Copy, Cartoon Network won gold in the 30-second campaign category for its internally created image campaign and took a silver in the 30-second single-spot category for "Ledge." The network also won several Golden Marble Awards at the first annual Advertising to Kids Conference, hosted by Brunico Marketing of Los Angeles. The judges consisted of a panel of senior creative professionals from ad agencies and from the children's entertainment industry. The campaign later won two Gold One Show awards, one in the Consumer TV (Various Lengths) category and one in the Consumer TV (Under $50,000 Budget) category. In 2004 one spot, titled "Duck vs. Rabbit," which was created by the animation studio Cuppa Coffee, collected a gold medal at the Golden Award of Montreux, an international advertising competition held in Switzerland. The spot promoted a 12-hour marathon of Bugs Bunny and Daffy Duck cartoons.

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, negatively affected ratings for both Nickelodeon and the Cartoon Network. One year later, however, Cartoon Network's ratings bounced back; from the fourth quarter of 2002 to the first quarter of 2003, the daytime delivery for Cartoon Network rose 8 percent for children between 2 and 11 years old, according to the data analysts Nielsen Media Research.

As much as the Cartoon Network increased its subscriber base, Nickelodeon increased its own even more and continued to dominate the children's television market. In 2002 Nickelodeon reported its best year ever. With hit shows such as Blue's Clues, Little Bear, Dora the Explorer, Bill Cosby's Little Bill, and Franklin, Nickelodeon remained the leader in 2003 and ranked number one for children ages 2 to 5. Its share of the 2- to 11-year-old market grew 3 points in 2003.

FURTHER READING

Ault, Susanne. "Mattel Motors to Warner to Distrib Hot Wheels Titles." Video Business, February 14, 2005, p. 5.

Carvell, Tim, and Joe McGowan. "Showdown in Toontown." Fortune, October 28, 1996, p.100.

Curry, Sheree. "A Seller's Market." Television Week, April 14, 2003, p. 22.

Lippman, John, and Bruce Orwall. "'Scooby-Doo,' Where Are You?" Wall Street Journal, June 17, 2002, p. B5.

Ross, Chuck. "Cartoon Network: Cable TV Marketer of the Year." Advertising Age, November 30, 1998, p. S1.

Robert Schnakenberg
Kevin Teague

THE WORLD'S MOST INTERESTING MAGAZINE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the early 1990s media watchers predicted the death of the weekly news magazines, yet Time magazine seemed as strong or stronger than ever in 1997. To succeed in changing times, the magazine adapted by emphasizing the depth, interest, and insight it brought to a wide span of subjects.

Introduced in 1996, Time's "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign grew to include more than 50 color print ads. The series, from the advertising agency Fallon McElligott, featured large, compelling photographs with a key section boxed by the Time icon—the magazine's name within a red border. The mostly print campaign ran first and foremost in Time but also appeared in several other Time Warner publications-Sports Illustrated, Money, and Fortune —as well as some trade journals.

One ad featured an aerial shot of a forest and road engulfed in smoke. A stream of emergency vehicles headed into what looked like a major forest fire. With the Time icon partially hidden by the smoke, the copy read, "If there's a story in there, we'll find it." Another ad showed X Game competitors in helmets and bright colored leathers whisking around a race track corner. The leader's helmet was boxed by the Time icon, and the copy read "824 words on the X Games. (And only two of them were 'dude.')" A sports ad used the Time icon to frame boxer Evander Holyfield's ear just after Mike Tyson had bitten it. The copy read, "What kind of bandage can boxing possibly put on this?" When a gorilla nurtured and protected a three-year-old boy who had fallen into her enclosure at a zoo, Time used the photograph in the campaign with the line, "A weekly reminder that the world is a pretty amazing place." The only ad in the campaign that did not use copy showed a heavily perspiring President Bill Clinton framed by a red box. It ran early in 1998 during the height of speculation about the President's relationship with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

Time used this series to stress the depth and breath of its coverage. The magazine wanted to move beyond the usual assumptions about weekly news magazines and broaden people's view of what they could find within Time. Building brand affinity was another campaign goal. The campaign demonstrated that the 75-year-old magazine covered not only hard news and major world events but also technology, business, sports, lifestyle, and entertainment.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

For several years the three major weekly news magazines—Time, Newsweek, and U.S. News & World Report—had been called dinosaurs. The theory was that with so many up-and-coming news sources (cable news stations like CNN and MSNBC, television talk shows, national editions of newspapers, the Internet, week-in-review sections) the weekly news magazines were not needed. But instead of disappearing, the magazines gained strength while some competitors—newspapers and network TV—struggled to stay afloat.

Critics claimed the weekly news magazines were losing their hard news edge and pampering readers by featuring pop culture stories. They pointed out that during a week when India and Pakistan were testing nuclear bombs, Time devoted its cover to the death of entertainer Frank Sinatra. While in 1987 Time's cover featured government or foreign affairs 23 times, by 1997 that number dwindled to five. The number of celebrity covers changed little over this 10-year span—from seven in 1987 to eight in 1997.

Time began stressing elements such as human interest stories, entertainment, health and science, and women's issues and lifestyle that had formerly been associated with other types of magazines, such as Reader's Digest, People, Prevention, and Ladies Home Journal. The magazine also changed format, going for a more graphic look, shorter articles, and more photographs and charts. And it produced more special issues covering colleges, personal finance, health, business, and technology. These changes needed to be communicated and explained to the Time audience.

"The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign grew directly out of Time's 1995 campaign, "Understanding Comes with Time." To deal with the "dinosaur issue," the 1995 campaign reasserted the value of the weekly news magazine. The campaign sought to emphasize that while there were many different outlets through which to receive news, many of them provided headline news without the depth, perspective, and insight Time could provide. "Understanding Comes with Time " focused on the magazine's coverage of big news stories and its commitment to giving readers a fuller understanding of them. "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" carried on much of the look and feel of the earlier campaign but focused on the wide variety of subject matter and interests Time covered.

CLIENT IDEAS STRENGTHENED TIME CAMPAIGN

"Usually when they [Time] push us it's to get us to look at an issue from Time 's perspective," said the art director on the campaign, Bob Barry. For example, the agency proposed an ad about a bombing in Northern Ireland that killed three children. The photograph showed a crowd mourning at the funeral as three tiny caskets were carried in. The proposed headline illustrated more about the situation in Ireland than about the perspective that Time brought to the story: "What Will It Take To Achieve Peace in Ireland?" The magazine asked for a rewrite. Copy writer Dean Buckhorn wrote another headline that won quick approval: "We'll Let You Know If Ireland Can Also Wage Peace." "The client has been great," said Barry, "they have their opinions and they're usually right."

TARGET MARKET

Because Time strove not to increase circulation but to increase the quality of the audience within that circulation, the campaign targeted current Time subscribers. Historically the magazine has kept a close watch on the demographics of its readership and has kept its advertisers informed of the type of readers it has.

According to Pew Research Center, about 15 percent of all adult Americans regularly read Time, Newsweek, or U.S. News & World Report. Compared with the general population, this audience is older with a strong upscale orientation. In 1997 Pew Research found 13 percent of readers were under age 30 while 40 percent were age 50 or older. The same study found that 44 percent of regular news weekly adult readers had an annual household income of at least $50,000; 27 percent had incomes of more than $75,000.

Compared with other adults, these readers followed some subjects, like international affairs and national politics, more closely. Time, Newsweek, and U.S. News & World Report readers were 80 percent more likely than the total adult population to be very close followers of international events.

COMPETITION

In 1997 Time was the clear leader in its category. Its 4.2 million subscriber base was 1 million more than Newsweek 's and about 2 million more than U.S. News & World Report 's. These competitors were not an influential factor in Time's campaign. During the year both Newsweek and U.S. News concentrated on advertising directed toward the industry or advertisers.

In response to increasing competition beyond the other two weekly news magazines, Time no longer sought to be the sole all-encompassing source for news. Instead, the magazine assumed its readers got the news headlines from television, radio, and other sources. Time's role became explaining the news and providing insight into headline stories.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Walter Isaacson took over as managing editor in 1996, he instituted a high-profile, high-interest strategy that helped restore the magazine's authority. "We've brought more storytelling to Time, to try to get at great issues through interesting tales, and to create high impact journalism that makes a difference," he said. Isaacson raised awareness of the magazine by being a frequent social and talk show presence. He also redefined Time's role away from hard news toward lifestyle and high interest topics.

In 1997 Time's cover featured, among others, comedian Ellen DeGeneres, film director Steven Spielberg, pop singer Jewel, actor Brad Pitt, and comedian Bill Cosby on the death of his son. Also making the cover were features such as "What's Cool This Summer," "Turning Fifty," and "The Most Fascinating People in America." Hard news cover stories included "Big Tobacco Takes a Hit," "Does Gore Have What It Takes?," "What's Wrong at the FBI?" and "Echoes of the Holocaust."

Editor-in-chief Norman Pearlstine told the Columbia Journalism Review that the switch from hard news to lifestyle subjects was attributable to two factors. One was the healthy economy. People felt secure and comfortable and were less concerned with hard news than they had been during a tense period such as the Cold War or a bad economy. The other factor was the readers' search for stories focusing on self-interest topics. "It's not surprising that the country has turned more inward. There's always been a balance between educating your reader and serving your reader, but we're not getting a lot of demand for international coverage these days," Pearlstine said.

Time wanted to be viewed less as a studious read and more as an engaging read. While maintaining a hard news element, Time sought to broaden the base of reasons to get involved with the magazine. "This campaign was an attempt to say what people enjoy about the magazine is very personal. Just as the concept of 'interesting' is a self-defined idea, what you take from the magazine is self-defined as well, so that gave us an umbrella so we could say we are different things to different people. There's surprise along with what you expect every week," said Fallon McElligott's Amy Frisch.

Time also decided to concentrate on its long-term relationship with readers. Subscribers to weekly news magazines are among the most attractive targets for advertisers. They are well educated with high incomes and in job positions where they often control significant expenditures. Time studied its core readers and looked for ways to retain them and improve the quality of its readership. Creating a campaign with high interest visuals and provocative copy seemed right.

Nearly all the images used in the campaign first appeared in Time stories. When looking for ideas, the Fallon McElligott team targeted those stories in which Time had both captured strong visuals and delivered a unique written perspective or analysis. An earlier proposed campaign that emphasized the visuals was rejected because the magazine also wanted to convey the importance of its writing.

Senior management had an usually deep involvement in designing the campaign. Each ad was approved by Time managing editor Walter Isaacson and president Bruce Hallett. Time often improved the campaign through its suggestions to the agency's creative team. The campaign ads were instantly identifiable as Time's. With the traditional icon prominent in every ad, readers quickly recognized which magazine was being advertised. The campaign ran mostly—about 70 percent—in consumer magazines, with some trade magazines and a few TV spots on CNN and elsewhere.

The campaign's creators intended for its more than 50 different ads to flow together but also to be distinct from one another. Rather than creating a few ads and running them frequently, the strategy was to continually change the running ad to emphasize the many different aspects of the magazine's contents and to keep the campaign fresh and timely.

OUTCOME

In 1997 key demographics of Time's readership improved. The magazine held and increased its subscriber base and made the type of quality gains in audience that advertisers seek. The goal of renewed brand affinity was also met to the magazine's satisfaction. Time's 1997 financial results were among the best in the business. Newsstand sales increased 40 percent. Reported ad revenue increased 21 percent (an additional $94 million). Ad pages jumped 16 percent. The gain in ad revenue was nearly three times that posted by the two other major weekly news magazines combined.

Adweek listed Time number one on its list of the 10 hottest magazines in 1997. The campaign itself garnered many awards, including several Addy Awards at the American Advertising Federation Awards.

FURTHER READING

Hickey, Neil. "Money Lust: How Pressure for Profit Is Perverting Journalism." Columbia Journalism Review July/August 1998, p. 28.

Pogrebin, Robin. "At Work and at Play, Time's Editor Seeks to Keep Magazine Vigorous at 75." New York Times March 9, 1998, Business Section, Page C6.

Sheets, Ken. "Time Warner Confounds The Skeptics." Kiplinger's Personal Finance Magazine May 1998, p. 32.

"Who Reads The Newsweeklies?." Research Alert November 21, 1997, p. 7.

Chris Amorosino

TiVo Inc.

2160 Sold Street
Alviso, California 95002
USA
Telephone: (408) 519-9100
Fax: (408) 519-5330
Web site: www.tivo.com

■■■

TIVO, TV YOUR WAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

A year after introducing its digital video recorder (DVR), which was able to record and store television programs on a hard drive, TiVo Inc. hired Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, an advertising agency based in San Francisco. The firm's tasks were to build brand awareness for the difficult-to-describe device and to begin transforming TiVo from something reserved for technophiles into a consumer product with mass appeal. TiVo was also keen to establish a dominant market share to gain leverage over its chief rival, ReplayTV, and to thwart the aspirations of potential future competitors. Goodby's $50 million campaign, called "TiVo, TV Your Way," began in early July 2000.

The campaign, which cost $50 million and continued well into 2001, included television spots, print ads, and an updated website that provided detailed information such as price, features, and technical specifications. It had three waves of television commercials. In the first Goodby employed quirky humor to make the claim that having TiVo allowed subscribers to act as their own network television programmers. The second set of spots built on this concept; one, featuring ex-football stars Joe Montana and Ronnie Lott, was a parody of an annoying commercial. In the final phase of the campaign, the spots attempted to show the everyday benefits of owning TiVo.

TiVo became the dominant brand in its market, but sales failed to meet the expectations of investors. Because of its depressed stock price, the company slashed its advertising budget to control costs and looked for other ways to build its business. When the account was put up for review (opened to bids from competing ad agencies), Goodby declined to participate.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When TiVo Inc. introduced its DVR in March 1999, it faced the task of selling a product that defied simple description. The device stored TV programs on a computer hard drive instead of cassette tapes or discs, but wary that the word "digital" might prompt consumers to fear their televisions would crash like their personal computers, the company did not want to call its product a digital video recorder. Nor did it want to compare the product to a VCR, since many people were frustrated by their inability to program VCRs. As a result TiVo initially called the product a personal video recorder (PVR). Writing in the Wall Street Journal, David P. Hamilton elaborated on the challenge of selling a product that crossed over from the computer realm to that of living-room electronics: "While earlier generations of consumer electronics were basically extensions of existing products—DVD players, for instance, essentially crossed compact-disk players with the playback capability of Michael Ramsay, co-founder of TiVo. AP IMAGES.

VCRs—the PVRs don't fit neatly into any category.'' TiVo's chief executive, Michael Ramsay, explained to Hamilton that the product was also different from other electronic components in that it was difficult for people to understand how it worked until they actually used it.

For the product launch TiVo hired the Los Angeles agency Campbell-Ewald West to develop television and radio commercials as well as in-store ads. Using the tagline ''You run the show,'' the 30-second television spots attempted to explain the features of TiVo in an entertaining fashion. In one spot a man watching television was abducted by aliens, but because TiVo had been digitally recording his show, after escaping, he returned to watching it where he had left off. The device was capable of performing a wide range of programming tasks, and pausing live television was actually one of its less compelling features, but it was one of the few that could be easily addressed in a 30-second commercial. Only a few months later, TiVo decided to change its approach, intending to shy away from explaining how its product worked and to concentrate instead on building brand awareness and its customer base. It put up its business for review by other ad agencies, and in February 2000 Goodby, Silverstein & Partners won the account.

TARGET MARKET

TiVo was readily embraced by the early adopters of technology, but to become profitable the company needed to appeal to a broader audience, despite the high price of the product and the subscription fees (either lifetime or monthly) that went with it. The goal of the ''TiVo, TV Your Way'' campaign was to extend the brand beyond technophiles to TV viewers who were willing to pay for digital control over programming. Ultimately the company wanted to reach an even broader market: the kind of consumers who bought VCRs, DVD players, and personal computers. TiVo hoped to stake its claim in the market and to establish brand awareness by the time these late-arriving customers were ready to buy a DVR.

COMPETITION

TiVo was in essence a glorified VCR, but because of its far more advanced capabilities, it did not really compete against VCRs or even DVD recorders. Its primary competitor in the ''personal television market'' was ReplayTV, another company that featured a product with a hard drive and similar programming functions. The two companies differed most significantly in their business models; ReplayTV opted to sell its unit and service for a single price, while TiVo, in response to marketing research, kept down the price of the unit itself by charging a monthly subscription fee or a one-time lifetime fee. On the horizon competition was also taking shape in the form of Microsoft's UltimateTV, intended for use with satellite provider DirecTV, and the DVR in development for DirecTV's rival, EchoStar. Large cable companies were also interested in incorporating DVR functions into their set-top cable boxes.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The $50 million ''TiVo, TV Your Way'' campaign started in July 2000. Its primary purpose was to establish the brand, building on the company's base of some 30,000 subscribers. Rather than talking about the price or explaining TiVo's capabilities in detail, Goodby kept the focus on the brand, using edgy humor to portray the DVR as a useful home-entertainment product and making the claim that owning TiVo was like having one's own TV network. The facts about the product were relegated to the company's website, which was updated to provide consumers with information about TiVo, such as its capabilities, its cost, and where to buy it. The TV spots ran on network programming and national cable channels as well as on local stations in certain areas, including Atlanta, Chicago, Dallas, Los Angeles, New York, and San Francisco. In addition the campaign featured print ads in regional newspapers and in such

''BOY HOWDY!''

Perhaps the funniest moment in the TiVo television spot that featured ex-football players Joe Montana and Ronnie Lott—a spoof of over-the-counter drug ads—was Lott's delivery of the phrase ''Boy Howdy!'' He made the exclamation after Montana explained how bacteria could cause ''masculine itching'' and ''unsightly discomfort.'' According to Susan Fornoff, writing in the San Francisco Chronicle, ''Lott never heard 'Boy Howdy' growing up in Southern California. But ad agency copy writer Chris Ford, who is from Reno, swears he might have heard a cowboy or two utter the phrase.'' Ford commented that, as a substitute for an expletive, the phrase was more memorable than ''you're kidding.'' national magazines as Rolling Stone, People, and Sports Illustrated.

TiVo's first ad in the campaign, a 30-second spot called ''Network Executive,'' generated controversy. Set to air during the hit show Survivor, the spot was unexpectedly rejected by CBS. It portrayed callous network executives scheduling and canceling TV shows. ''Look at these guys: network TV programmers,'' declared an off-screen voice with obvious disdain. ''They decide what we watch and when we watch it.'' At that point a pair of bouncers appeared and tossed one of the executives out a window. ''Who needs them?'' asked the announcer, followed by text that read, ''Program your own network. TiVo, TV your way.'' CBS said that it rejected the commercial because it was not an accurate reflection of the way a network operated and that it would not accept advertising that disparaged its business. Another TiVo spot was accepted by CBS, however.

Goodby produced two more 30-second TV spots for the initial phase of the campaign. One of them portrayed an inept, overweight police officer tumbling over a chain-link fence while chasing a suspect. He finally caught and cuffed the man, only to be kicked in the groin by the suspect, who then escaped. The policeman explained to an unseen interviewer, ''TiVo's been a godsend for me . . . When I get home, TiVo is my salvation.'' While fixing a sandwich, he was asked what he liked to watch and replied, ''Mostly cop shows.'' The other spot featured a father using TiVo to explain ice-skating moves to his daughter, only to have his son emulate them instead. Clearly concerned about his son's masculinity, the father shouted, ''Bobby, stop that! Bobby!'' The edginess of the campaign also extended to the print ads that centered on bodily functions. One character extolled the virtues of TiVo's ability to pause live TV for bathroom breaks.

Another set of three television spots, which built on the earlier ones, was filmed. They aired during the first week of November 2000 as part of a holiday push. The centerpiece was a spot spoofing drug ads and featuring football greats and close friends Joe Montana and Ronnie Lott. The spot had been written for unknown actors and only became a vehicle for Montana and Lott when TiVo suggested them to Goodby, an agency not known for using celebrities in its advertising. Despite Goodby's initial skepticism, the commercial proved popular, and the former athletes' involvement brought added attention to TiVo. In the spot, while the two were playing golf, Lott made a poor swing. Montana commented, ''What's the matter, Ronnie—masculine itching?'' The spot closed with Montana approaching Lott with a glob of ''Extra Strength Itch Stopper Plus'' on his fingers. The action was abruptly stopped by an unseen TiVo user while an announcer said, ''Get TiVo and skip the stuff you don't want to see.'' Another spot in this phase of the campaign portrayed a hospital emergency room filled with frustrated television viewers who had injured themselves smashing their television sets. The third spot featured a TiVo user who felt so liberated by TiVo that, in the spirit of doing whatever he wanted, he drove the wrong way down a one-way street and sawed a parking meter in half.

In the campaign's final phase, which began in May 2001, TiVo and Goodby applied lessons learned from their earlier advertising attempts. Brodie Keast, TiVo's senior vice president of marketing, told Brandweek 's Todd Wasserman that the company had gained a greater sense of the underlying consumer issues, in particular the ''inertia about how people watch TV.'' To address these issues, the three new spots suggested how consumers could take advantage of TiVo in real-life situations. They showed a family racing through dinner to avoid missing the season finale of their favorite show, a couple staying up to snuggle to a late-night movie but falling asleep, and a husband who had to run an errand during The Sopranos and became frustrated in his attempt to find out from his wife what he had missed.

OUTCOME

At the very least the ''TiVo, TV Your Way'' campaign played a role in establishing TiVo as the dominant brand in its category. The DVR was also helped, however, by its passionate base of customers, who expounded to their friends on the virtues of TiVo. Even before the close of 2000, the company's main rival, ReplayTV—which trailed in the number of users by a four-to-one margin—had conceded the consumer-electronics field.

It elected instead to pursue a business-to-business model, licensing its technology to cable providers and electronics companies (such as Panasonic, which licensed ReplayTV technology to develop a television with an integrated DVR). TiVo's brand was so strong that it gained currency as a verb in popular culture, as in "Did you TiVo that show?"

The campaign also helped to drive up traffic to the company's website and contributed significantly to increasing sales, but the numbers were still disappointing to the company and its investors. TiVo's losses since its founding mounted to more than $400 million, and the price of its stock, which had peaked at $79, dipped as low as $3. In an effort to cut costs and placate shareholders, TiVo dramatically cut the amount of money it spent on television advertising, spending $40 million in 2001, $8 million in 2002, and just $115,000 in 2003, according to Nielsen Monitor-Plus. Because TiVo customers demonstrating the DVR to their friends had always proven effective in selling the device, TiVo looked to make better use of its strong word-of-mouth recommendations, encouraging TiVo owners to host "TiVo-ware parties," similar to Tupperware parties, for their acquaintances. This approach left little for a traditional ad agency to do. When the account went into review, Goodby elected not to put in a bid to renew its deal.

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "TiVo Teams Up with Omnicom Group to Tell the World about Digital Video Recorders." New York Times, October 13, 2000, p. 1.

Fornoff, Susan. "Itching to Be Funny." San Francisco Chronicle, December 5, 2000, p. C4.

Garfield, Bob. "Boy Howdy! TiVo Send-Up Isn't Heinous; It's Hilarious." Advertising Age, November 13, 2000, p. E1.

Hamilton, David P. "TiVo, ReplayTV Fail to Take Off despite Big Fans." Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2001, p. 109.

Kirsner, Scott. "Can TiVo Go Prime Time?" Fast Company, August 2002, p. 82.

Kranhold, Kathryn. "TiVo Ad Campaign's Sly Humor Isn't a Hit with CBS Executives." Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2000, p. 36.

Lippert, Barbara. "TV Interruptus." Adweek, July 17, 2000, p. 5.

Wasserman, Todd. "As TiVo, MS Square Off, No Time to Hit Pause." Brandweek, May 21, 2001, p. 5.

———. "TiVo Team Goes for Gooey Laughs in Zapper's Zany World of 'Bad TV.'" Brandweek, November 6, 2000, p. 8.

Ed Dinger

T-Mobile International AG & Company KG

Landgrabenweg 151
Bonn, 53227
Germany
Telephone: 49 228 93631717
Fax: 49 228 93631719
Web site: www.t-mobile-international.com

■■■

GET MORE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

As the telecommunication industry spent $5.8 billion on consumer advertising in 2003, top competitors formulated brand identities that would gain them footholds in the industry. The Sprint PCS Group created advertising to boast its all-digital, nationwide service loaded with features, whereas Cellco Partnership's Verizon Wireless, the biggest advertising spender and wireless provider in the United States, branded Verizon Wireless as a high-quality service with its ''Can You Hear Me Now?'' campaign. When Europe's largest telecommunications company, Deutsche Telekom AG, acquired the U.S. telecommunications companies VoiceStream Wireless and Powertel, Inc., in 2001, it combined the two under the name T-Mobile International AG & Company KG, which then stood as the sixth-largest provider in the United States. The next year T-Mobile used VoiceStream's 1998 ''Get more'' tagline for a campaign intended to brand T-Mobile as a service that offered more minutes, features, and service than its competitors.

For the new campaign T-Mobile chose not to renew its contract with spokesperson and actress Jamie Lee Curtis, who had appeared in VoiceStream commercials since 1998. To attract younger subscribers, in 2002 T-mobile hired the 11-years-younger actress Catherine Zeta-Jones as the brand's spokesperson and awarded ad agency Publicis West a $100 million ad budget to release ''Get More.'' Using television, print, outdoor, and radio mediums, the campaign first appeared on September 3, 2002. The first 30-second commercials, which aired on network and cable TV, featured Zeta-Jones improving people's romantic predicaments with a T-Mobile phone. In the spot ''Czech'' a disappointed young man on vacation told a Czech woman that he could not join her in Venice because of his dog-sitting responsibilities back home. Zeta-Jones appeared with a T-Mobile phone so that he could ask his friend in New York to watch the dog.

Six months into the campaign T-Mobile was the fastest-growing wireless provider in United States. It added 2.9 million subscribers in 2002, a 41 percent increase over 2001. During the campaign's first three months 4 out of 10 new mobile phone customers chose T-Mobile over its competitors. By 2004 T-Mobile had overtaken Nextel Communications to become the nation's fifth-largest wireless provider. The campaign continued into 2005 and also won a Bronze EFFIE Award from the New York American Marketing Association.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although Deutsche Telekom acquired both Powertel (based in Atlanta) and VoiceStream (based in Washington state) in 2001, VoiceStream provided the majority of T-Mobile's U.S. subscriber base. Besides being the nation's sixth-largest wireless-service provider, VoiceStream was the first to offer two-way text messaging and high-speed wireless data services to the U.S. marketplace. In 1998 Curtis starred in most of VoiceStream's "Get More" campaign commercials to reinforce the provider's tagline, "One phone, one number, one service." VoiceStream's infrastructure used GSM (Global Systems for Mobile Communications), the world's most recognized wireless technology, which allowed T-Mobile subscribers to place calls in more than 90 different countries for as low as 99 cents per minute. The campaign hoped to target globe-trotting businesses that roamed from one country's network to another. Curtis was chosen for her sassy, versatile image. "Her active lifestyle runs the gamut—wife, mother, actress, author—she epitomizes who can use it to get more from life," Kim Thompson, a spokeswoman for VoiceStream, explained to the Associated Press.

In hindsight VoiceStream recognized that its original "Get More" campaign targeted a narrow demographic. "What portion of the population actually travels between Europe and America on any kind of regular basis? You have to look at it as a stand-alone business with its own ability to generate cash rather than as some kind of strategic global initiative," Charles Golvin, senior analyst at Forrester Research (a firm specializing in researching technology trends) told the International Herald Tribune.

In 2001 Deutsche Telekom purchased VoiceStream and Powertel for $30 billion. After acquiring additional smaller companies, Deutsche Telekom unified its telecommunications conglomerate under the name T-Mobile in 2002. In the United States T-Mobile repositioned its brand to capture the burgeoning youth market. "The T-Mobile debut in California and Nevada continues several things that the company did well as VoiceStream—namely building upon its 'get more' philosophy, offering competitive pricing and including features like AOL Instant Messenger that appeal to younger consumers. The teen youth segment presents an immediate opportunity for growth as they begin to aggressively add new subscribers," Knox Bricken, senior analyst with the Yankee Group (a research and consulting firm specializing in the technology market), told Business Wire. To further entice youth, T-Mobile offered calling plans as low as 8.2 cents a minute, undercutting its competitor Verizon's 14.8 cents a minute.

TARGET MARKET

Once VoiceStream was rebranded as T-Mobile, the international-traveler target became secondary, and the youth demographic was made primary. The target market became 18- to 34-year-olds as opposed to 18- to 49-year-olds. "VoiceStream historically has had a younger subscriber type," John Clelland, senior vice president for marketing and communications at T-Mobile, told the International Herald Tribune. "With the merger and the brand conversion, we are better equipped to go after those accounts." While competitors such as Nextel and Sprint targeted adults by featuring businesspeople using phones to solve business problems, "Get More" commercials featured young people using phones to improve romantic predicaments. The content was considered more appropriate for youth.

To continue marketing the service's continued global versatility, the first three commercials starred Czech, British, Italian, and American actors benefiting from T-Mobile's service. To attract the younger target T-Mobile also replaced Jamie Lee Curtis with 32-year-old Catherine Zeta-Jones (who had starred in Chicago and The Mask of Zorro) as the brand's spokesperson. "So the new Dona T-Mobile is younger, more sassy, and darn intercontinental. And if you're going global, who could possibly do better in that arena than a Welsh woman who pretends she's Spanish: Catherine Zeta-Jones?" jabbed Adweek's Barbara Lippert.

PARIS HILTON'S SIDEKICK

The Sidekick, a device developed by T-Mobile to allow subscribers to check E-mail, surf the Internet, and place voice calls, was one of the T-Mobile's highest-end handset options. T-Mobile received attention when hotel heiress Paris Hilton's Sidekick was hacked into and her entire contact list posted on the Internet. Within hours celebrities such as tennis player Anna Kournikova and teen actress Lindsay Lohan were receiving phone calls from hundreds of strangers.

COMPETITION

During the Jamie Lee Curtis portion of the campaign, expensive advertising and competitive pricing within the mobile-phone industry threatened to cripple the top providers' profitability. "The industry has hit an inflection point where it's not just about trying to lure new customers," Weston Henderek, an analyst at telecom-research firm Current Analysis, said to RCR Wireless News. "Carriers are having to go after their competitors' customers with advertisements explaining why they are a better choice." Sprint PCS used its trench coat–wearing spokesman, "Sprint Guy," to tout the provider's all-digital, nationwide network loaded with cutting-edge features. Verizon's "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign demonstrated the network's strong coverage. In 2003

PHONE GAMES

Seamus McAteer, a senior analyst at M*Metrics (a telecommunications-industry-analysis company), told Wireless Week that although most PC and console gamers were male, the majority of mobile-phone gamers were young females.

Verizon spent an estimated $300 million to $400 million on that campaign with an additional $700 to $800 on direct-mail and in-store promotions. Another provider, Cingular, spent $873 million on advertising in 2004.

According to analysts and consumer polls, providers were not distinguishing themselves from one another by establishing clear brand identities. AT&T Wireless Services and Cingular, for instance, simultaneously branded themselves as low-cost providers with personalized calling plans in 2002. Also, using service features to entice customers was not working. Industry terms such as ''rollover minutes'' and ''anytime minutes'' did not mean much to consumers. ''Carriers will need to explain to customers what their more-advanced networks can provide,'' Henderek explained to RCR Wireless News. ''You can't just launch these services and expect consumers to understand why they should be spending more money for higher-speed networks. You have to explain the nitty-gritty details so they can see the value of advanced services.'' Verizon, the largest advertising spender out of all American brands in 2003, led the competition with 37.5 million subscribers. When the second largest, Cingular, acquired the third largest, AT&T, in early 2004, the combined subscriber base boosted Cingular to the number one position.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1998 VoiceStream used the tagline ''Get More'' to showcase its service's ability to operate in over 90 different countries. Once VoiceStream was rebranded as T-Mobile, the tagline ''Get More'' was changed to mean ''more minutes, more features, and more service.'' Robert Dotson, president of T-Mobile's U.S. headquarters, told Business Wire, ''Mobile communications have exploded in the past two years, extending way beyond voice-only services to give customers constant access to their E-mail, the Internet and other information virtually whenever and wherever. The T-Mobile global brand reflects the whole spectrum of mobile services we provide on a worldwide basis, while maintaining our 'Get more' promise to provide customers with the best overall value and service in their wireless communications.''

The campaign's first spots were directed by Tarsem Singh, who had directed the psychological thriller The Cell. The first 60-second commercial, ''Anthem,'' used a mélange of dazzling images and had actors repeating the lines, ''More minutes, more features, more service.'' Catherine Zeta-Jones also appeared in the spot to explain, ''more asking, more getting.'' The spot ended with the tagline ''Get more from life.''

Three additional 30-second spots directed by Singh appeared during the campaign's first month. All featured Zeta-Jones solving communication problems for young people with a T-Mobile phone. In ''Czech,'' a spot that appeared to take place in Prague, a beautiful Czech girl asked an American man, ''You stay and we go to Venice?'' He passed on the invitation by stating he needed to watch his dog at home. Zeta-Jones then appeared to say, ''Stop, stop, stop—is he kidding?'' She handed him a T-Mobile phone so he could call his friend back home, who agreed to watch the dog another week. Another spot featured an English woman attempting to attract the attention of a nearby Italian man. Zeta-Jones saved the day again with a T-Mobile phone, helping the woman call a language institute and learn an Italian phrase. In the fourth spot Zeta-Jones provided a phone for a bored postal clerk to invite a friend to a martial-arts movie.

Critics praised the initial spots for their youthful, global positioning but criticized the campaign's muddled message. Adweek's Barbara Lippert wrote, ''Is T-Mobile a phone and a service? We don't find out. And while aiming at Gen X-ers is an interesting idea, low-energy slackers like the post office guy aren't exactly the kind of hard-driving businessmen who rely on having the same phone and number when traveling.''

Between 2002 and 2005 Publicis used ''Get More'' to advertise T-Mobile's photo messaging, downloadable HiFi ringers, and its popular Sidekick II, a device that combined E-mail, phone, and wireless-browser capabilities. Throughout the campaign Zeta-Jones starred as the brand's spokesperson. The actress ''totally connected with our vision, which is a cross between the fun 'girl next door' and a magical catalyst for spontaneous communication,'' Publicis executive creative director Bob Moore told Entertainment Weekly.

OUTCOME

The ad-industry high-water mark for ''Get More'' was winning a Bronze EFFIE Award (Telecom Services category) from the New York American Marketing Association in 2004. More significantly, the campaign helped T-Mobile unify its brand and become one of the biggest challengers within a cutthroat industry. In 2003 telecom analyst Jeff Kagan told the Seattle Times, "T-Mobile is a patchwork quilt of so many different companies that it's a big challenge to run and operate. The wireless industry is going through a major transition. T-Mobile is definitely a player, but they're a very small player." The "small player" was the year's fastest-growing wireless provider and increased its subscribers by 41 percent, totaling almost 10 million by 2004. During the campaign's first three months, 4 out of every 10 new subscribers were choosing T-Mobile.

T-Mobile's domestic success was primarily attributed to three factors: the appointment of Robert Dotson as president of T-Mobile's American base, the brand's average service price of 8.2 cents a minute, and Publicis's effective marketing campaign. "We have grown a fabulous business and team at T-Mobile built around the compelling philosophy of 'Get more' for our customers. [Dotson] is the author of that philosophy and it's through his relentless focus on making it a reality for our customers that he has lead our team to become the fastest growing company in the U.S. wireless industry," T-Mobile's domestic chairman, John Stanton, told Business Wire.

FURTHER READING

Carter, Ben. "ANALYSIS: McDonald's and BT Go After the Wi-Fi Diners." Marketing, January 15, 2004, p. 14.

Cuneo, Alice. "Cell Giants Plot $1.5B Ad Bonanza; New FCC Rules Spark Battle to Entice Rivals' Customers." Advertising Age, October 6, 2003, p. 1.

Duryee, Tricia. "VoiceStream Gives Curtis a Dial Tone." Seattle Times, November 11, 2004, p. E1.

Garner, Heather. "R-JENERATION: It's For You." Las Vegas Review-Journal, December 17, 2002, p. 4E.

Howard, Theresa. "'Can You Hear Me Now?' a Hit; Simple 'Test Man' Ads Help Verizon Wireless Stay Strong." USA Today, February 23, 2004, p. B08.

Luke, Robert. "Rivals Smell Blood in AT&T-Cingular Waters." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 26, 2004, p. E3.

Marek, Sue. "Mobile Game Standouts; Wireless Operators Weigh In on What It Takes to Make a Top-Selling Mobile Game." Wireless Week, January 1, 2005, p. 24.

Meyer, Dan. "Dotson to Take Over Top Reins at T-Mobile USA." RCR Wireless News, March 31, 2003, p. 3.

———. "Operators Spend Big to Get Message Across." RCR Wireless News, April 25, 2005, p. 12.

Norris, Gary. "Nortel Rebuilds Image with Ad Campaign." Toronto Star, November 9, 2004, p. D02.

Vinakmens, Kristen. "Wireless Wars: Carriers Strive for Identity as Cell Market Matures." Strategy, September 8, 2003, p. 2.

Wallace, Brice. "Making Connections." Salt Lake City (UT) Deseret News, August 3, 2003, p. M01.

Kevin Teague

Tommy Hilfiger U.S.A., Inc.

25 W 39th St.
New York, New York 10018
USA
Telephone: (212) 548-1000
Web site: www.tommy.com/

■■■

AMERICAN TARTANS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In September 1997 Toth Design and Advertising introduced a Tommy Hilfiger U.S.A., Inc. ad campaign for men's tartan-style polo shirts. The polos were usual enough, typical plaids in green, reds, blues, and blacks. The men in the ads, however, were all wearing skirts, Scottish kilts to be exact, and frolicking about like schoolboys, kicking up their feet and having a glorious time. The images expressed in the "American Tartans" campaign were typical for Tommy, a men's, women's, and children's clothing and accessory business that was founded in 1984 by Tommy Hilfiger, the company's director and principle designer.

Among Tommy's more visible products was a line of baggy, well-worn street clothes marketed to what is called the hip-hop generation, a term characterized by 1990s inner-city youth, rap music, and MTV rock videos. The clothes were often produced in red, white, and blue colors that sported the Tommy logo—a white, red, and blue flaglike rectangle with the names "Tommy" and "Hilfiger" boldly embossed across the top and bottom. Tommy also produced a wide array of men's casual sports clothes that managed to attract the 20-something buyer to high-end sportswear in department stores. It was to this latter audience that the "American Tartans" campaign was partly aimed.

Toth handled Tommy's advertising from 1992 to 1997. Their strategy was to create a brand image for Tommy that could compete with its main rivals, Polo Ralph Lauren and Nautica. Both of these brands of men's clothing embraced particular images that the "American Tartans" campaign wanted to counteract. "We looked closely at both Polo and Nautica and the lifestyles portrayed in their fashion," said Tyrone Sayers, an account supervisor at Toth. "Their image was highly affluent, something the common man will not identify with." When Toth advertising began its work for Tommy, it wanted to describe a lifestyle that someone could see themselves in. Tommy "is more relaxed and open, goofing around and smiling. We wanted something that was more approachable," said Sayers. "We wanted to present a product that was youthful, relaxed, informal." The "American Tartans" campaign reflected this principal image.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Toth began to create advertising campaigns for Tommy in 1992, the business was still small and growing. "We were virtually unknown when we started," said Sayers, "and the name—Hilfiger—was easy to trip over. We needed a brand image that would reinforce who we were, and that took precedence over any particular product." That image turned out to be what Sayers described as the "Peter Pan syndrome," which, according to him, was present in just about every man. ''The image of men in their 20s is actually all men. Men grow up and acquire families and mortgages and responsibilities, but they still see themselves in their 20s, laughing with their friends and having a good time. This is the Peter Pan syndrome.''

Playing on this concept, Toth placed men in ads that turned the fashion world on its head. They smiled, they laughed, they hugged each other, and they had fun. ''What we did was position Tommy as somebody who really is aspiring to be happy, '' said Michael Toth of Toth Design and Advertising in a 1996 Vogue article. In the early 1990s leading men's fashion campaigns used images that were glum and stoic. ''People were ready to see a guy smiling in an ad—which was like a no-no at the time—doing something that felt real and honest. People inspire to happiness because everyone wants to be happy, and that's what Tommy projects. It's not something we invented. The suit fit.'' One Toth ad campaign portrayed a group of young men playing football, covered in mud from head to toe. Their clothes, which happened to be the product, were also covered with mud. Hilfiger liked the fun that was taking place in the ad, although he admitted that it might be difficult to sell clothes covered in mud. The article quoted Hilfiger as saying that such an ad was one ''Ralph [Lauren] definitely wouldn't do and some of the other competitors wouldn't even consider, which is what I like about it.''

Tommy's ads also sought to reach different nationalities and socioeconomic groups, setting another trend in the fashion world. ''Tommy described the life he saw around him—blacks, Hispanics, Asians, men, and women,'' said Sayers. ''Two and a half years ago,'' said Hilfiger in a 1997 US article, ''you may not have found too many black models in advertising campaigns with top designers. Today, most top designers use them. I believe I was a part of that.'' A typical Tommy campaign often incorporated models of different ethnic backgrounds, walking and talking together, their arms wrapped around each other, playing ball and having fun. It was an approach that spoke to Hilfiger's vision of a more diversified world. ''The young people of America today, or the world today, have very open minds,'' said Hilfiger. ''They're not looking at minorities as being negative. They're just looking at it at face value, that this is America today, this is the world today. We're all a part of it. We should be enjoying it, we should be understanding it, we should be living it; we're all part of the dream.''

Living life and enjoying it to the fullest became the image that characterized Tommy products. Toth's campaigns for Tommy showed healthy, happy, diverse people in a carefree atmosphere. ''It was a lifestyle picture that we were after,'' said Sayers, ''and we always tried to tell a consistent story.''

TARGET MARKET

The ''American Tartans'' campaign was designed to appeal to men between the ages of 18 and 40. Part of what Hilfiger called his ''American Classics,'' the long-sleeve tartan polo shirt was marketed to men who felt and acted as if they were 20, which, according to Sayers, was just about all men. Part of the inspiration for the campaign was The Mighty Mighty Bostons, a rock group that wore kilts when performing. The rock band's image helped attract men in their late teens and early 20s to the product, said Sayers.

In addition, 30- and 40-year-olds who worked during the week and dressed casually on the weekends—men who fell into the Peter Pan syndrome—were also targeted. Sayers said, ''When these men come home from work, they feel as though they are dressing and acting far different than their fathers did. People's chronological age and the way they act are very different today. A youthful spirit and lifestyle appeal to these men, and we took that approach.''

COMPETITION

Tommy's main competition, Polo Ralph Lauren and Nautica, both marketed upscale men's fashions and a wide array of additional products, everything from cologne to home furnishings. Polo Ralph Lauren, which also carried the brand names Polo Sport and Chaps, designed and marketed menswear and women's wear sold in department stores. The Polo Home Collection sold products ranging from linens to giftware, much of it manufactured by such companies as Reed and Barton, makers of flatware, and WestPoint Stevens, which made bedding. In February 1998 Polo's net worth was put at $147.6 million, with 5,800 employees. Nautica's subsidiaries, Nautica International and Nautica Furnishings, offered men's sportswear, outerwear, dress shirts, robes, loungewear, and swimwear. Nautica's net worth in February 1998 was $56.4 million, and the company employed 1,700 people.

A company somewhere between Polo Ralph Lauren and Nautica in size, Tommy netted $113.2 million and employed 1,820 workers at the end of fiscal year 1998. In order to compete, Tommy had branched out considerably since the company's first signature collection of men's clothing was introduced in 1984. In 1996 Tommy launched a line of women's clothing and fragrance under the name ''tommy's girl'' and a line of children's clothing. The company was scheduled to introduce a collection of home furnishing products in 1998. All of this was in addition to Tommy's extensive line of fashions, which had grown to include athletic wear, dress and business clothing, men's cologne, and accessories such as belts, bags, and sunglasses.

FROM HIPPIE TO HIP-HOP

A product of the late 1960s hippie counterculture, Tommy Hilfiger grew his hair long and sported bell-bottoms in high school. He was the first kid in Elmira, a town in upstate New York, to dress like a hippie. He and a few friends spent the summer of 1969 on Cape Cod working in a boutique—called a head shop back then—selling posters, incense, and other paraphernalia. At the end of the summer, they used their earnings to buy out the store, added some bell-bottom jeans and velvet tops, and went back to Elmira to open their own shop. They called it People's Place and housed it in a tiny basement they painted black. By 1975 People's Place had stores throughout upstate New York, usually near college campuses.

Instead of buying clothes for his stores, Hilfiger wanted to become a designer. People told him that with only a high school diploma he could not be successful at designing clothes or at breaking into business. But Hilfiger was not deterred, and he went to New York City to pursue his dream. In New York Hilfiger worked for various companies, all the time waiting until he could start his own. In 1984 Calvin Klein offered him a job for $100,000 a year, but Hilfiger turned it down. Soon afterward Mohan Murjani, an apparel manufacture, invested in Hilfiger, and in 1986 his first ad campaign hit the streets.

Initially Hilfiger's fashions were designed for the preppy-minded consumer. Then in March 1994 something unforeseen happened: Snoop Doggy Dogg wore an oversize Tommy T-shirt on Saturday Night Live. The hip-hop generation went wild buying Tommy clothes, and Hilfiger was smart enough to capitalize on the association. He began to cater to hip-hop consumers, designing just for them. Other designers "thought it was the plague," Hilfiger was quoted as saying in a 1997 article in US magazine. But the strategy paid off, and Hilfiger's fashions set the trend for street clothes in the 1990s.

Like its major competitors, Tommy opened its own retail stores, both in the United States and elsewhere. In November 1997 Tommy's first flagship store debuted on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, and in September of that year the company opened a London store on Salone Street that featured men's sportswear. By February 1998 Tommy had 55 retail outlet stores in the United States, compared to Polo's 100 and Nautica's 50.

There were other competitors for Tommy in the higher end of fashion and accessories. Perry Ellis, Gap, Donna Karan, and Calvin Klein all vied with Tommy in the fashion world. Tommy's more universal marketing strategy, however, attracted the businessman as well as the hip-hop generation and the campus crowd. Michael Callahan, writing in a 1995 America West Airlines Magazine article, described Tommy's marketing strategy: "A tanned Wall Street banker carrying a Coach leather attache stands one aisle over from the hip-hop youth in headphones, both picking through tartan Oxfords that sell for $95, tennis shirts for $52, and hunter-green cardigans for $82. The banker is too young, too current for Lauren; the hip-hopper too fresh, too streetwise for The Gap or Structure. But they're both perfect for Tommy Hilfiger, the man who is revolutionizing how the younger generation is wearing clothes—his clothes."

MARKETING STRATEGY

According to Sayers, tartan plaids had been a repeated theme in the fashion world. "Tartans come and go," said Sayers. "It's a ubiquitous design and everyone uses them. We had to find a way to distinguish from everyone else's tartan shirt. We took the plaid story and turned it on its ear." The decision to develop the tartan theme for the 1997 fall men's campaign came out of a product meeting, Sayers said. Tartans were usually a part of the fall line, and Tommy had featured plaid boxers and skirts for women in the past. "This fall, we saw tartan reoccurring across all deliveries [new shipments], and it was the biggest single theme," Sayers said. "So we developed a tartan focus instead of the usual brand message. We had to decide how we were going to deliver it."

"But we still had to present our consistent lifestyle message and brand statement that's an umbrella over everything Tommy," said Sayers. Toth decided to dress the models in Scottish kilts—tartan plaids were Scottish, after all—and show the men "jumping and cavorting and having a ball." The men were relaxed, open, and goofing around in what Sayers described as a "strong American identity: active, slightly irreverent, and diverse." This was keeping with the brand image Toth had developed for Tommy, including the Peter Pan syndrome.

The "American Tartans" campaign was mainly a print campaign, with ads appearing in such men's magazines as GQ, Men's Health, and Esquire. Print ads also appeared in the New York Times and on billboards in Atlanta, Boston, and Los Angeles. In addition, some public telephone kiosks in New York ran images of the campaign.

OUTCOME

The "American Tartans" campaign did not noticeably increase sales of Tommy's long-sleeve woven plaid jerseys. But it did invoke smiles from the advertising industry, Sayers said, "whenever we showed it." In May 1998 Toth ended its relationship with Tommy, whose image, according to Sayers, was shifting. "Tommy has become more well known and successful, and what Tommy wants the brand to be has changed," said Sayers. "It's now upscale and sophisticated. It's a great company with great potential, and we watched it grow from $70-odd million to a company worth $1.5 billion."

From 1994 to 1998 the company's sales increased from $321 million to $847 million. Compared to Polo and Nautica, Tommy's net growth from 1997 to 1998 was the largest, 31 percent, as compared to 25.8 percent for Polo and 28.2 percent for Nautica. Hilfiger himself had won several awards for his fashion images and marketing strategies. In 1995 he was named Menswear Designer of the Year by the Council of Fashion Designers of America. That same year he received rock video station VH1's From the Catwalk to the Sidewalk Award at its annual Fashion and Music Awards.

FURTHER READING

Avins, Mimi. "Take a Spin inside Tommy Hilfiger's Fashion Cuisinart." Los Angeles Times Magazine, August 25, 1996, p. 19.

Callahan, Michael. "The Rise and Rise of Tommy Hilfiger." American West Airlines Magazine, October 1995, p. 36.

Tavee, Tom. "The People's Choice." US, November 1997, p. 111.

Van Meter, Jonathan. "Hip, Hot Hilfiger." Vogue, November 1996, pp. 306-9.

Anita Coryell

Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc.

19001 S. Western Avenue
Torrance, California 90509
USA
Telephone: (310) 468-4000
Fax: (310) 381-7800
Web site: www.toyota.com

■■■

A CAR TO BE PROUD OF CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., was the subsidiary of Toyota Motor Corp. charged with selling, marketing, and distributing the Toyota, Lexus, and Scion brands in the United States. The Toyota Corolla was the first line of cars Toyota ever introduced in the United States, and it had long been one of the most successful lines in the world. In 2002 Toyota launched the ninth generation of the Corolla with a campaign titled ''A Car to Be Proud Of.'' This campaign came on the heels of a disappointing year for Corolla sales; in 2002 sales declined by nearly 50,000 units from the previous year.

Saatchi & Saatchi, an ad agency with long-standing ties to Toyota, developed and administered the $30 million–plus campaign. Conill Advertising and the Burrell Communications Group were also enlisted to conduct campaigns targeting the Latino and African-American communities, respectively. The campaign was designed to appeal to younger consumers, particularly those aged 25 to 35. This image-conscious group often saw the Corolla as a staid, overly practical automobile. To change that perception Saatchi & Saatchi released daring commercials such as ''Key Party.'' In this spot a roomful of men at a swingers' key party looked on anxiously as a heavyset woman took her turn choosing a set of keys that would determine with whom she would go home. Despite the men's reluctance to be matched up with her, when she picked the keys to a Corolla, everyone rose to claim them. The spot closed with the tagline ''A Car to Be Proud Of.''

The campaign was a hit with critics, and it won a Silver Lion (Cars category) at the 2002 Cannes International Advertising Festival and a 2004 Silver Clio Award. It also led to a sales boost: 262,064 Toyota Corolla units were sold in 2003, versus only 195,767 units the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

By the end of the twentieth century Japanese car company Toyota was producing more than 5.5 million units per year, making it one of the largest auto manufacturers in the world. The Corolla was originally introduced to the Japanese market in 1966. Two years later it became the first Toyota car launched in the United States. The original Corolla was small, affordable, and dependable. Because Americans in the 1960s often had a negative view of the performance of Japanese-made vehicles, establishing a reputation for quality was important for Toyota.

Once Toyota had established the Corolla as a quality automobile, it worked on making it more attractive to consumers. In the 1970s it made the car larger and added horsepower to the engine. These improvements appealed to car buyers, and the Corolla became one of the most successful cars in the world. By the late 1970s and early 1980s Toyota had added sport coupé, hatchback, and liftback versions to the Corolla line. The Corolla underwent a major redesign in 1988, with the liftback being phased out in favor of a new front-wheel-drive coupé. In an effort to keep the car fresh Toyota redesigned the Corolla several more times over the years. The Corolla's reputation only grew, and by 1997 it was the best-selling car in the world.

By 2003 it was time for Toyota to reimagine the Corolla once more. Sales in 2002 had been disappointing. In contrast to a successful 2001, during which Toyota moved 242,750 units of the Corolla line, sales in 2002 sagged to 195,767 units. Because the Corolla was among the most visible automobiles in its fleet, Toyota viewed this nearly 50,000-unit decline as cause for concern.

In terms of units sold, Corolla was still one of the most popular cars in the world, a result in large part of a reputation for being a long-lasting, high-performing machine. It was, however, viewed by younger buyers as an unglamorous, uncool car. Toyota's traditional marketing approach played into this image. The company had focused on its vehicles' performance instead of on the design. One of Toyota's best-known campaigns, "Oh, What a Feeling," was sometimes parodied because each spot closed with a scene in which the Toyota driver jumped up, overcome with excitement after driving his Toyota. The spots were earnest and unflashy, just like the Corolla itself.

OOBEYA

The new Corolla was designed according to the Japanese principle of oobeya, which roughly translated to English as "big, open office." Rather than adhering to a rigid, hierarchical system to conceive and build the new Corolla, the entire design team, from engineers to marketers, worked together to make the Corolla succeed. That meant that sales, engineering, marketing, and other departments all had input on how the new Corolla looked and what kind of special features it had. From sales and marketing professionals, designers learned what consumers liked about previous editions of the Corolla and what features drivers did and did not respond to. That feedback led to the introduction of a CD-player option for the Corolla.

The most important aspect of oobeya, however, was the way it improved communication. Logistical problems were caught early, saving money for the company. For example, the only North American plant that made Corollas with sunroofs was in Canada, even though far more consumers in the United States purchased that option. Engineers pointed out that making the sunroofed Corollas in California would save transportation costs. This helped Toyota keep the Corolla's price below $20,000.

TARGET MARKET

Toyota set a goal of selling 230,000 units for model year 2003. It wanted to expand Corolla's market share further by attracting a new population of drivers. The car had always performed well with middle-class drivers, especially families, but among the automaker's biggest challenges was a perception that the steady, reliable Corolla was also a dull car. To address this problem Toyota decided on a two-pronged approach. First, Toyota redesigned the Corolla with an eye toward making the car more aesthetically pleasing to consumers. It had been several years since the Corolla had been significantly redesigned, and some consumers were growing bored with the older look. Next, the company introduced the Toyota Matrix, a new line built on the Corolla platform. The Matrix featured a sleeker design to appeal to single car buyers in their 20s.

This approach kept Toyota from spreading the Corolla too thin. Rather than expecting the Corolla to be all things to all people, Toyota used the Matrix to take pressure off the older vehicle line. While the Corolla would have a sleeker look, the Matrix could push that even further because there was no risk of alienating an existing audience. Toyota could go forward with its efforts to reach young compact-car buyers without worrying that the existing Toyota compact-car audience was being overlooked. Between the two vehicles, Toyota hoped to have the entire compact segment covered.

While the Matrix was aimed at image-conscious singles who ordinarily might not buy a subcompact car, the Corolla was still geared toward the traditional subcompact market. But the company also wanted to attract more buyers in the 25- to 35-year-old range. Often Corolla buyers were in their 40s, and the company felt that younger car buyers were an untapped market. Therefore, the "Car to Be Proud Of" campaign's concentration was on consumers aged 20 to 29.

COMPETITION

Toyota's primary rivals were two other Asia-based automobile manufacturers: Honda Motor Company and Nissan Motor Corp. Both were expanding their North American manufacturing in the early 2000s, which many observers felt would help the companies to build customer loyalty in the American market. The Honda Civic and Nissan Sentra were particularly strong competitors against the Corolla, since both were imported cars in the compact segment. Other major imports that competed with the Corolla were the Mitsubishi Lancer and the Mazda Protegé. Because of its sleek exterior the Protegé in particular attracted a younger, hipper consumer than the Corolla. The Ford Focus also provided the Toyota Corolla with some competition.

Toyota had been making serious inroads against these competitors in the late 1990s and early 2000s. While the automaker had an 8.8 percent share of the U.S. market in 1998, that had risen to more than 9 percent by 2000. By October 2003 Toyota controlled 11.2 percent of the U.S. market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Toyota earmarked upwards of $30 million for the campaign. It designated Saatchi & Saatchi Los Angeles to implement it. Saatchi & Saatchi was a major worldwide advertising agency whose parent company, the Publicis Groupe, was Europe's largest communications company. The agency had handled a number of campaigns for Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., including the U.S. launch of the entire Lexus brand. Saatchi & Saatchi's approach was to turn brands into "lovemarks," brands that inspired devotion in consumers that endured "beyond reason." Because Corolla was a well-known brand with a lot of visibility, it was a good example of a potential "lovemark."

One component of the campaign was to make the entire Toyota brand a highly visible sponsor at both the Florida and California branches of Universal Studios. Another component was the company's outreach program to Latinos and African-Americans. Conill Advertising in Torrance, California, was retained to create new print ads and television commercials specifically for the Latino community and to adapt the current Corolla campaign for that market. The Chicago-based Burrell Communications Group was retained to handle outreach to African-Americans.

The campaign featured a variety of posters and print advertisements, but the key to the campaign was a series of television spots. The theme of the campaign was that the Toyota Corolla was "A Car to Be Proud Of." This tagline evoked the car's reputation for quality. In order to grab the attention of younger consumers, however, the television spots themselves were irreverent, even controversial.

The spots ran on youth-oriented programs on the WB, Fox, and NBC networks. In keeping with Toyota's efforts to reach out to young consumers, the commercials used humor to give the car a cooler, edgier image. The two central spots were "Key Party" and "Party Dress." "Key Party" featured a group of couples sitting around at a swingers-style key party, picking car keys as a way to pair up for the evening. As a heavyset woman walked forward to choose a set of keys, all the men in the room grew tense. When she pulled out the keys to a Corolla, all that changed. One by one, every man in the room claimed the keys were his, implying that every man wanted to claim he owned a Corolla. The spot closed with the tagline "A Car to Be Proud Of." The spot's sexual innuendo—key parties were usually associated with the swingers scene of the 1970s—drew some criticism, however.

"Party Dress" was a 40-second spot that also used humor to show the lengths to which people would go in order to claim a Corolla. The commercial began with a man and his daughter walking on a sidewalk. The daughter was ready for a party in a new dress until a Corolla drove by and splashed water on the two pedestrians, ruining the dress. The father searched for the perpetrator and came across an innocent bystander. When the father asked the bystander if he knew who was driving the car, however, the bystander took responsibility himself. Off-camera the father was then heard to strike the man. The joke was that the bystander was willing to be assaulted just to claim that he owned a Corolla. "A Car to Be Proud Of" appeared at the end of the commercial.

OUTCOME

Critics applauded the Toyota campaign. While some found the sexual and violent undertones of the "Key Party" and "Party Dress" spots to be unpleasant, the typical response was one of unqualified enthusiasm. Saatchi & Saatchi's work won the Silver Lion in the Cars category at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, in 2002. This ceremony, dubbed "the Olympics of Advertising," was considered to be the most prestigious award in the industry. The campaign also garnered a Silver Clio Award in 2004 for "Party Dress."

More importantly, sales of the Corolla rebounded strongly. With 262,064 units sold in 2003, the Corolla not only outperformed its disappointing 2002 sales of 195,767 units, but it also surpassed the stronger 2001 sales period, during which 242,750 units were sold. The Corolla had returned as a major force in the industry and helped Toyota post strong company-wide sales in 2003.

FURTHER READING

Belson, Ken. "Slowdown? Don't Tell Toyota Motor." New York Times, October 31, 2002.

———. "Toyota Bucks the Economy and Posts Record Earnings." New York Times, November 9, 2001.

Chappell, Lindsay. "Toyota Envisions U.S. as Future Vehicle Development and Export Base." AutoWeek, August 7, 2002.

Knoll, Bob. "A Touch of Luxury for Old Reliable." New York Times, August 11, 2002.

Kohn, Joe. "Toyota Chases Youth with Corolla, Its Oldest Car." AutoWeek, December 31, 2001.

Liker, Jeffrey. The Toyota Way: 14 Management Principles from the World's Greatest Manufacturer. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

Maynard, Micheline. "Even Cars Need to Make a Good First Impression." New York Times, March 8, 2002.

Roberts, Kevin. Lovemarks: The Future beyond Brands. New York: powerHouse, 2004.

Yamaguchi, Yuzo. "Toyota, Honda Predicting Bigger Share of U.S. Sales in 2002." AutoWeek, December 27, 2001.

Zaccai, Gianfranco. "Designed for Loving." BusinessWeek, July 21, 2005.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

EVERYDAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

During the late 1990s Japan's largest carmaker, Toyota Motor Corporation, was edging its way into the American car industry's top triumvirate. The "Big Three" U.S. automakers were General Motors Corporation, DaimlerChrysler Corporation, and Ford Motor Company; but Toyota's reputation as a modest, reliable car yielded record-breaking sales nearly every year throughout the 1990s. Despite their reputation as Japanese imports, most Toyota cars sold in America were also made in America. Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., (TMS) was the American sales, distribution, and marketing subsidiary of Toyota and employed more than 30,000 Americans. Hoping to continue its success with a first-time branding campaign for Toyota, the automaker released a campaign called "Everyday."

Instead of advertising its cars' details, like many American automakers, TMS wanted to advertise the Toyota brand and its appeal to everyday people. An overarching slogan, "Everyday," was introduced across print media and television. The campaign was developed by the ad agency Saatchi & Saatchi Pacific of Torrance, California, and was used to market nearly every model manufactured by the company. Created from TMS's $350 million ad budget, these advertisements, which portrayed real people in real-life situations, first aired on September 12, 1997. The late-1960s hit "Everyday People" by Sly and the Family Stone was the emblem song for the campaign. One of the less celebrated spots featured a couple debating whether or not to roll up the windows on their Toyota Corolla. After smelling their baby in the backseat, they decided to keep the windows lowered. In the middle of the campaign the tagline changed to "Every Day" until the effort concluded in late 2000.

The spots were ridiculed by critics for being tedious or sanctimonious. Polls conducted by USA Today found that other ad agencies rated "Everyday" the fifth-worst campaign of 1998. Only 23 percent of the consumers surveyed liked the ads a lot. Saatchi & Saatchi explained that it initially used the word "everyday," meaning commonplace, instead of "every day," which suggested reliability, because visually one word looked better in print ads. Ad critics lambasted the decision. Nonetheless, in terms of sales growth TMS outperformed nearly every large automaker in America.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In September 1997 Toyota released its new "Everyday" ad campaign with 30- and 60-second commercials on network television and print ads in USA Today and the Wall Street Journal. The advertisements, developed by Saatchi & Saatchi, were set in commonplace environments and showed people in routine situations. Previous Toyota slogans, such as "You asked for it, you got it," "Who could ask for anything more?" and "I love what you do for me" (initiated in 1990), focused on the object being sold. The "Everyday" ads, in contrast, focused on people more than products. Initial ads centered on a series of lifestyle affirmations—regular people were shown responding to the challenge "All you have is today. How will you make it count?" This reflected a strategic switch from the advertising of specific product details to storytelling—creating a world for the product to exist in.

TARGET MARKET

The target market for the "Everyday" campaign consisted of baby-boomer consumers—those who came of age in the 1960s. "Everyday People," the song by Sly and the Family Stone that was used in the campaign's television commercials, hit the charts in 1969. "Music marks our lives, and 'Everyday People' is just one of those songs that people associate with a meaningful time in their lives," said Joe McDonagh, executive creative director at Saatchi & Saatchi. The song was used as an anthem evoking a lifestyle and an attitude more than as an overt theme song to be associated with a particular product. The emotional weight of the song came through its associations with baby-boomer nostalgia (other songs considered were "Day Tripper," "Yesterday," and ''Daydream Believer''). But it was also hoped that it would be given a contemporary hearing as well, with its message of diversity.

Both ends of the baby-boomer spectrum were targeted, but in particular the ads were directed at parents. Some ads targeted parents of young children, with posters for the campaign distributed to 1,250 child care centers and an additional 3 million brochures sent to these centers as well as to the parents of newborns at hospitals.

Other ads, specifically those for Toyota's sporty Camry Solara, were directed at older parents—active empty nesters with a median age of 40–45. Toyota researchers found that about 1.5 million empty-nest baby boomers entered the market each year. Thirty-second spots developed by Saatchi & Saatchi for this group carried the ''Everyday'' tagline but said, ''There are times when life is full of responsibilities. There are vehicles for those times. This is not one of those vehicles.''

Targeting baby boomers also meant targeting a population saturated with years of television advertising. The challenge for an ad agency marketing any product, whether hamburgers, tennis shoes, or cars, was to reach television viewers who had learned to tune out hard-sell, product-oriented commercials and connect with these viewers emotionally—hit them, so to speak, where they lived.

EVERYDAY OR EVERY DAY

The incorrect use of ''everyday''—meaning common, ordinary—to connote reliability (''every day'') was a conscious choice made by Saatchi & Saatchi. ''Grammatically, it should be two words,'' Sally Reinman, an executive with the ad agency, conceded to the Wall Street Journal. But after six months of intense discussion, Saatchi & Saatchi decided to go with one word. It looked friendlier and zippier, Reinman said. ''It's more than just a word. It's how the word looks. It's how you deconstruct the language.'' Reinman said she herself preferred the one-word slogan because it looked as if it came from real consumers, not a big car manufacturer. Art directors wanted it too, because two words looked awkward as a signature. By retaining the two-word variant in the body of its ads, Saatchi & Saatchi showed that it knew what it was doing. ''I will always speak my mind. Every day,'' said a man wearing sunglasses in one commercial. Then the slogan appeared: ''Toyota. Everyday.''

COMPETITION

As reported by Frank S. Washington in Automotive News, the 1990s brought parity to the U.S. automotive market. ''Other Asian manufacturers as well as the Big 3 and European automakers are building products of comparable quality, and currency valuations have led to competitive pricing. The bottom line: quality alone is no longer the primary reason to buy any vehicle,'' he wrote. While Japan's ''Big Three''—Toyota, Honda, and Nissan Motor Corporation—traditionally had gained market share in the United States through the quality of their cars, the challenge now was to achieve an identity in the American cultural landscape. Toyota's ''Everyday'' campaign, which presented the company as an interpreter and promoter of family values, stressed a company-wide identity for Toyota; other car manufacturers responded with umbrella campaigns of their own.

By June 1996 Nissan had a brand familiarity of 69 percent, according to marketing research conducted by the Allison-Fisher firm of Southfield, Michigan. This trailed Honda's 74 percent. Toyota led, with 81 percent. To give Nissan a sense of personality, a $200 million ''Life Is a Journey—Enjoy the Ride'' brand campaign was released. The ads were popular with consumers, hundreds of whom requested copies to download onto their personal computers, and the number of car shoppers who said they intended to buy a Nissan rose 21 percent. Honda, however, remained Toyota's toughest competitor. Toyota's Camry was the best-selling U.S. car in 1997, but Honda's Accord outsold Camry as of August 1998, selling 266,280 units compared to Camry's 176,577.

Of the smaller competitors, Mitsubishi initially emphasized a theme similar to Toyota's ''Everyday'' with its own ''Built for Living'' campaign. As in the Toyota ads, individual Mitsubishi models were shown in everyday situations with unexpected, humorous outcomes. At the end of each commercial an assortment of car models was then displayed, with the purpose of extending the spot's impact to the full Mitsubishi line. These spots were credited with increasing Mitsubishi sales in 1997. But a subsequent ''Wake Up and Drive'' campaign by Mitsubishi had a slightly different emphasis that contrasted with this celebration of the quotidian. It highlighted the exceptional in the everyday, with spots showing a car racing through a tunnel accompanied by the words ''No one will ever notice the baby seat.'' Mazda Motor Corporation took a similar tack with its ''Get In. Be Moved.'' ad theme. Mazda was not trying to simplify lives, sell cars for everyday people, or make vehicles popular with dogs, Richard Beattie, president and chief executive of Mazda North American Operations, told the Associated Press. "We appeal to people who love to drive," he said, "drivers who take the long way home. We are not a brand for everybody."

The "Everyday" theme appeared to have more success. In 1998 Toyota sales in the United States were up 6.4 percent. Toyota Motor Corporation and Honda Motor Co., the biggest Japanese automakers, both gained in the United States that year, while the smaller Japanese competitors, Nissan, Mitsubishi, and Mazda, after promising starts (Mazda sales were up 6.8 percent early in the year) fell further behind.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By 1997 auto marketers spent more on advertising than any other industry, but they were one of the last categories to initiate brand campaigns. To get more mileage out of their advertising dollars, car companies in 1998 took their cue from other industries, especially the fashion industry, and made the move to establish brand campaigns. Toyota planned to increase its 1998 ad budget by at least 10 percent, from an estimated $350 million in 1997, but all products were to fall under the "Everyday" branding campaign.

"We feel it's our first brand campaign," Dave Illingworth, senior vice president and general manager of the Toyota Division of Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., told Advertising Age. He said he considered the previous "Oh, what a feeling" tagline to be "more of an advertising line." "'Everyday' reminds customers that Toyota is more than a car, or a truck," Illingworth elaborated to PR Newswire. "It is a company with integrity, dedicated to enabling consumers to meet their life needs, whatever they may be. It is a company that places the consumer first—everyday. Central to the [branding] strategy is the need to enable the consumer to find a way into the brand, in general, and the product, in particular. Connecting with the consumer is key."

This branding campaign coincided with breakthrough advertising that focused on the consumer and the buying experience more than on the actual product. Ads had to be both soft sell and sophisticated, connecting with consumers who likely viewed about 36,000 television commercials each year. A USA Today survey ranked automotive commercials last in likability. Auto marketers realized that they had to learn to talk with consumers, not at them. "Consumers today possess a highly sophisticated filtering system," said Illingworth. "Our message must talk with, not at the consumer. It must show how our products contribute positively to the consumer's life. And it must show that we are serious about winning customers for life—everyday."

The "Everyday" campaign fit into a new school of marketing that saw ads as road maps for consumers, showing them how real people, spanning a variety of ages, races, and environments, actually used a product and how it fit their lives. Gimmicky commercials—such as the kind featuring a 175-pound man suspended high above a city, attached to a beam with Super Glue—were out. "Today we've got to show the customer how our product is an elemental part of their lives," said Joe Cronin, president and chief executive of Saatchi & Saatchi Pacific, Toyota Motor Corporation's advertising agency for 22 years.

This so-called show-me approach to marketing did not mean, however, that ads had to be humorless or devoid of whimsy. A television spot for the Toyota Sienna minivan showed the minivan emerging from a garage accompanied by the voices and sounds of a baby being born ("Take a breath now. Push. Here it comes."). The tagline—"Your life will never be the same"—appeared, followed by the brand slogan, "Toyota. Everyday."

Babies, in fact, were a favorite topic in the ads. An older couple in one spot wrangled over the window controls—up or down? The question was settled by a suspicious odor emanating from the infant in the backseat. Another spot showed a mother expertly and easily flipping up the backseats to look for a lost pacifier. Some commercials were everyday to the point of being charmingly laconic, as detailed by Bob Garfield in Advertising Age: "the best shows two working stiffs waking from a lunch-break snooze. 'We gotta go,' says one, sprawled on the far-reclining passenger seat of his buddy's Corolla. 'You're ruining my nap,' says his buddy, still sacked out on the driver's side. 'You don't understand. I can't get back late.' 'I do understand. We work for the same people,' says his friend, as we watch them in fast motion performing a series of post-nap ablutions and speeding back to work just in time. 'Technically we're an entire minute early.' 'I'll note this on my time sheet,' says the passenger dryly. Then the inimitable Sly Stone begins crooning, ' I . . . I . . . I . . . am everyday pe-o-ple.' This spot, in Garfield's opinion, said that Toyota did not merely set the standard; it was the norm. 'Everyone looks [every day] for those they can count on whether it's in a person or a brand," said Saatchi & Saatchi's McDonagh. "We believe we've found, and will demonstrate, Toyota's rightful place in people's lives—nothing more and nothing less."

When TMS released its first full-size pickup truck, the 2000 Tundra, Saatchi & Saatchi did not believe that "Everyday" advertised the truck's uniqueness. Instead, the Tundra was promoted with the inquisitive tagline "Have we gone too far? Or have others not gone far enough?" In September 1999 the "Everyday" tagline was split into two words after the one-word slogan was relentlessly criticized for suggesting that Toyotas were mediocre. To herald Toyota's year-2000 vehicles, eight new spots were created with TMS's $150 million budget. One spot featured a city suffering a power blackout while an unaffected Corolla remained powered. The tagline, "Always there. Every day," appeared on the screen. Further spots were created for the new Sienna, Camry, and Tacoma. Another 1999 commercial featured computer-animated ants crossing a road to advertise the diligence of Corolla's new VVTi engine. The spot ended with the copy "Charging ahead. Every day."

The campaign also splintered in September 1999. Realizing that baby boomers were no longer the majority of America's consumers, Saatchi & Saatchi adjusted the campaign to target consumers under the age of 35. TMS executives feared that the Toyota brand might succumb to the fate of Oldsmobile and Buick—both antiquated brands in the late 1990s. Sly and the Family Stone's "Everyday People" jingle was replaced with contemporary hip-hop and heavy-metal music. Spots ending with the tagline "Everyday People" featured 20-somethings enjoying Toyota's new subcompact car the Echo, which started at $9,995. Print and television spots for "Every Day" ran through the end of 2000.

OUTCOME

In a December 21, 1998, USA Today article in which advertising experts reviewed the best and worst ads of 1998, Richard Kirshenbaum of the ad agency Kirshenbaum, Bond and Partners in New York called the "Everyday" campaign a bust, saying, "Even everyday people don't want to be everyday people." The campaign "irritates most everyday people I know," added Gary Goldsmith, vice chairman and executive creative director of Lowe and Partners/SMS.

But as the article made clear, a campaign's popularity—or unpopularity—did not necessarily guarantee its longevity or sales. While the effectiveness ratings in the USA Today survey for the Toyota campaign were even lower than those for popularity, Toyota sales in the United States rose 6.4 percent in the calendar year 1998, compared with a 2.9 percent industry-wide increase. Toyota's sales, awareness, and consideration among car buyers had increased since the campaign was initiated, said Toyota ad manager Michael Bevan. David Pelliccioni, Toyota Division vice president of marketing, concurred that the "Everyday" campaign had succeeded in increasing customer awareness of Toyota.

"Toyota's one of the few companies that can afford to get away with running creative ads that emphasize image more than features," said Jim Wangers, a consultant with Automotive Marketing Consultants. Nevertheless, as reported in Automotive News in January 1999, a Toyota source said that the company wanted to return to more product-specific advertising and eliminate storytelling, which it accomplished with its subsequent "Get the Feeling" campaign, released in 2001.

Despite poor response to the campaign—which included consumer polls discrediting the campaign's effectiveness, critics accusing the campaign of mediocrity, and competing agencies pronouncing "Everyday" one of the worst campaigns of 1998—sales for TMS soared. December 2000 vehicle sales rose 14.2 percent above the previous year. Reflecting on TMS's success, the Advertising Age ad critic Bob Garfield wrote in 2005 that Toyota's slogans, such as "Everyday," were "a statement of the generic obvious" but were still effective for selling cars. The slogan's humdrum tone only skirted Toyota's main quality, which Garfield believed was safety. "Not the crash-test kind [of safety]; that positioning belongs to Volvo," he wrote. "The safety that defines Toyota is the certain knowledge you can buy one and not make a mistake. It's safely within the styling standards of contemporary good taste. It's safely within the boundaries of reasonable power and performance." Garfield then criticized campaigns such as "Everyday" for only advertising Toyota's reliability. He suggested that Toyota's future campaigns advertise the quality he first defined as "safety" and later as owner "satisfaction"—the real reason Toyota excelled worldwide.

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. "Toyota Ads Dote on Family, Appeal to 'Everyday People,'" USA Today, February 16, 1998.

Garfield, Bob. "Bob Garfield's Ad Review: Toyota's 'Everyday' Has Excellent Feeling." Advertising Age, November 17, 1997.

———. "Moving Forward or Step Backward?" Advertising Age, February 21, 2005, p. 40.

Halliday, Jean. "Brand Management Builds on Image Making: Every Carmaker Has Heightened Need to Craft a Champion; Execution Varies." Advertising Age, April 6, 1998.

———. "Saatchi Breaks Ads for $40 Mil Intro." Advertising Age, October 13, 1997.

———. "Toyota Boosts Ad Budget at Least 10% for 1998: New Products Fuel Increase in Spending." Advertising Age, February 16, 1998, p. 39.

———. "Toyota's Solara Ad Muscle to Hit with New TV Season: Coupe's Debut Targets Boomers with Empty Nests." Advertising Age, September 7, 1998.

Henry, Him. "Toyota Soars as Industry Falters." Automotive News, September 10, 2001, p. 43.

Kiley, David. "New Day for Toyota Will Launch a New Tagline 'Toyota. Every Day.' To Replace Its 'I Love What You Do for Me,'" Brandweek, August 18, 1997.

Ono, Yumiko. "Sometimes Ad Agencies Mangle English Deliberately." Wall Street Journal, November 4, 1997.

Pollack, Judann. "Carpe Diem: Toyota, Carvel, Dixie Ads Making the Day-to-Day Special." Advertising Age June 1, 1998.

Rechtin, Mark. "Toyota: Few Tomorrows for 'Everyday' Ad Theme?" Automotive News, January 18, 1999.

Reidy, Chris. "This Is a Car Ad? What Else Are They Selling?" Boston Globe, September 28, 1997.

"'Toyota/Everyday' Launched as Core Strategy in All-New Brand Advertising Campaign." PR Newswire, September 12, 1997.

Washington, Frank S.. "Japanese Adopt 'Image' Ad Strategy: Stressing Quality Isn't Enough." Automotive News, January 6, 1997.

Megan McNamer
Kevin Teague

FUEL FOR THOUGHT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A., Inc., was responsible for the distribution, marketing, and sales of all Toyota vehicles in the United States. It was owned by the Toyota Motor Corporation, a Japanese company that by 2004 had become the second largest automaker in the world. Toyota's advertising efforts were organized on three levels: national, regional, and local. Regional campaigns were run with dealer associations, which were cooperative marketing groups made up of Toyota dealers operating within key metropolitan areas. The Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association, centered on Chicago, Illinois, but including areas in three surrounding states, was one such co-op. At the time domestic competitors like the General Motors Corporation and the Ford Motor Company were using major incentives to promote their vehicles. These included cash rebates for buyers of new cars, which were designed to convince consumers that that they were getting a good value from those brands. One of the consequences for Toyota was that in 2003 its sales dipped 8.9 percent in the Chicago region.

Toyota and the Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association charged Saatchi & Saatchi Chicago, the local office of Toyota's primary advertising agency, with developing a campaign to boost sales and increase dealer profitability. The campaign, which was titled "Fuel for Thought" and which had a budget of more than $20 million, included television and radio spots built around consumer testimonials on the quality, reliability, and safety of Toyota vehicles. It ran for nine months, from January through September 2004. The campaign strategy was to redefine "value" so that it meant not simply low price but also included the buyer's getting a reliable, safe vehicle for the money. Some spots depicted two or more drivers discussing the value of a Toyota, while others featured testimonials from drivers. Print ads featured copy that emphasized similar themes. This approach harkened back to earlier Toyota campaigns that also had focused on the company's reputation for well-built, dependable cars. Key vehicles in the campaign were the Camry, the best-selling car in the United States in 2003; the Corolla, a compact car; the RAV4, a compact sport-utility vehicle (SUV); the Highlander, a conventional SUV; and the Tundra pickup truck.

The "Fuel for Thought" campaign succeeded with both advertising critics and consumers. It won a 2005 Bronze EFFIE Award, and it also helped Toyota's market share climb from 7.5 percent to 8.7 percent in the Chicago region. One vehicle, the RAV4 compact SUV, saw its sales jump by more than 10 percent in the area. The Toyota Camry, which remained the top-selling car in the United States in 2004, saw unit sales improve by 4.8 percent. In fact, the Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association posted higher sales increases than any other Toyota region in the United States and exceeded its sales expectations in seven of the nine months during which the campaign was running.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1957 the Toyota Motor Corporation founded Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A. to handle all distribution, marketing, and sales of Toyota automobiles in the United States. The American company was based in Torrance, California. By January 2004 Toyota had become the second largest automobile manufacturer in the world, behind only the American company General Motors. By that time Toyota was selling more than 5.5 million units worldwide every year.

In order to increase the effectiveness of its advertising, Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A. organized its marketing efforts on three distinct levels. The first was made up of the company's national advertising campaigns. The second consisted of campaigns undertaken for the regional dealer associations that were centered around major metropolitan areas, as, for example, Portland, Oregon; Denver, Colorado; or Chicago, Illinois. Finally, individual dealers advertised locally. In the Chicago region 2003 was a difficult year for automotive sales. By September the sales of light passenger vehicles were down 8.9 percent from the previous year. To remedy this, Toyota dealers in the area decided to create a campaign tailored to the needs of their region.

Such regional advertising was always created in conjunction with local dealers. Thus, while each dealer ran its own local advertising, dealers from across a metropolitan area banded together to form associations. In this sense a dealer association was a marketing co-op made up of dealerships operating within a given area. The Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association consisted of 112 separate dealerships across parts of four states.

Most of the advertising for Toyota in the early 2000s had been developed by Saatchi & Saatchi, an international agency owned by the French communications corporation the Publicis Groupe. In the United States most national Toyota campaigns were handled by Saatchi & Saatchi LA. The agency had become known particularly for its belief that brands should be turned into "lovemarks," that is, as something that inspired a deep loyalty from consumers. Advertising for the Chicago region was done by Saatchi & Saatchi Chicago, the agency's regional office.

Toyota's key passenger cars in 2004 included the Camry, the top-selling vehicle in the North American automobile market in both 2002 and 2003, selling more than 420,000 units each year. Also important was the Toyota Corolla, one of the best-selling compact cars in the United States, which sold more than 300,000 units in 2003. Because between these two vehicles accounted for such large sales, their continued success was a vital element in Toyota's goals for 2004.

CAMRY: TOYOTA'S KEY VEHICLE

In 2004, at the time Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A., Inc., and the Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association were developing the "Fuel for Thought" campaign, the Camry was one of the company's key vehicles. Introduced in 1980, the Toyota Camry was the best-selling car in the U.S. market in seven of eight years between 1997 and 2004 (1997–2000 and 2002–04). In 2004 Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A. sold 426,990 units of the vehicle. The car began life, however, as an offshoot of the Toyota Celica. It was originally called the Toyota Celica Camry, but by model year 1983 it had become an independent line.

The Toyota Camry was a midsize car, not known for a flashy exterior or souped-up engine. The vehicle's appeal rested on its reputation as a steady, reliable, safe car. The 2004 Camry came in three different versions: the LE, SE, and XLE. The LE was the most basic model, retailing for about $19,000 with a four-cylinder engine (the model cost $22,000 with a V-6.). The SE sold for almost $20,000 ($23,000 with a V-6) and featured a power moon roof along with bigger wheels and tires for a sportier drive. The XLE was the high-end model, with power seats, wood-grain trim, a CD player, and an alarm system, among other amenities. The sticker price ranged from $22,295 to $25,405, depending on the engine.

COMPETITION

One factor that Toyota had to contend with was its competitors' use of incentives to lure new car buyers. In effect, such incentives put vehicles on sale, since they reduced the prices consumers paid to dealers. At the time the three large U.S.-based automakers, Ford, General Motors, and DaimlerChrysler, were offering generous incentives, which included cash rebates and favorable lease terms, on many of their vehicles. These automakers developed their advertising campaigns around the incentives, thus helping to bring their lower prices to the attention of consumers. Such developments put pressure on Toyota dealers, who were forced to compete without the benefit of similar incentives.

A number of other automakers produced vehicles that were comparable to key Toyota cars and trucks. These included the Honda Accord and Nissan Altima, which competed with Toyota's best-selling passenger car, the Camry. Competition for the Corolla included the Honda Civic, the Nissan Sentra, and such domestic cars as the Ford Focus. The RAV4 competed with other compact crossover SUVs like the Honda CR-V and the Ford Escape, while the Highlander SUV appealed to drivers who might also consider the Nissan Murano or the Honda Pilot. The Tundra pickup competed with imported trucks like the Nissan Titan.

TARGET MARKET

Toyota was interested in attracting a fairly broad range of consumers, hoping to boost sales for all of its key vehicles. The campaign, however, was geared mostly at adults between the ages of 25 and 49, especially those with a household income of more than $50,000. The advertising also targeted people who were most likely to explore buying a new car, by visiting a dealership for example, sometime within a month of coming in contact with the campaign. Beyond that, Toyota wanted a campaign that focused on a diverse group of buyers from different ethnic backgrounds and educational levels.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Fuel for Thought" campaign was developed by Saatchi & Saatchi Chicago, the regional office of Toyota's principal advertising agency. In developing the campaign, the agency worked with both Toyota Motors Sales and the Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association.

Traditionally Toyota and their dealers had not spent as much on advertising in the Chicago area as had General Motors or Ford, automakers that were based in the region. The "Fuel for Thought" campaign was expensive, however, costing more than $20 million. Toyota attempted to use its resources efficiently by saturating a particular medium like television, for example, before introducing the campaign to another medium. The company also tried to reach the largest market possible with each spot or ad. As a result, 80 percent of the campaign consisted of advertising on television, 14 percent involved radio, and the rest was made up of print ads. The campaign ran for the first nine months of 2004

Toyota had high expectations for its Chicago-area dealerships. It was hoped that the "Fuel for Thought" campaign would boost sales in 2004, improve the company's share of the Chicago-area automotive market, boost profits for local dealers, and improve the penetration of the company's key vehicles into the Chicago market. To accomplish this, Saatchi & Saatchi decided that it was important to highlight the value of Toyota vehicles. This approach was not entirely new, for earlier national Toyota campaigns had focused on value, specifically on the quality and reliability of the company's cars and trucks. The "Fuel for Thought" campaign was centered around the company's key vehicles, the Camry and Corolla cars, the RAV4 and Highlander SUVs, and the Tundra pickup.

While Toyota offered some price incentives as well, these were not major elements in the campaign. In fact, Toyota's month-to-month incentives remained largely unchanged from 2003. Instead, the copy in all of the advertising used testimonials from drivers and straightforward product descriptions to focus on the value offered by a Toyota vehicle. Both television and radio spots used a slice-of-life format, depicting consumers talking to other consumers about the advantages of owning a Toyota. One definition of "value"—the idea that was at the center of the incentive programs of the three major U.S. automakers—was the value of a low price. The "Fuel for Thought" campaign, however, promoted the idea that value in a motor vehicle also included such things as quality, safety, innovation, and the cost of ownership. By these standards the ads promoted the idea that Toyota buyers were getting a good value for their purchase.

OUTCOME

The "Fuel for Thought" campaign was considered to be successful. Critics liked it, and the campaign won a 2005 Bronze EFFIE Award. Further, in 2004 the Chicago area had the largest sales growth for Toyota of any region in the United States. By the end of 2004 the Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association had posted its best sales numbers since its creation more than 25 years earlier. Sales were up 17 percent over 2003, and they exceeded expectations in seven of the nine months the campaign was running. During three of those months the Chicago region posted better sales numbers than any other Toyota region in the country.

As a result, dealers in the Chicago region had higher profitability growth as a group than did dealers in any of the other Toyota regions. This achievement occurred as Toyota posted its best sales ever in 2004, selling a total of 2,060,049 units. It was the first time that Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A. had sold more than 2 million units in North America. In January 2004 the Toyota Motor Corporation passed the Ford Motor Company to become the world's second largest automobile manufacturer in terms of sales, behind only Detroit-based General Motors.

Toyota's success occurred despite an industry-wide decline in sales of motor vehicles of 2.6 percent across the Chicago region. One result was that from 2003 to 2004 Toyota's market share in the region grew from 7.5 percent to 8.7 percent. In addition, its share of the light vehicle market rose from 9.5 percent to 10.9 percent, and its share of the light truck market rose from 5.8 percent to 7.0 percent. Each key vehicle in the campaign saw an increase in sales, with Camry increasing 4.8 percent in units sold, as it became the best-selling car in the Chicago area for 2004. The RAV4 saw its sales volume jump more than 13 percent, sales of the Corolla and Highlander both grew by more than 6 percent, and the Tundra saw sales rise by about 2.5 percent.

FURTHER READING

Gordon, Jane. "Wheel Is Turning against S.U.V.'s." New York Times, October 24, 2004.

Hakim, Danny. "3 Japanese Carmakers Gain against Big 3 in the U.S." New York Times, January 5, 2005.

———. "Toyota Overtakes Ford as World's No. 2 Automaker." New York Times, January 27, 2004.

Liker, Jeffrey. The Toyota Way: 14 Management Principles from the World's Greatest Manufacturer. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

Popely, Rick. "GM, Ford Plan to Boost Incentives." Chicago Tribune, July 2, 2004.

Roberts, Kevin. Lovemarks: The Future beyond Brands. New York: powerHouse, 2004.

Schweitzer, Kevin. "Just Who's Buying the New Cars?" Chicago Tribune, April 25, 2004.

Warner, Fara. "Toyota Begins a National Campaign to Highlight More Than a Vehicle's Mere 'Rational Attributes.'" New York Times, September 28, 2004.

Zaccai, Gianfranco. "Designed for Loving." BusinessWeek, July 21, 2005.

Zaun, Todd. "Expansion Costs at Toyota Limit Its Earnings Growth." New York Times, February 4, 2005.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

GET THE FEELING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., the American subsidiary of Toyota Motor Corporation, was responsible for the marketing and sales of the company's products in the United States, including the Toyota, Lexus, and Scion brands. In 2001 Toyota redesigned the Celica in honor of the model's 30th anniversary. At one time the Celica had been a premier line for Toyota, and the Camry, which was spun off from it, became one of the most popular cars in the entire U.S. market. Nonetheless, in the face of competition, especially from Honda and Acura, the Celica had come to need revitalization. In 2000, while the Camry sold 422,961 units in the United States alone, the Celica lagged far behind, at only 52,112 units. Geared toward buyers between the ages of 18 and 35, the redesigned Celica had a look that was inspired in part by Indy 500 race cars. Among other sporty highlights, it featured an adjustable rear wing. Toyota wanted to capitalize on the dramatic redesign of the car with a new marketing campaign.

The "Get the Feeling" campaign, developed by Saatchi & Saatchi Los Angeles, located in Torrance, California, emphasized the car's appearance. This was a departure for Toyota, which had previously highlighted the performance and reliability of its automobiles. The centerpiece of the campaign, which began in 2001 and ran for a year, was a series of three 15-second television spots with the tagline "Looks Fast." All three spots began with a single camera shot of a red Celica parked on a suburban street. The shot was held in silence for several seconds, giving the viewer the chance to ogle the car. Each spot then ended with a humorous event, in which the parked car was mistakenly believed to be moving quickly, based on its sleek appearance alone. In the spot "Dog," for example, a dog was shown running onto the screen, trying to chase what looked to be a moving Celica. The dog then crashed into the back of the car, leading to the "Looks Fast" tagline.

The spots were successful with critics and won a number of awards, including the prestigious Cannes Gold Lion for "Dog." The campaign was not, however, able to revitalize the Celica. Sales of the car dropped substantially in both 2001 and 2002, and they continued to fall until the entire Celica line was finally canceled in 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., was founded in 1957 to handle the marketing, distribution, and sales of Toyota vehicles in the United States. The company was based in Torrance, California. By the beginning of the twenty-first century, the parent company, which was based in Japan, had become the world's third largest automaker in unit and net sales, producing more than 5.5 million vehicles every year. Toyota's advertising traditionally had been conservative, emphasizing the company's reputation for well-made, fuel-efficient vehicles. This was embodied in the advertising of the "We're Quality Oriented" campaign, used by the company in the 1970s. Toyota then introduced the "Oh, What a Feeling" campaign in the 1980s. This campaign and its slogan became widely associated with the brand, though some criticized it for being dull. In fact, dealers in Ontario, Canada, produced a parody of the ad, tweaking what came to be known as the "jump," the shot of a Toyota driver leaping in excitement that often closed the spots. Nonetheless, the conservative advertisements were consistent with Toyota's image as a maker of dependable cars that got good gas mileage.

The Toyota Celica was introduced to the U.S. market in 1971. Conceived of as Toyota's answer to the Ford Mustang, the Celica was intended to be an affordable sports car. It was successful with both critics and customers and was named Motor Trend 's Import Car of the Year in both 1976 and 1978. The Celica was eventually eclipsed by another Toyota product, however, its offshoot, the Camry. Launched in 1980 as the Toyota Celica Camry, the new line was spun off on its own in the 1983 model year, and it became Toyota's best-known automobile. Soon most of the company's general advertising, particularly on television, was devoted to the top-selling Camry, which in sales was consistently one of the most popular midsize cars in the United States.

By the late 1990s there were rumors that Toyota was considering discontinuing the Celica. The car had been available in the U.S. market for more than two decades, which was a long time for a model to be in circulation. Further, for several years after 1993 the car had not undergone a significant redesign, which some people took as a sign of Toyota's flagging interest in the vehicle. In 1999 the Celica Coupe was eliminated, leaving only the GT Liftback and GT Convertible models. For the 2000 model year, however, Toyota redesigned the Celica, using Calty Design Research, Inc., to reconceive the styling of the car. The new Celica featured a cab-forward design and a distinctive spoiler, which gave it more of a racing look. In fact, the Celica's new appearance was partially inspired by Indy 500 cars. In honor of its 30th anniversary, the car was given an aggressive promotion at the 2001 New York International Auto Show.

COMPETITION

Toyota's closest competitor was Honda. Both were Japanese-based automakers that had penetrated deep into

ADVERTISING AUTEUR

The award-winning television spots of the "Get the Feeling" campaign were produced by Independent Media, in Santa Monica, California, and directed by Chris Smith. The respected filmmaker, who had also directed ads on behalf of other major brands, such as TiVo and Lee jeans, had an ongoing relationship with Independent Media. He was especially known in the film industry, however, for his award-winning documentary American Movie. The film, which followed the efforts of the failed filmmaker Mark Borchardt, connected with audiences at the 1999 Sundance Film Festival, where it won the Grand Jury Prize for Best Documentary. The work was praised for the way it mixed the comedy of its subject's eccentricities with a real affection for his determination. Smith's 1995 comic documentary American Job had also been screened at the festival.

the North American automobile market by earning respect for their performance and reliability. In 2000 Honda sold 1,158,860 total units, up more than 7.5 percent over the previous year. The company went on to have an even better year in 2001, selling 1,207,629 units. Honda's Acura division made particularly big gains in 2001, with sales jumping 19.5 percent over 2000, to 170,469 units. Toyota, however, sold 1,741,254 units in 2000, buoyed by the ever-popular Camry, which that year sold 422,961. While the Celica sold a respectable 52,112 units, it was about to feel the pressure from new Honda models, such as the Acura RSX.

Celica's traditional competitor, however, was the Ford Mustang. Both were relatively inexpensive sports cars geared toward young buyers. But in popular culture the Celica had never achieved the status of the Mustang, at least partly because the latter, with its powerful, high-performance engine, was seen as more of a muscle car. Still, by 2001 the primary competition for the Celica was coming from Honda and its subsidiary Acura. In 2001 Acura replaced the Acura Integra Coupe, which had previously competed with the Celica, with the RSX. The Acura RSX was an immediate hit with critics and in 2002 and 2003 was named one of the 10 best cars of the year by Car and Driver magazine. The car shared a platform with the Honda Civic. Though the Civic traditionally was seen more as an economy car, it also eventually came to compete with the Celica. In 2001 the Civic Type-R was introduced, featuring a sportier look than previous models, another development that put pressure on Toyota.

TARGET MARKET

With the advent of the "Get the Feeling" campaign in 2001, Toyota began a new drive to sell the Celica. Once again the company turned to Saatchi & Saatchi, which handled almost all of its advertising. Toyota charged the Los Angeles office of Saatchi & Saatchi with the development of advertising that would attract a younger audience. While an understated advertising approach worked for the Camry, a four-door car popular with families, it had been less effective for the sporty two-door Celica. Toyota was also concerned that its customer base for the vehicle was becoming too old. In addition, the Celica was underperforming among male car buyers, and there was concern that it did not project the kind of macho image a sports car should have.

The "Get the Feeling" campaign was directed at both males and females between the ages of 18 and 35 who were in the market for a new car. Toyota wanted to build on its reputation for quality by highlighting the stylistic elements of the car. To accomplish this, Saatchi & Saatchi developed a series of three 15-second television spots—"Dog," "Old Man," and "Motorcycle Cop"—all with the tagline "Look Fast."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Saatchi & Saatchi stated that its purpose in the "Get the Feeling" campaign was to turn Toyota into a "lovemark," as opposed to simply a trademark. The thinking was that Toyota had achieved a high level of respect but that in a competitive automobile market respect alone was not enough. Many manufacturers of automobiles, such as Honda and Volkswagen, had achieved a high level of regard for the performance of their vehicles, and Toyota needed to distinguish itself from its competitors. The company needed an entertaining campaign that made an emotional connection with consumers. The concept of the lovemark, which was unique to Saatchi & Saatchi, was used by the agency to describe a brand that inspired "loyalty without reason." To build this kind of loyalty, Saatchi & Saatchi wanted to burnish Toyota's image by showing that its automobiles were not only reliable but aesthetically pleasing as well. The Celica was a good candidate for this approach, since it had a sporty look and competed with visually striking cars like the Acura Integra.

Key agency players in the development of the ads were the creative directors Neal Ford and Doug van Andel, copywriter Sherry Hawkins, and art director Verner Soler. The spots were produced by Independent Media, of Santa Monica, California, and were directed by Chris Smith. Rather than developing the traditional 30-second spot, they were kept short, at 15 seconds each. The spots were designed so that two could run back-to-back. "Dog," the anchor spot, featured a single shot of a red Celica parked on a suburban street. After a few seconds a dog was shown running across the screen and crashing into the car. The implication, of course, was that the sporty new Celica looked fast even when it was standing still.

The other two spots used the same setup as "Dog": a single shot of a red Celica parked on the street. In the "Old Man" spot an elderly gentleman walking past the car stopped to yell that the driver should "slow down." The joke, of course, was that not only was the car parked but that no one was behind the wheel to hear him. In "Motorcycle Cop" a police officer pulled up behind the parked Celica to give it a speeding ticket. As with the "Old Man" spot, there was no driver to give a ticket to. All three spots closed with the "Looks Fast" tagline.

The point of the three spots was to demonstrate that the new Celica looked fast even when it was standing still. In all three the long single-camera shot put the focus on the car, inviting the viewer to admire its sleek design. Instead of an emphasis on Toyota's reputation for quality and performance, which is what might have been expected, the "Get the Feeling" campaign highlighted visual style in the most direct way possible. The humor of the campaign was meant to underscore the car's main selling point, its sporty new look. Since all three spots relied on a sustained single camera shot, the costs were kept at a minimum.

OUTCOME

Saatchi & Saatchi claimed that the "Get the Feeling" campaign helped lower the average age of Celica buyers by eight years. In 2001 and 2002 the median age of new Celica buyers was 29, well within Toyota's target range. Overall, however, sales of the Celica began to flag in the face of pressure from the Honda Civic and Acura Integra. While the Celica sold 52,112 cars in 2000, only 35,508 units were sold in 2001, and by 2002 the number of sales was down to just 22,676. On July 16, 2004, Toyota decided to discontinue the car altogether, citing increased competition.

Within the advertising industry, however, the campaign was highly successful, and the ads won numerous awards. Both the campaign as a whole and the "Dog" spot won prestigious Clio awards. The campaign also received a Silver Effie, among other accolades. The International Advertising Association gave individual Silver awards to both the "Dog" and "Old Man" spots. Ad Age named the "Dog" spot the Best Automotive Commercial of the Year. "Dog" also took home the 2002 Cannes Lions Grand Prix in Film, the Gold Lion, considered the most prestigious award in television advertising. The spot defeated 411 finalists, which had been whittled down from 5,059 entries. The "Old Man" spot won a Bronze Lion in the same competition.

FURTHER READING

Allen, Leslie. "Toyota Targets Hopes, Dreams in New Marketing." Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2004.

Elliott, Stuart. "Music Is at the Center of New Toyota Campaign." New York Times, August 28, 2001.

———. "Toyota Snubs Its Main Ad Agency." New York Times, July 15, 2002.

Garfield, Bob. "Toyota Touts an Ugly Celica in Compact Spots That Hum." Advertising Age, September 3, 2001.

Kiley, David. "A New Season for Car Slogans." Business Week, September 28, 2004.

Liker, Jeffrey. The Toyota Way: 14 Management Principles from the World's Greatest Manufacturer. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

McCarthy, Michael. "USA Stays in Running for TV Ad Award." USA Today, June 21, 2002.

Roberts, Kevin. Lovemarks: The Future Beyond Brands. New York: powerhouse Books, 2004.

Saatchi & Saatchi. "Dog." Available from <http://www.saatchikevin.com/workingit/Saatchi_TVCS.html>

Zaccai, Gianfranco. "Designed for Loving." Business Week, July 21, 2005.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

KIDS RULE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., was the distributor of Toyota Motor Corp.'s Toyota, Lexus, and Scion brands in the United States. In model year 2004 the company released a new version of its Sienna minivan. This launch was a top priority for the automaker, because the minivan segment featured strong competition from the new Honda Odyssey and Nissan Quest as well as from established domestic brands such as the Chrysler Town & Country. A segment-wide decline in sales throughout the 2000s made it imperative that the Sienna improve its meager 41 percent awareness rate among consumers, especially when the segment average stood at 48 percent.

To establish the Sienna in the minds of car buyers, Toyota turned to the Los Angeles office of ad agency Saatchi & Saatchi for a new kind of advertising campaign. In addition to using print ads, the Sienna would be marketed through a series of television commercials aimed at kids. Surveys indicated that more and more families were allowing their children to contribute to the decision about what automobile to purchase. To capitalize on this trend Sienna commercials featured child actors talking up kid-friendly features of the newly redesigned vehicle. For example, one spot featured a crash-test teddy bear, while another plugged the car's roomy interior by having a young boy explain that the car offered enough space for him to avoid his little sister. Each spot featured the tagline "Kids Rule." Toyota also sponsored Yahoo!'s family-friendly Yahooligans! Book Club and capitalized on other unorthodox advertising venues. The campaign's budget exceeded $20 million.

The 13-month launch was an unqualified success. In addition to winning a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005, the campaign led to a 99 percent jump in brand awareness among consumers, and this in turn fueled solid sales increases throughout the year. These gains came despite a slowdown for other vehicle sales in the segment, especially among the Sienna's key competitors.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Based in Torrance, California, Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., was founded in 1957 by the Japanese company Toyota Motor Corp. to handle U.S. sales, marketing, and distribution of Toyota automobiles. By the early 2000s Toyota was among the world's largest auto manufacturers, responsible for the production of more than 5.5 million units per year.

The Sienna first appeared in 1998 as a replacement for the unsuccessful Toyota Previa minivan line. While the vehicle was lauded for its safety and performance, it was not as successful as competitors such as the Honda Odyssey. By 2003, in anticipation of relaunching the line, Toyota had decided to redesign the Sienna. The car would be priced from $23,000 to $35,000 and would feature a sporty look and a more powerful 3.3-liter V-6 engine. The car was a success from the beginning with car critics, and Car and Driver named it one of 2004's Five Best Trucks in the "van" category.

TARGET MARKET

Toyota's primary focus for the Sienna was on consumers in the 30- to 39-year-old age range. The Sienna's target market was the same that most minivans shot for, namely professionals, retirees, couples, and families. With the Sienna launch Toyota made the innovative move of targeting not only the parents in those families but also the children. According to a 1999 survey conducted by marketing-information firm J.D. Power and Associates on behalf of the Nickelodeon television network, 62 percent of parents claimed that their children participated actively in the family's decision on what car to buy. Toyota planned to target those children directly with kids-centered advertising and the introduction of the "Kids Rule" tagline.

INTERNET OUTREACH

In April 2004 Toyota became the first automaker to host a Chinese-language website in the United States on behalf of a new automobile. The site was produced as part of the 2004 relaunch of the Sienna minivan. By the early 2000s Asian-Americans were the third-largest minority group in the United States, after Latinos and African-Americans. At the beginning of the decade Toyota began a companywide outreach program aimed specifically at these demographic groups. In some cases advertising agencies were enlisted to provide marketing campaigns specifically tailored for Latino and African-American consumers. Toyota decided to approach the Asian-American market, however, through the Internet.

Toyota chose to conduct a Web-based campaign after internal research revealed that, when looking to purchase an automobile, Asian-American Toyota buyers relied more heavily on the Internet than any other Toyota customer group. Because Chinese-Americans were the largest Asian-American group, the company focused primarily on them. Chinese speakers were also the largest group among Asian immigrants to the United States. The Chinese-language site featured information about the Sienna similar to that available on the English-language Toyota website. By June 2004 approximately 1.1 percent of visitors to Toyota's main site were choosing to read the Chinese-language Sienna page over the English one, well within the company's projections.

Toyota also identified new markets for the Sienna and pinpointed demographic groups that were more inclined to buy a Toyota minivan. As a result of company research, Toyota specifically marketed the Sienna to Asian-Americans. It released a Chinese-language website to help sell the Sienna—the first time an automaker had done so to promote one of its vehicles in the American market. Toyota's research indicated that 14 percent of all Sienna buyers were Asian-American and that the Sienna was more popular in the Asian-American community than any other Toyota vehicle. Because 70 percent of Chinese-Americans had Internet access, versus a national access rate of 60 percent, the Web was seen as the ideal forum for reaching these buyers. The Internet campaign, which featured pictures of and information about the Sienna, was also a way to reach these consumers that was more cost-effective than TV advertising.

COMPETITION

By 2004 the minivan market was a crowded one, and to make matters worse the segment had seen sales decline since 2000. Adding to the pressure on Toyota was the fact that Ford introduced its new minivan, the Freestar, almost simultaneously with the new Sienna. That vehicle replaced Ford's fading Windstar line. The Chrysler Town & Country was a comparable unit already on the market. Toyota was even more concerned about the Nissan Quest, which was another Japanese-made minivan debuting at the same time and gunning for the same buyers as the Sienna. The Quest launch would be backed by a campaign that cost more than $20 million, and the vehicle was poised to be one of the Sienna's primary competitors.

Because Honda and Toyota often competed for the attention of the import-car buyer, Toyota was also concerned about the threat that Honda's Odyssey minivan posed to the Sienna. Toyota decided to give the Sienna a 3.3-liter V-6 engine to make the vehicle more powerful than the Odyssey, which used a 3.0-liter V-6. Toyota knew that it was at a disadvantage in consumer awareness. While the segment average was a healthy 48 percent, the Sienna only managed a 41 percent awareness rate prior to the "Kids Rule" campaign. In addition, many of Toyota's competitors offered incentives—for example, Chrysler offered several thousand dollars back through dealers—and Toyota had chosen not to go that route with the Sienna.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Toyota commissioned Saatchi & Saatchi Los Angeles to conduct the campaign, which cost more than $20 million to produce. The company had a long relationship with Saatchi & Saatchi, which had helped launch the entire Lexus brand in the United States in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The agency had also handled the advertising for the redesigned Toyota Celica, creating a campaign that garnered a Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, in 2002. Saatchi & Saatchi's approach was to turn brands into "lovemarks," meaning that they inspired customer devotion that endured "beyond reason."

This approach stood in contrast to Toyota's traditionally more conservative campaigns. In the 1970s and 1980s the company's primary concern was reinforcing its image as a maker of safe, dependable vehicles. This led it to feature campaigns that many saw as uninspired, or at least unadventurous. Now, however, Toyota wanted more sophisticated campaigns that showed consumers that Toyota cars could be fun to drive and stylish to look at. The light touch of the "Kids Rule" campaign, which relied on humor to attract kids and families, was an example of this.

While the campaign was focused on a series of television spots, it also featured a number of unorthodox efforts. The Sienna became the official sponsor of Yahoo!'s Yahooligans! Book Club, which was geared toward kids and families, precisely the audience Toyota was after. Sienna ad banners ran on the Book Club's website as well as on the Yahoo! homepage. Additionally, advertisements for the Sienna were included in the "wish list" E-mails that kids using the site were encouraged to send their parents. Toyota sponsored "Live Your Best Life," a tour of self-help speeches and seminars organized by television personality Oprah Winfrey and aimed at women, especially mothers. Another innovative idea was Toyota's sponsorship of a series of Time for Kids Extra! magazines. These publications, an offshoot of Time Warner's Time, were distributed to a large audience of some 3 million students and their parents. Each eight-page issue was packed with interesting bits of information about the world. These advertising tactics helped Toyota reach new customers, which was important because the minivan segment was so competitive, with several new vehicles launching in a short period despite sagging sales across the segment.

The key to the campaign was a series of television spots centered on children. These commercials ran on kid-oriented networks such as Nickelodeon and the Discovery Channel. In one spot a group of young girls invaded a Sienna design session, demanding extra cupholders and other kid-friendly features for the vehicle. Another depicted a young boy acting as a "salesman" for the car, paying special attention to the vehicle's roominess, which made it easier for passengers to avoid their little sisters. In yet another spot a little girl strapped her doll and teddy bear into the Sienna for a crash test. After each emerged unscathed, the girl sat them down for a tea party. Other spots repeated the formula of young actors talking up child-friendly aspects of the car.

Each spot closed with the tagline "Kids Rule." The commercials walked a fine line, mixing humor but still underscoring Toyota's reputation for safety. While kids might want a fun car, parents were interested in keeping their children safe. Because the minivan segment was primarily aimed at families with children, any campaign would have to reassure parents that their children would be protected. Toyota's playful spot featuring the teddy bear and doll crash-test team was a good example of how Toyota was able to use a light touch to reinforce the brand's strong record for quality.

OUTCOME

The campaign was wildly successful. Sienna's sales went up 119 percent after the launch, while its competitors took a tumble. The Quest underperformed in its debut, selling 30,448 units, well below Nissan's target of 80,000 to 85,000. Meanwhile, Chrysler's Town & Country saw sales decline 7.5 percent, and Ford's Freestar sold 17.5 percent less than its predecessor, the Windstar, had. Many observers gave direct credit for the Sienna's success to the "Kids Rule" campaign. The campaign was also a hit with critics, and it won a Silver EFFIE Award from the New York American Marketing Association in 2005.

Toyota addressed the Sienna's awareness problem; from the prelaunch period to June 2004 its ad awareness jumped 99 percent. Total sales for 2004 reached 157,587 units, a significant rise from the previous year's 104,378 units sold. USA Today also reported that, based on the results of its Ad Track surveys, the "Kids Rule" campaign was among the 10 most likeable ads of 2003.

FURTHER READING

Blumberg, George P. "To Sell a Car that Women Love, It Helps if Women Sell It." New York Times, October 26, 2005.

Broder, John. "A Family Cocoon with Frills." New York Times, October 23, 2005.

Howard, Theresa. "Ads Put Kids in Minivan Spotlight." USA Today, June 29, 2003.

Jackson, Kathy. "Toyota Counts on Kids in Sienna Campaign." Automotive News, April 28, 2003.

Liker, Jeffrey. The Toyota Way: 14 Management Principles from the World's Greatest Manufacturer. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

Rechtin, Mark. "Toyota's New Sienna Minivan Incorporates the Best from All Comers." Auto Week, January 20, 2003.

Roberts, Kevin. Lovemarks: The Future beyond Brands. New York: powerHouse, 2004.

Vaughn, Mark. "Bigger Is Better: There's More Sienna Almost Anywhere You Measure." Auto Week, February 24, 2003.

Zaccai, Gianfranco. "Designed for Loving." BusinessWeek, July 21, 2005.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

THE ROAD IS CALLING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1989 Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., boldly placed itself in direct competition with such automakers as Bayerische Motoren Werke AG (BMW) and Mercedes Benz when it launched Lexus, a new division of near-luxury cars. A precedent was set, and fellow Japanese automakers Honda and Nissan would soon follow with their own divisions to compete in the lucrative over-$35,000 car market. Among the Lexus lines, the ES proved immensely popular, providing for approximately 50 percent of all Lexus sales by 1996. Hoping to increase sales for the already popular ES 300, Toyota released a campaign titled "The Road Is Calling."

The campaign debuted on October 10, 1996, across television, print, outdoor, interactive, and direct-marketing mediums. The ad agency Team One Advertising created the $60 million campaign to shake the cold, unemotional image that some had associated with the ES 300. For the campaign Team One put a captivating new spin on the typical car-zipping-along-a-scenic-landscape approach to car ads. In TV spots for "The Road Is Calling," celebrity actors, including Demi Moore and John Cleese, uttered voice-over lines scripted for such roads as the Autobahn and Fifth Avenue. By craftily choosing stars whose voices corresponded with a given aspect of the Lexus image, Team One portrayed the ES 300 as a tantalizing entity, one that even a road could fall in love with. The tagline was "The road is calling. Answer it." Bold, aggressive, and provocative, the enticing spots increased consumer awareness of the ES 300 as a car that represented luxury, performance, and value. The campaign concluded in 1998.

Not only did ad critics praise "The Road Is Calling," but also, more than 1,100 advance orders for the new ES 300 were placed before the car was made available at dealerships. Two months after the campaign began, Lexus's segment share increased 5 percent and sales were 32 percent greater than expected by Toyota's executives. Company representatives and Team One deemed the campaign a triumph.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Toyota introduced its Lexus division in 1989, it faced an uphill challenge toward an upscale image. Toyota had earned a long-standing reputation for producing reliable, dependable, and unassuming cars. After investing $500 million in research and development to create the Lexus division, Toyota had to create an image that would not be regarded as the Toyota in emperor's clothes. In addition, the company had to press to stay ahead of its traditional competitors, Honda and Nissan, who were quick on the heels of Toyota in launching their own near-luxury divisions, Acura and Infiniti.

Toyota did not allow its conservative, unpretentious reputation or the slowing of the go-go 1980s economy to dispel a dream of developing a car that could go tire-to-tire with such European luxury cars as Mercedes Benz, BMW, and Porsche. Undaunted by a marked slow down in conspicuous consumption in the United States, Toyota chairman Eiji Toyoda told Fortune magazine, "The people who have been buying our cars were moving up in life. We wanted to meet their heightened needs."

To introduce a near-luxury car at a dramatically lower price than its German competitors, Lexus had to shape a compelling new image. Research had shown that the older-age market for luxury cars in the United States would not be easily seduced away from their love affair with Cadillacs and Lincolns. Existing owners of high-end German cars, a market deeply tied to established status symbols, would be no less difficult to convert. There was, however, that little niche acknowledged by Toyota chairman Toyoda: the younger buyer moving up in life who wanted a true luxury car but who could not yet afford it.

In an utterly self-confident move, Lexus staged its debut to the press in Germany, the homeland of its targeted competition. U.S. industry journalists from such publications as Car and Driver and Road & Track were flown into Frankfurt for an exhilarating, heady five days of competitive driving in cars by Lexus, BMW, Jaguar, and Mercedes. From slow cruising along the Rhine to testing mettle on the Autobahn, the newborn Lexus captured attention for its serene quiet and stability at blinding speeds.

An aura of anticipation was generated for Lexus's American debut. A massive direct-mailing targeted 250,000 prospective consumers. In August dealers were given the nod to sell the new cars as soon as they rolled onto the lot, one month before the official introduction. Creating image lust was paramount for Lexus. Team One's objective was to bathe the Lexus in an image of quality, luxury, and dependability. They put together a tagline that would epitomize what Lexus had to offer: "The relentless pursuit of perfection."

By 1997 Team One's image for the ES 300 had shifted, adding style and performance to an earlier emphasis on safety and style. Through evocative narration from the road's perspective, "The Road Is Calling" spots deftly rolled a message of luxury, performance, safety, and value into one desirable car.

TARGET MARKET

Team One's primary goal with its "The Road Is Calling" campaign was to keep existing Lexus owners coming back for more, with a secondary goal of luring new owners away from competitive luxury cars like the Mercedes-Benz C-Class, Volvo 850, Infiniti I30, Acura TL, and Cadillac Catera. Surveying had shown Team One that buyers owning or considering these brands were demographically similar and that they were open to trading across the segment.

Affluence and image were key components in pinpointing demographics. The primary target average was a 49-year-old, college-educated, professional, married male with a median household income of $104,000. Psychologically, this audience was colored by a young mindset, a love of travel, and an active lifestyle. They were already driving a near-luxury, midluxury, or Japanese mid-size car and were confident and comfortable about their professional and personal life.

To attract this attitude-demanding audience, Team One set out to fashion a new air of excitement about the tried and true ES. They had to portray the ES 300 as a multifaceted car, one promising a sporty performance wrapped in a luxurious package while offering a good value. A look at the Nielsen ratings suggested "The Road Is Calling" would reach this audience with spots on NBC's Thursday night lineup of Friends, Seinfeld, and ER. Print ads were widely targeted at various segments of this market in business, sports, travel, food and wine, and home magazines.

Although the target market had been pinpointed as primarily male, Lexus aimed at women buyers as well, sponsoring such promotional events as Bon Appétit 's seventh annual Wine & Spirits Focus tours and a retrospective of fashion photography. Steve Sturm, Lexus's corporate marketing manager, told Advertising Age, "Traditionally, buyers of luxury cars are men, but we're reaching out now specifically to women who have their own income, their own sense of style for luxury cars."

In targeting a younger, hipper audience, Team One began to de-emphasize the Lexus as a sophisticated, mature product. In a 1997 spot entitled "Video Noise," a montage of futuristic imagery and alternative music were used to attract younger buyers to Lexus GS, LS, and RX models. Tom Cordner, cochairman and executive creative director for Team One, explained to Adweek, "The market is a little fickle now. People are in search of a brand of car, and they're experimenting more, and you want to grab their attention. At one point, they had an impression of Lexus, and we're a totally different company in terms of attitude. This was an opportunity to say to the world, 'Here is a new Lexus.' We are reaching down to a younger, hipper audience in an attempt to attract buyers we previously had not connected with."

COMPETITION

Lexus was not alone in recognizing and targeting the spending power of a more youthful audience in 1997. In Crain's Detroit Business, Lexus's Steve Sturm said, "The higher in price you go, the more competitive it gets. All of us are participating in a changing marketplace, and we have more changes in [model year] 1998 than any year in history. We are broadening our image to be younger, more energetic in approach."

Lexus's major competitors had their sights aimed at just this market in both ads and promotional sponsorship. In spots energized by racing camera angles and spirited music, BMW simulated the feel of being behind the wheel, nudging a new generation into Beemer lust. In a spin on a sophisticated wine tasting, the car company sponsored a "BMW Tasting" in a cooperative effort with Food & Wine. For the price of a test-drive, prospective buyers received free cooking pans from the magazine. Nordstrom department stores and upscale gadget retailer Hammacher Schlemmer were also the scene of BMW's special promotions. "These events don't attract huge crowds, but that's not our goal," said Rich Brooks, BMW's marketing and events communications manager, to Advertising Age. "The intimate setting lets us talk to high-end buyers in unique settings that suit their outlooks and lifestyles."

A ROAD LESS TRAVELED

"Come closer. Come closer. There. I'm the road and I'm so bored. It's been so long since someone new came into my life and hugged me, caressed me, and excited me." Such were the sad, lonely longings uttered by Demi Moore as the famous Monterey, California, byway in the "17-Mile Drive" segment of "The Road Is Calling." Alas, although the 17-mile stretch of road was amply sated when the ES 300 slipped along its asphalt, it would be but a brief encounter. Lexus had to pull the "17-Mile Drive" spot soon after its original airing, when Cadillac bought all filming rights to 17-Mile Drive.

Mercedes underscored its reputation for elegance by sponsoring a series of co-op literary events with Condé Nast. Groups of subscribers to Allure, Architectural Digest, Condé Nast Traveler, Gourmet, Vanity Fair, and Vogue were invited to exclusive restaurants to rub elbows with author Gay Talese.

The near-luxury marketplace in 1997 was the most competitive segment among luxury manufacturers. Lexus had to contend with the emergence of the sport-utility vehicle as the new vehicle of privilege, in addition to vying for market share with their traditional competitors. Infiniti's I30 was a major competitor in the value-oriented market; Acura's TL, Audi's A4, and Volvo's 850 were gaining in visibility; BMW and Mercedes were both gaining market share after a five-year decline; and Cadillac's Catera was rumored to be lobbing a direct hit at Lexus.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Lexus and Team One pulled out all the stops in marketing the ES 300 in what would be the most integrated launch campaign in Lexus's history. The approximately $60 million campaign, which included television, print, outdoor, interactive, event, and direct-marketing mediums, was developed to express ES 300's well-rounded qualities of luxury, performance, safety, and value. It was released on October 10, 1996.

Team One's challenge was to dramatize these qualities and increase awareness of the brand. Their approach in "The Road Is Calling" was innovative. The list of car ads that featured sleek, out-of-focus, mysterious vehicles gliding down a curvaceous highway was endless, but when had the road had a say about the sexy stuff going on its blacktop? In a series of spots, Team One handed the stage to famous roads. Through the voice-overs of equally well-known celebrities, the featured roads responded passionately to playing host to the ES 300.

Via the posh voice of Frasier star Kelsey Grammer, Fifth Avenue was the essence of elegance. Grammer's patrician voice lent dignity to the Avenue's boredom with its day-to-day life . . . until the new ES 300 rolled its way. Finally, it encountered something "worthy of its asphalt." The car's performance was praised in spots featuring the Autobahn (Jeremy Irons) and the Brooklyn Bridge (Joe Pesci). Irons/Autobahn taunted, "Do you think you have what it takes to tame me?" and closed the spot by laughing, "Come back. I let you win this time." The Brooklyn Bridge, aka Joe Pesci, challenged the ES's ability to maintain a smooth ride with a tough-guy brashness and a surface pocked with potholes. "You want a piece a' me? . . . I got your suspension right here!" Valencia Gayles, Team One account supervisor, spoke with Entertainment Weekly about the Pesci spot. "He has the quintessential tough-guy voice. We look for celebrity voices that correspond to the personality of the road." One of the campaign's final spots, "Canterbury," featured John Cleese extolling the ES's safety under pressure, whereas "Wall Street" had a bullish response to the model's value. Each spot ended with the tagline "The Road Is Calling. Answer It," enticing consumers to identify not only with the car's image, but also with that of the accommodating (or challenging) road traversed. Enticement was the theme of "The Road Is Calling" print ads as well, with the road beckoning the ES in such come-hither catchphrases as "Pick Me," "Feed Me," "Yoo-Hoo," and "Take Me, I'm Yours."

Brand ads for the Lexus LS 400 depicted the ultimate intimate relationship between driver and car. In "Running Man" and "Seamless," the driver literally blended right in, visually becoming one with his Lexus. The work of makeup artist Joanne Gall, who had painted actress Demi Moore's body for an infamous Vanity Fair cover, was matched by the tagline, "You've never felt this connected to a car.'' Sturm told Adweek, ''We have an all-new car from the inside out, and we wanted to make a dramatic and dynamic statement.''

Commercials for the Lexus GS sport sedan were equally bewitching. In Automotive News, Bob Garfield described the haunting spots as ''Edward Gorey meets William Shakespeare meets Charles Addams meets Tim Burton.'' An ominous female voice warned, ''Ill winds mark its fearsome flight, and autumn branches creak with fright. The landscape turns to ashen crumbs, when something wicked this way comes.'' Then came a tagline that could give the highway patrol something to worry about: ''Introducing the 300 horsepower V-8 Lexus GS. The fastest automatic sedan in the world.''

The highly integrated campaign had been inaugurated by what Team One believed to be a first-ever advance E-mailing to consumers. Targeted were owners of rival cars who had stopped by Lexus's website, where a virtual test-drive was being offered. At the same time, Lexus mailed product brochures and interactive promotional videos to existing owners in advance of the ad launch.

Considered together, Team One's 1997 Lexus advertisements were tinged with a beguiling brand identity. Lexus and its major competitors were following an emerging trend in automotive advertising, that of brand building. With Lexus and its competitors all offering dazzling performance and style, the key to registering in consumer consciousness was to align the brand name with desirability. Lexus's 1998 decision to ''relaunch'' its original tagline, ''The Relentless Pursuit of Perfection'' was a direct effort to reestablish a brand identity that had held the test of time. ''The Road Is Calling'' ended in 1998.

OUTCOME

With the beckon ''The Road Is Calling. Answer it,'' Lexus's ES 300 was introduced with an attitude of energetic enticement. The campaign positioned the ES 300 as the most successful launch in Lexus's history. Amid an arena crowded with competitors, the ES moved up the scale of consumer awareness thanks to the marketing efforts of the campaign. Dealership traffic was brisk, and all sales goals were exceeded during the launch time frame. The ES 300 continued to surpass monthly sales goals well beyond the initial push of the launch.

The ES 300 introduction generated an impressive level of consumer demand. Direct E-mailing and interactive promotions resulted in more than 1,100 advance orders before the ES even reached the showroom. During the first two months segment share increased from 7 percent to 12 percent, and the first six months' sales objective was exceeded by an average of 32 percent. In fact, consumer demand dramatically outpaced supply, necessitating a scaling back of advertising to allow for the limited supply.

Results of the Allison Fisher Awareness and Purchase Intention Data Study were equally decisive. The study found that demand for the ES was generated immediately upon launch, with shopping intentions moving up for four consecutive months. The ES was successful in attracting existing ES owners while also gaining share from the competition's Infiniti I30, Acura TL, Mercedes C-Class, and Volvo 850. The campaign's goal of increasing an image of good value scored high, with the ES's ''reasonably priced'' rating elevated to an all-time high. The performance image was also enhanced, with the model receiving its highest-ever rating for ''excellent acceleration.'' The ES 300 gained a marked lead in the near-luxury segment in both awareness and familiarity, 10 points higher than the nearest competitor. Lexus's ad recall increased for 1997, primarily as a result of the ES 300's ''The Road Is Calling'' campaign.

Across the board, Team One's ads for Lexus models met with critical success. The agency's ads were seen as stylishly provocative, and Team One received the most awards from the 1997 International Automotive Advertising Awards.

Team One Advertising and Lexus had set out to inject the company's image of elegance, safety, and dependability with a fresh shot of youthful energy. ''The Road Is Calling'' hit this mark in spades by targeting a younger market and repainting Lexus as a near-luxury car that could deliver performance and pleasure. After the campaign's second year U.S. sales for Lexus were 60 percent higher in 1998 than they had been in 1997. December sales for the ES 300 during the campaign's final year were 2.7 percent greater than the previous December's ES 300 sales.

FURTHER READING

Caro, Mark. ''Advertisers Sold on Using Major Stars for TV Voice-Overs.'' Chicago Tribune, April 10, 1998.

Enrico, Dottie. ''Automakers Switch Gears on Ads.'' USA Today, October 1, 1997.

Feuer, Jack. ''For Carmakers, Image Is Everything.'' Crain's Detroit Business, October 27, 1997.

Fitzgerald, Kate. ''In Upscale Traffic: Magazines Offer Affluent Events for Carmakers.'' Advertising Age, January 12, 1998.

———. ''Taking Tony Route: Carmakers Have Eye on Women as Autos Park at Stylish Events.'' Advertising Age, November 25, 1996.

Garfield, Bob. ''Rating the Ads: Lexus Wins, Toyota Loses.'' Automotive News, October 13, 1997.

Guildford, Dave. ''Lexus' New Safety Ads Depict Risky Drivers.'' Advertising Age, October 18, 1999, p. 26.

Halliday, Jean. "'99 Lexus Ads Shine Spotlight on Quality." Automotive News, June 29, 1998.

Johnson, Bradley. "Lexus Tries E-Mail for Auto Intro." Advertising Age, October 7, 1996.

Laine, Tricia. "Talk of Fame." Entertainment Weekly, May 8, 1998.

McCarthy, Michael. "Lexus Promotes Sportier Attitude." Adweek, October 7, 1996.

Taylor, Alex, and William E. Sheeline. "Competition: Here Comes Japan's New Luxury Cars." Fortune, August 14, 1989.

"Team One Lives up to Its Name at Awards Show." Los Angeles Times, January 15, 1998.

Tyrer, Kathy. "Lexus Makes an Emotional Appeal." Adweek, September 8, 1997.

———. "New Team One Spot Helps Lexus Let Down Its Hair." Adweek, September 22, 1997.

Barbra Brady
Kevin Teague

Travelocity

3150 Sabre Drive
Southlake, Texas 76092
USA
Telephone: (682) 605-1000
Fax: (817) 785-8004
E-mail: travelocity@travelocity.com
Web site: www.travelocity.com

■■■

ROAMING GNOME CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The pioneering online travel-booking company known as Travelocity had enjoyed a leadership position since its launch in 1996, but it eventually lost significant market share to Expedia.com, its most aggressive competitor. Orbitz, third in market share, was also gaining ground. Travelocity was owned by Texas-based Sabre Holdings Corp., a world leader in travel commerce. To provide an emotional connection and to differentiate itself from competing online travel-booking services with similar user experiences, Travelocity launched a high-profile television, print, public relations, radio, and outdoor advertising campaign in January 2004. The campaign began with a clever premise: the ''kidnapping'' of a two-foot-tall gnome lawn statue who unwittingly traveled the world with his captors.

The $80 million multimedia campaign was conceived by Raleigh, North Carolina–based ad agency McKinney & Silver, an independent operating unit of worldwide communications group Havas. A three-week guerilla public relations campaign spearheaded the initiative with a poster reading, ''Wanted: My garden gnome. Have you seen him?'' These posters, which were distributed and posted around the United States in key media and consumer markets, featured the gnome's photo, a toll-free tip line, and the Web address www.whereismygnome.com. Corresponding print ads showed a two-foot-tall garden gnome with a ruddy complexion and pointy red cap and used the identical poster copy, purportedly written by the gnome's desperate owner, ''Bill.'' Next the TV campaign broke on January 1, 2004, during the Rose Bowl.

Once the gnome's peripatetic premise was established, the roaming continued with vigor. In 2005 the campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award, which gave international recognition to ad campaigns for their measured marketing effectiveness. The gnome even had his own merchandise Web page on the Travelocity.com site, physical proof of the power of the campaign's effective branding to invigorate sales. Midway through the campaign an updated tagline, ''You'll never roam alone,'' was added to showcase the new ''Travelocity Guarantee'' and ''Customer Bill of Rights.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Before the widespread use of the Internet by consumers, only travel professionals used computer systems to find itineraries and prices of travel offerings. In 1996 Sabre Holdings opened a new business called Travelocity, a website at which the consumer user could find on his own the same transportation, hotel, and related travel offerings. Competitors Expedia and Orbitz joined the fray, but all three websites functioned similarly, and consumer differentiation was nonexistent.

In the two years prior to the "Roaming Gnome" campaign Travelocity had struggled, losing its industry-leading status to rival Expedia, and it had faced increased competition from Orbitz, which was funded by airlines. Travelocity had never recorded a profit and found itself playing catch-up as competitors unveiled new features and vacation packages. The company thus beefed up its promotional efforts in mid-2002 with "Travelocity Can," a $40 million branding campaign consisting of TV, radio, print, and online advertising that highlighted travel possibilities available both through the website and by calling the phone number 888-Travelocity. The campaign presented Travelocity.com as a "travel dream factory" that served as the ultimate consumer resource for all travel needs. TV advertising consisted of two 30-second spots, which were supported by corresponding print and online ads. "Wedding," one of the TV spots, highlighted the resources available through the site by featuring travelers in places all over the world. The second spot, "Elephant," showed people experiencing things that they had never dreamed possible, such as renting an elephant, because of the help they had received via Travelocity.com's travel tools. David Hall, principal for the Richards Group, the agency that created the campaign, said, "we feature real-life people describing how Travelocity helped them plan their entire trip."

In 2003 Travelocity's revenue grew 16.5 percent to $394.5 million, although the company reported a $100 million operating loss. Of the 64 million travelers who planned trips online in 2004, 45 million booked on the Internet, which reflected an increase of 6 percent over 2003, according to the Travel Industry Association of Washington, D.C.

In October 2003 Travelocity hired the Raleigh-based firm McKinney & Silver to create new marketing ideas. The gnome idea was one of proposals the agency had made during its bid for the Travelocity ad contract. "We thought the gnome was really lovable, someone who has a sense of the fun of travel," Susan McLaughlin, vice president of marketing for Travelocity, told the News & Observer.

GNOME, COME HOME: HOW TRAVELOCITY'S MASCOT WAS BORN

In a 2004 Christian Science Monitor article, Susan McLaughlin, vice president of marketing and merchandising at Travelocity, was quoted as attributing the gnome inspiration to a curious custom in Europe, where gnomes that decorated lawns and gardens were stolen and then taken on trips by pranksters, who sent the gnome owners amusing "ransom" notes with photographs of their missing gnomes on vacation.

The custom gained worldwide appeal via the 2001 French film Amelie, in which the protagonist, in an effort to inspire her father to travel, conspired with a flight attendant to send her father's gnome on a photo-documented tour of foreign landmarks. Years before Amelie the long-running British soap opera Coronation Street featured a similar plot in which a man stole his neighbor's gnome and then taunted him with ransom letters.

According to David Emery, a writer and specialist in urban legends, gnome-napping was an international phenomenon with at least a 20-year history that started in Australia when a Sydney family's gnome disappeared. In France the Front de Libération des Nains de Jardin (Garden Gnome Liberation Front) had reportedly "liberated" more than 6,000 gnomes since 1997. Several French websites were devoted to this cause.

TARGET MARKET

Traditionally women were responsible for purchasing leisure travel in most U.S. households, said Henry Harteveldt, an analyst at Forrester Research, a market-research firm. Travelocity's research indicated that there was a subset of high-value online travel purchasers who appeared to be potentially more loyal to Travelocity than others. Further analysis showed an attitudinal profile of these people, which resulted in the identification of an opportunity segment that Travelocity marketing executives called "The Insiders." This group of 44 million people (33 percent of leisure travelers) loved to travel and was active, self-directed, resourceful, information-hungry, and Internet-savvy. The so-called "Insiders" loved to discover new things and liked to feel that they were "in the know." They also enjoyed passing their "Insider" knowledge on to others.

Additional markets the company identified included affluent, middle-aged, career-driven professionals; comfortable retirees (both couples and singles); young singles and newlyweds who worked hard and played hard; affluent, educated couples, with or without children, who led active cultural and recreational lives; and 40-something, middle-income families whose teen-dominated households kept them busy.

COMPETITION

Expedia, Travelocity, and Orbitz all ranked among the top 10 in sales, but traditional travel agencies American Express Travel and Minneapolis-based Carlson Wagonlit

Travel still claimed the top two positions in 2005. Travelocity struggled with losing share to Expedia and facing increasing competition from Orbitz. In 2002 Expedia held a 36 percent market share, with Travelocity at 24 percent and Orbitz at 13 percent. Expedia spent $95 million on media in 2002, compared with $70 million for Orbitz and $59 million for Travelocity, according to TNS Media Intelligence/CMR.

In 2001 Expedia launched a television, print, and outdoor campaign, devised by the Los Angeles office of ad agency Deutsch, that used travel humor as its selling point. The TV spots showed unhappy but amusing travel scenarios played as flash-forward vignettes. The protagonist rethought and then rebooked his or her trip, precluding the potential ill-fated excursion. For example, in the spot "Business Trip," a woman reconfigured her trip in order to avoid an obnoxious male colleague who would have otherwise sat next to her throughout it. "House Party" showed a couple rethinking the wisdom of leaving their teenage son home during a vacation as they imagined a wild teen party. The couple then booked a trip to include the teen. "The campaign attempts to own better travel planning, which equals better travel experience," Eric Hirshberg, executive creative director at Deutsch, told USA Today. "These spots demonstrate the breadth and depth of Expedia's travel tools and how easy they are to use to plan and book your trip." Realistic casting added appeal to the target consumer, described as regular folk instead of "aspirational" travelers.

Competitor Orbitz aimed to put the romance and fun back into travel with its "Visit Planet Earth" print campaign, which was released in mid-2001, prior to the corresponding TV campaign. To inspire the kind of warmth and excitement that it asserted that consumers ought to feel in traveling, Orbitz's agency, New York–based TBWA\Chiat\Day, tapped the original artists behind the fun, mod travel posters of the 1960s and '70s.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"We did a lot of consumer research, and they told us all the websites look alike. They're all visually cluttered," said Jeff Glueck, Travelocity's chief marketing officer, in an interview with the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. Once McKinney & Silver signed on, it tackled the problem of how to explore new directions and regain Travelocity's market share in the online travel business. Glueck explained that the idea for the traveling gnome originated with agency group creative directors Philip Marchington and Lisa Shimotakahara. They had noticed a news story about a group calling itself the Gnome Liberation Front, which kidnapped garden gnomes in France and ran a website about it. "We thought, what a great spokesman for a travel brand," Glueck said.

"Tour Guide," a 30-second spot, showed the gnome, obviously enjoying his kidnapping, driving a double-decker bus through the streets of London. Speaking with a slight British accent, he narrated postcards meant for his owner Bill. They were snapshots of his adventures and showed him on a ski lift, in a spa, and almost fully submerged in a hot tub. The campaign tagline, "Book with Travelocity. Don't Forget Your Hat," was meant to convey the idea that the brand took care of its customers' needs.

Travelocity strove to set itself apart from the competition by positioning the company as one that gave customers the best possible travel experiences, with a range of choices from the beginning of the booking process to the completion of the trip. Travelocity developed a strategy based on initially creating "pre-buzz" through grassroots efforts; once a real "buzz" had been created among consumers, the roaming gnome was connected to Travelocity as the website's new face. This strategy guided the tactics and the overall timing and implementation of the campaign.

To pique consumer and media interest prior to revealing the gnome's connection with Travelocity, the company and ad agency McKinney & Silver designed a "Missing Gnome" poster, describing the gnome's kidnapping from his fictional owner, Bill. The posters featured the gnome's photo, a toll-free tip line, and the Web address www.whereismygnome.com. Posters were distributed and posted around the country in key media and consumer markets. Additionally, more than 2,500 handwritten letters were mailed on Bill's behalf, soliciting help from reporters for the gnome's safe return. Efforts surrounding the gnome's pre-buzz included outreach to key travel industry analysts; to crime, lifestyle, and metro reporters at community, daily, and national newspapers; and to on-air personalities and news-assignment editors at radio and TV stations in the top 25 U.S. media markets.

OUTCOME

"We think this is the only time in history when the spending went up after the pitch," McKinney & Silver CEO Brad Brinegar said to the News & Observer, referring to the tendency of some clients to cut back their spending plans after awarding an account to an ad agency. Campaign results included successfully generating brand awareness. The effectiveness of the three-week teaser, which ran from December 2003 to January 2004, was demonstrated by the 1,554,000 hits received at the wheresmygnome.com website and by the 3,180 E-mails sent to Bill, the gnome's fictitious owner. Brand momentum led to increased visits to the Travelocity website, and after just one month of the new campaign, site hits were 250 percent over the original goal; through July 2004 hits were 108 percent over the goal. The campaign won a 2005 Gold EFFIE Award for campaign efficacy in the specialized Retail/E-tail category.

FURTHER READING

Ahles, Andrea. "New Chief Executive for Travelocity Faces Uphill Road to Profitability." Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram, February 2, 2004.

———. "Travelocity Hopes Gnome Ad Campaign Will Relaunch Brand." Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram, January 6, 2004.

Anderson, Mae. "Behind the Scenes." Adweek, January, 24,2005, p. 26.

Fuquay, Jim. "Travelocity Posts First Profit Ever in Second Quarter." Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram, July 23, 2004.

———. "Travelocity to Unveil New Website Design." Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram, March 25, 2004.

Garfield, Bob. "Garfield's AdReview: Travelocity Vagabond Gnome Talks, but to Wrong Audience." Advertising Age, January 26, 2004, p. 33.

Howard, Theresa. "Expedia Ads Focus on Vacation Experience, Not Just Fares." USA Today, March 21, 2004.

Lazare, Lewis. "Travelocity's 'Roaming Gnome' Idea Came from European Custom." Chicago Sun-Times, January 9, 2004, p. 51.

Lovel, Jim. "David Baldwin On the Spot." Adweek, January 24, 2005, pp. 28–28.

Pierceall, Kimberly. "Industry Refines Services as Competition from Web Grows." Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, August 28, 2005.

Rajewski, Genevieve. "Roaming Gnomes in the News Again." Christian Science Monitor, January 30, 2004, p. 14.

Ranii, David. "Travelocity Books $80 Million with North Carolina Marketing Firm for Gnome Ads." Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, January 7, 2004.

Thomaselli, Rich. "Travelocity Hands McKinney $30M Biz." Advertising Age, October 27, 2003.

Trickett, Eleanor. "The Mix: Travelocity Pulls Off Hard Task of Sustaining Simultaneous Memorable Branding Efforts." PR Week, January 17, 2005.

Jan Arrigo

Triarc Companies, Inc.

280 Park Ave.
New York, New York 10017
USA
Telephone: (212) 451-3000
Fax: (212) 451-3134
Web site: www.snapple.com

■■■

RETURN OF THE SNAPPLE LADY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

On June 5, 1997, Wendy Kaufman, known to millions of consumers as ''the Snapple Lady,'' was welcomed back as a brand spokesperson after an almost two-year hiatus. The move completed a circle of sorts for Snapple, a brewer of iced teas and fruit flavored beverages that just three months earlier had been purchased by the Triarc Beverage Group. A stormy period of declining sales as a subsidiary of the Quaker Oats Company—during which the highly popular Snapple Lady was ushered out of the spotlight—was now over, and Snapple was in a mood to celebrate.

The Kaufman announcement was made in midtown Manhattan in New York City with style, flair, and a healthy dose of kitsch, all trademarks of the Snapple brand. Triarc retooled an empty storefront at 319 Fifth Avenue (at the corner of 32nd Street) to resemble an old-fashioned New York deli. Mike Weinstein, chief executive officer of the Triarc Beverage Group, stood up to welcome the media, distributors, and invited guests. Then Kaufman, escorted by several Snapple trucks, drove up to the ''deli'' on a parade float modeled to replicate the label of Snapple Orange Tropic, the new drink the company had formulated to commemorate her return. Kaufman then burst into the press conference to announce that she was, in fact, reunited with Snapple. A video of her latest Snapple television commercial was then played for the invited guests.

The commercial and the campaign were designed to return Snapple to its roots. This was an important strategy for a brand that had seen its sales decline by 21 percent during two years of Quaker Oats management. Triarc executives hoped the return of the Snapple Lady would energize the brand and once again put it in the forefront of American consumer consciousness.

The stakes were high for the new campaign. Triarc Companies, a holding company whose subsidiaries were engaged in beverages, restaurants, and propane distribution, spent $300 million in March 1997 to secure control of Snapple from Quaker Oats Company, the maker of Gatorade, Cap'n Crunch, and Rice-a-Roni brands. The acquisition added to the company's beverage interests, which also included subsidiaries Mistic Beverages and Stewart's. The company was also the franchiser for more than 3,000 Arby's fast-food restaurants. In addition, Triarc owned 43 percent of National Propane Partners.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1972 in Brooklyn, New York, Snapple began as a natural soda sold in health food stores. By the early 1980s the line had expanded to include fruit flavors with evocative names like Mango Madness and Tropical Fantasy. Later the company added a line of bottled teas as well. On its packaging Snapple emphasized the "natural" aspects of its beverages. The brand attracted a loyal following, particularly among college students and hip young professionals. Other companies soon moved to market similar products. By the end of the 1980s the so-called "New Age drink" market was growing briskly at 50 to 100 percent a year.

Kaufman became known as the Snapple Lady, answering mail for the Long Island-based beverage company. Majoring in film and sociology at Syracuse University, Kaufman spent eight years of dispatching trucks at her father's metal warehouse before getting a job in Snapple's order department in 1991. Having learned the workings of the beverage business, Kaufman started personally to answer consumers' letters to Snapple headquarters. Her oft-stated sentiment was that if people cared enough about Snapple to take time to write to the company, the company owed it to the consumers to respond. The company, which traded on a folksy image, decided to incorporate Kaufman into its ad campaign in 1993, and 36 award-winning television commercials between 1993 and early 1996 would ensue.

The spots were decidedly low-concept. In most of them Kaufman simply sat behind a desk and answered letters from Snapple consumers. "Hi and hello from Snapple," she predictably announced in her Long Island accent. Yet something about her authenticity and sense of humor struck a chord with audiences across the country. "I don't play the part, I am the part," she once observed, and Snapple drinkers embraced her as a company spokesperson they could relate to. As Snapple's "ambassador of goodwill," Kaufman did more than just appear in television commercials. She traveled the country performing promotional activities for the company, such as attending a prom with a New Jersey fan and dancing with the Los Angeles Classical Ballet. She even took a whirlpool bath in kiwi strawberry flavored Snapple in order to promote that new drink.

The "Snapple Lady" campaign came during a time of enormous growth for the brand. Between 1989 and 1993 Snapple sales rose from $23.6 million to $516 million. The ads and promotional activities made Kaufman a minor celebrity. She appeared on television talk shows like Oprah, Regis and Kathy Lee, and The Rosie O'Donnell Show. But her time in the national spotlight would run out when cereal giant Quaker Oats bought Snapple for $1.7 billion in December 1994.

There were ominous portents almost as soon as the Quaker Oats acquisition was completed. Some analysts noted that the allure of the so-called New Age beverages, which had gained popularity across the country, was fading at the time. Quaker Oats then compounded its troubles by trying to meld the Snapple distribution network into its top-selling Gatorade network, which did not go over well with distributors.

Quaker Oats then gave the green light to a series of new television commercials, dismissing Snapple Lady Kaufman just months before the expiration of her contract. The new spots, launched in April 1996, followed a four-month television advertising blackout, during which time Quaker Oats worked intensely to develop a new strategy for the struggling brand. For the first commercials of this campaign, created by agency Kirshenbaum, Bond & Partners, the iced tea and juice marketer tapped filmmaker Spike Lee to helm one of five new television spots. Echoing the old "We Try Harder" campaign for Avis Rent-a-Car, the new Snapple spots trumpeted the fact that while Snapple was not in the same league as soft-drink giants Coca-Cola or Pepsi-Cola, it would be happy as a high-ranking also-ran. "Threedom Equals Freedom" and "We Want to Be No. 3" were the tag lines for the spots. Some viewers were confused by the abruptness of the Snapple Lady's departure from the scene. Neither Quaker Oats nor Spike Lee offered any explanation for the change. "She had her run," said Lee.

While being proud to be third might have sufficed as a quirky campaign mantra, it proved unsuccessful as a market proposition. The campaign left consumers confused about the brand's identity, and Snapple took a beating from competitors who saw its problems as an opportunity to pour new products onto the market. The high-priced ads did nothing to slow the erosion in Snapple sales. Quaker Oats executives ultimately were forced to try giving the drink away in a $40 million summer campaign to try to lure skeptical consumers back to the brand. Despite these efforts, Snapple endured a $100 million loss in 1996.

In March 1997 Quaker Oats sold Snapple to Triarc Companies, Inc,. for less than one-fourth of what it had paid for the brand. The diminution was a result of losses that totaled $160 million in 1995 and 1996 alone and sales that dropped 21 percent in two years to $550 million. Triarc Companies, Inc., was perhaps ideally suited to try to revive the sagging fortunes of Snapple. Best known for its RC Cola brand, subsidiary Royal Crown Company made flavor concentrates for private-label soft drinks. The company was run by financiers Nelson Peltz and Peter May, who profited from several large investments in the 1980s. The pair eventually bought a controlling stake in Triarc, an industrial conglomerate then known as DWG Corp., from financier Victor Posner in 1993 for $71.8 million. In the 1990s Triarc began to focus on beverages and restaurants, purchasing the Mistic teas and juice drinks and the T. J. Cinnamons restaurant chain. It operated almost 3,000 restaurants, including Arby's and P. T. Noodles.

One of Triarc's first orders of business was to renew its association with Kaufman, and the beloved Snapple Lady was soon appearing in Snapple ads once again. In addition, a new Snapple flavor, Snapple Orange Tropic, was developed as part of a new line dubbed Wendy's Tropical Inspiration. Calling Kaufman "the embodiment of Snapple's lovable, offbeat nature," company officials appointed her to the newly created post of Snapple Ambassador for Community Relations.

TARGET MARKET

The New Age segment of the beverage category began as an alternative to highly carbonated soft drinks, offering iced teas, fruit-based beverages, and flavored waters in the 1980s. In the 1990s new New Age alternatives included caffeinated waters, herbal concoctions, and "premium" sodas with less sweetness and carbonation. By this time non-colas had grown to command more than 60 percent of the soft-drink market.

Snapple was created by a trio of marketers from Long Island: Leonard Marsh and Hyman Golden, brothers-in-law who owned a window-washing company; and Arnold Greenberg, who had a health food store. Because the three did not have the financial clout of the big soft-drink makers, they marketed mainly to small stores. Along the way their beverage developed a cachet among the young and trendy. This sought-after cachet was encouraged with clever advertising and the constant introduction of new, offbeat flavors. In the late 1990s Snapple continued to market its products to those young and health-conscious consumers who preferred an alternative to colas.

COMPETITION

Beverage industry giants Coca-Cola and Pepsi were to a large degree responsible for the slump in sales in the New Age beverage category that betokened the sale of Snapple to Triarc and the return of the Snapple Lady. Their glitzy marketing campaigns and big-budget commercials helped depress Snapple sales to the point where Quaker Oats found it necessary to sell the brand. Triarc's only recourse seemed to be a "back to the roots" strategy designed to recapture Snapple's lost consumers.

Snapple's overall success emboldened the giant soda makers to develop fruit and tea products to compete in this market. Coca-Cola spent an estimated $15-20 million to promote its Fruitopia brand of juices. Pepsi also embarked on an expensive relaunch of its Lipton's Brew brand of ready-to-drink teas.

FIFTEEN MINUTES AND COUNTING

"I never left Snapple. Snapple left me," Wendy Kaufman observed following her re-hiring by the beverage maker in 1997. "When Quaker came into the picture they decided I was no longer the image they wanted to project, that I had had my time, and that they wanted to go mainstream." That was the extent of the public bitterness expressed by Kaufman (although she did make a point of saying, "I'll never eat oatmeal again"—a not-so-veiled jab at Quaker Oats, Snapple's erstwhile parent company—at her reintroduction extravaganza). The happy-go-lucky Long Island native seemed to have accepted her so-called fifteen minutes of fame with an equanimity that other celebrities could learn from.

While away from Snapple Kaufman tried a few other show business gigs. She held a job hosting a radio call-in advice segment called "Ask Wendy" and appeared briefly in the Chevy Chase film National Lampoon's Vegas Vacation. But she could not escape the image that she had built for herself as a heartfelt iced-tea pitchwoman—especially after a Colorado disc jockey launched a "Bring Back Wendy" campaign. Kaufman even turned down an offer to promote Mistic soft drinks because her heart reportedly remained with Snapple. "I was heartbroken," she said of her dismissal. "All I wanted to be was the Snapple Lady." In March 1997 she got her wish—and so did her legions of fans worldwide.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Before Quaker Oats purchased Snapple in 1994, growth in the New Age beverage category had slowed to about 20 percent from the highs of the 1980s. By the end of 1995 Snapple sales had fallen 9 percent, and the brand lost $100 million including charges and write-offs. "What the hell is Snapple?" groused corporate brand consultant Alan Brew in March 1997. "No one knows what it means anymore." Indeed, the single greatest challenge faced by Triarc marketers in the wake of the beverage company's acquisition of Snapple was to rebuild the brand's identity. "It's not edgy anymore, but we can bring that edginess back," declared Triarc Beverage Group CEO Weinstein. He immediately entered into negotiations with Kaufman to discuss her future role with Snapple.

"Time is of the essence because summer is coming," Kaufman remarked after their initial meeting. "One more year of bad Snapple advertising would be devastating for the brand." Heeding Kaufman's advice, Triarc in May 1997 announced that it had hired the New York-based ad agency Deutsch to create advertising for Snapple. The $40 million account had been in the hands of Chicago agency Foote, Cone, and Belding. Kirshenbaum, Bond & Partners, Snapple's original agency, was contacted by Triarc but declined to offer a pitch for the account.

With Deutsch now in charge of the creative side, Kaufman was once again tapped to star in a Snapple television commercial. This spot, however, finds her venturing far afield from her previous role as a company ombudsman responding to consumer letters. The new spot traces the efforts of a search party that has set out to find the missing Snapple Lady. The searchers eventually trace her steps to an island near Bora Bora, where the rotund New Yorker is being worshiped as a god by the natives. Kaufman is ultimately located and returned to Snapple headquarters. "They need me!" she says as a rowboat whisks her away from the island paradise. The commercial ends with a humorous twist as one of the islanders mistranslates her parting words as "we can eat you" and looks menacingly on the team of rescuers. The ad plays humorously off of Kaufman's oft-repeated public pronouncement that she spends her time away from Snapple touring the tropics.

Snapple Orange Tropic, the product commemorating Kaufman's renewed association with the company, blended fruit juices and purees to conjure up "the tastes and scents of the tropics," according to a company press release. The all-natural beverage contained 12 percent juice. It also featured Kaufman on its packaging. The 16-ounce bottles of the new product were wrapped by a whimsical drawing of the Snapple Lady relaxing in her island getaway. Reclining on a chaise lounge and outfitted in a floral dress with a lei and a fruit-topped hat, Kaufman is shown surrounded by lobsters, fish, and tropical birds. Palm trees and tropical plants and flowers serve as a backdrop. The new drink was distributed for a limited time starting in June 1997.

Weinstein stressed that Kaufman's return would not be a one-time proposition. While she would not be asked to fulfill her previous role answering letters and would no longer serve as company spokesperson, the Snapple Lady would be deployed to make personal appearances and aid the brand in other ways. Although Kaufman's potency as a pitchwoman was said to be strongest on the East Coast, due to her pronounced New York accent, Weinstein also emphasized Snapple's commitment to remain a national brand.

OUTCOME

The return of the Snapple Lady seemed to generate the kind of energy around the Snapple brand that its marketing executives had hoped for. Kaufman's coming-out party was heralded with a blitz of free publicity in Snapple's core East Coast markets, as local newscasts scrambled to cover the return of the prodigal pitchwoman. The commercials themselves evaded the usual critical scrutiny as reviewers preferred to remark on the new aspects of Kaufman's reemergence.

Kaufman soon settled into her role as spokesperson emeritus for Snapple brands. She rode the Snapple Orange Tropic Float in the 24th Annual New York City Halloween Parade on October 31, 1997. Meanwhile, Triarc went about the business of crafting a long-term marketing and advertising strategy for the brand. During this period sales rebounded. For the year ending March 1, 1998, dollar sales of refrigerated teas grew 4.8 percent, with Snapple leading the market. Triarc stewardship halted a three-year sales decline and actually increased Snapple case volume slightly in the second half of 1997 compared to the second half of the previous year. The return of the Snapple Lady—along with improved distributor relationships, targeted advertising, and product innovation—was credited with the upswing.

In the spring of 1998 Snapple introduced a new tag line, "The Best Stuff Is in Here," in commercials that retained the quirkiness of previous ads but without the Snapple Lady. The product-focused spots were designed to illustrate the wide variety of Snapple flavors and were again created by Deutsch New York. Industry analysts were undecided about whether the brand's turnaround was permanent or temporary.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Quaker Wants Snapple to Be No. 3, But Will the Strategy Bear Fruit?" The Wall Street Journal, April 2, 1996, p. B6.

Petrecca, Laura, and Judann Pollack. "Snapple's Wendy Returns via Deutsch." Advertising Age, May 19, 1997, p. 1.

"Snapple Lady Gets Her Job Back." The Baltimore Sun, June 26, 1997, p. 3E.

Wells, Melanie. "She May Be Back in a Snapple." USA Today, April 28, 1997, p. 2B.

Robert Schnakenberg

Turner Broadcasting System, Inc.

One CNN Center
100 International Boulevard
Atlanta, Georgia 30303
USA
Telephone: (404) 827-1700
Fax: (404) 827-2437
Web site: www.turner.com

■■■

31 DAYS OF OSCAR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1994 Turner Classic Movies (TCM) was a small start-up cable network with a collection of 4,000 movies, 21 employees, an operating budget of between $13 and $15 million, and 1 million subscribers. TCM also had the backing of television giant Turner Broadcasting System (TBS). Within a year of its launch TCM had increased its subscriptions to include 4.3 million homes, and its classic movie library had grown to 5,600 films. But the new network had a goal of being the leading classic movie brand. To help achieve this goal, the network in 1995 introduced its ''31 Days of Oscar'' marketing campaign, which every year ran during March, the month of the Academy Awards.

By 2002, ''31 Days of Oscar'' had become a staple of advertising for the commercial-free, all-movies network, but to broaden its appeal to a younger audience while not alienating its core viewers—middle-aged Americans—the network reevaluated the campaign. For the updated version of ''31 Days of Oscar,'' TCM partnered with the New York-based agency nicebigbrain and creative Jim Jenkins to produce a series of three ads that spoofed classic movies. The ads were shown as trailers in theaters and also as television spots. The first ad was a takeoff on the film Rocky that featured senior citizens in the starring roles. This was followed by a rendition of Ben-Hur performed by second and third graders, and the third was a remake of The Dirty Dozen that was set in an ice rink, with skaters taking the roles. While the company did not release budget figures for the campaign, previous budgets reportedly had ranged from $1 to several millions.

TCM's decision to shift its marketing strategy was a success. The ''Rocky'' ad earned a Bronze Lion at Cannes, and the overall campaign as well as the individual ads earned gold awards in several categories from Promax. In addition, the campaign appeared to achieve the goal of attracting younger viewers to the network.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1994 Turner Network Television (TNT) launched the commercial-free, all-movies cable channel TCM. The new channel went head-to-head with the long-running cable network American Movie Classics (AMC). TCM's enticement to persuade cable providers to include the new network in its channel listings was its library of 4,000 movies, which dated from the 1930s to modern classics such as Chinatown and Ordinary People. The network's broader movie offerings were also expected to draw younger viewers than those who typically tuned in to AMC.

Within a year the TCM library had grown to 5,600 movies, which included 2,300 films obtained in licensing deals with Paramount and Columbia Pictures, Warner Bros., and MGM/UA. Its subscriptions had increased from 1 million to 4.3 million homes. Fueling the new channel's growth was its ability to advertise on other Turner-owned networks, including TNT, Cable News Network (CNN), and TBS Superstation.

In 1995, to promote its commercial-free programming, TCM launched the marketing campaign "31 Days of Oscar." As part of the campaign TNT ran a special program titled Inside the Academy Awards. The TNT promotion kicked off the campaign, which included showing only films that had won or been nominated for Academy Awards during the month of March. TCM's "31 Days of Oscar" campaign became an annual marketing event for the network, with a budget by 1999 that was reported to be "several million dollars," according to Multichannel News. As well as print ads and cross-channel television spots, the campaign included movie trivia contests. In 2000 TCM's director of marketing, Katherine Evans, told Multichannel News that the annual "31 Days of Oscar" campaign was the network's highest profile event, with a budget of about $1 million. According to Evans, the company devoted about six months annually to planning for the campaign. "31 Days of Oscar is something we never stop thinking about. As soon as this [year] is over, we'll do a postmortem and start working on the next year," she said.

ATTRACTING YOUNGER VIEWERS

Turner Classic Movies (TCM) has traditionally appealed to an older audience. In 2003 the average age of its viewers was 56. That year TCM, hoping to attract younger television watchers, launched a series titled Under the Influence. According to the network, the new series reached out to viewers who were between 18 and 34 and who might not be familiar with movies from the 1930s to the 1960s. "A lot of our audiences are older Americans who have a built-in relevance to our movies, but our challenge is to create that relevance among younger viewers," Tom Karsch, TCM's senior vice president and general manager, told Multichannel News. The series featured contemporary stars talking about classic movies they had been inspired by, as well as screenings of more recent films that would resonate with the target audience, such as Ferris Bueller's Day Off and Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery.

TARGET MARKET

From its inception TCM had aimed the "31 Days of Oscar" campaign at serious film buffs of all ages. In 2002, in an effort to attract younger viewers, TCM shifted its marketing focus by sending the message that classic films had an impact on current culture. TCM hoped to show younger audiences that the events from the past portrayed in classic movies had relevance to contemporary life. In an discussion in Broadcasting & Cable, a quote attributed to actress Elizabeth Taylor—"The only difference from movies and real life is better lighting and music"—was used to explain the inspiration for reaching out to young viewers: The network was careful, however, not to abandon traditional viewers, those in the 55-and-older demographic. Many of TCM's core viewers had seen the movies in the network's line-up as original releases in theaters, and they tuned in to watch once again those movies they had enjoyed when they first appeared on the big screen.

COMPETITION

In 1984, when AMC joined the list of cable television networks, it was the premier choice for viewers in search of commercial-free, all-movies programming. AMC held that position for 10 years, until in 1994 TNT launched TCM. The race for viewers was then on. At the time industry experts questioned whether there were enough viewers to support two all-movie channels and whether cable operators were interested in offering subscribers both networks. But when TCM was launched, AMC executives commented that they expected their new competitor to be a great channel.

By 1995 AMC counted 54 million subscribers, compared to 4.3 million for TCM, but the new network was positioning itself to take over the classic movie brand. Hurting AMC was the fact that it did not own the movies it showed. Rather, the network depended on licensing agreements with studios such as RKO, which was owned by TBS, the parent of TCM. Predictions that within 10 years AMC would be driven out of business by TCM pushed Kate McEnroe, AMC's executive vice president and general manager, to ask, "If AMC is going out of business in 10 years, does that mean that A&E, ESPN and HBO are going out of business?" She noted that those cable networks also did not own their products.

AMC responded to pressures from TCM with aggressive advertising and consumer marketing campaigns that began in 1994. The network also shifted from its all-movies format to develop original programming that appealed to a broader audience. In 2002 AMC was still in business and tackling TCM's successful "31 Days of Oscar'' campaign with its own event, the 10th annual Film Preservation Festival. Programming included documentaries of highlights from 1970s movies, as well as screenings of movies like The Last Waltz, This Is Spinal Tap, and Saturday Night Fever.

While AMC and TCM were battling for classic movie viewers, A&E Television Networks in 2002 was updating its 14-year-old flagship program, Biography. According to a report in Crain's New York Business, the program had ''become somewhat stodgy and plodding.'' The show had lost its appeal to younger viewers as well as to older audiences who preferred faster-paced, edgier cable programming. The network reported that the viewership of Biography had slipped from 1.6 million in 2000 to 1.1 million by 2002, and the audience of 18- to 49-year-old viewers had dropped from 494,000 to 288,000.

To revitalize its floundering network, A&E updated its programming and launched a campaign designed to lure back viewers. To increase its appeal to younger viewers, the network updated the movie celebrities and other people it profiled. Included were such contemporary actors as Tom Hanks and Jerry Seinfeld, rather than performers from the past like actress Judy Garland or actor and former president Ronald Reagan, who typically attracted an older audience. A television spot promoting a Biography segment on soccer player Pelé featured a close-up of Bill Clinton with a voice-over saying, ''You've scored more than any player in history.'' Other changes included a program titled TVography, which profiled a television program rather than a person, and man-on-the-street interviews on Biography subjects. To promote Biography further and to celebrate the program's 15th anniversary, A&E launched a 10-city tour in 2002 that included stops in Los Angeles, Denver, and Chicago.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2002, for the eighth year, TCM used the ''31 Days of Oscar'' campaign as a marketing strategy to promote its library of Academy-winning or -nominated films and to attract viewers. It was the first year, however, the network had taken a tongue-in-cheek approach. The three ads of the campaign were spoofs of the classic movies Rocky, Ben-Hur, and The Dirty Dozen. The ads, which were laced with humor, were designed to appeal to young adults as well as to older film afficionados. Tom Karsch, TCM's executive vice president and general manager, said in an interview with Multichannel News that, while ''31 Days of Oscar'' had always been the gem in the network's crown, it was time to make the campaign more entertaining. ''It was time to have some fun with it, and do something a little different, and call attention to the festival in a nontraditional way,'' he said. TCM executives declined to provide the cost of the campaign, but Karsch told Multichannel News that the eighth edition of ''31 Days of Oscar'' was the network's biggest promotion to date. In terms of marketing support from affiliates, he put the value overall to be ''in the millions.''

TCM devoted almost its entire 2002 marketing budget to production of the ''Rocky'' ad, which featured residents of a retirement home starring in a remake of the classic movie. During the ad senior citizens duked it out in a boxing ring, throwing knockout punches and reciting memorable lines from the movie, including ''Rocky, you're breaking the ribs'' and ''Can you take off you're hat? I always knew you was pretty.'' A voice-over at the end of the ad stated, ''31 straight days of Oscar-nominated movies. It's bound to have an effect. Watch Rocky and 300 other commercial-free classics . . . all March long.''

The hilarious remake of Rocky was such a hit with audiences that TCM ordered additional ads focusing on two other classic films. TCM's agency, nicebigbrain, staged the second ad as an elementary school version of Ben-Hur, with second- and third-graders playing the parts. Hearing a seven-year-old recite the classic line ''Your eyes are filled with hate, Ben-Hur. That's good, hate keeps a man alive,'' followed by a cough that steamed up the child's glasses, or seeing a child throw himself under the hooves of a hobbyhorse generated laughs and more praise for the campaign.

''Dirty Dozen on Ice,'' a spoof on the film The Dirty Dozen, was the third ad in the campaign. Described as ''laugh-out-loud funny'' by Adweek, it was set in an ice arena, with the prisoners training for their suicide mission while executing all of the jumps and moves of seasoned figure skaters. The skaters shouted, ''Let's go kill some Nazis,'' before crashing through a picture of Adolf Hitler. Then came the order ''Blow it, Jefferson,'' and with the skills of a hockey star the character tossed hand grenades into the vents. Both the ''Ben-Hur'' and ''Dirty Dozen on Ice'' ads used the tagline ''When every great movie is a classic, it's bound to have an effect.''

The ads were shown as trailers in theaters in New York, Los Angeles, Atlanta, and Denver, and they were aired as television spots on affiliated stations in New York and Los Angeles, on the Turner networks, and on radio stations. TCM also partnered with sister network Home Box Office (HBO) to generate consumer awareness and increase the ratings for the ''31 Days of Oscar'' programming.

OUTCOME

Although TCM's ''31 Days of Oscar'' had long been considered successful, the campaign hit a high note with its 2002 effort. ''Rocky'' and ''Dirty Dozen on Ice'' won recognition from Adweek as Best Spots, and ''Rocky'' also won a 2003 Cannes Lions Bronze Award. Promax recognized campaign and the ads with a list of gold awards in several categories; the overall campaign won in the category Program Campaign Using More Than One Media, and "Rocky" and "Dirty Dozen on Ice" won in the categories Funniest Promo and Branding/Image Campaign, respectively. In addition, "Rocky" won in the Out-of-House Program Promotion category.

As further evidence of the success of the campaign, a report in Electronic Media noted that "31 Days of Oscar" resonated with younger viewers. This was the target audience TCM was hoping to reach.

FURTHER READING

"A&E Tour Salutes 'Biography.'" Multichannel News, April 15, 2002.

Chunovic, Louis. "Rules for Winning TV Ad Campaigns: Sessions at CTAM Touts Simplicity, Single-Mindedness." Electronic Media, July 22, 2002, p. 20.

Cox, Ted. "A Rockumentary Built on Sand: AMC Tries to Give '70s Music Movies Their Due, but It Can't Be Bothered with Anything of Substance." Arlington Heights (IL) Daily Herald, August 30, 2002.

Dill, Mallorre. "The Ice Brigades." Adweek, July 15, 2002, p. 22.

Donohue, Steve. "AMC's Golden Go-To Guy: Net Keys Promo Campaign around Upcoming Oscars." Multichannel News, January 1, 2005.

Forkan, Jim. "Oscar Fever Heats Up for TCM, E!" Multichannel News, February 25, 2002.

Goetzl, David. "Aging 'Biography' Goes for Hipper Memoirs: A&E Revamps Show for Younger Viewers." Crains's New York Business, September 9, 2002.

Haugsted, Linda. "Mini Cinema." Multichannel News, July 8, 2002.

Hogan, Monica. "TCM Draws On Oscar Star Power." Multichannel News, February 21, 2000.

Karrfalt, Wayne. "The Fine Art of Allure: Every Screen Legend Requires Special Promo Care—and So Does the Channel That Spotlights Them." Broadcasting & Cable, April 12, 2004.

Katz, Richard. "TCM Demonstrates Turner's Muscle." Multichannel News, April 17, 1995.

Lippert, Barbara. "Two Thumbs Up: TCM Takes Clever Aim at the Failings of Modern Movies." Adweek, April 21, 2003, p. 30.

Mitchell, Kim. "New Rate Card in Mail for New Turner Network." Multichannel News, February 21, 1994.

"TNT and Turner Classic Movies Announce the Ultimate Academy Award Television Tribute." Business Wire, February 15, 1995.

Umstead, R. Thomas. "TCM Courts Younger Viewers with Series." Multichannel News, January 20, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

TBS VERY FUNNY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although it reached 88 million households in 2003, the daily average viewership of the cable Turner Broadcasting System (TBS) Superstation had dropped to 979,000, down 6 percent over the previous year. Viewers tuning in each day during prime time had slipped 5 percent, to 1.7 million. Further, the average age of viewers was skewing older, rather than the younger adult demographic craved by advertisers. In addition, with programming that included reruns of old black-and-white sitcoms, action movies, and Atlanta Braves baseball games, the TBS offerings in general entertainment and the station's lack of focus were becoming liabilities in the huge cable television arena.

To focus its programming, establish a clear identity with viewers, and attract a younger audience, TBS in 2004 reinvented itself by borrowing a strategy that, three years earlier, had been successful for sister station Turner Network Television (TNT). While TNT had positioned itself as the network for drama, TBS claimed the flip side of the coin and relaunched itself as the place for comedy. To support the makeover, the network dropped its "Superstation" moniker and adopted the tagline "TBS very funny." Working with Publicis New York, it also launched a rebranding campaign that included television spots set in a TBS call center, with operators responding to callers' descriptions of funny situations. One spot, for example, showed a caller asking if a boss's verbal abuse of a coworker was funny. The operator listened to the description of the situation and then told the caller that it was "very funny" and that the caller could laugh. The campaign also included print, online, and outdoor ads. Although network executives did not release the cost of the campaign, the New York Times, estimated the budget at $50 million.

Based on industry and viewer response, the campaign appeared to accomplish its goals of making people laugh, helping to establish TBS as the network for comedy and attracting a younger viewing audience. The campaign won awards, and critics in such publications as Adweek and Advertising Age's Creativity described the television spots as "inspired," "verbally adroit," "outrageously funny," and "one of the best TV promo campaigns in the history of the genre." While the network's number of daily viewers in 2004 averaged 940,000, similar to the number in 2003, TBS reported that in 2005, one year after the launch of the campaign, the average age of prime-time viewers had dropped from 40 to 37 and that the age of daytime viewers had dropped to 31.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1970 the Atlanta-based outdoor advertising executive Ted Turner bought a struggling television station and renamed it WTCG, for Turner Communications Group. Turner created the ''superstation'' concept in 1976 and began broadcasting the station's programming to cable systems via satellite. The fledgling network attracted viewers with reruns of old black-and-white television favorites, such as The Andy Griffith Show and Leave It to Beaver, Atlanta Braves baseball games, and championship wrestling. In 1979 the network was renamed the Turner Broadcasting System (TBS) and went on a growth binge. Among the channels added to the TBS family were Cable News Network (CNN), Turner Classic Movies (TCM), Turner Network Television (TNT), and TBS Superstation. When the network was acquired by Time Warner in 1996, changes were not far behind. While broadcasts of the Atlanta Braves games and old sitcoms were sacred and remained in place, Time Warner gave wrestling the ax. The original programming was combined with sitcoms and old movies to further enhance TBS's position as a general-entertainment network.

As the clutter of cable networks grew, increasing by some estimates to more than 500 channels, the number of viewer options that originally had made cable programming a success became a handicap. Robert Thompson, of Syracuse University, said that ''the whole business model had to change. Now you have to play by a whole different set of rules.'' To stand out in the crowd, networks were forced to begin establishing brand identities. The Lifetime channel became known as the network for women, MTV was the channel for music, and TBS sister station TNT redefined itself as the place for drama. These changes were the impetus behind the move by TBS in 2004 to establish its own identity in order to create a niche, find an audience, and rebuild sagging viewership. Armed with research indicating that 25 percent of viewers considered themselves comedy fans who believed in the old cliché that ''laughter is the best medicine'' and with a library that included some of the best sitcoms and comedic movies ever produced, TBS was positioned to establish itself as the network for comedy. In 2004 TBS dropped ''Superstation'' from its name and embraced the moniker ''Very Funny,'' and the change from a general- to a focused-entertainment network was under way.

TARGET MARKET

With programming that ran the gamut from baseball and professional wrestling to reruns of old movies and TV sitcoms, TBS had always considered itself a ''general-entertainment'' cable network, but it lacked a clearly defined identity and target audience. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s the TBS audience was slightly older than the ideal, with viewers typically in their mid-40s. In addition, the network was gradually losing its audience. In 2003 the network's average daily viewership was 979,000, down 6 percent from 2002. Further, the slip in prime-time viewers was 5 percent, to 1.7 million, from the previous year. Thus, TBS had an audience that was both older than the optimum and one that was declining.

The ''TBS Very Funny'' campaign was specific not only about programming lineup but also about the audience it intended to reach. As TBS prepared to launch the campaign, company executives explained during a meeting with advertisers that its target audience consisted of well-educated, upscale young adults in the 20- to 30-something age group. Steven Koonin, the TBS executive vice president and chief operating officer, told the New York Times, ''In cable, unless you stand for something, you're doomed. TBS will be for young adults who want television to make them laugh.''

COMPETITION

At the end of 2003 A&E Television Networks was in the midst of change. Faced with ratings problems, the network had earlier begun to revamp its programming, and by November 2003 A&E reported that its efforts to turn the numbers around were working. In the first two weeks of that month viewers had increased to 1 million, 11 percent over the same period during the previous year. Viewers in the 25- to 54-year-old age group, A&E's target market, were up 22 percent, to 422,000. To keep the momentum going, A&E launched a new branding campaign ''The Art of Entertainment,'' which was adapted for its three main programming genres: ''The Art of Biography,'' ''The Art of Documentary,'' and ''The Art of Drama.'' As part of its rebranding efforts, A&E embraced reality television in the vein of Survivor and Queer Eye for the Straight Guy by introducing its own reality show, Airline. The network also updated its programming on Biography, with episodes on such contemporary celebrities as Pierce Brosnan and The Rock. In 2004 A&E was losing some of its former core audience, viewers in their 60s, and compared to 2003, its total viewership had dropped about 13 percent, to 1.15 million. The network, however, reported double-digit increases in viewers of its target audience, those between the ages of 25 and 54. Abbe Raven, A&E executive vice president and general manager, said during an interview with Variety, ''As the interests of our core audience broadens, so will we. We're reaching to newer audiences but continue to satisfy our loyal viewers.''

As TBS and A&E took aim at young adults and baby boomers with their marketing and programming,

SANITIZED SEX PLAYS ON TBS

In 2004, as part of its prime-time programming, Turner Broadcasting System (TBS) entered into an eight-year agreement with Home Box Office (HBO) to buy and show in reruns the pay channel's hit series Sex and the City. Before launching the reruns, however, TBS editors cleaned up the steamier dialogue and scenes so that the program fit the strict guidelines of basic cable standards. The network also created a marketing campaign that used print ads and television spots featuring young actors who portrayed the show's adult female characters as teens. Other ads used the trendy new forum of Web logs, or blogs. These ads, introduced during the 2004 national elections, appeared on 50 political blogs with the theme "Vote Carrie," highlighting the character played by Sarah Jessica Parker. Web users who clicked on the ad were taken to VoteCarrie.org, a blog spoof that described her political platform and encouraged users to E-mail their comments. Including Sex and the City in its programming and the new campaign promoting it were designed to appeal to TBS's target audience—affluent, well-educated, computer-savvy young adults.

ABC focused on a different audience, namely, families. To interconnect its cable networks—ABC Family, Disney Channel, and Toon Disney—ABC Cable introduced the tagline "Imagination is part of the deal" and a campaign to support it. Ben Pyne, ABC Cable's senior vice president of affiliate sales and marketing, said of the new strategy, "It defines what we've always tried to do, but now we're coming out and saying it." As part of the attempt to build brand identity, ABC Cable introduced a redesigned website and a public-affairs effort under the theme "Learn Together" that encouraged parents to be more involved with their children and their activities. An increase in viewership among adults was taken as evidence that the strategy was working. In the first quarter of 2004 the Disney Channel, with a target audience of children under the age of 17, reported an average prime-time audience of 406,000 adults between 18 and 49, indicating that parents were spending time watching television with their kids. Rich Ross, the president of Disney Channel Worldwide, said that the network was making an effort to reach out to parents: "We have families in our shows, so we think it makes a difference because kids and families can see themselves."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "TBS Very Funny" rebranding campaign used a series of five television spots to answer the question of what was funny while at the same time tickling viewers' funny bones. The campaign, with a budget estimated at $50 million according to the New York Times, was created for the network by its agency, Publicis New York. In addition to television spots that ran on the Turner networks and on other Time Warner affiliates, the campaign included trailers that ran in movie theaters, print and billboard ads, and special promotions that ran on the updated TBS website.

Created with the intent of strengthening the image of TBS as a place for comedy, the television spots were set in a call center, with operators responding to viewers who dialed an 800 number (800-TBS-FUNNY) to tell their funny stories and to have them rated. In one spot a factory worker called to ask if her sloppy boss's continuing verbal abuse of a coworker was funny. After listening to the worker's detailed explanation of the abuse, the operator told the caller that the situation was "really quite funny" and that she could laugh. Another spot featured an office worker calling to find out how funny it was that her boss repeatedly called a coworker by the wrong name. After listening to the details, the TBS operator decided that the situation was only "mildly funny." One spot, titled "Strange Fruit," took place in an art gallery. After listening to the caller's description of a woman telling her older male companion that she wanted to buy something "really big and really expensive," the operator concluded, "Fake fruit, pompous jerk and arm candy."

In the background of each spot were brief glimpses of scenes from some of TBS's most popular comedy programming, such as Seinfeld. Also featured were cameo appearances by supporting cast members from various programs shown on TBS, including Marcel the monkey from Friends; Estelle Harris, who played Mrs. Costanza on Seinfeld; and Mario Cantone and Willie Garson, who appeared as Anthony and Stanford, respectively, on Sex and the City. Working with the New York-based agency Cliff Freeman & Partners, TBS created additional campaigns to promote individual television programs, including Sex and the City.

Although TBS already had been using its full roster of comedy programming for several years, the "TBS Very Funny" campaign was designed to rebrand the network as the authority on television comedy. The effort also was intended to shift TBS from its reputation as a general-entertainment superstation toward a more focused, clearly defined image as a place for entertainment. The strategy was borrowed from sister network TNT, which had successfully reinvented itself with the "We Know Drama'' campaign as the network to turn to for drama. Koonin called the TBS rebranding effort ''a full-fledged media push. We're literally changing everything on the network, the look and the lineup.'' Changes to the program lineup included reruns of contemporary sitcoms the network already owned, such as Friends, Home Improvement, and Seinfeld, as well as the addition of reruns of the Home Box Office (HBO) hit Sex and the City. The network also announced plans to develop original comedy programming, such as a reality show based on the original Gilligan's Island television series. The popular TBS series Dinner and a Movie remained on the schedule, but comedy movies were to dominate prime-time programming on weekends.

OUTCOME

If getting a laugh from viewers, driving home the message that TBS was, as Koonin put it to Broadcasting & Cable, the ''epicenter of funny,'' and reaching the target audience were the desired results, then the ''TBS Very Funny'' campaign was a success. Following its launch, a report in Advertising Age's Creativity praised the television spots as ''outrageously funny.'' The campaign also appeared to resonate with the target audience of young adults. In 2005, following the launch of ''TBS Very Funny,'' the network reported that the average age of viewers tuning in during prime time had dropped from 40 to 37.

In addition, the ''TBS Very Funny'' campaign was honored by the advertising industry. It received a 2005 Gold EFFIE, as well as a Silver CLIO for the spots ''Name,'' ''Wings,'' and ''Strange Fruit.''

FURTHER READING

Colford, Paul D. ''Publishing Column.'' New York Daily News, October 5, 2004.

Elliott, Stuart. ''TBS Puts Serious Money into Promoting Itself as a Place for Laughs.'' New York Times, April 22, 2004, p. 3.

Hill, Lee Alan. '''Sex and the City' Special Report: Promax & BDA.'' TelevisionWeek, June 20, 2005.

''License to Laugh.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2004, p. 14.

Lippert, Barbara. ''TBS' New 'Very Funny' Campaign Lives Up to Its Name.'' Adweek, July 12, 2004, p. 26.

Martin, Denise. ''Young at Art: In a Demo Sea Change, Cultured Cabler Embraces Celebs and Reality.'' Variety, February 2, 2004.

Miller, Stuart. ''ABC Cable: A Four-Network Initiative Involves Parents and Kids.'' Broadcasting & Cable, June 28, 2004.

Moss, Linda. ''ADC Cable Touts Imagination.'' Multichannel News, May 3, 2004.

''A New Look at TBS.'' United Press International, May 15, 2004.

''Ready for Takeoff: A New Programming Strategy and Branding Campaigns Aim for Some Bigger Audience Numbers Next Year.'' Multichannel News, December 8, 2003.

Romano, Allison. ''Comedy Tonight: TBS Brands Itself the 'Very Funny' Network.'' Broadcasting & Cable, April 26, 2004.

Umstead, R. Thomas. ''The Parent Trap: Kids Programming Is Getting a Lift from a Silent Minority of the Viewership Base, and Advertisers Are Taking Note.'' Multichannel News, May 17, 2004.

———. ''TBS Says Joke's on Us: Net; Our Sitcoms, Reality Shows Will Skew Younger.'' Multichannel News, April 26, 2004.

Wilbert, Caroline. ''TBS Fashions a Makeover: Image Is Geared to Younger Viewers.'' Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 21, 2004.

''The Work.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2004, p. 27.

Rayna Bailey

TV Guide, Inc.

7140 S. Lewis Avenue
Tulsa, Oklahoma 74136-5422
USA
Telephone: (918) 488-4000
Fax: (918) 488-4979
Web site: www.tvguide.com

■■■

ON THE INSIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although TV Guide, with a circulation of 9 million and a total readership of 28 million, was ranked in the top three major magazines in 2003, its circulation had dropped 30 percent since 1998. Adding to the aging iconic publication's woes was its loss of advertisers. According to the Publisher Information Bureau/CMR, the number of ad pages sold by the publication had decreased 11 percent in 2002. Reversing the trend of fleeing readers and, subsequently, fleeing advertisers was the goal set by TV Guide 's new executive team, which included John Loughlin, president of TV Guide Publishing Group, and Michael Lafavore, the magazine's editor-in-chief.

As part of the revitalization effort the magazine was completely redesigned based on extensive consumer research, and its website was upgraded to better integrate with the publication. To promote its new look TV Guide partnered with Dallas-based ad agency the Richards Group and launched a two-phase marketing campaign aimed at both media buyers and consumers. The ''On the Inside'' campaign, which began in 2003, had the tagline ''We see everything'' and an estimated budget of between $20 million and $30 million. Phase one of the campaign was created to alert media buyers of the magazine's new format and included print and outdoor ads. Phase two, targeted at consumers, included three television spots, each portraying a day in the life of a TV Guide reporter on the prowl for a scoop to print in the magazine.

Within two months of the campaign's launch, it was evident it had resonated with the target audiences. The first phase, aimed at media buyers, won a 2004 EFFIE Award and reversed a three-year decline in advertising sales. Phase two's message reached readers and led to a 40 percent jump in newsstand sales in September compared to the prior three months. The upgraded website was also attracting new subscribers, nearly 10,000 each week compared to only several hundred new subscribers a week before the campaign began.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1953 half of the homes in the United States had television sets providing family entertainment with programs that included I Love Lucy, Dragnet, The Adventures of Superman, Candid Camera, and Kraft Television Theatre. To help keep viewers informed of what was on at what time, TV Guide was introduced in April 1953. The magazine quickly became the television viewer's bible, with a circulation of 1.7 million in September of that year. By the mid-1970s TV Guide 's circulation had reached more than 19 million.

In 1988 the owner of TV Guide, Walter Annenberg, sold the publication to media conglomerate News Corp., which eventually entered a partnership with Gemstar, a company that made electronic TV-program guides. But the new CEO, Henry Yuen, neglected the aging magazine, focusing the company's energies on technologies such as interactive program guides and TV Guide's website. For five years the magazine did not mail out subscriber solicitation notices, and for 18 months it operated without a publisher. Compounding the magazine's problems were the facts that television was evolving, viewers' needs had changed, and other ways to learn what was on television became available—from newspapers publishing daily or weekly TV listings to TV remote controls that enabled viewers to surf through the channels from the comfort of their chairs. By 2003 the magazine's circulation had dropped to about nine million.

Yuen was forced out in 2002, and changes at the magazine began. John Loughlin, TV Guide Publishing Group's president, brought on board Scott Crystal as executive vice president and publisher and Michael Lafavore as editor-in-chief. The team set to work reinventing TV Guide with completely reworked editorial content. Loughlin said that the goal was to create a magazine that was more than a list of television programs. He told Adweek that the revamped magazine would be "the guide and trusted voice of helping people make decisions about in-home, on-screen entertainment." As TV Guide was undergoing its transformation, the Richards Group was creating the supporting "On the Inside" marketing campaign with the tagline "We see everything."

TARGET MARKET

From 1953, when it was founded, through 1988 TV Guide was successful, reaching a circulation peak of 19 million. But as times and readers' needs changed, the iconic magazine went into a slump. As the publication lost subscribers, dropping to a circulation of 9 million in 2003, it also lost advertisers. When TV Guide began its "On the Inside" marketing campaign in 2003, it had two target audiences: media buyers and consumers.

Phase one of the campaign was aimed directly at media buyers, who purchased advertising space for their clients and had redirected their spending to other publications that included television listings and viewing information in their editorial content. The second phase of the campaign was directed at consumers in an effort to convince them that TV Guide was the magazine to read for all things TV, from program listings to inside scoops on small-screen stars. Lynda Hodge, the Richards Group's art director, said that people had come to believe that only old people read TV Guide, and the consumer portion of the campaign was designed to change that stodgy image. She added that the goal was to show consumers that they could read the magazine for entertainment as well as for TV program listings.

CLASSIC TV PROGRAMMING NOW OFFERED ON DVD

With a 50-year history of covering television, TV Guide in 2004 began using its authority on television shows to release favorite programming on DVD. TV Guide –branded DVDs began to be sold that year by Genius Products, Inc. DVD titles would be released in collections with six hours of programming. Categories included comedies, Westerns, and detectives. Besides the television episodes, each DVD featured related trivia questions, commentary by the TV Guide editors who had selected the specific episodes, and a subscription offer to TV Guide magazine.

COMPETITION

For years TV Guide had defined TV remotes as its primary competition—because when viewers had remote controls they could more easily find out what shows were on merely by flipping through the channels while seated—but when the magazine reinvented itself, it also was forced to redefine the competition. Clear rivals for ad dollars and readers were other publications that offered entertainment news; other competitors were websites, on-screen listings, and newspapers that ran daily or weekly television program listings. Among the top print rivals were Gannett Company Inc.'s USA Weekend and Wenner Media LLC's Us Weekly.

USA Weekend was an entertainment and lifestyle magazine that was distributed through newspapers. In 2003 the publication reported a circulation of more than 23 million. Also in 2003, however, advertising agency executives and other publications, including TV Guide, were questioning the accuracy of those huge circulation numbers. Under debate was whether research methods credited the total circulation of the newspapers carrying USA Weekend as the total circulation of the magazine itself. It was also questioned whether or not USA Weekend was a true magazine or simply a weekly newspaper supplement. To answer the question a poll of readers was conducted through an industry-wide initiative led by Parade magazine, with the results showing that most people perceived USA Weekend as a magazine rather than a newspaper supplement.

As advertisers and other publications debated the accuracy of USA Weekend 's circulation numbers and whether it was a magazine or newspaper supplement, Us Weekly was named the 2004 Magazine of the Year by Advertising Age. In announcing its award, Advertising

Age described Us Weekly as a ''cultural reference point'' that had connected with younger, affluent women readers and in the process attracted advertisers. The first six months of 2004 saw Us Weekly 's newsstand sales climb 47.3 percent, and its ad pages increased 25.2 percent from the same period the previous year. Mediamark Research reported that the median household income of the magazine's female readers was higher than readers of both Vanity Fair and In Style.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The 2003 ''On the Inside'' campaign was TV Guide 's first consumer marketing effort in more than 10 years. With an overall budget of between $20 million and $30 million, it far surpassed the $250,000 the publication had budgeted in 2002 for advertising. Loughlin told Adweek, ''It's a fair characterization to say that for several years, there's been virtually no media spend.'' In addition, for the previous two years the publication had no advertising agency. The first step in TV Guide 's reinvention was making changes to the magazine itself. It added more pages of editorial content, which featured up-to-the minute stories about television celebrities, behind-the-scenes reports, and detailed recommendations about programming. Lafavore said that the magazine's editorial content had been adjusted to reflect the changing attitudes of viewers and the cultural role of television. The new campaign was designed to inform media buyers and consumers of the changes and lure them back to the magazine.

For the first phase of the campaign the Richards Group designed outdoor and print ads as teasers for media buyers. Signs that appeared in magazines and on billboards, buses, and buildings featured slogans that made tongue-in-cheek references to the television industry in general, such as ''Like everyone else, we're having a little work done,'' ''New look, new style, new attitude. Soon we'll be dating models half our age,'' and ''We're back from rehab and ready to party.'' In addition, the magazine flew 250 advertisers to Los Angeles for a post–Emmy Awards party, the first ever hosted by the magazine.

Phase two of the campaign targeted consumers with the tagline ''You miss nothing, because we see everything,'' which was shortened to ''We see everything.'' The campaign included television spots, radio commercials, and print ads that emphasized the point that readers would not miss anything if they read TV Guide, because the publication's team of reporters were always working to get the inside story for its readers. The advertisements used humor to send their message. One spot, titled ''Make Up Artist,'' showed a male reporter dressed in drag and posing as Average Joe star Kathy Griffin's makeup artist to get the scoop on a script she was working on. Griffin caught on to the scheme, and the reporter was kicked out the door. Another spot, ''Wired,'' showed an aggressive reporter slipping a bug onto NYPD Blue actor Gordon Clapp just before he filmed a scene of the show. The bug trashed the film equipment and, once again, the sly reporter was caught and given the boot.

Rod Underhill of the Richards Group said that the publication's marketing push was more than a campaign; rather, it was helping TV Guide recreate itself as a brand. ''The world is confused about what is TV Guide,'' he told Adweek. ''The brand itself doesn't carry any baggage, it doesn't have a lot of negatives. It's just suffering from neglect.''

OUTCOME

In September, six weeks after the launch of its redesigned publication and the accompanying ''On the Inside'' campaign, TV Guide reported a 40 percent jump in newsstand sales. That month's sales averaged 850,000, which included a 250,000 increase over the number of issues sold in each of the previous three months. In addition the publication's website, which had been redesigned in conjunction with the magazine, was adding as many as 10,000 new subscribers each week, compared with only hundreds per week previously. The new subscribers also tended to be younger—31-years-old on average versus 41—and more affluent. During an interview with Media Industry Newsletter, Loughlin said, ''In a magazine used to seeing year-over-year newsstand drops of 20 percent to 30 percent this is progress.''

Media buyers responded favorably to the campaign as well. According to Business Wire, ad pages in TV Guide 's feature-well—the center of a magazine where the longer articles were published—jumped 71 percent in September compared with September of the previous year, and all available ad space had been sold. A report in the Wall Street Journal stated that the magazine's September issue had 102.4 ad pages, the most it had sold since 1996, and that for the first time in six consecutive years ad revenue inched up rather than declined.

Further indication of the campaign's success was its win of a 2004 Bronze EFFIE from the New York American Marketing Association. The award was presented for the ''TV Guide Color Bar'' print ad that was used in phase one of the campaign, which was directed at media buyers.

FURTHER READING

''At 'TV Guide,' the 'Eye' Had It in 1957—And Has It in 2003.'' Media Industry Newsletter, September 15, 2003, p. 1.

Charski, Mindy. ''Aiming to Revitalize Brand, 'TV Guide' Turns to Richards.'' Adweek, March 24, 2003, p. 14.

Fine, Jon. ''Magazine of the Year: 'Us Weekly.'" Advertising Age, October 25, 2004.

———. "TV Guide Updates Image." Advertising Age, July 14, 2003, p. 4.

Howard, Brendan. "TV Guide Makes a Genius Move in TV DVD Distribution." Video Store, September 19, 2004.

Lazare, Lewis. "Ads Mislead on What's in New TV Guide." Chicago Sun-Times, September 11, 2003, p. 51.

Mandese, Joe. "No Rain on This Parade." Folio: the Magazine for Magazine Management, April 1, 2003.

Myerhoff, Matt. "How's That? The LABJ's L.A. Stories—$5 MN Ad Campaign for TV Guide Magazine." Los Angeles Business Journal, December 1, 2003.

"Redesigned 'TV Guide' Is Off to a Good Newsstand Start." Media Industry Newsletter, October 20, 2003, p. 1.

Rose, Matthew. "TV Guide: New Logo, New Strategy." Wall Street Journal, September 8, 2003, p. B3.

"TV Guide Launches New Design." Oakland (CA) Tribune, September 9, 2003.

"TV Guide Unveils New Look, New Attitude and New Editorial." Business Wire, September 8, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

Tyson Foods, Inc.

2210 W. Oaklawn Drive
Springdale, Arkansas 72762-6999
USA
Telephone: (479) 290-4000
Web site: www.TysonFoodsInc.com

■■■

POWERED BY TYSON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After the Arkansas poultry farmer John Tyson developed a method of transporting live chickens during the Great Depression, he sparked a legacy that would be passed down for three generations. When John Tyson's grandson, who shared his grandfather's first name, became CEO in 2000, Tyson Foods, Inc., was the largest chicken producer in the United States. The new CEO soon expanded the company's role in the packaged foods and meats market. One year after assuming leadership John Tyson agreed to buy IBP, Inc., America's largest beef processor and second-largest pork processor. The acquisition transformed Tyson into the world's largest meat producer. Subsequently executives needed to rebrand Tyson to include beef and pork. After 18 months of research Tyson discovered that the public considered protein to be the main quality that beef, pork, and chicken shared. To herald Tyson as a leading provider of protein, the corporation released "Powered by Tyson," the largest advertising campaign in Tyson's history.

The Boston ad agency Arnold Worldwide released the $75 million campaign on August 30, 2004. The campaign's television spots humorously featured individuals performing amazing feats simply because they were "Powered by Tyson." In one commercial a parasailing man was lifted into the air by a Tyson-fueled woman rowing a boat. The campaign's high-protein message was embraced by those following the popular Atkins Diet, a weight-loss program that involved eating high-protein foods. In addition to television spots the campaign included radio spots, print advertising, and outside promotions. Tyson products were also strategically placed on network programs, including the popular Monday night CBS sitcom Still Standing, which starred Mark Addy and Jami Gertz.

According to a 2004 Ad Age / IAG Quarterly Ad Performance Report (an ongoing study conducted by research firm IAG and published in Advertising Age), one "Powered by Tyson" commercial, which featured a mother running up a wall to catch her child's balloons, was rated the quarter's "best-liked spot." Tyson's fourth-quarter sales for 2004 were $500 million above those of the same quarter of 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Arkansas farmer John Tyson, who supported his family during the Great Depression by selling produce and chicken, devised in 1935 an unprecedented method to transport chickens from Arkansas to Chicago. He attached food-and-water troughs inside a trailer that kept the birds alive long enough to be sold in Chicago. The business of transporting and selling chickens proved to be a lucrative trade for the Tyson family. John's son Don became manager in 1960 and took the corporation public in 1963. Although packaged chicken was Tyson's mainstay, the company expanded into other meat products. In 1992 Tyson purchased Arctic Alaska Fisheries and Louis Kemp Seafood, and two years later it acquired the frozen-foods company Culinary Foods. Its foray into the seafood business was short-lived, however; the company sold the division in 1999. The ad agency DDB Chicago had been creating advertising for Tyson since 1995. According to the Associated Press news service, Tyson chief marketing officer Bob Corscadden described the company's marketing during this period as "warm and fuzzy." In 2001 DDB introduced a $20 million print campaign for Tyson titled "It's What Your Family Deserves."

© RAMIN TALAIE/CORBIS.

Tyson's best-selling food line, Tyson Country Fresh Chicken, reinforced Tyson's position as America's leading chicken producer. The titan was 60 percent larger than its closest competitor, Pilgrim's Pride. After the third-generation CEO, John Tyson, took control in 2000, he instigated the purchase of IBP, America's largest beef producer and second-largest pork producer. After the IBP acquisition the Tyson brand was hard-pressed to reposition itself as something other than a producer of chicken. Many Tyson investors, worried about the company's newly acquired debt of approximately $1.5 billion (which it had taken on from IBP as part of the deal), considered John Tyson too inexperienced and doubted his ability to salvage the corporation. John Tyson responded by recruiting apt executives for Tyson, including the former president of IBP, Richard L. Bond. John Tyson also oversaw 18 months of comprehensive research, which included holding 90 focus groups to determine how the Tyson brand should move forward. The research determined that consumers identified one shared quality between all meat products: high protein content. In addition, the strategic brand consultant Faith Popcorn's BrainReserve helped Tyson conduct an ad-agency review that resulted in the selection of Arnold Worldwide, an agency headquartered in Boston.

According to advertising analysts, building a brand for packaged meat was somewhat unprecedented. Beginning in the 1970s the poultry company Perdue Farms had branded its product around its founder Frank Perdue, but most consumers continued to consider meat a commodity. Pork and beef especially were selected because of how it looked behind its plastic wrapping. Price, according to one Tyson survey, was not the deciding factor. "This is virgin territory for branded manufacturers," John M. McMillin, a food analyst at the Prudential Equity Group, said to the New York Times. "Beef and pork have largely been commodity areas, and what Perdue and Tyson did to chicken 10 to 20 years ago is what Tyson is now trying to do to beef and pork."

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted several demographics, including consumers who enjoyed cooking meals from scratch and busy consumers who preferred cooking food that was already prepared. Advertising critics believed that the campaign successfully targeted dieters subscribing to the Atkins Diet, a low-carbohydrate weight-loss plan that had become highly popular by 2004. The marketing

HURRICANE RELIEF

In the aftermath of America's devastating 2005 hurricane season, Tyson Foods, the world's largest producer of meat, offered victims displaced by Hurricane Katrina jobs through its Houston and Dallas employment offices. During the previous year's hurricane season Tyson had donated more than 110,000 pounds of precooked chicken to feed those affected by hurricanes.

agency Lopez-Negrete Communications in Houston created TV spots for the campaign that targeted Latino consumers. In one TV commercial with a Spanish voice-over, two "powered" dancers outlasted the competition in a salsa dance contest as a result of eating Tyson meat.

"Powered by Tyson" also sought to reach the African-American market. A Tyson press release that appeared in Market News Publishing stated, "The foundation of African-American food preferences is soulfood . . . A major part of soulfood is protein, which gives families strength and energy to accomplish the many challenges of their busy days. Nobody brings quality, branded chicken, beef and pork protein to this consumer in more ways than Tyson Foods." Tyson hired the Chicago marketing agency E. Morris Communications to create television and print advertising that targeted African-American consumers.

During the campaign Tyson provided scholarships through the Tom Joyner Foundation, an organization dedicated to helping African-Americans afford higher learning. Recipe books titled Powered by Tyson were issued at football games and other events hosted by Historically Black Colleges and Universities (a category of institutions that were recognized as being founded for the education of African-Americans).

COMPETITION

With its beginnings dating to 1945, Pilgrim's Pride became America's second-largest poultry producer under the longtime leadership of Lonnie (Bo) Pilgrim. The company was also credited with treating chicken as more than just a commodity. In 1983 the Texas-based company first offered boneless and low-fat chicken products. In 1997 it targeted health-conscious baby boomers with Eggs Plus, a line of eggs enriched with fatty acids that aided in human cell growth and fat metabolism.

In mid-2004 Pilgrim's Pride released a commercial that featured the company's founder, Bo Pilgrim, dressed as a cook for a group of roughneck cowboys. According to Dan Emery, Pilgrim's Pride vice president of marketing, using the founder and chairman as an actor in the spot was a natural choice. "Bo's health, vitality and sense of fun testify to the kind of diet he espouses and enjoys—low in fat, cholesterol, carbohydrates, and triglycerides. He remains ahead of his time. Today, millions agree that chicken is the best choice for any healthy diet," Emery was quoted by the PR Newswire news service.

When Bo Pilgrim's character offered herb-roasted chicken and cooked vegetables in the 2004 commercial, the beef-loving cowboys became visibly peeved. The chicken was appreciated, however, when the cowhands remembered that they all had high cholesterol. The spot was created by the Wolf Agency. Initial spots were aired in states with the largest Pilgrim's Pride presence, such as Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Michigan. Later the commercial was extended to other U.S. regions.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Arnold and several other contributing agencies released the $75 million campaign on August 30, 2004. The campaign's original seven 30-second commercials all featured individuals "powered" by Tyson meats. Their shaky filming suggested that the content had been captured with a camcorder and was unintended for professional use. One spot showed a small child kicking a football across the street and over the power lines. Another spot featured a fun-loving family "Powered by Tyson" and sledding their way past a high-altitude base camp on what appeared to be Mount Everest. The spot "Parasailing" began with shaky camera footage of a man parasailing. It was then revealed that he was being pulled by his wife, who was merely rowing a boat. Each spot ended with the question "Have you had your protein today?"

When the campaign began in 2004, many consumers were eating meat for its high-protein, low-carbohydrate sustenance. This dietary craze was pioneered by the popular Atkins Diet, which advised the consumption of meat. Tyson, however, wanted "Powered by Tyson" to brand meat as an excellent energy source, not a weight-loss product. Corscadden explained to Nation's Restaurant News that Arnold Worldwide's strategy stressed the sustenance of Tyson products by using the formula "protein = energy = power," which suggested that pork, chicken, and beef provided consumers with more power. The strategy worked in Tyson's favor. In 2005 many American who had previously subscribed to the Atkins Diet were beginning to consider it an incomplete regimen.

CORPORATE RELIGION

John Tyson, the third-generation president and CEO of the world's largest meat producer, Tyson Foods, had taken control of Tyson in 2000. He soon integrated his religious beliefs into the corporate structure. One addition to Tyson's core values stated, "We strive to be a faith-friendly company." Another explained, "We strive to honor God and be respectful of each other, our customers, and other stakeholders." To provide support for employees John Tyson oversaw the hiring of 87 chaplains who would offer counseling in the business's 58 processing plants.

Print ads for "Powered by Tyson" appeared in popular consumer magazines such as People and Redbook. One ad featured a child performing world-class gymnastics on her school playground. The ad's copy asked, "Have you had your protein today?" In addition to appearing in print ads and television spots, the "Powered by" message was used at Tyson-sponsored USA Gymnastics and Crew Chief Club (an association of NASCAR head mechanics) competitions. To reach African-American communities Tyson sponsored events for Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority (AKA), America's first Greek-letter organization founded by and for African-American women. Tyson also contributed to Historically Black Colleges and Universities. In return for Tyson's scholarships, recipe books titled Powered by Tyson were distributed at college and university events.

Tyson paid the media conglomerate Viacom to place Tyson products on network and cable programming. Tyson foods appeared on CBS's popular sitcom Still Standing and on the soap opera As the World Turns. Short vignettes for Tyson were also filmed with actresses from the soap opera. The PR Newswire quoted Corscadden commenting about Tyson's product placement, "We're very excited about being part of this innovative effort … One of the primary components of our new 'Powered by Tyson' communications strategy states that we'll be seen in expected and unexpected places. This is new. It's unexpected. It dovetails nicely with our new strategy."

OUTCOME

According to advertising critics, "Powered by Tyson" helped Tyson expand beyond its chicken-only stigma and move forward as America's largest meat producer. An Ad Age / IAG Quarterly Ad Performance Report determined that the "best-liked spot" of the final quarter of 2004 was the Tyson commercial in which a mother ran up a wall to catch her child's helium balloons. One month after the campaign debuted, Fortune magazine ranked Tyson 44th out of the "100 Fastest-Growing Companies." During the 2004 quarter that the campaign was released, Tyson's sales were $500 million above the same quarter of 2003.

In February 2005 Fortune 's "Most Admired" list rated Tyson as America's "most admired company in food production." The PR Newswire quoted John Tyson's response to the accolade. "It's an honor to be recognized for the progress we've been making since our acquisition of IBP three years ago," the chairman and CEO said. "We're continuing our aggressive campaign to increase our value-added product sales over the next three to five years and believe our recently unveiled 'Powered by Tyson' marketing campaign will boost our efforts." In late 2005 Tyson was added to the S&P 500, an influential index of America's most prestigious blue-chip stocks.

FURTHER READING

Clayton, Chris. "Tyson Hunts for Next Chicken Wing." Omaha World-Herald, July 7, 2005, p. 01D.

Clubb, Deborah M. "Tyson Foods Donates Chicken to Food Bank." Memphis Commercial Appeal, November 14, 2002, B6.

Cody, Cristal. "Tyson Sales Up, Earnings Down; Chicken Sales Rising, but Mad Cow Slices into Beef Income." Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, May 3, 2005, p. 21.

Deogun, Nikhil, and Scott Kilman. "Tyson Makes a Move for Meat-Packer." Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2000, p. A3.

Harrison, Eric E. "Tyson Markets Organic Chicken Outside Arkansas." Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, July 24, 2003, p. 42.

Ives, Nat. "Tyson Is Counting on Protein to Bulk Up Its Image in a Campaign to Push Its Chicken, Beef and Pork." New York Times, August 4, 2004, p. 2.

Kilman, Scott. "Can Tyson Fight 'Chicken Fatigue' with Pork, Beef?" Wall Street Journal, January 10, 2001, p. B1.

Lazare, Lewis. "Humor Feeble in Toilet Paper Spots with Angels Larry, David." Chicago Sun-Times, August 16, 2004, p. 67.

Liskey, Tom Darin. "Tyson Earnings Shoot Up 75 Percent on Strength of Its Beef, Chicken Sales." Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, November 11, 2003, p. 27.

Lucas, John. "Poultry Odor Issues Are Many, Varied." Evansville (IN) Courier & Press, April 22, 2002, p. B1.

Reyes, Sonia. "Tyson Raises Heat on Hormone-Free Chicken Claim in $20M Print Splash." Brandweek, December 11, 2000, p. 4.

Riell, Howard. "Meat Makes a Comeback." Frozen Food Age, October 1, 2004, p. 24.

Weiss, Michael. "Pilgrim's Pride to Enter Cold-Cut, Deli Market." Dallas Morning News, May 13, 1986, p. 16d.

Zellner, Wendy. "The Wal-Mart of Meat; Tyson Foods Produces One of Every Four Pounds of U.S. Beef, Chicken, and Pork. Is That a Problem?" BusinessWeek, September 20, 2004, p. 90.

Kevin Teague

UBS Financial Services Inc.

1285 Avenue of the Americas
New York, New York 10019
USA
Telephone: (212) 713-2000
Fax: (212) 713-9818
Web site: financialservicesinc.ubs.com

■■■

THANK YOU, PAINE WEBBER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Paine Webber became a part of the UBS Financial Services organization. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In November 1998 retail investment brokerage Paine Webber, a unit of Paine Webber Group Inc., launched an ambitious $20 million print and television campaign, the largest in the company's history. Overseeing the account was Saatchi & Saatchi, which had handled Paine Webber's advertising since 1981. The tag line, however, was much older than Paine Webber's relationship with its advertising agency: it had first used "Thank you, Paine Webber" in 1975 and had maintained the tag line until 1987. Now Paine Webber revived it in an effort to reinforce the company's identity.

Paine Webber was an old firm that had weathered a number of difficulties in recent years. In a business increasingly perceived as a commodity rather than a service, identity was an all-important factor if Paine Webber hoped to attract more business, and the firm's 1996 campaign—with the tag line "Invest with more intelligence"—had not proven particularly memorable. "Thank you, Paine Webber" was its first advertising effort since then, but this campaign retained at least one theme from the 1996 campaign: the idea that a customer who invested his or her money through Paine Webber could rest assured.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1879 Boston bank clerks William Payne and Wallace Webber formed their own brokerage house. They joined the New York Stock Exchange in 1890, and in 1899 they opened their first branch in Houghton, Michigan, where Paine Webber had a substantial interest in copper mines. Except for an understandable slump during the Great Depression, the company experienced many years of growth and in 1963 relocated from Boston to New York City. After incorporating in 1970 and going public two years later, Paine Webber created a holding company, the Paine Webber Group, which controlled all its properties. The 1970s saw expansion into Britain and Japan and the purchases of several U.S. companies involved in the investment industry.

Paine Webber hit on its first truly significant challenges in the 1980s. Soon after purchasing Blyth Eastman Dillon, an investment banking firm, in 1979, many of Blyth's executives left, and with them went some of the many lucrative accounts Paine Webber had hoped to acquire with the buyout. By the time Paine Webber had managed to get the bank fully operational, a number of other brokerages had outpaced it in taking advantage of the 1980s boom in mergers and acquisitions. The 1987 stock market crash proved another significant blow, and in the following year Paine Webber made a problematic loan to the faltering Federated Department Stores chain.

Just as Paine Webber was getting on its feet again in the early 1990s, again it hit upon a series of troubles. Once more it lost a number of important personnel, this time from its Mitchell Hutchins Institutional Investors in 1993. The next year saw a crash in the bond market that hit Paine Webber hard; significant layoffs ensued. This followed the acquisition of Kidder, Peabody, an investment banking firm that had fallen on hard times, from General Electric, and the expenditure further hurt Paine Webber's bottom line. By the end of 1994 the company had suffered a staggering 87 percent drop in earnings.

Nineteen ninety-six brought more challenges to Paine Webber. In 1989 it had run an advertising campaign to support its Provider line, a life-insurance policy. The campaign had included a direct-mail effort involving some 1 million pieces, along with the purchase of 800,000 consumer leads and a television spot featuring Paine Webber president Joseph J. Grano. Paine Webber discontinued the product in 1993 after selling 7,200 policies, but in 1996 buyers of the Provider policy initiated a class-action lawsuit, charging that Paine Webber's brokers had led clients to believe that Provider was not a life-insurance policy but a retirement investment. The company agreed to pay more than $332 million in fines as well as restitution. Also in 1996 it was ordered to pay $2.5 million for charges of illegal hiring practices stemming from an action in which it had lured a number of employees from a Prudential Insurance office.

Nonetheless, earnings in 1996 were higher than they had ever been, and in 1997 Paine Webber launched a new investment product, the Paine Webber EDGE. In 1998 German financial institution Dresdner Bank AG expressed an interest in buying Paine Webber, but as of fall 1999, no further move had been made.

TARGET MARKET

In 1999 Paine Webber purchased an interest in an Internet software company and launched on-line trading services targeted to clients at relatively lower income levels. "Lower income levels" was a relative term, since persons who required the services of an investment brokerage had to have something to invest in the first place. (An equally appropriate term would be "younger investors," since Paine Webber, like all marketers, tried to keep one eye on the future.)

In the main, however, Paine Webber's target market could be described as mature, both in terms of years and of assets. Thus a November 1998 news release accompanying the launch of the "Thank you, Paine Webber" campaign included this statement from Mark B. Sutton, president of the Paine Webber Private Client Group: "Paine Webber has enormous opportunities for growth, particularly as millions of affluent baby boomers seek guidance in managing their assets and transferring wealth to the next generation. This campaign emphasizes that in the age of the Internet, financial information has become a commodity, causing information overload and further complicating investment decisions. Now more than ever, excellent investment advice tailored to investors' needs is highly valued."

Placement of campaign spots and print ads was broad, with inclusion in more than 40 news, consumer, and trade publications and media placement on network and cable television programs including National Football League and college bowl games, as well as the popular 60 Minutes news magazine program on CBS. Again, the latter tended to attract older viewers than many offerings on television.

Paine Webber's news release went on to note that quarterly research conducted in cooperation with the Gallup Organization had shown that "while many investors have ambitious plans for their futures, most underestimate the resources required to accomplish their goals, and few have considered wealth preservation planning." Simply put, this meant that many investors in their late 30s, 40s, and even 50s had not begun making adequate preparations for retirement, and Paine Webber sought to present itself as the solution to their problems.

COMPETITION

In 1998 Paine Webber ranked fifth among investment brokerages, with Merrill Lynch & Company in first place. It struggled to develop a position for itself as a brokerage offering strong individual service along with an aggressive institutional strategy. Meanwhile, as it launched "Thank you, Paine Webber," Stuart Elliott of the New York Times reported that both Merrill Lynch and John Nuveen & Company, another competitor, were in the process of changing advertising agencies.

Thanks in part to advertising that prominently featured its bull logo, thus carrying the image of an investor-friendly "bull market," Merrill Lynch had established strong name recognition with consumers. So had Fidelity Investments, a unit of the FMR Corporation whose highly personalized television advertising had also made its offerings a standout. Elliott reported that Fidelity and other brokerages were in the process of increasing their advertising presence in late 1998.

PAINE WEBBER'S MEDIA CONFERENCE

From December 7 to 11, 1998, Paine Webber held its 26th annual media conference at the McGraw-Hill Building in New York City. The five-day conference, as a company news release stated, was "designed to inform investors about the changes that have occurred within the [media] industry during the last year." It brought together representatives from a number of large media concerns, including Viacom, Time Warner, CBS, the Washington Post, the New York Times, Times Mirror, Knight-Ridder newspapers, Saatchi & Saatchi advertising, and many more.

Media Industry Newsletter commented on the absence of a major, if troubled, participant: Reader's Digest, still one of the nation's most widely circulated magazines. Tom Ryder of the Reader's Digest Association (RDA) had originally been scheduled to present "Phase 3" of the company's planned restructuring, but as it turned out, RDA was not ready for the presentation. Nonetheless, as Media Industry Newsletter conceded, Paine Webber media/entertainment managing director Chris Dixon and others managed to produce an impressive lineup. The conference, Dixon promised, would present a refreshing approach: instead of yet another discussion on the Internet and other new media, this one would place its greatest emphasis on the role of traditional media in the twenty-first century.

Paine Webber also had to contend with the somewhat troubled reputation it had acquired as the result of hardships during the 1980s and 1990s. Indeed, its choice of "Thank you, Paine Webber," a campaign first run in 1975, harkened back to a simpler time—or at least to what many perceived as a simpler time in hindsight. Meanwhile, Paine Webber kept a close watch on the competition. When Saatchi & Saatchi was invited to take part in a $50 million review for Chase Manhattan Bank in March 1998, it initially accepted, then pulled out, according to Adweek, for fear that a relationship with Chase Manhattan might be perceived as a conflict of interest.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The pullout from the Chase Manhattan bid may have been the event that sparked a rumor in Adweek that Paine Webber itself was on the hunt for a new agency. According to the April 13, 1998, report, the company had requested proposals from more than a dozen agencies. "Sources said Paine Webber needs a shop to take on creative and media chores for its corporate identity account," Adweek reported, "and would narrow the field to 12 this week. Two more cuts will be made before the company picks an agency in late June." Tony Dalton of Saatchi & Saatchi told Adweek, "I would be surprised if it [the Paine Webber account] were in play, and I would wait to see what the client had to say before deciding whether to defend."

It is no wonder that Dalton professed to be surprised by the rumor, which turned out to be just that—a rumor. Saatchi & Saatchi had maintained the account since 1981 and would continue to do so into 1999. It had launched its last campaign for Paine Webber in 1996, using the tag line "Invest with more intelligence." In one spot a 50-ish man was shown on a sailboat while a voice-over speculated as to how he had managed to achieve the sort of lifestyle that would allow him to go sailing while others his age were still working—and worrying about retirement. "How's he doing it?" the voice-over asked. The answer: "More research, insight, understanding."

In 1996 Paine Webber had devoted $19 million to its advertising, but in the following year the budget dropped to $8 million. By August 1998 the company had spent only $3.5 million; that would change with the launch of the new $20 million "Thank you, Paine Webber" campaign in November. The latter slogan had first appeared in 1975, created by Marshall Karp and Andrew Langer. It had run until 1987, when it was dropped in favor of successive campaigns, including "Invest with more intelligence." Elliott wrote in the New York Times that with the re-launch of the near-classic tag line, "Fans of advertising slogans that develop into catch phrases and enter the vernacular can gratefully start saying 'Thank you, Paine Webber' again" as Paine Webber "reviv[ed] the gratitude attitude."

Included in the initial launch were six print ads and two television spots that, in the words of the Paine Webber news release, "support[ed] its strategy to differentiate the firm by offering customized advice to high net-worth investors through highly trained investment professionals. The multi-million dollar print and television campaign capitalizes on Paine Webber's strong name recognition and its most memorable tag line, 'Thank you, Paine Webber.' " Launched just prior to Thanksgiving 1998, the campaign would continue well into 1999.

The print ads, with a heavy concentration on upscale publications, marked Paine Webber's first venture into print advertising in five years. As for the television spots, these juxtaposed images of worried investors—who presumably had not invested with Paine Webber—against those of satisfied-looking Paine Webber clients. One commercial showed parents and grandparents watching a children's soccer game as the thoughts of various spectators were projected in voice-overs. One mother said to herself, "It'd be great if money would grow as fast as these kids," while a father thought, "College in four years, costs up . . . someone do the math here." By contrast, the thoughts of a happy Paine Webber investor were much simpler: "Thank you, Paine Webber." As the campaign progressed other spots depicted similar scenes on a commuter train and in an airport terminal.

OUTCOME

In January 1999 Denise Gellene of the Los Angeles Times gave a less than glowing appraisal of Paine Webber's television advertising. "The gratitude of these customers seems excessive," she wrote. "There's no evidence in these commercials that Paine Webber has performed remarkably; none of its customers are boarding Lear jets. And let's not forget that Paine Webber's customers are paying full-service commissions for investment advice. Maybe Paine Webber should be thanking them."

Also in January Wall Street Letter noted that "Though the firm dug up its old 'Thank you, Paine Webber,' slogan . . . institutional salespeople reportedly had different feelings upon receiving their 1997 bonus checks" in February 1998. Investment earnings had been down, and Wall Street Letter attributed the cause to changes in key personnel, in particular sales director John Kelleher. According to the publication, "The jury apparently is still out" on whether the company would make the changes necessary to better compensate its sales force.

Likewise the jury was still out on the continuing "Thank you, Paine Webber" campaign. Certainly Paine Webber had weathered greater difficulties and come out on top. Like an investment, the campaign needed time to mature as it proceeded throughout 1999.

FURTHER READING

"ADVISORY/Paine Webber 26th Annual Media Conference." Business Wire, November 23, 1998.

"Corrections." New York Times, November 25, 1998, p. 2.

Dupree, Scotty. "Paine Webber Last Week Signed a Multi-Year Deal as the Executive Title Sponsor of ABC/Raycom College Football." Mediaweek, November 20, 1995, p. 9.

Elliott, Stuart. "Paine Webber Finds There's No Time Like the Present to Bring Back a Classic Catch Phrase" New York Times, November 20, 1998, p. 6.

Gellene, Denise. "For Paine Webber, Does Performance Count?" Los Angeles Times, January 14, 1999, p. C-6.

"Paine Webber." Wall Street Letter, January 4, 1999, p. 9.

"Paine Webber Account in Play: Seeks Advertising Agency for Creative and Corporate Image Work." Adweek (Western edition), April 13, 1998, p. 46.

"Paine Webber Could Have a Peck of Trouble." Business Week, October 7, 1996, p. 140.

"Paine Webber Introduces Advertising Campaign; Focuses on Investment Advice for High Net Worth Individuals." Business Wire, November 20, 1998.

"Paine Webber Reprises Familiar Tag in New Ad Thrust." Brandweek, November 23, 1998, p. 5.

"Paine Webber to Resume Advertising in Print." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998, p. 56.

"Paine Webber's 'Back to Basics' Media Conf. Leaves Out 'Most Basic' RDA." Media Industry Newsletter, November 30, 1998.

Judson Knight

Unilever PLC

Unilever House
Blackfriars
London, EC4P 4BQ
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 20 78225252
Fax: 44 20 78226191
Web site: www.unilever.com

■■■

CAMPAIGN FOR REAL BEAUTY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the most sweeping and ambitious advertising effort in the company's history, Unilever PLC launched a global ad campaign in 2003 that aimed not just to sell its new line of Dove brand products but also, in the words of Dove's U.S. marketing director, Philippe Harousseau, to "broaden the narrow and stereotypical view of beauty." Unilever was significantly expanding its Dove line from simple cleansing solutions (soaps, facial cleaners, and shower gels) to include deodorants, hair-care products, and more importantly, a whole new product category for the company: skin firming and lifting creams. To promote both the new products and the new idea of beauty, Dove and its ad agency, Ogilvy & Mather of Chicago, chose to use real women in the advertisements instead of models, and they selected women whose looks or weight were not typical for beauty-industry advertisements.

Dubbed the "Campaign for Real Beauty," it began as an outdoor campaign with billboards and mass-transit ads but eventually expanded to include print ads and TV spots, culminating in a 45-second spot that aired during the 2006 Super Bowl—all at an estimated total cost of over $100 million worldwide. The initial billboards in the United States showed six women, sizes 6–14, dressed only in white undergarments against a plain white background. (The rollout in each of the more than 10 countries where the campaign appeared followed a parallel course, with six women scouted locally and featured on billboards.) Equally important to the success of the campaign was Dove's interactive website, which offered descriptions of the product line and live discussion forums where women could discuss their feelings about the campaign.

By any standard the campaign was a smashing success. Not only did it help to increase Dove's global sales by 13 to 25 percent, but it also generated a phenomenal amount of media coverage. There was some backlash in the press, but the majority of critics found little fault with the campaign, and most lauded its willingness to use real women instead of idealized (and practically unattainable) icons of beauty. Industry awards were plentiful as well, making the campaign well worth the company's significant investment.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Dove soap emerged from product development research into ways of treating burn victims during World War II, and in the 1950s it was originally launched by Unilever in the United States as a moisturizing soap. The simple Dove soap bar was repositioned as early as 1957 as a "beauty bar" aimed at women with the spin that regular soaps would dry out their skin during bathing, while the Dove bar would not. From that point on such market differentiation and exclusive targeting of female consumers became the sole focus of the Dove brand. In addition, Dove set out to use clinical research to bolster its moisturizing claims, peppering its early ads with "dermatological studies" touting Dove as being milder on the skin than all other leading brands and using the tagline "Soap dries your skin, but Dove creams your skin while you wash."

Real women in Dove's Campaign for Real Beauty. IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

It was not until 2001 that the Dove brand began to expand beyond skin cleansers into other personal-care categories, namely hair care, antiperspirants and deodorants, and finally, in 2004, "firming" lotions to tighten and smooth the skin. Unilever never abandoned its use of the term "Beauty Bar" for the Dove product, and the concept of beauty was the thread that connected its advertising for more than 50 years. It came as no surprise, then, that the conventional definition of beauty and the issue of a woman's self-image would become the thrust of Unilever's global campaign to introduce its new line of products aimed at women. Having spent half a century trying to associate its products with an abstract concept, Dove chose to take the bold step of redefining the historical notion of beauty (as depicted in advertising) by featuring women in its advertisements who looked radically different from the models traditionally used to promote beauty products.

TARGET MARKET

The Dove brand of products had always been aimed exclusively at women. (Unilever had other lines of grooming products specifically for men.) The "Campaign for Real Beauty" did not try to appeal to a group beyond that which was already in the company's sights, but it did set out to attract even more women between the ages of 18 and 45 in a new way. With the introduction in 2004 of a new line of skin-care products, the company moved beyond mere cleansers and entered a new product category aimed at women who were dissatisfied with the appearance of their skin, whether it was too saggy, blemished, wrinkled, or just not firm enough. Such products were typically the domain of more upscale cosmetics companies, such as Clinique, Lancôme, and Chanel. Dove was not seeking to lure high-end customers away from these boutique brands (a stretch-mark cream from Clinique, for instance, sold for $95 in 2005, while Dove's Intensive Firming Cream sold for only $7.99); instead, Dove sought to reach its established customer demographic with a new product line and chose a controversial ad campaign to garner as much media and consumer attention as possible.

The new line of skin creams was aimed squarely at women whose assessment of their own skin's appearance was less than optimal—which, in practical terms, meant just about all women. To verify this assumption Dove, in conjunction with the research consulting firm the Downing Street Group, commissioned a study that surveyed some 3,000 women in more than ten countries to find out just how they felt about their own appearance. The extensive results, published as The Dove Report:

BEAUTY ACROSS THE GLOBE

As Dove expanded its "Campaign for Real Beauty" to more than 10 countries, it found through its research that the issues of beauty and self-image among women were nearly universal. The percentages of women in Japan, Korea, Vietnam, France, Germany, and elsewhere who rated themselves either "beautiful" or "attractive" were as low as those in the United States. Interestingly, however, the company had to modify its advertising approach to fit the social mores of each country. In Brazil, for instance, the group of six women photographed in plain white undergarments was found to be overly prudish by testing groups, and so the final ads pictured women in lacier and more stylishly colorful bras and panties. In China, where partial nudity was considered scandalous, the models were photographed in less revealing outfits and were not touching or depicted quite as playfully as their U.S. counterparts.

Challenging Beauty, stated that, among other things, only 2 percent of women considered themselves "beautiful," while only 9 percent felt comfortable describing themselves as "attractive." The report's introduction said, "our vision is that a new definition of beauty will free women from self-doubt and encourage them to embrace their real beauty." Armed with this database of information about the self-images of women worldwide, Dove worked with Ogilvy to create an ad campaign that strove to subvert the expectations the public had about beauty in both advertising and daily life.

COMPETITION

Dove's main brand competitors for skin and body-care products worldwide were Nivea (made by Beiersdorf AG) and Neutrogena (made by Johnson & Johnson). In 2005 Nivea's European market share was 20 percent; Dove's was 5.5 percent. U.S. market shares were more balanced among the three rivals. In the same year Nivea launched a pan-European media campaign, complete with a theme song, "New Days," by the up-and-coming German band Asher Lane. The song became a hit in Europe and was released as a CD single that was available for purchase from Nivea's website as well as at music stores; the packaging sported a sticker with the Nivea logo. The campaign's main TV spot depicted a wide cross section of people—young and old, male and female—in myriad situations (for instance, bathing, shaving, running, exercising, playing, or relaxing) casually using a range of Nivea products while "New Days" played. The approach was far more typical than Unilever's and far less controversial. With its established lead in European product sales, Nivea had no stake in rocking the boat. Dove, on the other hand, had little to lose.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In fall 2003, armed with the exhaustive information from The Dove Report, Ogilvy and Unilever began what would become a worldwide media campaign, starting with a series of billboards in the United Kingdom. The ads featured an unretouched photograph of six women of varying sizes and ages, wearing nothing but plain white bras and panties, standing together against a white background. Each woman in the ad was scouted from the general British populace; no modeling agencies were used. The ad boasted the tagline "New Dove Firming. As tested on real curves." The notion of "reality" suffused the entire campaign, and Dove made sure to emphasize the fact that the women in its ads were everyday citizens and not idealized beauties. Of course, the company selected rather attractive, healthy-looking women for its ads, even if they were a larger size or not as young as expected. The initial billboards caused a stir in the British press, eliciting praise from those who lauded Dove's use of real women as models and derision from those who either felt that the ads promoted an unhealthy body weight or thought the women were simply unattractive. Either way, U.K. sales of the featured firming cream doubled within a month of the ads' appearance.

The campaign moved to the United States in 2004 with a similar use of billboards and outdoor signage, although in America the initial intent was not to sell a particular product but first to position Dove as a company whose main concern was breaking the molds of established "fashion beauty" imagery. Each billboard in this first phase featured an unretouched photograph of a woman whose looks or age were atypical for the beauty industry. The first woman selected to appear in an ad, scouted from a home for the elderly, was 96 years old. The text in the ad consisted of two words adjacent to two check boxes marked "Wrinkled?" or "Wonderful?" and was designed to prompt the viewer to think about the image and the concept of beauty. A 96-year-old woman was indeed wrinkled, but could she be beautiful too? Clearly Dove was sending the message that it thought so. Another billboard featured a plus-size model with the words "Oversized?" or "Outstanding?" Each ad in the initial series followed the same template, showing a woman who was either older, less thin, or less typically attractive than expected alongside a pair of words that viewers could mull over. The ads directed viewers to the company's website, where they could register their votes for either adjective; the subsequent poll results were tabulated on the site. This interactive component served to introduce people to the website and its various sections, which were aimed at stimulating discussion about the concept of beauty. The website was designed from the outset to be a cornerstone of the campaign, containing, along with information and images from the campaign, various forums for users to post their own feelings about their bodies, their lives, or the campaign itself. It was eventually expanded to include live discussion groups where visitors could share their thoughts with each other in real time.

BEAUTY, BODY SIZE, AND WEALTH

Historically, what was considered beautiful or attractive had more to do with scarcity of resources than any other factor. In times past, when rich foods were less plentiful, being overweight was a sign of high status—it meant a person was not only eating well but could afford to do so; it was the poor who were underfed and thin. By the second half of the twentieth century, with the advent of corporate farming and cheaply made, fattening foods, anyone could "afford" to be fat, and thinness became a sign of status. The new ideal, one difficult to attain even for the wealthy, was to be ultrathin. Signaled in 1966 by the supplanting of robust icons of beauty such as Marilyn Monroe by the supermodel Twiggy—who stood 5 feet 7 and weighed only 91 pounds—beautiful came to be synonymous with unnaturally thin and free of body fat. In 2005 the average American model was 5 feet 11 inches tall and weighed 117 pounds, while the average American woman was 5 feet 4 inches and 140 pounds. Obesity had transformed from a sign of status to a social stigma, signifying a lack of self-control and the inability to afford high-quality, healthy foods.

Phase two of the U.S. campaign mirrored the British rollout, with six women scouted from locations ranging from a coffee shop to a college campus. Again, all six women were sizes 6–14 and were pictured standing together in plain white undergarments against a white background. Each was smiling, some were leaning on one another, and all appeared to be having a good time. Each was in her 20s. The image of all six women appeared simultaneously on billboards and mass-transit ads in most major U.S. markets, including Chicago, Miami, Boston, Atlanta, New York, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C. The image eventually appeared as a print ad in national magazines with the same "tested on real curves" tagline as well as text that stated, "Let's face it, firming the thighs of a size 2 supermodel is no challenge." The ads caused an even bigger sensation in the media in the United States than they had in Great Britain. Naysayers were few, although some found fault with the firming product itself, debunking its effectiveness. Others took issue with Unilever's mixed messages. While it used its Dove brand as a vehicle for transformative change in the ways that women and beauty were regarded in advertising, one of its other product lines, Axe deodorant, was being promoted with ads whose theme was sexually provocative and featured thin, attractive, scantily clad models fawning seductively over men who were presumably wearing the Axe product. In any case, the enthusiasm about the use of real women in the Dove ads led the six women to be interviewed on high-profile TV programs such as The Today Show and to appear on the cover of People magazine.

Dove continued its crusade to examine, redefine, and boost women's self-image in relation to beauty and body shape through its website and through its philanthropic efforts. To this end, in conjunction with the Girl Scouts of America, Dove helped fund (with an initial donation of $3 million) a program called "Uniquely Me!" that was designed to foster self-esteem in girls aged 8–17. In addition it created its own Dove Self-Esteem Fund for the same purpose. During the 2005 Super Bowl Dove ran a commercial not for its products but for this program, spending $2.5 million for the spot, hoping that it would both encourage support for the Self-Esteem Fund and continue to bolster the understanding of Dove's commitment to improving the self-images of women. Of the decision to promote the Dove Self-Esteem Fund rather than a particular product during the most expensive advertising time on television, Philippe Harousseau, U.S. marketing director for Dove, said, "It's time to free the next generation from these [beauty] stereotypes and give girls the tools they need to discover their own definition of beauty."

OUTCOME

Dove's gamble to create controversy by attempting to redefine the concept of beauty paid off in spades, and the value of the resulting media coverage far outweighed the financial costs associated with the campaign itself. According to Unilever's internal research, the media coverage generated by the campaign was worth 30 times more than the paid-for media space. Dove's global sales rose 25 percent in 2005, thanks in large part to its advertising blitz. In Asia sales increased 26 percent, while Dove's U.S. sales increased by a total of 13 percent in 2005 over the previous year. Based on this success, Dove planned to roll out three new product platforms in 2006, including new skin-toning creams, advanced hair-care products, and an expanded line of its skin-firming lotions, all advertised with the same paradigm-inverting use of real women instead of models.

The campaign picked up numerous ad-industry awards, including the Grand Prix at the 2005 European EFFIE Awards (a prestigious advertising-awards program hosted by the European Association of Communication Agencies), a Gold Euro EFFIE in the Toiletries and Beauty category, the Best of Show award at the 2005 Canadian Media Innovation Awards, and the Rethink Pink! Best Marketing Award for 2005. (The Rethink Pink! Conference, held annually in the United Kingdom, focused on marketing to women.) In addition, the advertising-news magazine Campaign named Dove its International Advertiser of the Year.

The impact of Dove's "Campaign for Real Beauty" could be seen in the trail of imitators it left in its wake. In 2005 the sportswear company Nike released a series of print ads featuring real women by using photographs of body parts (thighs, buttocks, arms, shoulders, legs, etc.) with accompanying text in which the woman in the photograph frankly discussed her features. A sample tagline: "My shoulders aren't dainty or proportional to my hips. Some say they are like a man's. I say, leave men out of it." Also in 2005, cosmetics giant Revlon chose 58-year-old actress Susan Sarandon as a model and spokesperson. Both Nike and Revlon followed Dove's lead, using either real women or atypical women to help sell their products. While the trend was never destined to catch on industry-wide, there was no doubt that Unilever and Ogilvy steered Dove into advertising territory worth emulating.

FURTHER READING

Brothers, Joyce. "Beauty Is No Longer Exclusive Domain of Magazines and Films; Dove's 'Campaign' Ads Are Raging Success because They Are Aspirational, but 'Doable.'" Advertising Age, August 1, 2005, p. 14.

Garfield, Bob. "Garfield's Ad Review: Women May Be 'Real' but Product Is Baloney." Advertising Age, July 25, 2005, p. 53.

Howard, Theresa. "Dove Ad Gets Serious for Super Bowl; 'True Colors' of Real Beauty Part of Self-Esteem Message." USA Today, January 12, 2006, p. B1.

Mills, Dominic. "Dove's Commitment to 'Real Beauty' Is Only Skin Deep." Daily Telegraph (London), January 18, 2005, p. 34.

Orbach, Susie. "Fat Is an Advertising Issue." Campaign, June 17, 2005, p. 26.

Prior, Molly. "Dove Ad Campaign Aims to Redefine Beauty." Women's Wear Daily, October 8, 2004, p. 18.

Vranica, Suzanne. "The Advertising Report: Dove's Curvaceous Campaign Tries to Renew Brand's Passion." Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2005, p. B3.

Wolf, Naomi. The Beauty Myth: How Images of Beauty Are Used against Women. New York: Anchor Books, 1992.

Jonathan Kolstad

DO IT ONCE. DO IT RIGHT. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 Unilever PLC subsidiary Lever Brothers, makers of Wisk laundry detergent, launched a new advertising campaign with the tag line "Do It Once. Do It Right." The primary element in the campaign, created by J. Walter Thompson (JWT) USA in New York, was television commercials. In one spot a woman's voice announced "Wisk presents the ten thousand million things we have to do." There followed a series of hilarious scenes with laconic titles, provided by the voice-over, such as "Locate stuff," "Prevent osteoporosis," and "Save the planet." After this litany, the voice-over presented yet another thing women had to deal with in the course of their busy workday: "Then we still have to do the laundry. Really well. Good thing Wisk has a targeted cleaning system. Now everything you wash gets done right the first time. Do it once. Do it right."

Bob Garfield of Advertising Age lauded the new spot, which he called "witty, refreshing, thoughtful." The commercial was particularly impressive, Garfield wrote, in light of Wisk's past history as a brand name that "evokes painful memories of unbearable shrillness, obnoxious and demeaningly stereotyped gender roles." He was referring to Wisk's "Ring-around-the-Collar" commercials from the 1970s.

Despite—or rather, precisely because of—the fact that many viewers found the "Ring-around-the-Collar" ads irritating, the earlier campaign proved one of the most successful in history. It had earned a place among Advertising Age's top 100 campaigns of the twentieth century and helped Wisk become one of the leading brands of laundry detergent. This in turn helped pave the way for the triumph of liquid brands, such as Wisk, over old-fashioned powdered detergents. The 1998 spots helped maintain Wisk's position among leaders, and assisted in Unilever's resurgence against its primary competitor, Procter & Gamble (P&G), whose Tide brand had long held the top spot.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the early 1950s Lever Brothers introduced Surf as a detergent to compete with Tide, which debuted in 1946. Although Surf established a strong market position, it did little to shake Tide's hold, so in 1956 Lever Brothers brought out Wisk, the first heavy-duty liquid detergent. Its uniqueness made Wisk a significant contender almost from the start and quickly earned it a market share of 4.2 percent, despite the fact that the new brand cost nearly twice as much as most powdered detergents. But by the mid-1960s, as the novelty of liquid detergents began to fade, so did Wisk's position. With less than 3 percent of the market in 1967, the company decided on a new strategy. Thus was born "Ring-around-the-Collar," the creation of James Jordan.

In 1968 Jordan, who went on to establish Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, was a copywriter with Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn (BBDO). "It took about a minute and a half to write that commercial," he later told Advertising Age. "And the rest was history." Originally, Lever Brothers had not been enthusiastic about the spots, which focused on the dirty rings left on shirt collars by less-than-effective brands of laundry detergent. But the commercials, involving embarrassing situations in which homemakers were shamed by public exposure of "ring around the collar" on the clothes of family members, gained huge exposure for Wisk.

"It was the first time a liquid detergent dramatized the product's cleaning benefit," wrote Robyn Griggs in Advertising Age, and largely as a result of the spots, Wisk became the first Lever Brothers brand to sell 1 million cases a year. It emerged as the leading liquid detergent in the United States, and with an 8 percent share of a highly segmented market, it occupied the number two slot overall, behind Tide. Yet in 1987, the year Wisk dropped "Ring-around-the-Collar," new Liquid Tide knocked Wisk out of second place.

In 1989 Lever Brothers moved its advertising account to JWT, which assigned copywriter J. J. Jordan—ironically, the son of James Jordan—to the account. Although the campaign was new, the approach proved much the same as that of "Ring-around-the-Collar," using concepts of shame and embarrassment, albeit presented in a humorous light. In one spot, an actor was splashed with mud while those around chided him with "tisk, tisk, tisk." A voice-over then responded with "Wisk, Wisk, Wisk."

TARGET MARKET

Despite the many changes that had occurred in the social fabric of American life since the introduction of Wisk in the mid-1950s, the focus of its marketing remained on women. Even though a large portion of America's female population worked outside the home, typically it was still women—whether married women with outside jobs, homemakers, single mothers, or single women—who were responsible for the laundry in their households.

Feminists might have considered the old "Ring-around-the-Collar" approach demeaning, as Garfield suggested; by contrast, the "Do It Once. Do It Right" campaign two decades later paid tribute to the many roles women are required to perform. In place of shame, a staple of advertising geared toward women from the earliest days of modern marketing, the new campaign offered an attitude of pride, encouraging women to feel good about their ability to succeed at a wide variety of tasks.

Discussing the change in Wisk's approach, Garfield asked, "What if [shock TV talk show host] Jerry Springer hosted a civil, witty round-table discussion that commenced the end of gratuitous sex and violence on TV?... What if the ghost of [ineffectual 1930s British prime minister] Neville Chamberlain appeared at the United Nations, admonishing the world to stop the Serbs before it is too late? It would be ironic, that's what, because these people are too identified with ugly events to be imagined transforming from monster or coward or scapegoat to hero." Yet Wisk had effected precisely such a transformation with "a striking new spot that speaks to busy launderers with candor and charm."

COMPETITION

The market for laundry detergents was divided not only among many brands, but also among several types of

RING AROUND THE RACETRACK

Detergents and racing may not seem like an obvious combination, but Wisk managed to bring the two together for a 1999 promotional campaign in the southeast. During the period from March 16 to April 30, some 600,000 specially marked boxes of Wisk contained in-box premiums—die-cast replicas of historic race cars. Whereas typically 50 percent of Wisk retailers in an area participate in a promotion, the race-car campaign, supported by sales incentives, radio, print ads, direct mail, and in-store displays, enjoyed 85 percent participation. The campaign, spearheaded by Championship Group in Atlanta, doubled or tripled Wisk market share in the area during the period of its run. Total cost of the promotion was less than $500,000.

THIRTY OUT OF THIRTY UNILEVER EXECUTIVES

In early 1999 Forbes reported on the resurgence of Unilever's soap division, thanks in part to the efforts of executive Niall FitzGerald. One of FitzGerald's most trying experiences, according to Deborah Orr of Forbes, was a 1994 scandal surrounding the company's Persil Power. The problem with the detergent, marketed in Britain, was not its inability to clean but rather its tendency to clean too well. Hence as Orr noted, "the British press had a field day—'It's Official! Persil Can Rot Your Knickers'."

During this difficult time, FitzGerald had a pivotal experience when he gathered 30 Unilever executives in a board room and asked how many did their own laundry. " 'Not one person raised a hand,' he says with amazement. 'There we were, trying to figure out why customers wouldn't buy our soap—and we didn't know the first thing about how it was used' That taught FitzGerald a lesson he heeds to this day: Never lose touch with your customer." In the end, FitzGerald elected to discontinue Persil Power, a move that meant a loss of several hundred million dollars in the short run but that ultimately served Unilever's long-term aim of gaining market share against Procter & Gamble and others.

detergent. As Tide was the first significant powdered brand in 1946, so Wisk a decade later became the first major liquid detergent. With the introduction of Liquid Tide in the mid-1980s, Lever Brothers responded by bringing out Advanced Action Wisk, and the company continued to create newer varieties of the brand to compete with P&G's market leader.

But the early days of laundry detergent's history also saw the introduction of what was then a much more obscure phenomenon: concentrated powders. The first brand in this category was probably SA-8, a creation of the Amway Corporation marketed primarily by direct sales in the late 1950s and early 1960s. The first mass-market concentrate, however, appeared in 1980, when Colgate-Palmolive introduced Fresh Start.

Fresh Start proved to be ahead of its time, but a decade later, in the early 1990s, concentrated powders began to take away market share both from regular powders and from liquids. In response, Lever Brothers introduced Wisk Power Scoop, using advertising built around the sort of scientific claims typical of the 1950s. The company promoted the new product as "an entirely new class of enzymes specifically designed to dislodge and dissolve oily dirt and stains." Power Scoop was "concentrated to the theoretical limit of density," advertising claimed. Yet then-Lever Brothers president David F. Webb, discussing the concentrated quality of the product with Advertising Age, used language familiar from the 1960s or early 1970s: "Small is beautiful," he announced, referring to the reduced packaging required for Power Scoop.

Tide and other powdered brands moved to concentrates, but overall there was a trend in favor not only of concentrates over traditional powders, but also of liquid over powder. By 1999 liquid detergents, despite their higher prices, for the first time exceeded sales of powders. The key players remained Unilever and P&G—with the latter still in the lead. P&G, with Tide, Cheer, Gain, and Era, controlled almost 54 percent of the U.S. market, while Unilever, with Wisk, Surf, and All, held a 19 percent share.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In June 1998 Lever Brothers presented the "Do It Once. Do It Right" campaign, which primarily centered around a single television spot. At the opening of the commercial, a woman's voice announces "Wisk presents the ten thousand million things we have to do every day." First among these is "Locate stuff," accompanied by a shot of a woman reaching under a bed, searching for something. There follow a series of other tasks, each with an accompanying dramatization—all of them decidedly tongue-in-cheek. "Prevent osteoporosis" shows a woman sitting astride a cow and balancing a glass of milk on her head. Under the spoken heading "Conquer flab," another woman is shown jogging furiously behind an ice-cream truck. Next, the voice-over announces "Train dog," and this time no woman appears, only a Labrador retriever balancing a model train on its head. Another segment, "Control frizz," is a shot of a woman with birds nesting in her hair.

The duties become ever more lofty as the spot progresses. The next one is "Remind kids of family infrastructure," which features a scene of a child playing before a portrait of the parents dressed in the uniforms of dictators. Next to last is "Save the planet," a serene tableau with a woman standing before a sky filled with stars. Finally the commercial comes to its central theme. "Then," the voice-over announces, as though to say "After all this", "we still have to do the laundry. Really well. Good thing Wisk has a targeted cleaning system. Now everything you wash gets done right the first time. Do it once. Do it right." During the week of September 7 to 13, 1998, Lever Brothers and Wisk held a position among the top 50 brands advertising on network prime-time television, with 11 spots on ABC, CBS, NBC, FOX, UPN, and WB.

OUTCOME

"What's so marvelous about this ad," wrote Garfield, "is how it recognizes the responsibilities, concerns, and vanities of the busy 1998 woman without pandering or idealizing—or going into an angry tirade." He declared the spot "endearing, self-deprecating, and above all, knowing about the semi-liberated American mom." As Garfield noted, Wisk had come a long way from the days of its famously irritating "Ring-around-the-Collar" spot, and although the new ad proved a critical success, it came at a time when Unilever faced ever more stiff competition from P&G. So even though Unilever experienced gains in sales of its liquid detergents—not only Wisk but All and Surf—during 1998, they did not offset losses in sales of powdered All and Surf. For the 52-week-period ending November 28, 1998, the company posted gains of 14.8 percent in its liquid detergents but losses of 19.6 in powders. P&G, by contrast, lost 10.9 percent in powders and gained 23.6 percent in liquids.

As Pamela Sauer related in Chemical Market Reporter, "the issue in 1999 for the U.S. laundry detergent industry will again be the battle of liquid versus powder." According to a March 1999 report in Brandweek, P&G was about to launch a new effort to "revitalize the slowly dying powder laundry detergent category" with the introduction of new Tide and Cheer product extensions, priced low to contend with Wisk and Surf. This would be accompanied by a $30 million advertising budget. At the same time, industry publications hailed the resurgence of Lever Brothers as P&G's leading competitor—an indication that the fierce ongoing battle between the two companies would continue into a new century.

FURTHER READING

Bittar, Christine. "P&G Sets Anti-Fade Plan for Ailing Powder Detergents: New SKUs." Brandweek, March 22, 1999, p. 4.

"Breaking: Wisk: Nobody Knows the Trouble." Advertising Age, June 1, 1998, p. 10.

Freeman, Laurie. "Wisk Rings in New Ad Generation." Advertising Age, September 18, 1989, p. 1.

Garfield, Bob. "Wisk Blots Out Stain of 'Ring Around the Collar,' " Advertising Age, June 8, 1998, p. 53.

Griggs, Robyn. "Irritation Tagline Rings True for Wisk." Advertising Age, March 29, 1999, p. C41.

"Lever Intros Whisk HE for High-Efficiency Front-Loaders." Brandweek, April 27, 1998, p. 8.

Orr, Deborah. "A Giant Reawakens." Forbes, January 25, 1999, p. 52.

"Reggie Bronze." Brandweek, March 29, 1999, p. R22.

Sauer, Pamela. "Finding the Profit in Liquids." Chemical Market Reporter, February 1, 1999, p. FR-3.

Thurm, Samuel. "Ten Who Helped Build N.Y.'s Sold Foundation: Creating a Washday Legacy Via 'Ring Around the Collar,'" Advertising Age, January 27, 1997, p. C12.

Walsh, Kerri et al. "Soaps and Detergents: Sharing the Risks and Rewards." Chemical Week, January 27, 1999.

"A Weekly Ranking of the Top 50 Brands' Advertising in Network Prime Time." Mediaweek, September 28, 1998.

Judson Knight

Unilever United States

700 Sylvan Avenue
Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 07632-9976
USA
Telephone: (201) 894-2104
Fax: (201) 871-8257
Web site: www.unileverusa.com

■■■

REAL COOKING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although dry mix meals had been available since 1937, when Kraft introduced its packaged Kraft Macaroni and Cheese dinner, the category did not begin to expand until 1970, when General Mills launched its Betty Crocker brand of dry dinner mixes called Hamburger Helper. The consumer-goods giant Unilever jumped into selling dry dinner mixes (food kits that usually required only the addition of meat for a complete meal) with its Lipton Sizzle & Stir in 1999. By then the total category accounted for $450 million in annual sales. In 2000 Lipton Sizzle & Stir claimed $30 million in sales in the category, which had grown to $500 million in total sales. The number one brand that year, with $405 million in sales, was Hamburger Helper. Kraft Foods' Stove Top Oven Creations captured $65 million in sales.

Despite the successful introduction of its new product, which had been supported by a $15 million marketing campaign created by the New York office of ad agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty, Unilever hoped to increase sales of its Lipton Sizzle & Stir brand to $40 million in 2001. As part of the growth effort, Bartle Bogle Hegarty developed a new ad campaign for the brand. Called "Real Cooking," the campaign put a unique twist on the traditional family gathered for dinner, using celebrities in the roles of parents and kids. It had a budget of $25 million and, like the initial campaign, included television spots and print ads.

"Real Cooking" was a hit, earning praise from Adweek, which named one of the television commercials a Best Spot of 2001. Also recognizing the TV spots for their humor and creativity were Entertainment Weekly, Time, and USA Today. But while the campaign was a success, the product was not. Sales of Lipton Sizzle & Stir failed to meet Unilever's expectations, and in 2002 the company canceled the campaign and shifted its marketing focus to its more popular Lipton Side Dishes brand.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Unilever United States made the decision in 1999 to venture into the rapidly growing category of dry dinner mixes, the company did so by expanding its Lipton brand. At the time Lipton was best known for its variety of teas, dry soup mixes (especially Lipton Onion Soup), and dry side-dish mixes (such as Lipton Noodles & Sauce). The new product, Lipton Sizzle & Stir, was launched in January 2000 with the support of a $15 million marketing campaign that included television spots and print ads. The campaign, which was created by Bartle Bogle Hegarty, New York, targeted women ages 25 to 44 years old and had the tagline "Surprisingly Real." TV spots used supposedly real situations to highlight the idea that Sizzle & Stir was a more substantial or

"real" product than competing dry dinner mixes. In one spot a teenage boy dropped a fork on the floor, picked it up, wiped it off on his shirt, then placed the fork on the table beside his mother's dinner plate as the words "Real teenager. Would rather be someplace else," scrolled across the screen.

The campaign helped push sales of Lipton Sizzle & Stir to $30 million during its first year on the market. Although the "Surprisingly Real" campaign was a success, Unilever hoped to attain annual sales of $40 million the following year. Bartle Bogle Hegarty was charged with creating a new campaign for the product. The new campaign took the idea of traditional family dinner settings and replaced the standard cute kids and patient parents with not-so-typical characters played by an unusual mix of celebrities. Themed "Real Cooking," the campaign began in early 2001.

TARGET MARKET

The goal of the Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign was to reach all busy families, and in particular mothers who may have been working outside of the home but were also responsible for serving healthy meals at the end of the day. A report in Advertising Age cited studies revealing that mothers, regardless of how hectic their schedules were, wanted to mother the way that their own moms had done. Studies also found that many women were frustrated or felt guilty about their inability to emulate the cultural definition of traditional moms in the style of June Cleaver, the ideal mother in the 1950s sitcom Leave It to Beaver. "Real Cooking" was designed to convince these women that it was possible to serve a home-cooked meal without spending hours chopping, stirring, and sautéing.

The campaign further enhanced its message by using celebrities easily recognized by women 30 to 45 years old, the main purchasers of meal kits. Reaching a younger demographic was an alternate aspect of the campaign. According to Supermarket News, in 2001 consumers ages 15 to 24 ate out three or more times each week. Bringing these young people back to the family kitchen to enjoy a home-cooked dinner was a potential benefit of the campaign, but more importantly, it could help establish brand identity with young consumers who would be the purchasers of meal kits in the future.

COMPETITION

Kraft Foods got its start in 1903, when James L. Kraft began a wholesale cheese business in Chicago. In 1937 Kraft introduced the granddaddy of convenience foods, Kraft Macaroni and Cheese. It did not take busy housewives long to appreciate that the new convenience foods could help them make a good meal with less time in the kitchen. Other convenience foods followed. Stove Top Stuffing mix became available in 1972 (at the time the brand was owned by General Foods). Kraft's Stove Top brand was revamped in 1998 as Stove Top Oven Classics, boxed meals that included everything but the meat. It was reintroduced to consumers with a $15.5 million marketing campaign. Stove Top Oven Classics quickly caught on, and by 2000 sales had jumped 51 percent to $65 million. In 2001 Kraft added three new flavor varieties to the brand. But with ever increasing, and less expensive, meal kit options available to consumers—110 such products were offered in 2002—Kraft's Stove Top brand sales were slipping, achieving just $40 million in sales in 2002. Kraft discontinued its Stove Top Oven Classics meal kits in 2003.

General Mills may have been best known for its brand icon Betty Crocker. The mythological homemaker got her start in 1921 as a pen name that consumers wrote to for baking advice. Betty Crocker began offering consumers convenience foods with the 1931 introduction of Bisquick baking mix. In 1950 General Mills published the first Betty Crocker cookbook, and in 1970 the company launched Hamburger Helper under the Betty Crocker brand. Although Kraft's Macaroni and Cheese mix had been on the market for close to 40 years when Hamburger Helper was introduced, Hamburger Helper fueled the popularity of dinner meal kits. Eventually the brand was expanded to include Chicken Helper and Tuna Helper. Despite growing competition from brands such as Kraft's Stove Top Oven Classics and Lipton's Sizzle & Stir, Hamburger Helper maintained its number

UNILEVER PROGRAM HELPS KIDS VISIT NATIONAL PARKS

The America's Best Classroom program was part of an ongoing, multimillion-dollar effort by Unilever to help preserve and protect the United States' national parks. In 2002 the program, through a partnership with the National Park Foundation and the Albertsons grocery-store chain, provided $190,000 in scholarships to kids from 18 communities. The scholarships helped fund trips to national parks for more than 2,500 kids from Boys and Girls Clubs in participating communities throughout the United States. Scholarships were awarded based on the number of purchases made of Unilever products at Albertsons stores in each community. Participating communities included Dallas, Chicago, Phoenix, Denver, and Orlando.

one spot, with a 75 percent market share of the dry-dinner-mixes category in 2001. To help maintain its top spot and ward off competitors, General Mills reintroduced its "Helping Hand" spokescharacter, first used in advertising for the Hamburger Helper brand in 1977. Beginning in September 2001 television spots appeared that featured an updated version of the disembodied, four-fingered hand with eyes, a red nose, and a mouth; the accompanying voice-over stated, "Helping you make a great dinner tonight."

MARKETING STRATEGY

To help Lipton Sizzle & Stir break through the cacophony of typical food advertising, Bartle Bogle Hegarty took a nontraditional approach to traditional families and dinnertime. The "Real Cooking" campaign began in February 2001 and included television spots and print ads. The TV spots portrayed a traditional family dinner scenario of parents stirring a hot pan on the stove and kids arguing about who would set the table, but with what could only be described as a nontraditional family preparing the meal.

Kicking off the campaign was a television spot titled "The Woolerys," which was followed by a spot titled "The Ts." Both spots featured an oddball cast of characters—a who's who of former A-list celebrities—filling the roles of parents and kids. Starring as the parents in "The Woolerys" were game-show host Chuck Woolery and talk-show host Sally Jesse Raphael, and actor Pat Morita (of the Karate Kid films) and singer Little Richard played the argumentative siblings. The spot opened with Sally chopping a carrot into a skillet on a stove while Chuck read instructions to her from the back of a box of Sizzle & Stir. Chuck stated that the serving instructions suggested adding broccoli, to which Sally responded, "That's just a suggestion. I grew this carrot and, so help me, I'm going to use it." In the midst of the discussion over what vegetable to use, Pat was busy setting the table. Sally called Little Richard to "see if Pat needs help setting the table," to which Little Richard, in typical annoyed-kid fashion, tossed a spoon onto the table and said, "There. I helped." A battle between the two "brothers" was stopped when Chuck, in his sternest dad voice, said simply, "Boys." Sally added, "Come on, boys. Can't we have one nice meal together?"

"The Ts" followed a similar format but with actor Mr. T, complete with gold necklaces and Mohawk haircut, as the dad and actress Lonnie Anderson as the mom. Taking on the roles of brother and sister were actor George Hamilton and gymnast Mary Lou Retton. In the spot Mr. T was standing over the sizzling pan of food on the stove while Lonnie called, "George. Set the table." George, engrossed in a program on television, responded, "In a minute." On the sidelines was Mary Lou, who answered the ringing telephone and said in a teasing voice, "George. It's a girl." George took the call, saying to Mary Lou, "At least I get calls." With the inquisitive family looking on, George looked uncomfortable and said into the phone that he couldn't talk. After hanging up the phone he said to his "parents" and "sister," "She's not my girlfriend." Mary Lou tauntingly responded, "Is too." At which point George took a big-brotherly swipe at her. Mr. T scolded in his coarse voice, "Knock it off."

Each television spots had the tagline "When you cook, you're a family" and sent the message that the definition of family as well as family cooking had changed over the years and that Sizzle & Stir was ready to meet the changing needs of both. Print ads showed the pseudo-families gathered in their respective kitchens while mom cooked dinner. Included in the bottom right portion of the ads was the tagline "When you cook, you're a family," a menu stating "Dinner at the Woolerys" or "Dinner at the Ts," and a list of ingredients: a package of Sizzle & Stir, and appropriate meat and vegetables.

OUTCOME

The "Real Cooking" campaign was recognized for its humorous and creative approach toward families gathered around the table for dinner. An article in the New York Times described the campaign as "offbeat" and stated further that it seemed to have "captured the public's imagination." In addition, Adweek named the "Woolerys" television commercial as one of its Best Spots. Entertainment Weekly, USA Today, and Time also each named "The Woolerys" as one of the best TV commercials of 2001. Writing for Advertising Age, Bob Garfield stated that the campaign created by Bartle Bogle Hegarty was "fabulous." He added that the use of nontraditional families in a traditional setting coupled with good food photography almost assured that the campaign would not fail.

Fail it did, however. In January 2002 Unilever canceled its "Real Cooking" campaign citing the failure of Lipton's Sizzle & Stir meal kits to live up to the company's sales expectations of an estimated $40 million annually. Although the company spent about $38 million in advertising for the brand from 2000 through September 2001, it reported just $30 million in sales. Recognizing that the brand was floundering with consumers, the company refocused its marketing on its Lipton Side Dishes, which accounted for $250 million in sales in 2000. Unilever charged Bartle Bogle Hegarty with creating a campaign as edgy as the Sizzle & Stir effort for that product line. The new $15 million campaign for Lipton Side Dishes, which began in May 2002 with the theme "Dinner Games," replaced the Sizzle & Stir campaign.

FURTHER READING

Carpenter, Dave. "Kraft Puts Big Effort into Making Food More Convenient." Chicago Sun-Times, June 17, 2002.

Crook, Laura. "Hamburger Helper Offers Generous, Tasty Portions." Spokane (WA) Spokesman-Review, October 17, 2001.

Dornblaser, Lynn. "Meal Kits—The Next Generation? Kraft Foods Introduces Freshmade Creations Line." Prepared Foods, March 1, 2001.

"Editorial: Why Unilever Is a Smart Client." Advertising Age, January 21, 2002.

Garfield, Bob. "New Spots for Sizzle & Stir Let Real Family Values Ring True." Advertising Age, February 12, 2001.

"Kids Trek to National Parks for Enriching Experience in 'Living' Classrooms." PR Newswire, June 17, 2002.

Lauro, Patricia Winters. "Advertising: Lipton Shakes Up a Stodgy Image." New York Times, May 8, 2001.

Mills, Karren. "General Mills to Buy Pillsbury." Oklahoma City Journal Record, July 18, 2000.

Neff, Jack. "Lipton Sizzle & Stir: Alicia Rockmore." Advertising Age, October 8, 2001.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Bartle Bogle Ads Deliver Real Thing for Sizzle & Stir." Advertising Age, April 24, 2000.

———. "Lipton Stirs Up 'Family' Effort; Familiar Faces Gather around Table in $25 Million Marketing Campaign." Advertising Age, February 5, 2001.

———. "Prepared Dinners: Oven Meals Challenge Microwave." Advertising Age, June 24, 2002.

———. "Raising the Hand; Hamburger Helper Revives Its Familiar Spokescharacter." Advertising Age, September 3, 2001.

———. "Strategies: Sizzle & Stir's Hot Spots Get Shelved; Unilever Shifts Focus and Funds to Better Sellers." Advertising Age, January 14, 2002.

Zwieback, Elliot. "Sell Young Shoppers on Home Eating." Supermarket News, May 14, 2001.

Rayna Bailey

SOOTHING CUCUMBER EYE TREATMENTS ADS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In July 1998 Chesebrough-Pond's, a division of Unilever United States, introduced a new item—Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments—to its Pond's line of facial care products. These were pliable, premoistened eye pads that were designed to look and smell like real cucumbers and that Pond's claimed would "relax and relieve tired eyes." Using cucumber slices over the eyes had long been a staple treatment in spas and salons. Pond's hoped that its synthetic version of this age-old remedy for swollen eyes would captivate consumers who wanted an indulgent beauty regime that also provided concrete benefits. Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments, which contained cucumber extract, aloe, vitamin E, chamomile, and green tea, promised to reduce eye area puffiness and lighten dark under-eye circles.

To promote the new product, Pond's turned to its advertising agency, Ogilvy & Mather, to create a campaign that would not only fuel the sales of Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments but also continue to modernize the company's image. The resulting print campaign was a visually stunning effort that incorporated Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments into simple, uncluttered ads. The ads bore only the tag line "Feast Your Eyes," the Pond's name, and small-print copy listing the product's ingredients and extolling its virtues in short, declarative sentences ("Better than real cucumber"; "Relax away puffiness in 10 blissful minutes"), thus making the product itself the focal point of the executions. The pads were depicted tumbling out of a glistening glass jar, looking like nothing so much as thinly sliced cucumbers—right down to the seed patch in the middle. The effect was intentional. "We made face care have appetite appeal," Mike Indursky, the category director at Pond's, told Advertising Age.

Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments performed far above expectations. The product had a profound effect on the company's image, helping Pond's in its quest to position itself as an innovative company capable of meeting its powerful competitors head-on. Moreover, Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments and its supporting campaign helped bring younger consumers to the Pond's facial care line, an important accomplishment for the brand.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Pond's was one of the original participants in the birth of the facial care industry, and it had gone on to become an "institution in a jar," as the April 26, 1999, issue of Advertising Age quipped. But while its cold cream could claim the distinction of being one of the oldest cleaners still in existence, the storied history of Pond's alone could not ensure the continued success of the company as the skin care market modernized and high-tech formulations came to be preferred by consumers. With the debut of over-the-counter products containing alpha-hydroxy acids in early 1990s, a premium was increasingly placed on laboratory-engineered offerings over the old-fashioned products made by Pond's. The company did make efforts to keep up with these changes, and in 1993 it created the Pond's Institute, a research and development facility dedicated to formulating cutting-edge products. Despite its best efforts, however, Pond's continued to struggle with image problems. According to the October 13, 1997, issue of Advertising Age, Pond's was "having a rough time in facial care," with its sales of both moisturizers and cleansers steadily decreasing.

It was interesting that the opportunity for a turnaround by Pond's was provided, although unintentionally, by a competitor. In 1997 the Andrew Jergen's Company released its Biore line of facial cleansing products. Among the new offerings was Biore's Pore Perfectstrip, which adhered to the face and removed blackheads. The cosmetic was an instant success. That same year, following Biore's lead, Pond's introduced its own pore strip. This, too, met with an enthusiastic response, especially from younger consumers concerned more with acne than with the wrinkles that so exercised the company's traditional base. As an industry analyst told the December 21, 1998, issue of Advertising Age, "The experience with pore strips showed Pond's there is an opportunity in the 18-to-34 market."

TOO NATURAL?

Pond's put a great deal of effort into making its Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments resemble actual cucumbers. The company was almost too successful. One beauty columnist jokingly reminded her readers not to eat Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments by mistake.

TARGET MARKET

With the debut of its Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments, Pond's hoped to continue to attract younger consumers to its facial care brand. "The challenge is to show young women that 'This Pond's is for me, [it's] not just my mother's Pond's,' " a cosmetic consultant explained in Advertising Age. The desire of Pond's to court younger women was grounded in impeccable business logic. Not only would women under the age of 35 add valuable immediate sales for the company, but as they matured, they would also be more likely to remain loyal to the products. Market research in other fields had consistently demonstrated that brand allegiances were formed at a young age and that the bonds were strong, often remaining with consumers for their whole lives. This dynamic held true in the facial care industry as well. "If [a company] can get them into the line," an analyst told Advertising Age, "[it] can get them to trade up to [its] other products later." The primary way in which both Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments and Ogilvy & Mather's supporting campaign targeted these younger women was to stress the product's natural ingredients. "Natural ingredients are broadening facial skin care's appeal to a young generation of consumers," proclaimed Chain Drug Review. In addition to touting Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments' virtual garden of botanical extracts, the print ads portrayed the eye pads as realistic, even as edible.

At the same time that Pond's wanted to expand its presence among younger women, the company did not want to alienate it core base of consumers, who were typically 35 and older. The company therefore sought to make its new product speak to women of different ages. Pond's targeted more mature women by emphasizing the product's soothing properties. A company spokesperson reported to the Rose Sheet that 60 percent of women experienced daily stress and said that they needed "magic moments" of private time to relax. Often they used baths or other beauty regimes as ways to diffuse their tension. "We were looking at quality-of-life issues and how difficult it is for women to balance things like work and family," Indursky told the June 28, 1999, issue of Advertising Age, as the Pond's category director explained the impetus behind Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments. To reach these women, Pond's pitched the product with the line "Relieve Your Tired Eyes and Renew Your Spirit."

COMPETITION

The chief competitor of Pond's in the facial care market was Biore, the Jergen's brand that had breathed new life into the entire category. "Cleaners before Biore were dead," an industry consultant said in the June 29, 1998, issue of Advertising Age. "Biore showed that technology could bring them back." When the company launched its five-item skin treatment line, it immediately set its sights on women between the ages of 18 and 34, a group that had generally been ignored by facial care companies. The Pore Perfect strip was the centerpiece of this strategy. The company recognized that it was "a new brand in a world of giant manufacturers serving a very skeptical group of consumers," as Biore's marketing director, Jeff McCurrach, confessed to Brandweek. For this reason Biore adopted an innovative marketing approach to distinguish itself from its competitors.

Biore's Pore Perfect strip campaign eschewed glamorous models and avoided making sweeping claims. Instead, the component spots focused on the workings of the strip—showing it resting on a model's nose—and often portrayed the results of the product—blackheads adhering to the strip's surface. "We weren't just giving hope in a bottle," McCurrach stressed in the June 29, 1998, issue of Advertising Age. "We had a state-of-the-art product and we demonstrated the results," he added. "The first reaction is 'Oh, that's gross.' Then people realize they can really get their faces clean."

In addition to its print and television ads, Biore tried unconventional strategies that paid off handsomely. It signed up as a sponsor of Lilith Fair, a traveling music tour featuring all female performers that garnered a huge following among Biore's target audience. The company then deployed a battalion of company employees at every Lilith Fair event. Armed with spritz bottles and Pore Perfect, Biore's staff convinced a sizable number of women to try the product, and sales skyrocketed. In its first full year after the strip's introduction in the United States, Biore commanded an impressive 22.5 percent of the facial care market.

The rest of the industry recognized Biore's phenomenal debut and began to introduce more products designed to appeal to younger female consumers. Neutrogena Corp., a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson, was already a category leader when it released its Neutrogena Deep Clean cream cleanser to augment it full line of facial cleansers and moisturizers. Johnson & Johnson also produced its own full skin care line, called Clean & Clear. In addition, Procter & Gamble sought to reinvigorate its classic but tired Noxzema facial cleanser in 1999, especially by drawing consumers between the ages of 18 and 30 to the brand. The company launched the new line Noxzema Skin Fitness and supported it with a massive advertising campaign conceived by Leo Burnett. Aware that many of the young women it wanted to reach were athletic, Procter & Gamble used fitness themes to market the items. The campaign adopted the tag line "Feel Fitness within Every Inch of Your Skin," which was incorporated into television ads featuring personal trainer Kathy Kaehler as a spokesperson.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Despite the venerable pedigree of Pond's, Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments were a "latecomer to the category," noted Advertising Age. To break through the numerous advertisements of its competitors, Pond's counted on Ogilvy & Mather to formulate a campaign that would catch consumers' attention and carve out a niche for Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments, particularly among the coveted younger demographic group. To accomplish this goal, the company opted for visually arresting ads. As Women's Wear Daily remarked, the print executions had a "cleaner, more sophisticated look than [had] been associated with the brand in the past." Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments, looking more like a snack than a beauty product, were the center of the ads. The presentation was calculated to make consumers more receptive to the pads. "Food is the ultimate comfort area," a Pond's spokesperson told the Syracuse Post-Standard. "People always return to that."

The recurring image of cucumber slices was intended to resonate with consumers in other ways as well. "The sight of a woman relaxing with cucumber slices over her eyes has become a visual cliche of sorts, the image of the pampered spa guest," explained the Newark Star-Ledger in its October 18, 1998, edition. By tapping into this trend, Pond's could accomplish two goals. First, the pictures of cucumbers allowed the company to tap into an idyllic imagery that crossed generational lines. Consequently, it did not have to risk alienating one age group by keying the ads to the concerns of the other, for example, by focusing on wrinkles rather than acne. Second, the ambience of affluent luxury projected by the spa association could polish the entire Pond's brand, not just boost sales for an individual product.

To reach all segments of its target audience, the company placed the ads for Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments in a diverse array of magazines. Ads appeared in such cosmetic industry staples as Cosmopolitan, Elle, Glamour, and New Woman. In addition, Pond's recognized that many of the women it wanted to connect with were interested in health and fitness. Accordingly, the ads appeared in publications such as American Health, Shape, and Fitness. Pond's also wanted to be sure that it did not overlook its traditional consumers and therefore ran ads in Ladies' Home Journal, Good Housekeeping, McCall's, and Family Circle.

OUTCOME

For Pond's, Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments reinvigorated both its sales and image. Almost immediately, Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments became one of the 15 best-selling items in the skin care industry. The company's 1998 retail sales soared 169.9 percent over the year before, to reach a volume nearly four times its 1991 sales. The company's share of the facial care market in 1998 rose to 16.7 percent. Even more impressive was Advertising Age's assessment of June 28, 1999, that Pond's had captured the number two spot in the facial cleanser category (behind Biore but comfortably ahead of Noxzema) because of the blistering sales of Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments. Pond's reported that the product generated tremendous repeat business. In fact, retailers complained about being swamped with requests for Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments. Moreover, beauty magazine columnists lauded the product, both for its ability to diminish eye puffiness and because the process of applying the pads themselves was so relaxing.

The annual Cosmetic Executive Women Awards named Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments as the best mass-market skin care product of 1998.

Especially promising was the fact that the product had attracted consumers from a wide age range. Category director Indursky crowed to Women's Wear Daily that for the first time in eight years his company could claim that "no matter how old you are, Pond's has the skin care product for you." The company professed such delight with the results of the Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments campaign that it dedicated its largest marketing budget ever to the Pond's brand in 1999. With this allocation the company aimed to use Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments to make further inroads into the younger market. One month after the product hit retailers' shelves, Pond's debuted another new item, Cleansing and Make-Up Remover Towlettes, to follow in the pads' wake. Pond's also announced plans to introduce Clear Solutions, a skin care line specifically designed for younger women, in 1999.

FURTHER READING

"Biore: The Nose Knew at Lilith Fair." Chain Drug Review, September 28, 1998.

Brookman, Faye. "The Marketing 100: Biore Pore Perfect." Advertising Age, June 29, 1998.

———. "Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments." Advertising Age, June 28, 1999.

Cardona, Mercedes. "P&G Reclaims Noxzema Franchise with Fitness." Advertising Age, April 26, 1999.

———. "Pond's Courts Younger Women with New Line." Advertising Age, December 21, 1998.

"Facial Care Products." Brandweek, September 15, 1997.

Sloan, Pat, and Laura Petrecca. "Unilever Extends Pond's to Bodycare." Advertising Age, October 13, 1997.

Stith, Barbara. "Food for Your Face." Syracuse Post-Standard, November 10, 1998.

Tode, Chantal. "Pond's Finds Life after Cold Creams." Women's Wear Daily, November 6, 1999.

Rebecca Stanfel

United Airlines Corp.

1200 E. Algonquin Road
Elk Grove Township, Illinois 60007
USA
Telephone: (847) 700-4000
Fax: (847) 700-4081
Web site: www.united.com

■■■

IT'S TIME TO FLY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks crippled the airline industry in general and UAL Corporation's United Airlines in particular, forcing the company to file for bankruptcy in 2002. Though United was still the world's number two carrier in 2004, substantial obstacles lay along the airline's path back to profitability. Trying to reorganize and emerge from bankruptcy, United launched "It's Time to Fly," the airline's first branding campaign since 1999.

Conceived by United's agency of record, Fallon Worldwide of Minneapolis, "It's Time to Fly" targeted business travelers with animated TV commercials set to United's signature sound track, George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. Print, outdoor, and online advertising likewise used distinctive illustrations to communicate the campaign's key message: that United understood the lives of businesspeople. Focused primarily on hub cities Chicago, Denver, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C., "It's Time to Fly" likewise included innovative international components in London and Hong Kong.

One of the campaign's TV spots was nominated both for an Emmy Award and an Annie Award from the International Animated Film Society, and the stylishness of the campaign as a whole was a bright spot and a potentially significant step in the company's arduous struggle to remake itself for the future.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The early years of the new millennium were extremely difficult ones for airlines, and United had it tougher than most. In 2001 a proposed merger with U.S. Airways was blocked by antitrust regulators, and then two United jets were involved in the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that both changed global politics and left the airline industry in shambles. During the decline in air travel that followed the attacks, United had to lay off more than 20 percent of its employees and eliminate a substantial number of its flights. The airline lost $2.1 billion in 2001 and filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in late 2002. UAL progressively cut its workforce and instituted pay and benefit decreases during bankruptcy reorganization, and in late 2003 it launched a low-fare carrier, Ted (a shortened version of the brand name United), to compete with discount airlines such as Jet Blue and Southwest, whose lower fares had long spelled trouble for full-service airlines like United.

The airline's last branding campaign, "Rising," which ran in 1999, had been an ill-timed and poorly received attempt to convince consumers that the airline's best days were in front of it. The difficulties facing full-service airlines were at that time all too apparent, and UAL's growing operational and labor troubles—problems that contributed significantly to the company's eventual bankruptcy—already loomed on the horizon. After it filed for bankruptcy the company had an understandably modest advertising budget. Since 2002 United's advertising had been largely restricted to promotional and fare-sale efforts.

TARGET MARKET

"It's Time to Fly" was a global campaign that primarily targeted frequent business travelers, attempting to show them that United understood its role as a facilitator of their success. The tagline itself implicitly referred to the airline industry's recent troubles and emphasized the benefits of traveling for business purposes. As a company spokesperson told the Wall Street Journal, "It's Time to Fly" was "a call to action for our own employees and a call to action for our customers . . . it's time to get back to meeting face to face . . . we are ready when you are."

TV ads paired George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, which had been United's theme music since the 1980s, with animated storylines (free of dialogue) dramatizing the role that air travel played in the lives of businesspeople. "Interview," for instance, showed the importance of face-to-face meetings by dealing with the ups and downs of the job-interview process. In the commercial a man woke up early, fussed over his appearance, and caught a United flight to an out-of-town interview, only to realize, on the elevator just before meeting his prospective employers, that he was wearing one brown shoe and one black shoe. He was dejected after the interview until he got a call on his cell phone informing him that the job was his. On the United flight home he napped with a smile on his face, and a flight attendant thoughtfully pulled down the window shade. Meanwhile, "A Life" traced the life and retirement of a business traveler in 60 seconds, during the course of which he traveled for both business and pleasure. This illustrated not only the business traveler's dependence on United but the seamless integration of all phases of his life, made possible by the airline's worldwide presence. The music in each commercial mirrored the ups and downs of the lives and situations being featured, and it was only interrupted at the end of each spot by the voice of Robert Redford intoning, "Where you go in life is up to you. There's an airline that can take you there—United. It's time to fly."

Print ads similarly employed illustrations, some of which had been conceived as original artwork for the New Yorker magazine, and again the intent was to show business travelers that United understood them and the role that flying played in their lives. In one, a man ascending at a subway stop found himself emerging into a literal jungle. The accompanying copy read, "You didn't get where you were going by finding the most comfortable spot in the office." Other print ads communicated United's role in the business traveler's lifestyle with messages such as "Let's face it. It's hard to climb the corporate ladder without going up 30,000 feet" and "Business is a series of battles. We make the chariots."

HOW DID THEY DO THAT?

To create the United spot "Interview," Academy Award–nominated animation partners Wendy Tilby and Amanda Forbis used the same process they had used in their acclaimed short film, "When the Day Breaks." First they shot digital-camera footage of their friends and neighbors realistically performing the roles in the film, and then they edited the story using the software programs iMovie and After Effects. Using the animation program Flash, they made computer drawings on top of the real-life scenes before printing out the images and painting them by hand. Among Tilby and Forbis's chief worries during this process was the possibility that the main character looked too much like the actor Ben Affleck. To correct this potential pitfall the animators altered and exaggerated the main character's features.

COMPETITION

United was number two among air carriers during the "It's Time to Fly" campaign. American Airlines, owned by AMR Corporation of Fort Worth, Texas, was the world's number one airline, and Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines was number three. Like United, both of these companies had been posting heavy losses and had been advertising only minimally in the years since the terrorist attacks of September 11. Both, likewise, had flirted with bankruptcy and were in the process of downsizing as a means of moving back toward profitability.

In 2004 American, like United, launched a branding campaign for the first time in several years. American's "Something Special in the Air" commercials had stopped airing in the late 1990s, and a brand campaign had been in development when American lost two of its planes in the September 11 attacks. (American then lost a third plane in a November 2001 crash.) Following on the heels of near-bankruptcy, layoffs, and restructuring, the 2004 campaign, called "Tickets to Life," attempted to show that American was the carrier with the best understanding of its customers. Each of the campaign's four TV spots featured a passenger heading to or from an important event, the significance of which an American Airlines employee clairvoyantly understood, and each ended with the tagline, "We know why you fly." The branding effort's estimated 18-month price tag was $60 million.

Delta Air Lines remained on the brink of bankruptcy through 2004, with high fuel prices and labor costs prolonging its difficulties and forcing it to cut jobs and reduce expenses. Its plan to stay aloft in the coming years included expanding its presence at several airports and expanding its low-fare subsidiary, Song, launched in 2003. In 2004 Delta ran an integrated campaign on behalf of its flagship brand, featuring an emphasis on its recently expanded operations at New York's JFK Airport. As part of the New York effort Delta unveiled a 30-story mural designed by artist Bruce McCall, best known for his contributions to the New Yorker. It also decorated Mini Coopers like Delta jets and employed drivers and street crews to engage passersby with a range of promotional offers.

Dallas-based Southwest Airlines was the only major airline in America to maintain its full flight schedule and to avoid employee layoffs in the aftermath of September 11. Its straightforward business strategy allowed it to remain profitable despite the overwhelming problems plaguing the rest of the industry. Southwest kept costs to a minimum through its exclusive use of one type of aircraft, the Boeing 737, its focus on short flights and small airports, and its no-assigned-seats policy. The airline, which had begun as a regional carrier, took advantage of its competitors' cutbacks by expanding during the industry downturn, adding direct international flights and adding to its East-Coast presence with service to Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"It's Time to Fly" was launched on February 18, 2004, with a print ad in the Wall Street Journal. The print ads, numbering 10 in all, used illustrations by New Yorker contributors such as Carter Goodrich, Rea Irvin, and Charles Martin. Other publications selected for the print run, which continued throughout 2004, were the New York Times Magazine, Time, Newsweek, BusinessWeek, Fortune, and Fast Company.

A total of four TV spots headlined the campaign. The first, "Interview," broke in United's hub markets during the Academy Awards telecast on February 29, 2004. The TV spots, each of which was scripted by Fallon and paired with a version of Rhapsody in Blue, were crafted by award-winning animators, who were given a choice of scripts and allowed substantial creative freedom. Academy Award–winning animators Aleksandr Petrov and Michael Dudok de Wit designed "A Life" and "Rose," respectively; while Academy Award–nominees Wendy Tilby and Amanda Forbis animated "Interview," and two-time Academy Award–nominee Joanna Quinn animated "Lightbulb." Each spot was dialogue-free, with the on-screen action tied to the ebb and flow of the Gershwin song, and each included the closing voice-over by Robert Redford. TV placements beyond the Oscar-night launch included hub-market buys during national events, including the U.S. Open golf tournament and national cable programming that tended to interest business travelers, such as CNN Headline News, CNBC's Squawk Box, and A&E's Biography.

Outdoor ads ran on billboards in Chicago and Los Angeles, featuring similarly distinctive illustrations that supported the overall look of the campaign. An online campaign—United's first—focused on British business travelers, targeting U.K.-based websites with a high concentration of business traffic. United and Fallon targeted London commuters in the Bank Underground station, inserting panels down a 160-yard length of station corridor to duplicate the appearance of a plane's interior. Views of scenery en route to New York or San Francisco from London were visible beyond the make-believe windows. United and Fallon likewise utilized Hong Kong's MTR underground system, installing backlit images along 300 yards of wall space between subway stations to create an effect comparable to that of a cartoon flip book. The resulting 20-second "movie" simulated a flight from Hong Kong to Chicago, showing views of both cities and both airports along with views visible along the way.

The global media campaign was also synchronized with in-house efforts aimed at bringing United's various operations together under a strengthened brand image. These efforts included a new look for the planes' exteriors. A blue-and-white paint job replaced United's predominantly gray livery and complemented the look of the company's just-commissioned Ted planes.

OUTCOME

"It's Time to Fly" attracted admiring press coverage and made United, according to Advertising Age's Bob Garfield, "the most elegantly advertised" airline of the time period. The TV commercial "Interview" was named a Shoot magazine "Top Spot" in April 2004, was one of five nominees for an Emmy Award for best prime-time commercial, and was one of five spots nominated in the advertising category of the International Animated Film Society's Annie Awards.

The favorable attention did not translate into profitability for the airline, however. UAL kept struggling through 2004. In 2005 the company continued to trim expenses, winning permission to default on its employee pension plans and announcing that some among its senior management team would take a 15 percent salary cut. Pilots saw increased flying time and other benefit reductions, as the company considered another round of major layoffs.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Ailing Delta Draws Attention to NY Hub." Brandweek, July 12, 2004.

"Campaign: United 'It's Time To Fly.' " Creativity, April 2005.

Carey, Susan. "United Airlines Paints New Image with Ads, Its Jets." Wall Street Journal, February 18, 2004.

Carpenter, Dave. "United Airlines Flies New Advertising Campaign, New Colors." Marketing News, March 15, 2004.

Champagne, Christine. "United Airlines Ad Illustrates the Benefits of Flying." Shoot, April 2, 2004.

DeSalvo, Kathy. "Top of the Crop." Shoot, August 20, 2004.

Garfield, Bob. "Beleaguered United May Find Relief with Simple, Artful Ads." Advertising Age, March 8, 2004.

———, "Ten Ads I Loved." Advertising Age, December 20, 2004.

Goldrich, Robert. "Six Appeal." Shoot, August 20, 2004.

Janoff, Barry. "Flying Faster than the Speed of Light (Bulbs)." Brandweek, March 22, 2004.

Madden, Normandy, and Laurel Wentz. "Spotlight." Advertising Age, May 10, 2004.

Sudhaman, Arun. "United Campaign Ahead of Pack on Tracks." Media Asia, May 7, 2004.

Takaki, Millie. "Annie, You're Your TV Spot Nominations." Shoot, December 17, 2004.

Trottman, Melanie. "American Air Plans 'Tickets to Life' Ad Pitch." Wall Street Journal, September 10, 2004.

"UA Targets Business Travellers via Online Fallon Ad Campaign." Campaign, June 4, 2004.

Mark Lane

RISING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

"Fly the Friendly Skies" had been a stalwart slogan for United Airlines since 1966, but as legions of business travelers could attest, the skies became increasingly unfriendly in the 1990s. The airline industry developed a decidedly negative public image because of deregulation, delayed takeoffs, lost baggage, cramped seating, and unsatisfactory customer service. A subsidiary of the UAL Corporation, United Airlines was the world's largest carrier, and its executives felt compelled to turn a new face toward fed-up consumers. After an exhaustive consumer research study, the airline began to revamp its positioning. United released "Rising," a campaign that acknowledged the lack of quality in the industry with a message promising to make things better. The airline hoped that such an honest approach would gain it consumers' trust and increase business.

Created by the ad agency Fallon McElligott, the $140 million print and television campaign debuted on May 22, 1997. Marketing experts initially called the campaign bold because it was the first in the airline industry to acknowledge the "rising" dissatisfaction flyers felt with all carriers. Instead of saturating viewers with the industry's advertising stereotypes—images of contented passengers headed (on time) for exotic locales while enjoying gourmet in-flight meals—the United campaign admitted that customers had a right to resent poor service and vowed to do whatever it took to satisfy the customer. The voice-over for one spot remarked, "If Orville and Wilbur had to go through what you do just to fly, they would have stayed in the bicycle business." After United employees and ad critics later criticized the campaign's condescension, the strategy shifted to a more ambiguous, uplifting message. The campaign concluded in late 1999.

During the later half of "Rising," the net income for United dipped to $187 million in 1999 from $218 million the year before. At first the campaign fared well, even garnering a few ad-industry awards. During its last year, however, ad critics ruthlessly discredited the campaign for promising something that United ultimately never delivered.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The world's leading passenger air carrier, United was also one of the oldest major airlines. In 1929 United Aircraft and Transport was formed by the partnership of aircraft designer William Boeing and engine designer Fred Rentschler. Then based in New York, the startup company—renamed United Airlines in 1931—was the first carrier to offer coast-to-coast services. By 1934 a reorganization brought United's transportation headquarters to Chicago, where it remained.

United was the largest business under the umbrella of parent company UAL Corporation, which also operated subsidiaries that included Apollo Travel Services, Galileo International Partnership, Shuttle by United, and United Express. In 1997 UAL formed the Star Alliance partnership with international airlines including Germany's Lufthansa, Scandinavian Airlines System (SAS), Air Canada, and Thai Airways to further increase international business. With hubs in Chicago, Denver, San Francisco, Tokyo, and Washington, D.C., United delivered passengers to 140 destinations worldwide; its fleet of 50 jumbo jets was among the industry's largest.

Though not known for technical innovation (United's first foray into jet service in 1959 trailed that of competitor American Airlines), the company parlayed partnerships, acquisitions, and a reputation for customer service to grow into the world's leading air carrier. During the 1960s and 1970s new management brought related industries into the fold. Hotels, car rental services, and a computer reservation company at one time were part of the company briefly known as the Allegis Corporation, whose goal was to become a travel conglomerate. But with the 1987 resignation of CEO Richard Ferris, the revamped UAL sold off the non-core acquisitions to focus on the core business of delivering ''the friendly skies.''

By the 1990s changes in the airline industry brought a proliferation of new names to airports across the United States, cutting into United's profits. In addition, skyrocketing fuel oil prices and a recession brought fierce cost-cutting measures from large and small carriers. Seeking a new way of doing business, United sought a union buyout in 1993. Losing almost $800 million a year, the company was forced to lay off thousands of employees and cut management salaries. Conflicts with pilots, machinists, and flight attendants continued to threaten UAL's operations until 1994, when stockholders approved an employee purchase of the company in exchange for almost $5 billion in wage concessions. With United employees holding 55 percent of the stock, the air carrier was among the world's largest employee-owned publicly traded companies.

But growth came at a cost. Deregulation and ''fare wars'' were bringing more people into airports, resulting in overbooked flights and crowded runways. Something had to give, and for the typical high-volume business traveler—United's target customer—that something was reliable service. Research revealed that United's passengers considered the airline no more capable of delivering ''friendly skies'' than its competition. So in 1997 UAL retired its venerable slogan (and its longtime ad agency) to establish a new image. The Minneapolis agency Fallon McElligott was charged with creating a campaign that would speak to U.S. business travelers on their own terms.

INTERNATIONAL ENDORSERS

Marlon Brando's voice-over in United Airline's international commercials represented a trend among high-profile actors. These celebrities, who may not otherwise have compromised their A-list integrity by making American commercials, appeared in or provided voice-over work for advertising spots screened exclusively overseas. Some of the more notable commercial stars included Woody Allen, Jodie Foster, and Leonardo DiCaprio.

TARGET MARKET

United's core customer was the business traveler; such customers constituted 9 percent of United's passengers yet provided 44 percent of the airline's revenue. With its large fleet and service to major business centers, United had a great investment in this customer category and could not afford to alienate the frequent flyer, who also tended to be among United's most vocal critics. These travelers valued reliable takeoffs, comfortable travel, and easy access, all of which the airline industry was hard-pressed to deliver during the 1990s.

The recreational traveler was not ignored; print ads highlighted pleasurable upgrades such as improved meals and the addition of Starbucks coffee to in-flight service. An Advertising Age report also noted that United had ''become the first major airline to advertise specifically to the 'gay market' by adding a gay-oriented magazine to its 'Rising' print media plan.''

COMPETITION

In the growing universe of passenger carriers, United had to compete not only with major names like Delta, Trans World Airline (TWA), Continental, and Northwest but also with smaller or regional/international names such as America West, Virgin Group, Japan Air Lines, Italy's Alitalia, British Airways, and New Zealand's Kiwi Air Lines. United's major competitor, Delta Airlines, introduced its own new advertising slogan in 1997. Delta's ''On top of the world,'' meant to reinforce good impressions of flying, was more in keeping with the kind of advertising traditional to the airlines market. In a 1997 J.D. Power & Associates survey, United finished with a ''below average'' rating among commercial airlines for flights under 500 miles. For flights longer than 500 miles, the company landed in third place behind Continental and TWA.

Competition outside of the airline industry included regional and national rail and bus lines, such as Amtrak and Greyhound. Some people chose to travel by train or bus because they were put off by the cost or inconvenience of airlines or because of fear of flying.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Prior to the ''Rising'' campaign United invested hundreds of millions in improving and upgrading its equipment, from ordering more wide-bodied Boeing 777s to redesigning each airline seat for the comfort of the passenger. In early 1997 the ad agency Fallon McElligott began talking to United's target customers. The answers they received were eye-opening, said Fallon planning director Rob White in a Chicago Tribune article. According to frequent business flyers—"road warriors," as they were dubbed—the idea of an airline turning around its service overnight was unfathomable. "They were telling us that we have to spend time in purgatory first," White said. "You can't just go from hell to heaven without a stop in between." A proposed campaign based on sarcastic humor did not go over well. Other storyboards showing superior customer service were dismissed as containing undeliverable claims.

"Then," reported the Tribune article, "the agency struck gold." A focus-group meeting of frequent flyers of all airlines revealed layers of resentment and frustration over poor customer service. What if United, instead of trying to counter those opinions, agreed with them? That idea "just resonated with people," said White, and the $140 million "Rising" campaign was born.

With "Rising" United took the unorthodox step of acknowledging that air travel had become more stressful of late. One commercial reenacted the Wright Brothers' historic first flight of 1912—except that the brothers were now plagued with modern-day delays. Meanwhile, a voice-over remarked, "If Orville and Wilbur had to go through what you do just to fly, they would have stayed in the bicycle business." In another commercial less-than-appetizing airline food was the focus. And in a third spot United employees who had assembled for the start of a six a.m. meeting were left waiting—chagrined and confused—when the meeting leader intentionally showed up late. The purpose was to remind the staff how their passengers felt during delays and other travel-related frustrations. "Air travel needs to be easier, more professional, especially for the people who do it most," noted the voice-over in one spot. "Now it will be, because, compared to the rest of the industry, United Airlines is headed in a different direction." Each commercial ended with the tagline "United Airlines. Rising."

The theme was taken up not only in broadcast spots but also in print ads. One ad touted United as "a better way for cynics to travel," while another mocked traditional airline advertising by asking, "Wouldn't it be great if we could all fly commercials?" Even United's 1997 annual report replaced corporate "silver linings" with featured letters from unsatisfied customers, along with replies from the company on its plans for improving poor service.

Internationally "Rising" broke in United's Latin American, Asian, and European markets in October 1997. Notable in these spots was the voice-over of actor Marlon Brando in his first television commercials. The strategy was to "tackle perceived low-brand awareness overseas, where our image is either confused or nonexistent," said the company's international advertising manager in an Advertising Age piece. He added that, outside the United States, American-based airlines "tend to be lumped together. We're seeking to stand out."

The international campaign was produced by the global ad agency Young & Rubicam, with creative treatments centered less on acknowledging customer dissatisfaction than on showing the history and resources of this major air carrier. One television spot began with a little boy playing with a model airplane while behind him rose images of vintage aircraft through the years, culminating in a new Boeing 777. As Advertising Age continued, "Print ads focus on the particulars of the airline, such as the one that shows a hand-written pie chart explaining, 'You've got $710 million to improve the life of the business traveler. How do you spend it?'"

Near the end of 1998 the campaign's creators changed strategies after months of criticism. Ad critics attacked "Rising" for advertising the faults of an industry that United dominated and then for never setting a high-water mark for service after promising improvement. On January 2, 1999, the "Rising" campaign was modified to advertise United's advantages instead of industry shortcomings. One spot, titled "Dreamer," featured a United jetliner taking off and magically transforming into a child's toy. Similar spots followed. In one a United jet was shown integrating into a flying flock of geese; in another commercial, titled "Circus," the United aircraft blended into a Cirque du Soleil dance troupe. Despite Fallon's attempt to improve the campaign, the 1999 spots were accused of being vague and not adding to United's brand. One print ad featured the text "Rising is astonishing. Rising is imagination. Rising is borderless and big. Rising is go. Rising is unstoppable. Rising is performance. Rising is leading the way."

OUTCOME

United executives were initially pleased with the campaign. In a press release United senior vice president David Coltman announced, "Our TravelTrak scores rating 'customer preference' have risen over the past year. Similarly, our high-yield revenue numbers have steadily improved, so it appears the Rising campaign is having the desired impact on our target audience." United's sales were up 6 percent in 1997. The campaign collected a Gold EFFIE Award for most effective campaign in the transportation category. The Chicago American Marketing Association gave "Rising" its Champs Gold Medal Award for marketplace effectiveness. The campaign also earned two certificates of excellence for creativity in public relations.

Among the advertising community, reaction to the unconventional "Rising" ranged from admiring to skeptical. "Inspired and inspiring—in addition to being risky bordering on reckless" is how an Advertising Age reviewer characterized the campaign. "It's easy enough to identify the problems," the article continued. "With clever advertising such as this, it's also easy to persuade viewers you're solving them . . . The trick—not on the airwaves but in the air—is to prove that you weren't lying. Every testy gate agent or ill-explained cancellation will turn 'Rising' into an ugly joke that rebounds on United."

Unfortunately for United, sales dipped from $218 million in 1998 to $187 million in 1999. During the campaign's final year, ad critics united against it. In June the ad critic David Snyder wrote in Crain's Chicago Business, ". . . the whole 'Rising' theme is flawed. Saying you're rising implies that you were schlock before, but now are really trying to make things better. Hardly a leadership position for the world's largest airline."

Despite dropping sales and a lack of fanfare, United executives stood by the campaign. John Kiker, United's vice president for advertising and communications, said in Adweek (Midwest edition), "We don't regret [the campaign] at all. It did us a lot of good and helped us learn what we needed to improve on." The executive admitted in the same January 10, 2000, publication that the message behind the campaign was too lofty for most consumers. A few days earlier, in an interview with the New York Times, Kiker said, "In all honesty, senior management's opinion is that 'Rising' did us a lot of good. . . . It was interesting, intriguing and made us focus on what we had to fix. But employees felt it laid a lot of blame on them and that was unfortunate." Fallon released a new campaign for United in January 2000.

FURTHER READING

"Ad Agencies Rise to United's Challenge." Chicago Tribune, June 15, 1997.

Baar, Aaron. "How Fallon Got United's Blessing." Adweek (New England ed.), January 29, 2001, p. 6.

"Candid Ads Acknowledge Consumers Are Dissatisfied with Air Travel." M2 Presswire, May 23, 1997.

Comerford, Mike. "Red Ink, Blue Skies." Arlington Heights (IL) Daily Herald, February 19, 2004, p. 1.

"Curtain to Rise on United Airlines' New 'Rising' Ad Campaign." PR Newswire, May 22, 1997.

Garcia, Sandra. "Rising to the Occasion." Shoot, December 7, 2001, p. 32.

Garfield, Bob. "Beleaguered United May Find Relief with Simple, Artful Ads." Advertising Age, March 8, 2004, p. 53.

"New Delta Ads Can't Stay Afloat; United 'Rising' Hinges on Service." Advertising Age, May 26, 1997.

"United Ads Mark a Bold Departure." Houston Chronicle, May 25, 1997.

"United Is 1st Major Airline to Target Gays." Advertising Age, June 2, 1997.

"United's 'Rising' Theme Expands to International Campaign." Advertising Age, September 15, 1997.

"When Ads Get Creative, Some Click, Some Bomb." USA Today, December 15, 1997.

Susan Salter
Kevin Teague

TED LAUNCH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 UAL Corp.'s United Airlines was forced into bankruptcy by years of dwindling profits compounded by the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, which left the airline industry in disarray. Though United remained the world's number two carrier, it faced particularly daunting challenges as a full-service airline, given the growing consumer shift to low-fare, one-class airlines. A critical part of the company's strategy for exiting bankruptcy, then, was the launch of a low-fare subbrand called Ted, whose name was derived from the last three letters of the flagship brand. Rather than advertising the new brand with a costly, full-scale traditional campaign, UAL and its agency of record, Fallon Worldwide of Minneapolis, targeted Ted's future home base of Denver, Colorado, in a self-described guerrilla campaign revolving around the Ted name.

The teaser campaign, which was launched on October 29, 2003, was meant to introduce the Ted personality even as Denver and the wider world were kept in the dark as to Ted's identity, and United successfully kept its secret through most of the two weeks between the marketing launch and the new carrier's official unveiling. Ted claimed responsibility for random acts of kindness, such as the delivery of flowers to a Denver hospital, and actors on Segway scooters wore signs reading, "I'm not Ted." A website featuring cryptic messages from Ted was established, and Ted was spelled out in enormous sod letters in a farmer's field near Denver. After the launch the offbeat tone of the Ted personality was extended to a radio campaign purporting to chronicle the search for a Ted spokesperson. This campaign moved to television in 2005.

The guerrilla campaign effectively attracted media attention, and Ted grew according to schedule in its first year. United claimed, at the one-year anniversary of Ted's first flight, that the brand had exceeded company expectations, and Ted's flight schedule continued to grow as United struggled to exit bankruptcy protection.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the late 1990s Dallas-based Southwest Airlines Company expanded into a national industry force, attracting passengers with its consistently low fares and on-time departures and arrivals. Southwest was able to keep prices low thanks largely to a straightforward business strategy calling for the exclusive use of one type of aircraft (the Boeing 737), a focus on short flights and small airports, one-class service, and a no-assigned-seats policy. A host of new airlines copied and modified Southwest's business model even as the original low-fare airline expanded. By the turn of the millennium, traditional full-service carriers, unable to match the fares of these new competitors, were struggling to remain profitable. United, which had a 70 percent route overlap with low-fare carriers, was particularly vulnerable in the evolving airline marketplace.

Airlines experienced unprecedented challenges in 2001, and United had it tougher than most. A proposed merger with U.S. Airways was blocked by antitrust regulators, and then two United jets were involved in the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, which, while changing global politics, left the airline industry in shambles. During the decline in air travel that followed the attacks, United had to lay off more than 20 percent of its employees and eliminate a substantial number of its flights. The airline lost $2.1 billion in 2001 and filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in late 2002. UAL progressively cut its workforce and instituted pay and benefit decreases during bankruptcy reorganization.

In the fall of 2003 United prepared to launch a low-fare carrier called Ted (a shortened version of the brand name United), to begin flying in February 2004. Based in Denver and primarily servicing leisure destinations, Ted was a critical component of United's strategy for the future. Though skeptics pointed to UAL's own previous unsuccessful attempt to launch a low-fare subbrand, the Shuttle by United, as well as to a similar failed attempt by Continental Airlines, UAL planned to expand Ted's fleet from an initial 4 aircraft to 45 within a year. Ultimately UAL projected a Ted fleet of 156 planes.

TARGET MARKET

UAL and its primary advertising agency, Fallon Worldwide, set out to establish a unique personality for the Ted brand while acknowledging, through the very name of the discount carrier, its connection to parent airline United. With a promise to keep last-minute one-way fares below $299, Ted appealed to business travelers, who buy the majority of plane tickets on short notice, but the Denver-based carrier's primary focus was on markets with a large percentage of leisure travelers (such as Orlando, New Orleans, Las Vegas, Phoenix, San Francisco, and Los Angeles). Ted therefore sought to establish an image of friendliness and approachability. As Fallon creative director Bruce Bildsten told Brandweek.com, "When people fly on leisure the flight is actually part of the vacation experience. They want to have a fun time on the flight so the experience on Ted is going to be in line with the mentality of the people taking the trip."

The advertising supporting the Ted launch was, accordingly, offbeat and untraditional. Two weeks prior to the announcement of the carrier's launch, Fallon enlisted guerilla-marketing specialists in Ted's hometown of Denver, allowing United to conceal its role in an unbranded teaser campaign meant to introduce the Ted personality. The teaser campaign, which, according to Bildsten, was "about being friendly and doing good things in the community in a way that endear [sic] the airline to the community rather than imposing on it," featured stealthy acts of kindness supposedly committed by someone named Ted as well as numerous mysterious appearances of the Ted name. Throughout the teaser campaign United kept its connection to Ted secret, leaving Denver residents to guess the identity and significance of the Ted personality.

COMPETITION

Though United was the number two airline in the world, the creation of Ted was a response not to its traditional rivals but to smaller low-fare carriers, whose robust growth had been achieved at the expense of the major full-service airlines, all of which were struggling. Southwest was America's low-fare leader, and JetBlue Airways Corp. (based in Forest Hills, New York) was a rising star in the expanding subsector. Among the leading traditional airlines, only Atlanta's Delta Air Lines, Inc., had an existing low-fare subsidiary.

Southwest was the only major airline in America to maintain its full flight schedule and to avoid employee layoffs in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. The airline took advantage of its competitors' cutbacks by expanding during the industry downturn, adding direct international flights and adding to its East Coast presence with service to Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. Southwest was also the airline industry's biggest advertiser, supplementing local fare-oriented advertising with national branding work. The airline ran branding campaigns focused on its NFL and NHL sponsorships, while also continuing to update its long-running "Wanna Get Away?" campaign. In keeping with Southwest's friendly, fun-loving image, "Wanna Get

NEW CARRIER, OLD PROBLEMS

United Airlines had a history of labor-relations difficulties prior to the Ted launch, and a new chapter in that history threatened to tarnish Ted's introductory flights. Having laid off a substantial portion of its workforce as a part of bankruptcy reorganization, United enticed 2,500 flight attendants into early retirement in the summer of 2003. When, about a month before Ted was scheduled to begin flying in February 2004, the company announced that it needed retirees to pay higher premiums for health care than had been agreed upon months earlier, the retirees claimed that they had been induced to retire under the assumption that their health-care benefits would not be changed. The Association of Flight Attendants organized picketing at airports and public events and ran advertisements that lampooned the new United subbrand, such as "UniTED cheaTED its Retirees."

Away?" featured individuals who, after becoming involved in extremely embarrassing situations, had a clear, humorous motivation for wanting to get away. In 2003 Southwest expanded its sports branding work with a campaign surrounding its newly minted sponsorship of the NBA.

JetBlue, operating out of New York's JFK airport, adapted the one-class ticketing and short-haul model introduced by Southwest and achieved profitability soon after its February 2000 launch. Modifying the Southwest model by offering assigned seats as well as seatback satellite television and by flying more than one type of plane in order to serve smaller markets more efficiently, JetBlue, like Southwest, capitalized on the industry behemoths' troubles by expanding each year following its launch. Among JetBlue's advertising was a campaign of "mockumentaries" satirizing traditional airline advertising. For instance, a pilot being interviewed said, in one commercial, "The whole plane wanted to go to California." The documentary interviewer asked, "What did you do?" and the pilot answered, with mock earnestness, "We took 'em." Similarly, in another scene, a flight attendant proclaimed, "A woman asked me for a soda, so I gave it to her. With ice." JetBlue thereby positioned itself as a new alternative to an airline culture in which competitors congratulated themselves for doing jobs that should be taken for granted.

Delta, meanwhile, remained on the brink of bankruptcy through 2004, with high fuel prices and labor costs prolonging its difficulties and forcing it to cut jobs and reduce expenses. Its plan to stay aloft in the coming years included expanding its presence at several airports and expanding its low-fare subsidiary, Song, launched in 2003. Song did only minimal marketing during its rollout. Delta planned to wait until Song reached its first-year goal of 144 flights daily before choosing a full-time advertising agency for the account.

MARKETING STRATEGY

On September 30, 2003, UAL notified Fallon executives about its plans to launch Ted and asked the agency to begin work on a buzz marketing campaign preparatory to the November announcement of the new carrier's launch. As Fallon's account director for United, Alex Leikh, told Advertising Age, "A week later we had 60 to 65 pieces of creative on the table, from teaser print ads to outdoor boards, and a week after that we came back with another 150 pieces." Fallon contracted with a guerilla-marketing firm in Denver and made sure to keep its fingerprints off the campaign in order to preserve the mystery of Ted's identity. "There's been a lot of cynicism about low-cost airlines," Leikh said, "so United decided to introduce it directly to the consumer." The teaser campaign was launched on October 29 in Denver, Ted's home base.

The campaign attempted to generate as much interest as possible with what was clearly a small budget. Actors, sometimes riding Segway scooters, carried signs reading "I'm not Ted" on Denver streets, while flowers were sent to hospital patients and a restaurant full of diners were treated to dessert, both courtesy of Ted. At sporting events Ted was wished happy birthday, and Ted was spelled out with gigantic sod letters in a field near Denver. A website, www.meetted.com, accompanied the campaign, offering mysterious messages including, "Here's to friends who answer the phone at 3 a.m." and "Here's to movies with orangutans." The campaign ran for two weeks, and on November 12 United confirmed the gradually building suspicions of media outlets like the Denver Post, announcing details of Ted's business strategy as well as setting February 12, 2004, as the date for its first flights.

As Ted began flying, United and Fallon added a radio campaign touting a fictional search for a Ted spokesperson. In addition to Denver the radio campaign ran in Chicago and Washington, D.C., United hub cities added to Ted's service roster following the carrier's successful launch. In 2005 the spokesperson search moved to television, with nine 30-second spots filmed on location in Las Vegas and Miami and featuring real people selected on the street by Fallon's creative team. The supposed aspiring spokespersons were shown on camera responding to cues given by improvisational comedian Jonathan Mangum. In one a man with a metal detector said, "If you don't want to keep hunting for fares, go to flyted.com." In another, Mangum asked a self-described ventriloquist to explain, in a British accent, that Ted does not charge booking fees. The TV spots ran on cable and network stations in Denver.

OUTCOME

The teaser campaign on behalf of Ted achieved its goal of attracting the attention of consumers and the media prior to the Ted launch. United announced the successful rollout of its initial 196 daily flights on August 11, 2004. Sean Donohue, vice president of Ted, said, "We've received strong endorsements from customers, outpaced our goals for on-time departures and arrivals, had positive financial performance and made significant competitive inroads in the markets we serve." By Ted's first anniversary the airline's number of daily flights had grown to 208, and United claimed solid market share gains, which it attributed to the addition of its low-fare carrier. As Donohue said in a company press release, "Ted has met or exceeded all of our expectations . . . Financially Ted delivered strong year-over-year margin improvement driven by an increase in both United elite customers as well as new customers to the airline." Ted continued to expand through 2005, though United had not yet found its way out of bankruptcy.

FURTHER READING

Allison, Melissa, and Susan Chandler. "United's Future Flies with Ted: Discount Airline Begins Operations on Thursday." Chicago Tribune, February 8, 2004.

Baar, Aaron. "Fallon, Ted Move Talent Search to TV." Adweek.com, May 20, 2005.

———. "United Sets Offbeat Intro for Low-Cost Carrier." Adweek.com, November 10, 2003.

Beirne, Mike. "Southwest Airlines Flies Campaign, Profits as Competition Hits Turbulence." Brandweek, April 28, 2003.

Cameron, Doug. "United Denies 'Ted' Reports." Financial Times (London), November 11, 2003.

Carey, Susan. "The Importance of Not Being Earnest—JetBlue Spoofs Commercials of Rivals, but Airline Says Spots Aren't Mean-Spirited." Wall Street Journal, June 5, 2003.

———. "Meet Ted, United's Low-Fare Carrier." Wall Street Journal, November 12, 2003.

Griffin, Greg. "United Airlines Likely behind Quirky 'Ted' Marketing Ploy in Denver." Denver Post, November 7, 2003.

Lewis, Al. "The Denver Post Al Lewis Column." Denver Post, November 16, 2003.

Thomaselli, Rich. "Delta Takes Low-Key Ad Approach to Low-Cost Carrier." Advertising Age, May 5, 2003.

———. "United, Fallon Go Stealthy to Intro Low-Cost Carrier." Advertising Age, November 17, 2003.

"United Airlines Says Ted Is Good to Go." Brandweek.com, November 18, 2003.

"United Battles Attendants Union." Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2004.

"United's Low-Cost Ted Completes Rollout." Airports, August 17, 2004.

Wilcha, Kristin. "Ted Searches for New Spokesperson among Real People." Shoot, June 3, 2005.

Mark Lane

United Distillers and Vintners of North America

750 E. Main Street
Stamford, Connecticut 06902-3845
USA
Telephone: (203) 602-5000
Web site: www.stoli.com

■■■

RUSSIAN ART CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Non-Russian drinkers of vodka might not have been familiar with the names of artists such as Kamalova, Shakirov, or Volcov, but most people would recognize the name Gorbachev. Besides belonging to the former president of the Soviet Union, the name also belonged to a Russian artist, Mikhail's nephew Yuri, who was nicknamed the ''Russian Rousseau.'' Hoping to translate name recognition into sales, the Russian distiller Stolichnaya commissioned the artist to produce a work combining references to its vodka (nicknamed Stoli) with a Christmas theme for the holiday installment of its ''Russian Art'' advertising campaign.

Yuri Gorbachev responded with a painting titled ''The Russian Country,'' which featured a Stolichnaya bottle riding in a sleigh. The ''Russian Art'' campaign, introduced in 1997, was created by Stolichnaya's advertising agency, Margeotes/Fertitta & Partners of New York. It played off an ongoing ad campaign launched in 1980 by rival vodka Absolut, a Swedish product, that featured the instantly recognizable shape of an Absolut bottle as rendered by famous artists like Andy Warhol and Keith Haring. But the objective of the Stolichnaya campaign differed significantly from Absolut's goal. Whereas Absolut sought to extend its reputation for sophistication by depicting its bottle as a work of art, Stolichnaya sought to ground its own brand in its Russian roots through the work of contemporary Russian artists. Further accentuating its Russian heritage, Stolichnaya sponsored the maintenance of four Russian-made Mikoyan-Gurevich (MiG) fighter jets in 1999. Adorned with Stolichnaya's logo, the Cold War jets appeared in air shows across America. The campaign ended in early 2001.

''Russian Art'' helped Stolichnaya stop a sales decline that had begun in the early 1990s. In 1999 sales of Stolichnaya increased to 1.3 million cases, which was significantly greater than the 1.1 million posted in 1996. At the campaign's conclusion Stolichnaya reigned as the number one vodka brand worldwide and second in America only to Absolut.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

According to Russians, vodka, whose name was a Russian diminutive that might be translated as ''little water'' or ''water of life,'' originated in the twelfth century. Distilled from grain, beets, or potatoes, vodka was described by the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations as ''neutral spirits so distilled . . . as to be without distinctive character, aroma, taste or color.'' Rival brand Smirnoff took advantage of this designation in its first advertising campaign in 1946 with the tagline ''It leaves you breathless,'' highlighting the ''no taste, no smell'' advantage of vodka over other spirits that left their mark on the breath of the drinker. There were a number of quality gradations in the vodka market, and Stolichnaya, produced in five distilleries in Russia for export, asserted its superior quality by stressing its Russian status.

Stolichnaya's ad agency, Margeotes/Fertitta & Partners, introduced the "Freedom of Vodka" campaign, which featured contemporary Russian art, in September 1994. In 1997 this campaign evolved seamlessly into the "Russian Art" campaign, with the style of artwork remaining the same and only the "Freedom of Vodka" tagline eliminated. In 1995 Stolichnaya became the first distilled-spirits marketer to establish its presence on the World Wide Web when Margeotes, in conjunction with CyberSight, developed the website "Stoli Central." The initiative broke the voluntary ban on advertising in the electronic media by spirits distillers in the United States. Stolichnaya thus took advantage of the graphic sophistication of the Web to extend its "Freedom of Vodka"/"Russian Art" campaigns beyond the confines of print advertising. The Stoli website gathered more than a dozen of the artistic images from the "Freedom of Vodka"/"Russian Art" campaigns for display. Patricia Barroll, vice president of marketing communications for Carillon Importers, which marketed Stoli in the United States at the time, was unrepentant about the decision to establish a presence on the Web. In keeping with its existing print advertising and its tradition for responsible marketing, the company maintained strict quality standards with respect to the content of the website. Barroll stated in a 1998 Brandweek article, "It was not a problem for us because we've always taken the high road . . . We always strived to make [the website] sophisticated, not sophomoric. Just like our print campaign."

TARGET MARKET

"Stoli Central" allowed the brand to reach a broader audience while maintaining its reputation for sophistication. In its Web advertising Stolichnaya targeted the 21-to 45-year-old demographic group by hiring MXNT's entertainment division, MaxPlanet Media, to produce a separate site, the "Virtual www.Stoli2000.com Millennium Tour," in late 1998. The site broadcast so-called Virtual Parties, with MTV-style concert footage geared specifically to Stoli's target audience. According to Keith Benjamin, an analyst with BancBoston Robertson Stephens, one strength of the medium over television, radio, magazines, and newspapers was its accountability, since all activity on the MaxPlanet Media website could be digitally monitored. "We believe [the Web] is the first widespread consumer medium that has the capability to deliver measurable [return-on-investment] data to advertisers," Benjamin stated in a PR Newswire press release. Another strength was the inherently global reach of the Web, allowing Stolichnaya to tap into its international brand awareness.

LEMON RUSKI WINE COOLER?

United Distillers Australia (UDA) introduced Stolichnaya Lemon Ruski alcoholic soda in late 1997, and when the demand created by television advertising outpaced the supply in January 1998, UDA had to suspend the ads. UDA ascribed the success of the launch to the combination of wine, vodka, and lemon flavoring as well as to the brand recognition of Stolichnaya. In March 1998, however, Independent Liquor filed a lawsuit against UDA for misleading advertising. Independent Liquor's managing director, Michael Erceg, explained that the advertising portrayed Lemon Ruski as a vodka drink, while in reality its vodka content was quite low, with wine contributing the majority of the alcoholic punch to the drink. In that sense the drink was more of a wine cooler than a vodka soda. The Australian Federal Court heard the case on March 27, 1998.

It was Russia, however, that had the largest vodka market in the world. According to beverage-industry journal Impact International, 80 percent of Russians drank vodka on a regular basis. This translated into astronomical sales: in 1996, for example, an estimated 250 million cases of vodka were sold on the Russian market, compared to 33.4 million cases sold in the United States. The maturation and opening up of the Russian market sent international vodka distillers scurrying to the motherland. Expatriate brand Smirnoff highlighted the double f in its name, reminding Russians of its connection to the imperial Romanoff family, which had appointed the Pierre Smirnoff Company as its sole purveyor of vodka from 1886 until the Russian Revolution of 1917, when Vladimir Smirnoff fled across Europe to the United States to reestablish his family's brand. Such intense interest in the vast Russian market reinforced Stoli's authenticity and boosted its status as an export.

COMPETITION

Poland backed up its claim to be vodka's country of origin with an onslaught of products in the "ultrapremium" category, also known as "Polish luxury vodka," which chipped away at Stoli's market share. Belvedere and Chopin spearheaded this development. Both were imported exclusively by Millennium Import Co. of Minnesota, a subsidiary of Phillips Beverage Co., which spent $15 million on advertising for the two brands from their 1996 launch until 1998. Belvedere was bottled in satin glass with an etched "window" engraved with the likeness of the Belvedere Palace in Warsaw. Millennium pushed both brands by sending gift boxes to celebrities such as Robert DeNiro, Robert Redford, and Michael Jordan and his Chicago Bulls teammates, as well as to the managers of General Motors, a strategy that earned Belvedere a 1998 Gold EFFIE from the American Marketing Association. Belvedere alone had exports totaling $1.6 million in 1996, $3.7 million in 1997, and an estimated $7 million in 1998.

The brand ran into trouble, however, when the French producer of the distinctive bottle, which held the rights to the Belvedere trademark, stopped shipment because of lack of payment from the Polish distiller, the state-run Polmos Uyrard-w. This produced a backlog in exports to the United States, hampering the growth of the brand. But Belvedere and Chopin were not the only brands in the Polish luxury vodka category. The Original brand underlined its heritage with its name. Wall Street Journal reporters Ernest Beck and Daniel Michaels interviewed 52-year-old New York City property developer Bob Shapiro, who had switched from Stoli after taste-testing Original, which he described as "viscous, and well-refined. . .a cut above." Descriptions such as this, as well as fancy bottles, led Smirnoff to run a campaign that parodied the Original advertising. The Smirnoff ads featured cartoon characters boasting that their vodka of choice "comes in a bottle designed by albino monks from Tibet," and Smirnoff's tagline read, "All vodka. No pretense."

Finlandia, the number three imported vodka behind Absolut and Stoli in the U.S. market, added fuel to Smirnoff's mockery with its own bottle redesign. Louisville-based Brown-Forman Corp., which also marketed Jack Daniel's and Southern Comfort, ordered the new design from Philadelphia-based Hanson Associates, which created a bottle in smooth, carved glass, as if it were the melting ice of a Finnish glacier, the source of the water for the vodka. The label was printed in organic inks directly onto the bottle. A new advertising campaign, the first in 18 months, was unveiled in 1997 in anticipation of the introduction of the new bottle in May 1998. The campaign created sales spikes, with sales in December 1997 increasing 22 percent over the same period the previous year.

Even with such increases, however, Finlandia would be hard-pressed to catch the leaders of the $1.2 billion premium-vodka market in the United States, for it maintained a mere 4 percent share, compared to Absolut's 55 percent and Stoli's 16 percent. What was more, Absolut was on an upward sales trend. Global sales of Absolut in 1997 amounted to 3.5 million cases, an increase of 5.9 percent over 1996, according to Impact Databank. Some of Absolut's success resulted from its line extensions into flavored vodkas such as lemon and pepper. The appeal of flavored vodkas resided in their mixability. Citrus-based drinks such as the screwdriver could be given an increased bite with lemon-flavored vodka, and spicy drinks such as the Bloody Mary got more fire with use of the pepper-flavored vodka. In January 1998 Stolichnaya followed in its rivals' footsteps by introducing six flavored vodkas: Razberi (raspberry), Strazberi (strawberry), Persik (peach), Vanil (vanilla), Zinamon (cinnamon), and Kafya (coffee). Stolichnaya later added four more flavors: Ohranj (orange), Limonnaya (lemon), Pertsovka (pepper), and Okhotnichya (herb and spice).

MARKETING STRATEGY

In order to underline the authentic Russian heritage of Stoli, the talents of contemporary Russian artists were enlisted to incorporate the Stolichnaya bottle or logo into works to be used as print advertisements. The ad titles from the "Freedom of Vodka" and "Russian Art" campaigns were broad and included "Accordion," "Ballet," and "Business," with artwork by Serguei Volcov; "Boat" and "Planes" by Eugeni Mitta; "Dance" and "Dining" by Fathulla Shakirov; "Epicurean" by Guram Abramischvili; "Fashion" by Irina Raevskaja; "Film" by Aidan Salakhova; "Kosolopov" by Alexander Kosolopov; "Orange" and "Shout" by Khurshida Kamalova; and "Tower" by Konstantine Jouravlev. The ads included text in Russian, translated on the "Stoli Central" Web page. Volcov's "Business," for example, was accompanied by the text "After work, Stolichnaya Vodka," and his "Accordion" had text that read, "In Russia, in America, in Europe, in restaurant, in cafe, in bar, at home, with beloved, with good people, with a friend, in nice company or just in a crowd of friends."

The "Stoli Central" website also featured an encyclopedic list of recipes for vodka cocktails, including lesser-known drinks such as one called To Russia with Love, which was made with vodka, cherry liqueur, half-and-half, coconut rum, and egg whites; and the Muscovy Martini, concocted from two different kinds of vodka along with triple sec, orange juice, and cinnamon. Some cocktails were exclusive to the list, such as the Pertsovka Angelic Ruble, the Preferred Chekhov Libation, Aunt Olga's Slick Cosmonaut, and Das Chartreuse Bolshoi. Besides drinks, the site featured two games, Stoli Cipher and Stoli Says. The former challenged its players to reconfigure a picture from jumbled mosaic squares, and the latter tested its players' memory. In early 1998 Stolichnaya upgraded its website to version 2.1 to include Quicktime video. MaxPlanet Media integrated Real Audio and Real Video into www.Stoli2000.com, its website dedicated to Stolichnaya.

In 1999 the American pilots Randy Howell and Jerry Gallud were looking for sponsors to fund U.S. air-show appearances for their four MiG-17s, fighter jets used by the former Soviet Union. The open-nosed jets consumed about 1,000 gallons of jet fuel an hour, an exorbitant expense compared to the 12 to 15 gallons used by small stunt planes. Peter Heyworth, an executive for United Distillers, jumped at the opportunity for the sponsorship. ''The MiG is an icon of Russia, and Stolichnaya is an authentic Russian product with a lot of heritage,'' Heyworth was quoted in the San Francisco Chronicle. ''It's not often in marketing that you get such a close fit.'' Stolichnaya covered the pilots' fuel costs. In return the jets were painted bright red and renamed ''Stoli MiGs.'' The jets made their first air-show appearance at the Paso Robles Air Show in California. An executive from Stolichnaya stated that, even though they were using MiGs for an art-themed campaign, the jets themselves also celebrated Russia's heritage. Both were ''as authentic as the soul of Russia herself,'' according to the San Francisco Chronicle.

OUTCOME

David Proffitt of the Arizona Republic applauded the ''Stoli Central'' website for its diversity of cocktail recipes. Otherwise he panned the site: ''Its entertainment value is about as low as the temperature during a Moscow winter.'' The goal of advertising campaigns was to increase sales, however, not to please reviewers. When Margeotes launched the ''Freedom of Vodka'' campaign in 1994, sales of Stolichnaya vodka had fallen to 900,000 cases from 1.1 million cases in 1991, a decline of 18 percent. By 1996 sales had gone back to 1.1 million cases. Turnarounds were rare in the highly competitive distilled-spirits market, and this represented one of the few instances when a major brand of spirits had reversed a downward trend in sales.

Yuri Gorbachev's business manager, Beatrice Booth, was quoted in Art Business News as saying that executives from Stolichnaya liked Gorbachev's painting for ''Russian Art'' so much that they asked him to contribute a new piece every holiday season for the campaign. ''Yuri's Stoli ads made the product very successful,'' said Booth, ''and the ads gave Yuri's career a tremendous boost. Collectors tell us all the time that they cut them out of magazines and frame them.''

''When fine art is used in advertising,'' Gorbachev explained to Art Business News, ''the quality, strength and feeling of the art transfers to the product, enhances it. And when an artist is unique, he gives a uniqueness to the product as well. Art connects emotionally with people. It is less artificial and has a stronger impact.'' The campaign helped Stolichnaya increase its U.S. sales from 1.1 million cases in 1996 to 1.3 million cases in 1999. Stolichnaya was the second-largest vodka brand in America and the largest vodka brand worldwide. In 1998 one in every three Russians drank it. Stolichnaya executives eventually awarded the brand's advertising account to BBDO Chicago, which in 2001 released a new campaign with the tagline ''See what unfolds.''

FURTHER READING

Beck, Ernest. ''Absolut Frustration: Why Foreign Distillers Find It So Hard to Sell Vodka to the Russians.'' Wall Street Journal, January 15, 1998.

Beck, Ernest, and Daniel Michaels. ''Marketing: A Simple Spirit, Vodka, Rises to Fashion Icon.'' Wall Street Journal Europe, May 7, 1998.

Gehman, Geoff. ''Yuri Gorbachev Fills Bixler with Something for Everyone.'' Allentown Morning Call, December 26, 1998.

Ho, Dorothy. ''Stoli's Hyperreality.'' Photo District News, June 1, 2002, p. 24.

Oljasz, Tomasz. ''Belvedere Bottle Battle Relations Turn Frosty between Makers of a Frosted-Glass Vodka Bottle and Polmos Uyrard-w, which Fills the Bottles with Its Super-Premium Spirit.'' Warsaw Voice, August 23, 1998.

Proffitt, David. ''Russian Secrets.'' Arizona Republic, May 28, 1998.

Smith, Rebecca. ''War Birds without Talons.'' San Francisco Chronicle, June 19, 1999, p. D1.

William D.Baue
Kevin Teague

United Parcel Service, Inc.

55 Glenlake Parkway NE
Atlanta, Georgia 30328
USA
Telephone: (404) 828-6000
Fax: (404) 828-6562
Web site: www.ups.com

■■■

MOVING AT THE SPEED OF BUSINESS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign was designed to modernize the image of the world's largest package-delivery company, United Parcel Service of America, Inc., commonly known as UPS. Over the years the corporation's advertising had helped it build a solid reputation for the efficient delivery of small parcels and documents, but many consumers were not aware that the company had changed significantly and offered a diverse mix of services and state-of-the-art technology.

The slogan "Moving at the speed of business" referred to the swift delivery of packages but also described the rapid manner in which UPS continually adapted to the changing needs of its business customers. One advertisement in BusinessWeek featured a photograph of a UPS truck parked at the Vatican in Rome, Italy. The headline read, "Fortunately, there's a global delivery service as good as UPS." Some spots in the campaign used humor to show UPS solving problems for its customers. In a television commercial that aired in December 1998, a rebellious elf took Santa's sleigh for a joyride and wrecked it in a snowbank. Stranded at the North Pole, Santa enlisted UPS to save Christmas by delivering presents for him.

"Moving at the Speed of Business" was handled by the New York office of Ammirati Puris Lintas (later renamed Lowe Lintas). It ran in print and broadcast media from 1995 through 2002. But as other shippers, such as FedEx, increased their market share, UPS felt that it was time to highlight what it could do beyond package delivery: supply-chain management, customhouse brokerage, and logistics-technology services. For a number of months UPS went without a tagline before unveiling the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign in 2002.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The firm that became United Parcel Service (UPS) was founded in Seattle, Washington, in 1907—an era before the widespread use of telephones and parcel post—when a teenager named James E. Casey established the American Messenger Company to deliver personal messages, luggage, and packages. Casey enlisted a crew of teenage helpers, including his brother George Casey, and funded the operation with $100 borrowed from a friend. The company's first promotional slogan, "Best service and lowest rates," summarized a business philosophy that ensured steady growth. In 1913 the enterprise merged with a competing company operated by Evert McCabe to form Merchants Parcel Delivery, which served many of the area's retail stores. The operation expanded to California and in 1929 launched an air delivery service called United Air Express, but that endeavor was discontinued at the onset of the Great Depression. During the 1930s the company expanded its territory to other states, changed its name to United Parcel Service, and painted its trucks brown to project a professional, dignified image.

In the 1950s UPS began pressing for common carrier rights, which would authorize it to make deliveries for any private or commercial customer in all 48 contiguous states. The company was finally granted that right in 1975, a development that placed it in direct competition with the United States Postal Service, the federal agency that handled most of the nation's mail and parcels. Since 1953 UPS had been offering two-day delivery service to large cities by sending packages in the cargo holds of regularly scheduled airlines and then completing the deliveries by truck, but during the 1980s the company began operating its own fleet of jets and could offer overnight air delivery. By 1998 UPS Airline was one of the 10 largest airlines in the nation, and UPS was the largest express carrier and package-delivery company in the world, delivering small parcels and documents to more than 200 countries and territories.

The industry and the corporation had changed dramatically over the years, but many consumers still perceived UPS as the company with delivery personnel in brown suits driving brown trucks, not a modern enterprise with innovative technology and a broad range of services. The company's advertising slogans had focused on the swift delivery of packages, evolving from "Best service, lowest rates" during the 1970s to "The tightest ship in the shipping business" during the 1980s and "The package delivery company more companies count on" during the early 1990s. In the mid-1990s UPS released a new campaign, "Moving at the Speed of Business," to modernize its image and publicize some of the other services it provided.

TARGET MARKET

The "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign was designed to explain the company's diverse products and services primarily for business customers. UPS continually invested in sophisticated technology to operate efficiently, maintain competitive prices, and provide state-of-the-art services. For example, by 1998 it was delivering 12.4 million packages and documents every day and had developed a system that could track the progress of each item. Its site on the World Wide Web was the first in the industry to record more than a million tracking requests in one day from consumers inquiring about the status of items they had shipped. One study found that the company transported more than half of the merchandise that consumers ordered over the Internet during the holiday shopping season at the end of 1998. That year 6 of the top 10 merchants selling goods over the Internet shipped their wares via UPS.

ROAD SHOW

Near the end of 1998 United Parcel Service was considering a second traveling seminar to follow a successful road show it had conducted two years earlier. Over a period of five months the company had hosted 50 seminars in 34 cities to explain its technology and services directly to some of its most loyal customers. The road show included workshops, face-to-face interaction with customers, and the opportunity for people to try some of the company's equipment. The traveling exhibit cost a few hundred thousand dollars and generated enough sales to recoup that expense within six months. About 90 percent of those who attended said they would recommend the road show to an associate.

The company had expanded into logistics management, which involved the warehousing, distribution, and tracking of merchandise for its customers. These services were useful for businesses that preferred to have merchandise delivered only when it was needed instead of keeping large inventories on hand. UPS also offered professional consulting and financial services. In addition, its Document Exchange product could deliver financial records, medical records, and other documents electronically with a password to protect their security and a certificate to show who received them. In a fast-paced era of expanding Internet commerce, electronic transmissions, and express delivery of packages, companies were changing the way they did business. The "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign assured consumers that UPS understood those changes and was adapting to meet the needs of its customers.

COMPETITION

The two main competitors for UPS were the United States Postal Service—an independent government agency that monopolized the delivery of first-class mail—and Federal Express Corporation, commonly known as FedEx. In 1997 FedEx had about 43 percent of the market for express delivery services, UPS had 27 percent, Airborne Freight Corporation (commonly known as Airborne Express) had 15 percent, and the Postal Service had 5 percent, according to Fortune magazine. UPS delivered more than express packages, however. Its total sales were about twice as large as FedEx's and a third as large as the Postal Service's. In 1998 the Postal Service had sales of $60.0 billion, UPS had $25.0 billion, and FedEx had $13.3 billion.

During 1998 the Postal Service continued the controversial "What's Your Priority?" advertising campaign, in which it compared its prices with those of UPS and FedEx. One print advertisement featured a graphic depiction of Earth above the headline "Sure, FedEx and UPS may promise you the world. But not for seven bucks." Pictures of the companies' distinctive mailing envelopes were aligned above flat rates for international deliveries. The Postal Service's price was $7, compared with $26 for FedEx and $28 for UPS. An arrow led from the Postal Service's envelope to the slogan "What's your global priority?" The text said that the Postal Service's Global Priority Mail might take a few days longer than delivery by the other two carriers, but it could save the customer up to 70 percent.

FedEx in 1996 had responded to the Postal Service's campaign by launching a series of negative radio advertisements and by filing a lawsuit and complaining to the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus. UPS also criticized the campaign and in 1998 accused the Postal Service of using unfair operating practices and abusing its status as a government agency to undermine competition from the private sector. The Postal Service discontinued the advertising campaign at about the end of 1998 after negotiating an agreement to end the lawsuit filed by FedEx.

In 1997 FedEx had revenues of $11.5 billion and shipped about 3 million items every day. UPS shipped 10 times that number and had sales of $22.5 billion. In the fall of 1997 FedEx announced that it would merge with Caliber Systems, Inc., a trucking company with sales of $2.7 billion that year. Both firms became subsidiaries of a new holding company, FDX Corporation, but they continued to operate independently during 1998, with FedEx making express deliveries and Caliber Systems carrying nonexpress packages. During the 1970s FedEx had been one of the first companies to offer express shipping, a service that it promoted with the slogan "When it absolutely, positively has to be there overnight." In the late 1990s FedEx used the taglines "The world on time" and "The way the world works" to emphasize that express delivery had become an important part of the way modern companies conducted business. During 1998 the company's slogan was "Be absolutely sure." According to Advertising Age, FedEx spent about $57.4 million on advertising in 1997.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The New York office of Ammirati Puris Lintas developed the "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign in 1995 to emphasize the information-technology and global services of UPS and to demonstrate that the corporation had changed significantly. UPS had progressed beyond the rapid delivery of packages and could help solve a variety of business problems. "Speed and reliability are now taken for granted in our industry," Peter Fredo, UPS vice president for advertising, said in a press release. "The challenge is to be innovative and flexible enough to bring new solutions and increased information to our customers. Our new tagline reflects the efforts UPS is making in these areas." The first television commercials in the campaign commented that the business environment was changing so rapidly that "the American business day has no beginning, middle, or end" and "business as usual can put you out of business." The spots called attention to the fact that UPS offered guaranteed delivery by 8 a.m. in addition to bar coding, inventory management, and tracking of packages.

A 1998 television commercial named "Ozone Monday" parodied Hollywood action films by showing a UPS deliveryman saving the day for a motion-picture crew frantically trying to work despite overwhelming difficulties. The spot opened with an explosion and a fireball roaring out of the roof of a building. A director shouted orders at the movie's star—an actress with voluminous hair and a bizarre superheroine costume—while the film's harried producer made calls on his cellular telephone. Several scenes followed in quick succession. The heroine clung to a rail, horizontally airborne in a howling wind full of rain and snow. The scene shifted to show her in a futuristic wedding dress, then shifted again to a group of mechanical pigs on wobbling wheels, their spring-loaded heads bobbing and their eyes spinning. Then the actress was shown in her dressing room amid a clutter of New Age paraphernalia, upset because she had not received her shipment of psychic healing tapes. The crisis was solved by the arrival of the UPS deliveryman, package in hand. A female narrator said, "Ozone Monday is going to be big, and you're the producer. But the director, first he wants a monsoon, then a blizzard, so you call UPS. You need the gowns for the wedding in three days; the metal pigs, second day by noon; and the star's psychic healing tapes—thank you—8 a.m.! Is there a happy ending? Two words—acceptance speech." The commercial concluded with a shot of the producer receiving an award for the film.

An advertisement that ran in Fortune magazine in August 1998 featured a large photograph of a two-lane highway running across open, rolling hills and past a distant city. The headline said, "Route 66. The Pacific Coast Highway. I-95. All freshly paved with the same guarantee. Introducing Guaranteed Ground. Only from UPS." The text explained that UPS guaranteed it would deliver packages to any business address nationwide by the day it was promised. The ad concluded with the slogan "Moving at the speed of business" and the company's logo, Internet address, and toll-free telephone number.

Some of the first television spots in the campaign aired during coverage of the 1996 Olympic Summer Games, professional basketball and golf competitions, and network television programs such as 60 Minutes and the NBC Sunday Movie. Print advertisements appeared in the Wall Street Journal, BusinessWeek, Newsweek, USA Today, and other publications. Advertising Age reported that UPS spent $85.2 million on advertising in 1998, up 30.4 percent from $65.3 million in 1997. Of that amount, $65.4 million went for television commercials (a 52.4 percent increase) and $17.9 million for print advertisements.

The "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign featured new executions in 1999. In a television spot called "Printer" a narrator said, "Imagine if people could just order things online and out they came." The spot showed scuba-diving equipment, a trombone, a water-cooler, and a football being delivered through a computer printer. It ended with the conclusion that, in the real world, "The best way to get stuff off the Web is UPS." The tagline featured a new twist on the old slogan: "Moving at the speed of e-business."

UPS began in the new century to pivot away from the "Moving at the Speed of Business" theme, which pigeonholed the company as nothing more than a fast shipper. In reality, UPS now offered a wide range of logistical services to customers that many were simply not aware of. In 2000 UPS aired a spot called "Consultants," which featured a pair of slick consultants offering several business nostrums: integrate your global supply chain, move assembly overseas, accelerate inventory velocity. But when the client told them, "Do it," one consultant had to admit, "We don't actually do what we propose," and the other added, "We just propose it." A voice-over then delivered the new message: "UPS can help redesign your supply chain.... We deliver more than just packages." At the time UPS went without a tagline, as the television spots shown during the 2000 Olympics in Sydney focused on nondelivery services. The company also changed its advertising agency of record, dropping Lowe Lintas after 17 years in favor of the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia.

OUTCOME

In October 1998 a Fortune survey named UPS as the most admired delivery company in the world. In February 1999 another survey by Fortune cited UPS as America's most admired mail, package, and freight company. It was the 16th time the firm had received the honor. In a press release Jim Kelly, the chairman and chief executive officer of UPS, commented, "You don't earn that distinction for 16 consecutive years by resting on your laurels. UPS is working every day to help its customers stay ahead of the absolutely stunning pace of change in today's business world, especially in areas such as electronic commerce. That's why, for example, we spend more than a billion dollars a year on information technology." UPS reported revenues of $24.8 billion in 1998, up from $22.5 billion in 1997 and $19.6 billion in 1994. The company delivered 3.14 billion packages and documents in 1998 compared with 3.04 billion in 1997 and 3.03 billion in 1994.

Aided by a UPS strike in 1997, the competition was beginning to nip at the heels of UPS by the turn of the millennium, prompting a change in marketing strategy and a repositioning of the brand. No longer did it make sense to promote UPS as a shipper; it needed to be seen as a solutions provider, with shipping being just one service it offered. After several months of development UPS unveiled a new campaign and tagline in early 2002: "What Can Brown Do for You?" The new effort took advantage of the signature brown color of its trucks and drivers' uniforms to promote all that UPS had to offer customers beyond package delivery. The "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign had adequately served its purpose, but, in a sense, the speed of business now dictated a change of course for a UPS looking to remain ahead of the pack.

FURTHER READING

Bradley, Sam. "One World, One UPS." Brandweek, February 5, 1996, p. 20.

Brownlee, Lisa. "UPS Launches a New Campaign to Regain Customers' Confidence." Wall Street Journal (Marketing & Media, Advertising), August 21, 1997.

Callahan, Sean. "Television. (United Parcel Service of America Inc., Lowe, Lintas & Partners." B to B, December 4, 2000, p. 42.

De Marco, Donna. "UPS Celebrates Brown in Biggest Ad Campaign." Washington (DC) Times, February 8, 2002, p. C09.

"Driving the UPS Brand." Sales & Marketing Management, December 1998, p. 47.

Hall, Carol. "High Fliers." Marketing & Media Decisions, August 1986, p. 137.

Leith, Scott. "UPS Foes with New Advertising Agency." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, April 24, 2001, p. D3.

Oberlag, Reginald. "Sonzero Spoofs Action Flicks for United Parcel Service." Shoot, March 6, 1998, p. 12.

Teinowitz, Ira, and Sean Callahan. "Post Office Axes Ads Rapping Its Rivals." Advertising Age, December 7, 1998, p. 1.

"Today's Businesses Stretching the Limits of Brand Elasticity, UPS Executive Says." PR Newswire, February 12, 1999.

Susan Risland
Ed Dinger

WHAT CAN BROWN DO FOR YOU? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In January 2002 United Parcel Service, Inc. (UPS), enjoyed a clear lead over FedEx, its major competitor, in the ground delivery business. At the same time, as part of a major rebranding campaign, UPS wanted to move beyond package delivery to include a variety of related services. To prepare for the impending rebranding, UPS launched the biggest U.S. advertising endeavor in its history. The high-priced, multilevel ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' campaign was intended to reveal fully what the company's growing capabilities were for just about anyone in nearly every aspect of the delivery business. In this way the campaign asked customers to look to the future. At the same time, with the focus on brown, the color the company had been associated with since its beginning in 1907, UPS was also reminding customers of its long heritage.

The ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' campaign, developed by the Martin Agency, debuted in January 2002 with such television spots as ''Mailroom Guy,'' ''Logistics Manager,'' ''Shipping Manager,'' and ''CEO.'' The first ads reflected the all-inclusive approach UPS wanted to convey. According to the spots, no matter where somebody fell on the managerial ladder, UPS could help that person. Later, in August 2002, the campaign shifted direction with the introduction of a new line of spots that focused on UPS employees. The emphasis in this later advertising varied from the recruitment of new employees to the commitment of UPS and its employees to the community. In ''Keith Jones,'' for example, UPS outlined a worker's eventual advancement from part-time employee to corporate health and safety manager. In another spot, ''Scholarship,'' a high school graduate explained how the company, through a tuition and assistance program called ''Earn and Learn,'' had helped her realize her dream of attending college. The ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' campaign had its debut during the telecast of the opening ceremony of the 2002 Olympic Winter Games and appeared later that year during the Academy Awards. The spots were also broadcast on other sports, news, and entertainment programs during prime time. During 2002 alone more than 10 television commercials were released, and there was a national print promotion, all of which cost UPS $45 million.

The ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' campaign successfully set the stage for the rebranding efforts that followed. The campaign's television spots spoke directly to potential customers, and the customer base grew, as did sales. By the end of fiscal 2003 domestic revenue for © JOHN SOMMERS II/REUTERS/CORBIS.

UPS had increased by more than $1 billion, while international revenue had increased by just under $1 billion, or 25 percent. The ''Synchronizing the World of Commerce'' campaign that followed in 2003 further aided UPS in achieving its financial goals, but it was ''What Can Brown Do for You?'' that prepared the way for the global campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

UPS traced its origins to the American Messenger Company, which was founded in Seattle in 1907. The company ran errands, delivered packages, and carried notes, baggage, and trays of restaurant food, mostly to local businesses. The American Messenger Company thrived, even without major advertising efforts. In 1913 the company bought its first delivery car, a Model T Ford, and inscribed its new name, Merchants Parcel Delivery, on the side. The inscription represented one of the company's few early advertising endeavors. In 1919 the company took its third name, United Parcel Service, or UPS, and moved beyond Seattle, to California. By this time UPS had chosen brown as the color for its delivery vehicles and uniforms. The color, of course, later gave its name to the advertising campaign "What Can Brown Do for You?"

Throughout the years UPS expanded rapidly, first to the East Coast and later overseas. By the 1940s the company was delivering more than 100 million packages a year. In 1946 UPS reached the landmark of its billionth package delivered. Still, there was no national advertising campaign in the United States for more than 35 years. The first such campaign, "UPS Saves You Money from the Ground Up," was launched in 1982. This national campaign, which focused on the company's cost-effectiveness, was heavily marketed toward the business world. The campaign was replaced in 1985 by "We Run the Tightest Ship in the Shipping Business," with business once again the target market. This focus continued through the next three campaigns, which included "The Package Delivery Company More Companies Count On" (1993), "Moving at the Speed of Business" (1995), and, finally, "What Can Brown Do for You?" (2002).

Just as advertising campaigns for UPS were slow to develop, so the company's logos changed only gradually. Within the span of almost a century, UPS had used just four logos. The first, showing an eagle on a shield, appeared in 1919, and those that followed represented minor changes on this. The third logo, which appeared in 1961, showed a bow-tied package above the UPS shield. Following the launching of the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign in 2002, UPS abandoned the package, which had been used for more than 40 years. The new logo, like those that had preceded it, continued to use brown as the trademark color.

TARGET MARKET

With more than 8 million people using its services every day, the UPS customer base was wide ranging. While individual consumers made up a portion of the base, businesses were a clear majority. Because businesses, the people who worked in them, and the jobs they did were diverse, the company's advertising aimed for a wide appeal. Thus, the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign was used to remind people at all levels of a business how UPS could be of help to them. In addition, the employee-centered ads, which touted the benefits of working for UPS, served as an attempt to recruit part-time workers.

Although UPS aimed for diversity in its approach, research on the campaign concluded that the advertisements were most effective with those in senior management positions. When, therefore, UPS created a new corporate tagline for use in a global rebranding effort, it focused on this group. The result was "Synchronizing the World of Commerce," a large-scale international print and television campaign that succeeded "What Can Brown Do for You?" Directed toward senior management, the print ads in this later campaign ran throughout the world, with television spots airing in a total of 144 countries.

WHAT CAN BROWN DO FOR YOU TODAY?

The website captionmachine.com asked people to submit captions for various humorous photos. One photo, entitled "UPS and FedEx Crash," captured an accident between the two companies' trucks. A total of 158 people submitted captions for the photo, including "FedEx + UPS = Fedup," "There can be only one," and "What can Brown do for you today?"

COMPETITION

The competition between UPS and FedEx was well known in the business world. In 2003, in response to UPS advertising, FedEx responded with a major marketing effort of its own. Its campaign, "Relax, It's FedEx," was launched during the season-opening telecast of ABC's Monday Night Football. The campaign included eight television spots that highlighted various FedEx services, including air, ground, freight, and international shipping. Its message to customers was that, if they were using FedEx, as opposed to, say, UPS, they would have peace of mind.

FedEx had earlier begun to encroach on UPS's prime market, especially when it purchased Caliber Systems, a major competitor in ground delivery. In addition, in what was labeled a "copy-cat move," FedEx purchased Kinko's soon after UPS had acquired Mail Boxes Etc. Still, UPS maintained a significant lead in the ground delivery business and, at the same time, proved more than competitive in other ways. Between 2002 and 2004, for example, total revenue for UPS ranged from $31 to $36.5 billion. This far exceeded revenue for FedEx, which during the same years never broke out of the $20 billion range.

Other UPS competitors included the United States Postal Service (USPS), the independent government agency that had nearly $70 billion in revenue in 2004. Still, much of the USPS's revenue was derived from the mailing of nonurgent mail, such as cards and letters, a service on which it held a monopoly. Its package delivery service, on the other hand, faced fierce competition from UPS and FedEx, as well as from the fast-growing DHL, the world's leader in cross-border express deliveries. DHL's overall revenue growth of nearly 8 percent in 2004, along with $30 billion in sales, made it a serious competitor. With its large-scale print and online advertising and a broadcast campaign that ran during the 2004 Olympic Games—in which the company promoted its Express Delivery Service in the United States—DHL created increasing competition for UPS.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The century-long heritage of UPS, embodied in the color brown, was something that could itself be marketed. The company's brown trucks and uniforms had long ago become an American icon, comparable to the Coca-Cola script or the Nike swoosh. Thus, in February 2002 UPS, under the guidance of the Martin Agency in Virginia, launched the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign. It was the largest and the most expensive U.S. advertising campaign in the company's history, yet only its fifth ever. The campaign debuted during the telecast of the opening ceremony of the 2002 Olympic Winter Games and later appeared during another high-profile event, the Academy Awards. In addition, the spots ran during prime-time sports, news, and entertainment programming, and print ads were also used. UPS spent a total of $45 million on the campaign.

The television spots in the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign were designed to work on different levels. The initial spots emphasized diversity, with titles such as "Small Business," "My Business," "CEO," "CFO," "Logistics Manager," "Shipping Manager," and "Mailroom Guy." The spots represented UPS's desire to convey to everyone, from CEOs to mailroom employees, what the company could do for them. In essence UPS wanted to assure people that, no matter what their position within a company, it could make their lives easier and help them do their work and achieve their professional goals. Later in 2002 UPS launched an extension of the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign. These later spots highlighted the experiences of representative employees, with the intent being to recruit part-time workers and to tout UPS's commitment to the community. In one such spot, "Road Trip," a 20-something employee explained how the company's generous starting wage and weekends-off policy allowed him to attend concerts with friends. Meanwhile, a more community-focused spot portrayed a UPS regional manager who had completed four weeks in the company's Community Internship Program, which benefited struggling communities throughout the United States. Thus, the campaign as a whole aimed to connect customers with UPS's longstanding commitment to the business world, to individual employees, and to communities.

While the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign worked to help customers make a connection with the company's past, it also directed them to look forward. By emphasizing the company's ever-growing capabilities, the campaign served as a springboard for an aggressive rebranding of UPS. The company wanted to move beyond package delivery to include services in logistics, freight forwarding, customs clearance, technology, and finance. As a result, between 1998 and 2004 UPS had made 28 acquisitions, including the purchase of Mail Boxes Etc. To highlight its rebranding, UPS introduced a new logo in 2003, abandoning the brown-and-white bow-tied package that had been used for 40 years. While the new logo kept the signature brown shield, it dropped the package, thus symbolizing the company's growth into areas other than delivery services. The transformation was to continue through 2009, by which time UPS would have changed every existing logo, something that involved thousands of vehicles, 250 aircraft, 1,700 facilities, 70,000 drop-off and retail boxes, and more than 1 million uniforms.

OUTCOME

"What we found was that not even we—brown-bleeding UPS'ers—had completely understood the power of 'brown' and the connection audiences have with it," said a company spokesperson. Thus, one indication of the success of the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign was that the unspoken message, centering on the color brown, was perhaps as significant than the spoken one. Still, the advertisements served as a means of getting the UPS message across.

The "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign appeared to be successful in setting the stage for the rebranding campaign that followed in 2003. By portraying the diverse customer base of UPS, the television spots in the campaign helped to draw in new customers. The global "Synchronizing the World of Commerce" campaign that followed used research derived from the effectiveness of the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, allowing UPS to determine that its new international advertising would be most effective if targeted toward those in senior management positions. Further, the early success of the UPS rebranding prompted another global advertising campaign, "Deliver More," which was launched in 2005. This campaign focused on the company's international package delivery services and, in the spirit of the rebranding efforts, highlighted the ability of UPS to use its wide range of capabilities to make it easier to conduct business internationally.

The "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign was accompanied by improvements in UPS finances. At the end of fiscal year 2002, UPS's domestic revenue was virtually stagnant. By the end of fiscal year 2003, however, U.S. revenue had increased by more than $1 billion, from $23.9 to more than $25 billion. Further, international revenue for UPS increased by approximately 25 percent in 2003, from $4.6 to $5.5 billion. Overall 2003 revenue for the company increased more than $2 billion compared to the previous year. This success was seen as being largely a product of the rebranding efforts. UPS needed to lay the groundwork, which including reminding customers of its heritage, before it could effectively spread its rebranding message, however, and it was the "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign that succeeding in doing this.

FURTHER READING

"Brown and a Better Life." August 21, 2002. Available from <http://www.pressroom.ups.com>

Callahan, Sean. "Look What Brown Has Done for UPS." B to B, October 25, 2004.

Carnegie, Jim. "UPS Kicks Off International Advertising Initiative." Radio Business Report 22, no. 37 (February 22, 2005).

"FedEx Companies Star in New Advertising Campaign: Ads Reinforce Reliability, Peace of Mind; 'Relax, It's FedEx.'" FedEx Archives, 2003.

"FedEx Taps BBDO for Kinko's Advertising Campaign." Memphis Business Journal, July 6, 2004.

Griswold, Alicia. "Martin Presents New Look: UPS." Adweek, March 25, 2003.

Lazare, Lewis. "One Place UPS Doesn't Deliver: Latest TV Campaign." Chicago Sun-Times, March 14, 2005.

Manning-Schaffel, Vivian. "UPS & FedEx Compete to Deliver." brandhome, May 17, 2004.

"UPS Delivers International Ad Campaign." Business First, March 3, 2005.

"UPS 'Delivers More' in New Advertising Campaign." Strategy, February 23, 2005.

"UPS Launches Biggest, 'Brownest' Ad Campaign Ever." February 7, 2002. Available from <http://www.pressroom.ups.com>

"UPS Unveils 'What Can Brown Do for You?' Ad Campaign." Business First, February 7, 2002.

Candice Mancini

United States Postal Service

475 L'Enfant Plaza SW
Washington, DC 20260
USA
Telephone: (202) 268-2000
Fax: (202) 268-2000
Web site: www.usps.gov

■■■

FLY LIKE AN EAGLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Even though the United States Postal Service (USPS) was made an independent agency in the 1970s, it was not until Loren Smith became the chief of postal marketing for USPS in 1994 that the organization aggressively competed in the private sector. The two largest competitors of USPS, the FedEx Corporation and United Parcel Service, Inc. (UPS), both dominated the global market for overnight and two- to three-day deliveries. Before Smith approved several of USPS's successful marketing campaigns, public perception was that the Postal Service was slow and unreliable. Even though Smith resigned from USPS in 1996, his marketing prowess remained. USPS released its "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign two years later to further elevate its stodgy image and publicize its products and services.

The $15 million television and print campaign was created by the New York branch of the advertising agency Foote Cone & Belding. "Fly Like an Eagle" began on October 19, 1998, and extended through the holiday season—the USPS's busiest time of year—to assure Americans that the Postal Service was poised to handle the holiday rush. The three debut television spots were set to the Steve Miller Band song "Fly Like an Eagle," which had been popular in the 1970s. Print ads adopted "Fly Like an Eagle" as the tagline as well. Though the campaign was scheduled to run for only three months, its success was such that subsequent campaigns in 1999 continued to employ the "Fly Like an Eagle" theme. In February 2000 the song and tagline resurfaced for a spot titled "Robot" that advertised the USPS's holiday return services. The campaign ended shortly after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Fly Like an Eagle" yielded a positive net income for USPS during its first year. The spot "Robot" was awarded Shoot magazine's Top Spot of the Week honor; and the campaign helped increase the number of monthly visitors to the website www.USPS.com. Larry Speakes, the USPS advertising manager, would later criticize the campaign in a February 25, 2002, Advertising Age article, explaining that it "didn't test well, while the [subsequent campaign that began in 2002] can translate into a variety of more targeted efforts."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Established in 1775 as the Post Office Department, the agency was tied closely to the federal government until the early 1970s, when it became an independent agency. This freed the agency, which operated within the federal government's executive branch, to compete within the business sector while continuing to receive government subsidies. A major competitive thrust came in 1994 when Loren Smith became the chief of postal marketing. Smith implemented a number of new programs and services, including the marketing of postal paraphernalia, such as T-shirts and games, and the creation of phone cards. Smith also added new agencies to the marketing roster—the USPS's longtime primary agency, Young & Rubicam (Y&R), New York, was joined by Foote Cone & Belding (FCB), Chicago's Draft Worldwide, and Chicago's Frankel & Co. While Y&R handled advertising for Global Priority Mail and all media buying, FCB took charge of U.S. Priority Mail and stamp advertising, two areas Smith planned to boost. Smith, in fact, took $80 million allocated to other marketing purposes and spent it on Priority Mail advertising in the mid-1990s without the approval or permission of the Postal Service Board of Governors. By 1996 Smith had exceeded the USPS's annual advertising budget by 62 percent, spending $87 million more than the allotted $140 million. As a result he left the agency in late 1996.

Though Smith's attempts at diversification met with negative reactions from some in the administration, his efforts succeeded in making U.S. Priority Mail a hit and provided the USPS with a significant increase in revenue. The "What's Your Priority?" campaign, launched in 1996 and developed by FCB, compared the cost of sending a package using Priority Mail versus mailing the package through a competing vendor's similar service, such as Federal Express Corporation's (FedEx) Two-Day Service or United Parcel Service of America's (UPS) Second-Day Air. The campaign continued through 1997 and 1998, and Priority Mail quickly became the USPS's fastest-growing service. In the 1996–97 fiscal year, according to Traffic World, Priority Mail accounted for more than $3.4 billion in revenue. Despite the campaign's achievements, however, a number of factors—including outcry from rivals claiming the comparative ads were unfair, the USPS's desire to make known its myriad of services, and the agency's wish to enhance its image—led the Postal Service to introduce the "Fly Like an Eagle" image campaign. The USPS's Roxanne Symko, manager of advertising and promotion, explained in Advertising Age: "People are familiar with the postal service, but to know us on the surface doesn't mean they know the kind of progress we have made in recent past. . . . We want to position ourselves in a new light, as innovative and looking forward."

TARGET MARKET

Although the USPS developed different campaigns targeted toward specific audiences, the agency introduced a number of campaigns in the 1980s and 1990s designed to attract the general public. A major hurdle faced by the Postal Service was its poor image. Roxanne Symko told Sloane Lucas of Advertising Age, "Our delivery standards are high, and we are a changing, progressive company but our research showed that people see us as old and stodgy." Many customers also considered the Postal Service to be somewhat unreliable, and the agency addressed this in a 1997 advertising campaign created by Y&R. Continuing with the "We Deliver" theme and tagline, the "If I Ran the Post Office" campaign focused on the postal customer and included television spots featuring customers presenting their suggestions for improving mail service and delivery. The campaign failed to garner much enthusiasm from the public, however, and it was abandoned.

Despite the Postal Service's image problem, the public appeared to be satisfied with the overall service provided by the USPS. A study conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press revealed that the USPS was the top-ranked federal agency in 1997, earning a favorability rating of 89 percent. A decade earlier the Postal Service's rating was 76 percent. Similarly, members of a panel of catalog marketers assembled by the USPS in June 1998 agreed that they were generally satisfied with the agency's delivery service but that customers continued to look upon the USPS with disfavor. In order to enhance its image, the USPS needed to promote its many services with a new, updated approach, such as the "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign.

COMPETITION

The Postal Service's most visible and energetic competitors were shipping-service providers FedEx and UPS. For the Postal Service, competition was a tricky matter;

YOU CAN'T HAVE IT ALL

Not only did the USPS face competition from UPS, FedEx, and other large shipping vendors, but it also met with challenges from small companies such as Mail Boxes Etc. and from technological advances, such as E-mail and computerized banking services, that enabled consumers to pay bills through the Internet or by telephone. Shopping via the Internet, known as e-commerce, was a growing arena as well, predicted by Forrester Research of Cambridge, Massachusetts, to increase to more than $100 billion by 2003, up from $8 billion in 1998. Although a survey of Internet shoppers conducted by Zona Research Inc. found that 32 percent received their merchandise from the USPS, 55 percent got their wares via UPS.

the Postal Service was a government-subsidized entity with many advantages. Its rivals frequently maintained that the USPS used revenues generated from its monopoly on mail delivery to fund services designed to compete against private companies. The USPS, exempt from most taxes, including federal and state, free from parking fines, and able to clear foreign customs more easily than its competitors, seemed to hold the upper hand in the marketplace. In addition, postal laws required that private companies charge twice as much for services also offered by the USPS, allowing the agency to significantly undercut competing prices. UPS chairman and CEO Jim Kelly spoke out against such policies in a speech given to the National Press Club in 1998 and declared, "I'm hard pressed to think of a better example of anti-competitive practices than setting your competitors' rates." The Postal Service defended the postal rules and pointed out that UPS and FedEx charged more than double the USPS's $3.20 Priority Mail charge for two-day delivery services. USPS spokesperson Norm Scherstrom said in the Journal of Commerce, "If I recall, when we started our Priority Mail ads, UPS was charging about $8 and FedEx was charging about $12.... If the requirement was a double postage rule why were they way above that?"

As powerful as the Postal Service was, it faced substantial competition from many challengers and did not command all delivery categories. In the express-delivery service segment, FedEx was the largest express shipping company in the world and the market leader with a 43 percent share in 1997. UPS took the second place spot with 27 percent, followed by Airborne Express at 15 percent, other services with 8 percent, and the Postal Service with 5 percent, according to the Colography Group. For two-day deliveries, however, the USPS's Priority Mail held a strong market share of 45 percent in 1997, thanks in part to the aggressive "What's Your Priority?" campaign. The campaign displeased the Postal Service's rivals considerably, with FedEx filing a lawsuit for false advertising and lodging a complaint with the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus. UPS openly criticized the campaign as well.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign marked a discernible and intentional change in the Postal Service's advertising. The Postal Service chose to focus on the agency as a whole rather than concentrating on a specific service or product. Symko explained in the November/December 1998 issue of the USPS publication Postal Life, "The 'Fly Like an Eagle' campaign tells customers that the Postal Service is one organization with many products... with one unified advertising message. This campaign will serve as a touchstone for everything the Postal Service does, and it will reinforce our promotional message to our customers."

THE SONGS THAT WOULDN'T DIE

Songs popular in the 1960s and 1970s continually seeped into advertising campaigns during the late 1990s. In addition to the Steve Miller Band's "Fly Like an Eagle," other old songs were featured in a diverse array of advertising campaigns. Burger King Corporation produced a series of commercials including different tunes, including the Trammps's "Disco Inferno." Ameritech used an adaptation of Don McLean's "Bye, Bye, Miss American Pie," Toyota Motor Sales USA Inc. used Sly Stone's "Everyday People," and AT&T ads featured Elton John's "Rocket Man."

The Postal Service regularly created holiday campaigns to inform customers of its ability to handle the holiday rush—during the Christmas season, the USPS delivered more than 5 billion letters and cards and 100 million packages—but they generally aired only during the holiday season. With "Fly Like an Eagle" the Postal Service planned to extend the duration of the campaign and adopted the new tagline and theme for all its promotions and advertising. The song was also used in all advertising. Symko explained in Postal Life, "We selected this song because besides being universally recognizable, likable and memorable, the music was an ideal fit for our message."

The "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign began airing on major networks and cable channels in mid-October and consisted of three commercials—the first presented the USPS's ability and willingness to help, the second focused on various USPS services designed to accommodate busy customers, and the third, which aired after Christmas, expressed thanks to the hardworking postal employees. The spots included montage sequences of smiling postal workers, employees loading airplanes and trucks, and delivery workers walking through the snow and empty streets to make sure customers received their mail on time. Intercut with these scenes were shots of the Postal Service's various products and services. One scene showed a woman looking out her window, anxiously waiting for her holiday packages to arrive. When the postal employee arrived, the woman rushed to the door to greet the delivery person. Another scene featured a child opening a gift—a gift that arrived just in time for Christmas, thanks to the Postal Service. Copy appeared on the screen and asked: "We've added a fleet of planes . . . an army of trucks. . . . 40,000 more employees. We're ready for the holidays. Are you?" Symko stated, "The ads evoke images of speed, strength, integrity and dependability, all images associated with the Postal Service. . . . This campaign portrays the Postal Service as a customer-friendly, hard-working organization that is dedicated to meeting our customers' needs."

In 2000 FCB created a spot titled "Robot" to tout a USPS service that allowed customers of online retailers to print their own return labels via the Internet. In the 30-second spot a woman was featured talking on the phone. An unopened box was sitting on her coffee table. "Oh, he already has Zogatron," she said. "I'll exchange it." Inside the box, a robot's eyes opened. It then kicked its way out of the packaging, leapt up to the family's computer thanks to computer-generated special effects, and printed its own return label. The robot reinserted itself into the now-labeled package before the woman even noticed. The spot ended with Steve Miller's song and the text "Fly Like an Eagle." The USPS advertising budget was reduced in 2000. The campaign officially ended after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

OUTCOME

The Postal Service enjoyed revenues of $60.1 billion and a surplus of $550 million in 1998. It was the first time the agency had experienced four consecutive years of positive net income. Though the successful "What's Your Priority?" campaign was discontinued at the end of 1998, the "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign was so well received that the Postal Service continued to employ the theme and tagline in promotions and advertising campaigns into 2001. Even musician Steve Miller approved of the campaign. In a letter in the January/February 1999 issue of Postal Life, Miller wrote: "I've been turning down commercial appeals to use this song for over 20 years and it wasn't until your request that I felt the full potential of this song could be reached . . . I look forward to continuing to make sure that the Postal Service continues to have the smartest and most meaningful promotions in the country and that the integrity of this message is maintained."

In 1999 the USPS continued to implement new programs and services to keep consumers satisfied and enhance the brand. Postal Service packaging boldly displayed the eagle symbol, new uniforms were planned for postal employees by the end of 1999, and packaging of products sold in post offices was revamped and updated. The Postal Service formed an alliance with private delivery service DHL Worldwide Express Inc. in early 1999 for its Priority Mail Global Guaranteed program, a service for two-day delivery of mail to Europe. The USPS's most significant new program in 1999, however, was delivery confirmation, and it was supported by the Postal Service's largest marketing program of the year. Delivery confirmation allowed the agency to compete more effectively with FedEx and UPS, which had long offered shipment tracking and delivery confirmation. The estimated $50 million campaign, which began in March, was developed by FCB, which seemed to be supplanting 20-year USPS advertising veteran Y&R as the organization's key agency. The Postal Service's Ron Landis explained in Postal Life that the agency was taking progressive measures to fly like an eagle into the future. Landis stated: "[W]e are taking a major step into the future and grooming ourselves to be contenders on a global scale. . . . We are showing the world who we are and what we can do, and we are doing it with flair."

The campaign was not appreciated by all USPS executives. In 2002 Larry Speakes suggested that the campaign's target audience was not effectively reached and that the campaign did not convey enough emotion. Nonetheless, six months after the campaign began, the website www.USPS.com reported a rise in monthly traffic. The spot "Robot" also collected Shoot magazine's Top Spot of the Week honor.

FURTHER READING

Bremner, Faith. "Postal Service Ad: Fly Right." USA Today, October 19, 1998, p. B8.

Lucas, Sloane. "FCB Breaks New USPS Image Work." Adweek, October 19, 1998.

Teinowitz, Ira. "Changing Themes." Advertising Age, February 25, 2002, p. 8.

———. "Postal Service Tries Image of Innovation: Steve Miller Song 'Fly Like an Eagle' Sets Tone of New FCB Campaign." Advertising Age, October 19, 1998, p. 6.

———. "USPS Confirms Delivery of $50 Mil Campaign." Advertising Age, February 22, 1999, p. 1.

Teinowitz, Ira, and Sean Callahan. "Post Office Axes Ads Rapping Its Rivals." Advertising Age, December 7, 1998, p. 1.

Teinowitz, Ira, and Beth Snyder. "USPS Plans $200 Mil-plus Review." Advertising Age, April 19, 1999.

Williamson, Debra Aho. "USPS Stats." Advertising Age, August 2, 1999, p. 36.

Woodward, Sarah. "Toy Robot Brings Many Happy Returns to USPS." Shoot, March 3, 2000, p. 12.

Mariko Fujinaka
Kevin Teague

United States Tennis Association

70 West Red Oak Lane
White Plains, New York 10604
USA
Telephone: (914) 696-7000
Fax: (914) 696-7019
Web site: www.usta.com

■■■

US OPEN EXCITEMENT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The United States Tennis Association (USTA) was the official governing body of American tennis and the owner of the US Open, the only Grand Slam tournament held in the United States. But the USTA membership, while holding at 500,000 individuals and 6,000 organizations, was not growing, and Nielsen ratings for telecasts of the US Open had dropped from a high of 5.8 in 1981 to 2.8 in 1998. The organization had earned a reputation as a group for professionals rather than the average tennis player, and the US Open had come to be viewed as a slow-paced, unexciting event, entertaining only to older audiences.

In 1999 the USTA launched a $2 million, two-phase marketing campaign created by ad agency Fallon McElligott New York. Phase one was intended to build interest in and to help boost ticket sales and television viewership for the US Open, held at the National Tennis Center in Queens, New York, and phase two was aimed at increasing membership in the USTA. The first phase, titled "US Open Excitement," included television spots that ran on cable, network, and local New York channels and print ads that appeared in publications like the New York Times and USA Today. The second phase, called "Direct Response TV," consisted of two television spots that ran during the airing of the US Open.

Both phases of the campaign far exceeded their goals of increasing ticket sales and television viewership by 10 percent each and of adding 10,000 new members to the USTA. The "US Open Excitement" campaign helped increase television ratings 100 percent over 1998, and ticket sales for the event were up 16 percent. Following the "Direct Response TV" campaign, memberships in the USTA jumped 69 percent, with the organization adding more than 16,000 new members. In addition, both campaigns were recognized with EFFIE, CLIO, and Athena awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The United States National Lawn Tennis Association was founded in 1881 as the governing organization for the sport. By 1999 the organization's name had been changed to the United States Tennis Association, and its purpose had grown to include promoting both community and professional tennis, developing world-class American tennis players by helping to provide the best coaches and training facilities, and encouraging cultural diversity in the sport. The organization also owned the US Open, one of four worldwide Grand Slam tennis tournaments.

Despite its long history and its appeal as a sport people could play throughout their lives, tennis was in a decline that had begun in the 1980s. In 1995 the USTA replaced its New York agency, Ammirati & Puris/Lintas, and launched a marketing campaign created by Grybauskas Beatrice, also based in New York. The campaign, which was designed to attract new players to the sport, was titled "Get in the Game" and featured tennis players like Pete Sampras and Andre Agassi. But interest in the sport continued to slip. According to the USTA, in 1999 the number of tennis players overall had dropped by 50 percent since the early 1980s. The number of players younger than 25 had dropped 15 percent during the same period. Further evidence of the declining participation in tennis was seen in the sales of such equipment as tennis racquets, which fell 40 percent in the 1990s. Although interest in the US Open was strong, ticket sales were down, and while individual memberships in the USTA were at 500,000, growth was stagnant, with only a reported 3 of every 100 tennis players signing on as members in 1999.

With the goal of increasing ticket sales for the US Open as well as television viewership for the tournament, the USTA reviewed a list of agencies, including Lowe & Partners, NW Ayer, and the Lord Group. The organization finally selected Fallon McElligott to create a multimedia campaign to promote the US Open and to increase membership in the USTA.

WEBSITE ENCOURAGES KIDS TO PLAY TENNIS

The United States Tennis Association created a website targeting kids who wanted to play tennis, along with their parents. The site, littletennis.com, included games and contests as well as information for parents, such as how to locate Little Tennis programs for kids, an online magazine with tennis-related articles, and a calendar of tennis and Little Tennis events.

TARGET MARKET

The USTA's 1999 marketing campaign was two pronged, and it was aimed at two distinct target audiences. Phase one of the campaign, "US Open Excitement," was directed at younger audiences as well as a wider group of sports enthusiasts who had lost interest in watching the USTA's flagship event, the annual US Open. Phase two, "Direct Response TV," targeted tennis players who enjoyed participating in the sport but who had never become members of the USTA.

Over the years tennis had gradually earned the reputation of being slow moving and boring to watch. By the mid-1990s the typical audience attending the US Open was skewed toward older, well-educated, affluent, conservative fans. The goal of the "US Open Excitement" campaign was to win back younger enthusiasts, those between the ages of 18 and 25, along with other fans who had tuned out tennis in favor of such high-octane sports as the X Games, the events shown on ESPN's SportsCenter, and college or professional football and hockey.

Although baby boomers were playing tennis, the number of players under the age of 25 had begun to decline in the 1980s. In addition, players of all ages were going on their own rather than joining the USTA and taking advantage of the benefits it offered. According to the organization, only 3 of every 100 tennis players were members in 1999. The goal of "Direct Response TV" was to build interest in the sport and attract younger players to the game. It also was designed to build awareness of the USTA with active tennis players of all ages and to change the perception that membership in the organization was only for advanced players or for tennis professionals.

COMPETITION

Two professional sports that were winning ticket-buying fans away from the US Open, which in 1999 attracted 584,490 people during its two-week run, were baseball and football. With New York the home to two Major League Baseball and two National Football League teams, among many other diversions, the US Open thus had strong competition for local audience dollars and ticket sales as well as for television viewers. In addition, the US Open was played during the end of the professional baseball and the beginning of the professional football seasons.

Traditionally known as America's pastime, Major League Baseball in 1999 had an average attendance of 28,888 fans per game, for a season total of more than 70 million. New York's baseball teams—the Yankees and the Mets—reported per-game attendances higher than the national average, with 40,651 and 33,650, respectively, and 1999 season totals of 3.2 million fans for the Yankees and 2.7 million for the Mets. Both teams worked with their ad agencies in 1999 to create marketing campaigns designed to boost ticket sales. The Yankees choose BBDO New York to create a series of newspaper, radio, and billboard ads that emphasized the team's successful past, including 24 World Series championships. Working with its longtime agency, Della Femina/Jeary and Partners, the Mets focused on the present and the team's up-and-coming status with a campaign that used the tagline "Are you ready? New year. New team. New magic."

The National Football League's pregame battle cry was "Are you ready for some football?" For fans the answer was typically yes. In 1999 the average per-game attendance nationally was 65,349, with the total attendance for the season at 16.2 million. In New York, fans of the Jets and the Giants were equally enthusiastic. For both teams home attendance averaged about 78,000 per game in 1999. The season totals were also about the same for both, with a total of 624,847 fans attending Jets games and 623,777 attending Giants games. Traditionally seen as a blue-collar game, football was going through a transition by 1999, attracting fans who arrived at games in Range Rovers and who preferred snacking on wine and aged cheese rather than on beer and peanuts. As the crowd morphed into a wealthier, more educated demographic, it was also getting older. According to a report in the Tribune Business News, Russ Hawley, the vice president of marketing for the New York Giants, explained the reason for the changing fan base: "The fan who first bought tickets in 1970 at age 29 is now 58 and, most likely, making better money."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1999 the USTA was confronted with two challenges: turning around steadily dropping tickets sales for its main event, the US Open, and bolstering the number of people actually participating in the sport of tennis and in the USTA, whose membership had also been on a steady decline. To reverse the slide in both areas, the USTA joined with Fallon McElligott to create two separate marketing campaigns. The cost of the campaigns was estimated at $2 million.

To promote interest in the annual US Open and to increase ticket sales as well as television viewership among people unable to attend the tournament in person, Fallon McElligott created the "US Open Excitement" campaign. Besides stirring interest in the event, the campaign was designed to change the perception that watching tennis was boring and appealed only to an older, country-club set. The multimedia campaign included television spots that were aired on national networks to encourage viewers to tune in to the US Open and on channels in the New York City area to convince local residents to buy a ticket and see the action in person.

The cable, national network, and New York television spots all used humor to appeal to a younger audience. They featured an eccentric spokesman who compared tennis to such exciting-to-watch sports as basketball and figure skating, with each spot portraying what might happen if those sports took place on a tennis court. In one spot, for example, a pair of figure skaters attempted unsuccessfully to execute a difficult routine on a hard-surface tennis court rather than in an ice rink. At the end of each spot the claim was made that nothing beats "the excitement of U.S. Open tennis."

The print ads were aimed at sports fans in New York. Running in such publications as the New York Times and USA Today, they featured tennis star Andre Agassi poking good-natured fun at people skeptical of his abilities. In the ads Agassi's tournament opponents consisted of the criticisms he had faced during his career, including "Can't win the big ones" and "Doesn't train hard." He advanced through the brackets and ultimately won by defeating each charge. Other ads, which appeared on New York City buses, pictured rows of people sitting in stadium seats, with Upper East Side society women wearing hats and holding small dogs on one side and East Village punk rockers on the other. The text stated that all were "going to the U.S. Open. Are you?" Ads that appeared in New York metropolitan area commuter trains had a similar theme. In one an out-of-shape man was leading a step aerobics class. The text read that the regular instructor "will be out at the U.S. open next Thursday. You may want to do the treadmill that day. Almost everyone's going to the U.S. Open. Are you?"

The second phase of Fallon McElligott's effort, to build enthusiasm for participation in the game of tennis and to increase membership in the USTA, resulted in the creation of the "Direct Response TV" campaign. To dispel the perception that membership in the USTA was only for serious tennis players and to convince people that the organization offered something for every level of player, from beginners to professionals, Fallon McElligott developed two television spots with the tagline "Help us grow the game we all love." The spots were aired on CBS and the USA Network during the US Open. One ad, titled "Anthem," portrayed the emotional aspect of tennis, with players both winning and losing competitions. A second ad, "Benefits," took a more reasoned approach in trying to motivate people to join the USTA. The commercials included the organization's phone number and listed some of the benefits of membership, such as a free subscription to Tennis Magazine.

OUTCOME

Turning to Fallon McElligott for its two-part marketing campaign produced the results that the USTA wanted. The 1999 "US Open Excitement" campaign led to increased ticket sales, and it increased television viewership for the finals as well, with ratings up an astounding 100 percent compared to the previous year. The campaign to increase USTA membership, "Direct Response TV," had similarly positive results. According to the USTA, following the campaign's launch the organization added almost 17,000 new members in a two-week period, the single largest increase in its history.

Fallon McElligott's 1999 creative efforts for the USTA did not go unnoticed by the advertising trade. Both campaigns were awarded 2000 EFFIEs. The "US Open Excitement" campaign received a Bronze EFFIE for helping to shatter the myth that tennis matches were stuffy and boring and for increasing interest in the sport. The "Direct Response TV" campaign was recognized with a Silver EFFIE for helping to change the perception that the USTA was only for professionals or serious tennis players. Further, two of the print ads featuring Agassi were recognized with 2000 CLIO awards. The "Fed Cup Congrats" ad was included on the award short list, and the "Agassi" ad received a Bronze CLIO. The Newspaper Association of American also awarded the "Agassi" ad a grand prize in its 2000 ATHENA awards for outstanding creativity. Fallon McElligott shared the top honor, and the $100,000 prize, with Ogilvy & Mather.

FURTHER READING

Adams, Jodie. "A Perfect Match—Plan to Increase Number of Tennis Players." Parks & Recreation, October 1, 1998.

Collins, Glenn. "Tennis Association Picks a New Agency." New York Times, July 27, 1995, p. 9.

Ebenkamp, Becky. "Full Contact Tennis." Brandweek, August 23, 1999.

Goldstein, Matthew. "Yankees and Mets Pitch Hot Teams to Bring in Fans: Nostalgia in the Bronx; Pizzazz in Queens." Crain's New York Business, August 16, 1999.

Hanover, Dan. "US Open Sponsors Take Their Games off the Court with Activation Strategies Worthy of a Grand Slam Event." Promo, September 1, 2000.

Hlotyak, Elizabeth. "USTA Planning a Major Tennis Marketing Effort." Westchester County (NY) Business Journal, August 14, 2000.

Kirkpatrick, David D. "Fallon and Ogilvy Share Top Award." New York Times, September 22, 2000, p. 17.

Levere, Jane. "Tennis Group Aims Campaign at Diverse Audience to Reverse Slide in U.S. Open TV Viewing." New York Times, August 30, 1999.

"Ogilvy & Mather, Fallon Share $100,000 Grand Prize in NAA 2000 Athena Awards for Creative Newspaper Advertising; $5,000 Student Prize to the Art Center College of Design in Pasadena, Calif." PR Newswire, September 22, 2000.

Simon, Ellen. "Football Draws a More Upscale Crowd." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, September 14, 1999.

"TENNIS.COM—www.LittleTennis.com Site for Kid's Programs." Parks & Recreation, November 1, 1999.

"Tennis Growth." Parks & Recreation, June 1, 1999.

"United States Tennis Association Selects Fallon McElligott New York City to Produce US OPEN and USTA Advertising Campaigns." Business Wire, May 3, 1999.

"USTA and NRPA: A Logical Partnership." Parks & Recreation, July 1, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

UnitedHealth Group, Inc.

UnitedHealth Group Center
9900 Bren Road East
Minnetonka, Minnesota 55343
USA
Telephone: (952) 936-1300
Fax: (952) 936-7430
Web site: www.unitedhealthgroup.com

■■■

IT JUST MAKES SENSE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

UnitedHealth Group, Inc., founded in 1974 as Charter Med Inc., was at the top of the health-insurance business in 2003, providing to 40 million consumers services that included a health maintenance organization (HMO), administrative support for companies providing their own insurance, and specialized services for Medicare beneficiaries. Financially the company was also at a high point, with revenues increasing from $11.8 billion in 1997 to an estimated $29 billion in 2003. But UnitedHealthcare, the company's business segment that served as an HMO, was suffering an identity crisis. Although UnitedHealthcare counted nearly eight million members, it believed that it had low brand awareness, no brand equity, and little brand definition among consumers. The HMO provider was also concerned about consumers' negative perceptions of health maintenance organizations.

To build brand awareness and brand identity as well as to reverse consumers' opinions that HMOs were more concerned about rate increases and benefits reductions than patient care, UnitedHealthcare released a marketing campaign in 2003. A pilot campaign with the theme and tagline "It Just Makes Sense" was introduced in three target markets. Created by Austin, Texas–based GSD&M, which had been UnitedHealthcare's agency since 2000, the campaign included television and radio spots and newspaper print ads. Budget information specific to the campaign was unavailable, but Adweek reported that the account was estimated at $25 to $30 million when GSD&M won it.

The humorous advertisements, which featured people caught in different situations that guaranteed they would need an HMO in the end, were a success. Not only did the campaign achieve its goals of increasing brand awareness and strengthening brand identity, but in 2004 "It Just Makes Sense" was broadened into UnitedHealthcare's first national campaign. The campaign was also awarded a Silver EFFIE in 2005 for helping to position UnitedHealthcare as an "innovative leader in health care coverage."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Charter Med Inc. was founded in 1974; three years later United Healthcare Corp. was created and acquired Charter Med. The company's name was changed in 1998 to UnitedHealth Group, and through a strategic realignment UnitedHealthcare became one of six independent but linked businesses operating under the UnitedHealth Group banner, which also included Americhoice, Ovations, Uniprise, Ingenix, and Specialized Care Services. Each business segment provided its own unique services: Americhoice focused on consumers enrolled in Medicare and other government-sponsored programs; Ovations provided services to Americans 50 years and older; Uniprise offered administrative services to self-insured companies; Ingenix provided software and information services to doctors and other health-care professionals; and Specialized Care Services was a collection of specialty business subsidiaries offering specific health and wellness benefits, such as chiropractic, dental, vision, life, accident, and critical illness plans. UnitedHealthcare was an HMO with almost eight million individual, small business, and midsize business members.

In 2002 UnitedHealth Group's net income climbed 48 percent to $1.35 billion on a revenue increase of 6.7 percent to $25 billion. By 2003 the company had grown to become the largest health insurer in the United States, providing services, coverage, and products that affected more than 40 million consumers. Despite its business diversification and solid financial standing, some analysts were questioning the quality of the company's earnings—which were partly based on double-digit premium increases—and the sustainability of its growth in a health-care environment that some Wall Street insiders believed was heading toward a fall.

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN PROMOTES MAKING INFORMED HEALTH CHOICES

UnitedHealthcare's United Health Foundation released a print advertising campaign designed to help educate consumers about the health-care system and how to make better decisions related to their own health care. The campaign, which ran from October 2003 through February 2004, featured ads in consumer magazines, including People, Better Homes and Gardens, and TV Guide. Related ads appeared on the websites ABCNews.com and Parents.com, among others. The ads focused on three topic areas important to helping consumers make wise health-care decisions: "Getting the most out of a visit to the doctor's office," "Taking charge of your care," and "Using antibiotics appropriately."

TARGET MARKET

Typically the female head of household oversaw her family's health-care needs, from taking care of family members when they were ill to making decisions about when a doctor should be contacted. Women were also often responsible for the household budget. With those facts in mind, GSD&M aimed UnitedHealthcare's marketing campaign at adults 25 to 54 years old but with an emphasis on women in that age demographic. GSD&M noted in its brief submitted for the 2004 EFFIE Awards competition that the skew ratio of the campaign was 7 women for every 3 men. It stated further that women in particular were frustrated with the health-care industry and were concerned about whether their family's health-care plan would provide the best coverage for the money. These female heads of household considered it necessary that a health-care insurance provider include prescription coverage, preventive care, a large network of doctors, and products and services that were easy to understand and use.

COMPETITION

Blue Cross and Blue Shield (BCBS) provided health-care coverage to more than 85 million Americans through a variety of services, including indemnity insurance, HMOs, preferred provider organizations (PPOs), point-of-service plans, and fee-for-service plans. The company was also perhaps one of the most recognizable names in the health-care industry, due in part to its advertising efforts over the years. In 2003 increases in the price of health care were hitting consumers hard, and HealthNow, a Blue Cross Blue Shield plan provider in upstate New York, was experiencing even higher rate increases than its closest competitor. To give consumers in that market a convincing reason to pay more for BCBS, the company released an advertising campaign targeted to that specific market. The "Big Blue Arm" campaign, created by ad agency Arnold Worldwide of McLean, Virginia, was designed to present BCBS as an advocate for its members and as worth more than other insurance companies. One TV spot showed a man sitting in a restaurant ready to enjoy a meal of two big cheeseburgers. When he looked away for a moment the Big Blue Arm swooped down and knocked one of the burgers off the plate. When the man turned to see what had swept his burger away, the arm came from another angle and swiped the second burger off the plate. Additional advertisements targeted smoking, inactivity, and other health concerns, all with the Big Blue Arm intervening to help people make healthy choices. Although some consumers were offended by the ads, overall the campaign was a success. Following its 16-week run BCBS reported that membership had grown 8 percent, an all-time company high. In addition, the campaign received top honors in 2004 during the Buffalo News Creative Advertising Awards, and it earned a 2005 Bronze EFFIE Award.

Aetna, Inc., was struggling in 2003. The insurer, which had been one of the nation's largest, was facing charges by doctors claiming the company used unfair billing practices and patient-care interference. And Aetna was in trouble financially, a problem blamed in part on overpriced acquisitions, such as the $1 billion purchase in 1999 of Prudential Healthcare. By 2001 Aetna's problems had resulted in a net loss of $279.6 million. To rein in costs and get the company back on stable ground, chairman and chief operating officer John W. Rowe increased annual rates 16 percent, cut 15,000 jobs, and reduced Aetna's customer base from 21 million in 2000 to 13 million in 2003. He also eliminated from the company's rosters about half of the U.S. counties in which Aetna had provided Medicare services. As things began to stabilize, Aetna rebuilt. In 2004 the company launched a national marketing campaign designed to reinforce the brand's value and relevance to consumers. Themed "We Want You to Know," the campaign targeted benefits consultants and brokers and the employee-benefits decision makers for companies. Print ads appeared in publications such as the Wall Street Journal, Forbes, Fortune, and BusinessWeek.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When GSD&M began work on UnitedHealthcare's "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, it was faced with the challenge of building awareness of and familiarity with the brand in a health-care environment that was increasingly leaning toward consumer-directed health care, which placed more choices and financial responsibility on the patient. The pilot campaign was designed for three test markets based on specific population criteria, including levels of consumer awareness of UnitedHealthcare (from emerging to established to heritage, or longstanding, customers). Working from the assumption that most consumers believed that the health-care process was confusing and irrational, GSD&M developed a campaign that used humor to point out the lack of common sense in both the industry and consumers. It further noted UnitedHealthcare's practical approach to health care and how it helped confused consumers to achieve healthier outcomes. The campaign, which first ran for a week in April 2003, included television and radio spots and newspaper ads in the target markets. That was followed by a second wave of advertising from November 10 to December 3.

Television spots included three that showed people making decisions with final results that made access to an HMO such as UnitedHealthcare seem like a good idea. In the first spot, titled "Bridesmaids," a wedding party was gathered in a beautiful meadow. Viewers did not realize that the meadow was at the top of a hill until the bride followed tradition and tossed her bouquet. It sailed through a pristine blue sky. As the bridesmaids raced to catch the flowers, the hapless young women went tumbling off the side of a cliff, bouncing and rolling across rocks and cacti into a lake below, to the surprise of an unsuspecting fisherman sitting in a boat on the lake. A second commercial, "Lions," featured a film crew in Africa making a documentary about lions. As a man wearing a giant lion's head approached a group of the beasts, the director said to him, "Just as I suspected, the lions are getting alarmed. Whatever happens, hold your ground. Now, initiate agitation phase." Following the instructions, the man wearing the lion's head started waving his arms and roaring. The final spot, "Hornet's Nest," showed a man on a ladder wearing gloves and goggles and facing a huge hornet's nest hanging from a branch of a tree. He said to his friend, who was waiting below with a garbage can, "Now when it drops make sure you get that lid on fast." When the man reached with clippers to cut off the branch, however, the ladder fell over, sending the man and the nest crashing to the ground and causing the angry, stinging wasps to surround both men. A voice-over at the end of each spot said, "People don't always use common sense. Fortunately, there's a health-care company that does."

The print ads and a spot that was aired on the radio reinforced the message delivered in the TV commercials. The radio spot had a woman thanking a man for helping her move some boxes and warning him to be careful on the stairs. Once the man was laden with piles of boxes, the woman asked him if he could see. The man answered that he could, which was followed by crashing and thumping sounds as he fell down a flight of stairs. When the sounds stopped, indicating that the man's fall had ended, the woman asked him, "Are you okay, can you stand?" The man responded that he was okay. He apparently tried to stand, and suddenly there were the crashing sounds of the man falling down more stairs. The same tagline used in the television spots followed. Newspaper ads included a variation of the "Hornet's Nest" TV spot: a man was depicted trying to remove a hornet's nest from the second-story eaves of his house with a rapidly spinning weed-whacker. Another print ad, "Lawnmower," pictured a man lifting a buzzing power lawnmower over his head in an attempt to trim a towering hedge surrounding his lawn.

OUTCOME

"It Just Makes Sense" was so successful at achieving its goals of increasing UnitedHealthcare brand awareness and building a positive perception of the brand among consumers in test markets that, rather than proceed with a planned final media wave in the test areas, the campaign was expanded into a national promotion in 2004. It was the company's first national marketing campaign.

Following the initial release of the campaign, Adweek included the television spot "Hornet's Nest" on its June 2003 Best Spots list, describing the campaign as turning good sense into an art form. The campaign was awarded a Silver EFFIE by the New York American Marketing Association in 2005. In addition, the company reported that the campaign resulted in significant increases in brand awareness among consumers; awareness jumped from 65 percent prior to the April 2003 launch to 79 percent afterward. Consumers' perceptions of the UnitedHealthcare brand's key attributes also showed positive increases. Research based on a seven-point scale showed one-point increases, or slightly less, in most areas, including perceptions that UnitedHealthcare was a strong and stable company (4.6 to 5.6), that it provided a practical approach to health care (4.3 to 5.3), that it was a health-care company that made sense (4.3 to 5.3), and that it was a leader in the health-care industry (5.4 to 5.4).

FURTHER READING

"Aetna Launches New National Advertising Campaign." Business Wire, February 16, 2004.

"Aetna's Painful Recovery. Jack Rowe Fixed the Insurer's Finances—But Are His Methods Good for Health Care?" BusinessWeek Online, December 8, 2003. Available from <http://businessweek.com/magazine/content/03_49/b3861097.htm>

"Buffalo, N.Y., Newspaper Presents Awards for Creativity in Advertising." Buffalo (NY) News, June 29, 2004.

Chura, Hillary. "Sharing Strategies: GSD&M Clients Hit Austin City Limits." Advertising Age, February 18, 2002.

Desloge, Rick. "Walli to Replace Turvey as Head of United Healthcare." St. Louis (MO) Business Journal, September 19, 2003.

Lang, Mark. "Best Spots of June: United Healthcare Tickles the Funny Bone." Adweek, July 14, 2003.

"Quiet Giant." HealthLeaders Magazine, April 1, 2003.

"UnitedHealth Group Reports Record First Quarter Earnings of $1.29 Per Share." Business Wire, April 16, 2003.

Wasserman, Todd. "Advertising: UHC Looks on Light Side of Pain, Injuries." Adweek, July 14, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

V & S Vin & Sprit AB

Box 47319
Stockholm, SE 117 97
Sweden
Telephone: 46 8 7447000
Web site: www.vinsprit.se

■■■

ABSOLUT DIRECTOR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Absolut Vodka, owned by the Swedish government monopoly V & S Vin & Sprit AB, was a brand built entirely on image. The famous Absolut print campaign, created by ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day and launched in 1981, featured endless permutations of a single formula: an image of the iconic bottle along with minimal copy pairing the brand name with a single proper or common noun. By its 20th year the print campaign could claim not only to have almost single-handedly led Absolut from obscurity to monumental success but also to have engineered a distinct Absolut personality, one of the most recognizable consumer-product images in the world. Often described as witty, stylish, smart, and trendsetting, the Absolut brand was, then, a natural candidate to experiment with the implementation of new technologies on its consumer website. Having already established a commitment to interactivity on its website, Absolut in 2001 unveiled "Absolut Director," an application that allowed online visitors to make their own short films.

"Absolut Director" provided more than 35 clips from an old Japanese monster movie, which users could rearrange as they pleased, while writing their own dialogue and building a soundtrack from a range of speaking voices and musical accompaniment. The final products created ranged in length from 30 seconds to four minutes, and the site encouraged the amateur filmmakers to E-mail a link allowing friends to view their handiwork, thereby increasing the number of visitors to "Absolut Director." A print ad carrying the same tagline likewise raised awareness of the site in an attempt to generate more online visits.

Linking such online promotions to actual sales was extremely difficult, and industry observers were split on the question of whether or not platforms like "Absolut Director" did any useful branding work. Absolut continued to experiment with interactive online marketing, however. Though the brand continued to be the top imported vodka in America, its sales remained flat amid increasing competition from higher-priced brands and an overall vodka-industry boom.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Owned by V & S Vin & Sprit AB, which was backed by the Swedish government, Absolut Vodka nominally traced its history to 1879, when a brand of vodka carrying the Absolut name was first brewed near Ahus in southern Sweden. That original brand ultimately dropped the Absolut from its name, and in the late 1970s an entrepreneur named Gunnar Broman decided to use the name, while claiming the older product's historical and geographical roots, for a new brand of vodka he planned on exporting from Sweden to America. Absolut Vodka did not yet exist as a product—there was no formula for the beverage, nor was there any distribution network in place—when Broman arrived in New York with prototypes of the distinctive bottle that would ultimately define the brand, trying to enlist an advertising agency to his cause. After a slow start following the product's 1979 launch, Absolut was dropped by its first ad agency, but then the account moved to TBWA\Chiat\Day, which built the Absolut brand virtually from scratch.

A print ad from the "Absolut Director" campaign. PHOTO COURTESY OF THE ABSOLUT SPIRITS COMPANY, INC. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

The Absolut print campaign's multiple-decade run began in 1981. It featured hundreds of variations on the same format: an image in the shape of the product's bottle ran with a two-word tag line that always began with "Absolut." The campaign's first execution, tagged "Absolut Perfection," featured a simple image of the bottle topped by a halo. Absolut-bottle-shaped images designed by famous artists, beginning with Andy Warhol in 1985, lent the brand a cutting-edge reputation, as did a focus on individuals from the world of high fashion, but the concept was infinitely mutable. It was applied, for example, to cities, countries, writers, photographers, holidays, seasons, topographical features, states of mind, and abstract concepts. Each twist on the format was meant to represent an interpretation of the world from an "Absolut perspective," and together the different executions amounted to a brand personality often described as elegant, hip, sophisticated, creative, and intelligent. In 1999 Advertising Age ranked the still-running Absolut campaign in the top 10 twentieth-century advertising campaigns.

With the rise of the Internet, distilled-spirits brands in particular saw a new avenue for marketing. Largely locked out of the image-building possibilities offered by television advertising, Absolut and other liquor brands established an early and often elaborate cyberspace presence, despite the fact that they could not sell their products online. Absolut first experimented with a website catering to early users of the Internet in 1996. In October 2000 the brand launched its well-regarded Absolut.com site, meant to appeal to the entire range of the Absolut target market. Among the initial features offered to visitors to www.Absolut.com was an interactive component called "Absolut DJ," which allowed Web surfers to mix dance songs and samples into new musical concoctions of their own.

ABSOLUT ONLINE

Though its print campaign was one of the longest running in advertising history, Absolut was hardly complacent when it came to investigating new ways of communicating with consumers. Absolut had been exploring ways to make creative use of its website since the early days of the Internet. In 1996, as competitors launched websites for general audiences, Absolut understood that its online audience at that time must necessarily be a technology-savvy group seeking out cutting-edge Web experiences. Early versions of the site therefore focused on the art and design elements behind the long-running print campaign. Then, as the Internet became populated by a broader range of the Absolut target market, the brand adapted its website accordingly. The result was a site that many pointed to as one of the alcohol industry's best, balancing creativity and sophistication with accessibility, all aimed at reinforcing the clear product image for which the brand was renowned.

TARGET MARKET

Though Absolut, in its print campaign, had long been able to tailor individual executions of its bottle concept to specific subsets of its target market, its branded online content was intended for the entire range of young people in its target group: 21- to 40-year-old drinkers of premium-priced liquors who were, according to V & S, "youthful in mind, active, outgoing, sociable, somewhat trend-conscious and fashionable."

"Absolut Director," moreover, built on the brand's 20-year heritage of creativity, as established in its print campaign. Having consistently used figures from the art and fashion worlds to communicate with those who appreciated creativity, Absolut was a natural fit for the marketing profile that an interactive movie-making platform offered. By allowing members of its target market to exercise their own creativity, the brand underscored its well-established commitment to creativity. In showing its adeptness with new technologies well in advance of most consumer products, Absolut likewise reaffirmed its reputation for cutting-edge sophistication.

COMPETITION

Though Absolut was America's top imported vodka, its sales fell well short of those of the total vodka-market leader, the more affordable domestic brand Smirnoff. Absolut, which was categorized as a premium vodka, was likewise being threatened, during this time, by a range of higher-priced imports, so-called super-premium competitors, such as Grey Goose and Belvedere. Vodka was the leading growth category among spirits in the U.S. during the early years of the new millennium, with much of that growth attributable to the explosive market gains made by these super-premium brands.

Smirnoff, whose sales had declined significantly from a 1990 peak, was attempting to increase awareness of the brand through various channels in the early 2000s. The brand became the first liquor to be advertised on network TV when, in 2001, NBC announced that it was rescinding the voluntary ban on hard alcohol ads that the three major networks had observed since the 1950s. In keeping with a list of 19 restrictions imposed by NBC, Smirnoff began running branded public-service spots warning against drunk driving, before NBC reversed itself, a few months later, under pressure from advocacy groups. But the Smirnoff name was, at the same time, reaching consumers via network and cable television in another way. Its British parent company, Diageo, had recently unveiled an entry in the category of "malternatives"—sweet, lightly carbonated beverages brewed like beer and thus not subject to the marketing restrictions imposed on hard liquor—under the Smirnoff name. Smirnoff Ice, as this product was called, became the top seller in a category whose target market largely consisted of entry-age drinkers. Industry observers noted that Smirnoff vodka, which otherwise had been unsuccessful in appealing to young people, benefited from its sibling brand's popularity and comparatively unrestricted ability to advertise on television. Smirnoff vodka's sales volume rose 25 percent between 2000 and 2003.

Super-premium vodka brands, meanwhile, began cutting into Absolut's market share from above, challenging its long-established near-monopoly among stylish high-end vodka drinkers. Brands such as Grey Goose and Belvedere, which cost approximately $30, compared with Absolut's $20 per bottle, emphasized such product attributes as the types of grain and distillation processes used to manufacture their vodkas. Grey Goose, the leading super-premium brand, found particular success in touting taste-test results supposedly indicating that it was the "World's best tasting vodka." In building its brand, Absolut had typically eschewed any reference to the product itself, focusing almost exclusively on image and style as embodied by its iconic bottle. As specialty-cocktail drinkers in hip urban nightclubs began claiming they could taste the difference between Grey Goose and Absolut—even when the seasoned bartenders who made those cocktails, as Forbes reported, could not—Absolut began running print ads emphasizing the grain and water from which its vodka was made. Grey Goose sales grew by 410 percent between 2000 and 2004.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Absolut Director" was created by the New York–based branding and entertainment studio Submarine, together with agency of record TBWA\Chiat\Day, the interactive design and direction firm Zendo Studios, and system architects Pillar Applications. The website, part of the larger Absolut.com home page, was meant to support the brand's wider marketing profile as maintained in the vaunted Absolut print campaign, while also raising awareness of the product's online presence. Although Absolut marketing executives acknowledged the difficulty of linking sales figures to branded content on a product's Internet home page, they believed that a dynamic online presence helped to establish or augment the consumer-to-brand relationship. Absolut's strategy for initiating this process hinged on the inclusion of interactive features on its website. "Absolut Director," like its online predecessor "Absolut DJ," maximized website visitors' interaction with the brand.

The application allowed visitors to select and arrange to their own liking more than 35 snippets of a 1960s Japanese science-fiction film, which they could then enhance with their own dialogue, speaking voices of their choice, and a variety of music options. This format was, according to Submarine's creative team, inspired by the Woody Allen movie What's Up Tiger Lily, which paired a preexisting Japanese spy movie with a new, tongue-in-cheek script. The finalized "Absolut Director" movies varied from 30 seconds and four minutes in length, and the creators were given the option of inviting family and friends to watch their movies. Such invitations, delivered in E-mail messages providing a Web link, drove further traffic to the "Absolut Director" site. Participants also had the option of entering their movies as "must see" picks to be showcased, if chosen, in a prominent position on the site.

Absolut enlisted high-profile feature-film directors to create the first movies using the "Absolut Director" application, thus stoking interest in the site while providing examples for the creative utilization of the supplied materials. Spike Lee was the first director to make a movie using the "Absolut Director" materials, and his effort was followed by films from directors Mary Harron, Chris Smith, John C. Walsh, and Mary Gillen. Simultaneously, TBWA\Chiat\Day crafted an "Absolut Director" ad following the classic print campaign format. It ran in magazines as a means of publicizing the site.

A Submarine-developed technology called H.I.L.D.E. (Highly Interactive Language-Enabled Director Experiment) was at the center of the "Absolut Director" experience. H.I.L.D.E. appeared as a female on-screen icon who guided website visitors through the process of making their movies. The technology also enabled the translation of typed dialogue into a voice file so that the onscreen actors actually spoke the words devised by movie makers.

OUTCOME

Industry analysts were divided on the efficacy of the branding accomplished via platforms such as "Absolut Director." Some argued that consumers visited product websites in search of practical information and promotional offers, not to interact with the brand. Supporters of the marketing approach, by contrast, believed that interactive online sites encouraged intimacy with the essence of a brand, which was the ultimate goal of conventional advertising and supposedly a primary driver of consumer choice. The difficulty of correlating Web visits to sales meant that no clear answer to the debate was likely to emerge.

Absolut continued to take a clear position on such issues, however. The brand remained committed to an interactive online presence and followed up "Absolut Director" with its first online campaign beyond its own homepage. The ads, placed on such websites as Yahoo!, E! Online, and CBS Marketwatch, featured the trademark format of a bottle and a two-word tagline from the print campaign, but they allowed Web visitors to rearrange the image, text, and other elements. As they did so, the elements of the ad underwent intriguing graphic and textual transformations. Absolut.com, moreover, remained one of the alcohol industry's most elaborate interactive websites.

Absolut's struggle to maintain its market share in the face of vigorous growth among super-premium vodkas was further complicated when its U.S. distributor, Seagram, divested itself of its alcohol holdings as part of a merger with French conglogmerate Vivendi. Though V&S eventually partnered with Jim Beam Brands for the U.S. distribution of Absolut, the shakeup was partly blamed for what became an extended period of lackluster sales. Between 2000 and 2004 Absolut sales remained flat at about 4.5 million cases per year, whereas total vodka sales in the United States increased by 17 percent during the same period.

FURTHER READING

Branch, Shelly. "Absolut's Latest Ad Leaves Bottle Behind." Wall Street Journal, May 3, 2001.

Chura, Hillary. "Drinking In the Internet." Advertising Age, September 3, 2001.

Cocoran, Ian. "Absolut Brilliance." Brandchannel.com, March 11, 2002. Available from <http://www.brandchannel.com/features_profile.asp?pr_id=60>

Hein, Kenneth. "Grey Goose Builds Nest with Drinks, Dollars." Brandweek, March 11, 2002.

Kaplan, David. "NBC Falls off the Wagon." Adweek, December 17, 2001.

Korolishin, Jennifer. "Click to Quench." Beverage Industry, September 2004.

Lewis, Richard. Absolut Book: The Absolut Vodka Advertising Story. Boston: Journey Editions, 1996.

Mack, Ann M. "Absolut Launches Net Campaign." Adweek, August 6, 2001.

Miller, Matthew. "Absolut Chaos." Forbes, December 13, 2004.

Saunders, Christopher. "Absolut Unveils 'Director' Web Promotion." ClickZ News, May 22, 2001. Available from <www.clickz.com/news/article.php/771201>

Mark Lane

ABSOLUT PRINT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1981 Carillon Importers released an advertising campaign to establish an identity for Absolut Vodka, a premium vodka made in Sweden and owned by that country's government-backed monopoly V&S Vin & Sprit. At the time Absolut was unknown in the United States, and Americans were not accustomed to paying a premium for vodka. Experts in the distilled-spirits market predicted a quick death for the higher-priced product. But largely because of Absolut's innovative and tremendously popular print ad campaign, Absolut rapidly became the best-selling imported vodka in the United States and captured a sizable portion of total vodka sales.

Created by the ad agency TBWA (which later became TBWA\Chiat\Day), the campaign was one of the longest running in advertising history. It consisted of hundreds of print ads that appeared in magazines ranging from the mainstream Sports Illustrated to the limited-circulation I.D. Each ad featured the Absolut bottle, or a representation of it, in a humorous or clever situation. Accompanying the bottle was a two-word tagline, the first word of which was always "Absolut." One early ad, for example, consisted of an Absolut bottle surrounded by fish and coral with the tagline "Absolut Treasure." Over the years TBWA broadened the concept of the campaign to include original artwork incorporating the Absolut bottle, with the first of these crafted by pop artist Andy Warhol. Moreover, TBWA oversaw the creation of new categories: Absolut fashion ads, which displayed the clothes of designers; so-called spectaculars, onetime ads that often included a gift for the consumer; and ads on cities, which paid homage to both particular cities and the Absolut bottle.

The "Absolut Print" campaign was one of the most lauded and successful in advertising history. It won every major advertising award and was widely viewed as being almost single-handedly responsible for Absolut's 20 years of explosive growth. From the campaign's inception in 1981 to 1995, sales increased 14,900 percent. Collectors of Absolut ads abounded, and hundreds of websites devoted to the ads sprang up on the Internet. Absolut continued to see consistent growth through 2000, but flattening sales thereafter led some to predict that the brand's heyday had passed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Absolut Vodka had been produced since the 1870s. By 1970, however, Absolut's brand owners, V&S Vin & Sprit, realized that the company's distillery in Aarhus, Sweden, could remain viable only by increasing sales volume through exports. During the 1970s the United States accounted for 60 percent of the vodka consumed in the world. Thus, it was natural that the Swedish vodka would target Americans, but entry into the U.S. market posed a challenge. Almost all of the vodka consumed in the United States was domestically made, and the niche for imported vodka was dominated by Russian brands, especially Stolichnaya. Moreover, most Americans were not willing to spend more to purchase a "luxury" imported vodka, which was generally valued for its relative tastelessness rather than for any qualities that connoisseurs might appreciate.

Vin & Sprit set out to secure an importer for Absolut and in 1978 settled on Carillon Importers, which also imported the high-end liquor Grand Marnier. Carillon sought to create a unique look and feel for Absolut. In order to distinguish the product from other vodkas, Carillon designed a short-necked, rounded bottle inspired by Swedish medicine decanters and printed the product information directly on the bottle rather than on the standard paper labels. When TBWA landed the Carillon account in 1980, it faced a daunting task. The agency "had to establish that Absolut was the best vodka on the market without actually saying that in the ad," Richard Lewis, TBWA\Chiat\Day's worldwide account director for the brand, wrote in Absolut Book: The Absolut Vodka Advertising Story.

In attempting to craft an ad campaign that reflected positively on both the product and the person consuming it, the TBWA creative team of Geoff Hayes and Graham Turner decided to focus on the architecture of the Absolut bottle. In a burst of inspiration Hayes hit upon the idea of "Absolut Perfection," which featured a slick photo of the Absolut bottle topped with a halo. The hallmark of the ad was its utter simplicity and a good measure of humor, characteristics TBWA sought for the entire campaign. "Absolut Bravo," which followed shortly afterward, was the first of the ads to be designed for a specific magazine. In this ad, roses were being flung at the Absolut bottle, as if after a bravura performance. The shot was constructed to appear in Playbill, and the theme targeted the magazine's audience. "We wanted to get into the reader's head, wherever he or she was at that very moment," said Lewis. The ad was both a salute to the product and to the actual performance taking place. "Absolut Phenomenon," which covered two pages and showed a rainbow emanating from an Absolut bottle and arcing into a glass of ice, was the first in which Carillon and TBWA experimented with an ad's placement in a magazine.

All of these were what Lewis termed "product ads," in that they featured the Absolut bottle. As the product and the campaign became more recognizable, Carillon and TBWA branched out. "Absolut Stardom," which appeared in 1984, was the first in which the image presented in the ad was not the actual glass bottle. Instead, the bottle image—depicted as a Broadway marquee—was made up of nearly 5,000 individual lights. Although "Absolut Stardom" marked a shift away from literal representations of the Absolut bottle, the trademark remained the distinctive image of the round-shouldered bottle with the perky lid.

In 1985 the Absolut campaign expanded in another innovative direction. Michel Roux, CEO of Carillon, wanted to shore up the vodka's fashionable identity. He commissioned Warhol to produce an original artwork that contained a representation of the Absolut bottle. It was the first time a company had employed art as a marketing strategy. "Absolut Warhol" was a success, and Absolut then commissioned original works from a diverse group of artists. Later collections of works by African-American, Russian, and gay artists were released. A similar venture was the "Absolut Fashion" collection, which began in 1987. After commissioning original designs from top fashion designers featuring representations of the Absolut bottle, TBWA and Carillon photographed models wearing the clothes. Not surprisingly, these ads generally ran in fashion-oriented magazines such as Cosmopolitan and GQ. Another subgenre of the campaign was dubbed "Absolut Spectaculars." These were onetime advertising extravaganzas that often involved a prize for consumers. On Father's Day in 1997, for example, Absolut inserted ties into copies of the New York Times delivered in 12 major cities. The ties, a nod to the stereotypical Father's Day present, were emblazoned with Absolut bottle-shaped sperm.

TARGET MARKET

As a high-end imported vodka, Absolut first sought to reach consumers with a college degree who were working at either their first or second job and who enjoyed the arts and nightlife. According to Lewis, however, the Absolut strategy had always been one of inclusiveness. "We really are interested in men and women of the legal drinking age and over," he said. "Our campaign has an open-door policy. It welcomes all consumers." He stressed that, by rarely featuring people in the ads, the campaign did not limit its appeal to different groups of people. "The brand remains interesting to the ever-new waves of consumers because we fit inside the consumer's imagination about the role the brand plays with them."

One group that the "Absolut Print" campaign consistently targeted was the arts community. The sophistication of the arts ads, especially the "Absolut Artists" and "Absolut Fashion" series, was intended both to appeal to a more urbane audience and to shore up the brand's chic image. After an artist's commissioned work for Absolut was completed, the company hosted an opening that served to publicize the product in the art world. Similarly, some of the "Absolut Fashion" ads ran as multipage inserts in fashion magazines. As a matter of strict policy, Absolut ads portrayed only items or locations that were classy or prestigious. "We perennially strove to maintain Absolut's premium image,'' Lewis wrote in Absolut Book.

TBWA and Absolut also attempted to reach an audience beyond those who actually encountered the ads in magazines. ''Absolut Spectaculars'' were designed to attract media attention and enhance the brand's presence in the public consciousness. The first such effort was made in 1987, when Absolut embedded a musical chip that played Christmas carols into a card inserted in New York magazine. Not only were individual consumers enchanted with what was at the time a high-tech trick, but newscasters demonstrated the card on the air, giving Absolut a bonanza of free publicity. Even a New Yorker cartoon was devoted to the subject. In later years Absolut gave away Nicole Miller ties, Donna Karan gloves, and the 1997 Father's Day tie, all inside magazines or newspapers and all designed to bring the product to the attention of a large segment of the population.

Absolut did seek to appeal to specific demographic groups, however. The ''Absolut Cities'' series, using the Absolut bottle in ways that played off familiar landmarks or perceptions of cities, originated as a way of increasing the brand's visibility in specific markets. The first of the series, ''Absolut L.A.,'' featuring a swimming pool shaped like an Absolut bottle, appeared in 1987 as the brand sought to reach more southern California consumers. The ad first ran in regional publications before being incorporated into the national campaign. Absolut repeated the strategy with cities such as Miami, Pittsburgh, Saint Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco. The company also reached out to the gay community by advertising in the gay press and to African-Americans by commissioning original artworks by well-known black artists.

COMPETITION

Absolut's print campaign revolutionized advertising for alcoholic beverages. While traditional alcohol ads portrayed party scenes, happy-go-lucky couples imbibing the product, or a simple close-up of a bottle, Absolut focused on image. ''We made alcohol advertising interesting, funny, and challenging,'' said Lewis. Absolut's efforts paid off. By 1987 Absolut's sales were soaring and had surpassed Stolichnaya, formerly the leading imported vodka. But Absolut's success served as an example for other vodka and spirits makers, and the import business grew quickly. Absolut faced competition not only from its old rival Stolichnaya but also from Brown-Forman's Finlandia, Skyy Spirits' Skyy Blue, Sidney Frank Importing's Grey Goose, and Millennium Import's Belvedere. Although vodka sales in general were flat, sales of premium brands continued to grow.

According to Advertising Age, many of the premium vodka brands ''rely more on word-of-mouth and offbeat marketing techniques than paid media advertising to drive sales.'' Nevertheless, many of Absolut's competitors learned the lesson summarized by an analyst for the Buffalo News: ''Well-advertised brands, such as Absolut Vodka, are doing well.'' In 1998 Finlandia, which controlled 4 percent of the market in imported premium vodka, launched a redesigned bottle. At the same time Finlandia embarked on a new print campaign that stressed the brand's ''purity.'' According to the St. Louis Courier-Journal, the goal was to ''create a more sophisticated image for the brand.'' In addition to adopting a more hands-on advertising approach, Sidney Frank Importing began an upscale ad campaign for its Grey Goose vodka in 1997. Skyy Blue vodka likewise relied on chic print ads that played off the architecture of the Skyy bottle. Stolichnaya's print campaign featured illustrations done in the Soviet socialist realist style.

Another challenge for Absolut was that in about 1998 the imported-vodka market in the United States began to change. Absolut had virtually created the U.S. market for expensive imported vodka, but superpremium vodkas, led by Grey Goose, effectively created an even more rarified vodka category. Whereas Absolut had in essence dodged the question of product quality and sold itself strictly based on a distinct brand image, Grey Goose found success with a product-quality pitch communicated both through print advertising and by word-of-mouth work with bartenders. Grey Goose grew 410 percent between 2000 and 2004, and a host of superpremiums jumped on the product-quality bandwagon. The rapid growth of the superpremium category came mainly at the expense of Absolut, whose sales began flattening in 2000.

THE JOKE'S ON YOU

An Absolut ad appeared in the New York Times on April 1, 1997, that raised the hackles of readers, with thousands calling the company to complain. ''You are now reading the first ad in the new Absolut Vodka campaign,'' the ad copy proclaimed. ''The first in a series of messages from a company that has a lot to say about vodka.'' The ad then recounted the delightful aspects of Absolut—the tiny Swedish hamlet in which the vodka was distilled and the grain from Sweden that was the vodka's ''secret ingredient.'' The ad listed a phone number for readers to call with comments. Those who telephoned heard a recording that ended with the following statement: ''As for that bit about the demise of the advertising campaign as you know it, well, Absolut April Fools. Cheers.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

Absolut employed a two-pronged strategy in its efforts to break into and then increase its share of the U.S. vodka market. It strove to craft ads that had broad appeal because of both their content and the mainstream magazines in which they ran. In addition, by creating tailor-made ads, the brand targeted many narrower consumer segments simultaneously. Absolut commissioned ads from a Chicago group called Thirst specifically to appear in the international design magazine I.D. Digital artists made ads for the back cover of Wired magazine. In 1997 Absolut joined forces with fashion designer Gianni Versace and photographer Herb Ritts for an ad exclusively for Vogue, the preeminent fashion magazine. Gay artists were commissioned to produce ads for publications such as the Advocate. Matching ads to magazines meant that the campaign was able to target groups with precision and build its customer base.

TBWA and Absolut sought advice from the magazines themselves in creating these tailor-made ads. By doing so, they redefined the relationship of advertisers and the magazines paid to carry their messages. Moreover, because Absolut spent almost its entire budget on the print campaign (between 1997 and 2005 the annual budget varied, ranging from $25 million to $35 million), the brand was an important source of revenue for the publications in which it advertised. The campaign's success created what Lewis termed the "Pied Piper effect." Magazines clamored for Absolut's advertising because the presence of its ads attracted other advertisers to the publications. Absolut thus developed a nearly symbiotic relationship with its chosen medium.

The "Absolut Print" ads appeared in more than 200 magazines. The Absolut brand team's primary concern in selecting a publication in which to advertise was to ensure that the magazine reflected the brand's image of status and quality. "It has to be a magazine that has good editorials and that is good-looking," said Lewis. "We are careful with whom we associate the brand." Absolut ads appeared in mainstream publications such as the New Yorker, Rolling Stone, and Vanity Fair as well as in magazines with a more specialized focus and smaller circulation, including Art and Antiques, Spy Magazine, and BOMB.

OUTCOME

The "Absolut Print" campaign was wildly popular among consumers. Collectors scanned magazines, clipped ads, and traded with other devotees, and more than 200 websites were established by people who wanted to post their collections. Richard Lewis of TBWA\Chiat\Day wrote a glossy book about the campaign, Absolut Book: The Absolut Vodka Advertising Story, which became one of the best-selling business books in recent decades. The campaign transcended advertising to become an icon of pop culture, but it did more than appeal to the artistic sensibilities of magazine readers. "The Absolut campaign is one of the very lasting campaigns that has really made its mark, which is very hard to do these days," an analyst told the Star-Ledger. "It's taken Absolut from a brand that no one ever heard of and made it the leader in its category."

Despite increasing competition, Absolut maintained a 70 percent share of the premium-vodka category through the end of the twentieth century, well ahead of its closest competitor, Stolichnaya. In 1994 V&S terminated its relationship with Carillon, opting instead for the international marketing muscle of the House of Seagram. The marketing campaign continued unchanged. By 1995 sales had increased 14,900 percent since the campaign's inception. As "Absolut Print" approached its 20th year, and despite a late-1990s decline in the sales of distilled spirits, Absolut regularly posted annual sales growth of 5 percent. All analysts concurred that the Absolut campaign was an integral part of the brand's continuing strong performance. USA Today termed the campaign "a textbook case for creating successful print advertising." The campaign won virtually every advertising award in existence (over 350 total), including two Stephen E. Kelly Awards for the best magazine campaign in America. In 1999 Advertising Age named "Absolut Print" one of the 10 best advertising campaigns of the twentieth century.

It was the case, however, that the brand benefited from social and economic trends. Brandweek credited some of Absolut's success in the 1990s to "connoisseur consumerism," whereby "retro-minded consumers . . . [were] experimenting with '90s versions of classic cocktails mixed with premium and luxury-priced spirits." According to the Buffalo News, the booming economy of the 1990s empowered consumers to drink higher-priced wines and spirits such as Absolut.

Although the economy slowed in the early years of the new century, vodka sales flourished, rising by 17 percent between 2000 and 2004, primarily on the strength of explosive growth in the superpremium category. Absolut, meanwhile, saw its sales peak in 2000 and remain flat in subsequent years. This fall-off in performance was, of course, partly a result of the superpremiums' success—they had directly targeted a niche that had been Absolut's stronghold—but a portion of Absolut's struggles were also attributed to distribution miscues stemming from a 2001 split with Seagram's.

The "Absolut Print" campaign continued to run, but the brand also began to experiment more seriously with other advertising formats. One of the first consumer brands to have devoted substantial resources to its website, Absolut used interactive branding vehicles such as Absolut DJ and Absolut Director, online applications that, respectively, enabled consumers to compose their own music and make their own short films, and the brand unveiled its first full-scale online campaign in 2001. Absolut also debuted its first-ever U.S. TV spot on cable in 2004, a commercial for the newly launched Absolut Rasberri flavor that was notably consistent with the print campaign: it showed time-lapse footage of an artists' collective painting 12-foot-tall Absolut bottles. Television was also used the following year for the launch of Absolut Apeach. The most significant indicator that Absolut might be plotting a long-term change of direction, however, came in late 2005 when V&S announced that online would thereafter be Absolut's media of choice. "Print is not the key media anymore," Absolut's communications manager for new media told Brandweek. "Our consumer is more focused on the Internet and mobile communication so we're shifting also."

FURTHER READING

Allan, Terri. "Sizzle in the Swizzle." Brandweek, October 27, 1997.

Arndorfer, James. "Models to Troll Taverns for Pricey French Vodka." Advertising Age, May 5, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Absolut Vodka's Ad Spots Withstand the Test of Time." USA Today, September 15, 1997.

Fitzgerald, Beth. "The Garden State Seen through an Absolut Filter." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, March 19, 1998.

Goetz, David. "Brown-Forman Set to Push Finlandia: Distributor Hopes Finnish Vodka Can Challenge Absolut." St. Louis Courier-Journal, March 26, 1998.

Hein, Kenneth. "Print Ad Pioneer Absolut Shifts Its Focus to the Web." Brandweek, November 21, 2005.

Lewis, Richard W.. Absolut Book: The Absolut Vodka Advertising Story, Boston: Journey Editions, 1996.

Mack, Ann M.. "Absolut Launches Net Campaign." Adweek, August 6, 2001.

Mathews, Jay. "Sales Raising Spirits in the Beverage Industry, but Caution Advised on Their Stocks." Buffalo (NY) News, January 20, 1997.

Miller, Matthew. "Absolut Chaos." Forbes, December 13, 2004.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Message on a Bottle." Adweek, September 6, 2004.

Rebecca Stanfel
Mark Lane

Jesse Ventura for Governor

Minneapolis, Minnesota
USA

■■■

RETALIATE IN '98 CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

One of the most noteworthy surprises to emerge from the nationwide elections of November 3, 1998, was the election of Jesse "The Body" Ventura as governor of Minnesota. A former professional wrestler who had appeared alongside Arnold Schwarzenegger and others in a number of action movies, Ventura had served as a Navy SEAL and in 1990 had become mayor of Brooklyn Park, Minnesota. His showmanlike antics, his outspoken nature, and his appearance—Ventura had an impressive physique and a shaved head—had certainly attracted notice; but much of the credit for his electoral success went to Bill Hillsman, president of North Woods Advertising of Minneapolis. With a budget of just $500,000—as opposed to some $13 million in combined spending by Democratic opponent Hubert H. "Skip" Humphrey and Republican Norman Coleman—Hillsman and North Woods managed to craft some of the most memorable ads of the 1998 elections. The overall Ventura theme was "Retaliate in '98," and prominent television spots included "Action Figure" and "Jesse the Mind."

Ventura ran as a Reform Party candidate, distancing himself from the two traditional parties with a platform that emphasized fiscal conservatism on the one hand and social libertarianism on the other. The Ventura campaign appealed to voters disaffected with the Democrats' reputation for making government ever larger and more intrusive and the Republicans' reputation for supporting measures to limit personal freedom. Advertising took a tongue-in-cheek approach while stressing issues such as lowering property and income taxes. "Jesse hit a nerve with people," Hillsman told Kate Fitzgerald of Advertising Age. "The grass roots nature of the campaign and the basic values we were communicating got across—proving it's not about media tonnage but about impact."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Minnesota had a history of supporting candidates outside the "political establishment," according to Steven E. Schier in Washington Monthly. Thus in 1990 and 1996, Democrat "Paul Wellstone's tie-dyed leftist insurgency" for the Senate "carried him to victory over establishment Republican Rudy Boschwitz." Hillsman and North Woods also worked on the Wellstone campaign. And "Rod Grams, as emphatically to the right as Wellstone is to the left, won a Senate seat during the 1994 nationwide Republican insurgency, defeating Ann Wynia, a conventional liberal well-known and widely respected among Minnesota's political establishment."

The tradition of dissent in Minnesota and neighboring Wisconsin, whose Governor Robert La Follette was an outstanding figure of the Progressive Party during the mid-twentieth century, went back a long way. In the 1990s this came into alignment with a larger nationwide trend that had political stargazers scratching their heads. Voters had thrown out President George Bush despite the latter's popularity following the Gulf War of 1991, and Democrat Bill Clinton had won the 1992 presidential election in part because conservative voters deserted Bush for third-party candidate Ross Perot. Democrats who considered Clinton's victory a mandate for larger government were shocked by the 1994 Congressional elections, which returned Republican control to both houses of Congress after a hiatus of four decades. But in 1996 Republicans had more shocks of their own when Clinton was reelected, and Republican control of Congress began to erode.

Jesse Venture posed as Rodin's "The Thinker", in a still from a television ad that ran during his campaign for governor of Minnesota. BILLSMAN, NORTH WOODS ADVERTISING. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Enter Ventura, a candidate for Minnesota governor representing the Reform Party, which Perot had established. Born in 1951, Ventura had served with the Navy SEALs, an ultra-elite special operations force, before going on to a career as a professional wrestler in 1975. He competed in the World Wrestling Federation and the American Wrestling Association and displayed the sort of antics typical of wrestlers. A skeptical writer in Time, on the eve of the November 1998 elections, described Ventura's early career thus: "When Jesse ('The Body') Ventura starred on the professional wrestling circuit in the 1970s and '80s, he was usually cast as the bad guy. Decked out in a feather boa, sequins, and the kind of oversize glasses Elton John made famous, the 6-ft. 4-in. Ventura would flex his muscles, glower at opponents, and spit out such gems of wrestling wisdom as, 'Win if you can, lose if you must, but ALWAYS cheat!' "

In the 1998 campaign Ventura produced more priceless wisdom, such as this bon mot quoted by Debra Goldman in Adweek: "I believe Minnesota should return the entire $4 billion tax surplus to the hardworking people who paid it. I believe Led Zeppelin and the Rolling Stones are two of the greatest rock bands ever." Yet all clowning aside, Ventura—who in the 1980s appeared in movies such as Predator—did a creditable job as mayor of Brooklyn Park from 1990 to 1994. With the launch of the 1998 campaign he positioned himself as a fiscal conservative and a social liberal.

TARGET MARKET

David Kirby of the Advocate, a national gay and lesbian news magazine, described Ventura as "A straight-talking macho man and former Navy SEAL [who] . . . was the darling of fraternity boys, construction men, and other stereotypically red-blooded males. But with his libertarian views, belief in social tolerance, and friendships with gay men, Governor Ventura has turned out to be something of a gay ally, even if some of his views put him squarely opposite most gays and lesbians."

The latter was probably a reference to the fact that many gay voters favored Democratic candidates who, along with social views that were more tolerant than those of many Republicans, offered an agenda of increased government spending which was anathema to Ventura. But the fact that Ventura sat for an interview with the Advocate appeared to refute assertions that he was a right-wing extremist. His comments included this remark: "I believe everybody's a human being and should be treated with the dignity accorded to every human being."

Time listed some of Ventura's "favorite targets: a corrupt campaign-finance system, the sensationalist media, and most of all, career politicians." The article went on to note his strong appeal among young voters, but as Ventura told Kirby: "We didn't do outreach to any groups at all. Our campaign was based on no groups at all, only individuals." Certainly his appeal was strong among voters who favored greater power for the individual and less power for government.

Nick Gillespie in Reason addressed the complaint of American University historian Michael Kazin that Ventura was not a true populist because he did not attack the "ungodly 'money power'" that the Populist movement of the 1890s opposed: "at the end of the 20th century, 'money power'—indeed, power in general—is far more concentrated in government hands than in corporate ones. If populism is at all about articulating fears of 'hard-working, productive Americans,' then Ventura is a fitting spokesman. The people of Minnesota—and the rest of the United States—have far fewer reasons to resent, say, Maplewood-based 3M or the owners of Bloomington's Mall of America than they do the local, state, and federal governments that levy all sorts of regulations on them and combine to take one-third to two-fifths of their income in the form of taxes."

COMPETITION

Gillespie made these comments as part of a larger discussion that centered around famed consumer advocate Ralph Nader, one of Ventura's most outspoken critics. As Gillespie noted, on the surface one might have supposed that Nader, who had long spoken of giving power back to the "people," would have taken encouragement from Ventura's candidacy; in fact quite the opposite was true. Nader supported the idea of more government control, not less, and this put him squarely at odds with Ventura.

Likewise Ventura managed to position himself in such a way as to present both his Democratic and Republican opponents as two peas in a big-government pod. On the one side was Humphrey, son of the late Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, a Democrat who enjoyed popularity during his tenure as the state's U.S. Senator; on the other was Coleman, the Republican mayor of St. Paul. Both, as Schier noted, were "life-long government employees and officeholders. Each was personally cautious and 'button-down' in demeanor. They provided a nice gray background for Jesse's campaign antics. Every act needs a straight man, and Jesse had two of them."

ON TO 2000

With the 1998 congressional and gubernatorial races behind them, ad agencies in early 1999 began to align themselves with political candidates intent on gaining the White House. North Woods Advertising of Minneapolis, whose president Bill Hillsman was widely acclaimed as a major force behind Jesse Ventura's victory in the Minnesota governor's race, threw its lot in with Rep. John Kasich in the Ohio Republican's bid for the presidency in 2000.

Republican front-runner George W. Bush, governor of Texas and son of former President George Bush, had assembled a team that included representatives from a number of agencies, including Public Strategies in Austin, Garcia LKS in San Antonio, and Alexandria, Virginia's Stevens Schriefer Group. Alex Kroll, Young & Rubicam's chairman emeritus, was leaning toward Senator Bill Bradley in his push for the Democratic nomination over Vice President Al Gore, according to Justin Dini in Adweek. Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain was working with a media consultant from Stevens, Reed & Curcio of Alexandria.

And what about the other most talked-about race of 2000, which would potentially place Hillary Rodham Clinton against New York's Republican Mayor Rudolph Giuliani for the New York Senate seat left open by retiring Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan? According to Dini's sources, Giuliani was likely to work with Doner Public Affairs of Tampa, Florida. Clinton's team would include White House consultant Mandy Grunwald and others.

In the end Ventura dealt a sound blow to both candidates, in part by bringing out disaffected voters who might not have come to the polls had the election been a straight two-party split. But Ventura still had to deal with his many critics, in particular among the intellectual elite, who dismissed him as an intellectual lightweight made up more of style than substance. Playing on the theme of a prominent North Woods spot, some of his detractors referred to him as a mere "action figure."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The latter reference was drawn from a 30-second spot that followed "Flag" in the buildup to the November elections. The "Flag" spot showed a split screen, one side red and the other white. These were respectively labeled "Democrat" and "Republican," and the camera pulled back to show that the red and white were part of an American flag. As the pullback continued to reveal the flag's blue canton, a voice-over explained the need to have a choice between the first two alternatives.

"Action Figure" and "Drive to Victory" followed. The first of these showed two young boys playing with a Jesse Ventura action figure resembling a popular variety of toy. The Ventura action figure faced an enemy called "Evil Special Interest Man," who announced "We politicians have powers the average man can't comprehend!" The boy holding the Ventura doll responded, "I don't want your stupid money!" After a voice-over message, the Ventura doll pounded its fist on a desk with the help of one of the boys, who shouted: "This bill wastes taxpayers' money. Redraft it!" The spot concluded with a voice-over warning, "Don't waste your vote on politics as usual." The "Drive to Victory" spot also used the action figure, this time riding in a recreational vehicle—a promotion of Ventura's 72-hour marathon driving tour of the state during the last days of the electoral campaign.

Then there was "Jesse the Mind," which Kathy DeSalvo described in SHOOT: "Sepia-toned visuals picture Ventura, wearing briefs, sitting in the pose of [Auguste] Rodin's 'The Thinker.' Through dissolves and soft-panning camera moves, the POV [point of view] drifts around Ventura. Over operatic needledrop music, a voiceover relates the candidate's qualifications: 'Navy Seal. Union member. Volunteer high school football coach. Outdoorsman. Husband of 23 years. Father of two. A man who will fight to return Minnesota's budget surplus to the taxpayers. He will fight to lower property and income taxes. He does not accept money from special interest groups and will work to improve public schools by reducing class sizes.' At spot's end the camera comes to rest on the face of Ventura, who winks."

OUTCOME

By winning the November election, Ventura instantly became the nation's most recognizable new governor. In January 1999 Schier reported that "he has signed a book contract in the mid-six figures with a major publishing house, and is in negotiation with NBC for a possible TV bio-pic. Stores in Minnesota feature T-shirts proclaiming 'My Governor Can Kick Your Governor's Ass' and, more tamely, 'My Governor Can Beat Up Your Governor.'"

Also in January the new governor appeared in a public service announcement conceptualized by North Woods—and directed by Tyrel Ventura, his 19-year-old son. The spot, which he made for the Minnesota State Colleges and Universities, encouraged students to go straight to college from high school rather than taking time off.

In June 1999 Nevada personal injury attorney Edward Bernstein announced that he was exploring the possibility of a run for his state's senate seat, a move that, according to Bernstein, Ventura's success had inspired him to make. June also saw the NBC television movie, but as Michael McCarthy and others reported in Adweek, the film proved that "Ad agencies don't get much respect—particularly in the make-believe world of Hollywood." In the film's version of the Ventura story, wife Terry comes up with the idea of the campaign commercials while going through a trunk in the family's attic. Hillsman and other creative forces were incensed by the portrayal of events in the movie, which Ventura himself had neither authorized nor endorsed.

The elimination of Hillsman from the picture was certainly a gross omission; by contrast, Washington Monthly called him "The Man Behind Ventura." His spots for Ventura won praise from Adweek, which listed them among the best ads of 1998, and Advertising Age also listed these among the year's notable advertising. "If you don't do something out of the ordinary," Hillsman told Alexandra Starr of Washington Monthly, "it's going to be expensive and ineffective." In a day and age when it cost $20 million even to become a serious candidate for president, Hillsman had managed to get a man elected as governor of the nation's 20th largest state on a budget of just half a million dollars. "There is no reason why a presidential campaign should cost $20 million," he said. "It's ineffective communication that drives the price that high."

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "'Body' Politic." Adweek (Eastern edition), November 9, 1998, p. 3.

"Body-Slam Politics." Time, November 2, 1998, p. 50.

DeSalvo, Kathy. "Ventura for Governor—Yes! The Body's Quirky Ads Help Win Minnesota Race." SHOOT, November 20, 1998, pp. 7–9.

———. "Tyrel Ventura Directs Dad/Governor Jesse in PSA." SHOOT, January 18, 1999, pp. 7–8.

Dini, Justin. "Ad Figures Picking Sides for 2000" Adweek (Eastern edition), June 14, 1999, p. 7.

Fitzgerald, Kate. "Gov. Jesse Ventura: Bill Hillsman." Advertising Age, June 28, 1999, p. S-14.

Gillespie, Nick. "Populist Psychology: Why Ralph Nader Hates Jesse Ventura." Reason, March 1999, pp. 6–7.

Goldman, Debra. "Think Negative." Adweek (Eastern edition), November 2, 1998, p. 58.

Kirby, David. "The Body Speaks." Advocate, May 25, 1999, p. 25.

McCarthy, Michael, et al. "Director's Cut." Adweek, June 28, 1999, p. 46.

Schier, Steven E. "Jesse's Victory: It Was No Fluke." Washington Monthly, January 1999, p. 8.

Starr, Alexandra. "The Man Behind Ventura." Washington Monthly, June 1999, p. 25.

Judson Knight

VF Corporation

105 Corporate Center Blvd.
Greensboro, North Carolina 27408
USA
Telephone: (336) 424-6000
Fax: (336) 424-7631
Web site: www.leejeans.com

■■■

CUT TO BE NOTICED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Lee Apparel Company, a division of VF Corporation, piloted an image-altering advertising campaign that began in the autumn of 1995 and continued through 1997. Lee hoped to update its brand image in the increasingly cut-throat denim market to become relevant to a younger, hipper consumer group. Lee brand jeans had long been the favorite among female adults, and the company's marketing campaigns revolved around the message that Lee jeans were comfortable and fit well. In the 1990s, however, competition in the jeans market grew, and comfort was no longer a strong selling factor for consumers faced with numerous choices.

Fashion-conscious youths and young adults, who accounted for a large portion of denim sales, desired jeans that made them look "cool," that conveyed an attitude and a hip image. To attract this consumer group, Lee and its advertising agency, Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott, produced a series of television spots that marked a departure from past Lee ads that relied primarily on humor to promote its jeanswear. The new ads, filmed in black and white, featured attractive, young, Lee-jeans-wearing men and women in search of romance. In the spots the desired party wore Lee jeans, which suggested that those who wore Lee jeans looked enticing. Ellen Rohde, Lee's vice president of strategic planning and advertising at the time of the campaign launch, explained, "Our goal is to get young adults thinking about Lee in an entirely different way." She added, "Now that they know us as the brand that fits, we'll be working hard to promote our new products and updated image to develop an emotional connection with them."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

VF Corporation, one of the world's largest publicly held clothing manufacturers, had the apparel industry covered from head to toe. In the 1980s and 1990s, VF acquired a number of companies to stay competitive in the increasingly crowded clothing market. VF owned businesses that manufactured intimate apparel and lingerie, swimwear, sports apparel, children's clothing, and outdoor gear, such as daypacks. The company's jeanswear division, the largest portion of the company, included the Wrangler, Rustler, and Riders brands along with Lee.

Though the denim market continued to grow through the 1990s, the apparel industry overall hit a snag in the mid-1990s as consumers tightened their pocketbooks. Many in the industry felt the pinch, including VF, which saw profits decline nearly 20 percent in 1995. VF reevaluated its business strategies and decided it needed to create demand and coax consumers to buy, and to that end VF chose to create products geared toward specific consumer groups and to freshen the images of its many brands.

For previous marketing campaigns, Lee had relied on humor to send the intended message that Lee jeans were comfortable, and many spots promoted the tag line "The brand that fits." Many television ads featured women attempting to squeeze into ill-fitting jeans. One spot starred a man singing in the shower in a baritone voice. As he got dressed and put on his non-Lee jeans, he suddenly became a soprano, indicating that the jeans were too tight. Although these ads successfully educated viewers about the comfortable fit of Lee jeans, they did not provide any other compelling reasons for purchasing Lee jeans, least of all that they were "cool."

TARGET MARKET

Lee traditionally targeted adult women and had enjoyed success with this audience. For many years, including 1996, Lee was the top-selling women's jeans brand. Lee decided to shift its aim toward younger consumers in the mid-1990s as Lee introduced trendier styles, such as the Lee Riveted jeans line featured in the "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign. According to Adweek, Lee Riveted jeans were geared toward style- and image-conscious young adults who wished to be viewed as fashionable and attractive. The youth market, particularly teens, accounted for a large portion of denim sales, and many jeans manufacturers clamored to win their approval. Lee vice president Gordon Harton emphasized the importance of attracting youths in Business Week and noted, "By the time they're 24, they've adopted brands that they will use for the rest of their lives." Lee believed its Lee Riveted line would appeal to young adults as well as teens, and thus the "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign was geared to those aged 18 to 34.

When young adults shopped for jeans, the status and stylishness of the jeans played heavily into their decisions, so Lee decided to veer away from their traditional ads that focused on comfort and fit. Ellen Rohde told USA Today that consumers felt Lee's old ads were out-of-date. The old ads were humorous in a slightly embarrassing manner, which grated against the target audience's intent of looking "cool." By producing stylish spots filled with good-looking young men and women wearing Lee jeans, Lee hoped to successfully energize its brand image and generate sales. According to the Associated Press, Mackey McDonald, VF's CEO, declared, "We will be emphasizing not only that Lee jeans are comfortable, but that they're flattering, they make you look good and feel good."

COMPETITION

The jeans industry grew dramatically in the 1990s, and everyone scrambled to get a piece of the pie. According to market research firm NPD Group, U.S. jean sales hit $10.65 billion in 1996. Although VF Corp., with about 27 percent of the jeans market, continued to dominate the denim arena, the company finished second to competitor Levi Strauss & Company as the world's largest apparel manufacturer. USA Today also indicated that in 1996 Lee placed second, with 12 percent of the market, in terms of denim sales in department and specialty stores, which sold about 280 million pairs of jeans annually. Levi's commanded 28 percent.

VF's jean brands overall, however, enjoyed increasing sales in the denim market. According to figures from research firm Tactical Retail Solutions, Levi's held a market share of 48.2 percent in the men's denim market in 1990, while VF followed with 22.1 percent. Levi's share shrunk to 26.2 percent by 1997, whereas VF's grew to 31 percent. In the women's market, VF had a 14 percent share in 1990, and Levi's held 8.5 percent. VF's share increased to 16.2 percent in 1997, but Levi's share rose as well, to 9.3 percent.

VF had to contend not only with Levi's competition, but also with a market increasingly crowded with private-label jeans manufacturers and designer labels. Tommy Hilfiger, Ralph Lauren, Donna Karan, and Calvin Klein were among the designers producing high-end jeans. In 1997 designer labels accounted for about 4 percent of the market in both the men's and women's markets. Private-label jeans posed a stronger threat: In the men's market, the share held by private-label manufacturers rose from 3.2 percent in 1990 to 19.1 percent in 1997. In the women's market, the share rose from 3.1 percent to 30.1 percent. According to the Los Angeles Times, J.C. Penney's Arizona Jeans line grew into a $1 billion line in a mere six years, and Sears, Roebuck's Canyon River Blues line, only two years old in 1996, enjoyed more than $200 million in sales and blossomed into the company's largest private-label clothing line.

DENIM DIFFERENCES?

Curiously, many jeans manufacturers produced oddly similar advertising campaigns in the 1990s. Levi's, Lee, and even J.C. Penney rolled out stylized, image-conscious vignettes starring handsome young men and women in various styles of jeans. Were these companies trying to differentiate their brands from others, or were they hoping to be mistaken for another line? Marketing consultant Jack Trout told USA Today, "One of the risks Lee may be running with its new hip ads is consumers might think they're trying to be more like Levi's and less like themselves."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In an increasingly competitive denim market, Lee needed to make an impact on or connection with consumers. Fallon McElligott's Harvey Marco told Adweek, "Lee wanted to rebrand itself. . . . They felt they weren't being taken seriously as a fashion brand." The "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign was Lee's vehicle for ensuring its jeans would be noticed and the brand's image updated. To appeal to the target market, the stylized, black-and-white television spots emphasized relevant issues for the 18-to-34 age group, such as taking risks with romance, the awkwardness of meeting someone new, and feeling attractive and confident thanks to fashion. Lee did not dispense with humor completely, but the "Cut to Be Noticed" spots involved humor meant to be endearing and touching rather than campy.

To specifically reach the target audience, Lee relied heavily on cable television. In the past, Lee opted for mass-market appeal and televised spots on network television. Jamie Lockard, Lee's director of advertising, explained the advantages of buying time on cable television to Adweek and said, "There is an extremely high likelihood that you can find a specific outlet for your message on cable, one that closely matches up your merchandise with the people whose attitude and lifestyle make them the best possible target for your product." Because of this strategy, the "Cut to Be Noticed" spots appeared on MTV, Comedy Central, and also on Fox.

The campaign first launched in September 1995 with "Ferry Boat" and "Dandelion." "Ferry Boat" continued to air through 1997 because of its popularity. Initially intended to lure female consumers ("Dandelion" targeted males), the spot starred a Lee-jeans-wearing young woman on a ferryboat. Her car boasted an Ohio license plate, and suitcases rested atop the roof. As the ferryboat prepared to leave the dock, a truck screeched into the parking lot, and a young man sprinted onto the boat. He found the woman on the deck, cautiously handed her a necklace, and said, "Excuse me, but you dropped this back there." When she asked, "Where?" he replied, "In Nebraska." The spot ended with the tag line, "Cut to fit."

Two new spots, "Coffee Shop" and "Laundry Room," began airing in 1996 and were televised through 1997. These ads also played on the theme of taking extreme measures to meet the desired person in Lee jeans. In "Coffee Shop" a young man sat in a coffee shop, drinking cup after cup of coffee. His waitress wore Lee jeans, and it was clear he hoped to meet her. The hours passed, and the waitress placed the "Closed" sign on the door. She asked the young man if he wanted anything else, and he nervously suggested, "Well, ummm, maybe if you're not busy . . . maybe we can go . . . get a cup of coffee?" He then looked defeated by his comment, and the screen cut to the Lee Riveted logo and a final shot with the tag line, "Cut to be noticed."

In "Laundry Room," a male in Lee jeans was the target of affection. A young woman in the laundry room of an apartment building pushed dollar after dollar into the change machine until the "out of change" light began to flash. As she sat down, a young man entered the room with his laundry. He approached the change machine, but, to his dismay, it was empty. He looked around, spotted the young woman, and walked up to her. "Excuse me. Do you have any change?" he asked. She nonchalantly replied, "Ummm . . . let me check," and slid her purse full of quarters under her chair with her foot. The implication was that Lee jeans made one irresistible. Fallon McElligott's Dean Buckhorn, a copywriter who worked on the campaign, told Adweek, "There's someone going to great lengths to meet the hero wearing Lee jeans." Though some of the scenarios may have seemed far-fetched, Buckhorn explained that they were based in reality. "We were trying to go for a situation we've all been in."

OUTCOME

Consumers responded positively to the "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign. Company research indicated that the initial spots were on target with the intended audience and that both men and women enjoyed the ads. Gordon Harton noted, "[The consumers] seem to relate to the product benefit in the spots—being attractive to the opposite sex because you look and feel great in Lee jeans." According to a poll conducted by USA Today that determined the popularity of all the spots that aired during the 1996 Olympic Games, "Laundry Room" ranked fifth with the under-35 age group. The survey also found that "Laundry Room" was the ninth most popular overall. "Coffee Shop" was voted one of the best ads of July 1996 by Adweek, and the campaign did relatively well with Ad Track, USA Today's poll that measured the popularity and effectiveness of an advertising campaign. Of those surveyed, 22 percent said they enjoyed the ads a lot and 19 percent felt they were effective. With the younger crowd, those aged 18 to 24, the campaign was more successful—28 percent really liked the spots, and 24 percent found them effective.

The jeanswear division of VF Corp. accounted for nearly 54 percent of the company's total revenues in 1996, and despite increased competition in the denim market, VF enjoyed increased sales through 1997. The jeans market swelled to a $12.5 billion market, and VF continued to grow. Lee president Terry Lay spoke with CNN's Biz Buzz and noted that NPD Group figures indicated that Lee's market share grew 16 percent in the first half of 1998. Adweek reported NPD Group data that showed a 2 percent increase in Lee's market share with women in the 20-to-34 age group in 1996, as well as a 13 percent rise among males aged 14 to 19. In early 1998 Standard & Poor upgraded its ratings outlook on VF Corp. from stable to positive, and VF appeared on track to reach its goal of generating $7 billion in revenues by the year 2000.

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. "Lee Jeans' 'Hip' Visuals Fit Young, Affluent Consumers." USA Today, July 8, 1996.

Garfield, Bob. "Lusty Jeans Watchers Provide Pants for Lee." Advertising Age, July 22, 1996.

Haley, Kathy. "Lee Zeroes in on Younger Customers." Adweek, March 24, 1997.

Martin, Ellen Rooney. "Fallon McElligott's Black-and-White Television Campaign for Lee Apparel Co." Adweek, December 16, 1996.

———. "True Believers." Adweek, December 16, 1996.

Rosenberg, Joyce M. "There's a War out There, and VF Boss Knows It." Associated Press, February 7, 1996.

Mariko Fujinaka

FIND YOUR ONE TRUE FIT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2003, Lee Jeans, a division of VF Corporation, was a 114-year-old company whose brand of women's jeans, Lady Lee Riders, had been a staple of closets for more than 50 years. But Lee was losing young women customers to trendier brands that were tailored and marketed directly to them. Lee's challenge was to shake off the perception of young women that the brand was unfashionable, uncool, and a style their mothers wore, not a pair of jeans a hip young woman would buy.

To change this perception and to convince young women between the ages of 18 and 34 to come back to the brand, Lee introduced the One True Fit jeans. The introduction was supported by a marketing campaign, "Find Your One True Fit," developed by the company's longtime agency, Minneapolis-based Fallon Worldwide. Although the exact cost of the campaign was not revealed, according to Adweek, Lee spent $6 million and $7 million on advertising in 2001 and 2002, respectively. For the initial launch in 2003, Fallon focused exclusively on television spots that ran on the major broadcast and cable networks, including ABC, CBS, NBC, Fox, MTV, and E! Entertainment Television. In 2005 the campaign shifted to print media and was broadened to include older women who also wanted better fitting jeans. Ads appeared in such national magazines as People, More, and Marie Claire.

The "Find Your One True Fit" campaign was well received both by the consumers it targeted and by the media. Shortly after the campaign's launch, Lee reported a 20 percent overall sales increase compared with the same period in 2002. Further, consumers' positive perception of the brand jumped from 25 percent prior to the campaign to 47 percent after it had begun. In 2003 Marie Claire named One True Fit an "Editor's Pick," and in 2004 Health Magazine named the brand "Dream Jeans." In 2005 the campaign won a Silver EFFIE.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Lee Jeans was founded in 1889 as a dry goods company. The firm began manufacturing its own brand of work clothes in 1911 when the founder, Henry David Lee, became dissatisfied with the quality of merchandise his suppliers were providing. From work clothes the brand grew to include a variety of product lines that ranged from western to casual wear. In 1949 Lee introduced Lady Lee Riders, the first line of women's jeans. Lee became the first brand to offer women's jeans with multiple fits, which were introduced in 1983. But as niche brands offering fashion jeans, such as Gap, Mudd, American Eagle, and Express, went after women under the age of 30, Lee's sales began to suffer. To reverse its sales decline and attract younger consumers, Lee developed a spin-off of its women's brand, described by the company as "The brand that fits for her mother," and introduced One True Fit jeans. The new style was based on its popular five-pocket jeans worn by generations of women, but it had a contemporary flair that met four criteria young women said they wanted: style, comfort, looks, and a construction that made women's derrieres look good as they walked away.

TARGET MARKET

Throughout the 1980s and into the early 1990s Lee consistently held the number one share in the women's denim jeans category. But the brand's customers were aging, and Lee jeans began to develop the reputation of not being the type of jeans worn by hip, younger women. Thus, attracting under-30 women was the challenge facing Lee in 2003. The "Find Your One True Fit" campaign was designed to reach young women who were no longer shopping in the junior department but who were not yet ready for the missy department. Lee's target audience was 18- to 34-year-old women who were recent college graduates starting new careers, getting married and having children, buying homes, and facing other transitions. Despite the changes that were occurring in their lives, these women still cared about looking good and dressing in style. For them getting older did not mean giving up sexy clothes and dressing like their mothers. Liz Cahill, Lee's director of advertising, told Adweek that One True Fit jeans had evolved from research indicating that young women liked the Lee jeans style but wanted jeans with a new fit. ''She is no longer a junior and not quite a missy. We did fit try-ons like crazy. Luckily, she is still willing to try new things,'' Cahill said of the target consumer.

NATIONAL DENIM DAY RAISES MONEY FOR BREAST CANCER RESEARCH

For the 2003 National Denim Day, Lee Jeans signed actress Christina Applegate as its spokeswoman. Since its inception the annual event, which was introduced by Lee Jeans in 1996, has raised millions of dollars for the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation. National Denim Day encourages employers to let staff members make a $5 donation in exchange for wearing jeans to work on a specific day each October. In 2003 the wear-jeans-to-work day was October 10. Applegate, best known for her role as Kelly Bundy in the 1990s hit television show Married with Children, was chosen by Lee Jeans to promote the event because her mother was a breast cancer survivor. Applegate also fell into the target consumer demographic for Lee Jeans, contemporary women shoppers in their mid-30s.

COMPETITION

Levi Strauss & Company had invented denim jeans in 1853. By 2003, although Levi's had been in a five-year sales slump, it was still the most recognized brand in the denim category. Taking credit for inventing jeans, Levi Strauss also took credit for reinventing jeans when, in February 2003, it introduced a new brand—Typ. 1 Jeans—and supported it with a marketing campaign using print ads. The initial ads, one of which appeared in the swimsuit issue of Sports Illustrated, were described as bold and sexy, like the new jeans being promoted. The ad that appeared in Sports Illustrated featured model Liliana Domínguez wearing Typ. 1 Jeans and a denim jacket and standing near a hubcap. After the initial launch, ads ran in other national magazines, including Allure, Teen People, GQ, and Spin. Outdoor advertising featuring Typ. 1 Jeans appeared in New York's Times Square and in Los Angeles on the Hyatt Regency Hotel on Sunset Boulevard. Television spots for the campaign began running in June 2003. Also in 2003, to increase its reach with consumers, Levi introduced a spin-off jeans line—Levi Strauss Signature—that was offered for sale in Wal-Mart stores.

Like Levi Strauss, Gap was on a downward spiral in the denim jeans category. In 2000, after shifting the focus of its marketing and product branding away from its core customers, baby boomers, and toward the teen market, Gap went into a 22-month sales decline. The chain reported a 24 percent drop in sales in April 2002 at stores open one year or more. To win back its customers and reverse its sales decline, Gap revamped its product offerings, shaking off glitzy, trendy merchandise and bringing back the staples that customers had come to expect, including basic T-shirts, khakis, and denim jeans. Supporting Gap's effort was a marketing campaign titled ''For Every Generation.'' The new campaign included television spots and print ads with a full roster of celebrities wearing Gap jeans and other items of clothing from the brand. Print ads included a 12-page insert that ran in Vogue, GQ, InStyle, and Rolling Stone. Television spots, which focused on Gap jeans and their fit, featured appearances by such stars as comedian Whoopie Goldberg, country singer Willie Nelson, and actresses Gena Rowlands and Sissy Spacek.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Fallon Worldwide had worked as the creative agency for Lee Jeans since 1986. The agency's ''Coincidences'' campaign, launched in 2002, helped revive the Lee Dungarees brand after it had slipped among its target market of young men between the ages of 17 and 24. The campaign was successful in achieving its goals of restoring the cool image of the brand among young men and improving sales, and it won a Silver EFFIE in 2004. Thus it was that in 2003 Fallon developed the campaign to rejuvenate another of Lee's fading brands, this time women's jeans. The ''Find Your One True Fit'' campaign tackled the challenges of convincing young women that Lee jeans were not just for their mothers, and like the campaign for Lee Dungarees, it was designed to restore the image of the brand as cool. To assure that the campaign for One True Fit jeans reached its target audience, it was developed through the efforts of an all-female team whose members were in the same demographic.

Because women were often bombarded with print fashion ads, the ''Find Your One True Fit'' campaign was initially limited to television spots that had their debuts during the telecast of the 2003 Emmy Awards. This was followed with spots that aired on the major national networks—ABC, CBS, NBC, and Fox—and cable networks, including MTV and E! Entertainment Television.

The initial spots, titled "Find Your Edge" and "Find Yourself," were described as a tribute to young women and how they felt when they thought they looked good. Harvey Marco, the Fallon's group creative director, explained in an interview with Business Wire that, although they were uncomplicated, the spots were meant to connect with women on several different levels. "This campaign is sexy, cool and relevant to the target audience," he said.

Additional television spots were developed for subsequent use and were aired throughout 2004. One spot, titled "Happy Place A," featured the seductive music of the French singer Pierre Avia performing "Why Should I Cry." The spot opened with a close-up of an attractive 20-something woman and then followed her through a variety of situations, all starting with the advice "Find your . . ." Included were shots of the woman in the bathtub, with "Find your sanctuary;" pulling on and zipping up a well-fitting pair of Lee jeans, with "Find your center;" playing a guitar, with "Find your voice;" jumping off a balcony into a swimming pool, with "Find your fear;" and speeding away in a white Porsche, with "Find your escape." The spot concluded with a rear view of the woman walking down a hall dressed in her Lee jeans and the text "Find your one true fit. Lee Jeans." Another spot, "Happy Place B," was an abbreviated version of the first.

The television spots in the "Find Your One True Fit" campaign ended in 2005, and the focus then shifted to print advertising. Ads ran in national fashion and women's magazines, including Glamour, InStyle, People, Redbook, More and Marie Claire. One print ad showed a woman standing on a beach dressed in Lee jeans and holding a puppy on her shoulder. The text read, "Write your own fashion statement. Have you found your perfect fit? Lee." Cahill said that the campaign was also broadened in 2005 to appeal to the mothers of the young women in the original target demographic. In a company press release she stated that the One True Fit brand was able to satisfy the needs of many women: "Women want to look good no matter what life stage they are in or title they carry."

OUTCOME

The "Find Your One True Fit" campaign for Lee Jeans achieved its goals of reversing the perception of younger shoppers that the brand was not fashionable or cool and that it was the jeans of choice only of their grandmothers. The company reported that within two months after it was launched the campaign had succeeded in increasing the positive perception of the product among consumers. A 2003 tracking study by Lee Jeans found that prior to the campaign, 25 percent of consumers surveyed thought its jeans were fashionable, compared to 47 percent who felt they were fashionable after the campaign had been introduced. In addition, one week after the launch of the campaign, Lee Jeans reported that One True Fit jeans had increased the company's overall sales volume by 20 percent compared to the same period in 2002.

In 2003 Marie Claire magazine named One True Fit jeans its "Editor's Pick" as the most flattering jeans for women with all figure types. In 2004 Health Magazine named them "Dream Jeans" for their ability to please all of the women on the publication's editorial staff. Further accolades for the "Find Your One True Fit" campaign included a Silver EFFIE in 2005 for achieving "significant gains in Lee's fashion imagery, coolness and purchase consideration."

FURTHER READING

Burrows, Dan. "Denim Dish: Lee Jeans to Debut High-End Jeans Called Lee Authentics, Developed in Europe." WWD, August 7, 2003.

"Curve Appeal." Mommy Too! Magazine, January–February 2005, p. 4.

DeMarco, Donna. "Gap Goes Back to Basics to Stop Sales Slouch: Retailer Returns to Less Flashy Clothes." Washington Times, May 10, 2002.

"Lee Jeans Helps Women Find Their One True Fit: Denim Powerhouse Introduces New Line, a New Ad Campaign." Business Wire, June 11, 2003.

"From Packs to Jeans, VF Meets Back-to-School Needs with High-Value, High-Style Innovations." Business Wire, August 1, 2003.

Kleinman, Rebecca. "Lee Denim Taps Applegate." WWD, June 5, 2003.

"Lee Serves Up Mid-Tier Missy." DSN Retailing Today, March 22, 2004.

"Levi's Typ. 1 Jeans Print Campaign to Break in Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Issue: Levi's to Co-Host Live Webcast at Exclusive Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Event to Mark the Unveiling." Business Wire, February 13, 2003.

Lockwood, Lisa. "Jeans Advertising: In Search of Steam." WWD, July 17, 2003.

MacMillan, Carrie. "Majoring in the Classics." Promo, May 1, 2003.

Malone, Scott. "True Blue. Jeans Marketing." WWD, June 23, 2003.

"Moms Are Getting Hip and Hot: Historic Jeans Maker Is Primed; Lee Jeans Touts Its One True Fit Jean the Choice of Hot Moms." PR Newswire, February 1, 2005.

O'Loughlin, Sandra. "Strategy: Lee Jeans Launching One True Fit in Move to Extend Market." Adweek, January 13, 2005.

Seckler, Valerie. "Levi Makes Advertising Return to Times Square: Levi Strauss & Co. Has Leased a 45-by-45-Foot Billboard on Times Square." WWD, February 3, 2003.

"Type 1 Gets Makeover." Advertising Age, June 30, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

RUGGED WEAR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Wrangler, Inc., a division of VF Corporation, launched a new line of clothing in 1993. The Rugged Wear line featured sturdy fabrics, camouflage patterns, and layers of warmth to appeal to those who enjoyed hunting, fishing, and other outdoor activities. Already a major player in the western wear and blue jeans segments of the apparel industry, Wrangler intended for Rugged Wear to complement the company's existing market niches. In the fiercely competitive clothing industry, image was often a substantial factor in an item's sales. Like cars, clothes conveyed a definite message about the consumer who chose them.

In order to craft such an image for its Rugged Wear line, Wrangler turned to its advertising shop, the Martin Agency, in 1997. The resulting ''Rugged Wear'' campaign relied on striking visual scenes and clever copy to distinguish Wrangler's outdoor line from those of its competitors. Consisting of three print ads, the ''Rugged Wear'' campaign appeared in magazines, on billboards, and in stores where the clothes were sold. One ad was for Wrangler Fishing Pants and pictured a laden clothesline. Four cats climbed up the legs of a pair of khaki pants hanging on the line. The text asserted, ''Experts agree. Wrangler Anglers are true fishing pants'' and concluded with a witty aside, ''Sorry, fish smell not included.'' A chameleon sporting a pair of Wrangler Camouflage Jeans provided a humorous focus for a second ad: ''Wrangler Rugged Wear. The #1 choice of incognito hunters.'' The third ad, for the brand's briar-resistant Teflon-coated field pants, did not show the actual product. Instead, it showed a vast briar field with a leg-shaped clearing in it. The implication was that the Wrangler wearer had been able to slice easily through the thicket thanks to his pants. Each ad was bordered by stitched leather and displayed the line's logo, which appeared to be branded into leather: ''Wrangler Rugged Wear. Geared for the Outdoors.''

Wrangler was pleased with the results of the campaign. Its new line proved to be a good bridge to Wrangler's traditional western wear line, and the campaign itself was quite well received by consumers. Some went so far as to contact the company for copies of the ads to hang in their homes. The advertising community praised the ads as well, bestowing several awards on the campaign, including the prestigious Addy Award.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Blue jeans were invented in the 1850s as sturdy work clothes for cowboys, ranchers, and miners in the American West. In the 1950s film stars James Dean and Marlon Brando popularized the denim pants as the clothing of choice for rebellious and trendy youth. By the 1970s, when ''designer'' brands such as Jordache, Gloria Vanderbilt, and Sergio Valente became popular, jeans had become as much about fashion, style, and image as they had about comfort and durability. ''Jeans are a badge,'' Angelo Lagrega, a Wrangler executive, told the Greensboro News and Record. ''When you wear a jean, you are making a statement.''

Wrangler, a division of VF Corporation, had forged a specialized image for its own products that was distinct from the mainstream appeal of rival Levi's or ultra-fashionable designer brands popular with a younger urban generation, such as Calvin Klein, Nautica, and Tommy Hilfiger. Wrangler had instead staked its claim in the Western wear segment of the market. Fifty-five percent of the brand's sales came from its Western products, which clothed America's real and aspirational cowboys. Western wear was ''the crown jewel and the real heritage of the company,'' Lagrega said in the Daily News Record. ''We dominate that business.'' The company also produced Wrangler Hero, a less expensive mainstream line of clothing intended to be sold at nationwide chain stores like Wal-Mart and Kmart.

In the course of its long-term business relationship with the Martin Agency, Wrangler had learned the value of niche marketing to sell its products. A director of media planning at Martin related to Brandweek the strategy the agency devised for its client: ''We told Wrangler, 'You don't need to be in New York, and you don't need to be in San Francisco.'" In other words, Wrangler placed its primary emphasis on people who would use its products for work and play, rather than as fashion accessories. Thus, instead of buying air time during mainstream television shows, Wrangler diligently pursued its cowboy aficionados. To raise its profile in this market, the company became an exclusive sponsor of the 1996 Country Music Awards and used country music star George Strait as a celebrity endorser. In addition, Wrangler sponsored rodeo events and rodeo stars Ty Murray and Joe Beavers. This focus on real cowboys paid dividends in the broader market as well. Because of its authenticity, the company came to have a strong appeal for yuppie cowboy-wannabes—who were attracted to the brand's cachet and image—without having to advertise heavily in the urban markets where these consumers lived. Lagrega succinctly encapsulated Wrangler's tactics to the Daily News Record: ''We're using a rifle approach, not a shotgun approach . . . . We find large niches to attack, and then advertise to our consumer.'' The quest for new market niches led to the introduction of the Rugged Wear collection.

TARGET MARKET

The launch of Wrangler's Rugged Wear marked a point of departure for the company. The line's distinctive items such as camouflage-patterned jeans, jackets, and hats, thermal jeans, and Teflon-coated field pants did not at first glance neatly conform to the company's two target markets: Western admirers (and Westerners) and mainstream consumers shopping at mass market stores. The Rugged Wear line was designed for fishing and hunting, for hacking through a thicket or waiting for ducks on a chilly, pre-dawn pond—not for the rodeo and country music scene embraced by Wrangler's Western wear. According to the Daily News Record, however, Wrangler and other Western wear manufacturers and retailers had found that "the traditional Western consumer tends to be a rancher, hunter, fisherman, or hiker anyway."

According to John Boone and David Oakley, the creative team at Martin who crafted the "Rugged Wear" campaign, the ads targeted consumers who had relied on Wrangler for Western wear and who would be pleased to realize that their favorite brand also made tough clothes for outdoor activities. The campaign specifically sought to appeal to men aged 25 to 49 who fished, hunted, and enjoyed the outdoors lifestyle.

Unlike many of its competitors' campaigns, the "Rugged Wear" campaign attempted to use striking images and humor to reach its target audience. The subtle wit of the campaign was meant to show respect to the consumer. Instead of "talking down" to its intended audience, the ads attempted, in the words of Oakley, to "give the audience credit to understand a joke."

COMPETITION

According to Adweek, "even powerful jeans marketers are finding that snaring—and retaining—consumer loyalty is an increasingly slippery endeavor." With its traditional emphasis on Western wear, Wrangler had done quite well in building consumer allegiance to its products. By 1997 the company had seized 27 percent of the jeans market in the United States, selling 100 million pairs of jeans annually. One out of every five pairs of jeans sold in the United States each year carried the Wrangler logo. The company was well poised to remain in its leadership position in this area, though always mindful of other jeans giants such as Levi's and Lee.

When it entered the outdoors wear sector, however, Wrangler encountered a new group of competitors, all of whom were poised to capitalize on the rapidly increasing popularity of wilderness activities such as backpacking and fly fishing. L. L. Bean, the well-known outdoor clothing company, reached consumers through its catalogues that featured clothing such as waterproof jackets and flannel-lined jeans, and which had a broad appeal with more affluent customers. Bass Pro Shops represented another challenge for Wrangler's Rugged Wear, as did Cabela's.

A MISUNDERSTOOD ATTEMPT AT DO-GOODING

In a preceding campaign for the Rugged Wear line, Wrangler marketed the outdoors clothes as being ecologically correct. Touting the use of biodegradable enzymes and eco-friendly dyes, Wrangler expected a positive response to its "Earth Wash" concept. The company's extensive research had revealed that half of Rugged Wear's target market expressed concerns about environmental issues. In stores, however, shoppers were not willing to manifest this zeal. Not only did customers dislike the softer colors that resulted from the use of biodegradable dyes, they also were wary that they were being charged more for "green" clothes. In response, Wrangler brightened the colors. But while it stopped emphasizing the environmental benefits of the apparel, it continued to use most of the eco-friendly manufacturing innovations in the Rugged Wear line.

In order to favorably distinguish Rugged Wear from its competitors, Martin sought to create a campaign that was memorable. Instead of relying on the generic outdoors-wear advertising tactic of portraying a forest tableau with a man in hunting pants holding a gun, Martin focused on a certain lightheartedness in the "Rugged Wear" campaign. The use of animals—the chameleon in camouflage attire and the pants-climbing cats—was meant to distinguish Wrangler from other companies' advertising efforts, as was the playful tone. By excluding actual people from the prints, the "Rugged Wear" campaign served to emphasize a connection with nature and the wilderness. In essence, Wrangler's ads, unlike those of its competitors, suggested that the clothes could take the consumer to the land of open sky, where the only "person" visible would be one's own silhouette cutting through an underbrush of briars. Moreover, the three component Rugged Wear print ads were not merely function-oriented presentations of the product line. Instead, the leather-stitched border and the burnt and branded look of the Wrangler logo in each ad served to convey more than the "nuts and bolts" of the products. Martin strove to give the Rugged Wear line an indelible image.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Wrangler had already mastered niche marketing for its Western wear products, and it applied the same strategy in the "Rugged Wear" campaign. By using only print media, Wrangler was able to hone its message to reach the narrow target audience it desired. The ads appeared in magazines such as Field and Stream, Hunting, American Hunter, Outdoor Life, and Bassmaster. As the campaign's popularity became evident, Wrangler expanded its scope to include outdoor billboards. Once more, the company did not seek upscale urban consumers. Instead, it chose rural locations for the billboards. The posters were also enlarged to be used as "point of sale" ads, located in specialty stores where the Rugged Wear line was carried. Just as the company had sponsored rodeo events and riders, Wrangler attempted visibly to bring its message to its desired consumers. For this reason, Wrangler entered the growing sport of bass fishing in high profile by sponsoring the "Wrangler Anglers." This training program for amateur fishermen was a huge hit. "We realized that our consumers for outdoor products were grass-roots guys out there in the ranks of the Bass Anglers Sportsman Society Federation, and we wanted to do something to support them while introducing our products," a Wrangler public relations director told the Greensboro News and Record.

As part of its marketing tactics, Wrangler was careful to never completely sever the association of Rugged Wear with its popular and well-known Western clothes. The Western-style border and brand on each of the posters served to assert Rugged Wear's claim to the Wrangler heritage. Since the target markets for the two sectors showed some overlap, this strategy served to span the distance between Wrangler's broad Western wear consumer base and its outdoors sportspeople.

Indeed, this strategy conformed perfectly to an emerging trend in the Western wear category. According to the Daily News Record, Western wear shoppers began to seek out more "rugged, outdoors-inspired merchandise." Bill Koronis, vice-president and general manager of VF's Western wear discussed the shift with that newspaper. "Up until now we were selling [Rugged Wear] primarily to sporting goods and farm stores, but in the past couple of years, Western wear retailers have been looking for something else to sell to their consumer."

In order to capitalize on this shift more fully, Wrangler joined with traditional Western wear stores such as Sheplers to launch in-store shops for the Rugged Wear line. These shops displayed canoes, tents, and outdoor motifs to illustrate the underlying purpose of the Rugged Wear line. "If you just stick these items on a rack, they fail," said Koronis in the Daily News Record. "But if you make the investment in presentation, it's very successful."

OUTCOME

Banking on the bridge between Western wear and outdoors wear was a risk for Wrangler. "It was a big step for the company," said Martin copywriter Oakley about the "Rugged Wear" campaign. But the plunge served Wrangler well. On an anecdotal level, the campaign gained the admiration of consumers. Hunters and fishermen so liked the prints that they contacted the company and requested copies of the component ads to hang in their homes. Wrangler was so pleased with the response that it expanded the campaign into 1998. The "Rugged Wear" campaign was also lauded within the advertising industry. Most noteworthy was the Addy Award garnered by the "Chameleon" ad. The Rugged Wear campaign and product line were widely praised by publications as diverse as the conservative political paper the Washington Times and the industry-standard Advertising Age.

Despite slumps in its mainstay Western wear and discount markets, Wrangler continued to see steadily rising sales. A Wrangler executive told the Daily News Record that the Rugged Wear line was "showing good growth."

FURTHER READING

Casada, Jim. "Amateurs Fight Long Odds." Greensboro News and Record, August 2, 1995.

Krouse, Peter. "Jeans: Life's Little Labels." Greensboro News and Record, November 2, 1997.

Mundy, Alicia. "She Works for a Conventional Agency, But She Has a Decidedly Unconventional Approach to Media." Brandweek, December 8, 1997.

Palmieri, Jean. "The New and Improved Wrangler." Daily News Record, March 2, 1998.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Searching for the Perfect Fit." Adweek, September 15, 1997.

Rebecca Stanfel

Village Voice LLC

36 Cooper Sq.
New York, New York 10003
USA
Telephone: (212) 475-3333
Web site: www.villagevoice.com

■■■

NOT AMERICA'S FAVORITE PAPER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Beginning April 10, 1996, The Village Voice —a liberal New York newspaper expressing the concerns of intellectual and political freedom—was distributed free throughout Manhattan in an attempt to boost its circulation and advertising. In anticipation of this change, the Voice commissioned a new advertising campaign from its agency, New York City's Mad Dogs and Englishmen. Mad Dogs responded with a campaign that maintained a tone consistent with its previous work for the Voice but capitalized more profoundly on the paper's truculent reputation to bolster the risky move to free circulation in Manhattan (readers in the other four boroughs and outside New York City still had to pay the $1.25 cover price). Mad Dogs created the tag line "Not America's Favorite Paper" as an ironic appeal to the Voice 's readership, who prided themselves on living outside the mainstream. The strategy was to regain the Voice 's position as the favorite paper of New York City's subcultures.

The print ads appeared mainly in the Voice itself but also appeared in other New York City newspapers (the Voice bartered ad space with other papers on an even trade) and on walls around the city. The ads relied on the stereotyping of the Voice's nonreaders, the types against whom Voice editorials ranted. One ad showed a member of the National Rifle Association (NRA) at a shooting range; with the choice of targeting a bull's-eye or a copy of the Village Voice, his rifle was pointed squarely at the newspaper. Another depicted two older upper-class women sitting together with crossed legs commenting demurely, "It's so nice that homosexuals, Jews, and terrorists have a newspaper to read." Yet another simply showed a copy of the Voice strapped into an electric chair.

The ads helped smooth the transition to free circulation, doubling both circulation and advertising. The campaign, which ran throughout the circulation transition and into the spring of 1997, reached audiences as far away as Israel and Japan, where critics appreciated the ads as examples of America's freedom of expression. Most importantly, though, the campaign maintained the radical tone of the paper to insure its readers that the move to free circulation, which ran the risk of appearing as a transformation from a hard news journal to a soft "shopper" —a mere advertising medium—did not represent a sellout but rather represented a means of spreading the liberal word further afield. Publisher David Schneiderman affirmed that "the Voice will remain the Voice."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Village Voice was founded in 1955 to capture the nonconformist political ideology and social currents of the Beatnik movement emanating from Manhattan's Greenwich Village. Norman Mailer, a controversial American novelist, was one of the newspaper's first writers. In the 1990s, however, writers and editors at the Voice began to sense that the weekly was losing its voice of influence over New York City's political and cultural scenes. The paper was also losing readership, falling from 136,000 in 1994 to 121,000 in November 1995. This circulation decrease coincided with a price increase from $1.00 to $1.25 in 1994.

The decision to go free was devised to reverse all of these trends; more people were likely to pick up a paper that was free than one they had to pay for, which would boost circulation and thus increase the influence the paper held in the city. Most alternative weeklies were free, including the LA Weekly, the West-coast equivalent of the Voice owned by the same parent company, Stern Publishing. What these papers might have lost in subscriptions and newsstand sales was recouped by increased advertising because the ads reached more readers. When the Voice went free, it lost approximately $3 million in circulation revenues. Making up that amount might take two to three years, Schneiderman predicted, but it was a short-term sacrifice to secure more long-range goals. "For us it is a preemptive strike into the future," said Schneiderman. "We don't think there is much future for newsstands in New York."

Mad Dogs and Englishmen had become the ad agency for the Voice in 1991 to help build up subscriptions. The marketing strategy came naturally to creative director Michael Reich since he considered himself a member of the counterculture that the paper targeted. The Voice and its readership positioned themselves as distinct from the rest of the world; their opinions railed against the opinions held by the majority of mainstream culture.

Mad Dogs' ads took advantage of the Voice 's often extreme leftist editorial position by dramatizing the extreme political right's revilement of all that the Voice represented. Voice readers loved to be hated, so Mad Dogs invoked the ire of the Voice 's political enemies. The ads relied on tongue-in-cheek exaggeration. One ad presented itself as a Village Voice subscription coupon that took up an entire page, complete with huge "Yes" and "No" boxes. The "No" box was checked, and below it was scrawled a diatribe against the left by a radical right-winger. The success of the ads derived from a kind of reverse snobbery, tacitly looking down on those who looked down on the Voice.

TARGET MARKET

The Village Voice 's promotions manager Tony Cima to described the paper's readership succinctly as "young, hip, and affluent." Since the Voice was distributed in the New York City metropolitan area, the readership consisted primarily of urban New Yorkers as well as New Jersey and Connecticut residents. Mad Dogs' Reich considered himself a quintessential Voice reader; he thus had a more developed conception of the target market. Reich, like many Voice readers, had moved to the city to get away from the suburbs. Reich and others believed New York City offered limitless opportunity for artistic and political expression.

The Voice and its readership had a complementary relationship in that both had strong personalities. Voice readers had their own distinctive identity, but the paper gave them a collective voice that Reich called "the unchartered minority of America." The subculture that the Voice appealed to included those ostracized almost everywhere else: gays, feminists, pacifists, ethnic minorities, and underground artists. Voice readers generally defined themselves in opposition to more predominant ideologies; thus Reich hit upon the idea of harnessing that opposition by advertising it. The Voice had a clear understanding of who its readers were and an even clearer understanding of who its readers were not. The irony that the ads played upon was the fact that certain people would never under any circumstances read the Voice. The Voice preached to the converted, so Mad Dogs advertised to the converted.

COMPETITION

When the Village Voice eliminated its cover price, the New York Observer took over its newsstand space and consequently doubled its newsstand distribution. But the Voice was less concerned with the Observer 's success than with the highly combative competitive strategies of its main rivals, the alternative weeklies TimeOut New York and the New York Press. TimeOut ran billboards claiming that its listings were "enough to make you lose your voice." The Press changed its distribution day in order to preempt the Voice's distribution, shifting from Wednesday (the day the Voice was distributed) to Tuesday. The Press also increased its editorial features space and its staff, adding a Washington correspondent.

Press publisher Ron Mann called the Voice's switch to free circulation disastrous, claiming that the Voice had not picked up any new business (a point refuted by the Voice) because it had priced its ad space above the market. A quarter-page, four-time ad in the Press went for $600; the same ad space in the Voice ran $1,800, Mann pointed out. The Voice commissioned a consultant to assess whether its ad rates were out of line with the market. The issue boiled down to the results ads could produce: TimeOut ads were seen by 50,000 readers, Press ads by twice as many, while Voice ads reached three times as many readers, even before the circulation switch.

THE VOICE OF LONG ISLAND

Mad Dogs and Englishmen's creative director Michael Reich claimed that he fled Long Island, where he grew up, to find his own kind of people in New York City—namely, the types who would read the Village Voice. Ironically, Voice circulation spread to the suburbs in April 1997 with the launching of the Long Island Voice, following the national trend toward suburbanizing urban alternative weeklies. The Voice, however, did not export all of its attitude. For example, while the Village Voice's sex columnist was openly gay, the Long Island Voice's was straight. Village Voice publisher David Schneiderman, a Long Island native, defended the move as a means of asserting that his hometown was not as vacuous as its reputation—there was more to Long Island than underage sex scandals involving Joey Buttafuoco and Amy Fisher, Schneiderman attested.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Voice's decision to concentrate most of the "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign in its own pages was driven by two main factors: first, one of the main goals of the campaign was to retain readers through the price elimination, so the Voice devoted itself to reassuring it readers that the attitude of the paper would not disappear with the price; second, the Voice could scarcely afford an expensive ad campaign, so its own pages represented a much cheaper medium than other outlets. The "bargain basement" approach to advertising was also consistent with the anticapitalistic tenets of the countercultural movement. Bartering, a mainstay of leftist economics, represented a way to avoid the transaction of money, transacting services instead. In this case the Voice bartered advertising space in its own pages in exchange for ad space in its rivals' pages, thus accessing its rivals' readers.

The Voice used another tactic invented by the counterculture: "sniping," or what Mad Dogs' Reich called "unofficial media buys." The term comes from the military practice of shooting at unsuspecting targets, except in this instance the Voice "attacked" unsuspecting passersby with its ads. This urban guerilla tactic involved plastering its poster ads on open spaces such as the sides of abandoned buildings or the plywood fences surrounding construction sites. The act had an illicit feel to it, even if it wasn't technically illegal. The efficacy of sniping was slightly diluted by the corporate co-opting of this underground tactic, with Calvin Klein and other corporate ads plastered all over New York City. Nevertheless, the strategy managed to raise the visibility of the Voice in a way that cost much less than buying official ad space on billboards or on the sides of city buses while also allowing the Voice to maintain its integrity.

The final advertising mode that the "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign employed was a direct mailing of postcards. This tactic directly confronted the recipients of the postcards with a choice: either they were or they were not thinkers who sympathized with the Voice's perspective, with no middle ground. The brilliance of the "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign was that it forced the people viewing the ads to take a stand either way. While the text of the ads disparaged the Voice, the subtext of the ads disparaged those who disparaged the Voice by implied mockery of their political or social views. The campaign alluded that only those hip to the message got the message.

OUTCOME

The Village Voice's "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign achieved its main objectives of increasing circulation and advertising. Circulation increases surpassed their goals both in Manhattan (more than doubling from 71,000 to 185,000) and in total circulation (increasing from 150,000 to 235,000), making the Voice the most distributed weekly in the country. As a result, advertising almost doubled.

The circulation transition was marred by a few glitches. Since newsstands no longer sold the paper, some readers had trouble finding one of the 2,000 retail outlets in Manhattan where copies were distributed; those who could find the bright red distribution boxes often found them empty or vandalized. Some homeless entrepreneurs exported stacks from Manhattan (where the paper was free) to Brooklyn (where they undersold the official $1.25 rate). Additionally, vendors within certain Manhattan commuter points, such as Grand Central and Penn Stations, as well as the Port Authority Bus Terminal, continued the full-price policy of their distributor, Hudson News. Voice publisher Schneiderman dismissed the story of the homeless peddlers as untrue and expressed faith in commuters' ability to find readily available free copies. While he promised to restock the distribution boxes more frequently, he admitted that it would be impossible to keep them full; the only problem, according to Schneiderman, was that the paper was simply too popular. Public perception was critical of the Voice's decision to go free. Robert Farrell, a business owner who had advertised in the Voice before switching to the Press a few years before the circulation change, commented that "when a business goes free, that shows weakness.'' Other critics echoed this sentiment, suggesting that the Voice's transformation into a free paper signaled a move away from journalistic integrity and toward advertisement-driven decisions. ''It's a sad day for the Voice,'' lamented former Voice editor Jonathan Larsen. ''Now it's become just another shopper,'' he added, suggesting that the paper's free pricetag would mean a predominance of advertising and listings over its former journalistic innovation. Soon after the paper went free, it reduced the number of issues of the Voice Literary Supplement from 10 per year to just four, a fact many believed seemed to support Larsen's charge.

Publisher Schneiderman countered the cynical charges of selling out with a more balanced response, pointing out that the increased market penetration for readers and advertisers would allow the Voice ''to deliver the best in journalism,'' a pledge that was harder to uphold when the $1.25 price decreased sales. The Voice could continue its commitment to journalistic excellence only if it could afford to remain in business. In order to compete against other alternative free papers, the Voice had to join their ranks. However, the Voice held a trump card: while none of the alternative papers could be considered America's favorite newspaper, only the Village Voice held the distinction of being America's least favorite paper.

FURTHER READING

Case, Tony. ''Moving to Free: Success or Disaster?'' Editor and Publisher, July 27, 1996.

Wulfhorst, Ellen. ''Village Voice to be Distributed Free in Manhattan.'' Reuters, February 7, 1996.

William D. Baue

Virgin Atlantic Airways Limited

The Office
Manor Royal
Crawley, West Sussex RH10 2NU
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 1293 616161
Fax: 44 1293 561721
Web site: www.virgin-atlantic.com

■■■

GO, JET SET, GO! CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Helmed by the British entrepreneur Sir Richard Branson, Virgin Atlantic Airways Limited hoped to attract the posh jet-setters abandoned by Concorde, a line of supersonic jets owned by British Airways. The Concorde flew twice the speed of most commercial jets, but on October 24, 2003, British Airways discontinued its service because of economic factors and a marred image after a Concorde crashed in France. Even though the Concorde disaster claimed 113 lives, British Airways in 2002 still dominated the U.K. airline industry with $11.8 billion in sales, overshadowing Virgin's $2 billion.

Branson, famous for his playboy antics and shrewd business instincts, was disappointed by Virgin's "Serious Fun" campaign, which had begun in the late 1990s. In 2003 Virgin awarded its advertising budget, estimated at $12 to $15 million, to Miami-based agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky. The agency created a campaign dubbed "Go, Jet Set, Go!" It began in late 2003 with advertising appearing across print, outdoor, online, television, movie product placement, television product placement, and alternative advertising. Chris Rossi, vice president of sales and marketing at Virgin Atlantic, said to the PR Newswire, "The goal of this campaign is to communicate the style and glamour of our Upper Class cabin and the new Upper Class Suite product features in a way that will captivate and entertain business flyers." The campaign coincided with Virgin embellishing its Upper Class service by adding features such as in-flight massages, larger sleeping areas, in-flight beauty therapists, and a stand-up bar, similar to minibars located in shopping malls.

"Go, Jet Set, Go!" earned Crispin Porter + Bogusky a silver EFFIE along with other awards, and it helped Virgin increase sales from $2 billion in 2002 to $8.1 billion in 2004. Alex Bogusky, a partner at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told Advertising Age, "As Virgin Atlantic has grown up, the pressure has been on to be a more grown-up company and less fun. But we're embracing fun to make the product less of a commodity and more about the experience."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

As a young man, Richard Branson founded a London-based recording studio called Virgin in the early 1970s, his first of many Virgin-branded companies. Branson's empire eventually grew to include magazines, cola, a music retail chain, trains, a mobile-phone service provider, and his most ambitious project, Virgin Atlantic Airways, which was founded in 1984. Virgin's maiden flight was made between London's Gatwick Airport and Newark, New Jersey, with the airline's only plane, a used Boeing 747, filled with pop stars and journalists. The airline continued targeting the wealthy, celebrities, and fashionistas into the late 1990s.

Virgin's "Serious Fun" campaign exploited the success of the Austin Powers movies. Billboards for the campaign displayed actor Mike Myers, outfitted as Mr. Powers, beneath the tagline: "Five times a day. Yeah, baby." The ad referred to Virgin's addition of a fifth daily flight between New York and London. Barbara Lippert, writer for Adweek, stated, "The whole thing is aimed at the sensibility of a 12-year-old boy and that's who advertisers want to reach, even if that 12-year-old is 24." After the campaign ended, Virgin representatives discredited it as "moronic" and a "cop-out." In 2003 the airline shopped a plethora of agencies in search of a more sophisticated advertising approach.

In 2003 Crispin Porter + Bogusky pitched a new image for Virgin flights as the "party on the way to London." John Riordan, Virgin's vice president for customer services, told Newsweek that Virgin was hesitant about the concept at first. Eventually, however, the company embraced Crispin Porter + Bogusky's vision, with the caveat that the word "party" was not to appear in any ad. Crispin Porter + Bogusky creatives in August 2003 toyed with campaign taglines such as "Jet swanky" and "Going up?" before they settled on "Go, Jet Set, Go!" The tagline played on the appellation "jet-setter," defined as a wealthy traveler who jets from one fashionable location to the next. "We're thinking of it as the 'Just do it' of travel," Bogusky told Newsweek. "It's a call to action to get out there and do great things."

SIR RICHARD BRANSON'S SPACE TRAVEL

Sir Richard Branson, the entrepreneur that the British, in a poll, voted as the third most qualified Brit to rewrite the Ten Commandments, became one of the world's best-known "rebel billionaires." Some of his commercial exploits involved helming the first commercial rock station in the U.K. as well as launching a commercial music retail chain, a commercial train service, and a pay-as-you-go mobile phone service. In 1999 Branson conceived Virgin Galactic, an airline that promised commercial space travel. By leaving the earth's atmosphere, the service would reduce the flight between London and Sydney to a mere three hours. Virgin hoped to have the service operating by 2010.

TARGET MARKET

"Go, Jet Set, Go!" targeted affluent, international flyers who did not classify as the typical business traveler. This included rock stars, supermodels, financiers, rap stars, and electronica DJs. Bogusky told the New York Times that Crispin Porter + Bogusky wanted to "appeal to the kind of people who appreciate the idea that though they're working hard, they deserve to have a good time." The firm, aware that their target was typically too busy to be exposed to network television spots or direct mail, used alternative advertising to increase visibility. Upper Class Virgin Atlantic beds were placed inside swanky department stores for people to try out. In order to target passengers descending in their competitor's aircraft, Virgin fixed massive advertisements to the rooftops of airport buildings.

One of the campaign's boldest moves involved creating a short pornography-spoof titled "Suite and Innocent." Crispin Porter + Bogusky felt the film was an effective way to attract the 78 percent of the target market that stayed at hotels equipped with LodgeNet, the pay-per-view channels that the film played on. "We were trying to figure out the best way to reach these highly elusive business travelers and this is where they're spending their time," Chris Rossi, vice president for North American sales and marketing, told the New York Times.

COMPETITION

British Airways, the fifth-largest airline in the world and the largest in the United Kingdom, pitted itself fiercely against Virgin in the early 1990s. In 1993 Branson took British Airways to court after it inflated rumors about Virgin's debt and Branson's drug addiction. In the libel settlement Branson won $5 million, which he distributed amongst his employees. One of the most galvanizing decisions British Airways made to ensure its position in the United Kingdom was partnering with American Airlines, the world's largest airline in 2003. Branson described competing against the two giants as comparable to "having a bleeding contest with a blood bank." British Airways posted sales at $14 billion in 2000, a figure which had slipped slightly below $14 billion by 2004. The slippage was attributed to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the surfacing of cheaper no-frills airlines, and the emergence of international European airlines such as Deutsche Lufthansa, British Midland Airways, and Virgin.

To keep its grip on the U.K. market, British Airways spent an estimated $100 million on marketing in 2005. P.J. O'Rourke, the biting American satirist, became the airline's new spokesperson. British Airways began

GOD SAVE THE KNIGHT

"God Save the Queen," a Sex Pistols hit that bashed the queen of England, was recorded at Richard Branson's Virgin recording studio during the mid-1970s. The band later played the song on a boat upon the Thames during Britain's 1977 Jubilee. The band was quickly stopped and arrested. Ironically, Branson was later knighted by the queen. "It's strange," Branson said regarding the ceremony, "...I was wondering whether the sword, instead of touching [my shoulders], was going to [chop off my head]!"

announcing bargain flight deals, such as "only £69 to go to Paris," on the back of ATM receipts. In a live-theater advertisement that took place throughout Heathrow Airport, actors were hired to perform scripts that boasted of British Airway's services. Employees also posted pro-British Airways content in Internet chat rooms. Jayne O'Brien, British Airways' marketing chief, told the Independent, "People see about 3,000 advertising statements a day. The challenge to the marketer is how you are going to get your message heard, engaged with and understood by the market."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Early ads for "Go, Jet Set, Go!" were launched in late 2003, during the final days of British Airways' Concorde. Virgin ads toasted the Concorde's final flight and offered its abandoned clientele their services. Complimentary copies of a short book titled "Night-Night Jet Set," mimicking the children's book format, began appearing in Virgin's upper-class suites. It featured text such as, "Night-Night rap superstar lounging in 7F. When finished signing contracts your massage waits to the left," and "Night-Night fashion goddess reading in 5D. Where did you get those shoes? We really must see." Airsickness bags doubled as origami 747s and planting pots. Virgin began product placement in movies such as Love Actually and Calendar Girls, both British-made. Virgin branding also appeared on NBC's reality-TV show American Princess. Ralph Bershefsky, a manager of advertising for Virgin in the United States, told Advertising Age, "We receive between 100 to 200 requests for sponsorship a week, so we have a tough time deciding what to do."

At the time of the campaign's launch, Virgin furnished its upper-class suites with a flat bed, table, and chair that could be enclosed with a temporary wall. The beds were the longest in the airline industry. Models of upper-class suites were placed inside posh department stores so that shoppers could see Virgin's improved features. Andrew Keller, Crispin Porter + Bogusky's creative director, told Advertising Age, "We're going to have events in the sky, such as business summits. We want to change the culture of flying so that it's not all about the destination. We want to change the game and make people want the experience." Virgin handed out destination luggage labels, similar to ones that were popularized in the late nineteenth century. As Christine Bittar wrote in Brandweek, "Experience is more meaningful than size for the Richard Branson airline. Making the Upper Class Suite flight more than just a trip means clients can eat meals whenever they want, enjoy a scalp and shoulder massage at the salon area, or mingle at the bar."

Print ads that appeared in magazines mimicked the laminated safety-information sheets found in airplane seat-pockets. Text stating, "No bouncing on the largest fully flat bed in business class," appeared above a diagram of a man jumping on his bed. Crispin Porter + Bogusky placed a 120-by-520-foot "Go, Jet Set, Go!" billboard on a rooftop near Los Angeles International Airport to target flyers looking out their windows as they landed. A similar ad was placed near New York's JFK airport. Crispin Porter + Bogusky used such innovative mediums to overcome one of the campaign's greatest challenges: reaching international travelers who were unlikely to take heed of traditional advertising. In October 2004 Virgin launched its nine-and-a-half-minute pornography parody, "Suite and Innocent", which cost $1 million and ran on pay-per-view channels in hotels until the end of 2004. Although the spoof was without nudity or profanity, it was riddled with double entendres and featured characters with such names as Miles High, Big Ben, and Summer Turbulence. "Virgin is a brand that likes to push the edge," Chris Rossi, one of Virgin's vice presidents, told Fast Company magazine. "Even so, I would never have given the green light for the LodgeNet piece if the agency didn't have the strategic thinking and research to back it up."

OUTCOME

"Go, Jet Set, Go!" ran during a time of increased sales growth for Virgin, whose $2 billion in sales for 2002 had risen to $8.1 billion by 2004. The percentage increase was significantly higher than that of Virgin's largest domestic competitor, British Airways, which improved from $11.8 billion in 2002 to just below $14 billion in 2004. Ad industry success ensued as well. In 2005 the campaign won a silver EFFIE Award along with a gold Clio Award for Contact and Content (a category that recognized innovation in reaching customers).

Many sources also noted the mutual admiration between Crispin Porter + Bogusky and Virgin. Of working with Virgin, Crispin Porter + Bogusky, well known for its MINI Cooper "Let's Motor" campaign and Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, said: "The opportunity to work for one of the coolest brands in the world was something we found very appealing. When we learned more about it and found that it truly did reflect the maverick spirit and entrepreneurial drive of founder Richard Branson, we got even more fired up." Virgin also seemed happy to end its previous "Serious Fun" campaign and doted on Crispin Porter + Bogusky.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "A New Playing Field: Some of the Smartest Creative Ideas Are Right Outside Your Window." Adweek, April 19, 2004, p. 28.

Atkinson, Claire. "Virgin Airlines Promo Targets 'Jetrosexuals'; Movie and TV Tie-Ins Also Part of Major Push." Advertising Age, November 3, 2003, p. 58.

Bittar, Christine. "Tools of the Trade." Brandweek, February 23, 2004.

Burrell, Ian. "In It for the Long Haul: Marketing: British Airways." Independent (London), June 20, 2005, p. 12.

Campo-Flores, Arian. "Virgin's New Flight of Fancy." Newsweek, November 10, 2003, p. 42.

Elliot, Stuart. "Sir Richard's Airline, Always Irreverent, Moves to the Next Plateau with a Spoof of Pornography." New York Times, October 4, 2004, p. 10.

Ives, Nat. "Tongue-in-Cheek Ads from Virgin Atlantic." New York Times, October 27, 2003, p. 8.

Lauro, Patricia Winters. "Big Marketers Are Betting on 'Austin Powers' to Endear Them to Young People." New York Times, June 14, 1999, p. 17.

Lazare, Lewis. "Diageo Ads Tout No-Carb Brands." Chicago Sun-Times, April 21, 2004, p. 83.

Mack, Ann. "CP+B Takes Flash Ads into Virgin Territory." Adweek, April 26, 2004, p. 12.

Waples, John. "Branson's Biggest Battle." Sunday Times (London), November 18, 2001.

Kevin Teague

Virginia Tourism Corporation

901 East Byrd Street
Richmond, Virginia 23219-4048
USA
Telephone: (804) 786-2052
Fax: (804) 786-1919
Web site: www.vatc.org

■■■

MEET VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite a limited budget, the Virginia Tourism Corporation (VTC) had been a model promoter of state tourism for most of the second half of the twentieth century. In the late 1960s it began using the slogan "Virginia Is for Lovers," a phrase that became well known and served as the foundation for all VTC marketing campaigns that followed. It was still deemed relevant at the start of the new century. Virginia's tourism industry, like that of the rest of America, received a major blow when terrorists attacked New York and Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, leading to a severe decline in travel. People looked to take shorter trips closer to home, and state tourism boards aggressively courted this business with a bevy of new slogans and increased ad spending. Virginia, on the other hand, cut its marketing budget for tourism and instead looked to make do with less by freshening up it venerable "Virginia Is for Lovers" slogan. The result was the "Meet Virginia" campaign, which sought to personify the state as a family friend. It began in February 2004.

"Meet Virginia," created by Virginia ad agency White & Baldacci (later renamed White & Partners) with a budget of about $2.5 million, primarily targeted mothers, who were the key decision makers in determining the destination of family vacations. Most of the campaign resources were devoted to print ads, which ran in more than a dozen national magazines. The ads portrayed different aspects of Virginia's personality. One execution said that "she" was "a breath of fresh air," accompanied by a picture of a woman standing atop a mountain. On the side were listed a number of destinations and outdoor activities in keeping with that ad's theme. The "Virginia Is for Lovers" slogan and logo were retained, anchoring a bottom corner of the full-page ads.

The "Meet Virginia" campaign succeeded in nearly tripling the number of requests for the state's official Virginia travel brochure. In addition, hotel bookings surged. The "Meet Virginia" theme was retained by the VTC, and the campaign was continued in 2005 and beyond. It also garnered national recognition, including an EFFIE Award, one of the top honors in the advertising industry.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since the introduction of the slogan "Virginia Is for Lovers" in 1969, the Virginia Tourism Corporation was one of the most aggressive promoters of state tourism in the United States. Despite lacking the budgets of other locales, the VTC brought Virginia's tourist attractions to the attention of travelers around the world. It also benefited from its geographical location: about 55 percent of the U.S. population lived within 500 miles of the state.

Travelers spent some $14 billion each year in Virginia and paid more than $1.8 billion in local and state taxes. Furthermore, well over 260,000 jobs in Virginia were tourism related.

Over the years the competition for travel dollars grew steadily, and then the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, caused a significant drop in international air travel, leading to more domestic trips. In addition, people were looking for trips that were shorter and closer to home. In the Northeast this led to even fiercer competition between tourism boards intent on capturing their share of this business. Many states increased advertising, leading to a blizzard of similar messages promoting sites of interests.

The VTC had the most recognizable travel slogan in the United States, but in the post–September 11 landscape it decided that "Virginia Is for Lovers" needed a little freshening up. In 2002 the VTC unveiled a series of three television spots offering an irreverent and somewhat literal spin on the venerable slogan. Each spot opened with the question "What comes to mind when you hear the slogan 'Virginia is for lovers?'" In the "Hotel" spot a bellhop introduced a puzzled family to a gaudy hotel love nest, complete with a heart-shaped bed and a neon lips sculpture. Also using a hotel setting, "Maids" showed a cleaning staff waiting in a hotel corridor, unable to work because from every door hung a "Do Not Disturb" placard. In the spot entitled "Beaches" a lover said, "I feel as if I've found my soul mate and best friend." The phrase was then echoed by countless other couples on the beach. The spots closed with a voice-over that stated, "It's easy to get the wrong impression." Viewers were then directed to a website, www.virginiaisforlovers.com, where they could learn about Virginia tourist sites and "more than 100 ways to love Virginia."

In 2003 the state cut the tourism advertising budget by 40 percent and mandated that the VTC review the ideas of new advertising agencies and reassign the account. Moreover, the state developed a strategic plan that called for less emphasis on radio and television commercials and more on print ads in niche publications. Northern Virginia ad agency White & Baldacci (subsequently renamed White & Partners) won the VTC account in September 2003. It developed its own twist on the "Virginia Is for Lovers" theme with the "Meet Virginia" campaign, which was released in February 2004.

TARGET MARKET

Surveys conducted by the VTC revealed a profile of Virginia tourists: 60 percent were college educated, more than half had household incomes in excess of $60,000, and their average household head was 54 years of age. The largest numbers came from nearby Washington, D.C. (11.5 percent), followed by New York City (7.8 percent), Baltimore (5.4 percent), Raleigh-Durham, North Carolina (5 percent), and Philadelphia (4.9 percent). Residents of Virginia itself were also a main source of visitors, and to a lesser degree the state attracted tourists from Atlanta; Pittsburgh; Charlotte, North Carolina; and Boston. To attract the family business in these markets, the "Meet Virginia" campaign specifically targeted the one person in the family most responsible for planning vacations: the mother. Hence, the target audience consisted of college-educated women between the ages of 25 and 54 who had at least one child under 18 years old. In addition, the family's household annual income would total at least $70,000. This composite person was kept in mind as the advertisements were crafted and the decisions were made about the most appropriate places to run them. White & Partners also made sure that the campaign did not neglect the interests of the rest of the family. While a woman was generally highlighted in an ad, family members were usually included in the background, and to attract the attention of husbands and children a variety of destinations and activities were featured.

"VIRGINIA IS FOR LOVERS"

The Virginia Tourism Corporation's longtime slogan, "Virginia Is for Lovers," was created in 1969 by Robin McLaughlin, a copywriter for the Martin Agency of Richmond, Virginia. It was first used, appropriately enough, in an ad that appeared in the March 1969 issue of Modern Bride.

COMPETITION

Because so many families were taking shorter trips to nearby locations, Virginia competed against surrounding states. New York City was rebuilding its tourism business after experiencing a serious downturn in 2001, and the state of New York had been successfully exploiting its own well-known slogan, "I Love New York," since the 1970s. New Yorkers who might pay visits to Virginia were also tempted by the Native American casinos Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun in Connecticut. Casinos in Atlantic City, New Jersey, also competed for tourists from New York and Philadelphia. The state of Pennsylvania, which for years had exploited its slogan, "You've got a friend in Pennsylvania," also vied aggressively for travel business. With its historic sites, Philadelphia was a perennial tourist attraction, as was Lancaster County, 50 miles to the west, which offered Amish and Pennsylvania Dutch tourist attractions that were well marketed. Even Maryland, which had long neglected its tourism trade, was becoming more aggressive in promoting itself.

Closer to home was Washington, D.C., an international tourist attraction, but the capital served more as a compliment to Virginia tourism than competition, drawing tourists from around the world who might choose to spend some time and money in nearby Virginia. To the south Virginia had a rival in North Carolina, which offered mountain activities as well as coastal attractions. In addition, Orlando, Florida, home to Disney World and a number of other attractions, was only a short flight from Virginia's core markets, and Orlando commanded a larger tourism budget. Virginia's tourism budget was less than half of the $12 million that other states spent on average and a small fraction of the $550 million that 46 reporting states spent in 2003, according to the Travel Industry Association of America.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The underlying concept of the "Meet Virginia" campaign was to personify the state as a woman, someone that other women in particular would find appealing and want to know better. Within this framework Virginia's tourist attractions were portrayed as aspects of the character's personality. Media elements included a limited amount of television and radio advertising as well as some out-of-home ads (such as signage) and Internet advertising, but the anchor of the campaign was print advertising. Print ads ran in 15 national magazines, including National Geographic, Smithsonian, Southern Living, Better Homes & Gardens, Good Housekeeping, the New Yorker, Audubon, Bon Appétit, Reader's Digest, Travel & Leisure, and O: The Oprah Magazine. Specialty print ads were also produced for trade publications: ads aimed at groups were placed in such niche magazines as Group Tour Magazine and Leisure Group Travel; and an ad focusing on meetings ran in periodicals that included Association Management Magazine, Convene, and Convention South.

Each full-page print ad attempted to offer a different side of Virginia's personality, accompanied by a list of relevant tourist attractions and destinations. In one execution a female hiker was shown standing at the top of a mountain and taking in a glorious view. Superimposed in script over the large "Meet Virginia" headline was "She's a breath of fresh air." Addition text read, "With miles of awe-inspiring mountains and valleys to explore, the fresh air does more than fill your lungs. It also clears your mind." In the margin was a list of outdoor activities to consider, such as visiting Busch Gardens, Civil War Battlefields, and Shenandoah National Park. In a lower corner of the ad was the "Virginia Is for Lovers" slogan and a variation on its heart logo, thereby providing continuity with the state's long-term campaign theme.

Another print ad showed a female golfer celebrating a successful putt. The headline read, "She brings out the tiger in you." A number of golf courses and related attractions, such as the Virginia State Golf Association Museum, were highlighted in a sidebar. In another execution a family was shown buried in sand up to their heads, the headline reading, "She'll help you escape." Virginia Beach and other outdoor venues were highlighted to the side. Winter activities were addressed in an ad that featured a woman snowboarder, accompanied by the headline, "She doesn't believe in spectator sports." Yet another ad promoted the state's historic sites. It showed a picture from the American Revolution battlefield of Yorktown, with a family watching a colonial soldier firing a musket. The headline was "Kids think she's a blast."

OUTCOME

The "Meet Virginia" campaign was so successful that the VTC continued it beyond 2004. The VTC's goal for the campaign was to generate about 100,000 requests for its annual "Virginia Travel Guide" vacation-planning brochure, but after just seven months it more than doubled that target, receiving 220,000 unique requests for the material. Another indicator of the campaign's effectiveness could be found in the state's hotel sector. According to "Virginia Tourism Monitor," a monthly research publication compiled by the VTC, during the first quarter of 2004 occupancy rates in the state were 8.7 percent higher than they had been during the first quarter of 2003. Moreover, this was nearly twice the national average increase of 4.4 percent, as tabulated by the Travel Industry Association of America.

The work done by White & Partners was also recognized by the advertising industry. "Meet Virginia" won a Bronze in the Travel/Tourism/Destination category of the 2005 EFFIE Awards, a highly prestigious competition produced by the New York American Marketing Association, a trade organization for marketing professionals. In addition, "Meet Virginia" was named the Best Overall Advertising Campaign at the 2004 Educational Seminar for Tourism Organization, an annual event hosted by the Travel Industry Association of America.

FURTHER READING

Coppola, Vincent. "Lighter Love Stories for Virginia." Adweek (southwest ed.), May 6, 2002, p. 7.

Dunham, Linda. "Virginia Tourism Official Enjoys Chance to Merge Passions: State, Literature." Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, May 18, 2004.

Griswold, Alicia. "There's Less of Virginia Tourism to Love." Adweek (southeast ed.), June 10, 2003.

———. "Virginia Tourism Goes to White & Baldacci." Adweek (southeast ed.), September 16, 2003.

Scutt, Caroline. "State to Mark 25th Anniversary of 'Lovers' Tourism Theme." Travel Weekly, November 22, 1993, p. T23.

Ed Dinger

Visa U.S.A., Inc.

900 Metro Center Boulevard
Foster City, California 94404
USA
Telephone: (650) 432-3200
Web site: www.visa.com

■■■

VISA. IT'S EVERYWHERE YOU WANT TO BE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1985 Visa U.S.A. was the world's largest credit card company, but it lacked a specific brand image. The American Express Company advertised its cards as the best way to pay for travel and entertainment expenses. MasterCard International positioned its brand for middle- and lower-income consumers. Visa, however, aimed for both American Express's and MasterCard's target markets as well as for more traditional consumers who paid with cash and checks. Visa realized that one advantage it had over its competition was that merchants worldwide accepted Visa more than any other credit card. Hoping to gain more customers, the company released its "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign to brand Visa as the most widely accepted credit card in the world.

The campaign, created by the ad agency BBDO New York, debuted on October 1, 1985. Its budget began at $20 million. At the end of its 20-year lifespan the campaign consumed a budget of $335 million. Always lauding Visa as the most widely accepted credit card, "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" targeted a broad market and employed television, radio, print, Internet, and billboard advertisements. The original advertisements featured unique and upscale businesses that accepted Visa but not American Express. Later spots advertised the advantages of Visa Check Cards over paper checks. In 2000 the campaign heralded the "smart Visa card," a card with a security chip. Four years later the spots promoted the Visa Signature card, the company's first limitless credit card. The campaign became a mainstay of Super Bowl and Olympics advertising. The campaign ended just before the 2006 Winter Olympics.

Advertising critics praised the campaign throughout its 20-year run. It collected may of the ad industry's most prestigious awards, including EFFIEs, Clios, and Cannes Lions. Visa's credit card market share expanded from 43.8 percent in 1985 to 52 percent in 2004, an increase the company attributed to the campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although Visa had been steadily capturing American consumers since its inception in 1958, the company suffered from a lackluster image. Rival American Express "projected status and prestige," explained the Wall Street Journal, by airing commercials featuring glamorous celebrities who used the charge card. Visa, on the other hand, lacked a coherent brand message and was often confused with MasterCard, another bank card competitor. An in-house marketing shop produced all of Visa's advertising, which, according to the September 9, 1994, American Banker, was "quite similar'' to MasterCard's, with both companies ''hammering the point that a single card could be used anywhere for anything, with the ability to spread payments or assist in budgeting.''

In 1984, however, Visa brought in renowned ad agency BBDO in hopes of revitalizing its image. Visa and BBDO approached the crafting of a new campaign with two goals: to differentiate Visa from MasterCard, which was increasingly encroaching on Visa's market share, and to ''reinforce [Visa's] upscale image and remind consumers that it [w]as . . . the most widely accepted payment card in the world.'' The company decided that the best way to achieve both aims was to take on American Express. At the time AmEx dominated the lucrative travel and entertainment sector of the market. Visa sought ''to piggyback on American Express' image as the premier travel and entertainment card,'' explained an article in the September 27, 1985, issue of American Banker. Thus, in ad after ad Visa drove home the point that elite and trendy restaurants, hotels, and shops—the sorts of establishments most consumers associated with American Express—emphatically did not accept that card.

TARGET MARKET

''It's Everywhere You Want to Be'' initially pursued adults who were American Express's core customers. Although the Visa card was carried by more American consumers and was accepted at more merchants than AmEx, market research at the time revealed that ''people tend[ed] to spend more on their American Express cards,'' according to the November 27, 1989, edition of the Wall Street Journal. The original target audience of the ''It's Everywhere'' campaign was adults aged 25 to 54 who lived in major metropolitan areas and had an annual income of more than $20,000. In order to tout its acceptance in the travel and entertainment sector, Visa's early commercials focused exclusively on such businesses, especially restaurants, hotels, and leisure activities. For instance, the three launch commercials portrayed Rosalie's Restaurant, Captain John's Boatyard in Mangrove Bay, Bermuda, and a fishing tackle store in Texas. Later spots featured the exclusive Telluride Ski Resort, the Jack Nicklaus/Flick Golf Schools, and Granita, a chic eatery in Malibu, California.

To reach this audience of older, more affluent Americans, Visa also took care to form advertising alliances with celebrities who appealed to these baby boomers. In 1989 the company teamed up with Paul McCartney. Visa sponsored the ex-Beatle's solo U.S. concert tour in exchange for billing as the only credit card accepted at the event. McCartney's allure was evident, as a BBDO spokesperson explained to the Wall Street Journal: ''He spans generations; he has an international image, and he has a family image.''

As the ''It's Everywhere'' campaign flourished, Visa expanded its target market. Generation Xers, those Americans born after 1964, accounted for 30 percent of all credit card purchases. Visa crafted television commercials and print ads that were designed to capture the allegiance of this demographic group. ''The Attic,'' for example, targeted 20- and 30-year-olds with its ''fast-paced montage of live fashion shots [that] could easily be part of a music video,'' according to a Visa press release. Indeed, the commercial's ''funky music, hip Gen Xers, and popular vintage clothing'' were carefully selected to reach this more youthful audience. ''The only thing that's out of style,'' quipped the commercial, ''is using American Express.'' In a similar vein, Visa also crafted a group of spots to attract owners of small businesses.

In 1996 the campaign targeted consumers accustomed to using paper checks, encouraging them to switch to its Visa Check Card with advertisements that carried the tagline ''Works Like a Check.'' Four years later spots for the new ''smart Visa card'' targeted what BBDO called ''alpha consumers,'' or technologically minded Americans between 18 and 34 years old. In 2004, with commercials that advertised Visa's Signature card, a limitless credit card aimed at wealthy consumers, the campaign's target shifted toward professionals aged 35 to 54 who earned at least $125,000 per year.

COMPETITION

When Visa set out to garner a more prosperous consumer base, especially in the travel and entertainment sector, it faced fierce competition from both American Express and MasterCard. Indeed, the Chicago Sun-Times succinctly concluded that AmEx ''owned'' the travel and entertainment category at the time of the 1985 launch of the ''It's Everywhere'' campaign. For years American Express had cultivated an elite image through its ''Portraits'' campaign and its series of ''Don't Leave Home without It'' advertisements. ''We have always directed all our efforts toward the upscale market in the United States,'' an AmEx executive told Gannett News Service. When Visa began its barrage of comparative advertising against its competitor, AmEx first sought to remain above the fray. By 1992, however, with its market share in a tailspin, American Express struck back with a counterattack to Visa's Olympic Games advertising. Working with a new agency, Chiat/Day/Mojo, American Express released two spots that were set in Barcelona, the location of the 1992 Olympic Games. The copy in the spots slyly sniped at Visa with slogans such as ''And remember, to visit Spain, you don't need a visa'' and

TAKING THE GLOVES OFF

Ad agency BBDO was quite clear in an interview with Adweek that its explicit strategy for the "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign was to "attack American Express." Stung by Visa's success, American Express (or AmEx) often vociferously complained that Visa's much-vaunted universal acceptance was the result of "buying off" the merchants who appeared in its highly publicized commercials. But the "Telluride" commercial generated particular controversy. The spot—which proclaimed, "at Telluride Ski Resort, they'll let you take the plunge, but they won't take American Express. Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" —also showed 13 shops on Telluride's main street, 10 of which accepted American Express, and also showed a hotel in town that took AmEx. American Express cried foul and sought an injunction to prevent Visa from running the spot. Visa agreed to pull the spot until it had removed the scenes of merchants that accepted American Express. But this did not end the bitterness between the rivals. According to Corporate Legal Times, in a court document American Express claimed that Visa "singled out high-visibility American Express clients and persuaded them to cancel their AmEx contracts in return for television advertising."

"Obviously, we're here for more than just fun and games." Nevertheless, AmEx's market share continued to decline, dropping that year from 20.4 to 19.6 percent, while Visa's remained strong, at 45.4 percent. Still striving to rebound, American Express initiated a national print and television campaign in 1997 that openly criticized Visa. "Visa says they're everywhere, but isn't it more important to have a card that helps you with just about everything?" queried one such commercial. AmEx also signed comedian Jerry Seinfeld as a spokesperson to appear in a variety of witty ads. American Express's era of decline ended when in 1997 the company's market share rose to 17 percent, up from 16.4 percent in 1996.

While Visa wrested control of the upscale market from American Express, MasterCard strove to reach middle-class consumers. In 1993, MasterCard abandoned its long-standing "Master the Moment" campaign, which relied on scenes of celebrities and carefree spending, in favor of "It's More Than a Credit Card. It's Smart Money." Component spots showed regular people using MasterCard in their daily lives, for example, while shopping at the supermarket. Instead of emphasizing prestige, MasterCard hammered home the value of its card and its practicality. In 1997, however, MasterCard switched strategies once more with the debut of the "Priceless" campaign from its new ad agency, McCann-Erickson. After boosting its ad budget 8 percent, to $106.2 million, in that year and honing its message to reach more affluent consumers, MasterCard saw its market share rise to 27.8 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The $20 million campaign's initial goal was to reinforce its upscale image and establish itself as the most widely accepted payment card in the lucrative sector of travel and entertainment. "Just a little north of Boston, in the old town of Marblehead, is a place where only the local people used to eat," declared the inaugural spot of the campaign. "Where the scaloppini and the scampi were so good that word soon got out that a night at Rosalie's was like a night in Milan. But if you go there, remember, bring a big appetite and bring your Visa card. Because at Rosalie's they don't take no for an answer and they don't take American Express. Visa. It's everywhere you want to be."

Eighty percent of the campaign's budget was spent on commercials aired during programming such as the Today Show and Good Morning America, both popular with the initial target audience; the NFL's Super Bowl, which annually drew the largest television viewership of any single event; Monday Night Football; and the final episode of the popular situation comedy Seinfeld. As a company spokesperson explained in a press release, Visa often selected venues such as Seinfeld to carry the "It's Everywhere" message because spots broadcast on such shows were "in the position to reach millions of current and potential cardholders in numerous market segments." Visa and BBDO also crafted print ads and radio spots that furthered the "It's Everywhere" theme.

In addition to airing television spots, the campaign built alliances with high-profile events. In 1986 Visa teamed up with the Olympic Games as an official sponsor, a relationship that would continue for the breadth of the campaign. Visa subsequently forged exclusive contracts with the National Football League, Paul McCartney's Concert Tour, and the Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey Circus. In addition to using these relationships in its advertising to hype that the organizations did not take American Express, Visa was able to capitalize on the cachet that events such as the Olympics possessed.

To target people between 18 and 34 years old, one spot in 1999 featured young people salsa dancing. The voice-over, provided by the actor Ed Grover, explained that the Salsa Lovers Dance Studio in Miami did not accept American Express, only Visa. The spot was one of many Visa advertisements that used Latin culture to attract consumers. "I think Latin culture used to be for Latins, but not anymore," Jimmy Siegel, a BBDO senior creative director, said to the New York Times. "Latin culture has become hip, and it's sort of on the edge of becoming more popular in the mainstream. I would expect more commercials with some sort of Latin influence." The campaign targeted tech-savvy "alpha consumers" the next year by advertising the new smart Visa card, a card that interacted with the Internet via a security chip. One Internet ad on www.NFL.com, the official site of the National Football League, read, "They don't take American Express—not even Blue." (The Blue Card was AmEx's version of the smart Visa card.) The copy referenced Visa's exclusive relationship with the NFL.

In 2003 the campaign focused more on business credit card advertisements. One spot that aired on ABC, CBS, CNN, Fox, MSNBC, ESPN, and other networks featured a clothing-store owner using her business credit card to make purchases, track expenses, and accept deliveries. Print ads and more television spots targeted larger businesses the next year. One 2004 print ad showed a business executive sitting in a swan chair (an office chair that was an icon of midcentury furniture design) beside stacks of paper. The ad's copy stated, "I want to be surrounded by intelligence, not information." Other ads used the "I want to be . . ." tagline and featured executives reposed in the same chair. "The swan chair is a platform to speak from, for business executives to voice their aspirations," Dawn Volan, director of advertising at Visa, said in B to B. "We want to use the chair as an identifier that Visa and Visa Commercial Solutions can help you reach those aspirations." The ads featured the modified tagline "It's everywhere you want your company to be."

One of the campaign's last efforts was promoting the Visa Signature card. Spots linked the no-limit credit card to other "signature" icons. Part of Visa's $335 million ad budget was used to create a spot that compared the Signature card to Marilyn Monroe, "the signature blonde," Frank Sinatra, "the signature voice," and the classic Ford Thunderbird, "the signature sports car." The spot ended with a voice-over explaining, "It's not just everywhere you want to be, it's everything you've ever wanted." The campaign ended in early 2006.

OUTCOME

"It's Everywhere You Want to Be" was heralded by both Visa executives and advertising analysts as an unequivocal success. From 1989 to 1993 Visa doubled its sales in the travel and entertainment sector. The company's share of the total credit card market increased from 43.8 percent in 1985 to 52 percent in 2004. "The ad campaign has succeeded beyond anybody's wildest imagination," a Visa spokesperson told the September 23, 1993, issue of American Banker. "It's Everywhere" collected many advertising awards, including a Gold Lion at the prestigious International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, and numerous EFFIEs, Clios, and ADDYs.

Even though the campaign jabbed at American Express for nearly 20 years, Elizabeth Silver, the senior vice president of advertising at Visa, said in an interview with Advertising Age, "American Express was a foil. Our real aim was MasterCard." When the campaign started, there was not much brand discernment between MasterCard and Visa. According to Visa, the company split the market nearly two to one with MasterCard. By the campaign's end Visa completely outpaced MasterCard with more than 50 percent of the entire credit card market.

Unfortunately for BBDO, by a few years into the new millennium Visa was viewing the campaign's message as outdated. In 2005 most merchants accepted American Express, Visa, and MasterCard. Consumers were not worrying about their American Express cards being denied. "We've had a very successful campaign with 'It's Everywhere You Want to Be,'" Visa's chief marketing officer, Susanne Lyons, said to the New York Times. "Acceptance was a great differentiator 20 years ago. But it's not so important now as qualities like security and convenience." Just before the 2006 Winter Olympics, Visa awarded its $335 million ad account to the agency TBWA\Chiat\Day Los Angeles. The 20-year campaign was replaced with the new agency's "Life Takes Visa" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Barge, Jeff. "Fantastic Plastic Commercial Squelched as Too Misleading." Corporate Legal Times, December 1993.

Bird, Laura. "Race for MasterCard's Account Narrows." Wall Street Journal, August 7, 1992.

Dash, Eric. "To Make the Card Special, Try the Warm and Familiar." New York Times, February 8, 2006, p. 4.

Elliott, Stuart. "VISA USA Decides It Wasn't Where It Wanted to Be." New York Times, November 15, 2005, p. 13.

Garfield, Bob. "Not Catchy, Not Creative, but Visa Found a Keeper." Advertising Age, February 27, 2006, p. 59.

Gross, Laura. "30 Years of Bank Credit Cards." American Banker, September 9, 1994.

Gross, Laura, and David Tyson. "Visa Ad Campaign Emphasizes Wide Acceptance." American Banker, September 27, 1985.

Lipman, Joanne. "McCartney: Madison Avenue's Newest Pitchman." Wall Street Journal, November 27, 1989.

Maddox, Kate. "Visa Effort Aims to Raise B-to-B Profile." B to B, July 19, 2004, p. 4.

Meece, Mickey. "Credit Cards Increase Market Share." American Banker, September 23, 1993.

Millman, Nancy. "DDB Needham Management Shaken by Defections." Chicago Sun-Times, February 11, 1987.

———. "Visa Charges Ahead with Successful Ads." Chicago Tribune, January 30, 1994.

Voight, Joan, and Andrew McMains. "Storming the Citadel." Adweek, October 5, 1998.

Woller, Barbara. "Credit Cards Fight to Get Into, and Out of, Consumers' Wallets." Gannett News Service, July 26, 1990.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

WORKS LIKE A CHECK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With little fanfare and virtually no advertising support, Visa U.S.A. introduced the Visa Check Card in 1979. This off-line debit card, which resembled a traditional credit card except that it deducted funds from a user's bank account like a check, was accepted by a wide range of businesses. It was not until the mid-1990s, however, when technology played a stronger role in American culture, that Visa executives decided that there was a vast market for its Check Card. Banks favored the card system because it reduced the amount of transaction fees they had to pay in comparison to covering checks. Merchants welcomed Check Cards because a transaction was approved only if the user had sufficient funds to cover the cost. Hoping to increase consumer awareness, acceptance, and use of the Visa Check Card, Visa released its "Works Like a Check" campaign.

Created by the ad agency BBDO New York, the estimated $45 million television campaign debuted during coverage of the 1996 Summer Olympics. Its emphasis was that using the Check Card was a significantly more convenient way to pay for a purchase than writing a conventional paper check. The first six commercials featured a wide range of celebrities, including 1996 U.S. presidential candidate Bob Dole, professional football player Deion Sanders, and actor Pierce Brosnan. Despite their fame, all the featured celebrities were unable to pay by check without their photo identification. Early spots ended with a voice-over explaining Visa's Check Card: "It works like a check . . . only better." Later spots featured a voice-over that stated, "Get in, get out, get on with life," which was followed by Visa's long-standing tagline, "Visa. It's everywhere you want to be." Visa simultaneously ended the campaign and its longtime relationship with BBDO just before the 2006 Winter Olympics.

Visa was delighted with the campaign's results. According to the Nilson Report, a publication for the credit card industry, charges made on Visa Check Cards skyrocketed from $20.2 billion in 1995 up to $467 billion in 2004. The campaign was critically acclaimed as well; it garnered a plethora of advertising awards, including a coveted Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Visa U.S.A. first introduced its debit card in 1979, when it issued 917,000 Check Cards. The cards, which were released by banks and credit unions, carried the Visa logo and looked almost identical to the already familiar credit cards. But unlike credit cards, the off-line debit cards deducted the funds used to make the purchase directly from the cardholder's bank account. Off-line debit cards also differed from ATM cards issued by banks in that the check cards did not require the cardholder to use any sort of personal identification number (PIN) or password. Banks found the Check Cards to be quite a boon to their operations. When their customers chose to pay for purchases with debit cards, the bank only paid around 30 cents in transaction fees, as opposed to the 65-cent cost it incurred when a customer paid with a check. Customers did not embrace the concept immediately, however. Many who received the new cards in the mail did not distinguish them from credit cards. Nor were the off-line debit cards "well entrenched in the marketplace," according to Credit Card Management.

Visa had never devoted an extensive advertising campaign to promoting its Check Card, although the number of cardholders had climbed slowly to 9.2 million by 1991. But Visa recognized the growth potential of the Check Card. Not only would banks prefer the lower transaction costs of the debit card but merchants would also benefit from the guaranteed payment of the Check Card. In Gallup polls American adults expressed interest in a payment method at checkout counters that was easier to use than a personal check. Moreover, people were increasingly reluctant to carry large amounts of cash, a concern that the Check Card could address.

TARGET MARKET

Because of the ubiquity of personal checks, Visa was interested in reaching virtually every American consumer. The company decided that celebrity spokespeople would be the best way to convey its message to its desired audience. Using a famous face to pitch a product was a tried-and-true advertising strategy. But Visa did not want generic "stars"; it wanted "unmistakable personalities" to deliver its key message—that even the "unmistakable" can be hassled to prove their identity. The next step was to use care and select as its spokespeople those whose appeal was broad enough to cross demographic lines. For instance, Tony Bennett, who appeared in the sixth installment of the campaign, was not only well liked by his retirement-age contemporaries but was also growing increasingly popular among a younger audience of baby boomers and Generation Xers. "His renditions of timeless classics have struck a chord with an entirely new generation of music lovers in their twenties and thirties," said Liz Silver, Visa's senior vice president of advertising.

Visa and BBDO were also sensitive to consumers' potential apprehensions about a new product—especially one that dealt with their finances. Featuring Bob Dole, a retired senator with a reputation for honesty and service, as well as cantankerousness, enhanced the product's credibility in a relaxed and entertaining way. "By having this very conservative, rather traditional, non-techie person use a newfangled way of doing business, you eliminate the objections of a lot of people who were uncomfortable with the product," Alvin Schechter, chairman of the brand-consulting firm Interbrand-Schechter, told American Banker.

The campaign's primary appeal, though, was its use of humor, which was intended to make the commercials—and Visa's Check Card—unforgettable to viewers. "Our philosophy is that the commercials need to entertain," Matthew Brispiel, Visa's director of advertising, told Credit Card Management. "If it doesn't entertain, it becomes wallpaper, and no one pays attention." Moreover, the campaign's comic elements were designed to put viewers at ease and to allow them to relate to the situations depicted. According to Visa's Silver, each scenario portrayed in the campaign served "to illustrate the frustration felt when paying by check in a light-hearted way. The punch line is that we're not alone—celebrities as recognizable as Tony Bennett can't avoid I.D. hassles."

A PROMOTIONAL ALLIANCE

The 60-second James Bond commercial that appeared in 1997 marked a new step for the "Works Like a Check" campaign. Visa forged a promotional alliance with MGM Pictures that was intended both to aid Visa's overall strategy and to hype the MGM-produced James Bond film Tomorrow Never Dies that was released at almost the same time that the campaign debuted.

COMPETITION

The "Works Like a Check" campaign's use of ironic humor and quirky celebrities distinguished Visa from the marketing efforts of its primary competitor, MasterCard. In launching a 1997 campaign for its own debit card, MasterMoney, MasterCard eschewed many of Visa's strategies for reaching its target market. MasterCard's "Priceless" campaign centered on the speed of making purchases with a debit card. One of the spots in that series, called "Paint," related the plight of a man waiting to buy a can of paint in a long hardware-store line while another customer paid with a check. "Al," the slow-moving manager, first had to approve the check. The man finally escaped when another register opened, and he was able to use his debit card quickly. The on-screen caption read: "Knowing you will never have to wait for Al—Priceless." Another spot portrayed the experiences of two women, one who successfully caught her train because she shopped quickly using a MasterMoney card, and the other who missed hers because she made her purchases by check.

Visa spent significantly more on advertising than its rival. In 1997 Visa devoted $46.7 million to promoting its Check Card, compared with the $10.9 million spent to market MasterMoney. Not surprisingly, Visa had issued over 50 million Check Cards by the end of 1997, while only 15.6 million MasterMoney cards had been issued to consumers. MasterCard, however, remained optimistic that its promotional strategy would close this gap at less cost to MasterCard. Instead of running a blitz of high-profile commercials during prime-time television slots, the company tried to win over viewers in other ways. For example, MasterCard took part in a 1997 contest on the television show Live with Regis and Kathy Lee, seen by more than 27.6 million consumers. Contestants had the chance to win a MasterMoney card with $5,000 or more on it. "While we may get 30 seconds to promote MasterMoney on a commercial, we'll be getting considerably more exposure through this promotion," MasterCard vice president Irene Katen told Credit Card Management.

Analysts noted that in 1996 and 1997 Visa and MasterCard's true competitors were not each other. According to Credit Card Management, "the goal for both . . . was persuading Americans to stop using cash and checks and to use debit cards instead." Although Visa held a far larger share of the debit card market, neither its ads nor MasterCard's were intended simply to outdo the other. Rather, both companies sought to build market acceptance for debit cards. Key competition for both Visa Check Card and MasterMoney was checks and the force of habit that kept consumers using them to make purchases. In essence, the campaigns for the only two off-line debit cards were mutually reinforcing. Neither company, however, lost sight of its ultimate goal of dominating the debit card market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Visa's goal was to increase the profile of its Check Card. In an effort to reach as broad an audience as possible, it opted for a strategy of "," which entailed running the commercials during some of television's highest-rated shows. According to Credit Card Management, Visa's commercials reached more viewers than MasterCard's "because of the types of programs on which they appear." The first spot of the campaign, featuring all-world athlete Deion Sanders, premiered during NBC's broadcast of the 1996 Summer Olympics. The best-known commercial of the series, which debuted during the 1997 Super Bowl (at an estimated cost to Visa of $40,000 per second simply for the airtime), featured the recently defeated presidential candidate Bob Dole returning to his hometown of Russell, Kansas. The 60-second spot cut between scenes of Dole's homecoming speech to the residents of Russell, a parade held in his honor, and tributes from local residents who had long-standing relationships with him. A sign in front of a grain silo declared, "Welcome to Russell, Kansas. Home of Bob Dole." After Dole finished lunch at the town diner, he asked the waitress, "Take a check?" "Of course," she replied, and then added with the first stern look in the commercial, "Can I see some I.D.? Driver's license, passport, military I.D., voter . . ." A voice-over interjected, "Maybe it's time you tried the Visa Check Card. It automatically deducts from your checking account everywhere Visa is accepted. No questions asked. No I.D. needed." The final image was of Dole: "I just can't win," he quipped. The voice-over that closed the spot stated, "The Visa Check Card. It works like a check, only better."

Another commercial, starring Pierce Brosnan, debuted during ABC's Monday Night Football telecasts during the fall of 1997. When Brosnan as James Bond tried to write a check to cover his caviar at a Secret Service snack bar, he was asked for I.D. even though he had already successfully passed through a building security system that confirmed his identity by scanning his voice, handprint, and even his retina. According to Matthew Brispiel, Visa's director of advertising, the celebrity in each spot was used as a foil. It was the product that was "held up as the hero."

Despite the overwhelming popularity of the "Works Like a Check" campaign, Visa did have to overcome some negative publicity regarding the possibility that off-line debit cards made consumers easy targets for fraud. Because the card did not require a consumer to enter a PIN at the time of a purchase, some contended that the card was unsafe. The Consumers Union emphasized that, in cases of fraud, it often took banks weeks to reinstate the stolen funds. In response, Visa announced a new cardholder protection policy to alleviate this concern.

In midcampaign Visa adjusted the commercials' voice-over endings. Visa's brand-management team believed that they no longer needed to explain that a Check Card "Works Like a Check." In TV spots released in 1999 the voice-overs touted the convenience of the Check Card with the phrase "Get in, get out, get on with life." Liz Silver, senior vice president of brand management and advertising for Visa, explained the shift in Brandweek. "We were moving up that ladder of consumer benefit . . . to the ability to get on with the things that are truly important to you and enabling your lifestyle," she said.

One spot that aired during the 2002 Super Bowl featured the actor Kevin Bacon struggling to make a purchase with a paper check. Referencing a trivia game called "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon," in which players linked any actor to Bacon by referencing other actors who had worked with him (the idea being that he could be connected to any film actor in six steps or less), Kevin Bacon was humorously featured trying to prove his own identity to a convenience-store clerk. When denied purchase, Bacon tracked down six people who, through a series of relationships, ultimately linked him to the clerk. For a subsequent Super Bowl commercial the Chinese basketball star Yao Ming and baseball legend Yogi Berra grew frustrated with a clerk who would not accept their checks. The campaign ended in early 2006.

OUTCOME

Early on in the campaign Visa declared its "Works Like a Check" campaign to be an unequivocal success. The number of Check Cards issued rose from 46 million in 1996 to 58 million in 1997. These figures validated Visa's assertion that its advertising campaign had achieved its primary goal of promoting awareness of its debit card. According to the Business Wire, Visa attributed the card's growing popularity in large part to its "consistent and high profile advertising." Testing done throughout the campaign revealed that consumers became increasingly more conscious of the option of using Visa's debit card. According to American Banker, Visa's tracking index indicated that by July 1997, 80 percent of consumers knew what a debit card was.

The advertising industry lauded the campaign as well. In June 1998 BBDO took top honors in the financial services category at the EFFIE Awards for the "Works Like a Check" commercials. The same year Visa won three Clio Awards for individual ads in the campaign. Moreover, the Bob Dole spot was honored with a Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. The campaign also collected the prestigious 2004 Bronze EFFIE in the Sustained Success category, which honored campaigns over five years old.

The campaign was probably best measured by the increase in Visa Check Card use over the campaign's lifetime. The annual charges to Visa Check Cards surged from $20.2 billion in 1995 to $537 billion in 2004. Unfortunately for BBDO, Visa executives decided to end the campaign just before the 2006 Winter Olympics. Susanne Lyons, Visa's chief marketing officer, explained the campaign's later weaknesses to USA Today: ''After the ads run for a long time, they become formulaic, and you become wallpaper . . . You have the same comic twist and you get a little predictable.'' Visa awarded its advertising account to the ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James. ''The Marketing 100: Visa Check Card: Liz Silver.'' Advertising Age, June 30, 1997.

Bloom, Jennifer Kingson. ''MasterCard's 'Priceless' Ads Win Top Honors.'' American Banker, June 15, 1999, p. 16.

Coulton, Antoinette. ''MasterCard Adds Debit to 'Priceless' Ad Campaign.'' American Banker, June 25, 1998.

Green, Jeffrey. ''Take 2 for Debit Commercials'' Credit Card Management, November 1, 1997.

Howard, Theresa. ''Visa to Change Strategies in Upcoming Ads.'' USA Today, January 22, 2006.

Meece, Mickey. ''Financial Firms Look to Score with Super Bowl Ads.'' American Banker, January 24, 1997.

''Shifting Gears.'' CardFAX, April 13, 1998.

''Visa Bonds with 007 in Its Latest Check Card Commercial.'' PR Newswire, November 10, 1997.

''Visa Check Card Experiences Double-Digit Growth.'' Business Wire, April 21, 1998.

Wallenstein, Andy. ''A Lot of Famous Agencies Are Not Named after Agency Producers.'' Shoot, August 21, 1998, p. 51.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

Volkswagen of America, Inc.

3800 Hamlin Road
Auburn Hills, Michigan 48326
USA
Telephone: (248) 340-5000
Fax: (248) 754-4930
Web site: www.vw.com

■■■

ALL GROWN UP. SORT OF. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Volkswagen of America, Inc. (VWoA), the U.S. extension of Europe's largest automaker, Volkswagen AG, released its fourth-generation Jetta sedan in 1999. The Jetta's exterior resonated so well with 20-somethings that it outsold all other VWoA models, including the Golf, the GTI, the Passat, the New Beetle, and the EuroVan Camper. In 2004 the Jetta accounted for 40 percent of VWoA's total sales, but company executives feared that Volkswagen was losing customers to competing brands with more power and greater features. In 2005 VWoA released an all-new, fifth-generation Jetta called the A5 Jetta. Automotive critics raved about its upgraded interior and engineering but criticized its bland exterior. To attract consumers who had favored the 1999 Jetta but now wanted more from a car, VWoA released a campaign titled "All Grown Up. Sort Of."

The campaign was created by VWoA's longtime ad agency Arnold Worldwide of Boston. It included print ads, radio spots, television spots, and alternative mediums such as wooden puzzles, coloring books, and a six-minute film titled The Check Up. The campaign debuted on March 19, 2005. The first commercial, "Airport," featured a young businessman using his A5 Jetta to shuttle an older, conservative executive from the airport. When the stodgy executive turned on the Jetta's radio to "check the scores," the speakers blared out heavy-metal music. The spot ended with the tagline "The new Jetta. It's all grown up. Sort of." Although the campaign's cost was undisclosed, Volkswagen spent an estimated $30 million on Jetta advertising in 2004, according to the media researcher Nielsen Monitor-Plus. VWoA ended its relationship with Arnold in September 2005.

The campaign earned Best of Show honors at the 2005 Francis W. Hatch Awards, which recognized creative excellence within New England's advertising community. Some VWoA car dealers criticized the campaign for not informing customers about the A5 Jetta's features. Nevertheless, the campaign helped Jetta sales increase 25 percent in the first three months of 2005 compared to the same period the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When the ad agency Doyle Dane Bernbach of New York released VWoA's "Think Small" campaign in the 1950s, automotive advertising in America changed forever. Before "Think Small," print ads for automotive brands typically depicted large, showy cars against imposing backdrops. In contrast, "Think Small" featured one small image of a Volkswagen Beetle juxtaposed on a stark white background. "It was one of the first advertising campaigns to treat audiences like they had some intelligence.

It was tongue-in-cheek and unexpected," Linda Scott, associate professor of advertising, art, and design at the University of Illinois, said to Automotive News.

In 1986 Doyle Dane Bernbach merged with the ad agency Needham Harper & Steers of Chicago to become DDB Needham Worldwide. During the latter half of the 1980s the expanded agency created campaigns that touted Volkswagen's German engineering. Spots featured Volkswagens speeding around test tracks. In 1990 DDB Needham Worldwide crafted a campaign around the German word for driving pleasure, "Fahrvergnugen," which was paired with a small stick figure. After experiencing waning sales VWoA briefly awarded its advertising account to Berlin Cameron Doyle and finally to Arnold in March 1995. Arnold's first executions featured the tagline "Drivers Wanted," which Arnold used for 10 years. Because VWoA did not release a new model during Arnold's first two years, the ad agency cross-promoted Volkswagen with Trek mountain bikes and K2 skis.

The 1999 Jetta resonated so well with younger customers that VWoA claimed to have the automotive industry's lowest average customer age: 33 years old. Over the next three years, however, the Jetta lost ground to competing brands, such as the Audi A4 and the MINI Cooper. Although its exterior remained popular, the fourth-generation Jetta's lack of power and limited features were cited for decreasing sales. To inject juvenescence into the brand Volkswagen engineers upgraded the fifth-generation Jetta, called the A5 Jetta, in size and features. According to automotive critics, the Jetta's popular exterior was lost in the upgrade. To suggest that the larger, more expensive A5 Jetta still exhibited the youthful uniqueness of its 1999 predecessor, Arnold released the "All Grown Up. Sort Of" campaign.

JETTA: IT'S A BREEZE

After Volkswagen's marketing team noticed that North Americans preferred sedans and coupes over hatchback-shaped automobiles, Volkswagen released its first Jetta, a larger version of the Golf hatchback. The first Jetta was released worldwide in 1980. Later generations emerged in 1984, 1991, 1998, and 2005. The original version's name came from the jet stream—the swift air currents that circle the earth. Although Canada, the United States, and South Africa retained the Jetta name across all five generations, the 1991 model in Europe was called Vento after the Italian word for "wind." Continuing its tempestuous naming convention, Europe's fourth generation model was titled Bora, the name of an air current above the Adriatic Sea. The 2005 version was once again called the Jetta in Europe but not across the globe. It took the name Sagitar in China, Bora in Mexico, and Vento in regions of South America.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted college graduates who were beginning to make their first adult life changes, including purchasing a home, starting lifelong careers, or committing to long-term personal relationships. Both of the campaign's TV spots featured 20-somethings performing notably adult activities, while still listening to hard-rock music. The campaign reached for "that person in the in-between stage in life," David Weist, Arnold's creative director for the campaign, told Adweek. "Where they're half grown up and still half a kid. They have a better job, they might have a steady relationship with someone, but they still can't quite throw that futon away or the monkey lamp. That's where the car is."

Volkswagen dealers criticized the spots for not providing enough imagery or information about the newly engineered Jetta. Ad critics, however, remarked that a strategy focusing more on image than on information was effective. If the tech-savvy target connected with the content, according to Arnold, the target would later research the Jetta themselves. "For the younger consumer, it's all about image and about wanting to feel good about yourself," Wes Brown, a partner in the Los Angeles marketing firm Iceology, explained to Automotive News. "If you've got a good image, they'll come in, and the product will speak for itself."

The fifth-generation Jetta was designed for a more affluent target than the previous Jetta. The A5 Jetta's baseline price of $20,390 was nearly $4,000 above that of the 1999 model. The A5 was also 17 centimeters longer, loaded with more features, and outfitted with a larger engine. In addition, according to automotive critics, it resembled the Toyota Corolla, a car popular with 30-something drivers. One of the campaign's spots, "Independence Day," featured a man and a woman in their late 20s who used an A5 Jetta to tote large speakers off to a newly purchased home. The spot implied that the fun-loving couple had moved from an apartment to a house just so that they could dance to loud rock music.

COMPETITION

While automotive critics compared the new Jetta's exterior to that of the Toyota Corolla, they likened its interior to that of an Audi—a brand partially owned by Volkswagen AG. Although the baseline Audi A4 and Audi A3 were slightly pricier than the A5 Jetta, Audi's advertising targeted a similar market. In March 2005 Audi of America, the North American branch of Audi, released its "Never Follow" campaign to herald the release of its seventh-generation A4 sedan. One campaign promotion asked consumers to locate nine Internet banner ads that highlighted new A4 features. Participants in the contest were eligible for a two-year lease on a new A4. Other prizes included PalmOne and Bose products. The campaign targeted 25- to 39-year-old men and was developed by ad agency McKinney + Silver of Raleigh, North Carolina. "We decided to engage the user, let them interact with the brand and let them see what's changed," Erin Bredemann, interactive strategist at McKinney + Silver, said to Adweek. "You collect these parts and also learn about the car through the game."

In June 2005 McKinney + Silver released its "The Art of the Heist" campaign to announce the all-new Audi A3, with a suggested retail price of more than $26,000. The campaign told the story of two hit men chasing the fictional Ian Yarbrough, who had recovered a stolen Audi A3 containing valuable computer files, across America. A plethora of media were used to tell the campaign's narrative, including one 30-second television commercial, print ads, outdoor ads, online banners, and the website www.AudiUsa.com/A3. According to Audi, more than 200,000 people interacted with the Audi website in a single day of the campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The campaign's two television spots, "Airport" and "Independence Day," debuted on March 19, 2005. "Airport" showed a 20-something man picking up his older, more conservative colleagues at the airport. At the spot's beginning the 20-something impressed the older men with a well-articulated business conversation. The mood inside the A5 Jetta deteriorated, however, when the man seated next to him stated that he wanted to "check the scores" and turned on the car stereo. Rock music blasted out of the speakers. The spot "Independence Day" featured a young couple dancing in their apartment to the Kings of Leon rock song "Molly's Chambers." After a downstairs neighbor complained, the couple used their A5 Jetta to transport larger speakers to what the spot later revealed was their new house. The commercial ended with the two dancing inside their new living room. Both spots concluded with the copy "The new Jetta. It's all grown up. Sort of."

To the dismay of Volkswagen dealers, neither spot explained the new Jetta's features. Also, the commercials rarely aired images of the A5's revamped design. Defending the campaign strategy in Automotive News, VWoA vice president Len Hunt said, "Everybody reaches for the obvious, 'I'm going to spend $20 million, so I better show what the car's got.' . . . We know our audience loves our brand, and we've made a name for ourselves with our ads, and we're sticking to that. We desperately try to keep this VW character in our ads."

For a less traditional effort of the campaign, Arnold hired uniformed 20-somethings to disperse coloring books and wooden puzzles with the "All grown up. Sort of" theme within Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Miami, Washington, D.C., and Seattle. The coloring books featured adults performing mundane tasks, such as washing dishes, computing taxes, and engaging in boring conversations, until being "rescued" by A5 Jettas.

Two-page foldout print ads were published in national magazines. Before the ads were unfolded, new Jettas appeared in serene settings such as in front of an upscale restaurant. Once the ads were opened, images showed much rowdier Jettas performing stunts such as driving in tight circles ("doing doughnuts") in the snow. One ad featured two nude owners running along the beach. "It's a different walk to take," Brown said in Automotive News. "Do you talk about all these features that are new to you and your buyer, or do you do it more abstract[ly] and say, 'If this is the way you lead your life, this is the brand for you.' European brands tend to go the more abstract way."

Arnold also created for the campaign a six-minute film titled The Check Up, starring Joe Pantoliano, formerly of the mob-family TV drama The Sopranos. Two million DVDs were inserted in Entertainment Weekly. Another 1.5 million were made available at Volkswagen dealerships. The film's narrative featured a 31-year-old man being investigated by a case officer for something called the "Federal Commission of Adulthood." The investigator, played by Pantoliano, monitored the maturation of young adults and made sure that the 31-year-old was accruing responsibilities. In addition to The Check Up, the DVD contained interviews with Volkswagen designers and driving footage of the new Jetta.

OUTCOME

Although the campaign helped A5 Jetta sales for the first three months of 2005 increase 25 percent over Jetta sales for the same period in 2004, other Volkswagen brands were underselling. Comprehensive sales for VWoA's first seven months of 2005 were 22 percent below the previous year. Volkswagen eventually severed its 10-year relationship with Arnold in September 2005 and awarded the account to Crispin Porter + Bogusky without a repitch from Arnold. Arnold executives blamed their loss on Kerri Martin, the new director for brand innovation at VWoA, who had previously served as the marketing communications manager for BMW of North America. Martin had worked closely with Crispin Porter + Bogusky to relaunch BMW's MINI Cooper in 2001.

"All Grown Up. Sort Of" earned Best of Show honors at the 2005 Hatch Awards, an annual event organized by the Ad Club of New England. Arnold executives readily defended their work after their campaign collected the award. "Certainly [the win is] bittersweet because VW was so much a part of the agency," Ron Lawner, chief creative officer at Arnold, said to Adweek. "But I think [the awards] speak very loudly about how modern and integrated this agency really is. We won for a body of fully integrated campaigns, and to be slapped for not thinking outside the box when we in fact live outside the box [is frustrating.]" Lawner was speaking only a few days after VWoA announced that it would use Crispin Porter + Bogusky.

FURTHER READING

Crain, Rance. "Integrated Ideas Are Not King at Frat-Boy Jokester Crispin Porter." Advertising Age, November 14, 2005, p. 22.

Creamer, Matthew, and Jean Halliday. "How Crispin Drove Off with VW." Advertising Age, September 12, 2005, p. 1.

Dutka, Elaine. "Volkswagen Commercial Now Available on DVD." Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2005, p. G7.

Elliott, Stuart. "With Sales Slumping, VW Switches Agencies." New York Times, September 7, 2005, p. 2.

Geist, Laura Clark. "Humor Is Hallmark of VW Ads." Automotive News, October 17, 2005, p. 36.

———. "New VW Passat Advertising Highlights Features, Safety." Automotive News, September 19, 2005, p. 16.

Harper, Brian. "Grown Up, but Will Anyone Notice?" Montreal (Quebec) Gazette, April 13, 2005, p. E5.

———. "Volkswagen Has a Lot Riding on Its New Jetta." Edmonton (Alberta) Journal, April 15, 2005, p. I3.

Joyce, Kathleen M. "Talking Shop." Promo, October 1, 2005, p. 24.

LaReau, Jamie. "VW Pushes Lifestyle over Product in Ads." Automotive News, April 4, 2005, p. 28D.

Lazare, Lewis. "It's No Secret that Volkswagen Needs the New Jetta to Be a Certified Hit in the North American Market." Chicago Sun-Times, March 22, 2005, p. 51.

Sabatini, Jeff. "Once a Standout, Now Lost in the Crowd." New York Times, September 18, 2005, p. 1.

Scanlan, Dan. "The Redesigned 2005 Jetta: 'All Grown Up.'" Jacksonville Florida Times-Union, July 9, 2005, p. G-1.

Kevin Teague

DRIVERS WANTED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

While Volkswagen had been the leading import car company in the United States during the 1960s and early '70s, by the late 1970s it had begun to lose its base of American consumers to emerging imports produced by companies such as Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corporation. In the early 1990s Volkswagen's sales hit a low of 49,533 units from a peak of 569,696 units in 1970. In addition to the low sales, the quality of cars being produced at Volkswagen's Mexico plant had become notoriously poor. The Germany-based automaker began considering a complete withdrawal from the North American market. In an attempt to inject the joy of driving back into its brand and improve its U.S. sales, Volkswagen released a campaign called "Drivers Wanted."

Created by the ad agency Arnold Fortuna Lawner & Cabot, which was soon renamed Arnold Worldwide, the television, billboard, Internet, and print campaign first surfaced in July 1995. It was created with Volkswagen's estimated $110 million North American advertising budget. Initial TV spots featured quirky and fast-paced content that was intended to target all consumers younger than 45, but the company particularly wanted to attract those between the ages of 18 and 34. Set to rock music and filmed in a quick-cutting style reminiscent of MTV videos, the campaign debuted with eight television spots suggesting that the Volkswagen Golf, a compact hatchback, helped drivers engage more fully with life. The spots' voice-over explained, "On the road of life, there are passengers and there are drivers. Drivers Wanted." The "Drivers Wanted" slogan would be used in almost every Volkswagen vehicle launch for the next 10 years. Volkswagen ended its relationship with Arnold on December 5, 2005, which served as the official end date of the "Drivers Wanted" campaign.

During Arnold's 10-year stint with Volkswagen, "Drivers Wanted" reversed the automaker's sales decline and eventually tripled its North American sales. Besides collecting a plethora of ad-industry awards, the campaign was considered by automotive critics to feature one of the most recognizable ad slogans in automotive history.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Volkswagen entered the U.S. new-car market in 1949 with the introduction of the Beetle. The company joined forces with agency Doyle Dane Bernbach in 1959, and this partnership led to what Advertising Age named "some of the most celebrated advertising ever done." These simple, yet tremendously effective, print pieces helped make the Beetle one of the most successful cars in U.S. history. A generation of young Americans—the baby boomers—embraced the Beetle for its low price, its fuel efficiency, and its cute appearance. By 1970 the Beetle "was an emblem of the time," according to the Boston Globe. At its peak Volkswagen sold a stunning 569,696 Beetles in the United States alone. In the 1970s, however, Volkswagen's Golf. © RÉGIS BOSSU/SYGMA/CORBIS.

Volkswagen faced new competition from Japanese automakers such as Toyota and Honda that followed Volkswagen's formula of providing both quality and value. By 1979 Japanese cars had begun to dominate the market, and Volkswagen struggled to redefine itself. The company lurched from one marketing effort to another with an array of agencies at the helm, never effectively conveying a post-Beetle identity. During the 1990s "Fahrvergnügen," which was the German word for "driving pleasure," became one of Volkswagen's largest campaigns. The effort was created by the ad agency DDB Needham and featured a simple stick figure with the Volkswagen logo. Despite the campaign's attempt to reinvigorate Volkswagen's brand, sales still dropped. DDB Needham was eventually relieved from the account.

"There was a time when people throughout the country knew Volkswagen," a senior executive told the Wall Street Journal. "Somewhere along the way, we lost our sense of direction. The public forgot who we were." U.S. sales fell to an all-time low of 49,533 cars in 1993. Some analysts speculated that Volkswagen—still a European powerhouse—would abandon its American market.

TARGET MARKET

In April 1995 Volkswagen chose Boston-based agency Arnold Communications (then Arnold Fortuna Lawner & Cabot) to forge a new image for the company. Arnold "determined that young people were the core market," according to Advertising Age, and then crafted "Drivers Wanted" around the values, needs, and desires of this group. Although its target audience was adults aged 21 to 44, the initial ads "skewed towards twenty-somethings looking for something beyond a boring econo-box," said USA Today. Instead of setting its sights on a mass market, as it had done in the past, Volkswagen sought to appeal to this narrow segment. Successfully pitching a product to Generation Xers was no easy task, however. Raised in the era of cable, and therefore used to dozens of television channels and their incessant commercials, Xers were more accustomed to advertising than their forebears—and also more impatient. If a commercial bored them, they changed the channel. Xers were also renowned cynics, inured and unreceptive to traditional advertising techniques.

"Drivers Wanted" tried to connect with this audience. Humor and an aggressive "anti-advertising" stance were both essential to the campaign. Unlike traditional car advertising, which was heavy on lists of attributes and footage of cars whizzing around curves, "Drivers Wanted" recognized that this hard sell was rather ineffective with Xers. Instead the Volkswagen campaign used clever narratives to convey the intangible essence of the brand. In a commercial titled "Sunday Afternoon," two young men tooled about in their Jetta with no particular place to go. They found a chair by the side of the road and loaded it into their hatchback. When its malodorous qualities became evident, they abandoned it on the street once more. "It's the commercial about nothing," a Volkswagen employee told the Wall Street Journal. The spot humorously depicted the "slacker" mentality for which Generation X was criticized. The voice-over ("It fits your life. Or complete lack thereof.") wittily conveyed, as one Arnold executive said in a press release, that "we aren't always doing cool, active things." "Sunday Afternoon" also featured a sound track popular among college students.

As "Drivers Wanted" continued to advertise new Volkswagen models, the campaign's target market expanded. When Volkswagen introduced an updated version of its more upscale Passat in 1997, the "Drivers Wanted" target included commercials that targeted consumers above the age of 30. Like the previous spots, these commercials relied on slice-of-life vignettes and humor to reach older and more affluent consumers. For instance, in one spot a middle-aged mother embarked on a date. She paused in her Passat outside to reflect on the irony of the situation: her teenage daughter would be the one waiting up for her return. For the New Beetle's 1998 debut, "Drivers Wanted" first targeted baby boomers, or Americans born between 1946 and 1964. After the New Beetle proved unexpectedly popular with members of Generation X, the campaign was directed at two audiences, targeting baby boomers with spots that referenced the 1960s and Generation Xers with content that was more contemporary. The target for "Drivers Wanted" would be adjusted throughout its 10-year lifespan according to what car model was being advertised.

COMPETITION

Volkswagen's line of small cars faced competition from a bevy of American and Japanese companies that strove to attract the same youthful audience as "Drivers Wanted." In 1994 the Chrysler Corporation introduced the Neon, a compact auto offered under both its Dodge and Plymouth labels. With ad agency BBDO Worldwide, Chrysler created the $85 million "Hi" campaign, directed at consumers aged 18 to 29. This print, outdoor, and television effort ran during high-profile events, such as the Super Bowl, and gained a great deal of attention as a result. The spots attempted to imbue the Neon with a likable, distinctly human personality. Commercials showed the little car driving through unusual landscapes, and at the end of each spot the Neon stopped facing the camera and delivered the campaign's tagline: "Hi" (which was written above the car). One print piece declared, "Hi. What could be friendlier than Neon's spacious cab-forward interior?" and answered itself, "It's friendly right down to the sticker. Gotta run." Chrysler continued "Hi" until 1997, when it incorporated Neon's advertising under an umbrella brand campaign.

DÉJÀ VU

Buoyed by its revived fortunes, Volkswagen resurrected the legendary Beetle in 1998. To celebrate the debut of the New Beetle, Volkswagen created a series of commercials and print ads that used the "Drivers Wanted" tagline. Some slyly referred to the original Beetle's roots in the counterculture movement of the 1960s. One spot quipped "More Power. Less Flower." Another put a decidedly ironic twist on that generation's maturation: "If you sold your soul in the '80s, here's your chance to buy it back."

General Motors (GM) had successfully marketed its Saturn under the theme "A Different Kind Of Company, A Different Kind Of Car" since the brand's introduction in 1990. An analyst for the Tennessean praised the campaign as "the most brilliant marketing campaign of any car in the last decade." Saturn's commercials, like those in "Drivers Wanted," favored vignettes about its drivers over traditional car-advertising tactics. In 1994 GM spent $141 million on advertising Saturn. Commercials included the depiction of a security guard who logged 100,000 miles on his Saturn without ever leaving his small community.

In 2002 German automaker Bayerische Motoren-Werke AG (BMW) reintroduced the MINI Cooper, which many automobile analysts considered a direct competitor with the New Beetle. BMW hired the agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky to handle advertising for the brand. To promote the car's recreational qualities, the agency famously strapped MINI Coopers to the roofs of SUVs and drove them across America. MINI Coopers were also parked in the bleachers of sporting venues. Playboy even allowed a MINI Cooper to be featured as a 2002 centerfold.

One of Volkswagen's later competitors was the Toyota Scion, which debuted in 2004. Scion was a brand created by Toyota to target Generation Y consumers, people born between 1978 and 2000. Seventy percent of Scion's marketing budget was spent on lifestyle events, including small-venue concerts. Because Generation Y was considerably more savvy about technology than older generations, Scion allowed its customers to accessorize their cars via the Internet before even stepping foot on a lot.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Volkswagen employed a variety of traditional and innovative marketing strategies to outmaneuver its competitors.

The company aired its "Drivers Wanted" spots during television programming that was popular with its target audience. The campaign debuted on Seinfeld and ER, and later installments of the campaign ran during Generation Xer favorites Melrose Place, Mad about You, Saturday Night Live, and The Late Show with David Letterman, as well as during NFL games. In 1997 commercials appeared during The X-Files and Millennium and on a controversial episode of the sitcom Ellen, in which the eponymous main character revealed that she was gay. While controversy-fearing car companies chose not to advertise during this particular episode, Volkswagen "figur[ed] that the subject matter [was] in keeping with its own slightly edgy pitch to young adults," according to the Wall Street Journal. "Volkswagen is a very cool, progressive company and isn't into prejudice," an Arnold representative told the Journal. "People who have alternative lifestyles also make money and buy cars." Volkswagen sought to place its print ads in publications that were read by its desired audience, including Rolling Stone, Shape, Outdoor, and Men's Health.

Volkswagen also pursued unique avenues to widen the reach of "Drivers Wanted." Volkswagen entered into a partnership with Trek bicycles and K2 Ski equipment and offered its Jetta with a special car rack and a mountain bike, skis, or a snowboard. Special commercials touted the arrangement. A spokesperson explained the strategy in a 1996 press release: "'Drivers Wanted' is all about connecting to life. The activity of mountain biking, like driving a Volkswagen, is also about connecting back to life and the outside world." The slogan would outlive its original 1995 campaign and be used for the remainder of Arnold's relationship with Volkswagen, serving to introduce models such as the New Beetle, the Touareg SUV, and the Phaeton.

In 1998 "Drivers Wanted" was the slogan for the "New Beetle" campaign, which used copy such as "Less Flower. More Power" and "If you sold your soul in the '80s, here's your chance to buy it back." Later "New Beetle" advertisements featured the copy "Hellooo rich hippies!" to target baby boomers nostalgic for the 1960s. "Drivers Wanted" surfaced again to advertise the fourth-generation Jetta and the redesigned Golf, both of which were made available in 1999. That same year Volkswagen executives claimed that the average Volkswagen buyer was 33 years old, the youngest average age in the North American automobile industry.

In 2002 Volkswagen's U.S. sales began to decline. "We didn't have the product strength, and the brand was sort of feeling its way at the same time," Karen Marderosian, director of marketing for Volkswagen of America, explained to Automotive News. "I do think that the advertising had become watered down mainly by . . . what was going on with the brand overall." Between 2002 and 2004 Volkswagen sales dropped nearly 20 percent. A decrease in Volkswagen's quality exacerbated the problem. According to a "Vehicle Dependability Survey" conducted by marketing-information firm J.D. Power and Associates in 2004, Volkswagens reportedly exhibited 40 percent more problems than the industry average.

During the final year of the "Drivers Wanted" slogan, Arnold released an integrated campaign for the New Beetle that touted the bubble-shaped car as a "Force of Good." The agency hired "ambassadors of good" to feed parking meters and hand out refreshments. In 2005 Arnold advertised the fifth-generation Volkswagen Jetta with a campaign titled "All grown up. Sort of," which also retained the "Drivers Wanted" slogan. On December 5, 2005, Volkswagen officially awarded its $340 million advertising budget to Crispin Porter + Bogusky. That date marked the end of the "Drivers Wanted" campaign.

OUTCOME

Volkswagen directly correlated its rising sales and brand recognition in the American car market with "Drivers Wanted." Sales in 1995 rose 18.5 percent from the previous year, to reach 115,114 cars, and Volkswagen noted in a press release that "consumers and dealers are responding positively to our marketing message." In 1996 Volkswagen's sales increased 18.1 percent, while the overall market grew a mere 1.8 percent. An Arnold executive told the Boston Globe that Volkswagen had "seen positive sales results from the first day 'Drivers Wanted' ads went on the air." The advertising industry also deemed the campaign a success. At the 1997 Best of Broadcasting Awards, "Drivers Wanted" took home the top honors, and the campaign won an EFFIE Award in 1998.

The campaign helped Volkswagen triple its North American sales. By 2005 "Drivers Wanted" was not just an advertising campaign but the foundation of all Volkswagen marketing. Unfortunately for Arnold, the automaker's sales had begun to decline in 2002. Executives at Volkswagen blamed the sales loss on lackluster advertising and on the poor quality of vehicles made at the company's main Mexico plant. After Volkswagen hired MINI Cooper's marketing and communications manager, Kerri Martin, to lead Volkswagen's North American marketing, Arnold was replaced by Crispin Porter + Bogusky, the agency credited for MINI's successful reappearance in 2002. During its heyday "Drivers Wanted" was considered the most recognizable tagline in the automotive industry, according to the global market-research firm NOP World.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Volkswagen Isn't Steering Clear of Controversial 'Ellen' Episode." Wall Street Journal, April 25, 1997.

Bosman, Julie. "VW's Quirky Campaign to Revive U.S. Sales." New York Times, February 17, 2006, p. 2.

Box, Terry. "Drivers Wanted for VW Reversal." Albany (NY) Times Union, July 17, 2005, p. B1.

Enrico, Dottie. "VW Isn't Bugged by Consumer Response." USA Today, December 16, 1995.

Garfield, Bob. "Bob Garfield's Ad Review." Advertising Age, December 8, 1997.

Gatlin, Greg. "Bugged about Sales, VW Dumps Ad Agency." Boston Herald, September 7, 2005, p. 25.

Newman, Heather. "Saturn on the Line." Tennessean, May 28, 1985.

Noyes, Jesse. "In Your Face." Boston Herald, September 16, 2005, p. 29.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "New Directions." Adweek, January 27, 1997.

Reidy, Chris. "Shifting into High Gear." Boston Globe, July 19, 1995.

———. "Volkswagen Campaign Found Its Drivers." Boston Globe, January 4, 1997.

Sante, Mike. "Wanted: Serious Drivers." Orlando Sentinel, December 14, 1995.

Serafin, Raymond. "It Was Billed as a Historic Moment." Advertising Age, September 13, 1993.

Wollenberg, Skip. "Get In. Be Moved. Mazda's New Ads Court People Who Like to Drive." Associated Press, March 2, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

LIVE LARGE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In November 1997 Volkswagen of America introduced an advertising campaign for its redesigned Passat. Arnold Communications, the Boston-based ad agency that won the lucrative $110 million North American Volkswagen advertising account in 1995, had created much momentum with its "Drivers Wanted" campaign, marketing the Golf and the Jetta to a target audience between the ages of 18 and 34. Arnold hoped to carry that momentum into the new Passat campaign. Since the Passat was a larger automobile than either the Golf or the Jetta, Arnold highlighted this feature with the tag line that urged customers to "Live Large."

Marketing the Passat represented a distinct challenge for VW and Arnold on several different levels: first, the redesigned Passat was geared toward an older, more affluent market than VW traditionally targeted; second, the new Passat was positioned to compete with Mercedes and BMW, a departure from VW's traditional competitors, the Japanese quartet of Honda, Toyota, Nissan, and Mazda; and third, this Passat represented a major status shift for Volkswagen from the image of the "people's car," exemplified by the original Beetle, to that of a higher-end car of prestige. Transforming Volkswagen's reputation to promote the Passat as a luxury car promised to be difficult if not impossible, some critics suggested, but other observers noted Volkswagen's wisdom in expanding its market.

Since the "Live Large" campaign represented only the first step in VW's long-term diversification project, the three commercials did not necessarily confront all three of these challenges simultaneously. Instead, the "Live Large" spots depicted characters forced to make choices. One spot showed a man at an intersection where he had to choose not which direction to go but between sowing more wild oats or getting married; in another spot a man in his forties visited a diner and tried rhubarb pie for the first time, prompting him to try other new experiences; and the last spot contrasted a middle-aged single mother's anxiety about driving to a date with her teenage daughter's higher anxiety about mom's timely arrival home that evening. Whereas the "Drivers Wanted" campaign had focused on less-consequential choices, such as whether to keep a scavenged easy chair that smelled bad, the "Live Large" campaign specifically addressed more mature decisions and episodes. While critics wondered what relevance these ads had to the car, the "Live Large" campaign set the foundation for Volkswagen's change of image.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the late 1950s Volkswagen established itself in the U.S. automobile market with a counterintuitive marketing strategy based on honesty, humor, and humility rather than hyperbole. Bill Bernbach had founded DDB New York, Volkswagen's ad agency for its first 40 years in the United States, on the assumption that advertising was not an exact science determined by data but rather a creative art appealing to intelligence and emotion. Bernbach's Beetle ads set a precedent in car marketing by creating a "personality" for the car. Paul McCann of the London Independent pointed out Bernbach's savvy in realizing that "being ironic about selling to the public was a really successful way to sell to the public."

"This insight has become the basis of many subsequent advertising campaigns," said Tony Cox, creative director of DDB New York. "Indeed, you can hear papers about it delivered at every advertising convention you go to—nowadays its usually called post-modernism." Arnold Communications overhauled the faltering image of Volkswagen (sales had reached their lowest point in 1993) with its decidedly post-modern ''Drivers Wanted'' campaign. The outstanding spot of that campaign, ''Sunday Afternoon,'' which featured two slackers with nothing better to do than tool around in their Volkswagen, struck a chord with its Generation X target market. Lance Jensen, Arnold's creative director who wrote the commercial, spoke with The Boston Globe 's John Koch in words that echoed Bernbach's philosophies: Jensen called advertising the ''unholy alliance of art and commerce,'' but he also explained that the ''unfortunate thing about advertising, and the wonderful thing, is that it's subjective. It's not math; you can't go to business school and find out how to make great advertising. That's frustrating for clients and people who have budgets. It's a tough gamble.''

After the success of the ''Drivers Wanted'' campaign, Arnold was challenged to produce a similarly successful but very different campaign for the larger, more luxurious Passat. But Arnold had managed to maintain consistency with Volkswagen's history of outstanding advertising by following the same technique established by DDB New York under Bernbach: the coupling of honesty with irony. Arnold's campaign for Passat extended the trajectory of VW advertising by fusing the Beetle marketing strategy of creating personality for the car with the ''Drivers Wanted'' technique of focusing on the driver, resulting in a hybrid that simultaneously described the car and the driver with its tag line ''Live Large.''

DON'T SWEAT IT

In England advertising for the Passat raised quite a stink. Volkswagen ran ads depicting the sweat-stained backs of naked models to promote air-conditioning in the cabins of its cars. Within days Citroen launched almost-identical ads—by coincidence both companies worked up the same idea simultaneously, Citroen claimed. VW elected not to pursue any legal action against Citroen, since both carmakers were imitating a previous Sure anti-perspirant campaign. Subsequently, however, Citroen ran ads pointing out that VW charged 500 pounds more than Citroen for air-conditioning. Nigel Brotherton, VW's advertising manager, countered that Citroen's claim was ''unethical and erroneous'' since it cited incomparable car models: a direct comparison would have revealed that Citroen's comparable models—the AX and the ZX, equivalents of VW's Polo and Golf—didn't even offer air-conditioning. VW's comparable model, the Passat, offered air-conditioning as a standard feature. Brotherton stated, ''We were prepared to be gentlemanly about Citroen using the same ads. It now seems that was the wrong course of action.''

TARGET MARKET

The success of the ''Drivers Wanted'' campaign helped strengthen VW's loyal base of customers under age 35, who represented more than half of its sales. Looking toward the future, though, VW realized that its current customers would not remain under 35 forever, so it devised a means of retaining its following through their middle years. As people grow, so do their incomes, the sizes of their families, and their expectations of comfort and status, VW reasoned. In response to these trends VW designed a larger, more luxurious, and more expensive car. The Passat specifically targeted those between 30 and 50 years of age with a household income of more than $80,000. Most of the target market would be married, hold college degrees, and one-third would have children living under their roofs.

Some questioned Volkswagen's logic. Wes Brown of Nextrend, an auto consulting firm, suggested that VW should maintain its strategic status quo instead of attempting to evolve. ''I mean, this is VW—people's car. It'll be amazing if they can pull it off,'' he said. ''They've got a lock in gen X with Golf and Jetta. The numbers show that the only thing close is the Honda Civic. Now it sounds as if they're about to move away from gen X in price.'' Brown assumed, however, that this generation was a static entity, while VW realized that Generation X would eventually grow out of its labels and stereotypes and forge its own future.

The transition from targeting one market to targeting another proved to be a slower process than expected. An Ad Track survey reported by USA Today revealed that Arnold's advertising still appealed more to the ''Drivers Wanted'' target market than to the ''Live Large'' target market. Of the consumers asked who were between the ages of 18 and 29, 14 percent liked the ads a lot while only 8 percent of those between 30 and 49 said they liked the spots a lot. However, the goal of the advertising was not to poll well but rather to sell more cars, which happened after the ''Live Large'' campaign.

COMPETITION

Volkswagen intended the Passat to attract drivers from traditional competitors—makers of Japanese and European mid-sized sedans—as well as ''hip Americans who own a Chrysler Cirrus or Dodge Stratus, for example, but want a more active and enthusiastic driving experience,'' according to senior marketing executive Steve Wilhite. More significantly, Volkswagen AG chairman Ferdinand Piech declared at a press conference at the international headquarters in Wolfsburg, Germany, that he planned to pit the Passat against entry-level models from BMW and Mercedes in head-to-head competition in the United States. The main obstacle to this strategy was overcoming the pervasive association of VW with the Beetle. The legacy of the Beetle's success in the United States haunted these efforts to redefine the image and reputation of VW.

Japanese carmakers overcame a similar obstacle by diversifying brand names, with each major company spinning off an upscale brand: Honda created Acura, Toyota created Lexus, and Nissan created Infiniti. Volkswagen was structured to do the same, with its own upscale brand, Audi. However, VW wanted each of its brands to be its own premium marque, with overlapping instead of graduated markets. Volkswagen would thus compete not only with Honda, Nissan, and Toyota, as it traditionally had, but also with their upscale counterparts as well. ''We want to be in the group of Lexus and Infiniti as soon as possible,'' vowed Piech.

Volkswagen attempted to achieve its goal of competing with BMW, Mercedes, Lexus, and Infiniti by equaling its rivals' quality while underbidding its competitors' prices. According to Piech, ''We are working on a car a little bigger in size than Passat for early next century, equal to Mercedes-Benz at 20 percent lower price.''

''People are sensible,'' Piech continued, suggesting that no one would pay $10,000 extra for a comparable car just because of its brand name. While Piech sounded urgent about competing with Lexus and Infiniti, in reality the deadline for moving into this accelerated class was more fluid. ''It's a directional thing,'' VW of America's director of communications Maria Leonhauser pointed out. ''There's no time frame in which we want to do this.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Live Large'' campaign maintained common threads with the ''Drivers Wanted'' campaign; both were based in reality, portraying scenarios that really could happen. The ''Live Large'' campaign simply shifted the reality by a couple of decades, depicting life situations that 40-somethings, not 20-somethings, faced. So the main difference between the campaigns was the age of the people cast for the commercials. One constant remained: after doing market research, Arnold realized that they were pitching the Passat not to a new market, but to an older, perhaps wiser, segment of the same market. ''They're still VW people,'' commented Arnold's Jensen, who worked on both the ''Drivers Wanted'' and the ''Live Large'' campaigns. ''They're still cool, still young in spirit.''

Volkswagen had created an image that defied convention; naturally, its customers would defy convention as well. ''A car is like a piece of jewelry,'' Jensen philosophized—jewelry not only adorns its owner, but it also says a lot about the personality of its owner. VW people would never wear a gem larger than one karat, if that, because it would be pretentious. Similarly, VW people wouldn't want to drive a Mercedes—''they wouldn't need the badge, and they wouldn't need the baggage,'' Jensen stated, suggesting that upscale brands carry symbolic weight signifying social status for their owners. VW didn't want to be associated with ''snob appeal.''

However, there was a growing market of loyal Volkswagen owners who could afford more but wanted to retain the funky VW image. Jensen imagined how they got where they were: ''As you grow up, you're forced to make decisions that aren't always fun—maybe you're stuck in suburbia, maybe you're 45 and having a midlife crisis, maybe you're divorced, maybe your life is just in a rut. This is true—people deal with these things, but that doesn't define them.'' A car represented a highly visible means of redefining one's reality. The ''Live Large'' ads, with their divorced mother and aging bachelor, depicted people making decisions that help them define themselves. One of those decisions, the ads suggested, was to drive a Passat, a good decision that might compensate for some of the more difficult issues they've faced.

OUTCOME

The results of the Ad Track survey could be deceptive, Jensen suggested, since USA Today 's readership tended to be much more mainstream than Passat's target market. The ads spoke to a very specific cross-section, and the message got through to its audience, VW spokesperson Tony Fouladpour reported. VW sold 2,563 Passats in the United States in January 1998, a 114 percent increase compared to sales for the month of January 1997. USA Today 's Dottie Enrico reported that VW officials were happy with the ''Live Large'' campaign and that sales had ''skyrocketed since the ads began in November.'' Chris Cedergren of Nextrend assessed the campaign as follows: ''All in all, the Passat has been a success story for VW, so I don't imagine they're going to question their ad strategy even if the campaign doesn't perform well in the popularity polls.''

Ad Age 's reviewer Bob Garfield called the ''Live Large'' commercials ''neither very good nor very bad.'' He complained that the spots promoted an emotional connection to the people in the commercials but failed to promote the Passat. The commercials, however, weren't intended to sell Volkswagen—the target market was already sold on the brand. They simply needed to be informed that the Passat represented an automobile option appropriate for their lifestyle.

The most outspoken opponent of VW's marketing strategy for the Passat was Jack Trout, a long-time marketing strategist and president Trout & Partners in Connecticut. He proclaimed that pitting the VW brand against Mercedes "Makes no sense. It ain't gonna work, trust me. You can bet a lot of money on that." There were probably many people who made similar proclamations upon first sight of the Beetle in 1938. But given that the Beetle went on to become the most-produced car in history, betting against VW's overwhelming brand loyalty would make no sense.

FURTHER READING

Healey, James R. "VW Longs for Life in Luxury Lane; Will USA Pay the Premium?" USA Today, July 11, 1997.

Koch, Paul. "Lance Jensen." The Boston Globe Sunday Magazine, January 11, 1998.

McCann, Paul, "The Ads that Broke the Mould: When a Boy from the Bronx Got Together with VW, Advertising Became Art with Creativity at its Heart." The Independent (London), June 1, 1998.

William D. Baue

NEW BEETLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

To herald the arrival of its newest car, Volkswagen of America Inc. launched a high-profile television, print, and outdoor advertising campaign in March 1998. The company had stopped selling its most famous car, the Beetle, in the United States in 1979, but the little car remained a cultural icon for many. Baby boomers fondly recalled tooling about in the 1960s and 1970s in their humpbacked Beetles. The car conjured up images of the counterculture, flower power, and nonconformity. In 1998, to further the company's revival, Volkswagen (VW) brought back the Beetle. While the New Beetle, as it was called, shared the rounded shape of its progenitor, the updated version had a more powerful engine, a roomier interior, and excellent safety features. It also had some quirky touches, such as a dashboard bud vase. Although the New Beetle caused quite a stir when Volkswagen first displayed it at auto shows, the company wanted an ad campaign that could bring a legend from the past into the landscape of the present.

With its Boston-based ad agency, Arnold Communications, Volkswagen conceived a series of ads for the New Beetle that were stunningly basic. "We wanted to keep the ads as simple as they can be," the chief creative director of the New Beetle campaign told the Associated Press. "This car is really about the way it makes you feel." The initial six New Beetle television commercials presented the car against a white background. The spots contained no voice-over or spokesperson and presented no specific details about the car. Instead, they showcased the New Beetle itself to sound tracks of alternative rock music. Each commercial displayed a single written tag line that matched the music and the images in the ad. One spot, for instance, showed seven yellow New Beetles together so that they formed a bright daisy. The copy declared, "Less flower. More power." Other television ads employed tag lines such as "If you sold your soul in the '80s, here's your chance to buy it back"; "A work of art with airbags and a budvase"; and "Suddenly the world is half-full again." Print ads followed a similar format: a single photo of the New Beetle accompanied by snappy copy.

The challenges confronting Volkswagen and Arnold in the New Beetle campaign were manifold. Obviously, baby boomers would have fond memories of the original Beetle and a likely affinity for the new version. But since 1995 Volkswagen had been assiduously building its brand to appeal to younger consumers, and it wanted the ads for the New Beetle to reach this group as well. To do so, Volkswagen strove to create ads that could "evoke memories from consumers old enough to remember the original car while being humorous enough to appeal to a younger crowd," according to Adweek. The New Beetle campaign achieved this by, in part, using tag lines in each ad that appealed to specific groups. While the copy in one print ad, "Comes with wonderful new features like heat," resonated particularly with older consumers who had endured the original Beetle's often faulty heating system, the tag line "Reverse-engineered from UFOs" appealed to younger drivers, specifically Generation X consumers who watched science fiction programs such as The X-Files.

The New Beetle campaign was a smashing success. It won several prestigious advertising awards and was praised by commentators in publications ranging from Advertising Age to USA Today. The goal Volkswagen set for itself was a lofty one, however. Company officials revealed that they hoped the New Beetle and its catchy campaign would bolster sales in the entire Volkswagen division. "Its success would not only be measured in sales of new Beetles, but in the overall growth of the brand and increased sales of VW's other models," a spokesperson from Arnold Communications told Adweek.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Between its arrival in the United States in 1949 and its discontinuation in 1979, the Volkswagen Beetle claimed a place for itself in American history. It surpassed the Model T Ford to become the best-selling car of all time.

Volkswagen's new Beetle. GETTY IMAGES.

Its original appeal lay in its uniqueness. While most American cars of the 1960s and 1970s were giant gas-guzzlers, the Beetle was a small fuel-efficient vehicle that offered an alternative to a generation of young consumers who strove to define themselves as living outside the mainstream world of their parents. As a reporter explained in World News Sunday, "The Beetle became a symbol of flower power." Pop artist Andy Warhol depicted the Beetle in a series of prints, and actor Woody Allen included a reference to the car in his 1973 hit movie Sleeper.

Part of the Beetle's allure originated in the groundbreaking advertising created by Doyle Dane Bernbach. Advertising Age's Creativity described the marketing of the original Beetle as "the benchmark for great consumer product advertising." Like the Beetle itself, the ads were understated, with their impact coming through offbeat humor. While traditional car advertising of the era played up the size and shininess of American sedans, the original Beetle spots used the car's smallness and homeliness as selling points.

By the 1970s the Beetle faced increasing competition from, and was losing market share to, the Japanese imports that were flooding the American market. Like the Beetle, the Japanese cars were inexpensive, reliable, and fuel-efficient. In an attempt to halt its decline, Volkswagen discontinued the Beetle in 1979 and introduced the Rabbit in its place. But the Rabbit never gained the same sort of cachet. The company struggled in United States during the 1980s and early 1990s. While Volkswagen sales boomed in Europe, Americans opted for Japanese or domestic autos. Volkswagen was "a nearly moribund brand in this country," declared the Washington Post. In 1995, however, the company's fortunes began to change. With an updated roster of sporty cars and an energized new ad campaign—"Drivers Wanted" —from Arnold, Volkswagen's sales began to climb once more. After introducing a concept car with a shape similar to the beloved original Beetle at a 1995 auto show, Volkswagen was inundated with letters from customers beseeching the company to bring back the Beetle.

TARGET MARKET

With the Beetle's rich American legacy, Volkswagen could not disassociate its New Beetle from the original car. While some analysts had speculated that the New Beetle would mainly attract baby boomers who had owned the original, Volkswagen quickly realized that the New Beetle's appeal "cut across traditional automotive demographic boundaries," according to a company press release. A spokesperson emphasized that early marketing studies had indicated that "people of all ages, young and old, and from different backgrounds responded in exactly the same way—with a big smile." Armed with this insight, Volkswagen instructed Arnold to craft a campaign for the New Beetle that would target a diverse audience.

Baby boomers who had come of age during the era of the first Beetle were an important population to reach with the New Beetle campaign. "We have this . . . tremendous heritage with the baby boomers," Volkswagen's marketing director told the Washington Post. Many aspects of the New Beetle ads were designed to remind the children of the 1960s about the car of their youth. The essence of the New Beetle campaign was similar to the legendary Doyle Dane Bernbach print pieces. Both campaigns made the car the "hero" of the ads; both used a stark white background, from which the Beetle boldly emerged; both shared the same typeface and understated sensibility. Several of the New Beetle ads deliberately hearkened back to the original car. One print ad proclaimed, "A car like this comes along only twice a lifetime," while one of the television commercials spoofed the original Beetle's notorious lack of acceleration with the wry tag line "0 to 60? Yes." One print piece even used a former Doyle Dane Bernbach ad as a reference point. In "Lemon" an original Beetle had been declared defective because the chrome was slightly marred. The New Beetle installment arrayed a vibrantly green New Beetle beneath the word "Lime."

The New Beetle ads walked a fine line, however. As much as Volkswagen sought to tap into baby boomers' nostalgia—and thus propel them to their nearest Volkswagen dealer—their tastes had changed in 19 years. The original Beetle's safety record was poor, and as baby boomers became parents, and even grandparents, they would not tolerate such flaws. Moreover, baby boomers had become comfortable living in suburban homes and driving sport utility vehicles or BMWs. A rattling car with little heat would not be desirable. Thus, Arnold Communications took care to present the spirit of the original Beetle in the new campaign, but it used copy that stressed the changes and the improvements in the New Beetle.

The New Beetle campaign also sought to reach consumers under the age of 35, who had few memories of the original. This demographic group was essential to Volkswagen. Priced beginning at about $16,000, the New Beetle aimed to draw first-time car buyers to the Volkswagen brand. Consumer studies had revealed that allegiances to brands were forged early in life, and the company hoped that engendering brand loyalty would eventually keep these younger buyers within the "chain" of Volkswagen vehicles as they aged and saw their incomes rise. This audience would not respond to the same pitch as baby boomers, however. "Nostalgia wasn't going to be enough to sell this car to the youth market," an Arnold executive told Advertising Age's Creativity. "We had to bring the Beetle into the present."

To accomplish this goal, the New Beetle spots employed cutting-edge music. Songs from fringe bands such as Spiritualized, Hurricane #1, and Fluke—all popular among college students—were used to back the commercials. Furthermore, specific ads targeted a younger audience. For example, in the style of updated versions of computer software, one print ad coyly labeled the car "Beetle 2.0." Arnold was confident that younger consumers—particularly retro-crazed Generation Xers—would understand the tongue-in-cheek allusions to the original Beetle. While "everyone knows about the Beetle and what it represented," an Arnold spokesperson explained to Advertising Age's Creativity, the New Beetle campaign made it clear that the most recent incarnation of the Beetle "is different—so the idea is, it's back, but this time it's for you, not your parents."

COMPETITION

The New Beetle was not the only small car vying for the competitive U.S. car market, however. DaimlerChrysler's Neon, which was introduced in 1994 and which was sold under both the Dodge and Plymouth brands, launched a new $40 million campaign on March 15, 1999. While Neon had been imbued with an endearing personality thanks to the "Hi" campaign that attended its introduction, the company hoped to update the Neon's image. "We tried to get away from cute, so the ads are more sophisticated in keeping with the changes of the car," a DaimlerChrysler spokesperson told Advertising Age. The campaign, created by BBDO Worldwide, had television, magazine, newspaper, and outdoor components, as well as Internet ads that appeared on prominent websites. Like the New Beetle, Neon attempted to capture a younger audience of consumers aged 20 to 34. To do so, BBDO employed what Advertising Age termed a "purposefully soft sell approach." The initial three television ads featured a voice-over by comedian George Carlin, who read BBDO-created lyrics to three songs: Dean Martin's "Amore," the Lovin' Spoonfuls' "You Didn't Have to Be So Nice," and the Mamas & the Papas' "Dream a Little Dream of Me."

In 1998 Oldsmobile introduced its Alero, which it aimed at "younger, more-forward thinking consumers,"

NOT SO POPULAR AT HOME

Despite the New Beetle's warm reception in the United States, the car did not fare as well in Germany, the company's headquarters and home country. The Beetle, which was known there as the Kaefer—the German word for "beetle"—was deemed too expensive. Rumors circulated that Volkswagen would offer a no-frills, stripped-down version of the car in Germany.

according to Adweek. In its $80 million "Start Something" campaign, Oldsmobile and its agency, Leo Burnett, used fast-paced footage of real families set to electronic music. "The spots are trying to communicate a certain way of thinking and living," an Oldsmobile representative told Adweek. In March 1999, Mazda broke a new campaign for its sporty Miata. These ads, which used the tag line "Get in. Be moved," were executed by W.B. Doner & Company and attempted to strengthen the Mazda brand.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Even before the car went on sale, the New Beetle received a marketing boost over its competitors. Newspapers breathlessly anticipated its introduction, and several columnists wrote paeans to their first Beetles. An industry analyst noted to the Associated Press that "Volkswagen really won't have to do much in marketing." But to meet its goals of selling 50,000 New Beetles in the United States in 1998 and bolstering Volkswagen's overall sales, the company chose not to rely on hype and instead spent an estimated $40 million during the first eight months of the campaign. While some rival car companies released narrative campaigns that portrayed quirky characters or elaborate story lines, Volkswagen's strategy for the New Beetle was to focus solely on the car. Advertising Age noted that the spots were a kind of "Rorschach ink blot [that allowed] each consumer [to] process the imagery and respond according to his own values, background, and personality."

To take the campaign to the diverse audiences it wanted to reach, Volkswagen aired the ads during mainstream television shows and in publications that reached large numbers of consumers. But television shows that were popular with consumers under 30, such as The X-Files, Melrose Place, Seinfeld, and Suddenly Susan, were targeted as well in order to attract a Generation X audience. Print pieces ran in popular consumers magazines such as Vanity Fair, as well as in more cutting-edge, niche publications like Wired. Volkswagen also displayed New Beetle ads on Yahoo!'s home page. With its billboards Volkswagen opted for a city-specific strategy. For instance, a New York outdoor ad offered a picture of the New Beetle with the wry comment "Just what New York needs, a car that stops traffic." In a further effort to gain the attention of Generation Xers, Volkswagen signed the New Beetle on as an official sponsor of the Lilith Fair musical tour, which, according to Shoot, was an event that "appeal[ed] to one of the Beetle's target markets, young men and women."

OUTCOME

The New Beetle's introduction was a triumph. Demand quickly outstripped the limited number of the cars at dealerships. Indeed, some consumers were so eager to own New Beetles that they paid thousands of dollars above the retail sticker price for used ones. By August 1998, Volkswagen had sold 32,450 New Beetles, and by October it had surpassed its goal of 50,000 for the year. As the company had hoped, the excitement surrounding the New Beetle appeared to lift the entire Volkswagen brand. "The New Beetle is fulfilling its role as a magnet for the VW brand," an Arnold executive told Adweek. Sales for the Jetta, Cabriolet, and Passat increased after the New Beetle's arrival.

Industry critics showered the New Beetle campaign with plaudits as well. It won the highest honors (Grand Prix Award) for the best print ad at the illustrious International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. According to USA Today, a judge at the show declared that the ads "made me want to buy the car." Furthermore, at the MPA Kelly Awards the campaign took home the prize for the best campaign appearing in magazines. Commentators in USA Today and Advertising Age named the New Beetle ads as among the best of the year. Although it was difficult to correlate ad campaigns with sales figures, 1998 was certainly Volkswagen's best sales year in the United States since 1981. In 1999 Volkswagen introduced a high-powered version of the New Beetle, the 1.8 T, and Arnold oversaw the creation of "Turbonium," a commercial vaunting the car's turbocharged capacity.

FURTHER READING

"Alero Begins Olds' Minority Push." Adweek, July 17, 1998.

Berger, Warren. "Nothing to Be Bugged About." Advertising Age's Creativity, April 1, 1998.

Garfield, Bob. "Flower Power." Advertising Age, May 31, 1999.

Halliday, Jean. "Campaign Urges Drivers to Say Hello to New Neon." Advertising Age, March 8, 1999.

Kaufman, David. "New Beetle Campaign Gets the Bugs Out for Volkswagen." Shoot, March 20, 1998.

Span, Paula. "Return of the Beetle." Washington Post, March 13, 1998.

Suhr, Jim. "Months from Reaching Showrooms, Beetle Already Creates Stir." Associated Press, January 9, 1998.

Takaki, Millie. "Meet the Beetle: Ad Lineage Makes Intro of New VW Bug a Daunting Creative Challenge." Shoot, March 6, 1998.

Waner, Judy, and Gazdik, Tanya. "Arnold Readies Ads for New VW Bug." Adweek, January 12, 1998.

Wells, Melanie. "Likeable Beetle Ads Win Print Division." USA Today, June 24, 1998.

"With a Simple, Well-Rounded Strategy for the New Bug, VW Recaptures Its Lost Youth." Adweek, July 13, 1998.

Wollenberg, Skip. "Volkswagen Relies on Beetle's Distinctive Shape, Fond Memories in New Ads." Associated Press, March 12, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

Wachovia Corporation

1 Wachovia Center
Charlotte, North Carolina 28288
USA
Telephone: (704) 374-6565
Fax: (704) 374-3425
Web site: www.wachovia.com

■■■

FINANCIAL WORLD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, First Union Corporation became Wachovia. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

On September 27, 1998, First Union Corporation debuted a commercial unlike any other in the financial services industry. In this spot the company avoided the stock images of financial services advertising—smiling customers, affluent retirees, and happy families. Instead, First Union depicted a chaotic and disturbing landscape—the "Financial World"—that was filled with symbolic representations. In "Launch," the initial execution, faceless people clad in black coats and bowler hats walk a city of garish neon. When one falls to the ground, his face shatters. Mutual funds are hawked by a fellow carrying a cigarette tray, and a fire-breather comes into view. A voice-over explains this dark scene: "This is a world only a few know well, a world of risk and uncertainty, where the roads can take you to success or prosperity—or sometimes to no place at all. This is the financial world." The images suddenly shift as the camera focuses on a towering edifice of steel and glass, shining in the sun and looming over the sordid scene beneath it. The voice-over concludes: "Yet high above the horizon, another mountain has risen—a mountain called First Union, with 16 million customers, the nation's eighth-largest brokerage and sixth-largest bank. For a new perspective of the financial world come to a mountain called First Union. Or, if you prefer, the mountain will come to you."

Created by the San Francisco-based ad agency Publicis & Hal Riney, "Financial World" was First Union's first national advertising campaign and was intended to introduce First Union to the world. Although a series of acquisitions had made First Union one of the largest financial-services corporations in the nation, few people were aware of the company's scale and range of offerings. "We want people to know that we're a substantial institution—a major player in the financial services world that can meet any financial need," Jim Garrity, First Union's vice president of advertising, told Adweek. With the stated goal of "breaking through the clutter of advertising," Publicis & Hal Riney turned to Star Wars creator George Lucas's company, Industrial Light and Magic (ILM), for cutting-edge special effects. Although some critics blasted the campaign as bleak and intimidating, Garrity averred that "the financial world is not always a warm and fuzzy place.... [W]e wanted to acknowledge what the real world is like and show how our expertise can help customers succeed in it." Each of the five commercials that comprised "Financial World" closed with an explanation of how First Union could assist consumers and with the same tag line: ''Come to the mountain called First Union. Or, if you prefer, the mountain will come to you.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

First Union's growth had been rapid. Beginning in the early 1980s, the Charlotte-based bank, headed by Edward Crutchfield, took over nearly 85 banks to become the sixth-largest bank in the United States. Its retail presence eventually stretched along the East Coast from Connecticut to Florida. In 1994 First Union started to expand into the arena of mutual funds and brokering. Two years later it bought Boston-based Keystone Investments Inc., a large manager of stock, bond, and money market funds. At the time, Crutchfield explained to an interviewer that the company was ''trying to build a business that is about 50 percent traditional bank while the other [half] needs to look like [brokerages] Merrill Lynch, Fidelity, and Charles Schwab,'' according to the Boston Globe.

In 1997 First Union ran a branding campaign on the East Coast, where its retail presence was most strongly concentrated. That effort, which First Union credited with tripling awareness of the company in the area, focused on how the brand provided ''smart, straightforward financial solutions in the customer's best interest.'' But First Union had its sights set higher than being simply a regional power. It believed it could purvey its services to consumers across the country and therefore decided to initiate a national advertising campaign. ''We want to build upon that momentum [of the 1997 campaign] so that First Union is on the short list of top financial providers in the mind of every potential customer,'' Garrity said.

TARGET MARKET

Though many of its competitors aired commercials that targeted a mass market, First Union aimed ''Financial World'' at a more narrow audience. ''We wanted to target the top 5 percent,'' is how Publicis & Hal Riney's Brad Fogel explained it. In other words, First Union sought to appeal to two major groups—major corporations' chief financial officers (CFOs) and chief executive officers (CEOs) on the one hand, and the most sophisticated of individual investors—those who controlled over one million dollars of investable assets—on the other. ''[W]e're reaching a point where we need to attract customers not just by buying institutions but by attracting prospects from around the country to do business with us,'' Garrity told American Banker.

In its effort to court an audience described by American Banker as ''corporate leaders and wealthy people,'' First Union eschewed typical financial services marketing in favor of the edgy ''Financial World'' spots. The scenes of chaos and danger were chosen for a reason. ''That's the reality,'' Fogel said. ''That's the way [this demographic] see[s] the financial world. We had to speak with credibility.'' For instance, in ''Change,'' First Union painted a depressing portrait of a system in flux. ''In the financial world, banking as we know it has become a thing of the past,'' the voice-over intoned while images of collapsed neoclassical buildings, broken statuary, and currency drifting haphazardly in the wind flickered across the screen. ''Teller windows have become electronic gateways,'' the narrator continues, and then proceeds to detail the various upheavals wracking the banking industry. By acknowledging the ''real world,'' First Union hoped to earn the respect of experienced individual and corporate investors, those who had both gained and, inevitably, lost money in the course of investing.

''Financial World'' also directly addressed corporate investors by discussing the problems specifically confronting corporate investments (and the solutions First Union could provide). ''Sharks,'' for example, depicted a frog attempting to navigate its way across a body of water teeming with sharks and alligators. ''Sometimes to defend against larger, fiercer competitors, your best choice is merger or acquisition,'' the narrator said. ''But beware, lest your careful, well-planned strategy should result in failure. In these troubled waters, experience, knowledge, and size are your best allies.'' As the frog safely reaches a serene pond in the shadow of First Union's magnificent building, the voice-over concludes: ''If you're considering strengthening your company through mergers or acquisition, think first of First Union. Wherever you plan to go, we have been there before.''

COMPETITION

The financial services sector that First Union was entering had become intensely competitive. In addition to First Union, several other large banks were in the process of staging massive branding efforts. ''Historically, they haven't been savvy marketers because they worked in defined territories with a limited set of products,'' noted Advertising Age. ''But as they enter new markets and add products and services, creating a strong brand image is essential.'' In May 1998 Chase Manhattan Corp., the largest bank in the United States, teamed up with San Francisco-based advertising firm Foote Cone & Belding to ''forge a more distinct image for the bank,'' according to Advertising Age. Dissatisfied with its long-standing tag line, ''The Right Relationship Is Everything,'' Chase opted to build its brand through clever credit card ads in which it showed what people could buy with a Chase card in a weekend.

FINANCIAL INNOVATIONS

Several aspects of First Union's "Financial World" campaign were unique from an advertising perspective. One was the unusual degree of involvement by the founder of Publicis & Hal Riney, the agency that worked on the campaign. Not only did Hal Riney play a large part but he also provided the voice-over in each commercial. Moreover, because special effects were central to the vision of "Financial World," many of the specific details of the commercials were left to the discretion of Industrial Light & Magic (ILM), which created the effects. Riney would provide a conceptual framework, and ILM would draft the script. First Union was the ideal client for an ad agency, Riney's Brad Fogel said. Its only desire was that the campaign be unique and that it help First Union stand out. Everyone involved with "Financial World" was therefore given considerable creative freedom.

Bank One Corp. was also seeking to revitalize its advertising. After acquiring First Chicago NBD Corp. in 1998 Bank One ended its decade-long relationship with the Martin Agency. "They're looking for someone that can help them transcend their regional bank image," an analyst told the January 11, 1999, Advertising Age. With its ad account in review, Bank One planned to make its next agency one that could "help it build its image as a major national player in the financial services arena."

In addition to the bevy of emerging mega-banks, First Union's rivals included major brokerages. Foremost among these firms was Merrill Lynch & Company, which—despite its position as the nation's largest brokerage business—met with increasingly stiff competition in the consolidating sector. After ending its partnership of 12 years with Bozell Worldwide in February 1998, Merrill Lynch selected J. Walter Thompson to craft a new campaign. "It's not a problem of people recognizing Merrill Lynch," a company spokesperson told the July 6, 1998, Advertising Age. "But we do need to be more completely understood." In March 1999 Merrill Lynch launched its "Human Achievement" campaign, which was designed to stress the importance of human experience and knowledge in the investing world. One print ad proclaimed, for instance: "We love technology. It's new and it inspires a certain awe. Technology is good at heavy lifting. People are good at heavy thinking. . . . Computers are plastic and metal and sand. People are brilliance and discernment and vision." Other ads used legendary blues musician B.B. King to convey a similar message.

MARKETING STRATEGY

First Union realized that winning over its elite target audience from established competitors like Chase or Merrill Lynch would be no easy task. Therefore, the company's goal for "Financial World" was simply to encourage the investors it wished to reach to consider First Union when planning their financial transactions. To accomplish this aim, the campaign had to get these people's attention. The stunning visual imagery ILM created for the commercials was an important part of this effort. The campaign "keeps hitting you with images and it stops you and it makes you want to look," Steve Beck, the commercials' director, told the San Francisco Examiner. Beck later explained to Bank Marketing that "[w]e've created these 60-second miniature films that will make you want to watch them over and over again." "Financial World" was deliberately different from the marketing of its competitors to ensure that the campaign stood out. It "will not be mistaken for anyone else's," Hal Riney, the chairman of Publicis & Hal Riney, said. Garrity echoed this sentiment. "One of our biggest goals was to break through the clutter of financial services advertising where you typically see smiling people shaking hands."

Just as the First Union building towered over the urban landscape in the commercials, so too did "First Union want to be perceived differently from other financial institutions," a Riney executive told Brandweek. Although "the conventional wisdom for financial institutions was to use business print and direct mail to target high-end investors," he continued, First Union wanted "a high impact environment." Following the lead of other successful brand builders such as the Coca-Cola Company, First Union turned to television to carry the bulk of its message. After the campaign's launch during National Football League (NFL) games, "Financial World" appeared frequently on sports programming including regular-season NFL and Major League Baseball games, and especially during what Brandweek called "must-see" events—such as the 1999 Super Bowl, baseball's World Series, the NCAA basketball tournament's Final Four games, and Wimbledon tennis. News programs were another important venue—"Financial World" aired during 60 Minutes, Dateline, and 20/20. But cable television was perhaps the most significant part of First Union's advertising efforts. Instead of focusing only on prime-time cable news shoes First Union aimed to hit a "variety of different programs to catch investors at different points in their day," said Brandweek. Some of the shows selected by First Union included CNBC's

Today's Business, Power Lunch, and Market Wrap, as well as MSNBC's Morning Line and Fox News Channel's Financial World, which also aired during telecasts of the Academy Awards and Tony Awards because of the more affluent audience those events garnered.

The appearance of "Financial World" during the Super Bowl also reflected a key facet of First Union's strategy. Although the Super Bowl was famous for its ability to capture a mass audience, a Super Bowl ad also represented a prestige decision, since companies that could afford the astronomical cost of airtime during the game received a considerable amount of free media attention in the ubiquitous Super Bowl ad previews and recaps in newspapers such as USA Today and the New York Times. As the Oklahoma City Journal Record explained, the Super Bowl afforded companies "a once-a-year opportunity . . . to create reputations and flaunt their best." Moreover, because of the game's cachet those businesses that did advertise during the Super Bowl were widely regarded as leaders in their fields—exactly the message First Union sought to convey with the "Financial World" ads themselves. The Super Bowl was part of what Fogel termed First Union's "big dog media campaign." By appearing there First Union demonstrated that it was at least on a par with its more established competitors.

OUTCOME

First Union expressed complete satisfaction with "Financial World." According to Brandweek, national awareness of First Union tripled in the first few months of the campaign. "The feedback from the ads has just been unreal," company spokesperson Sandy Deem told the Washington Times. "It has turned into revenue." On average First Union received about 100 calls a day to the phone number listed in the ads. The company also conducted tracking studies after the commercials aired and found that its target audience understood and was enthusiastic about the message conveyed in "Financial World." Even more interesting was the fact that the mass market outside the company's targeted groups responded well to the campaign and was able to articulate the commercials' premise that First Union was a haven in a turbulent financial world.

The campaign won several awards, including four Clios. But while many commentators applauded the campaign's bold images and innovative strategy, others did not. Advertising Age lambasted "Financial World" as "suicide" on First Union's part and concluded that the campaign presented the bank as "the prince of financial darkness." The New York Times called the commercials a "low point" of 1998 and characterized the campaign as "overblown, overbusy."

Other events made it difficult to gauge the effect "Financial World" had on First Union's bottom line. The company's fiscal earnings during the campaign's run proved lower than had been forecast as a result of the effects of First Union's numerous acquisitions. Consequently, the company's share price plummeted in the face of Wall Street's concern about the firm's future profitability. In this environment focus on the innovative ad campaign quickly gave way to speculation that First Union's merger mania might lead to the company being taken over itself.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James (with Beth Snyder). "Bank One $60 Million Review Set." Advertising Age, January 11, 1999.

Arndorfer, James (with Mercedes Cardona). "Chase Asks FCB To Hone Bank's Brand Perception." Advertising Age, May 18, 1998.

Arndorfer, James. "JWT's Vision of Merrill Lynch Earns $90 Million." Advertising Age, July 6, 1998.

"Banking on Business." Brandweek, April 12, 1999.

Campbell, Mike. "Bank Wars." Bank Marketing, March 1, 1999.

Kopecki, Dawn. "First Union Ad Gets Boos, Rave Review." Boston Globe, January 26, 1999.

Nucifora, Alf. "Below Average Ads." Oklahoma City Journal Record, February 8, 1999.

Raine, George. "To Experience and Describe the Chaos and Uncertainty Of . . . ." San Francisco Examiner, October 4, 1998.

"Shop Builds Dark 'Financial World' for First Union." Adweek, September 28, 1998.

Warsh, David. "Meet Fast Eddie." Washington Times, January 27, 1999.

Rebecca Stanfel

UNCOMMON WISDOM CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 First Union Corporation, based in Charlotte, North Carolina, acquired its smaller in-state rival, Wachovia Corporation, and the new entity took the Wachovia name. The merger, which made Wachovia the nation's fourth-largest bank, was followed by a large, multi-year branding effort. Conceived by the Winston-Salem, North Carolina, office of Mullen Advertising, the "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign broke in the summer of 2002 with the intent of raising the brand's profile and introducing, in stages, the various capabilities that Wachovia, a company composed of a range of corporate and retail financial-services divisions, offered as a result of the merger.

Employing both print and television advertising, the campaign used common occurrences and objects—motorcycle handlebars and haircuts, for instance—as metaphors to communicate the idea that wisdom could be found everywhere but that Wachovia had the unique ability to identify and use its wisdom on behalf of its customers. This concept was applied to individual company divisions in turn, beginning in July 2002 with spots supporting Wachovia Securities, the conglomerate's brokerage arm. That winter a portion of the campaign devoted to Wachovia's retail businesses was launched to coincide with the gradual conversion of First Union branches, beginning with Florida and moving north. In early 2003 Wachovia Wealth Management ads, aimed at investors, began appearing in national print publications and markets along the East Coast. Wachovia further supported its branding campaign with high-profile sports sponsorships in individual markets. The campaign cost an estimated $60 to $75 million in its first year and approximately $160 million in its second.

During the time that ''Uncommon Wisdom'' ran, Wachovia continued to expand, primarily through mergers and acquisitions, and the newly branded company was well positioned to compete with other banks that were steadily consolidating. In 2005 Wachovia executives claimed that the company profits had grown at an annual rate of 13 percent over the four-year period after the merger with First Union.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Wachovia Corporation had been expanding its banking operations regionally throughout the late 1980s and 1990s, and in the late 1990s it entered global banking, underwriting, and capital-formation markets. Prior to the 2001 merger with First Union Corporation, it had also expanded into New York and Florida.

Meanwhile, as a result of its policy of aggressive acquisition, First Union Corporation had become a major financial-services force. During Edward Crutchfield's 1988–2000 tenure as CEO, First Union absorbed more than a dozen separate banks and assorted financial services companies, including CoreStates Financial in 1998, an acquisition that, at the time, was the largest bank merger in history. After Crutchfield stepped down, and while First Union was still recovering from complications related to the cumbersome CoreStates merger, the new CEO, G. Kennedy Thompson, surprised analysts by bidding for Wachovia. First Union competed against SunTrust Banks for the purchase of Wachovia, acquiring the smaller company in a 2001 shareholder vote. The new entity, which chose Wachovia Corporation as its name, covered the East Coast from Florida to Connecticut.

After the merger Wachovia was the nation's fourth-largest bank, with operations spanning private banking, asset management, and brokerage, but its brand name was little known outside the southeastern United States. Wachovia's competitors, too, had been consolidating, so that the industry as a whole was perceived as increasingly faceless and corporate. At the same time the public's view of financial-services firms was distinctly colored by the 2001 stock-market crash and the waves of corporate scandals that followed. Though Wachovia, in its branding effort, had to operate amidst this climate of widespread public skepticism of financial institutions, it had not been involved in any of the scandals, and its banking heritage distinguished it from competitors, many of whom were identified with Wall Street.

TARGET MARKET

The first ''Uncommon Wisdom'' advertisements centered on Wachovia Securities, the company's brokerage division, and used noticeably high production values and metaphors meant to appeal to the sensibilities of the wealthy. Examples included a TV commercial depicting a middle-aged couple in a canoe, a metaphor for maintaining balance in one's investments, and a spot called ''Handlebars,'' featuring a Harley Davidson and illustrating what handlebars could teach people about financial relationships (the answer was ''You have to reach out to make them work''). The message of everyday wisdom and stability positioned Wachovia to appeal to investors anxious about market conditions. Furthermore, the products featured, such as expensive motorcycles, were obviously intended to appeal to the wealthy. Beyond this initial targeted appeal, the first phase of the campaign functioned, according to Wachovia's Jim Garrity, as ''a big coming-out party'' meant to create awareness and prepare the way for the ensuing mass-market push.

The retail-focused portion of ''Uncommon Wisdom,'' which broke in Florida and migrated north along the East Coast as branches were converted to the Wachovia name, continued to use metaphors that signified strategies for achieving financial well-being, but this phase primarily emphasized brand recognition—especially in markets where the bank had no prior presence—through the simple act of teaching consumers how to pronounce Wachovia. Additionally, the metaphor concept was given a more down-to-earth spin and broader potential appeal. The TV spot ''Salon'' used the act of getting a haircut to explain Wachovia's principles for working with small businesses, such as its commitment to careful listening. Other spots illustrated financial knowledge through images of children in a school play and on carnival rides. For the Florida portion of the campaign, Wachovia employed Hispanic agency Zubi Advertising of Coral Gables to "transcreate" ads whose metaphors appealed specifically to Spanish-speaking residents of that state.

Ads supporting Wachovia Wealth Management, which followed on the heels of the retail push, used the ongoing "Uncommon Wisdom" message to target investors "who are looking for financial advice, have $1 million of investable assets, and have $2.5 million or more of assets in all," according to American Banker. Wachovia marketing officer Raj Madan posited that such individuals placed a premium on access and advice, concerns that were answered with advertising such as a print ad that appeared in 2003. It featured a stained-glass window and the question, "What can a stained-glass window teach us about managing assets?" The answer was, "Sometimes you have to step back to see the whole picture." The copy elaborated, "If you were asked where you stood financially, how many calls would it take to answer? Accountant. Attorney. Broker. Banker." Because of the merger and the ensuing evolution of the company, Wachovia was able to offer wealthy individuals exactly such a big-picture view of their finances, and it had wealth management teams in close proximity to all the major markets this portion of the campaign targeted: Florida, New Jersey, Connecticut, the New York City suburbs, Philadelphia, and Washington, D.C. Additionally, the continuing emphasis on brand awareness was meant to let high-net-worth individuals know that they were doing business with a major player in the financial-services world.

COMPETITION

Citigroup Inc. was the largest company of its kind in the world, and—like most of the major financial-services companies at the time—it continued to grow as a result of large-scale mergers and acquisitions. Though its purchases were not as flashy as those of its top competitors, Citigroup understood the need to maintain a human face in this era of consolidation. Likewise, a weak market for investment banking encouraged Citigroup, like other banks, to renew its focus on retail customers. The marketing results of this banking milieu were popular and critically acclaimed Citibank advertising campaigns, such as "Live Richly" and "Identity Theft Solutions." "Live Richly" focused on the idea that there was more to life than money, and "Identity Theft Solutions" comically dramatized the idea of identity theft by showing victims speaking in the lip-synched voices of those who had stolen their identities. Both campaigns tried to assure consumers that Citibank cared about their interests and understood what was important to them.

America's second-largest bank, JP Morgan Chase & Co., was a product of the 2001 merger of retail-banking giant Chase Manhattan and investment-banking stalwart JP Morgan. In 2002 the company, in line with industry-wide trends toward customer-centered advertising, launched a TV campaign that used the tagline "The right relationship is everything" and that focused on customer relationships rather than on specific products or services. The campaign was adapted in 2003 for ads aimed at African-Americans, Hispanics, and Asian-Americans. In 2004 JP Morgan Chase swallowed up the country's sixth-biggest bank, Bank One, extending its reach into the South and the Midwest, and initiated a media review process for selecting agencies to handle post-merger advertising.

Wachovia's hometown rival, Bank of America, was the third-largest bank in the United States and, with approximately 5,800 locations in 30 states and the District of Columbia, the leader among retail banks. A 2004 merger with FleetBoston set the stage for a massive rebranding push. In light of the challenges posed by the blockbuster acquisition, Bank of America—which had more than 15 separate advertising agencies on its roster—hired a third-party consultant to help maximize its estimated $180 million marketing budget.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The idea behind the "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign came from Mullen's successful 2001 pitch for the post-merger Wachovia account. The campaign's first spots, supporting Wachovia Securities, appeared in May 2002 and ran in financial magazines such as Fortune and Forbes and in newspapers such as the Wall Street Journal and USA Today. The television portion of the campaign began on July 20 of that year, during the British Open golf tournament, and the series of six initial spots subsequently appeared primarily on weekend sports, financial, and public-affairs programs. Spending during the campaign's first year was estimated at $60 to $75 million.

The fallout from the numerous reports of corporate malfeasance during this period made it "a tricky time to be marketing wealth management services," according to

BUT WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

"Wachovia" (wah-KO-vee-yah) refers to an area of North Carolina settled by Moravian religious dissenters in 1753. The land, given to them by the English nobleman and North Carolina landowner Lord Granville, reminded them of a German river valley called Der Wachau. Wachovia is the Latinized form of the German word.

U.S. Banker, but Wachovia Securities—a bank brokerage able to distance itself from Wall Street and accounting firms—was positioned to offer itself as a trustworthy alternative to some of its larger competitors. The campaign thus emphasized everyday life as a source of wisdom and cast Wachovia as a steady presence intent on gleaning that wisdom for the sake of its customers. As Wachovia's Kirt Hibbits told American Banker, "This new campaign shows Wachovia as a company that cares about its customers and wants to take all that they know and all that we have learned to create shared success."

At the outset of the campaign another challenge facing Wachovia and Mullen was the disparity between Wachovia's new size and the relative obscurity of the brand name. The campaign's launch, therefore, rolled out the company's brokerage services while serving the ongoing goal of establishing Wachovia as a known quantity in the banking world. That goal took center stage in the retail phase of the campaign, which included advertising teaching customers in new markets how to pronounce the company name. Eight TV spots, some of which were in Spanish for the Florida market, led the retail portion of the campaign and were supported by print, radio, and outdoor ads.

In the campaign's second year, ad spending roughly doubled, reaching an estimated $160 million. The retail push gradually reached local markets, from Florida to Connecticut, and the company introduced another series of ads in support of Wachovia Wealth Management. The Wachovia Wealth Management phase of the campaign consisted of print ads in regional publications and in national magazines such as Forbes, Fortune, and Fast Company, and it also featured PBS and NPR sponsorships. In the summer of 2003 Wachovia sponsored the Wachovia Championship, a professional golf tournament in Charlotte, and continued to enhance its name recognition in key markets by sponsoring sports teams, including the Miami Dolphins and the New York Giants.

OUTCOME

During and after the "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, Wachovia remained the fourth-largest bank in the United States, keeping pace with competitors. Maintaining this position was more than a matter of simply holding on, however. Wachovia's continued growth—like that of Citigroup, JP Morgan Chase, and Bank of America—was primarily the result of a constant diet of mergers and acquisitions, the most prominent being the takeover of SouthTrust, a bank based in Birmingham, Alabama, in late 2004. Wachovia's profits grew at a 13 percent compound annual rate between 2001 and 2005, and the company was prepared to meet the challenges of a merger-heavy banking market. In a 2005 Forbes story on the company's positioning and outlook, CEO G. Kennedy Thompson, architect of post-merger Wachovia's rebranding and growth, offered the following prediction about the future of the banking industry: "I think there will be a handful of universal banks, and I think Wachovia will be one."

FURTHER READING

Boraks, David. "Wachovia Plans Big Brand Campaign." American Banker, January 6, 2003.

———. "Wachovia Renews Dolphin Pact." American Banker, August 29, 2003.

———. "Wachovia's Post-Merger Blitz Doubled Up in Second Year." American Banker, March 12, 2004.

Cardona, Mercedes. "Wachovia." Advertising Age, October 1, 2004.

———. "Wachovia Debuts Effort after First Union Merger." Advertising Age, July 15, 2002.

Chapelle, Tony. "Brokerage Ad Spending Increases." On Wall Street, December 1, 2003.

DePaula, Matthew. "Wachovia Waxes Metaphoric." U.S. Banker, September 2002.

Gjertsen, Lee Ann. "Wachovia's Wealth Unit in Post-Merger Rebranding." American Banker, February 27, 2003.

Griswold, Alicia. "Mullen Breaks Wachovia TV Ads." Adweek, January 6, 2003.

"Hotline." Adweek, July 22, 2002.

Julavitz, Robert. "Ad Spending's Up, Reflecting Bigger Emphasis on Retail." American Banker, July 25, 2003.

Kresbach, Karen. "Wachovia Aids Its Brand." Bank Investment Consultant, May 2003.

"Mullen, HH Get Wachovia Wisdom." Shoot, November 29, 2002.

"Wachovia Wealth Management." Sales & Marketing Management, June 2003.

Mark Lane

Walgreen Company

200 Wilmot Road
Deerfield, Illinois 60015
USA
Telephone: (847) 914-2500
Fax: (847) 914-2804
Web site: www.walgreens.com

■■■

PERFECT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 the 101-year-old Walgreens, owned by Walgreen Company, was the number one drugstore chain in the United States with annual sales hitting $28.68 billion. That year it filled more than 361 million prescriptions at its nearly 4,000 pharmacies. But rapidly growing drug chains CVS Corporation and Rite Aid Corporation were encroaching on Walgreens' business. Further, while filling prescriptions accounted for the lion's share—some 64 percent—of Walgreens' sales, encouraging customers to shop the stores' front ends for nonprescription items was critical for the chain to maintain and increase its market share. Walgreens' senior vice president of marketing, George Riedl, told Drug Store News that increasing front-end sales could be accomplished only by getting more customers into the stores.

In order to accomplish this goal, Walgreens in 2002 partnered with Euro RSCG Tatham Partners/Chicago to create a new advertising campaign. The campaign, "Perfect," was designed to reinforce the drugstore chain's image and brand while pointing out that it was the perfect place for busy consumers to shop and not just get prescriptions filled. No budget for the campaign, which was a series of television spots set in the mythical village of Perfect, was available, but the company typically spent $25 million to $30 million on all advertising each year.

The campaign was well received by consumers, industry insiders, and the media. According to a Walgreens spokeswoman, after the 2002 launch of the campaign, the company began receiving phone calls from people who had seen the spots and wanted to buy copies of their own. Praise for the campaign ranged from Adweek magazine calling it an "exceptionally eye-pleasing campaign" to the Chicago Sun-Times comment that the spots were standouts because "the ad copy is as strong as the visuals." In addition, the "Perfect" campaign was recognized by the Chicago Sun-Times as one of the top efforts produced by a Chicago-based advertising agency in 2002. The campaign continued in following years with the addition of new spots centered around holidays and special occasions.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When pharmacist Charles R. Walgreen, Sr., spent $6,000 to purchase the drugstore on the south side of Chicago where he was employed in 1901, he founded what would eventually become the Walgreens drugstore chain. From those beginnings Walgreens added stores, growing to nearly 4,000 stores nationwide by the end of 2002. The forward-thinking Walgreen also wanted to do more for customers than fill prescriptions. From that idea the store's front end evolved. Walgreens began adding a variety of nonpharmacy products to its merchandise mix, from hot food at the store's soda fountain to pots and pans and other household items stocked on the shelves lining its aisles. Despite offering in its front end a broad selection of personal items, household gadgets, gifts, toys, and over-the-counter health-care products, Walgreens' primary business remained its pharmacies, which accounted for 64 percent of its overall sales in 2002. It continued to advertise its pharmacies, launching in 2002 a new marketing campaign called "Rx Safety Net" that focused on pharmacy services. Simultaneously, however, Walgreens shifted some of its marketing focus to its front end and released a new national advertising campaign specifically designed to inform consumers about what was available in the stores beyond prescription drugs. The new campaign, titled "Perfect," was designed to send the message that whatever someone wanted, and whenever they wanted it, Walgreens was there to meet their needs.

WALGREENS HEALTH ADVICE ON TV

Walgreens drugstores, known for providing in-store pharmacy customers with advice about their health and medications, expanded its services to reach consumers outside of the store with the release of a television series, Walgreens Health Corner. The 30-minute program hit the air on Chicago's WGN-TV on January 3, 2004. Walgreens Health Corner was expected to reach a national audience through Superstation WGN. Working with a news-magazine format, the program ran on Saturday mornings and discussed a variety of health-related topics each week, including headaches, eating for optimum health, living through cancer, and cold and flu prevention.

TARGET MARKET

In 2002 busy consumers were already familiar with the pharmacy services available at Walgreens drugstores and took advantage of them. According to the company, it received 14,500 prescriptions to be filled each day through its website and filled more than 361 million total prescriptions in its stores in 2002. But the goal of the "Perfect" campaign was to drive consumers (both men and women) of all ages and ethnic demographics to shop the chains' front end. It stressed to all shoppers that, beyond its pharmacy, the chain could fulfill everyday nonprescription needs and was the ideal place for busy, time-strapped consumers to shop. The campaign touted the convenience of shopping in Walgreens stores and promoted the idea that everyone could find what they needed in its product mix, from cosmetics and greeting cards to exercise equipment and home health-care items such as wheelchairs. "You need to attract that customer into your store who will add to the market-basket," Walgreens' George Reidl said in an interview with Drug Store News.

COMPETITION

The CVS drugstore chain was founded in 1963 in Lowell, Massachusetts, as a shop selling a variety of beauty products and over-the-counter health aids. In 1967 CVS added pharmacies to its stores and began expanding. By 2001 the CVS chain boasted 4,000 stores and sales in excess of $22 billion, and it was the number two drugstore chain based on sales behind the granddaddy in the category, Walgreens. To keep its momentum going and encourage busy women in all age groups to go to a CVS store for more than just filling a prescription, in October 2002 the chain began a multimedia marketing campaign that included television spots and print ads with the tagline "Life to the Fullest." The campaign was created by Boston-based agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos. Each ad or spot featured a CVS store aisle marker paired with a contemporary image of a shopper somewhere other than a drugstore. The aisle markers contained text that, rather than directing shoppers to a specific product or merchandise category, related to an individual CVS shopper's experience. One spot portrayed a young woman sitting in a bright orange chair under a CVS aisle marker in the middle of a stark white room. The marker read: "Great Pharmacists, Expert Advice, Rapid Refill, A Prescription for Living Well."

Rite Aid Corporation, the number three drugstore chain in the United States based on sales (in 2002 annual sales totaled $15 billion, and the company had 3,500 stores), opened the doors of its first store in 1962 in Scranton, Pennsylvania. While Rite Aid had a busy front-end section with a variety of over-the-counter health aids, beauty products, and more, 63 percent of the chain's sales were in its pharmacy departments. Given Rite Aid's ongoing efforts to save consumers money by filling prescriptions with generic drugs rather than the higher-priced brand-name products, in 2002 the chain was featured in an advertising campaign for the health-insurance carrier Michigan Blue Cross Blue Shield. In the $1 million campaign, which was limited to print media, a Rite Aid pharmacist was quoted about the benefits of generic drugs. The tagline asked the question "Want the truth about generic drugs?" Reversing its competitors' trend of driving consumers to shop their stores' front ends in addition to their pharmacies, in 2003 Rite Aid launched an effort to encourage its front-end shoppers to use Rite Aid pharmacies to have prescriptions filled. A company spokesman noted in a Chain Drug Review article that Rite Aid's brand "starts with the pharmacy. It's the heart and soul of what we do." The effort included print ads and promotional mailings sans tagline with plans to add television and radio spots in the future.

MARKETING STRATEGY

When Euro RSCG planned its new marketing campaign for Walgreens drugstores, the challenge was to shift the chain retailer's advertising focus away from its core business, pharmacy services, and toward the front end of the stores, the area where everything else was sold. Additionally, Euro RSCG wanted to create a campaign that was a break from traditional drugstore advertising, which often featured a serious pharmacist standing behind a counter backed by shelves of pill bottles. The campaign, which was released in February 2002, was designed to change consumers' perception that a drugstore was only a place to pick up prescriptions by showing that shoppers could make other purchases at Walgreens, from cosmetics and greeting cards to gift items. It included six television spots set in the mythical town of Perfect, located "in a valley, near a river." No budget was available for the campaign, but Walgreen's annual advertising budget was typically between $25 million and $30 million, according to a report in the Chicago Tribune.

Because Valentine's Day was the big holiday in February, one of the initial spots showed what life in Perfect was like as its lucky citizens prepared for the special day. During the spot the camera showed scenes of an idyllic village while a voice-over said that Perfect was a place "where every day is filled with love, especially February 14. Valentines are handmade, and every man brings home roses. In Perfect, the only one in the doghouse is the dog." As the spot continued, the voice-over reminded viewers that they did not live in Perfect, "so we have Walgreens, where we can get what's needed for the real world." A subsequent spot that was released for the Christmas holiday had the snow-blanketed village decorated with twinkling lights and resembling a Currier & Ives Christmas card. As the camera scanned the village, there was a shot of a car carrying a Christmas tree, a happy couple on a ladder decorating the town hall, and a little girl catching snowflakes in her mouth. The voice-over said, "In Perfect snowflakes are caught more often than colds." Another spot, referring to the rush by some people to exchange unwanted Christmas gifts, showed the little girl running through the snow to the mailbox in front of her house while the voice-over noted that in Perfect the only thing exchanged was thank-you notes. Each spot ended with the tagline "That's life. This is Walgreens."

As the campaign continued through 2004, new spots were added. In 2005 the campaign received an update with new spots that presented a more realistic image of the town of Perfect and typical shoppers. In one spot, titled "Last Minute," the residents of the town, which was still blanketed with snow, were shown watching their clocks as they ticked toward midnight Christmas Eve. When the fated hour chimed, people dashed from homes and offices for gift shopping at the nearby Walgreens while the voice-over noted that the chain was always ready to accommodate those who waited until the last minute to shop.

OUTCOME

Following the introduction of the Walgreens "Perfect" campaign, industry insiders complimented the effort for helping the drugstore chain strengthen its brand identity and for driving home the message that Walgreens stores were the perfect place for busy consumers to shop. Adweek described the campaign's spots as "exceptionally eye-pleasing." The campaign also was well received by the media. In 2003 Chicago Sun-Times columnist Lewis Lazare included the campaign as one of the top 10 memorable television commercial efforts by Chicago-based advertising agencies. Lazare wrote, "This campaign transported us about as far as you can get from the dreary pharmacy department that is the epicenter of most drug stores." Based on the campaign's success, in 2003 and 2004 a new series of spots was introduced that were tied to different holidays throughout the year, such as Valentine's Day and Christmas. Other spots focused on specific services that Walgreens offered—such as its drive-through pharmacies—that helped consumers deal with life's daily problems. When Euro RSCG creative officer and developer of the "Perfect" campaign Jim Schmidt left the agency and joined Downtown Partners Chicago, an affiliate of Omnicom Group's DDB, in 2004 Walgreens followed, shifting its advertising business to the new agency. Downtown Partners modified the campaign and launched a series of new spots in 2005.

FURTHER READING

"Ads Tout Belief in Customer Service (CVS Corp. Advertising Strategy)." Chain Drug Review, December 11, 2000.

Alexander, Antoinette. "Customer Loyalty Is in This Contender's Corner." Drug Store News, March 21, 2005.

Baar, Aaron, and Trevor Johnson. "Walgreens Set for Shift to DDB Unit." Adweek, June 9, 2004.

"Conveying the Retailer's Message (Walgreens: The Jorndt Years)." Chain Drug Review, December 16, 2002.

Eder, Rob. "Challenge for Walgreens Is Not to Act Its Age." Drug Store News, March 21, 2005.

———. "CVS Breaks New Lifestyle-Oriented Ads." Drug Store News, October 21, 2002.

Gatlin, Greg. "CVS Aims Ads at Busy Women." Boston Herald, October 10, 2002.

Johnsen, Michael. "'Perfect' Campaign Steers Top-Line Growth—Walgreens Destined to Dominate: Marketing." Drug Store News, March 23, 2003.

Kirk, Jim. "Chicago Tribune Marketing Column." Chicago Tribune, January 10, 2002.

Lazare, Lewis. "New Walgreens Holiday Spots Still 'Perfect.' " Chicago Sun-Times, November 22, 2005.

———. "Our Vote for Top Chicago Commercial Efforts." Chicago Sun-Times, January 6, 2003.

———. "Walgreen Spots Improve on 'Perfect.'" Chicago Sun-Times, November 27, 2002.

"Rite Aid Aims to Break Out from the Pack (Building a New Rite Aid)." Chain Drug Review, October 27, 2003.

"Rite Aid Featured in Ad Campaign Touting Generics." Chain Drug Review, June 10, 2002.

" 'Walgreens Health Corner' TV Show Debuts Nationally on Jan. 3." PR Newswire, December 22, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

Washington Mutual, Inc.

1201 3rd Avenue
Seattle, Washington 98101
USA
Telephone: (206) 461-2000
Web site: www.wamu.com

■■■

FEAR NOT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In just 13 years Washington Mutual, Inc., a thrift lender that offered commercial and residential banking services, soared from being a Pacific Northwest regional bank to reigning as America's largest home lender with $268 billion in assets at the start of 2003. Part of the bank's success, according to analysts, stemmed from its CEO and president Kerry Killinger's unyielding ambition to acquire as many other American thrift lenders as possible. The flexible mortgages Washington Mutual offered also helped the bank excel. While its competition grappled for higher-earning customers, Washington Mutual tailored its advertising to customers within lower income brackets. To continue targeting people who had been denied by other lenders, Washington Mutual released its "Fear Not" campaign.

Created by the ad agency Sedgwick Rd., commercials for "Fear Not" first aired on ABC during the March 10, 2003, Academy Awards ceremony. The budget of the campaign's eight television spots and other radio, newspaper, and billboard advertising was not disclosed, but Brandweek magazine's Todd Wasserman noted that a similar campaign had cost Washington Mutual $25 million the previous year. The "Fear Not" campaign featured pitiable characters who, after being approved for a mortgage through Washington Mutual, experienced a newfound joy for life. In the spot "Paul" an irritable office worker named Paul applied at Washington Mutual for a home loan. After being approved, the thankful homeowner laughed off such calamities as being scalded with hot coffee and a drilling mishap at the dentist office. The campaign ended in the summer of 2003.

Other Washington Mutual advertising campaigns that were appearing simultaneously with "Fear Not" did not overshadow its ad-industry success. It collected a Silver Lion for Banking at the 2003 Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival. "Fear Not" also earned a Bronze award at the 2004 International ANDY Awards and collected a Gold EFFIE Award for Financial Services/Products in 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Seattle's city officials formed Washington National Building Loan and Investment Association to help rebuild the city's business district after it was destroyed by a fire in 1889. By 1908 the bank had established principles that would define the institution for decades, such as reduced fees, relaxed withdrawal policies, and a focus on public relations. After making more than 20 acquisitions throughout the 1990s, Washington Mutual became America's leading lender.

The agency Sedgwick Rd., formerly known as McCann-Erickson Seattle, had created advertising for Washington Mutual since 1991. The bank's tagline

"The Power of Yes," which had been used since 1998, epitomized the lender's dedication to providing mortgages for consumers who were denied mortgages by other institutions. Ad-industry research firm Taylor Nelson Sofres' CMR estimated that Washington Mutual spent $72 million on advertising in 2002. One television spot, which Washington Mutual aired during the 2002 Academy Awards ceremony, featured a man searching for his old pay stub inside a mountain of garbage. He needed the stub to prove his creditworthiness to his bank. Another spot featured a man undergoing a torturous interrogation by a bank that was approving his mortgage. The voice-overs for both spots explained that getting mortgages with Washington Mutual was easier with "the power of yes."

In an attempt to establish Washington Mutual as the foremost lender in Chicago, in fall of 2002 Sedgwick Rd. erected a 24-by-25-foot cave, referencing a prehistoric dwelling, on a plaza in a Chicago business district. Chiseled into the cave's entrance was advertisement copy that read, "We've been getting people into their dream homes for years." It also featured Washington Mutual's logo and the tagline "The Power of Yes." The cave remained in place into 2003. In Manhattan's Times Square, Sedgwick Rd. placed billboard advertisements with life-sized cutouts of homes that promised, "Whatever your dream home is, we have your loan." Similar billboards appeared around Yankee Stadium in the Bronx.

THRIFT LENDERS

Washington Mutual, which was classified as a thrift lender, reigned as America's top financer of home mortgages in 2003. Banks such as Washington Mutual qualified as thrift lenders if a certain percentage of their assets were housing-related investments. Once this percentage was met, one of America's 12 Federal Home Loan Banks would offer the thrift lender low-cost advances.

TARGET MARKET

Washington Mutual's "Fear Not" campaign specifically targeted first-time home buyers who had been denied mortgages from other banks. Because Washington Mutual offered a wide selection of products, including both fixed-rate and variable-rate loans, it could offer mortgages to a variety of different homeowners. While most banks targeted consumers who were within a higher income bracket, Washington Mutual's average customer earned $30,000 to $50,000 per year. The average balance for a Washington Mutual bank account was $1,000, while most banks averaged $3,500 per account balance. According to Institutional Investor, Richard Hartnack, the vice chairman for Union Bank of California, explained, "[Washington Mutual is] a bigger competitor for the smaller-balance accounts, those under $1,000, but I don't want an $800 account that doesn't pay me anything, anytime, anywhere." To compensate for accounts with smaller balances, Washington Mutual charged $20 per bounced check. Washington Mutual customers bounced an average of six checks a year.

The campaign's eight television spots featured characters such as office workers, supermarket checkers, and other middle-class employees that typically earned $30,000 to $50,000 per year. In each spot the main character or characters, disheartened by being denied mortgages from other institutions, were elated after being approved by Washington Mutual. "We take a fresh approach to our advertising and to the way we do business," Dave King, senior vice president of advertising and brand management for Washington Mutual's Home Loans and Insurance Services Group, was quoted by Business Wire. "Consumers who may have been anxious or confused about the home buying process in the past will find that we simplify the experience and help them find the best loan to meet their needs."

COMPETITION

In February 2003 the consumer bank with the greatest amount of deposits, Bank of America Corp., launched a $100 million campaign titled "Higher Standards." Created by several ad agencies belonging to the Interpublic Group of Companies, the new campaign distanced the Bank of America brand from any semblance of riskier businesses such as the scandal-ridden Enron Corp. Bank of America's previous tagline was "Embracing ingenuity." According to the New York Times, Timothy R.V. Foster, founder of the marketing company AdSlogans Unlimited in London, stated, "Given the current state of play in financial services, the last skill I want my bank to embrace is ingenuity. My bank should embrace compliance." Most "Higher Standards" commercials touted Bank of America's free online checking services. One television spot portrayed the paper checkbook as an antiquated tool for banking. Another spot demonstrated the reduced paperwork afforded by online banking.

In January 2003 Wachovia Corp., America's fourth-largest bank, released a campaign featuring the tagline "Uncommon Wisdom." Created by Mullen, an ad agency within the Interpublic Group, the campaign advertised Wachovia's dedication to money management,

WASHINGTON MUTUAL AND THE BEANSTALK

In October 2003 the financial institution Washington Mutual unveiled an 80-foot-tall advertisement that appeared to be growing outside of the Five Times Square building in New York City. The three-dimensional structure resembled an illustration from the children's story Jack and the Beanstalk. Copy for the advertisement read, "Whatever your dream home is, we have your loan."

financial relationships, and small-business management. "Uncommon Wisdom" included seven television spots along with print, outdoor, and radio advertisements. "Consumers are looking for a fresh voice in the financial services industry," Denzil Strickland, executive vice president and creative director at Mullen, explained to the PR Newswire. "They are looking for relevance. The Uncommon Wisdom campaign is about living in this world. By learning from the real world, and by applying that knowledge to financial issues, Wachovia stands apart from other financial institutions."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Television spots for "Fear Not" first aired on ABC in March 2003, during the Academy Awards ceremony. "Marketers recognize that the Academy Awards is one of the prime branding opportunities of the year," Dave King, Washington Mutual's national advertising manager, told Business Wire. Besides radio, newspaper, and billboard advertising, the campaign consisted of eight television spots titled after the names of their leading characters. In "Roy" the commercial's protagonist was presented as a fainthearted man who, after being approved for a mortgage through Washington Mutual, became overly courageous. Soon after hearing of his new home loan, he tried to shatter cement blocks with a martial-arts head-butt. Then he ordered a serving of day-old sushi, and finally he rode his dirt bike off a cliff.

Each of the television spots featured similar storylines about middle-class consumers who were able to overcome their personal hang-ups after being approved for a Washington Mutual mortgage. " 'The power of yes' is a brand statement that underscores our commitment to put people in homes," Genevieve Smith, vice president of e-commerce at Washington Mutual, told Brandweek. "While many of our competitors target the high-income customer, we've made our name by having great financial services for everyone. We've developed our brand as being inviting and approachable."

In the 30-second commercial "Paul," the spot's irritable main character was first shown popping a child's balloon because it drifted too close to his newspaper. After being approved for a mortgage with Washington Mutual, Paul's temperament improved. When his dentist admitted to drilling the wrong side of Paul's mouth, Paul calmly replied, "No problem." When a coworker knocked an entire urn of scalding coffee across Paul's back, he jokingly responded, "I guess I'm having tea." He merely chuckled after discovering a parking ticket on his windshield. The spot ended with the Washington Mutual logo and the tagline "The Power of Yes." The campaign included similarly titled spots such as "Debra," "Rick," "Jim & Karen," "Jen," "Tom," and "Julie." Some commercials ended with Washington Mutual's logo followed by the tagline "Home Loans. More Human Interest." Print and outdoor advertisements featured the same copy on white backgrounds.

Washington Mutual had been using humor to advertise its "The Power of Yes" message since the 1990s. According to advertising critics, humor made the brand appear more accessible and distinguished it from its competitors. Sedgwick Rd.'s creative director, Steve Johnston, explained in Advertising Age's Creativity that the campaign's "point is to differentiate Washington Mutual in a relevant way that makes people laugh."

OUTCOME

"Fear Not" was one of many Sedgwick Rd. campaigns in 2003 that helped Washington Mutual secure its position as the largest home financer in America. "Fear Not" collected a Silver Lion for Banking at the 2003 Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival. It also won a Gold EFFIE for Financial Services / Products at the 2004 EFFIE Awards, given out by the New York American Marketing Association, and it earned a Bronze award at the New York Advertising Club's 2004 International ANDY Awards (Financial Products & Services category).

Three of Sedgwick Rd.'s Washington Mutual campaigns, including "Fear Not," won top honors at the Midas Awards, an annual competition dedicated to advertising and marketing achievements in the financial-services industry. According to Business Wire, during the Midas Awards ceremony Jim Walker, the president of Sedgwick Rd., noted that it was a difficult challenge to reach the "ever-skeptical financial services audience." He continued, "Winning the grand prize is a testament to what a little humor and humanity can do to differentiate a brand." The commercial "Paul" scored as the best television commercial at the Midas Awards. Overall the campaign helped Washington Mutual generate an income of $12.2 billion from loan interest during 2003, one of the most profitable years in the bank's history.

FURTHER READING

Bergquist, Erick. "Wamu Targets Chicago for Affordable-Loan Push." American Banker, September 19, 2002, p. 10.

Cardona, Mercedes M. "Mortgages on the Rise: Smaller Players Give Financial Ads a Boost." Advertising Age, September 30, 2002, p. 4.

Cisterna, Fred. "Friendly Banking: La Agencia De Orci Introduces Washington Mutual to New York." Shoot, September 27, 2002, p. 17.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Washington Mutual: Brad Davis." Advertising Age, October 8, 2001, p. S18.

Deeken, Aimee. "Sedgwick Rd.: Best Use of Out-of-Home." Adweek, June 23, 2003, p. SR26.

Flass, Rebecca. "Washing-Stone Mutual." Adweek (western ed.), September 23, 2002, p. 3.

Heim, Sarah J. "Sedgwick Rd. Embraces Change: McCann-Erickson Outpost Expands Business, Hires Key Staffers." Adweek (western ed.), December 17, 2001, p. 5.

Kattleman, Terry. "Paul Elledge: The Man Behind the Lens on the Nutty Washington Mutual Campaign Also Shoots Kids for Cereal Ads and, Strange but True, Album Covers Like Ministry's Filth Pig." Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2003, p. 66.

Kuykendall, Lavonne. "Financial Firms Take Hard Look at Ad Spending as Biggest Banks Pull Back, Regionals and Insurers See Opportunity to Gain Market Share." American Banker, November 13, 2002, p. 3A.

Mandaro, Laura. "To Jump-Start Its Shares, Wamu Tries a Direct Pitch." American Banker, August 28, 2003, p. 2.

Sisk, Michael. "Ad Beat: Jack and the Beanstalk Hit the Big City." U.S. Banker, December 1, 2003, p. 28.

Stewart, Al. "Wamu Debuts N.Y Ads." Adweek (eastern ed.), July 22, 2002, p. 6.

Wilcha, Kristin. "Ikea's 'Lamp' Shines at Cannes Advertising Festival." Shoot, June 27, 2003, p. 1.

Kevin Teague

The Weather Channel Companies

300 N Interstate Pkwy.
Atlanta, Georgia 30339-2404
USA
Telephone: (770) 226-0000
Fax: (770) 226-2390
Web site: www.weather.com

■■■

PAINTED FACES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When it was launched in 1982 by the privately held media conglomerate Landmark Communications, The Weather Channel (TWC) represented a new concept—around-the-clock weather programming on television. Available on cable stations throughout the United States, TWC provided five-day national forecasts, warnings of dangerous weather, and reports on weather in Europe. Approximately every 10 minutes there was a brief rundown of local weather. There also were occasional specials, for example, a program on the effects of weather conditions on airplane crashes, and special updates on things such as skiing conditions. TWC employed some 60 meteorologists to analyze National Weather Service data and to prepare the thousands of customized weather forecasts that were beamed by satellite to individual cable stations. Other services provided by TWC included an award-winning Internet website, syndicated products such as maps and satellite images, a toll-free phone number for weather information, and radio and newspaper partnerships.

Until the "Painted Faces" campaign in 1997, TWC had not directly addressed its "geeky" image or the impact on viewers. The image arose in part from the program visuals: announcers who did not pretend to charm and sparkle, no-frills studios and weather maps, and matter-of-fact presentations. In contrast, broadcast weather announcers tried to lure viewers and keep them entertained. TWC was the undisputed leader in accurate information on weather, but most viewers tuned in only when they had a need for specific information.

With its European venture faltering and competition in the United States intensifying, TWC recognized the need to reconstruct its brand identify and its relationship with viewers. Steve Clapp, TWC's vice president of strategic marketing, sought a new agency and a new approach. This led to the television campaign "Painted Faces," which was launched in the spring of 1997 and was scheduled to run through 1998. According to the advertising agency, TBWA Chiat/Day of Venice, California, the principal goals of the campaign were to increase the awareness of TWC and to create a brand image for the channel.

Chiat/Day's research revealed a core of viewers who were obsessed with weather and watched TWC regularly. The agency studied this group to understand the source of the people's interest and to use it to stimulate interest in other viewers. The result was a series of ad spots set in a weather bar called The Front that mimicked a sports bar not just in looks but also in its role as a refuge for the obsessed. Drinks were named the "monsoon," walls held photos of legendary weather announcers, and patrons discussed weather statistics. The "Painted Faces" spot focused on two men who were "Weekend Update" fans.

Their faces were painted, one red as a warm-weather front and the other blue as a cool-weather front. As they heard the update, one was thrilled and the other dejected. The "winner" gloated, "Who looks ridiculous now?" The tag line of the ad wrapped it up: "Weather fans, you're not alone." An accompanying print campaign, which began in February 1997 and ran for 52 weeks as banner ads at the bottom of the USA Today weather page, also incorporated humor, joking about TWC's obsession with weather: "If you've never watched The Weather Channel, we have one thing say to you: Get a life!"

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

TWC lost $10.6 million in 1982, its first year of operation, and it did not turn a profit until 1985. Yet Landmark's president and CEO, John O. "Dubby" Wynne, felt that the company "had a winner." Indeed, by 1998 TWC was available in about 70 million U.S. homes, or 98 percent of those with cable. The number rose to 85 million if overseas customers were included. TWC also maintained operations in Latin America and had a 50 percent stake in its Canadian counterpart, Pelmorex. But a 1995 initiative to expand into Europe faced significant obstacles and was halted in late 1997.

TWC launched its first national advertising campaign in 1996, giving the account to Bozell Worldwide in New York. The $6 million campaign aired spots on other cable networks, including ESPN and TBS, and print ads appeared in Time, TV Guide, and People. The pitch was intended to be humorous. Print ads proclaimed, "No place on earth has better weather," and one television spot showed a woman hanging onto a post in high winds until a gust blew her down the street. Commenting on the Bozell campaign in Marketing News, Clapp noted, "Last year [1996] was a landmark because we really stepped up and made a significant investment behind branding activities." At the same time TWC reporters began doing on-the-scene coverage, which provided a change from the no-frills approach.

By early 1997 TWC was becoming a more powerful brand name. As Clapp noted, "Viewers perceive us as being very professional. They know they can turn to us for quality forecasts and weather expertise." What he sought, however, was to go a step further and "emotionally bond with the viewer." Hayes Roth, executive director for corporate identity of Landor Associates in New York and an expert on branding, commented, "Right now, [TWC's] advertisers are not always top-tier." He noted that the brand needed to become or be seen as "hipper or cooler." "Boring as toast," he said regarding TWC's brand name, even while acknowledging its loyal base of viewers. "They're doing a mediocre job of on-air branding." Roth claimed that TWC should build stronger ties to viewers and advertisers, and Clapp apparently had similar sentiments when he chose TBWA Chiat/Day over two other finalists for a new $10 million campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Understanding that TWC viewers encompassed a wide range of demographic and lifestyle characteristics was the first step in defining the market. Speaking to David Bauder of the Chicago Tribune, Michael Eckert, TWC's CEO, said, "Many viewers . . . stop briefly on the channel during a remote control surf. As expected, the channel's ratings zoom when a hurricane or big snowstorm is bearing down on a population center. They also jump each day in the early morning, when people who work outside tune in to find out what the day will be like. Gamblers are heavy watchers; they want to see if horses will be running on a fast or muddy track." He concluded, "As you put all these lifestyles together who are using us for different reasons, you start to build a mass."

Chiat/Day divided the viewers into two main groups. The first consisted of functional viewers, those who "get the information they needed, and tune out," for example, a person who might watch for comprehensive coverage at a given time or check the station when the weather affects a family member. The second group consisted of core viewers, "devoted TWC junkies, who religiously watched the channel" from between three and five hours at a time. They made up about one-fifth of all viewers. The first group represented the area of potential growth and became the primary target of the campaign. The key was to get them to see TWC the way the core viewers saw it.

COMPETITION

Although there was no other 24-hour weather channel, there were numerous sources of information on weather, and each presented a competitive challenge to TWC. As Chiat/Day noted, while people respected TWC, "they seemed to like their local weather guy, and he was the one they were turning to for their daily weather needs." TWC drew viewers in special situations, but for the most part it did not serve as their day-to-day source. For that people turned elsewhere, including broadcast stations, where weather announcers maintained viewers' loyalty by entertaining them. Nonetheless, for the most part TWC had no major rivals for its 24-hour coverage.

In 1997, however, there arose a new threat to TWC, a partnership between MSNBC's on-line Weather by INTELLICAST and Primestar Satellite Service, a provider of direct broadcast satellite (DBS) programming. MSNBC created a video version of its INTELLICAST service, with the focus on local forecasts. MSNBC's strategic goals were far-reaching, however, and included

AWARDS

The "Painted Faces" campaign met with critical acclaim. It appeared on a number of top 10 and best advertising lists of 1997, including those of Adweek, Time, TV Guide, and Entertainment Weekly. It also won a number of industry awards. These included three Belding Awards and a Communication Arts Award.

the addition of INTELLICAST to the digital tiers being developed by cable TV operators. Advertising Age quoted an executive at INTELLICAST as saying that these developments made TWC "vulnerable to something more locally oriented." It was at this time that TWC's new advertising push occurred.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In order to transform so-called functional viewers into "weather-engaged" viewers, Chiat/Day recognized the need to define the essence of the latter group's passion for TWC. The agency thus performed in-depth customer research before developing its campaign. Brand personification exercises, for example, generated drawings of TWC as "men in gray suits, 100-year-old robots and nerds named Eugene with bottle-cap glasses . . . The Weather Channel and its meteorologists were seen as a bunch of weather geeks." It was found that TWC had the respect of viewers, so that when people needed critical weather information, they tuned in. Otherwise they likely watched the weather on broadcast stations, which they saw as more entertaining but less serious and substantial. The challenge for Chiat/Day was to develop a stronger brand image and sense of personality for TWC while at the same time maintaining emphasis on the channel's expertise.

When the agency asked those identified as weather-engaged to keep journals, it appeared that they were somewhat embarrassed about the extent of their viewing. As they described their habit of keeping TWC on all day, for example, they sometimes qualified their statement with a comment like "this is going to sound ridiculous . . ." Chiat/Day's research revealed "a relationship to weather that was deeper than the rational need for accurate forecasting and the emotional need to feel in control." To find out what was at the root of this relationship, Chiat/Day had the subjects draw a single image of what they liked about the weather. Among the many drawings of the sun, one stood out, a zigzagging line underscored with the word "unpredictability." The image seemed to represent the opposite of the oft-expressed wish for accuracy in forecasts.

Chiat/Day explored this contradiction for clues to TWC's appeal among the weather-engaged. When the agency prepared a mock newspaper article proclaiming an imminent breakthrough in weather prediction that was 100 percent accurate, respondents hated the idea. Chiat/Day concluded, "The unconscious, instinctual relationship turned out to be about a fascination with the awe, mystery and wonder of Mother Nature." This seemed to be at odds with the image of TWC's meteorologists, for whom accuracy signified success. Research with the meteorologists, however, showed that they themselves had a passion and respect for the ultimate unpredictability of weather. In fact, it was this that had led many of them into the field in the first place. Further, they had no illusion about 100 percent accuracy. This information produced a new challenge for Chiat/Day: "How could we reconcile what was interesting about weather (mystery) with what was necessary about it (accuracy)?" The decision was made to accept the paradox and to allow the two poles to "co-exist in a yin-yang relationship."

One element of this approach was to encourage the TWC meteorologists to reveal their passion for the weather in the belief that their feelings would become contagious. It was thought that the passion of people who devoted their lives to learning and communicating about weather could be used as an energizing force. Showing the brand presentation and the ads to the meteorologists inspired them to voice their enthusiasm and wonder for weather. New on-air promotions and identity spots also were developed, and everything from set design to the meteorologists' style of presentation was revamped to align with this approach.

Chiat/Day thus attempted to control the image of TWC and craft an effective brand personality. The elements the agency had to work with were a bundle of contradictions: mystery, accuracy, geekiness, seriousness, passion. The journals of the weather-engaged had shown that these people recognized it to be a bit odd to be so "into weather." Working with this reality, Chiat/Day devised a brand personality—endearingly quirky—that was absolutely true to the character of TWC in all of its contradictions.

This brand personality allowed for the type of self-deprecating humor that evolved into the "Painted Faces" campaign. According to Chiat/Day, both the ad itself, which was directed by David Ramser, and the bar in which it was set gave "weather junkies a sense of acceptance and belonging and . . . permission to be into the weather. It's a place that also invites others to join in on the fun.'' Chiat/Day sought nothing less than to make TWC a part of pop culture. The ad ran on a number of cable channels, including the Discovery Channel, CNN, and A&E Network, on broadcast shows such as The Tonight Show, and on popular reruns and syndicated shows like Seinfeld and Wheel of Fortune.

OUTCOME

Chiat/Day's follow-up research, including both before-and-after drawings of brand personification, indicated that the campaign was successful in more deeply engaging functional viewers. This conclusion was supported by a Millard Brown Tracking Study showing that the brand image ''passionate about the weather'' was associated with TWC by 73 percent of those who recognized the ''Painted Faces'' ad as compared to 38 percent who did not. Furthermore, following two months of advertising in New York and Chicago, advertising awareness in these markets increased 13 percent as against 3 percent in a national control group. Of those aware of the ads, 63 percent linked the ads to TWC, more than doubling the average brand linkage of 31 percent.

Anecdotal evidence confirmed these positive results. Chiat/Day reported that TWC was flooded with fan mail and received requests for posters of ''Painted Faces.'' A 1997 survey by Young and Rubicam indicated that, along with the Discovery Network, TWC was one of the three most recognized names on cable.

FURTHER READING

Bauder, David. ''Rain or Shine, Weather Channel Is Becoming a Habit with Viewers.'' Chicago Tribune, April 12, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. ''Clouds of Geekiness Part for Weather Fans.'' Advertising Age, September 1997.

Haddad, Charles. ''The Weather Channel Yields to Poor Climate in European TV.'' Atlanta Constitution Journal, January 30, 1998.

McCarthy, Michael. ''A Channel Switch.'' Adweek (Western Edition), February 3, 1997.

Miller, Cyndee. ''Big Audience Has Weather Channel Singin' in the Rain.'' Marketing News, February 17, 1997, p. 2.

Osterman, Jim. ''Sun Shines on 3 Finalists for the Weather Channel.'' Adweek, December 9, 1996.

Ross, Chuck. ''Video Version of Online Intellicast Set for Primestar Satellite Service.'' Advertising Age, February 17, 1997.

''$6 Million TV, Print Campaign Touts Weather Channel.'' Brandweek, February 26, 1996.

''The Weather Channel Has Become Part of America's Television Climate.'' Roanoke Times & World News, January 21, 1998.

Wolverton, Brad. ''Cable's Storm King Reinvents Itself.'' Business Week, August 11, 1997, p. 6.

Cynthia Tokumitsu

Wendy's International, Inc.

One Dave Thomas Blvd.
Dublin, Ohio 43017-0256
USA
Telephone: (614) 764-3100
Fax: (614) 764-3330
Web site: www.wendys.com

■■■

FRESH STUFFED PITA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In a fast-food universe dominated by industry giant McDonald's, the task for the challengers has always been to devise a competitive posture that emphasizes differences that resonate with consumers. As customers began to assert their preference for fresh ingredients and made-to-order products, aggressive smaller chains moved to fill this demand. One of the first and most successful to do so was Wendy's International Inc.

Founded by R. Dave Thomas in 1969, the chain began by offering the kind of "fresh" burgers and shakes customers remembered from the days of the corner diner, a far cry from the processed patties that studded the menus of Wendy's big-name competitors. A series of quirky ad campaigns reinforced the company's image as a friendly, customer-oriented purveyor of simple comfort staples. Having established its niche, Wendy's continued to innovate, using menu flexibility to reflect the changing tastes of fast-food consumers. As tastes veered away from burgers and toward more healthful alternatives, Wendy's was thus in an ideal position to cater to this emerging market.

Consumers went through burger wars and price wars. Increasingly, however, they began to demand light but filling sandwiches that were more healthful than the traditional combinations of ground beef and cheese. By the late 1990s the demand for healthful fast-food items seemed to reach its peak.

Wendy's menu had long featured unconventional fast-food fare, including baked potatoes and chili. In response to the demands of health-conscious consumers, in 1979 it became one of the first chains to introduce a salad bar, which it did over the initial objections of Thomas. On the other hand, when McDonald's tried to introduce McPizza, consumers rejected it as bizarre and unappetizing. This was partly because McDonald's strong association with hamburgers left it ill-prepared for such a change in its menu. Wendy's, which was not encumbered by such associations, could and did respond more easily to the wishes of its customers.

One of the results was the introduction of the Fresh Stuffed Pita line in 1997. Inspired in part by the growing popularity of wrap sandwiches on restaurant menus, the four-sandwich line was designed to offer consumers the healthful benefits of a salad with a sandwich's portability. The common ingredient shared by all four sandwiches was the heated flatbread used to envelop the chilled ingredients. Two of the sandwiches incorporated chicken chunks, one with salad greens and a Caesar vinaigrette dressing and one with fresh vegetables and ranch dressing. A third, called Classic Greek, blended feta cheese into the mix, while the Garden Veggie Pita, which did not have meat or cheese, was the lightest option.

Using a massive promotional campaign, Wendy's sought to sell the new line to its existing customers while enticing salad lovers to its restaurants for the first time. The continuity of the new campaign with the chain's existing philosophy made the undertaking especially favorable. As John Barker, Wendy's vice president of investor relations, told Nation's Restaurant News, the Fresh Stuffed Pita line "reinforces Wendy's unique position in the market in that it's fresh and made-to-order."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The story of Wendy's marketing success was, in many ways, the story of founder Thomas. His blend of folksy charm and down-home homilies gave Wendy's campaigns their unique appeal and made him one of advertising's icons. "More than anything, I'm a marketer," Thomas confessed in his 1991 memoir, Dave's Way. His nose for promotion served as one of the pillars of Wendy's success.

The adopted son of an itinerant handyman, Thomas developed his love for the restaurant business early in life. In 1948 he dropped out of high school to work full-time in the industry. His big break occurred when he became a Kentucky Fried Chicken franchisee. Thomas was schooled at the knee of Colonel Harland Sanders, the founder of the chain of fast-food restaurants. Sanders's dedication to promoting his business became the template for Thomas's own marketing approach.

Using money he earned from turning around failing Kentucky Fried Chicken franchises, Thomas opened his first Wendy's in 1969. Named for one of his daughters, the burger-and-fries operation rapidly expanded from its Midwestern base. Advertising, along with shrewd menu innovations, were integral to the company's early growth. For the first eight years of its existence, however, Wendy's had no national advertising. Its commercials appeared only on local television and radio. The company's first nationally televised commercial, titled "Hot 'n Juicy," aired in April 1977. The $4 million inaugural campaign ran from 1977 to 1980, won a Clio Award for creativity, and established national name recognition for the fledgling company.

In 1981 the newly assertive company switched gears, debuting a glitzy Hollywood-style campaign that had employees and customers singing the jingle "Wendy's Has the Taste." A salad bar and chicken sandwich were featured in the advertising. Thomas also made his first appearance in a commercial. In each ad he related one of his basic business maxims. "Now given that," went the tag line, "why would anyone go anyplace else?" The camera then moved to one of several dining room scenes, where customers explained that there "Ain't No Reason" to go anyplace else. The use of the colloquial "ain't no" created substantial national and local publicity. The company's next campaign, "Wendy's Kind of People," debuted in June 1982. Its folksy theme was used in many later advertising, public relations, and sales promotion projects. In that same year Thomas became senior chairman of the company and gave up running the day-to-day operations. He would not appear in a Wendy's ad for the next seven years.

In the summer of 1983 Wendy's entered what were called the burger wars with a series of biting ads depicting the customer as a victim of "those other hamburger places." Hapless consumers were ordered to "step aside" or "park it" and wait for "frozen stiff" hamburgers. In January 1984 Wendy's unveiled its most famous campaign, indeed one of the singular campaigns in advertising history. The aim was to attack the misconception that Wendy's single hamburger was smaller than competitors' "big-name" hamburgers. Created by Dancer Fitzgerald Sample and the director Josef Sedelmaier, the man behind the FedEx famous fast talker, the "Where's the Beef?" campaign consisted at first of four commercials featuring 70-something actress Clara Peller and sidekicks Mildred Lane and Elizabeth Shaw.

Few marketing campaigns have hammered home the concept of bang-for-the-buck as effectively as "Where's the Beef?" The ads made a national folk heroine out of the feisty, diminutive Peller and spawned a catchphrase that ranked with the most memorable in advertising history. Before Peller brayed her way into the nation's consciousness, only 37 percent of American consumers were familiar with Wendy's advertising. After the debut of "Where's the Beef?" the figure jumped to 60 percent. But the impact of "Where's the Beef?" transcended the fast-food industry. The phrase was soon appearing everywhere, from bumper stickers to Sunday morning sermons. The tag line even appeared in the 1984 presidential campaign, when Democratic aspirant Walter Mondale used it to tweak rival Gary Hartin a televised debate. "I'm happy to say the slogan worked better for us than it did for Mr. Mondale," cracked Thomas in his memoir.

Wendy's did not rest on its "Where's the Beef?" laurels, however. It continued to produce unique, quirky ads that garnered industry accolades. In December 1984 Wendy's rolled out a series of humorous spots for chicken sandwiches under the banner "Parts Is Parts." It was another Clio winner. In 1985 Wendy's even managed to incorporate political humor into its advertising. Its commercial "Russian Fashion Show" lampooned the dreary monotony of life under the Soviet jackboot. This spot also won a Clio.

In June 1987 Wendy's introduced the "Hamburger A, Hamburger B" campaign, in which an interviewer asked people to choose between a fresh Wendy's hamburger and an unappealing hamburger made from frozen beef, presumably produced by one of the chain's rivals. With the burger wars having subsided, however, Wendy's returned to its folksy approach. In April 1989 Thomas returned in a series of ads in which he offered a money-back guarantee if consumers did not agree that Wendy's had the best tasting hamburgers in the business. Nearly 400 consumers nationwide took part in the accompanying testimonial campaign, one of the largest such campaigns in television history.

Wendy's next campaign, "Old Fashioned Guy," continued along the same line. The ads placed Thomas in a Wendy's restaurant expounding on his "old-fashioned philosophy" of making hamburgers. After asking people to "come on in" for an old-fashioned hamburger, Thomas concluded the ads by saying, "Our hamburgers are the best in the business, or I wouldn't have named the place after my daughter." Thomas's return could not have come at a better time for Wendy's. Sales throughout the fast-food sector had slowed, and it was believed that the burger war ads had taken Wendy's too far afield from its traditional strengths. With Thomas's return—and an aggressive quality control initiative that saw him spending 35 weeks a year schmoozing with franchisees—systemwide sales jumped to more than $3 billion in 1990, a 29 percent increase from the year before. Competitors' sales remained flat.

In the 1990s, despite suffering a serious heart attack, the genial Thomas continued to star in Wendy's ads. The founder's credibility as a spokesperson helped Wendy's to consistently increase its advertising awareness figures, surpassing even the "Where's the Beef?" campaign. As the decade wore on, the commercials began to emphasize the wide variety of Wendy's menu items, from specialty sandwiches such as Monterey Ranch Chicken to the Super Value Menu to the highly touted launch of stuffed pita sandwiches in 1997.

TARGET MARKET

In the 1990s Wendy's was among the leaders in fast-food franchises in responding to the needs of health-conscious consumers. As consumer tastes turned away from beef—and in the face of threats of increases in the price of beef—the company began to incorporate more chicken into its menu items. The marriage of chicken with salad on a light flatbread in the Fresh Stuffed Pita seemed tailor-made for a market that wanted a low-fat, low-cholesterol sandwich. "Fresh Stuffed Pitas provide Wendy's with a very attractive alternative to the typical fast food hamburger fare," observed Mitchell B. Pinheiro, an analyst with Janney Montgomery Scott, in a 1997 report on the company.

Early consumer tracking showed that the sandwiches were most in favor among young women, who had traditionally gravitated toward low-fat, salad-based products. Salad lovers who would not normally patronize fast-food restaurants soon became a valuable segment of the market as well. In an all-things-to-everyone approach, Wendy's spokespeople positioned Fresh Stuffed Pitas as the perfect choice for those who wanted a filling sandwich that was also light and easy to eat.

VEGETARIAN OR NOT?

The public expected a product called Garden Veggie Pita and designated as "vegetarian" on a brochure not to contain meat. Wendy's faced a public relations firestorm when it was revealed that this particular pita contained a gelatin additive made from animal by-products. Some consumers had complained when they noticed that the dressing on the sandwich wraps seemed thicker and more saucelike than customary vegetarian toppings. After fielding numerous complaints, Wendy's admitted that the dressing was derived from hide, beaks, and connective tissue, ingredients usually earmarked for pet food. The company agreed to retire the gelatin-based dressing once existing stocks ran out, and competing chains that also used animal extracts in vegetarian entrees rushed to change their practices as well.

COMPETITION

As the 1990s wore on, McDonald's embarked on a series of aggressive marketing campaigns that threatened to cut into Wendy's profit margins. Wendy's response to the threat was to diversify its menu even further. This strategy represented a counterattack against McDonald's, which in the eyes of many industry observers had for too long failed to innovate in the development of products.

A report by Everen Securities analyst Dean T. Haskell in the spring of 1997 found that McDonald's domestic operations were under intense competitive pressure from other major fast-food chains. "Competitive pressure in the United States persists because of a continuing proliferation of chain restaurants and weak consumer spending," Haskell observed. "Competitors of McDonald's are also building aggressively, using traditional and nontraditional units to penetrate markets." While McDonald's own growth remained solid, it found its competitive position jeopardized by such innovations as value pricing and menu diversification. Wendy's introduction of the Fresh Stuffed Pita in 1997 was only the latest in a series of product rollouts designed to take advantage of this competitive atmosphere.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Fresh Stuffed Pitas were initially test-marketed in Norfolk, Virginia, and Omaha, Nebraska, in January 1996. After receiving a favorable response, they were added to the menus of Wendy's franchises in eight other markets in the fall of 1996. They were priced from $1.99 to $2.99 and carried a low food cost, meaning that there would be relatively high margins if the line sold at all. Wendy's officials hoped to have the sandwiches replace the higher-cost salad bars still in place in many franchises.

By April 1997 Wendy's entire 4,400-unit U.S. system was in the training stage for the rollout. While there was initial reluctance on the part of some franchisees regarding the adjustments in operations required for the new product, strong, incremental sales gains based only on point-of-purchase advertising soon eased their reservations. "What we're doing is gradually increasing demand for the pita as stores gradually get used to carrying it, so the operations don't suffer," explained Wendy's Barker.

Promotional materials provided to franchisees stressed the fun of eating the sandwich. One promotion showed a cartoon Thomas dryly instructing consumers "how to eat a pita." Dummy press releases were designed to announce the launch of Fresh Stuffed Pitas in each market, while the entire press package was festooned with the legend "Fresh Like a Salad, Filling Like a Sandwich."

Once the entire Wendy's system became accustomed to assembling the pitas, the company launched television advertising. The New York-based agency Bates Worldwide designed the ads, which debuted in the spring of 1997. The initial spot featured Thomas explaining the concept of "a salad in a sandwich." A subsequent ad had him settling an argument between a young couple over whether the new product was a salad or a sandwich. "It's both," says a reassuring Thomas. Other spots in the national campaign showed Thomas donning a series of disguises and making a big announcement about the pita line to a gathering of Wendy's employees.

OUTCOME

Given the high-profile rollout of the ads, public response to the "Fresh Stuffed Pita" campaign was something of a disappointment. USA Today's Ad Track measured the popularity and effectiveness of the new ads. Its initial findings indicated that only 16 percent of respondents liked the commercials a great deal, while 26 percent found them effective. Older consumers responded more favorably than did younger consumers, with 24 percent of those over age 50 saying they liked the ads a lot.

Analysts differed over whether the product or the pitch was responsible for the lukewarm response to the ads. Carlie Rath, Wendy's executive vice president of marketing, told USA Today, "We realize the pita is a product that isn't going to appeal to all of our customers." While conceding that Thomas was one of the most recognizable chief executives in America, marketing consultant Lynn Upshaw felt that Wendy's "may need to reexamine how they can best use his image. That's one of the pitfalls of any long-running campaign."

Nevertheless, Wendy's declared the campaign a sales success. Certainly the early sales returns were favorable. A report by analyst Pinheiro found that Wendy's same-store sales had increased 9.1 percent in the first quarter of 1997. The growth was accompanied by a 6.6 percent increase in transactions. "Even more interesting is that the company has achieved these transaction gains while initiating some price increases," Pinheiro noted. "We cannot name another quick-serve restaurant chain that has been able to raise prices, a testament to the underlying strength of the concept." While declining to issue specific numbers, Wendy's acknowledged that, as of November 1997, pita sales were meeting or exceeding its own projections.

FURTHER READING

Enrico, Dottie. "Consumers Bought Into Real-World Ads in '97." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

———. "Dave Comes Up Flat as Wendy's Pita Pusher." USA Today, November 3, 1997.

Hamstra, Mark. "Wendy's Blends Elements of Salad and Sandwich in New Pita Promo." Nation's Restaurant News, March 31, 1997.

Killian, Linda. "Hamburger Helper." Forbes, August 5, 1991, p. 106.

Mulrine, Anna. "Psst. About That Veggie Pita." U.S. News & World Report, July 8, 1997.

Pollack, Judann, and Mark Gleason. "Wendy's, McDonald's Seek New Menu Sizzle." Advertising Age, March 5, 1997, p. 12.

Ross, Chuck. "Wendy's Shifts National Media Back to Bates." Advertising Age, March 5, 1997, p. 1.

Robert Schnakenberg

GOOD TO BE SQUARE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Wendy's International, Inc., was the United States' third-largest burger chain in the early 2000s, and it had a reputation for high-quality food that was the envy of the industry. The public face of the Wendy's brand was company founder Dave Thomas, who, with his folksy persona and rags-to-riches success story, had become an icon inseparable from the Wendy's brand, thanks to his starring role in a 12-year advertising campaign. Thomas's death in 2002 thus left Wendy's without a clear voice or direction in its marketing, a problem that was compounded by the growing marketing effectiveness of competitors McDonald's and Burger King. In 2005, as a means of updating the Wendy's image, the company and its agency, the New York office of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, introduced a comprehensive advertising platform under the tagline ''Do What Tastes Right.'' Designed to speak in different ways to different target groups, it was particularly noteworthy for its inclusion of an online, viral (designed to be passed around by consumers via E-mail and other means), and TV campaign called ''Good to Be Square.''

''Good to Be Square'' targeted young adults, especially males, prime consumers of fast food whom Wendy's had not effectively reached with preceding campaigns. All elements of the campaign were built around a central conceit in which an animated character called Smart Square (modeled after the square hamburger patties characteristic of Wendy's) demonstrated his superiority to throngs of round ''Beadicons'' (circular figures meant to evoke competitors' hamburgers). ''Good to Be Square'' began as an unbranded website featuring a short film and other elements that could be transmitted to other Internet users via E-mail. Soon after the site's launch in mid-May 2005, TV spots featuring Smart Square and the Beadicons began appearing, and the website became a branded one linked to the main Wendy's site.

Although ''Good to Be Square'' and the larger shift in Wendy's marketing strategy were seen as promising steps toward the goal of establishing a clear and updated brand identity, Wendy's in 2005 experienced its first full-year sales decline since 1987. This outcome was at least partly explained, however, by strengthened competition from McDonald's and Burger King as well as by a hoax that had damaged the chain's reputation among consumers in the spring of that year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Wendy's became America's third-biggest fast-food chain thanks in large part to its founder, Dave Thomas. Thomas began working in inexpensive restaurants at age 12 and did not finish high school. In 1969, after years of restaurant toil, he opened his own establishment, the original Wendy's, in Columbus, Ohio. Although the restaurant chain's extreme growth in subsequent decades lifted Thomas far above his roots, his humble background and no-nonsense personality continued to infuse the corporate culture, and arguably the food, at Wendy's.

© MIKE CASSESE/REUTERS/CORBIS.

The chain was known as a higher-quality alternative to competitors Burger King and McDonald's, a perception reinforced by the classic advertising campaign ''Where's the Beef?'' which used humor to posit that competitors' hamburgers fell far short of the standard set by Wendy's. Wendy's likewise augmented the industry-standard burger-and-fries offerings with a focus on chicken sandwiches and such items as chili, baked potatoes, and salads, which strengthened its image as an upscale fast-food chain and contributed to a corresponding impression that its food was healthier than that on offer at McDonald's or Burger King. Beginning in 1989 Wendy's and its advertising agency, the New York office of Bates Worldwide, linked this reputation for food quality with the personality of founder Thomas, who became the public face of the brand in its TV commercials. The spots depicted Thomas in a variety of humorous scenarios that demonstrated his honesty, commitment to quality, and lack of pretension, attributes that were successfully integrated into the Wendy's identity over the 12-year course of the campaign's run.

Thomas's death in 2002 therefore left Wendy's at a marketing crossroads. Because he served as the Wendy's spokesman, Thomas had become virtually synonymous with the chain itself, and there was no clear way to extend his legacy in future advertising campaigns or to promote an identity apart from his personality, at least in the years immediately following his death. Although the chain continued to perform well in 2002 and 2003, it struggled to find a consistent advertising strategy. In 2004 Wendy's settled on a new campaign featuring an "unofficial" spokesman, the fictional Mr. Wendy, who proselytized on behalf of the chain's food despite having been issued a cease-and-desist order from the corporate office. In TV, print, and online components crafted by the New York office of McCann-Erickson Worldwide for a family audience, Mr. Wendy was shown zealously encouraging people to try Wendy's against backdrops ranging from a Little League game to a Hollywood party. The Mr. Wendy concept was intended to provide a long-running framework for a variety of product pitches, as the commercials featuring Thomas had done. The campaign corresponded with surprisingly sharp sales declines, however, and many observers complained that Mr. Wendy represented a feeble and less-than-subtle attempt to replace Thomas. The campaign was pulled within a year of its introduction.

Wendy's faced additional problems during this time. McDonald's and Burger King had both found effective marketing messages at the same time that they were closing the perceived gap in menu quality that had historically set Wendy's apart from them. A March 2005 hoax in which a woman claimed to have found a severed finger in a bowl of Wendy's chili further damaged Wendy's brand image and proved temporarily devastating to sales chainwide. In May 2005 Wendy's and McCann-Erickson unveiled a new umbrella campaign called "Do What Tastes Right." In addition to marking a substantial break in tone from past advertising, "Do What Tastes Right" was projected to provide flexibility for speaking to different target groups with different creative strategies.

DAVE THOMAS, 1932–2002

A portly older man in an unstylish short-sleeved dress shirt and tie, Dave Thomas, as the longtime TV spokesman for his burger chain Wendy's, came across as a straight-talking everyman. His unassuming exterior was all the more appealing for being paired with one of the most compelling rags-to-riches stories in corporate America. An orphan whose adoptive mother died when he was five, Thomas lived in a succession of Midwestern towns as his father struggled to hold a steady job, and the two ate dinner at inexpensive diners and family restaurants every night. This gave the boy a sense of being at home in such establishments, and he began working in the restaurant industry at age 12, dropping out of school in the 10th grade to support himself by working in a restaurant. Even once Thomas had become one of America's most successful entrepreneurs, he exuded humility and authenticity. Adweek magazine critic Barbara Lippert said of the Wendy's commercials in which Thomas starred, "Even though the spots were only mildly smile-producing, that aggregate of genuine Daveness is what resonated: It made the commercials feel like home, like what Dave was looking for all his life."

TARGET MARKET

Although "Do What Tastes Right" featured a variety of creative executions and placements for different target markets, one of the overall goals of the campaign was to reach males aged 18 to 34. Wendy's recognized that it had not effectively targeted this younger market with the folksy, family-oriented advertising of the Thomas era and of the Mr. Wendy campaign, and "Good to Be Square" represented the chain's most daring and offbeat attempt to reach this younger audience. A combined Internet, TV, and viral campaign, "Good to Be Square" showed that Wendy's was cognizant of this target group's growing preference for online entertainment over watching television. Young adults were also among the most finicky of American consumers, in part, it was believed, because they were suspicious of traditional marketing techniques. The online portion of the campaign, accessible at www.goodtobesquare.com, thus offered entertainment—a short animated film as well as interactive functions featuring the character Smart Square and the hapless round "Beadicons" surrounding him—rather than overt branding.

COMPETITION

Although McDonald's was the U.S. fast-food-industry leader with more than double the estimated market share of Burger King and more than three times that of Wendy's in 2003 (43.1 percent versus 18.5 percent and 13.2 percent, respectively), it had seen sales flag in recent years at least partly because of a wider consumer backlash against fast foods that were perceived as unhealthy. Wendy's had been well positioned, thanks to its salads and other comparatively healthy menu options, to cope with changing consumer tastes, but in 2003 McDonald's began to engineer a sales turnaround that surprised analysts and threatened Wendy's positioning. A key part of the McDonald's resurgence was an updating of its menu: notably, the chain introduced a line of premium salads, reformulated its Chicken McNuggets to consist exclusively of white meat, and introduced sandwiches featuring whole-breast chicken fillets. This menu overhaul allowed the burger giant to claim many of the product-quality and health attributes that had long set Wendy's apart in the category. A well-received advertising campaign tagged "I'm Lovin' It" drew attention to the product innovations with help from celebrities including tennis stars Venus and Serena Williams and basketball star Yao Ming. McDonald's posted sales gains of $2 billion in 2004, for a sales total of $24.4 billion, larger than sales totals of its three top challengers—Burger King, Wendy's, and Subway—combined. McDonald's continued to post consistent sales growth in 2005 and was almost universally believed to be well positioned for future category dominance.

After experiencing sales declines in 2003 that left total revenues at $7.9 billion compared with $8.3 billion for 2002, Burger King was, like Wendy's, attempting to find a new direction for its marketing in 2004. It moved its advertising account from Chicago's Young & Rubicam to Miami's Crispin Porter + Bogusky. Then the company revived a long-running tagline from previous years, ''Have It Your Way,'' and used it to promote the chain's chicken-based menu items with a much-publicized online and viral campaign aimed at young adults. Called ''Subservient Chicken,'' the campaign featured a website, www.subservientchicken.com, where users could manipulate visuals of a human in a chicken suit. Web surfers could command the chicken to perform a number of actions, including dancing, watching television, and doing push-ups. The site's designers had programmed the chicken to respond to lewd or inappropriate commands with a disapproving wag of his wing, and a webcam frame made the chicken appear to be conscious of the Web surfers who gave him commands. Within eight days of the website's launch on April 7, 2004, it had attracted 15 to 20 million hits. The campaign was credited with helping the Burger King brand connect to young males and with sparking sustained growth over the next year. ''Subservient Chicken'' also won numerous advertising awards and was an obvious influence on Wendy's' entry into the world of viral marketing the following year.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In keeping with the larger ''Do What Tastes Right'' directive to focus on the chain's food, the ''Good to Be Square'' concept was rooted in the trademark square shape of Wendy's burgers. Online and TV executions were centered on the character Smart Square, a simple animated, square-shaped figure with arms, legs, an impassive facial expression, and a self-assured baritone voice. Smart Square was surrounded by Beadicons, circle-shaped characters evocative of other burger patties. The Beadicons were anxiety-ridden and ineffectual and could communicate only via tiny chirps and squeals.

''Good to Be Square'' was launched simultaneously with the larger ''Do What Tastes Right'' effort in mid-May of 2005. Originally website banners featuring a visual of Smart Square against a red background encouraged users to link to the ''Good to Be Square'' website, which at that point was unbranded. The 60-second film available for viewing there likewise contained no references to Wendy's, instead following Smart Square as he helped the hapless Beadicons solve a variety of problems: he effortlessly found a needle in a haystack for them, saved a group of Beadicons stranded in a boat by kicking an oar to them in one swift motion, and opened a gate that had been stymieing a bunch of Beadicons. Once he had opened the gate, a crowd of Beadicons slavishly followed him into a flowering meadow. As they gathered around him, a rainbow emerged in the background, and Smart Square coolly asked, ''Why? Why are they following me?'' The film's soundtrack was the upbeat 1970s song ''Ooh Child,'' by the Five Stairsteps, whose reassuring message that ''things are gonna get easier'' corresponded with Smart Square's problem-solving efforts. The website's viral components included a feature enabling viewers to E-mail the website link to friends as well as downloadable images of Smart Square and the Beadicons making a variety of expressions.

''Good to Be Square'' content later moved to branded TV spots. Like the online film, the TV spots showed Smart Square surrounded by squeaking circular Beadicons and demonstrating that he was far more self-assured and capable than they were, but in ways that more overtly pushed a Wendy's food-quality message. One spot featured Smart Square singing, ''It takes flair to be a square . . . it's better than being round or being a king or a clown'' (''king'' and ''clown'' being references, respectively, to Burger King and the McDonald's mascot, Ronald McDonald). Smart Square's song closed with images of actual Wendy's burgers and the casually intoned command ''Eat me.'' Another TV spot showed the circular Beadicons sweating and worrying under heat lamps before Smart Square appeared, saying, ''If heat lamps have this much power over little animated circle people, you can just imagine what they do to your hamburger.'' This was a reference to new grilling equipment that Wendy's had installed in its restaurants, allowing for faster food preparation and making heat lamps unnecessary. The TV spots ran under the ''Do What Tastes Right'' tagline and directed viewers to the website www.goodtobesquare.com. The ''Good to Be Square'' website thus became branded with the Wendy's name and was linked to the main company site. The TV spots were made available for viewing on www.goodtobesquare.com, and the initial film was still available but with branded Wendy's elements added at its conclusion.

Wendy's did not disclose budget figures for ''Good to Be Square'' or ''Do What Tastes Right,'' suggesting only that the new umbrella campaign marked an increase over the brand's typical yearly ad spend of between $350 and $400 million. "Good to Be Square" was, however, certainly a more cost-effective campaign than a traditional media effort would have been, because its online components required no purchasing of broadcast time and its viral components relied on Web users themselves to spread the word about the campaign.

OUTCOME

Although "Good to Be Square" and the larger shift in the tone of Wendy's advertising were generally well received, in 2005 the chain posted its first full-year sales loss—a decline of 3.7 percent—in 18 years. Wendy's cited the increased competition from McDonald's and Burger King as well as the ruse about the human finger in Wendy's chili as the reasons for the losses, and the company continued to develop its "Do What Tastes Right" marketing platform.

FURTHER READING

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "Wendy's Revamps Ad, Media Strategies to Zero in on Diverse Targets." Nation's Restaurant News, May 30, 2005.

Garfield, Bob. "Seven Things Wendy's Commercials Do Right." Advertising Age, May 23, 2005.

Gibson, Richard. "Wendy's Faces Advertising Dilemma." Wall Street Journal, November 10, 2004.

Hein, Kenneth. "Big Boys (and Bigger Burgers) Are Back!" Brandweek, June 20, 2005.

———. "Fast Food." Brandweek, April 25, 2005.

Howard, Theresa. "'Viral' Ads Are So Fun You Pass 'Em Along." USA Today, May 19, 2005.

Lippert, Barbara. "The Natural." Adweek, January 14, 2002.

MacArthur, Kate. "As Sales Slip, Wendy's Revamps Brand Team." Advertising Age, October 31, 2005.

———. "Rowden Grabs Wendy's Collar, Yanks It Forward." Advertising Age, June 27, 2005.

———. "Salad Days at McDonald's." Advertising Age, December 13, 2004.

———. "Wendy's Struggles to Serve Up Success." Advertising Age, February 21, 2005.

Steinberg, Brian, and Suzanne Vranica. "Burger King Seeks Some Web Heat; Interactive Site Is Created to Promote Chicken Items to Young-Adult Market." Wall Street Journal, April 15, 2004.

Mark Lane

Wholesome & Hearty Foods Company

15615 Alton Pkwy., Ste. 350
Irvine, California 92618
USA
Telephone: (949) 255-2000
Fax: (949) 255-2010
Web site: www.gardenburger.com

■■■

EATING GOOD JUST GOT GREAT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Gardenburger Inc. changed its name to Wholesome & Hearty Foods. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

Gardenburger, Inc., a manufacturer and distributor of meatless food products, launched its first television advertising campaign in 1998 and took a heady gamble by investing approximately $1.5 million, a sizable portion of Gardenburger's annual advertising budget of about $14 million, on one 30-second advertising slot on the final episode of the popular television program Seinfeld. The program, which aired on NBC, had generated a dedicated following of viewers, and the show's finale was purported to have the most expensive commercial advertising time in television history, outdoing even the much-watched Super Bowl. Despite skepticism among competitors and industry analysts regarding Gardenburger's decision to invest more than 10 percent of its modest advertising budget on 30 seconds, Lyle G. Hubbard, Gardenburger's CEO and president, spoke enthusiastically about the Seinfeld slot in a company news release. "The purpose of Gardenburger's advertising campaign is to take the brand from niche to mainstream, and what better way to do it than on one of America's favorite television shows," Hubbard stated. "There is huge consumer demand right now for low fat products that taste great, so the last episode of Seinfeld is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for Gardenburger."

The television campaign, developed by agency Publicis/Hal Riney & Partners, consisted of three animated spots. The whimsical commercials promoted the convenience, wholesomeness, and good taste of Gardenburger veggie patties. Narrated by actor Samuel L. Jackson, each ad used the tag line, "Eating Good Just Got Great" and focused on the motto, "Surprising Great Taste." The campaign began on May 4, 1998, the start of the company's peak sales season, with the second of the three ads airing on the last episode of Seinfeld on May 14, 1998. Even before the campaign commenced, however, the small, relatively unknown Gardenburger received a substantial amount of media publicity for its Seinfeld gamble. "Eating Good Just Got Great" continued through the summer, though it was initially scheduled for a five-week run due to the company's limited budget. The campaign also included a print effort in consumer magazines and was supported by a public relations plan implemented by public relations agency Publicis Dialog (formerly EvansGroup Public Relations). Publicis/Hal Riney's Paul Janus discussed Gardenburger's goal of attracting a mainstream audience and the logic behind its aggressive, albeit risky, advertising strategy in the Wall Street Journal and said: "If this is truly going to be a big category [meatless food products], somebody's got to be there first.... This is where we stick our flag in the ground."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the early 1990s the public began to grow increasingly conscious of health and nutrition matters, sparking a trend in the consumption of meat alternatives among nonvegetarians. According to market research firm FIND/SVP, sales of meat-substitute and dairy-alternative products more than doubled from 1989 to 1994, increasing from $138 million to $286 million, and were projected to continue growing to reach an estimated $662 million by 1999. Many were buying these products not in health food stores but in supermarkets, which in 1996 accounted for 52 percent of meat-substitute sales, according to FIND/SVP. Founded in 1985, Gardenburger had made its mark in the niche category that consisted of natural and health foods. The company, which had traditionally geared its advertising efforts to the health food shopper with ads that urged consumers to help save the planet, and the cows, by avoiding meat, hoped to capitalize on this nationwide healthful eating movement. By the mid-1990s, however, the company found itself in a rather unpleasant situation—though revenues were increasing, earnings were flat.

Gardenburger's fate changed in 1996 when it hired Hubbard, a former executive at Quaker Oats who had been responsible for turning the sagging rice cake business into a $200 million division in three years. Hubbard implemented a new growth strategy designed to mainstream the meatless food product category and transform Gardenburger into the market leader. Revenues quickly began to rise, increasing 10 percent in 1996 and 45 percent in 1997. In 1997 Gardenburger products became available in retail stores nationwide, up from 20 percent availability when Hubbard joined the company, and continued its push in the food service and restaurant arena. The company also began to broaden its marketing efforts to increase the brand's visibility—in 1997 Gardenburger launched a national print campaign that included ads in such mainstream publications as People, Rolling Stone, and USA Today.

TARGET MARKET

The traditional audience for Gardenburger veggie patties included strict vegetarians, a group that made up only 1 percent to 2 percent of the population. Other likely consumers were semivegetarians and those required by their physicians to change their eating habits because of medical conditions. These consumers represented a limited portion of the population, but a growing number of people began to focus on eating more healthily, and Gardenburger was able to expand its target audience. By 1998 most shoppers were aware of the healthfulness of various food products and had committed themselves to improving their diets, but most had still not tried many meat alternatives. Gardenburger's research had found, however, that about six out of 10 U.S. households unfamiliar with Gardenburger veggie patties were not only willing to try them but were also apt to consume them on a regular basis if they were easy to prepare, flavorsome, and good for their health.

For the "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign Gardenburger hoped to appeal to a wide audience that included the 33 million college-educated American adults who attempted to eat healthily and maintain relatively active lifestyles. Seinfeld was a popular program with this group, and Seinfeld particularly appealed to women between the ages of 25 and 54, a key audience for Gardenburger's veggie patties. Publicis/Hal Riney's Douglas Seay stated in a Gardenburger news release: "Seinfeld has owned the number-one or -two position with women every Thursday night at 9 p.m. for several years now.... The show's audience is a solid match with the demographic profile of Gardenburger's target market." It was up to Gardenburger and Publicis/Hal Riney to convince these loyal Seinfeld fans that Gardenburger products were worth trying—in 30 seconds.

COMPETITION

When Gardenburger embarked upon its ambitious growth endeavor, it was not the leader of the meat-alternative category; rather, that honor went to Worthington Foods Inc. of Ohio, the maker of such brands as Morningstar Farms, Natural Touch, and Worthington. According to "Business First-Columbus", Worthington's Morningstar Farms brand enjoyed a market share of 60 percent in the meatless food segment in 1995. Another rival, Pillsbury Company and Archer Daniels Midland Company's Harvest Burger brand, had a 23 percent share in 1995. Before Harvest Burger entered the meatless product category in 1993, Morningstar Farms' market share was a commanding 95 percent. Gardenburger trailed behind until 1997, when it began expanding its distribution channels and advertising with a national print campaign. At the beginning of that year Gardenburger's market share was 12 percent, but, the company reported, by the end of August its share had climbed significantly to 32 percent. Worthington Foods' share, meanwhile, hovered around 36 percent. Demand for veggie patties increased as well, growing 37 percent in the year ending May 1998, according to A.C. Nielsen Company.

A BURGER BY ANY OTHER NAME

Meatless patties found themselves divided into two overall categories—those that were intended to simulate meat both in taste and appearance, and those that were not. The meat-like products were generally composed of soy products, while the veggie patties tended to consist of vegetables and grains. Gardenburger veggie patties, for instance, were made of brown rice, bulgur wheat, onions, mushrooms, egg whites, and low-fat cheese.

Gardenburger was the first to take the high-visibility plunge into national television advertising. Though Worthington invested in advertising—the company spent about $1 million in 1995—it chose a slower strategy and promoted its products through print ads, coupons, and other promotions targeted to a more tailored audience. Worthington CEO Dale Twomley voiced his skepticism regarding Gardenburger's aggressive mainstreaming approach in the Columbus Dispatch and said: "It's way too broad of an approach. We're not selling waffles, orange juice or Twinkies. It's much more of a niche market. Our dollars are targeted on consumers who have an interest or are likely to have an interest."

MARKETING STRATEGY

As 1998 began, the management at Gardenburger had little intent of launching a national television campaign. CEO Hubbard planned to allot about $4 million on a print campaign, which was reasonable for a company with sales of $58 million in 1997. Gardenburger's ad agency, however, convinced Hubbard in January 1998 that a television effort would reach the widest audience. It would also give the company the best chance of branding the category and changing the perception of the veggie patty as a health-food item to a mainstream consumer product. Gardenburger also hoped to become a household name, much like Kleenexor Xerox, so it was imperative that Gardenburger get to the starting line before its rivals and that the advertising be memorable. Hubbard explained in Prepared Foods, "The thinking was 'let's just market veggie burgers and market them well enough so we can own the category in the mind of the consumer,' just like Gatorade did when it became the beverage for fluid replacement."

In order to finance the ambitious campaign and the Seinfeld slot, Gardenburger used $15 million of privately placed debt. The budget for the "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, which was Gardenburger's sole advertising effort in 1998, was three times as much as the company's 1997 ad budget. The slogan, "Surprising Great Taste," conveyed Gardenburger's understanding that many consumers believed meatless food products would not taste good, and it also prompted shoppers to give the veggie patty a try through the implication that they would be pleasantly surprised with the taste. The television spots were adapted from the print ads, which featured cartoon characters such as Lucy the Lion Tamer, who ate Gardenburger veggie patties so the lions would not smell meat on her breath. In addition to the Seinfeld finale, the spots were planned to air on major broadcast and cable networks during popular shows, including Ellen, Third Rock from the Sun, ER, Home Improvement, and the Oprah Winfrey Show, for a total of more than 1,500 instances.

All three of the television ads promoted the convenience, healthfulness, and good taste of Gardenburger patties. The second of three ads, "Vern," debuted on the Seinfeld final alongside spots from such advertising giants as Anheuser-Busch Company, Visa USA, and Wendy's International Inc. The spot, enthusiastically narrated by Jackson, featured the animated characters Vern and Edna. The generously proportioned Vern took hula lessons and invited Edna to a luau, hoping to impress her. When he attempted to serve her the traditional luau fare of roast pig, Edna frowned, requesting something "tasty and healthy" instead. Vern then saved the day by serving Gardenburgers, but then he donned a grass skirt and demonstrated his hula skills, leaving Edna to wonder when the other guests would arrive. The narrator asserted, "Discover Gardenburger—all natural, really tasty, end of story, because eating good just got great." Another spot featured Polly, who jumped on a pogo stick to catch a glimpse of the desirable Ned in his second-story apartment. She spied him eating a Gardenburger patty then continued jumping higher and higher, observing a man on an airplane eating a Gardenburger and cosmonauts munching on the veggie patties in a spaceship. Polly then reached heaven, where she saw her grandmother eating one. The narrator explained that "they are healthy and tasty and good!" The third spot, "Paul," gave the story of chef and Gardenburger creator Paul Wenner. Paul invented a patty with no meat, which he nervously tested on looming construction workers and truck drivers. Much to his delight and relief, the workers enjoyed the veggie patties, and Paul became a famous chef, worshipped by cows.

OUTCOME

The "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign was a wild success, and the company's decision to advertise on Seinfeld generated more than 1,000 news reports even before the ads aired, including stories on CNN Headline News and NBC and reports in the Wall Street Journal, USA Today, and the New York Times. One week after the Seinfeld episode, which reached more than 100 million viewers according to NBC, Nielsen scanner data indicated that Gardenburger sales skyrocketed—the company sold more veggie patties in that one-week period than it had in all of 1997, amounting to an increase of 411 percent and a total of $2 million in sales. Gardenburger also became the top-selling brand in the veggie patty segment, its market share jumping up to 50 percent. The company managed to hang onto its leading position even after the Seinfeld hype died down—in early 1999 Nielsen scanner data indicated that Gardenburger's share of the veggie patty category was 55 percent, significantly ahead of second-place Worthington, which had a share of 22 percent. Harvest Burger, acquired by Worthington in September 1998, held a 7 percent share. The overall meatless burger category was boosted by Gardenburger's advertising as well, and retail sales of veggie patties increased 57 percent in 1998.

Not only did Gardenburger's sales and recognition increase, but its ads were well-received by the viewing audience. The NPD Group, a research firm, conducted a survey following the Seinfeld finale and found that the Gardenburger spot demonstrated the second highest recall among the total of 28 commercials that aired during the program. The same poll rated "Vern" as the third favorite of the Seinfeld ads. The campaign won a gold EFFIE Award and a Genesis Award, given to organizations focused on animal issues. Because of the popularity and effectiveness of the "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, Gardenburger launched a second television campaign in April 1999 with a budget of $15 million. The 1999 campaign, developed by Chicago agency Rubin Postaer & Associates, featured the television spots from 1998 and was scheduled to run through the spring and summer in a continued effort to mainstream the veggie patty.

FURTHER READING

Hill, Jim. "Seinfeld Finale Will Serve as Gardenburger's Entree." Portland Oregonian, March 3, 1998, p. A1.

Leeson, Fred. "Gardenburger Eats Up Fame," Portland Oregonian, May 15, 1998, p. B1.

Richards, Bill. "Gardenburger Bets The (Soybean) Farm On the Last 'Seinfeld,'" Wall Street Journal, April 13, 1998.

Rose, Michael. "Rice-caking Gardenburger Marketing Whiz Hubbard is Transforming the Veggie Vendor," The Business Journal-Portland, April 10, 1998, p. 23.

Stapankowsky, Paula L. "Gardenburger Ad Campaign Has Fast Results." Wall Street Journal, May 4, 1999, p. B13.

Mariko Fujinaka

Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company

410 N. Michigan Ave.
Chicago, Illinois 60611
USA
Telephone: (312) 644-2121
Fax: (312) 644-0097
Web site: www.wrigley.com

■■■

ALTOIDS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

A British brand of breath mints dating from the eighteenth century and described as "curiously strong," Altoids was purchased in 1993 by Kraft Foods, Inc. Having discovered that Altoids had a cult following among young Seattle sophisticates in the mid-1990s, Kraft tapped the advertising agency Leo Burnett for a 1995 outdoor and print campaign meant to build brand awareness beyond the Pacific Northwest.

The initially modest campaign targeted hip young adults in select American cities, and it gained momentum thanks to a mix of unconventional outdoor placements, ironic humor, and provocative images and text, all of which worked to promote the idea of Altoids' "curious" strength. The success of the outdoor campaign led Kraft and Leo Burnett to take the campaign to print media that included alternative newsweeklies and, later, national publications closely associated with the target audience. The print and outdoor ads used the same images and copy; the campaign's initial ad, featuring a male bodybuilder and copy reading, "Nice Altoids," established the retro look and knowing humor that would remain the long-running campaign's hallmark attributes.

The Altoids campaign was, from 1995 to 1999, one of the most successful in advertising history. During those years Altoids went from being a little-known niche brand with 2 percent of the breath-mint category to being the best-selling mint in America, independent of any product innovations or corporate intervention beyond the marketing campaign. The campaign won numerous awards and was adapted to the needs of new Altoids products in later years. Altoids' sales began to level off in 2002, and the brand pursued further growth through the introduction of still more product lines. In 2004 the brand was purchased, along with other Kraft-owned brands, by Chicago's Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Altoids Mints dated to eighteenth-century London, where the William Smith Co. first sold the white candies as an "antidote to poisons in the stomach." It is legend that, when George III learned that he had lost the American colonies, he first reached for an Altoid. Although Altoids entered the American market in the 1950s, the brand languished in a gum and mint industry dominated by brands such as Certs, Tic Tac, and Breath Savers. Seattle was the sole exception to this trend. The city that embraced grunge music, dark-roasted coffee, and microbrewed beer also consumed a great many tins of Altoids each year.

After Kraft Foods acquired Callard & Bowser-Suchard, it set out to revamp the marketing efforts of the British company. Although Callard had run radio advertising that featured former Monty Python comic John Cleese spoofing the mints' British heritage, there had been no concerted effort to promote the brand. According to Steffan Postaer, one of the two Leo Burnett creative directors responsible for the Altoids campaign, ''Altoids had always been considered a unique item, but no one had ever put much marketing behind it.'' Kraft believed that, if consumers were made aware of the Altoids brand and its unique qualities, they would try and enjoy the product. Leo Burnett was given the task of constructing a campaign that would fuel demand by elevating consumer awareness.

TARGET MARKET

The offbeat and laconic humor of the campaign was intended to appeal to a sophisticated, largely urban audience. Both Kraft and Leo Burnett were aware of Altoids' success in the Seattle area, and their market research revealed that the city's progressive, hip, and educated residents were the primary consumers of Altoids. ''We knew we were talking to people in the arts; people in show business; executives; people with a college education; people who had made money, people who wanted to make some money, or people who thought making money was crude,'' said Postaer. ''We were looking to reach people who think . . . not just the random middle section of the culture.'' Moreover, age was a factor in the original target market. The campaign specifically sought to captivate those between the ages of 20 and 40.

This demographic group was most likely to prefer the stronger flavors of a more potent mint. Kitty Kevin, a food-industry analyst, explained to Minneapolis-St. Paul City Business that ''the stronger mint flavor is becoming more popular because stronger flavors in food are becoming popular.'' As ethnic foods, with their abundant use of garlic, onion, and spices, became more prevalent, a more powerful breath-freshening mint became more desirable. Moreover, as Americans became more accustomed to new food tastes, they wanted more robust flavors in all things, including mints. ''Americans have an openness toward food now,'' said Susan Smith, a spokesperson for the National Confectioners Association, to Tulsa World. ''They like ethnic food, spicy food, and lots of high flavors.'' Furthermore, for a generation obsessed with its weight, three Altoids tablets had only 10 calories and no fat.

Leo Burnett strove to appeal to its target market by capitalizing on the ''adult'' feel of Altoids. ''We have exploited the adult nature of the product,'' said Postaer. ''Altoids are more expensive than other mints, sold where you buy cigarettes, and they look powerful—more like medicine than candy.'' The explicit humor and the almost stark feel of the ads were purposefully designed to emphasize this aspect of Altoids. Indeed, one ad featured the photo of a leather-clad dominatrix brandishing a Whip alongside copy reading, ''Pleasure in Pain.'' Postaer explained, ''We reached our target through the look and feel of our ads.''

ITS OWN WEBSITE

Kraft Foods dedicated a website to Altoids (www.altoids.com), at which it offered, among other interactive features, free T-shirts to consumers who posted innovative uses for empty Altoids tins. Some of the more creative suggestions included pressing the tin into service as a goldfish coffin, a place to keep a nose ring or guitar picks, or a condom container. As the Altoids campaign matured, one of the website's defining features became an ''Ad Gallery'' devoted to some of the campaign's most memorable ads.

COMPETITION

The breath-freshener category to which Altoids belonged was a $238 million a year industry in 1997. An analyst reported to Gannett News Service that, although the mint market was substantial, its growth for the most part was ''flat and slow.'' Altoids, however, saw its sales soar. Indeed, according to Brandweek, Altoids ''raised the bar for manufacturers . . . in the breath-freshener category.'' In 1996 Altoids saw its sales rise 27 percent to reach $23.2 million for the year, and it became the fourth-best-selling brand of mint in America, behind Breath Savers, Tic Tac, and Certs. The Hartford Courant declared that Altoids were ''eating into the profits generated by bad-breath-beating titans.''

Needless to say, the industry took notice of Altoids' success and of the concept of ''curiously strong mints'' that proved to be so lucrative. A flood of potent, premium-priced mints streamed onto the market, all of which, according to Brandweek, owed a debt to Altoids. Not only did Certs, Tic Tac, and Breath Savers infuse their mints with ''more flavor,'' but also, Warner-Lambert—the brand owner of third-ranked Certs—also introduced Certs Powerful Mints with retsyn in 1997. These more concentrated candies were packaged in a horizontal container reminiscent of the Altoids tin and cost 40 percent more than previous Certs products. Warner-Lambert devoted $10 million to advertising its new product, on top of the $20 million already used to promote other Certs offerings. Similarly, the Minneapolis-based Dayton Hudson Corp. released a new line of its well-known Frango Mints in 1997. The Frango Purely Powerful Peppermints were small white circular tablets like Altoids, and they came in pocket-sized metal tins very similar to the container so closely associated with the Altoids brand. Also in 1997, Velamints began making Intense Velamints, likewise packaged in small metal tins. Chupa Chups U.S.A. launched a new Smints product accompanied by an advertising campaign that flatly pronounced, ''No Smint. No Kiss.'' Starbucks Coffee and the upscale department store Neiman Marcus also came out with stronger mint lines in 1997 and 1998. Overall, sales of power mints climbed 11.5 percent in the first three months of 1998 alone.

Not only did Altoids face new competition from other mint brands, but it was also challenged by chewing-gum manufacturers, who introduced so-called power gums. American Chicle added Dentyne Ice, a stronger-flavored gum, to its product line. The gum was packaged in flat cardboard boxes that resembled a pack of cigarettes more than the standard foil-and-paper chewing gum ensemble. Fleer Confections came out with small, chewable mint squares dubbed Arctic Chews. The marketing manager of the company explained the new item to National Petroleum News: ''We recognized that there was a not a lot of growth in the gum market, but there was a lot of growth in the fresh breath market.''

Both Leo Burnett and Kraft Foods were faced with their competitors' efforts to capitalize on Altoids' achievements. Postaer noted that when Altoids' campaign was initiated in 1995 the British mint did not have anything resembling the sort of competition it faced two years later. ''When we started out, we competed against chewing gum and candy,'' he said. ''No mints advertised themselves as superpowerful. They had always couched their campaigns in terms of breath-freshening capacity or some other benefit. We put an interstate right through that.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

Postaer and Mark Faulkner, the other creative director responsible for the campaign, were simultaneously restricted and liberated by the nominal budget Kraft allotted to the initially modest effort. For the most part the ad agency was unconstrained by corporate strategies or planners. Postaer and Faulkner proposed four possible campaigns: one that played off Altoids' British heritage; another that was ''competitive,'' comparing Altoids to other available mints; a third that was similar to the one ultimately chosen; and, finally, the campaign that was selected, which dramatized the ''curious'' strength of Altoids. Since the phrase ''curiously strong'' had been inscribed on the Altoids box for the better than 200-year history of the mint, Postaer and Faulkner decided to base their campaign on the slogan. ''Those words conveyed the exact balance of quirky charm and ownable essence that the brand represents,'' Postaer said.

Rather than quickly expend the campaign's budget on television spots, Kraft and Leo Burnett opted to spread the message of Altoids' curious strength through an outdoor print campaign. Because both Kraft and Leo Burnett had an accurate sense of Altoids' target market—the hip, educated, and affluent crowd that had already made the mints a success among Seattle's ''alternative'' population—they wanted to reach the same kinds of people in other cities. For this reason they set out to bring their message into the lives of their target market. Instead of targeting at the level of regions, states, or even cities, the advertisements were matched with specific neighborhoods in order to ''reach our very definable target where they lived, worked, and played,'' as Postaer explained.

After the campaign's launch in Chicago in April 1995, Altoids billboards quickly went up in San Francisco and in Portland, Oregon. Particular billboards and walls in key neighborhoods were adorned with the ads. Minneapolis, Los Angeles, and New York were also among the early cities whose hippest neighborhoods were targeted. Kraft bought ad spaces on the sides of buses that traveled specific routes in order to increase the campaign's visibility in theater districts and along streets with trendy cafes and restaurants. When the campaign showed success, the ads were also placed in magazines. Alternative newspapers such as the Reader were chosen, as well as 47 more mainstream publications, including Sports Illustrated, People, Bikini, Spin, Men's Journal, and Rolling Stone. Each of the ads—with the magazine versions simply smaller copies of the billboards—featured the tongue-in-cheek humor of the first ad of the campaign: a photograph of a flexing male bodybuilder was paired with the text ''Nice Altoids.'' Each subsequent ad also used the notion of ''curious strength'' as its jumping-off point. Early taglines included ''Luckily Not Available in Extra Strength,'' ''Are You a Mint or a Mouse?'' ''Go Medieval on Your Mouth,'' ''Mints with a Kung Fu Grip,'' and ''Mints So Strong They Come in a Metal Box.'' The campaign focused on print ads in national magazines in subsequent years, although unconventional outdoor placements remained part of the Leo Burnett arsenal even after the brand had become almost universally known. A 1999 effort, for instance, featured a poster affixed to the roof of a building near Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. The ad, visible only to airborne passengers, included the Altoids brand name as well as a message that perhaps implicitly addressed the mint's meteoric rise to the top of its category: ''Look Out Below.''

The campaign's controlling theme of ''curious strength'' was given a twist in ads touting a new Altoids flavor, Wintergreen, which was introduced in 1997. One ad, for instance, showed a young boy in a winter coat and hat, with his tongue stuck to an Altoids Wintergreen tin; others featured copy such as "Uncommon Cold," "Nuclear Wintergreen," and "Baby, That's Cold!" The fact that Altoids now boasted two flavors provided the concept for another memorable ad tailored to the brand's progressive target group: an image of the two tins was paired with copy reading "Bi-Curious?" 1999 saw Altoids' introduction of a Cinnamon flavor, and the ongoing print campaign was again modified, this time to pitch the new product's heat-generating properties. The Cinnamon launch also included a Web film element, Altoids' first flirtation with that medium. Later brand extensions—including a sour hard-candy line, a breath-strips line, a line of miniature-sized Altoids, and a gum line, in addition to Spearmint, Ginger, and Liquorice flavors of the original mint tablet—typically used the classic Altoids print format at least occasionally, though the Altoids Sours line in particular diverged from this model after its 2002 introduction. Even so, those Altoids Sours efforts that deviated from the archetypal print campaign's tactics—"Altoids Gone Sour" and "Altoidia"—continued to employ a markedly similar brand of humor while also remaining true to the "curiously strong" brand positioning first outlined by Leo Burnett in 1995.

OUTCOME

Kraft and Leo Burnett watched with glee as their campaign gained momentum. Not only did the witty print ads gain Altoids adherents among the campaign's selected target market, but the mints also became the epitome of chic for the culture at large. Rosie O'Donnell, the television talk show diva of the 1990s, conspicuously chewed Altoids during her program. Comedian Joan Rivers and actress Mariel Hemingway also lauded the mints to the Greensboro News and Record. Gannett News Service interviewed a businesswoman who succinctly described Altoids' crossover into the wider public: "It's a lot cooler than carrying around a roll of Mentos." Leo Burnett's campaign was credited with achieving its goal of driving up sales by making the product better known. At the time of the launch of the Altoids campaign in 1995, the mint's U.S. market share stood at 2 percent. By the end of 1999 the brand's market share was approaching 50 percent, and Altoids had outsold Tic Tac to become America's most popular mint.

Leo Burnett and Altoids became darlings on the ad-industry awards circuit as well. In 1996 the agency took home the Best of Show trophy at the Outdoor Advertisers Association of America's Obie Awards. The campaign was also recognized by the Chicago ADDY Awards as Best of Show. Most prestigious, however, was the honor of winning the Magazine Publishers of America's Kelly Award for the best magazine advertising campaign of 1997. Postaer gave credit to Altoids. "It was incumbent upon us to do superior advertising for this product because the product deserved it."

The intense competition created by the numerous Altoids copycat brands in the late 1990s, however, eventually took its toll. By 2002 sales had begun to plateau, and the brand pinned its hopes for future growth largely on new products such as the Altoids Sours line. In subsequent years Altoids Sours advertising eclipsed the ongoing, now-classic print campaign. In 2004, as part of a streamlining of its operations, Kraft sold the Altoids brand, along with LifeSavers and other confectionery units, to the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron, and Mike Beirne. "Altoids Seeks to Stay Fresh." Adweek (midwest ed.), December 9, 2002.

Berman, Laura. "Candy Is on a Power Trip, with Breathtaking Results." Gannett News Service, February 24, 1997.

Bundy, Beverly. "Americans Showing an Intense Taste for Growing Variety of Power Mints." Tulsa World, April 26, 1998.

Clapp, Kevin. "Altoids' Kick Extends beyond Your Breath." Hartford (CT) Courant, July 24, 1997.

Dean, Paul. "Altoids Peppermints: A Breath of Fresh Air." Greensboro (NC) News & Record, February 26, 1997.

De Stephen, Nicole. "High Intensity." National Petroleum News, September 1, 1997.

Jensen, Trevor. "Burnett's Altoids Work Extends Awards Streak at Chicago Addys." Adweek, May 25, 1998.

Mehegan, Sean. "Van Melle to Make Big-Buck Push into Altoids' Power Mint Turf." Brandweek, June 16, 1997.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Printed Matter." Brandweek, March 8, 1999.

Richard, Diane. "Dayton Introduces Curiously New Mint." Minneapolis-St. Paul City Business, August 1, 1997.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Brands in Trouble—in Demand." Advertising Age, December 13, 1999.

Rebecca Stanfel
Mark Lane

ALTOIDS GONE SOUR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the writing of this essay, William Wrigley Jr. Co. bought the Altoids brand from Kraft. The essay continues to refer to Kraft, as they were the initiators of the campaign when it was first launched.

Altoids peppermints were not advertised in the United States until 1993, when Kraft Foods bought the product's manufacturer and launched a campaign meant to build on Altoids' popularity among upscale, hip Seattle residents. The ad agency Leo Burnett USA's Chicago office helmed the niche-marketing, print, and outdoor campaign, which targeted in-crowd urbanites in other major cities by using offbeat, ironic humor. The campaign touched off explosive brand growth and led Altoids to the top of the breath-mint heap, but by 2002 increased competition had begun to erode Altoids' sales. In an attempt to build the brand in a new category, Kraft introduced a hard fruit candy called Altoids Sours and again pinned its brand-building hopes on Leo Burnett.

"Altoids Gone Sour" was a combined print, outdoor, television, and online push meant to convey the idea "Your Altoids are changing." In keeping with the Altoids heritage of ironic, in-crowd appeals, the campaign used the awkwardness of adolescence as a metaphor for the idea of changing Altoids. The TV spots, Altoids' first-ever venture in the medium, ran during the summer of 2002 and mimicked old-style educational videos, while the print and outdoor ads were reproductions of 1970s yearbook photos. Together these advertisements drove traffic to an Altoids Sours website (www.gonesour.com), the layout of which resembled a school yearbook. There consumers could find out more about the change Altoids was undergoing and watch longer versions of the TV commercials.

Leo Burnett claimed that the campaign had to be discontinued because Altoids Sours sold out after the summer 2002 launch. The print portion of the campaign won numerous top honors on the 2003 ad-industry awards circuit. Altoids Sours effectively created a new candy market—hard sours for adults—and subsequent Sours advertising remained true to the Altoids heritage. In 2004 the Altoids brand was purchased by the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

First manufactured in the United Kingdom in the 18th century, Altoids peppermints were originally marketed as a cure for intestinal discomfort. They came to America via Seattle, and for most of the twentieth century their distribution network did not reach beyond the Pacific Northwest. By the late 1980s Altoids had, thanks to its slogan "curious strength" and distinctive tin-box packaging, attracted a cult-like, word-of-mouth following among the denizens of Seattle's upscale coffee shops and nightclubs, despite the fact that British confectioners Callard and Bowser-Suchard, the makers of Altoids, did virtually no U.S. advertising behind the brand. In 1993 Callard and Bowser-Suchard was bought by Kraft Foods, and Kraft hired Leo Burnett to produce a small-scale campaign that would leverage Altoids' chic image and devoted word-of-mouth following. The campaign broke in 1995.

Kraft and Leo Burnett initially ruled out any attempt to create mainstream national awareness of the Altoids brand. Instead, they focused strictly on major American cities, such as Minneapolis, New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles, and within those cities they pinpointed neighborhoods frequented by successful, savvy young adults. Altoids posters, touting the mints' "curiously strong" flavor, were placed in bus shelters, subways, and alternative weeklies, and used ironic humor, a retro look, and offbeat, sometimes provocative imagery to appeal to their in-crowd target. For instance, a bodybuilder squeezing an Altoids tin was paired with the copy, "Nice Altoids." A dominatrix was featured in one poster along with the phrase "Pleasure in Pain." The copy that ran with some ads, "Mints so strong they come in a metal box," was adapted to fit the exterior of a Chicago El train and also ran on the backs of fare cards: "Mints for people who ride in a metal box." Other unique ad placements included a tugboat that circumnavigated New York harbor and rickshaws that traversed targeted Manhattan neighborhoods. Later ads were placed in magazines with national circulations.

The Altoids print and outdoor launch campaign was one of the most successful of its time. It won numerous ad-industry awards and triggered a period of extreme growth for the Altoids brand. Between 1995 and 1999 Altoids went from a 2 percent market share in the breath-freshener market to the category leader, besting longtime top mint Tic Tac on the way to transforming the category. Extra-strength imitators flooded the market, and Altoids itself introduced new flavors Wintergreen and Cinnamon. By 2002, however, sales had begun to slump, partly as a result of the newly saturated market. That year Kraft introduced several additional Altoids product lines, including a hard candy in sour fruit flavors meant to grow the brand in a new direction.

TARGET MARKET

The "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, like the Altoids advertising that preceded it, targeted trendsetting urbanites. Kraft and Leo Burnett expected the brand's heritage of "curious strength" and hipness to resonate with members of this group, whether or not those individuals were already Altoids consumers. Altoids maintained a strong hold on young adults, but the "Altoids Gone Sour" spots appealed more to a mindset than a particular age or income group. The campaign was overtly geared toward media-savvy individuals with a postmodern sense of irony, people who placed a premium on being "in the know."

THE FLAVORS

Altoids built its brand on a single, centuries-old, extra-strength peppermint flavor, but with increasing competition after its hugely successful late-1990s marketing campaign, the brand began diversifying into other ''curiously strong'' flavors as a way of building and maintaining market share. The Altoids mints line was enlarged to include wintergreen, cinnamon, and spearmint; the Altoids Sours line expanded beyond its initial offering of citrus and tangerine to include apple and raspberry; a line of Altoids breath strips was launched and then discontinued; and Altoids branched out into gum, with peppermint and cinnamon flavors as well as Sours gum in apple and cherry flavors. A tiny version of the original Altoids mints was launched, complete with its own tiny tin, and a Specialty line, featuring ginger and licorice flavors, rounded out the Altoids family of products.

The print and outdoor portions of the campaign featured humorously awkward, 1970s-style high-school yearbook photos, using the changes experienced during adolescence to introduce the idea ''Your Altoids are changing.'' For the first time Altoids ran television commercials, airing parodies of old-style educational films that supported the adolescent theme. While the move to TV risked making the brand seem more mainstream, the spots appeared only on cable stations, and the increasingly specialized cable-TV marketplace allowed Kraft and Leo Burnett to select specific audiences with a degree of precision comparable to its established model of highly targeted print and outdoor placements. Print, outdoor, and TV advertisements all directed consumers to an Altoids Sours website, where longer versions of the TV spots were integrated, along with the print and outdoor imagery, into a school-yearbook format.

COMPETITION

One measure of Altoids' success in the late 1990s was the number of competitors who attempted to copy the brand's extra-strength product and distinctive packaging. Life Savers unveiled its Ice Breakers line, and Certs (previously number two in the category) launched Powerful Mints. Department store Neiman Marcus, discount store Target, and coffee-retailing giant Starbucks, among many others, each introduced extra-strength mints packaged in tin boxes. The proliferation of such super-mint copycats and the resultant erosion of Altoids sales was one of the reasons the brand began turning to new product lines such as Altoids Sours.

Former category leader Tic Tac, owned by Ferrero S.p.A., was virtually alone in the breath-freshener category in remaining true to its original product during the super-mint onslaught of the late 1990s. ''We had the same Tic Tac strategy in 1980 as there is today,'' Ferrero's U.S. director of marketing told Candy Industry in 2002. Tic Tacs, like Altoids, boasted their own distinctive product and packaging, small colored pellets that rattled when shaken in their trademark plastic dispenser, and though Ferrero lost market share as well as its industry-leading position to Altoids in the late 1990s, the Tic Tac formula continued to prove successful. As the breath-mint category showed signs of waning in 2002 and Altoids turned to fruity flavors, Tic Tac likewise began to emphasize fruit. Having noticed more sales consistency from its orange flavor during the mint downturn, Ferrero accordingly made its seasonal lime flavor a permanent part of the Tic Tac stable.

Meanwhile, Vitech America, Inc., was one of the only confections manufacturers to have a preexisting product positioned to compete with Altoids Sours. Vitech's Squyntz! were, like Altoids Sours, one of the few fruit candies targeting adults. Vitech, which also boasted an Altoids competitor called Myntz!, began developing a marketing push in 2002 to position its candies, in the Altoids manner, as fashion accessories for discerning consumers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Altoids Sours applied the principle of extra-strength flavor to a sour fruit candy for adults. At the time the hard-candy market was primarily focused on children, so Kraft and Leo Burnett saw themselves as creating a new product category, as they had done with the original Altoids campaign in the 1990s. The Altoids strategy of using irony and a retro look to speak to knowing, cutting-edge hipsters remained in place, but the ''Altoids Sours'' campaign had its own distinctive look and trajectory. As Altoids' senior brand manager Andrew Burke told Advertising Age, ''[Moving into hard candy] is a big change, and we thought, 'How do we take the next step?' ''

That next step included, significantly, television advertising. The Altoids brand had been built on its cutting-edge, alternative image, so television represented a calculated risk. As Leo Burnett's Steffan Postaer said, ''The biggest reason not to [use TV] was the fear of going mainstream.'' A changing cable marketplace, however, meant that the Sours commercials could be programmed to reach Altoids' core audience of culturally aware, trend-setting types.

Airing during the summer of 2002 on cable networks that included MTV, VH1, E! Entertainment, and Bravo, the Sours TV spots were 15-second versions of 60-second Web films. The TV commercials were meant to spark interest in the new product and drive traffic to an Altoids Sours website (www.gonesour.com), whose layout mimicked a school yearbook and where, among other features, the full films were available for viewing. Parodying educational videos aimed at schoolchildren of an earlier era, the Web films reproduced the grainy look of old film reels and their accompanying cautionary voice-over, while weaving Altoids Sours into their storylines. In "Making Friends with Fruit," for instance, a boy in early adolescence was shown arriving at a pool party with actual citrus fruit in a metal lunchbox. When another boy attracted the attention of numerous girls with his circular tin of Altoids Sours, the voice-over proclaimed the film's message: "When making friends, not just any fruit in a metal box will do." Another Web film, "Healthy Curiosity," featured a boy performing science experiments in a school laboratory. During the course of an experiment designed to determine "what makes sour things sour," the boy fed an Altoids Sour to the class's pet guinea pig. The guinea pig exploded, providing "scientific evidence of curiously strong citrus sour flavor."

The print and outdoor portions of the "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, which communicated the idea "Your Altoids are changing," without providing any full explanation of that change, likewise drove traffic to the campaign's website. In keeping with the TV spots and the website format, the print ads and outdoor posters were reproductions of 1970s yearbook photos featuring humorously awkward adolescents. A teenage girl was shown above copy that read, "Soon your Altoids will blossom." The other three school portraits were of boys. One photograph ran with copy advising, "Don't be afraid to explore your Altoids"; another declared, "It's normal for your Altoids to change"; and a third informed consumers, "My Altoids are changing, and I'm OK with that." Each of the print spots included the www.gonesour.com website address.

OUTCOME

Within the first four weeks of the product launch, the "Altoids Gone Sour" push resulted in more than 500,000 visits to the brand's interactive website. Sales of Altoids Sours exceeded expectations. According to Leo Burnett, the campaign was so successful that it had to be discontinued: Altoids Sours sold out after the launch. The print component of the campaign was a star on the 2003 advertising-awards circuit, winning a Clio, an Andy, and a Gold EFFIE.

Subsequent Altoids Sours advertising remained true to the brand's trademark ironic humor and retro imagery and helped the Altoids brand stake out another new category in the candy industry. A print and outdoor campaign similar to classic Altoids posters used copy such as "Fruity Yet Strong" and "One Bad Motherpucker" in 2003. In 2004 the Altoids brand was purchased, along with LifeSavers and other Kraft confectionery divisions, by the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company. Altoids' second-ever TV campaign followed. Also featuring print and online components, the TV spots starred a fictional British anthropologist and explorer, Sir Gerald Pines, who reported, in mock-documentary format, on the Altoidians, an aboriginal tribe whose "constant exposure to curiously strong sour has rendered them immune to pain." The Sir Pines spots helped Leo Burnett and new Altoids owners Wrigley to win a 2005 Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Altoids Seeks to Stay Fresh." Adweek, December 9, 2002.

———. "Mint Condition." Brandweek, March 25, 2002.

Cox, Beth. "A Curiously Quirky Ad Campaign." ClickZ, August 16, 2002.

Embry, Liz. "Altoids: 'Curiously Strong' … And Now Sour, Too." Houston Chronicle, September 22, 2004.

Kanner, Bernice. "Altoids Comes on Strong with Launch of New Flavor." Denver Rocky Mountain News, September 22, 1997.

Sectzer, Jessie Ray. "Shakeout Leaves Classic, Creative Mints on Top." Candy Industry, January 2002.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Altoids Takes to TV with Spots for Sours." Advertising Age, July 15, 2002.

———. "Curiously Strong Altoids Moves Up Closer to No. 1." Advertising Age, December 13, 1999.

Wechsler, Pat. "A Curiously Strong Campaign." BusinessWeek, April 21, 1997.

"Wrigley to Buy Altoids and Life Savers from Kraft." Candy Industry, November 2004.

Mark Lane

GOTTA HAVE TWISTED SWEET CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Soon after its introduction in 1893, the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company's Juicy Fruit chewing gum became the best-selling gum in the United States. Although Juicy Fruit was still number one in the early 2000s, with a 31 percent market share worldwide, the brand was losing ground to other gum brands, including Cadbury Schweppes' Trident, Dentyne, and Chiclets brands, which together claimed a 26 percent share of the worldwide chewing-gum market.

To reconnect with its key consumers—kids ages 12 to 17—in 2002 Wrigley launched an effort to reposition its Juicy Fruit brand. The company updated the product's packaging, and its longtime agency, BBDO Chicago, created edgy new television spots as part of its ongoing "Gotta Have Sweet" campaign. In 2003 Wrigley introduced two new Juicy Fruit flavors, Grapermelon and Strappleberry, each of which twisted together two different fruits. To support the new products' launch, BBDO revamped the "Gotta Have Sweet" campaign as "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" and created new television spots, print ads, and a print-to-Web effort, which used print ads to direct consumers to a Juicy Fruit website.

The "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign had mixed results. Two television spots, "Piñata" and "No Dummy," were named Best Spots by Adweek in 2003 and 2004, respectively. Also in 2004, at the Chicago Creative Club's annual award ceremony, the Juicy Fruit television spot "Officeflage" earned both the People's Choice award, which was voted on by the public, and the Best of Show award, which was determined by a panel of judges. In 2005, however, the campaign's print-to-Web segment was cited by the Children's Advertising Review Unit for being potentially misleading to the young consumers it targeted. Following the ruling Wrigley ended the print-to-Web advertising, but the television spots and other print ads were continued in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company got its start in 1891 selling soap, a product that William Wrigley, Jr.'s father manufactured. To boost sales the younger Wrigley offered customers free premiums, including baking powder, with each purchase. Realizing that baking powder was more popular with customers than the soap, Wrigley began selling baking powder and offering packages of chewing gum as the free premium. The gum was an even bigger hit with customers, and in 1892 Wrigley began to sell chewing gum under his own name. Wrigley's first gum brands were Lotta and Vassar. Juicy Fruit was introduced in 1893 and quickly became the number one gum brand in the United States. Its flavor, though fruity, was never associated with any particular fruit.

During World War II Wrigley stopped selling Juicy Fruit and its other gum brands to American consumers, dedicating the entire available product to the country's military troops. To ensure that consumers did not forget the brand while it was unavailable, Wrigley launched an unusual marketing campaign in 1944 that consisted of print ads with a picture of the gum wrapper and the tagline "Remember this wrapper!" When the brand was reintroduced to American consumers in 1946, its ads had the tagline "For a refreshing change enjoy this completely different flavour."

One of Juicy Fruit's most notable taglines, "Taste is gonna move you," was introduced in 1983. By 1998 the slogan had lost its appeal with consumers, especially teens, Juicy Fruit's key market. Confronted with dropping sales, the company and its ad agency, BBDO Chicago, conducted extensive research among kids who chewed Juicy Fruit gum to learn what they liked about the product. The answer was that they chewed the gum because it was sweet. Based on the research the "Gotta Have Sweet" campaign was released in August 1998.

When William Wrigley, Jr., great-grandson of the company's founder, took over as chief executive officer in 1999 following the death of his father, the 35-year-old became the fourth generation of the family to head up Wrigley. In 2001 he revamped the company's marketing department and began looking past BBDO Chicago, which had worked with Wrigley for more than 70 years, for new ideas for marketing Wrigley products. BBDO heeded the warning and updated the agency's campaign efforts for Wrigley's gum brands. In addition, Juicy Fruit's packaging was redesigned for the first time since the 1980s, and to promote its two new flavors, in 2003 the "Gotta Have Sweet" campaign was modified as "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet."

TARGET MARKET

Besides being the number one fruit-flavored brand of gum in the United States among all consumers, Juicy Fruit also was the best-selling gum among kids 12 to 17 years old. Juicy Fruit had always been considered a bridge between kid-favored bubble gum and more adult gum choices such as Wrigley's Spearmint, and the two new flavors added to the Juicy Fruit family—Grapermelon and Strappleberry—were designed specifically for teens moving beyond bubble gum. Consumers in the company's target audience were described by the Chicago Sun-Times as "Skippies," schoolkids with income and purchasing power. According to Teenage Research Unlimited, a Chicago-based company that tracked trends among youths, Skippies spent $170 billion on products for themselves or their families in 2002, up from $155 billion in 2000. Reaching this key demographic was the goal of Wrigley's edgy new campaign, "Gotta Have Twisted Fruit." As the popularity of the new flavors became evident, Wrigley shifted its focus to even younger consumers, targeting children 8 to 11 years old.

COMPETITION

Cadbury Schweppes, based in London, England, was best known as the number three producer of soft drinks,

JUICY FRUIT FASHION FOR BRITISH FANS

Beginning in 2002 girls and young women in England could do more than chew Juicy Fruit gum. They could also head to a nearby Top Shop or Debenhams department store to buy Juicy Fruit–branded clothes. The new line, available only in select U.K. stores, included four styles of tops, hats, belts, and bags. According to a Wrigley spokeswoman, the new apparel targeted girls and women ages 11 to 24 years old.

behind the Coca-Cola Company and PepsiCo. Its beverage brands included 7 Up, A&W Root Beer, Dr Pepper, and Hawaiian Punch. In 2003 Cadbury completed a $4.2 billion deal with New York–based Pfizer, Inc., and purchased the pharmaceutical giant's Adams candy division. Included in the purchase were the Adams gum brands Trident, Dentyne, and Bubbas. Adding the Adams gum brands to its product offerings pushed Cadbury into the number two spot in the chewing-gum market, with a 26 percent worldwide share (behind Wrigley, which had a 31 percent share). Cadbury also claimed one-third of the sugarless-gum market in the United States. In 2004 Cadbury announced plans to expand its Trident brand to include fruit flavors; these would directly compete with Wrigley's fruit-flavored Juicy Fruit.

For more than 50 years the Topps Company of New York had given bubble-gum lovers and collectors of sports memorabilia a combination of their two favorite things: packs of Bazooka bubble gum and sports trading cards. Since its introduction in the 1940s Topps had used a variety of marketing techniques to increase its Bazooka brand's appeal to kids, including introducing Bazooka Joe comics in 1953 and adding new flavors, such as grape, strawberry, and a sugarless variety, to the original gum. The company also increased the variety of sports trading cards that were packaged with the gum; from the original cards, introduced in 1951, that featured pictures of baseball stars, the offerings were expanded to include popular hockey players beginning in 1954, football players in 1955, and basketball players in 1957. In 1967 Topps introduced Wacky Packages trading cards, which were sold with Bazooka bubble gum. The cards spoofed everything from Jell-O (tagged Jail-O and called the favorite dessert of Sing Sing inmates) to Minute Rice (Minute Lice) and were a hit with junior high school students. The 1985 introduction of Garbage Pail Kids trading cards, a parody of Cabbage Patch Kids dolls, helped fuel sales of Bazooka bubble gum despite complaints from parents that the gross-out humor of the cards was in poor taste. The Wacky Packages were discontinued in 1976, and the Garbage Pail Kids were canceled in 1988, but Topps reintroduced the trading cards to a new audience of young consumers in 2003 (Garbage Pail Kids) and 2004 (Wacky Packs).

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2003 Wrigley added to its 100-year-old brand Juicy Fruit two new flavors, Grapermelon and Strappleberry, that each combined, or twisted together, two fruit flavors. The company turned to its longtime agency, BBDO Chicago, for an advertising campaign that would support the 2003 launch of the product. The new campaign, themed "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet," was a variation on the brand's "Gotta Have Sweet" campaign, which had begun in 1998. Staying with the original campaign's humorous theme, the new one put a unique edge on seemingly ordinary situations to promote the new gum flavors. Included were television spots that targeted teens and 20-somethings, print ads aimed at middle school kids, and a print-to-Web effort that was developed for kids as young as eight years old.

The initial television spot, "Piñata," aired in October 2003 and depicted a children's birthday party. The center of attention, however, was not the birthday girl but a donkey-shaped piñata full of goodies and suspended from the ceiling. The celebrants took turns whacking the piñata in an effort to break it and get the treats inside. When it was finally broken, it dropped from the ceiling and began chasing one of the children who had grabbed the package of Grapermelon Juicy Fruit. After retrieving the prized gum from the terrified child, the piñata made its escape through a dog door. Another spot, "Officeflage," featured office workers camouflaging themselves as office furniture and equipment in order to grab a pack of the new Juicy Fruit gum from their unsuspecting coworkers. The first worker bought a pack of Strappleberry from an office vending machine. As he walked down the hall preparing to pop a piece of the gum into his mouth, a coworker disguised as a file cabinet swiped the pack of gum, shook off the disguise, and ran down the hall. As the second coworker stopped to retrieve a piece of gum, a third person, who had been lurking on a windowsill disguised as miniblinds, jumped from the window, snatched the gum, and ran into the office lunchroom. As he sat on the floor opening the treasured pack of gum, he noticed another coworker disguised as a water cooler poised to grab the Juicy Fruit.

The campaign continued in 2004 with a third television spot. As with "Piñata," the new spot involved an inanimate object coming to life. In "No Dummy" a class of high school students were shown beside a swimming pool learning CPR. As a teenage boy was practicing mouth-to-mouth resuscitation on a dummy, it came to life and stole the Juicy Fruit gum from his mouth. With the gum in its own mouth, the dummy made its escape, losing an arm and a leg in the process. When the dummy crashed its getaway vehicle—a bicycle—into a car and was knocked unconscious, the boy caught up, retrieved his gum, and continued performing CPR on the dummy. The television spots aired on national network and cable channels, such as MTV, that ran programming that appealed to teens.

Print-to-Web ads, which appeared in Disney Adventures magazine and targeted younger kids, also adopted a unique approach. Described as "mock ads" by the Promotions Marketing Industry, the two separate ads listed websites that appeared to promote a new boy band (www.luvboiseboys.com) and a movie (www.lambzilla.-com) by directing readers to the Internet sites. When readers visited either website, however, rather than images of the band or scenes from the movie, they reached a Juicy Fruit webpage that played the "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" television spot "No Dummy." Other print ads, aimed at preteens and tagged "Gotta Have Twisted Comics," ran in Nickelodeon magazine. The ads, which employed a comic-strip format, followed the ongoing adventures of students at the fictitious Dewey Needit Junior High School and eventually answered the question, "Who gets the Juicy Fruit in the end?"

OUTCOME

The "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign's television spots were included in Adweek 's Best Spots list in both 2003 and 2004; the "Piñata" spot was recognized in 2003, and the "No Dummy" spot was recognized the following year. Also in 2004, the Chicago Creative Club, an organization of Chicago-based advertising and design leaders that each year recognized the high standards of the Chicago creative community, presented its annual People's Choice honors to the "Officeflage" spot. "Officeflage" was named the Best of Show in the TV Commercial category as well.

Although the "Twisted Sweet" television spots were well received, the print ads that appeared in Disney Adventures magazine were criticized by the Children's Advertising Review Unit (CARU), a division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus and the self-regulatory forum of the children's-advertising industry. CARU cited that portion of the campaign for using mock ads that supposedly led children to websites for either a new band or a new movie but that actually directed Internet users to a Juicy Fruit ad. According to a report in Advertising Age, CARU stated that the overall print-to-Web campaign was "potentially misleading" and misinformed youngsters about the source of the ads. Further, CARU noted that, while older children might understand the humor of the commercial featuring a CPR dummy that came to life, stole a boy's gum, and was ultimately chased down by the boy, the commercial "could be too disturbing for younger children." Wrigley agreed to pull the online commercial. The websites were also discontinued.

FURTHER READING

Alpert, Lukas I. "Garbage Pail Kids Stickers Set to Return." Salt Lake City Deseret News, July 12, 2003.

———. "'Wacky Packages' to Return." Chicago Sun-Times, March 10, 2004.

Armitage, Jim. "Cadbury Outstrips Rivals after Adams Gum Buy." Evening Standard (London), February 23, 2005.

Boorstin, Julia. "Why Is Wrigley So Wrapped Up? Because It's in the Company's DNA." Fortune, March 3, 2003.

"Chewing-Gum Ads Sport New Flavor. Candy Makers' Sales Climb as Conservative Pitches Get Stuck under the Desk." Wall Street Journal, December 31, 2004.

"Confectioner and Beverage Maker Cadbury Schweppes PLC Said It Plans to Sell Its European Beverages Business as It Focuses on More Profitable Lines, Including Operations in the United States." Food & Drink Weekly, September 12, 2005.

"'Double Your Pleasure' Duds and Accessories." Candy Industry, June 1, 2002.

"Genius Products Secures Rights to Bazooka Brand for New Line of All-Family DVDs Hosted by Bazooka Joe." Business Wire, December 24, 2004.

Guy, Sandra. "Wrigley Eyes New Products to Fend Off Revived Rival." Chicago Sun-Times, March 12, 2003.

Irvine, Martha. "To Freshen Old Brands, Firms Ask 'Skippies.'" Chicago Sun-Times, July 4, 2003.

Lazare, Lewis. "Wrigley Ad Is the People's Choice." Chicago Sun-Times, September 30, 2004.

Platt, Gordon. "The Americas: Cadbury Schweppes Buys Pfizer Unit." Global Finance, February 2003.

Podmolik, Mary Ellen. "Juicy Fruit; Jennifer Crotty." Advertising Age, June 26, 2000.

Teinowitz, Ira. "Food Advertising Pushed into Harsh Spotlight." Advertising Age, March 15, 2005.

"Wrigley Extends Juicy Fruit to Pellet Gum." Professional Candy Buyer, May 1, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

NO MATTER WHAT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001, supported by a campaign titled "No Matter What," the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company introduced its Orbit gum, long available in Europe, to the United States. Orbit was different from such Wrigley brands as Doublemint and Juicy Fruit in that it was sugar-free, and the introduction of Orbit in the United States occurred at a time of increasing emphasis on dental health. Wrigley, however, was not the first U.S. company to offer sugar-free gum, for competitor Trident had been sugar-free since the 1960s. In fact, Orbit was not the first sugarless Wrigley product available in the United States; the company's Extra had been introduced in 1984 and Eclipse in 1999. Still, Wrigley wanted another alternative in its sugar-free lineup, especially since U.S. sales of chewing gum had been lagging for a decade. The timing turned out to be perfect, for in 2002 Wrigley's top two U.S. competitors—Trident and Dentyne—were purchased by Cadbury Schweppes. Thus, the competition in the chewing gum market intensified, and Wrigley, with a wider selection, was in a better position to compete.

The "No Matter What" campaign, led by the Chicago advertising agency Energy BBDO, sought to target a market of working people and their families between the ages of 18 and 49. The ads featured the actress Vanessa Branch, usually referred to simply as Vanessa, as a vivacious researcher at the so-called Orbit Institute, showing how the gum could help people feel neater and more "put together." They were also used as a way to introduce new flavors of Orbit gum. Television spots, which accounted for most of the total costs of the campaign, were aimed at showing how Orbit could leave a mouth clean "no matter what." In a variety of humorous scenarios the New York Times pegged as "seemingly inspired by Austin Powers movies," including one in which a tourist was nearly eaten by an enormous Venus flytrap, Vanessa was able to keep any mouth clean she happened to stumble across. The television spots were supported by other marketing efforts, including print ads and point-of-relevance posters that appeared in such places as taxicabs.

The "No Matter What" campaign was a success on several levels. First, studies measuring both advertising awareness and brand linkage among viewers of the television spots showed that the campaign had indeed reached its intended audience. The campaign won advertising honors, including a prestigious EFFIE Award, for its achievements. In addition, financial results seemed to confirm the success of the campaign. In 2004, just three years after Orbit had been introduced, the gross sales of all Orbit products in the United States exceeded $90 million, and the gum was outselling second-place Trident. Further, Orbit was accounting for one-third of Wrigley's profits.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

William Wrigley, Jr., founded the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company in Chicago in 1891. At first he sold soap, but he soon replaced soap with baking soda. In a move that demonstrated his flair for marketing, Wrigley offered customers a bonus with every purchase of Wrigley's Baking Powder: two packages of chewing gum. By 1892 Wrigley had begun selling packs of chewing gum independently, marketing the product under his own name. The first two brands were Vassar and Lotta, followed in 1893 by Juicy Fruit and Wrigley's Spearmint.

Wrigley was a true salesman, believing in his products and enthusiastically spreading the word about them. As he put it, to be successful a businessman had to "make a good product at a fair price—then tell the world." But Wrigley did not simply send salesmen onto the streets to sell his products directly, which at the time was the common marketing strategy. Instead, he became one of the first entrepreneurs to use large-scale advertising to promote sales. In the early 1900s Wrigley began to advertise his chewing gum in newspapers and magazines, as well as on outdoor posters. The ads promoted the gum's ability to provide relief for indigestion and stress. They were intended to reach the general population of consumers, who would then request that their local stores carry Wrigley chewing gum. Wrigley understood that retail stores could reach far more potential customers than could a sales force. Although it was not widely used at the time, this marketing strategy was simple.

In the 1930s Wrigley introduced the "Doublemint Twins" campaign, which became one of the most successful advertising efforts ever developed in the United States. Playing on the "Doublemint" name, the campaign portrayed the double-image concept in various ways. The earliest ads in the campaign were radio spots that featured, among others, two piano players, two comedians, and two violinists. Billboard ads featured air-brushed images of innocent-looking twins chewing the gum. From 1959 through 1963 Jayne and Joan Boyd appeared as the Doublemint twins. Projecting a tone of innocence, they appeared in a series of 12 commercials in which they portrayed the fun of being double as they sang the jingle "Double your pleasure, double your fun with Doublemint gum." The jingle, as well as the twins concept, was used through the 1980s. The company then tried a series of new campaigns, although all remained true to the theme of innocence. These later campaigns included "Small-Town America" in the 1980s and "Healthy Gums" in the 1990s. In 2005 the company reintroduced the "Doublemint Twins" campaign. Meanwhile, however, the company had launched the "No Matter What" campaign to promote the Orbit brand. With sugar-free Orbit, which had long been popular in Europe, the company hoped to gain a new wave of customers in the United States.

TARGET MARKET

Wrigley's sugar-free Orbit was introduced in the United States in 2001 as an aid to dental health. Its first national advertising campaign claimed that ''regular chewing helps knock tooth decay into orbit.'' The tagline reinforced the point by maintaining that the gum would convey a ''just brushed clean feeling.'' Orbit White, which contained sodium bicarbonate, a tooth-whitening agent, was introduced in January 2002. This newest product followed a three-year trend that had made whitening products the fastest-growing group in oral care.

The ''No Matter What'' campaign targeted people between the ages of 18 and 49, who accounted for more than half of all gum purchases in the United States. Research indicated that, of potential consumers, those most likely to use the product were people who lived busy lives involving work and a family. These were the people for whom the feeling of a clean mouth was most important. Research also showed that this customer base wanted a variety of gum flavors, not simply mint. Thus, by 2005 a total of seven flavors of Orbit were available in the United States, all of them promoted through the ''No Matter What'' campaign.

THE WAR ON GUM

In 2004, when the William Wrigley Jr. Company won licenses to sell Orbit in Singapore, that country lifted a 12-year ban on the sale and use of chewing gum. The ban had been imposed after someone stuck a wad of chewing gum in the door of a high-speed commuter train, causing serious delays in service. But the lifting of the ban did not come without conditions. Orbit could be sold over the counter only by pharmacists, who were required to record the names of those who bought the product.

COMPETITION

The year after Orbit was introduced in the United States, its top two competitors, Trident and Dentyne, had a new owner. In December 2002 the British food giant Cadbury Schweppes purchased Adams, the maker of both gums, from the U.S. pharmaceutical company Pfizer as a result of the $4.2 billion deal, Cadbury Adams USA LLC was created. But Trident and Dentyne had both established their names in the chewing gum business much earlier.

In the 1960s Trident became the first national brand of sugar-free chewing gum to be sold in the United States. Its 1964 advertising slogan, ''The Great Taste That Is Good for Your Teeth,'' promoted the fact that the gum used saccharin instead of sugar. When the advertising changed with the claim that ''4 out of 5 dentists surveyed would recommend sugarless gum to their patients who chew gum,'' Trident immediately became associated with dental health. The ''4 out of 5'' pitch continued through the following decades, reinforcing the association. In 2001 Trident introduced a tooth-whitening gum, Trident White, which competed directly with Orbit White. Within a mere nine months Trident White had gained more than 60 percent of all whitening gum sales. Cadbury Adams undertook large-scale advertising efforts for Trident. In 2004, largely to compete against Wrigley, the company spent an astonishing $60 million on Trident advertising. The new campaign featured the adventures of Little Mouth, an animated wind-up, chattering mouth. At the same time Trident continued to expand the flavors offered, a necessity in a market that demanded variety. New flavors introduced by the Little Mouth character included Watermelon Twist, Trident Splash Strawberry with Lime, and Trident Splash Peppermint with Vanilla.

While advertising for Orbit and Trident focused on the dental health of the general population, that for sugar-free Dentyne focused on the youth market. Dentyne's target market was 15- to 24-year-old daters in search of fresh breath. The Dentyne Ice brand, introduced in 1996, illustrated this focus, with its advertising most often featuring young couples kissing. In one such ad, as a young man attempted to kiss his attractive date, he imagined himself surrounded by every guy she had ever kissed, which made him feel insecure. Dentyne Ice served as a quick confidence booster, however, and he carried on with the kiss. After Cadbury Adams bought the company, advertising for Dentyne was skewed toward an even younger target market. For example, a 2004 digital campaign with the tagline ''Go bold!'' was aimed at 13- to 17-year-olds, with ads running on Yahoo!'s instant-messenger and Launch music platforms.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Wrigley's ''No Matter What'' campaign was launched following a decade-long lag in sales of chewing gum in the United States. At the same time other breath-freshening products, such as mints and breath strips, were experiencing sales increases. In response Wrigley introduced sugar-free Orbit, with the large-scale advertising campaign led by Energy BBDO, an agency based in Chicago. The ads featured the actress Vanessa as the spokesperson, demonstrating how Orbit could transform any ''dirty'' mouth into one that felt clean. As such, the ads directly targeted Orbit's market, reinforcing the link between a clean mouth and a well-organized life. In the ads Vanessa found herself in a variety of ''scenes of the grime,'' seeking to prove that ''no matter what'' Orbit left all sorts of mouths feeling clean.

The "No Matter What" campaign, which cost an average of $5 to $10 million a year between 2001 and 2005, included television and magazine advertising, as well as point-of-relevance posters. The latter were displayed in areas likely to reach Orbit's target audience: taxicabs, which were used by busy American workers; nail salons and health clubs, to reinforce the idea that the gum could help a person look and feel good; and dental offices, which supported the idea of a mouth that felt clean. In addition, new gum flavors introduced during the campaign were displayed in stores on shelf danglers, which helped highlight the new flavors and entice customers to try them. It was the television commercials, however, that accounted for the bulk of the advertising budget, on average 87 percent of all spending. From 2001 through 2005 several commercials were aired, largely on prime-time and late-night shows in an effort to reach the target audience. Each time a new commercial was introduced, it ran frequently in order to create brand presence before it then tapered off.

Each of the "No Matter What" television spots portrayed dirty mouths turned clean by Orbit. The mouths included those of a teacher, a school bus driver, a mailman, a biker, lovers at a picnic, clowns, and even a Venus flytrap. Although the initial emphasis was on introducing the Orbit brand in the United States, as new flavors became available, the focus of the campaign shifted. In 2003, for instance, the two television spots "Clowns" and "Equestrian" were used to introduce the new flavors Cinnamint and Bubblement. In the spirit of the campaign, one commercial showed Vanessa improving the dirty mouths of clowns and the other of a female rider. In 2005, in the hilarious "Fly Trap," in which a visitor to a botanical garden was swallowed by the world's largest Venus flytrap, Vanessa improved the dirty mouth of the plant while introducing Orbit's newest flavor, Citrus Mint. During the campaign other, more unconventional ways were used to promote Orbit. In 2003, for example, Wrigley sponsored the Chews Wisely Challenge, in which assistants of Vanessa, dressed in lab coats, appeared in such areas as Pike Place Market in Seattle to ask people to compare the taste of Orbit to that of Trident.

OUTCOME

The "No Matter What" campaign was successful in introducing Orbit in the United States. In 2004, the gross U.S. sales of all Orbit products exceeded $90 million, beating competitor Trident by nearly $8 million. According to Wrigley, by this point Orbit was accounting for a third of its total domestic profits. Further, Orbit had become the third best-selling gum in the United States, behind two other Wrigley products, Extra ($146 million in sales) and Eclipse ($93.3 million).

The "No Matter What" television commercials were given much of the credit, by both Wrigley and by advertising critics, for the campaign's success. As the New York Times put it, "The cheeky commercials, which also took occasional swipes at a not-so-mysterious 'Brand T,' quickly propelled most Orbit products to the top of the sales charts." As a result of the success of the campaign, new flavors were quickly added to the Orbit brand, and by 2005 seven were available: Original Peppermint, Spearmint, Wintermint, Bubblemint, Cinnamint, Citrusmint, and Sweet Mint.

The campaign also won awards from the advertising industry. The 2005 "Fly Trap" commercial earned recognition from Adweek as one of its Best Spots. The 2003 commercials "Clowns" and "Equestrian," which promoted the new flavors Cinnamint and Bubblemint, won an EFFIE Award. Created by the New York American Marketing Association in 1968, the EFFIE focused on the results of advertising campaigns, and the results of the 2003 spots were impressive. As indicated by a 2004 Communicus Advertising Effectiveness Study, the commercials succeeded in reaching customers. The study revealed that among viewers "Clowns" resulted in an advertising awareness of 46 percent and a brand linkage of 23 percent, with the numbers for "Equestrian" being 61 percent and 26 percent, respectively. These results were well above the norms of 37 percent for advertising awareness and 13 percent for brand linkage. Supported by their award-winning advertising, the new Cinnamint and Bubblemint flavors came to account for two-thirds of the overall growth of Orbit.

FURTHER READING

Barr, Aaron. "BBDO Casts Wrigley's Doublemint Twins." Adweek, March 9, 2005. Available from <http://www.adweek.com>.

Beirne, Mike. "Category Wars: Wrigley Returns to Orbit in Whitening Showdown." Brandweek, May 17, 2004. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>.

———. "Strategy: Wrigley Rebounds with $70M for 3 Brands." Brandweek, April 21, 2003. Available from <http://www.brandweek.com>.

"Cadbury Takes $4.2 Billion Gulp: Adams' Brands of Chewing Gum May Be a Treat." Houston Chronicle, December 18, 2002, p. 1.

"Dentyne Breaks Digital Ad Effort." Adweek, October 18, 2004. Available from <http://www.adweek.com>.

Koerner, Brendan I. "Wrigley's Second Chance to Smile." New York Times, June 20, 2004, p. 2.

Kruger, Renee Marisa. "Chewing Power: Loaded with Innovation, Chewing Gum Is Giving the Confection Industry a Lot More to Chomp On." Business and Industry, October 2002, p. 60.

Prystay, Cris. "At Long Last, Gum Is Legal in Singapore, but There Are Strings." Wall Street Journal, June 4, 2004, p. A1.

Todd, David. "Dentyne Ice Locks Lips with Youth Target." Strategy Magazine, May 8, 2000, p. B14.

Tylee, John. "AMV Launches Wrigley's Orbit Ads." Campaign, April 20, 2001, p. 7.

Candice Mancini

Working Assets Long Distance

101 Market St., Ste. 700
San Francisco, California 94105
USA
Telephone: (415) 369-2000
Fax: (415) 369-2000
Web site: www.workingassets.com

■■■

DIRECT MARKETING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in 1989, Working Assets Long Distance was the only enterprise offering a long-distance phone service and regularly donating to nonprofit organizations. It was a subsidiary of Working Assets Funding Service, Inc., which had been established four year earlier by Laura Scher, Michael Kieschnick, and Peter Barnes. Compared with the telecommunications giants AT&T, Sprint Corp., and MCI Communications Corp., Working Assets was a minuscule player. Nevertheless, it had succeeded in rapidly developing a base of customers and in generating considerable annual profits. Hoping to instill loyalty in its subscribers by sending them mailers that addressed social issues and its philanthropic work, Working Assets created an inexpensive direct-marketing campaign.

Every month Working Assets enclosed a letter with its subscribers' long-distance phone bill. The letters, which were printed with soy ink on recycled paper, informed customers about political issues and encouraged them to phone their Congressional representatives to register their opinions. Ten minutes of free long distance were allotted for every customer to call representatives in Washington, D.C., once a month. Without the burden of a large marketing budget, Working Assets was able to charge fees that were actually lower than those of most other companies. The company also donated 1 percent of its gross revenues (as opposed to profits) to an array of progressive nonprofit organizations. The subscribers voted annually on which organization should receive the funds.

Working Assets' political agenda and generosity brought the company a degree of publicity transcending that which it could have obtained from a more conventional marketing effort. Between 1985 and 2005 the Working Assets companies donated more than $50 million to nonprofit organizations. Although its direct-marketing campaign was responsible for spurring the bulk of the company's new subscribers to sign up, it was Working Assets' fundamental principles that ensured it a loyal base of consumers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Working Assets Long Distance was the brainchild of Peter Barnes, who had established the Working Assets Money Fund in 1983. This mutual fund refused to invest in the stocks of companies that were involved in defense contracting, had poor environmental practices, or did business with oppressive political regimes. Once the viability of the Working Assets Money Fund was assured, Barnes diversified his interests and introduced the Working Assets credit card, which donated 5 percent of the value of all purchases charged to the card to various progressive charities.

When contemplating his next business venture, Barnes hit upon the idea of offering long-distance service. He determined that such an enterprise would satisfy the criteria he had laid down for all of his forays into the consumer market. As Barnes explained to the Chicago Sun-Times, he was only willing to get involved with a product that could offer "a basic service, could be marketed nationwide, and could be donation linked." From these principles Working Assets was born in 1989. Operating as a long-distance re-seller (that is, as a company that bought phone-line capacity from other providers rather than owning its own), Working Assets purchased service in bulk from Sprint (and later MCI), which it then sold to its own customers. After starting small the company began to market itself to a national audience with a direct-mail blitz in 1992. Between 1992 and 1997 its roster of subscribers grew from 50,000 to 250,000.

TARGET MARKET

This dramatic expansion was a result in part of the receptive market the company had discovered. According to Marketing News, Barnes's venture tapped into "a growing niche [of] people who want to change the world, but don't want to go to too much trouble about it." Working Assets estimated that 20 million Americans were "societally conscious" and open to discovering new ways to support their beliefs. As a result, its potential audience was quite broad. The company focused primarily on residential long-distance consumers who subscribed to another carrier (generally perceived as a large and impersonal bureaucracy) and who often felt marginalized and disrespected by politicians and corporations. Characterized by their commitment to liberal social and political causes, this group spanned divisions of age, race, and income. "The demographics of an average [Working Assets] subscriber are hard to define, since they range in age from 20 to 75," Robin Greiner, a company manager, told Marketing News. "It's more of a psychographic," she added, a shared mindset as opposed to the sorts of commonalities that more traditionally defined targeted audiences. What potential Working Assets customers had in common was a dedication to causes such as abortion rights, civil liberties, and economic justice. They tended to live in major urban areas (particularly San Francisco, Chicago, and Boston) and were a highly educated lot. As the San Francisco Examiner noted, a full one-third of Working Assets' customers had postgraduate degrees. They were "take action" people, Greiner emphasized, the sorts who would write letters to the editor and wanted to be involved in effecting political and social change.

The primary way Working Assets sought to connect with this audience was through its corporate policies. The organizations and ideals the company supported matched those of the group it hoped to reach. The direct-mail campaign was essential in driving home this convergence of interests to potential consumers. Because these ads were in a letter format, Working Assets could explain its policy positions and its unique place within the telecommunications industry in a clear and detailed manner. This medium allowed the company to elaborate its goals without having to resort to the generalizations and oversimplifications that so often pervaded 30-second television commercials. Moreover, for Working Assets' highly educated target audience, the low-tech and traditional format of a letter carried more credibility than flashy television advertising.

In its direct-mail missives Working Assets positioned itself as an altruistic organization, more like a selfless political crusader than a profitable telecommunications company. Although it always noted that its rates were at least competitive with (if not better than) other long-distance service providers, Working Assets devoted most of its direct mail ads to informing consumers about its substantial charitable donations and its endeavors to mobilize the public in support of various causes. The ads touted the range of "Citizen Actions" the company had supported as another way in which Working Assets was more than just another corporate player. Special programs were highlighted as well, such as different phone-card giveaways Working Assets had run to encourage people to contact their elected representatives (at the company's expense). In 1995, for example, Working Assets distributed a bevy of "Stop Newt" calling cards (and not exclusively to Working Assets customers) in an effort to mobilize opposition to Republican Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich's action plan, the "Contract with America."

COMPETITION

With its corporate objective of "build[ing] a world that is more just, humane, and environmentally sustainable," Working Assets had a strong platform from which to differentiate itself from other long-distance service providers. For the most part its three largest competitors—AT&T, MCI, and Sprint—used price and convenient calling plans to attract residential long-distance customers. The market was fiercely competitive, constantly shifting, and saturated with advertising. The "Big Three" (as AT&T, MCI, and Sprint were collectively dubbed) flooded television, radio, and print media with a steady stream of commercials (both product-specific as well as image-oriented). Telemarketers from all of these companies also frequently contacted consumers at home (often in the evenings around dinnertime), promising cheaper rates and better services than their rivals. AT&T was the largest of the three and had an annual marketing budget of about $300 million. Employing these resources the company aired a slew of commercials that played up its status as the oldest long-distance provider in the country. Beginning in 1996 AT&T used actor Paul Reiser (from the television show Mad About You) in television spots that patiently explained how AT&T's calling plans were a simple alternative to the often gimmicky offerings from Sprint and MCI. These commercials, conceived by ad agency Foote Cone & Belding, were updated in 1997 and 1998. In May 1998 Reiser was portrayed on top of a mountain promoting AT&T's updated One Rate Plus calling plan.

A SWEET DEAL

In another effort to draw people to its long-distance services, Working Assets entered into an arrangement with the famously progressive Ben & Jerry's ice cream company whereby new subscribers to Working Assets phone services would receive coupons good for one free pint a month of the Vermont-based firm's delectable dairy offerings for their first year as Working Assets customers.

Both MCI and Sprint incorporated celebrity endorsers into their marketing strategies as well. Like AT&T they went "tit-for-tat [in] lowering per price minutes and offering package details," noted an article in the September 8, 1997, Advertising Age. In September 1998 MCI, the country's second-largest telecommunications company, used National Basketball Association icon Michael Jordan in partially animated spots that featured a cast of Warner Brothers cartoon characters such as Bugs Bunny. In August 1998 the company brought back Jordan and his cartoon companions to herald MCI's new Five Cents Everyday calling plan in spots created by ad agency Messner Vetere Berger McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG. In addition to its Jordan-centered spots, MCI used actor John Lithgow in Messner-produced advertising designed to promote its 10-321 (later 10-10-321) service, which was provided by MCI's wholly owned subsidiary Telecom USA. The digits were actually an access code that, when entered prior to dialing a number, would route a customer's call through MCI's telephony facilities irrespective of which company putatively provided long-distance service to the residence where the call originated. The 10-321 service was "the fastest-growing product MCI ha[d] ever introduced," the company told Advertising Age in 1997. MCI particularly hoped to win consumers away from AT&T with this effort.

Sprint opted for Candice Bergen to represent its telephone service. In 1997 the company dropped her long-standing "Dime Lady" persona (which focused on Sprint's offering of long-distance service at the rate of a dime a minute) and opted instead for commercials that looked more broadly at the company's low 10-cent rates and its calling plans. In three spots produced by ad agency J. Walter Thompson, Sprint "stress[ed] the power of a dime to bring simplicity and control to consumers' lives," according to the January 13, 1997, Advertising Age. Sprint severed its relationship with J. Walter Thompson in May 1997 in favor of Grey Advertising, which it commissioned to create a corporate-branding campaign.

Furthermore, Working Assets was not the only long-distance provider that strove to distinguish itself from the three telecommunications titans. An upstart phone company, Qwest Communications, launched a $50 million advertising campaign in February 1998. As Advertising Age revealed on February 23, 1998, the commercials, by Omnicom Group's Focus Agency, "toss[ed] humorous barbs at the entrenched long-distance telephone companies." The clever spots related the misadventures of "Bob," an employee of a "big long distance company." In one commercial Bob was beaten by a priest and a nurse in a hospital when they discovered his occupation. Working Assets also had a rival from a long-distance reseller at the opposite end of the political spectrum. Lifeline, owned by AmeriVision Communication, donated a portion of its proceeds to conservative organizations such as the Christian Coalition, Operation Rescue, and the Moore Foundation for Home Schooling.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Working Assets concentrated its marketing efforts on the features that distinguished it from other phone companies (indeed from most other corporations). As the newsletter Report on AT&T noted, "knocking on customers' doors and getting involved with their causes is a good way to steal away part of the . . . long distance market from the likes of AT&T." An industry analyst concurred with this assessment in Telephony. "They're selling brand differentiality in a way that a large carrier could not." Ironically, irrespective of the (progressive) personal convictions of Barnes and his company's employees, positioning Workings Assets as a socially responsible company made good business sense. Recognizing this fact, Working Assets took every opportunity to trumpet its generous donations, its activism, and its liberal pedigree.

The company encouraged its customers to get involved in national political debates in other ways as well. Each phone bill contained two "Citizen Actions." These consisted of briefs on particular issues coupled with pleas from the company for its customers to take stands concerning these topics. In 1993 the company launched "Have a Heart," in which it advocated aggressive lobbying on behalf of a smaller defense budget. "We are trying to increase the number of ways that people can make a positive social impact from money that they spend in their daily lives," Working Assets' founder told the San Francisco Chronicle.

Direct-mail letters lay at the heart of Working Assets' efforts to grow its business. According to Telephony, direct mail was the company's "largest source of acquiring new customers." To aim the letters at consumers most likely to respond to them, Working Assets obtained mailing lists from various like-minded political organizations and publications (such as The Nation, Utne Reader, and Mother Jones) who shared information about customers and subscribers. In the mid-1990s the company added small perks to encourage consumers to switch over to Working Assets. The company offered 60 free minutes of long-distance services in an initial bonus for becoming a customer. Beyond such tactics (and the occasional print ad placed in progressive publications such as the Nation) Working Assets relied on word of mouth to raise consumers' awareness of its services and products. Report on AT&T concluded that the company's "most successful marketing channel is its own customers," from whom it generated nearly 25 percent of its business. While its large competitors offered rebates, frequent-flyer miles, and other incentive programs to capture new customers, Working Assets depended predominantly on its community values and the goodwill of its subscribers.

OUTCOME

Working Assets' marketing strategies were a success. "We've proven it's possible to do good and do well at the same time," Barnes announced to the San Francisco Chronicle. By 1998 the company could claim 320,000 subscribers, and future prospects looked promising. Although Working Assets had only a small fraction of the customer bases of AT&T, MCI, and Sprint, it found that its subscribers were ideal consumers. The massive telecommunications giants were plagued by fickle customers who hopped from provider to provider in search of the latest deal. Working Assets subscribers, because they joined for political as well as economic reasons, tended to be more loyal. Moreover, because they believed in the company's mission, they were more responsible and timely in paying their phone bills. In 1997 Working Assets expanded its enterprise and began offering both pager and Internet services.

Working Assets evaluated its success partly in terms of the activism it had engendered. In 1998 alone Working Assets consumers generated more than 1 million calls and letters to Congress and the White House. That same year the company succeeded in advancing political causes ranging from safeguarding the integrity of the organic food label to securing higher levels of government funding for civil rights enforcement and family planning. In 2005 all of the Working Assets companies donated more than $4 to progressive organizations, bringing the cumulative total since 1985 to $50 million. The campaign continued into 2006.

FURTHER READING

Barbagallo, Paul. "Shared Vision, Shared Trust." Target Marketing, June 1, 2003.

Cleland, Kim. "Bergen Leaves Spotlight in Sprint's New 'Dime' Ads." Advertising Age, January 13, 1997.

Eckhouse, John. "Make a Call, Save a Whale." San Francisco Chronicle, September 25, 1993.

Goerne, Carrie. "Reach Out and Change the World." Marketing News, March 16, 1992.

"Little Guys Set Sights Low to Compete with AT&T." Report on AT&T, February 12, 1996.

Peregrin, Tony. "A Win-Win Situation." Telephony, May 13, 1999.

Rosenspan, Alan. "Improve Your Response." Direct Marketing, September 1, 2001, p. 34.

Rumbler, Bill. "Long-Distance Firm Profits from Dial-A-Conscience." Chicago Sun-Times, January 6, 1992.

Snyder, Beth. "Long-Distance Upstarts Aim Ads at Category's Big 3." Advertising Age, February 23, 1998.

———. "MCI Touts Success of 10-321 Service." Advertising Age, November 10, 1997.

———. "Phone Foes Open New Big-Bucks Marketing War."

Spencer, Jane. "The Worst Phone Service in America." Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2002, p. D1.

Tuller, David. "Phone Service to Give Part of Income Away." San Francisco Chronicle, February 18, 1989.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

Wyeth

5 Giralda Farms
Madison, New Jersey 07940-0874
USA
Telephone: (973) 660-5000
Fax: (973) 660-7026
Web site: www.wyeth.com

■■■

LIQUI-GELS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, American Home Products became a part of the Wyeth organization. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

Through its Whitehall-Robins Healthcare subsidiary, American Home Products (AHP) had been producing an ibuprofen-based analgesic under the brand name Advil for 14 years when in August 1998 it introduced Advil Liqui-Gel caplets, coated with gelatin for easy swallowing. AHP accompanied the brand-extension launch with a print and television campaign overseen by Young & Rubicam of New York City. As was typical of most advertising in the highly competitive analgesics category, spots targeted competitor Tylenol, a Johnson & Johnson brand marketed through its McNeil Pharmaceuticals subsidiary. AHP spent a sizeable portion of its $320 million advertising budget in 1998 on Liqui-Gels—$30 million. One particularly memorable commercial, though it was not specifically for Liqui-Gels, aired on the May 14 final episode of the enormously popular NBC sitcom Seinfeld. The 30-second spot cost an estimated $1.7 million to run.

Introduced in 1984, Advil became the first nonprescription pain reliever to contain ibuprofen, first developed in the 1960s. Like aspirin, ibuprofen inhibited the body's production of prostaglandins, chemicals that scientists believed provoked neural pain receptors. This came at a fortuitous time, as more and more Americans turned against aspirin in response to reports concerning gastrointestinal side effects, but if Advil's makers had little to fear from aspirin, they faced plenty of competition in the form of Tylenol, and the two brands waged a lengthy battle of attrition during the 1980s and 1990s. Advil Liqui-Gels, launched at about the same time as Tylenol Arthritis, went head to head with Extra Strength Tylenol. By the end of 1998, however, the two brands' relative positions remained the same, with Tylenol in first place and Advil in second.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Incorporated in 1926, American Home Products grew through consolidation and acquisition. Among the significant products it added in its early years was an oil for the treatment of sunburns, acquired in 1935; this it marketed under the brand name Preparation Has a product intended for the treatment of hemorrhoids. Also in the 1930s AHP bought the aspirin brand Anacin, which would prove enormously popular during the 1950s, thanks in part to a celebrated advertising campaign. Anacin's commercials, created by legendary adman Rosser Reeves, promised "Fast-fast-fast relief!" If some television viewers complained that the strident commercial was enough to cause headaches, it certainly proved effective, and Anacin became one of the leading brands during the decade and for some time thereafter.

But changes were afoot in the world of analgesic relief medications. In the 1960s chemists for the Boots Pharmaceutical Company, a British corporation, began developing a carboxylic acid derivative called ibuprofen. Boots introduced the drug as a prescription medication in 1964 and held the worldwide patent until 1985. Doctors prescribed ibuprofen for pain and inflammation associated with arthritis, menstrual cramps, and other conditions.

The first U.S. company to gain marketing rights for ibuprofen was the Upjohn Company, which sold it under the brand name Motrin. After AHP's Whitehall Laboratories gained approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) to market a nonprescription form of ibuprofen, Upjohn chose not to compete with it but rather sold Motrin's rights to Bristol-Myers, who marketed it under the brand name Nuprin. Meanwhile AHP in 1988 bought out A.H. Robins, a pharmaceutical company that had gone bankrupt as a result of lawsuits over its Dalkon Shield contraceptives. It later merged A. H. Robins with Whitehall Laboratories to create Whitehall-Robins Healthcare.

Advil appeared on the market in 1984 with the slogan "Advanced medicine for pain" and was well-poised to take the lead over Nuprin. By 1987 ibuprofen had emerged as the fastest-growing segment of an analgesics market estimated at more than $1.5 billion. Nuprin stood little chance against Advil, thanks to AHP's large direct-sales force, who helped gain prime grocery and pharmacy shelf space for their product. By the early 1990s, despite the appearance of numerous generic brands, Advil accounted for about half of all ibuprofen sales in the United States.

TARGET MARKET

By the mid-1980s statistics showed that about 80 percent of all adults in the United States used some variety of pain reliever. More and more Americans had begun to accept the idea of medication for pain, and with OTC drugs offering relief for a variety of symptoms beyond mere headaches, consumption of analgesics had increased noticeably. Whereas a study in 1984, the year of Advil's introduction, showed that some 80 percent of all Americans used one variety of pain reliever or another, by 1990 the figure had risen to more than 87 percent. This was a good sign for Advil, and an even better one appeared with the evidence of declining aspirin consumption. The latter resulted from the release of several studies showing negative effects on the gastrointestinal systems of persons who took aspirin.

Ibuprofen users tended to use the drug over long periods of time, often to treat arthritis, and this long-term use posed further benefits to the makers of Advil. According to a 1992 study published in BrandAdvantage magazine, some 45 percent of Advil users were in the 18-to-34-years-old category, suggesting that the medication was particularly popular with the young. Persons in the 35-to-54 category made up almost 37 percent of Advil users, and those 55 years of age or older accounted for the other 18 percent. Ibuprofen advertising in general, and that of Advil in particular, targeted the young: thus in 1993 Advil ran a commercial featuring major-league baseball pitcher Nolan Ryan, a symbol of physical fitness and robust activity.

Advil also had a strong female buying public, with more than 57 percent of its customer base being women. This placed it in a better position, relative to female buyers, than either Tylenol or Bayer, whose customers were 55 and 49 percent female respectively. In the late 1980s and early 1990s Advil had gone after a market it had previously left untouched: children. Thus in 1989 it introduced Children's Advil Suspension, a sweet liquid for the reduction of fever.

By the time Advil launched Liqui-Gels in the late 1990s ibuprofen had come under the same sorts of attacks that aspirin had previously encountered, with studies showing that the drug caused stomach pains and possibly even ulceration and bleeding. AHP fought a successful battle to avoid having to list possible side effects on the label. The FDA did, however, require a warning suggesting that consumers consult their doctors if they experienced unusual side effects after taking the drug. With the introduction of Liqui-Gels, however, Advil included a warning with language proposed by the FDA: "If you generally consume three or more alcohol-containing drinks a day, you should consult your physician for advice on when and how you should take Advil Liqui-Gels or other pain relievers."

COMPETITION

The fact that Advil was required to include the alcohol warning was ironic, not simply because AHP had long fought the requirement to include such a warning, but because the topic of combined alcohol and analgesic use had been the basis of a heated dispute with its leading competitor. So fierce had this battle become, in fact, that in March 1996 NBC, ABC, CBS, and CNN took an almost unprecedented step, refusing to run commercials for analgesics that made safety claims regarding competitors.

The cause of this highly unusual measure was an Advil commercial created by Young & Rubicam and first broadcast in February of that year. The spot featured a close-up of an alcohol warning label on a bottle of

A SHOW ABOUT NOTHING

On Thursday, May 14, 1998, the ultra-popular situation comedy Seinfeld broadcast its final episode on NBC, and advertisers were eager to get on the bandwagon. Many critics proved less than enthusiastic over the final show's plot, and Bob Garfield of Advertising Age was similarly negative about the commercials themselves—including one for Advil, which he dubbed "a waste of money."

In fact Garfield dismissed almost all the spots in such a manner. He called a commercial for Apple Computers, part of its "Think Different" campaign by TBWA Chiat/Day, "a bit excessive." Yet "it was all somehow apropos," in Garfield's opinion. "In this series putatively about nothing"—Seinfeld was famous for its loose plot lines—"taking its leave amid the biggest ad rates in history—$3.4 million per minute, give or take—a whole lot of expensive nothing is exactly what was delivered."

USA Today invited a panel of advertising experts to rate the ads in the 75-minute episode. They gave the highest score, 9.21 on a scale of 1 to 10, for Coors' Zima "Dog Bites Man" spot. The lowest rating went to Nissan's Altima commercial, which received a 3.25. Advil's "The Pain of Separation" fell almost exactly in the middle of the 29 ads, with a 5.44 rating.

Tylenol, with a voice-over suggesting that persons who drank three or more glasses of wine, beer, or mixed drinks a day should ask their doctors whether it might be safer to use Advil instead of Extra Strength Tylenol. According to OTC Business News, "An actor draws attention to the Tylenol warning label, pointing out the potential for liver damage if the product is taken in combination with alcohol."

The same report noted that the makers of Tylenol "reacted sharply to the Advil commercial, launching a public information campaign and taking 'concerns' about the advertising to the Food and Drug Administration and television networks." The campaign by McNeil, producers of Tylenol, included information statements on television and in newspapers and magazines, a nationwide direct-mail campaign aimed at doctors and pharmacists, and a toll-free information line.

According to OTC Business News: "Whitehall-Robins defended the Advil commercial, insisting that it was not 'deceptive in any way. The advertisement is meant to alert consumers to the risk of liver damage for those people who regularly consume alcoholic beverages and take Extra Strength Tylenol . . . . Nevertheless, Whitehall-Robins applauds ABC television network's decision to cease airing all commercials that make negative safety claims about competing analgesics . . . . We are especially pleased that ABC has decided to stop airing several recent Tylenol advertisements that make false claims about the safety of Advil.' "

At that point, the lead positions in the analgesics market were as they had been for some time and would remain through 1998, with Tylenol in first place and Advil in second. By the end of 1998 only the combined total of all generic brands, with $630.3 million in sales, held a higher market position than Tylenol's total sales of $567 million. Advil formed a distant second with $355.8 million, and third-place Aleve, a Bayer product, was even further down the line with $141 million. In fourth place was Excedrin, produced by Bristol-Myers Squibb—who had sold the Motrin brand to McNeil—with $114 million in sales. Thus by far the most serious competition for Advil came from Tylenol, and therefore most of its advertising was directed toward the market leader.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Compared to the 1996 ads concerning Tylenol and alcohol use, Advil's 1998 advertising was relatively tame. In fact it gained very little press—certainly far less, for instance, than Aleve's "Real relief is all day relief," created by BBDO Chicago and launched in April. The only Advil commercial that received much attention from journalists was not even a Liqui-Gels commercial, but a spot called "The Pain of Separation" that ran on the final episode of Seinfeld. The commercial played on viewers' feelings of separation anxiety with the end of the popular show and made a tongue-in-cheek recommendation of Advil as a cure for that pain.

Part of the lack of attention to Liqui-Gels in 1998 came from the fact that their launch occurred at the end of summer, well into the year. In August Health News Daily reported that the company had begun retail shipments of its brand extension on August 3, and that in September it would begin running print and television advertising created by Young & Rubicam. As for the actual content of those ads, one of the only places this even received mention was in a September 7 Advertising Age story by Michael Wilke, who wrote that "AHP last week launched an estimated $30 million TV and print campaign from Y&R Advertising, New York, for Advil Liqui-Gels, with ads emphasizing faster action than Extra Strength Tylenol."

Advil supplemented its television and print advertising with point-of-sale brochures to be distributed at retail buying centers. It backed up its advertising with a news release on September 25, following the annual meeting of the American College of Clinical Pharmacology. The news release reported that a study presented at the conference provided evidence that "Patients who were treated with Advil Liqui-Gels reported a faster onset of analgesic relief on tough headache pain, both for confirmed first perceptible relief and meaningful relief, than those who received Extra Strength Tylenol."

OUTCOME

In January 1999 Bayer's Aleve launched a $28 million advertising campaign for its own gelcaps, complete with television spots featuring the tag line "All day strong, all day long." This would be supplemented with print ads in a variety of magazines, including People, Better Homes & Gardens, Ebony, Readers Digest, and Prevention. Advil, by contrast, began a much more low-key campaign for Advil original, Advil 400 Extra Strength, and Advil Cold & Sinus, which would run from February to September. Meanwhile, Bob Garfield in Advertising Age attacked Tylenol's Allergy Sinus commercials, comparing them to political ads.

At least the Tylenol spots got attention, however, whereas the response to Advil's Liqui-Gels was muted. AHP had enjoyed a good year in 1998, with its stock rising from $43.93 to $70.25 per share, but as Justin Dini and Andrew McMains reported in Adweek in May 1999, it had begun "talking to six or seven agencies regarding a $15-25 million corporate-image assessment, sources said." Company leadership, according to Dini's and McMains's sources, "hop[ed] a corporate campaign might increase [AHP's] visibility on Wall Street."

FURTHER READING

"Advil Liqui-Gels Advertising to Begin in September; Latest Formulation of 14-Year-Old Whitehall-Robins OTC Analgesic Began Retail Shipments Aug. 3." Health News Daily, August 27, 1998.

"Advil Offers Proof." Community Pharmacy, May 1999, p. 40.

"Bayer Ad Campaign for Aleve Focuses on 'All Day Relief,'" Tan Sheet, April 20, 1998.

"Bayer Aleve Gelcaps Backed with $28 Mil. in Ad/Promo Spread" Tan Sheet, January 4, 1999.

Dini, Justin (with Andrew McMains). "AHP Seeking an Image Groomer" Adweek (Eastern edition), May 17, 1999.

Garfield, Bob. "Yech and Yada in 'Seinfeld' Ads." Advertising Age, May 18, 1998, p. 63.

———. "Tylenol Allergy Sinus Redefines Ad Sleaze." Advertising Age, May 10, 1999, p. 65.

"How the Ads Rank." USA Today, May 15, 1998.

"McNeil's Motrin IB Sales Up 19 Percent Through Mid-September." Tan Sheet, October 19, 1998.

"New Study Demonstrates That Advil Liqui-Gels Provide Faster Relief of Headache Pain Than Extra Strength Tylenol." Business Wire, September 25, 1998.

"TV Networks Wash Hands of Tylenol/Advil Battle." OTC Business News, March 21, 1996, p. 1.

Wilke, Michael. "Tylenol's $50 Million Intro Aims at Rx Rivals: Arthritis Brand is Crucial Launch." Advertising Age, September 7, 1998, p. 1.

Judson Knight

Xerox Corporation

800 Long Ridge Rd.
Stamford, Connecticut 06904
USA
Telephone: (203) 968-3000
Fax: (203) 968-3218
Web site: www.xerox.com

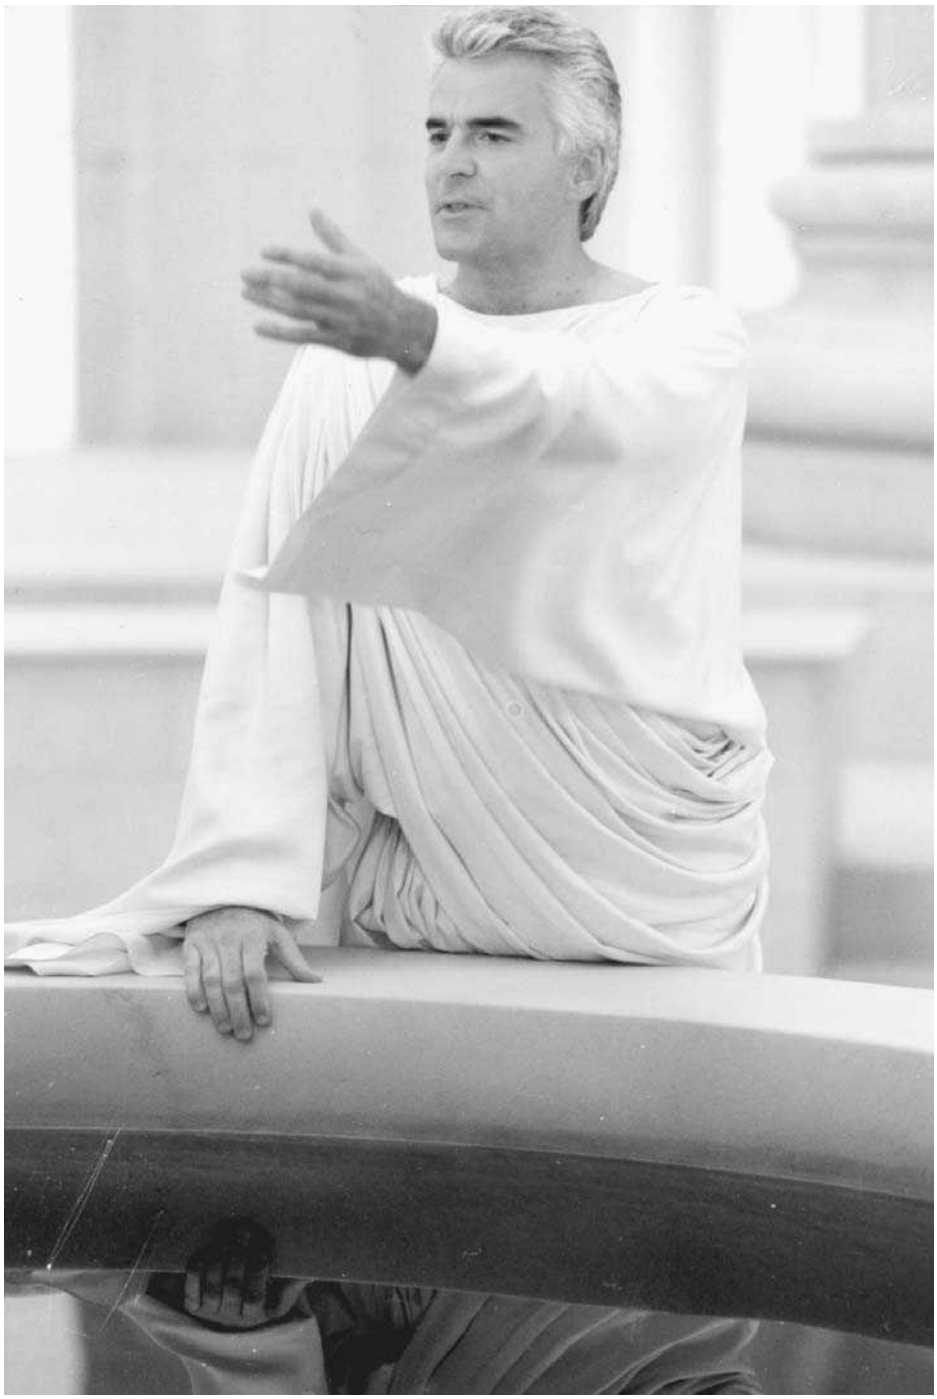
■■■

KEEP THE CONVERSATION GOING, SHARE THE KNOWLEDGE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In October 1998 the Xerox Corporation launched a $10 million advertising campaign in an effort to change people's perception of the Xerox brand. Although long known simply as a photocopy-machine company, Xerox had been diversifying its offerings to include an array of digital products, such as high speed digital copiers (copiers connected to computer networks), laser and ink jet printers, and multifunction devices that combined faxing, scanning, and printing capabilities. In fact, the company had generated 36 percent of its $18.2 billion sales revenue in 1997 from these high-tech items. But, as the Wall Street Journal recognized, ''that means that Xerox is competing less with traditional copier rivals such as Canon Corp., Konica Corp., and Ricoh, Inc. and more with printer giants such as Hewlett Packard. As a result, according to the Wall Street Journal, Xerox faces competitive threats from printer companies, which are vying for the same corporate customers'' Xerox wanted to reach. Moreover, many of Xerox's potential customers were unaware of these shifts in the company's focus. To address this situation, Xerox turned to advertising agency Young & Rubicam, which created ''Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge'' to promote the full range of Xerox's goods.

Xerox hoped this campaign would serve the dual purpose of helping the company break into the lucrative small business, home office, and retail equipment markets and of bringing Xerox's traditional group of customers—large businesses—into its digital fold. Seeking to stress its creativity and to reach a broad base of viewers, Xerox opted for a rather unconventional campaign. The campaign initially consisted of four television spots that discussed Xerox's role in offices ever more dominated by computer technology. The commercials' lighthearted vignettes demonstrated how Xerox made creating, transmitting, and sharing documents an easier task, but it was the fact that ''Keep the Conversation Going'' was structured around a classical Greek chorus led by a toga-wearing sage (played by actor John O'Hurley who was well-known for his role on the hit television show Seinfeld) that truly made the effort stand out. The chorus, which was shown standing in a white amphitheater complete with massive columns, sculpture, and giant pools of water, dispensed advice to businesses confronted with information-age dilemmas. In one ad, for instance, business associates congregate at the funeral of a colleague who had died suddenly without telling them the details of a lucrative contract he had won. ''Now they're really consumed with grief,'' the



A still featuring John O'Hurley, from Xerox's "Keep the Conversation Going" television campaign.
XEROX CORPORATION. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Greek chorus chimed in unison. "If only they knew that John scanned all his contracts into the Xerox Information Center."

Although advertising pundits lambasted the campaign for being "overly ambitious," as the Fort Worth Star-Telegram sniped, for example, consumers themselves responded well to "Keep the Conversation Going." Xerox continued the campaign into 1999 because "people get the message," Nancy Wiese, Xerox's director of worldwide marketing, told USA Today.

A still from Xerox's "Keep the Conversation Going" television campaign. XEROX CORPORATION. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Xerox had good reason to strive to keep up with the digital revolution of the 1990s—it had paid a high price for failing to do so in the 1970s. Then, Xerox's research labs invented what proved to be many integral parts of the personal computer, including the mouse and Windows-style icons. Convinced that, as a copier company, it had no need for these technologies (which, of course, would soon change the world), Xerox chose not to exploit them, essentially giving them away to others. "That episode has gone down in history as a textbook example of corporate myopia," opined the Sunday Times of London. At least as problematic was that Xerox was unprepared for the onslaught of Japanese competitors, such as the Canon Corp. that stormed the U.S. copier market in the 1970s and 1980s. During that period, Xerox's market share plummeted from a high of nearly 80 percent to a low of 7 percent. The company did fight its way back, however, attaining 18 percent of the market by 1992. In fact, after "focus[ing] on its core copier business," especially high-end machines, Xerox eventually surpassed archnemesis Canon and maintained a 27 percent share of the market in 1997.

Xerox's newfound success was threatened, however, by the changing nature of business itself. The rise of the personal computer and the Internet in the 1990s meant that paper documents no longer were the sole means of creating and disseminating information. "Ultimately, the paperless office will probably happen," a Xerox official told the Sunday Times of London. Computer printers, networks, and fax machines all diminished the centrality of the copier to business. In response to this tectonic shift, Xerox rapidly began to expand into this new class of machines. Instead of simply producing equipment to photocopy paper, Xerox created machines that were "portals . . . for easily moving documents between the physical and virtual worlds," according to the Hartford Courant. In September 1998 the company proudly announced its new combination digital copier/printer and committed to launching a bevy of printers, small copiers, and other personal products.

TARGET MARKET

Despite these changes, Xerox was still pigeonholed by many as a one-product firm. "It's the downside of having a strong brand," Anne Mulcahy, Xerox's chief staff officer, told the Wall Street Journal. "Sometimes it is hard to move away from things you have been successful with." With "Keep the Conversation Going," Xerox hoped to reposition itself, particularly in the eyes of two important groups: the large corporations to whom it had long sold its copiers; and the fast-growing sector the company referred to as the "SOHO" market, which consisted of small business people with home offices and other technologically savvy users interested in the kinds of digital products Xerox had come to offer. "Keep the Conversation Going'' sought to challenge the conventional wisdom about Xerox among these consumers. In one of the four initial television ads, Xerox's name is mentioned and a character begins to say, ''but they only make . . .,'' intending to express his belief that Xerox is still just a copier company. O'Hurley's sage cuts him off sharply: ''not any more they don't.''

In an effort to reach the SOHO market even before the campaign's launch, Xerox had begun to shift its sales techniques away from its trained staff who generally had pitched the company's products directly to corporate information officers and toward a more retail-oriented approach. To this end, Xerox committed to expanding its presence at such popular venues as Staples and Office Max. But the company still needed to encourage SOHO users to seek out its wares. Consequently, ''Keep the Conversation Going'' employed humorous scenarios to convey its message as a way of presenting Xerox as ''more human, and warm, and approachable,'' as Wiese told the Wall Street Journal. But the company was careful not to undersell the range of products and services it could provide. Many of the offerings touted by Xerox in ''Keep the Conversation Going'' (such as networked copiers and document-sharing software) transcended the needs of most SOHO consumers. But by overselling itself this way, the company hoped to reinforce the notion that it was a technological leader, and not ''just'' a copier business.

This focus on higher-end products also helped ensure that Xerox would continue to reach large businesses. To buttress this effort, the campaign's commercials were studded with trendy management buzzwords such as ''knowledge management'' and ''knowledge sharing.'' Moreover, the stories portrayed in some of the spots reflected the dilemmas faced by corporate personnel working in large offices. In one commercial, bickering team members complain to their leader, Wanda, about her decision to hire an outside consultant. ''He doesn't think the way we do! He doesn't even use the same systems,'' an underling tells her. The Greek chorus intercedes and tells Wanda everything will be fine. Because the group has Xerox's Docushare, everyone can access and share documents easily. Each of the four commercials illustrated how Xerox ''united people through documents,'' said Wiese, and the Greek chorus, which spoke in unison, ''represent[ed] [the] collaboration'' Xerox enabled.

COMPETITION

By expanding into the retail office equipment market—and especially by making high-capacity printers—Xerox put itself in direct competition with the industry leading Hewlett Packard Company (HP). HP was a difficult company for Xerox to challenge, ''but it [was] a battle Xerox [had to] enter,'' said the Hartford Courant, or it would ''watch HP's printers take over the smaller jobs that copiers once handled.'' HP had already tried to spruce up its image in order to garner a broader base of consumers. In November 1997 the company began packaging its printers and computers in boldly colored boxes that would be more ''exciting or enticing,'' as an HP spokesperson told the Wall Street Journal. HP also inaugurated its ''Expanding Possibilities'' campaign, a branding effort for its entire product line. As Xerox would do in ''Keep the Conversation Going,'' HP's campaign stressed that company's changing face. In a press release, HP noted that marketing studies had revealed that ''it was not perceived as innovative or inspirational.'' To counteract these impressions, one of the campaign's component commercials featured a former Negro League baseball player using the company's computers, scanners, and printers to make and sell Negro League baseball cards on-line.

HP recognized the threat Xerox's move into its territory could pose and was ''watching Xerox at every turn . . . not about to give an inch to the copier interloper,'' noted the Wall Street Journal. HP quickly introduced its own multifunction device, the Mopier, which—like some of Xerox's newest equipment—combined scanning, printing, and networking. In October 1998 HP launched a $125 million print, radio, and on-line campaign, the largest advertising campaign ever for its color printers. ''Even with a strong brand, and a strong market share, the company doesn't want to just sit on its laurels,'' an HP executive told the Business Journal. ''We intend to be everywhere with our ads,'' he said. Part of the overarching ''Expanding Possibilities'' campaign, the new offerings—conceived by Goodby, Silverstein & Partners—claimed that HP's printers created the best color documents, ''no matter what you're printing.'' The campaign had a broad target audience of

THOMAN SAID IT

Xerox President G. Richard Thoman summed up the company's hopes for the ''Keep the Conversation Going'' campaign at the 1998 Comdex show. ''I think we have to legitimize ourselves; I think the whole world views us as an analog copier company.'' But Thoman stressed that this perception was erroneous. ''It's not a question of making [a new image] up; it's a question of telling people about it.'' corporate customers, home users, students, and small businesses, and the print components ran in the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and USA Today, as well as in publications such as PC World, People, and Golf Digest.

Xerox also faced competition from its traditional copier rival, Canon. Like Xerox, Canon undertook a big-budget repositioning to signal that it was more than just a copier company, according to the Wall Street Journal. In 1997 Canon debuted a $9 million campaign devised by Devito/Verdi that strove to "elevate top-of-mind awareness that Canon is number 1 in the market," a company spokesperson told Advertising Age. These print, television, outdoor, and direct marketing ads used catchy slogans like "Business is War. Choose your weapons wisely" to promote Canon's business equipment. In June 1998 Canon began a new print and outdoor campaign that used the tag line "If it were that easy, you wouldn't need us." This effort used humor to stress the necessity of reliable business equipment. In one spot, a secretary tells her boss that the fax machine is down, to which he responds: "That's OK, I'll run it over there myself."

MARKETING STRATEGY

For the initial 10 week run of the campaign, Xerox relied exclusively on television advertising. (The company added print pieces as well when it continued to run "Keep the Conversation Going" ads in 1999.) To drive its message home to its audience, Xerox opted for 60-second spots instead of the more conventional 30-second ones. These longer installments not only allowed the company to convey a significant amount of information about its newest products, but also helped the company better connect with consumers. As one marketing analyst told the Wall Street Journal, "by the time I come back to my TV from the refrigerator, at least I'll remember what company was behind the ad." Furthermore, Xerox unleashed the "Keep the Conversation Going" commercials during a Major League Baseball playoff game and then ran them in what Wiese termed a blitz on a slew of broadcast and cable channels in hopes of reaching the greatest number of consumers possible—particularly those in the SOHO market.

Xerox also wanted to be sure to inform the corporate world of its diversification. To this end, the company arranged to make a high-profile appearance at the 1998 Comdex show, a computer industry exposition. At Comdex, Xerox actually re-created the set from its ads, building a coliseum two stories high and half the size of a football field. In keeping with this distinctive approach, the company chose not to deliver a keynote address at the gathering, but rather brought O'Hurley (dressed in a tunic) to conduct a mock Socratic dialogue with Xerox President G. Richard Thoman. Thoman used this platform to take the assembled industry representatives through the message of "Keep the Conversation Going." As Interactive Week Online explained, Thoman "showcase[d] [Xerox's] transition from a box-based analog copier manufacturer to a vested player in the realm of information technology."

The sensation Xerox created at Comdex (Interactive Weekly Online later described it as "this digital debutante's coming-out party") mirrored an underlying strategy of much of the campaign. No longer content to be perceived as a staid provider of copier machines to businesses, Xerox devised "Keep the Conversation Going" to attract attention. All aspects of the campaign were meant to mirror the changes occurring within the company. Xerox hired a big-budget film director, Gore Verbinski, to direct the campaign; it aimed to be "the most impressive display" at Comdex, as a company press release announced. In short, much of Xerox's motivation in executing "Keep the Conversation Going"—from pitching technology with a multicultural Greek chorus to assembling a coliseum for Comdex with pillars the size of redwoods—was make viewers look anew at Xerox and, in the words of a company press release, muse "And who would have thought this was from Xerox?"

OUTCOME

With a goal as difficult to quantify as repositioning itself and changing the way consumers viewed the company, it was complicated to gauge the outcome of "Keeping the Conversation Going." Xerox's hyperbolic ploys certainly did not win rave reviews from ad industry insiders. Both Adweek and Advertising Age criticized the campaign for using the Greek chorus as a motif—"Other than Woody Allen employing it as a device in 'Mighty Aphrodite,' you don't see it much after the second century B.C.," Adweek's commentator wryly noted. Both USA Today and the New York Times included "Keep the Conversation Going" among their "worst of 1998" ad compilations.

Nevertheless, consumers liked the campaign. A USA Today AdTrack survey revealed that baby boomers in particular found the campaign entertaining and effective. Wiese asserted that the commercials had scored well in postrun marketing surveys. "People get the message. They say, 'You're getting your sense of humor back,'" she told USA Today. Xerox dedicated $200 million to expanding the campaign in 1999 to include more television spots, as well as the introduction of print ads.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "HP to Get Marketing Makeover." Wall Street Journal, November 11, 1997.

Elliott, Stuart. "The Adept and the Inept." Fort Worth Star-Telegram, January 1, 1999. Reviews the "Keep the Conversation Going" campaign.

Goldfisher, Alastair. "HP to Spend $125 M on Ad Campaign." Business Journal, November 2, 1998.

Klein, Alec. "Xerox Posts Operating Gain but Issues Warning." Wall Street Journal, July 23, 1999.

Krol, Carol. "Canon Devotes $9 Million to Biz Equipment Ads." Advertising Age, July 21, 1997.

Lynn, Matthew. "Xerox Chief Aims to Copy Past Triumph." Sunday Times of London, June 15, 1997.

Moran, John. "Not Copying the Original Market Plan." Hartford Courant, November 19, 1998.

Narisetti, Raju. "Xerox Aims to Imprint High-Tech Image." Wall Street Journal, October 6, 1998.

Wells, Melanie. "Quirky Xerox Ads Appeal to Boomers." USA Today, February 8, 1999.

Rebecca Stanfel

Yahoo! Inc.

701 First Avenue
Sunnyvale, California 94089
USA
Telephone: (408) 349-3300
Fax: (408) 349-3301
Web site: www.yahoo.com

■■■

DO YOU YAHOO!? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Yahoo!, one of the early stars of the Internet, was launched in 1993 as Jerry's Guide to the World Wide Web, offering early users of the Web a way to navigate the quickly expanding Internet—in effect a table of contents. The company's founders soon dropped the name "Jerry's Guide" in favor of something more memorable, Yahoo!, an acronym for Yet Another Hierarchical Officious Oracle. To build the fledgling brand, in April 1996 the company released the "Do You Yahoo!?" marketing campaign.

The $5 million effort included television, radio, and print elements. One of the most memorable of the television spots, which aired in 1997, featured a balding young man using Yahoo! to search for a cure for his thinning hair. The final shot of the spot showed him strutting down the street with a huge, bushy Afro, turning the heads of his fellow pedestrians.

The "Do You Yahoo!?" campaign succeeded in raising the brand recognition of Yahoo! and attracting more visitors to the Web portal. In the late 1990s Yahoo! was far and away the most valuable Internet business, with a market value exceeding $4.3 billion. Yahoo! stumbled when the Internet sector crashed in the first few years of the new millennium, and its search-engine business was surpassed by a new rival, Google. But Yahoo! was able to rebound and continued to market its portal with the "Do You Yahoo!?" campaign until 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1993 Stanford engineering student Dave Filo's personal list of favorite websites had grown beyond 200 "bookmarks." He and fellow engineering student Jerry Yang wrote software that grouped their favorites sites into convenient on-screen folders. When they posted their list on the Web under the title "Jerry's Guide to the World Wide Web," people all over the world contacted them to say thanks. It was the Web's first table of contents.

Filo and Yang then planned to visit and categorize 1,000 websites a day. They decided to avoid the engineer's natural impulse to automate the process, instead throwing tremendous hours of human labor into the project. Yang hated the name "Jerry's Guide," so he and Filo followed the technology community's affinity for acronyms and came up with Yahoo! which stood for "Yet Another Hierarchical Officious Oracle."

Yahoo!'s distinguishing founding idea was using a cadre of professional Web surfers to organize a directory of websites into coherent categories. This approach differed from competitors like Excite (then called Architex), which relied on Web-scouring software to view and catalog. According to Fortune magazine, "Yahoo! had the best name, the worst technology, and a quaint belief that while other companies' machines were able to survey website addresses by the thousands every second, the human touch could somehow win out."

In 1995 Netscape and America Online both offered to absorb Yahoo! Yang and Filo declined but later signed with Sequoia Capital. Sequoia put up $1 million, which grew to $560 million by the end of 1997. Among the strong competitors that emerged were Excite, developed by another group of Stanford graduate students, and Lycos, which was developed at Carnegie Mellon.

But while human intelligence gave Yahoo! the early lead among Web search engines, what enabled Yahoo! to far outdistance the pack was a rapid rollout of E-mail, financial services, and a strong marketing effort. According to Fortune, in the first quarter of 1996 Yahoo!, Lycos, Excite, and Infoseek all delivered roughly the same number of pages. By the end of 1996, however, Yahoo! delivered twice as many pages as second-place Excite. By the third quarter of 1997 Yahoo! visitors looked at 50 million pages a day—more than the other three search engines combined.

TARGET MARKET

"Do You Yahoo!?" aimed to attract those people who intended to go online, an estimated 18 million people in 1998, according to IntelliQuest. Karen Edwards, Yahoo!'s director of brand management, referred to the company's target market as Internet intenders or near-surfers. This market's demographics skewed toward educated, affluent males, generally in the 25–54 age range. As time went on and women gained more interest in the Internet, the target group broadened to include them, and in the 2000s the ongoing campaign targeted a mass audience, touting Yahoo!'s wide range of services. Moreover, as Yahoo!'s overseas traffic increased, the campaign had to be adopted to different cultures and translated into various languages, although "Do you Yahoo!?" tested much better in English than translated.

In 1997 Yahoo! and other high-tech advertisers were counting on television to expand their markets. In May of that year BusinessWeek reported that 40 percent of U.S. homes had computers, but annual growth was down

INTERESTING YAHOO! FACTS

- In 1999 Yahoo! was an $11 billion company that did not own a building
- Although a billionaire, company cofounder David Filo put in 100-hour workweeks
- Cofounder Jerry Yang was so popular in his parents' home country of Taiwan that he registered in hotels under an assumed name
- Yahoo!'s grassroots marketing included a "Yahoo! for Barry Bonds" sign that flashed on the screen at the San Francisco baseball player's home stadium every time he hit a home run
- In 1998 Yahoo! was the most popular website in Japan, where 10 million people were online from the 20–30 percent clip of the past few years to about 13 percent. Yahoo! and others used advertising to show the ease and advantages of going online, in hopes of drawing more and more people into the Internet services market.

COMPETITION

Yahoo!'s strengths against its competition included a huge lead in market capitalization and its reputation as being tops in the search, finance, and news areas. Lycos was more aggressive than Yahoo! in pursuing acquisitions that added new services and broadened its market appeal. Lycos also chose to link separately branded sites to serve different demographic segments. Infoseek and Altavista benefited from the massive shadows of their owners, Disney and Compaq respectively.

Excite had strong health and search features and was the Web page for Dell's PC buyers. In October 1996 Excite introduced a $10 million campaign from Foote Cone & Belding featuring the Jimi Hendrix song "Are You Experienced?" On December 7, 1998, Excite premiered a new network and cable television campaign. Six 30-second commercials showed people botching common activities in embarrassing, humorous ways. One spot told viewers that the woman pictured could send photographs to friends around the world using Excite. She then walked through a screen door she had just closed. In another spot a man was all thumbs as he installed an air conditioner only to watch it plummet from his window. The spots ended with the suggestion that if this person could use Excite "you can too."

By 1998 Yahoo!'s growth and success had moved it into the domain of a new set of competitors. The company was being viewed as a key part of the computing establishment and a great destination for Web users. It felt less like a search engine and more like an online service. The competition grew to include Microsoft and America Online (AOL). Microsoft was spending $61 million on television spots built around its theme "Where do you want to go today?" Trying to outduel Microsoft, AOL spent about $66 million on television advertising. AOL's advantages included billions in monthly Internet user fees and the longest track record as a content aggregator.

In 1998 NBC launched a television campaign for its Web portal company Snap!. The commercials used the tagline "Don't Suffer from Information Overload. Snap! Out of It." A 1996 multimillion dollar campaign from Infoseek appeared regularly in full-page ads in the Wall Street Journal. All told, at one point in the 1990s Yahoo! had to contend with nearly 60 different competitors, yet its chief rival had yet to emerge: Google, the search engine that turned itself into a verb, something Yahoo! had failed to achieve. Yahoo! would be forced to reengineer its search capabilities to compete with Google, but more importantly Yahoo! retooled its business model, so that shopping and entertainment and other ventures overshadowed its search-engine business.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Yang believed that success depended upon giving Web users what they wanted and publicizing the brand voraciously. He recruited Karen Edwards to promote the brand. Edwards, who came from BBDO, where she had worked on the Apple account, wasted little time before putting Yahoo! on television with the $5 million ad campaign.

By 1997 advertising of Internet services had grown dramatically. High-tech products like personal computers, printers, and Internet service providers were becoming commodities. Yahoo! and its competitors offered the same access for the same price. As Edwards observed, "It's just like beer or cars. The products are similar enough that image has a lot to do with why people buy one instead of the other."

Chris Charron, an analyst with Forrester Research in Boston, noted, "Users find what they're looking for at Yahoo! While many competitors load their sites with elaborate graphics that can confuse users and delay them, Yahoo!'s site is clear, uncluttered, and fast." A search on competitor Alta Vista might return millions of matches, while the same search on Yahoo! would return a more manageable number of matches arranged in categories.

Edwards also led a so-called guerrilla marketing approach that saw Yahoo! popping up seemingly everywhere, including in magazines and at rock concerts, sports contests, and some unconventional venues. She gave a free auto paint job to any employee who would agree to having the Yahoo! logo displayed on his or her car. The company had a barter deal with the National Football League's 49ers in which the fans shouted, "Yahoo!" to cheer their team as the portal's purple logo burst onto the football stadium screen. Millions saw the Yahoo! Zamboni from the San Jose hockey arena in a scene from the movie EdTV. The Yahoo! logo appeared on a wide array of products, including backpacks, sunglasses, baseballs, computer glasses, skateboards, Slinkys, surfboards, yo-yos, and school stationery.

Some analysts, like those at Fortune, said that these early and inexpensive grassroots promotions were critical in getting Yahoo! far in front of the competition. With little advertising money, Yahoo! often bartered services to expand its reach. And it launched national advertising before nearly all of its competitors. Fortune also lauded Yahoo!'s cobranding of products, services, and contests with well-regarded brands, such as Ben & Jerry's, Visa, and MCI, and with community outreach to 75 nonprofit organizations. All the advertising and marketing would not have helped if Yahoo! did not also evolve and add new services. Users grew accustomed to finding something new at Yahoo! continually. Stock quotes, maps, chat rooms, news, weather, sports, Yellow Pages, and classifieds all broadened the site's appeal and kept its image of being fresh and cool.

Black Rocket's advertising strategy meshed well with Yang's vision of the company. The agency treated Yahoo! not like a technology company but as a consumer brand. "By conjuring up a cool California image—hip but not rad, easy-to-use but not simplistic—it managed to create a cult-like following not unlike that of Apple Computer Inc.'s Macintosh," said BusinessWeek. As it expanded, Yahoo! kept promoting new services under its single brand name. Competitor Lycos took the opposite strategy and built separately branded sites, including Tripod and WhoWhere.

The Yahoo! name itself paid dividends. The memorable and fun name gained wide credit for helping to attract investor attention and build a following. Black Rocket convinced Yahoo! to use the company name in the advertising slogan because it was unusual, irreverent, and memorable. "The name contains the promise of the product," said Owen Shapiro, senior analyst at market and brand research firm Leo J. Shapiro & Associates in BusinessWeek. "It reinforces the idea that when I go to Yahoo!, I'll be so pleased I'll be Yahooing afterwards." The name also implied that everyone knew what Yahoo! was.

While the early ads in the campaign emphasized Yahoo!'s search engine, by 1998 the company was emphasizing its shopping capabilities with spots showing an Arctic fisherman using Yahoo! to buy a hot tub and an overweight superhero buying handbags through Yahoo! to give to crime victims because he could no longer run down purse snatchers.

As the new century dawned, the idea of "Yahooing" did not catch on with Internet users as the company had hoped. Instead, users began to use the term "Googling" to mean "performing an online search." Nevertheless, Yahoo's brand recognition was still strong, and the company found its own lucrative niche on the Web, supported by new executions of the "Do You Yahoo!?" campaign that promoted Yahoo!'s varied product offerings. For example, one 30-second television spot, which premiered during the 2002 Super Bowl, took place on the island of Palau in Micronesia and featured a tourist and dolphin who both realized that they had settled on their vacation destination by using Yahoo! Campaign spots were also translated into other languages to reach an increasingly global market.

OUTCOME

A rapid rise in its stock price gave Yahoo! a market value of $4.3 billion in early 1998—by far the highest of any Internet company. More people accessed Yahoo! at work than any other website, and it ranked second only to America Online in traffic from home. In February 1998 Yahoo! attracted 31.2 million users to its site, 8 million more than second-place finisher Netscape and 13 million more than third-place finisher Microsoft. In May 1999 Advertising Age named Yahoo! its top marketer in the portal category. The company also regularly ranked among the top five sites in average minutes a user spent online a month, according to Media Metrix. And, unlike many early Internet giants, Yahoo! was profitable.

Yahoo! was not, however, immune to the effects of the dot-com crash that occurred at the start of the twenty-first century. Chief executive Timothy Koogle stepped down in the spring of 2001, and a few months later Karen Edwards, part of the team that had developed the "Do You Yahoo!?" tagline, quit "to spend more time with her family." The company continued to use the tagline for nearly two more years. Black Rocket lost the Yahoo! account in August 2003, and the company's new ad agency developed a marketing campaign anchored by the tagline "Life engine."

FURTHER READING

Armstrong, Larry. "Cars, Beer, and Web Browsers." BusinessWeek, May 12, 1997.

Himelstein, Linda. "Yahoo! The Company, the Strategy, the Stock." BusinessWeek, September 7, 1998, p. 66.

Mack, Ann. "No More Funny Stuff." Adweek (western ed.), March 4, 2002, p. 23.

———. "Yahoo!'s New Tune." Adweek, April 5, 2004, p. 10.

Nakache, Patricia. "Secrets of the New Brand Builders: AOL, Yahoo, Palm Computing." Fortune, June 22, 1998.

Piller, Charles. "The Cutting Edge; Sitting on Top of the World; Internet: Yahoo's Lean, Nimble Approach Has Made It the Richest of Web Portals." Los Angeles Times, October 12, 1998, p. C1.

Riedman, Patricia. "Yahoo! Forges Strong Brand while Adding Meaty Content." Advertising Age, May 3, 1999, p. S4.

Saunders, Christopher. "Yahoo! Launches TV, Radio Campaign." Internetnews.com, November 21, 2001. Available from <http://siliconvalley.internet.com/news/print.php/92791>

Stross, Randall E.. "How Yahoo! Won the Search Wars." Fortune, March 2, 1998, p. 148.

Voight, Joan, and Becky Ebenkamp. "Yahoo! TV Spot Is Aimed at Educated, Affluent Men." Adweek (eastern ed.), April 21, 1997, p. 2.

Chris JohnAmorosino
Ed Dinger

LIVE BILLBOARD DATING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Shortly after its launch in 1994 Yahoo! Inc. became one of the Internet's top search engines. Although the company remained primarily associated with its search engine in subsequent years, it also expanded its business operations to include a range of integrated online products and services, including Yahoo! Personals, America's second-most-popular forum for online dating. In 2004 Yahoo! Personals set out to differentiate itself from competitors by using select members of its paid subscription base as the stars of its online advertising. This effort, dubbed "Project: Real People," was not particularly newsworthy on its own, and Yahoo! Personals did not have a media budget sufficient to achieve saturation among its target market of professional singles. A three-day launch event, the "Live Billboard Dating Campaign," sought to rectify this situation.

The "Live Billboard Dating Campaign" was a $140,000 attempt to generate widespread media coverage of the Yahoo! Personals brand. The campaign, which began on January 7, 2004, centered on the efforts of one Yahoo! Personals subscriber, Julie Koehnen, to find an eligible bachelor using the online service. What made the campaign so noteworthy, however, was the fact that Koehnen conducted this search for a date while living, over the course of three days, on a platform erected along the bottom of a highly visible billboard on the Sunset Strip in Los Angeles. The billboard featured Koehnen's Yahoo! Personals photo and text stating, "Julie is looking for a few good dates. (And she's not coming down until she gets them!)" The attached platform offered the amenities necessary for Koehnen to search for dates using Yahoo! Personals and to host romantic prospects live at the billboard before choosing one among the group for further dates. Koehnen's life atop the billboard platform was broadcast, unedited, on the Yahoo! Personals website.

The campaign generated hundreds of stories in the local and national media, including live interviews of Koehnen on such programs as Good Morning America, and it spurred substantial increases in online traffic to the Yahoo! Personals site. Yahoo! Personals overtook Match.com during the first quarter of 2004 to become the nation's leading online dating service. The "Live Billboard Dating Campaign" won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Yahoo! was founded in 1994 by Stanford University Ph.D. students David Filo and Jerry Yang, and it quickly became one of the Internet's leading search engines. In the late 1990s and early 2000s the company expanded into a broad range of online communications, content, and shopping products and services, including the dating website Yahoo! Personals, which debuted in 1997.

Yahoo! Personals served as a forum for singles to search for and communicate with prospective romantic partners. A user created his or her own personal profile, including a photo, and could search the profiles of all other users for potential dates. Yahoo! Personals introduced a subscription model into its service in 2001. Users could still search listings for free, but to interact fully with other singles and post one's own profile, a monthly subscription fee was required. Subscription fees discouraged frivolous use, thereby allowing the larger community of users to take the site more seriously. As Yahoo! Personals and its competitors refined their services—the subscription model became the industry standard—more and more Internet-savvy singles turned to such online dating forums. By 2003 the personals category was outperforming all other online revenue sources (excluding gambling and pornography), and Yahoo! Personals was the number two dating service in cyberspace.

Among the primary marketing challenges facing Yahoo! Personals in this rapidly expanding market was the difficulty of differentiating itself from its competitors.

Most online dating sites offered roughly the same services at roughly the same prices, and there were limited possibilities for cultivating brand allegiance. Another primary challenge was the still-prevalent, if declining, stigma attached to online dating. Many potential users feared the idea that individuals would misrepresent themselves online; others were worried about the embarrassment connected with telling friends and family that a romantic partner had been located via the Internet.

A 2003 Yahoo! Personals campaign called ''Believe,'' crafted by the advertising agency Black Rocket Euro RSCG, sought to position the company as a source of hope in a bleak world, eschewing sexual messages in print and TV work that focused on the common fears and anxieties, as well as the fundamental optimism, of the dating experience. In 2004 Yahoo! Personals attempted to meet these challenges in a new way by focusing on real people in its advertising. The ''Project: Real People'' campaign, which was introduced with the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign,'' was built on a strategy of using actual Yahoo! Personals customers as models in online and print ads. This not only served the purpose of differentiating the brand's communications from those of competitors who employed professional models, but also spoke to the issue of stigmatization by showcasing the attributes of actual users of the service.

LOCATION, LOCATION, LOCATION

The location for the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign''—the Sunset Strip in Hollywood—was ideal for a number of reasons. First, a warm climate was essential to the event, as the campaign's star, Julie Koehnen, would be living outdoors for three days in midwinter. Also, Los Angeles was one of the top markets for Yahoo! Personals, and within Los Angeles the Sunset Strip had a particularly high concentration of vehicle and foot traffic as well as a trendy reputation that would resonate with the campaign target of single professionals. But other, less obvious factors were also crucial to the selection of this location. The outdoor-advertising company that owned the billboard was able to fit the three-day Yahoo! Personals campaign in between two other, longer-term advertisers—not necessarily an easy scheduling feat—and the prevalence of movie filming in the area made it possible for Yahoo! to acquire the appropriate permits for the live webcast in spite of the unusual filming setup. The various elements of the campaign thus fell into place.

TARGET MARKET

The ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign'' had a primary target group of women and a secondary, complementary target group of men. Both groups fit the same profile: 25- to 49-year-old professionals who had never been married, who lived in one of the top 10 Yahoo! Personals urban markets, who were curious but unsure about online dating, and who were interested in an alternative to the dating environment offered by nightclubs and bars.

Like the broader ''Project: Real People'' effort, the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign'' counted among its primary goals the destigmatization of online dating as well as the communication of the idea that real people found real romance via the service. The selection of Julie Koehnen as the subject of the campaign was thus calibrated to perform these functions vis-à-vis both target groups. As an attractive, well-spoken 39-year-old screenwriter, she was meant to show the female target group that Yahoo! Personals was an appropriate forum for impressive, interesting women to meet men. Meanwhile, Koehnen was intended to show men that they might meet someone as desirable as her by using Yahoo! Personals. Koehnen selected and conducted her dates live at the billboard site, effectively showcasing the Yahoo! Personals process.

Local and national media outlets were also a crucial target for the hybrid event. The ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign'' sought to make an impression across America with a limited budget, and it could only do so if print publications and TV programs became convinced that it was a newsworthy event. The project was designed specifically to generate media coverage—i.e., free airtime and print space for Yahoo! Personals—and a variety of media outlets were contacted in advance of the January 7 launch so that they would arrive to cover Koehnen's activities live.

COMPETITION

The leading online dating site prior to the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign'' was Match.com, which offered a $25 monthly subscription service similar to Yahoo! Personals' $20 service. Match.com, like Yahoo! Personals, built an advertising campaign influenced by reality TV. Helmed by Bartle Bogle Hegarty and debuting in July 2003 on the reality program Cupid, the campaign spots attempted to mimic the spirited bickering characteristic of reality TV, which was often structured around head-to-head competition between participants. The spots opened with the personal-ad photos of two supposed Match.com users, and then the photos morphed into characters who competitively berated one another. For instance, one female addressed a competing Match.com user, pictured alongside a palm tree, with this over-the-top diagnosis of her personality: ''You're insane, and I hope you never leave that little island you're stuck on.''

Though not among the Internet's most popular dating sites, eHarmony, introduced in 2000, offered a matchmaking formula that distinguished it from most of Yahoo! Personals' competitors, and a correspondingly higher subscription fee made it one of the more lucrative of competing services. Priced at $50 a month, more than twice the cost of Yahoo! Personals, eHarmony claimed to use scientifically sound psychological profiling to match its subscribers with one another. Rather than simply submitting a personal profile and making contacts with prospective dates of their own volition, eHarmony subscribers submitted to a psychological evaluation consisting of 436 questions, and the service used the results to generate a list of compatible fellow subscribers. EHarmony grew from a base of 20,000 subscribers in December 2000 to more than 4.5 million by the end of 2004.

MARKETING STRATEGY

''Project: Real People,'' a projected yearlong campaign, was built around 50 Yahoo! Personals members chosen from a pool of 38,000 who had responded to a casting call in the months leading up to the launch. The 50 ''Project: Real People'' participants, representing a diverse cross-section of the online dating community, were photographed for print and online ads that were slated to run in the weeks and months following the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign.'' Though the idea of using real people to pitch the dating service was unique in the industry, it was of limited news value, and Yahoo! Personals did not have budgetary resources sufficient to achieve saturation via a traditional media campaign.

The ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign,'' largely conceived and implemented by Yahoo! in-house marketers working within a $140,000 budget, was designed to address these issues. Both a three-day launch event for the larger ''Project: Real People'' campaign and an innovative marketing campaign in its own right, the ''Live Billboard'' effort was a hybrid of outdoor advertisement, buzz-marketing stunt, and reality TV show starring an actual Yahoo! Personals subscriber. Beyond announcing the ''Project: Real People'' campaign, the ''Live Billboard Dating Campaign'' was intended to drive traffic to the Yahoo! Personals website, to spur subscriptions, and to build awareness of the process by which singles met one another using the service.

A billboard on a high-traffic area of the famous Sunset Strip in Hollywood was outfitted with a living room, dining room, and office featuring wireless Internet capability. Julie Koehnen, one of the 50 ''Project: Real People'' finalists, was singled out for her ability to represent the dynamism, attractiveness, and charm that Yahoo! wanted consumers to associate with users of its online dating service. She was asked to live on the billboard for approximately 12 hours a day from January 7 to January 9, 2004, while conducting a search for dates using Yahoo! Personals.

The focus of Koehnen's days on the billboard was the conducting of this search, made possible by her wireless-equipped office, but she was also treated to a variety of wellness and entertainment services, including yoga sessions and visits from a fortune-teller and a comedian, and she made time for the numerous media interviews that the campaign was intended to generate. Over the course of the three days Koehnen interviewed, in person, three men per day at the billboard. At the end of this process she selected one bachelor to invite back for a date on the final evening of her billboard residency. From 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. each day Koehnen's activities were aired, uncut and unedited, on the Yahoo! Personals website, as ''Live Julie TV.'' The billboard above Koehnen's living space featured her photograph and copy reading, ''Julie is looking for a few good dates. (And she's not coming down until she gets them!)'' The Yahoo! Personals logo as well as the Web address where users could go to view Koehnen's profile were also prominently showcased.

OUTCOME

The three-day campaign generated 347 television and radio stories in more than 100 American markets, including coverage on every major Los Angeles network affiliate, more than 50 stories on Los Angeles TV stations alone, and live interviews or stories on such national shows as CNN Headline News, Good Morning America, Good Day Live, ABC News Live, and ESPN2's Cold Pizza. Traffic to the Yahoo! Personals website spiked significantly: unique visits increased 19 percent from the two-week period preceding the campaign and increased 44 percent compared to the same period the previous year. More than half a million viewers watched ''Live Julie TV'' over the course of its three-day run, and Koehnen received more than 1,000 E-mails from Yahoo! Personals subscribers as a result of her billboard residency.

Yahoo! Personals subscriptions increased 199 percent compared with the same period the previous year and 27 percent compared with the two weeks prior to the campaign, and the creation of individual profiles on the site increased by 250 percent and 14 percent respectively, by those same measures. During the first quarter of 2004 Yahoo! Personals overtook Match.com as the most popular online dating service, with an average of 6.4 million visitors per month, compared to Match.com's 5.2 million. The "Live Billboard Dating Campaign" won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005; hosted by the New York American Marketing association, this annual awards event was one of the most prestigious in the advertising industry. "Project: Real People" ran through 2004 and was extended, featuring new batches of Yahoo! Personals subscribers, in subsequent years.

FURTHER READING

Arnold, Catherine. "Web of Love: How Marketers Capitalize on E-motions." Marketing News, November 10, 2003.

Deeken, Aimee. "MindShare." Mediaweek, June 21, 2004.

Lauro, Patricia Winters. "Online Dating, a Hushed Subject but a Roaring Business, Goes Very Public in a Marketing Battle." New York Times, January 27, 2003, p. C9.

Lippert, Barbara. "True Romance." Adweek, April 14, 2003.

Richmond, Riva. "Web Firms Find Bliss in Personals." Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2003.

———. "Yahoo Plays Cupid to Millions and Finds He Is Very Well-Paid." Wall Street Journal, February 11, 2004.

Walker, Leslie. "Yahoo's 1st-Quarter Profit, Revenue Rise; Internet Advertising Drives Rebound." Washington (D.C.) Post, April 8, 2004, p. E05.

Mark Lane

Yard Strength, Inc.

1106 Hermosa Avenue
Hermosa Beach, California 90254
USA
Telephone: (310) 376-4011
Fax: (310) 376-1341
Web site: www.yardstrength.com

■■■

YARD FITNESS CENTER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite rising cases of obesity and gestational diabetes in the United States, one of the fastest-growing American business sectors during the late 1990s was the health and fitness industry. Between 1988 and 2002 memberships at health clubs in the United States rose 95 percent and yielded more than $12 billion in annual sales. An estimated 58 million individuals attended the 18,000 gyms nationwide during 2001. To gain ground on its Los Angeles–area competition, which included the much-larger Sports Club Company chain, Yard Strength, Inc., released a campaign titled after its only gym, Yard Fitness Center, in 2001.

Created by Los Angeles–based agency JC Advertising, the "Yard Fitness Center" campaign, which cost $12,000, consisted of only two television spots that appeared on local ESPN, Fox, and TBS stations. The Yard Fitness Center was located in Hermosa Beach, 22 miles southwest of downtown Los Angeles. Differentiating it from nearby gyms that advertised with in-club events and print ads, the August 2001 campaign's television spots suggested that gym members did not necessarily exercise for health reasons but simply to look better without clothes on. The television spot "Coverage" humorously began with a group of men playing basketball on public courts. Much to the unease of everyone playing, one of the more obnoxious players wore nothing but socks, sneakers, eyeglasses, and a headband. The spots ended with the tagline "Feel comfortable in your own skin" and the Yard Fitness Center logo.

Despite the fitness center's meager budget and single 4,500-square-foot facility, "Yard Fitness Center" achieved ad-industry success usually reserved for larger corporations. It won an award for Low Budget Campaign at the London International Advertising Awards and a Bronze Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival. "Yard Fitness Center" also increased awareness of the gym in Los Angeles. For the year following the campaign, Yard Fitness Center received thousands of E-mails from consumers who had enjoyed the commercials.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Located in Hermosa Beach, California, the Yard Fitness Center expanded between 1994 and 2005 to become a reputable high-end gymnasium within the Los Angeles coastal community. With one 4,500-square-foot facility, cutting-edge fitness machines, more than 10,000 pounds of free weights, and a boxing center, the gym appealed to some of the world's best professional athletes and Olympians. Much of the center's early publicity arose from magazines—such as Benningan's Health & Fitness, HEAT Volleyball Magazine, and Muscle Media—publishing articles about the gym's charismatic owner, Jeremy

"Troll" Subin. Subin was a former National Championship powerlifter whose career highlights included competing for the United States at competitions in the Soviet Union. While overseeing the Yard Fitness Center he began training professional athletes such as the Dodgers' MVP catcher Mike Piazza; Rookie of the Year Eric Karros, also a Dodger; and three-time Olympic volleyball medalist Steve Timmons. In the South Bay Weekly, Jason Kendall, catcher for the Pittsburgh Pirates, stated, "Troll helps me stay strong for 162 games without losing my flexibility. I'm different from Karros, and I'm different from Piazza. I'm a guy who has to use my flexibility, and that's what Troll focuses on."

Outside of the favorable press coverage and word-of-mouth praise, the Yard Fitness Center did little to advertise. Subin occasionally used his personal success to endorse the fitness center. In an issue of Benningan's Health & Fitness, he stated, "If you really want to improve your performance and prevent injuries, you need to train like an athlete, regardless of your level. At The Yard, we've carefully selected high-end equipment to help both professional athletes and 'civilians' maximize their physical potential." A few ads appeared in local publications with photographs of Mike Piazza or Eric Karros beside the gym's logo. Taglines for the ads read, "Where the good people are," or "Where preparation meets opportunity."

SHOOTING LOCATION

One of "Yard Fitness Center" campaign's two commercials, "Coverage," was filmed in six hours and featured a group of clothed, uncomfortable men trying to play basketball with one naked player. Even though the main actor wore nothing but a "small device" to cover his genitalia, the spot was filmed in a public park next to a daycare center.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign's first spot, "Coverage," targeted 20- to 40-year-old male sports enthusiasts, and the second spot, "Dressed For Dinner," featuring an easygoing naked couple going to dinner with another couple, who wore clothes, targeted 20- to 40-year-old women. Both groups of consumers differed from the Yard Fitness Center's previous target: athletes. "For this campaign, we targeted sports enthusiasts that enjoyed sports. Even though we previously targeted athletes, they only made up 2 percent of our clientele," Subin said. "We knew athletes would keep coming in because of our reputation, but this campaign was going to target the masses." Between 1988 and 2002 memberships at U.S. health clubs rose 95 percent. The average gym member had changed during that period as well. In 1987 Americans 55 years old and up constituted only 9 percent of gym members, but the number had jumped to 17 percent by 2002.

COMPETITION

The Sports Club Company, Inc., one of the most elite high-end fitness organizations in Los Angeles, carried memberships with some of America's best-known celebrities, such as Michael Jordan and Tom Cruise. Branded as the Sports Club, the Los Angeles–based gym prided itself as being the "Ritz-Carlton of gyms" and limited its advertising to on-site promotions, a newsletter, and cross-promotions with brands such as Giorgio Armani, American Airlines, and luxury watch manufacturer Audemars Piguet. In 2001 the Sports Club did not release print, television, or other traditional forms of advertisement. The club's cofounder, Nanette Pattee Francini, said in American Demographics that the Sports Club positioned itself as "a sanctuary from daily life. We don't do really blatant advertising." The chain of nine clubs, two of which were in the Los Angeles area, posted $102 million in sales for 2001, a 33 percent increase from 2000.

America's largest fitness chain, Bally Total Fitness Holding Corp., boasted 415 gyms and posted $852 million in sales for 2001. The corporation's flagship club, Bally Total Fitness, allowed outside brands to dispense free samples to members inside their gym. According to the trade group Promotion Marketing Association's Product Sampling and Demonstration Council, 68 percent of gym members were excited about receiving free samples. In 2001 Bally allowed consumer-product giant Unilever, which owned brands such as Dove, Bird's Eye, and Hellman's, to sponsor "Dove Days." This promotion, for which club staffers wore Dove apparel, included free fitness classes for Bally members. Female members were handed Dove Body Refreshers upon entering the gyms. To target calorie-conscious consumers, Kraft Foods placed coupons for its low-fat cheese products in Bally gyms during 2001. The coupons could be redeemed for a complimentary, 14-day Bally membership or $75 towards a future membership. The promotion was advertised in consumer magazines such as People, Shape, and Reader's Digest. Bally allowed similar promotions with Sunkist Growers, the Kellogg Company, and Eastman Kodak Company.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Yard Fitness Center" campaign's two spots, "Coverage" and "Dressed For Dinner," were written by

''TROLL''

Jeremy Subin, owner of the Yard Fitness Center, preferred to be called ''Troll'' by gym members and colleagues. The 5'2', 175-lb fitness expert trained a plethora of Los Angeles–based athletes, including baseball's 1993 Rookie of the Year, Mike Piazza, and Eric Karros, the 1992 Rookie of the Year. Subin monitored the athletes' diets and heart rates and also changed their training regimens to involve medicine-ball tosses, baseball drills, and Olympic weight-lifting drills.

JC Advertising's Josh Caplan and directed by Backyard Production's Kevin Smith. A writer for the Creative Review commented that the campaign ''proposes that people go to the gym not to feel healthy, but to look good naked.'' The first 30-second spot, ''Coverage,'' began with a close-up of three basketball players whispering at the edge of a public basketball court. ''I can't cover this guy, man,'' one said. Another pleaded, ''I don't wanna cover him.'' The third implored, ''What're we gonna do?'' The camera then showed the player no one wanted to cover: a trash-talking, frizzy-haired player wearing nothing but shoes, socks, glasses, and a headband. The naked player shouted to the three whispering, ''OK, ladies. Let's go. Time-out's over.''

The spot then showed the naked man, with his genitalia blurred, frightening off opponents with full-body presses and other physical contact that, had he been wearing clothes, would be considered appropriate during a basketball game. At one point the naked man jumped for a slam dunk and, much to the dismay of an opponent, pressed his groin into the opponent's face. Unapologetic, the naked man shouted, ''You want a piece of me?'' The commercial continued with the nudist scoring and trash-talking opponents until the spot faded blue and the tagline, ''Feel comfortable in your own skin,'' appeared. The logo for Yard Fitness and its Hermosa Beach address followed. Director Kevin Smith told Advertising Age's Creativity, ''It seemed doable and it seemed like it might be pretty funny. But it would be very easy to take it over the top.'' As for encouraging the actors' disgust towards the nearly naked antagonist, Smith continued, ''That's pretty much the natural reaction someone would have playing basketball with a naked guy.''

The second spot, ''Dressed For Dinner,'' began when a naked, 30-something woman opened the door to a clothed man and woman who were immediately dumbstruck by her lack of attire. They couple was obviously meeting the naked woman for dinner at a restaurant. ''Oh, hi guys,'' greeted the naked woman, sounding cheerful. The spot became more absurd when the woman's husband appeared wearing only a tie, black socks, and black shoes. ''Rog isn't wearing a tie,'' the naked man pleaded with his wife. ''No,'' she said, grinning at his tie. ''You're wearing it.''

Conceptually, the 30-second spot followed ''Coverage'' by featuring individuals, who after apparently joining the Yard Fitness Center, felt extremely comfortable without their clothes on. ''Dressed For Dinner'' ended the same way the other spot had, with the tagline and the Yard logo. The final shot featured the naked man looking completely content and settling into the front seat of the clothed man's minivan. ''Wow,'' he said as his naked body squeaked over the leather seats, ''leather—I like it.'' The clothed man's eyes opened wide with revulsion.

OUTCOME

According to Yard Fitness Center president, Jeremy ''Troll'' Subin, the campaign ''Caused quite a disturbance. Some people thought we were crazy.'' Commercial Closet, an organization dedicated to improving public sensibilities toward lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender issues within advertisement, attacked ''Coverage'' for using ''fear of same-sex attraction (homophobia) or 'inappropriate' gender behavior (transphobia)—accompanied by a horrific reaction by someone straight—as their source of humor.'' The spot ''Coverage'' was placed into a category of commercials that ''[did] not meet Commercial Closet's Best Practices.''

For the months following the campaign, the Yard Fitness Center did not record a significant rise in gym memberships. A year later, however, its brand awareness began to grow. The campaign's blend of absurdity and nudity was smiled upon at some of the largest advertising award shows of 2002. Even though the campaign's budget was a mere $12,000, ''Coverage'' won a Bronze Lion at the 2002 Cannes International Advertising Festival. The ''Yard Fitness Center'' campaign also won Low Budget Campaign of the year at the 2002 London International Advertising Awards. ''Coverage'' made the shortlist for the western United States region of AdForum magazine's first Creative Hits awards, which allowed AdForum website visitors to rate commercials online. By mid-2002, after the commercials were repeated on several network shows showcasing America's funniest commercials, Yard Fitness Center received thousands of E-mails and phone calls from people who had enjoyed the spots.

FURTHER READING

Champagne, Christine. '' 'Tag' Is It at London Int'l Ad Awards.'' Shoot, November 15, 2002, p. 1.

Fass, Allison, and Jonathan D. Glater. "Bally Fitness Selects Foote, Cone." New York Times, August 14, 2002, p. 3.

Frank, John. "MWW Creates Nutrition and Supplements Practice." PR Week US, June 24, 2002, p. 5.

Hanas, Jim. "Production Notes." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 2001, p. 51.

Lazare, Lewis. "Ad Notes." Chicago Sun-Times, September 30, 2002, p. 53.

———. "FCB Chief Survives Grueling Year." Chicago Sun-Times, September 9, 2002, p. 49.

Lockwood, Lisa. "Mags Brace for Challenging '03." Women's Wear Daily, November 8, 2002, p. 30.

McDermott, Maura. "With Some of These Deals, What You Lose Is Your Money." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, August 11, 2002, p. 2.

Paul, Pamela. "Locker Room Advertising." American Demographics, December 1, 2002, p. 28.

Singh, Rashmi Uday. "A Bloody Good Restaurant." India Today Plus, October 1, 2002, p. 58.

Takaki, Millie. "'In Your Face': An Unguardable Player." Shoot, August 24, 2001, p. 13.

Ward, Alyson. "Marketers Finding Sneaky New Ways to Pitch." Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 17, 2002, p. E1.

Woodward, Sarah. "Avenue Grows Roster." Shoot, June 28, 2002, p. 8.

———. "Editor Mori Joins CO-OP." Shoot, August 23, 2002, p. 7.

Kevin Teague

Index

Bold page numbers refer to the main entries for companies or organizations profiled in* EMMC. Page numbers in italics refer to photos. Cross references are included for user reference.

A

A & E Television Networks, 1–3
  Airline, 44
  Discovery Communications, as competitor of, 453
  Public Broadcasting Service, as competitor of, 1411
  TBS, as competitor of, 1663–1664
  Turner Classic Movies, as competitor of, 1661
"A & F Quarterly" campaign, 9–12, 580–581
AAAA. See American Association of Advertising Agencies
AAdvantage program, 7
AAF. See American Advertising Federation
Aaker, David, 21, 841
Aardman Animations, 1501, 1503
Aaron, Hank, 1107
Aaron, Marcia, 1229
"Aaron Burr" spot, 183, 257, 259
AARP, 1263
"Abandoned Mr. S" spot, 28
Abbott Mead Vickers, 429
"Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
ABC, Inc., 5–8
  ESPN, partnership with, 514
  Game Show Network, as competitor of, 593
  PowerAde, partnership with, 342
  TBS, as competitor of, 1663–1664
Aber Diamond Corp., 444
Abercrombie & Fitch, 9–13, 10
  French Connection, as competitor of, 580–581
  Gap, as competitor of, 596–597, 599, 603
Abramischvili, Guram, 1707
Absolut
  "Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733, 1730
  "American Apparel" campaign compared to campaign of, 74
  Johnnie Walker, as competitor of, 425
  Stolichnaya, as competitor of, 1707
"Absolutely, Positively Overnight" campaign, 540
Academy Awards
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280, 1282
  Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk Baby!" campaign, 1301
  Mercedes "Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994, 996
  Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801, 1803
The Academy Awards Movie, 140
Accenture, Ltd., 15–18
Access Codes for dial-around services, 976
Accident/liability insurance. See Insurance Accord, Honda
  Galant, as competitor of, 1033
  "Grrr" campaign, 745–748
  Oldsmobile Alero, as competitor of, 654
Ace K, 1304, 1305
Acesulfame potassium, 1304, 1305
Ackerman McQueen, 879–881, 955
Acquisitions. See Mergers and acquisitions
"Action Figure" spot (Ventura for Governor), 1742
"Action Figures" spot (FedEx), 537, 540
"Action Figures" spot (Geico), 615
"Action" spot, 735
Acura, 95
Ad Store
  "Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
  "JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
Adams, Dick, 960
Adams, Joey Lauren, 1426
Adams gum, 1828–1829
Adamson, Allen, 60, 228
Adamson, James B., 226
Adbusters (magazine), 72
ADDY Awards
  A & E "In Case You Missed It" campaign, 3
  "Altoids" campaign, 1824
  Ameritech "Privacy Manager" campaign, 156
  Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126

ADDY Awards, continued
AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 153
California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 260
Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627, 629
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1059
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517, 519–520
Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign, 736
H&R Block, "Worried About Bill" campaign, 687, 689
"The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1282
Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk Baby!" campaign, 1302
Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 903
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 906
Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator" campaign, 1321
Maryland State Lottery campaign, 948
Mercedes "Passion" campaign, 990
"Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1021
"NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1101
Pabst "Remember Rainier" campaign, 1245, 1248
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1359
"Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 870
Sims Sports "Be Free" campaign, 1516
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1534
"Sprint PCS" campaign, 1554, 1556
Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1569
Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 981
Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1617
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765, 1768
Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749, 1751
AdForum Creative Hits award, 996
adidas America, Inc., 19–22
Fila, as competitor of, 553
logo, 24
New Balance, as competitor of, 1124
Nike, as competitor of, 1140, 1146, 1152–1153
adidas-Salomon AG, 23–29
Adiemus (song), 413, 414
"Adios, Amigos" spot, 1021
Adkins, Trace, 841
"Adoption" spot, 629
"Ads by Dick" campaign, 115, 125, 128
Advanced Micro Devices Inc., 769–770, 773–774
Advanced Photo System, 479–481, 1164
Advantage Razor, 1191
Advantix campaign, 479–482, 485–488
Advent Rising (video game), 1003
Advertising Age
ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, recognition of, 75, 78
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign recognition, 119
CVS "Life to the Fullest" campaign recognition, 375
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign recognition, 503
FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign recognition, 540
Gap campaign recognition, 602
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign recognition, 740
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign recognition, 906
McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign recognition, 964, 966
Nissan "Enjoy the Ride" campaign recognition, 1173
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign recognition, 1473, 1475
Advertising agencies. See Specific agencies
The Advertising Council, Inc., 31–34
"Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101–103
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better "Child Hunger" campaign, 363–366
Advertising Standards Authority (United Kingdom), 1038
Advertising Walk of Fame, 35, 37, 39
Advertising Women of New York "Good" Award
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 952
"Nordstrom "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, 1187
Advil "Liqui-Gels" campaign, 1839–1842
Adweek
adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign recognition, 29
Allstate "Our Stand" campaign recognition, 53
American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign recognition, 100
Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign recognition, 138
Apple Computer "Switchers" campaign recognition, 139, 140, 141
Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign recognition, 222
CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign recognition, 281
Cheerios "Stories" campaign recognition, 627, 629
Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign recognition, 325, 328
CVS "Life to the Fullest" campaign recognition, 375
"Echo" spot, 250
FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign recognition, 540
Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign recognition, 593
Gatorade "Origins" campaign recognition, 1286, 1289
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign recognition, 726
Kinko's "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign recognition, 543
Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign recognition, 1687, 1689
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign recognition, 906
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign recognition, 952
"Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco" campaign recognition, 1027, 1030
New Balance "Thunderstorm, Stairs" campaign, 1123
"On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign recognition, 681, 682
PowerAde "Keep Playing" campaign recognition, 341, 343
priceline.com "Troubadour" campaign recognition, 1369, 1372
Reebok "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign recognition, 1417, 1420
Snapple "Bottles Personified" campaign, 239
Staples "That Was Easy" campaign recognition, 1563, 1566
Aerosmith, 1285
Aetna, 1726–1727
AFC Enterprises, 317, 318
Affleck, Ben, 209
Aflac, Inc., 35–41

Aflac Cancer Center, 37, 39
"The Aflac Duck" campaign, 35–38
African-American history, 1202
  Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print" campaign, 1107–1109
African-American market
  Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 632
  Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 562
  Miles Thirst as stereotype, 349
  Oldsmobile Alero "Start Something" campaign, 653–654, 655
  Popeyes "Stand Up for Flavor" campaign, 841
  Sears campaign, 1489
  Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign, 346–347
  Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 308
  Toyota "A Car to Be Proud of Campaign," 1633
  Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1673, 1674
African-Americans
  Hilton campaign, 730
  in Tommy Hilfiger ads, 1628
Agadi, Harsha V., 318
Agassi, Andre
  annual endorsement income, 552
  Canon camera spots, 346
  "Do the Dew" campaign, 1271
  Nike campaign, 1132
  "U.S. Open Excitement" campaign, 1722, 1723, 1724
Agency.com, 998
Agent Orange (film), 61
Ages of Myst (computer game), 380
Agri-Mark, Inc., 255
Aguilera, Christina, 129, 1479
Aguirre, Luis, 93
AICP Show, 1409, 1412
AIDS prevention, 312
Air France, 415
Air Jordan shoes, 1131–1132
Air Max shoe, 1149
Airborne Express, 420
Airline (television show), 44
Airlines
  AirTran "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign, 43–46
  Amtrak, as competitors of, 1105
  Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign, 411–414, 415
  Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 414–417
  "JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
  Northwest Airlines "E-Ticket" campaign, 1205–1208
  Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 407–410
  Southwest Airlines "Must Be Football Season" campaign, 1535–1538
  "Ted Launch" campaign, 1701–1704
  United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695–1698
  United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1698–1701
  Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1757–1760
Airplane! (film), 805
"Airplane" spot, 503
"Airport" spot, 158–159, 1773, 1775
AirTran Holdings, Inc., 43–46
Airwair. See Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC
Airwalk, 1152
"Al" spot, 1770
Alaska, 1444
Alba, Jessica, 600
Albers, Tom, 1251
Albert, Michael, 1062
Albertsons grocery stores, 1688
Alcoholic beverages
  "Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
  "Absolut Print" campaign, 1733–1737
  Glenfiddich "Single Malt" campaign, 683–686
  Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
  Mike's Hard Lemonade "Hard Day" campaign, 1013
  Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
Alden, Gary, 452
Aldrich, Jay, 1084
Alero
  New Beetle, as competitor of, 1785–1786
  "Start Something" campaign, 652–656
Alex, as competitor of Crayon, 188
Alexander, Greg, 1043
Alexander, Jason, 319, 385, 767, 770
ALF. See American Legacy Foundation
"Alguien digo McDonald's?" campaign, 962
Ali, Laila, 23, 25, 26
Ali, Muhammad
  adidas campaign, 23–25, 25
  Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 142
  IBM "Linux" campaign, 795, 796–797
All-American Soccer Stars Victory Tour, 1274
"All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 158–159, 1773–1776
All Japan CM Festival awards, 1134
All Sport, 1288
All-Star Benefit Concert, 1274
Allan, Beth, 1049
Allard, J., 1002
Allard, Wayne, 657
Allegra
  Freedom Forecast, 1462
  "Spirit of Freedom" campaign, 1461–1464
  Zyrtec, as competitor of, 1313
Allen, Gracie, 832
Allen, Marcus, 1549
Allen, Paul, 1241
Allen, Rick, 452
Allen, Steve, 1358
Allen, Tim, 650
Allergen counts, 1462
Alley, Kirstie, 815–818, 816
Allied Domecq PLC, 47–50
Allison, Donnie, 1094
The Allstate Corporation, 51–54, 617, 620
Ally & Gargano
  Dunkin' Donuts "Fred the baker" campaign, 48
  FedEx "Fast-Paced World" spot, 538
Alpert, Herb, 608
Alpha-Bits, 628–629
Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, 1674
Alter, Stewart, 611
Alternate reality games, 157–160
Alternative music
  Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459, 460, 461
  Fusion Flash Concerts, 560
Altmann, Olivier, 1609
"Altoids" campaign, 1821–1824, 1825
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1824–1827
Altria Group Inc., 55–58, 249
  See also Philip Morris Companies Inc.
"Always Coca-Cola" campaign, 351
"Always Out There" campaign, 431–434
Amacher, Jacquie, 1070
"Amazing Sprint Sense Dime Find" contest, 1546
"Amazon Theater" campaign, 59–62

Amazon.com, Inc., 59–62
Borders, as competitor of, 197
eBay, as competitor of, 497
Ambrosio, Chris, 1069
Ambush (film), 177–178
AMC. See American Movie Classics
AMD. See Advanced Micro Devices Inc.
Amelie (film), 1652
America Online, Inc., 63–69
American Greetings, partnership with, 693
Lycos, as competitor of, 917
TelSave, partnership with, 151
Yahoo!, as competitor of, 1852
American Advertising Awards. See ADDY Awards
American Advertising Federation
adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign, 29
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 32
American Advertising Foundation
Center on Multiculturalism, Corporate Mosaic Award, 1282
American Airlines
AAdvantage program, 7
Delta Air Lines, as competitor of, 413, 415–416
national monuments in advertising, 1604
Northwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1206–1207
Southwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1537
United Airlines, as competitor of, 1696–1697
American Apparel Inc., 71–74, 581
American Association of Advertising Agencies, 32
American Cancer Society, 97, 664
American Chicle Group, 233–234
American Civil Liberties Union, 75–78
American Eagle Outfitters, 11, 598, 599
American Express Company, 79–90
Amazon.com partnership with, 62
"Charge against Hunger" campaign, 364–365
Citibank, as competitor of, 327
Discover, as competitor of, 1051–1052, 1054–1055
MasterCard, as competitor of, 951
"Seinfeld" campaign, 1056
Visa, as competitor of, 1766
American Greetings Corporation, 693
American Home Products, 1839–1842
American Honda Motor Company, 91–95, 92, 93
American Idol (television show), 48
American Legacy Foundation, 97–100, 249–250, 1029
American Medical Women's Association, 1329, 1331, 1332
American Movie Classics, 1659, 1660–1661
American Movie (film), 1642
"An American Revolution" campaign, 631–634
"American Tartans" campaign, 1627–1630
American Telemarketing Association, 156
American Tobacco Company, 55
Americans for the Arts, 101–104
"America's Adventure Place" campaign, 873
"America's Best Classroom" program, 1688
America's Second Harvest, 364, 365
Ameritech. See AT&T Inc.
Ameritrade, 529
Ammirati Puris Lintas
Ameritech "Privacy Manager" campaign, 153–156
Burger King "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign, 225–228
Compaq "Has It Changed Your Life Yet?" campaign, 134
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 867–870
UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1709–1712
Amos, James, 920
Amos, John, Paul, and Bill, 35, 38
Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1103–1106, 1104
AMWA. See American Medical Women's Association
Amway, 1685
ANA. See Association of National Advertisers
ANA/AICP Battle of the Brands, 1248
Andersen Consulting. See Accenture, Ltd.
Anderson, Fred, 142
Anderson, Lonnie, 1689
Anderson, Richard Dean, 952
Anderson, Scott, 213
Anderson, Wes, 757
Andrew, Kyle, 596
Andrews, Jim, 554
Andrews, William, 1111
Androgyny, 262
ANDY Awards
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1827
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 153
ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1499
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525, 528
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
Kinko's "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign, 543
Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 903
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 906
Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 930
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1079
Museum of Contemporary Art "Labels" campaign, 1081, 1084
Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1427
Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 168
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1534
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801, 1803
Andy Head Award, 544
Anelka, Nicolas, 25
Angelo, David, 1298
Angona, Bob, 908
Angotti, Thomas, Hedge, 569–573
Angry Leprechaun web site, 441
"Angst Band" spot, 205
Anheuser, Eberhard, 105, 109
Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc., 105–130, 124, 127
Miller Brewing Company, as competitor of, 1019–1020
SABMiller, as competitor of, 1449–1451, 1454
Samuel Adams labeling practices, 201
Animal mascots
Aflac duck, 35–40
Bud Ice penguins, 120–122
Budweiser frogs, 108–112
Budweiser Louie the Lizard, 116–120
Cadillac Catera duck, 639
Dinky (Taco Bell dog), 1594–1597
GEICO "Gecko" campaign, 613–616
Serta sheep, 1501–1503

Animal Planet, 451
Animal testing, 191, 192
Animatronics
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 108–112
  Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 116–120
Annie Awards, 1695, 1697
Ansell Consumer Products, 312, 313
"ANSKY guys," 28–29
Antacids, 1322–1325
"Anthem" spot (Campbell's soup), 271
"Anthem" spot (Dr. Pepper), 466
"Anthem" spot (Fila), 553
"Anthem" spot (Häagen-Dazs), 1119, 1121
"Anthem" spot (Hewlett-Packard), 724
"Anthem" spot (T-Mobile), 1625
"Anthem" spot (United States Tennis Association), 1723
Anti-brands, 72–73
Anti-impotency drugs, 1325–1328
Anti-Money Laundering Act, 322
Antidepressants
  Paxil "Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
  Prozac print campaign, 505–508
Antiestablishment campaigns, 1086
Antiperspirants. See Deodorants and antiperspirants
Antismoking campaigns
  California Department of Health, Tobacco Control Section campaigns, 243–247, 244, 245, 248–251
  "Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco" campaign, 1027–1030
  "Truth" campaign, 97–100
Antitrust trial of Microsoft, 1005
Antonini, Joseph, 851
"Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 669–673
"AOL Latino" campaign, 63–66
AOL Time Warner, 1241, 1242, 1244
  See also America Online, Inc.
"Apartment 10G" spot, 1296, 1303
"Apartment" spot, 611
"APB" spot, 652
Apicella, David, 88
"Apology" spot, 537, 539
Apple Computer, Inc., 131–145, 132, 133
  Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 722
  Hewlett-Packard, partnership with, 726
  Intel, as competitor of, 770, 774
  iPod, 136
  Microsoft, as competitor of, 1006
Apple stores, 139
Applegate, Christina, 1747
The Apprentice (television show), 221, 1041
APS. See Advanced Photo System
Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1274–1277
Aquos televisions, 1505, 1506, 1507
Arch Deluxe, 957, 961
Archer Daniels Midland Company, 287, 1036
"The Architect" spot, 1362
"Arctic Ground Squirrel" spot, 431, 433
Are You Experienced? (song), 1852
Ariel, 1378
Arison, Micky, 294
Arison, Ted, 293, 294
Arliss (television show), 951
Arm & Hammer laundry detergent, 1396
  See also Church & Dwight Company, Inc.
Armageddon (film), 633, 1590
Armstrong, C. Michael, 977
Armstrong, Lance
  adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 24
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
  Nike campaign, 1145
Armstrong, Louis, 103
Armstrong, Neil, 3
"Army of One" campaign, 1263
Arnell, Peter, 1230, 1418
Arnell Group
  Fila "Grant Hill 4" campaign, 553
  Reebok "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign, 1417
Arnold, Tim, 677
Arnold Communications
  JetBlue campaign, 408–409, 820, 821
  McDonald's "Donna Summer" spot, 963
  Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1783–1786
Arnold Worldwide
  American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 97–100
  Antismoking campaign, 249–250
  FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
  "On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign, 679
  Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441–1444
  Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1671–1674
  Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1776–1779
  Volkswagen Jetta "All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 1773–1776
  Volkswagen New Beetle "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 170–171
  Volkswagen Passat "Live Large" campaign, 1780–1783
Arquette, David
  AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 153
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 350, 352
  Gap campaign, 602, 607
Arquette, Rosanna, 496, 498
"The Arquettes" spot, 352
"Arrest" spot, 33
Arrow Trading Company, 1588
Art
  "Absolut Print" campaign, 1730, 1733–1737
  "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101–104
  Museum of Contemporary Art "Labels" campaign, 1081–1084
  Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
"Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101–104
Art Directors Club Awards
  "Miller High Life" campaign, 1455
  Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1088
  Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print Campaign," 1109
"The Art of the Heist" campaign, 157–160, 1775
Arthritis Foundation, 1438, 1439, 1440
Arthur Andersen, 15–16
Arts-and-crafts toys, 189
Arts and Entertainment Television Networks. See A & E Television Networks
Ashby, Deanna, 873
Ashe, Arthur, 1137
Asher & Partners, 243–247
Asher/Gould, 248–251
Asherton-Pickett, M.D., 928
Asian-Americans
  in Tommy Hilfiger ads, 1628
  Toyota "Kids Rule" campaign, 1644
"AsiaOne" campaign, 549
ASIMO (robot), 741, 743
"Ask-a-Tech" sessions, 609, 611
"Ask Iris" web site, 1387
Aspartame, 241, 1304

Association of National Advertisers, 32
Association of Volleyball Professionals, 1275
Astaire, Fred, 1437–1439, 1438
Astaire, Robyn, 1438, 1439, 1440
Astin, Sean, 1235, 1236
Aston, Lottie, 1143
"At Your Side" campaign, 1047–1050
ATHENA Awards
  Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101, 103
  Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 195, 197
  "US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721, 1724
Athletes
  Breathe Right Strips, 338
  Charles Schwab "Smarter Investors" campaign, 303–304
  Fila "Grant Hill 4" campaign, 551–554
  Gillette "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 672
  Nike campaigns, 1132, 1139, 1145
  Nike "Move" campaign, 1142, 1144
  Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1149
  PowerAde "Keep Playing" campaign, 343
  Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043, 1046
  shoe company endorsements, 751
  Sports-fantasy promotions, 47, 48, 49
  Yard Fitness Center, 1860
  See also Specific athletes
Athletic apparel
  Nike "Move" campaign, 1141–1144
  Nike "Play" campaign, 1144–1147
  Nike "What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders?" campaign, 1150–1154
  Nike "Women's" campaign, 1154–1157
Athletic footwear
  adidas America, Inc., 19–22
  adidas-Salomon AG, 23–26
  Fila USA "Grant Hill 4" campaign, 551–554
  FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
  New Balance "Thunderstorm, Stairs" campaigns, 1123–1125
  Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1134–1138
  Nike "Meet the LeBrons" campaign, 1138–1141
  Nike "Move" campaign, 1141–1144
  Nike "9,000 Shots" campaign, 1131–1134
  Nike "Play" campaign, 1144–1147
  Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1147–1150
  Nike "What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders?" campaign, 1150–1154
  Nike "Women's" campaign, 1154–1157
  Reebok "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign, 1417–1420
Atkins Diet
  Advantage bars, 933
  Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 440
  Diet Rite and, 240, 242
  Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1672–1673
Atlas, Jacoba, 1410
AT&T Inc., 147–156, 1625
  MCI, as competitor of, 972–973, 976–977
  SBC Communications, as competitor of, 1474–1475
  Sprint, as competitor of, 1544–1545, 1548
  Sprint PCS, as competitor of, 1555
  Working Assets Long Distance, as competitor of, 1836–1837
"The Attic" spot, 84
Aubrey, Stever, 231
Auctions, online
  eBay 2004 television campaign, 496–499
  eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
Audi of America, Inc., 157–160
  Honda, as competitor of, 747
  Mercedes-Benz, as competitor of, 995
  Volkswagen, as competitor of, 1774–1775
Augustsson, Peter, 1446
"Aunt Rosalina" spot, 355, 356
Aurius, 445
Austin, Debi, 246
Austin Powers (film), 707, 1335
Ausubel, Lawrence, 88
Auto racing, 1093–1096
"AUTOgraphs for Education" program, 1459
Automobiles
  American Honda Motor Company "What About Now?" campaign, 91–95
  Audi "Art of the Heist" campaign, 157–160
  BMW "The Hire" campaign, 175–179
  "The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 638–641
  Cadillac "Break Through" campaign, 634–637
  Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 631–634
  Chrysler "Engineered to be Great Cars" campaign, 386–389
  Chrysler Group "Employee Pricing Plan Plus" campaign, 383–386
  Ford "Driving American Innovation" campaign, 555–558
  Ford "Life In Drive" campaign, 558–561
  Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 561–564
  General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 641–645
  General Motors "Hummer" campaign, 645–648
  Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745–748
  Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741–744
  Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177–1180
  Isuzu "The Call" campaign, 803–806
  "Jeep" campaign, 389–392
  Jeep "There's Only One" campaign, 392–394
  Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign, 1646–1649
  "Mercedes-Benz Corporate Branding" campaign, 983–987
  Mercedes M-Class "Smooth Ride" campaign, 990–994
  Mercedes "Passion" campaign, 987–990
  Mercedes "Smooth Ride" campaign, 990–994
  Mercedes "Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994–996
  MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 169–172
  MINI Cooper "MINI Robots" campaign, 172–175
  Mitsubishi "Wake Up and Drive" campaign, 1031–1034
  Nissan "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign, 1167–1170
  Nissan "Enjoy the Ride" campaign, 1171–1174

Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1174–1177
Oldsmobile Alero "Start Something" campaign, 652–656
Porsche "Cayenne Launch" campaign, 1365–1368
Saab "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1445–1447
"Saturn Relaunch" campaign, 1465–1467
Saturn "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign, 1468–1472
Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1509–1512
Stanley Steamer, 1560
Suburban Auto Group "Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1579–1582
Toyota Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1641–1643
Toyota Corolla "A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631–1634
Toyota "Everyday" campaign, 1634–1637
Toyota "Fuel for Thought" campaign, 1638–1640
Toyota Sienna "Kids Rule" campaign, 1643–1646
Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1776–1779
Volkswagen Jetta "All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 1773–1776
Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1783–1786
Volkswagen Passat "Live Large" campaign, 1780–1783

Automotive service centers
General Motors "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, 648–652
"Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1009–1012

Autry, Gene, 986

Aveda
The Body Shop, as competitor of, 192
Herbal Essences, as competitor of, 334

Avedon, Richard, 261

Avery Dennison, 1458

Avia, Pierre, 1748

AXA Financial, 764–765

Axtman, Melanie, 1083

B

Babb, Stuart, 1125

"The Babe" spot, 1300, 1301

"Baby Bob" campaign, 1413–1415

Baby boomers
Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 220
Cadillac "Break Through" campaign, 635–636, 636–637
Carnival Corporation "Fun Ships" campaign, 294
Chrysler "Engineered to Be Great Cars" campaign, 387
Crate & Barrel 1998 print ads campaign, 533–536
Dirt Devil "Fred Astaire" campaign, 1439
Ford Explorer campaign, 993
Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 596
Gap "Khakis" campaign, 602
Gap stores, redesigned, 599
Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1179
Intel "Bunny People" campaign, 769
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 894
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 950
Mercedes "Corporate Branding" campaign, 984, 985, 986
Mercedes M-Class "Smooth Ride" campaign, 993
"Miller High Life" campaign, 1453
Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1330
priceline.com "Troubadour" campaign, 1370
Round Table Pizza "The Last Honest Pizza" campaign, 1430
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441, 1442
1960s and 1970s songs in advertisements, 637
Toyota "Everyday" campaign, 1634–1635
Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1785
Volkswagen New Beetle "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 170

"Baby Smokers" spot, 247

"Baby" spot, 996

"Baby-sitter" spot, 719, 720

"Babysitters" spot, 45

Bacardi Silver, 1015

Bach, Robbie, 1001, 1002

Bachman-Turner Overdrive, 1214

"Back in the Sack" campaign, 337–340

Back-to-school campaigns
Kmart "Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847
Staples "That Was Easy" campaign, 1565–1566
Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569

"Backstage" spot, 1301

Bacon, Kevin
E*TRADE "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 531
Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1771

Bad Boys (film), 633

"Badge" spot, 388

"Badminton" spot, 1096

Baegte, Jim, 1354

"Bag Boy Fantasy" spot, 890, 891

Bagley, Stan, 1105

Bagni, Gregg, 1252

Bagotronics (fictitious company), 792–794

Baird, Lisa, 785

Baker, Brian, 1553

Baker, Matt, 1071

Baker, Vin, 166

Balance Bar, 932

Balch, John, 1435

Baldwin, Alec, 103

Ballmer, Steve, 1089, 1091

"Balloon" spot, 787

"Balls" spot, 1526, 1528–1529

Bally Total Fitness, 1860

Balzer, Harry, 698

Ban antiperspirant, 1402

Banaag, Ricky, 771

Banana Republic, 596

Bank of America
Citigroup, as competitor of, 331
Wachovia, as competitor of, 1794
Washington Mutual, as competitor of, 1802

Bank One Corp., 1791

Banking
Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 329–332
First Union "Financial World" campaign, 1789–1792
Wachovia "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, 1792–1795
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801–1804

Bankruptcy
Kmart Corp., 847, 848, 850, 854
Malden Mills Industries, Inc., 923, 924
Schwinn/GT Cicycles, 1251
United Airlines, 1695

Banks, Ernie, 1107

Banks, Tyra, 1045, 1277

"Bar" ad, 1607, 1608, 1609

"Barbecue" spot, 761

Barclays Global Investors, 161–164

Barcome, Don, 1215

Barenaked Ladies, 1034, 1128, 1129
Barker, John, 1810, 1812
Barkley, Charles
  Gillette "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 672
  Nike campaign, 1132, 1152
  Nike promotional show, 1143
Barnard, Kurt, 851, 1229, 1566
Barnes, Derek, 1580, 1581
Barnes, Peter, 1835–1836, 1838
Barnes and Noble
  Amazon.com, as competitor of, 60–61
  Borders, as competitor of, 196–197
Barnett, Alan, 999
Barrabee, Linda, 300
Barracuda Networks, Inc., 323
Barrett, Craig, 1091
Barrett, Dean, 967
Barrett, Jamie, 1132, 1467
Bartle Bogle Hegarty
  ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better "Child Hunger" campaign, 363–366
  Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
  "Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886–889
  Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign, 1687–1690
  "Monsanto Image" campaign, 1035, 1037
  "Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 869
Baryshnikov, Mikhail, 83
Baseball (documentary), 1109
Basich, Tina, 1515
Basinger, Kim, 602
Basketball
  Detroit Pistons "Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257–1260
  Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 165–168
Basketball Club of Seattle, LLC, 165–168
Baskin-Robbins, 48
Bass fishing, 1751
BASS PLC. See Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC
Basserman, Michael, 986, 990
Bassett, Steve, 615
Bates, Jack, 1560
Bates Worldwide, 314
Bath & Body Works, 192
Batteries, 509–512
Baum, Herb, 436
Bay, Michael, 88, 633
Bayer AG, 1327
Bayerische Motoren Werke AG, 169–179, 176
Bayless Cronin, 317–319
Bays, Joe, 1295
Bazooka gum, 1829
BBDO
  AOL "Welcome to the World Wide Wow" campaign, 66–69
  Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1274–1277
  Campbell Soup Company "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign, 268–271
  Charles Schwab "Smarter Investor" campaign, 301–304
  Chrysler Group "Employee Pricing Plan Plus" campaign, 383–386
  Delta Air Lines campaigns, 414–415
  eBay account, 495
  Fédération des producteurs de lait du Québec milk campaign, 183
  FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 539–540
  FedEx "The Way the World Works" campaign, 547–550
  Frito-Lay "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 583–586
  General Electric "Imagination At Work" campaign, 623–626
  Icehouse Beer campaign, 121
  "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737–740
  "JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280–1283
  Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1828–1830
  Kinko's "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign, 541–543
  Mountain Dew campaign, 465
  Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1267–1270
  Office Depot "What You Need. What You Need to Know." campaign, 1213–1216
  Orbit gum "No Matter What" campaign, 1831–1833
  Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1261–1265
  "Pepsi, It's the Cola" campaign, 1289–1292
  Pepsi Edge campaign, 241
  Pepsi "Generation Next" campaign, 1277–1280
  Pepsi "Security Camera" campaign, 1295–1298
  Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1283–1286
  Pizza Hut "Big New Yorker Pizza" campaign., 1345–1348
  "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544–547
  "Snickers Cruncher" campaign, 941–943, 942–943
  Snickers Marathon bars "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 931–934
  Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 305–309
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765–1768
  Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1769–1772
BC Dairy Foundation, 181–185
"Be a DiGiorno Delivery Guy" promotion, 865
"Be Bullish" campaign, 526–527
"Be Direct" campaign, 143
"Be Like Mike" campaign, 343, 1287
"Be More" campaign, 1409–1412
"Be Your Own Rock" campaign, 1405–1408
"Be yourself again" tagline, 1211
"Beach" ad, 1607, 1608, 1609
"Beach Chairs & Umbrellas" spot, 295
"Beaches" spot, 152, 153, 1762
"Beadicons," 1813, 1814, 1815
Beam, 174
"Bears" spot, 1277
Beatles, 174, 1139
Beattie, Richard, 1635
Beattie, Trevor, 580, 1525
Beauty
  Body Shop "Ruby" campaign, 191–194
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679–1683
"Beaver España" campaign, 1607, 1608
Beavers, Joe, 1749
Bebear, Claude, 764
Bécaud, Gilbert, 183
"Because Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 25
Becker, Boris, 1589
Beckett, Alec, 924
Beckham, David, 23
Beckstead, June, 605
Bed Bath and Beyond, 756
"Bed-in for Peace," 729
Bedding
  Dial-A-Mattress "Always Out There" campaign, 431–434
  Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Beebe, Dion, 1412

"Beer . . . or Michelob?" campaign, 105–108
Beer commercials
Anheuser-Busch "Beer . . . or Michelob?" campaign, 105–108
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 116–120
Bud Ice "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 120–123
Bud Light "I Love You, Man" campaign, 112–116
Bud Light "Real American Heroes/ Real Men of Genius" campaign, 123–126
Budweiser "Whassup?!" campaign, 126–130, 127
Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign, 569–573
"Frogs" campaign, 108–112
Guinness "Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense" campaign, 426–429
Heineken "It's All About the Beer" campaign, 705–708
"Miller High Life" campaign, 1452–1455
"Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1017–1021
Miller Lite "Low Carb" campaign, 1449–1452
Miller Lite "Miller Time" campaign, 1021–1025
Pabst "Remember Rainier" campaign, 1245–1248
"Rheingold Beer" campaign, 1421–1424
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 867–870
Rolling Rock "Grab a Rock" campaign, 759–762
Samuel Adams, 199–202
"Beer Man" campaign, 129
Beetle, Volkswagen, 1776–1777, 1783–1784
Being John Malkovich (film), 757, 758
Belatti, Frank, 318, 319
Belding Awards
ESPN "The Rick" campaign, 516
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 814
Weather Channel "Painted Faces" campaign, 1807
Bell, Cathy, 963
Bell, Charlie, 965
Bell, Glen, 1591–1592
Bell, James, 370
Bell, James "Cool Papa," 1107
Bell, Nicola, 484
Bell Atlantic, 155
Bella (chimpanzee), 1581
Bellas, Michael, 114, 1272
Belsh, Kim, 243, 244, 247
Belvedere
Absolut, as competitor of, 1731, 1732
Stolichnaya, as competitor of, 1706–1707
Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream
Brigham's, as competitor of, 208
Häagen-Dazs, as competitor of, 1119, 1120–1121
Working Assets Long Distance, partnership with, 1837
Yahoo!, partnership with, 1853
Ben Folds Five, 1370
Ben-Hur (film), 1661
"Ben-Hur" spot, 1661, 1662
"Benefits" spot, 1722
Beninati, Marie Drum, 890
Benjamin, Jeff, 224
Benjamin, Keith, 1706
Bennett, Chuck, 1595, 1596
Bennett, Kuhn & Varner, 1433–1436
Bennett, Lisa, 415, 416
Bennett, Tony, 1770
Benz, Carl, 987
Berdusco, Roger, 586
Berg, Peter, 607
Berg, Scott, 725, 726
Bergen, Candice
"Dime Lady" campaign, 1547
"Dime Zone" campaign, 1545
"Speak Freely on Monday Nights" campaign, 1549
Sprint campaign, 152, 973, 1837
"Sprint Sense" campaign, 1543
Berger, Charles, 1484, 1485
Berger, Dennis, 228
Berger, Matthew, 228
Berkeley, Joe, 229, 231
Berkenfield, Andy, 891
Berkov, Stephen, 157, 158, 160
Berle, Milton, 306
Berlin, Andy, 368
Berlin Cameron & Partners, 1114–1117
Berlin Cameron/Red Cell
C2 campaign, 241
Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
Berman, Chris, 517, 520
Bernard, Harry, 891
Bernbach, Bill, 1780, 1781
Bernstein, Edward, 1742
Berra, Yogi, 37, 39, 1771
Berry, Halle, 446, 938
Bershefsky, Ralph, 1759
Bertelsmann AG, 196
Bertini, Bob, 356
Bertino, Fred, 826
Besson, Luc, 1446
Best Buy, 1494
"The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482, 482–485
"The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers In Your Cup" campaign, 1373–1376
"The Best Stuff Is Here" tagline, 1658
"Beta-7" campaign, 1497–1500
"Better Beef" spot, 287
Better Business Bureau, 80, 82
"Better Place" spot, 1234
Betty Crocker, 1688
Bevan, Michael, 1637
Beverages
Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1274–1277
DoubleShot "Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197–1200
"Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1655–1658
Snapple "Bottles Personified" campaign, 237–240
See also Alcoholic beverages; Milk; Soft drinks
Bewkes, Jeffrey, 738
Bezos, Jeff, 59, 60, 61, 1591
BHP Billiton, 444–445
Bibendum, 681
BIC, 1458, 1479
Bickler, David, 125
"Bicycle" spot, 426
Bicycles
Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
Schwinn "What a Ride" campaign, 1252–1256
"Specialized" campaign, 1539–1542
Bierbaum, Tom, 864
"Big Blue Arm" campaign, 1726
Big-box stores, 1494
"Big Daddy" spot, 993
"Big Dig" flavor, 207, 208
"Big Drop" spot, 1321
"Big Match" spot, 1446, 1447
"Big New Yorker Pizza" campaign, 1345–1348
"Big News" spot, 613
"Big Pieces, Little Pieces" campaign, 318
"Big Show" spot, 987, 993
"Big Wrestlers" spot, 356
Bigley, Deirdre, 797
Bijur, Arthur, 734, 735
Bijur, Peter I., 307
Bildsten, Bruce, 176, 178, 1161, 1702

"Bill of Rights" campaign, 1432
Billboards
"Altoids" campaign, 1823
Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1276
Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1681–1682
General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 643, 644
Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834
Museum of Contemporary Art "Labels" campaign, 1081–1084
Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1148
"Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 836
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1697
Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1751
Yahoo! "Live Billboard Dating" campaign, 1854–1857
"Billiards" spot, 577
Bilxseth, Sean, 1580
Bindbeutel, Henry, 1426
Bingman, Pam, 1062
Binney, Alice, 189
Binney & Smith, 187–190
Bioré, 1691–1692
Bird, Larry, 1552
"Birds" spot, 735, 1411
Bitterman, Larry, 1573
Black, Bryan, 1040
Black, Jack, 60
Black, Lee, 1088
Black & Decker, 1436
Black Entertainment Television, 347
Black Eyed Peas, 137
Black Label Johnnie Walker, 425
Black Rocket
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
"Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 1853
Yahoo! "Live Billboard Dating" campaign, 1855–1857
Blackspot Anticorporation, 72
Blackwell, Mark, 1352
Blades, Joan, 1074
Blair Witch Project (film), 1507
Blanks, Billy, 457
Blaskey, Rick, 460
Blass, Bill, 984
Bledsoe, Drew, 519
Blige, Mary J.
National Football League Kickoff festival, 1285
"National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign, 1217
Blimpie International
Quiznos, as competitor of, 1415
Subway, as competitor of, 456–457
"Blind Date" spot, 770
"Blizzard" spot, 355–356
Bloch, Henry and Richard, 687
"Block Air" spot, 689
Blockbuster, 734–735
Blogs, 211–214
Bloom Agency, 1343
Bloomberg, Michael, 1424
Blue Card, 86, 89
Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 1726
Blue Man Group, 1041
"Blue Skies" campaign, 1313
Blue (song), 397
Bluestein, Bill, 798
Bluetooth wireless technology, 1066
Blum, Brad, 221
Blur, 460
BMW
Lexus, as competitor of, 1647–1648
Mercedes-Benz, as competitor of, 985–986, 988–989, 995
BMX bikes, 1249–1252
Boardman, Robyn, 178
Boards Magazine, 45
"Boat" spot, 1020, 1455
"Bob" campaign, 1837
Bobby Award, 1282
Bock, Gayle, 413
Bodett, Tom, 778, 782
Body Geometry bicycle saddle, 1540, 1541
The Body Shop International PLC, 191–194, 334
Body size, 1682
Boeing, William, 1698
Bogusky, Alex
American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 98
Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 223, 225
IKEA "Unböring" campaign, 756
MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 171, 172
Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1758
"Boiling Turkey" spot, 53
Boise Cascade, 1565
Bologna, Anne, 326, 330
Bombardier, 1355
Bonaparte, Andy, 225, 228, 959
Bond, Richard L., 1672
Bonds, Barry, 304, 1852
Bonham, Bill, 1431
Bonham, John, 636
Bono, 135
The Book of Days Engagement Calendar, 56
The Book of Dreams, 743
"The Book of Harley-Davidson" campaign, 701–704
"Book with Travelocity. Don't Forget Your Hat" tagline, 1653
Booksellers, 195–198
Boomerang, 1612
Boone, John, 1750
Booth, Beatrice, 1708
Borchardt, Mark, 1474, 1642
Borders Group, Inc., 195–198
Borders Perrin Norrander, 359–362
Borel, Daniel, 911
Boston Beer Company, Inc., 199–202, 200
Boston Chicken, 203–206
Boston Idea Group, 100
Boston Marathon, 1419
Boston Market Corp., 203–206
Boston Red Sox, 207–210
Bosworth, Brian, 672
Bottled water, 1274–1277
"Bottles Personified" campaign, 237–240
"Botulism" spot, 593
Bouchez & Kent, 1041
Boudreau, Walter, 1411
"Bouncing Balls" spot, 681, 682
"Bouncing Car" spot, 239
Bousquette, Matt, 956
Bovine growth hormones, 1035, 1037
Bow Wow, 271
Bowerman, Bill, 1138, 1140
"Bowling" spot, 577
"Boxer" spot, 369
"Boxing" spot, 3
Boxster, 1365, 1366, 1367
"Boy" spot, 585
"Boy Band" spot, 239
Boyd, Carol, 56
Boyd, Jayne and Joan, 1831
Boyd, Wes, 1074, 1075
Boyle, Gert, 359–362
Boyle, Tim, 359–362
Boylson, Michael, 808
Boys and Girls Clubs, 1688
Bozell
celebrity milk mustache campaign, 183

Chrysler "Engineered to be Great Cars" campaign, 386–389
"It Happens At the Hilton" campaign, 729–732
"Jeep" campaign, 389–392
Little Caesar "Talking Pizzas" campaign, 906–910
Lycos "Go Get It" campaign, 915–918
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300
Brabeck, Peter, 932
Bradham, Caleb, 1280, 1284, 1295
Bradley, Bill, 1741
Brady, Tom, 598, 600
The Brady Bunch (television show), 1225, 1227
Brancheau, Jon, 650
Brand, Barry, 666
Brand Buzz, 240–242
Brand Content, 1042
Brand-name CDs
Dr. Martens Unlaced, 460
The White Album (Fédération des producteurs de lait du Québec), 183
Woman Thing Music, 57–58
Brand placement. See Product placement
Branded entertainment, 59–62
Brando, Marlon
Harley-Davidson, 1350
iPods, 136
jeans, 1749
Levi's jeans, 883
Pepsi "The Joy of Cola" campaign, 1281
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
Brandvik, Erika, 871
Brandweek awards, 871
Branson, Richard, 1235, 1757–1760
Brant, Ryan, 1498
Braun, 1190
"BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
Bravo Network, 592
"Break Through" campaign, 634–637
"Break Up" spot, 163
"Breakdance" spot, 239
"Breakfast in Bed" spot, 629
Breast cancer, 1747
Breath mints, 1821–1824
Breathe Right strips, 337–340, 338
Breeders, 460
Breen, Howard, 689
Breitenbach, Paul, 1370
Brenneman, Greg, 221
Brenner, Sean, 553
Brentjens, Bart, 1541
Brew, Alan, 1657
Breyers ice cream, 468
Bricken, Knox, 1624
"Bridesmaids" spot, 1727
Bridgestone/Firestone, 680–681
Brigham's, Inc., 207–210
BrightHouseLive, 265–268
Brimley, Wilford, 1293
Brinegar, Brad, 1653
"Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197–1200
Brinkley, David, 1326, 1327
Brispiel, Matthew, 1771
British Airways, 1758–1759
British Open golf tournament, 1794
British Television Advertising Awards
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741
Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1236
"Britney Rooftop" spot, 1280, 1282
Brittin, Lewis, 1205
Broadband, AOL, 66–69
"Broadcast News" spot, 519
Broadcast promotions
A & E Television Networks, 1–3
ABC "TV Is Good" campaign, 5–8
"Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding" campaign, 1611–1615
ESPN "The Rick" campaign, 513–516
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517–520
ESPN "Without Sports" campaign, 520–523
Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign, 591–594
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737–740
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1077–1080
"NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
Oxygen Media "Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241–1244
PBS "Be More" campaign, 1409–1412
Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1662–1665
Turner Classic Movies "31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659–1662
Weather Channel "Painted Faces" campaign, 1805–1808
Broce, Alan, 518
Brøderbund, 379, 381, 382
Brokaw, Tom, 60, 1230, 1238
"The Broken Leg" campaign, 38–41
Brolick, Emil, 1592
Broman, Gunnar, 1729
Bronze Lion. See Lion Awards
Bronze Pencil Awards. See One Show Awards
Brooker, Brian, 1537, 1538
Brooks, Baba, 1406
Brookter, Carolyn, 1604
Brosnan, Pierce, 986, 1549, 1769, 1771
Brothers, Dr. Joyce, 1230, 1548
Brotherton, Nigel, 1781
Brown, Billy, 603
Brown, Cleyson, 1544
Brown, Garrett, 929
Brown, James, 178
Brown, James (basketball player), 576
Brown, James (singer), 1298, 1302
Brown, Junior and Tanya Rae, 607
Brown, Karen, 1149
Brown, Larry, 1259
Brown, Margy, 1004, 1007
Brown, Richard, 502
Brown, Rob, 1003
Brown, Wendy, 151
Brown, Wes, 1774
Brown & Williamson Tobacco Company, 246, 1294
Browne, Liz, 1525
Brownstein, Carrie, 1371
Brubeck, Dave, 1178
Bruce, Bill, 1272
Bruce, Bruce, 841
Brundage, Damon, 960
Brunswick, 1355
Bruyn, Steven, 387, 388
Bryant, Kobe, 346, 347–348
Bryce, Michael, 448
Buchanan, Bob, 608
Buchner, Rob, 60
Buck, Peter, 455
"Buck" spot, 718, 721, 723
Buckhorn, Dean, 1745
Buckley, Bryan
Dial-a-Mattress "Always Out There" campaign, 432
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 527
MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 171
"On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign, 680, 681
"Vegas Stories" campaign, 873
Bud Ice, 120–122
Bud Light
"I Love You, Man" campaign, 112–116

Bud Light, continued
Miller Lite, as competitor of, 1023, 1449–1451
Budgen, Frank, 1145
Budget Rent A Car System, Inc., 211–214
Budweiser
"Frogs" campaign, 109–112, 539
Heineken, as competitor of, 706
"Louie the Lizard" campaign, 539
Miller High Life, as competitor of, 1454
Rolling Rock, as competitor of, 761–762
Buechert, Courtney, 29
"Buffalo" spot, 936
Buffett, Warren, 614, 616, 619
Bugaboo jacket, 360
"Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 717–720
"Bull's-eye" logo, 1599, 1601
Bunge Ltd., 287
"Bunker Shot" spot, 1136
"Bunny Chasers" campaign, 509–512
"Bunny People" campaign, 144, 767–771, 768, 769, 772
Burch, Howe, 554, 1149
Bureau of Engraving and Printing, 215–218, 216
Burgay, Steve, 827
Burger King Corp., 219–228, 220
Carl's Jr., as competitor of, 291
Hardee's, as competitor of, 698
McDonald's, as competitor of, 959, 962, 965, 968–969
Wendy's, as competitor of, 1815
"Burger" spot, 1020
Burke, Andrew, 1826
Burke, Bill, 1486
Burke, Kevin, 1394
Burlington Industries, 925
Burnard, Alex, 1251
Burns, Brad, 975, 976
Burns, Clare, 1608
Burns, Curt, 684
Burns, George, 832
Burns, Ken, 1109
Burrell Communications Group
Toyota "A Car to Be Proud of Campaign," 1631, 1633
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 298
Burrier, Dan, 1068
Burson-Marsteller, 215–218
Burton, Jake, 84, 1514
Burton, LeVar, 129
Burton, Rick, 1143
Burton Snowboards, 1514–1515
Burwick, Dave, 1270, 1272, 1291
"Bus Ride" spot, 341, 343
"Bus" spot, 184, 1596
Busch, Adolphus, 105, 106, 109
Busch, August, III, 110
Busch, August A., IV, 109, 123, 127, 130
Bush, George H. W., 76, 1426
Bush, George W., 1073–1076
defense spending, 229, 232
gay rights, 658
iPods, 136, 138
Kyoto Protocol, withdrawal from the, 1510, 1511
Peace Corps, 1263, 1265
political campaign, 1741
Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1509–1512
"Swift Boat Veterans for Truth" campaign, 1583
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities, 229–232
Business services, 919–922
Business travelers
Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1104
Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign, 411–412
Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 415
Holiday Inn Express "Stay Smart" campaign, 780, 781
Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 927–930
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1696
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1699
BuSpar, 667
Butler, John, 1431
Butler, Shine & Stern
Round House Pizza "The Last Honest Pizza" campaign, 1429–1432
"Specialized" campaign, 1539–1542
Butler, Thomas R., 1054
Buttonwood Agreement, 1091
Byers, David, 688, 689
Byrd, Richard, 1113
Byrne, Martha, 57
Byrne, Mike, 1146

C

C2, 241
Cable & Telecommunications Association for Marketing Hall of Fame
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517, 520
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 740
Cable Car Awards, 1059
Cable television
branding, 6–7
Cargill "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, 288
"Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding" campaign, 1611–1615
Court TV "Linda Lo-Cal" vignette, 836
Discovery Communications "Two Guys" campaign, 451–453
ESPN "The Rick" campaign, 513–516
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517–520
ESPN "Without Sports" campaign, 520–523
Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign, 591–594
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737–740
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1745
MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 170, 171
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1077–1080
Old Navy "Destination" campaign, 1229
Oxygen Media "Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241–1244
Saab "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1447
Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1662–1665
Turner Classic Movies "31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659–1662
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1351
Cable vs. DSL Internet service, 1475
Cadbury Adams USA LLC, 233–236, 1828–1829
Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages, 237–242
Coca-Cola Company, as competitor of, 351–352
PepsiCo, as competitor of, 1282, 1284, 1291

"The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 638–641
Cade, Robert, 1286
Cadillac
"Break Through" campaign, 634–637, 635
"The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 638–641
Caffeine, 1268
Caffrey's, 428
Cage, Nicolas, 633
Cahill, Liz, 1747, 1748
Cajun Holding Company, 318
Calderin, Rob, 227, 228, 841
Calderwood, Graham, 792
Calhoun, Steve, 658–659
California
antismoking campaigns, 1028
emissions mandates, 641
California Department of Health Services, Tobacco Control Section, 243–251, 1028–1029
California Milk Advisory Board, 253–256, 254
California Milk Processor Board, 183, 257–260
"California" spot, 828
California Tobacco Health Protection Act, 248
"The Call" campaign, 803–806
"Call to action" campaigns, 170, 171
Callihan, Barbara, 1370
Calloway, Wayne, 1299
Calthey, Robert, 880
Calvin Klein Cosmetics Company, 261–264
Cameras. See Photography
Cameron, Evan, 553
Cameron, Kirk, 1281
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31–34
"Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679–1683, 1680
Campanella, Roy, 1107
Campbell, Lori, 432
Campbell, Naomi, 729, 730, 731
Campbell Doyle Dye, 177
Campbell-Ewald
Borders "Find Out" campaign, 195
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 631–634
Campbell Mithun Esty, 854–857
Campbell Soup Company, 265–271, 266
Camry, Toyota
Ford Fusion, as competitor of, 559
Galant, as competitor of, 1033
Mitsubishi Galant, as competitor of, 1033
Oldsmobile Alero, as competitor of, 654
overview, 1639
"Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300, 298
"Can You See It?" campaign, 785–788
"Can You Wait?" campaign, 371–374
"Can Your Camera Do This?" spot, 481
Canadian Film Centre, 273–276, 274
"Cancer by Carton" article, 97–98
Cancer-expense insurance, 35–40
Candido, Jeff, 872, 873
Candie's Foundation, 752
Candy
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1824–1827
Hershey ReeseSticks "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" campaign, 709–712
Hershey "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, 712–715
M&M's "New Millennium" campaigns, 937–940
"Snickers Cruncher" campaign, 940–943
Cannondale, 1251, 1540
Canon U.S.A., Inc., 277–280
Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 718
Kodak, as competitor of, 480, 487
Nikon, as competitor of, 1164
Xerox, as competitor of, 1847
Cantalupo, James, 965
"Canterbury" spot, 1648
Cantone, Mario, 1664
Canyon Gang, 1250
Capital Cities Inc., 514
Capital One, 327
Capitol Records, 263–264
Caplan, Josh, 1861
Cappelli, Paul, 526, 797
Caputo, Gerard, 1410
"Car Alarm" spot, 941, 942
"Car Carrier" spot, 633
"Car Chase" spot, 891
Car rental companies, 211–214
"Car" spot, 888
"A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631–1634
"Car Wash" spot, 891
Caraccioli, Laura, 1411
Card Photo Printers, 277–279
CareerBuilder Inc., 281–284, 1040
Careful What You Wish For (film), 61
Carerre, Tia, 713
Cargill, Inc., 285–288, 286
Cargill, William Wallace, 287
Carillon Importers, 1734
Carlesimo, P.J., 166
Carlin, George, 1471, 1785
Carl's Jr., 289–292, 290
Hardee's, and, 698, 699
Jack in the Box, as competitor of, 813
Carlson, Charles, 1256
Carlston, Doug and Gary, 379
Carmichael Lynch
Polaris campaign, 1355
Porsche "Cayenne Launch" campaign, 1365–1368
Rapala "Custom Lures" campaign, 1193–1196
Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
Schwinn "What a Ride" campaign, 1252–1256
Carmichael Lynch Spong, 702–704
Carnahan, Joe, 178
Carney, Frank and Dan, 1345
Carnival Corporation, 293–296
Cunard Line, as competitor of, 373
Royal Caribbean Cruises, as competitor of, 1443
Carol H. Williams Advertising, 243
Carolson, Pete, 1579
Carpet-cleaning services, 1557–1561
"Carpooling" spot, 681
Carr-Locke, Robin, 1136, 1137
Carrey, Jim, 39, 617
Carroll, Chris, 457
Carroll, John, 348
Carrot Top
AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150, 148
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 519
Carson, Johnny, 1458
Carter, Caroline, 1067, 1070
Carter, David, 176
Carter, Dennis, 770
Carter, Jimmy, 1238
Carter, Vince, 1095, 1100, 1144
Carter-Miller, Jocelyn, 1066
Carter Products "Trojan Man" campaign, 311–315
"Cartoon Crisis Center" spot, 1613
"Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding" campaign, 1611–1615
CARU. See Children's Advertising Review Unit (CARU)
Casanova Pendrill Publicidad, 64
Case, Paula, 1427

Case, Stephen M., 64
Casey, George, 1709
Casey, James E., 1709
Casey, Kerry, 703
"Cash in Hand" campaign, 945–948
"Cashback Bonus" program, 1050, 1051, 1052
Cashen, Jon, 835
"Cat Herders" campaign, 501–504
"The Catch" spot, 1101
Catera, Cadillac, 638–640
"Catfight" campaign, 1450
Cats, 934
Cattrall, Kim, 336, 1161
"Cayenne Launch" campaign, 1365–1368, 1366
CBS
  "Network Executive" spot, 1621
  "Welcome Home" campaign, 6
CDC. See Centers for Disease Control and Prevention
CDs
  AOL "Welcome to the World Wide Wow" campaign, 65, 66–69, 67
  Dr. Martens Unlaced, 460
  The White Album (Fédération des producteurs de lait du Québec), 183
  Woman Thing Music, 57–58
Cedar, Larry, 1059
Cedergren, Christopher, 644, 1782
Celebrex campaign, 667
Celebrities
  Aflac "Duck" spots, 37, 39
  Amazon.com branded entertainment, 59–62
  American Express "Do More" campaign, 82–86
  Apple Computer "Switchers" campaign, 140
  "Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" campaign, 447–450 dead, 1439
  dial-around numbers, 976, 977
  Discover "Make a Statement" campaign, 1055
  Gap campaign, 887–888
  Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 597
  Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 598, 600
  Gap "Who Wore Khakis?" campaign, 602
  Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 890
  MCI "1-800-Collect" campaign, 971
  MINI Cooper drivers, 174
  prescription drug campaigns, 667
  Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043–1046
  Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1770–1771
"Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" campaign, 447–450
Celebrity voice-overs
  Arquette, Rosanna (eBay 2004 television campaign), 496, 498
  Bacon, Kevin (E*Trade "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign), 531
  Baldwin, Alec ("Art. Ask for More" campaign), 103
  Brando, Marlon (United Airlines "Rising" campaign), 1700
  Carlin, George (Saturn "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign), 1471
  Carlin, George (Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign), 1785
  Cattrall, Kim (Herbal Essences campaign), 336
  Cleese, John (Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign), 1646, 1648
  Collins, Jackie (Charles Schwab "Smarter Investor" campaign), 304
  Daniels, Jeff (Microsoft "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign), 1004
  Dreyfuss, Richard (Apple "Think Different" campaign), 142, 143, 774
  Gifford, Kathie Lee (Carnival "Fun Ships" campaign), 294, 295
  Grammer, Kelsey (Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign), 1648
  Irons, Jeremy (Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign), 1648
  Jackson, Samuel L. (Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign), 1817
  Jones, James Earl (Ameritech "Privacy Manager campaign), 155
  Keillor, Garrison (Honda Motor Company "The Power of Dreams" campaign), 743
  Keillor, Garrison (Honda UK "Grrr" campaign), 745
  Lahti, Christine (Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign), 413
  McConaughey, Matthew (Peace Corps "Life is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign), 1261, 1264
  Moore, Demi (Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign), 1646, 1648
  Newman, Paul ("A World of Energy") campaign, 305, 308
  Pesci, Joe (Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign), 1648
  Redford, Robert (United Airlines "It's Time To Fly" campaign), 1697
  Sinise, Gary (Cadillac "Break Through" campaign), 637
  Turner, Kathleen (McDonald's "Got the Urge?" campaign), 968
  Weaver, Sigourney (John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign 1996), 823
  Weaver, Sigourney (Sarajevo Olympic Children's Fund), 107
Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1641–1643
Cellco Partnership, 297–300, 298
Cellular phones. See Mobile phones; Wireless services
Cendant Car Rental Group, 211
Censorship
  "Censorship is UnAmerican" tagline, 1425–1426
  "Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI)
  Aspartame, 241
  Olean, 1399
  "Quaker-Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign, 1292, 1293, 1294, 1295
  Sprint "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign, 1550
Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 312
Centrum Silver, 1331
Cereal
  Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627–630
  Kellogg "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, 831–834
  Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837
  "Quaker-Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign, 1292–1295
Cereda, Flavio, 554
Certs, 1822–1823
Cezares, Gabriel, 1595
"Chair" spot, 1173
"The Chamber of Fear" campaign, 1139, 1140
Chambers, John, 1091
"Champagne of Beers" slogan, 1453

Champine, Laura, 876
"A Championship Season" spot, 1156
Champs Gold Medal Award, 1700
Chan, Jackie, 1273
Chance 2 Motorsports team, 839
Chang, Michael, 1055, 1133
Change, 1509–1512
"Change + HP" campaign, 726
"Change" spot, 33, 1790
"Changes" campaign, 966
"Channel Surfing" spot, 385
Chapelle, Dave, 1289, 1291
"Chaperone" spot, 1581
"Charade" spot, 589
Charities
  drugstore.com Foundation, 472
  Lee jeans "National Denim Day" campaign, 1747
  Target "Take Charge of Education" campaign, 1603–1606
Charles, Prince, 1035, 1037
Charles, Ray, 1304, 1552
The Charles Schwab Corporation, 301–304, 302, 527
"Charlie's Parents" spot, 563
Charney, Dov, 71–74
Charron, Chris, 1852
Chase, Chevy, 37, 39
Chase Manhattan
  Citigroup, as competitor of, 331
  First Union, as competitor of, 1790
  Wachovia, as competitor of, 1794
"Chase" spot, 1296
Chastain, Brandi, 1156
Cheadle, Don, 178, 1099, 1100, 1101
The Check Up (short film), 159, 1775
"Checkerboard" logo, 1113
Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627–630
Cheese
  California Milk Advisory Board "Happy Cows" campaign, 253–256
  on Kraft DiGiorno Rising Crust Pizza, 863
Cheez-It crackers, 267
"Chef Jimmy" campaign, 456, 1414
Chelsea Pictures/ Campfire, 157–160
Cheltenham festival, 429
Chem-Dry Cleaning, 1559
Chemistri, 650–652
Chenault, Kenneth, 80
Chesebrough-Pond, 1320
Chevrolet, Louis, 631
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 631–634
Chevron Corporation, 305–309
Chevy Cavalier, 94
Chewing gum
  Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1827–1830
  Orbit gum "No Matter What" campaign, 1830–1833
  Trident "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 233–236
Chiat\Day
  Body Shop "Ruby" campaign, 193
  Honda advertising, 92
Chicago Creative Club, 1830
Chicago Region Toyota Dealer Association, 1638–1639
Chicago Windy Awards, 1359
Chick-fil-A
  Church's Chicken, as competitor of, 318–319
  KFC, as competitor of, 840–841
"Chicken Pox" spot, 365
Chicvara, Jerome, 201
"Child Hunger" campaign, 363–366
Children
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 111, 112, 117
  Anheuser-Busch ""Spuds McKenzie" campaign, 113–114
  Burger King "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign, 228
  Cheerios "Spoonfuls of Stories" literacy project, 628
  Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1828
  LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 879–882
  obesity, 457
  Post Cereals partnership with Reach Out and Read program, 628–629
  Secret Sparkle Body Spray, 1401, 1403
  Subway "F.R.E.S.H. Steps" campaign, 457
  Target/Golden Books Entertainment partnership, 1605
Children's Advertising Review Unit (CARU), 1403, 1828, 1830
Children's Books & Toys, Inc., 196
Children's Healthcare of Atlanta, 37, 39
"Child's Play" spot, 1074
"Chimps" spot, 737–740
China, 546, 547
Chinese-Americans, 1644
"Chinese Office" spot, 544
Chipotle, 1593
"The Chivas Life" campaign, 424–425
Chivas Regal, 424–425
Chodosh, Joe, 1095
"Choice" spot, 33
"Chop Shop" spot, 53
Christine, Virginia, 1374
Christopher, Douglas, 1592
Chrysler. See DaimlerChrysler Corp.
Chrysler, Walter P., 384, 386
Chuck D, 103
Chunky soups, 270
Church & Dwight Company, Inc., 311–315
  Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1396
  Super Scoop, 1116
Churchill, Winston, 729, 730
Church's Chicken, 317–320
Chux, 1381
Cialis, 1327
Ciara, 752
Cigarettes
  Altria Group Inc., 55–58
  California Department of Health Services "Antitobacco" campaign, 243–247, 244
  Six Flags theme parks smoking ban, 1520
  "Tobacco Control Section" media campaign, 248–251
  "Truth" campaign, 97–100
Cigars, 246–247
Cima, Tony, 1754
"Cinderella" spot, 523
Cingular
  T-Mobile, as competitor of, 1625
  Verizon Wireless, as competitor of, 298–299
Cisco Systems, Inc., 321–324
Citibank, 325–328, 326
Citigroup Inc., 329–332
  ING, as competitor of, 764
  Wachovia, as competitor of, 1794
"Citizen Actions," 1836, 1837
Citroen, 1781
"The City Never Sleeps" campaign, 330
Civic "What About Now?" campaign, 91–95, 92, 93
Civil rights movement, 1201
"cK be" campaign, 261–264
CKE Restaurants, 698
Clairol, Inc., 333–336
Clairty Coverdale Fury, 1027–1030
Clapp, Gordon, 1201–1204, 1669
Clapp, Steve, 1805, 1806
Clapton, Eric, 989
Claritin
  Allegra, as competitor of, 1463
  Zyrtec, as competitor of, 1312–1313
Clark, Allan, 1515

Clark, Dick, 308, 937, 940
Clarke, John, 464, 465
Clarke, Tom, 1146
Clarkson, Kelly, 749, 752
Clay, Peter, 672
Claymation
  Maryland State Lottery "Cash in Hand" campaign, 947
  Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501, 1503
Clayton, Joseph, 1334
Clayton, Paul, 226, 227
Clean Air Act, 94
"Clean Slate" spot, 163
"Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
"Clear solutions in a complex world" tagline, 893
Cleese, John, 1646, 1648, 1822
Clelland, John, 1624
Clement, Ruth, 954
Clendenin, Tom, 517
Cleverly, Bruce, 1315
"Click, Instantly" tagline, 1359
Click Em On Markers, 189, 190
"Client Dinner" spot, 45
Cliff Freeman & Partners
  Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign, 733–736
  Little Caesar "Cloning" campaign, 897–900
  Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 900–903
  Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 903–906
  Midas campaign, 1010
  Mike's Hard Lemonade "Hard Day" campaign, 1013–1016
  "NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
  Snapple campaign, 239
  Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569
Cline, Davis & Mann, 1326–1328
Cline, Patsy, 1397, 1548
Clinton, Bill
  1992 election, 1740
  Biography spot, 1661
  "Cat Herders" spot, reference to, 503
  Joe Boxer campaign, 847
  "Motor Voter Bill," 1426
  National and Community Service Trust Act, 1426
  Specialized bicycle ad, 1540
  Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615
  youth vote, 1425
Clinton, Hillary Rodham, 60, 246, 1741
Clio Awards
  adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign, 27, 29
  "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1827
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 112
  Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 119
  Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
  Anheuser-Busch "Whassup?!" campaign, 128, 129
  Bay, Michael, spots by, 633
  BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 184
  BMW "The Hire" campaign, 178
  Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 197
  Burger King campaign, 965
  Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 219
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 223, 225
  Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 232
  California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 257, 260
  Canadian Film Centre "2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival" campaign, 273, 276
  Columbia Sportswear "Mother Boyle" campaign, 361
  Dial-A-Mattress "Always Out There" campaign, 434
  eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493, 495
  Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 503
  ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1498, 1499
  First Union "Financial World" campaign, 1792
  Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign, 591, 593
  Gill Foundation "TurnOut" campaign, 657, 659
  Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119, 1121
  Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 720
  Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 723
  Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign, 736
  Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
  IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 800
  IKEA "Unböring" campaign, 755, 758
  "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737, 740
  Jeep "There's Only One" campaign, 392, 394
  John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign, 826
  Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk Baby!" campaign, 1302
  Little Caesar "Cloning" campaign, 900
  Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 903
  Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 906
  MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1063
  Maryland State Lottery "Cash in Hand" campaign, 948
  "NHL on Fox" campaign, 578
  Nike "Move" campaign, 1144
  Nike "Play" campaign, 1147
  Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181, 1183
  Pabst "Remember Rainier" campaign, 1245, 1248
  PBS "Be More" campaign, 1409, 1412
  Pepsi "Security Camera" campaign, 1298
  Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249, 1251
  Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 168
  Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1505, 1507
  Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1569
  Toyota Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1643
  Toyota Corolla "A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631, 1633
  Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1665
  "US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721, 1724
  Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1759
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765, 1768
"Cloning" campaign, 897–900
Clooney, Rosemary, 1605
Clorox Company
  Fresh Step, 1116
  Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1383

Clothing
Abercrombie & Fitch, 9–12
American Apparel Inc., 71–74
Columbia Sportswear "Mother Boyle" campaign, 359–362
"Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1490
Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 595–598
Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 598–601
Gap "Khakis" campaign, 601–604
Gap "This Is Easy" campaign, 605–608
Kmart "Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1748
Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 883–886
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 889–892
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886–889
Nordstrom "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, 1184–1187
Old Navy "Destination" campaign, 1228–1231
Old Navy "'70s Retro TV" campaign, 1225–1228
Tommy Hilfiger "American Tartans" campaign, 1627–1630
Virginia Slims V-Wear, 56
Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749–1751
"Cloud" spot, 255
Clouser, Chris, 699
Clow, Lee
ABC "TV Is Good" campaign, 7
Apple "Silhouette" campaign, 136
Apple "Think Different" campaign, 142, 143
Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177, 1179
Mercedes "Falling in Love" spot, 987
Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1595
"Clowns" spot, 1833
Clydesdale horses, 106, 109
CME. See Campbell Mithun Esty
CMJ Music Marathon, 1423
CNBC, 37
CNN-SI, 515, 518
CNS, Inc., 337–340
Co-op marketing, 770–771, 772
"Coach" spot, 521, 522
Coad, R. B., 411
"Coaster 2 Coaster" campaign, 1611, 1614
Coate, Brian, 495
Cobranded credit cards, 1054
The Coca-Cola Company, 341–357, 350
Dasani, 1275
Diet Rite, C2 as competitor of, 241
Nestea Cool, 1300–1301
PepsiCo, as competitor of, 1278, 1281–1282, 1290–1291, 1296–1297
PowerAde, 1288
Snapple, as competitor of, 1657
Surge, 1268–1269, 1271–1272
Vanilla Coke, 1284–1285
Coca-Cola Zero, 352
Cocciolo, Harry, 681
Cochrane, Lisa, 53
"Code Red" campaign, 1267–1270, 1273
"Coffe Shop" spot, 1745
Coffee
Folgers "The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers In Your Cup" campaign, 1373–1376
General Foods International Coffees "It's How to Unplug" campaign, 859–862
"Coffee Cup" spot, 913
"Cog" spot, 741, 743, 746, 747
Cohen, Alan, 6, 7, 8
Cohen, Ben, 72, 229–231, 230
Cohen, Betty, 1612
Cohen, Dr. Dan, 340
Cohen, Ian, 1513, 1514, 1516
Cohen, Margaret Kirch, 1295
Cohn, Linda, 519
Cohn & Wolfe
Diet Rite "Go for Zero" campaign, 240–242
Paxil "Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
Colbert, Stephen, 648–652, 649
Cold and allergy products
Allegra "Spirit of Freedom" campaign, 1461–1464
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 337–340
Kimberly-Clark "Kleenex Anti-Viral" campaign, 843–846
"The Power of Zyrtec" campaign, 1311–1314
Cole, Charles, 749, 750
Cole, Frank, 863
Cole, Kenneth, 749–750
Cole, Neil, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753
Cole & Weber/Red Cell, 1245–1248
Cole Henderson Drake, 399–402
Coleman, Jay, 242
Coleman, Norman, 1739, 1741
Colette, DJ, 1071
Colgate-Palmolive European detergents, 1396
Collaborate
Logitech "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, 911–914
Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1425–1428
"Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, 285–288, 286
Collect calls
AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
MCI "1-800-COLLECT" campaign, 971–974
Collective Soul, 560
College Bowl Championship Series, 1039, 1041
Collins, Jackie, 304
Collins, Jerry, 841
Collins, Joan, 1228
Collins, Kim, 25
Collins, Michael, 1393
"Collisions" spot, 713
Collopy, Mary, 1129, 1130
Colorado, 657–660
"Colour like.no.other" tagline, 1528
Coltman, David, 1700
Columbia Sportswear Company, 359–362
Columbia TriStar Television Distribution (CTTD), 1605
Comaneci, Nadia, 25
Combs, Roberta, 581
Combs, Sean "Puffy," 1001, 1003
Comdex show, 1846, 1847
"Come Home" spot, 129
Come On-a My House (song), 1605
"Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1487–1491, 1493
"Comedy Cure II," 664
Comfort foods, 203
Commercial Closet, 1861
Commission for Racial Equality, 730
"Commitment 2000: Raising a Better Tomorrow" initiative, 102
Commodore personal computers, 68
Common, 350, 352
Communication Arts Awards
Little Caesar "Cloning" campaign recognition, 900

Communication Arts Awards, continued
Weather Channel "Painted Faces" campaign, 1807
Community Nutrition Institute, 241
Community service. See Social responsibility
"Community" spots, 1004–1007
Community Trade Programme, 192
Compaq
Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 722
Hewlett-Packard acquisition of, 724
iMac, as competitor of, 133–134
"Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You." campaign, 419–422
"Competitive" campaign, 79–82
Computer games, 379–382
Computer mice and keyboards. See Computer peripherals
Computer operating systems, 794–797
Computer peripherals, 911–914
Computer worms, trojans, and viruses, 322
Comstock, Beth, 624, 626
ConAgra, 1036
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation, 363–366
Concept Farm, 1–3
Concord watches, 1045
Conde Nast Publications
General Motors partnership with, 94
Mercedes partnership with, 989
Condoms, 311–315
Cone, David, 28
Conill Advertising, 1631, 1633
Conlon, Peggy, 32, 34
Conn, David, 751, 752
Conner, Bart, 667
Connery, Sean, 633
Connors, Jimmy, 1145
"Conquer the Highlands" project, 424
Conseco, Inc., 367–370
"Consultants" spot, 1712
Consumer electronics
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 717–720
Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 720–723
Philips Electronics "Getting Better" campaign, 1333–1336
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1505–1508
"Sony Bravia" campaign, 1526–1529
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1531–1534
Contests
"Amazing Sprint Sense Dime Find," 1546
Audi "Art of the Heist" campaign, 158
Brigham's "Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207–210
Kraft "Be a DiGiorno Delivery Guy" promotion, 865
Mail Boxes Etc. scratch-off game, 920
Mail Boxes Etc. "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign, 919–922
M&M's "Help us find our colors" contest, 937, 940
Nordstrom "Win Shoes for Life," 1182
Purina "Incredible Dog Challenge," 1113–1114
Royal Appliance "Scratch & Win-Match & Win" contest, 1440
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1507
Continental Airlines, 412
Controversies
Abercrombie & Fitch, 9, 11–12
Abercrombie & Fitch "XXX" campaign, 596–597, 599–600
ACLU ads, 76, 77
adidas sponsorship of the New York Yankees, 26–29
Diet Coke "Aunt Rosalina" spot, 356
FCUK brand, 579–582
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Honda "Mr. Clean" campaign, 94
"Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 749, 751
John Hancock "Immigration" spot, 829
MoveOn.org "Child's Play" spot, 1074
Nike's international labor practices, 1134, 1142, 1151, 1155
Super Bowl "wardrobe malfunction" incident, 675, 676
"Vegas Stories" campaign, 871, 873
Cook, Dave, 158
Coolio, 1298, 1302
Coolpix cameras, 1159–1161
Cooper, Ric, 1443
Coors Brewing Company
Anheuser-Busch, as competitor of, 118, 125, 129
Bud Light, as competitor of, 114–115
Miller High Life, as competitor of, 1454
Miller Lite, as competitor of, 1451
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum sponsorship, 1108
Rolling Rock, as competitor of, 868
Coppola, Julia, 1061
Coppola, Sophia, 758
Cor Boonstra, 1334
Corbett, John, 561, 562, 563, 1033
Cordner, Tom, 1647
Corlett, Candace, 197
Corn Pops "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, 831–834
Cornelius, Don, 346
Corolla "A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631–1634
Corona
Foster's, as competitor of, 571
Heineken, as competitor of, 707
Rolling Rock, as competitor of, 762
"Coronation" spot, 3
Corporate Mosaic Award, 1282
Corpus, Vizhier, 1155
Corra, Henry, 611
Cortese, Dan, 962
Corwin, Hank, 1041
Cosby, Bill, 1617
Cosmetics and fragrances
Body Shop "Ruby" campaign, 191–194
Calvin Klein "cK be" campaign, 261–264
French Connection "Scent to Bed" campaign, 579–582
See also Skin care products
Cossette Communication-Marketing, 183
Costello, John H., 1488
Cotsakos, Christos, 526, 528, 530
"Counterfeit" campaign, 159, 169–172
Counterfeiting, 215–218, 1044
"Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Country Music Awards, 1749
Couric, Katie, 218, 1223
Court cases, 76
Court TV, 836
Courtyard by Marriott, 927–930
"Coverage" spot, 1859, 1860, 1861
Coverdale, Jac, 1028
Cowen, Tyler, 1132
Cowens, Dave, 209
Cowher, Bill, 464
Cows and Gateway, 610
Cox, Tony, 1780

Cox Arquette, Courtney, 350, 350–352, 1282
Coyle, Walter, 1230
Coza, Dave, 434
Crabtree & Evelyn, 192
Craft brews
  "Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 867–870
  Samuel Adams "It's What's Inside" campaign, 199–202
Craig, Sid, 815
Cramer-Krasselt
  AirTran "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign, 43–45
  CareerBuilder campaign, 281–284, 1040
  Hyatt Hotels campaign, 731
Crandall, Court, 515
Crate & Barrel 1998 print ads campaign, 533–536
Craven, Sheila, 771
Crawford, Cindy
  adidas apparel, 20
  Cadillac "The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 639
  Pepsi campaign, 1277, 1279, 1284
Crawford, Steve, 415
Crayola, 187–190, 188, 189
Crayons, 187, 188, 189
Crazy (song), 1397
"Crazy" spot, 1101
"Creating a world of smarter investors" tagline, 301
Creative Excellence in Business Advertising award, 285, 288
Creative Response Concepts, 1585
Creativity Awards, 1081, 1084
Credit cards
  American Express, 79–90
  Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 325–328
  Discover card "It Pays to Discover Revisited" campaign, 1050–1053
  Discover "Make a Statement" campaign, 1053–1056
  Marriott cobrands, 930
  MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 949–952
  Target Guest Card, 1603–1606
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765–1768
"Credits" spot, 735
Creed, Greg, 1593
Creidenberg, Jan, 1463
Crew Chief Club, 1674
"Crew Morning" spot, 1376
Crisp, Quentin, 890
"The Crisp You Can't Resist!" campaign, 709–712
Crispin Porter + Bogusky
  American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 97–100
  antismoking campaign, 249–250
  Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 195–198
  Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 219–222
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 222–225
  "Counterfeit" campaign, 159
  IKEA "Unböring" campaign, 755–758
  MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 169–172
  MINI Cooper "MINI Robots" campaign, 172–175
  Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
  Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1757–1760
CRK Advertising, 261–264
Cronin, Jay, 1263
Cronin, Joe, 1636
Crosby, David, 153
Crosby, Stills, and Nash, 153
Cross-promotions. See Partnerships and cross-promotions
"Crossing" spot, 1247
Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon (film), 275
Crowne Plaza, 731
CRT TVs, 1506
Cruise, Tom, 1860
Cruise lines
  Carnival Corporation "Fun Ships" campaign, 293–296
  Cunard Line "Can You Wait?" campaign, 371–374
  Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441–1444
"Crush" spot, 1183
Crutchfield, Edward, 1790, 1793
Cruz, Irma, 890
Cruz, Penelope, 350, 351, 352, 1281
Crystal, Billy, 1304
Crystal, Scott, 1668
Crystal Method, 601, 602
CSPI. See Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI)
CTS, Cadillac, 634–637, 635
CTTD. See Columbia TriStar Television Distribution (CTTD)
Cuarón, Alfonso, 1409, 1411
Cude, Jonathan, 159
Cuffe, Alison, 1384
Cullinan, Joseph "Buckskin," 305
Cumming, Alan, 1235, 1236
Cunard Line Limited, 371–374
Cure, 724, 726
"Curse of the Bambino," 208
"Curse Reversed" ice-cream flavor, 209
Curtis, Benjamin, 404, 405, 406
Curtis, Hal, 1144, 1147
Curtis, Jamie Lee, 888, 1623, 1624
Cusack, Joan, 447, 449
Custom Cleaner, 1383–1384
"Custom Lures" campaign, 1193–1196
"Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Cutter, John, 470
CVS Corporation, 375–378
  drugstore.com, as competitor of, 473
  Walgreen, as competitor of, 1798
Cyan Worlds Inc., 379–382
"CyberSavers" program, 1206
Cyrix, 769, 774
"Czech" spot, 1625
Czerkinsky, Gregory, 1467

D

"Dad, Can I Have Some Money—Tax Day 6" spot, 689
Daffy's, 76
Dahlin, John, 771
Dahlin Smith White, 772
Daiberl, Stefan, 1069
Daily Defense hair care products, 335
The Daily Show (television show), 651
Daimler, Gottlieb, 987
DaimlerChrysler Corp., 383–394, 392
  "Employee Pricing Plan Plus" campaign, 383–386
  "Engineered to be Great Cars" campaign, 386–389
  Ford, as competitor of, 562–563
  Saturn, as competitor of, 1470–1471
  Volkswagen, as competitor of, 1778, 1785
Dairy Farmers of Ontario, 182
Dairy Management, Inc., 259
Dairy products
  BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 181–185
  California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 257–260
  Posilac and, 1035–1038
Dale, Jeremy, 1234, 1235
D'Alessandro, David, 825
Dalhoon, Don, 969

Dali, Salvador, 274
Dallas, Eugenia, 33
Dalsey, Adrian, 419
Dalton, Tony, 1677
Daly, John, 566
Daly, Lee Ann, 523
Damon, Johnny, 422
Damon, Matt, 209
"Dan the installer" campaign, 447–448
Dan the Product Guy (character), 1592–1593
"Dance Party" spot, 1550, 1552, 1553
"Dancing Fish" spots, 295
"Dandelion" spot, 1745
Daneyko, Ken, 519
Danforth, William H., 1111, 1113
Dangerfield, Rodney, 664
Daniels, Jeff, 1004
Daniels, Preston, 230
"Dante Hall" spot, 1101
Dante's Peak (film), 1549
Danza, Tony, 975, 976
D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles
  Anheuser-Busch "This Bud's for You" campaign, 109, 117
  Cadillac "Break Through" campaign, 634–637
  Norelco "Reflex Action Razor" campaign, 1189–1192
  Whiskas campaign, 934–935
Darden restaurants, Inc., 395–398
Dare, Virginia, 1201
"Darin'" campaign, 1433–1436, 1434
DarkGrey, 322
"Dart" spot, 361
Dasani, 1275
Daschle, Tom, 659
Dassler, Adolf (Adi), 19–20, 23–24
Dassler, Horst, 20, 24
Dassler, Rudi, 23–24
"Date" spot, 589, 590
Dave Matthews Band, 1120
Davenport, Lindsay, 1144
Davey, Charles, 921
David Ogilvy Research Award, 260
Davidson, John "J.D.", 577
Davidson Development Inc., 399–402
Davie-Brown Entertainment, 216–217
Davies, Steve, 1234
Davino, Flavio, 343
Davis, Ann, 1125
Davis, Bob, 917, 918
Davis, Catherine, 1051
Davis, Dale, 167
Davis, Gary, 1427
Davis, Jim, 1124, 1125
Davis, Larry, 856
Davis, Mark, 542
Davis, Marvin, 298
Davis, Mike, 1230
Davis, Miles, 1230
Davis, Paula, 1488, 1489, 1490
Davis, Steve, 706, 708
Davis, Thornetta, 1259
Day, Janet, 852
Dayton, George Draper, 1603
Dayton, Jonathan, 238
Dayton Company, 1599, 1603
Dayton Foundation, 1603
Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
DC Comics, 1614
DCA Advertising, 277–279
DDB
  Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 124–126
  Anheuser-Busch "Whassup?!" campaign, 127–130
  Dell "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign, 405–406
  Dial "Doesn't That Feel Better" campaign, 436
  Gill Foundation "TurnOut" campaign, 657–660
  Golf GTI commercial, 170
  J.C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 807–810
  McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, 964–967
  McDonald's "We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 967–970
  New York State Lottery "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, 1127–1130
  OfficeMax "What's Your Thing?" campaign, 1221–1224
  State Farm "True Stories" campaign, 1571–1573
  "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1009–1012
DDB Needham
  Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1103–1106
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 109–112
  Anheuser-Busch "I Love You, Man" campaign, 113–116
  "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 961–963
  Discover "Make a Statement" campaign, 1055–1056
  Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 979–982
De Beers SA, 443–444
De Luca, Geurrino, 912
De Wit, Michael Dudok, 1697
Dead celebrities, 1439
Dean, Howard, 1037
Dean, James, 883, 1230, 1749
Dean Witter, 1047, 1048, 1051
Deaver, Scott, 212, 213, 214
Debit cards
  MasterCard, 951, 952
  Visa, 84, 951, 1769–1772
DeCecco, Dave, 1290
"Decisions" spot, 388
Decker, Bill, 335
Dedrick, Gregg, 840
Deem, Sandy, 368, 1792
"Deeper" campaign, 16–17
Defense spending, 229–232
DeGeneres, Ellen, 1617
DEKALB Genetics, 1036
Del Rivero Messianu, 962
Del Russo, Mark, 93
Del Taco, 1592
Delaney, Greg, 731
Delaney, Kathy, 1040
Delivery services
  DHL "Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You." campaign, 419–422
  FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 537–541
  FedEx "The Way the World Works" campaign, 547–550
  "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544–547
  United States Postal Service "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign, 1717–1720
  UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1709–1712
  UPS "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1713–1716
Dell, Michael, 140, 403, 1091
Dell Inc., 403–406, 404
  Apple Computer, as competitor of, 140, 143
  Gateway, as competitor of, 610
  Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 722
Della Femina, Fravisano, and Partners, 804
Della Monica, Joe, 962
Delta Air Lines, Inc., 407–417, 408
  American Express partnership with, 83
  Northwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1206–1207
  Southwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1537
  United Airlines, as competitor of, 1697

"Delta Marathon" campaign, 411, 415
DeLuca, Fred, 455
"Dennis Miller Ads" campaign, 974–978
Dentyne Ice, 1832
Deodorants and antiperspirants
  Gillette "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 669–673
  Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401–1403
Department stores
  "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1487–1491
  J.C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 807–810
  Kmart "Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
  Kmart "Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall" campaign, 854–858
  "Martha Stewart Everyday" campaign, 850–854
  "Sears. Where Else?" campaign, 1491–1495
  Target "New Yorker Magazine Sponsorship" campaign, 1599–1602
  Target "Take Charge of Education" campaign, 1603–1606
Dermar, David, 115
Dershin, Sharon, 156
DeShannon, Jackie, 821
Design & Art Direction Awards
  Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
  "Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550, 1553
  "Sprint PCS" campaign, 1554, 1556
Designer jeans, 1744
DeSio, Anthony, 919
"Desk" spot, 385
Desmond, Paul, 1178
Desreux, Michele, 295
Desrozier, James, 79
"Destination" campaign, 1228–1231
Destino (film), 274, 275
"Destiny" spot, 202
Destiny's Child, 752
Detroit Lions, 557
Detroit Pistons "Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257–1260
Detroit Red Wings, 1258–1259
Detroit Shock, 1259
Detz, Rudy, 262
Deutsch
  California Milk Advisory Board "Happy Cows" campaign, 253–256
  DirecTV "Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" campaign, 447–450
  Mitsubishi "Wake Up and Drive" campaign, 1031–1034
  Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1040–1042
  Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1209–1212
  Old Navy "Destination" campaign, 1229–1230
  Old Navy "'70s Retro TV" campaign, 1226–1228
  Snapple "Bottles Personified" campaign, 237–240
Deutsche Post World Net, 419–420, 421
Deutsche Telekom, 1624
"Deviled Egg" spot, 1020
DeVito, Danny, 447, 449, 1302
DeVito/Verdi
  ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, 75–78
  "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 33
Dewar's, 424
Dexter's Laboratory (television show), 1613–1614
DeYoung, William, 312
DHL Holdings (USA), Inc., 419–422, 420
  United Parcel Service, as competitor of, 1714–1715
  United States Postal Service, partnership with, 1720
Di Caprio, Leonardo, 294, 1147
Diageo plc, 423–429
Dial-A-Mattress, 431–434
Dial-arounds, 975–978
The Dial Corporation, 435–438, 1383–1384
Diallo, Amadou, 7
Diamond, Lynn, 444
Diamond Foods, Inc., 439–442, 440
The Diamond Trading Company, 443–446
Diana, Princess, 1062
Diaz, Cameron, 446
Dick, Andy, 12
"Dick" campaign, 1021–1024
Dick Clark's New Year's Rockin' Eve (television show), 631, 633, 937, 940
"Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 960–964
Diesel, Rudolf, 747
Diesel engine, 747
Dieste, Stephanie, 980, 981
Diet Coke
  Diet Pepsi, as competitor of, 1304–1305
  "Untapped" promotion, 354
  "You Are What You Drink" campaign, 353–357
Diet Debbie doll, 835
Diet Pepsi
  Diet Coke, as competitor of, 353, 355
  "This Is Diet?" campaign, 1303–1305
  "Uh-huh" campaign, 1552
Diet programs. See Weight loss
Diet Rite, 240–242
Diet soft drinks. See Soft drinks
Dietary supplements, 1329–1332
Dietrich, Marlene, 986, 987
Digital Domain, 242
Digital imaging technology
  Advantix "Take Pictures. Further" campaign, 485
  Canon "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, 277–280
  Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 587–590
  Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 723–727
  Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482–485
  Nikon "Mass Market Initiative" campaign, 1159–1162
  Xerox "Keep the Conversation Going, hare the Knowledge" campaign, 1845, 1846
Digital music
  Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 135–138
  Echo, 196
Digital video recorders, 1619–1622
Dilbert, 1568
Dilbert (comic strip), 1576
Dillard's, 1186
Dillon, Nan, 666
Dillon, Thomas, 290
"Dime Lady" campaign, 973, 1547, 1837
"Dime Zone" campaign, 1543–1546, 1547
"Diner" spot, 947, 1096
"Ding Dong" spot, 253, 1605
Dinky (Taco Bell dog), 1594, 1594–1597
Dinley, Pat, 1190
"Dinner" spot, 103
"Dinosaur" spot, 915

Direct mail advertising
"AOL Latino" campaign, 65
AOL "Welcome to the World Wide Wow" campaign, 66–69
Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 163
Little Caesar "Talking Pizzas" campaign, 906–907, 909
Mercedes "Smooth Ride" campaign, 991–992
Village Voice "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign, 1755
Working Assets Long Distance "Direct Marketing" campaign, 1835–1838
"Direct Response TV" campaign, 1721–1724
Direct-to-consumer advertising
Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1209–1212
Paxil "Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
"The Power of Zyrtec" campaign, 1311–1314
prescription drugs, 1461, 1462, 1464
Prozac print campaign, 505–508
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325–1328
"Director" spot, 276
Directors Guild of America Awards, 498
DirecTV Group, Inc., 447–450
Dirks, Robert, 729, 731
Dirt Devil
"Darin'" campaign, 1433–1436, 1434
"Fred Astaire" campaign, 1437–1440
The Dirty Dozen (film), 1661
"Dirty Dozen on Ice" spot, 1661, 1662
Discover card "Make a Statement" campaign, 1053–1056
"Discover the Better Taste of Progresso" campaign, 270
Discovery Communications, Inc., 451–453 drugstore.com, alliance with, 473
Game Show Network, as competitor of, 593
Public Broadcasting Service, as competitor of, 1411
Discovery Health Media, 473
Dish Network, 448
Disney, Walt, 274
Disney Channel, 1664
Disposable diapers, 1380–1382
Distilled spirits
"Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
"Absolut Print" campaign, 1733–1737
Glenfiddich "Single Malt" campaign, 683–686
Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
Ditka, Mike, 973, 1327
DiVencenzo, Joseph T., 1106
Diveny, Larry, 1323
"Diver" spot, 1573
Diversity, 1628
Dixie Chicks, 752, 1217
Dixon, Chris, 1677
DMB&B
Allegra "Spirit of Freedom" campaign, 1461–1464
Cadillac "The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 639–641
DMs. See Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC
"Do Geese See God" (film), 60, 61
"Do It Once. Do It Right." campaign, 1683–1686
Do-it-yourself digital-photo kiosks, 483, 484
"Do More" campaign, 81, 82–86, 86–89, 951
"Do the Dew" campaign, 1268, 1270–1274
"Do What Tastes Right" campaign, 221
"Do You Have a Honda?" campaign, 742
"Do You Know Me?" campaign, 83, 84, 87
"Do you smell smoke" tagline, 250
"Do you speak Fuji?" tagline, 589
"Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 917, 1849–1853, 1850, 1851
Dobalo, Laurel, 314
Dobson, James, 658
Doc Martens. See Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC
Dockers, 603
Doctor's Associates Inc., 455–458
"Doctors" spot, 883, 884, 885
"Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 475–478
"Doesn't That Feel Better" campaign, 436
"Dog and Cat" spot, 1362
Dog Chow, 1111–1114
"Dog Door" spot, 1558, 1560
"Dog" spot, 1643
"Dog Trilogy" spot, 952
"Dog Walker" spot, 182, 184
Dogbert, 1214
"Doggie Mind Control" spot, 1173
"Doggie" spot, 560
"Dogs love trucks" tagline, 1173
Dole, Bob
"The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280, 1281, 1282
Purina Dog Chow Search for America's Most Incredible Dog, 1114
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325–1328
Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 951, 1769, 1770, 1771
Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, 213
Dolls
Bunny People dolls, 770
Diet Debbie, 835
"Rosie O'Doll," 856
Domain name registration, 675–678
Domino's
Little Caesar, as competitor of, 898, 899, 902, 904–905, 907–908
Pizza Hut, as competitor of, 1347
"Don" spot, 735
Donaghy, Mary Ann, 64
Dondero, Rob, 873
Doner
La-Z-Boy "The New Look of Comfort" campaign, 875–878
Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Six Flags "It's Playtime" campaign, 1517–1520
Donlay, Chris, 738
The Donnas, 1403
Donny & Marie (television show), 1605
Donohue, Marty, 48, 50
Donohue, Sean, 1704
Donovan, Carrie, 1226, 1228, 1230
Donovan, John, 1123
Donovan, Landon, 1144
"Don't Fence Me In" spot, 986
"Don't Leave Home Without It" campaign, 87
"Don't Mess with Dinner" campaign, 204
"Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 181–185
Doom (computer game), 381
"Doorstep Challenge" campaign, 1377
"Doorstep" spot, 1183
"Doorway" spot, 1186

Doris Duke Charitable Foundation, 102
Doritos, 583–586
Doston, Robert, 1625
Doswell, Raymond, 1108
"Doublemint Twins" campaign, 1831
DoubleShot "Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197–1200
"Doug" spot, 550
"Doughnut" spot, 1020
Douglass, John W., 231
Dove
  "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679–1683, 1680
  Dial, as competitor of, 436
  "Dove Days" promotion, 1860
  Dove Self-Esteem Fund, 1682
  Secret Sparkle, as competitor of, 1402
Dr. Dre, 1022
Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC, 459–462
Dr Pepper/Seven Up, Inc., 463–466
  lemon-lime beverage competition, 1290
  Pepsi, as competitor of, 1282, 1291
  Pepsi Vanilla, as competitor of, 1284
  Sprite, as competitor of, 345, 348
Drako, Dean, 323
"Dream Garage" spot, 1172
"Dream Team," 1133, 1142
"Dreams found faster" tagline, 283
"Dreams/Yume No Chikara" spot, 742, 743
Drees, Stephen, 1055
Drescher, Fran, 1226, 1345, 1348
"Dressed for Dinner" spot, 1861
Drexler, Mickey, 602, 1229
Drexler, Millard, 596, 605, 607
Dreyer, William, 1121
Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings, Inc., 467–470, 1119
Dreyfuss, Richard, 142, 143, 774
Driggs, Steve, 327
"Drink More Water" campaign, 1274–1277
"Drink Up" spot, 1274, 1276
"Drinking 101" piece, 12
"The Drive/Revised" spot, 1136
"Drive to Victory" spot, 1742
Driver, Minnie, 61
"Drivers Wanted" campaign, 170–171, 173, 1776–1779
"Driving American Innovation" campaign, 555–558
"Driving while black." See "Racial Profiling" campaign
Drug abuse prevention, 1217–1219
Drug Induced Nutritional Deficiency Program, 1332 drugstore.com, inc., 471–474
Drugstores
  CVS Corporation "Life to the Fullest" campaign, 375–378
  drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471–474
  Walgreen "Perfect" campaign, 1797–1799
"Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1061–1063
Dry Cleaner's Secret, 1384
Dryel "Habits" campaign, 1382–1385
DSL Internet services, 1473–1476
Dubois, Andre, 1601
"Duck vs. Rabbit" spot, 1614
Ducks
  Aflac, 35–37, 38–40
  Cadillac Catera, 639, 640
"Duct Tape" spot, 1020, 1455
"Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign, 403–406, 404
Dudrek, Tom, 111
"Dueling Disorders" spot, 522
Duff, Hillary, 652
Dufour, Gérard, 1335, 1336
Duhamel, Josh, 600
Dukakis, Michael, 76
Dumars, Joe, 1258, 1259
Dun, Andrew, 396
Duncan, Tim, 23, 346, 1095, 1100
Dundore, Bruce, 246
Dunkin' Donuts
  "Fred the baker" campaign, 48
  "Just the Thing" campaign, 49–50
  "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47–50
Dunlap, Angela, 973
Dunlap, Bill, 856
Dunlap, John, III, 641
Dunlop, Kerry, 1061
Dupont, Stephen, 1355
Dupri, Jermaine, 560
Duracell, 510
Durant, William, 631
Durex Consumer Products, 313, 315
Dusenberry, Philip B., 32
DustBuster, 1436
Duval, David, 566
Duvall, Robert, 447, 448
DVDs
  MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 171
  TV Guide, 1668
Dweck, Michael, 431, 433, 434
Dweck & Campbell, 431–434
"Dye Hard Snapple Tour," 239
Dylan, Bob, 142Einstein, Albert
Dyson, James, 475, 476, 477
Dyson Ltd., 475–478

E

E. Morris Communications, 1673
E-commerce
  Amazon.com "Amazon Theater" campaign, 59–62
  drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471–474
  "E-Business" campaign, 792
  IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 785–788
  IBM "E-Business" campaign, 788–791
  IBM "Gizmo" campaign, 791–794
  Lycos store, 918
  Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184
"E-Ticket" campaign, 1205–1208
Earhart, Amelia, 10, 55
"Early A.M." campaign, 549
"Early Intervention Youth" campaign, 1217–1219
Earnhardt, Dale, Jr., 839, 841, 1095
"Earth Wash" concept, 1750
"Earthquake" spot, 915
Easley, Robert, 1190
Eastman, George, 482, 483, 485, 489
Eastman Kodak Company, 479–491, 482
  Fuji Photo Film, as competitor of, 588–589
  Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 725
  Nikon, as competitor of, 1164
  Polaroid, as competitor of, 1358, 1361
Eastwood, Clint, 1409
EasyShare system, 483
"Eat fresh" tagline, 457
"Eat Mor Chikin" campaign, 841
"Eat Something" campaign, 203–206
"Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1817–1820
Eatzi's Market and Bakery, 205
Ebaugh, Susan, 1503
eBay Inc., 493–499, 497
  Amazon.com, as competitor of, 61
  "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1091
Eberhard Faber, 1458
Eberle, John, 554

Ebert, Roger, 275
Echo, 196
Echo-boomers. See Generation Y
"Echo" spot, 250
Eckert, Bob, 863
Eckert, Michael, 1806
Eckstein, David, 1057
Eclipse, Mitsubishi, 1033–1034
"Ecomagination," 625
Edgerly, Albert Wester, 1111
Edgerton, David, 226
eDiets.com, 817
Edison, Thomas, 624
Edmondson-Jones, Gareth, 822
EDS. See Electronic Data Systems
Education funding, 229–232
Educational toys
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
  LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 879–882
Edwards, Karen, 1851, 1852, 1853
Edy, Joseph, 1121
EFFIE Awards
  Accenture "I Am Your Idea" campaign, 18
  adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 25
  AirTran "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign, 45
  "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1827
  American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 100
  Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 136, 138
  AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
  AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 151, 153
  Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 161, 163
  Binney & Smith "Make Play" campaign, 187, 189
  Blue Cross and Blue Shield "Big Blue Arm" campaign, 1726
  Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 337, 340
  Breathe Right Strips "On the Nose" campaign, 338
  California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 257, 260
  Canon "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, 277, 279
  CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 281–284
  Carl's Jr. "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 289, 291
  Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627, 629
  Cisco Systems "The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 321, 324
  Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 332
  "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1490
  ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation "Child Hunger" campaign, 365
  Cunard Line "Can You Wait?" campaign, 371, 374
  Davidson Development "Repositioning" campaign, 399, 402
  Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377, 1379
  Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 414, 416
  Detroit Pistons "Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257, 1259, 1260
  Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439
  Diamond Trading Company "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign, 443, 446
  Diet Rite "Go for Zero" campaign, 242
  DoubleShot "Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197, 1198, 1199
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1683
  Dreyer's Grand Light "Unbelievable" campaign, 467, 470
  drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471, 474
  Dryel "Habits" campaign, 1383, 1385
  Dyson "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 475–478, 477
  Ebay television campaign, 496
  Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 503
  Febreze "Sharing and Connecting" campaign, 1389, 1390
  FedEx "Absolutely, Positively Overnight" campaign, 540
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953, 956
  Fisher-Price PowerTouch "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 881
  FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565, 567
  Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign, 569, 572
  Gain "Strange But True" campaign, 1395, 1397
  Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1820
  General Motors "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, 652
  Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119, 1121
  Hallmark Cards "Sneak a Peak" campaign, 691–695
  Hardee's "Revolution" campaign, 697, 699
  Holiday Inn Express "Stay Smart" campaign, 780, 783
  IBM "E-Business" campaign, 791
  IBM "Gizmo" campaign, 792, 794
  IBM "Linux" campaign, 795, 797
  Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811, 814
  Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423, 426
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1282
  Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834, 837
  Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482, 484
  Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 489, 491
  LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 879, 881, 955
  Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746, 1748
  "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1089, 1091
  MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 952
  "Mello Yello: It's Smooth" campaign, 1269
  Millennium campaign, 1707
  Miller Lite "Low Carb" campaign, 1452
  Morgan Stanley "At Your Side" campaign, 1050
  Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1267, 1270
  NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093, 1096
  "NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099, 1101
  Nissan "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign, 1167, 1169
  Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1174, 1176
  Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1209, 1212
  Orbit gum "No Matter What" campaign, 1831, 1833
  Pampers "Got the Power" campaign, 1380, 1382
  Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1261–1265

Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1283, 1286
Piedmont Federal "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign, 1341, 1343–1344
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1359
Polaroid "See What Develops" campaign, 1362
"Purina Dog Chow Every Day" campaign, 1112
"Rheingold Beer" campaign, 1421, 1424
Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1427
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441, 1444
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1475
Schick Intuition "Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1477–1480, 1479
Scotts Miracle-Gro "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1486
Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 168
Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401, 1403
Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501, 1503
Snickers Marathon bars "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 931, 933
Sprint "Dime Zone" campaign, 1546
Stanley Steemer "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign, 1557, 1560
Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1569
T-Mobile "Get More" campaign, 1623, 1625
Tampax Pearl "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1386, 1388
Toyota Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1643
Toyota "Fuel for Thought" campaign, 1638, 1640
Toyota Sienna "Kids Rule" campaign, 1644, 1646
Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651, 1654
Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1665
TV Guide "On the Inside" campaign, 1667, 1669
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
UnitedHealth Group "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1725, 1728
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721, 1724
Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1757, 1759
Virginia Tourism Corporation "Meet Virginia" campaign, 1761, 1763
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765, 1768
Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1771
Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1779
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801, 1803
Xbox "It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001, 1003
Yahoo! "Live Billboard Dating" campaign, 1854, 1857
Egger, Brian, 295
eHarmony, 1856
Ehringer, Sean, 19, 21
"85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, 277–280
Einhorn, Eric, 138
Einstein, Albert, 142
Eisen, Rich, 241
Eisner & Associates, Inc., 945–948
"EKG" spot, 1087
El Pollo Loco, 1596
"El Toro" spot, 389, 390, 391
Elder, Lee, 1137
Electric cars, 641–644
Electric shavers, 1189–1192
Electronic Arts (EA), 1497, 1498, 1499
Electronic communications networks (ECNs), 1089, 1090
Electronic Data Systems, 17, 501–504
"Elevator Fantasy" spot, 883, 885
Elfman, Bodhi, 890
Elfman, Danny, 890
Eli Lilly and Company, 505–508, 1327
Elias, Jonathan, 1144
Elizabeth II
"Coronation" spot, 3
iPods, 136
Ellen (television show), 1779
Elliott, Chris, 584
Elliott, Gordon, 269–271
Elliott, Missy, 600, 608, 888, 1146
Ellis, Davis W., 52
Email, 1148–1150
"Embarassment" spot, 1388
Emerald Nuts, 439–442, 440
Emissions, automobile, 94
Emmy Awards
Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 325, 328
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737, 740
J.C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 809
Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 885
Nike "Move" campaign, 1142, 1144
PBS "Be More" campaign, 1409, 1412
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695, 1697
The Emperors of Chocolate: Inside the Secret World of Hershey and Mars (Brenner), 941, 942
"Employee Pricing Plan Plus" campaign, 383–386
Employment web sites
CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 281–284
Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1039–1042
"Empowering the Internet Generation" campaign, 321–322
Empty Nest (television show), 805
Enderle, Rob, 725
Energizer Holdings, Inc., 509–512
Energy bars, 931–934
Energy issues, 1509–1512
"The Energy You Crave" campaign, 931–934
Engelbart, Douglas C., 913
English, David, 106
Ennis, Tom, 437
Enos, Joe, 1228
Enrico, Dottie, 1134
Enrico, Roger, 1278
"Envious Nomads" spot, 441
Environmental issues
Body Shop, 192
Citibank, 330
Clairol Employee Commuter Program, 335
Ford, William "Bill," 557
Ford hybrid cars, 558
General Electric "Ecomagination," 625
General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 641–645
"Monsanto Image" campaign, 1038
personal watercraft, 1354
Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1509–1512
Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 306
Wrangler "Earth Wash" concept, 1750
"The Envy" spot, 707
Epica Awards, 745

Episodic advertising
Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 890–891
Epperson, Jerry, 756
"Equestrian" spot, 1833
Erbor, Stan, 1433, 1435
Erceg, Michael, 1706
Erhart, Charles, 1325
Erickson, Paul, 973
Erickson, Ryan, 20
Ernst, Mark, 688
ES 300, Lexus, 1646–1649
ESPN, Inc., 513–523
MTV, as competitor of, 1078–1079
PowerAde, partnership with, 342
Rolling Rock, partnership with, 761–762
ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1497–1500
ESPNews, 513–516
Esrey, William, 1544
"Essentials" campaign, 94
Estates of World Golf Village "Repositioning" campaign, 399–402
Estefan, Gloria, 1281, 1296, 1488
Ethan Allen, 876–877
Etonic Athletic Worldwide, 566
"eToys" spot, 84
E*TRADE Financial Corp., 303, 525–531
Eubanks, Kevin, 849
EURO RSCG DSW Partners, 767–771
Euro RSCG Tatham
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better "Child Hunger" campaign, 363–366
Red Lobster "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign, 395–398
Walgreen "Perfect" campaign, 1797–1799
Eurobest Awards, 3
Euromarket Design, Inc., 533–536
Europe
Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 887
"EV1 Introduction" campaign, 641–645, 642
Evans, Daryl, 298
Evans, Katherine, 1660
Evans, Romer v., 76
Eveready, 509–512
Everhart, Angie, 149
Evers, Reinier, 158
Eversen, Carol, 149
"Everybody Chill" campaign, 352
"Everyday" campaign, 1471, 1634–1637
Everyday People (song), 1634, 1636
"Everything Fits" spot, 1335
"Everything Is Possible" campaign, 405
"Evolution" spot, 870
Excite
Lycos, as competitor of, 917
MasterCard partnership with, 952
Yahoo!, as competitor of, 1852
"Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 134, 718, 720–723, 1846–1847
Expedia, 1652–1653
"Experiment" spot, 40
Explorer, Ford, 680, 993
Express delivery services
DHL "Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You." campaign, 419–422
FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 537–541
FedEx "The Way the World Works" campaign, 547–550
"Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544–547
United States Postal Service "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign, 1717–1720
UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1709–1712
UPS "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1713–1716
Extra gum, 234
ExtraCare program, 376
Extreme Carver sandwiches, 203, 204, 205
Extreme sports athletic footwear manufacturers' campaigns, 1152–1153
Harris, Rob, 1272
Exxon Mobil Corporation, 307
Eye of the Tiger (song), 125, 805, 1197, 1199

F

F-Series trucks, 564
Faber Castell, 188
Fabric sprays, 1388–1391
Fabrics, 923–926
Facial tissue, 843–846
Factor, Davis, 751
"Factory" spot, 322
The Faculty (film), 603
Fadner, Hilary, 1427
Failed products, 1399
Fairchild, Morgan, 1225, 1226, 1227, 1228
Falk, David, 1131
"Falling in Love Again" spot, 987, 989, 990
Fallon, Pat, 778, 1408
Fallon McElligott
Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 367–370
drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471–474
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 501–504
"Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777–780
Holiday Inn campaign, 929
Holiday Inn Express campaign, 929
Holiday Inn Express "Stay Smart" campaign, 780–783
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Miller Brewing Company "Ads by Dick" campaign, 115
Miller Lite "Miller Time" campaign, 1021–1025
Nikon "Mass Market Initiative" campaign, 1159–1162
"The Nikon School" campaign, 1162–1165
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184
Nordstrom "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, 1185–1187
Prudential "Be Your Own Rock" campaign, 1405–1408
Purina "Incredible Dogs" campaign, 1111–1114
Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615–1617
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1698–1701
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721–1724
Fallon Worldwide
"Amazon Theater" campaign, 59–62
BMW "The Hire" campaign, 175–179
Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 325–328
Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 329–332
DoubleShot "Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197–1200
Dyson "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 475–478
Electronic Data Systems (EDS) ad, 17
Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1747

PBS "Be More" campaign, 1409–1412
"Sony BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
"Ted Launch" campaign, 1701–1704
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695–1698
False claims, 688
"Family Dinner" radio spot, 905
"Family Vacations" spot, 680
Fanning, Shawn, 1085, 1086
Fantappie, Giancarlo, 1339
Fantasy sports promotions, 1279
Farley, Chris, 1323
Farley, Jim, 174
"Farmer" spot, 1173
Farrell, Robert, 1755
Farrell, Sean, 1475
Fashion designers, 878
"Fashion Models" spot, 800
"Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
Fast food restaurants
Carl's Jr. "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 289–292
Church's Chicken "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, 317–320
"Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 960–964
Hardee's "Revolution" campaign, 697–699
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811–814
KFC "Chicken Capital USA" campaign, 839–842
McDonald's "Campaign 55" campaign, 957–960
McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, 964–967
McDonald's "We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 967–970
Quiznos "Baby Bob" campaign, 1413–1415
Subway "Jared Fogle" campaign, 455–458
Taco Bell "Think Outside the Bun" campaign, 1591–1594
Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1594–1597
Wendy's "Fresh Stuffed Pita" campaign, 1809–1812
Wendy's "Good to Be Square" campaign, 1812–1816
"Fast-Paced World" spot, 538
"Fast-Talking Man" ads, 538, 546
Fat-Free Pringles "Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1398–1400
Fat Joe, 560
"Father and Son" spot (AT&T), 153
"Father/Son" spot (Mastercard), 949
Faulkner, Mark, 1823
Favat, Pete, 1442
Favre, Brett, 1273
Fawcett, Mark, 1515
FCUK Him and FCUK Her fragrances, 579–582
FDA. See Food and Drug Administration (FDA)
"Fear Not" campaign, 1801–1804
Fearing, Judy, 517, 519, 520, 1273
Febreze "Sharing and Connecting" campaign, 1388–1391
Federal Communications Commission, 1410
Federal Open Market Committee Meetings, 163
Federal Trade Commission, 1295
Federated Department Stores, Inc., 1185–1186
Fédération des producteurs de lait du Québec, 183
FedEx Corp., 537–550, 545
DHL, as competitor of, 420–421
name change to FedEx, 548
Staples, partnership with, 1568
United Parcel Service, as competitor of, 1711, 1714
FedEx Field, 545
Feeding Children Better Foundation, ConAgra Foods', 363–366
"Feel All Right" tagline, 240
"Feel comfortable in your own skin" tagline, 1859
Feel 'n Learn Advanced Trainers, 1380–1382
Feiss, Ellen, 140
Feldman, Alan, 1009, 1010, 1012
Felix da Housecat, 1069, 1071
Fellows, John, 420
Feminine hygiene products
"Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1385–1388
Kotex feminine pads, 845
Feminism
Calvin Klein "cK be" campaign, 262–263
Nike, accusations of exploitation of women by, 1155
Ferguson, Sarah, 816
Fernandez, Mary Joe, 303
Ferraro, Geraldine, 1303
Ferrell, Will, 140, 887
Ferrero S.p.A., 1826
Ferris, Richard, 1699
Ferroni, Cameron, 1003
"Ferry Boat" spot, 1745
Fertman, Don, 456
Feuerstein, Henry, 923
Feuling, Steven, 849
Fidelity Investments
Charles Schwab, as competitor of, 303
E*TRADE, as competitor of, 530
iShares, as competitor of, 162
Paine Webber, as competitor of, 1676
Fields, Bill, 1252
Fifth Third Bank, 1091
50-Plus Communications Consulting, 1342
Figliulo, Mark, 1494
Fila USA, 551–554, 1149
File-sharing industry, 1085–1088
Filo, David, 1849, 1850, 1852, 1854
"Fin" spot, 187, 189
Financial Advisers, 161–163
Financial Communications Society Portfolio Awards, 1050
Financial services
Charles Schwab "Smarter Investor" campaign, 301–304
Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 367–370
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
E*TRADE "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 528–531
H&R Block "Worried About Bill" campaign, 688
"ING Launch" campaign, 763–766
"It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign, 1341–1344
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 893–896
"Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1089–1092
Morgan Stanley "At Your Side" campaign, 1047–1050
sports sponsorships, 369
"Thank You, Paine Webber" campaign, 1675–1678
"Financial World" campaign, 1789–1792
Fincher, David, 175
"Find Out" campaign, 195
"Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1748

Fingerman, Jeremy, 269
Finlandia, 1707
"Finn" the Goldfish, 265–268
Finver, Jody, 156
Fiorina, Carly, 723–726, 724, 793
FireBlocker mattresses, 1502
"Fired" spot, 163
Firefly, 693
Fireman, Paul, 1417, 1418
Firestone, 680–681
First Boards Award, 503
First Choice, 1609
"First Date" spot, 1052
"First" spot, 543
First Union, 1789–1792, 1793
FIRST USA credit card, 1294
Fischer, Cathryn, 679, 680
"Fish" spot, 1409, 1411
Fishbone, 1370
Fishburne, Laurence, 447, 449
Fisher, Carrie, 1234, 1235
Fisher, Dana, 1130
Fisher, Donald, 605, 608
Fisher, Doris and Don, 595, 598, 601–602, 1225, 1228
Fisher, Eddie, 1234
Fisher, George, 489
Fisher-Price
  "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
  PowerTouch Learning System, 880–881
Fishing, 1751
Fishing lures, 1193–1196
Fitness centers, 1859–1861
FitzGerald, Niall, 1685
Fitzgerald, Rob, 113, 116
Fitzpatric, Robert, 1083
Five Stairsteps, 1815
527 groups, 1075, 1584–1585
"Flag" spot, 1741
Flaherty, Patrick, 1532
Flake-Wilkerson Market Insights, 880
Flanagan, John, 891
Flanagan, Lawrence, 949
Flanders, Steven, 1087
"Flaps" spot, 327
Flash mobs, 560
Flavored creamers, 861
Fleadh Irish Music Festival, 429
Fleming, Michael, 592
Fletcher, Jim, 1430
Flickinger, Burt, 1121
"Floating Man" spot, 1000
Florida
  Anheuser-Busch "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 122
  antismoking campaign, 249
  "Truth" campaign, 97–100, 1029
Florida Atlantic University, Small Business Development Center, 1214, 1215
Floris, Gus, 884
Floss, Ken, 1507
Fluke, 1785
Flutie, Doug, 209, 976, 977
FLW Outdoors, 932
"Fly Like an Eagle" campaign, 1717–1720
Fly Like an Eagle (song), 1717, 1719, 1720
"Fly" spot, 235
"Fly Trap" spot, 1831, 1833
"Fly Your Own Song" campaign, 410
FMR Corp., 303
Focus on the Family Action, 657, 658
The Fog of War (film), 140, 1454
Fogel, Brad, 1790
Fogle, Jared, 455–458
Foley, Tim, 48
Folger, James A., 1373
Folgers, 861
Food and Drug Administration (FDA) advertising guidelines, 1313, 1326
  Advil warning labels, 1840 dietary supplement claims, 1330
  Lotronex, 1211
  Novartis Zelnorm, 1210
  Posilac, 1036
  prescription drug advertising regulations, 1461 product health claims, 1293
Food delivery services, 817
Food products
  California Milk Advisory Board "Happy Cows" campaign, 253–256
  Campbell Soup Company "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign, 268–271
  Cargill "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, 285–288
  Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439–442
  Dunkin' Donuts "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47–50
  Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1817–1820
  General Mills "Stories" campaign, 627–630
  Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign, 1687–1690
  Pepperidge Farm "Goldfish Crackers" campaign, 265–268
  Perdue "Now Arriving" campaign, 1307–1310
  Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 979–982
  Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1671–1674
Food Research and Action Center (FRAC), 364
Food safety, 1308–1309
Food Sightings Museum, 1592
Foodmaker, Inc. See Jack in the Box, Inc.
Foote Cone & Belding
  Citibank "The City Never Sleeps" campaign, 330
  Dockers "One Leg At a Time" campaign, 603
  Jeep "There's Only One" campaign, 392–394
  KFC "Chicken Capital USA" campaign, 839–842
  Kraft Foods "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign, 862–866
  Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 885–886
  Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 889–892
  "Quaker-Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign, 1292–1295
  Snapple "Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1658
  Taco Bell "Think Outside the Bun" campaign, 1591–1594
  United States Postal Service "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign, 1717–1720
FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
Footwear News, 25
"Footy," 572
"For Every Generation" campaign, 595–598, 599, 600, 1747
Forbes, Malcolm, 702
Forbis, Amanda, 1696, 1697
Ford, Chris, 1621
Ford, Gerald, 1073–1074
Ford, Henry, 555, 559, 561
Ford, Neal, 1642
Ford, Richard, 1366
Ford, William "Bill," Jr., 555, 556, 557
Ford Motor Company, 555–564
  Chevrolet, as competitor of, 632–633
  Explorer, 680, 993
  General Motors, as competitor of, 643
  Iacocca, Lee, 384

Nissan Quest, collaboration on the, 1175
Saturn, as competitor of, 1471
Taurus, 107, 1033
Toyota, as competitor of, 1642
Foreman, George, 650
Formula One racing, 93
Forschner, Charles, 1587
Forth & Towne, 1227
Fortune Brands, Inc., 565–568
Foster, Rube, 1107
Foster's Group Limited, 569–573
Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign, 570, 571
FOTFA. See Focus on the Family Action
"Foul Me" spot, 523
Fouladpour, Tony, 1782
"Found" spot, 1223
"Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 233–236
Fox, Michael J.
Diet Pepsi campaign, 1303, 1304
Gateway "People Rule" campaign, 609, 611
Pepsi campaign, 1284, 1296
Fox, Robert, 977
Fox Entertainment Group, Inc., 575–578
Fox Sports Network, 515, 518, 522
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675, 677
FRAC (Food Research and Action Center), 364
Fragrances. See Cosmetics and fragrances
France, William, Sr., 1093
Franchino, Joey, 48
Francis, Karen, 655
Francis W. Hatch Awards
Dunkin' Donuts "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47
"Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1590
Franck, Daniel, 1152
Frank, Sidney, 1735
Frankenheimer, John, 60, 175
Frankie J., 560
Franklin, Aretha
Folgers campaign, 1376
National Football League Kickoff festival, 1285
Pepsi "The Joy of Cola" campaign, 1281
Franklin, Rachelle, 1067
Franz, Dennis, 1305
Frappuccino, 1197
Frazee, Emily, 327, 328
Frazee, Harry, 208
"Fred Astaire" campaign, 1437–1440
"Fred the baker" campaign, 48
Frederick Brewing Company, 201–202
Fredo, Peter, 1711
Free trials, 66–69, 67
Freed, Vicki, 293
"Freedom. Appreciate it. Cherish it. Protect it." tagline, 33
"Freedom Party" campaign, 872
Freeman, Cliff, 577
French, Susan, 566
French Connection Group PLC, 579–582
Frenette, Charles S., 357
Frequent-flier programs, 83
Freschetta, 864
Fresh Care, 1389
Fresh Start, 1685
Fresh Step, 1116
"Fresh Stuffed Pita" campaign, 1809–1812
"Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241–1244
FreshCare, 1383
Frey, Larry, 517
"The Friday Scotch" campaign, 683, 685
Friedman, Eli, 1003
Friestad, Marian, 1581
Frisch, Amy, 1617
Frito-Lay Inc., 583–586
Diet Pepsi, co-promotion with, 1305
PepsiCo control, 1278
Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1399
See also PepsiCo
"Frogs" campaign, 108–112, 117, 539
Frost, Geoffrey, 1066, 1069, 1070, 1071
"Frozen Moment" spot, 1132
Frozen pizza, 862–865
Fry Multimedia, 535
Fudo, Frank, 554
"Fuel for Thought" campaign, 1638–1640
Fuji Photo Film U.S.A., Inc., 587–590
Kodak, as competitor of, 481, 487, 490
Nikon, as competitor of, 1163
"Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, 317–320
Full Sail Brewing Company, 201
Full Voice (magazine), 194
"Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1523–1526
"Fun Ships" campaign, 293–296
Funicular, Jeff, 335
Funk, Dr. Herbert, 459
Furniture, 875–878
Fuse TV, 137
Fusion Flash Concerts, 560
Fusion "Life in Drive" campaign, 558–561

G

Gable, Clark, 10
Gagnon, Pierre, 1032, 1033, 1034
Gain "Strange But True" campaign, 1395–1397
"Gala Event" spot, 245, 246, 247
Galant "Wake Up and Drive" campaign, 1031–1034
Galbin, Paul, 1065
Galia, Julia, 94
Gall, Joanne, 1648
Gallagher, Daniel, 1544, 1545
Gallo, Vincent, 262
Gallud, Jerry, 1708
Gamble, James, 1377, 1380, 1398
Game Show Network, 591–594
Game shows, 217
GameCube, 1003
Gamgort, Bob, 939, 943
Gammons, Peter, 514
Gannon, Laura, 1594–1597
Ganot, Harvey, 1323
Gap Inc., 595–608
Lee jeans, as competitor of, 1747
Levi's jeans, as competitor of, 887–888
Old Navy, as competitor of, 1230
Sears, as competitor of, 1489
Garbage Pail Kids, 1829
Garbo, Greta, 10
Garcia, Andy, 447, 449
Garcia, Bonnie, 954
Garciaparra, Nomar, 48
Garden-care products, 1481–1486, 1482–1483
Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1817–1820
Gardiner, Dave, 229, 231
Garfield, Bob, 539
Garfinkel, Lee, 344, 706, 708
Garland, Dwight, 1567
Garland, Eric, 136–137
Garland, Judy, 1661
"Garlic" spot, 343
Garner, Art, 94
Garner, James, 174, 1358
Garnett, Kevin, 1140

Garr, Jennifer, 588
Garrity, Jim, 1789, 1790, 1793
Garson, Willie, 1664
Gartner, Jim, 770
Gary Garlic (character), 1431
"Gas Station" spot, 86–87, 89
Gates, Bill, 752, 1005, 1007
Gates, Henry Louis, 795
Gateway, Inc., 405, 609–612
Gatorade
  "Origins" campaign, 1286–1289
  PowerAde, as competitor of, 342–343
Gault, Stanley, 679
Gay market
  "Absolut Print" campaign, 1735
  Jesse Ventura "Retaliate in '98" campaign, 1740–1741
  United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1699
  Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1779
  "Yard Fitness Center" campaign, 1861
Gay rights, 657–660
"Gay/Straight" spot, 1079
Gayles, Valencia, 1648
Gays and lesbians
  A & F Quarterly campaign, 11
  Gill Foundation "TurnOut" campaign, 657–660
  Guinness ad (unreleased), 428, 429
  John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–827, 829
"Gecko" campaign, 613–616, 619
Gecko Motion, 317, 319
GEICO, 613–621
  Allstate, as competitor of, 51, 52
  State Farm, as competitor of, 1571, 1572
Geier, P. A., 1433, 1438
Geldenhuys, Kim, 1161
General Electric Co., 623–626, 1053
General Foods International Coffees
  "It's How to Unplug" campaign, 859–862
General Mills, Inc., 627–630
  Kellogg Company, as competitor of, 832, 836
  Unilever, as competitor of, 1688–1689
General Motors Corporation, 631–656
  Chrysler Group, as competitor of, 384
  Ford, as competitor of, 557, 562–563
  Honda, as competitor of, 94
  Saab Cars USA, Inc., 1445–1446
  Volkswagen, as competitor of, 1778
General Nutrition Center, 471, 472
Generation C, 158
"Generation Next" campaign, 259, 1277–1280
Generation To Generation (music CD), 461
Generation X
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 110, 117
  Anheuser-Busch "I Love You, Man" campaign, 115
  Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 204
  Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 220
  Calvin Klein "cK be" campaign, 262
  Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 330
  Diet Coke "You Are What You Drink" campaign, 354
  Energizer "Bunny Chasers" campaign, 510
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953, 954, 955, 956
  Fisher-Price PowerTouch "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 881
  Frito-Lay "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 584
  Gap "Khakis" campaign, 602, 603
  Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 812
  Miller Lite "Miller Time" campaign, 1022
  Mountain Dew "Do the Dew" campaign, 1273
  Piedmont Federal "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign, 1342
  Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441, 1442
  Sprint "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (1998), 344, 345
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1766
  Visa ads, 84
  Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1777–1778
  Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1785, 1786
Generation Y
  Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 220
  Dr Pepper "This Is the Taste" campaign, 464
  Gap "Khakis" campaign, 602, 603
  Honda "What About Now?" campaign, 93
  Ice Breaker gum, 235
  Nike "Skateboarders" campaign, 1151–1152
  Snapple "Bottles Personified" campaign, 238
  Toyota Scion, 174, 1778
Generic brands, 831
Genesis Award, 1820
Genesis Team, Toyota, 93
Genetically modified foods, 1035, 1036
Gennaro, Mary Jo, 57
Gentle Glide tampons, 1385–1387
Genuine Swiss Army Knives, 1588–1589
George, Eddie, 1095
Georgescu, Peter, 999
Gerald Pines (character), 1827
Gerard de Thame Films, 394
Gerbrandt, Larry, 740
Germany, 964
Gerstner, Louis V., Jr., 788, 789, 798
"Get a piece of the rock" tagline, 1406
"Get More" campaign, 1623–1626
Get on Board, Lil' Children (song), 1523, 1525
"Get Out There" campaign, 1441–1444
"Get the Facts" campaign, 796
"Get the Feeling" campaign, 1641–1643
"Get Tooned" campaign, 1611, 1613
"Getting Better" campaign, 1333–1336
Getting Better (song), 1333
Gevorigian, Yuri, 33
Ghosn, Carlos, 1167–1168, 1175
Giancamilli, Andy, 853
"Giant Antenna" spot, 1551
Giant Caesar pizza, 900–903
Gibbs, Mike, 477
Gibson, Josh, 1107
Gibson, Kirk, 672
Gibson Greetings, Inc., 693
Gier, Randy, 239, 242
Gies, Brian, 221, 222
Gifford, Kathie Lee, 293, 294, 295
"The Gift" spot, 1335
Gilda's Club, 1488
Gill, Tim, 658
Gill Foundation, 657–660
Gillen, Mary, 1732
Gillespie, Dizzy, 602, 1230
Gillette
  "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 669–673, 670, 671
  Norelco, as competitor of, 1190–1191

Schick, as competitor of, 1316, 1478–1479
Sensor razors, 1315
Gillette, King C., 669
Gillette, Ray, 1055
"Gimme a Light" campaign, 114
Gingrich, Newt, 1836
Giraldi, Bob, 155–156
Girard, François, 1409, 1411
Girl Scouts of America, 1682
"Girl" spot, 103
"Girl's Trend" spot, 849
"Girlwatchers" campaign, 1303
Giuliani, Rudolph, 76, 1348, 1741
Givaudan-Roure, 262
"Gizmo" campaign, 786, 787, 791–794
Gladman, Julie, 1464
Glaser, Milton, 1602
Glasser, Ira, 76
Glastonbury Festival, 460
GlaxoSmithKline plc, 661–668, 1210–1211, 1324, 1327
"Glee Club" spot, 739
"Glen" spot, 1197, 1199
Glendening, Parris N., 945
Glenfiddich "Single Malt" campaign, 683–686
Glennon Company, 107
"Global Color Vote" promotion, 937, 939–940
Global Gillette, 669–673
Glowing puck, 577
Glueck, Jeff, 1653
Gnome Liberation Front, 1653
"Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1757–1760
"Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign, 43–45
"Go Back in Time" campaign, 2
Go Daddy Software, Inc., 675–678
"Go for Zero" campaign, 240–242
"Go Get It" campaign, 915–918, 916
God Save the Queen (song), 1759
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Godin, Seth, 136
Godzilla (film), 711
"Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257–1260
Gold Label Johnnie Walker, 425
Gold Lion. See Lion Awards
Gold Pencil Awards. See One Show Awards
"Gold Rush" promotion, 886, 888
Goldberg, Whoopi, 597, 598, 1747
Goldblum, Jeff, 133, 134
Golden, Hyman, 1657
Golden Award of Montreux, 1611, 1614
Golden Books Entertainment, 1605
Golden Kompass Award, 413
Golden Marble Awards, 1614
Golden Pencil Awards. See One Show Awards
Goldeneye (film), 986, 989
"Goldfish Crackers" campaign, 265–268, 266
Goldman, Gary, 178
Goldman, Manny, 354
Goldner, Brian, 954
Goldsmith, Gary, 1532, 1534, 1637
"Goldspot" campaign, 1233–1236
Goldstein, Adam, 295, 1215
Goldstein, Stanley and Sidney, 375
Goldstein, Steve, 884, 885, 890
Golf, Volkswagen, 170, 1169, 1777
Golf footwear and apparel
FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1134–1137
"Golf Gods" campaign, 567
Golf sponsorship, 108
"Golf" spot, 577, 1153
"Golf Swing" spot, 1136
"Golfing Buddies" spot, 385
"Golf's Not Hard, with Tiger Woods" campaign, 1136
Golin, Steve, 177
Golub, Harvey, 87
Golvin, Charles, 1624
Gomez, 1335
González, Alejandro, 177
González, José, 1528, 1529
"The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly" awards, 1187
"Good Cop, Bad Cop" spot, 276
Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval, 1390
"Good News" campaign, 615, 616–618, 619
"Good to Be Square" campaign, 1812–1816
"Good to the last drop." slogan, 859
Good Will Hunting (film), 735–736
Goodall, Jane, 738, 739
Goodby, Jeff
California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 258
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 441
founding of Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, 494
Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1121
Nike "Skateboarders" campaign, 1153
on "Tag" spot, 1147
Goodby, Silverstein & Partners
Anheuser-Busch "Nice Finish" campaign, 108
Anheuser-Busch "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 120–123
California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 183, 257–260
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439–442
Discover card "It Pays to Discover Revisited" campaign, 1050–1053
Dreyer's Grand Light "Unbelievable" campaign, 467–470
Ebay 2004 television campaign, 496–499
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119–1122
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 719–720
Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 134, 721–723
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 723–727
Isuzu Axiom "The Call" campaign, 805–806
Nike "What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders?" campaign, 1150–1154
Nike "Women's" campaign, 1156
"On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign, 679–682
Polaroid "See What Develops" campaign, 1360–1363
"Saturn Relaunch" campaign, 1465–1467
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473–1476
"TiVo TV Your Way" campaign, 1619–1622
Gooding, Cuba, Jr., 1426
Goodman, John, 449
Goodman, Larry, 514
Goodwin, Leo and Lillian, 620

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, 679–682
Google
  eBay, as competitor of, 494, 497
  Yahoo!, as competitor of, 1852
Gorbachev, Mikhail, 540
Gorbachev, Yuri, 1705, 1708
Gordeeva, Ekaterina, 1046
Gordon, Grant, 684
Gordon, Russ, 1062
Gordon, Stephen, 535
Gore, Al, 783
Gore & Associates, 924–925
Gore-Tex, 924–925
Goren, Ed, 576, 577, 578
Gorman, James, 527, 689
Gorme, Eydie, 81
Gossamer Condor (plane), 643
"Got Milk?" campaign, 181–182, 183, 257–260
"Got the Power" campaign, 1380–1382
"Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, 831–834
"Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1827–1830
Gottesman, Blake, 138
Gottfried, Gilbert, 35–37, 38–40
Gottliebas, Ann, 262
Goudge, Dave, 1565
Goulet, Robert, 517, 987
"Grab Your Own Style" campaign, 535
Graf, Gerry, 527
Graham, Heather, 685
Graham, Jamie, 566, 567
Graham, Martha, 144
Graham, Nick, 849
Gramaglia, Jerry, 1549
Grammer, Kelsey, 614, 1648
Grammy Awards, 354
Grams, Rod, 1739
Granato, Cammi, 107
"Grand Canyon" campaign (Little Caesar), 900–903
"Grand Canyon" spot (American Express), 81
Grand CEBA awards, 1575, 1578
Grand Cherokee, 389–391, 392–394, 992–993
Grand Prix Award
  Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607, 1609
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1683
  Nike "Play" campaign, 1145, 1147
  Nike "Skateboarders" campaign, 1153
  Sony PlayStation 2 "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1524
  Toyota Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1643
  Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1786
Grand Turismo, 1339–1340
"The Grandfather" spot, 1406
Grano, Joseph J., 1676
Grant & Sons Ltd., 683–686
"Grant Hill 4" campaign, 551–554
Grasse, Steven, 1019
"Grave" spot, 163
Graves, Leon, 1037
Graves, Michael, 535, 852, 1600, 1604
Graves, Tom, 491
Gray, Dave, 526, 527
Gray, Macy, 137, 1267, 1269
Gray, Mike, 1355
Green, John, 1239
Green, Maurice, 343
Green, Simon, 194
"Green Acres" spot, 1225, 1226
Green Acres (television show), 1225, 1226, 1227
Greenberg, Arnold, 1657
Greenberg, Jack, 958, 965
Greenblatt, Andrew, 230
Greene, Mike, 835
Greenpeace, 1037
Greenspan, Alan, 163
Greenwood, Galen, 981
Greeting cards, 691–694
Greiner, Robin, 1836
Gretemeyer, Janice, 312
Grey Goose, 1731, 1732, 1735
Grey Worldwide
  "call to action" campaigns, 171
  Fat-Free Pringles "Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1398–1400
  Febreze "Sharing and Connecting" campaign, 1388–1391
  Red Lobster, 395–396
Griesser, Matt, 565, 566
Griffey, Ken, Jr., 552
Griffin, Kathy, 1669
Griffiths, James, 1608, 1609
Griggs, Stephen, 460, 461
"Grim Reaper" spot, 369
Grinkov, Sergei, 1046
Grinstein, Gerald, 410
Grossman, Jeff, 974
Grossman, Mike, 506, 508
Grotz, Beth, 651, 652
Ground Zero
  California Department of Health "Tobacco Control Section" media campaign, 248
  ESPN "The Rick" campaign, 513–516
  "JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
Grove, Dr. Andrew S., 768
Grover, Ed, 1767
"Grow" campaign, 331
Growney, Bob, 1067
"Growth" spot, 250
"Grrr" campaign, 745–748, 746
Grunwald, Mandy, 1741
Gruss, Joe, 870
GSD&M
  Advertising Council "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31–32
  Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101–104
  Dial "You're Not As Clean As You Think" campaign, 435–438
  Southwest Airlines campaign, 416
  Southwest Airlines "Must Be Football Season" campaign, 1535–1538
  UnitedHealth Group "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1725–1728
GT Bicycles, 1249–1252, 1540
"Guardian Angels" spot, 681
"Guardrail" spot, 53
Guest, Annie, 888
Guest, Christopher, 515, 575
"Guests" spot, 833
"Guidance Counselor" spot, 893, 894, 896
Guinn, Kenny, 874
Guinness, Arthur, 427
Guinness "Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense" campaign, 426–429, 427
Gunbaum, Eric, 137
Gunn, Donald, 1609
Gunshanan, Jim, 1499
"Guppy" spot, 570, 572
Gupta, Sanjay, 845
"Guru" spot, 843, 845
Gustin, Carl, 483, 489, 490
Guth, Charles, 1281, 1284
Gutierrez, Eric, 658, 659
Gutwillig, Ken, 1023
"Guy's Trend" spot, 849
Gyorgy, Christopher, 1107, 1109
Gyro Worldwide, 683, 685–686

H

H2 blockers, 1322, 1324, 1325
Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119–1122

Haas, Bob, 889
Haas, Jay and Bill, 567
Haas, Lukas, 607
Haas, Robert, 884
Habitrol, 663
"Habits" campaign, 1382–1385
Hacker, George, 1014
Hacking, 1624
Hacohen, Dean, 1532
Hadlock, Carolyn, 150
Hafitz, Robin, 300
Hagerdon, Horace, 1481, 1484
Haggar Clothing Company, 603
Hagler, Marvin, 672
Haglund, Margaretha, 57
Hahn, Kurt, 1237
Hainer, Herbert, 24
Hair care products
  Clairol "Totally Organic" campaign, 333–336
  Pert Plus "Sink Boy" campaign, 1391–1394
"Haircuts" spot, 739
Hal Riney & Partners
  General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 641–645
  Saturn campaign, 1465–1466
  Sprint "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign, 1549
Hale, Marcia, 1037
Haley, Brad, 698, 811–813
"Half Pipe" spot, 279
"Half" spot, 1177, 1180
"Halftime" spot, 466
Hall, Anthony Michael, 522
Hall, Arsenio, 971, 974
Hall, Bridget, 1277
Hall, Christy, 1536
Hall, Dante, 1101
Hall, David, 1652
Hall, Don, 1002
Hall, Floyd, 850, 851
Hall, Jerry, 1230
Hall, Joyce, 691, 692
Hall, Steve, 212
Hall, Tina, 1149
Hall, Trey, 205, 1414
Hallmark Cards, Inc., 691–695, 692
"Hallmark Hall of Fame" series, 692
Halloween, 694
Halo 2 (video game), 1499
Halvoline motor oil, 308
"Hamburger" spot, 1455
Hamill, Dorothy, 667
Hamilton, George, 1689
Hamilton, Linda, 1549
Hamilton, Rhona, 142, 144
Hamilton, Richard, 1258
Hamlin, Pam, 1442
Hamm, Mia, 1154, 1156, 1289
Hammerquist & Halverson, 1513–1516
Hampton Inn, 929
Hancock, George, 201
"Handlebars" spot, 1793
"Hands" spot, 562, 563
Hanks, Tom, 1661
Hanna-Barbera cartoons, 1611–1613
Hannah, Darryl, 61
Hannen, Geoff, 1251
Hannum, Marshall, 1250
Hanson, Dan, 1004
"Happy Cows" campaign, 253–256, 254
"Happy Place" spots, 1748
Harbaugh, Jim, 515
"Hard Day" campaign, 1013–1016
Hardee's Food Systems, Inc., 697–699
Harlan Page Hubbard Lemon Awards, 1294
Harley-Davidson Motor Company, 701–704, 702
  Dr. Martens, similarity with, 461
  Victory Motorcycles, as competitor of, 1349, 1350–1351
Harlow, Shalom, 597
Harousseau, Philippe, 1679, 1682
Harper, Ron, 566
Harrelson, Woody, 1426
Harris, Estelle, 1664
Harris, Jon, 1299, 1300, 1302
Harris, Ken, 1058
Harris, Mary Ann, 370
Harris, Rob, 1272
Harrison, Mark, 1203
Harrison Carloss, 459, 461
Harron, Mary, 1732
Hart, Michael, 477
Harteveldt, Henry, 1652
Hartford Wolfpack, 1189, 1190, 1191
Hartin, Gary, 1810
Hartley, Gregg, 553
Hartley, Mariette, 1358
Hartman, A. A. "Ollie," 1271
Hartnack, Richard, 1802
Harton, Gordon, 884, 1744, 1745
Harvick, Kevin, 651
"Has It Changed Your Life Yet?" campaign, 134
Hashagen, Warren, 605, 606, 608
Haskell, Dean T., 1811
Hatch, Orrin, 75
Hatch Awards
  John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign, 826
  MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1063
  Volkswagen Jetta "All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 1773, 1776
"Have a Heart" campaign, 1838
"Have It Your Way" campaign, 219, 220, 223, 226–228, 291
Havers, Nigel, 411
Haviland, Lyndon, 98
Hawk, Tony, 140
Hawkins, Hersey, 552
Hawkins, Sherry, 1642
Hawley, Russ, 1723
Haworth, 1576–1577
Haxan Films, 1507
Hayden, Steve, 790
Hayek, Salma, 597
Hayes, Geoff, 1734
Hayes, John, 79, 81–84
Haysbert, Dennis, 51–53
HBO. See Home Box Office, Inc.
Health centers, 1859–1861
Health claims, 1292, 1293
Health insurance. See Insurance
Health issues
  Subway "F.R.E.S.H. Steps" campaign, 457
  Walgreens Health Corner, 1798
Health maintenance organizations, 1725–1728
Health Medical Consumer Advertising & Marketing, 1311–1314
Healthy Curiosity (short film), 1827
Heard, David, 1607
Heard, Dennis, 584
Heartbeat (song), 1528
"Heartbeat" spot, 629
"Heat or Food" spot, 363
Heater, Bill, 1369, 1370
Hecker, Gordon, 1481, 1485
Heffernan, Paul, 1124
Hefner, Hugh, 290
Heggie, Janice, 1062
Heidegger, Ian (character), 273, 274, 275–276
Heim, Scott, 1384
Heimdichner, Brad, 610
Hein, Sheila, 659

Heineken USA Inc., 705–708, 706
Foster's, as competitor of, 571
Rolling Rock, as competitor of, 762
Helfant, Adam, 1146
Heller, Jeffrey M., 502
"Hello Future" campaign, 893–896, 894
"Hello World" campaign, 1134–1138
"Hellooo Federal" tagline, 546
"Help us find our colors" contest, 937, 940
"Helping Hand" spokescharacter, 1689
Hemingway, Ernest
Abercrombie & Fitch, 10, 596, 599
Gap "Who wore khakis?" campaign, 602, 1230
Hemingway, Mariel, 1824
Hemsley, Sherman, 1227, 1230
Henderek, Weston, 1624–1625
Henderson, Alan C., 244
Henderson, Susan, 868
Hendra, Carla, 791, 792
Hendricks, John, 452, 1411
Hendrix, Jimi, 1852
Henin-Hardenne, Justine, 23
Henrich, Emo, 1514
Henson, Jim, 83
Hepburn, Audrey, 1337
Hepburn, Katharine, 10
Herbal Essences, 333–336, 1393
"Heritage" campaign, 1201–1204
Heritage trails program, 1203, 1204
Herman Miller, 1576
Herrera, Lisa, 658, 659
Hershey, Milton S., 709
The Hershey Company, 709–715
Ice Breaker gum, 235
Mars, as competitor of, 939, 941–942
SmartZone bar, 932–933
"Herta" spot, 721
Heston, Charlton, 113, 115, 124
Heston, William, 1292
Hetteen, Allan, 1353
Hetteen, Edgar, 1353
Hewitt, Dan, 1498
Hewlet, William, 717
Hewlett, Walter, 725
Hewlett, William, 721
Hewlett-Packard Company, 717–727, 721
Apple Computer, as competitor of, 140
Apple iPod, 136
Dell, as competitor of, 405
IBM, as competitor of, 793
iMac, as competitor of, 134
Xerox, as competitor of, 1846–1847
Hey, Mama (song), 137
Heye & Partner, 220, 964–967
Heyes, John, 1608
Heyworth, Peter, 1708
"Hi" campaign, 1470–1471, 1778, 1785
Hicks, Jeff, 223
Hicks, Scott, 1410, 1412
High-definition cameras, 149
High School Reunion (television show), 48
"Higher Standards" campaign, 1802
Hilbert, Daniel R., 761, 762
Hilbert, Stephen C., 367
Hilfiger, Tommy, 1629, 1630
Hill, Grant
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 518
Fila campaign, 751, 1149
Fila "Grant Hill 4" campaign, 551–554
Orlando Magic, 167
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign, 344, 346, 347, 465
Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulous, Inc.
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 229–232
Cisco Systems "Empowering the Internet Generation" campaign, 321–322
CVS "Life to the Fullest" campaign, 375–378
Dunkin' Donuts "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47–50
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–829
priceline.com "Troubadour" campaign, 1369–1372
Hill, Vada, 1595, 1597
Hillblom, Larry, 419
Hills Bros. Coffee, 861
Hillsman, Bill, 1739, 1741, 1742
Hilton, Chip, 1288
Hilton, Conrad, 730
Hilton, Paris, 698, 1624
Hilton Hotels Corporation, 729–732
Hines, Gregory, 1055
Hintermeister, Stacy, 896
Hip-hop
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 634
Fusion Flash Concerts, 560
Gap "This Is Easy" campaign, 607
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 348
Tommy Hilfiger clothing, 1629
"The Hire" campaign, 175–179, 995
Hirsch, Andy, 989
Hirshberg, Eric, 450, 1033, 1653
Hispanic Americans
Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1595
in Tommy Hilfiger ads, 1628
Hispanic market
Allstate insurance, 53
"AOL Latino" campaign, 63–66
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 632
Dunkin' Donut "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 48, 49
Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 954, 955, 956
Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 562
Gain "Strange But True" campaign, 1395–1396
J.C. Penney, 809
McDonald's "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 962
McDonald's "We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 970
Oldsmobile Alero "Start Something" campaign, 653–654, 655
Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1263
Pizza Hut campaign, 1347
Sears "Todo para ti (Everything for you)" campaign, 1489
Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 308
Toyota "A Car to Be Proud of Campaign," 1633
"Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1012
Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1673
Wachovia "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, 1793–1794
Hispanic Serving Institutions, 1263
Historically Black Colleges and Universities, 1263
History Channel International, 1–3
"History" spot, 870
Hitler, Adolf, 1367
Hittle, Brad, 870
HIV/AIDS, 1411
Hladecek, Joel, 719

HMS Partners, 293–296
Hoagland, Ralph, 375
"Hockey" spot, 1189, 1190, 1191
Hodge, Lynda, 1668
Hodges, William, 1053, 1055
Hodgetts, Phil, 644
Hoechst, 1313
Hoechst Marion Roussel. See Sanofi-Aventis
Hoff, Jason, 872
Hogan, Paul, 570
Hogan, Terry "Hulk," 672
Hogue, Benoit, 576
Holcomb, Jim, 1437, 1439
"Hold Up" spot, 1234
Holiday Inn
  "Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777–780
  Hilton Hotels, as competitor of, 731
Holiday Inn Express
  Courtyard by Marriott, as competitor of, 929
  "Stay Smart" campaign, 780–783
"Holiday Magic" spot, 856–857
"Holidays your mother wouldn't like." tagline, 1607
Hollywood Entertainment Corporation, 733–736
Holmes, Katie, 888
Holtkamp, Deborah, 1436
Holubiak, Myron, 508
Holyfield, Evander, 518, 519
Home Box Office, Inc., 737–740, 951
Home Depot, 1494
Home dry cleaning products, 1382–1385
Home furnishings, 755–758
Home meal replacements, 203–206
"Home Movie" spot, 908, 909
Honda, Soichiro, 741
Honda Motor Company, 741–744
  General Motors, as competitor of, 643
  Mitsubishi, as competitor of, 1033
  Nissan, as competitor of, 1168, 1172, 1176
  Oldsmobile, as competitor of, 654
  Piaggio, as competitor of, 1338–1339
  Saturn, as competitor of, 1471
  Toyota, as competitor of, 1632–1633, 1635, 1639, 1641–1642, 1645
  "What About Now?" campaign, 91–95, 92, 93
Honda UK, 745–748
Honey, Stan, 577
Honored Guest Awards program, 930
Hood ice cream, 208
Hooper's Hooch, 1013, 1016
"Hoops" spot, 1269
Hoover, 476–477
Hoover, Harry, 1202
Hope, Bob, 306
Hopper, Dennis, 447, 449
Horizons line of furniture, 876–877
Horne, Lena, 602
"Hornet's Nest" spot, 1727
Hornsby, Andre, 880
Horowitz, Alexandre, 1189
Horowitz, David, 77
"Horse" spot, 888
Horsfall, Jan Robert, 915–916
Horton, Sherry, 998
Host, Theodore J., 1481, 1484
"Hot and Fresh" campaign, 319
Hot Legs (song), 397
"Hot News for Burger Lovers" campaign, 456
"Hotel" spot, 940, 1762
Hotels
  "Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777–780
  Holiday Inn Express "Stay Smart" campaign, 780–783
  "It Happens At the Hilton" campaign, 729–732
  Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 927–930
HotJobs.com Ltd.
  CareerBuilder Inc., as competitor of, 283
  Monster, as competitor of, 1040–1041
House, Andrew, 1524
"House Party" spot, 237, 239
"Housekeeper" spot, 65
Houseman, John, 1047
Housewares
  Crate & Barrel 1998 print ads campaign, 533–536
  Kmart "Martha Stewart Everyday" campaign, 850–854
Houston Herstek Favat, 249
"How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093–1097
"How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 598–601
"How to Speak Australian" campaign, 569–573, 570, 571
"How to Speak 'Footy'" campaign, 572
Howard, Juwan, 346
Howell, Randy, 1708
H&R Block, Inc., 687–690
Hu, Judy, 624–625
Hubbard, Lyle G., 1817, 1818
Hubbe, Nikolaj, 607
Hubbert, Juergen, 989
Hudler, Scott, 940
Huff Daland Dusters, 411, 414
Huffington, Arianna, 507
Huggies, 1381
Hughes, Marli Brianna, 833
Hughes, Mike, 1609
"Human Achievement" campaign, 303, 1791
Hume, Amy, 836
"Hummer" campaign, 645–648, 646
Humphrey, Hubert H. "Skip," 1739, 1741
Hunger prevention programs, 363–366
"Hungry? Crunch this" tagline, 941, 942
Hunt, John, 1552
Hunt, Len, 1775
Hunt Adkins, 1205, 1207
"Hunt for 33" contest, 761–762
Hurley, Bill, 990
Hurricane #1, 1785
The Hurricane (film), 275
Hurricane Katrina, 1673
Huschle, Cynthia, 1211
Hutcheson, Tad, 44, 45
Hutchinson, Lisa, 1468
Hutt, Harry, 168
Hutton, Lauren, 597, 1331
Hyatt Hotels, 731
Hybrid cars
  Ford, 556, 558
  Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1509–1512
Hyde, Andrea, 581
"Hype" spot, 790

I

"I Am an American" spot, 32
"I Am Tiger Woods" campaign, 1134–1138
"I Am Your Idea" campaign, 15–18
"I Feel Love" spot, 1041
"I Love You, Man" campaign, 112–116, 1023
"I think therefore iMac" tag line, 132
I Will Evolve website, 1512
"I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1357–1360
Iacocca, Lee, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387
Iacocca Foundation, 385
Iams, 935

IBM
Apple Computer, as competitor of, 143
"Deeper" campaign, 16–17
Dell, as competitor of, 405
Electronic Data Systems, as competitor of, 502
iMac, as competitor of, 134
Ibuka, Masaru, 1526, 1532
Ibuprofen, 1839–1842
Ice Breaker gum, 235
Ice cream
Brigham's "Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207–210
Dreyer's Grand Light "Unbelievable" campaign, 467–470
Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119–1122
"Ice Cream Man" spot, 891
Ice-T, 1022
Icehouse Beer campaign, 121
Iceland supermarket chain, 1038
Icon Awards
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 720
Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 723
IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 785, 787
Iconix Brand Group, Inc., 749–753
"Icons" ads, 425, 426
"I'd like to buy the world a Coke" campaign, 351
Idei, Nobuyuki, 1532, 1533
"Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 325–328, 332, 1794 IDEO, 1105
iExplore.com, 453
"If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, 1127–1130
"If You Let Me Play" spot, 1155
"Ignition" spot, 560
IKEA International A/S, 755–758, 756
Crate & Barrel, as competitor of, 535
La-Z-Boy, as competitor of, 877
Ilitch, Denise, 909
Ilitch, Michael and Marina, 897, 901, 904, 907
Illingworth, Dave, 1636
I'm a Believer (song), 1173
"I'm Lovin' It" campaign, 291, 964, 964–967
"iMac" campaign, 131–135, 132, 133
Imada Wong Communications Group Inc., 243
"Image is nothing. Thirst is everything. Obey your thirst." tagline, 344
"Imagination At Work" campaign, 623–626
Immelt, Jeffrey R., 623, 624
Immigrants, 33
"Immigration" spot, 829
"Impala Man" spot, 891
"Impala" spot, 936
Impax Marketing Group, 212
"Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 23–26
Impotence and smoking, 246, 247
Imus, Don, 1191
"In a World of Technology, People Make the Difference" tag line, 154
"In Case You Missed It" campaign, 1–3
In the Heat of the Night (film), 275
"In Your Home" campaign, 165–168
Iñárritu, 177
InBev USA, 759–762
"Incredible Dogs" campaign, 1111–1114
"Independence Day" spot, 1774, 1775
Independent Media, 1642–1643
India, 684
"India" spot, 950, 951
Indiana Baseball Hall of Fame, 1109
"Individuals of Style" campaign, 600
Indriago, Carolina, 1347
Industrial Light and Magic, 643, 1461, 1789, 1791
"Industrial Strength Investment Tools" tag line, 162
"Infect Truth" viral kits, 99, 100
Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177–1180
Information technology services, 501–504
ING Groep N.V., 763–766
Ingels, Marty, 1297
"Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1385–1388
Ink, Stephen, 1293
"Ink Cartridge Bingo" spot, 1563, 1564, 1565
InMarketing, Inc., 749–753
Inner Actives, Nike, 1156
"Inner Beast" campaign, 934–937
"Innovation Delivered" tagline, 15, 17
"Innovation" spot, 557–558
Insale awards, 126
Inserts
"Absolut Print" campaign, 1735
Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 195–198, 197
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 339
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 634
cK fragrance strips, 263
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 590
General Electric "Ecomagination," 625
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 723–724, 725–726
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 896
"Inside Job" spot, 323
"Inside Microsoft Anthem" spot, 1004
"Instructoart," 1077–1080
"Insult" spot, 620
Insurance
Aflac, Inc., 35–40
The Allstate Corporation, 51–54
Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 367–370
GEICO "Gecko" campaign, 613–616
GEICO "Good News" campaign, 616–618
GEICO "Mini-Campaigns," 618–621
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–829
"MetLife Helps You Make Sense of It All" campaign, 997–1000
Prudential "Be Your Own Rock" campaign, 1405–1408
State Farm "True Stories" campaign, 1571–1573
UnitedHealth Group "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1725–1728
"Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826, 827
"Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–829
Intel Corporation, 144, 767–775
INTELLICAST, 1806–1807
"Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1065–1068, 1069
"Intensity Hunter" market, 1198
Interactive advertising
Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1147–1150
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1507

Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC, 777–783
"Intern" spot, 1568, 1569
International Advertising Festival in Cannes
American Express "Paris" spot, 82
Anheuser-Busch "Whassup?!" campaign, 128, 129–130
Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign honors, 736
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
IBM "E-Business" campaign, 791
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 800
IKEA "Unböring" campaign, 755, 758
"The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1282
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085, 1088
Nike "Play" campaign, 1145, 1147
Nike "Skateboarders" campaign, 1153
Sony PlayStation 2 "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1524
Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1786
International ANDY Awards
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 229
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation "Child Hunger" campaign, 365
International Automotive Advertising Awards, 1649
International Business Machines Corp., 785–801
International campaigns
American Express "Do More" campaign, 84
Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign, 413–414
Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1681
Dr Petter "This Is the Taste" campaign, 465
General Electric "Imagination At Work" campaign, 625
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 797–801
"It Happens At the Hilton" campaign, 732
McDonald's campaign, 964, 966–967
Nissan "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign, 1167–1170
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1507
"Sony BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
Sony PlayStation 2 "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1525
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
International Coffees ""It's How to Unplug" campaign, 859–862
International Dairy Foods Association, 210
International labor issues, 1134, 1142, 1151, 1155
International Modern Pentathlon, 1124
International Mountain Biking Association, 1541 Internet
"Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 25, 26
"Altoids" campaign, 1822
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1825, 1827
Amazon.com, Inc., 59–62
America Online, Inc., 63–69
American Express "Seinfeld" campaign, 89
American Greetings/America Online partnership, 693
Anheuser-Busch "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 122
Audi "Art of the Heist" campaign, 157–160
Barnes & Noble web site, 196
BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 184
BMW "The Hire" campaign, 175–179
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 339
Budget Rent A Car "Up Your Budget" campaign, 211–214
Bureau of Engraving and Printing "The New Color of Money" campaign, 217
cable vs. DSL, 1475
"Campaign for Freedom" website, 33
captionmachine.com, 1714
CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 281–284
Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 629
Church's Chicken "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, 319
Cisco Systems "The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 321–324
computer worms, trojans, and viruses, 322
Crate & Barrel website, 535
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 441, 442
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
Discovery Communications "Two Guys" campaign, 451–453
Discovery.com campaign, 593
"Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 1849–1853
drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471–474
e-commerce, 1718
eBay 2004 television campaign, 496–499
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
eDiets.com, 817
ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1497–1500
"ESPNet SportsZone," 514
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
E*TRADE "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 528–531
Food Sightings Museum, 1592
Ford Fusion "Life in Drive" campaign, 559, 560–561
Game Show Network website, 592
General Electric "Pen" subcampaign, 625
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 719–720
IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 785–788
IBM "E-Business" campaign, 788
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 797–801
"iMac" campaign, 133
"ING Launch" campaign, 765
"Instructoart," 1079
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 812
J.C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 810
Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1830
Kinko's, 921
Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 490–491
Kodak.com, 486
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 889, 891
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 896
Lycos "Go Get It" campaign, 915–918
MasterCard/Excite partnership, 952
MetLife, 998

Internet, continued
MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 169–172
MINI Cooper "MINI Robots" campaign, 172–175
Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1039–1042
MoveOn.org "Real People" campaign, 1073–1076
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085–1088
Nike "Meet the LeBrons" campaign, 1141
Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1148–1150
Nissan "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign, 1169
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184
Northwest Airlines "E-Ticket" campaign, 1205–1208
Oldsmobile Alero "Start Something" campaign, 654–656
Oxygen Media, 1241
Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1264
Pepperidge Farm "Goldfish" web site, 266, 268
Polartec "Forward Fabric" campaign, 925
Procter & Gamble feminine hygiene websites, 1387
Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1427
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1444
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473–1476
Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1402–1403
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1507–1508
The Sidekick, 1624
Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1511–1512
Sprint PCS, 1554, 1555
Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1706, 1707–1708
"Subservient Chicken" campaign, 222–225
Toyota Chinese-language website, 1644
Toyota Sienna "Kids Rule" campaign, 1645
Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651, 1653–1654
Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1664
United States Tennis Association, 1722
Wendy's "Good to Be Square" campaign, 1813, 1815
Xbox Live, 1001–1003
Yahoo! "Live Billboard Dating" campaign, 1854–1857
Internet Explorer, 1005
"Interrogation" spot, 1305
"Interview" spot, 1696, 1697
Intuition "Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1477–1480
Intuition (song), 1477, 1479
Inventions, 624
Investment companies
Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 161–164
Charles Schwab "Smarter Investor" campaign, 301–304
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–829
Morgan Stanley "At Your Side" campaign, 1047–1050
"Thank You, Paine Webber" campaign, 1675–1678
IPA Advertising Effectiveness awards, 741
iPod, 136
Ford Fusion "Particle" spot, 560
Hewlett-Packard branded, 726
"Silhouette" campaign, 135–138, 1086–1087
Ireland, Kathy, 1502
"Ireland" spot, 950, 951
Irish stout, 426–429
"Ironic Quotes" spot, 247
Irons, Jeremy, 1648
Irritable Bowel Syndrome, 1209–1212
Isaacson, Walter, 1616–1617
iShares, 161–163
"iShares. This is the new school of investing" tag line, 163
Israel, 584
Isuzu Motors America, Inc., 803–806
Isuzu Trooper commercials, 563
"It Happens At the Hilton" campaign, 729–732
IT industry. See Information technology services
"It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1725–1728
"It Pays to Discover Revisited" campaign, 1050–1053
"It pays to Discover" tagline, 1050, 1051
"It stirs the soul" tagline, 862
"Italian Woman" spot, 279, 369
"It's a Woman Thing" campaign, 55–58
"It's All About the Beer" campaign, 705–708
"It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 150–153, 1548
"It's Always Been Survival of the Fittest. Drink Milk." campaign, 183
"It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085–1088
"It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 84, 951
"It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001–1004
"It's Him" spot, 356
"It's How to Unplug" campaign, 859–862
"It's not an ending, it's a beginning." tagline, 763
"It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign, 862–866
"It's Playtime" campaign, 1517–1520
"It's Something Else" campaign, 43, 44
"It's the Cheese" tagline, 253
"It's Time to Drink Beer" campaign, 117–118
"It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695–1698
"It's What's Inside" campaign, 199–202
"It's Wide Open" campaign, 883–886
"It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign, 1341–1344
iTunes
Hewlett-Packard personal computers, 726 iPod "Silhouette" campaign, 137, 138
Motorola partnership with, 1071
Napster, as competitor of, 1086–1087
Iverson, Allen, 1146, 1418

J

J. W. Foster Company, 25
J. Walter Thompson
Citibank campaign, 330
Diamond Trading Company "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign, 443–446
Ford Fusion "Life in Drive" campaign, 558–561
Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 561–564

Jenny Craig "Kirstie Alley" campaign, 815–818
"Kleenex Anti-Viral" campaign, 843–846
Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298–1303
Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator" campaign, 1317–1322
Rolaids "Super Fans" campaign, 1322–1325
Schick Intuition "Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1478–1480
"Schick Tracer FX Ads" campaign, 1315–1317
Sprint "Dime Zone" campaign, 1544–1546
Sprint "Speak Freely on Monday Nights" campaign, 1549
Trident "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 233–236
U.S. Marines campaign, 1263–1264
Wisk "Do It Once. Do It Right." campaign, 1683–1686
Jack in the Box, Inc., 811–814
"Jackie Collins" spot, 304
Jackobson, Michael, 1399
"Jack's Back" campaign, 811–814
Jack's Pizza, 864
Jackson, Alan, 561
Jackson, Bo, 1139, 1142
Jackson, Janet, 440, 675, 676
Jackson, Jesse, 1134
Jackson, Keith, 1288
Jackson, Michael (Mercedes-Benz executive), 983, 986, 989, 990, 991
Jackson, Michael (performer), 1278, 1281, 1284, 1296
Jackson, Michael (Scotch authority), 684
Jackson, Peter, 1069
Jackson, Reggie, 1300, 1301
Jackson, Richard J., 251
Jackson, Samuel L., 1817
Jackson, Sheldon, 343
Jacobs, Chris, 1107
Jacobs, Irwin, 1354–1355
Jacobs, Susan, 986
Jacobs, Tony, 241
Jacobs' Pharmacy, 350
Jacobson, Peter, 1135
Jadakiss, 1146
Jaffe, Richard E., 12
Jail House Rock (song), 1302
"Jailbreak" spot, 1087
Jaksich, Nancy and Jerry, 1579–1580
"Jamais sans mon lait" tag line, 183
Jamar, Stacy, 398, 960
James, Harry, 844
James, LeBron, 24, 347–349, 1138–1140, 1139
James, Rick, 1140
Jameson, Jenna, 12, 137
Jamieson, Paul, 332
Janus, Paul, 1817
Jaoume, Leon, 1235
Japan, 490
"Japanese Surgeons" spot, 800
"Jared Fogle" campaign, 455–458, 813, 814
"Jargon" spot, 1000
Jarmon, Steve, 238
Java software, 786
Jay, John, 1149
Jay-Z, 1418
Jayne, Billy, 149
Jazz, Honda, 1168–1169
J.C. Penney Company, Inc., 807–810, 808, 1489, 1493
JC Advertising, 1661
Jean, Wyclef, 1235
Jeans
Gap "This Is Easy" campaign, 605–608
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1748
Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 883–886
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 889–892
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886–889
Jeep, 392
Grand Cherokee, 992–993
Hummer, as competitor of, 646, 647
"Jeep" campaign, 389–392
"There's Only One" campaign, 392–394
The Jeffersons (television show), 1301
Jeffries, Michael, 10, 600
Jenkins, Jim, 1552, 1659
Jenner, Bruce, 667
Jenny Craig, Inc., 815–818
"Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 749–753, 750
Jensen, Jeff, 107
Jensen, Lance, 645, 646, 648, 1781, 1782
Jensen, Mike, 1390
Jeopardy (television show), 299
Jeremy's MicroBatch Ice Creams, 922
Jergens
Lubriderm, as competitor of, 1320
Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1402
"Jerry's Guide to the World Wide Web," 1849
"Jesse the Mind" spot, 1742
Jesse Ventura for Governor, 1739–1742
JetBlue Airways Corporation, 819–822, 820
Song Airlines, as competitor of, 408–409
Ted, as competitor of, 1702, 1703
"JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
Jeter, Derek, 1279, 1289
Jetskis, 1352–1356
Jetsons, 1548
Jetta "All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 1773–1776
Jewel, 1479
Jewelry, 443–446
Jewison, Norman, 275
JibJab, 119
"Jingle for Goldfish" campaign, 266
Jingles
"The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers In Your Cup," 1373–1376
"Have It Your Way," 228
"Pepsi-Cola Hits the Spot," 1284, 1290
Texaco, 306
"JoAnn" spot, 1215
Job sites
CareerBuilder ""Time to Move On" campaign, 281–284
Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1039–1042
Jobs, Steve
APPLE "Silhouette" campaign, 136
APPLE "Switchers" campaign, 139, 140
APPLE "Think Different" campaign, 132, 141, 142
"Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
Joe Isuzu (character), 803–806
"Joe" spot, 1101
John, Elton, 1548, 1719
John Hancock Financial Services Inc., 107, 823–829
Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
Johnson, Allison, 724
Johnson, Betsey, 446, 750
Johnson, Bruce, 339, 340
Johnson, Carole, 672
Johnson, David, 1353

Johnson, Earvin "Magic"
AIDS awareness, 312
American Express ads, 84, 85
American Express campaign, 951
Johnson, Lyndon, 1073–1074
Johnson, Mark, 114
Johnson, Michael, 1273
Johnson, Mike, 115, 1019, 1021, 1024
Johnson, Ted, 47, 48
Johnson & Johnson
Chesebrough-Pond's, as competitor of, 1692
Nicotrol, 661–662
Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1381
Johnston, Kristen, 334
Johnston, Paul, 1514
Jonah (chimpanzee), 1580, 1581
Jones, Andy, 567
Jones, James Earl, 155
Jones, John Paul, 636
Jones, Karen, 422
Jones, Marion, 1143
Jones, Orlando, 1282
Jones, Timothy, 364
Jones, Tommy Lee, 1549
Jonze, Spike, 757, 758
Joplin, Janis, 984, 989, 994
Jordan, J. J., 1317, 1684
Jordan, James, 1684
Jordan, McGrath, Case, Taylor, New York, 661–665
Jordan, McGrath, Case & Partners, 763–766
Jordan, Michael
annual endorsement income, 552
endorsements, 553
Gatorade campaign, 343, 1286, 1287, 1288, 1289
McDonald's campaign, 1552
MCI campaign, 971, 974, 1837
National Basketball Association, 1095, 1100–1101
Nike campaign, 28, 1131–1134, 1139, 1142, 1145
Rayovac campaign, 511
Sports Club Company, Inc., 1860
Jordon, J. J., 1302
Jouravlev, Konstantine, 1707
"Journeys" ads, 425
"The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280–1283
JoyCam cameras, 1357–1360
JP Morgan Chase & Co.
"Amazon Theater" campaign, 59, 61
Citigroup, as competitor of, 331
Jr. Fire Ridge Parka, 360
Judd, Naomi and Wynonna, 857
Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1827–1830
"Jukka Brothers" campaign, 1077, 1078
Julian, Peter, 21
"Julie" ad, 365
Jung, Andy, 836–837
"Jungle" spot, 120
"Just Do It" campaign, 21, 28, 1139, 1152
"Just for the taste of it" tagline, 353
"Just Screw It" tagline, 749, 752
"Just the Thing" campaign, 49–50

K

Kaehler, Kathy, 1692
Kagan, Jeff, 152, 1626
Kahn, Bette, 535
Kahn, Joseph, 560
Kalember, Patricia, 663
Kamalova, Khurshida, 1707
Kamber, Victor, 76
Kamen, Harry P., 999
Kaminsky, Alex, 516
Kanawa, Kiri Te, 1044
"Kandoo" launch campaign, 1381
Kane, Tim, 156
Kanefsky, Jason, 521
Kansas City, Missouri, 1107–1109
Kansas State University, College of Education, 1108
Kaplan, Dena, 594
Kaplan Thaler, Linda, 36, 38, 335
Kaplan Thaler Group
Aflac "Broken Leg" campaign, 38–41
"The Aflac Duck" campaign, 35–38
Church & Dwight "Trojan Man" campaign, 314
Herbal Essences account, 335–336
Kar-wai, Wong, 177
Karan, Donna, 984
Karcher, Carl, 289
Karl, George, 166
Karlson, John, 1215, 1565
Karlsson, Linus, 1022
Karros, Eric, 1860, 1861
Karsch, Tom, 1660, 1661
Kasich John, 1741
Katayama, Yutaka, 1171
Katen, Irene, 1770
Katz, Francine, 201
Kaufman, Wendy, 1655–1658
Kay, Woody, 1062, 1063
Kaye, Tony, 426, 823
Kazin, Michael, 1741
Keast, Brodie, 1621
Keebler Sunshine Cheez-It crackers, 267
Keener, Ray, 1250
"Keep Playing" campaign, 341–344
"Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge" campaign, 1843–1847, 1844, 1845
"Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
Keeter, Phil, 1355
Keillor, Garrison, 743, 745, 747
Keister, Paul, 758
Keitel, Harvey, 424
Kellam, Doug, 475
Kelleher, Herb, 1535
Kelleher, John, 1678
Keller, Andrew, 173, 221, 1759
Keller, Casey, 1400
Keller, Kevin, 219
Keller, Mary Ann, 648
Kelley, Brian, 947
Kellogg, Dr. John Harvey, 834
Kellogg Company, 831–837, 835
General Mills, as competitor of, 628
Keebler Sunshine Cheez-It crackers, 267
Kelly, Albert, 1120
Kelly, Gene, 170
Kelly, Jim, 1712, 1719
Kelly, Paul, 1324
Kelly, R., 1146
Kelly Awards
"Absolut Print" campaign, 1736
"Altoids" campaign, 1824
Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 136, 138
Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 328
General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 644
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1359
"Specialized" campaign, 1542
Volkswagen "New Beetle" campaign, 1786
Kendall, Jason, 1860
Kennedy, John F., 1261–1262
Kennedy, Joseph, 642, 643
Kenneth C. Smith Advertising, 919–922
Kerkorian, Kirk, 384
Kerouac, Jack, 599
Kerry, John, 1073–1076, 1583–1585
Kerstetter, Bob, 1058
Ketchum, John, 1203

Kevin, Kitty, 1822
"Key Party" spot, 1631, 1633
"The Key" spot, 1507
Keyes, Susan, 868
KFC Corp., 839–842
  Church's Chicken, as competitor of, 318–319
  reimaging campaign, 397
"Khakis" campaign, 601–604
"Kick-Start Diet" campaign, 834–837
"Kids Rule" campaign, 1643–1646
"KidsCenter" spot, 518, 519
Kieschnick, Michael, 1835
Kiker, John, 1701
Kilborn, Craig, 352
Kilcoyne, Jill, 751
Kilduff, Jack, 464
Kilmer, Val, 1161
Kimball, Alayna, 402
Kimball, John E., 197
Kimball Tobacco Company, 55
Kimberly-Clark Corporation, 843–846, 844, 1381
Kimble, Victor, 370
Kimmel, Ken, 48
King, Arlene, 719
King, B. B., 713, 1791
King, Dave, 1802
King, Larry, 729
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
  ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, 75, 77
  Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 144
King, Rick, 1120
King, Rollin, 1535
King & Bear golf course, 400, 401
Kings of Leon, 1775
Kinko's
  Mail Boxes Etc. as competitor of, 921
  "Our Office Is Your Office" campaign, 541–544
Kinks, 724, 726
Kiosks
  do-it-yourself digital-photo kiosks, 483, 484
  General Foods International Coffees "It's How to Unplug" campaign, 860
Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners
  Netscape Navigator campaign, 1006
  Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 407–410
  "Vespa reintroduction" campaign, 1339
"Kirstie Alley" campaign, 815–818
KISS, 1281
Kissmobile, 714
"Kitchen" spot, 757
Kitty litter, 1114–1117
Klacking, John, 1430–1431
"Kleenex Anti-Viral" campaign, 843–846, 844
Klein, Calvin, 1629
Klein, Kelly, 597
Klein, Rochelle, 765
Klein, Russ, 220, 221, 222, 223
Kleinman, Ronald E., 1036
Kline, Richard, 313, 314
Kling, Jeff, 1453, 1454
Klug, Jan, 562, 563, 564
Kmart Corp., 847–858, 851
  Little Caesar, partnership with, 901
  Sears, acquisition of, 1495
  Sears, as competitor of, 1489
Knabusch, Edward, 875
"Knicks Tickets" spot, 88
Knight, Philip, 1131, 1132, 1138, 1140, 1151
Knight, Wayne, 973
Knives, 1587–1590
Knopfler, Mark, 823, 824
Knowles, Beyoncé
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280, 1281, 1282
  Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1285
Knox, Dave, 1401
Koch, James, 199
Koch, Jim, 201, 202
Kodak. See Eastman Kodak Company
Koehnen, Julie, 1850, 1854, 1855
Koelker, Mike, 889
Koenig, Joe, 107
Koepke, Gary, 1121, 1149
Kogan, Theo, 261
Kohl's, 809
Koivisto, Eric, 790, 1004
Kolodny, Abigail, 1105
Koogle, Timothy, 1853
Koonin, Steven, 1663, 1665
Kopald, Larry, 94
Korey, Kay & Partners, 295
Kornhauser, Henry, 234
Koronis, Bill, 1751
Kosolopov, Alexander, 1707
Kotex, 845, 1387
Kournikova, Anna, 303–304, 527, 1152, 1624
Koval, Robin, 36, 38
Kowloon Wholesale Seafood Company, 811
Kraft, J. L., 862
Kraft, Robert and Kim, 1250
Kraft Foods, Inc., 859–866
  "Altoids" campaign, 1821–1824
  "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1824–1827
  Balance Bar, 932
  Cartoon Network, partnership with, 1611, 1613
  Unilever, as competitor of, 1688
Kramer, Jill, 723
Kraus, Jeremy, 922
Krauss, Jurgen, 220
Kravitz, Lenny
  Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 598, 599, 600
  Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 890
Kricfalusi, John, 1041
Krivkovich, Peter, 44
Kroc, Ray, 961, 967
Kroger, Fred, 312
Kroha, Sally, 1292
Kroll, Alex, 1741
Kronmuller, Lisa, 710
Kruger, Barbara, 1082
Krugman, Scott, 933
Krupnick, Elizabeth, 1405–1408
Krutick, Jill, 1355
Kuenheim, Eberhard von, 985
Kuhn, Barbara, 663
Kuhnie, Jay, 388
Kusin, Gary, 542
Kusnetzky, Dan, 795, 796
Kyoto Protocol, 1510, 1511

L

L. L. Cool J., 602
La Agencia de Orcí & Asociados, 298
La Broad, Michael, 121
La-Z-Boy Inc., 875–878
Labadie, Peter, 507
Labatt USA, 867–870
  See also InBev USA
Labels
  Advil, 1840
  Rolling Rock 33 mystery, 760, 869
  Samuel Adams beer, 201
"Labels" campaign, 1081–1084
Labor issues
  Nike, 1134, 1142, 1151, 1155
  United Airlines, 1703
  UPS strike, 538–539
Labrador retriever, Lycos, 916, 918
LaBroad, Michael, 118
Lacey, Katie, 1290

Lachky, Bob
Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 111, 112
Anheuser-Busch "I Love You, Man" campaign, 115
Anheuser-Busch "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 121
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 123, 125, 126
Anheuser-Busch "Whassup?!" campaign, 128
"Charlton Heston" spots, 124
LaCivita, Chris, 1585
Lady Lee Riders "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1748
Lafavore, Michael, 1667, 1668
Lafayette, Colorado, 1294–1295
LaFontaine, Don, 734, 735
Lagrega, Angelo, 1749
Lahde, Scott, 1040
Lahti, Christine, 413
Lai, Ann, 52
Laimbeer, Bill, 1259
Laird, Trey, 597
Laird + Partners
Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 595–598
Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 598–601
Lake, Charlene, 1475
"Lake" spot, 1219
Lake Tahoe, Nevada, 1354
Lambatos, Jimmy, 456, 1414
Lambert, Jordan, 1320
Lambie, Jim, 1342
Lambrettas, 461
Lamfrom, Paul and Marie, 359
"Lamp" spot, 755, 757
Lancer, Mitsubishi, 1034
Land, Edwin, 1357, 1360
Land of Point, 382
Land Rover, 680
Landis, Ron, 1720
Landsberg, Steven, 1105
Landsberger, Gidi, 584
Lane, Ken, 250
Langbo, Arnold, 832
Lange, Robert, 921
"Language Tape" spot, 129
Larkins, Sean, 194
Larsen, Jonathan, 1756
Larsen, Mark, 511
Larson, Dave, 1146
Larson, William, 1429
Las Vegas, Nevada, 872
Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority, 871–874
"Las Vegas—It's anything and everything" campaign, 872
Lasorda, Tommy, 1324
Lasser, Stuart, 1471
"The Last Honest Pizza" campaign, 1429–1432
"Last Minute" spot, 1799
Late Show (television show), 959
Latin America, 1347
"Latin" spot, 466
LaTorre, Lou, 1323
Latrobe Brewing Company, 759–762, 867–870
Lauer, Matt, 1223
"Laughing Mouths" spot, 1525
Launch campaigns
"Cayenne Launch" campaign, 1365–1368
First Union "Launch" spot, 1789
"ING Launch" campaign, 763–766
"JetBlue Launch" campaign, 819–822
"Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
"Kandoo," 1381
Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1174–1177
"Sony BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
"Ted Launch" campaign, 1701–1704
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325–1328
Laundry products
Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
Dryel "Habits" campaign, 1383–1385
Gain "Strange But True" campaign, 1395–1397
Wisk "Do It Once. Do It Right." campaign, 1683–1686
"Laundry Room" spot, 1745
"Laundry Spa" service, 1384
"Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473–1476
Lauterborn, Robert, 625
Lawn care, 1481–1486
Lawner, Ron, 1776
Lawrence, Carol, 860
Lawrence, Steve, 81
Lawson, Roger, 1405
Lawsuits
Boise Cascade lawsuit against Staples, 1565
Gillette lawsuit against Norelco, 1191
Hoeschst lawsuit over Schering-Plough ad, 1463
MasterCard International's Home Box Office lawsuit, 951
MetLife, 998
Microsoft antitrust trial, 1005
Playtex lawsuits against Procter & Gamble, 1385–1386
Prudential Insurance Company, 1406
SABMiller lawsuit over Anheuser-Busch ads, 1450
"Swiss Army knife" term, 1588
"Lawyer" spot, 617
Lay, Terry, 1745
Laybourne, Geraldine, 1241
Lazare, Lewis, 1602
LCD technology, 1505–1507, 1526–1529
Leagas Delaney
adidas "Runners, Yeah, We're Different" campaign, 19–22
adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign, 26–29
League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), 1595
"Leak" spot, 1387–1388
Leap Partnership of Chicago, 105–108
LeapFrog Enterprises, Inc., 879–882, 954–955
Learish, John, 377
"Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 879–882, 955
Learning Channel, 451
The Learning Company. See Cyan Worlds Inc.
Leary, Denis, 209, 1078
Leatherman, 1588
"Leave It to Beezer" spot, 576
"Leaving Early" spot, 91
Lebda, Doug, 1343
"LeBron" spot, 347, 349
Led Zeppelin, 635, 636–637
"Ledge" spot, 1613, 1614
Lee, Ang, 60, 177
Lee, Dylan, 1063
Lee, Harmon, 603
Lee, Joe R., 398
Lee, Sandra, 271
Lee, Spike
"Absolut Director" campaign, 1732
"Knicks Tickets" spot, 88
Nike "9,000 Shots" campaign, 1131, 1133
Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233, 1235, 1236
Pizza Hut "Big New Yorker Pizza" campaign, 1345, 1348

Snapple campaign, 1656
Spike DDB, 576
Lee jeans
"Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Levi's jeans, as competitor of, 887
Leggett, Dennis, 1226, 1227
Legh, Chris, 1286, 1288
Legislation
National and Community Service trust Act, 1426
National Voter Registration Reform Act, 1426
Leibovitz, Annie, 87
Leikauskas, Darryln, 208, 209, 210
Leikh, Alex, 1703
Leisure, David, 803, 804, 805
Lemon Awards, 1294, 1550
Lemon Ruski, 1706
Lemony Snicket's A Series of Unfortunate Events (movie), 39
LendingTree, 1343
Lennon, John, 729, 730, 1333
Leno, Jay, 209, 702
Lenza, Al, 1208
Leo Burnett
"Altoids" campaign, 1821–1824
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1824–1827
Altria Group "It's a Woman Thing" campaign, 55–58
"Army of One" campaign, 1263
Binney & Smith "Make Play" campaign, 187–190
Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 414–417
Dryel "Habits" campaign, 1383–1385
Fila "Grant Hill 4" campaign, 551–554
Gain "Strange But True" campaign, 1395–1397
Hallmark Cards "Sneak a Peek" campaign, 694
Kellogg "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, 833–834
Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837
"Marlboro Man" campaign, 99
McDonald's "Campaign 55" campaign, 957–960
Morgan Stanley "At Your Side" campaign, 1047–1050
Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1329–1332
Oldsmobile Alero "Start Something" campaign, 652–656
Pert Plus "Sink Boy" campaign, 1391–1394
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1357–1360 product characters, 1049
Prozac print campaign, 505–508
Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401–1403
Tampax Pearl "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1385–1388
Leonard, Buck, 1107
Leonard, Sugar Ray, 976
Leonhauser, Maria, 1782
Lesbians. See Gays and lesbians
Leslie, Lisa, 1154
"Less flower. More power" tagline, 1783
"Let the Dance Begin" tagline, 1325
"Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 407–410
"Let's Motor" tagline, 169
Letterman, David
McDonald's "Campaign 55," 959
on the new twenty dollar bill, 217
Lever Brothers. See Unilever PLC
Levi Strauss & Co., 883–892
Dockers "One Leg At a Time" campaign, 603
Gap, as competitor of, 606
Gap and Old Navy history, 1229, 1230
Lee jeans, as competitor of, 1744, 1747
Levine, Chuck, 1549
Levine, Marty, 388
Levine, Ned, 1020
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886–889
Levitra, 1327
Levitt, Arthur, 1057
Lewinsky, Monica, 750
Lewis, Richard, 1734, 1735, 1736
Lewnes, Ann, 767
Lexmark, 718–719
Lexus
BMW, as competitor of, 177
Cadillac, as competitor of, 636, 638
Infiniti, as competitor of, 1179
Mercedes, as competitor of, 989, 995
"The Road Is Calling" campaign, 1646–1649
Liberty Bowl, 540
Liberty Tax Service, 688
Lieberman, Joe, 1426
Liebler, Arthur, 1471
Liebman, Bonnie, 1294
Liebman, Joseph, Henry, and Charles, 1421
Liebmann, Wendy, 600
Liewald, Bob, 552
Life Cereal, 833
"Life in Drive" campaign, 558–561
"Life is a journey. Enjoy the Ride" tagline, 1172
"Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1261–1265, 1262
"Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1445–1447
"Life Is Short, Play Hard" campaign, 25
"Life Is Short, Play More" campaign, 1002
Life (magazine), 1195
"Life on Acela" campaign, 1103–1106, 1104
"Life on Land Is Dry" campaign, 395–398
"Life Raft" spot, 53
"A Life" spot, 1696
"Life Tastes Good" campaign, 351
"Life to the Fullest" campaign, 375–378
Lifeline, 1837
LifeStyles condoms, 312, 313
Lifetime, 1243
Light, Larry, 966
Lightner, Candy, 1062
"Lights" spot, 250
Lil' Kim, 1226
Lilith Fair, 1692
Lilly, Kristine, 49
The Limited, Inc., 10
Lincoln, 636
Lincoln, Abraham, 424, 895
Lincoln, Robert, 895
Lincoln National Corp., 893–896
"Linda Lo-Cal" vignette, 836
Lindbergh, Charles, 9–10
Linder, Rolf, 1239
Lindros, Eric, 515
Linens 'n Things, 756–757
Linton, Doug, 1148
"Linux" campaign, 794–797
Lion Awards
adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 25
adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign, 27, 29
Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 112
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 119

Lion Awards, continued
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
Bay, Michael, spots by, 633
BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 184
BMW "The Hire" campaign, 178
Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 197
Burger King campaign, 965
Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 219
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 232
California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 257, 260
Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607
Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 370
Dial-A-Mattress "Always Out There" campaign, 434
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493, 495
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 503
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 520
ESPN "Without Sports" campaign, 521, 523
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525, 528
Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign, 591, 593
"Gas Station" spot, 86, 89
Gill Foundation "TurnOut" campaign, 657, 659
Harley campaign, 704
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 720
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741, 744
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811, 814
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign, 826
Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 885
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 888
Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 930
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 952
MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign, 169, 171–172
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085, 1088
NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093, 1096
"Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550, 1553
"NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099, 1101
"NHL on Fox" campaign, 578
Nike "Move" campaign, 1144
Nike "Play" campaign, 1145, 1147
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181
Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233, 1236
Reebok "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign, 1417, 1420
"Saturn Relaunch" campaign, 1467
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473, 1475
Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249, 1251
Sony PlayStation 2 "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1524
Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 981
Toyota Celica "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1641, 1643
Toyota Corolla "A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631, 1633
Turner Classic Movies "31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659, 1662
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1768
Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1769, 1771
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801, 1803
"Yard Fitness Center" campaign, 1859, 1861
"Lions" spot, 1727
Liotta, Ray, 178, 888
Lippert, Barbara, 26
Lippitt, Scott, 206
Lipson, David, 880
Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298–1303, 1299, 1300
Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign, 1687–1690
Lira, Mananita, 74
"Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1089–1092
Listerine Antiseptic mouthwash, 1320
Literacy
Cheerios "Spoonfuls of Stories" project, 628
Post Cereals partnership with Reach Out and Read program, 628–629
Target/Golden Books Entertainment partnership, 1605
Lithgow, John, 975, 976, 1055, 1837
Lithia Motors, Inc., 1581
Little, Tony, 618
Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc., 897–910
Little Children (Perrotta), 267
"Little Fruits" campaign, 237
"Little Girl" ad, 323
Little Richard, 1689
Littlewood, Peter, 937, 939
Liukin, Nastia, 25
"Live Billboard Dating" campaign, 1854–1857
"Live Large" campaign, 1780–1783
"Live Richly" campaign, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329–332, 764, 1794
"Live Your Best Life" tour, 1645
Living and Learning Centres Inc., 204
Living billboard, Delta's, 412
"Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign, 1557–1561, 1558, 1559
"Living Room" spot, 757
LL Cool J, 607
Lockard, Jamie, 1745
Lockhart, H. Eugene, 80
Loeb, Lisa, 1370
Loeffler Ketchum Mountjoy, 1201–1204
Loft Candy Company, 1282, 1284, 1296
Logan, Judy, 1006
Logical Progression III, 460
Logitech International S.A., 911–914
Logos
adidas, 24
Burger King, 220
Chrysler, 388
Mercedes, 986, 988
Nike swoosh, 28
Purina "checkerboard," 1113
"Striding Man," 423, 424, 425, 426
Target "bull's-eye," 1599, 1601
Lohan, Lindsay, 1624
Lollapalooza, 460
Lombard Brokerage, 1056, 1057
London International Advertising and Design Awards
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1080
"Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544
"Yard Fitness Center" campaign, 1861
The Lone Ranger (radio and television show), 627
Long, Howie, 634

Long, Robert, 1251
Long distance service
AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 150–153
MCI "1-800-COLLECT" campaign, 971–974
MCI "Dennis Miller Ads" campaign, 974–978
Sprint "Dime Zone" campaign, 1543–1546
Sprint "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign, 1546–1550
Working Assets Long Distance "Direct Marketing" campaign, 1835–1838
"Long Time Gone" spot, 153
Longneck bottles, 869–870
"Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, 648–652, 649
"Looks Fast" tagline, 1643
"Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47–50
Loraine, Martin, 170
Lord Group
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 298
"Wild Things Are Happening" campaign, 155
L'Oreal's Plenitude, 1320
Loren-Snyder, Barbara, 850
Lorillard, 250
"Lost" spot, 1223
The Lost World: Jurassic Park (film), 959, 989, 993
Lotronex, 1210–1211
Lott, Ronnie, 1619, 1620
Lott, Trent, 212
Lotteries
Maryland State Lottery "Cash in Hand" campaign, 945–948
New York State Lottery "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, 1127–1130, 1128
Lotus software, 799
"The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 583–586
Loughlin, John, 1668, 1669
"Louie the Lizard" campaign, 116–120
Louis, Joe, 2, 3
Louis-Dreyfus, Robert, 20, 24, 27
"Louis the Lizard" campaign, 539
"Lounge Chair" spot, 913
Louvre, Nancy, 664
"Love Scene" spot, 275–276
"Love Your Body" campaign, 193
Loverde, Loren, 140
"Low Carb" campaign, 1449–1452
Low carb diets
Carl's Jr., 291
Miller Lite "Low Carb" campaign, 1449–1452
Snickers Marathon Low Carb Lifestyle Energy Bar, 933
Low-fat foods
Fat-Free Pringles "Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1398–1400
Frito-Lay, 584
Low Rider (song), 1173
Lowe & Partners
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 32
Diet Coke "You Are What You Drink" campaign, 353–357
Heineken "It's All About the Beer" campaign, 705–708
Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 927–930
"Mercedes-Benz Corporate Branding" campaign, 983–987
Mercedes M-Class "Smooth Ride" campaign, 990–994
Mercedes "Passion" campaign, 987–990
Perdue "Now Arriving" campaign, 1307–1310
Saab "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1445–1447
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1531–1534
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (1998), 344–347, 464–465
Lowell, Christopher, 1215
Lowery, Vaughn, 847, 848, 849
Lubars, David
Citibank "Live Richly" campaign, 330
drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 472
Dyson "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 477
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" and "Airplane" spots, 503
Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator" campaign, 1317–1322, 1318, 1319
Lucky Dog, 976, 977
Lucky Star (film), 177
Lucky Strike cigarettes, 55
Lucy, John, 797
Ludwig, Saul, 680
Luechtefeld, Monica, 1214
"Luggage" spot, 543
LULAC (League of United Latin American Citizens), 1595
"Lunch Break" campaign, 219–222, 291
Lunden, Joan, 1313
Luscious Jackson, 20
Lush, 460
Lusk, Wyoming, 1006, 1007
"Lust for Life" campaign, 373
Lust for Life (song), 1441, 1443, 1444
LVCVA. See Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority
Lycos, Inc., 915–918, 916, 1852
Lynch, David, 1169
Lynch, Jill, 884
Lynch, Joe, 1478
Lynch, Peter, 1058
Lynch, Tom, 1066
Lynn, Robert, 419
Lyons, Susanne, 1768, 1772
Lyons Lavey Nickel Swift, 1311–1314

M

M-Class SUV, 990–993, 991
Ma, Yo-Yo, 140, 1044, 1046
Mabius, Eric, 607
Macchiarulo, Lynne, 1478
MacCready, Paul, 643
Macdonald, R. Fulton, 855
MacDonough, Jack, 1022, 1024
MacGowan, Shane, 429
Machida, Katsuhiko, 1505
Mack, Walter, 1284
Mackin, Tom, 1195
MacLaine, Shirley, 951
MacLennan, Moray, 1607
Macleod, Hugh, 213
Macy, William H., 607
"Macy" spot, 1269
Macy's department stores, 94
Mad Dogs and Englishmen, 1753–1756
Madan, Raj, 1794
MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1061–1063
Madden, John, 463, 464
Madden NFL 2005, 1498
"Made Like No Other" campaign, 1119–1122
Madonna
adidas apparel, 20
BMW "The Hire" campaign, 175, 178
Dr. Martens, 460
Gap campaign, 600, 888
Pepsi endorsement, 1278
youth vote, 1426
Maertens, Dr. Klaus, 459

Magali, 1315, 1316
Magalogs, 9–12, 580–581
Magazines
Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615–1617
TV Guide "On the Inside" campaign, 1667–1670
Magerman, Michael, 731
Magic the Dog, 1226, 1228, 1230
"Magician" spot, 1021
Maguire, Tobey, 1147
"Maids" spot, 1762
Mail Boxes Etc., Inc., 539, 542, 919–922
Mailer, Norman, 1753
"Main Street USA" spot, 33
Major, John, 429
Major League Baseball
adidas sponsorship of the New York Yankees, 27, 28
Anheuser-Busch sponsorship, 118
Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1274, 1276
DHL sponsorship, 422
MasterCard sponsorship, 951
Pepsi, alliance with, 1277–1278, 1279
Pepsi participation at the All-Star Fanfest, 1279
United States Tennis Association, as competitor of, 1722
"Make a Difference" campaign, 314
"Make a Statement" campaign, 1053–1056
"Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign, 268–271
"Make It With MD" campaign, 1533
"Make Life Rewarding" tagline, 86
"Make Play" campaign, 187–190
"Make Room" campaign, 883, 884
"Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184, 1185
"Make Up Artist" spot, 1669
"Makeshift" spot, 523
Malden, Karl, 87
Malden Mills Industries, Inc., 923–926
"The Male Bonding Incident" spot, 707
Maleeny, Tim, 453
Maloney, Dave, 576
"Malternatives," 1013–1016
Mambro, Jamie, 825
Mamorsky, Leo J., 1129
"Man in the Field" spot, 1021
"Man with the Guinness" campaign, 427
Mancuso, Paulanne, 261, 263
Mandela, Nelson, 729, 730
Mangum, Jonathan, 1704
Mann, Michael, 177
Mann, Ron, 1754
"Mannequin" spot, 1470
Manning, Jeff, 258, 260
Manning, Taryn, 597
Mannion, Bill, 1335
Manson, Charles, 75, 77, 685
Mansur, Bernadette, 576
Mantle, Mickey, 1301
Mapes, Tim, 408, 410
MapQuest, 64
Marathon bars "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 931–934
"Marathon" spot, 1474–1475
Marcarelli, Paul, 297, 298, 299
Marchington, Philip, 1653
Marco, Harvey, 1745, 1748
Marcus, Pam, 1229
Marderosian, Karen, 1779
Margeotes/Fertitta & Partners, 1705–1708
Margulies, Sherri, 739
Marineau, Philip, 886, 887, 888
Marino, Dan, 1296
Marino, Mary Ann, 156
Marjoram, Gary, 1003
"Mark" campaign, 777–780, 781
Mark-It, 1458
Markowitz, Michael, 526
Marks, Stephen, 579, 580, 582
Marks-A-Lot, 1458
Marlboro 500 auto race, 663
Marlboro Man, 99
"Marlboro Man" antismoking campaign, 248, 1028–1029
"Marriage Counselor" spot, 572
Marriott International, 927–930
Mars, Forrest, 937, 939, 940, 941
Mars, Frank, 931, 937, 941
Mars, Inc., 931–943
Hershey, as competitor of, 710–711, 713–714
Purina, as competitor of, 1112–1113
Marsh, Leonard, 1657
Marshall, Penny, 795, 849, 854–857, 1489
"Marsupial" spot, 593
Martha Stewart brand, 847, 848
"Martha Stewart Everyday" campaign, 850–854, 851, 1489
Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, 850, 851
Martin, Billy, 1301
Martin, Joe, 662
Martin, Kerri, 173, 174, 1775
Martin, Mark, 1328
Martin, Paul, 1107
Martin Agency
GEICO "Gecko" campaign, 613–616
GEICO "Good News" campaign, 616–618
GEICO "Mini-Campaigns," 618–621
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print Campaign," 1107–1109
UPS "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1713–1716
Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749–1751
Martin/Williams
E*TRADE "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 528–531
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 893–896
Polaris "Ride the Best" campaign, 1352–1356
Staples "That Was Easy" campaign, 1214–1215, 1563–1566
Steelcase "Work Effectiveness" campaign, 1575–1578
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1349–1352
Martinez, Arthur C., 1487, 1488, 1489
Marting, Merle, 1137
Marx, Louis, Jr., 1587
Maryland State Lottery Agency, 945–948
Mascots
Miles Thirst, 347, 348, 349
Trump, 1041
Mashburn, Jamal, 552
Mason, Bill, 601
"Mason" spot, 721
"Mass Market Initiative" campaign, Nikon, 1159–1162
Massachusetts, 246, 249
MasterCard International, 949–952, 950
American Express, as competitor of, 80, 81, 84, 88, 89
Discover, as competitor of, 1051–1052, 1054–1055
Visa, as competitor of, 1767, 1770
Masterfoods USA, 931, 932, 934–937
Mastromonaco, John, 205
Match.com, 1855–1856
Matejczyk, John, 689
Mathieu, Christian, 756
The Matrix Reloaded (film), 636

Matrix, Toyota, 1632
Matsunaka, Stan, 658
Mattel, Inc., 953–956
Mattes, Richard, 835
Mattresses
  Dial-A-Mattress, 431–434
  Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Mattus, Reuben, 1119
MaxPlanet Media, 1706, 1707
Maxwell, Jack, 1019
May, Barbara, 1195
May, Kenneth A., 542
May, Peter, 1656
"Maybe It's Your Cooking" campaign, 317
Mayday, Charlie, 2
"Mayday for Marriage" rally, 659
Mayer, Oscar, 862
Mayo, Pat, 751
Mays, Willie, 1107
Mazda
  Oldsmobile, as competitor of, 654
  Toyota, as competitor of, 1635–3636
Mazza, Mike, 1554
MBI. See Millward Brown International
McAnsh, Craig, 1613, 1614
McAteer, Seamus, 1625
McBride, Chuck, 885, 891
McBride, Sandra, 439, 440
McCabe, Evert, 1709
McCadden, Michael, 606
McCaffery, Paisley, 149
McCain, John, 230, 1741
McCammon, Lou "Mack," 1113
McCann-Erickson
  California Milk Advisory Board "Milk. It Does a Body Good" campaign, 258
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
  drugstore.com campaign, 471, 472
  Gateway "People Rule" campaign, 609–612
  Glenfiddich "The Friday Scotch" campaign, 683, 685
  MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 85, 949–952
  Microsoft "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign, 1005, 1007
  PowerAde "Keep Playing" campaign, 341–344
  Rolling Rock "Grab a Rock" campaign, 760–762
  Samuel Adams "It's What's Inside" campaign, 199–202
  Sharpie "Write Out Loud" campaign, 1457–1459
  Xbox "It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001–1004
McCarter, Guy, 1410
McCarthy, Jenny, 749–753
McCartney, Paul, 1333, 1766, 1767
McCarvillean, Bridget, 94
McClure, Michael, 995
McConaughey, Matthew, 1261, 1264
McConnaughy Stein Schmidt Brown, 533–536
McCook, Jacqueline, 227
McCormick, Carolyn, 661
McCormick, Fritz, 1474
McCourt, Rob, 1431
McCurrach, Jeff, 1691
McDonagh, Joe, 1634, 1636
McDonald, Bill, 205
McDonald, Dan, 421
McDonald, Dick and Mac, 961
McDonald, Mackey, 1744
McDonald's Corporation, 957–970, 964, 968
  Burger King, as competitor of, 220, 224, 227
  Carl's Jr., as competitor of, 290–291
  Hardee's, as competitor of, 698
  "Nothing But Net" campaign, 1552
  size, 225
  Taco Bell, as competitor of, 1593
  Wendy's, as competitor of, 1811–1812, 1814–1815
McDowell, Jim, 176
McEnery, Tom, 1163, 1165
McEnroe, John, 1132, 1139
McEnroe, Kate, 1660
McFarlane, Rodger, 658
McGinnis, Marjorie A., 202
McGrady, Tracy
  adidas "Nothing Is Impossible" campaign, 23
  adidas T-MAC shoe, 1124
  "Code Red" campaign, 1267, 1269
  Seattle SuperSonics, 167
McGwire, Mark, 950, 951
McHugh, Peter, 1183
MCI LLC, 971–978
  American Greetings partnership with, 693
  AT&T, as competitor of, 148, 151, 152
  Sprint, as competitor of, 1545, 1548
  Working Assets Long Distance, as competitor of, 1837
  Yahoo!, partnership with, 1853
McIlhenny, Edmund, 979–980
McIlhenny Company, 979–982
McKee, Bonnie, 1403
McKee, Elizabeth, 151
McKeever, Ellen, 692
McKellar, Tyler, 495
McKelvey, Andrew J., 1039, 1040
McKenna, Travis, 1059
McKenzie, Stacey, 261
McKinney & Silver
  Audi "Art of the Heist" campaign, 157–160
  "Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1089–1092
  Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651–1654
McLamore, James, 226
McLaren, Wayne, 99
McLaughlin, Robin, 1762
McLaughlin, Susan, 1652
McLean, Brian, 1148
McLean, David, 99
McLean, Don, 1719
McMahon, Ed, 985, 989
McMillan, Nate, 167
McMillin, John M., 1672
McNally, Howard, 977
McNamara, Robert S., 140
McNeil Consumer Products Company, 661–662, 663–665
McQueen, Steve, 174, 275
McWilliams, Larry, 269, 270
"The Meadow" spot, 613, 615
Mears, Mark, 457
Meatpacking District Initiative, 409
Media Kitchen, 410
Medical Marketing & Media Awards, 1209, 1212
"Medicine or Food" spot, 363
Medicus, 1461–1464
Meehan, Emily, 452
"Meet the Greens" campaign, 587–590
"Meet the LeBrons" campaign, 1138–1141
"Meet Virginia" campaign, 1761–1764
"Meeting Paper Shuffle" spot, 1565
"Meeting" spot, 1552
"Megaphone" radio spot, 905
Meineke Car Care Centers, 650
Meisels, Blair, 628
Meldrum & Fewsmith Communications, 1438–1440
Melendez, Bill, 999
Mello Yello, 1268–1269
Mellors, Tim, 171
The Melting Pot, 397
"Membership has its privileges" tagline, 80

Membership Rewards program, American Express, 80–83
Men
Body Shop cosmetics, 193 herbal and vitamin remedies, 1331
Subway Steakburger, 456
"Men don't obsess over these things. Why do we?" tagline, 835
Men in Black (film), 1549
Men in Black II (film), 1553, 1555–1556
Men of Metal (novelette), 172, 173
Mendelsohn, Jordin, 813
Mendelsohn/Zein Advertising
Carl's Jr. "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 289–292
Hardee's "Revolution" campaign, 697–699
Mendes, Michael J., 440
Mendes, Sam, 53
Mennen Speed Stick, 672
Men's Journal, 424
"Mentorship" program, 425
Meow Mix, 935
Mercedes Benz (song), 984, 989, 995
Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC, 983–996, 984, 988
BMW, as competitor of, 177
Lexus, as competitor of, 1647–1648
middle-class market, 1044
Merchandising
Bunny People dolls, 770
Serta sheep, 1503
Taco Bell "Dinky" merchandise, 1597
Merck, Mandy, 56
Mercury Award, 1569
"Mercury" spot, 986
Mercury Villager minivan, 1174–1175
Mergers and acquisitions
Capital Cities Inc. acquisition of ABC and ESPN, 514
CKE Restaurants acquisition of Hardee's, 698
Hewlett-Packard acquisition of Compaq, 724
Kleenex merger with Scott Paper, 844, 845
Kmart acquisition of Sears, 850, 1495
Morgan Stanley/Dean Witter merger, 1047, 1048, 1051
PepsiCo acquisition of Taco Bell, 1592
Philip Morris Company acquisition of Miller Brewing Company, 1017
Quaker Oats acquisition of Gatorade, 1287
Quaker Oats acquisition of Snapple, 259, 1655, 1656–1657
SBC acquisition of AT&T, 150
Walt Disney Company acquisition of ESPN, 514
Warren Buffett acquisition of GEICO, 614
Wolf Group acquisition of Meldrum & Fewsmith, 1439
Merkley Newman Harty & Partners
JetBlue "Unbelievable" campaign, 818–822
Mercedes "Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994–996
Merlo, Ellen, 56
Merrill Lynch & Co.
Charles Schwab, as competitor of, 303
E*TRADE, as competitor of, 526–527
First Union, as competitor of, 1791
H&R Block, as competitor of, 689
Paine Webber, as competitor of, 1676
Merriman, Michael, 1440
Merritt, Necole, 642
Mersereau, Marilyn, 322
"The Message" spot, 1473–1474
Messner Vetere Berger McNamee & Schmetterer
MCI "1-800-Collect" campaign, 971
New Balance "Thunderstorm, Stairs" campaigns, 1123–1125
Messner Vetere Berger McNamee Schmetterer/Euro RSCG
Intel "Time for a Pentium II Processor?" campaign, 771–775
MCI "Dennis Miller Ads" campaign, 975–978
Philips Electronics "Getting Better" campaign, 1333–1336
Metal Gear Solid, 1533
MetLife, Inc., 997–1000
John Hancock, as competitor of, 827–828
Prudential, as competitor of, 1406–1407
Mettler, Robert L., 1488
Metzler, Richard, 421
MGM cartoons, 1611
MGM Pictures, 1770
"MIBII" spot, 1556
Michalski, Jerry, 788
Michelin, 681
Michelle, Candice, 678
Michelob, 105–108
Mickelson, Phil, 565
Micra, Nissan, 1167
Microprocessing chips
Intel "Bunny People" campaign, 767–771
Intel "Time for a Pentium II Processor?" campaign, 771–775
Microsoft Corp., 1001–1007, 1005
Apple Computer, as competitor of, 139–140, 143
IBM, as competitor of, 796, 799
Logitech, as competitor of, 912
Lycos, as competitor of, 917
Sega and Take-Two, as competitor of, 1499
Sony, as competitor of, 1524–1525
Taco Bell, partnership with, 1593
Yahoo!, as competitor of, 1852
MicroStrategy, 1067
Midas, Inc., 1009–1012
Midas Awards
Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 161, 163
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1803
Miesmer, Charlie, 303
"The Mighty Jeep: A Legend Turns 60" (exhibit), 393
Mike's Hard Lemonade Company, 1013–1016
"Mikey" spot, 833
Milano, Alyssa, 971, 974
Milbrett, Tiffney, 1156
Miles Thirst (mascot), 347, 348, 349
Military, 924
Milk
BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 181–185
California Milk Processor Board "Got Milk?" campaign, 257–260
Posilac, 1035, 1036
"Milk. It Does a Body Good" campaign, 258
Milk Calendar, 182
"The Milk Chocolate Melts in Your Mouth—Not in Your Hand" slogan, 937
Milk Processor Education Program, 183
Millar, Kevin, 209
Millar, Ronny, 685
Millennium, 1706–1707
Miller, Dennis, 975
DirecTV radio spots, 447
MCI campaign, 974–978
M&M's campaign, 713, 938
Monday Night Football, 519
Miller, Mark Crispin, 33, 334
Miller, Mike, 167
Miller, Nicole, 750

Miller, Reggie, 167, 1149
Miller, Robyn, 382
Miller, Steve, 1720
Miller Brewing Company, 1017–1025
  Anheuser-Busch, as competitor of, 110, 117–118, 121, 125, 128
  Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign, 569–573
  Lemon Awards candidacy, 1294
  Rainier and, 1246
  Rolling Rock, as competitor of, 868
  See also SABMiller plc
Miller High Life, 1018
  Rainier, as competitor of, 1246–1247
  Rheingold Beer, as competitor of, 1422–1423
"Miller High Life" campaign, 1452–1455, 1453
"Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1017–1021, 1019
"Miller High Life Manifesto" spot, 1453
Miller Lite
  "Ads by Dick" campaign, 125, 128
  Bud Light, as competitor of, 113–114
  "Miller Time" campaign, 1021–1025, 1023
Milligan, Stephen, 429
Mills, Simon, 461
Millstein, Alan, 608, 884, 885, 890
Millward Brown International, 491
Milner, Duncan, 137
Ming, Jenny, 1226, 1229
"Mini-Campaigns," 618–621
MINI Cooper
  Audi, as competitor of, 159
  "Counterfeit" campaign, 169–172, 170
  "MINI Robots" campaign, 170, 172–175
  Volkswagen, as competitor of, 1778
MiniDisc, 1533
Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco, 1027–1030
Minolta, 481
Minorities. See Race/ethnicity
Mintz, Richard I., 217
Miracle-Gro "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1481–1486, 1482–1483
"Miracle" spot, 587, 589
Mirren, Helen, 1069
Misdom, Janine, 119, 1019
Misleading advertising, 1294
"Miss Rheingold" pageant, 1421, 1423
"Missed Cue" spot, 927
"Missed It" spot, 947
Mitchell, Bill, 947
Mitchell, Gary, 508
Mitchell, Grace, 204
Mitchell, Nick, Jr., 1342
Mitchell, Pat, 1409, 1410, 1412
Mitchell Gold, 877
"Mitre Saw" spot, 651
Mitsubishi Consumer Electronics America, 1335
Mitsubishi Motors North America, Inc., 1031–1034, 1635
Mitta, Eugeni, 1707
MIXX Awards, 157, 160
Mizrahi, Isaac, 985, 1242
"M'm! M'm! Good! To Go!" campaign, 270
"Mmmm ... Toasty." tagline, 1413, 1414, 1415
M&M's
  "New Millennium" campaigns, 937–940
  Reese's, as competitor of, 713–714
MMX technology, 767–771
Mobile phones
  Motorola "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1065–1068
  Motorola "Moto" campaign, 1068–1071
  See also Wireless services
Moddelmog, Hala, 318, 319
Model Magic, 189–190
Modernista!, 645–648
Molly's Chambers (song), 1775
"Moments of Truth" campaign, 85
Mondale, Walter, 1810
Monday Night Football
  Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 109
  Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 503
  FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 539
  "It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 739
  Logitech "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, 913
  Nike "Hello World" campaigns, 1134
  Nike "Tiger Woods" spot, 567
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1767
  Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1771
Monday Night Madness Mobile, 1547
"Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign, 1546–1550
The Monkees, 1173
"Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
Monroe, Marilyn beauty standards, 1682
  Gap "Who Wore Khakis?" campaign, 602
  Levi's campaign, 1230
  Visa Signature card campaign, 1768
Monroe, Steve, 981
Monsanto Company, 1035–1038
"Monsanto Image" campaign, 1035–1038
Monsarrat, Nancy, 24
Monster, 282–283, 1039–1042
Montague, Ty, 845, 1498, 1499
Montana, Joe
  Allstate campaign, 52
  annual endorsement income, 552
  Pepsi campaign, 1296
  "TiVo TV Your Way" campaign, 1619, 1621
Montero, Mitsubishi, 1033
Montgomery Ward, 1488–1489
Montres Rolex SA, 1043–1046, 1045, 1589
"Moo Cow" spot, 756, 757
"Mood Swing" spot, 707
"Moon Landing" spot, 3
Mooney, Carla, 1063
Moore, Demi, 1646, 1648
Moore, Jacques J., 640
Moore, Peter, 1001
Morales, Esai, 53
Moran, Jeffrey, 932, 933
Morden, Bill, 389, 390, 391
Morel, Paul, 564
Morfitt, Marti, 338
Morgan, Alan James, 1603, 1605
Morgan, J. P., 1048
Morgan, Tracy, 1499
Morgan Stanley, 327, 1047–1059
Morita, Akio, 1526
Morita, Pat, 1689
"Morning Again in America" spot, 1467
"Morning Break" spot, 661
"Morning Commute" spot, 681
Morningstar Farms, 1818–1819
Morris, Errol
  Apple "Switchers" spot, 140
  Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 331
  "Miller High Life" campaign, 1452, 1454–1455
  "Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1020
  MoveOn.org "Real People" campaign, 1073–1076

Morris, Errol, continued
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1507
State Farm "True Stories" campaign, 1572
Morrison, Phil, 509, 511, 1371
Morrison, Van, 429
Morrow, Ronald, 1375
Mortenson, Chris, 514
Moschitta, John, 538
Moser, Mark, 998
Moses, Elissa, 1334, 1335
"Mosquito" campaign, 979–982
"Mosquito" spot, 1608
Moss, Tara, 244
"The Most popular cruise line in the world" tagline, 296
Motel 6
Holiday Inn, as competitor of, 778–779
Holiday Inn Express, as competitor of, 782
"Mother Boyle" campaign, 359–362
Mother Ltd., 1233–1236
Mothers Against Drunk Driving, Connecticut Chapter, 1061–1063
Motley, Don, 1109
"Moto" campaign, 1068–1071
"Motor Voter Bill," 1426
"Motorcycle Cop" spot, 1643
Motorcycles and motor scooters
"The Book of Harley-Davidson" campaign, 701–704
"Vespa Reintroduction" campaign, 1337–1340
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1349–1352
Motorola, 1065–1071, 1066
Motown Live (television show), 1335
Mottolese, Maura, 238, 239
Moudry, Tom, 981
Mountain bikes
Schwinn "What a Ride" campaign, 1252–1256
"Specialized" campaign, 1539–1542
Mountain Dew
"Code Red" campaign, 1267–1270, 1273
Dr Pepper, as competitor of, 464, 465
"Mountain" spot, 1523, 1524, 1525
Mountjoy, Jim, 1201
Mourning, Alonzo, 1149
"Mouthwash" spot, 45
Movado Group, 1045
"Move" campaign, 1141–1144
"Move Our Money" campaign, 229–231
"Move Over" spot, 1279
MoveOn.org, 1073–1076, 1584–1585
Movie theater spots
Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1103–1106
Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233–1236
MovieFone, 64
"Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1709–1712
"Moving Day" spot, 1459
"Moving Van" spot, 1183
"Mower" spot, 719, 720
Moyer, Greg, 451
MP3 players
Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 135–138
Hewlett Packard-Apple partnership, 726 technology, 1087
"Mr. Clean" campaign, 94
Mr. Goodwrench, 648–652
Mr. K. (character), 1171, 1173
Mr. Peanut, 441
"Mr. Really Bad Toupe Wearer" spot, 124
Mr. Six (character), 1517, 1519–1520
Mr. T, 1689
"Mr. Wendy" campaign, 1813, 1814
"Mrs. Olson" spots, 1375
MSN Music, 1087
MSNBC, 1806–1807
MSN.com, 473
MTV Networks Company, 1077–1080
MTV Video Music Awards
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1077
Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1285
"Muhammad Ali" spot, 797
Muir, John, 1509
Mulcahy, Anne, 1845
Mullahy, Jim, 572
Mullen Advertising
Oxygen Media "Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241–1244
"Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1587–1590
"Vespa reintroduction" campaign, 1337, 1339, 1340
Wachovia "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, 1792–1795, 1802–1803
Mulligan, Richard, 805
Mullin, Clare, 476, 477
"Multi-Tasker" spot, 913
"Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats" campaign, 1114–1117
Murphy, Tim, 566
Murphy, Victoria, 506
Murphy's "Vincent Murphy" campaign, 428
Murray, Ralph, 1253
Murray, Ty, 1749
Murro, Noam, 496, 498, 1467
Musachio, Heidi, 533
Musco, Tre, 840
Muse, 1326
The Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles, 1081–1084, 1082
"Museum" spot, 785
Museums
The Museum of Contemporary Art "Labels" campaign, 1081–1084
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print Campaign," 1107–1109
Musgrave, Marilyn, 657
Music
Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 135–138
Calvin Klein Cosmetics/ Ticketmaster cross-promotion, 263–264
Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459, 460, 461
Fusion Flash Concerts, 560
Lilith Fair, 1692
Motorola technology, 1068
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085–1088
Pepsi sponsorship, 1279
Woman Thing Music, 57–58
Music & Media Partnership, 460
Music Mixer, 1002
"Musical Instruments" spot, 1079
"Musical" spot, 735
Musicmatch, 1087
"Must Be Football Season" campaign, 1535–1538, 1536
Mustang, 1642
"Mustang" spot, 1304
Musto, Mark, 448
Mutombo, Kidembe, 303
"Mutual Admiration" spot, 908, 909
Mutual funds, 161–163
My Best Friend's Wedding (movie), 246
"My McDonald's" campaign, 959
"My Pleasure" spot, 314
Mya, 350, 352
Myers, Dave, 137
Myers, Mike, 707, 1758

MySpace.com, 1402–1403
Myst (computer game), 379, 380, 382

N

Nabisco, 267
Nacmias, Andrea, 553
Naddaff, George, 204
Nader, Ralph, 171
Nagahiro, Kenichi, 745–746, 747
Nail Communications, 923–926
Nakamura, Shiro, 1177
"Naked Emperor" spot, 1411
Namath, Joe, 1101
Nano-Dry, 925
NanoTex LLC, 925
Napster, Inc., 1085–1088
Nasalcrom, 1313
NASCAR, 1093–1097, 1094
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship, 118
  AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 149–150
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
  Discover card sponsorship, 1050, 1052
  Dr Pepper car sponsorship, 465–466
  Ford Fusion, 559
  KFC team sponsorship, 839, 841
  National Football League, as competitor of, 1101
  Philips Electronics sponsorship, 1335
  PowerAde sponsorship, 1288
  Sharpie, partnership with, 1458
  Tabasco sponsorship, 982
  Viagra sponsorship, 1328
  Visa sponsorship, 84
"NASCAR Garage" spot, 651
The Nasdaq Stock Market, Inc., 1089–1092
National Advertising Division, Better Business Bureau, 80, 82
National and Community Service Trust Act, 1426
National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing. See NASCAR
National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum, 1109
National Basketball Association
  NASCAR, as competitor of, 1095
  National Football Association, as competitor of, 1100–1101
  Reebok apparel contract, 1146
  Schick sponsorship, 1315, 1317
  Sprite cross-promotion, 344, 346, 347–349
National Comstock Law, 311
National Consumers League, 1014
National Denim Day, 1747
National Football League, 1099–1102
  Heineken "It's All About the Beer" campaign, 707
  Hershey "$1 Million Kick" promotion, 711
  IBM, partnership with, 795
  Kickoff festival, 1285
  NASCAR, as competitor of, 1095
  Southwest Airlines sponsorship, 1535–1538
  Sprint sponsorship, 1546–1549
  United States Tennis Association, as competitor of, 1723
  Visa sponsorship, 1767, 1768
National Geographic Channel, 452–453
National Geographic (magazine), 792
National Geographic Society website, 792
National Hockey League
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship, 120, 122
  "NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
  Norelco sponsorship, 1191
  Southwest Airlines sponsorship, 44, 416, 1535, 1537
National monuments, 1604
National Outdoor Leadership School, 1238, 1239
National Park Foundation, 1604, 1688
National Public Radio, 1447, 1599
National Railroad Passenger Corporation, 1103–1106
National Tobacco Control Foundation, 247
National Voter Registration Reform Act, 1426
"National Youth Anti-Drug Media" campaign, 1217–1218
Natural products
  Body Shop, 191–194
  Clairol "Totally Organic" campaign, 333–336
  Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1329–1332
Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), 1275
Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1329–1332
Nauser, Debbie, 1520
Nautica, 1628
Navigator browser, 1006
NBA Jam Session, 346
NBC
  DHL sponsorship, 422
  Game Show Network, as competitor of, 593
  mock promotions of ABC's campaign, 6
  "Must-see TV" campaign, 6
NCAA basketball
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
  Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 368
  Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 416
  FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 540
  Mercedes "Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994, 996
  Oldsmobile Bravada campaign, 655
Needham Harper Steers, 92
Neeleman, David, 819–820
Neff, Peggy, 659
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum, 1107–1109
"Neighbor" spot, 1096
"Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1481–1486
"Neighborhood" spot, 1475
Neiman, Adam, 72–73
Nelly, 522
Nelson, Bruce, 1214, 1215
Nelson, Dave, 939
Nelson, Jim, 703
Nelson, Ozzie and Harriet, 482
Nelson, Willie
  Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 597, 598, 599, 1747
  Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298, 1302
Neon
  "Hi" campaign, 1470–1471, 1778
  New Beetle, as competitor of, 1785
Ness, Ann, 287
Nestea Cool, 1300
Nestlé, Henri, 939
Nestlé Purina PetCare Co., 935–936, 1111–1117
Nestlé S.A., 1119–1122
  The Coca-Cola Company, as competitor of, 352
  General Foods International Coffees, as competitor of, 861
  The Hershey Company, as competitor of, 711
  Mars, as competitor of, 939, 942
  PepsiCo, as competitor of, 1275–1276
  PowerBar, 932
Netscape Communications Corp., 64, 1006
"Network Executive" spot, 1621
Network Solutions, 676
Network Walkman, 137
Neuberger, Karen, 1502

Neufville, Richard de, 644
Neupert, Peter, 472
Neutrogena, 1692
"Never Follow" tag line, 158
"Never Miss a Genuine Opportunity" campaign, 128
"Never Stop Milk." tag line, 183
"Never without my milk" tag line, 183
"The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1349–1352
New Balance Athletic Shoe, Inc., 1123–1125
  Nike, as competitor of, 1146
  Reebok, as competitor of, 1418
New Beetle, 170–171, 173–174, 1020, 1778, 1779
"New Beetle" campaign, 1783–1786, 1784
"The New Color of Money" campaign, 215–218, 216
"New Driver" spot, 1573
New England Broadcasting Association awards, 826
"The New Look of Comfort" campaign, 875–878
"New Millennium" campaigns, 937–940
"New Neighbors" spot, 531
New Order, 460
"New School" campaign, 161–164
"New Shoes" spot, 1140
New York American Marketing Association, 914
New York Art Director's Club Awards, 981
New York Giants, 1723
New York Institute of Photography, 1164
New York Life
  MetLife, as competitor of, 998–999
  Prudential, as competitor of, 1406–1407
New York Mets, 1722
"New York Miracle" spot, 822
New York Press, 1754
New York State Lottery, 1127–1130, 1128
New York Stock Exchange, 1090, 1091
New York Times, 49
New York World's Fair, 1358
New York Yankees, 1722
  adidas, 26–29
  Ruth, Babe, 208
"New Yorker Magazine Sponsorship" campaign, 1599–1602
Newell Rubbermaid, 188–189
Newman, Lee, 159
Newman, Paul
  Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 231
  Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign voice-over, 305, 308
"News" spot, 617
Newsom, Gavin, 657
Newspapers, 1753–1756
Newsweek, 1616
Newton, Wayne, 37
Newton-John, Olivia, 750
"The Next Shift" spot, 724
Nextel
  "Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550–1553
  Sprint PCS, as competitor of, 1555
NFL Fever 2004 (video game), 1001, 1003
"NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099–1102
"NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
"Nice Finish" campaign, 108
Nice 'n Easy hair coloring, 334
Nickelodeon
  Cartoon Network, as competitor of, 1612–1613
  Holiday Inn, partnership with, 779
Nickerson, Thomas, 1263
Nicklaus, Jack, 84, 399, 400, 400, 552
NicoDerm CQ "Power to Quit" campaign, 661–665
Nicotine replacement therapies, 661–665
Nicotrol, 661, 663
Nielsen, Karl, 460
"Night" spot, 187, 189"
Nike, Inc., 1131–1157, 1135
  adidas, as competitor of, 20–21, 24–25, 27–28
  Candie's, as competitor of, 751
  Fila, as competitor of, 553
  FootJoy, as competitor of, 566
  "Hello World" campaign, 1134–1138
  "I Am Tiger Woods" campaign, 1134–1138
  New Balance, as competitor of, 1124
  Olympics sponsorship, 23
  real women in ads, 1683
  Reebok, as competitor of, 1418
Nikon Corporation, 481, 1159–1165
"Nimrods" spot, 522, 523
"9,000 Shots" campaign, 1131–1134
Nine West, 751
"1998 Negro Leagues Baseball Museum Print Campaign," 1107–1109
Nintendo
  GameCube, 1003
  Sega and Take-Two, as competitor of, 1499
  Sony, as competitor of, 1524–1525
Nissan, Colin, 1475
Nissan Motor Company, Ltd., 1167–1170
Nissan North America, Inc., 1171–1180
  Honda, as competitor of, 743
  Oldsmobile, as competitor of, 654
  Toyota, as competitor of, 1632–1633, 1635, 1639, 1645
Nivea
  Dove, as competitor of, 1681
  Lubriderm, as competitor of, 1320
"No Dummy" spot, 1829–1830
"No-Hassle Card" campaign, 327
"No Matter What" campaign, 1830–1833
No Sweat, 72–73
Noble, Eric, 93
Nokia, 1067, 1069–1070
Nonconformism
  Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459–462
  Harley-Davidson, 461
Nordhielm, Kristie, 299–300
Nordstrom, Dan, 1182
Nordstrom, Inc., 1181–1187, 1185
Nordstrom, John W., 1181
Norelco Consumer Products Company, 1189–1192
Norman, Greg, 553, 1136
Norman, Richard, 1464
Normark Corporation, 1193–1196
Norono, David, 1347
North American Coffee Partnership, 49, 1197–1200
North Carolina Division of Tourism Film and Sports Development, 1201–1204
North Face, 361
North Woods Advertising, 1739–1742
Northern Exposure (television show), 561, 563
Northwest Airlines Corporation, 412–413, 1205–1208
Norton, Nancy, 1210
"Nose" ad, 1253, 1255
Nostalgia
  brand revivals, 1020
  Gap "Khakis Swing" spot, 602, 603
  "Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1018
"Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign, 1753–1756

"Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense" campaign, 426–429
"The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1283–1286
Notebaert, Richard, 154
Noth, Chris, 61
"Nothing But Net" campaign, 1552
NOTICEables, 1391
Nottoli, David, 638, 640
Novak, David, 841
Novartis AG, 1209–1212
Novica, 452–453
Novick, Chip, 1554, 1556
Novus Services, 1054
"Now & Then" spot, 1282
"Now It Gets Interesting" campaign, 16
NRDC. See Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC)
Nuchow, Leslie, 57
Nuclear weapons, 231, 232
Nugent, Robert, 812
Nullsoft, 64
"Nuns" spot, 800
NutraSweet, 1035
NW Ayer, 1374
NW Ayer & Partners, 670–673
Nye, Bill, 1055
N'Yeurt, Felix, 262

O

Oakley, David, 1750, 1751
Obesity
  Jenny Craig, Inc., 816
  Subway "F.R.E.S.H. Steps" campaign, 457
  Subway "Jared Fogle" campaign, 455, 456
  Trident gum, 234
"Obey Your Thirst" campaign (1998), 205, 344–347, 464–465
"Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 347–350
O'Brien, Conan, 617
O'Brien, Don, 1149
O'Brien, Jayne, 1759
O'Brien, Joanne, 774
O'Brien, Steve, 515–516
Obsession cologne ad campaign, 9, 10
Occidental Studios, 238
"Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First?" campaign, 1237–1240
Ochman, B. L., 212
O'Connell, Tom, 1058
O'Connor, Sinead, 429
O'Donnell, Rosie, 465, 849, 854–858, 1489, 1824
Odor eliminators, 1388–1391
OdorFree, 1389
Odyssey, Honda
  Nissan Quest, as competitor of, 1176
  Sienna, as competitor of, 1645
Oetting, Rudy, 156
Office and print services, 541–543
Office cubicles, 1575, 1576
Office Depot, Inc., 1213–1216
  OfficeMax, as competitor of, 1222
  Staples, as competitor of, 1568
Office furniture, 1575–1578
Office machines, 1843–1847
Office of National Drug Control Policy, 1217–1219
Office supplies
  Kinko's online outlet, 542
  Office Depot "What You Need. What You Need to Know." campaign, 1213–1216
  OfficeMax Inc. "What's Your Thing?" campaign, 1221–1224
  Staples "That Was Easy" campaign, 1563–1566
  Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569
"Officeflage" spot, 1828, 1830
OfficeMax Inc., 1221–1224, 1565, 1568
Ogilvy & Mather
  American Express "Do More" campaign, 82–86, 951
  "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 33
  Chesebrough-Pond's "Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads" campaign, 1690–1693
  Cisco Systems "The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 321–324
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679–1683
  Ford "Driving American Innovation" campaign, 555–558
  Foster's account, 573
  Guiness "Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense" campaign, 426–429
  Hershey "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, 712–715
  IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 785–788
  IBM "E-Business" campaign, 788–791
  IBM "Gizmo" campaign, 792–794
  IBM "Linux" campaign, 794–797
  IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 134, 798–801
  Kodak "Advantix" campaign, 479–482
  Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482–485
  Kodak "Take Pictures. Further" campaign, 485–488
  Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 488–491
  Kotex "Red Dot" campaign, 1387
  Miller Lite "Low Carb" campaign, 1449–1452
  Motorola "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1065–1068
  Motorola "Moto" campaign, 1068–1071
  Office of National Drug Control Policy "Early Intervention Youth" campaign, 1217–1219
  Outward Bound "Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First?" campaign, 1237–1240
  Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 347–350
  "Wear a Moustache" campaign, 182
Ogilvy Award, 1490
"Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 120–123
O'Hagan, John, 431, 432, 433
O'Hurley, John, 1843, 1844, 1846, 1847
Oil companies, 305
Oil of Olay, 1320–1321
OK Soda, 345
Olajuwon, Hakeem, 1056
Olbermann, Keith
  Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 203–206
  ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 515, 520
  SportsCenter, 517
"Old Fashioned Guy" campaign, 1811
"Old Man" spot, 426–427, 1643
Old Navy, Inc., 596, 1225–1231
"Old School" spot, 1087
Old Spice, 1402
Oldham, Todd, 875, 876, 878
Oldsmobile
  Alero "Start Something" campaign, 652–656
  Volkswagen, as competitor of, 1785–1786
Olean, 1398–1399
Olestra, 584
Olive, Jason, 261
"Olive" spot, 322
Olivio, Allen, 771
Olson, John, 1259

Olson & Company
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 337–340
Detroit Pistons "Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257–1260
Olympics
A & E "Go Back in Time" campaign, 2
adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 25
American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 99
Anheuser-Busch "Beer . . . or Michelob?" campaign, 105, 106, 107
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 633
"Delta Marathon" campaign, 411, 415
DHL sponsorship, 421–422
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 440, 441
Fat-Free Pringles "Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1399
Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 561, 563
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 799, 800
IBM sponsorship, 790
"Jeep" campaign, 391
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826, 828
Kodak "Take Pictures. Further" campaign, 487
Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 490
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1745
M&M's sponsorship, 938
Monster sponsorship, 1040
Nike "Move" campaign, 1141–1144
Nike "Women's" campaign, 1156, 1157
Office Depot "What You Need. What You Need to Know." campaign, 1215
Owens, Jesse, 19–20, 23
Reebok sponsorship of the "Dream Team," 1133, 1142 snowboarding, 1514
sponsorship, 23
Texaco sponsorship of the U.S. Olympic Team, 307
UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1712
UPS "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1715
Visa/American Express competition, 79–80, 1766–1767
Visa sponsorship, 84, 1767
women athletes, 1154
O'Malley, Mike, 515, 516
Omnicom Group, 32
"On the Nose" campaign, 338
"On the One Twos" radio spot, 1269
"On the Street" spot, 651
"On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign, 679–682
"On Top of the World" campaign, 411–414, 415, 1207, 1537
Onak, Dave, 155
ONDCP See Office of National Drug Control Policy
One-A-Day, 1331
"The One and Only" tagline, 628
"One client at a time" tagline, 1048
"1-800-COLLECT" campaign, 971–974
180 (ad agency), 23–26
"One Leg At a Time" campaign, 603
One Show Awards
A & E "In Case You Missed It" campaign, 3
adidas "Yankee Fans" campaign, 29
Advertising Council "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31, 33
Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 197
Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 223, 225
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 232
"Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding" campaign, 1611, 1614
ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1499
"Father and Son" spot, 153
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 720
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 906
MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1063
"Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1021
Motorola "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1068
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1079
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085, 1088
Sims Sports "Be Free" campaign, 1516
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1534
"Specialized" campaign, 1542
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign, 347
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 349
Suburban Auto Group "Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1579, 1582
"Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1590
"Vespa reintroduction" campaign, 1337, 1340
One Tough Mother: Success in Life, Business, and Apple Pies (Boyle), 359, 361
O'Neal, Shaquille
All Sport campaign, 1287
annual endorsement income, 552
music video, 1596
National Basketball Association, 1095, 1100
Pepsi campaign, 1296
Pepsi "Generation Next" campaign, 129, 1277
Reebok campaign, 28
Reebok endorsements, 1133
O'Neil, Buck, 718, 721, 1107
O'Neill, Ed, 973
O'Neill, John, 1583–1584, 1585
O'Neill, Patrick, 849
Oneworld Alliance, 415
Online auctions
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
eBay 2004 television campaign, 496–499
Onlineshoes.com, 1182–1183
"Only in New York" tagline, 28
Ono, Apolo Anton, 1141, 1142
Ono, Yoko, 729
Ontario Milk Marketing Board, 182
Oobeya, 1632
Ooh Child (song), 1815
Oppenheimer, Brent, 1105
"Opportunity Knocks" spot, 539, 540
The Oprah Winfrey Show, 815, 818, 1242, 1243
Optima credit card, 80, 83
Orange S. A., 1233–1236
Orbe, Tom, 1171, 1172, 1173, 1178
Orbit gum, 234, 1830–1833
Orbitz, 1652–1653

"Orchestra" spot, 1411
Oreck, David, 477–478
Oreck Company, 477
"Origins" campaign, 1286–1289
Orloff, Glennis, 1477–1478
O'Rourke, P. J., 1758
Ortega, Daniel, 804
Osborn, John, 933
Osburn, Melissa, 1114
Osmond, Donny, 667
Ostrom, Ray, 1194
Otsuka Pharmaceutical Company, Ltd., 1330
Otto, Ed, 1093
"Our Office Is Your Office" campaign, 541–544
"Our Stand" campaign, 51–54
Out of Order: Rock the Vote Targets Health (short film), 1426
Outboard Marine, 1355
Outbreak Tour, 99–100
Outdoor Systems Inc., 1148
Outdoor wilderness education, 1237–1240
"Outfit" spot, 328
"Outperform" campaign, 25
Outward Bound USA, 1237–1240
Ouweleen, Michael, 1611, 1613
Overbeck, Carla, 554
Overend, Ned, 1541
Owen, Clive, 175–178, 995
Owen, Jane, 334
Owens, Jesse
  adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 25
  adidas shoes, 19–20, 23
  History Channel "Go Back in Time" campaign, 2
Owens, Terrell, 1459
"Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177–1180
Oxygen Media, 1241–1244
"Ozone Monday" spot, 1711

P

Paar, Jack, 1358
Pabst Brewing Company, 1245–1248
  Rainier, as competitor of, 1247
  Rheingold Beer, as competitor of, 1423
Pace, Grant, 442
Pacheco, Steve, 548, 549, 550
Pacific Bell DSL "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473–1476
Pacific Cycle, Inc., 1249–1256
Package delivery. See Delivery services Packaging
  Altoids tins, 1822
  Foster's beer, 573
  General Foods International Coffee tins, 861
  Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 718
  Miller High Life, 1017
  Rolling Rock longneck bottles, 869–870
Packard, David, 717, 721
Pagano Schenck & Kay, 1061–1063
Page, Jimmy, 636
Paige, Satchel, 1107
"The Pain of Separation" spot, 1841
Pain relievers, 1839–1842
"Paint" spot, 1770
"Painted Faces" campaign, 1805–1808
PAL program, 26
Palace Sports & Entertainment, 1257–1260
Palmer, Arnold, 400
  annual endorsement income, 552
  Estates of World Golf Village, 399, 400
  Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043
Palmer, Shawn, 1541
Palmer Jarvis DDB, 181–184
Palminteri, Chazz, 1284–1285
Palmisano, Samuel J., 769, 786, 792
Pampers "Got the Power" campaign, 1380–1382
"Pamplona" spot, 239
Panasonic, 1335
Pantoliano, Joe, 1775
Papa John's
  Little Caesar, as competitor of, 898–899, 902, 904–905, 907–908
  Pizza Hut, as competitor of, 1347
  Round Table Pizza, as competitor of, 1431
"Parasailing" spot, 1673
"Parents" spot, 873
"Paris" spot, 80, 81, 82
"Park Bench" spot, 37, 38–39
Parker, Sarah Jessica, 598–601
Parks, Rosa, 144
Parmar, Belinda, 488
Parmet, Nancy, 738, 739
Parody advertising
  "Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1827
  Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 205
  Daz "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
  Levi's "Doctors" spot, 883, 884, 885 of MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 951, 952
  Mike's Hard Lemonade "Hard Day" campaign, 1015
  Old Navy "'70s Retro TV" campaign, 1225–1228
  Pepsi "Bob Dole" spot, 1326
  Sims Sports mock product offers, 1515
  "Tiny House" spot, 620–621
  Turner Classic Movies "31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659
  UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1711
  Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1759
Parr, Jack, 1458
Parsey, Tim, 1068–1071
Parsons, Bob, 675–676, 678
"Particle" spot, 560
Partners & Shevack, 1481–1486
Partnership for a Drug-Free America, 1218
Partnerships and cross-promotions
  ABC/American Airlines, 7
  American Express/Delta Airlines, 83
  American Greetings/America Online, 693
  Bally Total Fitness/Unilever, 1860
  Borders/Children's Books & Toys, 196
  Burger King/The Apprentice, 221
  Calvin Klein Cosmetics Company/Ticketmaster, 263–264
  Cartoon Network/Kraft Foods, 1611, 1613
  Cartoon Network/Pepperidge Farms, 1611, 1614
  Cartoon Network/Six Flags theme parks, 1611, 1613–1614
  CVS/MSN.com, 473
  Dewar's/Men's Journal, 424
  Dexter/Discovery Zone partnership, 1613
  Dial/Shrek 2, 435, 436, 437
  Diet Rite/Zero Gravity Corporation, 240, 242
  Discover/General Electric Consumer Finance, 1053
  Discover/Wal-Mart, 1053
  drugstore.com/Discovery Health Media, 473 drugstore.com/General Nutrition Center/Rite Aid, 471, 472
  General Motors/Macy's/Conde Nast Publications, 94
  Häagen-Sazs/Showtime, 1120
  Hewlett-Packard/Apple, 726
  Holiday Inn/Nickelodeon, 779
  IBM/National Football League, 795
  Isuzu/General Motors, 803–804

Partnerships and cross-promotions, continued
Little Caesar/Kmart, 901
MasterCard/Excite, 952
McDonalds/Walt Disney Studio Entertainment, 224
Mercedes/Conde Nast, 989
Monster/WeightWatchers.com, 1040
Motorola/iTunes, 1071
National Park Foundation/corporate advertisers, 1604
Nissan/Ford, 1174–1175
Nissan/Yahoo!, 1169
Nordstrom/Teen People, 1186
Oldsmobile/ABC "Start Something Tuesdays on ABC Sweepstakes," 655
Oxygen Media/AOL Time Warner, 1241, 1242, 1244
Peace Corps partnerships, 1263
Pepsi/Lipton, 1298–1302
Pepsi/Major League Baseball, 1277–1278, 1279
PowerAde-ESPN/ABC, 342
Rolling Rock/ESPN, 761–762
Secret Sparkle/MySpace.com, 1402–1403
Sega/Take-Two partnership, 1497–1500
Sharpie/NASCAR, 1458
Snapple/Viacom, 238
Song Airlines/Meatpacking District, 409
Sony/Samsung, 1526–1528
Spring/Men in Black II, 1553, 1555–1556
Sprite/National Basketball Association, 344, 346
Staples/Federal Express, 1568
Starbucks/New York Times, 49
Starbucks/PepsiCo, 49, 1197–1198
Swiss Army Brands/Armageddon, 1590
Taco Bell/Microsoft, 1593
Target/Golden Books Entertainment, 1605
Target/Revlon, 1605
Unilever/National Park Foundation, 1688
United States Postal Service/DHL, 1720
Visa/MGM Pictures, 1770
Volkswagen/Trek, 1779
Working Assets Long Distance/Ben & Jerry's, 1837
Xbox/Showtime Networks, 1002
Yahoo!/Ben & Jerry's/Visa/MCI, 1853
See also Sponsorships
"Party Cup" spot, 1459
"Party Dress" spot, 1633
"The Party's Over" sot, 1223
Pascarella, Carl, 81
Pascoe, Gary, 935, 936
"The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 414–417
"Passion" campaign, 986, 987–990
Pastore, Lorraine, 1462
Pataki, George E., 1128
Patrick, Dan, 515, 517, 518, 520
Patrick, Sharon, 852
Patterson, Thomas, 1427
Patti, Michael, 1297
Patton, David, 1527, 1529
Patton, Erin, 1133
Patton (movie), 231
Paul, Ron, 396, 960
"Paul" spot, 1803, 1819
Paxil
Prozac, as competitor of, 507
"Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
Paxton, Mickey, 1300
"Pay Phone" spot, 53
Payne, John, 935, 936
Payne, William, 1675
Payton, Gary, 166, 167, 1149, 1150
PBS. See Public Broadcasting Service
PCs. See Personal computers
Peabody, Bo, 917
Peace Corps, 1261–1265, 1262
Pearl Harbor attack, 32
Pearl tampons, 1385–1388
Pearlstine, Norman, 1617
Pediatric AIDS Foundation, 1274
"Pediatric Edition" spot, 1581
Pelé, 1661
Peller, Clara, 224, 406, 1810
Pelliccioni, David, 1637
Peltz, Nelson, 1656
Pemberton, John, 350
Pen Pals program, 1203
Pen Schoen & Berland, 555–558
"Pen" subcampaign, 625
"Penelope" spot, 352
Penney, James Cash, 807
Penney's. See J.C. Penney Company, Inc.
Pennington, Ty, 1494
Pentium II processors, 771–775
"People Are Good" campaign, 61
"People first" tagline, 1465
People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), 255
"People Rule" campaign, 609–612
Pepcid AC, 1324
Pepper, Dan, 812
Pepper, John E., 1400
Pepperidge Farm, Inc.
Cartoon Network, partnership with, 1611, 1614
"Goldfish Crackers" campaign, 265–268, 266
Peppermint Prozac, 507
"Pepsi, It's the Cola" campaign, 1289–1292
Pepsi Blue, 1285
"The Pepsi Challenge" campaign, 1296
Pepsi Stuff, 1279
PepsiCo, Inc., 1267–1305
The Coca-Cola Company, as competitor of, 351, 352
Gatorade, 342–343
"Generation Next" campaign, 259
Pepsi Edge, 241
Slice revival, 1020
Snapple, as competitor of, 1657
Starbucks, partnership with, 49, 1197–1198
Taco Bell, acquisition of, 1592
See also Frito-Lay Inc.
Perdue, Arthur W., 1307–1308
Perdue, Frank, 1307, 1308, 1309
Perdue, Jim, 1307–1308, 1309, 1310
Perdue Farms Inc., 1307–1310
Pereira, Frank, 642
Perez, Antonio, 722–723
Perez, William, 1140
"Perfect" campaign, 376–377, 1797–1799
Periera, Frank, 644
Peripherals, computer, 911–914
Perkins, Sam, 167
Perlman, Hank, 518–519
Perot, H. Ross, 501, 502
Perry, Luke, 485
Persil, 1378, 1685
"Person to Person" campaign, 414, 416–417
Personal computers
AOL Optimized PC, 65
Apple Computer "Switchers" campaign, 138–141
Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 141–145
Dell "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign, 403–406
Gateway "People Rule" campaign, 609–612
Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 721–723
IBM, 789
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 797–801
"iMac" campaign, 131–135

Intel microprocessors, 767–771, 771–775
peripherals, 911–914
Personal watercraft, 1352–1356
"Personally Invested" campaign, 162
Personals ads, 1854–1857
"Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
Pert Plus "Sink Boy" campaign, 1391–1394
Pesci, Joe, 1648
Pestridge, Simon, 1142
Pet food
Mars, Forrest, canned pet-food invention by, 939
Purina "Incredible Dogs" campaign, 1111–1114
Whiskas "Inner Beast" campaign, 934–937
"Pet Store" spot, 40
Peter Pan syndrome, 1627–1628
Peterman, Dan, 1083
Peters, Erich, 1298
Peterson, Bob, 1513
Peterson, Duane, 230, 231
Peterson, George, 522
Peterson, Jack, 361
Peterson, Kim, 16
Peterson, Matt, 1513
Peterson, Robert, 811
Peterson Milla Hooks, 1599–1602
Pete's Brewing Company, 201
Petro, Aleksandr, 1697
Petty, Kyle, 841
Petty, Richard, 1094
Petty, Tom, 136
Pfizer, Charles, 1311, 1325
Pfizer Inc., 1311–1328
PGA Tour, 399–401
Pharmaceuticals
Advil "Liqui-Gels" campaign, 1839–1842
Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1209–1212
Paxil "Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
"The Power of Zyrtec" campaign, 1311–1314
Prozac print campaign, 505–508
Rolaids "Super Fans" campaign, 1322–1325
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325–1328
Pharmacia & Upjohn, Inc., 1313
Pharmacies. See Drugstores
"Pharmacy" spot, 661
Pharmavite LLC, 1329–1332
Phelan, Patricia, 515
Philadelphia Eagles, 894
Philip Morris Companies Inc.
"Antitobacco" campaign and, 246
"Marlboro Man" campaign, 99
Miller Brewing Company, acquisition of, 1017 name change, 249
"Think. Don't Smoke" campaign, 98
See also Altria Group Inc.
Philips, Anton, 189
Philips, Brian, 546
Philips, Gerard, 1189
Philips Company, 1189
Philips Electronics North America Corp., 1333–1336, 1528
Phillips, Paul, 793
Phillips Petroleum Company, 307
Phoenix, Lauren, 74
Phoenix Companies, 688–689
"Photo Fusion" feature, 559, 560–561
Photography
Canon "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, 277–280
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 587–590
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 723–727
Kodak "Advantix" campaign, 479–482
Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482–485
Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 488–491
Nikon "Mass Market Initiative" campaign, 1159–1162
"The Nikon School" campaign, 1162–1165
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1357–1360
Polaroid "See What Develops" campaign, 1360–1363
"Take Pictures. Further" campaign, 485–488
Piaf, Edith, 183
Piaggio, Enrico, 1338
Piaggio USA, Inc., 1337–1340
Piazza, Mike, 1860, 1861
Picasso, Pablo, 602, 1230
"Picture Book" spot, 726
Piech, Ferdinand, 1782
Piedmont Federal Savings and Loan Association, 1341–1344
"Pigeons" spot, 1173
Pilgrim, Lonnie "Bo," 1673
Pilgrim's Pride, 1673
"Piñata" spot, 1828, 1829
Pinheiro, Mitchell B., 1811, 1812
"Pink Room" spots, 1594, 1596
Pinkett Smith, Jada, 598, 600
Pippen, Scottie, 671, 672–673, 1056
Pirko, Tom, 241, 347, 1297
Piscopo, Joe, 1301
"Pitcher" spot, 617
Pitney, Jack, 170, 172, 173
Pitt, Brad, 1617
Pizza, frozen, 862–865
Pizza chains
Little Caesar "Cloning" campaign, 897–900
Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 900–903
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 903–906
Little Caesar "Talking Pizzas" campaign, 906–910
Pizza Hut "Big New Yorker Pizza" campaign., 1345–1348
Round Table Pizza "The Last Honest Pizza" campaign, 1429–1432
Pizza Hut, Inc., 1345–1348, 1346
Little Caesar, as competitor of, 898, 899, 902, 904–905
Round Table Pizza, as competitor of, 1431
"Pizza! Pizza!" tagline, 898, 905
"Plan B" ad, 1207
"Planet Zortron" ad, 1207
Plansker, Jeffery, 1407
Plant, Robert, 636
Planters Nuts, 441
Platt, Lewis, 721, 722
"Play" campaign, 1144–1147
PLAY Foundation, 1137
"Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 881, 953–956
Play That Funky Music (song), 769, 771
Playboy magazine, 170, 173
PlayStation 2
"Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1523–1526
Xbox, as competitor of, 1001, 1002–1003
Playtex, 1385–1387
"Please Be Quiet—Tax Day 20" spot, 689
"The Poachers" spot, 707
Pocket Pumps, 921, 922
Pocketknives, 1587–1590
Pogany, Don, 127, 1223
Poh, Jim, 170
"Point of View" spot, 962
Poitier, Sidney, 275
Poland Spring, 1275–1276

Polaris Industries, Inc., 1349–1356, 1350, 1353
Polaroid Corporation, 1357–1363
Polartec "Forward Fabric" campaign, 923–926
Polhemus, John, 681
Police Athletic League (PAL) program, 26
Political advertising
  Jesse Ventura "Retaliate in '98" campaign, 1739–1742
  "Morning Again in America" spot, 1467
  MoveOn.org "Real People" campaign, 1073–1076
  "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth" campaign, 1583–1585
Polk Automotive Loyalty Awards, 394
Polo, 1628
"Polygraph Backrub" spot, 1012
Polynice, Olden, 166
Polzin, Michael, 511
Pond's "Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads" campaign, 1690–1693
"Poodle" spot, 588
"Pool" ad, 1607, 1608, 1609
"The Pool" spot, 1507
Pop, Iggy, 1426, 1441, 1443
Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits, 318, 841
Popkowski, John, 1323
Poppen, Sherman, 1514
Popular Photography (magazine), 1163, 1164
Populism, 1741
Pore Perfect strips, 1691–1692
Porges, Shelly, 1054
Porizkova, Paulina, 985
Porsche, Ferdinand, 1367
Porsche Cars North America Inc., 1365–1368, 1366
Porter, Chuck, 171
Porter, Emily, 82
Portfolio Awards, 1059
Portland Trailblazers, 168
Portrait (film), 61
"Portraits" campaign, 83, 84, 1041
Posehn, Brian, 651
Posen, Zac, 446
Posilac, 1035–1038
Posner, Victor, 1656
Post, Charles William "C. W.", 859, 862
Post, George, 411
Post Cereals
  General Mills, as competitor of, 628–629
  Kellogg Company, as competitor of, 832–833, 836
Postaer, Larry, 92
Postaer, Steffan, 1822, 1823, 1824
Poster campaigns
  Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1103, 1105
  Glenfiddich "Single Malt" campaign, 685
  MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1061–1062, 1063
  Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651–1654
  Village Voice "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign, 1755
  Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1751
Pottery Barn, 535
Potts, Annie, 1331
Potty Training Kelly, 751
Poundstone, Paula, 1055
Powell, Matt, 1125
Powell of New York, 1421–1424
Power Lunch (television show), 37
"The Power of All of Us" tagline, 495, 498
"The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741–744
"The Power of Yes" campaign, 1802
"The Power of Zyrtec" campaign, 1311–1314
The Power (song), 1380
"Power to Quit" campaign, 661–665
PowerAde, 341–343, 1288, 1289
PowerBar, 932
"Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1671–1674
Powerpuff Girls (television show), 1614
PowerTouch Learning System
  LeapFrog, as competitor of, 880–881
  "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
Prager, Iris, 1387
Pray, Doug, 659
Prefontaine, Steve, 1132, 1139
Preiss, Jeff, 1041
"Premature Pour" spot, 707
"Prepared so fresh you can taste it" campaign, 396
Prescription drugs. See Pharmaceuticals
"President of Beers" ad, 1450, 1452
Presidential campaigns. See Political advertising
Presley, Elvis, 1298, 1302
"Press Conference" spot, 986
Pressler, Paul, 887
Price, Greg, 780
Price, Nick, 1135
Price, Tim, 975
"Priceless" campaign, 84–85, 949–952, 950, 1767, 1770
Priceline.com Incorporated, 1369–1372
Pricing, 957–960
"A Priest, a Rabbi, and an Imam Are Walking Down the Street" spot, 33
Prima, Louis, 601
"Prime-time roadblock" strategy, 37
Prince George's County Public School, 880
Princess Cruise Lines, 1443
Pringles, 1398–1400
Print advertising
  A & F Quarterly campaign, 9–12
  "Absolut Print" campaign, 1729, 1730–1731, 1733–1737
  ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, 77
  Allegra "Spirit of Freedom" campaign, 1462
  "Altoids" campaign, 1823, 1825
  "American Apparel" campaign, 71–74
  American Express, 81
  American Express "Do More" campaign, 85
  Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 103
  Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 144
  Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1276
  BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 184
  "The Book of Harley-Davidson" campaign, 701–704
  Borders "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 195–198
  Brigham's "Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207–210
  Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 229–232
  "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 33
  CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 283
  Cargill "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, 287, 288
  Charles Schwab "Smarter Investors" campaign, 304

Chesebrough-Pond's "Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads" campaign, 1690–1693
Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 634
Chrysler "Engineered to Be Great Cars" campaign, 387
Cisco Systems "The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 323
Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 331
Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
Columbia Sportswear "Mother Boyle" campaign, 359–362
"Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1487
Crate & Barrel 1998 campaign, 533–536
Cunard Line "Can you Wait?" campaign, 373–374
CVS "Life to the Fullest" campaign, 377
DHL "Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You." campaign, 421
Diamond Trading Company "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign, 443–446
Discover Brokerage campaign, 1058
Discover "Make a Statement" campaign, 1055
Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459, 461
Dreyer's Grand Light "Unbelievable" campaign, 469–470
Estates of World Golf Village "Repositioning" campaign, 400–402
Ford "Driving American Innovation" campaign, 558
French Connection "Scent to Bed" campaign, 579–582
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 589–590
Gap "For Every Generation" campaign, 597
Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 600
Gap "This Is Easy" campaign, 607
Gateway "People Rule" campaign, 611
General Electric "Imagination At Work" campaign, 625
General Foods International Coffees "It's How to Unplug" campaign, 862
General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 643–644
General Motors "Hummer" campaign, 647
General Motors "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench" campaign, 651
Hallmark Cards "Sneak a Peek" campaign, 694
Hershey Reese's "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, 712, 714
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 723–724
Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 743
Honda "What About Now?" campaign, 91, 92, 93
IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 787
IBM "Linux" campaign, 796
"iMac" campaign, 134
"ING Launch" campaign, 765
"It Happens At the Hilton" campaign, 731–732
"Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 749–753
JetBlue "Unbelievable" campaign, 818–822
Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 425
Kraft "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign, 865
La-Z-Boy "The New Look of Comfort" campaign, 877
LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 881
Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1748
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 890
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 888
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 896
Little Caesar Unlimited Pizzas campaign, 899
Logitech "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, 913
Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator," 1322
Lycos "Go Get It" campaign, 915, 916
MCI "1-800-COLLECT" campaign, 973
Motorola "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1065–1068
Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1269
NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1096
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print Campaign," 1107–1109
New York State Lottery "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, 1129
"Nextel. Done." campaign, 1552
Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1147–1150
"The Nikon School" campaign, 1162–1165
Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1176
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1183
Nordstrom "Reinvent Yourself" campaign, 1184, 1186–1187
North Carolina "Heritage" campaign, 1201, 1203–1204
Northwest Airlines "E-Ticket" campaign, 1205–1208
Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1211
Outward Bound "Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First?" campaign, 1237–1240
Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1264
Perdue "Now Arriving" campaign, 1310
Philips Electronics "Getting Better" campaign, 1335
Piedmont Federal "It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here." campaign, 1343
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1359
Polaroid "See What Develops" campaign, 1361
Polartec "Forward Fabric" campaign, 925
Prozac print campaign, 505–508
Purina "Incredible Dogs" campaign, 1111, 1113
Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043–1046
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 869
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1443
Saab "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1447
Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
Schwinn "What a Ride" campaign, 1252–1256
Sears "Todo para ti (Everything for you)" campaign, 1489
Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 167
Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1402
Sierra Club "Hybrid Evolution" campaign, 1509
Sims Sports "Be Free" campaign, 1513–1516

Print advertising, continued
Snickers Marathon bar "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 933
Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 409–410
Sony "What's Next?" campaign, 1531–1534
"Specialized" campaign, 1539–1542
Stanley Steemer "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign, 1560
Steelcase "Work Effectiveness" campaign, 1575–1578
Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
"Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1587–1590
Tampax Pearl "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1388
Target "New Yorker Magazine Sponsorship" campaign, 1599–1602
Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 308
Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615–1617
Tommy Hilfiger "American Tartans" campaign, 1627–1630
TV Guide "On the Inside" campaign, 1669
Tyson Foods "Powered by Tyson" campaign, 1674
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1696, 1697
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
UnitedHealth Group "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1727
UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1711–1712
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1723
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 299
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1349–1352
Village Voice "Not America's Favorite Paper" campaign, 1753–1756
Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1759
Virginia Tourism Corporation "Meet Virginia" campaign, 1763
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1768
Wrangler "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749–1751
Xbox "It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001, 1002
"Printer" spot, 1712
Printers
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 717–720
Xerox "Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge" campaign, 1843–1847
Priority Mail, 1718, 1720
"Privacy Manager" campaign, 153–156
Private-label jeans
Lee jeans, as competitor of, 1744
Levi's jeans, as competitors of, 884–885
Private label vitamins and herbal supplements, 1329, 1331
Procter, William, 1377, 1380, 1398
The Procter & Gamble Company, 1373–1403
cat food, 935
Clairol, purchase of, 336
Frito-Lay, as competitor of, 585
Kimberly-Clark, as competitor of, 844–855
Pfizer, as competitor of, 1320–1321
Unilever, as competitor of, 1684–1685
See also Global Gillette
Proctor, Mike, 1513
"Proctor" radio spot, 688
"Prodigy" spot, 795, 796–797
"Product Assault" campaign, 1147–1150
Product placement
BMW motorcycle in Tomorrow Never Dies, 986, 989
BMW Z3 in Goldeneye, 986, 989
Dunkin' Donuts, 48
HotJobs.com on The Apprentice, 1041
Mercedes ML320 in Lost World: Jurassic Park, 989, 993
new twenty dollar bill, 217–218
Swiss Army Brands in Armageddon, 1590
Tyson Foods on Viacom shows, 1674
"Product Tester" spot, 1021
Production Farm, 3
Proferes, Patricia, 973
Professional Golfers' Association, 1275
Progressive Insurance
Allstate, as competitor of, 52
Geico, as competitor of, 614, 620
State Farm, as competitor of, 1571, 1572
Progresso soups, 270
Prohibition, 106
"Project: Real People" campaign, 1855, 1856
Promax Judge's Choice award, 593
Promotions
"Diet Coke Untapped," 354
Diet Rite/Zero Gravity Corporation promotion, 240, 242
Kraft "Be a DiGiorno Delivery Guy" promotion, 865
Levi's "Gold Rush" promotion, 886, 888
M&M's "Global Color Vote" promotion, 937, 939–940
Purina "Incredible Dog Challenge," 1113–1114
Propaganda
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign as, 33–34
"It's a Woman Thing" campaign as, 57
Propaganda Films, 88
Proposition 99 (California), 244
"Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 367–370
Proudfoot, Kevin, 522
Proulx, Erik, 1251
Prozac, 505–508, 506, 665–666
The Prudential Insurance Company of America, 1405–1408
John Hancock, as competitor of, 825, 827–828
MetLife, as competitor of, 998–999
Pruismann, Jason, 1371
Pryce, Jonathan, 1178, 1179
PT Cruiser, 387, 388
Public Broadcasting Service, 1409–1412
Public service campaigns
American Legacy Foundation "Truth" campaign, 97–100
Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 101–104
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31–32
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better "Child Hunger" campaign, 363–366
MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1061–1063
Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1425–1428
Publicis
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 587–590
T-Mobile "Get More" campaign, 1623–1626
TBS campaign, 522

Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1662–1665
Publicis & Hal Riney
Discovery Communications "Two Guys" campaign, 451
First Union "Financial World" campaign, 1789–1792
Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1817–1820
Saturn "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign, 1468–1472
"Sprint PCS" campaign, 1553–1556
Puentes, Bill, 437
Puffs, 844–845
Puppies, 1435
Purcell, Philip, 1050
Purina
"Incredible Dogs" campaign, 1111–1114
"Purina Dog Chow Every Day" campaign, 1112
Whiskas, as competitor of, 935–936
"Purse" spot, 530–531
Pursell, 1485
Push-to-talk technology, 1551, 1552
"Putting You Back in the Picture" campaign, 415
Puzder, Andrew, 290, 697, 699
PWC. See Personal watercraft
Pyne, Ben, 1664
Pyro, 459–462
Pytka, Joe, 365, 1180, 1298, 1552

Q

Q45, Infiniti, 1177–1180
Q-Link, 63, 64, 68
Quake (computer game), 381
Quaker Oats Company
Gatorade, 342, 343, 1287
Kellogg Company, as competitor of, 833
"Quaker-Warms You, Heart and Soul" campaign, 1292–1295
Snapple, acquisition of, 259, 1655, 1656–1657
Qualcomm phones spot, 539
Quality Care service centers, 650
Qualls, Roxanne, 1400
Quantum Computer Services, Inc., 63, 68
Quark, Inc., 658
Queen, 599
Queen Mary 2 (ship), 371–374
"Queen of Carbs" ad, 1450, 1452
"Queen" spot, 355, 356
Queeny, John, 1035
Quesnelle, George, 662, 664
Quest
"Launch" campaign, 1174–1177
Sienna, as competitor of, 1645
Questrom, Allen, 807, 808
"Quick and Easy" spot, 915
"Quicksand" spot, 389, 390, 391
Quinlan, Michael, 963
Quinn, Joanna, 1697
The Quiznos Master LLC, 456, 1413–1416
Qwest Communications, 1837

R

R. C. Auletta & Company, 1339
R. Griggs Group, 459, 460
R. J. Reynolds, 1094
R/West, 1580–1582
Raab, Steve, 1499
"Race-car" campaign, 1684
Race/ethnicity
Abercrombie & Fitch, 12
ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, 75–78
California Department of Health Services "Antismoking" campaign, 243
Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1136–1137
smoking, 56
"Race" spot, 255
"Racial Profiling" campaign, 75–78
Radcliffe, Ted "Double Duty," 1107 Radiant Silk, 1402
Radio, 580
Radio advertising
Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 103
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 118
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes" campaign, 123–126
"AOL Latino" campaign, 65
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 339
Brigham's "Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 231
Carter Products "Trojan Man" campaign, 314
Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 352
DirecTV "Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" campaign, 449
drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 473
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493–496
Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign, 735–736
"iMac" campaign, 134–135
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 896
Little Caesar "Pizza by the Foot" campaign, 905
Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1269
priceline.com, 1370
Red Lobster "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign, 397
Scotts Miracle-Gro "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1485
"Ted Launch" campaign, 1703
Radio Mercury Awards
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
eBay "Abbreviated" campaign, 493, 495
RadioShack, 1548
Radner, Gilda, 1488
Raevskaja, Irina, 1707
Rafferty, Bill, 865
"Rainbow Connection" campaign, 283
Rainbow/Push Coalition, 349
Rainey Kelly Campbell Roalfe/Y&R, 1235
Rainforest Action Network, 330
RainierVision, 1245, 1246, 1247
"Raise Your Right Hand" campaign, 443–446
"Raising the Bar" campaign, 299
Raj, Robin, 1426, 1427
Ralenkotter, Rossi, 873
Ralston Purina. See Nestlé Purina PetCare Co.
Ramsay, Michael, 1620, 1620
Randee of the Redwoods, 1078
Rao, Maya, 1083
Rap. See Hip-hop
Rapaille, G. Clotaire, 387, 388, 1375
Rapala "Custom Lures" campaign, 1193–1196
Raphael, Sally Jesse, 1689
Rasmussen, Bill, 517, 521
Rasmussen, Robert, 1499
Rasmussen, William F., 513
Rath, Carlie, 1812
Ratings, television, 5, 8
Rattin, Mark, 1394

"Ravaged" spot, 1585
Raven, Abbe, 1663
Ravenhall, Kitty, 315
Rawlings, Mike, 1346, 1348
Rayovac, 510–511
Razors
  Schick Intuition "Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1477–1480
  "Tracer FX Ads" campaign, 1314–1317
3rd Rock from the Sun (television show), 6
"Read-In" literacy program, 1605
Reader's Digest, 97–98, 1677
Ready-to-drink coffees, 1197–1198
Ready-to-drink teas, 1298–1302
"Ready to Move Up?" tagline, 303
Reagan, Ronald, 804, 1467, 1661
"Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 123–126, 124
"Real California Cheese" campaign, 253, 254, 255
"Real" campaign, 350–353
"Real Compared to What" spot, 352
"Real Cooking" campaign, 1687–1690
Real estate, 399–402
"Real Experiences" campaign. See "Bottles Personified" campaign
"Real Life, Real Answers" campaign, 823, 824, 827
"Real People" campaign, 1073–1076
Reality-based television commercials, 269
Reality Bites (movie), 246
Reality shows
  Airline, 44
  Burger King/The Apprentice partnership, 221
  "Tiny House" spot, 620–621
RealPlayer, 1087
Reames, Scott, 1143
Rebates, 1050
"Red Dot" campaign, 1387
Red Hot Chili Peppers, 1426
Red Label Johnnie Walker, 425
Red Lobster, 395–398
Red Orb Entertainment, 379–380, 381, 382
Red Sky, 719–720
"Red X" campaign, 768, 772
Red Zone, 1402
Redenbacher, Orville, 1309
Redford, Robert, 1409, 1410, 1697
Redington, Frederick W., 1457
Reebok International Ltd., 1417–1420
  adidas, as competitor of, 21, 25
  Fila, as competitor of, 553
  Nike, as competitor of, 1133, 1136, 1140, 1146, 1149, 1155
Reed, Rick, 1585
Reene, Michael, 790
Reese, Harry Burnett, 710, 712
ReeseSticks "The Crisp You Can't Resist!" campaign, 709–712
Reeves, Rosser, 1839
"Reflex Action Razor" campaign, 1189–1192
Reform Party, 1739–1741
Refund Rewards ad, 688
Register.com, 676–677
Reich, Michael, 1754, 1755
Reid, Peter, 116
Reidl, George, 1798
ReignCom Ltd., 137
Reilly, Anne-Michelle, 1264
Reimaging
  KFC, 397
  The Melting Pot, 397
  Red Lobster, 398
"Reincarnation" spot, 994, 996
Reingold, Arthur, 863, 864
Reinman, Sally, 1635
"Reinvent Yourself" campaign, 1184–1187
Reiser, Paul, 153, 1545, 1548, 1837
Reith, Kathryn, 1154
"Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544–547
"Relay" spot, 726
"Remember Rainier" campaign, 1245–1248
Remington, 1190
Remodeling
  CVS, 376
  Holiday Inn, 779
  KFC restaurants, 840
  Little Caesar's stores, 908
  Office Depot, 1214, 1216
Renaissance, 1037
Renault, 1167, 1168, 1175
Reno, Nevada, 872–873
Renovation. See Remodeling
"Rent or Food" spot, 363
Rentschler, Fred, 1698
ReplayTV, 1620, 1621–1622
"Report on Sustainable Development" (Monsanto), 1038
"Repositioning" campaign, 399–402
"Reshape Your Attitude" campaign, 835
Resolve Fabric Freshener, 1389
"Restaurant" spot, 790
Restaurants
  Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 203–206
  Burger King "Lunch Break" campaign, 219–222
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 222–225
  Burger King "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign, 225–228
  Carl's Jr. "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 289–292
  Church's Chicken "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, 317–320
  "Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 960–964
  Hardee's "Revolution" campaign, 697–699
  Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811–814
  KFC "Chicken Capital USA" campaign, 839–842
  McDonald's "Campaign 55" campaign, 957–960
  McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, 964–967
  McDonald's "We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 967–970
  Quiznos "Baby Bob" campaign, 1413–1415
  Red Lobster "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign, 395–398
  Subway "Jared Fogle" campaign, 455–458
  Taco Bell "Think Outside the Bun" campaign, 1591–1594
  Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1594–1597
  Wendy's "Fresh Stuffed Pita" campaign, 1809–1812
  Wendy's "Good to Be Square" campaign, 1812–1816
Restoration Hardware, 535
"Restore" spot, 724
Retail stores
  "Gateway Country," 611
  Negro Leagues Baseball Museum gift shop, 1108
  Song Airlines, 45, 410
  See also Department stores
"Retaliate in '98" campaign, 1739–1742, 1740
Retired Teachers Association, 1263
"Retirement Home" spot, 304, 1520
Retton, Mary Lou, 1689
"Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1655–1658
"Reunion" spot, 1087
Reuter, Edzard, 984
"Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207–210

Revlon
real women in ads, 1683
Target/Revlon advertising supplement, 1605
"Revolution" campaign (Hardee's), 697–699
"Revolution" spot (Nike), 1139
Rewards programs
American Express, 80–83
Marriott Rewards program, 930
Rexer, William, 177
Reynolds, Debbie, 1234
Reynolds, Patrick, 249, 1029
Rhapsody in Blue (song), 1695
The Rheingold Brewing Company, 1247, 1421–1424
Rhymes, Busta, 1269, 1273
Ribisi, Giovanni, 1426
Ricci, Christina, 598, 599
Ricciardi, Joe, 644
Rice, Donna, 750
Rice, Jerry, 52, 338
Richards, Michael, 985, 989
Richards Group, 1667–1670
Richie, Lionel, 1278, 1296
Richino, Nick, 1125
Richmond Show, 1109
"The Rick" campaign, 513–516
Rickles, Don, 1058
Riddler, Sarah, 1422
"The Ride" spot (Schwinn), 1250
"Ride" spot (Trident gum), 233, 235
"Ride the Best" campaign, 1352–1356, 1353
Riedl, George, 1797
Ries, Al, 330
Rigali, Monica, 1146
Right Guard "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 669–673
"Right Hands" campaign, 52
"Rikkia" spot, 348
Riklis, Meshulam, 293
Rimes, LeAnn, 397
Riney, Hal, 1467
"Ring-around-the-Collar" campaign, 1683
Ringer, Randy, 150
Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey Circus, 1767
"Ringo" spot, 527
Riordan, John, 1758
Ripken, Cal, Jr., 1396
"Rising" campaign, 1206–1207, 1537, 1695, 1698–1701
Risko, Robert, 1602
Riswold, Jim, 1133, 1136
Ritchie, Ashton, 1486
Ritchie, Guy, 60, 175, 177, 178, 995
Rite Aid
CVS, as competitor of, 377
drugstore.com partnership with, 471, 472
Walgreen, as competitor of, 1798
Ritts, Herb, 1736
Ritz crackers, 267
"Riven" campaign, 379–382
"River" spot, 1000
Rivers, Joan, 1824
R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company
"Antitobacco" campaign, 246 lawsuit concerning antismoking spots, 250
"Roach Motel" spot, 739
"The Road Is Calling" campaign, 1646–1649
"Road Rage" spot, 1579, 1580, 1581
Road Runner, 1474
"Road Trip" spot, 770, 1715
"Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651–1654
Roan, Tim, 1484, 1485
Robert Falls and Company, 1440
Roberts, Julia, 246
Roberts, Mike, 966
Roberts, Wyman, 396, 397
Robinson, George, 1111
Robinson, Jackie, 1107, 1137, 1233, 1235
Robinson, James, III, 87
"Robot" spot, 1717, 1720
"Rock Climber" spot, 999–1000
The Rock (film), 633
Rock n' Roll (song), 635, 636, 637
Rock the Vote, 1120, 1425–1428
Rockapella, 1376
"Rocket Man" spot, 153
Rocky (film), 1659, 1661
Rocky Road ice cream, 1121
"Rocky" spot, 1659, 1661–1662
Roddick, Anita, 191, 192
Rode, Ellen, 1743
Rodeo, 1749
Rodkin, Gary, 1268
Rodman, Dennis
Converse campaign, 751
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 520
Roffman, Marvin, 734
Roger, Bob, 388
Rogers, Gary, 468, 470
Rogers, Mike, 1486
Rogers, Roy, 1293
Rogge, Joyce, 1537
Rohde, Ellen, 1744
Roisum, Joan, 1573
Rolaids "Super Fans" campaign, 1322–1325
Rolex
"Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043–1046
Swiss Army Brands, as competitor of, 1589
Rolling Rock
"Grab a Rock" campaign, 759–762
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 867–870
Rolling Stone magazine, 263
Rolling Stones, 1005
Rolston, Matthew, 1227
Roman Holiday (film), 1337
"Romeo and Juliet" spot, 1552
Romer v. Evans, 76
Ron Felcher (character), 1417, 1419
Ronald McDonald (character), 967–968, 969
Roogow, Buddy, 945, 946, 948
"Room Service" spot, 569
"Room" spot, 719, 720
Roosevelt, Franklin and Eleanor, 144
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 106
Roosevelt, Theodore
Abercrombie & Fitch, 9, 596, 599
"Good to the last drop." slogan, 859
Roper, Tim, 196, 197
Rose, Claudia, 445
Rose, John W., 1727
Rose Art, 188
Rosen, David, 238
Rosen, Rob, 279
Rosendahl, Tim, 398
Rosensteele, Jim, 367
Rosenthal, Amy, 890
"Rosie O'Doll," 856
"Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall" campaign, 849, 854–858, 1489
Ross, Matt, 800
Ross, Rich, 1664
Ross & Company, 925
Rossi, Chris, 1757, 1758, 1759
Roth, Hayes, 1806
Rothman, Sam, 27, 28
Round Table Pizza, 1429–1432
Roundtree, Richard, 1277
Roundup, 1035
Rourke, Mickey, 175, 702
Routenberg, Eric, 1359
Roux, Michel, 1734
Rowden, Ian, 221
Rowlands, Gena, 1747
Rowley, Craig, 703, 704

Roxio, 1085–1088
Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company, 1433–1440
Royal Caribbean Cruises Ltd., 1441–1444, 1442
  Carnival Corporation, as competitor of, 295
  Cunard Line, as competitor of, 373
Rozenich, Anna, 959
R&R Partners, 871–874
RSA USA, 61
"Rubber Ducky" spot, 156
"Rubberband Man" spot, 1221, 1222–1223, 1565
Rubin, Gerry, 92
Rubin Postaer, 92–95
"Ruby" campaign, 191–194
Rudkin, Margaret, 265, 266
Rudolph, Steve, 531
Rudy, Frank, 1138
"The Rugby Bunch" spot, 1225, 1227
"Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749–1751
Rukeyser, Louis, 1410
Run-DMC, 608
"Run" spot, 744
"Runners, Yeah, We're Different" campaign, 19–22
"Running Man" icon, 65, 67, 68–69
"Running Man" spot, 1648
Running shoes. See Athletic footwear
"Running" spot, 1153
"Running with the Squirrels" spot, 503, 504
Rusen, Hart, 1580
Rush, Marvin, 644
Ruskin, Gary, 199, 242
Russ, Peter, 553
Russell, Alan, 184
Russell, Tom, 1222
Russell Stover Candies, 711
"Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
Rust, Edward B., Jr., 1573
Ruth, Alice, 606
Ruth, Babe, 208, 1293
Rutherford, Joan C., 588
Ryan, Nolan, 515
Ryder, Tom, 1677
Ryder, Winona, 246
Ryman, Steve, 852, 853

S

Saab Cars USA, Inc., 1445–1448
Saarinen, Eric, 999
Saarinen, Lauri, 1193–1194, 1195
Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising
  Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627–630
  Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
  Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign, 411–414, 415
  Gillette "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 673
  "Riven" campaign, 379–382
  "Smiley" the Goldfish, 266
  "Thank You, Paine Webber" campaign, 1675–1678
  Toyota Corolla "A Car to Be Proud Of" campaign, 1631–1634
  Toyota "Everyday" campaign, 1634–1637
  Toyota "Fuel for Thought" campaign, 1638–1640
  Toyota Sienna "Kids Rule" campaign, 1645–1646
SABMiller plc, 1449–1455
  See also Miller Brewing Company
Sabre Holdings, 1651
Sachs, Becky, 977, 1294
Sack, Mary Lou, 1406
"Safety Video" campaign, 903–906
"Sailor" spot, 314
Salakhova, Aidan, 1707
Salasnek, Noah, 1515
Salon Selectives, 1393
"Salon" spot, 1793
Salt-N-Pepa, 1552
Salzman, Marian, 136
Same-sex marriage, 657–660
Sample, Fitzgerald, 1810
Samples, 864
Sampras, Pete, 1722
Samsung
  Motorola, as competitor of, 1070
  Sony, partnership with, 1526–1528
Samuel Adams beer, 199–202, 200
San Francisco Ad Club awards, 885
Sanders, Barry, 1149
Sanders, Deion
  annual endorsement income, 552
  Visa Check Card "Works Like a Check" campaign, 1769, 1771
Sanders, Harland, 397
Sandor, David, 82
Sands, Mike, 653, 655
Sanford, Isabelle, 1230
Sanford, L.P., 1457–1460
Sanford, William H., Jr., 1457
Sann, Ted, 303, 527, 1297
Sanofi-Aventis, 1461–1464
Sapka, Steve, 220, 221
Sappi Print Media Efficiency Award, 18
"Sarah's Escapade" spot, 321
Sarajevo Olympic Children's Fund, 107
Sarandon, Susan, 1683
"Sara's Escapade" spot, 323
Sargent, Ron, 1215, 1563, 1564, 1566
Satellite television, 447–450
"Saturday Night" spot, 828–829
"Saturday" spot, 491
Saturn Corporation, 1465–1472
  "Saturn Relaunch" campaign, 1465–1467
  "Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign, 1470
Savage, Terry, 1308, 1524
Sawyer, Linda, 756
Sayers, Tyrone, 1627, 1629, 1630
SBC Communications Inc., 150, 1473–1476
Scaglione, Bob, 1508
Scaly, Sam, 1309
Scandal Music, 125
Scandals
  insurance companies, 1406, 1407
  LeapFrog, 880
Scaros & Casselman, 731
Scarpelli, Bob
  Bud Light campaign, 116, 1023
  Ikea campaign, 755
  J. C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 807, 810
"Scent to Bed" campaign, 579–582
Schaden, Rick, 456
Schaefer, Audrey, 1551
Schaefer, George, 1091
Schaeffer, Pierre, 484
Schechter, Alvin, 1770
Scheider, Roy, 1235
Schenck, Ernie, 825
Schenkenburg, Markus, 1230
Scher, Laura, 1835
Scherck, Ted, 546
Schering-Plough
  Hoescht, as competitor of, 1463
  Pfizer, as competitor of, 1312–1313
Scherstrom, Norm, 1719
Schettini, William, 457
Schick, Jack, 1478
Schick, Jacob, 1189
"Schick Tracer FX Ads" campaign, 1314–1317
Schick-Wilkinson Sword, 1477–1480
Schiffer, Claudia, 888
Schiller, Derek, 27
Schindler, Scott, 1041
Schlaet, Arnold, 305–306
Schmeling, Max, 2, 3

Schmid, Ron, 663
Schmidt, Jim, 534, 535, 1799
Schneider, Don, 1297
Schneider, George, 105
Schneiderman, David, 1753, 1754, 1755, 1756
Schoen, Kim, 521
Schofield, Stan, 672
"School" spot, 65
School supplies
  Staples "That Was Easy" campaign, 1565–1566
  Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569
Schroer, Jim, 564
Schulman, Dan, 151
Schulman, Jessica, 142, 143
Schultz, Howard, 1089, 1091
Schumacker, Jim, 114, 122
Schwab, Bill, 370
Schwab, Charles, 301
Schwab, Mark J., 693
Schwan's Sales Enterprises, 864
Schwarzenegger, Arnold, 645
Schweitzer, Mark, 1551, 1552
Schwinn/GT "Fast. It's Corporate Policy." campaign, 1249–1252
Schwinn "What a Ride" campaign, 1253, 1254
Sciarra, Pina, 346
Scient Corp., 502
Scion, 174, 1778
Scooby-Doo (television show), 1612, 1614
Scoop, Fatman, 1269, 1273
"Score" spot, 276
Scorsese, Martin, 1409, 1410
Scotch whiskey, 683–686
Scothon, Chuck, 954
Scott, George C., 231, 739
Scott, Jake, 1143
Scott, Kirk, 282
Scott, O. M., 1481
Scott, Ridley, 178, 1234
Scott, Ridley and Tony, 61
Scott, Tony, 178
Scott, Willard, 295
Scott Paper, 844, 845
Scotts Miracle-Gro Company, 1481–1486
"Scratch & Win-Match & Win" contest, 1440
"Screw" spot, 681
"Screwy, Ain't It?" tagline, 1611, 1613
Scrubs (television show), 849
Scully, Kevin, 1240
Scurry, Briana, 1156
Sea-Doo, 1355
"Sea Monster" spot, 279
Seacrist, Kelly, 977
Seade, Liz, 1057, 1059
Sealy, 1502
"Seamless" spot, 1648
Search engines
  "Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 1849–1853
  Lycos "Go Get It" campaign, 915–918
"Search for America's Most Incredible Dog" contest, 1114
"The Search" spot, 1159, 1161
"Searchlight" spot, 204
Sears, Barry, 932
Sears, Roebuck & Co., 1487–1495, 1492
  Discover card, 1050, 1051, 1054
  J.C. Penney, as competitor of, 809
  Kmart, as competitor of, 855–856
  Kmart merger with, 850
  Target, as competitor of, 1604
"Sears. Where Else?" campaign, 1491–1495
Sears Tower, 1493
Seattle SuperSonics, 165
Seay, Douglas, 1818
SEC. See Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC)
Second City, 566
Secondhand smoke, 246, 247, 250
Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401–1403
Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), 1057
"Security Camera" campaign, 1295–1298
Sedelmaier, Josef, 1810
Sedgwick Rd., 1801–1804
"See What Develops" campaign, 1360–1363
"See You Later, Alligator" campaign, 1317–1322, 1318, 1319
"See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign, 919–922
"See Yourself Succeeding" campaign, 303
Seergy, Michael, 1174
Seese, Guy, 1247
Sega of America, Inc., 1497–1500, 1524–1525
Segal, Gordon and Carole, 534, 536
Seger, Bob, 564
Sehorn, Jason, 303, 304
Seibert, Fred, 1612
Seinfeld, Jerry
  A&E profiles, 1661
  American Express campaign, 951
  American Express "Do More" campaign, 82–86
  "Seinfeld" campaign, 86–90, 327, 1056
Seinfeld (television show), 87, 88 advertisers, 1841
  Advil "Liqui-Gels" campaign, 1841
  Gardenburger "Eating Good Just Got Great" campaign, 1817, 1818, 1819, 1820
  mock promotion of ABC's campaign, 6
  Nice 'n Easy hair coloring ad, 334
  Old Navy "Woof" spot, 1228
  "Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1767
Selassie, Haile, 25
Seldane, 1313, 1462, 1463
"The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 321–324
Self-service digital-photo kiosks, 483, 484
Selig, Allan H. "Bud," 1278
Selleck, Tom, 857
Sellers, Peter, 174
Seminars, 1710
Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 1584
Sendak, Maurice, 155
Senior citizens, 1342
Sensor razors, 1315, 1316
Seomin, Scott, 829
September 11th terrorist attacks
  A & F Quarterly campaign, 12
  ACLU ads, 77
  Advertising Council "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31–34
  airline industry, 1695, 1702
  American Express advertising, 86
  Americans and their finances, 330
  Amtrak ridership, 1106
  Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
  antidepressants and antianxiety drugs, 668
  Cartoon Network ratings, 1615
  Charles Schwab Corporation, 304
  Coca-Cola "Life Tastes Good" campaign, 351
  defense spending, 232
  Delta Air Lines "Person to Person" campaign, 414, 416–417
  Diamond Trading Company campaign, 444
  Dunkin' Donuts "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47, 49

September 11th terrorist attacks, continued
fast food restaurants, 318
"Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777
IBM "Leaning Tower of Pisa" spot, 793
JetBlue campaign, 821–822
Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 424
Jordan, Michael, donation of, 1100–1101 museum attendance, 1084
New York State Lottery "If I Had a Million Dollars" campaign, 1129
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1444
Southwest Airlines profitability, 1538
tourism slump, 871
travel and tourism, 296, 1762
United States Postal Service "Fly Like an Eagle" campaign, 1720
Sequoia Capital, 1850
"Serious Fun" campaign, 1758
Serta International, 1501–1504
"Service Bay" spot, 651
ServiceMaster Clean, 1559
Sesame Street (television show), 1411
"Set Yourself Free" campaign, 315
Seven Up. See Dr Pepper/Seven Up, Inc.
Seward, Lisa, 331
Sex and the City (television show), 446, 598, 599, 600, 1664
"Sex Bicycles" ad, 1249, 1251
Sex Pistols, 1759
Sexual harassment, 73
Sexuality
A & F Quarterly campaign, 9–12
Abercrombie & Fitch "XXX" campaign, 596–597, 599–600
"American Apparel" campaign, 71–74
Carl's Jr. "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 290
Clairol "Totally Organic" campaign, 333–336
Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
French Connection "Scent to Bed" campaign, 579–582
Hardee's Paris Hilton spot, 698
"Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 749–753
"Vegas Stories" campaign, 873
Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1759
Vodafone campaign, 1234–1235
"Sexy Moms," targeting of, 1174–1176
Seymour, Henry O., 1292
Seymour, Stephanie, 354
"Shade Running" spot, 1146
Shaffer, Gina, 1022, 1023, 1024
Shaggy, 1279
Shahid, Sam, 9, 10, 11
"Shake" spot, 392, 394
Shakira, 25, 1280, 1282
Shakirov, Fathulla, 1707
Shalhoub, Tony, 522
Shampoo. See Hair care products
Shanahan, Jack, 229, 231, 232
Shanet, Larry, 431
Shanks, Gordon, 891, 892
Shapiro, Bob, 1707
Shapiro, Owen, 1853
Shapiro, Robert, 1036
"Shaq/Shaft" spot, 1277
Share Our Strength (SOS), 364–365
"Shared Food" spot, 363, 365
"Sharing and Connecting" campaign, 1388–1391
"Sharks" spot, 1790
Sharp Corp., 1505–1508
Sharpe, Shannon, 303, 304, 527
Sharpie "Write Out Loud" campaign, 1457–1459
Shatner, William, 1369–1372
Shaum, Lucy, 201
ShaveMyYeti.com, 925
"Shaving Follies" spot, 1479
"Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1477–1480
Shaving razors. See Razors
Shea, Maggie, 331
Sheehan, Mike, 825
Sheep, Serta, 1501–1503
SheepAreEvil.com, 925
"Sheet Metal" spot, 1467
Sheik condoms, 313
"Sheldon" spot, 343
Shell Oil, 307, 308
Shelmerdine, Guy, 515
Shepardson Stern & Kaminstky, 410
Shepherd, Kenny Wayne, 607–608
Sherbow, Sue, 902, 907
Sheriff, Karen, 154
Sherman, Nate, 1009
Shields, Brooke, 262
Shimotakahara, Lisa, 1653
Shipping companies. See Delivery services
"Shipping" spot, 45
"Ships" spot, 800
Shoe Pie (music CD), 460
Shoes
Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459–462
"Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 749–753
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184
See also Athletic footwear
Short, Len, 66–69
Short films
"2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival" campaign, 273–276
"Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
Amazon Theater, 59–62
BMW "The Hire" campaign, 175–179
The Check Up, 159, 1775
Healthy Curiosity (short film), 1827
Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1087
"Out of Order: Rock the Vote Targets Health," 1426
Wendy's "Good to Be Square" campaign, 1815
"Shower" ad (Schwinn), 1255
"Shower" spot (Snapple), 239
Showtime Networks
Häagen-Sazs, partnership with, 1120
Xbox, partnership with, 1002
Shrek 2 (film), 435, 436, 437
Shue, Andrew, 515
Shuldman, Ken, 1105
Shulman, Bruce, 1179
"Shuttle" spot, 681
Sicher, John, 347, 348, 1273, 1290, 1305
Sick, Fritz, 1245
The Sidekick, 1624
Siegel, Jimmy, 302
Sienna "Kids Rule" campaign, 1643–1646
Sierra Club, 1509–1512
Sierra Mist, 1290
Sifford, Charlie, 1137
Sight Effects, 999
Sigma Corporation of America, 1163
"Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
"Sign On a Friend" promotion, AOL, 65
Signature jeans, Levi Strauss, 886, 887
"Silent Car" spot, 873
"Silent Hero" spot, 323
"Silhouette" campaign, 135–138, 1086–1087
Siltanen, Rob, 1171, 1172, 1174

Siltanen & Partners, 1413–1415
Silver, Elizabeth, 1768
Silver, Eric, 450
Silver Lion. See Lion Awards
Silver Pencil Awards. See One Show Awards
Silver Skillet award, 289, 291
Silverglade, Bruce, 1293
Silverstein, Rich
  E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 526
  founding of Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, 494
  Nike "Women's campaign," 1156
Simmonds, Richard, 295
Simmons, 1502–1503
Simmons, Chet, 521
Simmons, Nate, 924, 926
Simon, Julian, 947
Simoncelli, Peter, 684
"Simplicity Shootout" spot, 133, 134
The Simpsons (television show), 773
Sims, Tom, 1513
Sims Sports, Inc., 1513–1516
Sinatra, Frank
  Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298, 1301
  Visa Signature card campaign, 1768
Singh, Tarsem, 1625
"Single Malt" campaign, 683–686
Sinise, Gary, 637
"Sink Boy" campaign, 1391–1394
Sinyard, Mike, 1539
"Sir Pines" spots, 1827
Sisson, Alan, 552
Sitley, Mark, 1411
Sittig, Dick, 811
"Six Dollar Burger" campaign, 289–292
Six Flags, Inc., 1517–1521, 1518, 1519, 1611, 1613–1614
"Six Million Dollar Man" spot, 68
60 Minutes (television show), 1186
Size, body, 1682
"Skateboard" spot, 239
"Skateboarders" campaign, 1150–1154
Skin care products
  Chesebrough-Pond's "Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads" campaign, 1690–1693
  Dial "You're Not As Clean As You Think" campaign, 435–438
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679–1683
  Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator" campaign, 1317–1322
  See also Cosmetics and fragrances
Skinner, David, 689
Skrzypczak, Milosz, 1066
SkyTeam Alliance, 415
Slade, David, 60
Slater, Christian, 597
Slater, Kelly, 140
"Sled Dogs" spot, 361
"Sleight of Hand" spot, 218
Slice, 1020
Slifka, Tom, 1250
"Slive" spot, 1136
Slum Village, 634
Sly and the Family Stone, 1634, 1636, 1719
"Smackdown Your Vote" campaign, 1427
Small Business Development Center, Florida Atlantic University, 1214, 1215
Smart, Amy, 1426
"Smart Heart Challenge," 1292, 1294
SmarTalk, 793
"Smarter Bombs" ad, 232
"Smarter Investors" campaign, 301–304, 527
SmartZone bar, 932–933
"Smile" spot, 49
"Smiley" the Goldfish, 266
Smirnoff
  Absolut, as competitor of, 1731–1732
  Smirnoff Ice, 1014
  Stolichnaya, as competitor of, 1707
Smith, Allan, 1576
Smith, B., 269, 271
Smith, Baker, 449
Smith, Bill, 1250
Smith, Chip, 1540
Smith, Chris
  "Absolut Director" campaign, 1732
  SBC Pacific Bell "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1474, 1475
  Toyota "Get the Feeling" campaign, 1642, 1643
Smith, Emmitt, 673, 1133
Smith, Frederick, 537, 541, 549
Smith, Genevieve, 1803
Smith, Jaclyn, 855
Smith, Jimmy, 1147, 1149
Smith, Jud, 702
Smith, Kevin, 1861
Smith, Loren, 1717–1718
Smith, Nadine, 660
Smith, Ray, 155
Smith, Robert, 1041
Smith, Susan, 1822
Smith, Will, 633, 1549
SmithKline. See GlaxoSmithKline plc
Smoking and Health (report), 98
Smoking cessation products, 661–665
Smoley, Sandra, 245
"Smooth Move" campaign, 1014
Smothers Brothers, 1230
Snack foods
  Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439–442
  Fat-Free Pringles "Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1398–1400
  Frito-Lay "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 583–586
  Pepperidge Farm "Goldfish Crackers" campaign, 265–268
  Snickers Marathon bars "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 931–934
Snap!
  Lycos, as competitor of, 917
  Yahoo!, as competitor of, 1852
Snap advertising, 1380
Snapple
  "Bottles Personified" campaign, 237–240
  milk, as competitor of, 259
  "Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1655–1658
"Sneak a Peek" campaign, 691–695
Snickers, 714, 931–934
Snoop Dogg, 383, 385, 1147, 1629
Snoopy, 828, 997–1000
"Snooze" spot, 156
Snoring, 337–340
"Snorkeling" spot, 91
"Snow Covered" spot, 389, 390, 391
Snowboards, 1513–1516
Snowden, 1605
Snowden on Ice (television show), 1605
Snowmobiles, 1353
Snurfers, 1514
Snyder, Daniel, 1520
Soap. See Skin care products
Soap operas, 1377–1379
"Soap Slip" spot, 1479
"Soap" spot, 633
Soccer, 1156
"Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
Social responsibility
  American Apparel Inc., 72–73
  Body Shop, 191–192
  Round Table Pizza franchisees, 1430
  Working Assets Long Distance "Direct Marketing" campaign, 1835–1838

"Sock" ad, 1254, 1255
Soft drinks
  Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 350–353
  Diet Coke "You Are What You Drink" campaign, 353–357
  Diet Pepsi "This Is Diet?" campaign, 1303–1305
  Diet Rite "Go for Zero" campaign, 240–242
  Dr Pepper "This Is the Taste" campaign, 463–466
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280–1283
  Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1267–1270
  Mountain Dew "Do the Dew" campaign, 1270–1274
  "Pepsi, It's the Cola" campaign, 1289–1292
  Pepsi "Generation Next" campaign, 1277–1280
  Pepsi "Security Camera" campaign, 1295–1298
  Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1283–1286
  "Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1655–1658
  Snapple "Bottles Personified" campaign, 237–240
  Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (1998), 344–347
  Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 347–350
Software
  "Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
  Microsoft "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign, 1004–1007
Sogard, Harold, 680
"SOHO" market, 1845–1846, 1847
"Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 134, 143, 788–789, 797–801
"Somebody Up There Likes You" campaign, 821
Song Airlines
  AirTran, as competitor of, 45
  "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 407–410
  Ted, as competitor of, 1703
Sony Corporation, 1523–1529, 1531–1534
  Apple iPods, as competitor of, 137
  Hewlett-Packard, as competitor of, 725
  PlayStation 2, 1001, 1002–1003
Sony Pictures Digital, 560
Sony Pictures Entertainment, 1553
"The Sooner you believe it, the sooner we can end it" tagline, 363, 365
"Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads" campaign, 1690–1693
SOS (Share Our Strength), 364–365
Sosa, Omar, 603
Sosa, Sammy, 554, 950, 951
Souder, Kirk, 515
Soul Coughing, 460
"Soulmates" spot, 1041
Soups, 268–271
Southern Community Financial, 1342–1343
Southwest Airlines Company, 1535–1538
  AirTran Holdings, Inc., as competitor of, 44
  Delta Air Lines, as competitor of, 416
  JetBlue, as competitor of, 820
  Ted, as competitor of, 1702
  United Airlines, as competitor of, 1697
Sowle, Erinn, 1581
Spacek, Sissy, 597, 1747
Spade, Andy, 407, 409, 410
Spade, David, 971, 974
Spade, Kate, 407, 409
Spahn, Gerry, 1173
Spanish-language television
  Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 632
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 954, 955
  "Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1012
"Speak Freely on Monday Nights" campaign, 1549
Speakes, Larry, 1717, 1720
Speakman, Lisa, 349
Spears, Britney
  Herbal Essences campaign, 333, 334, 336
  "The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280, 1282
  National Football League Kickoff festival, 1285
  Pepsi campaign, 1284
Specht, Ilon, 662
"Special FX" spot, 273, 275, 276
"Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837, 835
Specialized Bicycle Components Inc., 1539–1542
"Speed Racer" spot, 618
"Speeding Tickets Bicycles" ad, 1251
Speight, Lester, 1417, 1418, 1419
Speiser, Mitchell, 398
"Spelling Trouble" spot, 28
Spence, Mitch and Tracey, 920
Spice Girls, 1277, 1278, 1279
"Spicy Crispy chicks" spot, 813
Spiegel, Brennan M. R., 1210
Spielberg, Steven, 1617
Spike DDB, 576
Spinella, Art, 563, 564
Spinks, Leon, 355
Spinner Networks, 64
Spinners, 1221
Spinozzi, Mike, 196
"Spirit of Freedom" campaign, 1461–1464
Spiritualized, 1785
Splenda, 241
Spokescandies, 937, 938, 939, 940
"Spongemonkeys" campaign, 1414, 1415
Sponsorships
  adidas sponsorship of the New York Yankees, 27
  adidas sponsorship of the X Games, 1153
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship of NASCAR, 118
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship of the National Hockey League, 120, 122
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship of women's professional sports, 108
  Aquafina sponsorship of the All-American Soccer Stars Victory Tour, 1274
  Aquafina sponsorship of the All-Star Benefit Concert, 1274
  Aquafina sports sponsorships, 1275
  Biore sponsorship of Lilith Fair, 1692
  Cheerios sponsorship of The Lone Ranger, 627
  Coors Brewing Company sponsorship of the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum, 1108
  DHL sponsorship of Major League Baseball, 422
  DHL sponsorship of the Olympics, 421–422
  Diet Coke sponsorship of the Grammy Awards, 354
  Diet Rite and Oprah Winfrey's Live Your Best Life Tour, 241
  Discover card sponsorship of NASCAR, 1050, 1052
  Dr. Martens sponsorship of alternative music bands, 460
  FedEx sports sponsorships, 545
  Glenfiddich sponsorship of the Triangular Cricket Tournament, 684

Guiness music festivals sponsorship, 429
Hallmark Hall of Fame series, 692
IBM sponsorship of the Olympics, 790
KFC sponsorship of NASCAR Chance 2 Motorsports team, 839, 841
Lincoln Financial Field, 894
MasterCard sponsorship of Major League Baseball, 951
M&M's sponsorship of the Olympics, 938
Monster sponsorship of the Olympics, 1040
Mountain Dew sponsorship of the X Games, 465, 1270, 1273
New Balance sponsorship of the International Modern Pentathlon, 1124
New Balance sponsorship of the Susan G. Komen Race for the Cure, 1124
NicoDerm sponsorship of a Marlboro 500 auto race car, 663
NicoDerm sponsorship of the American Cancer Society, 664
Norelco sponsorship of the National Hockey League, 1191
Olympics, 23
Philips Electronics, 1335
PowerAde sponsorship of NASCAR, 1288
Purina's sponsorship of the McCammon's traveling animal act, 1113
R. J. Reynolds sponsorship of the Winston Cup, 1094
Reebok sponsorship of the "Dream Team," 1133, 1142
Saab sponsorship of National Public Radio, 1447
Schick sponsorship of the National Basketball Association, 1315, 1317
Sears, 1488
single-sponsor advertising, 1601
Snickers Marathon bars sponsorship of FLW Outdoors fishing tournaments, 932
Southwest Airlines' National Hockey League sponsorship, 44
Southwest Airlines sponsorship of the National Football League, 1535–1538
Southwest Airlines sponsorship of the National Hockey League, 416, 1535, 1537
Sprint sponsorship of the National Football League, 1546–1549
Sprite sponsorship of the Soul Train Music Awards show, 346–347
Stolichnaya sponsorship of MiG-17s, 1708
Tabasco sponsorship of NASCAR, 982
Target "New Yorker Magazine Sponsorship" campaign, 1599–1602
Texaco sponsorship of the U.S. Olympic Team, 307
Toyota sponsorship of the "Live Your Best Life" tour, 1645
Viagra sponsorship of NASCAR, 1328
Visa, 84
Visa exclusive contracts, 1767
Visa sponsorship of Paul McCartney tour, 1766, 1767
Wachovia sports sponsorships, 1795
"Wrangler Anglers," 1751
Wrangler sponsorship of the Country Music Awards, 1749
See also Partnerships and cross-promotions
"Sport Life Fila" tagline, 554
Sporting goods
Rapala "Custom Lures" campaign, 1193–1196
Sims Sports "Be Free" campaign, 1513–1516
"Sporting Goods" spot, 1052
Sports
financial services company sponsorships, 369
Lincoln National sponsorship, 894
NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093–1097
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum "1998 Print Campaign," 1107–1109
"NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099–1102
"NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
Nike "Move" campaign, 1141–1144
Samuel Adams "It's What's Inside" campaign, 200–201
Sports Club Company, Inc., 1860
Sports drinks
Gatorade "Origins" campaign, 1286–1289
PowerAde "Keep Playing" campaign, 341–344
Sports-fantasy promotions, 47, 48, 49
SportsCenter (television show)
"PowerAde Break" segments, 342
Rolling Rock/ESPN partnership, 761–762
"This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517–520
Sportswear. See Clothing
Sprewell, Latrell, 166, 672
Springsteen, Bruce, 60
"Sprint Guy," 1553, 1554
Sprint Nextel Corporation, 1543–1556
AT&T, as competitor of, 151, 152
MCI, as competitor of, 973
T-Mobile, as competitor of, 1624
Verizon Wireless, as competitor of, 299
Working Assets Long Distance, as competitor of, 1837
Sprite
Dr Pepper, as competitor of, 464–465
"Obey Your Thirst" campaign (1998), 205, 344–347, 464–465
"Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 347–350
Sprite Remix, 1269, 1290
Spry, Scott, 1049
"Spuds McKenzie" campaign, 113–114
"Sputnik" spot, 593
"Squash" spot, 577–578
"Squirrel" spot, 233, 235
Squyntz!, 1826
SSR. See Super Sports Roadster (SSR)
SSRIs. See Antidepressants
St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, 1605
Stack, Peter, 1595, 1596–1597
Stacker, Pete, 125
Stackhouse, Jerry, 519, 552
"Stacy" spot, 491
Stadler, Craig, 567
Staffen, John, 1128, 1129
Staind event, 560
"Stairs" campaign, 1123–1125
Stallone, Sylvester, 1301, 1302
"Stampede" spot, 886, 888
"Stand Up for Flavor" campaign, 841
Stanley, Francis Edgar, 1560
Stanley Cup Finals, 576
Stanley Steemer International, Inc., 1557–1561
Stanton, John, 240, 1626
Staples, Inc., 1563–1569
Mail Boxes Etc., as competitor of, 921
Office Depot, as competitor of, 1214–1215
OfficeMax, as competitor of, 1222
"That Was Easy" campaign, 1564
Staples, J. Fred, 1426
Star Alliance, 415
Star (film), 178
"Star of the American Road" campaign, 306

Starbucks Corp., 1197–1200
Dunkin' Donuts, as competitor of, 48–49
General Foods International Coffees, as competitor of, 861
"Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1091
Starcom, 834–837
"Starfish" spot, 295
Starr, Ringo, 304, 527
"Start Something" campaign, 652–656
State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company, 1571–1574
Allstate, as competitor of, 52
GEICO, as competitor of, 614, 617, 620
"Statue" spot, 726
Status symbols, 1044, 1045
"Stay Curious" campaign, 1410
"Stay Smart" campaign, 780–783
Steelcase, Inc., 1575–1578
Steeples, Eddie, 1223, 1565
Steiger, Rod, 275
Steinberg, David, 854, 856
Steinberg, Scott, 1086, 1087
Steinbrenner, George, 1301
Steiner, Charley, 515, 517, 518
Steinhour, Jeff, 224, 1251
Steinke, David, 197
Stemberg, Thomas, 1563, 1564
Stendahl, Tom, 1254
Stenger, Griffin, 1, 3
Stereotypes, 349
Stern, Charlene, 1059
Stern, Greg, 1541
Stern, Howard, 125
Stern, Jackie, 1371
Stern, Peter, 1140
Sternberg, Chris, 908, 1347
Sternberg, Tom, 1089, 1091
Steve Miller Band, 1717, 1719, 1720
Steven (character), 403–406
Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, 1583–1585
Stever, Dave, 1120
Stewart, Martha, 847, 850–854, 1489
Stewart, Rod, 397
Steyer, Robert, 1036
Stibel, Gary, 1556
Stick film cameras, 1357–1360
"Stick-Up" spot, 1470
Stimson, Drake, 1390
Stires, Denise Benou, 190
Stites, Tom, 770
Stock car races. See NASCAR
Stokely-Van Camp, 343, 1287
"Stoli Central" website, 1706
Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
Stone, Charles, III, 128, 129
Stone, Joss, 598, 601
Stone, Oliver, 1133
Stone, Sharon, 66, 68–69
Stoner, Michael, 572
"Stop Newt" calling cards, 1836
"Stop the Waste?" campaign, 364
"Stories" campaign, 627–630
"Storytelling" campaign, 561–564
Stout, 426–428
Strange, Curtis, 1135
"Strange But True" campaign, 1395–1397
"Strange Fruit" spot, 1664
Stranger, Peter, 1595
Strauss, Levi, 886
"Strawberry" spot, 1119, 1121
Street, Picabo, 1044
Charles Schwab "Smarter Investor" campaign, 303
Nike "Move" campaign, 107, 1141, 1144
Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043, 1046
Strick, Jeremy, 183, 1081, 1082
Strickland, Denzil, 1803
"Striding Man" logo, 423, 424, 425, 426
Strong, Henry, 485
Stuart, Don, 663
Studies and reports
"Report on Sustainable Development" (Monsanto), 1038
Smoking and Health, 98
Sturm, Steve, 1647, 1649
Style Holidays, 1608–1609
StyleWar, 757
Subin, Jeremy "Troll," 1859–1860, 1861
Submarine (studio), 1732
"Subservient Chicken" campaign, 222–225, 1815
"Subtitles" campaign, 502
Suburban Auto Group, 1579–1582
Subway
"Jared Fogle" campaign, 455–458
Quiznos, as competitor of, 1414–1415
"Subway" spot, 824
Suede, 460
"Sugar-Free Chocolate" spot, 287
Sugarless gum
Orbit gum "No Matter What" campaign, 1830–1833
Trident "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 233–236
Suh, Chan, 998
Sui, Anna, 750
Suissa Miller
Acura advertising, 95
Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 203–206
Sullivan, Ed, 482, 987, 993
Sullivan, Michael, 1342
"Sum of All Parts Challenge" campaign, 158
Summer, Donna, 961, 963
"Summer Job" spot, 1291
"Summer of Play" party, 1147
Sun Microsystems
Dell, as competitor of, 405
IBM, as competitor of, 786–787, 793
"Sunbeam" spot, 388
"Sunday Afternoon" spot, 1781
Sunglasses, 1589
"Sunshine" spot, 1029–1030
Super Bowl advertising
Accenture, Ltd., 16
American Express "Do More" campaign, 83
American Express "Seinfeld" campaign, 89
Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 111
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 118
Anheuser-Busch "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, 120–123
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
Anheuser-Busch ""Spuds McKenzie" campaign, 113
Anheuser-Busch "Whassup?!" campaign, 129
AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 152
Cadbury Adams "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 235
Cadillac "Break Through" campaign, 635, 637
Cadillac "The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 639
CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 282
Charles Schwab "Smarter Investors" campaign, 304, 527
"Child's Play" spot controversy, 1074
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439, 440, 441, 442

Dirt Devil "Fred Astaire" campaign, 1437, 1439, 1440
"Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 1853
Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1679
Dove Self-Esteem Fund, 1682
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 503
Electronic Data Systems (EDS), 17
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 539
FedEx "Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 546
First Union "Financial World" campaign, 1791, 1792
Frito-Lay "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 586
"Frogs" campaign, 109
Garfield, Bob, favorites of, 539
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Heineken "It's All About the Beer" campaign, 707
"Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777, 778
IBM "Linux" campaign, 795, 796–797
Intel "Bunny People" campaign, 770
Isuzu "Joe Isuzu" spots, 804
"The Joy of Pepsi" campaign, 1280, 1282
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886, 888
Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk Baby!" campaign, 1302
Mail boxes Etc. "See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl" campaign, 919–922
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 951–952
M&M's "Hotel" spot, 940
Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1039, 1041–1042
Monster "When I Grow Up" campaign, 1040
Mountain Dew "Do the Dew" campaign, 1272
Nissan "Enjoy the Ride" campaign, 1173
Oldsmobile Alera "Start Something" campaign, 655
Oxygen Media "Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241
Pepsi "Generation Next" campaign, 1277, 1280
Pepsi "Security Camera" campaign, 1295, 1296, 1297
Philips Electronics "Getting Better" campaign, 1336
Pizza Hut "Big New Yorker Pizza" campaign, 1345, 1348
Prudential "Be Your Own Rock" campaign, 1405, 1408
Reebok "Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign, 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420
Staples "That Was Easy" campaign, 1566
Suburban Auto Group "Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1579
Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 981
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1767
"Super Fans" campaign, 1322–1325
Super Scoop, 1116
Super Sports Roadster (SSR), 632
"Superman" spot, 85, 89
SuperSonics. See Seattle SuperSonics
Supple, Jack, 703, 1194
Supplemental insurance, 35–40
"Support the ACLU" tagline, 76
Surge, 1272
Surgeon General, U.S., 98
"Surprise" spot, 107
"Surprisingly Real" tagline, 1687
Survivor, 1197, 1199
Survivor benefits, 659
Survivor (television show)
Snickers sponsorship of, 943
Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation, 1747
Susan G. Komen Race for the Cure, 1124
Susetka, Bill, 336
Sutton, Mark B., 1676
SUVs
General Motors "Hummer" campaign, 645–648
Isuzu Axiom "The Call" campaign, 803–806
"Jeep" campaign, 389–392
Jeep "There's Only One" campaign, 392–394
Mercedes, 989
Mercedes M-Class "Smooth Ride" campaign, 990–994
Porsche "Cayenne Launch" campaign, 1365–1368
Suzuki, 1339
Swan, John, 463, 841
Swangard, Paul, 24, 361
Swearingen, Amy, 1063
Sweatshop-free clothing, 71–74
SweatX, 72
Sweepstakes
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 590
"Start Something Tuesdays on ABC Sweepstakes," 655
Sweet, Joe, 176
Sweetwood, John, 779
Swette, Brian, 1278, 1279
Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, 1075, 1583–1586
Swing dancing, 603
Swiss Army Brands, Inc., 1587–1590
"Switchers" campaign, 1075
Swoopes, Sheryl, 1055
Swoosh logo, 28
"Symbols" spot, 986
Symko, Roxanne, 1718, 1719, 1720
"Synchronized Flying" spot, 413–414
Syndication, 1581–1582
Synia, Ann, 1739

T

T. Rowe Price Group, 162
T-MAC basketball shoe, 1124
T-Mobile International AG & Company KG, 1623–1626
Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 979–982, 980
Taco Bell Corp., 1591–1597
Tae Bo, 457
TAG Heuer, 1045, 1589
"Tag" spot, 1145
Tagamet, 1324
Taggert, Adam, 134
Taglines
"Acértate a tu mundo," 65
"Be yourself again," 1211
"The Best Stuff Is Here," 1658
"Book with Travelocity. Don't Forget Your Hat," 1653
"Censorship is UnAmerican," 1425–1426
"Cingular fits you best," 298
"Clear solutions in a complex world," 893
"Click, Instantly," 1359
"Colour like.no.other," 1526, 1528, 1529
"Creating a world of smarter investors," 301
Diet Coke, 355
"Do you smell smoke," 250
"Do you speak Fuji?", 589
"Dogs love trucks," 1173
"Dreams found faster," 283
"Eat fresh," 457
FedEx spots, 546
"Feel All Right," 240

Taglines, continued
"Feel comfortable in your own skin," 1859
"Freedom. Appreciate it. Cherish it. Protect it.", 33
"Get a piece of the rock," 1406
"Get closer to your world," 65
"Have it your way," 223, 226–228
"Holidays your mother wouldn't like.", 1607
"Hungry? Crunch this," 941, 942
"I think therefore iMac," 132
"Image is nothing. Thirst is everything. Obey your thirst.", 344
"In a World of Technology, People Make the Difference," 154
"Industrial Strength Investment Tools," 162
"Innovation Delivered," 15, 17
"iShares. This is the new school of investing," 163
"It pays to Discover," 1050, 1051
"It stirs the soul," 862
"It's not an ending, it's a beginning.", 763
"It's the Cheese," 253
"Jamais sans mon lait" tag line, 183
"Just Do It," 21
"Just for the taste of it," 353
"Just Screw It," 749, 752
"Less flower. More power," 1783
"Let the Dance Begin," 1325
"Let's Motor," 169
"Life is a journey. Enjoy the Ride," 1172
"Looks Fast," 1643
"Make Life Rewarding" tagline, 86
"Membership has its privileges," 80
"Men don't obsess over these things. Why do we?", 835
"Mmmm ... Toasty.", 1413, 1414, 1415
"The Most popular cruise line in the world," 296
"Never Follow," 158
"Never Stop Milk.", 183
"Never without my milk," 183
"The One and Only," 628
"One client at a time," 1048
"Only in New York," 28
"People first," 1465
"Pizza! Pizza!", 898, 905
"The Power of All of Us," 495, 498
"Ready to Move Up?", 303
"Red Lobster for the Seafood Lover in You," 395
"Screwy, Ain't It?", 1611, 1613
"The Sooner you believe it, the sooner we can end it," 363, 365
"Sport Life Fila," 554
"Support the ACLU," 76
"Surprisingly Real," 1687
"There Are Some Things Money Can't Buy. For Everything Else There's MasterCard," 85
"Thinking of You," 1178
"This Is What It's All About," 1099, 1101
"True," 129
"Trust Your Intuition," 1479
"Two great tastes that taste great together," 710, 712
"Very real power" tagline, 341, 343
"We Take the World's Greatest Pictures. Yours," 1163, 1164
"We'll leave the light on for you," 778, 782
"What Cats Want," 936
"What happens here, stays here.", 871, 873
"What's my thirst?", 347, 348
"When you cook, you're a family," 1689
"Where's your Mustache?", 183
"The World On Time," 548
"Your Link to Better Communication," 154
"You're in Good Hands with Allstate," 51, 52
Tahoe Regional Planning Agency (TRPA), 1354
"Tailgating" spot, 1146
"Take Charge of Education" campaign, 1603–1606
Take Five (song), 1178
"Take Pictures. Further" campaign, 485–488
Take-Two Interactive Software, Inc., 1497–1500
Talese, Gay, 989
"The Talk" spot, 65
"Talk value" concept, 129
"Talking Pizzas" campaign, 906–910
"Tall Tales" campaign, 480, 487, 488–491
Tam, Vivienne, 750
Tampax Pearl "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1385–1388
"Tango" spot, 1282
Tapie, Bernard, 20, 24
Target Corporation, 1599–1606, 1600
Crate & Barrel, as competitor of, 535
J.C. Penney, as competitor of, 809
Kmart, as competitor of, 852
Tarses, Jamie, 7
Tasone, Don, 1375
Taster's Choice
Folgers, as competitor of, 1374
General Foods International Coffees, as competitor of, 861
"Tasting Is Believing" campaign, 1398–1400
"Tattoo" spot, 488, 491
Taurus, Ford, 107, 559, 1033
Tauzin, Billy, 1411
Tax-preparation companies, 687–689
Taxi, 273–276
Taylor, Elizabeth, 1234, 1660
Taylor, Jeff, 1039, 1040
Taylor, Martin, 76
Taylor-Hines, Charlee, 1290
TBS Superstation
ESPN, as competitor of, 522
MTV, as competitor of, 1078–1079
"TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1662–1665
TBWA GGT Simons Palmer, 462
TBWA\Chiat\Day
ABC "TV Is Good" campaign, 5–8
"Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
"Absolut Print" campaign, 1733–1737
adidas "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign, 23–26
Apple Computer "Silhouette" campaign, 135–138
Apple Computer "Switchers" campaign, 139–141
Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 142
"Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 32, 33
Cunard Line "Can You Wait?" campaign, 371–374
Energizer "Bunny Chasers" campaign, 509–512
Game Show Network "You Know You Know" campaign, 591–594
"iMac" campaign, 131–135
Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177–1180
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811–814
Kmart "Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
Kmart "Martha Stewart Everyday" campaign, 850–854
Museum of Contemporary Art "Labels" campaign, 1081–1084
"Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550–1553
Nissan "Enjoy the Ride" campaign, 1171–1174
Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1174–1177

Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1594–1597
Weather Channel "Painted Faces" campaign, 1805–1808
Whiskas "Inner Beast" campaign, 934–937
TBWA\G1 Europe, 1167–1170
TBWA\London
French Connection "Scent to Bed" campaign, 579–582
Sony "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1523–1526
Tea, 1298–1302
Teachers, 764
Team One Advertising, 177, 1646–1649
"Team Prayer" spot, 714
Teamsters, 538–539
TeamX, 72
Teasdale, Mark, 685
Ted airlines, 409
"Ted Launch" campaign, 1701–1704
Teen antismoking campaign, 97–100
"Teen Date" spot, 152, 153
Teen People (magazine), 1186
Teen pregnancy prevention, 313
Teenage Ska (song), 1406
"Teenager" spot, 1059
Tel-Save, 151
Telecom, USA, 1294
Telecommunications
Ameritech "Privacy Manger" campaign, 153–156
AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 150–153
MCI "1-800-COLLECT" campaign, 971–974
MCI "Dennis Miller Ads" campaign, 974–978
Motorola "Intelligence Everywhere" campaign, 1065–1068
Motorola "Moto" campaign, 1068–1071
"Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550–1553
Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233–1236
Sprint "Dime Zone" campaign, 1543–1546
Sprint "Monday Nights Free and Clear" campaign, 1546–1550
"Sprint PCS" campaign, 1553–1556
T-Mobile "Get More" campaign, 1623–1626
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300
Working Assets Long Distance "Direct Marketing" campaign, 1835–1838
Telemarketing, 153–156
Television
Burger King/The Apprentice partnership, 221
on JetBlue Airways, 821
Television commercials
A & E "In Case You Missed It" campaign, 1–3
ABC "TV Is Good" campaign, 5–8
Absolut campaign, 1737
ACLU "Racial Profiling" campaign, 77
Advertising Council "Campaign for Freedom" campaign, 31–34
Advil "Liqui-Gels" campaign, 1839–1842
Aflac "Broken Leg" campaign, 38–41
"Aflac Duck" campaign, 35–38
"Altoids Gone Sour" campaign, 1825–1827
Americans for the Arts "Art. Ask for More" campaign, 103
Anheuser-Busch "Frogs" campaign, 109–112
Anheuser-Busch "Louie the Lizard" campaign, 116–120
Anheuser-Busch "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign, 126
"AOL Latino" campaign, 65
AOL "Welcome to the World Wide Wow" campaign, 66, 68–69
Apple Computer "Think Different" campaign, 144
Aquafina "Drink More Water" campaign, 1274, 1276
AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 161–164
BC Dairy Foundation "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, 182, 184
Binney & Smith "Make Play" campaign, 187–190
Boston Market "Eat Something" campaign, 203–206
Breathe Right Strips "Back in the Sack" campaign, 339
Bureau of Engraving and Printing "The New Color of Money" campaign, 218
Burger King "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign, 228
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 231–232
Cadillac "Break Through" campaign, 634–637
Cadillac "The Caddy That Zigs" campaign, 638–641
California Milk Advisory Board "Happy Cows" campaign, 253–256
Campbell Soup Company "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign, 268–271
Canadian Film Centre "2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival" campaign, 273–276
Canon "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, 279
CareerBuilder "Time to Move On" campaign, 282, 283
Cargill "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, 287
Carnival Corporation "Fun Ships" campaign, 295
Carter Products "Trojan Man" campaign, 311–315, 314
"Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding" campaign, 1611–1615
Charles Schwab "Smarter Investors" campaign, 303–304
Cheerios "Stories" campaign, 627–629
Chrysler "Engineered to Be Great Cars" campaign, 387–389
Chrysler Group "Employee Pricing Plan Plus" campaign, 383–386
Church's Chicken "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, 319
Cisco Systems "The Self-Defending Network" campaign, 321–324
Citibank "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign, 325–328
Citigroup "Live Richly" campaign, 329–332, 331, 332
Clairol "Totally Organic" campaign, 333–336
Coca-Cola "Real" campaign, 350–352
Columbia Sportswear "Mother Boyle" campaign, 359–362
"Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1489–1490
ConAgra Foods' Feeding, 363–366
Conseco "Protect/Create Wealth" campaign, 367–370
CVS "Life to the Fullest" campaign, 377
Dell "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign, 403–406

Television commercials, continued
Detroit Pistons "Goin' to Work. Every Night." campaign, 1257–1260
DHL "Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You." campaign, 421, 422
Dial "You're Not As Clean As You Think" campaign, 435–438
Diamond Foods "Emerald Nuts marketing campaign," 439–442
"Did Somebody Say McDonald's?" campaign, 961–963
Diet Rite "Go for Zero" campaign, 240–242
DirecTV "Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" campaign, 447–450
Dirt Devil "Darin'" campaign, 1433–1436
Discover Brokerage "Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
Discover "Make a Statement" campaign, 1055–1056
"Do You Yahoo!?" campaign, 1853
DoubleShot "Bring on the Day" campaign, 1197–1199
Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 461
Dr Pepper "This Is the Taste" campaign, 463–466
Dreyer's Grand Light "Unbelievable" campaign, 469
drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 473
Dryel "Habits" campaign, 1384–1385
Dunkin' Donuts "Loosen Up a Little" campaign, 47–50
Dyson "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 475–478
Ebay 2004 television campaign, 496–499
Electronic Data Systems "Cat Herders" campaign, 501–504
Energizer "Bunny Chasers" campaign, 509–512
ESPN "The Rick" campaign, 513–516
ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 517–520
ESPN "Without Sports" campaign, 520–523
E*TRADE "Monkey Trilogy" campaign, 525–528
E*TRADE "Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 528–531
FedEx "Be Absolutely Sure" campaign, 537–541
FedEx "The Way the World Works" campaign, 547–550
Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
Folgers "The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers In Your Cup" campaign, 1373–1376
FootJoy "Sign Boy" campaign, 565–568
Ford "Driving American Innovation" campaign, 555–558
Ford "Storytelling" campaign, 561–564
Foster's "How to Speak Australian" campaign, 569–573
Frito-Lay "The Loudest Taste on Earth" campaign, 583–586
Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 587–590
Gap "How Do You Wear It?" campaign, 600
Gap "Khakis" campaign, 601–604
Gap "This Is Easy" campaign, 605–608
Gateway "People Rule" campaign, 611
GEICO "Gecko" campaign, 613–616
GEICO "Good News" campaign, 616–618
GEICO "Mini-Campaigns," 618–621
General Electric "Imagination At Work" campaign, 623–626
General Motors "EV1 Introduction" campaign, 643
General Motors "Hummer" campaign, 647–648
Gill Foundation "TurnOut" campaign, 657–660
Gillette "Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized" campaign, 670–673
"Godaddy.com Super Bowl Commercial" campaign, 675–678
Häagen-Dazs "Made Like No Other" campaign, 1121
Hallmark Cards "Sneak a Peak" campaign, 691–695
Hardee's "Revolution" campaign, 697–699
Heineken "It's All About the Beer" campaign, 705–708
Hershey Reese's "There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, 712–715
Hewlett-Packard "Built By Engineers, Used By Ordinary People" campaign, 719
Hewlett-Packard "Expanding Possibilities" campaign, 720–723
Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign, 726
"Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation" campaign, 777–780
Holiday Inn Express "Stay Smart" campaign, 780–783
Hollywood Video "Welcome to Hollywood" campaign, 735
Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745–748
Honda "What About Now?" campaign, 91–95
H&R Block "Worried About Bill" campaign, 687–690
IBM "Can You See It?" campaign, 785–788
IBM "E-Business" campaign, 790
IBM "Linux" campaign, 794–797
IBM "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign, 797–801
IKEA "Unböring" campaign, 755–758
"iMac" campaign, 133, 134
Infiniti "Own One and You'll Understand" campaign, 1177
"ING Launch" campaign, 765
Intel "Time for a Pentium II Processor?" campaign, 771–775
Isuzu Axiom "The Call" campaign, 803–806
"It's Not T.V. It's HBO" campaign, 737–740
Jack in the Box "Jack's Back" campaign, 811–814
J.C. Penney "It's All Inside" campaign, 807–810
"Jeep" campaign, 389–392
Jenny Craig "Kirstie Alley" campaign, 815–818
Jesse Ventura "Retaliate in '98" campaign, 1739–1742
"JetBlue Launch" campaign, 821–822
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (1996), 823–826
John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 826–829
Juicy Fruit "Gotta Have Twisted Sweet" campaign, 1828–1830
Kellogg "Gotta Have My Pops" campaign, 831–834
Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837
KFC "Chicken Capital USA" campaign, 839–842
"Kleenex Anti-Viral" campaign, 843–846
Kmart "Joe Boxer Launch" campaign, 847–850
Kmart "Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall" campaign, 854–858

Kodak "Advantix" campaign, 479–482
Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 482–485
Kodak "Tall Tales" campaign, 491
Kraft "It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno" campaign, 864–866
La-Z-Boy "The New Look of Comfort" campaign, 877
LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 881
Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1743–1746
Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1747
Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 885–886
Levi's "They Go On" campaign, 889–892
"Levi's Type 1 Jeans" campaign, 886–889
Lexus "The Road Is Calling" campaign, 1646–1649
Lincoln National "Hello Future" campaign, 895–896
Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298–1303
Lipton Sizzle & Stir "Real Cooking" campaign, 1687–1690
"Listed on Nasdaq" campaign, 1090–1092
Little Caesar "Cloning" campaign, 897–900
Little Caesar "Grand Canyon" campaign, 900–903
Little Caesar "Safety Video" campaign, 903–906
Little Caesar "Talking Pizzas" campaign, 906–910
Logitech "What Will You Do With All That Freedom?" campaign, 911–914
Lubriderm "See You Later, Alligator," 1321–1322
Lycos "Go Get It" campaign, 915–918
MADD "Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way." campaign, 1061–1063
Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 927–930
Maryland State Lottery "Cash in Hand" campaign, 945–948
MasterCard "Priceless" campaign, 949–952
McDonald's "I'm Lovin' It" campaign, 964–967
McDonald's "We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 967–970
MCI "1-800-Collect" campaign, 971
Mercedes "Corporate Branding" campaign, 986
Mercedes "Passion" campaign, 987–990
Mercedes "Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994–996
Microsoft "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign, 1004–1007
Mike's Hard Lemonade "Hard Day" campaign, 1013–1016
"Miller High Life" campaign, 1452–1455
"Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1017–1021
Miller Lite "Low Carb" campaign, 1452–1453
Miller Lite "Miller Time" campaign, 1021–1025
"Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco" campaign, 1027–1030
Mitsubishi "Wake Up and Drive" campaign, 1031–1034
Monster "Today's the Day" campaign, 1039–1042
Morgan Stanley "At Your Side" campaign, 1047–1050
Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1267–1270
MoveOn.org "Real People" campaign, 1073–1076
MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1077–1080
NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093–1097
Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1331–1332
New Balance "Thunderstorm, Stairs" campaigns, 1123–1125
"NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099–1102
"NHL on Fox" campaign, 575–578
NicoDerm CQ "Power to Quit" campaign, 661–665
Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1134–1138
Nike "9,000 Shots" campaign, 1131–1134
Nike "Play" campaign, 1144–1147
Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1150
Nike "What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders?" campaign, 1150–1154
Nike "Women's" campaign, 1154–1157
Nikon "Mass Market Initiative" campaign, 1159–1162
Nissan "Do You Speak Micra?" campaign, 1169
Nissan "Enjoy the Ride" campaign, 1171–1174
Nissan "Quest Minivan Launch" campaign, 1176
Nordstrom "Make Room for Shoes" campaign, 1181–1184
Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1211
Office Depot "What You Need. What You Need to Know." campaign, 1215
OfficeMax "What's Your Thing?" campaign, 1221–1224
Old Navy "Destination" campaign, 1228–1231
Old Navy "'70s Retro TV" campaign, 1225–1228
"On the Wings of Goodyear" campaign, 679–682
Orbit gum "No Matter What" campaign, 1830–1833
Oxygen Media "Fresh Television for Women" campaign, 1241–1244
Paxil "Social Anxiety Disorder" campaign, 665–668
PBS "Be More" campaign, 1409–1412
Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1261–1265
Pepperidge Farms "Goldfish Crackers" campaign, 265–268
Pepsi "Generation Next" campaign, 1277–1280
Pepsi Vanilla "The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla" campaign, 1283–1286
Perdue "Now Arriving" campaign, 1310
Pert Plus "Sink Boy" campaign, 1391–1394
Philips Electronics "Getting Better" campaign, 1335–1336
Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1357–1360
Polaroid "See What Develops" campaign, 1360–1363
Polartec "Forward Fabric" campaign, 925
"The Power of Zyrtec" campaign, 1313–1314
PowerAde "Keep Playing" campaign, 341–344
Prudential "Be Your Own Rock" campaign, 1405–1408
Quiznos "Baby Bob" campaign, 1413–1415

Television commercials, continued
Red Lobster "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign, 397
"Relax, It's FedEx" campaign, 544–547
"Return of the Snapple Lady" campaign, 1655–1658
"Riven" campaign, 381–382
"Rolling Rock Ads" campaign, 867–870
Rolling Rock "Grab a Rock" campaign, 759–762
Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1443, 1444
"Saturn Relaunch" campaign, 1467
SBC Communications "Laurel Lane" campaign, 1473–1476
Scotts Miracle-Gro "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1485–1486
"Sears. Where Else?" campaign, 1491–1495
Seattle SuperSonics "In Your Home" campaign, 165–168
Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Sharpie "Write Out Loud" campaign, 1457–1459
Sims Sports "Be Free" campaign, 1515–1516
Six Flags "It's Playtime" campaign, 1517–1520
"Snickers Cruncher" campaign, 940–943
Snickers Marathon bar "The Energy You Crave" campaign, 933–934
Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 410
"Sony BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
Southwest Airlines "Must Be Football Season" campaign, 1536
Sprint "Dime Zone" campaign, 1545–1546
Sprite "Obey Your Thirst" campaign (2004), 347–350
Stanley Steemer "Living Brings It In. We Take It Out." campaign, 1557–1561
Staples "Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569
State Farm "True Stories" campaign, 1571–1573
Suburban Auto Group "Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1579–1582
"Swift Boat Veterans for Truth" campaign, 1583–1585
T-Mobile "Get More" campaign, 1623–1626
Tabasco "Mosquito" campaign, 979–982
Taco Bell "Think Outside the Bun" campaign, 1593
Taco Bell "Want Some?" campaign, 1594–1597
"Ted Launch" campaign, 1703–1704
Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 308
"Thank You, Paine Webber" campaign, 1677–1678
Tidy Cat "Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats" campaign, 1115–1117
"TiVo TV Your Way" campaign, 1619–1622
Toyota "A Car to Be Proud of Campaign," 1631–1634
Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651–1654
Trident "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign, 233–236
"Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1011–1012
Turner Broadcasting System "TBS Very Funny" campaign, 1662–1665
Turner Classic Movies "31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659–1662
TV Guide "On the Inside" campaign, 1669
United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695–1698
United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
UnitedHealth Group "It Just Makes Sense" campaign, 1727–1728
UPS "Moving at the Speed of Business" campaign, 1711–1712
UPS "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1713–1716
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721–1724
"Vegas Stories" campaign, 871–874
Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1351
"Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be" campaign, 1765–1768
Volkswagen "Drivers Wanted" campaign, 1776–1779
Volkswagen Jetta "All Grown Up. Sort Of." campaign, 1773–1776
Volkswagen Passat "Live Large" campaign, 1780–1783
Wachovia "Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, 1792–1795
Walgreen "Perfect" campaign, 1797–1799
Washington Mutual "Fear Not" campaign, 1801–1804
Wendy's "Good to Be Square" campaign, 1815
Whiskas "Inner Beast" campaign, 934–937
Wisk "Do It Once. Do It Right" campaign, 1685–1689
Xbox "IT's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001, 1003
Xerox "Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge" campaign, 1843–1847
"Yard Fitness Center" campaign, 1859–1862
Televisions
Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1505–1508
"Sony BRAVIA" campaign, 1526–1529
"Telluride" spot, 1767
Temerlin McClain, 298
Temple, Shirley, 1523, 1525
Tempo awards, 284
Temujin (computer game), 381
"10" spot, 1052
Tench, Diane Cook, 1435
Tendercrisp Chicken Sandwich, 222–225
Tennis
Anheuser-Busch sponsorship, 108
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721–1724
Virginia Slims tour, 56
"Tennis Player" spot, 303–304
"Tennis" spot, 1153
Terminology, 789
Terry, Luther, 98
"Terry Tate, Office Linebacker" campaign, 1417–1420
Tesh, John, 520
Teske, Naomi, 1355
"Test Drive" spot, 891
"Testimonial" spot, 1280, 1281, 1282
"Testman" campaign, 297–300, 1552
Texaco Star Theater (television show), 306
Texaco "A World of Energy" campaign, 305–309
Textiles, 923–926
Textron, 1353
T.G.I. Friday's, 292
Thacker, Robert, 1604
Thale, Karyn, 22
Thame, Gerard de, 394
"That Jazz" spot, 1178
"That Was Easy" campaign, 1214–1215, 1563–1566, 1564

"That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298–1303, 1299, 1300
"That's Entertainment" spot, 857
Theme parks, 1517–1520
"There Are Some Things Money Can't Buy. For Everything Else There's MasterCard" tagline, 85
"There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's" campaign, 712–715
"There's Only One" campaign, 392–394
Theriault, Roger, 207
Theron, Charlize, 446
"They Go On" campaign, 889–892
"Think. Don't Smoke" campaign, 98
"Think Different" campaign, 132, 138, 139, 141–145, 1006
"Think Outside the Bun" campaign, 1591–1594
"Thinking of You" tagline, 1178
"Thirsty" spot, 870
"31 Days of Oscar" campaign, 1659–1662
"33" on Rolling Rock labels, 760, 869
"This Bud's for You" campaign, 109, 117
"This Is Diet?" campaign, 1303–1305
"This Is Easy" campaign, 605–608
This Is Spinal Tap (film), 799
"This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 515, 517–520
"This is the Power of the Network. Now" campaign, 322
"This Is the Taste" campaign, 463–466
"This Is What It's All About" tagline, 1099, 1101
"This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign, 195–198
Thoman, G. Richard, 800, 1846, 1847
Thomas, Bill, 1511
Thomas, Dave, 220, 224, 969, 1809–1814
Thomas, Frank, 1133
Thomas, Joyce King, 952
Thomas Cook Tour Operations Ltd., 1607–1610
Thomason, Scott, 1580
Thomason Auto Group, 1580
Thompson, Geoffrey, 885
Thompson, Robert, 1663
Thompson, Sean, 747
Thorne-Smith, Courtney, 877
Thornton, Joe, 49
"Three Amigos" spot, 1485
"Three Reasons to Own a Good Pair of Boots" ad, 361
"Three-Second rule" spot, 1079
Three-stone-jewelry campaign, 444
Threespot Media, 1264
3T, 1279
Thrifty car rental, 213
"Thrill Ride" spot, 1433, 1434
"Throwing Eggs" spot, 1581
Throwing Muses, 460
"Thugs" spot, 757
"Thunderstorm" campaign, 1123–1125
Thurber, Rawson, 1418, 1419
Tic Tac, 1826
Ticketmaster, 263–264
Tide, 1685
Tidmarsh, David, 519
Tidy Cat "Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats" campaign, 1114–1117
Tie-ins
  Burger King movie tie-ins, 959
  Dr. Martens tie in to World Cup soccer tournament, 459, 461
  McDonald's/Walt Disney Corporation tie-ins, 959
  Spring/Men in Black II cross-promotion, 1553, 1555–1556
  Sprint/Monday Night Football tie-ins, 1546, 1547, 1548
  Sprint movie tie-ins, 1549
  Taco Bell/Xbox partnership, 1593
  Target tie-ins to the Donny & Marie show, 1605
Tiger Power, 628
"Tiger" spot, 999
Tiger Woods Foundation, 1137
Tilby, Wendy, 1696, 1697
Tiles, Neal, 450, 576, 577
Tilford, Todd, 461
Tillamook County Creamery Association, 255
"Tim and Chuck," 1245–1248
Timberlake, Justin, 964, 966
Timberland, 360–361
"Time for a Pentium II Processor?" campaign, 771–775
"Time to Move On" campaign, 281–284
Time Warner, Inc., 64, 66, 67, 1611–1617
Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615–1617
"Timeless Ride" spot, 996
TimeOut New York, 1754
Timex Expedition watch, 1589
Timmons, Steve, 1860
"Timmy" radio spot, 905
Timon, Clay, 94
Timony, Mary, 1371
"Tiny House" spot, 620–621
Tip Corporation, 1271
"Tire Swing" spot, 332, 1096
Tires, 679–682
Titanic (film), 294
Titanium Lions. See Lion Awards
Title IX, 1154, 1155
Tito, James, 869
Tito family, 759
TiVo Inc., 1619–1622
"TiVo TV Your Way" campaign, 1619–1622
TLP-Dallas, 416
TNT, 1612
"Toasted Bunny" spot, 770
Tobacco Industry Research Council, 98
Tobacco industry settlement agreement, 97, 98, 249, 1028
Tobak, Steve, 769
Tobin, Clare, 1609
Today Show
  Dreyer's Grand Light taste test, 470
  new twenty dollar bill, 218
"Today" spot, 1041
Togo's Eateries, 48
Toilet training, 1380–1382
Toledo, Elizabeth, 1155
Tom, Glenn, 1057
"Tom" spot, 33, 546
Tomb Raider (computer game), 381
Tombstone pizza, 864
Tomlin, Lily, 1058
Tommy Hilfiger U.S.A., Inc., 603, 1627–1630
Tomorrow Never Dies (film), 986, 989, 1770
Toms, David, 565
The Tonight Show
  Kmart "Vaughn" spot, 849
  Stallone, Sylvester, appearance by, 1302
Tooker, Steve, 436
Tools, 1590
Tooth Fairy (film), 61
"The Tooth" spot, 1507
Topolewski, Gary, 391, 908, 909
Topps Company, 1829
Tor, Tom, 33
Tormé, Mel, 1271, 1272
Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival, 273–276
Torres, Liz, 1055
Torvalds, Linus, 795
"Totally Organic" campaign, 333–336, 1393

Toth, Michael, 1628
Toth Design and Advertising, 1627–1630
"Tour Guide" spot, 1653
"Tour" spot, 828
Tours
  hybrid car, 1511
  "Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1590
  United Parcel Service seminars, 1710
"Tow Truck" campaign, 1056–1059
Tower Records, 263
Townley, Jay, 1251
Townshend, Pete, 426, 459–460
"Toy Boat" spot, 496, 498
"Toy Mania" spot, 856
A Toy Story (movie), 143
Toyoda, Eiji, 1646
Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc., 1631–1650
  Chevrolet, as competitor of, 632
  Ford, as competitor of, 557, 559
  General Motors, as competitor of, 643
  Generation Y marketing, 93
  Honda, as competitor of, 742–743
  MINI Cooper, as competitor of, 174
  Mitsubishi, as competitor of, 1033
  Nissan, as competitor of, 1168, 1172, 1179
  Oldsmobile, as competitor of, 654
  Saturn, as competitor of, 1471
Toys
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
  LeapFrog "Learn Something New Every Day!" campaign, 879–882
"Toys" spot, 1172
"Tracer FX Ads" campaign, 1314–1317
Trademark disputes, 1588
Trading cards, 1829
Train service, 1103–1106
"Training Camp" spot, 1419
Trammps, 1719
"Translation" spot, 719
Transportation. See Travel and tourism
"Trash Day" spot, 560
"Trash Talk" spot, 304
Travel and tourism
  Amtrak "Life on Acela" campaign, 1103–1106
  Carnival Corporation "Fun Ships" campaign, 293–296
  Clairol Employee Commuter Program, 335
  Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
  Cunard Line "Can You Wait?" campaign, 371–374
  Delta Air Lines "On Top of the World" campaign, 411–414
  Delta Air Lines "The Passenger's Airline" campaign, 414–417
  Marriott International "Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest" campaign, 927–930
  North Carolina "Heritage" campaign, 1201–1204
  Northwest Airlines "E-Ticket" campaign, 1205–1208
  priceline.com "Troubadour" campaign, 1369–1372
  Royal Caribbean "Get Out There" campaign, 1441–1444
  Six Flags "It's Playtime" campaign, 1517–1520
  Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 408–410
  Southwest Airlines "Must Be Football Season" campaign, 1535–1538
  "Ted Launch" campaign, 1701–1704
  Travelocity "Roaming Gnome" campaign, 1651–1654
  United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1695–1698
  United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1698–1701
  "Vegas Stories" campaign, 871–874
  Virgin Atlantic Airways "Go, Jet Set, Go!" campaign, 1757–1760
  Virginia Tourism Corporation "Meet Virginia" campaign, 1761–1764
Travel South Marketplace, 1203
Travelers Group, 329
Travelocity, 1370–1371, 1651–1654
Treasure hunt, 211–214
Tree, David, 855, 857
Trees, Wendy, 1321
Trek
  Schwinn, as competitor of, 1250–1251, 1254
  Specialized, as competitor of, 1540
  Volkswagen, partnership with, 1779
Trenet, Charles, 183
Trevino, Lee, 566
Triangular Cricket Tournament, 684
Triarc Companies, Inc., 1655–1658
Tribeca Film Festival, 59, 62
Trident, 233–235, 1832
"Trim-A-Home" spot, 856
Trimpa, Ted, 658
Triple Crown races, 84
"Triple Squeeze" spot, 823–824
TRM Copy Centers, 921
Troggs, 962
"Trojan Man" campaign, 311–315
"Troubadour" campaign, 1369–1372
Trout, Jack, 744, 1783
Troyer, Verne, 974, 1235, 1236
TRPA. See Tahoe Regional Planning Agency (TRPA)
Truckee River Whitewater Park, 873
Trucks
  Chevrolet "An American Revolution" campaign, 631–634
  Ford, 564
"Trucks" spot, 1283, 1285
True (film), 128, 129
"True Stories" campaign, 1571–1573
"True" tagline, 129
Trump, Donald, 221, 1345, 1348
Trump, Melania, 40
Trump (mascot), 1041
"Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1579–1582
"Trust the Midas Touch" campaign, 1009–1012
"Trust Your Intuition" tagline, 1479
"Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1329–1332
"Truth" campaign, 97–100, 249–250, 1029
"Truth vs. Advertising" ad, 247
Trzaskoma, Greg, 1259
"The Ts" spot, 1689
"Tuba" spot, 1468, 1471
Tucker, Chris, 1446
Tucker, Laurie A., 544
Tucker Tapia, 533, 536
Tudor line, Rolex, 1043–1047
Tull, Jodi, 1613
Tully, Patrick, 685
"Tummies" campaign, 1209–1212
Tums, 1324
"Turbulence" spot, 637
Turlington, Christie, 262
Turnbull, Craig, 1259
Turner, Cathy, 1384
Turner, Gary, 1251
Turner, Graham, 1734
Turner, Kathleen, 968
Turner, Ted, 1323, 1663
Turner, Tina, 1278, 1296
Turner Broadcasting System, Inc., 1323, 1611–1613, 1659–1665
Turner Classic Movies, 1612
Turner Field, 487

"TurnOut" campaign, 657–660
Turow, Joseph, 6
TV Guide, Inc., 1667–1670
  ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign recognition, 517
  Hewlett-Packard "You + HP" campaign recognition, 726
"TV Is Good" campaign, 5–8
"TV" spot, 620
TWC. See The Weather Channel Companies
Twenty dollar bill, 216
"Twice as Nice for Your School" promotion, 1605
Twiggy, 174, 1682
Twister (film), 509, 510, 511
Twitchell, James, 891
"Two great tastes that taste great together" tagline, 710, 712
"Two Guys" campaign, 451–453, 593
"Two Sprites" spot, 349
"2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival" campaign, 273–276, 274
2GO card, Discover, 1050, 1051, 1052
Twomley, Dale, 1819
2wentys, 1609
Tylenol, 1841
"Type 1 jeans" campaign, 886–889
Tyson, John, 1671, 1674
Tyson, Mike, 355, 518, 519
Tyson Foods, Inc., 1309, 1671–1674, 1672

U

U2 (rock band), 135–138
"U Slice the Pie" campaign, 230
UBS Financial Services Inc., 1675–1678
"Uh-huh" campaign, 1552
Ulene, Art, 1331
Ullman, Tracey, 1242
"Un Testimonials" campaign. See "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign
"Unbelievable" campaign (Dreyer's Grand Light), 467–470
"Unbelievable" campaign (JetBlue), 818–822
"Unclaimed Luggage" spot, 873
"Uncommon Wisdom" campaign, 1792–1795, 1802–1803
"Under the Cap 'Obey Your Thirst' Promotion," 346
Under the Influence (television show), 1660
Underhill, Rod, 1669
"Understanding Comes with Time" campaign, 1616
Underwear, 847–850
Underwood, Blair, 60, 61
"Undo" campaign, 250
"Unfulfilled Idealists" market, 1261, 1263, 1264
Unilever PLC, 1679–1686
Unilever United States, 1687–1693
  Bally Total Fitness, partnership with, 1860
  Procter & Gamble, as competitor of, 1396, 1402
Unions, 72–73
United Airlines Corp., 1695–1704
  Delta Air Lines, as competitor of, 412
  Northwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1206–1207
  Southwest Airlines, as competitor of, 1537
United Distillers and Vintners of North America, 1705–1708
United Kingdom
  "Cleaner Close" campaign, 1377–1379
  Club 18-30 "Perspectives" campaign, 1607–1609
  Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745–748
  Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741–744
  "Jeep" campaign, 391
  McDonald's "Changes" campaign, 966
  "Monsanto Image" campaign, 1035, 1037
  Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233–1236
  United Airlines "It's Time to Fly" campaign, 1697
  Whiskas spot for cats, 934
United Media, 998
United Parcel Service, Inc., 1709–1716, 1713
  DHL, as competitor of, 420–421
  FedEx, as competitor of, 538–539, 545, 548–549
  Kinko's, as competitor of, 542
  United States Postal Service, as competitor of, 1719
United States Postal Service, 1717–1720
  FedEx, as competitor of, 538, 545, 549
  United Parcel Service, as competitor of, 1710–1711, 1714
United States Tennis Association, 1721–1724
United Telecommunications, 1544
United Way, 1100
UnitedHealth group, Inc., 1725–1728
Universal Parks and Resorts, 1518–1519
University of Florida, 1286
Univision Radio, 65
Uniworld, 562
Unlaced (music CD), 460
"Unlike Any Other" campaign, 994–996
Unlimited Pizza, Little Caesar's, 897–899
Unsung Heroes Awards, 764
Untouchables, 461
"Unwind" spot, 1103
Urlacher, Brian, 1402
Uronis, Will, 646
U.S. Army, 1263
U.S. Department of Agriculture, 366
U.S. Department of Defense, 924
U.S. Department of Justice, 1005
U.S. Government
  Bureau of Engraving and Printing "The New Color of Money" campaign, 215–218
  Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities "Move Our Money" campaign, 229–232
U.S. House of Representatives, 1354
U.S. Marine Corps, 1263–1264
U.S. News & World Report, 1616
U.S. Soccer, 1275
U.S. Surgeon General, 98
"US Open Excitement" campaign, 1721–1724
Us Weekly, 1668–1669
USA Gymnastics, 1674
USA Network, 522
USA Today, 1134
USA Weekend, 1668
USPS. See United States Postal Service
Utton, Nicholas, 531
Uva, Joe, 1613
Uzzie, Don, 502, 503

V

V & S Vin & Sprit AB, 1729–1737
V-Wear, 56
Vacuum cleaners
  Dirt Devil "Darin'" campaign, 1433–1436
  Dyson "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign, 475–478
Vadervalk, Melanie, 299
Valdes Zacky and Associates Inc., 243
Vale, Michael, 48
Valentine McCormick, 1207–1208
Valkonen, Stefani, 1394

ValuJet, 43–44
Van Andel, Doug, 1642
Van Auken, Brad, 691, 694
Van der Merwe, Robert P., 844
Van Dyke, Dick, 482
Van Dyke, Paul, 1069, 1071
Van Eden, Steven, 343
Van Halen, 1172
Van Munching, Philip, 868
Van Pelt, Scott, 519
Van Wees, David, 760
Vanbiesbrouck, John, 576
Vandersnick, Roger, 1096
Vanessa, 1831, 1832, 1833
Vanilla Coke, 1284–1285
"Vanilla" spot, 1119, 1121
Vans, 1152
Vanzura, Liz, 645, 646
Vartan, Michael, 600
Vaseline Intensive Care, 1320
Vasquez, Gaddi, 1263
Vassiliadis, Billy, 874
Vaughan, Brian, 890
"Vaughn" spot, 847, 849
"Vegas Stories" campaign, 871–874
Vegetarian fare, 1811, 1817–1820
Veggie burgers, 1817–1820
Velasquez, Mario, 1425
Venables, Bell & Partners
  Barclays Global Investors "New School" campaign, 162–163
  Napster "It's Coming Back" campaign, 1085–1088
Venables, Paul, 1086, 1087
Vengaboys, 1519
Ventura, Tyrel, 1742
Ventura for Governor, 1739–1742
Venturini, Tisha, 1156
Venus, 1478–1479
Verástegui, Eduardo, 1261, 1262
Verbinki, Gore, 1847
Verdi, Ellis, 76
Vergrugge, Moe, 1083
Verizon
  "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300, 298
  Nextel, as competitor of, 1551–1552
  Sprint PCS, as competitor of, 1555
  T-Mobile, as competitor of, 1624–1625
"Vern" spot, 1819
Versace, Gianni, 1736
Vertigo (song), 137, 138
"A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471–474
"Very real power" tagline, 341
Vescovo, Matt, 225, 735, 1077, 1078–1080
"Vespa Reintroduction" campaign, 1337–1340
Veterinary Medicine Advisory Committee (VMAC), 1036
VF Corporation, 909, 1743–1751
Viacom, 238
"Viagra Launch" campaign, 1325–1328
Viant Corp., 502
Vick, Edward H., 153
Vick, Michael, 341
Victorinox, 1587, 1588, 1590
Victory Motorcycles "The New American Motorcycle" campaign, 1349–1352, 1350
Video games
  ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1497–1500
  Sony PlayStation 2 "Fun, Anyone?" campaign, 1523–1526
  Xbox "It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001–1004
Video stores, 733–736
Videotape, 589
"Videotape" spot, 1457, 1459
Viesturs, Ed, 1043
Vietnam Veterans for a Just Peace, 1584
Vietnam War, 1075, 1583–1585
Viewpoint Studios, 1339
Vigoro, 1484–1485
Village Voice LLC, 1753–1756
Villante, Christina, 1322
"Vincent Murphy" campaign, 428
Vino Classic, 1339
Vioxx, 667
Viral Awards
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 225
  MTV "Watch and Learn" campaign, 1080
Viral marketing
  Budget Rent a Car "Up Your Budget" campaign, 211–214
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 222–225
  MINI Cooper "MINI Robots" campaign, 172–175
  Suburban Auto Group "Trunk Monkey" campaign, 1582
Virgin Atlantic Airways Limited, 1757–1760
Virgin Mobile Telecoms, 1235
Virgin Records, 380
"Virginia Is for Lovers" campaign, 1761, 1762
Virginia Military Institute (VMI), 1191–1192
Virginia Slims cigarettes, 55–58
Virginia Tourism Corporation, 1202, 1761–1764
Virginia Victims of Crime Act, 659
"Virtual Reality" spot, 81–82, 82
"Virus" spot, 790, 791
Visa U.S.A., Inc., 1765–1772
  American Express, as competitor of, 84, 88, 89
  American Express "Competitive" campaign, 79–82
  Discover, as competitor of, 1051–1052, 1054–1055
  MasterCard, as competitor of, 950–951
  Yahoo!, partnership with, 1853
"Visit Planet Earth" campaign, 1653
"The Visit" spot, 811, 814
Vitale, Dick, 865
Vitamins, 1329–1332
Vitech America, 1826
Vitolo, Danny, 663
VIVUS, Inc., 1326
VMAC. See Veterinary Medicine Advisory Committee (VMAC)
VMI. See Virginia Military Institute (VMI)
Vodafone, 1234–1235
Vodka
  "Absolut Director" campaign, 1729–1733
  "Absolut Print" campaign, 1733–1737
  Johnnie Walker "Keep Walking" campaign, 423–426
  Stolichnaya "Russian Art" campaign, 1705–1708
Vogel, François, 723, 726
Vogel, Mark, 1143
Voice-overs. See Celebrity voice-overs
"Voicebox Smoker" spot, 246
VoiceStream, 1623–1624
Voit, Fred, 156, 976, 978
Volan, Dawn, 1768
Volcov, Serguei, 1707
Volkswagen of America, Inc., 1773–1787
  Audi, as competitor of, 158–159
  Golf, 1777
  Honda, as competitor of, 94
  MINI Cooper, as competitor of, 170–171, 173–174
  New Beetle, 1020
  Nissan, as competitor of, 1169
  Saturn, as competitor of, 1471

Volkwein, Ed, 1333, 1334, 1336
Volunteerism
National and Community Service Trust Act, 1426
Peace Corps "Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go?" campaign, 1261–1265
Von Bismarck, Otto, 109
Vonckx, Ginny, 855, 857
Vonk, Nancy, 1607, 1609
Vonnegut, Kurt, 1055
VOOM, 448
Voting, 1120, 1425–1428

W

W. B. Doner & Company
Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1501–1503
Six Flags "It's Playtime" campaign, 1517–1520
"W-2—Tax Day 5" spot, 689
Waalkes, Jeff, 1019
Wachovia Corporation, 1789–1795, 1802–1803
Wacker, Watts, 1132
Wagner, Lindsay, 1502
Waitkus, Diane, 1430, 1431
"Waitresses" spot, 247
Waitt, Ted, 609–612
"Wake Up and Drive" campaign, 1031–1034
"Wake-Up Call" spot, 572
Wal-Mart
Amazon.com, as competitor of, 61
Discover, partnership with, 1053
J.C. Penney, as competitor of, 809
Kmart, as competitor of, 852, 855–856
Sears, as competitor of, 1493–1494
Target, as competitor of, 1601, 1604
Walchli, Suzanne, 440
Waldenbooks, 197
Walgreen, Charles R., Sr., 1797
Walgreen Company, 1797–1800
CVS, as competitor of, 376–377
drugstore.com, as competitor of, 472–473
Walgreens Health Corner (television show), 1798
Walker, Alice, 1155
Walker, Herschel, 338
Walker, Jay, 1369
Walker, Jim, 1803
Walker, Joan, 154, 155
Walkie-talkie service, 1551
Wall, Chris, 786, 794, 1068
Wallace, Rusty, 149
Wallace, William, 109
Wallboards
Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834
"Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 836
Waller, Peter, 1594, 1597
Wallflowers, 560
Walsh, John, 517
Walsh, John C., 1732
Walt Disney Company
ESPN, acquisition of, 514
McDonald's tie-ins, 959
Six Flags, as competitor of, 1518
Walter, Tiffany, 56
Walter P. Chrysler Museum, 393
Walters, Brian, 177
Walters, John P., 1218
Walton, Jim, 515
"Wanna Get Away?" campaign, 1702–1703
"Wannabe" spot, 431, 433
"Want Some?" campaign, 1592, 1594, 1594–1597
Warbreeds (computer game), 382
Ward, Edward, 614, 615, 618
Warhol, Andy, 1730, 1733–1737
Warner, William R., 1320
Warner Brothers cartoons, 1612, 1613
Warner-Lambert. See Pfizer Inc.
"Warning" spot, 1061
Warschauer, Bonnie, 840
Wasch, Ken, 1005
Washing machines, 476
Washington, Denzel, 275
Washington Monument, 1604
Washington Mutual, Inc., 1801–1804
Washington Redskins, 545
Wasiak, Greg, 1–2
Wasserman, Gail, 1054
Watches
Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043–1046
"Swiss Army Equipped" campaign, 1589
Waterfield, Phebe, 324
Waters, Maxine, 1155
Waters, Robyn, 606
Watersmeet High school Nimrods, 522, 523
Watkins, James, 225
Watson, Thomas, 787
Wattles, Mark J., 733, 734, 735
"The Way the World Works" campaign, 547–550
WCRS Group, 1234
WE, 1243
"We Got the Crunch" campaign, 317
"We Gotta Get Out of This Place" spot, 1369, 1372
"We Love to See You Smile" campaign, 967–970
"We Love TV" campaign, 5
"We Take the World's Greatest Pictures. Yours" tagline, 1163, 1164
We Will Rock You (song), 599
"Wear a Moustache" campaign, 181–182
"The Weasel" spot, 707
The Weather Channel Companies, 68, 1805–1808
Weaver, Jill, 52
Weaver, Sigourney, 107, 823
"Web Jam" spot, 790
Web portals, 1849–1853, 1854–1857
Webb, David F., 1685
Webber, Chris, 1267, 1269
Webber, Wallace, 1675
Weber, Bruce, 9, 10
Weber, Ron, 1194
Webisodes, 812
Weblogs. See Blogs
Wedding anniversaries, 445
Wedding gift registry, 534
"Wedding Rock" spot, 761
"Wedding" spot (Diet Pepsi), 1305
"Wedding" spot (MetLife), 1000
"Wedding" spot (Nextel), 1552
Weedfald, Peter, 1070
Weight loss
Fogle, Jared, 455–458
Jenny Craig "Kirstie Alley" campaign, 815–818
Kellogg "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837
Weight Watchers, 816–817, 1040
Weigman, Tom, 1548
Weinstein, Alice, 159
Weinstein, Jerry, 1464
Weinstein, Mike, 1655, 1657, 1658
Weisbaum, Herb, 1385
Weiss, Albert, 985, 989–990
Weist, David, 1774
Weitzen, Jeffrey, 609, 610, 611
Wek, Alek, 597
Welch, John F. "Jack," 623–624
"Welcome Aboard" spot, 543
"Welcome to the State of Independence" spots, 1447
"Welcome to the World Wide Wow" campaign, 66–69

"We'll leave the light on for you" tagline, 778, 782
Wellington, Bruce, 1406
Wells, Mary, 1011
Wells Rich Greene, 333–336, 1011
Wellstone, Paul, 1739
Wendel, Hal, 1354
Wendy the Snapple Lady, 237, 259
Wendy's International, Inc., 1809–1816, 1813
  Burger King, as competitor of, 220–221, 224
  McDonald's, as competitor of, 962, 965, 969
Wenger, 1588–1589
Werme, Judith, 334, 335
Werner, Helmut, 985
Westbrook, Bill, 779, 1405, 1407
Westerman, Mark, 553
Western wear, 1749–1751
Westheimer, Dr. Ruth, 335, 1393
"Whassup?!" campaign, 126–130, 127
"What a Ride" campaign, 1252–1256, 1253, 1254
"What About Now?" campaign, 91–95, 92, 93
"What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, 1713–1716
"What Cats Want" tagline, 936
"What Do We Have Here?" campaign, 1023–1024
"What happens here, stays here." tagline, 871, 873
"What If?" campaign, 24
"What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders?" campaign, 1150–1154
"What Matters Most" campaign, 779
"What You Need. What You Need to Know." campaign, 1213–1216
"What's in Your Wallet?" campaign, 327
"What's my thirst?" tagline, 347, 348
"What's Next?" campaign, 1531–1534
"What's Your Priority?" campaign, 1718
"What's Your Story?" contest, 239
"What's Your Thing?" campaign, 1221–1224
"Wheat-surfer" spot, 1461, 1463, 1464
"When I Grow Up" campaign, 1039, 1040
When the Day Breaks (short film), 1696
"When You Are as Old as the Hills" ad, 361
"When you cook, you're a family" tagline, 1689
"When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign, 225–228
"When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401–1403
"Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign, 1004–1007
"Where's the Beef?" campaign, 1810
"Where's Your Mustache?" campaign, 183
Whiskas "Inner Beast" campaign, 934–937
Whitacer, Jack, 1187
White, Reggie, 1149
White, Rob, 1024
White, Steve, 421
White & Baldacci, 1761–1763
White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, 1217–1219
Whittaker, Forrest, 175
"Whizzy Website" spot, 790, 791
Wholesome & Hearty Foods Company, 1817–1820
Whopper, 226
"Why" campaign, 331
"Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before?" campaign, 1468–1472, 1470
"Why Wouldn't You?" campaign, 528–531
Wiborg, Jack, 328
Wide Leg jeans, 883–886
Wieden, Dan, 1145, 1149
Wieden+Kennedy
  Diet Coke campaign, 356
  ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1497–1500
  ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 515, 517–520
  ESPN "Without Sports" campaign, 520–523
  Foster's account, 573
  Microsoft "Where Do You Want to Go Today?" campaign, 1005–1007
  Miller Brewing Company campaigns, 110–111, 117–118
  "Miller High Life" campaign, 1452–1455
  "Miller High Life Man" campaign, 1017–1021
  Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1134–1138
  Nike "Meet the LeBrons" campaign, 1138–1141
  Nike "Move" campaign, 1141–1144
  Nike "9,000 Shots" campaign, 1131–1134
  Nike "Play" campaign, 1145–1147
  Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1147–1150
  Nike "Women's" campaign, 1154–1157
  OK soda campaign, 345
  PowerAde "Very Real Power" campaign, 341, 343
  Round Table Pizza campaign, 1429, 1432
  Sharp "More to See" campaign, 1506–1508
Wieden+Kennedy London
  Honda "Grrr" campaign, 745–748
  Honda "The Power of Dreams" campaign, 741–744
Wiese, Nancy, 1844, 1846
Wilcoxon, Cleve, 1094
Wild, Scott, 28
Wild Cherry, 769, 771
The Wild One (film), 1350
"Wild things are happening" campaign, 155
Wilderness survival, 1238
Wilinsky, Dan, 1554
Wilke, Mike, 829
Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company, 1821–1834
William Grant & Sons Ltd., 683–686
William Morris Agency, 216–217
Williams, Brad, 889
Williams, Christopher, 795, 796, 1003
Williams, Clay, 511, 1595, 1596
Williams, Hank, 1295, 1298
Williams, Jeff, 1454
Williams, Michael, 140
Williams, Scott, 1221
Williams, Serena, 24, 1815
Williams, Todd, 22
Williams, Venus, 1146, 1815
Williamson, Jeff, 1486
Williamson, Randy, 191
Willis, Bruce
  Armageddon (film), 633, 1590
  The Fifth Element, 1446
  Lipton Brisk "That's Brisk, Baby!" campaign, 1298, 1301
Wilsdorf, Hans, 1043
Wilson, Hank, 607
Wilson, John, 1410
Wilson, Jon, 836
Wilson, Kemmons, 777–778
Wilson, Nancy, 1178
Wilson, Pete, 244
Wilson, Tom, 1259, 1260
WIN Award. See Women's Image Network (WIN) Ad Award

"Win Shoes for Life" contest, 1182
Window Writers, 187–188
Windows, 796
Windy Awards, 1492
Winfrey, Oprah, 1242
  "Live Your Best Life" tour, 241, 1645
  Oxygen Media, 1241, 1243
Wingate Inn, 929
"Wings" spot, 387, 388
"Wingtips" spot, 397
Winn, Anne, 929
Winner, Michael, 1235
Winston, Stan, 224
Winston Cup, 1094
Winter, Bob, 126
Winterton, Bruce, 1018, 1020
Wireless services
  "Nextel. Done." campaign, 1550–1553
  Orange "Goldspot" campaign, 1233–1236
  "Sprint PCS" campaign, 1553–1556
  T-Mobile "Get More" campaign, 1623–1626
  Verizon Wireless "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, 297–300
  See also Mobile phones
Wisconsin dairy industry, 255
Wisely, Robert, 813
Wish Book catalog, 1489
Wisk "Do It Once. Do It Right." campaign, 1683–1686
"Without Sports" campaign, 520–523
"Witness Protection Program" spot, 572
Wladawsky-Berger, Irving, 789, 791
Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company, 234
WNBA. See Women's National Basketball Association (WNBA)
"Wobbler" spot, 1479
Wolf, Darin, 869, 870
Wolf Group
  Dirt Devil "Darin'" campaign, 1433–1436
  Meldrum & Fewsmith, acquisition of, 1439
  Scotts Miracle-Gro "Neighbor to Neighbor" campaign, 1481–1486
Wolfe, Sidney, 1211
Wolfe, Thomas, 1201
Wolzien, Tom, 69, 734
"Woman on Pillow" ad, 323
"Woman" spot, 996
Woman Thing Music, 57–58
Women
  Anheuser-Busch sponsorship of women's professional sports, 108
  Body Shop "Ruby" campaign, 191–194
  brand popularity among, 955
  "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1488, 1489–1490
  CVS makeover, 376
  Dial "You're Not As Clean As You Think" campaign, 436, 437
  Diamond Trading Company "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign, 443–446
  Dove "Campaign for Real Beauty" campaign, 1680
  drugstore.com "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign, 471, 472
  Estates of World Golf Village "Repositioning" campaign, 400
  Fuji Photo Film "Meet the Greens" campaign, 588
  General Foods International Coffees "It's How to Unplug" campaign, 860
  Kodak "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, 483
  La-Z-Boy "The New Look of Comfort" campaign, 876
  Nature Made "Trusted By the Ones You Trust" campaign, 1330–1331
  New Balance "Thunderstorm, Stairs" campaigns, 1123–1125
  Nike, accusations of exploitation by, 1155
  Nike "Women's" campaign, 1154–1157
  Novartis Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1210
  Office Depot store interiors, 1214, 1216
  Olympics advertisements, 107
  Samuel Adams "It's What's Inside" campaign, 200–201
  Schick Intuition "Shaving Made Simple" campaign, 1477–1480
  "Sears. Where Else?" campaign, 1492, 1493
  Serta "Counting Sheep" campaign, 1502
  Song Airlines "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, 408
  "Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan" campaign, 834–837
  Tampax Pearl "Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women" campaign, 1385–1388
  Virginia Slims advertising, 55–58
"Women's" campaign, Nike, 1154–1157
Women's Image Network (WIN) Ad Award, 1274, 1276
Women's National Basketball Association (WNBA), 1259
Women's NCAA basketball tournament, 200–201
WongDoody, 165–168
Woo, John, 178, 995
Wood, Ben, 1067
Wood, Elijah, 1003
Wood, Mary, 585
Wood, Michael, 580
Wood, Mike, 879, 955
Wood, Robert E., II, 1054
Woodall, Rob, 441
Woodard, Thad, 1342
Woodbine Agency, 1341–1344
Woods, Tiger, 1135
  Accenture, Ltd., 18
  American Express "Do More" campaign, 82, 83, 84, 85, 87–88, 951
  annual endorsement income, 552
  endorsements, 553
  ESPN "This Is SportsCenter" campaign, 520
  Lincoln Financial Battle at the Bridges, 894
  Nike campaign, 71, 565, 566, 567, 1145
  Nike "Hello World" and "I Am Tiger Woods" campaigns, 1134–1138
  Rolex "Celebrity Endorsement" campaign, 1043, 1044, 1045–1046
"Woof" spot, 1228
Woolery, Chuck, 1689
"The Woolerys" spot, 1689
Woolman, C. E., 411
Word-of-mouth marketing, 192
"Work Effectiveness" campaign, 1575–1578
Working Assets Long Distance, 1835–1838
"Works Like a Check" campaign, 951, 1769–1772
World Cup Soccer Team, Women's, 1156
World Cup soccer tournament
  Dr. Martens tie in, 459, 461
  Saab "Life Is Not a Spectator Sport" campaign, 1445, 1447
World Financial Center, 86
World Golf Village "Repositioning" campaign, 399–402

"A World of Energy" campaign, 305–309
"The World On Time" tagline, 548
World Series
  Anheuser-Busch ""Spuds McKenzie" campaign, 113
  Brigham's "Reverse the Curse" campaign, 207–210
  John Hancock "Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities" campaign (2000), 828
  Pepsi/Major League Baseball alliance, 1279
World Trade Center, 304
World Trade Organization (WTO), 490
World War II
  The Advertising Council, 32
  Cunard Line Limited, 372
  Jeep, 389–390, 392
World Wrestling Federation, 1427
WorldCom, 1545
"The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615–1617
"Worried About Bill" campaign, 687–690
Worthington Foods, 1818–1819
WPP Group, 555, 557
Wrangler, Jeep, 389–392, 393, 646
"Wrangler Anglers" program, 1751
Wrangler (clothes)
  Levi's jeans, as competitor of, 887
  "Rugged Wear" campaign, 1749–1751
Wrapping paper, 195, 196, 197
Wreaks, Bill, 1049
"Wrestler" spot (PowerAde), 343
"Wrestlers" spot (Dial-a-Mattress), 431
Wright, Frank Lloyd, 144
Wrigley, William, Jr., 1828, 1831
"Write Out Loud" campaign, 1457–1459
"Wrong" spot, 546
Wunderman, 955
Wyeth, 1839–1842
Wynant, Wilbur, 895
Wynne, Angus, 1517
Wynne, John O. "Dubby," 1806
Wynne, Steve, 20
Wyville, Jon, 1095

X

X Games
  adidas sponsorship, 1153
  Mountain Dew "Code Red" campaign, 1269
  Mountain Dew "Do the Dew" campaign, 1270
  Mountain Dew sponsorship, 465, 1270, 1273
  Nike "Skateboarders" campaign, 1153
  Time "The World's Most Interesting Magazine" campaign, 1615
Xbox
  "It's Good to Play Together" campaign, 1001–1004
  Taco bell tie-ins, 1593
Xerox Corporation, 718, 1843–1848
XM radio, 637

Y

Yahoo! Big Idea Chair Awards
  Burger King "Subservient Chicken" campaign, 225
  ESPN NFL 2K5 "Beta-7" campaign, 1499
  Pabst "Remember Rainier" campaign, 1248
Yahoo! Inc., 1849–1857
  adidas search term, 26
  eBay, as competitor of, 494
  Lycos, as competitor of, 917
  Musicmatch, 1087
  Nissan, partnership with, 1169
Yamaha, 1338–1339
Yang, Jerry, 1849, 1850, 1852, 1854
"Yankee Fans" campaign, 26–29
Yao Ming, 24, 1771, 1815
Yapp, Jeff, 733
Yarborough, Cale, 1094
"Yard Fitness Center" campaign, 1859–1862
"Yard Sale" spot, 239
Yard Strength, Inc., 1859–1862
Yaris, Toyota, 1168–1169
Yates, Liam, 137
"Yeah, We've Got That" campaign, 1567–1569
Yearwood, Trisha, 1055
Yellowcard, 560
"Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1425–1428
"YMCA" spot, 1277
"Yo Quiero Taco Bell" campaign. See "Want Some?" campaign
Yokum, Dwight, 601
York, John, 1250
Yorn, Pete, 560
Yost, John, 1057
"You + HP" campaign, 405, 723–727
"You Are What You Drink" campaign, 353–357
"You Can Trust Your Car to the Man Who Wears the Star" campaign, 306
"You Know You Know" campaign, 591–594
"You" spot, 726
Young, Donald, 642
Young & Laramore, 1557–1561
Young & Rubicam
  Accenture "I Am Your Idea" campaign, 15–18
  Advil "Liqui-Ges" campaign, 1839–1842
  AT&T "Carrot Top" campaign, 147–150
  AT&T "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign, 152–153
  Citibank campaign, 330
  "Come See the Softer Side of Sears" campaign, 1487
  Dr Pepper "This Is the Taste" campaign, 463–466
  Fisher-Price "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 953–956
  Fisher-Price PowerTouch "Play. Laugh. Grow." campaign, 881
  General Foods International Coffees ""It's How to Unplug" campaign, 859–862
  H&R Block, "Worried About Bill" campaign, 687–690
  "Jingle for Goldfish" campaign, 266
  "MetLife Helps You Make Sense of It All" campaign, 997–1000
  NASCAR "How Bad Have You Got It?" campaign, 1093–1097
  National Football League campaign, 1095
  Network Walkman campaign, 137
  "NFL Playoffs" campaign, 1099–1102
  "Sears. Where Else?" campaign, 1491–1495
  Seven Up campaign, 348
  United Airlines "Rising" campaign, 1700
  Xerox "Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge" campaign, 1843–1847
"Young Voyagers" spot, 1012
Younger, Ben, 177
"Your Airline Has Arrived" campaign, 43, 44
Your Cheatin' Heart (song), 1295, 1298
"Your Link to Better Communication" tag line, 154
"You're in Good Hands" campaign, 51
"You're Not As Clean As You Think" campaign, 435–438
"You're Virtually There" ad, 1207–1208

YourStyle weight management program, 816–817
Youth market
  Abercrombie & Fitch, 9–12
  "Antitobacco" campaign, 245–246
  Dr. Martens Airwair "Beliefs" campaign, 459–462
  "Jenny McCarthy for Candie's" campaign, 751
  Lee jeans "Cut to Be Noticed" campaign, 1744
  Lee jeans "Find Your One True Fit" campaign, 1746–1747
  Levi's "It's Wide Open" campaign, 883–886
  "malternatives," 1014
  Nordstrom campaign, 1186
  Office of National Drug Control Policy "Early Intervention Youth" campaign, 1217–1219
  Polaroid "I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen" campaign, 1357–1360
  Rock the Vote "Yes/No Ballot Box" campaign, 1426
  Secret Sparkle "When You're Strong, You Sparkle" campaign, 1401
  smoking, 56
  "Truth" campaign, 97–100
"Youth Vote 2000" campaign, 1426–1427
"You've Come a Long Way, Baby" campaign, 55–56
Yuen, Henry, 1668

Z

Z3 roadster, 986
Z4 roadster, 175, 176, 177
Zambow, 1376
Zander, Ed, 1067
Zandl, Irma, 756
Zantac, 1324
ZapMail, 538
Zappacosta, Pierluigi, 911
Zappos.com, 1182
"Zebra" spot, 936
Zelnorm "Tummies" campaign, 1209–1212
Zero Gravity Corporation, 240, 242
Zeta-Jones, Catherine, 1623–1626
Zima, 1014, 1016
Zimmerman, Chris
  Nike "9000 Shots" campaign, 1134
  Nike "Product Assault" campaign, 1147, 1148, 1149, 1150
  Nike target markets, 1135
Zimmerman, Eric, 1061
"Zipper" spot, 950, 951
Zoic Studios, 174
Zoloft
  Paxil, as competitor of, 666
  Prozac, as competitor of, 507
Zoom LeBron basketball shoe, 1138–1140
Zubi Advertising, 562, 1793–1794
Zyban, 663
Zyman, Sergio
  on the Gap campaign, 608
  "Obey Your Thirst" campaign, 344, 345
  "You Are What You Drink" campaign, 354, 356, 357
Zyman Group, 196