
Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns Volume 2

Thomas Riggs, editor

Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns

VOLUME 2

Highlights

This second volume of Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns (EMMC) profiles 474 of the most notable advertising and marketing initiatives of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, including:

- Aflac's "Duck"
- California Milk Processor Board's "Got Milk"
- Dell's "Dude, You're Getting a Dell"
- Geico's "Gecko"
- General Motors's "Looking for Mr. Goodwrench"
- Hewlett-Packard's "You + HP"
- Mastercard International's "Priceless"
- Old Navy's "Retro 70s"
- PepsiCo's "Generation Next"
- Taco Bell's "Think Outside the Bun"
- Unilever PLC's "Campaign for Real Beauty"
- United Parcel Service's "What Can Brown Do For You?"

EMMC covers campaigns that were important for their innovation, for their effectiveness in selling products or services, or for the significance of their companies. It also focuses on products or services that changed how we view consumer brands, had positive or negative social significance, and/or affected our lifestyles in some far-reaching way. Information in each chapter is easily accessed under the headings Historical Context, Target Market, Competition, Marketing Strategy, and Outcome.

INCLUDES PHOTOS AND DESCRIPTIVE SIDEBARS

Enhancing the text are pertinent and interesting visual elements. There are close to 150 reproductions of television and print advertisements and more than 500 sidebars. A valuable addition, the photos lend context to the data featured within the chapters while the sidebars provide anecdotal statistics and unusual incidents and facts.

ADDITIONAL FEATURES

- Companies are arranged alphabetically
- Campaigns represent a wide variety of marketing strategies, such as branding and direct mail, and were featured in various media, including television, radio, and print
- The Index organizes essays under broad subject and topic headings, as well as lists company and product names, key advertising agencies, and people
- Further Reading sections suggest avenues for continued study
- EMMC, Volume 2 perfectly complements the first volume of Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns, published in 1999.

A valuable addition to Gale's business resource collection, EMMC is the only publication of its kind that provides detailed commentary on major marketing campaigns throughout the twentieth and twenty-first centuries.

Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns

VOLUME 2

Thomas Riggs
EDITOR

THOMSON
GALE

Detroit • New York • San Francisco • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London

Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns, Volume 2

Thomas Riggs, Editor

Associate Editors
Mariko Fujinaka, Patrick Hutchins

Chief Line Editor
Robert Rauch

Line Editors
Laura Gabler, Anne Healey

Proofreaders
Kimberly Burton, Jennifer Zielinski

Thomson Gale Project Editors
Jacqueline K. Mueckenheim, Holly Selden

Thomson Gale Editorial Staff
Miranda Ferrara, Kristy A. Swartout

Technical Support
Luann Brennan, Mike Weaver

Indexing Services
Laurie Andriot

Rights and Acquisitions
Margaret Chamberlain-Gaston, Sue Rudolph

Imaging and Multimedia
Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Lezlie Light, Michael Logusz, Audrey Pettengill, Kelly Quin, Robyn Young

Composition and Electronic Prepress
Evi Seoud

Manufacturing
Wendy Blurton

© 2007 Thomson Gale, a part of The Thomson Corporation.

Thomson and Star Logo are trademarks and Gale is a registered trademark used herein under license.

For more information, contact
Thomson Gale
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Or you can visit our Internet site at http://www.gale.com

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED
No part of this work covered by the copyright hereon may be reproduced or used in any form or by any means—graphic, electronic, or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, taping, Web distribution, or information storage retrieval systems—without the written permission of the publisher.

This publication is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The authors and editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual material herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

For permission to use material from this product, submit your request via Web at http://www.gale-edit.com/permissions, or you may download our Permissions Request form and submit your request by fax or mail to:

Permissions Department
Thomson Gale
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Permissions Hotline:
248-699-8006 or 800-877-4253, ext. 8006
Fax: 248-699-8074 or 800-762-4058

Since this page cannot legibly accommodate all copyright notices, the acknowledgments constitute an extension of the copyright notice.

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, Thomson Gale does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. Thomson Gale accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Encyclopedia of major marketing campaigns, volume 2 / Thomas Riggs, editor.
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN-13: 978-0-7876-7356-7 (hardcover)
ISBN-10: 0-7876-7356-0 (hardcover)
1. Advertising campaigns – United States – History – 20th century. I. Riggs, Thomas, 1963 – .
HF5837.E53 1999
658.1'0973 – dc21 99 – 31858

This title is also available as an e-book.
ISBN-13: 978-1-4144-0607-7, ISBN-10: 1-4144-0607-X
Contact your Thomson Gale sales representative for ordering information.

Printed in the United States of America
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Advisors and Contributors XV
Foreword XVII
Introduction XXI

A

A & E Television Networks
In Case You Missed It Campaign 1
ABC, Inc.
TV Is Good Campaign 5
Abercrombie & Fitch
A & F Quarterly Campaign 9
Accenture, Ltd.
I Am Your Idea Campaign 15
adidas America, Inc.
Runners. Yeah, We're Different Campaign 19
adidas-Salomon AG
Impossible Is Nothing Campaign 23
Yankee Fans Campaign 26
The Advertising Council, Inc.
Campaign for Freedom Campaign 31
Aflac, Inc.
The Aflac Duck (2000) Campaign 35
The Broken Leg Campaign 38
AirTran Holdings, Inc.
Go. There's Nothing Stopping You Campaign 43
Allied Domecq PLC
Loosen Up a Little Campaign 47
The Allstate Corporation
Our Stand Campaign 51
Altria Group Inc.
It's a Woman Thing Campaign 55
Amazon.com, Inc.
Amazon Theater Campaign. 59
America Online, Inc.
AOL Latino Campaign 63
Welcome to the World Wide Wow Campaign. 66
American Apparel Inc.
American Apparel Campaign 71
American Civil Liberties Union
Racial Profiling Campaign 75
American Express Company
Competitive Campaign 79
Do More Campaign 82
Seinfeld Campaign 86
American Honda Motor Company
What About Now? Campaign. 91
American Legacy Foundation
Truth Campaign. 97
Americans for the Arts
Art. Ask for More Campaign 101
Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc.
Beer. . . or Michelob? Campaign 105
Frogs Campaign 108
I Love You, Man Campaign 112
Louie the Lizard Campaign. 116
Oh, and Beware of the Penguins Campaign. 120
Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius Campaign. 123
Whassup?! Campaign 126
Apple Computer, Inc.
iMac Campaign 131
Silhouette Campaign. 135

Switchers Campaign 138
Think Different Campaign 141
AT&T Inc.
Carrot Top Campaign 147
It's All Within Your Reach Campaign. 150
Privacy Manager Campaign 153
Audi of America, Inc.
Art of the Heist Campaign 157

B

Barclays Global Investors
New School Campaign 161
The Basketball Club of Seattle, LLC
In Your Home Campaign 165
Bayerische Motoren Werke AG
Counterfeit Campaign 169
Mini Robots Campaign 172
The Hire Campaign 175
BC Dairy Foundation
Don't Take Your Body for Granted Campaign. 181
Binney & Smith
Make Play Campaign 187
The Body Shop International PLC
Ruby Campaign 191
Borders Group, Inc.
This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts Campaign 195
Boston Beer Company, Inc.
It's What's Inside Campaign 199
Boston Market Corp.
Eat Something Campaign 203
Brigham's, Inc.
Reverse the Curse Campaign. 207
Budget Rent A Car System, Inc.
Up Your Budget Campaign 211
Bureau of Engraving and Printing
The New Color of Money Campaign 215
Burger King Corp.
Lunch Break Campaign 219
Subservient Chicken Campaign. 222
When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better Campaign 225
Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities
Move Our Money Campaign 229

C

Cadbury Adams USA LLC
Four Out of Five Dentists Campaign 233
Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages
Bottles Personified Campaign 237
Go for Zero Campaign. 240
California Department of Health Services, Tobacco Control Section
Antitobacco Campaign 243
Tobacco Control Section Media Campaign. 248
California Milk Advisory Board
Happy Cows Campaign 253
California Milk Processor Board
Got Milk? Campaign 257
Calvin Klein Cosmetics Company
cK be Campaign. 261
Campbell Soup Company
Goldfish Crackers Campaign 265
Make It Campbell's Instead Campaign 268
Canadian Film Centre
2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival Campaign. 273
Canon U.S.A., Inc.
85 Second Photo Lab Campaign. 277
CareerBuilder Inc.
Time to Move On Campaign 281
Cargill, Inc.
Collaborate>Create>Succeed Campaign. 285
Carl's Jr.
Six Dollar Burger Campaign. 289
Carnival Corporation
Fun Ships Campaign 293
Cellco Partnership
Can You Hear Me Now? Campaign 297
The Charles Schwab Corporation
Smarter Investor Campaign. 301
Chevron Corporation
A World of Energy Campaign 305
Church & Dwight Company, Inc.
Trojan Man Campaign 311
Church's Chicken
Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life/Full Flavor, Full Pockets Campaign. 317
Cisco Systems, Inc.
The Self-Defending Network Campaign 321
Citibank
Identity Theft Solutions Campaign 325
Citigroup Inc.
Live Richly Campaign. 329
Clairol, Inc.
Totally Organic Campaign 333
CNS, Inc.
Back in the Sack Campaign 337
The Coca-Cola Company
Keep Playing Campaign 341
Obey Your Thirst Campaign (1998) 344
Obey Your Thirst Campaign (2004) 347
Real Campaign 350
You Are What You Drink Campaign 353

Columbia Sportswear Company
Mother Boyle Campaign 359
ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation
Child Hunger Campaign 363
Conseco, Inc.
Protect/Create Wealth Campaign 367
Cunard Line Limited
Can You Wait? Campaign 371
CVS Corporation
Life to the Fullest Campaign 375
Cyan Worlds Inc.
Riven Campaign 379

D

DaimlerChrysler Corp.
Employee Pricing Plan Plus Campaign 383
Engineered to Be Great Cars Campaign 386
Jeep Campaign 389
There's Only One Campaign 392
Darden Restaurants, Inc.
Life on Land Is Dry Campaign 395
Davidson Development Inc.
Repositioning Campaign 399
Dell Inc.
Dude, You're Getting a Dell Campaign 403
Delta Air Lines, Inc.
Let Yourself Fly Campaign 407
On Top of the World Campaign 411
The Passenger's Airline Campaign 414
DHL Holdings (USA), Inc.
Competition. Bad for Them. Great for You. Campaign 419
Diageo plc
Keep Walking Campaign 423
Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense Campaign 426
Dial-A-Mattress
Always Out There Campaign 431
The Dial Corporation
You're Not as Clean as You Think Campaign 435
Diamond Foods, Inc.
Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign 439
The Diamond Trading Company
Raise Your Right Hand Campaign 443
DirecTV Group, Inc.
Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now) Campaign 447
Discovery Communications, Inc.
Two Guys Campaign 451
Doctor's Associates Inc.
Jared Fogle Campaign 455
Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC
Beliefs Campaign 459
Dr Pepper/Seven Up, Inc.
This Is the Taste Campaign 463
Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings, Inc.
Unbelievable Campaign 467
drugstore.com, inc.
A Very Healthy Way to Shop Campaign 471
Dyson Ltd.
Doesn't Lose Suction Campaign 475

E

Eastman Kodak Company
Advantix Campaign 479
The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints Campaign 482
Take Pictures. Further. Campaign 485
Tall Tales Campaign 488
eBay Inc.
Abbreviated Campaign 493
eBay 2004 Television Campaign 496
Electronic Data Systems
Cat Herders Campaign 501
Eli Lilly and Company
Prozac Print Campaign 505
Energizer Holdings, Inc.
Bunny Chasers Campaign 509
ESPN, Inc.
The Rick Campaign 513
This Is SportsCenter Campaign 517
Without Sports Campaign 520
E*TRADE Financial Corp.
Monkey Trilogy Campaign 525
Why Wouldn't You? Campaign 528
Euromarket Design, Inc.
Crate & Barrel 1998 Print Ads Campaign 533

F

FedEx Corp.
Be Absolutely Sure Campaign 537
Our Office Is Your Office Campaign 541
Relax, It's Fedex Campaign 544
The Way the World Works Campaign 547
Fila USA
Grant Hill 4 Campaign 551
Ford Motor Company
Driving American Innovation Campaign 555
Life in Drive Campaign 558
Storytelling Campaign 561
Fortune Brands, Inc.
Sign Boy Campaign 565
Foster's Group Limited
How to Speak Australian Campaign 569

Fox Entertainment Group, Inc.
NHL on FOX Campaign 575
French Connection Group PLC
Scent to Bed Campaign 579
Frito-Lay Inc.
The Loudest Taste on Earth Campaign. 583
Fuji Photo Film U.S.A., Inc.
Meet the Greens Campaign 587

G

Game Show Network
You Know You Know Campaign 591
Gap Inc.
For Every Generation Campaign. 595
How Do You Wear It? Campaign. 598
Khakis Campaign 601
This Is Easy Campaign 605
Gateway, Inc.
People Rule Campaign 609
GEICO
Gecko Campaign 613
Good News Campaign 616
Mini-Campaigns. 618
General Electric Co.
Imagination at Work Campaign 623
General Mills, Inc.
Stories Campaign 627
General Motors Corporation
An American Revolution Campaign 631
Break Through Campaign. 634
The Caddy that Zigs Campaign 638
EV1 Introduction Campaign. 641
Hummer Campaign 645
Looking for Mr. Goodwrench Campaign 648
Start Something Campaign 652
Gill Foundation
Turnout Campaign. 657
GlaxoSmithKline plc
Power to Quit Campaign 661
Social Anxiety Disorder Campaign 665
Global Gillette
Anything Else Would Be Uncivilized Campaign. 669
Go Daddy Software, Inc.
Godaddy.Com Super Bowl Commercial Campaign. 675
The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company
On the Wings of Goodyear Campaign 679
William Grant & Sons Ltd.
Single Malt Campaign 683

H

H&R Block, Inc.
Worried about Bill Campaign. 687
Hallmark Cards, Inc.
Sneak a Peek Campaign 691
Hardee's Food Systems, Inc.
Revolution Campaign 697
Harley-Davidson Motor Company
The Book of Harley-Davidson Campaign 701
Heineken USA Inc.
It's All About the Beer Campaign 705
The Hershey Company
The Crisp You Can't Resist! Campaign. 709
There's No Wrong Way to Eat a Reese's Campaign. 712
Hewlett-Packard Company
Built by Engineers, Used by Ordinary People Campaign. 717
Expanding Possibilities Campaign 720
You + HP Campaign 723
Hilton Hotels Corporation
It Happens at the Hilton Campaign 729
Hollywood Entertainment Corporation
Welcome to Hollywood Campaign 733
Home Box Office, Inc.
It's Not T.V. It's HBO Campaign 737
Honda Motor Company
The Power of Dreams Campaign 741
Honda UK
Grrr Campaign. 745

I

Iconix Brand Group, Inc.
Jenny McCarthy for Candie's Campaign. 749
IKEA International A/S
Unböring Campaign. 755
InBev USA
Grab a Rock Campaign 759
ING Groep N.V.
ING Launch Campaign 763
Intel Corporation
Bunny People Campaign. 767
Time for a Pentium II Processor? Campaign. 771
Intercontinental Hotels Group PLC
Holiday Inn Brand Rejuvenation Campaign. 777
Stay Smart Campaign 780
International Business Machines Corp.
Can You See It? Campaign. 785
E-Business Campaign 788
Gizmo Campaign 791
Linux Campaign. 794
Solutions for a Small Planet Campaign 797
Isuzu Motors America, Inc.
The Call Campaign 803

J

J.C. Penney Company, Inc.
It's All Inside Campaign 807
Jack in the Box, Inc.
Jack's Back Campaign 811
Jenny Craig, Inc.
Kirstie Alley Campaign 815
JetBlue Airways Corporation
JetBlue Launch Campaign 819
John Hancock Financial Services Inc.
Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities. Campaign (1996) 823
Insurance for the Unexpected. Investments for the Opportunities. Campaign (2000) 826

K

Kellogg Company
Gotta Have My Pops Campaign 831
Special K Kick-Start Diet Plan Campaign 834
KFC Corp.
Chicken Capital USA Campaign 839
Kimberly-Clark Corporation
Kleenex Anti-Viral Campaign 843
Kmart Corp.
Kmart Joe Boxer Launch Campaign 847
Martha Stewart Everyday Campaign 850
Rosie O'Donnell and Penny Marshall Campaign 854
Kraft Foods, Inc.
It's How to Unplug Campaign 859
It's Not Delivery, It's DiGiorno Campaign 862

L

Labatt USA
Rolling Rock Ads Campaign 867
Las Vegas Convention & Visitors Authority
Vegas Stories Campaign 871
La-Z-Boy Inc.
The New Look of Comfort Campaign 875
LeapFrog Enterprises, Inc.
Learn Something New Every Day! Campaign 879
Levi Strauss & Co.
It's Wide Open Campaign 883
Levi's Type 1 Jeans Campaign 886
They Go On Campaign 889
Lincoln National Corp.
Hello Future Campaign 893
Little Caesar Enterprises, Inc.
Cloning Campaign 897
Grand Canyon Campaign 900
Safety Video Campaign 903
Talking Pizzas Campaign 906
Logitech International S.A.
What Will You Do with All That Freedom? Campaign 911
Lycos, Inc.
Go Get It Campaign 915

M

Mail Boxes Etc., Inc.
See Your Small Business on the Super Bowl Campaign 919
Malden Mills Industries, Inc.
Forward Fabric Campaign 923
Marriott International
Never Underestimate the Importance of a Good Night's Rest Campaign 927
Mars, Inc.
The Energy You Crave Campaign 931
Inner Beast Campaign 934
M&M's New Millennium Campaigns 937
Snickers Cruncher Campaign 940
Maryland State Lottery Agency
Cash in Hand Campaign 945
MasterCard International Priceless Campaign 949
Mattel, Inc.
Play. Laugh. Grow. Campaign 953
McDonald's Corporation
Campaign 55 Campaign 957
Did Somebody Say McDonald's? Campaign 960
I'm Lovin′ It Campaign 964
We Love to See You Smile Campaign 967
MCI LLC
1-800-Collect Campaign 971
Dennis Miller Ads Campaign 974
McIlhenny Company
Mosquito Campaign 979
Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC
Mercedes-Benz Corporate Branding Campaign 983
Passion Campaign 987
Smooth Ride Campaign 990
Unlike Any Other Campaign 994
MetLife, Inc.
MetLife Helps You Make Sense of It All Campaign 997
Microsoft Corp.
It's Good to Play Together Campaign 1001
Where Do You Want to Go Today? Campaign 1004
Midas, Inc.
Trust the Midas Touch Campaign 1009
Mike's Hard Lemonade Company
Hard Day Campaign 1013
Miller Brewing Company
Miller High Life Man Campaign 1017

Miller Lite's Miller Time Campaign 1021
Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco
Minnesota Partnership for Action against Tobacco Campaign. 1027
Mitsubishi Motors North America, Inc.
Wake Up and Drive Campaign. 1031
Monsanto Company
Monsanto Image Campaigns. 1035
Monster
Today's the Day Campaign. 1039
Montres Rolex SA
Celebrity Endorsement Campaign. 1043
Morgan Stanley
At Your Side Campaign 1047
It Pays to Discover Revisited Campaign 1050
Make a Statement Campaign 1053
Tow Truck Campaign 1056
Mothers Against Drunk Driving, Connecticut Chapter
Drunk Driving's a Serious Crime. Let's Treat It That Way. Campaign 1061 Motorola, Inc.
Intelligence Everywhere Campaign 1065
Moto Campaign 1068
MoveOn.org
Real People Campaign 1073
MTV Networks Company
Watch and Learn Campaign 1077
The Museum of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles
Labels Campaign 1081

N

Napster, Inc.
It's Coming Back Campaign. 1085
The Nasdaq Stock Market, Inc.
Listed on Nasdaq Campaign 1089
National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing
How Bad Have You Got It? Campaign. 1093
National Football League
NFL Playoffs Campaign 1099
National Railroad Passenger Corporation
Life on Acela Campaign 1103
Negro Leagues Baseball Museum
1998 Print Campaign 1107 Nestlé Purina PetCare Co.
Incredible Dogs Campaign 1111
Multiple Strength for Multiple Cats Campaign. 1114
Nestlé S.A.
Made Like No Other Campaign 1119
New Balance Athletic Shoe, Inc.
New Balance Thunderstorm, Stairs Campaign. . . . 1123
New York State Lottery
If I Had a Million Dollars Campaign 1127
Nike, Inc.
9,000 Shots Campaign 1131
Hello World and "I Am Tiger Woods" Campaigns 1134
Meet the Lebrons Campaign. 1138
Move Campaign 1141
Play Campaign 1144
Product Assault Campaign 1147
What If We Treated All Athletes the Way We Treat Skateboarders? Campaign 1150
Women's Campaign 1154
Nikon Corporation
Mass Market Initiative Campaign 1159
The Nikon School Campaign 1162
Nissan Motor Company, Ltd.
Do You Speak Micra? Campaign 1167
Nissan North America, Inc.
Enjoy the Ride Campaign. 1171
Nissan Quest Minivan Launch Campaign 1174
Own One and You'll Understand Campaign. 1177
Nordstrom, Inc.
Make Room for Shoes Campaign 1181
Reinvent Yourself Campaign. 1184
Norelco Consumer Products Company
Norelco Reflex Action Razor Campaign 1189
Normark Corporation
Custom Lures Campaign 1193
North American Coffee Partnership (Starbucks Corp.)
Bring On the Day Campaign 1197
North Carolina Division of Tourism, Film and Sports Development
Heritage Campaign. 1201
Northwest Airlines Corporation
E-Ticket Campaign. 1205
Novartis AG
Tummies Campaign 1209

O

Office Depot, Inc.
What You Need. What You Need to Know. Campaign. 1213
Office of National Drug Control Policy
Early Intervention Youth Campaign 1217
OfficeMax Inc.
What's Your Thing? Campaign. 1221
Old Navy, Inc.
'70s Retro TV Campaign 1225
Destination Campaign 1228

Orange S.A.
Goldspot Campaign 1233
Outward Bound USA
Oceans, Mountains, Forests, Fear. Which Do You Conquer First? Campaign 1237
Oxygen Media
Fresh Television for Women Campaign 1241

P

Pabst Brewing Company
Remember Rainier Campaign 1245
Pacific Cycle, Inc.
Fast. It's Corporate Policy. Campaign 1249
What a Ride Campaign 1252
Palace Sports & Entertainment
Goin' to Work. Every Night. Campaign 1257
Peace Corps
Life Is Calling. How Far Will You Go? Campaign. 1261
PepsiCo, Inc.
Code Red Campaign 1267
Do the Dew Campaign. 1270
Drink More Water Campaign. 1274
Generation Next Campaign 1277
The Joy of Pepsi Campaign 1280
The Not-So-Vanilla Vanilla Campaign 1283
Origins Campaign 1286
Pepsi. It's the Cola Campaign. 1289
Quaker—Warms You, Heart and Soul Campaign. 1292
Security Camera Campaign. 1295
That's Brisk, Baby! Campaign. 1298
This Is Diet? Campaign 1303
Perdue Farms Inc.
Now Arriving Campaign. 1307
Pfizer Inc.
The Power of Zyrtec Campaign 1311
Schick Tracer FX Ads Campaign 1314
See You Later, Alligator Campaign 1317
Super Fans Campaign. 1322
Viagra Launch Campaign 1325
Pharmavite LLC
Trusted by the Ones You Trust Campaign 1329
Philips Electronics North America Corp.
Getting Better Campaign 1333
Piaggio USA, Inc.
Vespa Reintroduction Campaign. 1337
Piedmont Federal Savings and Loan Association
It's Your Mortgage. Keep It Here. Campaign 1341
Pizza Hut, Inc.
Big New Yorker Pizza Campaign 1345
Polaris Industries, Inc.
The New American Motorcycle Campaign 1349
Ride the Best Campaign 1352
Polaroid Corporation
I-Zone/Joycam/Sticky Film Teen Campaign 1357
See What Develops Campaign 1360
Porsche Cars North America Inc.
Cayenne Launch Campaign 1365
priceline.com Incorporated
Troubadour Campaign 1369
The Procter & Gamble Company
The Best Part of Wakin' Up Is Folgers in Your Cup Campaign 1373
Cleaner Close Campaign. 1377
Got the Power Campaign 1380
Habits Campaign 1382
Ingenious Protection for Ingenious Women Campaign. 1385
Sharing and Connecting Campaign. 1388
Sink Boy Campaign 1391
Strange but True Campaign 1395
Tasting Is Believing Campaign 1398
When You're Strong, You Sparkle Campaign 1401
The Prudential Insurance Company of America
Be Your Own Rock Campaign 1405
Public Broadcasting Service
Be More Campaign 1409

Q

The Quiznos Master LLC
Baby Bob Campaign. 1413

R

Reebok International Ltd.
Terry Tate, Office Linebacker Campaign 1417
The Rheingold Brewing Company
Rheingold Beer Campaign 1421
Rock the Vote
Yes/No Ballot Box Campaign 1425
Round Table Pizza
The Last Honest Pizza Campaign 1429
Royal Appliance Manufacturing Company
Darin' Campaign 1433
Fred Astaire Campaign 1437
Royal Caribbean Cruises Ltd.
Get Out There Campaign. 1441

S

Saab Cars USA, Inc.
Life Is Not a Spectator Sport Campaign 1445
SABMiller plc
Low Carb Campaign 1449
Miller High Life Campaign 1452

Sanford, L.P.
Write Out Loud Campaign 1457
Sanofi-Aventis
Spirit of Freedom Campaign. 1461
Saturn Corporation
Saturn Relaunch Campaign. 1465
Why Didn't Anyone Think of This Before? Campaign. 1468
SBC Communications Inc.
Laurel Lane Campaign 1473
Schick-Wilkinson Sword
Shaving Made Simple Campaign 1477
Scotts Miracle-Gro Company
Neighbor to Neighbor Campaign 1481
Sears, Roebuck & Co.
Come See the Softer Side of Sears Campaign 1487
Sears. Where Else? Campaign 1491
Sega of America, Inc. & Take-Two Interactive Software, Inc.
Beta-7 Campaign 1497
Serta International
Counting Sheep Campaign 1501
Sharp Corp.
More to See Campaign. 1505
Sierra Club
Hybrid Evolution Campaign. 1509
Sims Sports, Inc.
Be Free Campaign 1513
Six Flags, Inc.
It's Playtime Campaign. 1517
Sony Corporation
Fun, Anyone? Campaign. 1523
Sony Bravia Campaign 1526
Sony Corporation of America
What's Next? Campaign 1531
Southwest Airlines Company
Must Be Football Season Campaign 1535
Specialized Bicycle Components Inc.
Specialized Campaign 1539
Sprint Nextel Corporation
Dime Zone Campaign 1543
Monday Nights Free and Clear Campaign 1546
Nextel. Done. Campaign 1550
Sprint PCS Campaign 1553
Stanley Steemer International, Inc.
Living Brings It In. We Take It Out. Campaign. 1557
Staples, Inc.
That Was Easy Campaign. 1563
Yeah, We've Got That Campaign 1567
State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company
True Stories Campaign 1571
Steelcase, Inc.
Work Effectiveness Campaign. 1575
Suburban Auto Group
Trunk Monkey Campaign 1579
Swift Boat Veterans for Truth
Swift Boat Veterans for Truth Campaign 1583
Swiss Army Brands, Inc.
Swiss Army Equipped Campaign 1587

T

Taco Bell Corp.
Think Outside the Bun Campaign 1591
Want Some? Campaign 1594
Target Corporation
New Yorker Magazine Sponsorship Campaign . . . 1599
Take Charge of Education Campaign 1603
Thomas Cook Tour Operations Ltd
Perspectives Campaign 1607
Time Warner, Inc.
Cartoon Network Promotional and Branding Campaign. 1611
The World's Most Interesting Magazine Campaign. 1615
TiVo Inc.
TiVo, TV Your Way Campaign 1619
T-Mobile International AG & Company KG
Get More Campaign. 1623
Tommy Hilfiger U.S.A., Inc.
American Tartans Campaign. 1627
Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc.
A Car to Be Proud Of Campaign 1631
Everyday Campaign 1634
Fuel for Thought Campaign 1638
Get the Feeling Campaign 1641
Kids Rule Campaign. 1643
The Road Is Calling Campaign. 1646
Travelocity
Roaming Gnome Campaign 1651
Triarc Companies, Inc.
Return of the Snapple Lady Campaign 1655
Turner Broadcasting System, Inc.
31 Days of Oscar Campaign. 1659
TBS Very Funny Campaign 1662
TV Guide, Inc.
On the Inside Campaign. 1667
Tyson Foods, Inc.
Powered by Tyson Campaign 1671

U

UBS Financial Services Inc.
Thank You, Paine Webber Campaign. 1675
Unilever PLC
Campaign for Real Beauty Campaign 1679
Do It Once. Do It Right. Campaign. 1683

Unilever United States
Real Cooking Campaign 1687
Soothing Cucumber Eye Treatments Ads Campaign 1690 United Airlines Corp.
It's Time to Fly Campaign 1695
Rising Campaign 1698
Ted Launch Campaign 1701
United Distillers and Vintners of North America
Russian Art Campaign 1705
United Parcel Service, Inc.
Moving at the Speed of Business Campaign 1709
What Can Brown Do for You? Campaign 1713
United States Postal Service
Fly Like an Eagle Campaign 1717
United States Tennis Association
US Open Excitement Campaign 1721
UnitedHealth Group, Inc.
It Just Makes Sense Campaign 1725

V

V & S Vin & Sprit AB
Absolut Director Campaign 1729
Absolut Print Campaign 1733
Jesse Ventura for Governor
Retaliate in '98 Campaign 1739
VF Corporation
Cut to Be Noticed Campaign 1743
Find Your One True Fit Campaign 1746
Rugged Wear Campaign 1749
Village Voice LLC
Not America's Favorite Paper Campaign 1753
Virgin Atlantic Airways Limited
Go, Jet Set, Go! Campaign 1757
Virginia Tourism Corporation
Meet Virginia Campaign 1761
Visa U.S.A., Inc.
Visa. It's Everywhere You Want to Be Campaign 1765
Works Like a Check Campaign 1769
Volkswagen of America, Inc.
All Grown Up. Sort Of. Campaign 1773
Drivers Wanted Campaign 1776
Live Large Campaign 1780
New Beetle Campaign 1783

W

Wachovia Corporation
Financial World Campaign 1789
Uncommon Wisdom Campaign 1792
Walgreen Company
Perfect Campaign 1797
Washington Mutual, Inc.
Fear Not Campaign 1801
The Weather Channel Companies
Painted Faces Campaign 1805
Wendy's International, Inc.
Fresh Stuffed Pita Campaign 1809
Good to Be Square Campaign 1812
Wholesome & Hearty Foods Company
Eating Good Just Got Great Campaign 1817
Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company
Altoids Campaign 1821
Altoids Gone Sour Campaign 1824
Gotta Have Twisted Sweet Campaign 1827
No Matter What Campaign 1830
Working Assets Long Distance
Direct Marketing Campaign 1835
Wyeth
Liqui-Gels Campaign 1839

X

Xerox Corporation
Keep the Conversation Going, Share the Knowledge Campaign 1843

Y

Yahoo! Inc.
Do You Yahoo!? Campaign 1849
Live Billboard Dating Campaign 1854
Yard Strength, Inc.
Yard Fitness Center Campaign 1859

Index 1863

Advisors and Contributors

ADVISORS

Borders, Bill. Founding partner, Borders, Perrin & Norrander, Portland, Oregon.

Jaffe, Andrew. Former executive director, Clio Awards; president, Compass Consulting, LLC, Norwalk, Connecticut.

Zilavy, Julie. Manager, Online Services, American Association of Advertising Agencies, New York, New York.

CONTRIBUTORS

Amorosino, Chris John. Freelance writer living in Unionville, Connecticut. He creates a variety of communications materials for clients in the advertising, financial services, and medical fields.

Arrigo, Jan. Louisiana-based freelance writer focusing on travel and culture. Author of Cemeteries of New Orleans: A Journey through the Cities of the Dead and New Orleans.

Bailey, Rayna. Former newspaper managing editor and magazine associate editor. She is now a freelance writer living in Westcliffe, Colorado.

Baue, William B. Freelance writer who has published articles on William Faulkner and Toni Morrison, as well as on work apprenticeships. He has taught writing and literature to both college and high school students.

Benbow-Pfalzgraf, Taryn. Freelance writer living in the Chicago area.

Brady, Barbra. Freelance writer and curator based in Missoula, Montana.

Caso, Frank. Freelance writer living in Hartford, Connecticut. His work has appeared in publications in the United States, Canada, and Russia.

Coryell, Anita. Freelance writer living in Missoula, Montana.

Crow, Alden Scott. Writer based in Clements, California.

Cunningham, Guy Patrick. Freelance writer living in New York City.

Dinger, Ed. New York-based writer.

Fujinaka, Mariko. Editor and writer living in Portland, Oregon.

Hutchins, Patrick. Advertising copywriter, creative director, and journalist for more than 20 years. Formerly employed at several agencies in Los Angeles, he freelances from his home in Montana.

Kazemi, Kim. Freelance writer living in Missoula, Montana.

Knight, Judson. Author and coauthor of numerous books, including Abbey Road to Zapple Records: A Beatles Encyclopedia and a three-volume Ancient Civilizations series. He lives in Atlanta, Georgia.

Kolberg, Sharyn. New York-based freelance writer and editor. She has written or ghostwritten more than a dozen books in a variety of fields, including direct marketing, sales, self-help, and nutrition.

Kolstad, Jonathan. Freelance writer and photographer living in Portland, Oregon.

Lane, Mark. Freelance writer living in Brooklyn, New York.

Mack, Deborah. Freelance writer and researcher living in Maryland.

Mancini, Candice. Freelance writer who teaches English composition and literature to college and high school students. She lives in Missoula, Montana.

McGinniss Kerr, Bridget. Freelance writer and editor living in El Portal, California.

McNamer, Megan. Freelance writer and movie critic in Missoula, Montana. Her articles have appeared in several national publications, including Sports Illustrated, the Miami Herald, Islands, and Child.

Millstein, Sarah. Freelance writer and editor. In addition to working on projects for nonprofit organizations and corporations, she has written articles on sustainable agriculture and food. Her work has appeared in Mother Earth News, Green Guide, and Just Food News.

Minderovic, Christine Miner. Freelance writer who works in the field of medicine. She has written about science, medicine, dance, art, and literature.

Porter, Allison I. Writer, editor, and researcher based in Washington, D.C. She has written The Path to Poverty: An Analysis of Women's Retirement Income, Your 1991/92 Guide to Social Security Benefits, and Porter's Guide to Congressional Roll Call Votes.

Risland, Susan. Writer whose work has appeared in Ferguson's Guide to Apprenticeship Programs, Exploring Tech Careers, and other publications.

Salter, Susan. Writer contributing to numerous reference books, including Contemporary Authors, Newsmakers, and the Encyclopedia of Consumer Brands.

Samano, Simone. Freelance writer living in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

Schnakenberg, Robert E. Author of reference, biographical, and instructional materials, including The Encyclopedia of Shatnerica. He lives in New York City.

Stanfel, Rebecca. Freelance writer living in Helena, Montana.

Steiner, Susan M. Freelance writer, editor, and translator. She was formerly editor-in-chief, German Information Center.

Tokumitsu, Cynthia. New York-based writer focusing on business and education. She also served for four years as editorial director of Quality Resources.

Teague, Kevin. Freelance writer living in the central coast region of California. Author of the novel The Rise of Charlie Drop.

Wilson Peacock, Kathy. Freelance writer living in Dearborn, Michigan.

Foreword

Trying to expound on any large body of advertising work is always dangerous. Since Cro-Magnon man scratched an image onto a cave wall for others to see, the business of mass communication has been evolving. Advertising is a fluid, ever-changing craft. I hesitate to label it as art only because doing so tends to raise howls of indignation from those in the field of so-called serious art—playwrights, filmmakers, musicians, painters, sculptors, and such. I could build a strong case, however, that any well-conceived, beautifully executed ad, in any medium, differs from traditional art in only one sense: its purpose, either directly or indirectly, is to evoke a mercantile response. Regular art has merely to evoke an emotional response so that, by comparison, it gets off easy.

For the purposes of this encyclopedia, let us say that advertising falls closer to fashion. Like fashion, it is an art form with decidedly commercial ends. As with fashion, there are trendy, fleeting styles of advertising that come on strong, cause a stir, and then fade away with the next hot "ad couture." And there are sturdy classics, ads that wear well with age and that look fine and still touch people after 10, 20, or even 30 or more years. These are creations that rest upon timeless human emotions or truths rather than on a passing currency. An ad headlined "Lemon" and featuring, say, a new Lexus would be no less compelling today than it was for Volkswagen 40 years ago.

In any given year we see ads of both kinds—splashy, contemporary messages of the moment (such as iPod's "Silhouette" campaign and countless print ads flaunting jagged, beat-up typefaces) and durable works that rest on less ephemeral trends (such as John Hancock's "Insurance for the Unexpected"). Is one form "better" than the other? Not inherently. Both work or fail for other reasons, for their freshness, relevance, involvement of the viewer, execution, or memorability.

Like Hollywood, advertising is often criticized for shaping, if not lowering, cultural and social standards. The usual response from studio executives is that they merely reflect, not cause, what is already happening in our collective midst. Consider Clark Gable's 1934 appearance sans undershirt in It Happened One Night, which reputedly prompted the sales of men's undershirts to drop by 75 percent. (Hollywood made up for this later, in 1951, when Marlon Brando appeared in a T-shirt and jeans in the film A Streetcar Named Desire and the sales of T-shirts spiked to new heights.) Did Gable cause this to happen, or was he reflecting changes then under way? Was he initiating a trend or following one? The truth is usually somewhere in between.

The same can be said of much modern-day advertising, although here we have to be careful. In marketing today the pickup of information and trends is so fast that advertising may be creeping ever closer to being a cause of change. In an era in which people are wired together and in which ''cool hunters'' track buying patterns among young people, a budding local fad or an emerging trend can be sniffed out in its infancy and catapulted into the national consciousness, sometimes with startling speed. Indeed, many marketers pride themselves on lightning turnarounds from the time a new movement is spotted to its appearance in their advertising, thus making them appear to be at the forefront of the ever-shifting edge of change. Thus, in increasing instances contemporary advertising involves a good deal more than the passive reflection of trends. At the very least, to borrow a term from Malcolm Gladwell's 2000 book The Tipping Point, marketers vastly accelerate the ''contagiousness'' of an idea or social phenomenon. Whether it is merely a new set of words (''Got [blank]?''), a social shift like the emphasis on fitness, or an emerging technology like text messaging, advertising, probably even more so than Hollywood, can and often does play the role of an accelerator, if not an out-and-out instigator, of cultural change.

One reason for the growing potency of advertising, besides the ever-improving accuracy and penetration of research, is its sheer ubiquity. To some extent this has resulted from the splintering and proliferation of the media. Not long ago advertising was primarily limited to the big five: television, radio, print, outdoor, and direct mail. In 1984 one study revealed that in a single day the average American was exposed to 560 commercial messages via these five media. Of these messages 76 were noticed, and of these 12 could be recalled 24 hours later. Of the 12 that could be recalled, 3 were remembered negatively. This meant that only 9 messages, or 1.6 percent, were recalled in a positive sense, which is a pretty dismal figure. Today, however, cable and satellite networks offer hundreds of television channels. Added to this is the cyberworld of websites, pop-up ads, E-mail spam, blogs, podcasts, and text messaging on cell phones, in addition to the ''ambient'' advertising that appears on such things as shopping carts, store shelves, the handles of gas pumps, banana peels, and even urinals. It has become virtually impossible to elude the grasp of advertising, and in general such increased pervasiveness has translated into increased persuasiveness.

It also has produced increased annoyance, however. Advertising has long been labeled the uninvited guest in our homes, offices, and cars. It arrives unbeckoned, usually interrupting some form of entertainment or search for information, insinuates itself into the recipient's mind with its hand out, and then goes away momentarily, only to resurface and repeat the cycle within a few minutes. As people feel more and more victimized by the omnipresence of advertising, their shell of resistance against it hardens. This is nothing new, but as advertising grows more and more ubiquitous, the shell grows more and more impenetrable. It is a vicious cycle. Just as industrialized nations spew noxious greenhouse gasses into the atmosphere in record amounts, so marketers spew vast clouds of often obnoxious advertising.

At least some of the advertising in this encyclopedia demonstrates there is a silver lining to these dark clouds. There is an increasing appreciation for the one tactic that has proven consistently adept at penetrating the shell of resistance. This is creativity. More specifically, it is advertising that defies traditional approaches in some way and that is fresh and interesting enough and, ironically, enough unlike advertising to slip past the resistance against it. Thus, brands like adidas, Nike, Burger King, FedEx, IKEA, Altoids, Volkswagen, and BMW Mini have consistently wielded the leverage of strong creativity in their branding. Without undertaking a detailed and difficult discussion of the many facets and hurdles of producing truly original advertising today, suffice it to say that there is an encouraging awareness of its growing importance and, in turn, of its implementation. This results not so much from curiosity or desire but more from coldhearted necessity. Ordinary advertising can no longer easily be justified by the dollars thrown at it. Bland advertising is being seen for what it is, a rotten business investment. To quote one of the more visionary creative deans of the industry, Jeff Goodby of Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, ''The best thing to have happened in advertising in the last 20 years is without a single doubt happening right now. This business, which for the most part has always tolerated creativity as a kind of goateed necessary evil, is now about to turn the joystick over to the creative force, big-time. It has no choice.'' This is good news not only for those in the business who endure the usually uphill battle of selling atypical work to clients and management but also to the vast public at the receiving end.

This brings us to another phenomenon, without which any discussion of the contemporary advertising landscape is incomplete, namely, the one new technology out of several that is most rapidly changing the ground rules. It is called, disarmingly enough, TiVo, a product that uses DVR, or digital video recording, technology. The TiVo black box already allows approximately 9 percent of U.S. television viewers merrily to fast-forward past all the uninvited advertising. Estimates are that by 2010 its penetration will reach one of every three households, which places an even greater premium and burden on creativity in advertising. As more viewers are armed with a simple button that can eradicate advertising, the advertising must become so entertaining that the viewer wants to watch it and makes a conscious decision to do so. Advertising must become so visually alluring that it compels a fast-forwarder to hit the brakes and view it, which is no small order.

Of course, another antidote to DVR technology is to embed advertising within the programming itself. This will likely move well beyond product placement, the technique that is used today, to the point that in a sitcom, for instance, an actor will not only swig on a Bud but the Bud will somehow become an integral part of the story line. Some screenwriters may well rebel at this, but others may happily pocket the increased residuals that would flow from such artful intertwining of commerce and scripting. Likewise, in printed media there may be an increasing use of advertorials, in which the lines between news about and advertising for new products become progressively fuzzier. Subliminal advertising in the twenty-first century may take this approach. Whereas the much maligned, though in fact rarely practiced, form of subliminal advertising in the 1950s supposedly relied on subconscious flashes of messages so fleetingly fast that the viewer was unaware of them, this new iteration is so subtle that it does not look or smell like advertising at all. It is woven into the entertainment in such a way that it is TiVo-proof.

But certainly the arena in which advertising and content will become the most homogenized is on the Web. While it is not possible to have a crystal ball that shows all of the twists and turns that are bound to take place over even the next few years, one thing is certain: the role of advertising on the Web will grow exponentially. We should expect the proliferation of cooperative websites like MySpace.com, on which two, three, or more advertisers join forces to allow consumers to do everything from conduct personal business and send E-mail, to share photos, play games, and post blogs that revolve around a communal topic. Think of adidas and Penn, for instance, on a tennis-centric site. In addition, television programming will make increasing use of the Web by allowing viewers to ''split-watch'' both, with commentary and ads on the Web related to what is happening simultaneously on the television screen. We should expect that virtually any television program will be available for instant downloading gratis, with one small string attached: the downloader must agree to accept certain commercials along with it.

BMW revealed the power of exciting minifilms with their products-in-action epics on the Web. Burger King allowed Web surfers to let a willing, kinky chicken do their bidding. And countless other brands have dabbled in experiential, if experimental, forms of ''webvertising.'' This will surely continue to evolve into far more interactive, and far more widely watched, fare as technology ramps up connection speeds, hard drives become insatiable, wireless connections become universal, and computer displays, TVs, cell phones, PDAs, and iPods continue to converge. But all of the convergence in the world will mean little commercially unless the content of the ad messages also continues to evolve in terms of entertainment and freshness.

As one who has ranted about the effectiveness of creativity in advertising for more than a few years, I naturally find these developments encouraging. And the looming hyperfragmentation of the media, while a bit unnerving, should serve only to solidify the importance of how well each message is crafted. Dare I say how artfully? Clearly the status quo is dead meat.

So peruse the 474 campaigns discussed in this encyclopedia. It is a unique gathering. From them you will glean insights and fresh perspectives, not the least of which will be an accurate sense of how far advertising has advanced during the first years of this new century. And with a little interpolation you may also emerge with a reasonably accurate sense of how it will continue to evolve over the rest of the decade.

Bill Borders

Introduction

Thomson Gale published the first volume of the Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns in 1999. It included nearly 500 essays, each on an important advertising campaign of the twentieth century. The present volume serves as an update to the first, offering an additional 474 essays on campaigns that appeared between the late 1990s and 2005.

There were three main criteria for selecting a campaign: its conceptual value or innovation (sometimes represented by the winning of awards); the importance of the company or brand for which it was run; and its effectiveness in selling the advertised product or service. The campaigns covered in this book were for products or services in various categories, such as alcoholic and other beverages, automobiles, food items, footwear, insurance, public service, pharmaceuticals, and telecommunications.

CONTENT AND ARRANGEMENT

EMMC is organized alphabetically by the name of the company for which the campaign was run. Thus, the ''Miller High Life'' campaign is listed under SABMiller plc, which manufactures Miller High Life beer. Each entry in the encyclopedia has the same sections:

Entry Head: Lists the company's name, address, phone and fax numbers, and web page.

Overview: Provides a brief summary of the campaign.

Historical Context: Discusses historical details of the brand, the company, the industry, or general culture needed to understand the featured campaign.

Target Market: Specifies the audience toward which the campaign was directed and the reason why that audience was targeted.

Competition: Points out the brand's major competitors and, if known, their market shares. Often discusses the competitors advertising campaigns.

Marketing Strategy: Discusses how the campaign was started, who started it, and what were some of the concerns and goals.

Outcome: Discusses the campaign's success in achieving its goals, if sales increased or decreased during the campaign, and whether the campaign received any awards or other critical attention.

Further Reading: Lists articles and books that provide information on the campaign or on marketing within the category.

Sidebar: Discusses a topic often peripheral to the main discussion but important in understanding the campaign, brand, product, or company.

In addition to the entries, the encyclopedia features a comprehensive index, photographs illustrating many of the campaigns and products, and a foreword—written by Bill Borders, founding partner of Borders, Perrin & Norrander—discussing important trends in contemporary marketing.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people were involved in putting together this book, some of whom are listed on the staff page. I would like to thank the advisers, who provided invaluable help with the selection of campaigns; Bill Borders, for the introduction; the contributors, who conducted extensive research for their entries, often with the help of the companies and advertising agencies associated with the campaigns; and the companies and agencies, without whom many of the essays could not have been written. I would also like to express my appreciation to Patrick Hutchins, whose advice at various stages of the project was essential; Mariko Fujinaka, who commissioned authors and assisted with other important tasks; Robert Rauch, Laura Gabler, and Anne Healey, for their editing; and Kimberly Burton and Jennifer Zielinski, who proofread the text. Finally, I would like to thank Holly Selden, who coordinated various in-house responsibilities.

COMMENTS AND SUGGESTIONS

Comments and suggestions, including ideas for future essays, are welcome. We invite readers to send us their thoughts to the following address:

Editor
Encyclopedia of Major Marketing Campaigns
Thomson Gale
27500 Drake Road
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535
Toll-free phone: 800-877-GALE

A & E Television Networks

235 East 45th Street
New York, New York 10017
USA
Telephone: (212) 210-1400
Fax: (212) 850-9370
Web site: www.aetv.com

■■■

IN CASE YOU MISSED IT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 the Concept Farm, a boutique advertising agency based in New York, launched a promotional effort for History Channel International, part of A & E Television Networks, itself a joint venture of Hearst, ABC, Inc., and NBC. History Channel International was carried alongside its older cousin, the History Channel, on many U.S. cable and satellite television systems, but it faced different challenges in reaching its target audience, men in the age range of 24 to 54. Not only did the agency have to find a way to make familiar historical footage seem fresh, but the spots also had to work in any number of cultures around the world.

Modestly budgeted, the Concept Farm's second campaign for History Channel International, called "In Case You Missed It," attempted to meet those challenges through a humorous mix of stock and contrived footage. The unfortunate heroes of the campaign's three 30-second spots were well situated to witness some of the most important moments in history, only to be accidentally distracted and miss the climax. Each ad closed with the title card, "In case you missed it the first time," and the History Channel logo.

The campaign, which began in 2001, was successful with American audiences, winning several awards and improving the status of the Concept Farm. The humor was not as well received in other countries, however, causing some overseas broadcast partners not to run the spots. As a result, more serious-minded promotional campaigns followed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Concept Farm was founded by advertising veterans frustrated by working at big agencies. According to Anthony Vagnoni, writing for Print, "They started the company so that they could freely pursue ideas for new kinds of advertising and explore projects that would otherwise be abandoned." Griffin Stenger, one of the firm's cofounders and creative directors, told Vagnoni, "We've all seen too many ideas get killed by account people or marketing executives at big corporate clients." Like many boutiques, the Concept Farm looked for niche opportunities, in particular in the field of broadcast promotions (ads for TV channels and their programs).

As the number of television channels increased dramatically with the rise of cable television, so, too, did the need to promote them. Although the budgets were small and the deadlines tight, the Concept Farm was attracted to the freedom afforded by broadcast clients. Television marketing departments had fewer management layers than those of other companies, and this streamlined the approval process and allowed ad agencies a better chance of seeing their work on the screen unfiltered. As Gregg

Wasiak, a cofounder of the Concept Farm, told Ann-Christine Diaz of Advertising Age's Creativity, "The speed at which everything has to happen really means broadcast clients have to make a lot of gut decisions. They understand their brand and they go with it." Time was not the only limited commodity. Promoting a TV channel required a great number of commercials, and so the budget for each spot was small. Wasiak put a positive spin on the problem, explaining, "It forces you to be simple and think creatively."

When the Concept Farm landed the job of promoting History Channel International, it faced hurdles beyond time and budgetary constraints. Because of language and cultural barriers related to the channel's global market, the shop had to focus on visuals. Given the limited budget, the firm knew that it would rely on stock film footage, but the task of making the overly familiar seem interesting again remained daunting. Wasiak told Diaz, "We wanted to serve up what's great about the History Channel, some of the most spectacular film you've ever seen about history, in a way you've never seen before."

The Concept Farm's first History Channel International campaign, "Go Back in Time," employed the simple technique of playing a tired film backward to make it fresh. One spot showed Jesse Owens landing in the pit on his gold-medal-winning long jump at the 1936 Berlin Olympics. He was pulled back in the air and ran in reverse, accompanied by a voiceover: "Go back in time and see the leaps we've made." Another spot reversed the infamous summary execution of a prisoner during the Vietnam War. One ad in the campaign used footage of the Hindenburg disaster, showing the exploding dirigible returning to its original form. Wasiak elaborated on the effect of seeing the tragedy in reverse: "You understand that those were not 'moments in history' until that instant. We wanted to work backwards from that point and understand that that's when history was made."

For its second effort for History Channel International, the Concept Farm elected to continue exploiting stock material. It found another creative way to breathe life into tired footage in the "In Case You Missed It" campaign.

A LONG COUNT

One of the subjects in History Channel International's "In Case You Missed It" ads, German boxer Max Schmeling, became the unwilling tool of the Nazis following his defeat of African-American Joe Louis in 1936. Although portrayed as the "Aryan Superman" by Nazi propagandists, Schmeling hid a pair of Jewish boys in his apartment to spare them from a Nazi mob and reportedly helped some Jewish friends avoid the death camps. When Louis in later life fell upon hard times, Schmeling quietly provided him money. Looking back on the second fight with Louis in 1938, he said that he was almost happy he lost, "Just imagine if I would have come back to Germany with a victory. I had nothing to do with the Nazis, but they would have given me a medal. After the war I might have been considered a war criminal." In February 2005 Schmeling died at the age of 99, his only regret being that he did not live to see 100.

TARGET MARKET

Like its cousin, the History Channel, History Channel International considered its target audience to be men between the ages of 24 and 54. Most viewers, however, tended to be closer to the upper end of that age range. The broadcaster was interested in lowering the average, but as Charlie Mayday, A & E's senior vice president of programming, explained to Michael Rose of Video Age International, "You have to accept that the subject appeals to an older audience." On the upside, continued Mayday, the audience existed all over the world, and "a good story" would transcend national boundaries.

COMPETITION

In the realm of cable television, History Channel International's main rivals were the multitude of broadcasters—such as the Discovery Channel, ESPN, and other sports programmers—that targeted the same male demographic. In a larger sense, however, History Channel International was vying with every other advertiser for the attention of its coveted audience; thus, its competitors included deep-pocketed beer companies, automakers, and Hollywood film studios.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As was the case with the initial promotional campaign for History Channel International, the Concept Farm in its second effort had to contend with a small budget, a limited number of chances to speak to its target audience, and a crowded marketplace, while finding a way to achieve global appeal and to overcome language and cultural barriers. The new campaign, titled "In Case You Missed It," centered on spectators who were distracted and missed the key moment of an important historical event. Wasiak told Diaz that the inspiration came from his own life: "I remember when Buster Douglas knocked out Mike Tyson, I was taking a pee. I missed the whole thing. When man first landed on the moon, there must have been somebody who was in the bathroom and missed all that."

The Concept Farm used the History Channel's film archives as well as two stock footage houses, Archive Films in New York and WPA in Chicago. Then the team created its own "lost footage," the shots of the commercials' protagonists. The newly filmed action, though humorous, was carefully matched in style to the real historical clips.

The three 30-second spots in the "In Case You Missed It" campaign were written by Wasiak and first appeared in the spring of 2001. The ad called "Boxing" concerned the first historic fight between Joe Louis and Max Schmeling in 1936. Intercut with actual footage of the fight were shots of a ringside photographer poised to take the climactic shot in the bout. By accident his flash went off, temporarily blinding him and causing him to miss Schmeling delivering the knockout punch to Louis. As would be the case with all the spots, a title card then faded in, reading "In case you missed it the first time," followed by the History Channel logo. The second spot, "Coronation," used footage from the coronation of England's Queen Elizabeth II in 1953. Two members of the nobility quietly watched the solemn occasion, but just as the archbishop was about to place the crown on Elizabeth's head, one of them dropped his hat. In the course of bending over to retrieve it, he inadvertently hit his neighbor in the groin with his scepter. The victim doubled over in pain and missed the crowning. The spot closed with his valiant effort to share in his comrade's joy while suffering through the pain. The final ad, called "Moon Landing," depicted astronaut Neil Armstrong's first steps on the moon. In Mission Control a NASA engineer looked on, watching the television screen and drinking coffee. He spilled the coffee on his lap and looked away just as Armstrong was about to hop onto the lunar surface. By the time he looked up again, Armstrong had already completed his historic moment. The engineer could do nothing but feign enthusiasm and mask his embarrassment.

OUTCOME

The "In Case You Missed It" campaign garnered several awards for the Concept Farm. It won a Eurobest Award in 2001, the Gold Pencil in the Consumer Television Campaign (:30/:25) category at the One Show in 2002, an American Advertising Award (ADDY) in 2002, and an Andy Award from the Advertising Club of New York in 2003. The Concept Farm's Stenger told Millie Takaki, writing for Shoot, about the importance of winning the Gold Pencil: "We were up against many top production companies and ad agencies, and for us it validated our whole creative philosophy." After receiving that award the Concept Farm began getting requests from other agencies to direct their commercials. In response the agency created the Production Farm, an independently operated production company that used the directorial talent of the Concept Farm.

Although the Concept Farm's work was lauded by the firm's peers, History Channel International was not completely pleased with the campaign. As the number of countries it served grew significantly, the broadcaster became increasingly worried about offending local sensitivities. Humor, in particular, played differently from country to country. The Concept Farm developed two more promotional campaigns for History Channel International that took a more serious approach, the last one relying on montages of historical footage set to music, thus eliminating the need for graphics that would have had to have been translated dozens of times.

FURTHER READING

Diaz, Ann-Christine. "Ecce Promo: The Fertile Field of Broadcast Promotions." Advertising Age's Creativity, October 1, 2002.

———. "Revisionism Reconsidered: New York's the Concept Farm Cultivates New Ideas from Old Events for the History Channel." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 2001.

Diedrick, Brian. "BBDO N.Y., GSD&M Top TV ADDYs." Shoot, June 14, 2002, p. 1.

Kim, Hank. "The One Show." AdAgeGlobal, May 2002, p. 14.

Solman, Gregory. "New History Channel Ads Remember Things Past." Adweek, June 14, 2004, p. 15.

Takaki, Millie. "The Concept Farm Launches Product Farm." Shoot, September 19, 2003, p. 8.

Vagnoni, Anthony. "Look at Me." Print, January 2003, p. 48.

Wilcha, Kristin. "It's Hip to Be 'Square' at the ANDYs." Shoot, May 9, 2003, p. 1.

———. "Short Route: BMW Tops One Show." Shoot, May 17, 2002, p. 1.

Zammit, Deanna. "Concept Farm Touts A & E Overseas." Adweek (eastern ed.), May 27, 2003.

Ed Dinger

ABC, Inc.

77 W. 66th Street
New York, New York 10023-6298
USA
Telephone: (212) 456-7777
Fax: (212) 456-7777
Web site: www.abc.go.com

■■■

TV IS GOOD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Traditionally, every summer the broadcast television networks launched marketing campaigns to spotlight their program offerings for the coming season. The campaigns were often uneventful and run-of-the-mill, with viewers and the media paying little notice. In 1997, however, ABC, Inc., unveiled a different kind of campaign created by TBWA\Chiat\Day in Los Angeles. The campaign, called ''TV Is Good,'' was designed to help ABC break out of the traditional confines of network slogans and logos, and it created a stir.

Targeting viewers aged 18 to 49 and leveraging a budget of $12 million in its first season, ''TV Is Good'' directly addressed the guilt associated with watching television. Commercials featured messages that verged on the cynical, such as ''Don't worry, you've got billions of brain cells,'' and ''Life Is Short. Watch TV.'' While many in the media criticized the campaign's apparently insincere celebration of decadent TV-watching, the resulting debate about the merits of ''TV Is Good'' built considerable buzz around the ABC brand. A 1998–99 modification of the campaign, budgeted at $15 million and tagged ''We Love TV,'' further contributed to ABC's emerging personality.

Although industry observers widely credited the overall campaign with contributing a distinct brand positioning to ABC, the network continued to suffer ratings declines. Because this was a problem endemic to broadcast TV at the time, however, such statistics were not an accurate measure of the success of the marketing campaign. During the 1999–2000 TV season and beyond, ABC continued to refine the marketing style and tone first introduced in 1997.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

While ABC and the other two main broadcast networks, CBS Broadcasting Inc. (CBS) and the NBC Television Network (NBC), had enjoyed a virtual monopoly on prime-time television for decades, the 1980s saw increasing competition from cable television networks such as the Cable News Network (CNN) and Home Box Office (HBO) as well as the Fox Broadcasting Company. Cable networks gradually eroded the big three's dominance of the market. In 1977, 93 percent of households watched one of the big three networks, but 10 years later that figure had slipped to 70 percent. By 1996 the big three commanded only 49 percent of the prime-time audience, the first time ever that the combined share of ABC, CBS, and NBC had fallen below 50 percent.

Like CBS and NBC, ABC faced tough financial times in the 1980s, and it had to enact cost-cutting measures just to stay profitable. Capital Cities purchased ABC in 1985, and in 1995 it was bought by Disney. By 1996 ABC had fallen to third place in prime-time ratings, with only 15 percent of all viewers, behind front-runners NBC (18 percent) and CBS (16 percent). The network decided that it had to seek a clear, strong image to compete with NBC and CBS and the various cable channels.

TARGET MARKET

While television networks, as mass-media businesses, wanted to attract as many viewers as possible for their advertisers, ABC's 1997 campaign targeted a narrower market. The whimsical style of the "TV Is Good" campaign was specifically aimed at a youthful audience. During the early 1990s ABC was the number one network among the 18–49 age group, the market advertisers coveted; by 1997, however, the network had slipped to a distant second in this market. All efforts were directed at winning back this audience.

This tactic did not please everyone. For example, Joseph Turow, professor of media at the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg School for Communication, said of the "TV Is Good" campaign, "I don't think they care if it turns off people who are over the hill. Advertisers and networks are really getting manic about attracting people under 30." Alan Cohen, ABC's executive vice president for marketing, said that the network was not intentionally spurning people over 49. Cohen told the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette that, when ABC tested its campaign promos on viewers aged 18–54, "The campaign played universally the same . . . The audience is right with us on this."

COMPETITION

In addition to CBS and NBC, ABC faced competition from the increasingly robust Fox network. The many cable networks, including CNN, HBO, ESPN, Showtime, Nickelodeon, Comedy Central, the Discovery Channel, USA Network, E! Entertainment Television, and the Family Channel, also presented ABC with competition.

Before 1997 there was a difference in the way broadcast networks and cable channels used marketing campaigns. Broadcast networks relied on slogans—such as "We're still the one"—and promos to market their new seasons. Cable networks, however, used the style of marketing known as branding, in which consumers were led to identify the company or product with a specific image. For example, Nickelodeon marketed its shows as family-based entertainment that children especially would enjoy. Its marketing encouraged viewers to think of family fun whenever they saw or heard the Nickelodeon name. CNN marketed its shows as no-nonsense programs for people who enjoyed hard news, inviting viewers to identify the network as a reputable, sober source for information.

The 1997 season saw the broadcast networks attempting to use branding for the first time. While ABC was using "TV Is Good" to project a lighthearted image, NBC's marketing campaign promoted "Must-see TV," and CBS advertised "Welcome Home." The NBC campaign attempted to capitalize on its ratings successes, using stars from top-rated programs such as Seinfeld in on-air promos. The CBS "Welcome Home" campaign, which was also used in 1996, attempted to portray the network as the place for "comfort and dependability," according to a company executive. Fox, UPN, and the WB had similar slogans. "The name of the game now is branding, the quaint notion of imbuing a network with a personality that will give a sort of halo effect to the programs it presents," wrote Gary Levin in Variety,

NBC'S TAKEOFF

ABC and competitor NBC took a few shots at each other over the "TV Is Good" campaign. NBC fired the first volley when it ran a satirical spot during its prime-time megahit Seinfeld. The spot featured black lettering on a yellow background, just like the ABC ads. The copy read, "Right now you could be watching another network. But you're not stupid. You're watching the number-one network in America. The National Broadcasting Company." On the record ABC responded through a spokesman, who quipped, "Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." Off the record ABC faxed a five-page memo to NBC headquarters, reportedly with one line on each page: (1) "Right now you could be writing original promos"; (2) "But you're not"; (3) "You're copying ours"; (4) "Thanks!" (5) "ABC."

The wackiness was not over, however. According to the New York Times, NBC employees—allegedly writers for the sitcom 3rd Rock from the Sun—drafted mock promotions of the ABC campaign. The promos, which clearly were takeoffs on the "TV Is Good" theme, featured lines such as "Museums cause cancer; we mean it. You'll die," and "Our laziness and stupidity are good news for Japan." But ABC had the last laugh, for the hubbub surrounding the campaign only meant more publicity for a third-place network anxious for attention.

describing the networks' 1997 campaigns. ''Desperate to hold viewers, ABC, CBS, NBC, and Fox are copying successful cable networks with identifiable personalities,'' added the Orange County Register 's Kinney Littlefield.

MARKETING STRATEGY

ABC's third-place position in the ratings convinced its executives that the time was right to try something completely different. As Cohen told Broadcasting & Cable, ''When you're not number one, you have to take more chances.'' ABC's research had revealed that most television viewers could not distinguish between the existing network advertising slogans and that most people tended to ignore logos or stars repeating catchphrases. Cohen said, ''They were all drowning out each other, and it left networks without a brand identity.'' The goal of the ABC campaign was clear. Cohen explained to the Salt Lake Tribune, ''We want to establish an attitude and personality for ABC that's funny, friendly, and irreverent.''

Through test and focus groups the network had further discovered that people enjoyed television more than they were willing to admit, and as Lee Clow, TBWA\Chiat\Day's chairman, explained, the agency based its creative approach on this knowledge. ''As you talk to people about their lives these days and how stressed they are, TV is this period of time where they actually get to recuperate a little bit,'' Clow said. ''Kind of just plop yourself down and let something happen to you so you don't have to use your brain and work too hard for a few minutes. So we thought, why not kind of honestly celebrate the notion that TV is a good part of our lives, and sitting down in front of it for a while isn't a bad thing.''

Launching a marketing campaign that celebrated television was not without risks in 1997. At the time there was outspoken criticism of television, with many people objecting to the sexual situations, strong language, and violence found in the programming. By choosing to praise television at a time when it was popular to criticize the medium, ABC knew that it was taking a chance.

The first phase of the campaign, which did not mention specific network programs, appeared on television. These spots established the visual elements that would define the campaign throughout its run: a yellow background on which appeared the black text of witty slogans offering a variety of takes on the ''TV Is Good'' theme. The initial wave of spots featured messages such as ''Don't worry, you've got billions of brain cells,'' ''You can talk to your wife anytime,'' ''The couch is your friend,'' and ''Life is short. Watch TV.'' Print and billboard ads appeared next, and, finally, the network began running spots for individual shows that incorporated the campaign style. In addition to the ads, ABC initiated cross-promotions with American Airlines, McDonald's, and Toys ''R'' Us. In the American Airlines promotion, the monthly newsletter for AAdvantage members included trivia questions about plot twists in ABC shows. AAdvantage members could then earn frequent-flier miles by mailing in correct answers to the questions. This extensive marketing reflected the fact that ABC had increased its advertising and promotion budget by 30 percent over the previous year. The budget for ''TV Is Good'' was approximately $12 million in 1997–98.

The TV spots got the attention of the press even before they were first broadcast. The message was quickly picked up by newspaper writers, and ABC was thrust into the media spotlight. Under the headline ''Ads that Rot Your Brain,'' Jonathan Foreman of the Wall Street Journal wrote, ''The new TV season gets under way this week, amidst one of the worst ad campaigns of all time. In an apparent effort to win over the young viewers of 'Generation X,' ABC settled on irony as an advertising gimmick.'' Monica Collins of the Boston Herald said, ''At ABC, they're underestimating us like mad while the network runs the snootiest ad campaign ever.'' Some ABC affiliates had misgivings about the advertisements, too. Complaints from several affiliates convinced the network to drop one spot that said, ''Books are overrated.'' In addition, organizations critical of television, including the nonprofit TV-Free America, blasted the commercials. As the spots began to air and the media debate about the campaign's merits gathered steam, Cohen told Bill Carter of the New York Times, ''The reality is the spots have already worked. People are talking about ABC.'' Jamie Tarses, then the entertainment president for ABC, told Broadcasting & Cable, ''Anybody would give their left arm for this kind of attention. This is what you want if you're selling television shows or cars or whatever . . . It's about making noise.''

For the 1998–99 TV season, TBWA\Chiat\Day offered what it called an ''evolved'' version of the campaign, which, according to the New York Times, ''is adspeak for 'You don't like it? All right, already! We'll change it.'" The ironic humor was toned down, and ''TV Is Good'' was changed to the slightly more sincere ''We Love TV.'' The messages continued to be delivered in the same visual style (black text on a bright yellow background), and many seemed in keeping with the brashness of the previous seasons. For instance, one spot advised viewers, ''Don't just sit there. Okay, just sit there&'' another offered the dubious historical interpretation ''Before TV, two world wars. After TV, zero.'' But the campaign also began to offer less polarizing messages, such as ''TV, so good they named a frozen meal after it,'' and ''Without a TV, how would you know where to put the sofa?'' The 1998–99 season likewise marked an increase in series-specific commercials using the overall campaign's visual elements, humorous tone, and tagline. The campaign budget for that season was estimated at $15 million.

OUTCOME

ABC saw its "TV Is Good" campaign as successful for a number of reasons. First, the campaign received an impressive amount of press coverage. Second, another of the big three networks added to the publicity windfall by mocking the campaign with a television spot of its own. Third, public response to the campaign was mostly favorable. Cohen said to Tom Feran of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, "We did talk to a lot of viewers around the country and show them this material, and I think people sort of got it. They said, 'Wow, this is funny. ABC is funny. They must have good comedies.' And that's exactly the connection we wanted them to make."

Though industry observers likewise credited the network with effectively generating consumer interest and with building an identifiable brand image for itself, 1997–98 saw ABC's ratings decline more precipitously than those of the other two major networks. The many problems confronting ABC—ratings declines, an inability to create popular new programs, and ever-increasing competition from cable networks—were, however, the problems facing its broadcast competitors as well. In this context, ratings increases were not necessarily a realistic eventuality, at least in the short term. "The story isn't so much growth anymore," Joe Mandese, editor of the industry newsletter The Myers Report, told the New York Times, "as preserving your share." The network's ratings continued to decline in the following years, but so did those of NBC and CBS.

In the 1999–2000 season ABC and TBWA\Chiat\Day further redefined the brand-building project. Although the network's promotional spots continued to employ the visual elements and a measure of the ironic humor from the previous two seasons' campaigns, the new tagline, "America's Broadcasting Company," seemed to mark a departure in tone and strategy. The network and its agency maintained that the campaign was not a reversal of the previous years' tactics but rather a further evolution. This view was supported by a recurring message in the "America's Broadcasting Company" spots: "United we watch."

FURTHER READING

Battaglio, Stephen. "ABC Enjoys the Spread of Yellow-Spotted Fever." Hollywood Reporter, August 18, 1997, p.1.

Carter, Bill. "ABC's 'TV Is Good' Campaign Spawns Satirical Admiration." Arizona Republic, August 21, 1997, p. C6.

Elliott, Stuart. "ABC Stays with Old Yellow, but It's an 'Evolved' Form." New York Times, June 11, 1998.

———. "In an Unconventional Campaign, ABC Labels Itself America's Broadcasting Company." New York Times,

Feran, Tom. "ABC's Edgy Ads Getting Sharp Reaction." Cleveland Plain Dealer, August 25, 1997, p. 1E.

Holston, Noel. "Dumb and Dumber: ABC Promos Embrace the Boob Tube." Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune, August 16, 1997, p. 1E.

Levin, Gary. "Promos: No 'Slogans Heroes.'" Variety, June 22, 1997, p. 1.

Lippert, Barbara. "I Want My ABC." New York Magazine, August 18, 1997, p. 20.

Littlefield, Kinney. "'TV Is Good' Says Nothing about ABC." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, August 24, 1997, p. F5.

Moore, Frazier. "'TV Is Good'? ABC's Ad Campaign Strives for Irony." Salt Lake Tribune, May 28, 1997, p. B7.

Pope, Kyle,"ABC Brings Back a New Variation of 'TV Is Good,'" Wall Street Journal, June 11, 1998.

Santiago, Denise-Marie. "ABC's 'Hip' Ad Campaign Is Causing Comment—Pro and Con." Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, August 25, 1997, p. D3.

Alden Scott Crow
Mark Lane

Abercrombie & Fitch

6301 Fitch Path
New Albany, Ohio 43054
USA
Telephone: (614) 283-6500
Fax: (614) 283-6710
Web site: www.abercrombie.com

■■■

A & F QUARTERLY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Once renowned for supplying the rich and famous of America with outdoor gear, Abercrombie & Fitch (A & F) went bankrupt in the 1970s and was reinvented in the late 1980s as an apparel retailer for college-age teens and young adults. After going public in 1996, the company began to focus on marketing itself as a lifestyle brand, selling a freewheeling collegiate image more than engaging in any sustained pitches about product quality. With the help of Sam Shahid and Bruce Weber, the creative director and photographer who had together created such sexually explicit ad campaigns as those on behalf of Calvin Klein's Obsession fragrance in the 1980s, A & F in 1997 launched a hybrid of consumer magazine and product catalog—an increasingly popular marketing tool commonly called a ''magalog''—that became the focus of its branded advertising for the next six years.

The ''A & F Quarterly,'' as the publication was called, leaned heavily on magazine-like editorial features and art photography, with much less emphasis on traditional catalog fare like product specifications and pictures in which the clothing was central. In keeping with Weber's past work, the photos were notable for their focus on male bodies and for an open attitude toward sexuality in general. Many of the features in the magazine were controversial, including one encouraging the consumption of alcohol and another focusing on group sex. Though the magalog aimed to showcase the college lifestyle in a way that appealed to A & F's target market, many believed that it had the simultaneous goal of intentionally inciting controversy.

When the ''A & F Quarterly'' was discontinued in 2003, opinions were mixed as to its effectiveness as a marketing tool. There was little argument about the fact that it had raised the brand's profile immeasurably, but A & F sales had been consistently underwhelming since 2000. Some commentators observed that the company had reached a point beyond which further escalation of the magalog's shock value would become virtually impossible, and the company's future marketing course was uncertain. Nevertheless, the ''A & F Quarterly'' was a groundbreaking entry in the emerging magalog field.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Abercrombie & Fitch began life as a lower-Manhattan-based purveyor of high-quality hunting, fishing, and camping gear, and in the early twentieth century the store developed a loyal customer base among wealthy outdoors enthusiasts, including numerous famous Americans. Teddy Roosevelt visited the store to prepare for his numerous big-game expeditions, and every subsequent president through Gerald Ford was said to have been an Abercrombie & Fitch patron. Aviators Charles Abercrombie & Fitch store in Bridgewater (New Jersey) Commons Shopping Mall.

© NAJLAH FEANNY/CORBIS.

Lindbergh and Amelia Earhart were notable Abercrombie & Fitch customers, as were screen stars Greta Garbo, Katharine Hepburn, and Clark Gable. The author Ernest Hemingway regularly bought gear and guns from Abercrombie & Fitch, including the shotgun he used to commit suicide.

By the late 1960s Abercrombie & Fitch had expanded substantially, with stores across the United States, but the company's fortunes nevertheless declined through the late 1970s, when it went bankrupt and was purchased by the sporting goods chain Oshman's. Abercrombie & Fitch fared little better under its new corporate parent, and in 1988 it was sold again, this time to The Limited, Inc. (later called Limited Brands). The Limited, Inc., had experienced success with concept-store startups including the women's clothing retailers The Limited and Express as well as the lingerie emporium Victoria's Secret. During the 1990s Abercrombie & Fitch's image was drastically recast. Though still retaining hints of its rugged outfitter's roots, the company became a maker of high-end casual wear for teens and college students. Abercrombie & Fitch went public in 1996, and The Limited divested itself of equity in the company.

Abercrombie & Fitch marketing was helmed in-house by Sam Shahid, the company's creative director as well as the president and creative director of his own agency, Shahid & Co., which represented other fashion brands as well. In preparing for the introduction of "A & F Quarterly," Shahid enlisted the photographer Bruce Weber, whose arty fashion photographs were well known for their sensuality. Shahid, creative director for Calvin Klein in the 1980s, had worked with Weber on the famously controversial sexual images in ads for such products as Obsession cologne.

TARGET MARKET

Abercrombie & Fitch's official target market from the late 1990s onward was no secret. Chairman and CEO Michael S. Jeffries told the Wall Street Journal, "We're a life-style brand, projecting inside the store and outside the store the life style of a very specific customer, the 18-to-22-year-old American college student." Though these young people were undoubtedly the brand's core loyalists, some critics believed that the company was also intentionally targeting younger teens with the consistently controversial images and editorial content in "A & F Quarterly." Abercrombie & Fitch (A & F) acknowledged that younger teens had been won over to the brand but argued that this was a function of kids' desire to emulate elder siblings and other trendsetters. After numerous complaints that young teens were purchasing the magalog, A & F established a policy requiring identification upon its purchase.

A & F was in the business of selling casual clothes often described as having a preppy or fraternity-house look, but its marketing focused less on the clothes

THE LIMITS OF PROVOCATION

Though Abercrombie & Fitch claimed that it did not intentionally incite controversy as a means of spurring sales, many industry observers took it for granted that this was the company's overriding strategy for building its image. After crossing the line, in the opinion of numerous public-advocacy groups, with a 1998 "A & F Quarterly" issue encouraging college students to drink creatively (and, accordingly, to excess), the company's magalog (a cross between a magazine and a catalog) continued to push the bounds of decency with images that included exposed male pubic hair and that depicted Santa and Mrs. Claus in a scene of sadomasochistic sexual play. In 2002 the company's provocation moved into new territory: it released a line of T-shirts featuring images of Asians along with text that many considered overtly racist. A & F apologized, as was its practice after inciting controversy, and it saw its stock price reach a yearly high. Later that year the company unveiled a line of thong underwear for girls aged 7 to 14 and then pulled the product a month later in the face of intense criticism, apologizing for any offense it had caused.

themselves than on a brand personality. This personality was built on celebratory and irreverent evocations of the college lifestyle, including an emphasis on freewheeling behavior, alcohol consumption, and especially on sexually suggestive images. Though many provocative images of women appeared, the preponderance of nearly nude men in the magalog, many of whom were pictured in groups, led to widespread observations that the publication was homoerotic. Though A & F built a following among gay men during this time, the company denied that it was intentionally marketing to gays. In response to charges that the magalog objectified the male body, campaign creator Sam Shahid told the Wall Street Journal, "Fine. Let them complain. Gays love it; straights love it; girls love it . . . It's in the eye of the beholder."

Beginning with a 1998 installment said to encourage irresponsible drinking, individual issues of the magalog repeatedly courted controversy, as did A & F clothing products in the 2000s. The company denied the widespread belief that it intentionally sparked controversy even at the expense of seeming offensive, but conventional wisdom maintained that the cultivation of a spirit of rebelliousness verging on the offensive was a marketing tactic of particular usefulness among college students.

COMPETITION

One of A & F's chief competitors was the mammoth chain the Gap, which was long associated with basic casual apparel such as khakis, T-shirts, and jeans. After several years of slumping sales and an ill-conceived attempt to branch out into more ambitious fashion styles, the chain refocused its energy on its basic lines in 1998. This return to form was announced and driven by a $300 million marketing campaign. TV spots in the campaign showed young men and women in Gap khakis and shirts, dancing and riding skateboards against a soundtrack of energetic music. Gap sales began to rebound, supplementing gains in the parent company Gap Inc.'s other chains, which included Banana Republic and Old Navy.

American Eagle Outfitters was a more direct competitor, as it targeted virtually the same group of young people as A & F, and with markedly similar clothing. In fact, the resemblance was close enough that A & F filed an unsuccessful lawsuit in 1998, alleging that American Eagle had copied its styles. Though A & F was perceived as having more status among teens and college students, American Eagle clothing was less expensive. The competition between the two clothiers became especially intense during the bleak sales season following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. In the months leading up to Christmas 2001, A & F fought American Eagle with large-scale discounts and coupons, forcing American Eagle to discount even further (and forcing both companies to absorb heavy losses). The holiday 2001 season also saw American Eagle run its first TV commercials ever. Though less explicit than A & F's marketing, the American Eagle campaign similarly appealed to teen and young adult sexuality with scenes of young people dancing and kissing.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Though analysts contended that magalogs were not an efficient way of generating sales, A & F was able to build a signature environment with the "A & F Quarterly" and to rival the distribution numbers of successful mainstream magazines, thereby communicating its brand message in great depth to a loyal audience. Meanwhile, the provocative photographs and editorial content had the effect of consistently generating controversy. Far from hurting the company, these successive controversies added to the word-of-mouth buzz around the brand, which extended well beyond the magalogs' distribution base. The "A & F Quarterly" showed shots of merchandise for sale, but its primary focus was on images of attractive young men and women wearing minimal amounts of A & F apparel while engaged in suggestive recreational activities. There were also editorial features geared to the college lifestyle. Each issue focused on a seasonal range of activities in the college student's life. The fall issue used variations on a back-to-school theme, whereas the winter issue featured holiday imagery and content, the spring issue focused logically on spring break, and the summer issue evoked summer vacation. The magalog initially sold for $5 a copy—the price was later increased to $6—with a yearly subscription fee of $12. At the height of its popularity the quarterly's circulation was estimated at 220,000.

This format remained consistent throughout the six years that "A & F Quarterly" was produced, but several issues were singled out by critics for their alleged objectionable content. The fall 1998 issue was the first of these. Together with images of naked young people in a feature on campus "streaking" and tongue-in-cheek sexual advice in an article called "The Rules of Attraction," A & F ran a piece called "Drinking 101," which offered recipes for drinks such as the "Brain Hemorrhage" and advised its college-age audience (many of whom were not of legal drinking age) to "indulge in some creative drinking this semester." Vocal complaints from groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving led A & F to recall the unsold issues and physically excise the "Drinking 101" article. Once issues were returned to stores, A & F placed a responsible-drinking message on the magalog cover.

The Christmas 1999 issue of the magalog incited further controversy. The cover featured a shirtless young man holding a teddy bear, his pubic hair exposed by the low waistline of his pants, and another image in the magalog showed Santa Claus on his knees in front of Mrs. Claus, who was wearing a leather bustier and brandishing a whip. The issue also included an interview with the pornographic-movie star Jenna Jameson and a photo of the actor and comedian Andy Dick standing naked on an urban street with a sign in front of his midsection reading, "Hot nuts." Complaints from the Michigan attorney general about the Christmas issue further stoked the A & F buzz, and the company responded by placing a warning on the issue's cover declaring that it was intended for mature audiences only. The year 1999 also saw A & F take its sensual imagery to cable TV with commercials focusing on college men's wrestling teams.

After the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, marketers in all sectors found themselves rethinking their advertising messages, and A & F's irreverently sexual personality was not a good fit for the historical moment. The company canceled publication of the magalog's winter 2001 issue. A significant evolution in the "A & F Quarterly" came with 2002's summer issue, in which the company sold advertising space to other marketers looking to reach a college-age audience. Products advertised in that issue included SoBe beverages and the Sony Playstation 2 video-game system. In 2002 the magalog also came under fire for the lack of racial diversity among its models, many of whom had blond hair and blue eyes. This controversy dovetailed with the uproar over A & F T-shirts featuring text and images that were widely seen as promoting an offensive caricature of Asians. The Christmas 2003 issue, the cover of which touted "group sex and more," was recalled after widespread protests, and a 60 Minutes report alleged that the company relegated its minority employees and others who did not fit the blond-haired, blue-eyed archetype to positions in back of the store rather than in more visible jobs. Meanwhile softening sales at A & F stores nationwide led investors to question the company's relative neglect of advertising channels outside of the magalog. On December 9, 2003, the company announced that the Christmas issue then in circulation would be the last "A & F Quarterly" to see publication.

OUTCOME

Between 1997 and 1999, while A & F expanded rapidly and posted double-digit sales growth in individual stores, the "A & F Quarterly" was praised as an innovative and effective marketing tool. As disappointing 1999 sales results began to emerge, however, many in the media began to question A & F's marketing strategy. Sales figures in the years 2000–03 proved equally disappointing, and though these years corresponded with a dramatically slumping American economy, analysts also criticized A & F's approach to marketing. Richard E. Jaffe, a retail analyst with the firm UBS, told the New York Times that "the magalog was effective at raising visibility" but that "in terms of its racy content, it became harder and harder to outdo themselves, to provoke, to generate a reaction and create the excitement of the past." At the time of the discontinuation of "A & F Quarterly," A & F had seen declines in its key sales measurement—sales at stores open at least a year—for 39 of the preceding 46 months. Despite these criticisms, the "A & F Quarterly" was indisputably one of the most talked-about print campaigns of its time, and it was roundly acknowledged as an influential pioneer in the growing magalog movement.

FURTHER READING

Carr, David, and Tracie Rozhon. "Abercrombie & Fitch to End Its Racy Magazine." New York Times, December 10, 2003.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "Abercrombie & Fitch." Advertising Age, June 28, 1999.

———. "Abercrombie & Fitch Takes Its Ads to TV." Advertising Age, August 2, 1999.

Edwards, Jim. "Saving Face." Brandweek, October 6, 2003.

Elliott, Stuart. "After Sept. 11, Value and Price Become the Themes for Promoting Holiday Shopping." New York Times, November 16, 2001.

———. "Come Hither: Abercrombie & Fitch Invites Other Advertisers into Its A & F Quarterly." New York Times, May 3, 2002.

Gross, Daniel. "Abercrombie & Fitch's Blue Christmas." Slate, December 8, 2003. Available from <http://www.slate.com/id/2092175>

Lindsay, Greg. "Morphing Magalogs." Folio: The Magazine for Magazine Management, July 2002.

Lippert, Barbara. "Season's Meetings." Adweek, December 20, 1999.

Wells, Melanie. "Anticlimax." Forbes, March 20, 2000.

White, Erin. "Showdown in Sweaterland: A & F, American Eagle Tussle Selling Look-Alike Clothing to Same Group of Teens." Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2001.

Williams, Mark. "Catalog Controversy." Marketing News, September 14, 1998.

Mark Lane

Accenture, Ltd.

22 Victoria Street
Hamilton, HM12
Bermuda
Telephone: (441) 296-8262
Fax: (441) 296-4245
Web site: www.accenture.com

■■■

I AM YOUR IDEA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Andersen Consulting, a global technology, management, and outsourcing consultancy, was forced to change its name after splitting with its sibling company, the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, in January 2001. The rebranded company, Accenture, Ltd., publicized its new name in a high-profile marketing campaign in 2001 that was widely criticized but that was effective, according to some observers, at raising awareness of the Accenture brand among corporate executives, the ultimate target of all consulting-industry advertising. Accenture and its agency, New York–based Young & Rubicam, followed up this initial effort with "I Am Your Idea," a 2002–03 campaign designed to further heighten the company's brand image among high-level executives.

"I Am Your Idea" was a global campaign employing an estimated budget of $70 million to spread the message that Accenture had the capability to turn ideas into effective business practices. TV, print, and poster executions used the notion of ideas actually addressing their owners—corporate executives—via interior voices and written messages in public areas, among other modes of communication. In each case the ideas sought to make their presence and, accordingly, their value known to their owners. Print ads and TV spots alike employed the message "It's not how many ideas you have. It's how many you make happen," along with the tagline "Innovation Delivered."

The campaign was credited with substantially increasing global awareness of the Accenture brand and with increasing the likelihood that high-level executives would consider the consulting firm for future projects. Accenture's billings during the campaign's run far exceeded the goal of $12 billion set prior to the launch. "I Am Your Idea" won a 2004 Euro EFFIE for its success in Europe.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Accenture's roots went back to the 1950s, when the Chicago-based accounting firm Arthur Andersen developed a consulting division. As this division grew, its leadership became dissatisfied with the subservient position that consulting occupied in the company's hierarchy. A new corporate structure was thus created in 1989, making Arthur Andersen and Andersen Consulting separate subsidiaries of the same parent company, but a clause in the companies' contract with one another mandated that the more lucrative of the two share its annual profits with the other. This clause resulted in increasing friction between the two entities in the context of a booming consulting industry and a flat market for accountants, and Andersen Consulting's sense of the agreement's unfairness was exacerbated when Arthur Andersen launched a competing consulting division. Andersen Consulting initiated a split with Arthur Andersen in 1997, but the split was delayed by years of legal wrangling. Andersen Consulting finally won the right to sever its ties with the accounting firm in 2000, on the conditions that it pay Arthur Andersen $1 billion and rebrand itself under a new name. Andersen Consulting was renamed Accenture in late 2000, and the company was officially relaunched on January 1, 2001.

The Accenture name was widely derided by analysts and media critics, even as the company and its agency, New York's Young & Rubicam, were setting out to imbue that name with an identity via an estimated $175 million global advertising campaign. Tagged ''Now It Gets Interesting,'' the campaign appeared in print before making its TV debut via four spots that aired during the 2001 Super Bowl. These spots were ranked among the least-recalled of all commercials that aired on that year's broadcast, and the campaign as a whole was generally maligned by ad-industry critics. B to B magazine, however, claimed that ''Now It Gets Interesting'' resonated with its ultimate target: the high-level corporate executives responsible for hiring consulting firms such as Accenture.

Because they were dependent on other corporations for their business, consulting companies' fortunes were directly linked to the state of the economy at large. A cooling global economic climate in the first few years of the twenty-first century meant slowed growth for the consulting industry. Therefore, if they hoped to grow, Accenture and its competitors had to steal market share from one another. Because many competitors offered the same suite of services as Accenture—corporations typically turned to Accenture for help with technology, management, and outsourcing issues—a particular emphasis was placed on differentiating the company through marketing.

WHAT'S AN ''ACCENTURE''?

Andersen Consulting's lengthy and bitter effort to separate itself from its sibling, the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was concluded in late summer 2000, when an international arbitrator ruled that the separation could proceed as long as Andersen Consulting paid Arthur Andersen $1 billion and changed its name by January 2001. The consulting company thus embarked on an intense search for a new name, hiring a leading identity-and-design agency to come up with ideas before settling on Accenture, the brainchild of Kim Peterson, an Andersen Consulting employee in Oslo, Norway. Peterson came up with the name by combining the words ''accent'' and ''future.'' He told Advertising Age, ''I wanted a word that had a lot of positive associations to it . . . and that would emphasize accomplishment and accelerated growth . . . as well as adventure and excitement and also the future.'' As compensation for his idea, Peterson was awarded a free trip to Melbourne, Australia, to attend a company-sponsored golf championship.

TARGET MARKET

''I Am Your Idea,'' the follow-up to ''Now It Gets Interesting,'' again targeted corporate decision makers—senior executives with titles such as CEO, CFO, COO, CIO, and CMO—but was not saddled with the simultaneous mainstream branding challenge of its predecessor. The campaign's goal was to make Accenture one of the companies that these executives naturally thought of when considering embarking on major projects requiring outside consultants. Young & Rubicam sought to accomplish this by addressing a negative perception that the target group often brought to its dealings with consultants: the idea that consulting firms dogmatically insisted on their own ideas without taking fully their clients' needs into consideration. As with ''Now It Gets Interesting,'' ''I Am Your Idea'' was a global effort, focusing on business-oriented print and TV outlets as well as signage in airports worldwide.

COMPETITION

Accenture's most direct competitor at this time was the newly strengthened consulting division of the old-line tech giant International Business Machines Corporation (IBM). It was initially known for its computer-focused consulting, but with its July 2002 acquisition of the consulting division of accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers, IBM Business Consulting Services (later called IBM Global Services) doubled in size and dramatically extended its range of business expertise. IBM was thus positioned to transcend its reputation as a tech firm, and this project dictated much of its consulting-focused advertising in the following years. The IBM division's first major postacquisition campaign, for instance, used the theme ''Deeper'' to communicate its new strength. Released in late 2002, the $90 million print campaign employed images such as that of a jungle, with copy suggesting the immensely complex nature of thoroughly assessing a business's needs. ''Everything at once?'' the ad's copy read, ''Who would have the depth?'' Another ad in the campaign used an image of the Grand Canyon to illustrate the idea that IBM's knowledge went "deeper" than that of competitors in a long list of industries.

Another of Accenture's competitors, Electronic Data Systems (EDS), was likewise in a transitional phase that, during this time, dictated the focus and tone of its advertising. EDS broke the consulting-industry mold with an overtly zany 2000 Super Bowl commercial, via the advertising agency Fallon Worldwide, in which cowboys on horseback were shown rounding up thousands of cats, an image meant to evoke EDS's ability to impose order on a chaotic business situation. In 2001 another EDS Super Bowl spot dramatized the same idea using imagery recalling the running of the bulls in Pamplona, Spain, with a key difference: the animals chasing the frenzied participants were squirrels. The following year EDS lost market share and prestige as a result of a number of badly managed major contracts, and the company's marketing profile accordingly diminished. EDS commercials returned to TV in 2003, but the new global campaign was meant to repair the company's reputation among corporate executives and thus eschewed the attention-getting advertising concepts for which the company had become known.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The controlling idea behind the "I Am Your Idea" campaign was that Accenture could help corporate executives turn their ideas into reality. An initial set of TV spots were released at the start of the campaign in February 2002, and a second round of commercials headlined a September 2002 campaign update. Given Accenture's belief that business-oriented magazines and newspapers worldwide were the best way to reach high-level corporate executives, print executions ran throughout the campaign's cycle. Airport posters likewise were employed for the duration of the campaign, in keeping with the target group's need to travel frequently. The campaign ran through August 2003, leveraging an estimated budget of $70 million.

The TV spots all used the conceit of an idea speaking to its owner. In each case the owner of the idea was an upscale, middle-aged executive, and the idea was depicted as an admonitory voice urging the executive to act before it, the idea, disappeared. Several spots featured the idea speaking via voice-over, as though in the executive's mind. For instance, an executive was shown walking, briefcase in hand, through the deserted streets of a city at night, while his idea said, "Listen, it's me. You know, I'm your idea. You can't ignore me. I'm what keeps you up at night. I make you restless, maybe even a little nervous." Streetlights and storefront displays mysteriously lit up, as though the idea was employing supernatural force to win the executive's attention. "After all," the idea continued, proclaiming the message that ran in each of the campaign's executions, "It's not how many ideas you have. It's how many you make happen." A more humorous spot showed an idea speaking to an executive by other means. The commercial opened on the scene of a doctor entering a patient's room to explain the nature of his malady: "You seem to have one of those office sticky notes lodged in your head." The doctor displayed the incriminating X-ray, which clearly showed a yellow sticky note reading "USE ME" embedded in the man's skull. "Do something with that idea," the doctor advised, "and then it should disappear." "But what if I can't?" the patient asked. The doctor's deadpan response was, "It could develop into a notepad, a folder, possibly even a filing cabinet." Each TV spot closed with the Accenture logo and the tagline "Innovation Delivered."

Print ads used a similar concept to send the same warning about the necessity to realize the potential of one's ideas. In the ads ideas spoke through signs on airport walls, the steps of office buildings, freeway exit signs, and other backdrops typically frequented by elite businesspeople. One ad showed a rack of airport luggage carts with attached signs that read, "I am your idea. Push me." Another ad featured a close-up of a golf ball on a tee as a golfer prepared to strike it. On the ball was printed, "I am your idea. Drive me." Yet another print execution focused on a disposable coffee cup wrapped in an insulating cardboard sleeve reading, "I am your idea. I won't stay hot forever." Small copy at the bottom of each ad reiterated the message from the TV spots: "It's not how many ideas you have. It's how many you make happen. So whether it's your idea or Accenture's, we'll help you turn innovation into results." Readers were directed to the Accenture website, www.accenture.com, and the "Innovation Delivered" tagline ran underneath the Accenture logo.

The advertising was supported by a schedule of global events showcasing the Accenture brand, and dozens of case studies were made available on the corporate website, detailing the ways in which Accenture had helped prominent clients in the past.

OUTCOME

In-house research concluded that, as a result of "I Am Your Idea," unaided global awareness of the Accenture brand grew from 29 percent to 34 percent. The company also concluded that the number of target executives who might consider Accenture as a consulting partner in the future had tripled, and Accenture generated $16.1 billion in bookings during the campaign's run, well surpassing its precampaign goal of $12 billion in bookings. For its effectiveness in the European market, the campaign won a 2004 Euro EFFIE Gold Award in the corporate category as well as the inaugural Sappi Print Media Efficiency Award at that year's Euro EFFIE ceremony (the pan-European counterpart to the New York American Marketing Association's annual EFFIE Awards).

A combination of factors, however, led Accenture to recast its marketing in 2003. For one, the sustained economic downturn had made the idea of innovation, showcased so prominently in "I Am Your Idea" television and print executions, seem outdated, according to James Murphy, Accenture's global managing director of marketing and communications. Additionally, IBM's acquisition of PricewaterhouseCoopers, coming midway through the first year of the "I Am Your Idea" campaign, heightened Accenture's need to raise its corporate profile. In October 2003, accordingly, a new campaign featuring professional-golf superstar Tiger Woods was unveiled.

FURTHER READING

Callahan, Sean. "Tiger Tees Off in New Accenture Campaign." B to B, October 13, 2003.

Clark, Philip B. "Andersen Becomes Accenture." B to B, November 6, 2000.

Crain, Rance. "'Accenture' Seemed Foolish; Now It Seems a Stroke of Luck." Advertising Age, January 28, 2002.

Davis, Wendy. "Accenture May Finesse Effort after Criticism." Advertising Age, February 12, 2001.

Linnett, Richard. "Andersen's Accenture Gets $175 Mil Ad Blitz." Advertising Age, December 4, 2000.

Maddox, Kate. "Sawyer Awards." B to B, December 10, 2001.

Steinberg, Brian. "Media & Marketing—Advertising: Accenture Ads Tee Off with Tiger; Consultancy Starts Effort with Golfer in the Hopes of Taking Share from IBM." Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2003.

Sweeney, Jack. "The Origin of Species." Consulting Magazine, January 2004.

Walker, Rob. "Making a Name in Consulting." Slate, January 10, 2001. Available from <http://www.slate.com/?id=1006844>

Wasserman, Todd. "Accenture Accents 'Idea' Campaign." Brandweek, September 30, 2002.

Mark Lane

adidas America, Inc.

5055 N. Greeley Avenue
Portland, Oregon 97217
USA
Telephone: (800) 448-1796
Fax: (800) 448-1796
Web site: www.adidas.com

■■■

RUNNERS. YEAH, WE'RE DIFFERENT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

German sporting-goods company adidas-Salomon AG returned from near death in the mid-1990s with a new focus and global strategy. No longer content to allow competitors, especially the seemingly invincible Nike, to dominate the sporting-goods category, adidas launched a full-scale offensive designed to increase awareness of the brand, enhance its image, and elevate sales. The company moved production facilities to Asia to cut manufacturing costs, formed high-visibility alliances with sports organizations and athletes (including a sponsorship of the New York Yankees baseball team beginning in 1997), purchased the French company Salomon SA (a manufacturer of golf, ski, and bike equipment) in 1997, and pumped additional funds into its modest marketing budget. Hoping to increase the sales of its running accessories in the United States, adidas America, Inc., the U.S. headquarters for adidas, released a provocative campaign titled "Runners. Yeah, We're Different."

The San Francisco office of advertising agency Leagas Delaney released the branding campaign with an estimated $1 million. To prove that the company understood the sport of running, the "Runners. Yeah, We're Different" campaign, which began in 1998, targeted the serious runner, a relatively small and anonymous audience. With full-page and two-page ads in specialty magazines such as Runner's World and Running Times and with some executions in the general-interest Sports Illustrated, the series of print ads celebrated the rather unusual but relatively common habits of dedicated runners, such as smearing Vaseline on the inner thighs and under the arms to prevent chafing. Sean Ehringer, Leagas Delaney's creative director, explained, "[adidas] wanted to do a brand focus campaign that gave them some running credentials, and the way we decided to do that was to let runners know that we understand them . . . Runners have their own kind of weird way of doing things, so there's a lot of things to talk about there." The campaign ended in 2000.

According to the ad-industry publication Campaign, "Runners. Yeah, We're Different" was the third most awarded series of print ads in the world for 2000. It helped adidas's brand awareness in the United States reach record highs and was eventually expanded globally.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Adolf Dassler, known as Adi, began making athletic shoes in 1920 in Germany. His shoes made their first appearance in the Olympics in 1928, and in 1936 Jesse Owens won four Olympic gold medals running in Dassler's track shoes. It was not until 1948 that Dassler founded the adidas company. The company was immensely successful, flourishing through the 1960s and 1970s. At the 1972 Olympic Games, noted Advertising Age, more than 80 percent of the gold-medal winners sported adidas shoes, and all of the Olympic officials were outfitted in uniforms designed by adidas. During that decade adidas gear could be found on most professional soccer players and on about 75 percent of professional basketball players. By 1978, the year of Dassler's death, the adidas brand enjoyed a global recognition rate of about 95 percent.

Although it took years for adidas to build a reputation, the company's commanding grip of the athletic-goods market deteriorated quickly. Not only did adidas miss some important athletic trends, such as the jogging craze of the late 1970s, but it also suffered from management problems. Dassler's son Horst took control of the company in 1985, but he died just two years later, and adidas was sold in 1989 to French businessman Bernard Tapie, who soon declared bankruptcy during the course of a political scandal. By the time creditors approached French businessman Robert Louis-Dreyfus to take over the failing company in 1992, adidas's share of the U.S. running-shoe market had fallen from a leading 70 percent share in the early 1970s to a dismal 1.9 percent, and the company was losing more than $100 million annually.

Louis-Dreyfus knew nothing about the athletic-shoe business, but he had succeeded in turning around other failing companies, notably the London advertising agency Saatchi & Saatchi. After taking the helm at adidas in 1993, Louis-Dreyfus downsized the staff, moved production to Asia, and nearly doubled the marketing budget, from 6 percent of sales to 11 percent, to acknowledge the importance of advertising and image. Not only did adidas manage to elude death, but it also quickly and steadily began to increase sales and boost its reputation. Between 1992 and 1996 the company's share of the $8 billion U.S. market increased from 2 percent to a small but more respectable 5 percent, and its revenues grew from $1.7 billion to $2.8 billion. In 1994 U.S. sales grew 62 percent, and a year later the company went public, the same year the rather unfit Louis-Dreyfus symbolically demonstrated his commitment to adidas by running in and completing the Boston Marathon. By the late 1990s the company's U.S. sales were growing at an annual rate of nearly 50 percent, and adidas had no intention of slowing its pace. Steve Wynne, president of adidas America, told Fortune in 1997, "We have huge market share to gain in the United States . . . We're very focused on what we need to do right now. In 1998, you're going to see some very big improvements in our sales."

TARGET MARKET

Because adidas was a multisport company, it traditionally geared its goods and its advertising toward athletes. The company developed equipment for numerous sports, including wrestling, weight lifting, basketball, tennis, running, and soccer. Adidas's target audience suddenly expanded in the 1990s, however, as renewed interest in the adidas brand, particularly in apparel, grew. Adidas was no longer associated solely with sports enthusiasts but with fashion-conscious youth, and the company embraced the market composed of 20- to 25-year-olds.

Despite its popularity with the youth market, adidas continued its marketing efforts in niche segments, directing advertising toward markets with specific athletic needs. For the "Runners. Yeah, We're Different" campaign, adidas narrowed its audience to pinpoint the serious runner, a group frequently overlooked by the sports media despite the popularity of running. The lack of hype surrounding running could perhaps be attributed to the individuality and solitude of the sport. As Leagas Delaney's Ehringer remarked, "Most people who run run silently on their own for their own reasons, and nobody even knows they exist." Ehringer also emphasized the importance of running and said, "It is very much a unique and individual sport, but it's a part of almost every athlete's life at some point." To lure runners, an extremely dedicated lot, adidas adopted an honest and direct approach. Ryan Erickson, a marketing executive at adidas's rival Reebok International Ltd., explained the importance of credibility when advertising to runners. Erickson said in Footwear News, "Runners sniff out fake stuff in a heartbeat."

STARS AND STRIPES

Adidas's comeback was boosted by the resurgent popularity in the early 1990s of adidas gear, adorned with the trademark three-stripes design and once again considered stylish after decades of being passé. Celebrities such as Madonna, Cindy Crawford, and the band Luscious Jackson all appeared sporting adidas apparel.

COMPETITION

In the highly competitive U.S. athletic-footwear category, adidas America faced considerable competition from Nike and Reebok, the top two athletic-shoe manufacturers in the nation. Nike, which had dominated the field since the 1980s, when it wrested market share away from adidas during the running craze, boasted a 47 percent share of the U.S. athletic-footwear market in 1997, up from 45.2 percent in 1996, according to the industry newsletter Sporting Goods Intelligence. Reebok held a market share of 15.2 percent in 1997 and 16.5 percent in 1996. Although it was trailing Nike and Reebok considerably, adidas was becoming increasingly successful and profitable. Adidas's share of the athletic-footwear market had grown from 5.4 percent in 1996 to 6.1 percent a year later, and in 1997 adidas snagged the number three position away from Fila Sport SpA, the U.S. arm of Fila Holding SpA. Also that year, adidas's U.S. sales enjoyed a 66 percent increase over 1996.

Helping adidas was the rejuvenation of the running-shoe category in the late 1990s. Running-shoe sales in the United States increased by 11 percent in 1997, and even smaller niche players, such as New Balance Athletic Shoe, Inc., and Saucony, Inc., were doing well. By 1996 adidas had managed to move up to the number two spot in the running category, and that year its running business increased an impressive 74 percent in the United States.

Although adidas had a long way to go before it could hope to come within hitting range of Nike, the company still set its sights on taking market share away from Nike and Reebok. Adidas did not have the aggressive marketing budget of its chief rivals—adidas estimated that Nike's media budget was 10 times greater than its own—but adidas believed that its quality products and careful marketing could generate enthusiasm among consumers. Fortunately for adidas, Nike hit a rough patch in the late 1990s that helped pave the way for adidas's success. Although Nike still dominated the athletic-footwear category, its hold grew weaker. Its U.S. athletic-footwear sales dropped 18 percent in the third quarter that ended February 28, 1998. David Aaker, a professor at the University of California at Berkeley, explained in Adweek, "The Nike brand has grown universal and ubiquitous to the point where it is losing its core appeal as a maverick." In reaction, Nike expanded its famous "Just Do It" tagline and added the gentler "I Can" slogan in 1998, and its swoosh logo was toned down, no longer boldly emblazoned on every Nike product. Adidas, meanwhile, planned to take advantage of Nike's slump to build its brand image. Ehringer noted, "Our job here in the U.S. specifically has been to replace the notion, 'I'm buying this for what it isn't' to 'I'm buying this for what it is.' We've been trying to rebuild the brand in a sense and put its credentials out there and make sure people understand that it's a multisport brand . . . so when fashions come and go, in the end, [adidas is] still a legitimate sports brand for sports."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In planning the "Runners. Yeah, We're Different" branding campaign, adidas and Leagas Delaney felt that it was important to speak directly to the runner. Ehringer told Joan Voight of Adweek, "I am so tired of this huge trend where ads keep telling you that you are not adequate in some way. 'Be that' or 'Do this.' . . . What is wrong with celebrating the fun-ness of the brand? . . . Better to have a conversation with people, not a conversation at people." In keeping with this belief, and to make the most of adidas's marketing dollars, Leagas Delaney created a series of colorful print ads that celebrated running with a direct and unique approach only runners would likely appreciate and understand. Ehringer explained, "The unusual thing about [the campaign] was we were really very literal about it. I think it was pretty courageous to do ads that were so honest about really talking to runners that a lot of people wouldn't even know what you were talking about." To add an extra element of interest and to further suggest adidas's bond with runners, many of the ads starred adidas-sponsored runners, talented athletes with little face-recognition value.

One of the early ads was a two-page color spread featuring a male runner—an adidas-sponsored marathon runner—applying bandages to his nipples at a road race. His shirt, with pinned-on race number, was casually tucked into the waistband of his shorts as he completed the bandaging task. Skyscrapers and other runners appeared in the background. A heavyset woman in nonrunning attire, perhaps a spectator, observed the runner's ritual with a slightly bewildered look, emphasizing how odd the act must appear to nonrunners. The only text in the ad was the adidas logo in one corner and the tagline in another. A second ad showed a walking and running path in a city. A male runner blew his nose in typical runner fashion—with a finger pressed against one nostril to allow the forceful emanation of mucus from the other—as a disgusted nonrunning female looked on. The "Runners. Yeah, We're Different" slogan appeared in the middle of the ad, and the text at the bottom read, "You've never experienced a support shoe like this. The incredibly smooth ride of the Equipment Tyranny is something different too." The $1 million campaign appeared in running-specific publications such as Runner's World and Running Times and in the popular magazine Sports Illustrated. Another ad showed two male runners racing a cable car up a steep San Francisco hill as cable car riders looked on. The Vaseline ad featured a male and a female runner getting ready for a race by applying Vaseline to various body parts that might otherwise get rubbed raw while running. The male runner was Peter Julian, who was a four-time all-American while at the University of Portland. Similar ads continued until the campaign ended in 2000.

OUTCOME

The ''Runners. Yeah, We're Different'' campaign generated much interest and discussion among runners. The campaign ended in 2000, and some of the final ads were bolder than those from 1998. One 1999 ad, for example, featured a full view of the backside of a naked male runner (two-time 10,000-meter Olympian and four-time 10,000-meter U.S. champion Todd Williams) who stood by the open trunk of his car to change out of his muddy running clothes. Another ad showed a female runner squatting by a tree next to a trail, her shorts pulled down. Although these ads were quite daring, the acts featured were not out of the ordinary for runners. Adidas's director of marketing communications, Karyn Thale, told Adweek that the company was pleased with the advertising efforts and said, ''It is time to tell our story in the U.S., and the Leagas ads are doing a great job of [expressing] our brand's young, fresh and hardworking image here.''

Adidas continued to thrive and in 1998 held onto its number three ranking in the athletic-footwear industry with a 6 percent share, according to market research firm NPD Group, Inc. In comparison, Nike's retail dollar share was 34 percent and Reebok's 13 percent. Although overall spending on athletic shoes dropped 6 percent from the previous year, running shoes continued to lead the athletic-footwear category, acquiring 17.1 percent of retail sales. Adidas's U.S. net sales jumped 68 percent to $1.59 billion, and the running category grew more than 50 percent from 1997. Adidas spokesperson John Fread told the Business Journal of Portland, ''For us, [1998] was an outstanding year, another record.'' Adidas was definitely back in the game, and it planned to stay there, pursuing its commitment to sports and athletes around the globe.

In the campaign's final year adidas reached its highest brand awareness in company history. The adidas sales increase during the campaign shocked sporting-goods analysts because running shoes were previously considered a slow-growth category. The print ads collected more awards than print ads released by any other competitor in 2000, and adidas eventually expanded the campaign internationally.

FURTHER READING

Cowen, Matthew. '''Surfer' Sends AMV to Top of the Gunn League.'' Campaign, November 10, 2000, p. 7.

Dill, Mallorre. ''Crowned Prints.'' Adweek (eastern ed.), June 5, 2000, p. 24.

Jensen, Jeff. ''Reebok Backs New Shoe with Anti-Nike Stance.'' Advertising Age, May 25, 1998, p. 4.

Levine, Joshua. ''Adidas Flies Again.'' Forbes, March 25, 1995, p. 44.

Puris, Martin. ''Bringing Back Adidas.'' Advertising Age, March 8, 1999, p. 14.

Voight, Joan. ''Adidas American Style.'' Adweek, October 5, 1998.

Wallace, Charles P. ''Adidas Back in the Game.'' Fortune, August 18, 1997, p. 176f.

Mariko Fujinaka
Kevin Teague

adidas-Salomon AG

Adi-Dassler-Strasse 1-2
Herzogenaurach, 91074
Germany
Telephone: 49 9132840
Fax: 49 9132842241
Web site: www.adidasgroup.com

■■■

IMPOSSIBLE IS NOTHING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Over the years adidas-Salomon AG has maintained an international reputation as a premier maker of sporting goods and athletic footwear. It has hired some of the sporting world's top athletes as spokespersons for its products, and the company has also owned a sponsorship deal with the New York Yankees. Despite its high profile in the industry, however, the company remained the also-ran athletic footwear company in the United States, behind Nike, Reebok, and New Balance. In addition, in 2003 the company reported that its total sales in the United States had dropped 16 percent in the first nine months of that year. Further confounding adidas, which sponsored the 2004 Olympic Summer Games, was the loss of its sponsorship rights to the 2008 Olympics to its competitor Nike.

To gain an edge over the competition and to reenergize its business in the United States, in 2004 adidas-Salomon AG introduced a $50 million brand-marketing campaign—the largest ever undertaken by the company—that included television, print, and Internet ads. Themed "Impossible Is Nothing," the yearlong global campaign was created for adidas by 180/TBWA, a partnership between 180, an agency based in Amsterdam, and the San Francisco agency TBWA/Chiat/Day. It kicked off with television spots featuring digitally altered footage of boxing legend Muhammad Ali jogging with some of the top athletes of the 1990s and 2000s, such as soccer star David Beckham. Athletes featured in subsequent ads included Ali's daughter Laila, also a boxer, NBA greats Tracy McGrady and Tim Duncan, and tennis champion Justine Henin-Hardenne.

The campaign clearly resonated with consumers and earned praise and official recognition from the advertising industry. After it began, the company reported that U.S. sales were up 11 percent compared with the same period the previous year.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Adidas was founded in the late 1920s in Germany by brothers Adi and Rudi Dassler. According to the company, Adi Dassler "had passion for every sport and a passion to make equipment to help every athlete perform better." In 1928 adidas began equipping Olympic athletes, and it continued to do so over the years. Runner Jesse Owens wore the company's track shoes during his Olympic competition in 1936, and it was reported that at the 1972 Olympics some 80 percent of the gold-medal-winning athletes wore adidas shoes. Adi Dassler's innovations included inventing screw-in cleats for soccer shoes and introducing a lightweight sprint spike. When the brothers ended their partnership in the late 1940s, Adi kept the business going and continued to develop sporting equipment intended to enhance the performance of athletes at all levels.

© PETER KNEFFEL/DPA/CORBIS.

By the 1990s, however, the company was struggling. This was due in part to mismanagement by Adi's son Horst, who, after Adi died, had taken control of adidas in 1985. Horst's death in 1987 led to the sale of the company in 1989 to French businessman Bernard Tapie, who filed for bankruptcy soon after purchasing adidas. By 1992 the company's U.S. market share had taken a nosedive, dropping to 1.9 percent from a high of 70 percent 20 years earlier.

In 1992 another French businessman, Robert Louis-Dreyfus, took the helm at adidas, and by the late 1990s the company was on an upward swing, increasing its business by 74 percent in the United States. But in 2003 adidas, with a 10 percent market share, still lagged behind Nike in sales, and its North American business was again on a downward slide, dropping 16 percent in the first nine months of that year. Herbert Hainer, who had succeeded Louis-Dreyfus as adidas-Salomon president and CEO in 2001, told Advertising Age that the drop in U.S. sales in 2003 was not a one-year problem but rather had been ongoing for several years. Hainer blamed the problem on the fact that adidas had been "slow to adapt to a shift in demand from many of our customers."

In an effort to revitalize its U.S. business, the company refocused its marketing to attract younger consumers and shifted its global marketing functions to the company's American headquarters in Portland, Oregon. Adidas also implemented a new, more cohesive approach to its international advertising by hiring American agency TBWA/Chiat/Day as its "global agency network." For the development of the upcoming campaign, TBWA was partnered with 180, an Amsterdam-based shop that had been creating successful ads for adidas since 1998.

TARGET MARKET

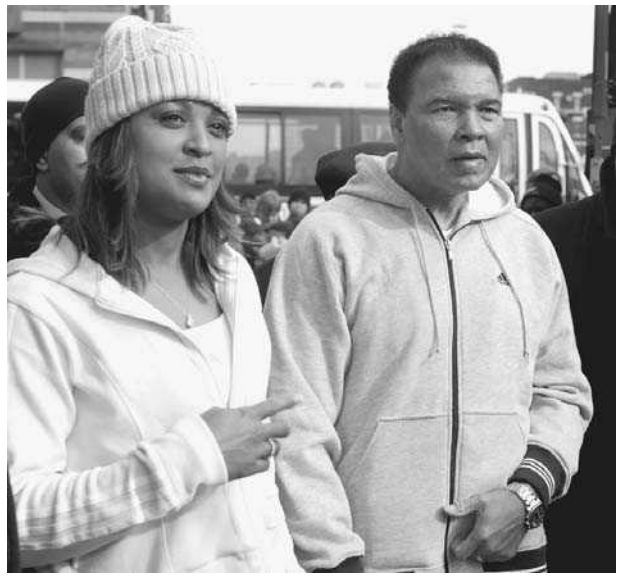
The "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign was driven by adidas's efforts to shift its marketing focus to reach its target audience, 12- to 24-year-old consumers involved in sports. Based on statistics showing that men between the ages of 18 and 34 spent more time online than watching television, adidas also shifted some of its marketing to the Internet. Tara Moss, Internet business developer for adidas America, explained during an interview with Advertising Age, "We were trying to reach that teen audience that is dedicated to sports. Their apparel and footwear is really necessary to them in their daily lives."

Whether the new campaign would actually appeal to its target audience was questioned by some. In an interview with the Oregonian, Paul Swangard, managing director of the Warsaw Sports Marketing Center at the University of Oregon, said that adidas needed to make changes in its marketing to be competitive with such companies as Nike and Reebok, who were using high-profile athletes, including NBA stars LeBron James and Yao Ming, respectively, to promote their products. "The challenge here is whether young teenagers, who are really the hot market for shoes and apparel, resonate with [Muhammad] Ali," he said. "Many of these kids may never have seen him compete in their lifetime."

COMPETITION

With a 37 percent market share in the United States, Nike had a firm hold on its position as the number one sporting goods company. In 2004 it introduced one of its most extensive advertising pushes, a campaign that asked the question "What If?" Like the adidas ads that featured star athletes, Nike's commercials used a roster of top athletic performers. But rather than showing the athletes doing what they did best, the Nike ads depicted athletes participating in sports other than their specialty. For instance, tennis star Serena Williams played beach volleyball, and Tour de France champion Lance Armstrong sparred in a boxing ring. As Nancy Monsarrat, Nike's director of U.S. advertising, explained to the Washington Times, "What if Lance Armstrong was given a pair of boxing gloves instead of a bike as a child? Our belief is that a passionate athlete's drive to win would translate into success in any sport."

Reebok International Ltd., the number two maker of athletic shoes in the United States, had employed numerous memorable marketing campaigns, from ''Because Life Is Not a Spectator Sport'' in the mid-1980s to ''Life Is Short, Play Hard'' in 1991. In 2003 it introduced its ''Outperform'' campaign. According to the company, this campaign allowed Reebok ''to educate consumers about our heritage in performance. The first commercial went all the way back to 1895 and the beginnings of the J.W. Foster Company, working our way up to the present day.'' Reebok increased its international marketing in 2004, starting a major ad campaign in China, where the market for sneakers was $500 million and Reebok's sales accounted for just $40 million of that. The company's international presence also was expanded in Europe, with French soccer star Nicolas Anelka serving as spokesman. In Latin America and the United States the brand partnered with pop singer Shakira.



Boxing legend Muhammad Ali (R) and daughter, Laila at the unveiling of a billboard featuring their image as part of the launch of Adidas' campaign "Impossible is Nothing." © JEFF CHRISTENSEN/REUTERS/CORBIS.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The adidas ''Impossible Is Nothing'' campaign, created by 180/TBWA, was designed first to reach American consumers and to improve the company's market share in the United States. Adidas stressed that the campaign was aimed at a global market and that ads would eventually include athletic stars from a variety of sports and regions. ''Impossible Is Nothing'' was launched in February 2004 with television, print, and Internet advertising. ''Wallscapes''—huge ads on the sides of buildings—were installed in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, San Francisco, Miami, and Portland.

The first television spot featured American boxing icon Muhammad Ali as a young man setting off on one of his legendary long runs; the footage was digitally altered to show him running alongside members of a new generation of athletes, including soccer great David Beckham and NBA star Tracy McGrady, all dressed in adidas merchandise. Meanwhile, Ali's daughter Hannah narrated, ''Some people listen to themselves, rather than listen to what others say . . . they remind us that once you set out on a path, even though critics may doubt you, it's okay to believe there is no 'can't,' 'won't,' or 'impossible.' They remind us it's okay to believe impossible is nothing.'' Another TV ad employed digital effects to depict a young Muhammad Ali sparring with his daughter Laila. In a voice-over Laila dismissed the idea that women should not box, saying, ''Impossible isn't a fact; it's an opinion.''

In addition to print ads and TV spots, the campaign, described by the company as a ''fully integrated communication campaign,'' also included ads and promotions on the adidas website as part of an effort to reach consumers, especially teens, all over the world. For a limited time the ''Laila'' TV spot was made available on the Yahoo!, MSN, and ESPN home pages. The online aspect of the campaign also featured 20 elite athletes, each telling his or her personal ''Impossible Is Nothing'' story. Consumers who logged onto the site were encouraged to share their own stories of overcoming the impossible to succeed. The best stories were awarded prizes.

Additional television commercials showed past and present Olympic stars interacting with each other. One ad had sprinter Kim Collins on the track encountering the 1936 gold-medal-winner Jesse Owens. Another depicted gymnast Nastia Liukin retracing the moves of the legendary Nadia Comaneci, who in 1976 became the first gymnast to complete a perfect-10 Olympic performance. The spot starring Haile Gebrselassie, known as one of the greatest runners of all time, was digitally altered to feature him running a 10,000-meter race in the Long Beach Memorial Stadium against nine competitors: all himself.

OUTCOME

As the ''Impossible Is Nothing'' campaign advanced, it became evident that it was resonating with consumers, and it earned accolades within the marketing arena. The campaign received a Silver EFFIE Award and won a Gold Lion Award at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, and adidas was named the 2004 Marketer of the Year by Footwear News. Ad critics praised the campaign as well. Speaking specifically of the

ADIDAS, PAL PARTNER IN PROGRAMS FOR KIDS

As adidas kicked off its "Impossible Is Nothing" advertising campaign, the company did not forget some of New York City's youngest athletes and perhaps its future champions. The company announced plans to partner with the city's Police Athletic League (PAL) to support boxing and basketball programs for boys and girls. Offering words of encouragement to kids and lending support for the proposed partnership, Laila Ali, who was featured in some of the "Impossible Is Nothing" ads with her father, boxing legend Muhammad Ali, said during an interview (at the program's unveiling at the PAL center in Harlem), "A lot of people told me I shouldn't go into boxing. If I had listened to them, I wouldn't be where I am now. It's very important for you to follow your dreams. You really can't let anyone decide your future for you."

commercials created for the U.S. market, Barbara Lippert of Adweek said that the campaign had been "incredibly successful." She continued, "Those ads really capture the viewer's imagination. They are beautifully executed and organic, effectively leveraging the brand's image. Adidas has made a lot of noise. To come that far, that quickly, is just incredible."

The Internet component of the campaign was also successful in reaching the target audience. According to Moss, there was a 125 percent increase in the use of the search term "adidas" on the Yahoo! home page the day the ad featuring Ali and Laila appeared online. The highest number of search requests was from young men aged 13 to 17. Despite the campaign's success, the NPD Group, an international market-research organization, listed adidas as the number four athletic-footwear brand in the United States—behind Nike, Reebok, and New Balance—the same position it had held in 2003. But based on dollar sales adidas made advances in 2004. According to the company, sales in 2004 were 11 percent higher than in 2003, pushing adidas closer to its proposed goal of doubling its 10 percent U.S. market share and closing the gap between itself and the top company, Nike.

FURTHER READING

"Calling the Shots: With RBK, the Company Is Putting Forth a Younger, Hipper, and Much More Aggressive Front." Footwear News, October 25, 2004.

Drier, Melissa. "Adidas Net Rises 41.1% in Qtr." Women's Wear Daily, May 6, 2004.

Fisher, Eric. "New Nike Ad Theme: 'What If?' " Washington Times, February 29, 2004.

Garfield, Bob. "By Mimicking Apple, Adidas Paints Itself as Second String." Advertising Age, February 16, 2004.

Holmes, Stanley, and Aaron Bernstein. "The New Nike." Business Week, September 20, 2004.

Holmes, Stanley, and Ira Sager. "Punchy New Ads from Adidas." Business Week, February 9, 2004.

Kletter, Melanie. "Adidas Looks to Regain Steam with New Ads." Women's Wear Daily, February 6, 2004.

Marcial, Gene G. "Reebok Sprints Ahead." Business Week, April 12, 2004.

"Mission Impossible: Armed with a New 'Brand Attitude,' adidas Amped Up Its Marketing All Year Long." Footwear News, December 6, 2004.

"New Nike Campaign Is a Real Change of Pace." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, February 26, 2004.

Oser, Kris. "Adidas Mines Possibilities with Web Effort; Ali Spot Snags 5 Mil Views from Key Demographics." Advertising Age, May 3, 2004.

"The Player: Stamminger Invokes Heritage to Revive Adidas Sales in U.S." Advertising Age, May 3, 2004.

Russak, Brian. "Ad-ing It Up." Footwear News, October 25, 2004.

Sickinger, Ted. "Adidas Spends $50 Million on Ads to Get Footing in Marketplace Race." Oregonian, February 6, 2004.

Thomaselli, Rich. "Terry Tate Builds Buzz for Reebok, but Not Shoe Sales; Real Celebs Are Behind 70% Spike." Advertising Age, February 2, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

YANKEE FANS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After more than a decade of dismal performance worldwide and a 1995 company relaunch by a group of international investors, the Germany-based athletic-footwear-and-apparel brand adidas (the official company name became adidas-Salomon AG after a 1997 merger with French sports-equipment maker Salomon) set its sights on rebuilding its share of the U.S. market. It dramatically raised its marketing profile in the United States and sought partnerships and licensing agreements. One such agreement, with the New York Yankees, caused controversy among other members of the Major League Baseball association. The partnership also resulted in a modestly scaled yet successful advertising campaign focusing on the nature of that baseball team's fans.

"Yankee Fans" was developed by the San Francisco ad agency Leagas Delaney. It began during the 1997 baseball season and also ran during the following season, leveraging an estimated $1 million annual budget. The campaign was headlined by black-and-white TV and cinema spots as well as print and outdoor support, all of which revolved around five out-of-shape Yankee fans who painted letters on their bare chests so that collectively they spelled "YANKS." The TV spots ran primarily in the New York area, but they also received national exposure during postseason broadcasts of Yankees games.

The campaign was a hit with Yankee fans and New Yorkers. The five principal characters from the TV spots became local celebrities, and their fictional exploits were well received by advertising-industry critics. "Yankee Fans" won a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival and a silver and two bronze Clios, among other awards. Even though it was not designed to drive national adidas sales, the campaign corresponded with a period of sustained profit and market-share increases.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Strong in the 1970s, adidas practically disappeared in the United States in the 1980s and early '90s. The German sports-shoe company, once the category leader with a 70 percent U.S. market share, slid completely out of the top four spots, down to a 2 percent share in 1993. Name recognition was low, and it was not viewed as a high-quality product. Fortune magazine said that by 1993 the company was losing $100 million a year. During those same years Nike had become the dominant athletic-shoe manufacturer on the strength of its powerful, sustained marketing effort. At adidas's low point an international group of investors led by Frenchman Robert Louis-Dreyfus bought the company and revamped it. It went public in November 1995.

Louis-Dreyfus fired the German senior management staff, closed down high-cost factories, and doubled spending on marketing (the marketing budget was set at 6 percent of the sales revenue in 1993). As a result, by 1997 sales had doubled, and Louis-Dreyfus kept the marketing budget at 12.5 percent of revenue. Ad agency Leagas Delaney, which previously had been creating a single commercial per year for adidas, was by 1997 making 40 spots and spending close to $20 million in the United States on advertising.

The resurgence took adidas past Fila to number three in the U.S. athletic-footwear-and-apparel market. Much of the rebound was built on a huge increase in adidas's apparel business. To further enhance this growth, adidas bought French sports-equipment maker Salomon in September 1997. The move balanced the company's geographic reach and provided better insulation against swings in fashion and sales downturns in one region or country. "The move gives [a]didas a leg up on Nike in one of its final frontiers for growth," said Jeff Jensen of Advertising Age.

Another key marketing decision helped lead to the "Yankee Fans" campaign. After Nike signed a sponsorship agreement with the National Football League's Dallas Cowboys, adidas looked for similar opportunities. The company won the Yankee sponsorship by acting quickly; Nike and Reebok received calls from the Yankees about sponsorship, but adidas won by listening and moving fast, according to the Yankees' vice president for business affairs, Derek Schiller. The baseball team also accepted partial payment of the sponsorship agreement in the purchase of adidas stock. "The Yankees and Adidas personify tradition and performance. Everyone knows who the Yankees are. Around the world. It's a great relationship for both parties," explained Sam Rothman, account manager at Leagas Delaney. The sponsorship agreement, however, immediately generated controversy. Major League Baseball (MLB) maintained that the deal violated the league's licensing policy. The Yankees and adidas responded by suing all of the other MLB teams as well as some leaders of the organization, claiming that these parties had disrupted a legitimate business partnership.

TARGET MARKET

In the late 1990s the major competitors in the athletic-shoe market received the bulk of their sales from young males, many of whom bought multiple (often five to six) pairs of athletic shoes each year. Adidas's overall core market was the 14- to 18-year-old elite athlete, but the "Yankee Fans" campaign strictly targeted Yankee baseball fans. For the Yankee sponsorship to be of the most value to adidas, the company needed to build a strong association with the club in the minds of its fans. Leagas Delaney said that it was not an intensely researched campaign with focus groups, statistics, or scientific analysis. Instead the agency built the spots informally. Yankee fans were known to be passionate about their team. And the Yankee franchise had the proudest tradition in baseball, a long history, and more glory years than any other major U.S. sports team.

The agency chose the five actors who played the Yankee fans based on their abilities to project a New York attitude—an attitude that indicated, "Let's get it done with full gusto." Campaign success hinged on accurately portraying the male New York Yankee fan yet doing so in a humorous, exaggerated way.

COMPETITION

Since the 1980s Nike had dominated the athletic-footwear-and-apparel category. With its ubiquitous swoosh

YANKEE FANS LOVE ''YANKEE FANS''

Leagas Delaney account manager Sam Rothman paraphrased the sentiments of art director Peter Nicholson and copywriter Scott Wild, the creative minds behind the ''Yankee Fans'' campaign. ''We shot the 'Yankee Fans' ads for 1998 at Yankee Stadium. They were playing the Braves. We kept the Yankee Fans around and had them do personal appearances. We had them sitting in the stands watching the game. When they were shown on the JumboTron (the in-stadium video screen) the crowd went absolutely nuts. We showed the commercials. Then we took the guys and moved them to another part of the stadium. I've never seen a crowd go so crazy. People were jumping up and down, yelling, screaming, running over to them, taking their pictures, and asking for autographs. These guys, like Mr. 'S' signs his autograph, 'Mr. S.' That is what we wanted—acceptance from the fans. That was the best proof of how we accomplished our goal.'' logo, Nike owned 47 percent of the 1997 U.S. athletic-footwear market. Nike's hold on the category was so strong it redefined advertising for the entire category, emphasizing brash confidence, endorsers, the soft sell, and cinematic savvy. In 1997 Nike overhauled its long-standing, world-famous ''Just Do It'' campaign as a new campaign titled ''I Can.''

Even with such a dominant player, because of its growth the market continued to present a strong attraction to other companies. Athletic shoes enjoyed solid demand in the United States, and a steady economy and rapid rollouts of new styles that kept capturing new sales spurred their popularity. Apparel other than footwear was another way competitors increased their sales and profits.

For several years Reebok, the number two competitor with 21 percent of the U.S. athletic-footwear market, ran ads similar to Nike's (for example, the ''Reebok Lets U.B.U.'' campaign). Reebok tried to counter Nike's staple of star athletes, such as basketball's Michael Jordan, with its own superstars (Shaquille O'Neal). Reebok later dropped O'Neal and tried to exploit the anti-Nike sentiment.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Nike's dominance was so impressive that other product categories, such as soft drinks and telephone companies, also adopted its ad style. Eventually market research found young consumers tiring of athlete-as-God and win-at-all-costs approaches. Ads with highly paid, ''perfect-body'' endorsers and so-called ''full-of-itself'' attitude began to suffer. After years of seeing the Nike swoosh logo everywhere, some people in focus groups began referring to it as a ''swooshtika.'' ''The underlying cocky, prescriptive, hipper-than-thou tone of the ads started to get on people's nerves, as did the company's tendency to deify athletes,'' wrote Warren Berger in Advertising Age.

In this environment the ''Yankee Fans'' campaign gave people a low-key approach. Whereas Nike portrayed the athlete as hero and hard worker, and Reebok fought back with its own sports-celebrity endorsers, adidas focused on the fan. (This focus, however, was at least partly a result of adidas's and the Yankees' ongoing lawsuit against the rest of MLB: adidas was not allowed to use Yankees players in the campaign's spots until the lawsuit was settled.) The competition showed the athlete's muscle, but the adidas spots showed the fans' potbellies and lack of muscle tone. The spots came across as real and down to earth. Another twist was having one of the world's greatest sports franchises represented not by its stable of stars but by the people who paid to see those stars play.

Among the campaign's four initial black-and-white TV/cinema spots, two in particular resonated with New Yorkers and Yankee fans as well as with ad-industry critics. ''Abandoned Mr. S'' opened with a dance beat and the image of a shirtless and bald man waiting nervously on a busy street corner. Painted on his chest was an ''S.'' Viewers pondered this man's purpose and felt his discomfort until a taxicab pulled up. His relief was palpable: inside were four other men, each shirtless and with a letter painted on his not-so-muscular chest. Together the men spelled out ''YANKS.'' In the spot ''Spelling Trouble'' the five guys were again in a cab and were again shirtless, each with a letter painted on his chest. The driver sized them up and said, ''Ansky? What the hell is Ansky?'' The guys, realizing that they were not sitting in the correct order, started moving around in the backseat, creating a tangle of limbs and torsos before settling into position, spelling out ''YANKS.'' Mr. ''N'' ended the spot by yelling ''Yanks!'' at the top of his lungs. Each commercial closed with the tagline ''Only in New York.''

When in May 1998 the adidas/Yankees lawsuit against the other MLB teams was settled, the campaign began featuring Yankees players in addition to the ''ANSKY guys,'' as the Yankee fans in the spots had become known. For instance, the Yankees' pitching coach was shown advising pitcher David Cone to rest his arm. The ANSKY guys accordingly began doing everything in their power to help him rest his arm: they answered his cell phone for him, fed him, and even helped him relieve himself in the men's room.

The campaign's annual budget was estimated to be $1 million. The spots initially ran on the large video screen at Yankee Stadium as well as on TV during local sports programming and in movie theaters in the New York area. During postseason games involving the Yankees the spots were aired nationally. Print and outdoor ads using photographs of the ANSKY guys were also employed.

Some criticized the advertisements for not showing or talking about the product, but adidas wanted all emphasis on the audience. ''It's not like [a]didas is a new brand that has burst out and needs to create a new identity,'' said Courtney Buechert, managing director of Leagas Delaney. ''Adidas's identity was and is and has been for 70 years about love for a sport and a mission to create products to help athletes perform better.''

OUTCOME

The ''Yankee Fans'' campaign ran during an upswing for the company. Financially the year 1997 was the best ever for adidas, especially in the United States, where its growth rates outpaced Nike's and Reebok's. Worldwide sales were $3.72 billion in 1997, up 23 percent over 1996. North American sales were up 66 percent, increasing the company's market share in the world's most important sporting-goods market to more than 6 percent. In 1998 adidas also made huge strides in its attempt to catch Reebok and Nike; that year it doubled its share of the U.S. market to 12.6 percent.

The campaign's target market seemed to love the spots. The five guys became celebrities, attracting crowds, autograph hounds (each ANSKY guy signed with his individual letter), and applause whenever they made a public appearance. The campaign also won many industry awards, including a Silver Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, one silver and two bronze Clio Awards, and a 1998 American Advertising Federation Award. It was also a finalist at the One Show and earned a ''Best Spot of 1997'' recognition from Adweek. The campaign's profile was heightened considerably by the Yankees' championship season of 1998, during the course of which the spots ran on national television. The ANSKY guys were featured prominently in the victory parade following the Yankees' World Series victory.

Leagas Delaney's success with the ''Yankee Fans'' campaign landed it the New York Yankees' own advertising duties in 1999. The agency was also entrusted with the job of crafting adidas's first umbrella branding initiative in the United States since 1993. That campaign, the high-profile ''Long Live Sport,'' was released in 1999. The partnership between adidas and the New York Yankees was renewed in 2006, guaranteeing that adidas would remain the ''Official Athletic Apparel and Footwear Company of the New York Yankees'' at least through 2013.

FURTHER READING

Berger, Warren. ''Advertising Age's Creativity.'' Advertising Age, March 1, 1998.

Jensen, Jeff. ''Marketer of the Year: Nike.'' Advertising Age, December 1996.

Kaufman, David. ''Leagas Delaney's 'Liquid Loofah' Mixes Baseball and Cosmetics.'' Shoot, August 29, 1997.

''MLB Settles Adidas/Yankees Lawsuit, Extends Deals.'' Brandweek, May 4, 1998.

Peltz, James F. ''Miles to Go? Sneaker Stocks Are Still on the Fast Track.'' Los Angeles Times, March 18, 1997, p. FI4.

Sandomir, Richard,''How Does an Ad Spell Success? A-N-S-K-Y.'' New York Times, October 23, 1998.

Saporito, Bill. ''Can Nike Get Unstuck?'' Time, March 30, 1998, p. 48.

Voight, Joan. ''Leagas to Unveil Adidas Image Work.'' Adweek (western ed.), April 26, 1999.

———. ''Yankee Fever in California.'' Adweek (western ed.), August 24, 1998.

Wallace, Charles P. ''Adidas Back in the Game.'' Fortune, August 18, 1997, p. 176.

Chris John Amorosino
Mark Lane

The Advertising Council, Inc.

261 Madison Ave., 11th Fl.
New York, New York 10016
USA
Telephone: (212) 922-1500
Fax: (212) 922-1676
E-mail: info@adcouncil.org
Web site: www.adcouncil.org

■■■

CAMPAIGN FOR FREEDOM CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the wake of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States, several advertising industry associations decided to join together to develop a public service advertising campaign to inspire and rally the American people. They turned to the Advertising Council, an organization that for more than a half-century had coordinated and distributed public service announcements of all types.

Several advertising agencies also donated their services to develop the television and radio spots and print ads that constituted the resulting "Campaign for Freedom." The first phase was launched to coincide with the 2002 Fourth of July celebrations; the second phase was timed for the two-year anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. There was no budget for the effort, which relied on free airtime and print space from media companies. The commercials and ads explored the theme of freedom in a number of ways: positing an America in which people could be arrested for asking about the wrong book at a public library; portraying the real-life stories of people who fled repressive countries to come to America; and celebrating America's religious and cultural inclusiveness.

Following the first two phases of the "Campaign for Freedom," the purpose shifted from inspiration to action, as the audience was urged to participate in civic activities such as voting and to volunteer time to worthwhile causes. One of the ads in the "Campaign for Freedom" won a One Show award, but while it drew praise from many quarters, the company was also criticized by others, who viewed the advertising as little more than propaganda.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

No different than anyone else, members of the advertising industry were stunned by the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States. And like many citizens, they gave thought to what gave strength to the country and made it unique among nations. Employees of Texas ad agency GSD&M were in Maryland in a client meeting when the attacks unfolded, and because air flights were suspended for several days, they drove home to Texas. With ample time for reflection, they decided to create a public service announcement (PSA) that celebrated America's diversity, a message with resonance given the suspicions that were laid upon people of Middle Eastern descent or mistaken for it. GSD&M broadcast producers quickly lined up pro bono help from directors, producers, and editors, and the agency's president contacted the Ad Council about being a partner in the endeavor. The organization agreed to participate and for the first time in its history became the sole signatory of a PSA. The result was the ''I Am an American'' spot, featuring a wide range of men and women, young and old, of different races, declaring, ''I am an American.''

The ''I Am an American'' spot aired within 10 days of the attacks. Also during this time three advertising industry associations—the American Association of Advertising Agencies (AAAA), the Association of National Advertisers (ANA), and the American Advertising Federation (AAF)—met and began to plan a full-fledged advertising campaign to help Americans reflect on the bedrock of democracy: freedom. It was also agreed that the Ad Council was the proper vehicle to lead what would become the ''Campaign for Freedom.'' Unlike traditional Ad Council campaigns that were developed by a single agency, this effort would be the joint work, free of charge, of four agencies: Omnicom Group's Chicago office of DDB, the Los Angeles office of TBWA\Chiat\Day, DeVito/Verdi of New York, and the New York office of Lowe & Partners Worldwide, a subsidiary of Interpublic Group of Companies. Heading the effort would be Philip B. Dusenberry, who had recently retired as chairman of BBDO North America. Instead of relying on the backing of a sponsoring organization, the Ad Council, in another break from tradition, sought funding to cover production and distribution costs from a variety of sources, including ad agencies, agency employees, trade groups, advertisers, and media companies. After several months of development, the ''Campaign for Freedom'' was ready to launch in time for the Fourth of July holiday.

TARGET MARKET

While the ''I Am an American'' spot aired at a time when the emotional reaction to the September 11 events was fresh and raw, by the time the ''Campaign for Freedom'' broke nine months later, the mood in the country was somewhat different. ''Right after 9/11 there was this upsurge of patriotism in America,'' Dusenberry commented in a radio interview on New York radio station WNYC in July 2002. ''But over time that sense has waned a little bit because other things come into play and people let this blessing we have, which is called freedom, flip to the back of their mind.'' In essence every strata of America was the campaign's target audience. For those people who had grown somewhat complacent in the months since the terrorist attacks, the PSAs were a wake-up call. For people more vigilant, they offered reinforcement.

COMPETITION

The ''Campaign for Freedom'' lacked traditional competition. People were not being asked to choose between tyranny and freedom, to buy democracy over totalitarianism. They were not even asked to take any particular action, other than to ruminate about the nature and importance of freedom. Following the attack on Pearl Harbor that ushered in America's involvement in World War II, Ad Council ads pursued patriotic themes but with a more tangible purpose: to sell war bonds to finance the war to achieve the greater end of preserving freedom and democracy. As Dusenberry explained to WNYC, ''Most advertising is designed to sell a product, a service, a brand. In this particular case, this advertising is asking people to feel something.''

''LOOSE LIPS SINK SHIPS''

The Advertising Council, originally called the War Advertising Council, was launched in the midst of World War II in 1942. Not only did the organization develop ''Buy War Bonds'' advertisements, but it also coined the famous ''Loose Lips Sink Ships'' slogan and introduced the United States to Rosie the Riveter in an effort to recruit women into the workforce to support the war effort. Following the war the Ad Council devoted itself to peacetime endeavors, such as the work it did for the National Safety Council.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Peggy Conlon, president and chief executive officer of the Ad Council, told Jane L. Levere of the New York Times in July 2002, ''According to research, Americans are looking for messages that will inform, involve and inspire them during the war on terrorism.'' The theme that resonated was freedom. Hence it was the concept of freedom that the alliance of advertising associations decided to focus on in the aftermath of September 11. ''Freedom is our strength,'' Conlon explained to Levere. ''However, freedom is also at risk. The 'Campaign for Freedom' recognizes that it is every American's responsibility to protect the foundation of our nation, and this is the heart of the strategy. The campaign wasn't designed to define what freedom is, but to stimulate a dialogue, to make people think about it.''

To emphasize the theme of freedom, the campaign was timed to coincide with the Fourth of July. The first phase of the campaign included eight television commercials and one print ad, which the Ad Council distributed to 10,000 print and broadcast outlets. All the PSAs were run in advertising time and space donated by the media. A wide swath of network and cable TV channels—including ABC, CBS, Fox, Bravo, Discovery, Lifetime, and VH1—immediately began to carry the ads.

DeVito/Verdi produced four of the initial eight television spots and supplied the campaign's tag line: ''Freedom. Appreciate it. Cherish it. Protect it.'' Three of the DeVito/Verdi spots asked what life would be like in America if freedoms that many people took for granted were lost: freedom to read whatever material they like, freedom of speech, and freedom of religion. In the spot called ''Library,'' for example, a man was detained because he requested a pair of banned books. The fourth DeVito/Verdi spot was perhaps the most notable of the first wave of commercials. Called ''Main Street USA,'' it showed a stretch of row houses in Bayonne, New Jersey, as a voice-over said, ''On September 11th, terrorists tried to change America forever.'' After a fade to black the same street was shown again, this time adorned with a multitude of American flags, sometimes two or three to a house. ''Well, they succeeded,'' noted the voice-over. A white title card then revealed the campaign's tagline.

The three spots produced by Lowe dealt with the concepts of freedom of choice and freedom of opportunity. The spot titled ''Change'' showed students in a multicultural classroom studying the civil-rights movement. Another, called ''Choice,'' reminded Americans about the abundance of choices they enjoy at the supermarket. The lone DDB spot, ''Arrest,'' showed the police pull over a young man, drag him out of his car, and then after finding newspapers in the back seat, handcuff and arrest him. The copy read, ''Imagine America without freedom.'' The print ad in the first phase was developed by TBWA\Chiat\Day. The text accompanying a picture of a tattered America flag declared, ''Read this ad. Or, don't. An exercise in freedom. By deciding to continue reading, you've just demonstrated a key American freedom—choice. And should you choose to turn the page, take a nap or go dye your hair blue, that's cool too.''

The second phase of the ''Campaign for Freedom'' was launched in September 2003, more than a year after the initial wave of PSAs, this time coinciding with the second anniversary of the September 11 attacks. ''Main Street USA'' was brought back, and three new television and radio spots and a pair of print ads were distributed as well. Produced by Ogilvy & Mather, the three television spots were presented as documentary-style interviews. They featured three immigrants and their stories of fleeing oppression to come to America. In the spot called ''Tom,'' Tom Tor told how he escaped the ''killing fields'' of Cambodia. With images of the Statue of Liberty, the Lincoln Memorial, and excerpts from the Constitution in the background, Tor explained, ''If I stayed in Cambodia, I would have been dead . . . Why did I come here? Freedom.'' The subjects of the other spots were Eugenia Dallas, who fled the Soviet Union during the time of Stalin, and Yuri Gevorigian, who escaped torture in Armenia. The spots were cut in 30- and 60-second versions, and the audio was used to fashion radio spots. The two print ads in the second phase of the ''Campaign for Freedom'' were created by TBWA\Chiat\Day had also focused on the immigrant experience, reminding the audience that virtually everyone in America was the offspring of immigrants, while celebrating the country's diversity. The copy of one ad featured the headline ''A Priest, a Rabbi, and an Imam Are Walking Down the Street. (There's no punch line.)'' The text, accompanying a picture of three religious men on a street corner, then posed the question ''What do you get when you mix Christianity, Judaism and Islam? In many parts of the world it's a recipe for disaster. Yet in America, it's a formula that's endured for over 200 years.''

OUTCOME

The ''Campaign for Freedom'' became a long-term effort for the Ad Council and its alliance of advertising agencies. Subsequent phases were added to move beyond the initial inspirational messages and to call on people to express freedom in action through participation in everyday civic activities, such as voting. The campaign was also aided by a dedicated website, http://www.explorefreedomusa.org, where all the advertising could be found and visitors could learn more about the Constitution, American history, and homeland security, as well as access links for registering to vote or volunteering their time.

It was difficult, if not impossible, to gauge the effectiveness of the ''Campaign for Freedom,'' given that its goal was ethereal. But it did succeed in raising money from such media companies as Knight-Ridder and the Hearst Corp. as well as major corporations like the Coca-Cola Company and Home Depot. It also received an abundance of free media time and space, worth tens of millions of dollars. Levere reported that ''some advertising industry experts praised the campaign's intent and execution.'' TBWA\Chiat\Day Los Angeles won an award for the print ad ''A Priest, a Rabbi, and an Imam Are Walking Down the Street,'' taking home a Bronze Pencil in the Consumer Magazine category of the 2004 One Show, sponsored by New York City-based One Club, a nonprofit organization dedicated to recognizing and promoting excellence in advertising.

The ''Campaign for Freedom'' was not without its share of critics, however. Levere interviewed New York University media studies professor Mark Crispin Miller, who deemed the ads unfocused and exploitative. ''The campaign is inappropriate because these ads are not thought-provoking but emotionally manipulative. They are bits of rousing propaganda,'' he commented. ''What we need now in a time of terror is more information, more truth, more clarity of mind. The Ad Council is merely giving us a kind of feel-good blather for the nation's couch potatoes.'' Minneapolis freelance writer and activist Jeff Nygaard offered an even more cynical view of the Ad Council's efforts in Nygaard Notes: ''They are selling, first of all, the idea that ads are good things, sources of information and inspiration—Ads are our friends. This message is brought to you, after all, by the 'Ad Council.'" The Ad Council's Conlon answered the critics by telling Levere, ''There are always critics and skeptics, no matter how well-intentioned anyone's efforts are. We're doing everything within our power to protect these people's right to say whatever they want to say about this campaign.''

FURTHER READING

Bednarski, P.J. ''Freedom to Disagree.'' Broadcasting & Cable, September 15, 2003, p. 37.

Champagne, Christine. ''P&G and Ford among Few Advertisers on 9/11.'' Shoot, September 6, 2002, p. 1.

Garfield, Bob. ''Ad Council's Latest 'Freedom' Commercials Miss the Mark.'' Advertising Age, September 15, 2003, p. 49.

Levere, Jane L. ''An Ad Council Campaign Sells Freedom, but Some Call It Propaganda.'' New York Times, July 1, 2002, p. C8.

Melillo, Wendy. ''Ad Council Launches Campaign to Celebrate Freedom.'' Adweek, July 1, 2002, p. 5.

———. ''Ad Council Marks 9/11 with Immigrants' Tales.'' Adweek, September 8, 2003, p. 11.

Nygaard, Jeff. ''Read This Ad.'' Nygaard Notes, September 13, 2002.

Pesca, Mike. ''Freedom in 30 Seconds.'' On the Media, July 5, 2002. Available from <http://www.wnyc.org>

Teinowitz, Ira. ''Ad Council Rolls Out New Ads in 'Campaign for America.'" Advertising Age, September 8, 2003, p. 8.

———. ''Selling the U.S.A.'' Advertising Age, July 1, 2002, p. 3.

Ed Dinger

Aflac, Inc.

1932 Wynnton Road
Columbus, Georgia 31999
USA
Telephone: (706) 323-3431
Fax: (706) 324-6330
E-mail: advertising@aflac.com
Web site: www.aflac.com

■■■

THE AFLAC DUCK (2000) CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Aflac, Inc., was a major insurance company based in Columbus, Georgia. In 2000 its top product was its cancer-expense coverage, which the company had invented in 1958. Though profitable, Aflac suffered from poor brand recognition; only 12 percent of consumers remembered the company, in part because it had such an unusual name. In response, Aflac wanted to expand its business by improving consumer's awareness of the brand. It also wanted to target 35- to 54-year-old consumers.

In 1999 the company hired a new advertising agency, the Kaplan Thaler Group, to improve its name recognition. The New York–based agency was known for its ''Big Bang'' approach to advertising: the belief that campaigns succeeded most when they altered consumers' views about the brand advertised. To accomplish this for Aflac, the agency created a new spokescharacter, the Aflac Duck. Voiced by comedian and actor Gilbert Gottfried, the Duck appeared in spots that featured consumers having trouble remembering the company's name. The Duck attempted to remedy this by ''quacking'' the answer: ''Aflac.'' The lighthearted spots were broadcast on prime-time network TV and during broadcasts of sporting events such as Major League Baseball games. Aflac spent $35 million on the campaign.

The Duck was a major success. According to USA Today 's Ad Track poll, it was one of the most popular spots of 2000. Brand recognition shot up to more than 70 percent and later topped 90 percent. Sales improved 28 percent, a result in part of improved name recognition. The company's accident/disability insurance took off, outselling the company's cancer-expense plans for the first time. The Duck became a cultural icon and continued as the company's advertising focal point through 2004. That year the Duck became one of the first characters to appear on the Advertising Walk of Fame in New York City.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The American Family Life Assurance Company (later called Aflac) was founded as an international holding company in 1955 by brothers John, Paul, and Bill Amos. In 1958 it became one of the first companies in the world to offer insurance against cancer. It expanded its offerings significantly in the 1980s, and by the late 1990s it sold a variety of policies, from dental care to short-term disability to hospital-confinement indemnity and life insurance. In 1990 the company adopted the acronym ''AFLAC'' as its official name.

By 2000 Aflac was insuring more than 40 million people. The company excelled at providing policies that helped pay out-of-pocket expenses not covered by someone's primary insurer. This was also known as "supplemental insurance." Aflac was respected in the industry, and in January 2000 Fortune included it in its list of the 100 best companies to work for in the United States. Because of the Fortune 500 company's solid core business and steady growth, in 1999 the National Association of Investors Corporation named Aflac one of its favorite stocks. Aflac was especially adept at reaching out to small businesses. It tailored certain plans specifically for this market, with a sales force of about 60,000 that helped reach small businesses face-to-face. It was also the largest provider of guaranteed-renewable insurance in the United States. The company thrived overseas as well, becoming the largest provider of individual insurance policies in Japan. Aflac's primary business strategy revolved around expanding its product line and focusing on gaining clients through businesses.

TARGET MARKET

Aflac was especially eager to connect with consumers in the 35- to 54-year-old age group and to boost sales of accident and disability insurance. While the company's cancer-expense insurance had always been the backbone of its sales, there was not much room left for growth in that sector. In order for Aflac to grow, it needed to expand its other businesses. Because accident/liability insurance was a major part of the industry, Aflac felt that that was the area it most needed to expand. The company also wanted to sell more of its supplemental insurance.

The company especially wanted to reach consumers with families. Aflac had a good reputation, but its difficult-to-remember name impeded its efforts to attract new customers. Insurance was a buyer's market. Many companies offered similar coverage policies, and it was important to stand out. Aflac suffered from terrible brand recognition: only about 12 percent of consumers remembered the brand's name. This limited the company's new sales leads.

COMPETITION

Aflac's primary competition came from other accident- and health-insurance brands, such as Citizens Financial Corp., Conseco, Inc., and Amerisafe, Inc. All offered services comparable to Aflac's. There were a number of companies competing in the sector, making Aflac's low brand recognition a serious liability. Aflac issued 98 percent of its coverage on a payroll-deduction basis. This meant that, while the company's sales force and its reputation were able to help it sell its products to cost-conscious corporations, it had a hard time drawing sales leads outside of the corporate sphere. Aflac believed that it needed to change its image with consumers to survive in a tough industry.

ONE FUNNY DUCK

When the Kaplan Thaler Group created the Aflac Duck, it chose Gilbert Gottfried to provide the Duck's voice. Gottfried was no stranger to voice-over work, having provided the voice of the parrot Iago in the classic 1992 Disney animated film Aladdin. A longtime stand-up comic, Gottfried first rose to prominence in 1975 when he appeared on the NBC variety show Saturday Night Live. He later acted in a string of diverse films, including Beverly Hills Cop 2, Problem Child, and Look Who's Talking Too.

Never a leading man, Gottfried nonetheless drew a solid fan base with his offbeat humor and distinctive voice. As a stand-up comedian he was often known for his bawdy humor, which was perhaps most evident in his performance of an old vaudeville joke shown in the 2005 documentary The Aristocrats. But his nasal, high-pitched voice also resonated in children's animated films, in which he often voiced comic relief. His character Iago was one of the most popular Disney villains, and the character later popped up in other Disney projects, including the television show House of Mouse.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Aflac contracted the ad agency Kaplan Thaler Group (KTG), a division of Bcom3 based in New York City, to help the brand break through to consumers. This was the first major campaign conducted by KTG on Aflac's behalf. The company earmarked $35 million for the campaign. KTG was run by cofounders Linda Kaplan Thaler and Robin Koval. They had developed an approach to advertising that they called the "Big Bang." A "Big Bang" campaign altered people's perceptions of a brand or product. Aflac, which suffered from poor brand recognition, decided that this was a good approach for the company.

While trying to develop an idea for the Aflac campaign, some of the KTG personnel had trouble remembering the brand's name themselves. While repeating the name in an effort to memorize it, the ad agency employees noticed that it sounded a little like a duck quacking. That prompted the creation of Aflac's new "spokesman," the Aflac Duck. The new "Duck" campaign began on December 21, 1999. Gilbert Gottfried, a nasal-voiced comedian who was known for his work in films such as Beverly Hills Cop 2, performed the Duck's voice.

One key spot featured two men in a steam room talking about insurance. One man was praising his insurance company, which helped him pay his out-of-pocket expenses following a serious accident. Every time he forgot the company's name, the Aflac Duck popped up to remind him by quacking, "Aflac." As the conversation continued, the Duck grew increasingly impatient with the man, eventually shouting at him. This was the second spot in the campaign, following the Duck's debut in "Park Bench," which featured a similar conversation located on a park bench. Both commercials revolved around people's difficulty in remembering the company's name.

More spots followed. One showed a young couple discussing having their first child. They realized that they needed supplemental insurance and were trying to think of the name of a good insurer. Once again, the Duck appeared to remind them: "Aflac." All of the initial spots played on the theme of consumers' difficulty in remembering the insurer's name. The commercials turned this weakness into a strength by using it as the source of much of the campaign's humor. The Duck himself was a humorous character, especially in the way that he grew increasingly frustrated by consumers' inability to either recall Aflac's name or listen to his prompts.

The spots were mostly aired as a part of what the ad industry called a "prime-time roadblock," a strategy involving running the same commercial on many different stations at about the same time. Aflac ensured a large audience by airing spots during every major network evening news program. The spots were also aired on CNN during Larry King Live and Headline News and on the financial network CNBC throughout the day. In addition, the spots ran during major sporting events, especially college football, professional baseball, and major tennis tournaments such as Wimbledon. As the campaign took off, the company's advertising spread into prime-time programming across the three major networks, ABC, NBC, and CBS. In July 2001 the Duck made his premiere in Japan, where it was just as successful.

OUTCOME

The "Duck" campaign was an unqualified success. USA Today reported that, based on a poll conducted by the newspaper and market-research firm Harris Interactive, it was one of the most popular campaigns of 2000. The company's name recognition among consumers shot up from 12 percent immediately before the campaign to a resounding 71 percent after the Duck's introduction. As the campaign continued, Aflac's brand recognition soared above 90 percent. The "Duck" spots were a key reason. According to the advertising research company Ipsos ASI, the initial "Duck" campaign scored more than double the industry average in brand recall.

Aflac also saw sales improve. In the first two weeks of 2000 the company had more sales leads than in all of 1998 and 1999 combined. It also saw annualized premium sales jump 28.5 percent in the second quarter of 2000, giving the company a record $168 million in sales that quarter. For the first time accident/disability insurance replaced cancer-expense insurance as the company's number-one product. Sales for the year were up a healthy 28 percent, and recruiting was up 22 percent.

The Duck's popularity prompted the company to offer stuffed "talking" Aflac Ducks, which quacked when squeezed, for sale on its website. Proceeds were donated to the Aflac Cancer Center at Children's Healthcare of Atlanta. The company's relationship with the institution dated to 1995, when it funded construction of the cancer unit. Aflac promoted the initiative on CNBC's Power Lunch. Company CEO Dan Amos appeared on the program in July with the Duck. The Duck made return appearances on the program throughout the month, promoting the charity effort. By August the company had raised $75,000.

Aflac's reputation thrived. In 2001 it was named the fifth most admired company in the health and life insurance industry by Fortune. The magazine sighted Aflac's "bold approach to advertising" as one reason for the honor. The Aflac Duck became a cultural icon, and the company began to associate itself with the Duck mascot, placing it on the company's website. In 2004 the Duck was named one of the country's favorite advertising figures, besting such characters as Ronald McDonald to be one of the inaugural members of the Advertising Walk of Fame in New York City.

In subsequent years a number of celebrities appeared in "Duck" spots, including comedian Chevy Chase, retired baseball star Yogi Berra, and singer Wayne Newton. The Duck was also featured on the TV shows The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and Saturday Night Live. The Duck would remain the focus of Aflac's advertising for several years. In an effort to explain the company's services better, however, the company began to de-emphasize the Duck in some of its advertising in 2004.

FURTHER READING

Elliott, Stuart. "Why a Duck? Because It Sells Insurance." New York Times, June 24, 2002.

Fass, Allison. "Ayer, One of Madison Avenue's Oldest Names, Is Fading Away as It Is Absorbed by Kaplan Thaler." New York Times, April 8, 2002.

Howard, Theresa. "Kaplan Ads Shoot for 'Big Bang.'" USA Today, July 25, 2004.

Insana, Ron. "Insurance Business Just Ducky for Aflac." USA Today, July 5, 2005.

Kaplan Thaler, Linda, and Robin Koval. Bang!: Getting Your Message Heard in a Noisy World, New York: Doubleday, 2003.

Rose, Lacey. "America's Most Loved Spokes-Creatures." Forbes, January 5, 2006.

Shubin, Seymour. The Man from Enterprise: The Story of John B. Amos, Founder of AFLAC. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998.

Sperber, Bob. "Linda Kaplan Thaler On the Spot." Adweek, April 21, 2003.

Vranica, Suzanne. "New Aflac Ad Campaign Muzzles Iconic Duck." Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2004.

Witkoski, Michael. "The Bottle that Isn't There and the Duck that Can't Be Heard: The 'Subjective Correlative' in Commercial Messages." Studies in Media & Information Literacy Education 3, issue 3 (August 2003).

Guy Patrick Cunningham

THE BROKEN LEG CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The primary business of Aflac, Inc., a Fortune 500 company based in Columbus, Georgia, was supplemental insurance. In an effort to make a major push to turn around its poor brand recognition among consumers, the company hired ad agency Kaplan Thaler Group (KTG) to devise a new campaign in 2000. KTG came up with a humorous set of TV commercials that introduced the Aflac Duck, which became an advertising icon. By 2004 Aflac's brand recognition stood at 90 percent, and the Duck was appearing in Hollywood films such as the 2004 hit Lemony Snicket's A Series of Unfortunate Events. The company even integrated the character into its logo. Surveys indicated, however, that many customers were still unsure of what Aflac actually did.

The company decided to initiate a $50 million campaign in December 2004 that would de-emphasize the Duck in favor of explaining supplemental insurance and what it provided consumers. KTG would once again mastermind all of the advertising. The new TV spots kept the Duck but moved him into the background. For example, in "The Broken Leg," the Duck busied himself writing checks to handle an accident victim's out-of-pocket expenses, while the injured man himself explained that Aflac was taking care of all of the expenses that his primary health insurance would not cover. Another new spot featured an on-screen appearance from Gilbert Gottfried, the comedian who had provided the Duck's voice since the character's initial appearance in the 2000 "Park Bench" spot.

The spots were largely successful. Aflac's revenues continued to climb, and its brand recognition held steady. A survey conducted by the Customer Respect Group (a research and consulting firm that focused on how corporations treated their customers online) indicated that the company was also hitting new highs in customer satisfaction. Aflac continued to tweak its use of the Duck in future campaigns.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Aflac, Inc., was founded as the American Family Life Assurance Company (also known by its acronym, AFLAC) in 1955 by three brothers, John, Paul, and Bill Amos. The company began as a small insurer and grew significantly after its 1958 creation of the first policy to cover cancer expenses. This policy remained the backbone of the company's business for decades. Until 2000 it had been Aflac's best-selling plan. Aflac grew steadily over the years since its founding, and by 2004 it was large enough to be listed among the Fortune 500. In the first few years of the twenty-first century more than 40 million people were insured by Aflac, and the insurer possessed assets worth more than $50 billion. The company adopted "Aflac" as its official name in 1990.

Aflac's business plan revolved around growing its core business. The company was especially successful in selling supplemental insurance, a type of insurance that helped pay for out-of-pocket expenses not covered by a primary health-insurance policy. These policies had been the focus of the company's most popular advertising campaign, the 2000 introduction of the Aflac Duck. The Duck, voiced by Gilbert Gottfried, first appeared in the spot "Park Bench" on December 31, 1999. The character remained the star of the company's advertising efforts for several years, appearing in more than 20 spots between 2000 and 2004.

The spots were devised by Kaplan Thaler Group (KTG), a part of Bcom3, which was in turn bought by the Publicis Groupe, Europe's largest communications company, in 2002. KTG was known for its "Big Bang" approach to advertising. The theory, which was articulated by agency founders Linda Kaplan Thaler and Robin Koval in their 2003 book Bang!: Getting Your Message Heard in a Noisy World, was based on the idea that advertising campaigns should strive to alter perceptions of the brand.

The Duck was a prime example of this approach in action. Other insurance companies often invoked stability or practicality in their commercials. Aflac's approach was built around humor. The original "Park Bench" spot featured two men on a park bench discussing supplemental insurance. Neither could remember the name of the carrier under discussion, so a duck appeared to "help" them by quacking the answer: "Aflac!" The spot's humor was underscored by the fact that neither man appeared to hear the Duck, who grew louder and more frustrated as the spot continued. The genesis of the character stemmed from a problem that KTG marketers shared with Aflac's pre-Duck customers: an inability to remember the company's unusual name. While trying to memorize the name, KTG members began repeating it to themselves, and one of the noticed that word "Aflac" sounded like a duck quacking. And the Aflac Duck was born.

The Duck boosted the company's profile significantly. Aflac's brand recognition exceeded 90 percent in 2004. In the first two weeks after the campaign began, Aflac garnered more sales leads than it had in all of 1998 and 1999 combined. Sales for the first year jumped about 28 percent. Increased brand recognition was a key contributor. The company began selling stuffed Aflac Ducks on its website, donating the profits from that venture to the Aflac Cancer Center at Children's Healthcare of Atlanta. Finally, in 2004 the company incorporated the Duck into the company's official logo.

The Duck became a celebrity in his own right. Soon he was parodied on television programs such as The Tonight Show and Saturday Night Live. Well-known stars, including retired New York Yankees hall-of-famer Yogi Berra and comedian Chevy Chase, made appearances in Duck spots. In 2004 the Duck made his feature-film debut in Lemony Snicket's A Series of Unfortunate Events. The Jim Carrey vehicle grossed more than $118 million at the box office. The Duck remained successful and popular, but Aflac was concerned that the spokes-character's fame was beginning to draw some focus away from the services that the company offered.

SO WHAT DOES AFLAC DO?

In December 2004 Aflac began a new drive to inform customers about its core business: supplemental insurance. Supplemental insurance was a form of insurance that worked as a "supplement" to traditional health insurance. It covered the kinds of expenses that traditional health insurance did not. The most obvious benefit was that it covered deductibles and other out-of-pocket expenses. But supplemental insurance also paid for treatment-related travel (if a patient needed to see a specialist in another city, for example) and the daily living expenses that could accrue during an illness, particularly when there was lost income from missed work. The key benefit of supplemental insurance was that it would come into effect immediately, whereas traditional health insurance required a patient to pay a certain initial cost (called a deductible) before covering other expenses.

Aflac's most popular policy for several decades was its cancer-expense insurance. Developed in 1958, this insurance worked as a supplement to a patient's primary health coverage, picking up the costs of deductibles on doctor's visits, hospital stays, and drug therapies. Supplemental accident and disability insurance offered similar benefits. In addition it bridged the gap in earnings until a patient was eligible for long-term disability benefits (which did not come into effect until a patient missed work for a predetermined period of time).

TARGET MARKET

The primary targets for Aflac's products were adults aged 35 to 54, especially those with children. Most of its insurance was sold via employers, because at the time, most Americans received insurance coverage through their jobs. Aflac was especially adept at reaching small-business owners. The company had several plans tailored to these kinds of companies.

Aflac's "Duck" campaign had done an incredible job of boosting the company's brand identification. While only about 13 percent of consumers recognized the brand in 1999, by 2004 that number was higher than 90 percent. The company's spokes-duck was a large reason for this. The character had become an advertising icon. In 2004 the Duck was honored with a place on the Advertising Walk of Fame in New York City. The character beat out more than two dozen other nominees in an online poll. Other characters honored included Kellogg's Tony the Tiger (associated with Frosted Flakes cereal) and Planter's Mr. Peanut.

One problem that Aflac faced was a lack of full awareness of what the company did. An October 2003 survey conducted by the market-intelligence firm the Bantam Group indicated that, while most respondents had heard of the company, 60 percent were unsure about what kind of services Aflac offered.

COMPETITION

Beginning in 2000 accident/disability insurance surpassed cancer-expense insurance as Aflac's biggest-selling plan. Unlike in the 1950s through the 1990s, when Aflac's success depended on holding onto a business it had largely invented (cancer-expense insurance), the company now relied on a service other insurers had specialized in for a long period (accident and disability insurance). Competition was provided by companies that offered services similar to those of Aflac, including supplemental insurance and accident/disability insurance. Just a few of its main rivals on this front were Citizens Financial Corp. of Louisville, Kentucky; Conseco, based in Carmel, Indiana; and Amerisafe, a company out of DeRidder, Louisiana. The latter specialized in workers' compensation insurance for those employed in hazardous industries. Aflac offered a variety of plans and needed to make sure to differentiate its plans from those of its competitors.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In an effort to build on its newly strong brand recognition, Aflac decided to close 2004 with a new campaign that would emphasize the company's core business. It retained the Kaplan Thaler Group (KTG), with which it had established a highly successful relationship, to run the new campaign. The company earmarked $50 million for this new campaign, which would focus on television spots aired mostly on network television.

The move carried risks: the Duck was popular with consumers, and it was so identified with the company that Aflac had inserted it into the company logo. The new spots offered a chance for Aflac to explain its services to consumers. One commercial, which aired during college football's year-end bowl games, featured two men sitting down and talking. The spot was titled "The Broken Leg." The setup recalled the "Park Bench" commercial that had kicked off the initial "Duck" campaign. The difference was that in the new spot the two men had no problem remembering the company's name. One of the men was shown wearing a cast as a result of a serious leg injury. His friend was surprised by the injured man's composure. The injured man explained that he was not alarmed by the situation because he had accident insurance from Aflac. Even though the man was missing work, his bills were being paid by Aflac. Aflac's supplemental insurance covered the bills that the man's primary insurance company did not pay.

The Duck was featured in the spot, although he did not speak. He appeared in the background, writing checks to cover the injured man's bills. The Duck even produced cash to pay for the man's Chinese takeout food. While the spot did not revolve around the Duck, Aflac and KTG made sure that he appeared. The company had to move delicately, since the Duck was so intertwined with the company's identity. If the Duck did not appear at all, Aflac reasoned, customers might get confused. This way the Duck's presence reminded consumers that the injured man was praising Aflac, the company whose name sounded like a duck quacking.

Another spot, titled "Pet Store," used humor to forge an independent identity for the brand. It starred none other than comedian Gilbert Gottfried, the man who had provided the Duck's voice since the character's inception. In the spot Gottfried tried to return the Duck to the pet store, complaining that he kept saying the same thing over and over again. The Duck then refused to quack. A helpful parrot chimed in and told the pet-store owner both the company's name and its business. Again, the spot explained supplemental insurance and underscored Aflac's strong and quick performance.

OUTCOME

The campaign was largely successful. Aflac retained its high level of brand recognition. In 2005 Fortune named Aflac number 465 on its Global 500 list, an improvement from its previous year's ranking at 477. The company generated $13.3 billion in revenue in 2004. Customers responded to the company's new tack and named Aflac one of the best companies in customer satisfaction, according to a survey by the Customer Respect Group. This indicated that Aflac's effort to focus attention on its performance paid dividends in customer satisfaction.

In the spring of 2005 Aflac unveiled the next phase in the Duck's evolution. A new spot, titled "Experiment," featured the Duck's brain being switched with that of model Melania Trump. The Duck then proceeded to explain Aflac's business in Melania's voice. The spot brought back the "quack"—only it came from Melania. This was a careful calibration on the company's part. It did not want too many spots to pass without the "quack" for fear of losing its hard-earned gains in brand recognition. But Aflac wanted people to know about its core business, too. It continued to tweak future campaigns in an effort to strike the right balance.

By later in 2005 the Duck was back helping customers directly. In "Pitching In," the Duck watched a couple's baby and engaged in household chores. This marked a decision to go back to the late 2004 phase in which the duck was an active Aflac representative.

FURTHER READING

Auletta, Ken. "The New Pitch: Do Ads Still Work?" New Yorker, March, 28 2005.

Elliott, Stuart. "Why a Duck? Because It Sells Insurance. Kaplan Thaler Puts Consumers Ahead of Peer Approval." New York Times, June 24, 2002.

Howard, Theresa. "Kaplan Ads Shoot for 'Big Bang.'" USA Today, July 25, 2004.

Insana, Ron. "Insurance Business Just Ducky for Aflac." USA Today, July 5, 2005.

Kaplan Thaler, Linda, and Robin Koval. Bang!: Getting Your Message Heard in a Noisy World, New York: Doubleday, 2003.

Rose, Lacey. "America's Most Loved Spokes-Creatures." Forbes, January 5, 2006.

Shubin, Seymour. The Man from Enterprise: The Story of John B. Amos, Founder of AFLAC. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998.

Sperber, Bob. "Linda Kaplan Thaler On the Spot." Adweek, April 21, 2003.

Vranica, Suzanne. "New Aflac Ad Campaign Muzzles Iconic Duck." Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2004.

Witkoski, Michael. "The Bottle that Isn't There and the Duck that Can't Be Heard: The 'Subjective Correlative' in Commercial Messages." Studies in Media & Information Literacy Education 3, issue 3 (August 2003).

Guy Patrick Cunningham

AirTran Holdings, Inc.

9955 AirTran Boulevard
Orlando, Florida 32827
USA
Telephone: (407) 251-5600
Fax: (407) 251-5727
Web site: www.airtran.com

■■■

GO. THERE'S NOTHING STOPPING YOU CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

AirTran Airways took to the skies in 1997 following the merger of AirTran, a small carrier serving 11 cities from its base in Orlando, Florida, and ValuJet, a discount carrier struggling to rebuild after the crash of one of its planes. Within two years AirTran was emerging as a strong competitor in the discount airline market, and the trouble-plagued ValuJet was fading into memory. By 1999 AirTran served 30 cities with 280 daily flights, and plans were under way to replace its entire fleet of planes with newer aircraft. AirTran's revenues were also steadily increasing, as passengers came back to the carrier. Following the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, which involving the hijackings of four commercial aircraft, AirTran was one of the few U.S. airlines to report rising income, with revenues of $733 million in 2002.

To help with the transition from ValuJet to AirTran, the airline hired the Milwaukee office of Cramer-Krasselt to create a rebranding campaign. The initial effort, "It's Something Else," was launched in 1997. As the success of the rebranding effort became apparent, Cramer-Krasselt replaced "It's Something Else" in 2000 with a new campaign, "Your Airline Has Arrived." To increase consumer awareness of AirTran's low prices and services, promoted as helping to make travel easy and affordable, the $23 million "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign was launched in 2003.

The humorous ads that formed the "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign were a hit with consumers and industry watchdogs alike. Included were television and radio spots, as well as print, outdoor, and Internet ads. The campaign received a 2004 Gold EFFIE Award and in the month after its launch was recognized by Boards Magazine as one of the top spots.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In June 1993 ValuJet joined the ranks of discount airline carriers when its first flight took off, traveling between Atlanta, Georgia, and Tampa, Florida. With its low fares and reliable service, the airline quickly grew in popularity with consumers. But ValuJet was plagued with problems, including planes that slid off runways and a fire on one flight. Then, in May 1996, tragedy struck ValuJet when one of its airliners crashed into the Florida Everglades, killing all 110 people onboard. Following the crash, the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) grounded ValuJet while the airline's maintenance and safety procedures were investigated. The airline's operating license was returned in September 1996, but travelers deserted ValuJet amid ongoing fears of safety problems. Soon after its license was restored, ValuJet announced plans to merge with AirTran, a small carrier based in Orlando. The ValuJet name was dropped, and the carrier began operation in 1997 as AirTran Airways.

The Milwaukee office of Cramer-Krasselt was hired to help reshape the airline and win back wary travelers. The agency replaced ValuJet's agency, Atlanta-based Hughes Advertising. Cramer-Krasselt's initial campaign included references to the ValuJet name. "It would have been disastrous if we had tried to cover up the connection and then had it leak out that AirTran was flying ValuJet planes," Peter Krivkovich, president of Cramer-Krasselt, told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. The initial campaign, "It's Something Else," had such taglines as "By the time we're through reinventing ValuJet, you won't even recognize it . . . New Management. New thinking. New airline." The effort helped put the airline back on track, but by October 1998 its flights were still taking off only slightly more than half full.

Undaunted, AirTran pushed ahead. In 2000 Cramer-Krasselt created a new campaign to replace "It's Something Else." This $8 million campaign, under the title "Your Airline Has Arrived," sent the message that AirTran could stand up against the major carriers, while offering affordable fares. Taglines included "We're the David vs. Goliath." The campaign seemed to work. Customers came back, and AirTran's revenues steadily increased, rising from $439 million in 1998 to $733 million in 2002. In 2003 Cramer-Krasselt created a campaign to replace "Your Airline Has Arrived." This new campaign, "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You," promoted AirTran's low business fares.

TARGET MARKET

Although AirTran's revenues were climbing and passengers were slowly rediscovering the carrier, the airline was still trying to convince consumers to think of AirTran first when they scheduled trips. The campaign was aimed particularly at business travelers, who were considered to make up one of the industry's most lucrative sectors. Thus, the campaign was designed to appeal both to leisure travelers planning quick getaways and to frequent business fliers. But more than anything, the campaign was aimed at any consumer looking for a low airfare. "Now more than ever consumers are looking for hassle-free, affordable travel options," said Tad Hutcheson, AirTran's director of marketing. He added that the new campaign showed how AirTran could give consumers what they wanted, including affordable ticket prices and flights to major destinations.

COMPETITION

The concept of no-frills, low-cost air travel had been introduced by Texas-based Southwest Airlines in 1971 when its first flight, between Dallas, Houston, and San Antonio, took off. Building on the innovative idea of providing passengers on-time flights at the lowest possible fares, the airline helped redefine air travel. Within three years Southwest had carried its millionth passenger, and by 2003 it had grown to become the number four carrier in the United States, with almost 2,800 daily departures that carried 65 million passengers to cities in 30 states. Besides helping to set the standard for future low-cost carriers, Southwest's innovative thinking was reflected in its marketing. In 2000 the airline launched a television campaign designed to encourage people to book flights on its website. The spots used humor to show people how they could leave uncomfortable daily situations behind by booking a quick vacation getaway on southwest.com. In an attempt to reach its target audience—25- to 54-year-old men who made frequent business trips—the airline also signed a sponsorship agreement with the National Hockey League. In 2003 Southwest took another unique approach to marketing when it partnered with the Arts & Entertainment Television Network (A&E) for a new reality show titled Airline. The program, which in effect starred Southwest Airlines and which debuted in early 2004, provided a behind-the-scenes look at the airline industry. It followed both passengers traveling to various U.S. locations as well as the airline staff, from ticket agents to pilots, who helped them on their way.

THE IMPACT OF AIRTRAN AND OTHER DISCOUNT AIRLINES

In 2003, according to Deutsche Bank, the international financial services provider, the top five U.S. airlines—American, Continental, Delta, Northwest, and United—reported combined losses estimated at almost $6.5 billion. As the big airlines were floundering, they also were thumbing their noses at the discount carriers. They should have been paying attention, however. The investment banking firm Lehman Brothers reported that by the end of 2002 discount airlines had captured 28 percent of the domestic market, up from 9 percent in 1991. In addition, discount airlines were affecting fares in markets that accounted for 56 percent of the larger airlines' revenue. With the promise of reliable, inexpensive flights, even without frills, airlines like AirTran, Southwest, and JetBlue were making money and attracting passengers away from the big five.

While Southwest was promoting itself with a reality television show, Delta Air Lines, one of the big five carriers in the United States, was preparing to compete with the discount carriers. In February 2003, in the hopes of winning back passengers, Delta launched Song, the airline's updated version of a discount carrier to replace its low-frills sibling, Delta Express. Described as an "airline within an airline," Song provided video screens at each seat and planned to include video games, live television programming, and music in its 36 planes. Song also announced plans to charge lower fares than the competition. As part of its marketing strategy, the airline opened Song retail shops, modeled after the inside of a airplane cabin. The first store opened in 2003 in New York's SoHo area, and a second store opened in 2004 in Boston's Prudential Center. Merchandise included video games and other entertainment options available on Song flights. For people who could not seem to get enough airline food, a selection of the items included on the Song menu could be purchased in the shops. And for those travelers anxious to book their next trip on Song, the stores had computers at the ready for customers to buy tickets. Although the airline reportedly planned to launch a television marketing campaign promoting Song, the retail shops were meant to enable consumers to enjoy the full Song experience without traveling to an airport. It was not clear, however, that the retail project was successful in selling tickets for flights on the airline, and in October 2005, as part of its restructuring plans under bankruptcy protection, Delta announced that Song would be phased out.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cramer-Krasselt designed "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You," AirTran's new 2003 advertising campaign, to send a clear message about the carrier's low fares and the ways in which its services could help consumers avoid various travel difficulties. The $23 million campaign was launched in February 2003 with five television spots. Also included were radio, print, outdoor, and Internet advertising. The television spots were limited to the larger markets served by AirTran, including Atlanta, Baltimore, and Milwaukee. The print and outdoor portions of the campaign appeared in all of the airline's markets.

Humor was the driving force in the "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign. Television spots targeting business travelers portrayed office situations with a twist. For example, the spot titled "Shipping" showed business people sent to a meeting in packing crates. The people climbed out of the crates with packing peanuts stuck in their hair before convening in a boardroom. One unfortunate employee missed the meeting, however, when his packing crate fell off the back of the delivery truck. A voice-over asked, "Is the cost of getting there getting in the way of business?" Another spot targeting business travelers, titled "Client Dinner," showed two businessmen entertaining a new client. At the end of the meal the businessmen walked out without paying the restaurant check. The spot ended with the question "Business trips getting too expensive?"

Among the TV spots aimed at leisure travelers was "Babysitters." This commercial showed grandparents arriving at their daughter's house for a visit. The parents quickly handed their small children to the grandparents before tossing luggage into a cab and driving off, with the grandfather running after the cab as he shouted, "Don't leave us with the babies." Another spot targeting leisure travelers, titled "Mouthwash," showed a family whose members shared a bottle of mouthwash. After each person rinsed, he or she spit the mouthwash back into the bottle, before passing it on to the next person. The voice-over asked, "Does the cost of travel have you cutting back in other areas?"

Print ads followed themes similar to the television spots. For example, one ad pictured a sleeping man in a business suit stretched out on a park bench, with his suitcase stashed underneath. The lights of a big city twinkled in the background. Another showed a business meeting taking place around a boardroom table that was made of plywood supported by stacks of plastic milk crates. The text in all of the print ads asked the question "Does the cost of flying have you cutting back in other areas?"

OUTCOME

According to Hutcheson of AirTran Airways, both the consumer and industry response to the "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" campaign was overwhelmingly positive. In the months following the campaign's launch in February 2003, the airline reported a steady increase in passenger traffic. By the end of 2003 the carrier's passenger traffic had jumped nearly 30 percent, to about 607 million travelers, compared to 466 million over the same period in 2002. In March 2003 Boards Magazine named the campaign one of its top spots. The campaign also received a 2004 Gold EFFIE Award for, among other things, reaching consumers, especially business travelers, and increasing ticket sales, which allowed AirTran plant to fly with full passenger loads, well above the break-even point.

In 2005, as further evidence of the campaign's success, Cramer-Krasselt introduced additional advertising under the "Go. There's Nothing Stopping You" banner. Included were five new television spots, which followed the same humorous formats that had been used in the originals. Other supporting efforts included new radio, print, outdoor, and Internet advertising.

FURTHER READING

"AirTran Ads Continue to 'Go.'" May 3, 2005. Available from <http://www.mediaweek.com>

"AirTran Airways, Formerly Value Jet, On the Move." Bergen County (NJ) Record, November 7, 1997.

"AirTran Airways Launches Five New Television Spots." PR Newswire, May 3, 2005.

"AirTran Airways Says 'Go'; New Advertising Campaign to Help Airline Break Down Travel Barriers." Business Wire, February 17, 2003.

Barrett, Rick. "Fledgling Airline ValuJet Nearly Collapsed Following a 1996 Crash That Killed 110 People: A Milwaukee Ad Agency Shaped Its New Image as AirTran." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, May 11, 2003, p. D1.

Bynum, Russ. "ValueJet Takes Off Again as AirTran." Los Angeles Daily News, September 25, 1997.

Dinell, David. "AirTran Rolls Out New Marketing Effort." Wichita Business Journal, February 19, 2003.

Goetzl, David. "AirTran Flies in the Face of Big-Time Carriers: New $8 Million Spot TV Campaign Takes David-vs-Golilath Approach." Advertising Age, May 8, 2000.

Grantham, Russell. "Delta's Song All Tuned Up for Battle: Hip Discount Unit Has Made Inroads." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 9, 2003.

"It's a Bird . . . It's a Plane . . . It's Southwest Airlines in a New A&E Network Documentary Series: 'Airline' to Debut on A&E. 1st Quarter 2004." PR Newswire, July 28, 2003.

Serwer, Andy. "Naked Ambition in the Air: The Growing Influence of Discount Carriers Is Changing the Game for Big Airlines." Fortune, December 8, 2003.

"Sky Hooks." Advertising Age's Creativity, April 1, 2003, p. 20.

Thurston, Scott. "Not Out of the Clouds: Weakness Amid Strength; AirTran Continues to Struggle for a Comeback; While Virtually All Other Sizeable Carriers Make Money." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 12, 1998.

"Top Spots: A Look at the Month's Most Notable Work." Boards Magazine, March 1, 2003.

Tully, Shawn, and Paolo Hjelt. "Straighten Up and Fly Right: The U.S. Airline Industry Is Broke; Here Are Five Ways to Fix It." Fortune, February 17, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

Allied Domecq PLC

The Pavilions
Bridgwater Rd.
Bristol, BS13 8AR
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 117 9785000
Fax: 44 117 9785300
Web site: www.allieddomecq.co.uk

■■■

LOOSEN UP A LITTLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Dunkin' Donuts, the wholly owned subsidiary of the United Kingdom–based Allied Domecq PLC, reigned in 2000 as the world's largest coffee-and-baked-goods chain. With 3,500 outlets and $2 billion in annual sales, the quick-service restaurant was outperforming competitors such as Starbucks Coffee Company and Krispy Kreme Doughnuts, Inc. Even though Starbucks and Krispy Kreme were rising in popularity, executives at Dunkin' Donuts remained undaunted. They believed that Dunkin' Donuts' customers preferred the chain's low prices and rapidly prepared drinks, such as its Dunkin' Donuts Dunkaccino, an adaptation of a café mocha. After a survey conducted by the ad agency Hill, Holliday, Connors & Cosmopulos of Boston revealed that most customers considered Dunkin' Donuts a respite from their everyday anxieties, Dunkin' Donuts released its "Loosen Up a Little" campaign to brand its stores as a place to relax.

The $60 million campaign was created by Hill, Holliday, Connors & Cosmopulos (often referred to as Hill Holliday) and targeted several different demographics. It first appeared during Labor Day weekend in 2000. The campaign's television, radio, outdoor, and print advertisements suggested that its audience "Loosen Up a Little" with Dunkin' Donuts. One spot featured a woman smearing cream cheese in the shape of a smiley face on a high-strung businessman's jacket. In another spot a man removed his toupee during a coffee break, while in a different spot a businessman licked the jelly filling from his tie. Posters were hung inside elevators in office buildings throughout New England. The campaign included a fantasy-sports promotion that offered encounters with professional athletes such as the football linebacker Ted Johnson of the New England Patriots. Commercials for the campaign aired across major U.S. markets during the season premieres of the hit TV shows ER, Friends, and Law & Order.

"Loosen Up a Little" ended prematurely in August 2002 because Dunkin' Donuts executives considered the tagline "Loosen Up a Little" to be inappropriate for the advertising climate following the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001. Nonetheless, the campaign helped Dunkin' Donuts generate more than $2.7 billion in sales for the 2001 fiscal year and record a 7 percent sales growth for 2002. It also earned a plethora of awards at the 2002 Francis W. Hatch Awards, which recognized New England's best ad campaigns.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1950, Dunkin' Donuts grew to become a leading quick-service restaurant on the East Coast. One of the chain's longest-running campaigns, created by the ad agency

Ally & Gargano, New York, featured "Fred the baker," played by actor Michael Vale. The 15-year campaign used more than 200 spots, and in many Fred uttered the refrain "Time to make the doughnuts" early in the morning.

In 1989, while that campaign was underway, Dunkin' Donuts was purchased by Allied Domecq, the world's second-largest alcohol distiller. Dunkin' Donuts was not the only quick-service restaurant owned by the British enterprise. Allied Domecq had also acquired the ice-cream giant Baskin-Robbins and the sandwich chain Togo's Eateries. In 1997, when Dunkin' Donuts began expanding its offerings beyond just doughnuts and drip coffee, the chain ended its "Fred the Baker" campaign. New menu items helped Dunkin' Donuts increase sales by 10 percent in 1998. That same year Dunkin' Donuts awarded its advertising account to Hill, Holliday, Connors & Cosmopulos. The agency's copywriter Marty Donohue and art director Tim Foley successfully pitched commercial ideas to Dunkin' Donuts executives. One spot was about a police car chase that ended at Dunkin' Donuts. Another commercial depicted a construction site past which beautiful women walked unnoticed, yet when a man carrying Dunkin' Donuts Coolata drinks passed by, construction workers began whistling and hollering. Dunkin' Donuts vice president of marketing Eddie Binder praised Foley and Donohue in Adweek for their lighthearted, humorous approach. "They just got it. They understood the brand," he said.

Some of the agency's first work for Dunkin' Donuts included a doughnut-naming promotion in which participants were eligible for either $50,000 or a lifetime supply of Dunkin' Donuts. The promotion included the commercial "Ski Lodge," which featured a woman using her beauty to dupe men out of Dunkaccinos. The ad agency conducted a survey that revealed that many Dunkin' Donuts customers considered their shopping experience inside Dunkin' Donuts as a "break from reality." The survey results became the impetus for the upcoming "Loosen Up a Little" campaign.

COMMERCIALS AFTER TIVO

With the emergence of TiVo, a product that allowed audiences to skip unwanted television commercials, advertisers began creating new opportunities for television advertising. Coca-Cola reportedly spent $13 million to place its soft drink on the judges' table on Fox's hit reality show American Idol. Dunkin' Donuts, the world's largest coffee-and-baked-goods chain, paid to have its coffee placed on the reality television show High School Reunion. Phil Risinger, director of advertising for Dunkin' Donuts, noted in the Boston Globe that the Dunkin' Donuts' product placement on the show was not intrusive. "It's not in your face," he explained. "They're doing what folks do in the morning. They're drinking coffee."

TARGET MARKET

The campaign included several executions to reach three distinct target markets. First, a poster execution appeared inside the elevators of 69 office buildings on the East Coast in early 2001. The posters, along with a majority of the campaign's commercials, targeted what the ad critic David Gianatasio referred to in Adweek as "stressed-out urbanites." The posters suggested that in the hectic lives of most workers, Dunkin' Donuts offered a desirable place to "Loosen Up a Little." By placing the posters in elevators, in which many business professionals spent a few minutes every work day, the campaign targeted what Dunkin' Donuts field marketers called a "captive" target. Marty Donohue of Hill Holiday explained the timeliness of the campaign to the Boston Globe: "Dot-coms were rampant, and people were under a lot of stress. Dunkin' Donuts was seen as a safe haven."

The campaign also targeted a demographic that Hill Holliday dubbed the "regular guy." While Starbucks sold premium coffee drinks such as the café mocha for an average price of $3, Dunkin' Donuts sold its equivalent, the Dunkaccino (a mixture of coffee, milk, and chocolate), for about $1.50. Dunkin' Donuts was considered by its marketing department to be a brand for the mass market. To effectively reach this target, the campaign included "one-of-a-kind" sports-fantasy prizes. One prize allowed participants to win tickets to a Celtics basketball game and sit with Nomar Garciaparra of the Red Sox. Similar prizes included interactions with Ted Johnson of the Patriots, Paul Pierce of the Celtics, and Joey Franchino of the New England Revolution. "We're the regular guy's brand, so sports becomes a big part of getting access to our customer," Dunkin' Donuts vice president Ken Kimmel explained to the Boston Globe.

The campaign's third target included the East Coast's burgeoning Latino community. Select spots that were originally filmed in English were later released with Spanish voice-overs on Hispanic television networks. The Latino community of Boston, the city with the most Dunkin' Donut stores in America, had expanded from an estimated 36,000 Latinos in 1980 to 85,000 in 2000.

COMPETITION

In October 2001 Starbucks was aggressively adding new stores to its existing 3,000 locations in North America.

Advertising analysts were amazed by Starbuck's ability to expand the specialty-coffee retail industry with relatively little advertising. Executives at Starbucks firmly believed that word-of-mouth advertising was more effective than paid advertising. Therefore, instead of financing exorbitant campaigns, Starbucks spent operating costs on its enjoyable in-store environment, premium coffee-based products, and unparalleled customer service. From 2001 to 2002 alone, sales for Starbucks jumped from $2.6 billion to $3.3 billion.

When Starbucks did advertise, it was usually in partnership with other major brands. In 2000 Starbucks formed an exclusive relationship with the New York Times. In exchange for publishing print ads announcing new Starbucks drinks and holiday gift cards, the New York Times became the sole newspaper sold inside Starbucks. To compete with Dunkin' Donuts, Starbucks temporarily sold the popular Krispy Kreme doughnuts inside select Starbucks stores. The relationship ended after Krispy Kreme announced its own line of espresso beverages. In 2002 the North American Coffee Partnership, a joint venture between Starbucks and PepsiCo, released its first television advertising campaign, which promoted bottled Frappuccino and Starbucks DoubleShot drinks. The campaign included print ads, four 15-second TV spots, and one 30-second spot.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Commercials for "Loosen Up a Little" first aired during Labor Day weekend in 2000. In addition to television spots, the $60 million campaign included radio, outdoor, and print advertisements. One of the campaign's lead creatives, Marty Donohue, explained in an interview with Adweek that the campaign aimed to brand Dunkin' Donuts as "little comfort zones. Not a serious place, but a place people go every day" to escape the stressfulness of life. Donohue and Foley led a team of 12 copywriters and art directors for "Loosen Up a Little" and hired the acclaimed commercial director Noam Murro of Biscuit Filmworks to direct the spots.

One of the first spots featured a man who took advantage of being stuck in a traffic jam by leaving his car to fetch a Dunkin' Donuts breakfast. "The work probes a little deeper into the human condition than previous Dunkin' ads, while retaining the humor and freshness of the earlier work," Foley told Adweek. Storylines for the commercials were created from the agency's "honest assessment" of real-life customer experiences, he added.

In a television spot titled "Smile," two obnoxious business executives discussed a meeting that was taking place later that day. "I am stoked. Locked and loaded," the more brazen of the two exclaimed. The bus lurched, and a woman standing behind the man accidentally smeared Dunkin' Donuts cream cheese on his jacket. "Hey, why don't you watch yourself," he snapped. The woman then appeared to scrape the cream cheese off his jacket. When the man exited the bus, however, it was revealed that she had only shaped the cream cheese into a smiley face.

Later in the 2000 holiday season another spot featured Christmas carolers trying to eat doughnuts while singing. By the spot's end their words had become unintelligible. Commercials aired on network channels during the season premieres of shows such as ER, Friends, and Law & Order. The campaign targeted what advertising critics referred to as "stressed-out urbanites." Posters promoting Dunkaccinos and the chain's "Coffee by the Pound" offering were posted inside elevators of 69 East Coast office buildings. To target Boston's expanding Latino community, commercials were rereleased with Spanish voice-overs across Spanish-language television networks.

In 2001 the campaign targeted what the creatives from Hill Holliday referred to as the "regular guy." "Peel-and-win" stickers that allowed participants to win sports-fantasy prizes were placed on Dunkin' Donuts drinks. Prizes for the promotion included opportunities with athletes from six of New England's professional sports teams. One prize offered several hours of soccer coaching from Kristine Lilly of the Boston Breakers. Another prize included the ice-hockey captain Joe Thornton of the Bruins delivering coffee and doughnuts to the winner's office.

OUTCOME

Advertising critics, Hill Holliday, and executives from Dunkin' Donuts all considered "Loosen Up a Little" to be a success. Dunkin' Donuts exceeded $2.7 billion in sales for the 2001 fiscal year. It also posted a 7 percent sales increase for the beginning of 2002, outperforming the collective growth rate of 3 percent for the entire quick-service-restaurant industry. Overall sales for Allied Domecq, the owner of Dunkin' Donuts, jumped from $3.8 billion in 2000 to $5.2 billion in 2002. The campaign also collected a variety of awards at the 2002 Hatch Awards, which recognized New England's best ad campaigns. Unfortunately for Dunkin' Donuts, the campaign ended prematurely in August 2002. The company's executives deemed the tagline "Loosen Up a Little" too irreverent in the wake of the September 11th terrorist attacks.

When Dunkin' Donuts began its "Just the Thing" campaign in August 2002, creatives at Hill Holiday explained the shortcomings of the "Loosen Up a Little" campaign to the Boston Globe. "The problem was, though, you had to spend half your 30 seconds talking about how hectic life was. You had to explain it and set it up. That left us with only 15 seconds to talk about the product. 'Just the Thing' gets to the point quickly," Marty Donohue said. "It's wonderfully simple and you get it right off the bat. It's so perfectly Dunkin' Donuts. The new tagline is as comforting as a doughnut and a cup of coffee."

FURTHER READING

Adams, Steve. "Dunkin' Donuts Pours Effort into Courting Hispanics." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, September 28, 2004, p. 9.

———. "Dunkin' Tests Appetite for Sandwiches." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, July 22, 2005, p. 14.

———. "Funky Dunkin'." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, January 25, 2005, p. 15.

Aoki, Naomi. "Where Reality TV, Commerce Meet." Boston Globe, March 21, 2004, p. A1.

Collins, Monica. "A War's Brewing in Cutthroat World of Coffee, Doughnuts." Boston Herald, August 10, 2003, p. 28.

Gatlin, Greg. "Dunkin' Approach Recasts Ads as Serious Biz." Boston Herald, October 11, 2004, p. 31.

———. "Product Placement Carries a Premium." Boston Herald, March 30, 2005, p. 27.

Goodison, Donna. "Dunkin' Taps Customers for New Ad Blitz." Boston Herald, November 2, 2005, p 035.

MacArthur, Kate. "BK, McD's Wake Up to Premium Coffee." Advertising Age, April 11, 2005, p. 14.

Noyes, Jesse. "Versatile Brown Stars in Dunkin' Ad." Boston Herald, August 26, 2005, p. 37.

Powell, Jennifer Heldt. "Making a Pitch for Dunkin' Donuts." Boston Herald, April 12, 2005, p. 38.

Slajda, Rachel. "Making It All Ad Up." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, June 1, 2005, p. 28.

Wentz, Laurel. "Dunkin' Donuts Creates Spanish-Language Spot." Advertising Age, September 6, 2004, p. 15.

Kevin Teague

The Allstate Corporation

2775 Sanders Road
Northbrook, Illinois 60062-6127
USA
Telephone: (847) 402-5000
Fax: (847) 326-7519
Web site: www.allstate.com

■■■

OUR STAND CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Allstate Corporation, America's longtime number two auto insurer, faced new challenges in the 1990s when competitors such as GEICO and the Progressive Corporation blanketed television with spots playing up the low prices of their policies. Long reliant on its slogan "You're in Good Hands," Allstate found itself in need of a brand refurbishing to counteract the inroads made by these direct marketers. In November 2003 Allstate released the "Our Stand" marketing campaign, its first to feature a celebrity spokesperson, actor Dennis Haysbert, known for playing the president of the United States on the hit television series 24.

While "Our Stand" included radio, print, and Internet elements, the core of the campaign was the television spots featuring Haysbert. The spots offered a soft sell in which Haysbert made the case that price was not everything when it came to buying car insurance—a relationship with an agent was important as well—and vouched for Allstate's integrity and commitment to take a stand for customers and promote their interests. Although the company did not reveal the advertising budget for the campaign, Allstate was reported in the press to have increased its ad budget 56 percent to more than $120 million in 2003, a level it maintained in 2004 and 2005.

"Our Stand" helped Allstate reestablish its position in the marketplace. The company reported that the number of consumers contacting Allstate through its sales agents, website, and call center had increased after the campaign began, but it did not provide any financial data to support the claim. Haysbert's contract was extended through 2006, however, indicating that the company was pleased with the campaign's effectiveness.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Allstate was credited with having the oldest surviving tagline in paid advertising: "You're in Good Hands with Allstate," which dated back to 1951, when a print ad first depicted a pair of hands cradling an automobile. (The oldest tagline in use was "Only You Can Prevent Forest Fires," a long-standing public-service effort produced by the Advertising Council; it had been used since 1947.) Throughout its history Allstate and its rivals produced advertising that was serious in tone, emphasizing such company virtues as trust and reliability and never mentioning price. Then, in the 1990s, GEICO, a direct marketer of car insurance ranked seventh in sales, upset the status quo by bombarding the television airways with humorous commercials that challenged the likes of number two Allstate and market leader State Farm solely on the basis of price. The Progressive Corporation soon followed suit, and Allstate came under increasing pressure to protect its market share.

To keep its slogan fresh and maintain relevance in the marketplace, Allstate offered variations on the "Good Hands" theme. The insurer also dabbled with celebrity endorsers. In 2001, for example, Allstate began a television, print, and radio advertising campaign that used the tagline "The Right Hands Make All the Difference." The advertisements featured football players Joe Montana and Jerry Rice as well as inventor Ann Lai, all of who whom relied on their hands in their professions. But the "Right Hands" campaign failed to stem a drop in Allstate policyholder growth, and after 18 months it was retired, replaced by the "Our Stand" campaign, which was the first Allstate advertising campaign to center on a celebrity spokesperson: actor Dennis Haysbert.

An African-American, Haysbert had acted in numerous films and television shows since getting his break in 1979, when he first appeared on the television series The White Shadow. But he achieved true celebrity status in 2001, when he was cast in the television series 24 to play Senator David Palmer, a character who would later become president. At the core of Palmer's character was moral integrity, an attribute that viewers associated with Haysbert the actor and that thus made him an ideal advocate for Allstate's message. Jill Weaver, Allstate's vice president of brand strategy, was quoted in a press release as saying that Haysbert embodied "the spirit of the Allstate brand. Experienced, honest, and understanding, with a sense of strength and conviction."

GOOD HANDS

Allstate's venerable slogan "You're in Good Hands With Allstate" was inspired by an incident in life of one of the company's general sales managers, Davis W. Ellis. In the spring of 1950 his youngest daughter was hospitalized with hepatitis. To ease his concern his wife told him not to worry: "We're in good hands with the doctor." That remark came to mind later in the year when Allstate was struggling to coin a slogan for its first national advertising campaign. Ellis shared the story about his daughter, and soon the company had settled on a slogan that endured for well over half a century.

TARGET MARKET

The "Our Stand" campaign sought to update the brand image of Allstate while appealing to a more diverse customer base. In essence, auto insurers were faced with the difficult task of reaching one of the broadest markets imaginable: anyone who drove a car, whether they were male or female, young or old, and regardless of ethnicity. In this regard Haysbert was a good choice as spokesperson; he had wide appeal, even with younger consumers, despite the fact that he was born in 1954. Allstate's main pitch was that picking an insurance company was more involved than just choosing the lowest price. More important, the company argued, was the service a policyholder could expect and the integrity of the insurance agents and of the company that stood behind them. Hence, the "Our Stand" target audience was somewhat older than the demographic targeted by GEICO and Progressive. This older market also had more money to spend on car insurance and placed greater value on a relationship with a broker and the solidity of the insurance company backing the policy.

COMPETITION

In terms of market share, State Farm was Allstate's top rival. It controlled about 18.5 percent of the market in 2004, compared with Allstate's 10 percent. Next in line were Progressive with 7.1 percent and GEICO with 5.5 percent. Rounding out the top 10 in direct premiums written were Farmers Insurance Group (4.9 percent), Nationwide Group (4.5 percent), United Services Automobile Association Group (3.5 percent), American International Group (3 percent), Liberty Mutual Group (2.8 percent), and American Family Insurance Group (2.2 percent). All insurers were boosting their marketing budgets, eager to take business from each other, a result in large measure of the increasing profitability of the auto-insurance business. Because cars had become better built, they needed less repairs and were involved in fewer accidents. Consequently, insurance companies had fewer claims to pay out. Moreover, America's population was growing older, resulting in people driving slower, again leading to a decrease in accidents, greater profits for insurers, and a heated scramble to peel away the customers of rivals.

In addition, Allstate, State Farm, and other old-guard broker-based insurers found themselves competing against the likes of GEICO and Progressive in another way. Mya Frazier reported in Advertising Age, "It's a battle of the business model, pitting the call-center row of headset-wearing operators taking claims and signing on new customers against neighborhood agents who know a customer's kids and may even be a neighbor. It's pitting Internet price quotes [against] in-office consultations and the yearly search for a best price [against] a lifetime relationship with an agent." It was at this fundamental level that the "Our Stand" campaign made its case with consumers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In answer to GEICO and Progressive's blitz of advertising focusing on price, Allstate's "Our Stand" campaign made an emotional appeal to urge consumers to re-evaluate what was really important in insurance. Lisa Cochrane, the insurer's assistant vice president of marketing communications, told American Banker reporter Lee Ann Gjertsen, ''We know that customers are looking for more than just a low price; they need good value, good protection. That's why they buy insurance or financial security products.'' At the same time, Cochrane noted, Allstate believed that ''quality insurance should be affordable.'' A secondary purpose of the campaign was to promote research that, according to Allstate, revealed that 70 percent of customers who switched to Allstate saved $200. Moreover, because Allstate had in recent years become involved in banking and financial services, the ''Our Stand'' campaign served to build general awareness of what Allstate had to offer in addition to its core auto-insurance business.

The ''Our Stand'' campaign broke in November 2003. The crux of it was the television spots anchored by Haysbert, but the company also included radio spots that began airing later in the month, print ads that debuted in early 2004, and Internet executions. The first four TV spots were shot and produced by Sam Mendes, the director of the Oscar-winning film American Beauty. These initial spots set the serious tone of the more than 20 spots featuring Haysbert. In the spot titled ''Pay Phone,'' Allstate took a subtle dig at GEICO and its telephone-based operation. The camera slowly zoomed in on Haysbert standing next to a pay phone on a dark, deserted stretch of road. In a low-key voice he asked, ''If you needed your insurance, who would you call? Not the name of the company, but the name of the person? You got two seconds. Coming up blank? You may want to consider Allstate . . . You deserve a relationship with a real person. That's Allstate's stand. Are you in good hands?'' A wide shot of the scene capped the commercial, with the Allstate logo and ''You're in Goods Hands'' tagline offering a counterpoint to Haysbert's final question.

A number of other commercials featuring Haysbert followed. In ''Chop Shop'' he stood in a dank garage where thieves ripped apart a stolen SUV to sell for parts, and he spoke about Allstate's 600-person fraud team. In ''Guardrail'' he stood next to a crumpled highway guardrail to talk about Allstate's 20 percent discount for people with good driving records. The spot called ''Boiling Turkey'' showed Haysbert in a backyard with a deep-fat turkey fryer, which was used to illustrate the potential of holiday mishaps, whether they were caused by fryers or car accidents on icy roads. In ''Life Raft'' he compared Allstate to a life raft and other insurers, such as GEICO, to little more than a circular life preserver—a zero. In addition, the spot promoted new policy features that dovetailed with the marketing campaign: Accident Forgiveness, which prevented rates from increasing in the event of an accident, and New Car Replacement, so that if a car was ''totaled'' the policyholder received a new car rather than a check that deducted appreciation.

Allstate built on the ''Our Stand'' campaign in 2004 and 2005. Haysbert appeared in television, radio, and print advertisements that were specifically aimed at African-Americans. Because research indicated that these consumers relied heavily on the referral of family and friends when buying car insurance, the advertisements centered on family reunions. Also in 2004 Allstate targeting the Hispanic market by airing four Spanish-language television spots featuring actor Esai Morales. The tagline for these executions was ''Así piensa Allstate'' (That's what Allstate believes). The Hispanic component of the ''Our Stand'' campaign also included radio, print, and outdoor elements. In addition, the ''Our Stand'' campaign was used in 2005 to introduce a new Allstate product: Your Choice Auto Insurance, which could be customized to suit individual needs.

OUTCOME

Allstate was pleased with the ''Our Stand'' campaign. The television spots polled well with consumers. According to USA Today 's Ad Track survey, 17 percent of consumers liked the commercials ''a lot.'' While that number was below the Ad Track average of 21 percent, it represented a strong showing in a category that consumers generally did not like. The campaign was also recognized by advertising trade publication Adweek, which named ''Boiling Turkey'' a ''Best Spot'' in December 2003. Haysbert's work was also much appreciated by Allstate. In fall 2005 the company renewed his contract to serve as Allstate spokesperson through the end of 2006. The most important measure of the campaign's success, however, was to be found on Allstate's balance sheet. While the company reported no hard numbers, it did note in its 2003 annual report, ''[R]eaction, as measured by increased contact with agencies, allstate.com, and 1-800-Allstate, has been positive.'' Allstate had pulled the plug on the previous marketing campaign after 18 months, so the fact that the company renewed its commitment to Haysbert through 2006 indicated that the ''Our Stand'' campaign was having an appreciable effect on Allstate's bottom line.

FURTHER READING

''Allstate Addresses Latino Marketplace.'' Adweek (midwest ed.), May 18, 2004.

''Allstate Signs Celebrity to New Ads.'' Best's Review, January 2004, p. 64.

Anderson, Mae. ''53 Years Later, Still in Good Hands.'' Adweek, February 3, 2003, p. 40.

Frazier, Mya. ''Progressive, Geico Prod Auto Rivals into Price War.'' Advertising Age, February 28, 2005, p. 4.

Gjertsen, Lee Ann. "Insurers Cut Marketing, but 3 Campaigns Shine." American Banker, March 11, 2004, p. 11.

Goch, Lynna. "Get Emotional: Reaching Out to Consumers' Feelings Is the Key to Successful Insurance Marketing." Best's Review, July 2005, p. 15.

Howard, Theresa. "Presidential Allstate Ads Counter the Gecko." USA Today, August 16, 2004, p. 6B.

Kirk, Jim. "Allstate's New Campaign Takes Stand on Old Values." Chicago Tribune, November 11, 2003.

Yerak, Becky. "Allstate's Ads Push Agenda." Chicago Tribune, November 24, 2005.

Ed Dinger

Altria Group Inc.

120 Park Ave.
New York, New York 10017
USA
Telephone: (917) 663-4000
Fax: (917) 663-2163
Web site: www.altria.com

■■■

IT'S A WOMAN THING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, The Philip Morris Companies changed its name to Altria Group Inc. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

The slogan Philip Morris Companies Inc. used in 1968 to launch its Virginia Slims campaign—"You've Come a Long Way, Baby"—effectively combined the two seemingly dissimilar marketing themes of female attractiveness and women's rights. The series of ads were highly successful, however, and in 1996 the company introduced a successor campaign with the slogan "It's a Woman Thing."

The new campaign, which was directed by Leo Burnett USA of Chicago, took on what might be called a post-feminist ironic tone. For example, a photo of a beautiful blond woman on a motorcycle was accompanied by the line "I don't necessarily want to run the world, but I wouldn't mind taking it for a ride." Another ad showed a young woman who exuded beauty, happiness, and "female cool" polishing her nails a metallic blue. The accompanying line asked, "Does this look stupid on me? The correct answer to the question is 'No.'"

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cigarettes had been marketed directly to women since the 1880s, when the Kimball Tobacco Company tried to sell perfumed cigarettes called Satin Straight Cuts in satin drawstring purses. The effort failed because of the social climate. When in the 1920s Lucky Strike ads appeared that featured slender young women who advised, "Reach for a Lucky instead of a sweet," suggesting a correlation between smoking and thinness, sales tripled within a year, however. The image of Amelia Earhart was used in Lucky Strike ads of 1928, which implied that the aviator had smoked Luckys on her transatlantic flight. (Earhart, a nonsmoker, protested.) The following year, fashion and activism combined when debutantes and feminists marched in New York's Easter Day parade smoking "torches of freedom" in the form of Lucky Strikes.

In 1967 the American Tobacco Company failed in an attempt to market king-size cigarettes for women with the line "Cigarettes are like girls. The best ones are thin and rich." But when Philip Morris introduced Virginia Slims a year later with the slogan "You've Come a Long Way, Baby," the brand rose into the number one spot for sales to women. The strategy behind the initial marketing of Virginia Slims linked good looks and emancipation, or, in the words of Ellen Merlo, the company's group director for brand management, "Old-time fashion and fun." Sepia-tinted photographs of downtrodden "women of yesteryear" shown sneaking cigarettes and then feeling shame upon being discovered were juxtaposed with bright, glossy images of beautiful contemporary women who seemed to have arrived at full-blown independence. The ads were slightly sardonic about the lot of women in earlier times, when "a woman wasn't allowed to vote, earn, talk, think or smoke like a man," as characterized in the Virginia Slims Book of Days Engagement Calendar.

Direct advertising was never the sole promotional device used by Virginia Slims. The Book of Days Engagement Calendar, introduced in 1970 and offered free at points of sale, contained humorous historical anecdotes and memorable sexist quotes but few overt selling lines. The Virginia Slims Opinion Poll, a series of polls conducted by the Roper Center to survey the changing status of women in society, was launched in the same year. Soon after, Virginia Slims created the first professional women's tennis tour, which allowed the brand name to continue to appear on television without direct pitches for the product. In the 1980s sponsorship of the visual and performing events by parent corporation Philip Morris led the Wall Street Journal to call it "the art world's favorite company." And the 1990s saw the introduction of Virginia Slims V-Wear, advertised as a "fashion collection with a streetwise attitude" and available free with proofs of purchase. Critics, however, lambasted the relatively short period of time—six months—and number of proofs of purchase—980—needed to obtain a complete ensemble, calculating that a smoker would have to go through five packs of cigarettes a day to meet the goal.

TARGET MARKET

The "It's a Woman Thing" campaign targeted women smokers. The ads invoked the "feel-good solidarity of a Hollywood female buddy movie," wrote Lucy O'Brien in The Independent. O'Brien quoted Mandy Merck, a lecturer in media studies at Sussex University: "It's a woman thing implies that you can share this culture of smoking with your friends. Smokers adore each other—shared vices and addictions make great bonding experiences." Worldwide, women were a market of great interest because they invariably smoked less than men and in some markets did not smoke at all. In Hong Kong, for example, where only 1 percent of women smoked, tobacco companies had spent millions trying to persuade them to begin.

Despite antismoking campaigns, the Wall Street Journal reported that U.S. consumption of cigarettes held steady in 1996 and possibly was rising. One significant factor was the new generation of smokers in their late teens and early 20s who saw the habit as hip. From 85 to 90 percent of new smokers in the United States in 1997 were teenagers, with 3,000 minors beginning to smoke each day according to figures provided by the American Lung Association. According to reports by the association and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, virtually all smokers began the habit by age 18. Consumer Reports reported that a high proportion of young smokers were girls, who associated smoking with weight loss, social acceptance, and independence.

Philip Morris and Leo Burnett were careful, however, not to pitch the Virginia Slims ads directly to underage smokers. "They didn't say it's a girl thing; it's a woman thing," observed Carol Boyd, director of the University of Michigan's Substance Abuse Research Center. "It has to do with growing up, being independent." Nevertheless, this was an enticing prospect for young girls. As quoted on CNN, teenage smoker Tiffany Walter summed up the image by saying, "[It's] like this beautiful supermodel that'll never gain weight. [She's] just gorgeous, has a lot of money, is classy, up in the business world, just like women of the '90s want to be."

YOUNG SMOKERS

Of young female smokers in the early 1990s, the overwhelming majority were white. In a 1995 survey on high school smoking in the United States, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that 40 percent of white females attending high school had smoked in the previous month and that 21 percent were heavy smokers. Of young African-American females attending high school, only 12 percent smoked at all, with just 1 percent being heavy smokers. Some observers suggested that the female cool of the "It's a Woman Thing" ads continued to play to the social pressure to be thin, which was more of a concern to white than to African-American teenage girls, who held different ideas of beauty.

COMPETITION

In 1997 Philip Morris was the largest tobacco company in the world, with 45 percent of the U.S. and 12 percent of the world market, and its Marlboro cigarettes were the world's best-selling brand. Nearly three-fourths (72 percent) of smokers between the ages of 18 and 24 were loyal to two brands—Marlboro (59 percent) and R. J. Reynolds' Camel (13 percent). Both brands pursued advertising that incorporated female images or broadened their formerly masculine images. R. J. Reynolds announced plans to add a Josephine Camel character to its "Joe Camel" campaign, and some ads for Marlboro Lights become more androgynous, with desert scenes and tumbleweed replacing the Marlboro Man.

According to Margaretha Haglund, head of tobacco control at Stockholm's Institute of Public Health, young women smokers traditionally favored so-called light or low-tar brands. Early brands developed specifically for women included Eve, Cooper, Charm, and Kim, as well as Virginia Slims. A main competitor for Virginia Slims was Capri, whose ads retained a classic style of feminine imagery, showing a woman in an elegant gown holding a long, thin cigarette with the accompanying line "She's gone to Capri and she's not coming back." Other competitors included Dakota, aimed at "virile females with a high-school education," according to Sussex University's Merck, and Misty, a budget-priced cigarette advertised with young-looking models and the slogan "Light 'n Sassy . . . Light Price, Too."

Nonetheless, by 1985 the market share of Virginia Slims was double that of all other women's cigarettes combined. Among all brands Virginia Slims was number 10 in sales in 1996. Its market share was 2.4 percent, far behind Marlboro's 32.3 percent, but not far behind Camel's 4.6 percent. No other women's brand made the top 10 list. Ad spending for Virginia Slims in 1996 was $30.9 million, a $4.4 million increase over the previous year.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Some of the "It's a Woman Thing" magazine ads followed the "competent and liberated" theme put forth by previous Virginia Slims ads and placed a lit cigarette squarely in the center of the image. One ad, for example showed a well-groomed woman in a stylish straw hat who eyed the camera over her cigarette and stated, "If it slices, dices or scrubs, it's hardly ever the gift we've always wanted." Some of the ads did not depict or address smoking itself but instead showed women refusing to feel tormented by problems with boyfriends. In one a long-haired blond girl shared a denim jacket with a grinning young man, with the line saying, "It takes time to get over a breakup. Fortunately, a new boyfriend can cut that time in half." In another a short-cropped, tousle-haired girl slouched in her slip and smiled ruefully at the camera: "Making up with us is easy; admit you're wrong even if you're not."

Accompanying the ads was a new Virginia Slims promotional program—Woman Thing Music—a label for emerging female musicians. Woman Thing Music was envisioned as a series of CDs and tours promoting undiscovered women artists. It was all part of the Virginia Slims "tradition of providing opportunities for women to showcase their talents and interests," Mary Jo Gennaro, Philip Morris's manager of events marketing, told the Wall Street Journal. The CDs were not sold at record stores but were available free with the purchase of Virginia Slims in special packages of two at supermarkets, convenience stores, and other outlets.

Brand-name CDs had been used by other marketers. In January 1997 Time magazine reported that the Woman Thing Music label was just the latest in a list of brand-name labels that included those by Banana Republic, Gap, Victoria's Secret, and Pottery Barn. Most of these CDs were compilations of previously released songs by well-known musicians. In contrast, Woman Thing Music aimed to promote new and unknown female performers by underwriting their albums and sponsoring live performances. The first CD, released in the spring of 1997, was a six-song mini-album by 27-year-old Martha Byrne, who played Lily on the soap opera As the World Turns. Four of the songs were originals, including one titled "It's a Woman Thing," and one was a cover of John Lennon's "Imagine," which contained the line "It's a woman thing."

OUTCOME

Antismoking activists saw the "It's a Woman Thing" campaign as propaganda. The new slogan was lampooned in critical press reports as "It's a chemo thing," and the previous "You've Come a Long Way, Baby" was cynically interpreted in light of dire health statistics. The Independent's O'Brien wrote, "As regulations against tobacco advertising become more stringent, it is inevitable that the dated image of the woman with the healthy grin and the skinny cigarette will fade away. Companies are already shifting their focus from magazines and posters to other areas such as sponsorship and the Internet. For the Virginia Slims woman, at last it seems her days are numbered."

According to Time, critics of the CD project called it "an attempt to get pop music-loving kids to smoke." The Woman Thing Music campaign met with active resistance in the form of a counter concert called Virginia Slam. Leslie Nuchow, a New York singer and songwriter, organized the event in May 1997. She had been contacted by a representative of Philip Morris to participate in the Woman Thing Music project but declined, saying that the CDs and tours exploited women for the profit of the tobacco industry. Nuchow then gained recognition for her own music through the counter event, which had the support of popular performers such as Ani Di Franco. In August 1998 Mediascope reported that Woman Thing Music CDs were no longer available.

FURTHER READING

Brotman, Barbara. "Why Is It a Woman Thing? Feeling Pressure to Be Thin, More Women and Girls Smoke." Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, August 5, 1996.

Carpi, John. "New Evidence That Cigarette Ads Targeted Teen Girls." American Medical News, March 14, 1994, p. 8.

Cohen, Elizabeth. "Women Targeted by Cigarette Ads, Not Health Ads." CNN, November 21, 1996.

Farley, Christopher John. "C'mon Baby, Light My Fire: Cigarette Giant Philip Morris Goes After the Youth Market by Starting Its Own Record Label." Time, January 27, 1997.

Guthrey, Molly. "Former Tobacco Executive Says Youths Never Targeted." Pioneer Press, April 23, 1998.

Hardin, Peter. "Virginia Slims Effort Slammed." Richmond Times-Dispatch, February 16, 1997.

Henningsen, Michael. "You've Come a Long Way, Baby!" Weekly Alibi, January 29–February 4, 1997.

Jones, Chip. "Philip Morris to Revamp Ad Practices: Chairman Wants Emphasis on Not Marketing to Youth." Richmond Times-Dispatch, June 3, 1998.

O'Brien, Lucy. "The Market: Smoking: It's a Woman Thing." The Independent, August 25, 1996.

Reilly, Patrick M. "Virginia Slims Gets Its Own Record Label." Wall Street Journal, January 15, 1997.

Robinson, William A. "Virginia Slims Comes a Long Way in 17 Years." Advertising Age, May 30, 1985, p. 30.

"Women and Smoking." Mediascope, August 15, 1998.

Megan McNamer

Amazon.com, Inc.

1200 12th Ave. South, Ste. 1200
Seattle, Washington 98144-2734
USA
Telephone: (206) 266-1000
Fax: (206) 266-1821
Web site: www.amazon.com

■■■

AMAZON THEATER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Amazon.com, Inc., entered the retail marketplace as a pioneering online bookseller in 1995, and though it had been steadily diversifying its product offerings all along, by 2004 most consumers still thought of the website only in connection with books and music. Having recently made the transition, thanks to years of capital-intensive investment, from dot-com trendsetter to actual profit maker, Amazon wanted its customers to begin thinking of its site whenever they needed anything. Unconvinced that television and other traditional forms of advertising could translate into online sales, Amazon and its founder and CEO, Jeff Bezos, enlisted Fallon Worldwide's Minneapolis office, a leader in online branded entertainment, to spread the message about Amazon's breadth of products via Amazon.com itself.

The result was "Amazon Theater," a series of five short films starring well-known Hollywood actors and integrating products available for purchase on Amazon.com. The films, sponsored by JP Morgan Chase & Co., cost approximately $2.5 million to produce. Timed to coincide with peak holiday traffic, they premiered on Amazon.com each Tuesday between November 9 and December 7, 2004, and were packaged as a free "holiday gift" to customers. Though the featured Amazon products were folded into the stories without fanfare, they were listed as starring players in an interactive credit roll at the end of each movie, allowing viewers to click and go to linked Amazon pages to make immediate purchases.

This innovative integration of entertainment and shopping attracted industry and media attention and pointed the way to future explorations of interactive advertising. Amazon continued to experiment with the inclusion of entertainment on its website by partnering with the Tribeca Film Festival in 2005 to stage a short-film competition. Candidate films were available for free viewing on the website, and Amazon customers selected the winner.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Inspired by a statistic claiming that Internet usage was growing at a rate of 2,300 percent a year, entrepreneur Bezos launched Amazon in July 1995 as an online bookseller. By doing away with the costs associated with the building and operation of traditional retail stores, the pioneering Web business was able to offer consumers lower prices than its physical-world counterparts while still delivering a high level of customer service. As the Web population grew exponentially in the late 1990s, so did Amazon. It went public in 1997; extended its product range to music, videos, toys, and electronics in 1998; began a concerted effort to buy up other dot-coms and to offer a wider range of online services; and increasingly established an international presence by 2000, with websites serving England, Germany, France, and Japan. In 2002 Amazon partnered with hundreds of clothing retailers. In 2003, after years of steady investment aimed at allowing it to boast "Earth's biggest selection" and to claim to be "Earth's most customer-centric company," Amazon posted its first yearly profit.

By 2004, despite the fact that Amazon's product selection rivaled that of Wal-Mart, most consumers still thought of the online retail powerhouse as a site strictly for buying books and music. Amazon wanted to change this perception, but it had almost entirely quit investing in traditional media advertising, choosing instead to keep prices low and offer free shipping. The company had, however, already experimented with branded entertainment on its site. During the 2003 holiday season Amazon had enlisted celebrities Jack Black, Bruce Springsteen, Hillary Clinton, and Tom Brokaw, among others, to offer exclusive content and gift recommendations on its site. Because Amazon represented "a hybrid between stores and a media outlet," according to branding consultant Allen Adamson, the promotion also served the interests of the celebrities, who contributed their content and recommendations free of charge.

Amazon's interest in continuing to experiment with online branded entertainment made it a logical match for Fallon Worldwide, the agency widely credited with inventing the category. In 2002 Fallon's Minneapolis office had teamed up with successful feature-film directors, including Ang Lee, John Frankenheimer, and Guy Ritchie, to create short, online action films starring BMW cars. The BMW films won several major awards and helped boost the carmaker's sales by 8 percent in 2003. Though the BMW films seemed to herald the arrival of a dynamic new outlet for marketers, the dot-com slump, together with the fact that a majority of Web surfers still did not have the high-speed Internet connections required to watch video footage efficiently, kept the category from becoming viable for most companies.

TARGET MARKET

Because it could air the "Amazon Theater" films in a prominent place on its own site, Amazon had a built-in audience that was available to few other Web advertisers. "Amazon enjoys real critical mass," Fallon's Rob Buchner told Adweek. "They are a network unto themselves." At the time of the campaign's launch, more than 30 million Americans were visiting Amazon.com each month, and the site had more than 44 million registered members. During the holiday season Amazon, like most retailers, saw its traffic spike significantly, so Fallon chose the 2004 holidays as the ideal time to undertake a branding effort.

The majority of Amazon's customers were affluent and college educated, and they generally felt comfortable with new technologies and media. They were accustomed to having their shopping experience include free entertainment and informational content, such as the previous holiday season's celebrity contributions, customer reviews of Amazon's products, and recommendations based on previous purchases.

The "Amazon Theater" films did not try to push products or the Amazon brand in a traditionally aggressive way; rather, they were intended to be a natural extension of the ongoing effort to improve the overall customer experience, which the company viewed as an important way of promoting loyalty. Though the films integrated products for sale on Amazon.com and offered links for purchasing those products in their credit sequences, there was no mention of or reference to Amazon at all. Amazon received no product-placement fees and did not make product names or logos easy to spot. Instead, the films were offered as a gift to customers. As founder and CEO Bezos said, "It's a great example of Amazon's relentless commitment to finding new and innovative ways to surprise and delight customers and deliver an unparalleled online experience."

COMPETITION

As an online book and music vendor, Amazon was far ahead of its competitors during this time. Its nearest bookselling competitor was barnesandnoble.com, the online complement to the category-leading bookstore Barnes and Noble. Like Barnes and Noble, barnesandnoble.com used features such as magazine subscriptions and author events to attract customers. Although Amazon

CHOOSE YOUR OWN ENDING

Although all of the "Amazon Theater" films had interactive credits, "Do Geese See God," directed by David Slade and starring Blair Underwood, took even further advantage of its medium of distribution by making the story itself interactive. The movie's title, a palindrome, mirrored the structure of the story, which circled back on itself endlessly unless viewers participated by choosing one of several alternate endings, thereby freeing Underwood's character from the story's otherwise infinite loop.

had a larger selection of book titles, barnesandnoble.com had a larger inventory on hand at any given time.

The online auction site eBay, with nearly 50 million visitors per month in the fall of 2004, generated more monthly traffic than any other Internet commerce site. Although its business model differed from Amazon's—it allowed individuals to buy and sell their own items and derived income from user fees and advertising—it rivaled Amazon as an online stop for purchasing almost anything at all. After a two-year advertising campaign that promoted its range of products and featured average people singing show tunes, eBay shifted to a "People Are Good" message in 2004. The campaign ran on TV, in magazines, and online, and, in conjunction with a newly established buyer-protection program, it endeavored to reassure consumers about the merits of doing business with strangers.

As a superstore Amazon fell far short, in sales, of the behemoth bricks-and-mortar retailer Wal-Mart, which was the world's largest company of its kind. With about 75 percent of its 5,700 stores located in the United States, Wal-Mart was, during this time, expanding its international presence while projecting sustained U.S. growth for the coming decade. Criticized for its employment practices and battling dozens of lawsuits, Wal-Mart undertook a national newspaper campaign to repair its image.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although Bezos and Amazon wanted the emphasis to be on entertainment—the presiding idea being that the "Amazon Theater" films were meant as a gift to customers—Fallon was charged with the goal of making customers aware that the website was more than just a place to shop for books and CDs; it was a one-stop online destination for virtually any product imaginable. Fallon's creative team thus devised five film scripts loosely organized around the theme of karmic balance, each of which showcased a particular segment of products that consumers did not necessarily associate with Amazon. The agency hired the bicoastal production company RSA USA, run by Hollywood filmmaker brothers Ridley and Tony Scott, to collaborate on the project. RSA USA matched the five scripts with directors from its diverse roster, and actors Minnie Driver, Blair Underwood, Darryl Hannah, and Chris Noth were enlisted to star in the films. Each Tuesday for the five weeks between November 9 and December 7, 2004, a new film, ranging from 5 to 10 minutes, premiered on Amazon.com. The films, the budgets of which were estimated at roughly $500,000 apiece, were sponsored by JP Morgan Chase & Co. The Chase brand appeared throughout the "Amazon Theater" experience, and Chase's Amazon.com platinum Visa card was featured.

"Portrait," featuring Driver as an envious boss and focusing mainly on fashion products, told the story of an overweight female employee whose inner beauty was uncovered when a magical portraitist photographed her. "Agent Orange," directed by Tony Scott, also featured fashion products and was billed as a suspenseful, psychedelic love story in which strangers were brought together on a subway by a goldfish. "Do Geese See God," starring Underwood as a man caught in a futile race against time, highlighted home electronics, while "Tooth Fairy" integrated housewares and appliances into the story of a father (Noth) searching for a tooth hidden by his daughter. The "Amazon Theater" series concluded with "Careful What You Wish For," a tale of comeuppance featuring Hannah and a wide array of jewelry.

So that the product placement did not interfere with the stories, special care was taken to integrate the products seamlessly into each film. Instead of playing up the products' appearances in the narratives themselves, after the manner of traditional product-placement agreements, Fallon and Amazon listed products as though they were actors in the closing credits. The credits, moreover, were interactive. Viewers could click on an actor's or a director's name and go to an "artist boutique" offering gift and philanthropic recommendations and showcasing that artist's other movies, books, and CDs available for sale. Likewise, viewers of "Amazon Theater" films could click on any starring product in the credit roll and go to the appropriate Amazon page for purchasing it. After premiering on Amazon.com and running through the 2004 holiday season, the "Amazon Theater" films ran in theaters prior to featured movies.

OUTCOME

Adweek credited the campaign with offering "a glimpse at what the merger of the PC and the TV could mean: a shopping portal within programming," and Advertising Age placed the films at the top of their "10 Best Web Series or Films" list for 2004. But Bezos downplayed the potential of "Amazon Theater" to generate sales, maintaining that the films were meant primarily as entertainment and telling the Wall Street Journal that, if the films were advertising for Amazon, "they're the worst advertising in the world." Amazon was able, of course, to track traffic and purchasing activity related to "Amazon Theater," but the company was unwilling to release any numbers. Both Amazon and Fallon spokespersons claimed that the campaign was a success on all fronts, and Amazon indicated that it would continue looking for new ways to provide interactive entertainment and to incorporate short films on its website.

In March 2005 Amazon partnered with the Tribeca Film Festival and its sponsor, American Express, to announce the "Amazon Theater"/Tribeca Film Festival Short-Film Competition. Amazon invited filmmakers to submit short films of up to seven minutes, and Amazon customers could view them for free on Amazon.com and vote on their favorites. The five that received the most votes were screened at the Tribeca Film Festival, which ran from April 19 to May 1, 2005. The top-rated filmmaker, after another round of customer voting, was given a $50,000 grant for a future film in the form of a prepaid American Express card.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James B., and T.L. Stanley. "Amazon Jumps on Internet-Film Trend." Advertising Age, September 6, 2004.

Champagne, Christine. "RSA Takes Short Route for Amazon." Shoot, November 19, 2004.

"Cinema Amazonia." Creativity, December 2004.

Cuneo, Alice Z. "EBay Effort Plays Up Public Honesty." Advertising Age, October 4, 2004.

Fritz, Ben. "Shorts Long on Innovation." Variety, November 28, 2004.

Graham, Jefferson. "At the (Amazon) Movies: E-Tailer Offers New Way to Sell." USA Today, November 9, 2004.

Nason, Pat. "Feature: Amazon.com Jump-Starts Short Films." UPI, November 24, 2004.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "American Theater." Adweek, November 29, 2004.

Reinan, John. "Fallon to Create Amazon Web Flicks." Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 20, 2004.

"Showtime at Amazon." Newsweek, November 29, 2004.

"10 Best Web Series or Films." Advertising Age, December 20, 2004.

Wingfield, Nick. "Amazon Lures Stars—Gratis—to Promote Holiday Gifts." Wall Street Journal, November 11, 2003.

———. "Amazon Offers Free Short Films in Holiday Push." Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2004.

Mark Lane

America Online, Inc.

22000 AOL Way
Dulles, Virginia 20166
USA
Telephone: (703) 265-1000
Fax: (703) 265-1101
Web site: www.corp.aol.com

■■■

AOL LATINO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

America Online, Inc. (AOL) emerged in the 1990s as the largest Internet service provider (ISP) in the United States, a feat it accomplished in large measure through the mass distribution of start-up CD-ROMs and free trials. Many of its customers were families and people new to the Internet who were won over by AOL's claims that it was easy to use. By the early 2000s, however, AOL's strong growth came to an end, and it began to lose subscribers to cheaper dial-up ISPs as well more expensive but much faster broadband providers. On its rise to the top AOL had netted a great deal of Hispanic customers, and as a matter of course AOL became the leading portal for Hispanics. They were an alluring demographic—fast growing, family oriented, and cost conscious—making them an ideal source to replace the dial-up customers that AOL was losing at an alarming rate. To better attract and serve this market, AOL launched a Spanish-language portal called AOL Latino in September 2001. While AOL reached out to the Latino market with Spanish-language advertising, the commercials were merely translated versions of material developed for the general population. In 2003 AOL finally hired an Hispanic advertising agency, Casanova Pendrill Publicidad, Inc., and released an advertising campaign that was specifically developed for the Hispanic market.

The AOL Latino campaign, the budget of which was not made public, unfolded in waves and included television, radio, print, outdoor, and Internet elements. The early TV spots highlighted AOL features that were popular with Hispanics: music downloads, education support, and instant messaging. Later the campaign emphasized the theme of empowerment, stressing the idea that having the Internet in the home was important in the educational development of children.

AOL was pleased with the results of its Latino campaign. Although the company did not reveal subscriber gains, the campaign clearly solidified AOL Latino's position as the number one Spanish-language ISP. Furthermore, it helped mitigate AOL's continuing loss of general-population subscribers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The precursor of AOL was Q-Link, an online service established in 1985 for owners of Commodore personal computers. The company that operated it, Quantum Computer Services, changed its name to America Online in 1991. With the advent of the World Wide Web in the 1990s, an increasing number of people bought personal computers to take advantage of the Internet. AOL vied with two other early online entrants, CompuServe and Prodigy, to become the market leader among Internet service providers (ISPs). AOL was relentless in its efforts to distribute start-up CD-ROMs and enticed new subscribers with free trials of its service. AOL was successful in selling itself to parents who wanted to maintain limits on content for their children; it also attracted customers who were simply new to the Internet and preferred more guidance than was available with other services. In 1997 AOL became America's largest online service, boasting 8 million subscribers, a number that would double just a year later.

During its rise to the top AOL attracted a large number of Hispanics. It was not until September 2001, however, that it launched AOL Latino to cater specifically to the Spanish-speaking market. In July 2002 the company established a U.S. Hispanic interactive-marketing unit. By this time AOL had merged with Time Warner, creating the largest media company in the world, and the online unit came under increasing pressure as the subscriber base, which had reached about 25 million in the United States, began to erode. AOL was losing out on one end to cheaper dial-up services and on the other end to providers of faster high-speed Internet connections. As a result it began to view the Hispanic market as an important source for replenishing its pool of customers. In January 2003 Advertising Age reported, "2.5 million Hispanic households [were] likely to go online for the first time in 2003, and . . . those new to the Internet [were] increasingly Spanish-dominant." In January 2003 Casanova Pendrill Publicidad, an ad agency that was part of Interpublic Group and was based in Irvine, California, was awarded AOL's Hispanic advertising account. In May of that year AOL released its first-ever comprehensive campaign targeting Hispanics, both to reinforce its position as the top ISP for Spanish-speaking Americans and to attract new business. Prior efforts were simply Spanish-language versions of advertising created for mass audiences.

CORPORATE LOVE

America Online, introduced by Stephen M. Case in 1985 as a small dial-up Internet service called Q-Link, evolved into a media powerhouse 15 years later. In 1999 it acquired the companies Netscape Communications (known for its Web browser), MovieFone (a ticketing service), and two major Internet music providers: Spinner Networks and Nullsoft. A year later it added the mapping-services company MapQuest, and in 2001 it merged with Time Warner in a $183 billion deal that created the largest media company in the world. Case was named chairman of the new behemoth.

TARGET MARKET

In 2000 the Hispanic population in the United States numbered more than 40 million, or about 13 percent of the overall population. It not only was the largest minority group in the country but also was growing at a fast clip: about 5 percent each year, four times faster than the general public. Thus, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, by 2010 there were expected to be 50 million Hispanics in the United States, making them an increasingly inviting opportunity for marketers of all stripes. The AOL Latino campaign targeted bilingual and Spanish-dominant speakers who either planned to switch ISPs or intended to begin using an ISP in the next 6 to 12 months. Within that group AOL looked to appeal to families, as it did with the general population. Mary Ann Donaghy, AOL's executive director of marketing strategy and new-product development, explained to Advertising Age, "Hispanic Internet users tend to be younger than other users, are more likely to use instant messaging and to download music and videos, and spend more if they shop online, especially on music and DVDs." Therefore they were an ideal audience for AOL's product-enhancements pitch, which addressed these activities.

COMPETITION

In appealing to the Hispanic market AOL faced much of the same competition as it did with the general population, because many in the target demographic were bilingual and might easily choose an English-language Web interface over a Spanish-language one. Hispanics tended to be very price sensitive, so they generally opted for dial-up connections. Thus, AOL had to contend with cheaper dial-up ISPs, such as Earthlink, the NetZero and Juno brands of United Online, Yahoo!, lesser-known brands such as Copper and Toast.net, and local ISPs. In the broadband category AOL competed against telephone companies offering DSL service and cable TV operators offering cable-modem service, which was even faster than DSL. An increasing number of consumers opted for a high-speed connection, foregoing AOL's offer of premium content at an additional cost. AOL also had to contend with small Spanish-language ISPs—such as Pasito.com, which teamed up with the popular Hispanic portal Para—and a more formidable challenge from Microsoft's MSN, which in 2001 bought Yupi Internet, a Spanish-language Internet portal. Although it faced a lot of competition for the business of Hispanics, AOL was the unchallenged market leader.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The AOL Latino campaign, estimated to be budgeted at $10 million, broke in May 2003 and included television, radio, and print elements. The focus was on music downloads, education support, and instant messaging, features that Hispanic consumers used more than the general population. Writing for Adweek Online, Ann M. Mack reported that the two initial 30-second television spots played on ''the themes of family, friends and education, and emphasize[d] AOL features that are appealing to Hispanics, such as entertainment and the ability to communicate with people domestically and abroad via the Web.'' The spots relied on the tagline ''Get closer to your world''; one showed a boy clicking a mouse to explore a botanical garden online, and another showed a girl clicking on a link to listen to the words of Abraham Lincoln. The spots ran on the popular Spanish-language television channels Univision, Telefutura, and Galavision in several of the top-10 Spanish-speaking markets, including Chicago, Miami, New York, and Los Angeles. They were aired again in July 2003. A print component of the campaign also began in May, and radio spots were unveiled in July.

A second phase of the AOL Latino campaign began in November 2003 and included television, radio, print, and outdoor advertising. Three of the television spots featured AOL's Running Man icon. For example, the spot titled ''School'' depicted the character in a classroom. While writing in Spanish on a blackboard, a teacher heard a disruption and turned around to ask, ''Who's passing notes?'' (''Notes'' in Spanish translated as ''messages,'' thus drawing a connection to AOL's instant-messaging feature.) The children in the room then pointed to an unlikely student, the Running Man, AOL's icon for instant messaging, who looked away in an attempt to appear innocent. The spot closed with him dashing out as class was dismissed, with a voice-over commenting, ''America Online learned Spanish . . . introducing the new AOL Latino.'' Writing for Adweek, Rebecca Flass explained, ''In showing Running Man learning Spanish, AOL is hoping to convey that it now speaks the language of Latinos.'' The second Running Man spot, ''Housekeeper,'' featured a mother apparently interviewing an unseen person as a housekeeper, asking how the person intended to protect the kids. The punch line of the spot was the revelation that the woman had been addressing the Running Man and talking about AOL and its parental-control features. The third spot, titled ''Love,'' followed the same pattern, this time with a man in a cubicle talking to someone offscreen, presumably a lover. ''Finally we understand each other,'' he said. ''We're talking the same language.'' Once again the Running Man was revealed as the silent partner. The tagline for these spots was ''Acércate a tu mundo'' (Get closer to your world).

Other television spots in this phase of the campaign were 30-second vignettes that, according to company literature, were ''meant to supply tips to users that address offerings like homework help, instant messaging, and parental controls.'' The campaign's radio spots, featured on the 66 stations of Univision Radio, focused on Hispanic families' affinity for Spanish even when communicating online. Billboard ads were placed in the top 10 Hispanic markets, print ads appeared in leading Spanish-language magazines, and Spanish advertising was run on websites. In addition, AOL began an aggressive distribution of CDs containing AOL Latino 9.0 Optimizado (the Spanish version of the new version of AOL, AOL 9.0 Optimized) through direct mail.

In June 2004 AOL began a final campaign phase that ran through the end of the year. The advertising shifted its focus to the theme of empowerment; this idea was based on market research showing that 70 percent of Hispanics believed that having an Internet connection in the home increased a child's performance in school, thus giving them a better chance to go to college and ultimately land a good job. The first television spot in this series, titled ''The Talk,'' showed a young boy asking his parents why the family did not have Internet access at home. The spot then showcased AOL Latino's educational features, such as bilingual homework help. The father then brought home a computer with access to AOL Latino; the family began to experience the Internet, and the spot closed with the boy bringing home an excellent report card.

AOL also introduced a pair of supporting programs. One, the ''Sign On a Friend'' promotion, paid a $50 bounty to an existing member when he or she referred a friend to AOL Latino. The other was the introduction of the AOL Optimized PC, a personal computer priced at $299.99 with a one-year AOL membership commitment of $23.90 a month; it was available at Office Depot stores and other retailers. In addition to a computer and a printer, the system came bundled with a suite of software that included word-processing and spreadsheet applications. Although the PCs were made available to all consumers, they were especially suited to cost-conscious Hispanic families and could be purchased preloaded with AOL Latino service. Moreover, the PCs could easily switch from Spanish to English to accommodate bilingual consumers and families with members who preferred one language over the other.

OUTCOME

AOL continued to experience serious erosion in its overall number of U.S. subscribers and subscriber revenues, losing out to high-speed providers as well as less-expensive dial-up ISPs, but AOL Latino was able to make gains with the Hispanic population to offset losses in the general public. The campaign succeeded in doubling normal call volume to AOL member-services centers, as the target audience embraced the opportunity to receive more information about a free trial. The company did not reveal the exact number of Hispanics it added to its customer base other than to say that AOL Latino "significantly increased memberships." Focus groups and other research, according to the company, also showed that the campaign was well received by the target audience.

FURTHER READING

"America Online Launches $10 Million Advertising Campaign Directed at U.S. Hispanics." Technology Advertising & Branding Report, May 19, 2003.

"AOL Targeting Hispanic Population." Communications Today, May 13, 2003.

Flass, Rebecca. "AOL Begins Hispanic Push in Major Cities." Adweek (southeast ed.), November 10, 2003.

Mack, Ann M. "AOL Debuts Spanish-Language Effort." Adweek Online, May 13, 2003.

———. "AOL Introduces Hispanic Service." Adweek Online, October 1, 2003.

———. "AOL Promotes Its New Optimized PC." Adweek, August 23, 2004, p10.

Wasserman, Todd. "AOL Running Man Has Message for Hispanics." Brandweek, November 10, 2003, p. 6.

———. "AOL Says Hola." Brandweek, April 7, 2003, p. 3.

Wentz, Laurel. "Hispanics' Web World Widens." Advertising Age, January 26, 2004, p. 27.

———. "Online Marketing: Niche Within a Niche." Advertising Age, August 5, 2002, p. 33.

Ed Dinger

WELCOME TO THE WORLD WIDE WOW CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

America Online, Inc. (AOL) used a strategy of mass distribution of start-up CD-ROMs and free trials along with unsophisticated late-night television spots to become the largest Internet service provider (ISP) by 1997. Because it relied on dial-up service, AOL faced a major challenge with the advent of broadband (high-speed) Internet access provided by telephone and cable TV companies. Moreover, AOL joined forces with Time Warner in a celebrated 2001 merger, creating a media giant. Expectations for performance were heightened, but AOL found the business landscape shifting and began to lose subscribers, both to cheaper dial-up ISPs and faster broadband service providers. AOL, pigeonholed as a dial-up ISP in the minds of consumers, attempted to become a broadband provider but soon abandoned that strategy. Instead it decided to reposition itself as a premium-content provider—an add-on service for people acquiring broadband connections from other sources. In an effort to rebrand itself and pitch the broadband package, in January 2003 AOL hired Len Short, formerly of Charles Schwab & Co., to serve as chief of brand marketing. Short recruited a new ad agency, BBDO New York, to develop a campaign to sell AOL Broadband.

In March 2003 AOL unveiled a $35 million, two-month campaign with a new tagline, "Welcome to the World Wide Wow." Unlike previous efforts, the new AOL television spots possessed all the glitz expected from a Madison Avenue advertising agency. They aired during prime time rather than being relegated to cheap late-night slots. The campaign also included an online blitz that saturated the Web with ads touting AOL Broadband. The television spot that received the most attention featured movie star Sharon Stone in a night-gown in bed, a life-size version of the AOL running-man icon, and a bit of double entendre.

The campaign's "World Wide Wow" tagline was questioned by critics, and the Sharon Stone spot was singled out for vituperation. While Short maintained that he was pleased with the campaign and insisted that it had met its intended goals, his words were belied by his actions. He asked for new ideas from ad agencies, and a few months later AOL trotted out a new approach and a fresh tagline. Despite the changes, AOL continued to lose subscribers and failed to win many converts to its broadband service. By February 2004 Short had left the company, and AOL reverted to its previous marketing strategy.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

America Online, an early participant in the Internet revolution, had by 1997 emerged as the leading Internet service provider (ISP), relying mostly on the mass mailing and distribution of program CD-ROMs and free trials. Beyond that, the company's marketing was a ragtag affair that included buying television time on the cheap and airing crude spots late at night; it possessed no coordination and achieved little impact. Adweek critic Barbara Lippert described AOL commercials as "cheap-looking, numbed-out affairs featuring an array of smiley, zomboid converts at their keyboards, spouting lines stiffer than the ubiquitous sign-up discs." The tagline was "So easy to use, no wonder it's No. 1!" Nevertheless, AOL thrived because of it ease of use and low price, both of which appealed to the millions of consumers who began to buy their first computers and were unsure about how to navigate the new world of the Internet.

Through free trials and mass distribution of CDs, America Online became the largest Internet Service Provider. © RUARIDH STEWART/ZUMA/CORBIS.

The scattershot approach worked until the 2000s. After it merged with Time Warner in 2001, creating the largest media company in the world, AOL began to see subscriber growth slow down. The market was becoming more sophisticated about computers and the Internet, as many people opted not to pay for AOL's proprietary content and to simply subscribe to a less expensive, bare-bones Internet connection. Moreover, as a dial-up service AOL was beginning to feel pressure from broadband service providers, such as telephone companies offering DSL service and cable television companies offering even faster cable-modem service. AOL launched its own broadband service, offering a connection and AOL content while touting speed and ease of use. Given that all broadband products presented the same advantages, however, AOL struggled to differentiate itself from the competition. The company then changed course, electing instead to bundle its content with broadband carriers at an extra charge to consumers. The add-on service included more video clips, better parental controls to keep children within the confines of the AOL site, virus protection, and a block on pop-up advertising.

To support the broadband service and meet challenges in the marketplace, AOL hired a new brand marketing head, Len Short, formerly with Charles Schwab & Co. In early 2003, after just one week on the job, he fired the company's advertising agency, Gotham, which had held the account since 1997 and had not impressed Short with its approach to selling AOL Broadband. He then asked other agencies to pitch ideas for a broad $150 million campaign to rebrand AOL, but it quickly became apparent that the crux of the rebranding effort would be promoting the broadband service, and that $35 million job was given to BBDO New York. According to Julia Angwin, writing for the Wall Street Journal in March 2003, "The stakes are high. The AOL Time Warner unit is under fierce pressure to show results by the end of this year, or face the possibility of being spun off or sold."

TARGET MARKET

In general AOL appealed to the family market. The service was not only easy to use for all age levels but also provided parents with a measure of control, preventing children—especially AOL's large base of teenage customers—from being inadvertently exposed to the seamier side of the Internet. The company also touted the service's ease of use for people new to home computing and first-time users of the Internet, those in need of "training wheels."

The broadband campaign targeted a narrower subset of the family market: people with enough disposable income to upgrade from dial-up Internet service to a high-speed connection, costing $40 to $50 per month, and who were also willing to pay an additional premium,

COMMODORE ONLINE

America Online was launched in 1985 as Q-Link, an exclusive online service for owners of Commodore personal computers that was introduced by Quantum Computer Services, Inc. Tandy computer owners were added in 1987 and IBM-compatible computers a year later. A Macintosh version of Q-Link was introduced in 1989, the same year that Quantum Computer Services unveiled a nationwide network for personal computer owners called America Online. In 1991 Quantum assumed the America Online name.

$14.95 ($9.95 for AOL subscribers), to receive the AOL interface and content. A major part of the campaign involved Internet marketing, which would inundate the Web with advertising urging current broadband users to subscribe to AOL's content. But the campaign's top priority, according to the Wall Street Journal 's Angwin, was ''to convince its 35 million subscribers to keep their America Online service when they upgraded to a high-speed Internet connection.''

COMPETITION

Although AOL viewed itself as a step up from Internet service providers (ISPs), which merely offered a connection, it still faced stiff competition from dial-up ISPs such as Earthlink and United Online (created by the 2001 merger of ISPs NetZero and Juno). These providers offered accelerators to boost dial-up Internet speeds. To compete on this end of the market, AOL added its own speed-enhancing upgrades. The company also received competition from telephone companies offering DSL service and from cable TV operators with their cable modems. By no longer offering broadband connections and repositioning itself as an add-on service, AOL skirted direct competition and formed partnerships with many of these broadband providers, making AOL available to their customers at an extra charge.

Nevertheless, many of these broadband customers would be content with a bare high-speed connection and would therefore forego AOL's exclusive content and added features. Moreover, customers could increasingly turn to other sources for the types of services that AOL offered; as Angwin reported in the Wall Street Journal, ''cable and phone companies . . . are adding snazzier features to their broadband services.'' To make the landscape even more competitive, Internet portals such as Yahoo and Microsoft's MSN also added virus protection and pop-up blockers and teamed up with telephone companies to offer high-speed Internet connections at a lower price than broadband plus AOL. In an interview with Catharine P. Taylor of Adweek, Short said that AOL Broadband's competition was essentially ''everybody,'' adding, ''But in some ways, we don't have competition, because our product is fundamentally compatible with all the connection providers, and we have proprietary content. However, at this early stage of broadband, some people are making a decision between us and another broadband provider, because they see us a dial-up connection. That's going to get eliminated as we go forward.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

To promote AOL Broadband, in March 2003 AOL released a $35 million, two-month advertising campaign developed by ad agency BBDO. The first two commercials, using the tagline ''Welcome to the World Wide Wow,'' were unveiled on the Academy Awards telecast. One of the spots, ''Six Million Dollar Man,'' was a parody of the opening of the old television show about a man with artificial parts that gave him superhuman powers. Instead of actor Lee Majors the spot featured AOL's familiar Running Man icon being rebuilt ''better than before,'' making the case that AOL Broadband was a quantum leap above the old dial-up version of the service. The second spot featured actress Sharon Stone rolling around in bed, apparently after making love, telling someone off-camera, ''that was the most amazing experience I ever had. So, can you stay? Or do you have to run?'' A life-size version of the Running Man was then revealed. As he rushed offscreen, an announcer said, ''The new AOL for Broadband is just a little sexier than you might have imagined.'' Left alone, Stone muttered in disgust, ''icons,'' as if saying, ''men!'' Subsequent spots in this initial phase of the campaign showed a model whose body was covered with pop-up ads that were removed by AOL's new blocking software, and monks, who had taken a vow of silence, communicating to one another through AOL's instant messaging feature.

In addition to the television spots, the campaign included a large Internet component. Some of the animated Internet ads were designed for specific types of content. On the Weather Channel's website, for example, clouds forming the Running Man floated across the home page, then the clouds dissolved into an ad with the headline ''Life needs a better outlook.'' The goal was to reach more than 80 percent of the online population within two days.

OUTCOME

The broadband campaign met with quick criticism. The "Welcome to the World Wide Wow" tag was widely ridiculed. In a review for Adweek, Barbara Lippert asked, "Has anyone actually uttered the words World, Wide and Web together since, like, 1999?" Simon Dumenco wrote in New York magazine, "The only wow factor is roughly along the lines of, 'Wow, does Sharon Stone need money that badly?'" As much as the tagline was criticized, the Sharon Stone spot was eviscerated. Lippert wondered, "And what is the take-away here? That if you sign up for AOL Broadband, like Sharon, you'll get screwed? And unlike what you see from an ISP, why would you want a lover who is superfast?" Dumenco further commented, "The irony is that in aligning itself with a silver-screen temptress whose moment has come and gone, AOL has only reminded us all how precipitously it, too, has faded."

After two months AOL once again put up its advertising account for review in what was called a "repitch." Catharine P. Taylor, writing for Adweek, cited sources who said that AOL was dissatisfied with BBDO's broadband campaign. Short disputed this contention, maintaining that the campaign had met all of its objectives. "This is a two-stage game," he said. "And I'm dead serious about stage one and I'm dead serious about stage two."

Stage two was the release of AOL 9.0 Optimized, a new version of the AOL software that included a fuller package of the company's broadband capabilities as well as enhanced features for dial-up users. Despite a new series of television spots, a new tagline ("Life needs . . ."), another online advertising blitz, and partnership deals to add popular content such as professional-sports video highlights, AOL continued to lose subscribers to faster or cheaper competitors. Very few of its dial-up customers making the switch to broadband elected to pay extra for AOL's premium-content package. Media analyst Tom Wolzien explained to Ann M. Mack of Adweek, "You can have the greatest advertising in the world, but if the value proposition isn't appropriate to your consumers, nothing's going to work." After little more than a year on the job, Short's tenure with AOL came to an end in February 2004. The advertising budget was also slashed by about a third, and the company reverted to a more conservative marketing approach.

FURTHER READING

Angwin, Julia. "America Online Sets Revival Effort." Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2003, p. B6.

Consoli, John. "Leaning More on TV: AOL Inks Big Super Bowl Deal." Adweek, September 22, 2003, p. 7.

Dumenco, Simon. "Base Instincts." New York, April 7, 2003.

Lippert, Barbara. "AOL: Anti-Climactic: Better than It Was Before, but New Effort Lacks 'Wow.'" Adweek, March 31, 2003, p. 28.

———. "AOL's Upgrade." Adweek, October 13, 2003, p. 30.

Mack, Ann M. "In the End, Short's Style Fails to Connect at AOL." Adweek, February 23, 2004, p. 9.

McMains, Andrew, and Catharine P. Taylor. "AOL Cuts 'Short' Its Relationship with Gotham." Adweek (western ed.), January 13, 2003, p. 3.

Sampey, Kathleen, and David Gianatasio. "America Online Seeks Star Treatment." Adweek, March 10, 2003, p. 8.

Taylor, Catharine P. "A Conversation with Len Short." Adweek, March 3, 2003, p. S8.

———. "AOL Calls 'Repitch' for Creative." Adweek Online, May 22, 2003.

Ed Dinger

American Apparel Inc.

747 Warehouse Street
Los Angeles, California 90021
USA
Telephone: (213) 488-0226
Fax: (213) 488-0334
Web site: www.americanapparel.net

■■■

AMERICAN APPAREL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

American Apparel Inc., founded by Dov Charney in 1997, rose to profitability as a T-shirt maker with an unconventional business model. Countering the almost universal garment-industry practice of outsourcing labor to other countries, Charney located his company headquarters and manufacturing facility in the same building in downtown Los Angeles, paying his factory workers high wages and providing comprehensive benefits. Despite the higher costs of its manufacturing process, the company was able to grow by using a "vertically integrated" structure in which all facets of business were intermingled for maximum efficiency and speed of production. After seeing sales double each year after 2000, American Apparel expanded into retail, with a widened offering of basic knitwear, in 2003. Charney himself devised the accompanying print ad campaign.

The American Apparel ads premiered in concert with the retail-store openings in 2003 and expanded geographically as more stores opened, running in lifestyle publications and alternative newsweeklies in relevant urban markets. Charney himself sometimes took the photographs for the ads, which featured sexually provocative images of company employees as well as men and women whom Charney had sought out on the street and elsewhere. The campaign openly courted comparisons with soft-core pornography while at the same time publicizing American Apparel's commitment to social justice, a combination intended to appeal to the progressive values of young, hip urbanites.

While the campaign ran, American Apparel sustained its rapid growth. Sales continued to double each year, and the number of retail stores grew from 2 in 2003 to more than 50 in 2005. The ads generated considerable controversy and resulted in public scrutiny of Charney's overlapping personal and business lives, but his marketing savvy, as demonstrated by the print campaign and the company's distinct brand image, went virtually uncontested.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Dov Charney started selling T-shirts on the streets of his native Montreal during high school, and he dropped out of Tufts University to start the first incarnation of his T-shirt manufacturing business, American Apparel, in South Carolina. When this effort failed, Charney moved to Los Angeles, where he relaunched American Apparel in 1997.

Despite the prevailing conventional wisdom decreeing that profitability in the garment trade required the use of cheap foreign labor in the manufacturing process, American Apparel's business headquarters and factory operations were located in a single building in downtown

Los Angeles. From the start American Apparel paid well over the minimum wage and offered comprehensive benefits and perks to its factory workers, while also making significant improvements in fabric quality and fit relative to other major American T-shirt brands. These two brand attributes—a politically attractive sweatshop-free business model and a superior product that was competitively priced—helped Charney carve out an ever-growing niche among T-shirt wholesalers. The company found particular success as a supplier of T-shirts to rock bands, who screen-printed their logos onto the shirts and sold them at concerts and online. American Apparel first became profitable in 2000, and the company nearly doubled its sales growth and employee force each year thereafter, eventually adding new products, such as tank tops and women's underwear. In explaining American Apparel's success, Charney pointed to his antiestablishment business model, arguing that it simply made more sense for his company to locate its factory operations in the United States. American Apparel's "vertically integrated" structure, the concentration and strategic intermingling of all company departments under one roof—Charney, for instance, served as head fashion designer and marketer as well as CEO—was a cost-saving, efficiency-enhancing way of doing business that allowed the company to accommodate higher manufacturing costs.

While continuing to focus on basic casual knitwear, American Apparel further enlarged its range of products and styles, and in November 2003 it began opening retail stores with an art-gallery look in fashionable urban neighborhoods. The products sold in the stores had no logos, and the company positioned itself as an alternative to the vigorously branded garments found in most other retail outlets. The American Apparel stores' selection of wall-mounted photographs (including the work of prominent photographers, Charney's own photographs, and images from 1970s and '80s pornographic magazines) and the hiring of retail employees were undertaken with an eye toward maximizing a brand image that was uniquely urban and gritty as well as overtly sexual. This image was intended to work with the company's socially conscious reputation to appeal to youthful urbanites, and the accompanying advertising campaign, chiefly developed by Charney himself, shared this mandate.

TARGET MARKET

American Apparel targeted 20-something urban hipsters with a combination of social consciousness, a lack of visible branding, quality products, and reasonable pricing—but primarily with sexual images. Charney downplayed media attempts to cast him as a do-gooder, maintaining that an appeal to the conscience alone would never result in profitability. He openly acknowledged that the American Apparel image was rooted in hedonism more than social justice but asserted that both were organic parts of youth culture. "This is a new generation of young adults," he told the New York Times. "They want what their parents wanted at that age, what kids always want: to have a beer, to smoke a joint, to go to a good movie, to party . . . At the same time it doesn't feel good when their happiness is based on exploitation." In his company's print ads, therefore, Charney showcased provocative images of scantily clad women (and occasionally, men) that clearly verged on pornography. Meanwhile, American Apparel's socially conscious agenda was mentioned in accompanying small print. Charney contended that an appreciation for pornography did not conflict with a social consciousness and that those who thought otherwise were out of step with the rising generation that he was targeting.

COMPETITION

Several other clothing and footwear makers were at this time pitting themselves against supposedly exploitative megacorporations. Part of Charney's inspiration for the American Apparel business model and image was the anticonsumerist magazine Adbusters, which sought to change the power structure and exploitative norms of twenty-first-century life. In 2004 Adbusters unveiled its Blackspot shoes, an "anti-brand" that was intended as part of a campaign to "unswoosh" Nike (a reference to Nike's logo, the swoosh) and "give birth to a new kind of cool in the sneaker industry," according to a Blackspot mission statement. Purchasers of Blackspots automatically became voting members of the Blackspot Anticorporation, a status that allowed them to weigh in on new designs and uses for the profits generated by sales of the sneakers. Blackspots had, logically, a black spot instead of a logo, but some critics pointed out that the black spot itself functioned as a logo.

TeamX, a company located in the same downtown Los Angeles neighborhood as American Apparel's headquarters, launched a sweatshop-free clothing brand called SweatX in 2002. Funded by an investment from a hedge fund endowed by Ben & Jerry's Ice Cream cofounder Ben Cohen, TeamX employed only union workers and paid them at least $10 an hour. The company never became profitable, however, and it folded in 2004.

Waltham, Massachusetts–based No Sweat also sold sweatshop-free, union-made garments and shoes. Unlike American Apparel, No Sweat claimed that its social-justice mission was central to its existence, rather than a mere selling point. "We're creating an opportunity for progressive customers to participate in an experiment," the company's founder and CEO, Adam Neiman, told the Boston Phoenix. "Call it entrepreneurial HARASSMENT?

American Apparel founder and CEO Dov Charney was widely known for his libertarian attitudes toward sex. Not only were these attitudes embodied in the company's advertising, which he largely crafted, but Charney also publicly defended his right to have consensual relations with his employees and was said to foster an overtly sexual work environment. These personal attributes proved troublesome, as many industry observers had predicted they would, in May 2005, when three female former employees filed suit against Charney, claiming sexual harassment. Among the offensive actions the women cited were Charney's frequent off-color comments, his suggestive actions and gifts, and his policy of hiring women (sometimes strangers on the street) based on physical appearance. Charney dismissed the complaints and maintained that he had never pressured anyone into a sexual relationship. He told BusinessWeek, "I should tone down? So I don't get in trouble? It's fascism. You're asking me to succumb to tyranny." BusinessWeek interviewed seven former American Apparel workers, however, who were not involved in the controversy but claimed that they had found the sexual environment of American Apparel offensive. One said, "It was a company built on lechery." Another said, "I thought it was a male contemporary perspective on feminism, but it turns out to be just a gimmick." A third former employee stated that she intentionally stayed away from the retail store where she was employed when Charney was in town. "It's not one person," she said, "he's aiming for all women."

activism—[an experiment] to see whether a niche market can be used to reform the larger industry." American Apparel's Charney scoffed at his competitor's sincerity: "No Sweat—boring! That guy from Massachusetts—c'mon, dude, how many panties has he sold?" Charney, whose workers were not unionized (to the dismay of many union activists), also questioned the righteousness of No Sweat's commitment to hiring only unionized workers. Regarding the unionized Indonesian workers who made No Sweat sneakers, Charney told the Phoenix, "[Neiman] says they're making more than the minimum wage in that country. But it's like 70 cents an hour; that's not sweatshop-free to me."

American Apparel's long-term goals included challenging the likes of clothing giants the Gap and Old Navy, but American Apparel's sales, though growing rapidly (from roughly $20 million in 2001 to a projected $250 million in 2005), were still only a fraction of those larger competitors, both of which were owned by Gap Inc., whose 3,000-plus stores generated more than $16 billion in 2004. American Apparel's explosive growth during the early 2000s did recall, however, the Gap's rapid expansion in the late 1970s.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The American Apparel ads ran in alternative urban weeklies, including New York's Village Voice and L.A. Weekly, as well as in lifestyle magazines such as Vice and Beautiful/Decay. The campaign began with the opening of the first retail locations in New York and Los Angeles, and it was expanded into new markets as more stores were opened.

What distinguished American Apparel's sexuality-based approach from those of other risqué marketers, such as Victoria's Secret and Abercrombie & Fitch, was the nature of the photographs and models in its advertising. Many of the photographs were taken by Charney himself, and the subjects that were shown wearing American Apparel clothes were not professional models. Charney recruited his models personally on urban streets, at trade shows, and in his stores, among other places. Many models either became American Apparel employees after their photo shoots or were already American Apparel employees before being chosen to appear in the company's advertising. The resulting ads showcased a range of female beauty and body types and were not doctored to eliminate imperfections. The images therefore had the appearance of intimate casual snapshots or art photographs, and they were meant to look more genuine than sexual images found in conventional advertising, which, in the opinion of many consumers, presented destructively unreal images of beauty.

The early American Apparel ads established the prototype that would remain in place, with variations, throughout the campaign's run. In an ad publicizing the first American Apparel store in Los Angeles, for instance, a young woman in a bra was shown from the waist up, looking casually away from the camera. Accompanying copy read, "Come see what we're doing at our new Community Store and Gallery." The store's address appeared below, as did—in smaller print at the bottom of the page—an explanation of American Apparel's identity and commitment to social justice. Other ads showcased underwear by using cropped, close-up images of the garments on models. Some of the ads included narrative copy providing details about the model pictured, as in the following example: ''Mananita Lira (aka Spring) was born in La Paz, Mexico. When she was 12 years old she and her family moved to the United States. 'My sisters and I bought some sunglasses and new clothes and tried to pass ourselves off as American girls at the Mexican/American border.' Thirteen years later Spring, age 25, is involved as a retail strategist at American Apparel.''

The ads became more sexually explicit in 2004 and 2005, and many made reference to the porn aesthetic governing the campaign. Charney himself posed for an ad in which he was photographed from behind wearing an American Apparel T-shirt and no pants. Another ad showed a young man in underwear with copy reading, ''Meet Glen. He's a 25-year-old New Jersey native living in New York. Glen's a bright guy and works as a tutor, but he has shown off some other features in Sweetaction Magazine, a porn mag created by ladies for ladies. Who better to test out the new Men's Brief, coming soon to our stores.'' One ad depicted ''Melissa,'' the winner of ''an unofficial wet T-shirt contest held at the American Apparel apartment in Montreal,'' and another showed a company employee, Kelley, reenacting ''her favorite poses from vintage porn mags.'' In 2005 an actual pornographic-movie star, Lauren Phoenix, was featured in an ad wearing only American Apparel tube socks; accompanying copy instructed consumers to ''look her up on Google.''

OUTCOME

As the campaign ran, American Apparel's explosive growth continued. After opening its two initial retail locations in 2003, by the end of 2005 the company had 29 U.S. stores and 28 international stores, with 35 more stores slated to open. The American Apparel factory in Los Angeles became the country's largest garment-manufacturing facility, with a workforce of more than 3,000 and the capacity to produce one million T-shirts per week. Continued exponential growth was predicted.

The sexual emphasis of the American Apparel ads incited substantial negative media attention, especially as it became known that the ads' imagery was in keeping with the work environment Charney fostered at his company: he unapologetically revealed in multiple sources that he regularly engaged in sexual relations with his employees, including some of the ad models. Though many observers questioned Charney's judgment on such matters, few disputed the marketing instincts behind the print campaign and the American Apparel brand image. Advertising Age 's Simon Dumenco said, ''[Charney's] ads are not only hot (they show his sexy employees modeling the merch) and briskly reinforce the brand message (which is all about well-constructed, no-frills, eminently wearable, sweatshop-free clothing), but are refreshingly not celebrity-obsessed.'' Dumenco further compared the trendsetting power of American Apparel's ads to that of what was perhaps the most lauded print campaign in history, ''Absolut Vodka,'' and praised the innovative attention to the personal stories of the models pictured.

FURTHER READING

Baker, Linda. ''The Goal: 'Sweatshop Free.' The Problem: Defining It.'' New York Times, December 14, 2003.

Dodero, Camille. ''Trying Ethics On for Size: Worker-Friendly Clothing Companies Look to Break the Sweatshop Mold.'' Boston Phoenix, March 4–10, 2005.

Dumenco, Simon. ''Media Guy Slips into Coma; Are Print Ads to Blame?'' Advertising Age, August 29, 2005.

Gladwell, Malcolm. ''The Young Garmentos.'' New Yorker, April 24, 2000.

La Ferla, Ruth. ''Building a Brand by Not Being a Brand.'' New York Times, November 23, 2004.

Navarro, Mireya. ''His Way Meets a Highway Called Court.'' New York Times, July 10, 2005.

Macklem, Katherine. ''Doing the Rag Trade Right.'' Maclean's, April 14, 2003.

Palmeri, Christopher. ''Living on the Edge at American Apparel.'' BusinessWeek, June 27, 2005.

Strasburg, Jenny. ''Made in the U.S.A.'' San Francisco Chronicle, July 4, 2004.

Walker, Rob. ''Conscience Undercover.'' New York Times Magazine, August 1, 2004.

Wright, Christian. ''Mister T.'' New York, August 23, 2004.

Mark Lane

American Civil Liberties Union

125 Broad St., 18th Fl.
New York, New York 10004-2400
USA
Telephone: (212) 549-2500
Fax: (212) 549-2646
Web site: www.aclu.org

■■■

RACIAL PROFILING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1999 the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), a nonprofit corporation dedicated to the preservation and extension of constitutional liberties, hired its first advertising agency, New York City–based DeVito/Verdi. The ACLU hoped to use consumer-advertising techniques to improve the image of the organization, which in recent decades had become vilified by conservatives in the United States. In addition, the advertising was to be used to call attention to particular causes backed by the ACLU. One issue that received its own campaign within the framework of the greater effort was the racial profiling of motorists stopped by the police.

The ACLU began its racial-profiling campaign in June 1999 by releasing a report on the issue and filing a lawsuit involving one of the cases it documented. In this way the organization was able to generate a great deal of publicity, which was important given the campaign's mere $1 million budget. In late 1999 the first print ads appeared in newspapers. More advertising followed in 2000, including the ACLU's first-ever television spots, which were run in Utah to put pressure on one of the state's senators, Orrin Hatch, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The print ads succeeded in attracting attention by being provocative. One showed pictures of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Charles Manson with a headline that read: "The man on the left is 75 times more likely to be stopped by the police while driving than the man on the right."

The ACLU's racial-profiling campaign, which ran until the end of 2000, achieved its main goals. It brought a great deal of attention to the practice of racial profiling, forcing police departments to become more cautious about the way they approached traffic stops; also, many state legislatures introduced legislation to curb racial profiling. In addition, the campaign was recognized by the advertising industry, with Advertising Age naming it a Best of Show in its annual awards in 2001.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From its inception in 1920, when it supported the rights of conscientious objectors and opponents of America's entry into World War I, the ACLU never shied away from controversy. Over the decades it made news through its participation in the well-known Scopes Trial that engendered a debate about evolution (1925); fought the U.S. Customs Service ban on the sale of James Joyce's novel Ulysses in 1933; opposed the internment of more than 100,000 Japanese-Americans during World War II; supported school desegregation in the 1950s and the civil rights movement of the 1960s; opposed the war on drugs starting in the 1960s; supported reproduction rights in the 1970s while also defending the right of a neo-Nazi group to march through the streets of Skokie, Illinois, in 1978. While the latter issue cost the ACLU support from the left wing of the political spectrum, resulting in a dip in membership, in general the ACLU irritated conservatives. In the 1988 presidential campaign, Republican George H. Bush made Democrat Michael Dukakis's ACLU membership an issue, attempting to disparage him by calling him a ''card-carrying member of the ACLU.'' The hatred of the ACLU among conservatives was further hardened in 1989, when the group convinced the U.S. Supreme Court to invalidate a Texas law that made flag desecration a punishable offense; likewise, it was later successful with the court when it recognized the civil rights of gays and lesbians in the 1996 case Romer v. Evans.

In early 1999 the ACLU began a general campaign that used the tagline ''Support the ACLU.'' The main issue pursued within it was the practice of police employing racial profiling in stopping motorists, a problem bitterly dubbed ''DWB'' (driving while black), a play on the term for a real crime, DWI (driving while intoxicated). The ACLU decided to hire an ad agency to develop consumer-style advertising. In doing so, its goals were to counteract the nefarious image that conservatives had created about the organization, to present its core values to the public, and to deal with specific issues.

Four agencies vied for the account, which was awarded in June 1999 to DeVito/Verdi, a firm that was not unfamiliar with controversy. Two years earlier it had run afoul of New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani with a bus ad for New York magazine that used the tagline ''Probably the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for.'' After the mayor had the ads removed, the New York chapter of the ACLU helped the magazine successfully argue to an appeals court that, in running the ad, the magazine was within its First Amendment rights. Upon winning the ACLU account, DeVito/Verdi president Ellis Verdi told the press, ''We know from personal experience how effective they can be, and we look forward to communicating that message to the public.''

The ACLU had never had difficulty generating publicity, but hiring a Madison Avenue ad agency represented a significant shift. ''The organization has advertised in the past,'' wrote Patricia Winters Lauro in the New York Times, in 2000, ''but its approach has either been event-driven—the mass arrests of antiwar protesters—or, in recent years, all-text ads about issues that ran on op-ed pages in newspapers.''

DAFFY START

DeVito/Verdi, the advertising agency that produced the ACLU's provocative print ads about racial profiling, was not new to controversy. Shortly after opening shop in 1991, it created an ad for a discount clothier called Daffy's that showed a picture of a straitjacket accompanied by a headline that read: ''If you're paying over $100 for a dress shirt, may we suggest a jacket to go with it?'' The ad was a hit with consumers and the advertising industry, but because a mental-health advocacy group took exception to the use of a straitjacket in the ad, it led to picketing at an advertising awards show.

TARGET MARKET

In press comments issued after the hiring of DeVito/Verdi, ACLU executive director Ira Glasser said, ''We want to target opinion leaders.'' In addition, he noted, ''we also want to reach out to a broader audience: those members of the public we call 'persuadables,' that is, people who are highly likely to share the ACLU's core values even if they don't agree with everything we do.'' Those ''persuadables'' were not likely to be found among conservatives and those leaning to the political right in America. Rather, the ACLU was hoping to spur into action an audience that was ''liberal, progressive, and somewhat shrinking,'' as described to Lauro by Victor Kamber, head of the Kamber Group, which produced advocacy advertising for such groups as labor unions.

Regarding the racial-profiling component of the general campaign, the advertising tried to influence police departments to change the way the way they stopped motorists based on race. It also reached out to state legislators, whom the ACLU hoped to pressure into passing laws to curtail the practice. The campaign was also directed at victims of racial profiling, urging them to share their stories with the ACLU and to lodge complaints. The more examples of racing profiling the ACLU could gather, the better the case that could be made that the problem was pervasive and required action.

COMPETITION

Although the ACLU prided itself on being nonpartisan—willing to take on cases regardless of political party affiliation or ideology—the organization found vigorous opposition from Republicans and conservatives, who were not reluctant to characterize the ACLU as the epitome of evil. Right-wing media pundits were especially vituperative in their denunciation of the ACLU and the causes it championed. An example of this criticism came from commentator David Horowitz, who took specific exception to an ACLU print ad concerning the subject of racial profiling. Horowitz espoused the belief that racial profiling was, in fact, good police work that targeted the types of people most likely to commit crimes. After challenging the statistics in the ad as well as asking how many of the questionable traffic stops were conducted by Hispanic or black officers, Horowitz commented, ''When facts like these make no difference, it is a sure sign that we are in the presence of an ideological force, disconnected from reality.'' Horowitz was not alone in opposing the ACLU and in claiming that examples of abuse of police power were simply blown out of proportion by the ACLU and other forces of political correctness.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To build its campaign to combat racial profiling, the ACLU conducted extensive research to determine the depth of the problem and to create documentation. It drew upon government reports, case studies from two dozen states, traffic-stop statistics obtained from ACLU lawsuits, and news stories. A report on the phenomenon of DWB was written, concluding that it was a nationwide problem. The report was released and disseminated shortly after the ACLU undertook a high-profile lawsuit in Oklahoma involving an egregious example of DWB, in which a decorated Army sergeant and his 12-year-old son were held in a grueling two-and-a-half-hour traffic stop. The ACLU was then able to drum up widespread media interest in DWB and to begin the process of educating the public on the subject. A website was also created to serve as a clearinghouse on racial profiling and a place where people could report instances of unwarranted traffic stops, thus providing the ACLU with information and possible cases for litigation.

The next step in the campaign against racial profiling involved consumer advertising. ACLU executive director Glasser told Lauro of the New York Times, ''We have taken to advertising for the same reason people who market products have taken to advertising in a dramatic and splashy and visible way. We want to get the message into people's consciousness without forcing them to have to read a law review article.''

In December 1999 the ACLU took the unusual and attention-grabbing tactic of promoting its message by running three ads in the classified pages of major newspapers, including the New York Times. Each ad addressed a different example of injustice; one, which ran in the automotive ads, served as the opening salvo in the effort to fight racial profiling. The text read: ''Car for Sale: 500 SL Luxury Sport Coupe. Its performance is unmatched on the highway. Unless you're black and driving on some interstates. Then you could be pulled over and searched by state troopers for fitting a drug courier profile. These humiliating and illegal searches are violations of the Constitution and must be fought. Support the ACLU.''

The ACLU also ran full-page print ads, which proved controversial in their own way. One involved the death of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed man killed in a hail of gunfire outside his apartment building in New York City. According to witnesses, he was simply returning home from dinner and made the mistake of reaching into his jacket when four plainclothes policemen ordered him to show his hands. They fired 41 shots, 19 of which struck Diallo. The incident had received international press coverage, and the ACLU referenced it in a new ad, which showed 41 bullet holes and the following text: ''On February 4th, 1999, the NYPD gave Amadou Diallo the right to remain silent. And they did it without ever saying a word. Firing 41 bullets in 8 seconds, the police killed an unarmed, innocent man. Also wounded was the constitutional right of every American to due process of law. Help us defend your rights. Support the ACLU.''

Several months later, in May 2000, the ACLU ran another controversial print ad, which appeared first in the New York Times and a day later in the New Yorker. The ad showed a picture of Martin Luther King, Jr., on the left side of the page and notorious killer Charles Manson on the right. The headline read: ''The man on the left is 75 times more likely to be stopped by the police while driving than the man on the right.''

The ACLU also took its campaign to the local level in September 2000, airing its first-ever paid television spots. They targeted Utah, whose senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican, was the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. In addition to ads sponsored by national organizations, local branches of the ACLU made their own contributions to the campaign. The Washington state chapter of the ACLU, for example, launched its own advertising effort to call attention to racial profiling.

OUTCOME

The ACLU's focus on racial profiling continued until the end of 2000, and then in the spring of 2001 the emphasis switched to the issue of gay civil rights laws. A few months later the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, took place, and the problem of DWB was pushed further aside, as the ACLU began addressing a host of civil-liberties questions that emerged with the launch of the so-called war on terror.

The ACLU was pleased with the results of its campaign. It claimed that many police departments had begun to require that officers record the race of every driver they stopped. In addition, more than 25 states introduced legislation connected to the DWB issue.

The campaign was also able to achieve the goal of drawing attention to the issue, receiving a great deal of free media concerning racial profiling. The advertising played an important role in this regard. Although it upset a large number of people, it stood out and met its purpose. The advertising industry recognized the work as well. In 2001 the campaign won an Ad Age Best of Show Award (Magazines category).

FURTHER READING

"ACLU Attacks Racial Profiling with Ad Citing Dr. King and Charles Manson." Jet, June 26, 2000, p. 38.

Berger, Warren. "Stirring Up Trouble, without Even Trying." One. A Magazine, Fall 2004.

Davilla, Florangela. "ACLU Ads to Spotlight Racial Profiling Issue." Seattle Times, April 20, 2000, p. B5.

Foster, Shawn. "ACLU Targets Hatch for Support of Study." Salt Lake Tribune, September 14, 2000, p. D1.

Horowitz, David. "Racial Profiling: The Death of the Civil Rights Movement." FrontPageMagazine.com, September 5, 2000. Available from <http://www.frontpagemag.com/Articles/ReadArticle.asp?ID=1078>

Johannes, Laura. "For the ACLU Head, Terrorism Battle Threatens Liberties." Wall Street Journal, November 19, 2001, p. B1.

Lauro, Patricia Winters. "The A.C.L.U. Is Taking a Provocative Madison Avenue Route to Raise Support for Its Causes." New York Times, May 30, 2000, p. C10.

Lee, Henry K. "Study Indicates Racial Profiling by Oakland Cops." San Francisco Chronicle, May 12, 2001, p. A13.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Taking the Liberties." Adweek, December 13, 1999, p. 7.

Vagnoni, Anthony. "Advertising Age Best Awards." Advertising Age, May 28, 2001, p. S1.

Ed Dinger

American Express Company

World Financial Ctr.
200 Vesey St.
New York, New York 10285
USA
Telephone: (212) 640-2000
Web site: www.americanexpress.com

■■■

COMPETITIVE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In June 1996 American Express Company launched a $200 million global marketing campaign to emphasize its strong brand presence and also to introduce new products and services. As competition in the credit card market intensified, American Express (AmEx) had suffered declining revenues in the early 1990s. At the same time AmEx lost market share as the company made a failed attempt at becoming a financial services supermarket by purchasing several brokerage firms, investment banking companies, and real estate businesses.

American Express hoped that its ''Do More'' campaign, which consisted of both print and television ads, would lure consumers with the company's historic brand image of reliability and prestige. Once interest was captured, AmEx planned to inform consumers of its wide variety of services and programs, with the belief that consumers would take advantage of the offers because they trusted and respected AmEx. John Hayes, the company's executive vice president of global advertising, explained, ''Our advertising used to be about a limited number of products and services, and was often defined by the people who used them. This campaign stresses our growing number of services and what American Express can do for you.''

The ''Do More'' campaign continued into 1997, spreading information about the American Express collection of charge cards, credit cards, investment products, travel services, and more. In January AmEx also launched the ''Competitive'' campaign, which was part of the ''Do More'' effort yet focused exclusively on addressing the faults of its competitors' services. The campaign primarily targeted longtime rival Visa International, which had a history of attacking American Express in its ad campaigns.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The competitive portion of the ''Do More'' campaign was a reaction to continual onslaughts from Visa's marketing. Since the mid-1980s Visa had deliberately pitted itself against American Express, producing numerous television commercials that pointed out AmEx's alleged shortcomings as a credit card provider. James Desrozier, vice president of MasterCard International's advertising division, said in a 1992 Newsday article, ''Visa went against American Express without mentioning MasterCard. It was the two of them and it just knocked us out of the game. It was a brilliant strategy.''

American Express generally ignored Visa's attacks, although battles occasionally arose. Prior to the 1994 Olympics in Lillehammer, Norway, agreement had been reached between the two companies to refrain from attacking one another in Olympic-related advertising.

In addition, because Visa was an official sponsor of the Olympics, AmEx was not to use images or shots from the events in its ads or to imply an affiliation with the Olympic Games. When the Olympics began, however, the agreement crumbled. Visa objected to AmEx television ads that claimed, "So if you're traveling to Norway, you'll need a passport, but you don't need a visa." The play on words could be confusing, it was charged, and Visa accused AmEx of suggesting that it was connected with the Olympics by emphasizing its history with and presence in Norway. Visa then countered with television ads using its standard anti-AmEx slogan, "And they don't take American Express."

American Express had long been marketed as a charge card that exemplified prestige and status, and its fees could pack a wallop. In 1995, for example, the standard green card commanded a $55 annual fee. An older marketing campaign embraced the tag line "Membership has its privileges," which hinted at AmEx's exclusive reputation. Its promises of privileges and perks, however, were not enough to sustain customer loyalty. Time magazine reported that in the early 1990s more than 2 million AmEx cardholders chose to cancel their membership. Other credit card companies such as Visa and MasterCard offered low interest rates and fee-free cards to consumers, and they garnered a lower usage fee from merchants, which made them more attractive to retailers. In 1977, for example, Visa reportedly took a 2 percent fee from purchases, whereas AmEx still took 2.74 percent, down from 3.22 percent in 1990. In 1995 H. Eugene Lockhart, MasterCard's chief executive officer at the time, told Fortune, "The consumer today simply doesn't see the need to pay fees for a card that gives them no greater functionality than anything we or Visa would give them." It appeared that the card of prestige had become the card of the privileged few rather than that of the masses, and, according to Fortune, AmEx's share of the domestic card market declined from close to 25 percent in 1990 to 16 percent in 1995.

TARGET MARKET

American Express's clientele had traditionally included those who were financially established and for whom "membership ha[d] its privileges." AmEx had long been embraced by business travelers and corporate clients, and, according to Time, AmEx customers were "big spenders who charged an average of $6,000 on their cards in 1996, in contrast to some $3,200 for charges per Visa card." Business charges and travel expenses accounted for the bulk of this spending, however, and customers used AmEx cards infrequently for personal purchases. To remedy this situation and to increase its market share in the competitive credit card arena, AmEx needed to appeal to a broader market. The company thus expanded its target clientele to include not only the upscale crowd but also the credit card-carrying masses. To compete with Visa and MasterCard, AmEx promoted its Optima credit card, which allowed the cardholder to pay off a percentage of the balance each month rather than the entire balance, as with the traditional AmEx charge card.

HE SAID, SHE SAID

The Better Business Bureau had dealt with American Express and Visa on numerous occasions throughout the 1990s. However, until Visa cried foul over AmEx's Visa-bashing "Paris" spot, AmEx had been doing all of the complaining.

For the "Competitive" campaign American Express took aim at non-AmEx cardholders to inform them of its numerous incentive programs and premiums. While companies such as Visa and MasterCard had long offered a slew of cards and rewards to its cardholders, including discounts on purchases and free airline miles, AmEx had generally refrained from such programs and stuck with its traditional card offerings. But the company learned a lesson, reported Time, during a focus group session in the early 1990s when the holder of a competing card that offered free airline miles stated, "I want to go with you guys, but you guys are so stupid that you're not offering this product to me." In a company survey AmEx learned that its cardholders would use their AmEx cards for more purchases if the spending rewarded them with travel, food, and merchandise perks. AmEx thus expanded its small airline mileage program in 1995 to offer a wide-ranging rewards program. The Membership Rewards program allowed cardholders to earn points by using their AmEx cards, which could later be exchanged for travel rewards, merchandise, gift certificates, and more. AmEx also began to offer a wider variety of cards, including some with no annual fee and some co-branded with other companies, and solicited retailers to increase the number of outfits at which the card could be used. As AmEx president Kenneth Chenault told U.S. News & World Report, "If our customer wants to use the American Express card at a hot dog stand, we want to be there."

COMPETITION

Although American Express faced competition from credit card companies, major banks, and other financial service providers, Visa provided the most visible rivalry.

According to RAM Research findings reported in Advertising Age, the ubiquitous Visa card dominated the credit card market with a share of 50.5 percent during the first half of 1996. MasterCard followed with 26.4 percent, AmEx with 15.9 percent, and Discover with 7.3 percent. Similar reports by SMR Research in USA Today indicated that AmEx's share dropped from 20.4 percent in 1992 to 16.4 percent in 1996. Visa's market share, on the other hand, rose from 45.1 to 49.2 percent, while MasterCard's share remained essentially steady at 27.6 percent.

American Express's market share could not match Visa's, but AmEx showed signs of improvement in 1996 when it finally reversed a decade-long decline in its share of the credit card market. Advertising Age reported that spending on AmEx cards went up 15.6 percent in 1996 from 1995, while Visa's purchase volume increased 15.5 percent. And according to U.S. News & World Report, 41.5 million AmEx cards were in circulation in 1996, an increase of 8 percent from the previous year. Carl Pascarella, CEO of Visa U.S.A., was not impressed, however, as he told Time: "They haven't changed much.... Over the past eight or nine years, consumers have been pulling out their Visa card significantly more often than their American Express card." AmEx indeed had a long way to go to catch Visa. There were almost 600 million Visa cards in distribution, and Visa was accepted by more than 14 million retailers globally. Although AmEx had been signing up more businesses to accept its cards and had more than 5 million merchant partners, this was still a far cry from Visa's 14 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The primary purpose of the American Express "Competitive" campaign was to point out the shortcomings of its competitor Visa. The "Do More" campaign of 1996 had laid the groundwork by introducing AmEx's numerous new services and programs, while also capitalizing on its image of reliability and downplaying its snobbishness. As the company's Hayes explained in Advertising Age, "We're reshaping the American Express brand to fit a wide variety of uses in the next century—we want to have long-term, meaningful relationships with people and we're going to build them through marketing."

The "Competitive" campaign consisted of a print effort and of three television spots that aired on the national networks during prime time. The first spot, "Paris," began airing in January of 1997 during the National Football League play-offs and implied that many of Visa's alleged services were nonexistent or unreliable. The spot featured a Visa cardholder embarking on a vacation to Paris. The cardholder had intended to use the free airline miles he had accumulated on his Visa card but discovered at the airport that his miles had expired. He then attempted to charge the plane ticket on his Visa card, only to be told that he had reached his credit limit. The cardholder was forced to pay cash for his ticket, and his troubles did not end there. Upon reaching France, the traveler encountered problems entering the country. He then contacted Visa for traveler assistance but was turned down. Other obstacles lay in wait as well, for when the traveler injured himself and also was arrested for mistakenly declaring himself a spy in French, he was unable to use his Visa's free medical or legal services. The message AmEx intended to send was that the traveler would not have had such problems had he used an AmEx card.

American Express timed its aggressive campaign to begin shortly after many airlines had cleared out a large number of free airline miles, many of which had accumulated on credit cards. An AmEx spokesperson told Credit Card Management, "There are a lot of inconsistencies in Visa programs because they vary from issuer to issuer.... We feel it is important to set the record straight. And with many frequent-flier miles having just expired, we felt it was a good time to remind people of the benefits of Membership Rewards." AmEx's free airline miles came with no expiration date.

The print effort, which began in February, declared, "Visa says they're everywhere, but isn't it more important to have a card that helps you with just about everything?" One of the print ads showed an American Express card next to a Visa card. The ad listed mocking descriptions of Visa's services, including "No medical referrals, but rounded corners for safety."

A second television spot, "Grand Canyon," featured another unlucky traveler. This Visa cardholder was on his way to Las Vegas to see Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme but en route encountered problems in the Grand Canyon. He lost his wallet, dropped his camera into the canyon, and then crashed his rental car into a billboard as Lawrence and Gorme passed by on their tour bus, uncorking a bottle of champagne. In this spot American Express challenged Visa's purchase protection plans, rental car insurance services, and lost card assistance, implying that its own services in these areas were superior.

The spot "Virtual Reality" featured a male, played by the unlucky traveler from the Grand Canyon, standing in a store and wearing a virtual reality headset. In his fantasy he danced with a beautiful woman, but just as they were about to kiss, he was jarred from his dream by a store clerk who informed him that he was over the spending limit on his Visa card and thus could not continue with his virtual reality session. A struggle over the headset ensued, and the police arrived. This ad questioned Visa's credit limits, in turn emphasizing that American Express cards had no preset spending limits.

OUTCOME

Visa obviously was not pleased with the American Express "Competitive" campaign and in July 1997 filed a complaint with the National Advertising Division (NAD) of the Better Business Bureau, hoping to put a stop to the airing of the ads. Visa claimed that the AmEx spots were misleading because the advertising implied that Visa did not offer any of the services discussed in the campaign. Visa argued that many of its cards offered various services, including medical and legal referrals, purchase protection, and airline mileage programs. David Sandor, a Visa spokesman, told American Banker, "Millions of Visa cards offer the enhancements AmEx claims Visa doesn't have." Advertising Age indicated that 85 million Visa Gold cardholders received free medical and legal services as opposed to 40 million AmEx cardholders who benefited from similar programs.

The NAD reviewed Visa's complaints and determined that American Express needed to change only a few words that could be considered confusing. AmEx was required to make it clear that some Visa classic cards did offer medical and legal services and that some cards also offered mileage programs in which the airline miles had no expiration date. AmEx spokesperson Emily Porter indicated to American Banker, "We are pleased that we just have to make some minor changes . . . . We see this as a victory." Another AmEx spokesperson downplayed Visa's complaints and explained to Credit Card Management, "We are not surprised Visa is uneasy with the spot . . . . Visa is not providing its members with products and services consumers want. We want to make it clear that we would like to provide those products to their members."

Viewers were not as unhappy as Visa about the "Competitive" campaign. The "Virtual Reality" spot was nominated for a best commercial Emmy Award for 1997, and "Paris" won an award at the 1997 Cannes International Advertising Festival. One cardholder, a victim of the purge of airline miles, said that the American Express "Paris" spot was especially effective. The cardholder told Credit Card Management, "Losing miles after spending years to build them is a maddening situation . . . . The ad also correctly points out that Visa issuers do little for their cardholders when it comes to travel services." Other viewers may also have been swayed, for, according to Time, AmEx saw its market share increase from 18.3 to 18.9 percent during the first half of 1997, while Visa's share dropped from 48.88 to 48.85 percent. AmEx stock shares had increased fourfold since 1993, and profits were on the rise.

FURTHER READING

"American Express Strikes Back." Credit Card Management, March 1, 1997, p. 6.

Fickenscher, Lisa. "BBB Endorses Most of Amex's Visa-Bashing Ads." American Banker, December 3, 1997, p. 14.

Fitzgerald, Kate. "AmEx Retools Ad Effort to Global Vision." Advertising Age, June 10, 1996, p. 4.

———. "AmEx's Ads Needle Rival: Visa Labels Them 'Unfair.'" Advertising Age, February 17, 1997, p. 38.

Greenwald, John. "Charge! American Express May Not Have the Cachet It Once Did, but Its Card Business Is Growing Again, Thanks to a Grittier Game Plan and No-Nonsense Management." Time, January 12, 1998.

Sherrid, Pamela. "A New Class Act at AMEX." U.S. News & World Report, June 23, 1997, p. 39.

Spencer, Peter. "Advertising Battles." Consumers' Research Magazine, April 1, 1998, p. 43.

Mariko Fujinaka

DO MORE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The American Express Company (AmEx) was long associated with the celebrities whose appearance in print campaigns was meant to position "membership" in its credit-card brand as the domain of a privileged few. But AmEx's elitist brand image became a serious hindrance in the 1980s and 1990s. Rivals such as Visa U.S.A. and MasterCard International had been using their own marketing to exploit the fact that their card brands were accepted more universally than AmEx, and by 1996 their gains had significantly eroded AmEx's market share. The launch of a new umbrella advertising campaign tagged "Do More" was not just the debut of new creative concepts; it marked a concerted attempt to reposition the AmEx brand.

Created by ad agency Ogilvy & Mather, "Do More" aimed to convey all the advantages AmEx could offer, ranging from its numerous charge and credit cards to travel services and financial-planning assistance. "We want consumers to see American Express as more than a charge card company," John Hayes, AmEx's head of global advertising, told USA Today. The company also used "Do More" to broaden its consumer base, employing celebrities, such as Tiger Woods and Jerry Seinfeld, who appealed to consumers across demographic and income boundaries. The umbrella effort had various incarnations and encompassed several individual campaigns through 2001. AmEx typically spent between $170 million and $200 million on U.S. credit-card advertising during these years.

AmEx gained market share in the first two years that "Do More" ran. Difficulties in later years were reversed by the introduction of a new card appealing to young adults, a product whose existence itself was a measure of the evolving nature of the AmEx brand. "Do More" did a great deal to bring about and to publicize this evolution, and many of the hallmarks of this repositioning campaign—including the continued participation of Tiger Woods and Jerry Seinfeld—were visible in the advertising that followed its discontinuation in 2002.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

American Express had built its reputation as a prestigious charge card. In 1976 the company began its famed "Do You Know Me?" campaign in which celebrities ranging from dancer Mikhail Baryshnikov to puppeteer Jim Henson appeared in ads that pictured them and an AmEx Green Card bearing their names. In 1987 the "Portraits" campaign followed a similar formula. By aligning the brand with stars, AmEx cultivated the notion that carrying one of its cards was more akin to joining an elite country club than making a financial transaction. As later ads sniffed, "membership has its privileges."

In the 1980s, however, AmEx's careful positioning began to backfire. According to Brandweek, while AmEx "clung to its old, elite ways," the credit card industry went through monumental changes. With so many cards vying for consumers' attention, Visa and MasterCard (specifically, the member banks that comprised the Visa and MasterCard consortia) began to cross-market with various businesses so they could offer incentives to consumers. For instance, by teaming up with airlines, Visa and MasterCard could entice consumers to charge purchases with the promise of frequent-flier miles. Moreover, companies such as AT&T and GM allied themselves with the Visa and MasterCard brands and began to peddle cards that tied in to phone service or car purchases. But while the entire industry became hyper-segmented, AmEx continued to sell itself on its reputation alone and lost market share as a result. Also damaging was Visa's 1987 launch of an attack campaign that stressed Visa's global acceptance by featuring countless businesses that declined to take American Express. Further limiting AmEx's appeal was the fact that the company continued to charge its hefty $55 membership fee, while Visa and MasterCard offered fee-free cards and low interest rates. Taken together these factors weakened AmEx considerably. In fact more than 2 million AmEx cardholders canceled their memberships in the early 1990s, and the company's share of the domestic credit-card market sank from nearly 20 percent in 1990 to 16 percent in 1995, according to Fortune.

In 1995 AmEx began to explore new ways to stanch the flood of cardholders abandoning AmEx and to persuade existing cardholders to use AmEx more often. After negotiating an agreement with Delta Airlines, AmEx was able to offer a frequent-flier program like those of its rivals. The company also debuted its Membership Rewards program, which gave consumers points for each AmEx purchase made. These points could then be redeemed for bonuses such as gift certificates, travel vouchers, or car rentals at an array of participating businesses. AmEx also introduced the Optima card, a revolving credit account similar to Visa and MasterCard in that consumers could carry a balance on it from month to month rather than having to pay it in full at the close of each billing period (as the Green Card required). Moreover, AmEx pushed more retailers to accept its cards. This effort was punctuated by the inauguration of the "Do More" campaign in June 1996. "This company has had a great history of reinventing itself," Hayes told American Banker. "This is the next logical step."

TARGET MARKET

Because AmEx wanted to use "Do More" ads to gain new cardholders, the company crafted individual ads to appeal to distinct groups, especially those that it had not targeted in its previous advertising. One of the key approaches AmEx used to broaden its customer base was to employ spokespeople who counteracted the company's image as "a stodgy, premium brand that caters to older customers," according to the Wall Street Journal. In 1997, for instance, AmEx signed Woods, who had won the Masters Tournament that year. As a 21-year-old phenomenon of mixed race, Woods provided AmEx an opportunity to reach younger consumers as well as African-American consumers. It was essential to AmEx's future that it garner younger consumers because they "tend to stick with the first credit card they use," explained USA Today. Furthermore, Woods was able "to cross every demographic line . . . and appeal to an audience that makes $250,000 a year as well as an audience that makes $25,000," an industry analyst told American Banker.

Seinfeld, who pitched the Green Card in spots that aired during such high-profile events as the Super Bowl, was another figure that transcended the traditional AmEx audience. "The Seinfeld advertising has attracted a new and younger group to the franchise and has also helped promote everyday usage, which is key," Hayes told Brandweek. While AmEx was typically associated with the travel and leisure retail sector, the company wanted to increase the routine purchases consumers charged each month to their AmEx cards. Instead of presenting Seinfeld in the same sort of glamorous settings that permeated ''Portraits'' or ''Do You Know Me?'' AmEx showed Seinfeld wielding his Green Card at grocery stores and gas stations. One commercial paired Seinfeld with the animated figure of Superman and portrayed Seinfeld (rather than the caped hero) rescuing Lois Lane at a grocery store by pulling out his AmEx card. (She had forgotten her wallet; Superman's costume had no pockets; Seinfeld paid for the food.)

Similarly, in the 1998 series of spots for AmEx's Small Business Services division, the company focused on African-American, Latino, and female entrepreneurs. ''We have represented the three groups who represent the strongest growth in new business starts,'' an AmEx spokesperson told Brandweek. In the 1998 ads that did present wealthy and prominent businesspeople, AmEx chose the likes of Jake Burton, a snowboarding pioneer, and Earvin ''Magic'' Johnson, a basketball hall-of-famer who had been diagnosed with HIV, both of whom Hayes classified as ''people who have challenged the status quo and appreciated the service we give . . . [They are] not just those that fit the traditional view of success.''

Despite AmEx's desire to broaden its consumer base, it was careful not to ''move downscale,'' as Hayes described it in Brandweek. The company had considerable brand equity rooted in AmEx's reputation for superior service, and it did not want to alienate its core group of affluent card users. ''Creating the balance where the brand becomes accessible, yet . . . remains special at the same time, is a real challenge,'' Hayes said. AmEx relied on its spokespeople's ability to walk this tightrope. Though Woods was young, he was nevertheless a golfer, a player of a sport popular among businessmen. Moreover, Woods was not a rebellious upstart. Though barely out of his teens, he was one of the best golfers in the world. Similarly, Seinfeld's hit sitcom was watched by a huge audience. Popular with many viewers, Seinfeld was not exclusively a Generation X hero, and the commercials featuring him also appealed to AmEx's older cardholders as well.

COMPETITION

Industry leader Visa had persisted in its attacks on AmEx since the 1985 launch of its ''It's Everywhere You Want to Be'' campaign. Although Visa's share of the domestic credit-card market fell to 48.8 percent from 49.2 percent in 1996, it continued to portray businesses, restaurants, and entertainment providers that would not accept AmEx as a way to stress the universality of its own cards. Like AmEx, Visa also addressed specific new markets in its 1998 efforts. Under the umbrella of the ''Everywhere'' theme, Visa targeted Generation X consumers in ''The Attic,'' a commercial featuring a trendy used-clothing store. In ''eToys,'' a television spot for an online merchant, Visa linked itself to the growing e-commerce sector by presenting itself as the credit card of choice for Internet purchases. With a commercial highlighting Jack Nicklaus's golf school (which only took Visa), Visa tried to reach more affluent cardholders.

A cornerstone of Visa's marketing strategy was its sponsorship of sporting events. In addition to being the official sponsor of the National Football League (NFL), horse racing's Triple Crown races (the Kentucky Derby, the Belmont Stakes, and the Preakness), and NASCAR auto racing, Visa had been an Olympic Games sponsor since 1986. Visa used the 1998 Winter Olympic Games as a platform to reinforce its message of global acceptance. As a Visa executive explained in the January 30, 1998, edition of American Banker, ''nothing was better for a brand'' than associating itself with the Olympics.

Like American Express, Visa also endeavored to expand its empire—and its name recognition—beyond credit cards. In 1998 Visa continued to promote its debit card, the Visa CheckCard, with big-budget advertisements depicting celebrities being hassled for identification when writing a check. Visa touted its small-business cards as well. According to the October 5, 1998, issue of Advertising Age, Visa's long-term goal was to leverage ''its brand equity into different kinds of payment.''

MasterCard, too, vied to be consumers' card of choice. Breaking free from a long period of mediocre advertising and negligible growth, in 1997 the company debuted ''Priceless,'' which ''bec[ame] one of the industry's most admired campaigns, creating an almost

''DO MORE'' EVERYWHERE

American Express Company's ''Do More'' campaign truly was a global one, running in 23 different countries simultaneously. Although the same basic ads were used everywhere, the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather changed small details when appropriate. ''We've created an overall platform for positioning,'' John Hayes, the company's head of global advertising, told Advertising Age. ''We make modifications and customizations everywhere to make sure what we do is right.'' Golfer Tiger Woods proved an especially valuable global representative—particularly in Japan, where golf was a passion among a large percentage of the population.

nonstop buzz . . . [and] raising consumer awareness and consumer usage of the card,'' Adweek raved. Using the tagline ''There Are Some Things Money Can't Buy. For Everything Else There's MasterCard,'' MasterCard's agency, McCann-Erickson, made an emotional appeal to its viewers. These print and television advertisements showed scenes of various activities, such as a father and child at a baseball game and an older couple celebrating a wedding anniversary. The voice-over announced the cost of various aspects of these endeavors, and the commercials all culminated in a ''priceless'' moment (such as ''real conversation with 11-year-old son'' at the end of the baseball spot), followed by the campaign's tagline. Buoyed by ''Priceless,'' MasterCard's purchase volume rose 16 percent from 1997 to 1998 and its market share remained steady, increasing slightly to 27.8 percent from 27.6 percent, according to Credit Card News.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Because the primary goal of ''Do More'' was to establish the brand's relevance to diverse consumers, AmEx used a targeted strategy to pair specific messages with specific groups. For instance, the print executions portraying small-business entrepreneurs ran almost entirely in publications such as Success, Entrepreneur, and Forbes. The initial Tiger Woods ads touting American Express Financial Advisors favored major newspapers (especially the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times, and USA Today) and newsweeklies (including Time and Newsweek) over lifestyle publications. AmEx chose to air the Seinfeld commercials on mainstream, high-profile television programming because the company hoped the comedian could connect a mass audience of credit-card users to the Green Card. ''Superman'' first appeared during NFL playoff games, which reached viewers across demographic lines.

The message of ''Do More'' was that AmEx—not Visa or MasterCard—could improve one's ventures and that AmEx was a global solution always available to make things better (or easier). Part of the way AmEx delivered this message was by making its ads attention-getters. The spokespeople chosen to represent the various facets of the brand were not only well known but also had a certain renegade charm. Certainly Johnson was one of the greatest basketball players of all time, and his excellence was intended to mirror AmEx's reputation for service and prestige. But Johnson had also shocked the nation when he announced he was HIV-positive. Pundits had decried him, and some fellow basketball players even shunned him. Using him in the AmEx spots was a daring choice and attracted much notice.

Similarly, the ''Superman'' spot was designed ''to break through commercial clutter,'' Hayes said. Instead of banking on Seinfeld's celebrity, AmEx created a commercial that juxtaposed him with a comic book character and spoofed the notion of any credit card (or personality) being able to ''save the day.'' As he took his AmEx card out of his pocket, Seinfeld spun around in a blur. An onlooker asked, ''What's with the spinning?'' ''He idolizes me,'' Superman wryly explained. ''It's embarrassing.'' Again, the notion was to twist the genre slightly, to prompt viewers to sit up and take note that American Express was not quite what everyone assumed it to be. In 1999 AmEx extended its association with Seinfeld. One noteworthy spot showed the comedian embarking on a cross-country road trip after observing that he needed to ''get some kind of real life.'' In keeping with his persona, his adventures were simultaneously large-scale and trivial: among other activities, he saw Mount Rushmore, held a cup of coffee that was too hot, had a conversation with an attractive blond woman, and visited the Saint Louis Arch.

American Express updated the ''Do More'' concept in 2000, adapting the tagline to a subcampaign dubbed ''Moments of Truth,'' the first phase of which consisted of five TV spots featuring ordinary people. Each of these commercials focused on the fact that AmEx offered ''more'' services than its competitors. For instance, American Express's travel-assistance benefits were touted in one spot that showed a woman waiting fruitlessly at an airport baggage claim. Another spot emphasized American Express's partnership with the bulk-sales supermarket Costco; yet another focused on the company's online-banking offerings via the juxtaposition of a ''wired'' young woman with her ''analog'' father, who was paying bills by hand. The tagline's flexibility was further demonstrated by that year's highest-profile and most imaginative spot, which featured Tiger Woods playing an outsized game of golf on the streets of Manhattan. Woods was shown swatting a ball over the Empire State Building and then from Central Park all the way downtown to Wall Street, before sinking a putt in a paper cup positioned on the Brooklyn Bridge. In this case ''do more'' was intended as a suggestion that American Express could help cardholders realize their most ambitious hopes.

OUTCOME

When AmEx inaugurated ''Do More'' in 1996, critics predicted that the company would lose its ability to differentiate itself by shedding some of its snobbish image. Ogilvy and AmEx quickly seemed to prove the skeptics wrong, however: the company's 1996 purchase volume rose 15.6 percent, and ''after years of decline,'' its 1997 share of the domestic credit-card market climbed to 17 percent from 16.4 percent, according to Advertising

Age. AmEx posted global market share declines in 1998 and 1999, but this was partly a result of the Visa and MasterCard emphasis on debit cards, a product AmEx did not offer. AmEx countered with its most successful product launch in recent memory, the Blue Card, aimed at college-age consumers and other young adults. The ranks of Blue Card holders steadily increased in 2000 and 2001, and AmEx unveiled a Blue Card designed for small-business owners. Although the Blue Card's marketing did not fall under the "Do More" umbrella, it did build on the strategy of democratizing the traditionally upscale AmEx brand image, an approach whose merits were no longer questioned at the beginning of the new century. This change in perception was perhaps a measure of the success of the brand repositioning accomplished through the "Do More" campaign.

The Seinfeld and other "Do More" spots aired through 2001, but AmEx, like many advertisers, struggled to find appropriate ways to promote itself in the somber months after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. AmEx's post-9/11 difficulties were compounded by the fact that the company's headquarters were located at the World Financial Center, adjacent to the Twin Towers, which had collapsed. In early 2002 the "Do More" tagline was dropped in favor of "Make Life Rewarding." Both Seinfeld and Woods continued to be involved with the American Express brand.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James. "Credit Card Industry Attempts to Build Usage in Tight Market." Advertising Age, October 5, 1998.

———. "Unity Becomes Watchword for Global Credit Dollars." Advertising Age, October 20, 1997.

Cardona, Mercedes,"With Blue, Tiger as Stars, AmEx Soars." Advertising Age, October 9, 2000.

Coulton, Antoinette. "At Winter Olympics, Visa Has No Competition." American Banker, June 30, 1998.

———. "Fore! AmEx Signs Tiger Woods as Spokesman." American Banker, May 20, 1997.

Frank, Stephen. "Tiger Woods Is Plugging American Express Products." Wall Street Journal, May 21, 1997.

Kim, Hank,"Credit Cards." Adweek (eastern ed.), April 23, 2001.

———. "Inside Priceless: MasterCard Moments." Adweek, April 12, 1999.

Meece, Mickey. "Career Tracks: AmEx Goes Well beyond Cards with New TV Spots Series." American Banker, June 18, 1996.

"Off-Beat Entrepreneurs." Brandweek, August 24, 1998.

"Tiger Practices for U.S. Open with AmEx Spot." Bank Advertising News, July 10, 2000.

Vranica, Suzanne,"American Express Will Launch New Ads." Wall Street Journal, March 15, 2002.

Wells, Melanie. "AmEx Ads Will Push the Big Picture." USA Today, June 14, 1996.

———. "Woods, AmEx Partner in $13 Million Deal." USA Today, May 20, 1997.

"Widening the Expressway." Brandweek, September 7, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel
Mark Lane

SEINFELD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although the American Express Company (AmEx) had built its brand on an idea of exclusionary "membership," its elitist image proved a weak spot in the 1980s and 1990s, when competitors such as Visa and MasterCard eroded AmEx's market share by positioning themselves as more convenient alternatives. One of the AmEx marketing moves meant to counteract the company's outdated image was enlisting the comedian Jerry Seinfeld in 1992 as a collaborator on TV commercials that reproduced the observational comedy of his stand-up routine and of his NBC sitcom Seinfeld, which at the time had a devoted but comparatively small viewership. As Seinfeld became increasingly popular, AmEx heightened Seinfeld's role in its marketing. Between 1995 and 2002 the comedian was a centerpiece of the credit-card giant's American marketing efforts.

In one spot Seinfeld was shown foiling, thanks to his AmEx card, a gas-station attendant who wanted to inconvenience him by failing to stop the pump at exactly $20. This focus on humorously trivial acts was characteristic of Seinfeld's comedy, but the tone and content of the commercials represented risky new territory for American Express. Seinfeld's intelligent and accessible persona helped the card-issuer bridge generational divisions and position itself as suitable for use in unglamorous hubs of daily life, such as grocery stores, without undermining the upscale image it had spent so many years creating. The cost of retaining Seinfeld and of running the commercials was not disclosed, but the comedian was, at the peak of his popularity, one of the highest-paid TV stars, and his AmEx spots often debuted on Super Bowl broadcasts, the most expensive of all advertising forums. American Express annually spent about $300 million advertising its credit cards.

The commercials were well received by consumers and ad-industry critics; they were consistently named among Adweek 's monthly Best Spots in the late 1990s, and the "Gas Station" spot won a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 1997. Seinfeld was a central part of AmEx's long-term brand repositioning, a project that paid intermittent dividends during the years of the campaign's run. Seinfeld and AmEx further collaborated on a well-received online campaign in 2004.

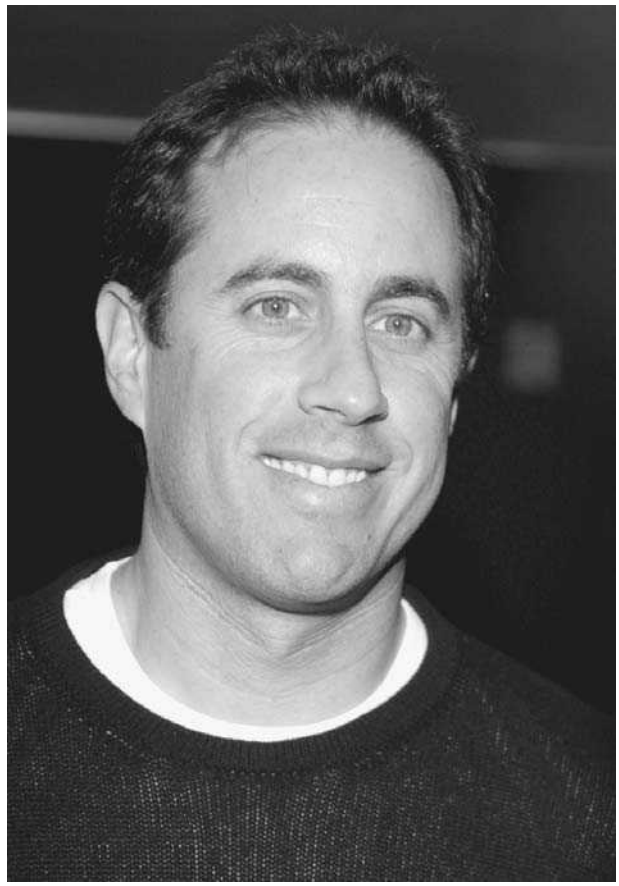
HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Beginning in the 1960s American Express distinguished itself for two decades with several highly acclaimed campaigns. Advertising Age included two 1970s American Express campaigns (''Do You Know Me?'' and ''Don't Leave Home without It'' featuring Karl Malden) on its list of the ''50 Best Commercials.'' The 1988 print campaign featuring photos of famous card members by Annie Leibovitz was a finalist for the book Advertising's Ten Best of the Decade 1980–1990.

But in 1990 AT&T Corp. disrupted the general-purpose credit-card market by introducing its Universal Card with no annual fees. The move adversely affected American Express, which relied on annual fees for much of its revenue, for two reasons. First, American Express was not a credit card but rather a charge card that had to be paid in full monthly, and so it did not earn interest by extending credit. Second, American Express collected on average 3.22 percent of the transaction, making Visa a much more attractive card for merchants to honor, since it charged about half of this percentage. CEO James Robinson III attempted to salvage American Express by turning it into what Time magazine called ''an unwieldy financial supermarket.'' In 1993 the board of directors replaced Robinson with Harvey Golub, who streamlined the company by severing the brokerage, investment-banking, and life-insurance divisions. Golub's tactics turned the company around in short order. Spending on American Express cards increased by 15.6 percent in 1996, outpacing the 13.4 percent rise for credit cards overall (exclusive of debit transactions and cash advances). And in the first half of 1997 American Express finally reversed its decade-long downward trend in market share, rising from 18.3 to 18.9 percent of the $469 billion credit-card market.

TARGET MARKET

The Seinfeld commercials were part of a larger AmEx effort to counteract a damaging perception that the brand was the elitist province of older, wealthy consumers. To broaden its card-holding base AmEx needed to reach younger consumers, who tended to remain loyal to their first credit-card brand, but it was also important that the company not alienate those who had been drawn to AmEx's long-cultivated aura of prestige. Seinfeld was a key figure in this brand repositioning beginning with his initial involvement with AmEx in 1992. The comic's ironic, urban-inflected sensibility attracted a devoted following among young consumers, but his value to the company became increasingly evident in the following years, as his eponymous sitcom achieved a level of popularity that transcended demographic divisions. Even as Seinfeld became universally known and appreciated, Jerry Seinfeld's hold on younger, hipper consumers remained strong. His persona was that of an intelligent yet accessible and self-effacing everyman. He thus emerged as a spokesperson who fit neatly with the AmEx imperative to broaden the brand's target market without alienating its existing cardholders.



Comedian Jerry Seinfeld. © STEVE AZZARA/CORBIS.

Seinfeld's centrality to AmEx's advertising increased in concert with his celebrity. As of 1995 Seinfeld was well on its way to becoming perhaps the defining TV sitcom of its era, and the comic became one of the chief elements of the wider AmEx marketing effort tagged ''Do More,'' a branding campaign that was intended to extend the ongoing redefinition of the company's image. AmEx's other primary spokesperson during this time, the young golf phenom Tiger Woods, likewise contributed a uniquely inclusive aura to the brand. As a 21-year-old of mixed ethnicity, Woods appealed to young people across ethnic lines, but his overwhelming mastery of a sport closely linked with older, moneyed consumers likewise won him respect from many established AmEx customers.

KNIX TIX

In an underscoring of American Express Company's affiliation with the New York Knicks, Michael Bay of Propaganda Films directed a 30-second spot titled "Knicks Tickets," in which spokesperson Jerry Seinfeld brandished his American Express card to pursue his lost Knicks tickets from his limo to horseback to in-line skates to underwater diving. The final frames, shot outside Madison Square Garden (because it was too expensive to shoot inside), showed Seinfeld in full scuba gear telling his date, "I'd have gone to the moon for these." The spot ended on a two-shot of Seinfeld and film director and Knicks fanatic Spike Lee, in an astronaut's suit, affirming, "Tell me about it." Seinfeld performed his own stunts for the spot—mounting a horse, diving backward off a boat, and even in line skating for just the second time in his life.

COMPETITION

While American Express's market share was rising in the first half of 1997, to 18.9 percent, Visa's was falling slightly, from 48.88 to 48.85 percent. Visa nevertheless dominated almost half of the market, with about 600 million cards accepted at more than 14 million locations worldwide. This made American Express pale in comparison, with 42.3 million cardholders able to charge at 5 million locations worldwide. In an attempt to make its numbers more competitive, American Express lowered the average percentage of the fee it charged merchants on each transaction from 3.22 percent in 1990 to 2.74 percent in 1998. The discount increased merchant acceptance of the card. In a 1997 survey cardholders confirmed that they could use their cards at 92 percent of the locations where they wanted to shop, up from 72 percent five years earlier. These statistics substantiated the portrayals in the commercials of Seinfeld charging gas and purchasing single stamps. But Visa still charged merchants a fee of less than 2 percent, allowing the front-runner to claim, "It's everywhere you want it to be."

American Express edged out its main competition in the corporate and small-business markets, where it controlled a 65 percent share. Consistent with its image, American Express cardholders tended to be bigger spenders, charging on average $6,000 yearly in 1996, compared with Visa's per-card average of $3,200. Consumers tended to use their American Express cards for higher-priced purchases, such as travel and entertainment. They also, however, tended to rack up a much higher volume of charges on competitors' cards on day-to-day spending. The use of debit cards, which drew directly from checking accounts and thus worked well for this kind of spending, increased by 75 percent in 1996. University of Maryland economics professor Lawrence Ausubel predicted that consumer spending would bifurcate between the extremes of immediate payment (debit cards) and extended payment (credit cards), emptying the middle ground of charge cards with monthly payments in full that represented American Express's traditional arrangement. In fact, exclusive agreements with Visa and MasterCard barred major banks from joining American Express to offer debit cards and make other arrangements, a case that was contested in federal courts. Internationally, American Express established relationships with banks that benefited both.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Ogilvy & Mather creative director David Apicella had first noticed Seinfeld as a promising stand-up comic in the 1970s. In 1992, acting on a hunch, Apicella hired Seinfeld to endorse American Express, although the Seinfeld show was still in its infancy and not yet the pop-culture juggernaut that it eventually became. "When we started, he hadn't quite reached the spectacular levels of success," Apicella recalled. "He had kind of a cult following. But I thought he was a nice combination of being Everyman—and appealing to every man—and being insightful in his observations." At first Seinfeld's role was supplemental to the company's brand advertising, and his minimalist spots simply mimicked his stand-up routine, with his material focusing on touting American Express. By 1995 Seinfeld's role at American Express had expanded to include being the spokesperson for the general brand campaign.

The Seinfeld spots that appeared in those years imitated the plots of the eponymous sitcom that had become a part of the collective American consciousness, and like the Seinfeld show, they were crafted via brainstorming sessions, according to participants in the creative process. "We do it much like a sitcom is written," Apicella said. "We just sit around a room for as long as it takes to get a funny commercial . . . Having spent however many days it takes to get the thing right with Jerry in the room, we're usually pretty together, but we're always changing things on the set." Apicella continued, "Jerry does some ad-libbing, but things are generally scripted. Jerry's commercials are done the way Jerry's show is, which is done the way Jerry's act was—[they are] carefully constructed beforehand."

One well-known spot, "Gas Station," showed Seinfeld filling his car with gas, preparing to stop the pump at exactly $20, presumably because this amount would facilitate the cash payment he wanted to make. When the pump went slightly over $20, the gas-station attendant began to delight in the irritation the error would cause, but Seinfeld responded by giving the pump handle another gratuitous squeeze and victoriously producing his AmEx green card, which made the precise total of his purchase irrelevant. The humorously trivial nature of the comedian's triumph was in keeping with his sitcom character's personality, a necessary element of the campaign from the point of view of the TV show's loyal audience. Additionally, the fact that AmEx was being connected with the commonplace act of purchasing gas was noteworthy. Typically associated with upscale travel and leisure purchases, AmEx had not, prior to the Seinfeld campaign, been regularly promoted as a card to be used for such mundane, unglamorous tasks.

Another prominent spot in the campaign, which made its debut during the 1998 Super Bowl, showed an American Express card being put to a similarly commonplace use, while further deriving humor from the small scale of Seinfeld's personal triumphs. This time, however, the spot—set in a grocery store—literally juxtaposed the comedian's character with that of Superman, who appeared as an animated figure. When Lois Lane, having forgotten her wallet, needed help purchasing her groceries, it was Seinfeld who was able to oblige, thanks to his American Express card. Superman's costume, alas, had no pockets, limiting his ability to save the day.

Although the last episode of Seinfeld aired in May 1998, Seinfeld's relationship with AmEx continued; indeed, in the aftermath of the show's end the public appetite for new Seinfeld material could only be satisfied via AmEx commercials. The Seinfeld campaign was put on hold during 2000 as AmEx relied more heavily on Tiger Woods and a more aspiration-minded iteration of its ongoing "Do More" message. A new batch of Seinfeld spots began appearing on TV with the March 2001 broadcast of the Academy Awards, and the Seinfeld campaign remained an integral part of AmEx's television advertising through 2002.

OUTCOME

Adweek editors consistently included commercials from the "Seinfeld" campaign on their monthly list of the "Best Spots" breaking on broadcast and cable television, and "Gas Station" garnered a Silver Lion at the Cannes Advertising Festival in June 1997. Although AmEx began to make up ground against its rivals in 1997, it was locked out of the debit-card market by an agreement between Visa, MasterCard, and the banks that issued debit cards. Therefore, AmEx lost market share in 1998 and 1999. It reversed the trend by introducing its Blue Cards, which featured a microchip meant to store the consumer's personal information to facilitate online purchasing—a feature that was not fully functional because it required retailers to use special equipment that was not then cost-effective or readily available. The microchip nevertheless effectively positioned the card as a hip, youth-focused accessory, the only credit card of its kind. AmEx attracted millions of new cardholders in this way in 2000 and 2001. The Seinfeld commercials were not used to pitch the Blue Card, but the card's success marked an extension of the ongoing brand repositioning of which the comedian had long been an integral part.

The concept behind the 1998 Seinfeld and Superman commercial was revived in 2004 for a much-publicized pair of "webisodes," five-minute films available for viewing only online. The comedian and the superhero passed their time together in much the same way that Seinfeld and his onscreen friends Elaine, George, and Kramer typically passed their time on Seinfeld. In the first webisode, for instance, Seinfeld and Superman made small talk in a diner, returned a damaged DVD player (thanks to an AmEx policy of replacing faulty merchandise within 90 days of purchase), and attended a lackluster Broadway musical about the state of Wyoming. The second webisode touted, among other AmEx attributes, the company's roadside-assistance service, by showing Superman and Seinfeld stranded on a road in Death Valley. This Web campaign attracted more than 2 million visitors. Although ad-industry observers questioned its practical brand-building and product-promotion benefits, "The Adventures of Seinfeld and Superman" was widely considered one of the most innovative online campaigns of its time. Because of the campaign Adweek named American Express its Interactive Marketer of the Year for 2004.

FURTHER READING

DeSalvo, Kathy. "Paper Chase: American Express Advertisement Featuring Jerry Seinfeld." Shoot, January 19, 1996, p. 16.

Garfield, Bob. "American Express Spot Seeks Some Laughs and Hides the Sell." Advertising Age, October 7, 2002.

Greenwald, John. "Charge! American Express May Not Have the Cachet It Once Did, but Its Card Business Is Growing Again, Thanks to a Grittier Game Plan and No Nonsense Management." Time, January 12, 1998, p. 60.

Lefton, Terry. "Widening the Expressway." Brandweek, September 7, 1998.

Mack, Ann M., and Patricia Orsini,"Buddy Movies." Adweek, November 22, 2004.

Schumer, Charles E.. "Let the Credit Cards Compete." New York Times, August 4, 1996.

Sherrid, Pamela. "A New Class Act at AMEX." U.S. News & World Report, June 23, 1997, p. 39.

"Shipwreck II on Super Bowl XXIX." Adweek, January 30, 1995.

Wallenstein, Andy. "David Apicella: Ogilvy & Mather's Creative Director Brought Seinfeld to AmEx Ads." Shoot, September 12, 1997, p. 46.

William D. Baue
Mark Lane

American Honda Motor Company

1919 Torrance Blvd.
Torrance, California 90501-2722
USA
Telephone: (310) 783-2000
Fax: (310) 783-2110
Web site: www.honda.com

■■■

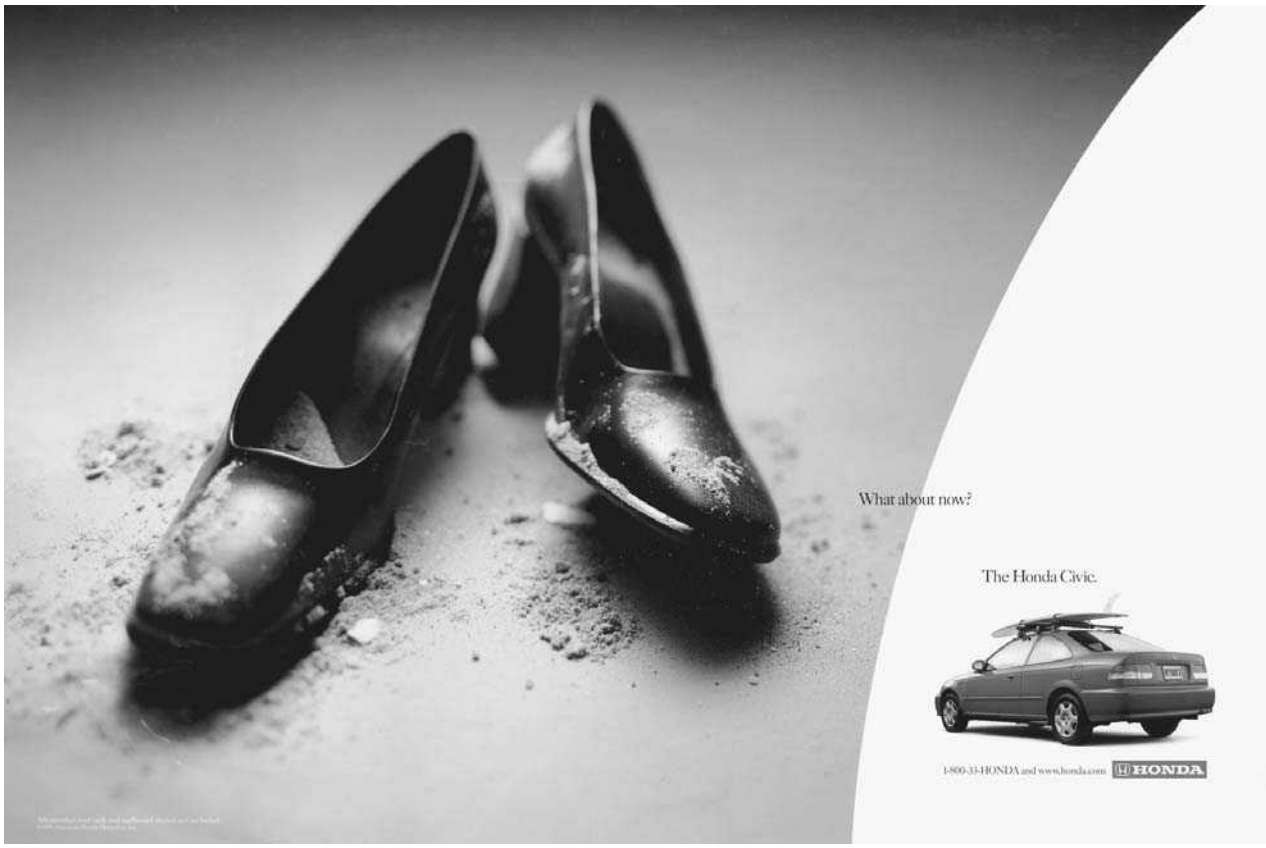
WHAT ABOUT NOW? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 advertising agency Rubin Postaer of Santa Monica developed a campaign for the American Honda Motor Company that was set in a corporate world from which workers yearned to escape. The ads proposed the Honda Civic both as the enticement for getting away from the responsibilities of work and as the means of escape. This approach attempted to solve a difficult targeting problem: how to appeal to the spirit of younger buyers, who were adopting the Civic as their signature car, while still acknowledging the demographic group who could better afford to buy the car, 30- and 40-something professionals as well as the baby boomer parents of the younger buyers. Rubin Postaer solved the problem by portraying the everyday situation of the older audience with the spirit of a younger attitude. The subtext of the ads suggested that a person could fulfill his responsibilities with the Civic while also managing to inject some fun into the equation.

The tag line of the campaign asked, ''What about Now?,'' focusing attention on the present. The print as well as the television campaign juxtaposed images of work with symbols of recreation. Each print execution featured a small picture of a Civic with a roof rack holding a stereotypical piece of recreational equipment. One print ad pictured a pair of sand-covered pumps, suggesting that the owner had just visited the beach, while the roof rack on the Civic held a surfboard. Another ad showed a pinstriped suit on a hanger, with a lift pass to ''Mt. Doom'' affixed to its bottom button, while the Civic had skis on the roof rack. A final ad filled the page with an open briefcase revealing a fish on ice and the Civic with a fishing pole strapped on top.

The television commercial entitled ''Snorkeling'' similarly explored the line between work and play, investigating their odd points of convergence. This spot started with an underwater scene and then revealed a business-suited man swimming in snorkeling gear. When the camera surfaced above the water, it revealed a Honda Civic awaiting the man on the beach. The voice-over said that the businessman was supposed to be attending a symposium but that his attention had been drawn elsewhere—to his automobile, which promised more excitement than a conference. The spot ''Leaving Early'' created an Orwellian atmosphere of the totalitarianism of modern work, against which was set the liberation of fleeing with the assistance of a Honda Civic. A man's offhand comment about leaving work early was overheard and set in motion an elaborate series of countermeasures designed to prevent his departure. The final scene showed the man fleeing in his Civic, barely making it through the closing gate and leaving behind the helicopters and cars pursuing him.



A print advertisement from Honda's "What About Now?" campaign. RUBIN POSTAER & ASSOCIATES. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Honda Motor Company was founded by Soichiro Honda in 1948. In 1990 Nobuhiko Kawamoto, an engineer who had joined Honda's research department in 1963, became president and chief executive. Honda's success reached a peak in the 1980s, but the lean economy of the 1990s pushed the company to the verge of being bought out by rival Mitsubishi Motors. Instead, in 1992 Kawamoto restructured the company by slashing his beloved Formula One racing division and by introducing a top-down management style, with performance-based promotions replacing Honda's collegial corporate culture based on seniority. Even more important, Kawamoto divested his fellow engineers of sole decision-making power, handing over more power to those who manufactured and marketed the automobiles. The move allowed Honda to take into account consumer input and preferences when building its automobiles.

The marketing of Honda automobiles in the United States dated back to 1970, when the Los Angeles office of advertising agency Chiat Day introduced American drivers to the N600 model. In 1974, when Honda was selling a mere 43,000 cars per year, Gerry Rubin arrived at Needham Harper Steers (now DDB Needham), which had just taken the account away from Chiat Day in time to introduce Honda's newest model, the Civic. Needham responded to the new assignment by focusing attention on the car itself. An early commercial depicted a family loading groceries into a Civic hatchback, and in 1978, at the height of the oil crisis, print ads for the Civic highlighted the fact that it ran on regular as well as unleaded gasoline. In 1986 Larry Postaer joined Gerry Rubin at Needham, and later that year they broke off to establish their own agency, Rubin Postaer, to service the Honda account. Honda exhibited great confidence in the new agency by awarding it the $100 million account without a public review.

TARGET MARKET

As the young drivers who had originally favored Hondas grew older, the company struggled to maintain the interest of this aging demographic group while simultaneously generating interest from younger drivers. Fortunately for Honda, the younger generation adopted the Civic as its unofficial automobile. This demographic group, sometimes known as Generation Y, numbered approximately 77 million people born since 1979 and was about twice as large as its predecessor, Generation X. According to a 1999 survey of 2,000 young people conducted by Chicago-based Teenage Research Unlimited Inc., 6 percent of teenagers owned new cars, and 12 percent planned on buying a new car within the year. Rival carmaker Toyota estimated that approximately 4 million teens would reach driving age in the United States every year until 2010, when the demographic group of drivers under age 30 would number 123 million, or a third of all car buyers. Although these younger consumers could not afford the pricier cars—those with higher profit margins—they remained a key to future profits since brand preference was created early on. Companies such as Levi Strauss & Co. had already been burned by ignoring the preferences of Generation Yers when it failed to pick up on the wide-leg look in jeans.

A print advertisement from Honda's "What About Now?" campaign. RUBIN POSTAER & ASSOCIATES. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Generation Y swelled in numbers because of the size of its parents' generation, the baby boomers. The baby boomers were responsible not only for the size of Generation Y but also, until the children left home, for its financial status. While many Generation Yers could afford to buy their own cars, many also needed assistance from their parents, and so marketers had to appeal to the sensibilities of both the younger and the older generations. In an article by Joyzelle Davis in the Montreal Gazette, Mark Del Russo, the leader of Toyota's Genesis Team, which was charged with the task of figuring out the purchasing preferences of Generation Y, said, "It's important to respect and not alienate the baby-boomer generation." Honda focused its "What about Now?" campaign on corporate themes as a means of connecting with the responsible side of baby boomer conscious while also appealing to the latent sense of rebellion in the group, which had come of age in the turbulent 1960s.

Honda connected with the younger generation almost by happenstance. Analysts speculated that the low price of the Civic appealed to teens and 20-somethings, but even more important was Honda's history in Formula One racing, which attracted young men especially. "You've just gotta have a Civic—it's the car," 19-year-old Luis Aguirre of Hollywood, who owned a 1996 Civic DX coupe, was quoted as saying in Davis's article. Aguirre had modified his Civic into a "slammed-down" version by boosting power to the engine and enhancing the sound system, while other young men also lowered the car body and added custom wheels, oversized exhaust pipes, and turbochargers. Auto industry analyst Eric Noble noted that these modifications, combined with Honda's racing heritage, created a "halo of hipness" for the brand. Honda picked up on this trend by introducing the Civic SI model, which came with custom wheels and side sill panels that made the body appear to be closer to the ground. Honda also installed a 160-horsepower engine to replace the 106-horsepower engine standard in most Civics.

MR. CLEAN?

In 1998 a $20-million Honda campaign used a tie-in with Procter & Gamble's instantly recognizable icon of cleanliness, the bald-headed Mr. Clean, to tout its environmentally friendly cars. In June 1998, however, Honda came under fire for its misinterpretation of the Clean Air Act, resulting in fines of up to $262 million. The controversy arose from Honda's failure to program its emissions control system to report spark plug failures in 1.6 million of its cars. For its part Honda explained that it was trying to avoid excessive instances when the "check engine" light would illuminate. According to a Los Angeles Times article by Denise Gellene, Honda spokesperson Art Garner maintained that the company's automobiles still "meet or exceed every requirement" of the Clean Air Act. Larry Kopald, a Los Angeles advertising executive, pointed out that Honda's decision to continue running the Mr. Clean ads might appear hypocritical to consumers. "If people see the ads right now, Honda runs the risk of being seen as a manipulator of the media," said Kopald in Gellene's article, adding that the controversy "does make them seem a little foolish." On the other hand, Clay Timon, chairman of the San Francisco image consulting firm Landor Associates, was cited in Gellene's article as doubting that the controversy would register negatively with consumers, since the ads had "created an image of Honda as fuel-efficient, with engines that don't pollute, well in advance of the settlement coming down." If anything, according to Timon, consumers would simply see the settlement as "out of character."

COMPETITION

The Honda Civic competed against other subcompacts in both the import and the domestic categories. Among imports the Honda competed against Volkswagen for the attention of the younger audience. The average age of Honda buyers in the United States was 40, while the average age of Volkswagen buyers was 38, the youngest in the industry. Volkswagen wooed younger buyers with its economically priced performance models, the Golf, Jetta, and reintroduced New Beetle. On the domestic front Honda competed primarily against Ford and General Motors (GM). Ford introduced a new model, the Focus, to augment the Escort in competing for entry-level buyers. The Focus, unveiled at the Los Angeles Auto Show in August 1998, featured a slammed-down design with stiff sports car suspension, a lowered body, and aerodynamic spoilers.

GM supported its Chevy Cavalier model with a fully integrated campaign. The "Essentials" campaign, created by GM's long-standing agency Campbell-Ewald, tied in with Macy's department stores and Conde Nast Publications to target an educated young female audience. A total of 400,000 booklets inserted in Conde Nast titles such as Women's Sports & Fitness, Self, and Bride's exhorted readers not to test-drive but rather to "try on" a Cavalier, appealing to the fashion consciousness of women aged 18 to 35. The Conde Nast database selected 30,000 subscribers as targets for invitations to events at Macy's highlighting the Cavalier. The coup came when Campbell-Ewald and Conde Nast convinced New York City officials to allow a Cavalier to remain parked in a no parking zone in front of Macy's for a week, garnering an estimated 15,000 impressions per hour. A security guard patrolled the car to ensure against vandalism, and according to Chevrolet brand advertising manager Bridget McCarvillean in an Adweek profile of Campbell-Ewald by Lisa Granatstein, he "turned out to be a good product ambassador."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Davis quoted 21-year-old Julia Gulia as saying, "I want something more present, very updated, because that describes me," as she was picking up her new Civic from a Honda dealership outside Chicago. Rubin Postaer recognized the fact that many prospective Civic buyers focused on the present in its many definitions. Gulia used the term to refer to the reputation of the Civic among her contemporaries as a popular car. Honda sought to support this notion of the Civic as a hip car with the irreverent tone of the "What about Now?" campaign, since irreverence was one of the defining features of youth culture in the late 1990s. Simultaneously, the "What about Now?" campaign stressed the importance of focusing on the here and now. "Carpe diem," or "seize the day," could have served as a motto for this younger generation. The tag line underscored the preoccupation with present gratification by stressing "now" as its focal point.

OUTCOME

According to statistics compiled by J. D. Powers & Associates, the Honda Civic continued to lead the subcompact category in sales in 1998. Rubin Postaer also reported that intentions to purchase the Civic were on an upward trend after the 1998 "What about Now?" campaign and that dealers were registering increasing demand for the Civic. What was more, Honda achieved this success through very efficient advertising, which cost only a little more than half as much as the advertising of its competitors. In 1997 Honda budgeted $43 million in media expenditures, while Ford and Chevrolet each spent $77 million on the second-place Escort and the fourth-place Cavalier, respectively. Saturn devoted an astronomical $185 million to media expenditures, more than four times as much as Honda.

Honda expressed its satisfaction and confidence in Rubin Postaer by awarding the agency the advertising account of its upscale Acura division. As it had done in 1986, when it awarded its main ad account to Rubin Postaer without a review, Honda forwent a review in transferring the Acura account from Suissa Miller of Los Angeles to Rubin Postaer. The victory was particularly satisfying for Rubin Postaer in light of its having lost the bid for the account in 1996, when it landed at Suissa Miller. In awarding the Acura account, Honda acknowledged that Rubin Postaer understood best how to position Honda's many models in various markets and to different target audiences.

FURTHER READING

Davis, Joyzelle. ''Automakers Tune In to 'Phat' Vibrations: Reinventing Themselves in Bid to Win Loyalty of Generation Y.'' Montreal Gazette, July 17, 1999.

Gellene, Denise. ''Honda Seeks to Clear the Air over Ads.'' Los Angeles Times, June 18, 1998, p. D6.

Johnson, Greg. ''Agency Followed 'Simple' Equation for Honda Success.'' Los Angeles Times, July 29, 1999.

''The Trouble with Excellence.'' Economist, July 4, 1998.

William D. Baue

American Legacy Foundation

2030 M Street, NW, 6th Fl.
Washington, DC 20036
USA
Telephone: (202) 454-5555
Fax: (202) 454-5599
E-mail: info@americanlegacy.org
Web site: www.americanlegacy.org

■■■

TRUTH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998, 46 state attorneys general reached a settlement with tobacco companies, which included an agreement to fund a five-year, $1.5 billion, national teen antismoking campaign under the auspices of a new nonprofit corporation, the Washington, D.C.–based American Legacy Foundation. The state of Florida also used some of the money it received from the settlement to launch a local teen antismoking campaign called ''Truth.'' It was so successful that the foundation took it national in 2000.

''Truth,'' created by Miami-based advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky and Boston-based Arnold Worldwide, was a multifaceted campaign heavily influenced by the input provided by annual youth summits and a youth review board, which provided feedback and suggestions. Rather than taking a ''just say no'' approach that would likely prove counterproductive, the marketers tried to channel youths' natural rebelliousness by directing it against the practices of the tobacco companies. The television commercials were confrontational and controversial, as well as a call to action. One spot, for example, showed teens delivering hundreds of stuffed body bags to the New York headquarters of Philip Morris, representing the deaths they said the company was responsible for. The campaign also marketed ''Truth'' like any other youth product, advertising in the type of magazines teens read, as well as touring the country in vans, showing up at beaches, skate parks, and other hangouts to give away free gear and ''Infect Truth'' viral kits so that youths could engage in their own guerrilla marketing efforts.

The ''Truth'' campaign was a highly successful campaign, playing a major role in a significant decrease in teen smoking. Although the loss of funding from tobacco companies after five years resulted in budget cuts, the campaign was able to carry on. ''Truth'' was also recognized by the advertising industry, which presented the campaign with a number of celebrated awards.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although people speculated about the health risks of using tobacco, it wasn't until the twentieth century that the issue was addressed scientifically. As early as 1930 German researchers drew a statistical correlation between smoking and cancer. Despite warning about the dangers of smoking, the American Cancer Society circa World War II still relied on the disclaimer that ''no definite evidence exists'' to tie smoking with lung cancer. A turning point in the public debate about smoking came in 1952 when Reader's Digest published ''Cancer by the Carton,'' an article that brought the dangers of smoking to a mass audience and led to other periodicals addressing the subject, as well as a decline in cigarette sales for the first time in a generation. The tobacco industry responded by forming the Tobacco Industry Research Council, little more than a public relations ploy, and also began producing "healthier" cigarettes with better filters and low-tar formulations. Sales rebounded. Then in 1964, at a time when nearly half of adult Americans smoked, U.S. Surgeon General Luther Terry issued a report, Smoking and Health, which concluded that cigarette smoking was causally related to lung cancer in men, and the data for women pointed "in the same direction."

From the time of Luther's report, the tobacco industry came under siege. A year later Congress passed the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act, requiring that every cigarette package carry the surgeon general's warning. Cigarette consumption dropped as did the number of smokers, but the industry brought out a new generation of healthier cigarettes, which forced people to smoke more to receive their daily nicotine fix and as a result led to even greater sales. In the late 1960s the first national antitobacco ad campaign was launched and proved so effective that the tobacco industry was forced to take notice. Because antismoking advocates were gaining equal time from broadcasters, the companies in 1971 elected to pull all radio and television ads as a way to prevent a deluge of antismoking public service messages.

Tobacco companies continued to fight a rear-guard action against the scientific evidence that linked smoking to cancer as well as heart disease and emphysema. While enjoying some success in the political arena, where it could count on the support of senators and congressmen from tobacco-growing states, the tobacco industry was unable to fend off the assaults in the courts from state attorneys general. In 1998 the industry agreed to a settlement worth almost $250 billion with state attorneys general—this after the U.S. Senate had killed a comprehensive tobacco bill and undercut the leverage of the attorneys general.

As part of the $206 billion 1998 master settlement agreement, the tobacco companies agreed to fund a new nonprofit corporation, the Washington, D.C.–based American Legacy Foundation, in a five-year, $1.5 billion, national teen antismoking campaign. To receive the money, however, the foundation had to agree not to vilify the industry, a condition that would soon become controversial. Florida, drawing on its $11.3 billion portion of the settlement, provided $200 million to the Florida Department of Health, to become one of the first states to establish its own teen antismoking campaign. Miami-based advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky landed the account and launched the "Truth" campaign, which was heavily influenced by teen input. It proved so effective that in 2000 the American Legacy Foundation decided to take "Truth" national.

TARGET MARKET

The "Truth" campaign targeted youths between the ages of 12 and 17, television's "golden demographic." It was also a pivotal time of life when people are especially susceptible to the allures of smoking. While adult smoking declined at a steady rate after the 1970s, teen smoking increased just as steadily. According to a federally funded study in 1991, more than 25 percent of high school students nationwide were smokers. By 1997 that number reached 36.4 percent. As Florida prepared to launch the original "Truth" campaign, it determined that 27.4 percent of its high school students had used tobacco in the past 30 days. Among middle school students that percentage was 18.5 percent. Marketing to this demographic was tricky, however. As Alex Bogusky of Crispin Porter + Bogusky explained to Alison Sloane Gaylin of Shoot, "You didn't have to do too much research to find out that typical PSAs [public service announcements], with the 'say no' approach, would actually increase the prevalence of tobacco usage among teen because it makes [smoking] more alluring. Tobacco use is tied into rebellion. It would just make it more of a rebellious act." As a result the marketers relied on teens themselves to help drive the direction of the "Truth" campaign.

COMPETITION

Although individual states and such organizations as the American Lung Association also ran teen antismoking campaigns, they were pursuing the same goal and hardly in competition with the American Legacy Foundation. Rather, all of them faced common adversaries: the tobacco companies and the media that often glamorized smoking. Big tobacco may have been barred from radio and television, but it still spent more than $5 billion each year on advertising. It also spent money on its own teen antismoking efforts. Philip Morris USA, for example, funded its own campaign at the same time the "Truth" campaign was going national. Called "Think. Don't Smoke," the $100-million-per-year effort took a more traditional approach than the confrontational "Truth" campaign. The Philip Morris ads preached to its audience, which as Bogusky had noted was more likely to make teens interested in smoking. Moreover the ads were somewhat self-congratulatory. Lyndon Haviland, chief operating officer of the American Legacy Foundation, told Lynn Porter, writing for the Tampa Tribune, that the "Think. Don't Smoke" campaign "makes teens more likely to feel good about Philip Morris and more likely to feel good about the tobacco industry in general." The

THE MARLBORO LADY

Marlboro, the best-selling cigarette in the world since 1972, was introduced by Philip Morris in the early 1900s as one of the first cigarettes aimed at women. It featured a red tip to hide lipstick marks but failed to catch on. It was reintroduced in 1924, still targeting women, with the slogan "Mild as May." Thirty years later Chicago ad agency Leo Burnett took over the brand, which at the time had less than 1 percent of the market. The new campaign featured Marlboro Men, which over the next decade included athletes and sailors in addition to cowboys. In 1963 Marlboro began using cowboys exclusively and a year later launched the "Marlboro Country" campaign: "Come to where the flavor is. Come to Marlboro Country." Sales began to grow at a 10 percent clip each year until Marlboro eclipsed Winston as America's top-selling brand and soon conquered the world. Dozens of men would portray the Marlboro Man in television and print ads over the decades. Two of them, Wayne McLaren and David McLean, died of lung cancer.

"Truth" campaign, on the other hand, gained much of its power by casting tobacco companies as the villains.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Crispin Porter + Bogusky had never been involved in social marketing before, so it was not surprising that the agency, as it prepared to make its pitch to Florida officials to win the account, would draw on its experience in youth marketing—to sell the product of "not smoking" in the same way it did for other clients at the time (a basketball shoe company, a fast-food restaurant, and a bicycle company). First it conducted research where members of the target market felt comfortable and likely to be uninhibited in giving their answers, such as skate parks and shopping malls. The agency also analyzed successful new product launches to the teen market by Sega, Nintendo, Mountain Dew, and youth fashion brands like Vans, Skechers, and JNCO. As a result the marketing plan would go far beyond television spots to include promotional tours and a magazine that was to be distributed in record stores and surf shops. Most importantly the agency decided to channel teens' natural rebelliousness against tobacco companies. Research indicated that a large number of teens thought that farmers made cigarettes; the campaign would seek to disabuse them of that notion, teach them how tobacco companies operated, and transform them into an army of teens demanding straight answers from big tobacco. The campaign pitched by Crispin Porter + Bogusky to Florida was initially called "Rage." The agency won the account, changed the campaign's title to "Truth," and convened a summit of 500 young people and a youth review board to provide feedback and guide the creative process. Over the course of two years the Florida program succeeded in cutting middle school cigarette consumption in half and lowering high school consumption by a fifth.

The American Legacy Foundation decided to expand the "Truth" campaign to go national in 2000. Crispin Porter + Bogusky teamed up with Boston-based Arnold Worldwide and public relations firms to form an alliance to handle the $185 million account. The first two television spots were quick to create controversy. In one a woman, in the style of confrontational filmmaker Michael Moore, entered Philip Morris's New York headquarters in an attempt to deliver a lie detector and get at the truth about nicotine addiction. The other spot featured teenagers unloading body bags outside of Philip Morris's headquarters. The company complained that the ads defied the vilification provision of the 1998 settlement agreement. Threatened with losing its funding, the foundation withdrew the ads. Four other spots portrayed common consumer products, such as soda or athletic footwear, as if they were as dangerous as tobacco. Each relied on the same voice-over, saying, "There is only one product that actually kills a third of the people who use it. Tobacco." The television networks initially refused to run the spots but soon gave in. Later in 2000 the "Truth" campaign revisited the use of body bags in a series of five new commercials developed to break during the Olympics. One of them spoofed the Marlboro Man by strapping a body bag onto a horse, which then rode off into the sunset as a teen yelled, "Go be a cowboy." Another showed youths tossing body bags out of an airplane while shouting, "Hey, tobacco! Advertise this! . . . Taste the adventure."

Building on the success of the first year, the marketers added an important element to the campaign in 2001, launching the Outbreak Tour, a counterpoint to how tobacco companies promoted their products. In 2000 the campaign had used an RV to tour 27 markets in six weeks to present the "Truth" message. The Outbreak Tour used 10 orange vans and three Lincoln Navigators rigged with deejay turntables, video monitors, Sega video games, Internet access, and lounge chairs. More importantly, perhaps, they were staffed with "ambassadors," including a variety of rappers, ravers, graffiti artists, skateboarders, musicians, fashion designers, and ex-smokers who could effectively carry the no-smoking message to the target audience. Over the summer the tour hit 158 cities, visiting beaches, skate parks, concerts, and anywhere else young people might congregate. The tour also attracted its own audience by staging concerts and martial-arts demonstrations and hosting graffiti-art galleries. The ambassadors handed out T-shirts, bandannas, hats, and "Infect Truth" viral kits containing stickers and stencils so teens could engage in their own guerrilla marketing efforts. In addition to the Outbreak Tour, grassroots marketing was encouraged by print ads with removable "Truth" stencils that appeared in summer editions of such magazines as Mass Appeal, Snowboarder, Vibe, and Teen People.

OUTCOME

"Truth" received immediate acclaim and was named Best Campaign of 2000 by Adweek. The magazine noted, "Approaching 'truth' as a brand like Marlboro or Camel, the umbrella campaign is a guerrilla-style war that attacks on multiple, psychological levels and, literally, takes its message to the streets." Some of the television spots, such as when teens piled stuffed body bags around the Philip Morris headquarters, crossed over from TV spot to live protest, providing a dynamic, energizing element to "Truth."

The "Truth" campaign received its last payment from the tobacco settlement in 2003, forcing the American Legacy Foundation to slash its budget from $160 million a year to $40 million a year. Regardless, "Truth" was a success on every level. The most important measure was the rate of teenage smoking. According to research published in the American Journal of Public Health in 2005, between 2000 and 2002 the number of young people between the ages of 12 and 17 who smoked decreased from 28.8 percent to 18 percent. An estimated 300,000 fewer teens took up smoking during that period. Tobacco companies also contributed to the decline by raising their prices to offset settlement costs. Without doubt the price of cigarettes was a major influencing factor on whether young people smoked or not, but the impact of the "Truth" campaign was not to be discounted. It was also recognized by the advertising industry. In addition to being named Adweek 's Best Campaign of 2000, "Truth" won best of show at the annual awards given to New England ad agencies, sponsored by the Boston Idea Group. In 2005 "Truth" tied for the highest honor, the Grand EFFIE, at the prestigious annual EFFIE Awards, administered by the New York chapter of the American Marketing Association.

FURTHER READING

Andrews, Helena. "Teen Smoking Declines, Truth Campaign Credited." Capital Times (Madison, Wisconsin), February 26, 2005, p. 2C.

Beirne, Mike. "Butt-Kicking Big Tobacco." Brandweek, November 12, 2001, p. 28.

———. "Gold Winner: Smoking Ain't Glam, Dude." Brandweek, March 18, 2002, p. R18.

"Best Campaign of the Year 2000: American Legacy Foundation." Adweek, February 5, 2001.

Boccella, Kathy. "Surveys Show High School Smoking Is on the Decline." Philadelphia Inquirer, January 15, 2002.

Gaylin, Alison Sloane. "Getting at the Truth." Shoot, November 23, 2001, p. 19.

Hicks, Jennifer. "The Strategy behind Florida's 'Truth' Campaign." Tobacco Control, March 2001.

Ives, Nat. "2 Agencies in a Tie for the Grand Effie." New York Times, June 5, 2003, p. C8.

McGregor, Paloma. "Teens Spread Truth about Smoking Risks." Plain Dealer, July 22, 2000, p. 1E.

Porter, Lynn. "The 'Truth' Gets Results." Tampa Tribune, July 21, 2002, p. 1.

Reidy, Chris. "Boston-Based Agency's Controversial Antismoking TV Ads to Run during Olympics." Boston Globe, September 19, 2000.

Teinowitz, Ira. "Foundation Yanks Two Controversial Anti-Smoking Ads." Advertising Age, February 21, 2000, p. 63.

Ed Dinger

Americans for the Arts

1000 Vermont Ave. NW, 12th Fl.
Washington, DC 20005
USA
Telephone: (202) 371-2830
Fax: (202) 371-0424
Web site: www.americansforthearts.org

■■■

ART. ASK FOR MORE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 the nonprofit arts-advocacy group Americans for the Arts (AFA) teamed up with the Advertising Council, the producer of a myriad of public-service advertising campaigns, to present the ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign. The organizers believed that the arts were a valuable component in the education of children and were concerned that, in an age of budget cuts, it was receiving short shrift. In order to make the case for increased funding for arts education in public schools, the campaign targeted parents and community leaders.

Texas-based ad agency GSD&M created the campaign, which was funded by a $1 million grant and was the recipient of approximately $30 million in donated media each year. It consisted of television and radio spots, print ads, outdoor advertisements, and Internet elements. Many of the advertisements highlighted Americans' lack of arts knowledge, claiming, for instance, that trumpet player Louis Armstrong was often confused with astronaut Neil Armstrong, the first man to walk on the moon. They also humorously illustrated the effects of too little art in a child's development. One television spot showed a child boring everyone at the dinner table by reciting a typical day at school, minus art; another depicted a child whose idea of a fun bedtime story was a volume of arcane zoning regulations.

The ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign, according to organizers, succeeded in raising awareness about the importance of the arts in education. It was also successful in attracting a great deal of free national media as well as participation from local arts groups. In 2003 the print campaign won three ATHENA Awards, which were given out annually to honor newspaper ads.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Americans for the Arts (AFA) was formed in 1996 through the merger of the National Assembly of Local Arts Agencies and the American Council for the Arts. Their combined resources allowed AFA to better advocate for greater emphasis on arts education in the United States. The state of public education in America in the final decades of the twentieth century had come under question, as it appeared that U.S. students were falling further behind their foreign counterparts in a number of areas. Because so many jobs of the future were related to information and technology, most of the remedies for fixing school systems called for a greater emphasis on reading, math, and science. Many schools had never offered much in terms of arts education, but now, because of budget cuts, schools had to make difficult choices about how to allocate funds, and in many cases art programs were slashed or eliminated altogether.

AFA and other arts advocates argued that the elimination of art programs—including the visual arts, music, dance, and drama—in public schools was shortsighted. Their position, backed by various studies, was that arts education played a vital role in the development of children and that building cultural awareness was just as important as improving math skills and an understanding of science. AFA argued that art education was important to early childhood development and was especially valuable in shaping brain and motor coordination. As children grew older, involvement in the arts helped increase self-esteem, improved problem-solving skills, instilled a sense of discipline, and promoted the concept of teamwork. A quality arts education often led to a strong overall academic performance, as reflected in College Board research that indicted that students who studied the arts for four years scored 89 points higher on the Scholastic Aptitude Test. Moreover, AFA contended that after-school arts programs were an effective way to reduce the problem of delinquency and truancy in youth.

To make its case for the arts to the general public, AFA received a $1 million grant from the Doris Duke Charitable Foundation. It then enlisted the services of Texas advertising agency GSD&M and the Ad Council to develop an ad campaign. ''Art. Ask for More'' was released in February 2001. Nearly 300 smaller arts organizations agreed to promote the campaign on the local level, although many more ultimately participated.

TARGET MARKET

According to research cited by AFA, 9 out of 10 parents agreed that it was important to teach art in the schools. What they failed to understand, AFA asserted, was that a cursory exposure to the arts was not sufficient and that schools needed to do more than simply fend off further budget cuts; they also needed to add more to their arts programs. Because only 7 percent of funding for public education came from the federal government, the focus of the ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign was on civic leaders and on parents with children in public schools. AFA wanted to impress upon this audience the value of an arts education and to urge them to put pressure on their local school boards, where a great deal of budgetary decisions were increasingly being made. In addition AFA sought to encourage parents to expose their children to the arts outside of the school by, for example, making sure that the home included an abundance of pictures and books, taking advantage of local cultural resources, enrolling in art classes as a family, encouraging children to draw at home, singing songs together, and making up stories. The campaign was also intended to encourage people with an artistic skill to share it by serving as a volunteer to help teach children.

FOCUS ON CHILDREN

The Advertising Council, the nonprofit organization responsible for distributing the ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign, had a long history of involvement with public-service announcements before working with Americans for the Arts, the campaign's sponsor. Over the years the Ad Council was involved in a wide range of issues, including the selling of war bonds in World War II, fighting drunk driving, and preventing forest fires. In 1995 the Ad Council decided to focus much of its resources on a single topic: children. It launched ''Commitment 2000: Raising a Better Tomorrow,'' a 10-year effort to pursue a range of issues relating to children, including violence, education, and health care. Some of the ongoing campaigns, such as drunk driving, were recast to include children. The ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign was part of this new targeted strategy.

COMPETITION

While it was hard to argue that art education did not have its place in public schools, AFA was not without its share of critics, who questioned the underlying assumption of the ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign. Writing for Arts Education Policy Review, Constance Bumgarner Gee noted that AFA ''does not mention what type of art is important for kids to 'get' or what desirable knowledge or experience is to be had by getting more art.'' Regarding the campaign's goal of generating press coverage about art education, Gee commented that ''no explanation is offered of the value or purpose of getting more art for kids other than to 'gain local media attention for your organization.'''

In addition, AFA's attempt to make art programs a panacea for all manners of societal ills was also debatable. Of course, after-school programs helped to reduce problems among at-risk youths. That was a lesson learned a century prior, when Boys Clubs were established to provide an after-school alternative for disadvantaged urban youths. There the emphasis was on sports, but the clubs also offered reading rooms and art activities. It could be argued that after-school art programs were not necessarily more effective than, say, a boxing program such as the Gold Gloves, which over the decades had developed a proven track record in curbing youth problems in the inner city. Boxing could also make the claim that it instilled discipline and a sense of accomplishment.

According to Karen Libman, also writing for Arts Education Policy Review, arts advocates ''have often garnered support for the arts through any means necessary, even unsupported advocacy claims. It is time to own up to this. . . . Advocacy cannot mean that we portray ourselves as all things to all people . . . while art can do many things, it cannot do everything. If we promise that, or try to prove it, we will certainly fail.''

Aside from questions about its premise, ''Art. Ask for More'' had to compete for attention with something that also assumed the mantle of art: entertainment. A study conducted by the Columbia School of Journalism revealed that coverage of the arts had in recent years been replaced by entertainment news, much of which was dominated by celebrity gossip. In fact, the largest category of arts coverage was obituaries of artists and entertainers. The blurred distinction between entertainment and art was yet another challenge facing the campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

''Art. Ask for More'' was released in January 2002 and included television and radio spots, print ads, outdoor advertisements, and Web banners. The strategy of the advertising was to demonstrate, often in a humorous way, the effects of having too little art education. The first television spot, for example, featured a young boy who encountered a street musician playing a violin and told him, ''Get a job!'' Next the boy was shown at a party; when a clown made a giraffe out of balloons, the boy commented, ''I don't see it.''

Later TV spots showed other children affected by the lack of art in their lives. In the spot called ''Dinner'' a young boy was asked about his day at school. His parents were dismayed by the monotony of his routine: ''I went to lunch and then I ate it, and then lunch was over . . .'' A voice-over by actor Alec Baldwin interrupted the boy's narrative, commenting, ''The less art a kid gets, the more it shows. Are yours getting enough? Art. Ask for more.'' In another spot, ''Girl,'' a young girl riding in a car with her mother changed radio stations, switching from music to financial news. Then before going to bed she asked her father to read from a thick volume titled ''Zoning and Variances.'' Other television spots relied on celebrities such as rapper Chuck D, who stressed the role that art played in a child's development.

The campaign's radio spots took a man-in-the-street approach, as an interviewer recorded people's misidentification of famous artists. Thus, the ballet dancer Rudolph Nureyev was confused with a hockey player, jazz musician Louis Armstrong was mistaken for the first man to walk on the moon, and modern-dance pioneer Martha Graham was credited with the invention of the graham cracker. The print ads also played with the same idea using the same artists. In one ad a picture of Louis Armstrong playing his horn was accompanied by a headline that read: ''No wonder people think Louis Armstrong was the first man to walk on the moon.'' The text of the ad offered a brief biography of Armstrong, who learned to play the trumpet at a reformatory for boys, and then commented, ''the arts are dismissed as extravagant in today's schools,'' before making the case that the arts made better students. Other print ads focused on the sixteenth-century painter Caravaggio and the composer Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky.

Another major facet of the ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign was local participation. Area arts groups contacted local media to draw attention to the resources of the campaign's website. An example of local initiatives was the commissioning of a bus in Chicago to showcase the artwork of area students by allowing them to decorate the outside of the bus, essentially turning it into a rolling mural. The idea was also taken up in Hampton Roads, Virginia. On the backs of the buses the national ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign was promoted.

OUTCOME

''Art. Ask for More'' became a long-term campaign for AFA and the Ad Council. After two years the organizers announced that they were pleased with the results. Polling indicated a strong increase in support for arts education in U.S. schools. The campaign had also received a great deal of media support, in two years garnering $110 million in national media donations for television and radio airtime and print space. It also received time from major broadcast TV, cable, and radio networks in America's top 100 media markets as well as placement in such publications as the New York Times, USA Today, Parade, and Time. In addition, the campaign was bolstered by the support of 367 local partners across the country. In June 2005 AFA began to modify the focus of the campaign. Having made its point about the need for arts education, it began attempting to educate people about how they could effectively serve as advocates for the arts in their own communities.

The ''Art. Ask for More'' campaign was also well received by the advertising industry. In 2003 GSD&M was honored by the Newspaper Association of America in its annual ATHENA Awards, which recognized excellence in newspaper advertising. The agency won a gold award for the campaign as well as a gold award and silver awards for individual print ads.

FURTHER READING

''Ads Suggest the Pitfalls of Losing Art Education.'' New York Times, January 26, 2002, p. B12.

"Alec Baldwin Stars in Arts Ad Campaign." Long Island Business News, February 8, 2002, p. 13A.

Burck, Jodi. "Teach Aims to Ignite Art 'Spark' for All." Grand Rapids (MI) Press, April 8, 2002, p. D1.

Charski, Mindy. "Print Honors Go to Richards, DDB, GSD&M." Adweek (southwest ed.), September 25, 2003.

Gee, Constance Bumgarner. "Spirit, Mind, and Body: Arts Education the Redeemer." Arts Education Policy Review, March–April 2004, p. 9.

Houston, Allen. "Nonprofit Group Presents Arts to American Children." PR Week, February 11, 2002, p. 7.

Libman, Karen. "Some Thoughts on Arts Advocacy: Separating the Hype from the Reality." Arts Education Policy Review, January–February 2004, p. 31.

Messina, Debbie. "City Buses Showcase Artwork of Students to Promote Courses." Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot, March 22, 2002, p. B4.

"Mining Arts' Value in Austin." Back Stage, June 16, 2005.

Riley, Kevin W. "Art: A Recreation Thing." Parks & Recreation, July 2002, p 22.

Ed Dinger

Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc.

1 Busch Place
St. Louis, Missouri 63118
USA
Telephone: (314) 577-2000
Fax: (314) 577-2000
Web site: www.anheuser-busch.com

■■■

BEER . . . OR MICHELOB? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1998 Anheuser-Busch Companies, the Saint Louis, Missouri–based brewery best known for its premium Budweiser and Bud Light beers, greatly increased the advertising budget of its Michelob line of superpremium beers. After spending just over $17 million in 1996 and even less in 1997 on promoting Michelob, Anheuser-Busch devoted an estimated $30 million to the brand in 1998, primarily for a television-based campaign created by Leap Partnership of Chicago. Using the tagline "Beer . . . or Michelob?" the campaign sought to differentiate Michelob from a confusing plethora of superpremium, specialty, and microbrewery brands flooding the U.S. market. It placed particular emphasis on publicizing Michelob Light, which was widely seen as having more potential for sales growth than its full-calorie Michelob siblings.

The humor-based television spots broke during CBS's broadcast of the Winter Olympics from Nagano, Japan, in February 1998 and continued with little conceptual modification through 2001. One characteristic spot featured an actor unwilling to order a beer in a scene that called for him to do so; instead, he insisted on ordering a Michelob. Other prominent spots in the campaign focused on a negligent grocery-store employee whose bagging technique changed radically for the better when a customer purchased Michelob Light. The campaign began to focus more on Michelob Light, and the tagline was adjusted to "Beer . . . or Michelob Light?" Print gradually became a more prominent element of the increasingly robust campaign; by 2001 Anheuser-Busch had boosted its budget for the Michelob brand family's marketing to an estimated $50 million.

Michelob Light sales grew each year that "Beer . . . or Michelob?" ran. Although it was true that the brand had been growing since 1993, increases in sales growth closely mirrored increases in Michelob's advertising budget.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1852 George Schneider founded the Bavarian Brewery in St. Louis, but in 1860 he sold it to Eberhard Anheuser. The latter hired his son-in-law, Adolphus Busch, in 1864, and in 1872 they first used the "A and Eagle" trademark that would evolve into the logo of Anheuser-Busch. The U.S. centennial year of 1876 saw the introduction of Budweiser, a brand created to resemble beers from Bohemia in Central Europe. Twenty years later, in 1896, the company introduced Michelob as "a draft beer for connoisseurs."

The company took the name Anheuser-Busch in 1919, the same year the Eighteenth Amendment outlawed the production and sale of alcoholic beverages in the United States. For the next 14 years, as America underwent Prohibition, the company turned to a variety of enterprises such as bottling soft drinks and selling yeast. It even produced a nonalcoholic version of Budweiser. But when Prohibition was repealed in 1933, August Busch, son of Adolphus, personally delivered a case of Budweiser to President Franklin D. Roosevelt in a carriage pulled by a team of Clydesdale horses. The latter would become the Anheuser-Busch symbol, and their use would be closely tied to the Budweiser brand in coming years.

By 1957 Budweiser had become the nation's most popular brand of beer, a position it still held more than 40 years later. Anheuser-Busch diversified its holdings into a number of nonbeverage enterprises and expanded internationally during the 1970s and 1980s. In 1981, responding to the growing market for light beers, it introduced the first extension in what would become the Michelob family of beers: Michelob Light. The latter became America's first brand of superpremium light beer. Three years later, in 1984, the brand added Michelob Classic Dark, which it billed as "the ultimate in dark beers." Finally, as part of yet another industry-wide trend, in 1988 Michelob presented Michelob Ice, for which it also claimed status as the nation's first superpremium dry beer.

TARGET MARKET

Michelob's 1998 advertising placed an emphasis on Michelob Light, part of a larger light-beer category that had grown by 3 percent in the preceding year. By contrast, Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser Light—better known as Bud Light—had seen its revenues grow by more than 16 percent in the same period. And because Michelob Light had performed better than any brand in the Michelob family during the preceding year, accounting for 50 percent of Michelob revenues, Anheuser-Busch elected to divert much of its Michelob budget toward the light brand.

"Beer drinkers may be couch potatoes," a supermarket category manager told Chain Drug Review in March 1998, "but if they can't rouse themselves to shed their fat with exercise, at least they want to slow the weight gains. If they drink a light beer with their baked chips, they can tell themselves they're not neglecting their health." This somewhat derogatory assessment carried more than a grain of truth: light beers appealed to a category of buyer that on the surface might seem like a contradiction in terms—beer drinkers concerned about health and fitness. But of course at heart there was nothing truly contradictory about the desire to enjoy a premium beer on the one hand and the desire not to gain excess pounds on the other. Thus a large portion of the nation's top-selling brands were light beers. Furthermore, the association of beer and sports, symbolized by Michelob's launch of its campaign with the Winter Olympics in February 1998, was an old one.

What was new, however, was Michelob's thrust: along with a drastic increase in spending for the brand's advertising, spots drew attention to Michelob's traditional image in a way that many Michelob ads in recent years had not. "In 1896," Michelob brands vice president David English told Chain Drug Review, "Adolphus Busch created Michelob as a beer for connoisseurs—a step above the ordinary. That image has been blurred by the proliferation of micros [beers marketed by microbreweries], specialties, and imports in today's market. Our new campaign returns to Michelob's 102-year heritage as the worldwide symbol of brewing excellence."

COMPETITION

Anheuser-Busch and Michelob were not the only ones profiting from the steadily increasing interest in light beers. Miller Brewing Company's Miller Lite, as well as Coors Light, a product of the Adolph Coors Company, had also shown noticeable increases during 1997. But data presented in Prepared Foods in March 1998 showed that Anheuser-Busch held a formidable share of the top brands.

First, of course, was Budweiser, followed by Bud Light. Fifth and sixth places belonged to Busch and Natural Light, and Busch Light was in ninth place, bringing Anheuser-Busch's holdings to a total of 5 out of 10 slots on the top-10 list. Miller held three spots with Miller Lite, Miller Genuine Draft, and Miller High Life. The other two spots belonged to Coors Light and Milwaukee's Best. Michelob Light stood in 13th place, followed by Michelob.

As a superpremium beer, Michelob was hardly likely to make the top-10 list, which in fact included no superpremium brands. Among its prominent competitors were Heineken from Holland and Lowenbrau and Beck's from Germany. Closer to home was Samuel Adams, which used marketing tied to American heritage themes in order to establish a link between itself and the Founding Father whose name it had adopted as its own. In 1997 Anheuser-Busch ran an ad in the Boston area, drawing attention to the fact that, whereas Samuel Adams used images of Revolutionary War–era Boston in its advertising, it was Michelob that actually had a bottling plant in that city.

Michelob also competed with a number of other superpremium brands as well as specialty beers and microbrews. The latter were extremely small operations that typically sold their products only in local markets.

A 'KINDER, GENTLER' OLYMPICS

"I think you'll find a lot of kinder, gentler advertising in the Winter Olympics," Advertising Age sports-marketing writer Jeff Jensen told Keith J. Kelly of the New York Daily News. The phrase "kinder, gentler," of course, was borrowed from Vice President George Bush's successful 1988 campaign for the White House, but Jensen was referring to the 1998 Nagano Winter Olympics' emphasis on advertising geared toward women. With events that tended to be more popular among female viewers than male, the Winter Games typically drew a much larger ratio of women viewers than did the Summer Olympics. Hence advertising tended to be more specifically geared toward women.

A Michelob Light spot, part of Anheuser-Busch's "Beer . . . or Michelob?" campaign, was to be directed toward the female demographic group, as was a Ford Taurus commercial showing a female doctor driving a Taurus to a hospital to deliver a baby. Ford spokesman Joe Koenig said, "In years past, that might have been a man driving the car." Nike ran spots that included poetry written by female high school athletes, and other Nike commercials featured female athletes such as skier Picabo Street and hockey player Cammi Granato.

A John Hancock Mutual Life spot, while not geared specifically to female viewers, certainly carried a serious, thoughtful message. In fact, the commercial was not a pitch for John Hancock so much as a plea for viewers to donate to the Sarajevo Olympic Children's Fund. Visuals were made up of footage from the 1984 Winter Games, held in that city, which was then part of Yugoslavia. This was combined with scenes of war-torn Sarajevo, which, as the capital of independent Bosnia and Herzegovina since 1992, had been the site of bitter ethnic fighting. A voice-over by actress Sigourney Weaver stated, "The children of Sarajevo never forgot the Olympics. Please don't forget them."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1995 Michelob had ended a long relationship with the ad agency D'Arcy Macius Benton & Bowles and selected Glennon Company of St. Louis as its primary agency—though not necessarily its agency of record, since Anheuser-Busch had recently adopted a policy of working with several firms. Among Glennon's spots had been the "Gimme Guys," a May 1997 campaign tied to a golf-ball giveaway promotion.

Such advertising, based as it was in a raucous brand of humor more typical of Budweiser, was at odds with the strategy Michelob had employed in the 1980s, when its television spots had carried the tagline "Some things just speak for themselves." The latter campaign had stressed the image of quality associated with the brand; and for its 1998 advertising Michelob sought to use both quality and humor.

In the fall of 1997 Anheuser-Busch replaced Glennon with Leap Partnership as the lead agency on its Michelob account. It also announced, at the end of the year, a decision to raise its overall advertising budget 22 percent, or $70 million. As 1998 rolled around, Anheuser-Busch let it be known that it would invest a full $30 million on a brand-family campaign for Michelob. This represented a significant jump over previous years: in 1996 the parent company had devoted about $17 million to advertising for its superpremium beer, and during the first half of 1997 it spent only $3.7 million on Michelob. With "Beer . . . or Michelob?" the company presented what Anheuser-Busch vice president for brand management Bob Lachky called "situational spots" designed to emphasize the brand's quality image while using humor. Thus, James B. Arndorfer reported in Advertising Age, "The TV spots will be similar in spirit to those for Bud Light, but less wacky."

"Beer . . . or Michelob?" was launched with two commercials that first aired during the CBS broadcast of the 1998 Winter Olympics from Nagano, Japan, in February. One showed a movie actor in the middle of a scene in which his script called on him to ask for a beer; however, he could not seem to restrain himself from asking specifically for a Michelob Light—much to his director's consternation. Another spot, targeting female viewers, was entitled "Surprise." In it, a woman returned home from a shopping trip—during which she had bought a sexy item of lingerie—to find a note from her husband suggesting that she grab two Michelobs and meet him in the living room. Before doing so, however, she put on her new purchase, then tiptoed into the darkened and quiet living room. Suddenly, the lights came on, and she found herself surrounded by a crowd of family and friends shouting "Surprise!" Painfully embarrassed, she saw her parents among the group and said timidly, "Hi, Daddy." Outdoor, radio, and point-of-purchase advertisements supplemented the TV spots.

The campaign's creative strategy remained consistent throughout its three-year run, with later TV spots continuing to use situational humor reminiscent of other Anheuser-Busch brands' marketing. One well-known commercial that first ran in late 1999, for instance, showed a grocery-store bag boy handling a customer's purchases with exaggerated carelessness. After shoving a potted plant upside-down into a bag and ruining a loaf of French bread, the bag boy came to the customer's six-pack of Michelob Light and changed his behavior radically, packing the beer in bubble wrap, bagging it with care, and marking the bag "Fragile." The bag boy was used again in TV spots that aired in 2000, and the same concept was applied to commercials featuring a bartender.

The "Beer . . . or Michelob?" TV spots typically appeared during prime-time sports programming, and print ads in sports magazines became an increasingly prominent element of the campaign beginning in 1999. The campaign's emphasis on Michelob Light resulted in a gradual tagline modification to "Beer . . . or Michelob Light?" and Anheuser-Busch continued attempting to drum up interest in the brand among women, most notably through sponsorships of women's professional tennis and women's professional golf. There was also a 2000 print element that specifically targeted women. The campaign's budget consistently increased as Michelob Light experienced sales growth each year after it began. The previously unprecedented $30 million budget of the campaign's first year grew to an estimated $34 million in 1999. The next year the budget increased by an additional 20 percent, and in 2001, the campaign's final year, Anheuser-Busch spent an estimated $50 million on advertising for Michelob beers.

OUTCOME

In 1998 Michelob Light sales topped the 2.6 million barrel record that the brand had reached in 1996, up from a sales low of 2 million barrels in 1992. As Advertising Age noted, demographics, distributor interest, and economic factors also converged to aid the brand's resurgence, but the disparity between the brand's 1997 and 1998 sales levels corresponded clearly with the 1998 increase in the Michelob advertising budget. Indeed, sales of Michelob Light had grown every year since 1993, with the exception of 1997, when Anheuser-Busch spending on behalf of the brand was at its low ebb. Anheuser-Busch accordingly continued to ratchet spending higher in subsequent years, and sales of Michelob Light continued to grow.

In 2001 Anheuser-Busch asked the numerous advertising agencies on its roster, including Leap Partnership, to pitch new Michelob campaign ideas. The brewer eventually awarded the account to Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, the San Francisco agency that shared the primary advertising duties for Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser brand. The resulting 2002 Michelob Light campaign, "Nice Finish," marked a departure from the humor-based approach with which Leap Partnership had found success. That year also marked the introduction of Anheuser-Busch's enormously popular low-carb offering, Michelob Ultra, which overshadowed Michelob Light amid the growing consumer obsession with low-carbohydrate diets.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James B.. "A-B Debuts $30 Mil Campaign for Michelob on Olympics: Brewer Concentrates on Light Brand in a Significant Switch in Ad Focus." Advertising Age, January 19, 1998, p. 4.

"Brewers Hop Back to Basics." Prepared Foods, March 1998, p. 108.

Chura, Hillary. "A-B Cranks Up Michelob Ads, Accents Light." Advertising Age (midwest ed.), July 17, 2000.

———. "Michelob Light Thrives as Ad Spending Rockets." Advertising Age (midwest ed.), November 22, 1999.

Desloge, Rick. "A-B Pouring $70 Million More into '98 Ad Budget." St. Louis Business Journal, December 15, 1997, p. A6.

———. "Glennon Pushed Off Michelob Job: Picked Up by Leap." St. Louis Business Journal, October 20, 1997, p. A8.

Kelly, Keith J.. "A Big Pitch for the Gold: Winter Games to Offer 'Kinder, Gentler' Spots." New York Daily News, February 9, 1998, p. 42.

Kirk, Jim. "Anheuser-Busch to Launch Frog-Free, Adult-Oriented Budweiser Ads." Knight-Ridder Tribune Business News, February 6, 1998.

"The Leap Partnership Named to Handle Anheuser-Busch's Michelob Advertising." Business Wire, September 24, 1997.

"Michelob to Tee Off." Supermarket News, May 5, 1997, p. 32.

Panczyk, Tania D., and Trevor Jensen. "Shops Get a Shot at Michelob." Adweek (eastern ed.), September 10, 2001.

Reidy, Chris. "The Pitch." Boston Globe, February 6, 1998, p. C4.

Sherwood, Sonja. "When It Comes to New Products, Experts Won't Throw Them a Line." Beverage World, November 30, 1998.

"Top Brewers Jockey for Sales." Chain Drug Review, March 2, 1998, p. 120.

"Twin Tracks of Heritage and Hilarity to Continue to Build Budweiser in '99." Brandweek, January 25, 1999, p. 12.

Judson Knight
Mark Lane

FROGS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Founded in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1860, Anheuser-Busch rose to become the largest brewing company in the world, largely because of the success of its flagship brand, Budweiser. But Budweiser's sales began to slow in the late 1980s. Indeed, the three largest beer makers in the United States—Anheuser-Busch, Miller Brewing Company, and Coors Brewing Company—realized with dismay that Americans were drinking less alcohol. Moreover, consumers aged 21 to 27—the key market for beer sales—were turning away from these three traditional breweries and were instead embracing the beers produced by smaller, often local microbreweries. In 1994 Anheuser-Busch responded to these challenges by firing its ad agency of 79 years, D'Arcy, Masius, Benton, & Bowles. Anheuser-Busch wanted to craft a new image for Budweiser that would appeal to younger consumers without alienating loyal Budweiser drinkers.

After hiring a new advertising agency, DDB Needham, Chicago, Anheuser-Busch launched its Budweiser "Frogs" campaign. The commercials featured animatronic (a form of animation) frogs who croaked out the brand's name one syllable at a time: "Bud" -"Weis" -"Er." The original frog spot debuted during the 1995 Super Bowl and showed the amphibians on lily pads. At first it sounded as if the frogs were making nonsensical noises, but eventually the three distinct syllables came together to form the brand's name. A neon Budweiser sign hung in the background. "Frogs II," the second commercial in the campaign, showed the frogs waiting by the side of a road as they croaked out the brand's name. As a Budweiser truck passed by, they latched onto the side with their tongues. "Frogs III," which was first aired on ABC's Monday Night Football, introduced a female frog. The commercial began with the male and female calling back and forth "Bud" and "Weis" respectively, as the male sought to hone in on the sultry female's location. The "Er" was provided in a sort of chuckle by the male as he finds the female. "Frogs IV" took the amphibians to a snowstorm, where they continued to call out "Bud" -"Weis" -"Er" undeterred by the cold that froze their tongues.

Although Anheuser-Busch took strong criticism during the "Frogs" campaign from groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD), who claimed the commercials were targeting children, the campaign was immensely popular. The commercials topped USA Today's Ad Track, a poll that measured the popularity and effectiveness of ad campaigns. According to Advertising Age, the "Frogs" campaign resulted in a tripling of the younger target group's awareness of Budweiser. In 1997 Anheuser-Busch phased out the "Frogs" campaign by introducing two lizards to replace the frogs. The company did not want to overexpose the concept. "We expect our advertising to stay ahead of the curve," said August A. Busch IV, Anheuser-Busch's vice-president of marketing, in Advertising Age. During their run, the frogs had proved to be a great success for the company. They were able to effect a dramatic change in the way consumers, particularly the coveted young adult market, viewed Budweiser.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1860 a German immigrant named Eberhard Anheuser bought the Bavarian Brewery in St. Louis, Missouri. Four years later, his son-in-law, Adolphus Busch, began working there, and in 1876 the two introduced Budweiser Beer to the world. Renamed Anheuser-Busch in 1879, the company grew to become the largest brewer in the world. By 1986 Anheuser-Busch had brewed a billion barrels of beer.

Anheuser-Busch also had a long history of distinctive advertising. Pre-Prohibition ads sought to appeal to various ethnic groups and featured figures such as Otto Von Bismarck and the Scottish folk hero William Wallace. The famous Clydesdale horses, which became the company's symbol, were first used to sell Budweiser in 1933. At their first public appearance they delivered Budweiser to the White House. In the 1940s and 1950s brewers strove to gentrify their products; Anheuser-Busch used the slogan "Beer Belongs" in ads picturing middle-class families sipping beer from Pilsner glasses. By the 1970s, however, beer ads were omnipresent on televised sports programs, and brewers began to "celebrate the traditional values of the American male: sports, camaraderie, and hard work," according to the Wall Street Journal. In 1979 Anheuser-Busch's long-time ad agency, D'Arcy, Masius, Benton, & Bowles, conceived of the "This Bud's For You" campaign, which featured construction workers, lumberjacks, and laborers. These men were saluted "for being on the job and working hard all day long." The company stayed with this advertising theme throughout the 1980s, often running ads portraying manly Bud drinkers surrounded by women in various states of undress. By 1994 Budweiser maintained a market share of 21.9 percent of all beer sales, but sales growth was flattening and Anheuser-Busch realized that a new marketing approach was needed.

TARGET MARKET

As the nation's largest brewery, Anheuser-Busch was hit hard by some shifts in American drinking habits and demographics. The number of 21- to 27- year-olds, historically the group who drank the most beer, fell by about 3 million between 1990 and 1998, from 27.6 to 24.6 million. Not only did this group consume more beer than others but they also formed their beer brand loyalty during this period of their lives. For the most part, what they learned to drink during these years was what they continued to drink throughout their lives. These "entry-level drinkers" of the 1990s were media-savvy and, according to the Sacramento Bee, "both highly brand conscious and notoriously lacking in brand loyalty.'' Compounding these challenges was the fact that this segment of the population was increasingly turning to trendy microbreweries instead of the established giants such as Anheuser-Busch for their beer. These smaller breweries tended to produce darker, richer beers, sometimes with more exotic flavors that included essences of fruits and nuts.

Anheuser-Busch crafted the ''Frogs'' campaign specifically to appeal to this demographic group. According to the St. Louis Business Journal, ''Budweiser needed to regain trends with 20-somethings to maintain and grow its total share. No normal Generation X campaign would work.'' Nor would the company's traditional marketing style. As the Wall Street Journal noted, ''Anheuser-Busch was concerned that [its] image was getting stale, with its ads featuring scantily clad women and gritty blue-collar workers.'' Although D'Arcy, Masius, Benton, & Bowles first developed the concept of the beer-hawking frogs, its was DDB Needham, Chicago, that brought the idea to its full fruition.

In order to recapture this group that avoided ''drinking their father's beer,'' Anheuser-Busch wanted the Budweiser campaign to captivate its audience. The ''Frogs'' commercials were meant to entertain the viewer with a more ironic sense of humor. A Manhattan analyst told the Sacramento Bee that the ads had a ''twisted, childish humor'' that appealed to the under-30 set. The ads were intended to project a fresher, more youthful image, with a sensibility that was more modern than some of the older themes commonly perceived as sexist by the younger generation.

The resulting commercials were noticeably devoid of any ''hard sell'' tactics. For a generation raised on sitcoms and commercials, image was often an end in itself. ''They look at advertising and marketing as almost a spectator sport,'' a marketing analyst told the Sacramento Bee. The ''Frogs'' campaign also appealed to its target market because of its inclusiveness. Using animals as the new beer mascots allowed Anheuser-Busch to step away from earlier campaigns with their pervasive bikini-clad barflies and all-American tough guys that frequently offended women. As late as the 1970s, beer was characterized as a ''20/80 product,'' which meant that 20 percent of the population drank 80 percent of the beer. Women were not a part of that 20 percent. As time passed, women accounted for greater percentages of beer sales. Young men, however, still comprised the core of the beer-drinking market. The quirky ''Frogs'' campaign allowed Anheuser-Busch to ''communicate with young men without offending women,'' according to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. The ads could imbue Budweiser with an off-beat personality without risking going overboard. ''Animals don't focus on gender. Advertisers don't have to worry if it's a man or a woman or how the man or woman is behaving,'' the Journal Sentinel noted. As the success of the amorous amphibians in ''Frogs III'' demonstrated, this campaign was also able to play on the traditionally sexist slant of beer advertising.

Additionally, the ''Frogs'' campaign enabled Anheuser-Busch to include minorities in its marketing message. Traditionally, beer advertising shunted minorities over to ''malt liquor'' products, such as Anheuser-Busch's own King Cobra malt liquor, Michelob Malt, and Hurricane Malt Liquor. By 1996 Anheuser-Busch had begun to dedicate separate Budweiser ad campaigns featuring rap stars and R & B music to appeal to African American and Hispanic markets. Census data in the mid-1990s predicted that the number of African Americans and Hispanics would grow at a much greater rate than the white population and that combined the two minorities would represent nearly a quarter of the U.S. population by 2000. Given this information, Anheuser-Busch recognized the advantages of a campaign that did not turn away any potential consumers.

As much as it needed to update Budweiser's image for a new generation of beer drinkers, Anheuser-Busch and DDB Needham understood that the ''Frogs'' campaign had to walk a fine line. In seeking out a new market, they could not alienate loyal Budweiser drinkers—those over the age of 30 for whom Budweiser was clearly the beer of choice. For this reason Anheuser-Busch continued to release other advertising targeting a more traditional audience at the same time that the ''Frogs'' campaign was aired. For example, August Busch III, chairman of the company, appeared in one series of commercials that stressed Anheuser-Busch's century-old heritage and its exacting standards of quality. But the St. Louis Business Journal found that Budweiser was such ''an elite brand'' and was ''so well entrenched that [it could] step outside the traditional rules.''

COMPETITION

Anheuser-Busch was not the only large brewery to grasp the potential impact of shifting demographics and new marketing needs. In 1995 beer sales declined 1.5 percent, a figure that reflected a decade of stagnant beer sales. Budweiser's most significant mainstream competitor, Miller Brewing Company, took note of Budweiser's success in building a brand personality through quirky advertisements such as those in the ''Frogs'' campaign. The advertising agency Wieden & Kennedy oversaw the marketing efforts for Miller Genuine Draft, the brand that competed most directly with Budweiser. Miller's new campaign featured grainy black and white images of young people drinking beer and dancing. The scenes presented stylized images reminiscent of the early 1970s,

KIDS AND FROGS

Anheuser-Busch's advertising blitz impressed its frogs deep into the consciousness of American consumers. In fact, a survey done by the Center for Alcohol Advertising, based in Berkeley, California, revealed that children between the ages of 9 and 11 years old could more readily identify the Bud frogs than other advertising icons such as Tony the Tiger and Smokey Bear (as well as the Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers). Only Bugs Bunny was more recognizable to this age group than the frogs. Some commentators took this survey as evidence that Anheuser-Busch was targeting underage drinkers. Others, however, attributed this result simply to Budweiser's heavy marketing. "If Tampax Tampons advertised as much as Budweiser, they'd have the same product recognition," wrote columnist Tom Jackman in the Kansas City Star. Anheuser-Busch firmly denied that its ads were intended to encourage underage drinking and noted that it spent over $20 million per year to discourage alcohol and drug abuse.

and in fact one commercial borrowed heavily and deliberately from the classic film A Clockwork Orange. Under the tag line of "It's Time to Drink Beer," the Miller ads asserted the implicit "hipness" of drinking a "good old-fashioned macro-beer" (in the words of one of the commercials).

Miller intended its campaign to reach the same demographic target as Budweiser's "Frogs" campaign. "The greatest opportunity to influence your business—the most evolving dynamic—is in the 21- to 30-year-old group," a spokesperson for Miller told Beverage World. Like Anheuser-Busch, Miller recognized the need to reach out to previously neglected segments of the American beer-drinking market by designing spots that did not exclude women or minorities. As Tom Dudrek, a senior vice president ad the advertising agency Leo Burnett, told Crain's Chicago Business News, "[Beer advertising] is not as Neanderthal. I don't think you see the Swedish Bikini Team anymore."

In addition to facing competition from other large-scale breweries, such as Coors, Stroh, Pabst, and Genesee, Budweiser was also losing business to smaller breweries that claimed to produce a higher-quality beer. These more expensive labels, including Samuel Adams and Pete's Wicked Ale, could not hope to approximate the sheer volume of Budweiser's sales. But the higher-end beers did appeal disproportionately to younger consumers, who liked the cache of these more elite brands. Even smaller regional breweries, such as Henry Weinhard of Portland, Oregon, developed strong local followings based on word-of-mouth reputation, not glitzy advertising campaigns. Anheuser-Busch was thus in danger of having its market share eroded from all sides.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Anheuser-Busch, however, could not rely on word-of-mouth to update Budweiser's image as the "King of Beers." Instead, the company pumped millions of dollars into a media blitz for its "Frogs" campaign. Although the company was unwilling to disclose how it allocated its nearly half billion dollar annual advertising budget among its various products, company publications termed the "Frogs" campaign a "total advertising effort" encompassing radio, print, and television ads. The frogs also appeared on billboards, hats, t-shirts, and other paraphernalia. In addition, their biographies were recounted on Budweiser's web site.

The most attention was devoted to the "Frogs" television commercials, however, because they could reach the greatest number of consumers. The "Frogs" spots each debuted during prime-time, "event" sports broadcasting. The first ad in the campaign premiered during the 1995 Super Bowl. The Super Bowl was generally the most-watched television program of the year, and this status has made it the launching pad for some of the highest-profile advertising campaigns in television history. In fact, the commercials have been known to eclipse the game itself in terms of stimulating viewer interest. Anheuser-Busch's goal was to use this huge stage to create a "buzz" around the unique "Frogs" spot, which would in turn generate more attention for the Budweiser brand. When this approach proved successful, Anheuser-Busch decided to continue its launch strategy. "Frogs III" was introduced during ABC-TV's popular Monday Night Football broadcast, while the fourth installment in the campaign debuted during the 1996 Super Bowl.

Because the campaign was designed to change the image of the tremendously well-known product rather than introduce it to consumers, the ads did not contain a great deal of specific information about Budweiser. Instead, the commercials sought to create a hip status for the brand in order "to fashion a more positive consumer attitude to [the beer]," as Anheuser-Busch executive Robert Lachky told the Chicago Tribune. By using humor, entertainment, and sheer exposure, Anheuser-Busch strove to forge a more emotional connection with its target audience through the "Frogs" campaign.

The company also wanted to ensure that virtually every consumer in America would be exposed to its message. To achieve this end, Anheuser-Busch saturated the market with a barrage of television and radio spots, as well as billboards, print ads, and special promotions. The frogs' ubiquity and immense popularity was a great boon to Budweiser (nearly 50 percent of consumers surveyed by USA Today's Ad Track poll after the campaign's debut said they like the ads "a lot"—the highest mark recorded by the survey in 1995).

OUTCOME

Anheuser-Busch executives declared the "Frogs" campaign to be a success. Lachky told USA Today that "Budweiser was losing market share and the new ads helped to turn the brand around." He further emphasized that the commercials were "especially popular among core 21- to 27-year-old consumers." Industry analysts agreed with Anheuser-Busch's assessments. Advertising Age asserted that the campaign tripled its targets' awareness of the brand. Consumers seemed to concur. The ads topped USA Today 's Ad Track poll for three months straight. Other USA Today surveys revealed that the "Frogs" campaign appealed to viewers across income and age lines. The ads were well received in the advertising industry as well. The campaign won a slew of awards, including several Clio Awards and the prestigious Silver Lion Award at the 1995 Cannes Film Festival.

Not everyone commended the "Frogs" campaign, however. According to USA Today, elementary school children were quite familiar with the campaign and its famous frogs. Critics alleged that this demonstrated that these "critter" campaigns actually targeted children, thereby encouraging underage drinking (and building a future market for beer sales). Anheuser-Busch denied that the Budweiser ads were designed to draw in children. "Watching a beer ad does not cause a kid to drink," Anheuser-Busch's head of consumer awareness told the newspaper.

Eventually Anheuser-Busch did end the "Frogs" campaign—at least those ads that exclusively featured the frogs. Company officials denied that the decision was related in any way to pressure exerted by children's interest groups. Instead, Anheuser-Busch stated that it did so in order to ensure that the campaign, and thus the image of the brand it supported, remained fresh and positive in consumers' minds. In subsequent ads, two lizards with Brooklyn accents were introduced. Frank and Louie, as they were called, plotted to overthrow the frogs' successful reign as Budweiser "spokesfrogs."

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James. "Anheuser-Busch Sets $70 Million Hike in '98 Ad Spending." Advertising Age, December 1, 1998.

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Anheuser-Busch Promotes Dogs, Frogs, and Sermons on Moderate Drinking." Wall Street Journal, August 14, 1997.

Cahill, Joseph. "Suds City: Chicago Beer Pitchers Pour It On." Crain's Chicago Business, September 18, 1995.

"Campaign Clout: Budweiser's New Menagerie Hops to the Top of the Ad Charts." Advertising Age, March 18, 1998.

Causey, James. "Mascots With Attitude Invade a Wild Kingdom of Marketing." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel April 29, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie. "Budweiser Ads Up the Ante." USA Today, October 16, 1995.

Finnie, William. "Frogs a Breakthrough Campaign for Anheuser-Busch." St. Louis Business Journal, May 29, 1995.

Hays, Constance. "New Beer Drinkers Baffle Industry." Sacramento Bee, April 26, 1998. Examines the demographic target of the Budweiser "Frogs" campaign.

Jackman, Tom. "'Bud Frogs' Study Impaired By Leap in Logic." Kansas City Star, May 9, 1996.

Lazarus, George. "For Bud Lovers, This Frogs For You." Chicago Tribune, September 4, 1995.

Prince, Greg. "Time and Again: Miller Goes Straight to the Core and Likes the Results." Beverage World, February 15, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

I LOVE YOU, MAN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Anheuser-Busch Companies, the largest beer maker in the world, introduced Bud Light to its product line in 1982. In those days the light beer market was relatively young and was dominated by Miller Lite, a beer made by Anheuser-Busch's main competitor, the Miller Brewing Company. "Light" beers are so named because they contain fewer calories (and less alcohol) than "regular" beer. To create a market niche for its new product, Anheuser-Busch relied heavily on creative advertising campaigns to generate consumer awareness about its new brand and to alter the perception that Miller Lite was the only reduced-calorie beer available on the market. This approach proved to be quite successful, and Bud Light steadily gained in sales and market share at the expense of Miller Lite. By 1993 Bud Light had overtaken Miller Lite to become the best-selling light beer in the United States.

In the mid-1990s, however, the entire beer market had begun to slump as American alcohol consumption declined overall. Moreover, demographic trends indicated a decrease in the number of consumers between the ages of 21 and 30, the prime beer-drinking years. Bud Light was particularly affected by this decline. It lost its number-one position in the light beer market back to Miller Lite and struggled to create an advertising campaign that could reinvigorate its sales figures. To halt this decline, Anheuser-Busch turned to the DDB Needham advertising agency, the shop that had created the initial Bud Light campaign in 1982 that launched the brand to prominence.

DDB Needham sought to craft a campaign that would appeal to a generation of young men raised on sitcoms and commercials but that would also not alienate either older drinkers or women, who might prefer a light beer because of its lower calorie count. The ''I Love You, Man'' campaign, which debuted in 1995, was designed to serve these multiple goals. The first spot of the campaign featured ''Johnny,'' a scruffy-looking man in his mid- to late thirties fishing off the end of a pier with his father and brother. Saucer-eyed, Johnny looks over to his father and says, in a voice redolent with emotion, ''Dad. Well, you're my dad. And I love you, man.'' His father eyes him coolly and responds, ''You're not getting my Bud Light, Johnny.'' Subsequent commercials showed Johnny pulling similar faux-sincere beer scams on his brother and girlfriend, always without success.

Anheuser-Busch ran the commercials heavily during major sporting events, including Major League Baseball's World Series and the Super Bowl, generally the highest-rated television broadcast of the year. Marketing surveys revealed the campaign's popularity. A poll conducted for USA Today by the Louis Harris Company revealed that 34 percent of those surveyed liked the ''I Love You, Man'' spots ''a lot,'' which compared quite favorably with the 23 percent average for other commercials rated. As the ''I Love You, Man'' tag line insinuated its way into popular culture (actor Rob Fitzgerald, who played Johnny, appeared on David Letterman's latenight show), Anheuser-Busch sought to expand the campaign's appeal. Fitzgerald was featured in profiles in People magazine and USA Today, and DDB Needham strove to develop new scenarios in which Johnny could beg for Bud Light.

The fourth and final ''I Love You, Man'' commercial debuted during the 1996 Super Bowl and featured actor Charlton Heston. In it Johnny crashes a Hollywood party and meets the Bud Light-drinking Heston, who is perhaps best known for his roles as Moses and in the movie Planet of the Apes. Heston coaches Johnny on how to say the famous line but remains immune when Johnny turns the appeal on him. ''Since the viewers already know the punch line, we needed to take Johnny's character someplace bigger,'' campaign creator David Merhar told Life magazine. ''Everything leading up to the line had to be the funny part.''

The campaign was a resounding success. Bud Light sales rose 12 percent while the ''I Love You, Man'' commercials ran, recapturing the number one slot in the light beer market and rising to become the second best-selling beer in the United States, behind only Anheuser-Busch's flagship brand Budweiser. Wary of overexposing the premise, Anheuser-Busch quietly ended the campaign in 1997.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Anheuser-Busch brought out Bud Light in 1982, the light beer market was dominated by Anheuser-Busch's closest competitor, the Miller Brewing Company, and its Miller Lite beer. Miller's advertising campaign, featuring famous retired athletes and other well-known personalities debating whether Miller Lite was a superior beer because it tasted great or because it was less filling, established the brand as a major feature of the beer landscape. Miller Lite's success demonstrated the impact a popular advertising campaign could have on sales volume in the highly competitive beer market and the growth potential for light beers in general. Anheuser-Busch wanted to tap into this growing market with Bud Light.

Anheuser-Busch's first ad campaign in support of its new offering focused on generating name recognition for the brand and altering the consumer's assumption that light beer meant Miller Lite. This television campaign presented various people walking into bars and saying ''Gimme a light.'' In response, they were offered items ranging from neon signs to dogs jumping through flaming hoops to blowtorches. ''No,'' the surprised consumers would respond, ''Bud Light.'' The humorous ads were quite successful, and Bud Light gradually began to erode Miller Lite's commanding share of the market.

Bud Light's advertising success continued with the 1987 launch of its Spuds McKenzie campaign. This series, featuring a bull terrier dubbed ''the original party animal,'' followed the exploits of this ladies' hound as he celebrated life and Bud Light in the company of skimpily dressed women. Boosted by the popularity of this campaign (which generated an entire subindustry of Spuds paraphernalia, including tee shirts and hats), Bud Light sales continued to climb. However, the Spuds ads also drew heavy criticism from parents and anti-alcohol groups concerned that the use of the endearing canine was intended to appeal to children under the legal drinking age. Anheuser-Busch adamantly denied any intent to target people under age 21, but the company also responded by recasting Spuds as a youthful executive striving to spread a message encouraging responsible drinking. This shift did not placate the critics, and the campaign was discontinued in 1989. Anheuser-Busch rejected the notion that the Spuds ads were eliminated because of outside pressure. But as a senior executive at DDB Needham, the agency that created the ads, told the Wall Street Journal, "You have to pay attention to what's being said. If you don't, the heat gets hotter."

Bud Light's strong growth continued through the early 1990s. By 1993, Bud Light had overtaken Miller Lite as the best-selling light beer in the United States. Moreover, the light beer market as a whole continued to expand. "Unlike the diet segment in soft drinks," Beverage Marketing Corporation chairman Michael Bellas said in Beverage World, "the light category is a significant [part of the entire beer market,]" rather than just a small subcategory of its own. By 1997 three of the five best-selling beers in America were light beers: Bud Light, Miller Lite, and Coors Light.

Bud Light could not afford to rest on its laurels, however. While light beer's share of the beer industry grew, total beer sales volume flattened throughout the early and mid-1990s. According to the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel, this stagnation could be attributed to "the changing tastes of baby boomers . . . and lack of enough 21 year olds to take their place." Bud Light was hit particularly hard in the mid-1990s, ceding its newly acquired primacy back to Miller Lite.

TARGET MARKET

Anheuser-Busch targeted its Bud Light advertising predominantly to the 21 to 30-year-old market. Twenty-somethings consumed more beer than people in any other age bracket. As the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel noted, "Beer consumption declines with age. The biggest drop occurs when a person reaches 34, [but] with a majority of the population over 30, the [beer] industry has reached a glass ceiling." Moreover, drinkers in their twenties were more liable to form their lifelong brand preferences during this decade of their lives. A spokesman for Miller Brewing Company concluded in Beverage World that "the most evolving dynamic is the 21- to 30-year group . . . . It would take a lot of pounding away to try to accomplish a [brand] switch [after that]."

Although not wanting to ignore older consumers, especially the increasingly health-conscious baby boomers who might be more drawn to a lower-calorie beer, the company recognized the significance of the youth market. "Marketing, and 21- to 30-year-old men's receptivity to it, is absolutely critical to a beer brand's success," Budweiser's vice president of brand management Bob Lachky told the Dallas Morning News. DDB Needham attempted to reach this market by crafting ads that were irreverent and entertaining. This approach was a necessary one to reach this audience. As Mark Johnson, director of brand management for Miller Lite told the Sacramento Bee, "This is a savvy audience. They started shopping earlier, they've had candy marketed to them, they've had Channel One in their classrooms. They've been there, they've done that, they've bought the t-shirt."

As Anheuser-Busch learned from its "Gimme a Light" campaign, humor was a very effective way of reaching its preferred audience. However, the sort of humor employed was quite significant. The company could not afford to alienate potential customers—particularly women, who were often ignored in traditional beer advertising. Jim Schumacker, a vice president of Bud Light marketing, recognized the challenge posed by creating Bud Light promotional spots in USA Today: "Bud Light advertising is more difficult to create than Budweiser's because Light's customers are more diverse . . . . That means ads must appeal to both sexes." Anheuser-Busch had received a great deal of criticism for the sexism implicit in the Spuds McKenzie campaign. After an outcry from women (who were drinking more beer with each passing year of the 1980s and 1990s) and even from trade such publications as Ad Age (which in 1993 condemned most beer ads for using women to "represent sexual imagery and nothing else"), Anheuser-Busch recognized a need for care in its selection of promotional messages. "Treating women as objects is not in tune with today's markets," Lachky told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel.

The "I Love You, Man" campaign sought to appeal to its target audience by tweaking on a familiar cultural trope. The opening scenes of emotional bonding were designed "to pull people in like a Hallmark card," David Merhar, the DDB Needham creative executive who devised the "I Love You, Man" concept, explained to the Wall Street Journal. Media-literate 20-somethings were quick to grasp the reference and adored the concluding twist where the smarmy appeal for Bud Light was resoundingly rebuffed. In fact, the spots were so popular among their chosen demographic that "I Love You, Man" became a cultural catchphrase, being recited on talk shows, comedy routines, and even casually among beer drinkers. "I have definitely said 'I love you, man' to my friends," reported one consumer interviewed by the Wall Street Journal.

COMPETITION

Bud Light's main competitors in the light beer market were Coors Light, made by the Adolph Coors Company, which was the third-largest brewer in the United States, and Miller Lite. Although Coors Light's sales were good (revenue generated by the brand surpassed the Coors Company's flagship brand Original

I LOVE YOU, DAD

The inspiration for the "I Love You, Man" campaign came from the real-life experience of David Merhar, the DDB Needham associate who conceived of the ads. After a dinner at home with his 61-year-old father, Merhar hugged his dad and uttered the now-famous words, "I love you, man." As Merhar explained to USA Today, "This is how guys say 'I love you,' with a little disclaimer."

Coors in 1987 and increased every year for the next decade), Bud Light had its sights set squarely on surpassing Miller Lite. In 1990 Bud Light controlled 19 percent of the light beer market, while Miller Lite retained a strong 33 percent. Three years later Bud Light surpassed Miller Lite as the best-selling light beer in America, as its light beer market share rose to 30 percent while Miller Lite's dropped to 22 percent. This lead was short lived, however, as Miller Lite rebounded to first place during a period in which sales volumes for both competitors decreased. But the "I Love You, Man" campaign elevated Bud light sales and restored the Anheuser-Busch brand to primacy, frustrating the Miller Brewing Company so much that it pulled its advertising account from the Leo Burnett agency in December 1996 and gave it to the Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligot firm.

Fallon McElligot recognized the necessity of appealing to the under-30 market and devised offbeat anti-ads attributed to the fictional account executive superstar "Dick." These "Ads by Dick" had an ironic sensibility designed to reach the younger target market. Early spots in the campaign were introduced by a 1970s-style year book picture displayed on the screen, while the voice-over declared: "This is Dick. Dick is a creative superstar and the man behind the advertising you are about to witness. We gave Dick a six-pack of Miller Lite and some money and asked him to come up with a commercial for Miller Lite." This inside-jokey style continued throughout the ads. One of the first of the more than 50 "Ads by Dick" Fallon McElligot produced showed a group of Lite-drinking cowboys slowly sauntering into the men's room of their rustic bar to the strains of "Adios Amigos." Another portrayed a rancher trading a truckload of Miller Lite to a turncoat steer in exchange for information about a planned stampede. In a third spot, a group of professional wrestlers were shown faking their moves in the ring. Later, they adjourned to a bar where they poured their cans of Miller Lite right past their mouths without making contact.

Miller Brewing Company hoped the new ad campaign would reinvigorate its flagging sales and increase the favorable impression of its brand among consumers. "We wanted to redefine the brand and do it quickly," Mike Johnson, Miller Lite's brand director told Adweek. "We wanted something that would shake up the system to say it's not the same old Miller Lite." To ensure its message reached the widest possible distribution, Miller tripled its advertising budget to support the "Ads by Dick" campaign, spending $38.7 million dollars during the first quarter of 1997 alone, nearly 70 percent of Miller Brewing Company's total beer advertising budget. The campaign proved successful, as Miller Lite's sales in supermarkets rose 13 percent and total sales rose 1.7 percent overall in 1997. "Awareness of the brand is high, recall is high, and sales are up," Johnson said. The popularity of the campaign forced Anheuser-Busch to increase its own advertising budget to retain its lead in the market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Anheuser-Busch employed its tried-and-true strategy of high-profile athletic event advertising for the "I Love You, Man" campaign. The commercials ran during major sporting events, such as the National Basketball Association's playoffs and telecasts and Major League Baseball's World Series. They appeared during regular-season broadcasts as well. The Charlton Heston "I Love You, Man" commercial debuted during the 1996 Super Bowl.

At least as important as placement, however, was the tone Anheuser-Busch sought to strike in the ads. By using humor and an absence of sexual messaging, the company was able to avoid alienating potential consumers who did not happen to be men between the ages of 21 and 30. But by making the commercials entertaining and ironic, Anheuser-Busch was still able to play directly to the sensibilities of its desired audience. As Beverage World noted, "[Generation] X-ers also appreciate marketing with a sense of humor. Bud Light's 'I love you, man' commercials offer an astute marketing approach to Generation X-ers."

Once Anheuser-Busch recognized the popularity of the "I Love You, Man" campaign, it strove to expand on it, pushing the campaign beyond traditional advertising formats. "The question became, 'How can I take an idea that's going to be on paid media and get some extra boost out of it?'" Bob Lachky, Anheuser-Busch's director of brand marketing explained to the Wall Street Journal. To accomplish this goal, the company arranged for profiles of Rob Fitzgerald, the actor who played Johnny, to appear in such publications as People and USA Today. Fitzgerald also made other public appearances on behalf of the brand and was twice invited onto Late Night with David Letterman.

OUTCOME

The "I Love You, Man" campaign was a tremendous success. Immediately prior to the campaign, Bud Light had been struggling. During its run, however, Bud Light became the fastest-growing beer in America, with its market share topping 10 percent of the total U.S. beer market. "Years from now, this will be the case study of how to turn around a dying brand," Modern Brewery Age editor Peter Reid told the Portland Oregonian. DDB Needham did not disguise its pleasure with the results. "Advertising has established the brand as hip, and that translates into sales," Bob Scarpelli, chief creative officer and vice chairman of the ad agency, told the Dallas Morning News.

The campaign's success was not just limited to the beer market. The "I Love You, Man" ads became a full-scale cultural phenomenon. As the Oregonian reported, "The line is the new mantra of the TV-watching crowd, like 'Where's the beef' before it. Signs proclaiming 'I love you, man' are all over the stands at sporting events." "I love 'I love you, man,'" concurred one 26-year-old interviewed by the Wall Street Journal. "It's a total manly moment." That response was exactly what Anheuser-Busch had hoped for when it launched the campaign.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Nipped in the Bud: How the Beer Industry Uses TV Ads to Mollify Critics, Buff Its Image." The Wall Street Journal, August 14, 1997.

Causy, James E. "Brewers Look Ahead to a Market Upswing: More Twenty-One Year Olds Expected in Near Future." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 23, 1996.

"I Love Your New Bud Light Ad, Man." Dallas Morning News, December 17, 1996.

Dutka, Elaine. "Heston Pokes Fun at Himself in Beer Ads." Life, April 5, 1996.

Hays, Constance, "New Beer Drinkers Baffle Industry." Sacramento Bee, April 26, 1998.

Horovitz, Bruce. "Bud Light Guy Ain't Loving His Job, Man." USA Today, January 26, 1998.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Of Beer and Brain Candy." Adweek, March 16, 1998.

Prince, Greg W. "Good Old Premium Beer: Is There Still Room at the Bar for Homer Simpson's Favorite?" Beverage World, April 15, 1997.

Stein, Jeannine. "Johnny Savors Success While Sobbing for Beer." Portland Oregonian, January 27, 1996.

Tieszen, Lori. "The X Market." Beverage World, December 15, 1996.

Wells, Melanie. "Beermaker's Flat Results." USA Today, July 27, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

LOUIE THE LIZARD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In June 1997 Anheuser-Busch Companies introduced a multimedia national advertising campaign to bolster its Budweiser brand beer. Although Anheuser-Busch dominated the American beer market with a 45.3 percent market share and a diverse product line that included the beers Budweiser, Bud Light, Busch, Michelob, and numerous other brands, Budweiser's sales had begun to slip in the late 1980s. The company turned to its advertising agencies to seek a solution to Budweiser's problems through a revamped marketing image. After launching, in 1995, the highly successful "Frogs" campaign, which attempted to capture the 21- to 29-year-old segment of the American population, Anheuser-Busch continued to pour advertising dollars into Budweiser. A substantial portion of the estimated $150 million spent annually on Budweiser between 1997 and 2001 went to a campaign called "Louie the Lizard," developed by the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners to target younger beer drinkers.

The campaign, which had TV, radio, print, outdoor, online, and promotional components, focused on an embittered animatronic lizard named Louie who railed against the Budweiser frogs in a Brooklyn accent. Louie was galled that Budweiser had chosen the frogs as brand representatives instead of him; the frogs were each capable of uttering only a single syllable, whereas Louie was articulate and intelligent, if somewhat unstable. Over the course of the campaign Louie became increasingly jealous of the frogs, hiring a ferret to kill them during one memorable series of commercials. In 2000 he focused his resentment on a wildly popular contemporaneous Bud advertising campaign. Soon thereafter, the swamp-creatures storyline faded from prominence, to be only briefly resurrected in 2001, 2004, and 2005.

The campaign was one of the most popular in recent advertising history, and it was credited with sustaining the freshness of Budweiser's image among its target audience of young beer drinkers. It won numerous ad-industry awards, including a 1998 Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival and an assortment of Clio Awards in 2000. Nevertheless, Budweiser sales continued to decline during the life of the campaign. Although some observers pointed to this fact as evidence of the fruitlessness of Bud advertising, the reality of changing American beer preferences was inarguably the leading cause of Budweiser's steady sales erosion.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the fiercely competitive American beer market, Anheuser-Busch had often used high-profile advertising campaigns to promote its flagship beer brand, Budweiser. Even with a history of brewing in the United States that dated back to 1852 and a solid reputation as the world's largest beer maker, Anheuser-Busch still felt the squeeze of flattening beer sales that plagued the entire beer sector in the 1990s. In 1995 American beer sales continued a decade-long trend of descent and dropped an additional 1.5 percent. Anheuser-Busch soon realized that, although Budweiser remained the beer of choice for older Americans, the brand's popularity with the highly desirable segment of younger beer drinkers, aged 21 to 29, had waned.

By 1994 Anheuser-Busch determined that Budweiser's image—carefully cultivated through visible ad campaigns—sorely needed to be energized and updated. That year Anheuser-Busch severed its long-term relationship with D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, the agency that had created the iconic 1979 "This Bud's for You" campaign that featured hardworking, Budweiser-drinking blue-collar laborers. Prior to this dismissal, however, D'Arcy had produced a single TV spot that would lay the groundwork for one of Budweiser's most popular advertising platforms of all time.

That initial commercial, featuring three swamp-dwelling frogs who stared at a neon Budweiser sign and who each croaked a syllable of the brand name in turn, immediately resonated with consumers. DDB Needham Chicago (the agency later dropped "Needham" from its name), one of the group of ad agencies Anheuser-Busch chose to work with after severing its relationship with D'Arcy Masius, followed this introductory commercial with more than a dozen spots featuring the amphibians croaking out the syllables of the Budweiser brand in humorous scenarios. Over the course of the next two years the campaign almost single-handedly vaulted the Budweiser brand out of its slump. Sales of the brew among younger beer drinkers boomed; industry publications, including Advertising Age, lauded the campaign's creativity and wit; and polls measuring consumer response revealed that the "Frogs" campaign was one of the most popular ever.

Anheuser-Busch was under constant pressure to end the beloved "Frogs" campaign, though. Children's advocacy groups claimed that the commercials were designed to "hook" kids on the Budweiser brand by using "critters." In 1996 a survey of San Francisco–area children revealed that 9- to 11-year-olds were more likely to recall the Budweiser frogs than they were Smokey Bear or Kellogg's Frosted Flakes' Tony the Tiger. The company was also aware of the risk of taking the "Frogs" concept beyond the point of freshness and innovation.

TARGET MARKET

The lizards' saga of jealousy and murderous rage, as presented in the "Louie the Lizard" spots, was designed to capture the same audience pursued by the "Frogs" campaign. Attracting men aged 21 to 29 had long been the aim for beer advertisers. Not only did these younger drinkers consume far more beer than their over-30 counterparts, but also, they cemented their beer brand loyalty during these years of their lives. In the 1990s, however, Anheuser-Busch was plagued both by younger consumers turning to trendier microbrews and by a falling number of 20-somethings in the population at large. The smaller pool of younger drinkers was more likely to consider Budweiser as their "father's brand" and less as the choice for a younger generation.

The "Frogs" campaign did much to reinvigorate the brand's image among more youthful drinkers. Advertising Age correlated a near tripling of this age group's awareness of Budweiser with the release of the "Frogs" commercials. The so-called Generation X, however, was more media-savvy than its predecessors and thus more likely to lose interest in a campaign. "They look to advertising and marketing as almost a spectator sport," a specialist in targeting Generation X consumers told the Sacramento Bee.

The lizards, especially Louie, with his solipsistic plot to overthrow the frogs and become a commercial star, provided Anheuser-Busch with the perfect opportunity to deliver a style of tongue-in-cheek humor that often performed well with the target audience. By purposefully poking fun at the "Frogs" campaign—which was beginning to wear thin with some viewers—the "Lizards" commercials delivered a sophisticated spoof on advertising itself. Beverage World agreed that it was the type of consciously cultivated "self-deprecating" humor that sold well with consumers in their 20s.

COMPETITION

Anheuser-Busch's largest rivals launched their own advertising campaigns to capture the same demographic group targeted by the "Lizards" commercials. Miller Brewing Co., always a strong competitor, teamed up with Portland-based ad agency Wieden+Kennedy to create the "It's Time to Drink Beer" campaign for Miller

INVENTING REPTILIAN PERSONALITIES

In addition to constructing an elaborate plotline in the "Lizards" campaign, Goodby and Anheuser-Busch made up profiles for their new stars, Louie and Frank. On Budweiser's Web page Goodby created "Bios and Headshots" for the reptiles. Using the same cute humor that defined the commercials, these profiles listed such fictional details as Louie's "Last Book Read" (The Work Habits of Seven Highly Effective Lizards) and "Hobbies" ("swatting flies, tracking grasshoppers, and bowling"). Moreover, in press releases Budweiser executives spoke of the lizards as though they were real. A marketing representative was quoted as saying, "We're delighted that Louie and Frank have decided to spend their summer with us in Texas."

Genuine Draft (MGD) in 1997. With Miller facing the same stagnating sales figures as Budweiser, its campaign was intended to reposition MGD as the hip brand of the 1990s. Following the popular resurgence of 1970s fashion, the black-and-white commercials featured frolicking youths wearing bell-bottom jeans and swigging MGD to funk music. But the Miller campaign employed the same irreverent humor that marked Louie's rants. "It's time for good old macrobrew" made in "vats the size of Rhode Island," one commercial proclaimed in block type. Miller's vice president of marketing explained to Beverage World that the target market of the MGD campaign did not "like typical advertising."

Like Budweiser's "Lizards," MGD's campaign also sought not to exclude women and minorities—two groups noticeably absent from earlier beer commercials. Instead of avoiding the issue with "critter" ads, MGD's "It's Time to Drink Beer" sought to build a more modern image through an inclusive cast of characters. Women appeared in the commercials but danced and drank with "the boys." Their function was not that of sex symbols. African-Americans with outrageously tall afro hairstyles (again reminiscent of the 1970s) were prominently featured in the campaign as well.

Adolph Coors Brewing Co., the third-largest American brewery, relaunched its Original Coors beer in 1996 with a $10 million advertising campaign. For years Coors had dedicated most of its efforts to marketing Coors Light. The Original Coors commercials were themed "the last real beer" and centered on the notion that Original Coors was an "honest," anti-elitist brew.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although Anheuser-Busch would not reveal the exact dollar amount it committed to the saga of Louie and Frank, the company typically spent between $300 and $350 million a year on advertising during the years that "Louie the Lizard" ran. The bulk of that figure was dedicated to Budweiser and Bud Light, and multiple campaigns for each brand tended to run simultaneously. This giant budget ensured that Anheuser-Busch was able to support Budweiser with a "total advertising effort," according to the company. In addition to a vast array of "Lizard" television commercials, the reptiles also appeared in national radio spots, on promotional clothing, in outdoor and print ads, and as the sponsors of athletes and sporting events.

Indeed, if there was one word to encapsulate Anheuser-Busch's strategy in reaching its target audience, it would be sports. The television commercials were usually aired during big-ticket athletic events watched by millions of American viewers. The campaign debuted during a National Basketball Association (NBA) game carried by NBC, made numerous Super Bowl appearances, and often ran during Major League Baseball games and the Monday Night Football series.

Radio spots were similarly broadcast during sporting events. Not only did Anheuser-Busch dole out considerable funds to ensure that Budweiser was named the "Official Beer of Major League Baseball" in 1998 but it also crafted specialized radio commercials for baseball fans. Budweiser also sought and achieved the distinction of being recognized as the "Official Beer of NASCAR," the stock-car racing circuit. In conjunction with this development, Louie the Lizard was painted on the Budweiser team's car in 1998. Michael LaBroad, director of Budweiser marketing, explained in a press release that the company was "always looking for ways to extend our advertising icons beyond television."

The "Louie the Lizard" spots starred Louie and Frank, two disaffected animatronic lizards who felt spurned because Anheuser-Busch had made stars of the earlier Bud campaign's croaking frogs instead of them. "I can't believe they went with the frogs," Louie complained to Frank in a distinct Brooklyn accent in the campaign's first commercial. "Our audition was flawless." Perhaps the best known of the commercials were those released during the 1998 Super Bowl in a sequence of four spots that related Louie's attempt to assassinate the frogs (and thus be able to take their place) by hiring a ferret hit man. The campaign continued with Louie trying out a Texas accent after he learned that one of the Bud frogs he had tried to eliminate was a Texan. "Frank, these Texans, they hold grudges," said Louie. "You know the phrase, 'Remember the Alamo?' Well now it's going to be 'Remember the frog.'" In July 1998 a commercial showed Louie being given a chance to join the croaking-frogs chorus. But he became flustered and botched the shoot, crying, "I can't work in this environment. Cut! Cut!"

As the campaign matured, the jealousy plotline escalated. Although the ferret successfully managed to electrocute the frogs with the neon sign on which they so obsessively focused, the frogs lived. The incomprehensibly gibbering ferret was well received by consumers and Anheuser-Busch executives and became a regular character in the campaign. In 2000 Louie's jealousy found a new target: the cast of another set of DDB-created Budweiser spots, the enormously popular "Whassup?!" campaign. That effort, centering on the comically ebullient "Whassup?!" greeting exchanged, with elaborate tongue-wagging, among friends, had for the moment eclipsed even the universally famous frogs and lizards. ("Whassup?!" parodies flooded the Internet, and the campaign won the Grand Prix at the 2000 International Advertising Festival in Cannes.) Louie claimed, with characteristic resentment, that the "Whassup?!" crew had stolen the protruding-tongue idea from him.

Always wary of overexposing even its most successful advertising concepts, Anheuser-Busch sent the swamp creatures into semiretirement midway through 2000, and the hiatus lasted roughly a year. In 2001 Louie and company reappeared in commercials that, surprisingly, were aimed at an over-40 audience. These spots included work that mimicked Budweiser product-quality advertising of the past as well as further ferret-related drama. The swamp-creatures storyline again faded from the airwaves, only to reappear briefly in 2004. Amid an increasingly acrimonious advertising spat between Anheuser-Busch and SABMiller (the parent company of Miller Brewing), which had been initially triggered by Miller's claims that its Miller Lite had fewer carbohydrates than Bud Light, Louie was tapped to foment the anti-Miller sentiment. Anheuser-Busch again allowed the lizards to be resurrected in 2005 at the request of JibJab, the animation team that had created a wildly popular online cartoon parodying the 2004 presidential-campaign efforts of George W. Bush and John Kerry. JibJab, given creative license to spread the Budweiser message online, showcased the lizards and frogs in a barbershop sing-along deriding drinkers of pretentious cocktails and wine.

OUTCOME

The exploits of the disgruntled reptiles quickly won popular approval. USA Today 's Ad Track survey of adult consumers revealed that the campaign was among the most popular in modern advertising history. Anecdotal evidence and analysts' observations indicated that the "Louie the Lizard" campaign connected with the desired audience. Janine Misdom, a Manhattan marketing- firm partner, explained to the Sacramento Bee why consumers under 30 responded to the Louie and Frank saga: "It's funny, it's a little bit nostalgic, and there's a little bit of the bad-boy thing." On June 22, 1998, USA Today reported that its most recent Ad Track indicated that the "Louie the Lizard" campaign appealed to consumers across lines of class and age. Marketing insiders heaped praise on Goodby's lizards. Advertising Age commended the campaign as the "Best of Show" from a pool of nationally aired commercials. The TV campaign won a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 1998. In 2000 the radio portion of the campaign was awarded a gold, two silvers, and two bronzes at the Clio Awards (one of the world's largest advertising-awards programs), while the TV campaign took home a bronze Clio Award.

Neither "Louie the Lizard" nor "Whassup?!" could arrest Budweiser's seemingly permanent sales slide, however. This led many advertising-industry observers to question the value of Budweiser's marquee image-building campaigns, but Anheuser-Busch felt that the declines were the inevitable result of changing American tastes in beer. Besides, Budweiser advertising was meant to have the ancillary effect of driving sales of other Anheuser-Busch brands, especially Bud Light, which in 2001 surpassed Budweiser to become the best-selling beer in the United States.

FURTHER READING

Arndorfer, James. "Actual People to Join Lizards in '98 Budweiser Creative." Advertising Age, March 16, 1998.

———. "Anheuser-Busch Sets $70 Million Hike in '98 Ad Spending." Advertising Age, December 1, 1997.

Cuneo, Alice Z., and Hillary Chura. "Bud's King Lizard Back." Advertising Age, July 23, 2001.

———. "Whassup? Bud Agencies Exchange Beer Barbs." Advertising Age, May 29, 2000.

Finnie, William. "Frogs a Breakthrough for Anheuser-Busch." St. Louis Business Journal, May 29, 1995.

Hays, Constance. "New Beer Drinkers Baffle Industry." Sacramento Bee, April 26, 1998.

Lippert, Barbara. "Lounge Lizards." Adweek, May 29, 2000.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "JibJab Takes a Stab at Budweiser." Adweek, July 25, 2005.

Prince, Greg W.. "Good Old Premium Beer: Is There Still Room at the Bar for Homer Simpson's Favorite?" Beverage World, April 15, 1997.

Tieszen, Lori. "The X Market." Beverage World, December 15, 1996.

Voight, Joan. "'Louie the Lizard' on the Stump." Adweek, February 21, 2000.

Rebecca Stanfel
Mark Lane

OH, AND BEWARE OF THE PENGUINS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Anheuser-Busch introduced two new beers to its Budweiser family in 1995. Bud Ice and Bud Ice Light were both "ice brewed" by pumping the beer through ice chambers during the brewing process. Both varieties of Bud Ice were packaged in distinctive long-necked bottles shaped to look and feel like a handful of ice cubes. To inaugurate its newest product, as well as to bolster Bud Ice in the competitive ice beer market, Anheuser-Busch selected the San Francisco-based ad agency Goodby, Silverstein, & Partners to develop an advertising campaign that would reflect the values of the fledgling brand and that would appeal to viewers through creative, memorable, and entertaining commercials. The resulting "Oh, and Beware of the Penguins" campaign, which featured slightly sinister penguins, was launched during the Super Bowl on January 28, 1996. Since that first spot garnered almost immediate positive responses from both consumers and critics, Anheuser-Busch continued with the campaign. Over the next two years, the "Penguins" campaign was expanded to include other television commercials, as well as ads on billboards and trucks. Additionally, marketing teams dressed as penguins turned up in bars handing out samples of the beverage.

The television "Penguins" spots all featured tuxedo-clad penguins that went to edgy extremes to steal people's Bud Ice. The spots, which parodied movie genres, included such commercials as "Penguin Express," in which a film-noir-type detective was frightened in his train car by a Bud Ice-seeking penguin who sang the refrain from the classic Frank Sinatra song "Strangers in the Night" in a nasal-toned "Dooby Dooby Doo." In another commercial, this time spoofing horror movies, a suburban couple was terrified by a penguin's crank calls from their upstairs bedroom. The bird, of course, wanted their ice beer. In 1997 Anheuser-Busch released an ad that portrayed the thieving penguin making off with the National Hockey League's Stanley Cup trophy. "Jungle" told the tale of jungle explorers who made the mistake of resting and drinking a Bud Ice. Spear-pointing natives captured the party, lashed them to stakes, and used the Bud Ice to summon their penguin god, which they did by chanting "Dooby Dooby Doo" and placing the beer on a shrine before a roaring fire. At the close of each ad, viewers were advised to "Drink Bud Ice . . . But Beware of the Penguins."

Anheuser-Busch chose the quirky and slightly-threatening penguin as its mascot for Bud Ice to target the company's professed target market—the "contemporary adult" aged 21 to 34 years old. Moreover, using a bird instead of a person to promote its beer allowed Budweiser to reach across race and gender lines to appeal to a wide audience of potential Bud Ice drinkers. The campaign and its high-visibility tie-ins, such as Bud Ice's partnership as the "official beer" of the National Hockey League, helped propel Bud Ice and Bud Ice Light to become the highest-selling ice brand in the United States.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Anheuser-Busch, the world's largest brewery with a history dating back to the 1860s, originally launched an ice draft brand in 1994. The beer, which was added to Anheuser-Busch's vast repertoire of beers—including Budweiser, Bud Light, Michelob, and the nonalcoholic O'Doul's—was first marketed under the more cumbersome name Ice Draft from Budweiser. This brand met with stiff competition from other brewers and did not fare as well as expected, partially because Budweiser's contribution to the ice genre contained 5 percent alcohol instead of the 5.5 percent alcohol of other ice draft brands. In addition, shortly after Ice Draft from Budweiser was released, Anheuser-Busch's competitors hurried their own versions to the shelves. Miller Brewing Company, Budweiser's chief competitor, introduced six ice beers. Although Ice Draft from Budweiser was the best-selling ice beer in 1994, its market share was eclipsed by Miller's total line of ice drafts. Anheuser-Busch expected to sell 3.5 million barrels but actually realized sales of only 2.5 million barrels in the highly competitive market.

Rather than abandon the concept, however, Anheuser-Busch chose to repackage and relaunch the brew as Bud Ice in 1995. Bud Ice Light was released the same year. The new formulation had the higher alcohol content of its rivals and was bottled to look as if the glass container were sculpted out of ice. But even more important to the brand's success was the estimated $35 million Anheuser-Busch dedicated to promoting Bud Ice.

TARGET MARKET

Bud Ice and Bud Ice Light were targeted at what Anheuser-Busch termed the "contemporary adult," who ranged in age from 21 to 34 years old. More specifically, though, the brand sought to appeal to a group "a little younger than the mainstream—to people from 21 to 27," according to Advertising Age. These young adults represented the pinnacle of the market for breweries. Not only were 20-somethings bigger beer consumers, they were also more liable to form their life-long brand preferences during this decade of their lives. A spokesman for one of Budweiser's competitors, Miller Brewing Company, told Beverage World that "the most evolving dynamic is the 21- to 30-year group . . . it would take a lot of pounding away to try to accomplish a [brand] switch [after that age]."

Budweiser knew from its experience with the wildly successful Budweiser frogs and wise-cracking lizards that humor worked well to attract this younger target audience. Bob Lachky, vice president of Budweiser brands, explained to Advertising Age that "the only way to appeal to [this demographic group] was with something off-beat and a little edgy." The cute but malicious singing penguins fit this bill neatly and indeed were like nothing else on television.

Budweiser was also aware that by focusing the campaign on penguin mascots it could obtain a competitive boost without offending or excluding any group, which was a risk run by ads featuring real people. Although young men by far consumed more beer than any other group, Anheuser-Busch had only recently abandoned its more sexist ads that featured scantily-clad women as barroom objects of desire for beer-guzzling men. After an outcry from women (who were drinking more beer with each passing year of the 1980s and 1990s), as well as from trade publications such as Advertising Age (which in 1993 condemned most beer ads for using women to "represent sexual imagery and nothing else"), Anheuser-Busch changed its strategies. "Treating women as objects is not in tune with today's markets," Lachky told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. Beer campaigns that relied on animal mascots rather than party scenes did not run the risk of excluding women from their appeal.

The penguins did provide Bud Ice and Bud Ice Light with an abundance of personality. Bud Ice brand manager, Michael La Broad, emphasized to USA Today that the "beauty of the [Penguins] campaign is that it's memorable." Analysts concurred that the "critter ads" had sufficient wit and entertainment value to reach both 20-something Generation Xers and aging baby boomers, an impressive sweep for a beer campaign. Moreover, by cleverly parodying standard film tropes, each commercial allowed the brand to capitalize on the popularity, image, and hip campiness of the various genres the campaign spoofed.

A LAWSUIT FOR THE BIRDS

In 1997 Bud Ice's use of the penguin resulted in a lawsuit filed by a Miami clothing maker, Supreme International, which alleged that Anheuser-Busch stole that company's signature bird trademark. "Now I know what it's like to be kicked in the stomach by a Clydesdale," said Supreme's chairman, George Feldenkreis, referring to the mammoth horses that had served for decades as Budweiser's signature image.

COMPETITION

Bud Ice and Bud Ice Light faced stiff competition from every major brewer (as well as many minor brewers) in the United States. When Anheuser-Busch launched its Ice Draft from Budweiser, it quickly encountered nearly 40 competitors. Foremost among these was Miller Brewing Company, which released six ice beers in 1994 and 1995. Ice Draft from Budweiser was originally released to compete with cold-filtered Miller Genuine Draft. As Bud Ice, it clashed with Miller's Icehouse, which was advertised in corporate identity spots produced by BBDO Worldwide, Toronto. Miller also sought to win over the coveted 20-something target market. One of the early Icehouse spots showed two bodysurfers in a mosh pit trying unsuccessfully to swim over the crowd to get to the bar. In response, a waitress—with a tray of perfectly balanced Ice House beer—was passed over the audience to reach them. The Milwaukee-based company spent more than $26 million promoting its Lite Ice beer in 1994 alone.

Beyond its specific ice draft competitors, Bud Ice initially had to struggle to keep the entire ice draft category afloat. This new beer category saw its sales fluctuate widely, and sometimes its very existence seemed tenuous. But by 1996 the market had begun to steady, and ice beers came to account for 5 percent of the 190 million barrel U.S. beer market. But the market faced encroachment from a new source. Trendy microbreweries and smaller national breweries like Samuel Adams vied for Bud Ice's young and brand-conscious target market. Moreover, other major breweries—Miller and Coors Brewing Company, among others—always remained poised to capture any unguarded share of Budweiser's leading position in the market.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Anheuser-Busch first confined its television advertising efforts for Bud Ice to sports-oriented programming. A USA Today poll revealed that as of July 15, 1996, Bud Ice's ''Penguin'' ads were resoundingly popular, yet had been seen by only 30 percent of the viewers quizzed for the survey. The reason for this discrepancy was that Anheuser-Busch ran the commercials only during televised sporting events that ''reached a young, affluent audience.'' ''Penguins'' spots did appear regularly on local and cable sports programming, including ESPN, the preeminent sports broadcasting station in the country. As the campaign caught on, however, Budweiser attempted to reach a wider audience. ''Penguins'' commercials ran on programs such as Saturday Night Live, the Late Show with David Letterman, and Mad TV, as well as on the VH-1 music video network.

As the television campaign gained momentum, Anheuser-Busch devoted more time and money to so-called on-premise activity, referring to promotions carried out at locations (most notably bars) at which alcohol is sold and consumed ''on the premise.'' In late 1996 marketing teams dressed in tuxedos turned up in bars giving out Bud Ice-icles, which were plastic icicles that customers could use to add a bright color and a fruity taste to their bottled Bud Ice. Flavors included ''Brain Freeze,'' ''Ice-otope,'' and ''Kiss My Face.''

Anheuser-Busch also sought to draw in more of its key market with promotional tie-ins with the National Hockey League (NHL) and other regional hockey associations, such as the East Coast Hockey League and the American Hockey League. Jim Schumacker, marketing chief for Bud Light and Bud Ice, revealed to Brandweek that Bud Ice's marketing strategy was two-pronged. ''We've got two thrusts,'' he said. ''Equity in the penguin has been very strong in the contemporary-adult market, as has equity in the National Hockey League.'' Since the NHL itself targeted the same contemporary young adult male demographic, the link was natural. In one television commercial that illustrated the dual strategies of the ''Penguins'' campaign, a Bud Ice penguin stole the Stanley Cup, the National Hockey League's championship trophy. In addition to these national efforts, Anheuser-Busch also strove to bring the ''Penguins'' campaign into key regional markets. For instance, Florida—home of two NHL teams—proved to be essential to Bud Ice because of the success Miller's Icehouse had achieved in that market. The ubiquitous penguin made personal appearances throughout the state (dressed for the sunny climate in sandals and sunglasses) and was christened ''Florida's Snowbird,'' a pun on the state's nickname for transplants from northern states. According to Brandweek, Bud Ice ''created the most tightly-woven plan for the brand, interlacing local market activity with a raft of hockey association, and, of course, that larcenous penguin.'' This combination of targeted television advertising and concentrated local and regional efforts proved quite successful as Bud Ice strengthened its grip on the top slot in the ice beer market.

The company also devoted a website to the birds, providing information about how the commercials were made, tie-ins to other Budweiser websites, and biographical data on the penguins. The graphics and prose style of the site were clearly targeted to the young adult audience.

OUTCOME

Although industry analyst Jerry Steinman acknowledged to USA Today that ''it's hard to link increased sales of Bud Ice to one specific factor,'' the ''Penguins'' campaign was remarkably well received by television viewers. This enthusiasm was borne out by USA Today 's Ad Track survey, which monitored the popularity and effectiveness of national advertising campaigns. The penguin spots proved to be among the 10 most popular ads measured, winning the approval of nearly a third of the polled consumers. In 1996 Bud Ice's sales rose 21 percent, compared to the 1.8 percent increase of ice draft sales in general.

The campaign did receive stiff criticism from a variety of groups who accused Anheuser-Busch of using a cute mascot to lure children to its brand (and thereby create a lifelong market for it). A former ad executive told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, ''When I worked on the McDonald's account [at another ad agency], the theory was to target kids 4- to 7-years-old. We thought if we could capture them at that age, we could keep them for life.'' Critics believed Anheuser-Busch's ''Penguins'' campaign was employing a similar strategy. Company officials, however, disputed the claim that the ads targeted kids, and Anheuser-Busch refused to pull the ''Penguins'' campaign. A spokeswoman for the company cited Anheuser-Busch's $160 million educational campaign against underage drinking as evidence of the brewer's opposition to youth drinking and its firm commitment to deterring it.

FURTHER READING

Causey, James. ''Mascots with Attitude Invade a Wild Kingdom of Marketing.'' Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, April 29, 1996.

Enrico, Dottie. ''Penguin Waddles to Popularity for Bud Ice.'' USA Today, July 15, 1996.

''Penguin on a Mission.'' Brandweek, May 19, 1997.

Prince, Greg. ''Time and Again: Miller Goes Straight to the Core and Likes the Results.'' Beverage World, February 15, 1997.

Pruzan, Todd. ''Bud Ice Gets Humming with Musical Penguins.'' Advertising Age, March 11, 1996.

Rebecca Stanfel

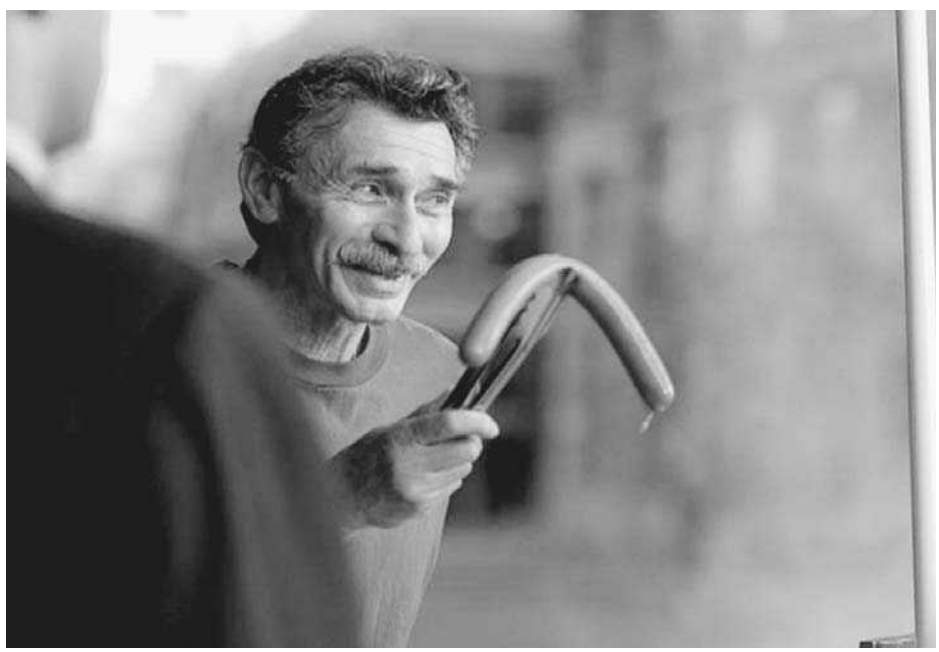
REAL AMERICAN HEROES/REAL MEN OF GENIUS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc., had the two best-selling beers in the United States in 2000 as well as more than double the market share of any competitor. The company's flagship brew, Budweiser, remained the country's most popular alcoholic beverage despite a decade-long decline in sales. Bud Light had meanwhile been making double-digit percentage gains in sales and was poised to overtake the ''King of Beers,'' thanks to the growing consumer preference for reduced-calorie beer. Anheuser-Busch maintained its market dominance in part by consistently setting the standard for beer advertising.

After assuming responsibility for advertising for the Bud family of brands in 1994, August A. Busch IV (son of August A. Busch III, the company's CEO) made it a priority to update Bud's image for a new generation of beer drinkers. Anheuser-Busch advertising, under Busch and marketing executive Bob Lachky, increasingly relied on irreverent, ironic humor to appeal to younger segments of its legal-drinking-age audience. Although radio had become an afterthought for many advertisers by the late 1990s, Anheuser-Busch continued to explore the medium's possibilities. In keeping with the tone of a mid-1990s radio campaign and Bud Light's consistently popular television campaigns, Anheuser-Busch unveiled a tongue-in-cheek series of radio spots called ''Real American Heroes,'' which parodied beer advertisements of previous decades. Anheuser-Busch spent a reported $4 million on the radio campaign in 2002.

The ''Real American Heroes'' campaign made a bigger splash than many believed possible for a radio effort. Renamed ''Real Men of Genius'' after September 11, 2001, the campaign ran successfully for years, earning dozens of awards from the advertising industry while building a dedicated base of fans. ''Real Men of Genius'' made the rare leap from radio to television in 2003. Though the television commercials were likewise well regarded, the campaign returned exclusively to radio the following year.



Mr. Footlong Hotdog Inventor, A Real American Hero. DDB/NEEDHAM, CHICAGO. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Mr. Really Bad Toupe Wearer, a Real American Hero. DDB/NEEDHAM, CHICAGO. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In the 1970s and 1980s top American brewers marketed their beers by appealing to consumers' affection for the blue-collar American workingman. Classic slogans such as "Miller Time" and "This Bud's for You" suggested that hardworking men deserved a quality beer at the end of the day and that, moreover, the "regular guy" was a hero deserving of recognition. Anthemic music and patriotic undercurrents were used to enhance the sincere, heroic tone of these commercials, and the formula proved successful until the early 1990s.

During the late 1980s and early 1990s, however, Anheuser-Busch had an aging base of consumers, and younger drinkers were perceived as unresponsive to commercials that saluted such straightforward values as patriotism and hard work. Anheuser-Busch sought to update its products for a new generation. The sincere statement "This Bud's for You" gave way, in the mid-1990s, to less traditional ideas, such as the Budweiser frogs and lizards, as well as Bud Light creative, including "Ladies Night," "Yes I Am!" and "I Love You, Man." These campaigns helped "make the 25-year-old believe that Budweiser spoke their language," according to Anheuser-Busch's Lachky.

Also in the mid-1990s Anheuser-Busch supported the Bud Light brand with a popular series of over-the-top radio commercials narrated by Charlton Heston. The Heston spots, according to Lachky, "carved out an area attached to the brand that was very fun, very young, very cut through." As the Heston campaign wound down, Anheuser-Busch commissioned Bud Light lead agency DDB Worldwide Chicago to come up with a replacement radio campaign.

TARGET MARKET

The focus of Anheuser-Busch's marketing efforts during this time was 21- to 27-year-old drinkers, a segment of the population that consumed more beer per capita than other age groups and had not yet formed strict brand allegiances. Like preceding Anheuser-Busch campaigns of the 1990s, "Real American Heroes" used ironic humor to reach its core audience. Beyond simply appealing to this audience's tastes, however, the radio spots capitalized on the younger market's wariness of traditional advertising techniques by mocking the sincere "work-reward" campaigns of the 1970s and 1980s. Using dramatic rock music and authoritative voice-overs that explicitly recalled those earlier campaigns, "Real American Heroes" sarcastically extolled the virtues of "heroes" like Mr. Bowling Shoe Giver Outer, Mr. Garden Gnome Maker, and Mr. Jelly Donut Filler.

The campaign eventually made its way onto television (after having been renamed "Real Men of Genius"), but many of the spots were particularly suited to a radio audience because they created, as Lachky told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, a "theater of the mind" that activated the consumer's imagination. Though the spots mocked supposed everyday heroes, they were similar to the classic work-reward campaigns in that they were meant to reflect listeners' ordinary observations and personal experience. "Everybody has got their quirks," Lachky said, "and everybody has probably been a 'Real Man of Genius.'"

Supplementing Bud Light's brand strategy via radio campaigns became increasingly sensible, in Anheuser-Busch's view, because of the rise of cable television and the resulting fragmentation of the network viewing audience. Additionally Anheuser-Busch was able to place many of its radio spots locally as well as nationally.

MIDLER WAS NO SURVIVOR

DDB Worldwide Chicago originally envisioned using a Bette Midler song like "The Wind Beneath My Wings" for the sound track to the "Real American Heroes" commercials. But the rights to Midler's songs proved prohibitively expensive, and the Midler music did not work well in test runs. DDB's creative team began, instead, to lean toward a 1980s anthem-rock sound along the lines of Survivor's "Eye of the Tiger." The agency hired Chicago's Scandal Music to do an original parody of that sound, and it happened that Scandal's owner, Sandy Torano, was a friend of Survivor's lead singer, David Bickler. Far from being offended at the suggestion that he mock someone like himself, Bickler embraced the role. Indeed Bickler had long enjoyed a career not just as a rock star but as an ad pitchman, with singing credits that included a Kentucky Fried Chicken "Finger Lickin' Good" spot, a Frosted Flakes commercial, and work for Sprite's "Uncola" campaign. In TV versions of the "Real Men of Genius" spots, Bickler was shown wearing an unflattering wig and pumping his fists triumphantly while singing. "That's part of my role, to provide that exclamation point," he told USA Today. "I get into the spirit. I want it to be as good as it could be."

This benefited wholesalers, who needed to be able to respond to varying local conditions. Further, television viewing traditionally dropped off significantly during the summer months, the time of year when consumers drank the most beer. Radio allowed Anheuser-Busch to reach otherwise unreachable segments of its audience, including those who were traveling or engaging in leisure activities away from their televisions.

COMPETITION

Though Miller Brewing Company remained Anheuser-Busch's nearest rival, its market share had been decreasing for years, and its leading product, Miller Lite, was likewise losing market share when Bud Light's "Real American Heroes" campaign broke. Miller's advertising campaigns had been partially blamed for these declines. Miller Lite's "Dick" campaign, which ran on television in 1997 and 1998 and consisted of a series of absurdist vignettes supposedly dreamed up by a fictional advertising copywriter named Dick, attracted attention for its unpredictability and humor but did little to promote the beer itself. After abandoning "Dick," Miller Lite struggled to find new, compelling themes in its advertisements. In 2002, after being purchased by South Africa Breweries, Miller began using taste-test commercials claiming that Miller Lite outperformed Bud Light, and in 2004 Miller Lite began to make up ground against Bud Light and Coors Light by positioning itself, amid the low-carbohydrate diet craze, as a lower-carb alternative to its rivals.

The Adolph Coors Company, a distant third in the American beer wars, increased its market share in the late 1990s, and its leading product, Coors Light, had by 2001 surpassed Miller Lite to become the country's third most popular beer (and second most popular light beer). Coors Light's multiyear "Beer Man" television campaign, focusing on ballpark vendors, was seen by many wholesalers as a refreshing real-life contrast to campaigns like the Budweiser lizards and Miller Lite's "Dick."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Extending the tone of the Heston radio campaign and directly parodying Anheuser-Busch's own "This Bud's for You" concept, DDB's creative team singled out "regular guys" in overlooked jobs or with comical foibles, "people who just need to be called out to take a bow for whatever reason," as agency creative director John Immesoete said, and began scripting music-based mock tributes to them. For the commercials' sound track, DDB commissioned Chicago-based Scandal Music to compose a comically overblown 1980s song similar to the Survivor hit "Eye of the Tiger," and David Bickler, who had himself been Survivor's lead singer, was hired to do a bombastic parody of his own vocal work. After a lengthy search DDB hired announcer Pete Stacker, whose experience included traditional beer advertising, to do voice-over for the spots. The lyrics, sung in dramatic fashion by Bickler, worked in counterpoint to Stacker's deadpan baritone voice-over, and a portrait of each "hero" emerged against the background of soaring music. Anheuser-Busch was uncertain, in the beginning, about the extreme sarcasm of the commercials. "But we ran them past the consumer," Lachky told Adweek, "and they were a home run."

The initial series of 12 "Real American Heroes" spots attracted fans almost immediately. Radio personality Howard Stern lauded them on the air, and websites devoted to the jingles' lyrics began appearing. Tape recordings of the spots showed up for sale at the online auction site eBay, and "Real American Heroes," along with Budweiser's famous "Whassup?!" television commercials (also created by DDB Worldwide Chicago), began to dominate the awards circuit. The radio commercials were likewise popular with Anheuser-Busch executives and distributors, and DDB was told to "keep 'em coming," according to Immesoete. Another 17 spots followed the original 12. With the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, however, the premise of mocking American heroes suddenly seemed questionable, and the spots were pulled from circulation. The campaign reemerged in early 2002 as "Real Men of Genius."

The continuing success of "Real Men of Genius" led Anheuser-Busch to commission the campaign's adaptation for a 2003–04 television run. The move was seen as risky, even though similar Anheuser-Busch spots had already aired on British TV. The spots' success in the United States had depended, until then, on allowing the consumer to visualize the characters being parodied via song and voice-over. As DDB's Bob Winter told Adweek, "It was hard to think of how to do it visually on TV." The initial spots adapted included "Mr. Way Too Much Cologne Wearer," "Mr. Foot Long Hot Dog Inventor," and "Mr. Really Bad Toupee Wearer" and appeared on programs such as Saturday Night Live and Monday Night Football. A "Real Men of Genius" commercial likewise made it onto Anheuser-Busch's famously competitive Super Bowl roster, and the television campaign was, like its radio counterpart, a favorite on the awards circuit. Anheuser-Busch decided early on, however, to limit the number of TV adaptations. "Sometimes the best ideas are [best] left alone in the medium where they flourish," Lachky told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The spots continued on radio. In 2004 the number of spots produced since the campaign's inception surpassed 100, and in Anheuser-Busch's view the potential to extend the idea was still endless.

OUTCOME

In addition to exceeding 100 spots, the "Real American Heroes/Real Men of Genius" campaign earned more than 100 advertising awards. The radio campaign won the top Radio-Mercury Award two years in a row, the 2003 Grand Clio, and numerous other Clio, ADDY, Kinsale, One Show, and ANDY awards. The television campaign won a Gold Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. Numerous websites devoted to lyrics and MP3 recordings of the commercials could be found on the Internet throughout the campaign's run. In 2003 and 2004 Anheuser-Busch released two volumes of official compact disc recordings of selected spots along with bonus tracks of unreleased spots. The campaign was credited with raising the profile of radio advertising as a whole.

In 2001 Bud Light, overtaking Budweiser in sales for the first time, became the number one beer in America. Continuing to dominate the domestic beer market, Anheuser-Busch had approached a market share of 50 percent by 2001 and held steady at that unprecedented level in following years. "We knew we had a winner with the 'Real Men of Genius' campaign early on," Lachky told PR Newswire, "but the popularity and longevity of the series has exceeded our expectations and provided a fantastic promotional opportunity for Bud Light."

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "'Genius' Gets Promotion." Adweek, December 1, 2003.

"Bud Light Roars at Cannes Lion Ad Festival as 'Real Men of Genius' Wins 'Gold Lion' for Creative Campaign." PR Newswire, June 28, 2004.

Cancelada, Gregory. "Bud Light Presents Radio Men of Genius." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 28, 2004.

Holt, Douglas B. "Interview with Steven Jackson." Advertising and Society Review 4, no. 2 (2003).

Howard, Theresa. "Anheuser-Busch's Silly 'Mr.' Ads Hit a High Note with Viewers." USA Today, January 12, 2004.

Jensen, Trevor. "DDB Produces 17 More 'Heroes.'" Adweek, July 24, 2000.

Khermouch, Gerry, and Trevor Jensen. "Least Likely to Succeed." Brandweek, November 9, 1998.

Lee, Thomas. "Long-Running Anheuser-Busch Radio Ad to Make It to Small Screen." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 12, 2003.

MacArthur, Kate. "A Sharp Wit and Modesty Mark Immesoete at DDB." Advertising Age, July 9, 2001.

McBride, Sarah. "Radio to Make Big Noise in Upfront: Advance Sales of Airtime, National Campaigns Seen as Way to Battle with TV." Wall Street Journal, May 18, 2004.

McCarthy, Michael. "Top Brewer Also Reigns as King of Marketing: Young, Hip Ads Help Anheuser-Busch Reach Consumers." USA Today, September 8, 2000.

"Survivor Singer Belts It Out for Bud Light." USA Today, January 12, 2004.

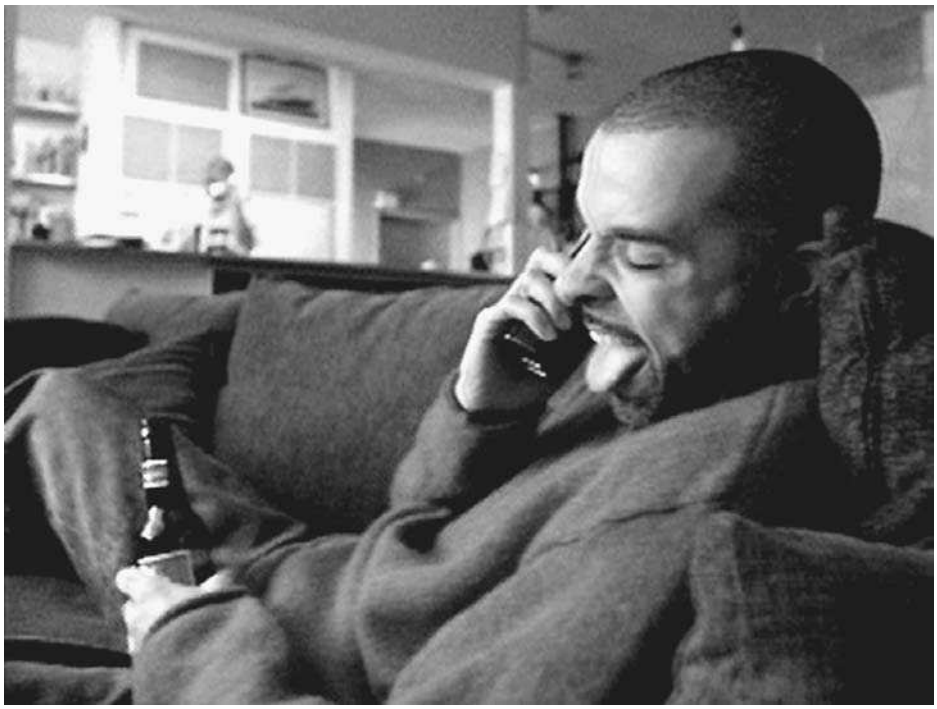
Wolf, Barnet D. "Anheuser-Busch Taps 'Genius.'" Columbus (OH) Dispatch, May 19, 2004.

Mark Lane

WHASSUP?! CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In December 1999 Anheuser-Busch Companies, Inc., had the two best-selling beers in the United States and more than double the market share of any competitor. Despite a decade-long decline in sales, Budweiser, the company's flagship brew, remained the country's most popular alcoholic beverage, although, thanks largely to the growing consumer preference for reduced-calorie beer, Bud Light was poised to overtake the "King of



A still from Anheuser Busch's "Wassup?!" campaign. DDB/NEEDHAM, CHICAGO. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Beers.'' Anheuser-Busch already had the industry's biggest and most successful advertising presence, but the Budweiser television campaign called ''Whassup?!'' resonated with a new, more youthful audience and became not just an industry award winner but also a pop-culture phenomenon.

The idea behind the ''Whassup?!'' commercials, developed for Anheuser-Busch by DDB Worldwide Chicago, was simple. In the initial spot, called ''Whassup True,'' four male friends, speaking over the phone, greeted one another with the slang phrase ''Whassup?!'' The answer—''Watching the game. Having a Bud''—elicited the response ''True, true,'' before the conversation escalated into a chorus of ''Whassups?!'' delivered with mouths open, tongues protruding, and an air of intense glee. ''It didn't feel like advertising,'' said DDB's Don Pogany. ''It seemed different than anything else. And it seemed to be totally what Bud is about: camaraderie and friendship and what guys do.'' A second spot aired during the 2000 Super Bowl, and several more featuring the ''Whassup?!'' guys aired later in the winter. Each of the spots ended with the Budweiser logo against a black background and the tagline ''True.''

Within a few months of the campaign's introduction, unauthorized Internet parodies began to appear that featured people in the news, cartoon superheroes, and many others greeting one another with innumerable variations on ''Whassup?!'' Disc jockeys and late-night talk-show hosts began saying ''Whassup?!'' and soon it became a common greeting and a pop-culture phrase around the world, even in countries where Budweiser was not sold. The initial campaign won nearly every major industry award, and later installments continued to win awards. ''Whassup?!'' ran through 2001 and was then developed into a more expansive campaign called ''True,'' in which the tagline from the original commercials was interpreted in new ways meant to show beer drinkers that Budweiser understood them and their lives.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1992 August A. Busch IV, whose father, August A. Busch III, was the CEO of Anheuser-Busch, took charge of marketing for the Budweiser family of brands. At the time imports and microbrews posed threats to the Anheuser-Busch juggernaut, and as Michael McCarthy of USA Today put it, ''Bud was becoming your dad's beer.'' Though Anheuser-Busch and Budweiser had a long history of marketing prowess, as evidenced by the iconic status of their trademark Clydesdale horses and by enduring slogans like the ''King of Beers'' and ''This Bud's for You,'' Busch set out to update the Bud image for a new generation of beer drinkers.

Busch and Anheuser-Busch executive Bob Lachky oversaw a period of breakthroughs in creative work on behalf of the Budweiser brands. Between 1993 and 1995 campaigns such as ''Ladies Night,'' ''Yes I Am!'' and ''I Love You Man,'' all on behalf of Bud Light, helped, in Lachky's words, ''make the 25-year-old believe that Budweiser spoke their language.'' Anheuser-Busch began using a combination of different advertising agencies while relying primarily on DDB and on Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, the San Francisco agency responsible for the successful ''Louie the Lizard'' campaign. According to Lachky, the use of multiple agencies encouraged ''a healthy competition and better creative work.''

By 1999 Anheuser-Busch had an estimated market share of 47.5 percent, up from 43 percent at the beginning of the decade. Budweiser, however, continued to lose ground yearly. Although this was seen as a reflection of consumer preference rather than a deficiency in the product or in marketing, Anheuser-Busch continued to allocate large amounts of advertising money and energy to Budweiser. This was intended to arrest the slide in Budweiser's market share, but also, as Hillary Chura noted in Advertising Age, ''Advertising dedicated to Budweiser often boosts sales of other brands like Bud Light, Bud Ice, and the rest of the brand family.''

TARGET MARKET

Anheuser-Busch expected the ''Whassup?!'' ads to resonate across demographic lines within the 21- to 27-year-old segment of the population, an essential part of Budweiser's larger target market of all legal-age drinkers. Not only did this segment of young adults account for a disproportionate percentage of beer sales relative to other adults, its brand loyalties had presumably not yet been formed. The spots featured a mostly African-American cast, and the campaign's central verbal exchange was based on slang terms used in minority communities, although the universal principles of friendship that were displayed had the power, Anheuser-Busch believed, to attract young viewers across racial, ethnic, and gender divides. Barbara Lippert argued in Adweek that the ads were about ''feeling so connected to your best buds you can watch TV together through the phone. And that while you are supposedly 'chillin,' you are all maniacally dialing each other.''

Anheuser-Busch, however, wanted to avoid alienating older customers who did not understand the significance of the characters' boisterous attitudes and protruding tongues. When a group of wholesalers expressed their disapproval of the emerging campaign, Lachky and Busch decided not to continue to air the original version but to showcase ''Whassup?!'' spots that relied on individual narratives and thereby helped viewers make sense of the characters. They also decided to trim the 60-second spots to 30 seconds in order to reduce the amount of time occupied by the ''Whassup?!'' ritual itself. Soon Internet parodies began, and the campaign attracted mainstream media attention. Once ''Whassup?!'' became part of the pop-culture vocabulary, the campaign had an air of widespread public validation that overcame all demographic divisions. As Advertising Age put it, ''Any advertising that bridges generation gaps so that even our mothers are leaving 'Whassup?!' messages on our answering machines must be a good one.''

THE QUESTION OF ORIGIN

After ''Whassup?!'' had won both the Grand Clio and the Cannes Grand Prix in 2000, there were complaints within the advertising industry. Some felt that it was inappropriate to give the industry's highest honors to a campaign that had not originally come from an advertising agency at all. The idea, of course, was Charles Stone III's, and the initial spot was similar to his independent film True. But Stone was not himself the sole author of the idea. ''Whassup?!'' was a greeting that he and his friends had been using with one another since 1984.

COMPETITION

Although Miller Brewing Company remained Anheuser-Busch's nearest rival, Miller's market share, which had been decreasing for years, dropped from 21.7 to 19.6 percent between 1999 and 2001. Advertising campaigns for the company's two top brews, Miller Lite and Miller Genuine Draft, had been blamed for failing to move the products. Miller Lite's ''Dick'' campaign, which ran in 1997 and 1998 and consisted of a series of absurdist vignettes dreamed up by a fictional advertising copywriter named Dick, attracted attention for its unpredictability and humor, but it did little to promote the beer itself. Miller Genuine Draft's ''Never Miss a Genuine Opportunity'' campaign, which relied on openly sexual themes and narratives, was derided by many for being too graphic and, like the ''Dick'' campaign, for failing to establish any connection between the story line and the product. After abandoning these campaigns, Miller struggled to find new, compelling themes in its advertising.

TALK VALUE

DDB Worldwide Chicago claimed to have pioneered the concept of "talk value," that elusive quality that makes advertising campaigns and phrases cultural touchstones, but the "Whassup?!" campaign far exceeded the agency's and Anheuser-Busch's expectations. The phrase appeared as a headline on the cover of Forbes, and the commercials were parodied on Saturday Night Live in addition to being mentioned countless times in the media while being spread around the world via more than 80 homemade Internet parodies. At the 2000 Grammy Awards performers Christina Aguilera and LeVar Burton imitated the "Whassup?!" commercials on the red carpet, and during that year's NBA season the Sacramento Kings gave a collective cry of "Whassup?!" after each team huddle.

The Adolph Coors Company, a distant third in the American beer wars, had increased its market share to 11.1 percent by 2001, and its leading product, Coors Light, had surpassed Miller Lite to become the country's third most popular beer. "Beer Man," a Coors Light advertising campaign that focused on ballpark vendors, was seen by many wholesalers as a refreshing, real-life contrast to campaigns like the Budweiser lizards and Miller Lite's "Dick." An effort to turn back slumping sales of the company's Original Coors beer by touting its alcohol content and rich taste met with mixed results in the declining market for full-calorie domestic beers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Whassup?!" had its genesis outside the advertising world in a short film called True, created by music-video director Charles Stone III as a means of trying to break into feature films. A DDB creative director discovered True and immediately recommended it to his supervisor as suitable for a Budweiser advertisement. The film, which became "Whassup True" after minor adjustments in content, featured Stone and three of his friends. Stone himself was tapped to direct and to act in the series of commercials DDB began scripting, and though roughly 80 other actors were auditioned for the parts of Stone's friends, with one exception DDB hired the real-life friends to play themselves. Stone worried that the slang response "True" might need to be scrapped in favor of a more mainstream line like "Right on," but Anheuser-Busch's Lachky recognized the trend setting potential of the original.

"Whassup True" originally aired with little fanfare on sports programming in December 1999. The 60-second commercial was a hit with the 21- to 27-year-old demographic, but for the 2000 Super Bowl Anheuser-Busch chose the shorter and less risky "Girlfriend," in which one of the "Whassup?!" friends answered the phone in characteristic fashion while trying not to let on that the "game" he was watching with his girlfriend was actually a figure-skating competition. Other spots in the original campaign included one in which a pizza deliverer was mistaken for a friend and subjected, over an apartment-building intercom, to the "Whassup?!" routine. The spots eventually ran during sports programming, as well as prime-time and late-night shows.

After Internet parodies and media attention became widespread, "Whassup?!" was at risk of becoming overexposed, and Anheuser-Busch and DDB worked to keep the campaign fresh by running their own spoofs. In "Come Home" an alien, returning to his home planet after infiltrating Earth in the guise of a dog, was asked by his ruler what he had learned from his time among humans. After a short pause the alien declared, mouth wide and tongue lolling, "Whassup?!" In addition, DDB created a unique hybrid commercial called "Language Tape," in which a professor-like character directed viewers to Budweiser.com, where they could learn how to say "Whassup?!" in 36 different languages. Website traffic increased to 1.265 million visitors per month, compared to the previous year's average of 400,000.

Anheuser-Busch and DDB went on to run commercials featuring New Jersey men bearing a strong resemblance to characters on the hit television show The Sopranos, who said, "Howyoudoin," instead of "Whassup?!" After this final twist on the original idea, Budweiser's advertising agencies, along with its in-house marketing team, began producing various television spots that more broadly interpreted the tagline "True." These spots included story lines offering honest and affectionate reflections on gender differences and male behavior, commercials with a focus on product quality, and several series of vignettes, such as the well-known "Leon" commercials, which revolved around the comical exploits of an extremely self-centered professional football player.

OUTCOME

"Whassup?!" was one of the most acclaimed and popular campaigns in advertising history. It won nearly every major award in the industry, including the prestigious Grand Clio and the Grand Prix at the International

Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. During the second year of the "Whassup?!" campaign, Busch was named Advertiser of the Year at the Cannes festival. The campaign's signature phrase earned comparisons to classic advertising phrases like Wendy's "Where's the Beef?" and Nike's "Just Do It." Busch said of the "Whassup?!" campaign, "In our lifetimes, we'll never see so much value created from a single idea. It makes Budweiser a brand for every culture, every demographic and every community. It makes Budweiser a younger, hipper, more contemporary brand."

The decline in Budweiser sales could not be stopped, however. Meanwhile, sales of Bud Light continued to grow at double-digit rates, and in 2001 it surpassed Budweiser to become the best-selling beer in the United States. Anheuser-Busch continued to dominate the domestic beer market. In 2000 the company increased shipments and sales by 2.8 percent, and in 2001 it likewise outperformed the industry, approaching a market share of nearly 50 percent. Budweiser's umbrella "True" campaign, so memorably launched by the "Whassup?!" commercials, continued.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Can Your Beer Do This?" Brandweek, October 15, 2001.

Burford, Ru-El. "In Defense of 'Whassup?!': Bud Campaign Struck Chord with Minority Communities." Advertising Age, September 25, 2000.

Chura, Hillary. "Budweiser Loses Share While Its Siblings Grow." Advertising Age, November 22, 1999.

———. "Miller, Shops Prep for Ultimate Test." Advertising Age, April 16, 2001.

"Cybercritique: DDB Ad Pours a Pleasing Dose of 'Whassup?!' " Advertising Age, November 13, 2000.

Heller, Karen. "Budweiser's Whassup Ads Light Up Director's Career." Philadelphia Inquirer, March 17, 2000.

Khermouch, Gerry. "The Quiet Beer Man." Brandweek, October 12, 1998.

Khermouch, Gerry, and Trevor Jenson. "Least Likely to Succeed." Brandweek, November 9, 1998.

Lauro, Patricia Winters. "Whassup? America's Asking." New York Times, February 16, 2001.

Lippert, Barbara. "'True' Love." Adweek (midwest ed.), July 3, 2000.

McCarthy, Michael. "Top Brewer Also Reigns as King of Marketing: Young, Hip Ads Help Anheuser-Busch Reach Consumers." USA Today, September 8, 2000.

———. " 'Whassup?!' Four Buddies Find Fame as Their Personal Greeting Enters the Pop Culture Lexicon in an Ad Campaign." USA Today, March 14, 2000.

Panczyk, Tania D. "Bud Extends 'True' Campaign." Adweek (midwest ed.), March 25, 2002.

Prince, Greg W. "Long Live the King." Beverage Aisle, May 15, 2002.

Mark Lane

Apple Computer, Inc.

1 Infinite Loop
Cupertino, California 95014
USA
Telephone: (408) 996-1010
Web site: www.apple.com

■■■

IMAC CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s technology analysts speculated that Apple Computer, Inc.'s fate hinged on its new personal computer the iMac. Apple's share of the worldwide desktop-computer market had plummeted since 1995, the last year the company had been profitable. Ever greater numbers of consumers were buying personal computers (PCs) that ran on Microsoft's Windows operating system rather than Apple's version. Although Apple had pioneered user-friendly computers, the company had not introduced a consumer-targeted computer since 1992. Hoping that its stylish new iMac would propel Apple back into this vast segment of the market, Apple released its ''iMac'' campaign.

The $100 million campaign, created by the ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day, debuted on August 16, 1998. Its advertisements featured brightly hued computers against a plain white background, thereby further emphasizing the iMac's one-of-a-kind colorful shell, and contained snappy copy that underscored either the iMac's aesthetics or its user-friendliness. The campaign, which consisted of network and national cable television commercials (as well as spot television marketing in Apple's top 10 markets), magazine, billboard, and bus ads, and radio spots, was the largest marketing effort in Apple's history. But despite the high stakes involved for the company, the ''iMac'' campaign delivered its message in a ''fun and factual'' way, an Apple spokesperson stated in the August 14, 1998, San Francisco Chronicle. The ads highlighted the iMac's easy Internet access, its simplicity (especially when compared to rival PCs), and its speed. Central to each ad was the iMac's unique design. ''Chic, not geek,'' proclaimed one, while another simply said, ''iCandy.''

The iMac's debut was triumphant, and 1998 proved to be Apple's first profitable year since 1995. Many industry analysts credited the iMac as the primary force behind this turnaround. ''A year and a half ago, Apple had no future; now it does,'' proclaimed Fortune. Consumer surveys revealed that a substantial percentage of iMac purchasers were first-time Apple buyers, which indicated that the ''iMac'' campaign had succeeded in its goal of winning over new computer buyers and PC converts.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1977, Apple had fallen on hard times by the mid-1990s. The company had made history in 1984 when it introduced the Macintosh, a machine that revolutionized the computer world with its graphical screen displays, pull-down menus, and other user-friendly features. While International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) licensed its operating system and other technologies, thereby launching an armada of inexpensive PC clones, Apple instead honed its image as the purveyor of "machine[s] for free-thinking, discriminating nonconformists and rebels," according to Macworld. Apple consistently touted the fact that its computers, unlike those of its rivals, were simple to use. The introduction of Microsoft's Windows operating system in the early 1990s undermined the force of these claims, however, as Windows provided similar graphical features and screen windows. A proliferation of similar products confused customers at the same time that Apple's image-making efforts devolved into chaos. By 1996, 25 separate Apple campaigns were running simultaneously. As the company's market share plummeted precipitously—from a high of around 14 percent in 1993 to a paltry 3 percent in 1997—software writers threatened to stop creating programs for the Apple operating system, claiming there was no profit to be made. Consumers began to doubt that Apple would survive and were reluctant to spend thousands of dollars on a machine that might quickly become a dinosaur. "This company was in a death spiral," an Apple executive told Newsweek.

© LWA- JDC/CORBIS.

Steve Jobs, one of Apple's founders, returned to the company as interim CEO in 1997 and quickly strove to right the troubled company. After trimming the product line to two broad categories—home and business—Jobs vowed to focus the "home" line on Apple's key markets of consumers and school users. At the same time Jobs oversaw the creation of 1997's "Think Different" advertising campaign, a high-profile effort designed to reassert that Apple, though plagued by bad press and sinking profits, was a vibrant company producing innovative products for innovative people. Jobs' strategy halted the company's free fall, and in April 1998 Apple reported its second straight profitable quarter. The company still needed to prove that it could compete for the consumer market with rival PC makers such as Hewlett-Packard, Compaq, and Dell. While Apple retained "Think Different" as an overarching branding campaign, it needed advertisements to herald the arrival of its newest machine, the iMac.

TARGET MARKET

Apple wanted to market the iMac predominantly to three groups: loyal Apple users, first-time computer buyers, and PC owners. As the company had not introduced a new consumer product since 1992, it hoped that many Apple users would choose to upgrade to the iMac. The company had long cultivated a rebellious image, with advertisements ranging from the famous "1984" commercial to the stark "Think Different" photos of maverick geniuses who had flouted conventional wisdom to make stunning contributions. As a result Apple buyers tended to be those who perceived themselves to be somewhat outside the mainstream and who valued creativity. Advertisements for the iMac were crafted to reach this group as well. The print ads used arty photos of the iMac that made the computer look less like a machine and more like a museum piece. The taglines in some of the print pieces also followed the Apple advertising formula. For instance, "I think therefore iMac," punned on Descartes' famous maxim, and understanding the reference required a degree of intellectual literacy. Moreover, the quirky, insider-type wit was likely to appeal to the alternative audience comprising the bulk of Apple loyalists.

© PATRICK DURAND/CORBIS/SYGMA.

Reaching first-time computer buyers presented an entirely different set of challenges. An industry analyst estimated that 5 million to 10 million consumers were ready to buy their first computer. According to an Apple news release this analyst concluded that "access to the Internet is a leading reason for consumers to buy a personal computer." The technological world was often overwhelming to the uninitiated, though, with its talk of RAM, gigabytes, and modem speed. The "iMac" campaign sought to allay these consumers' fears. One print ad suggested that the most complicated aspect of buying an iMac was deciding which color to purchase. "The thrill of surfing. The agony of choosing," the piece quipped. "Buying a computer used to be a decision based on processor power, functions, and software packages," said the Austin American-Statesman. "iMac has changed things because it is now about choosing between strawberry and grape." Other print ads—"Yum" and "iCandy"—likened the machine to a sweet treat, further demystifying it. The television commercials, such as "Simplicity Shootout," also emphasized the iMac's user-friendliness by juxtaposing Apple's easy setup and Internet access with the hassle of trying to use a Windows-based PC for the first time. Commercials featuring the actor Jeff Goldblum validated the insecurities of the Internet "newbie." "It seems a big party is going on these days," Goldblum said to the camera, referring to the Internet. "[But] I don't have an e-mail." He then proceeded to explain how easy it was to get on the Internet with the iMac.

The third group Apple strove to target with the "iMac" campaign was consumers using other PCs. Many analysts doubted that Apple could entice an appreciable number of Windows aficionados to purchase the iMac as their next computer, according to Tulsa World. Apple believed it could. To do so, the company hammered home the message that the iMac was faster, simpler, and equally as affordable as comparable PCs. The "iMac" campaign conveyed that "[w]e have a better product," an Apple executive told Advertising Age. Apple also used the iMac's style as an important selling point. One particular print ad (that humorously declared, "Sorry, no beige" above a turquoise iMac) embodied an underlying premise of the "iMac" campaign: "people [would] be able to further express themselves through their computers," as an Apple spokesperson told the Austin American-Statesman.

COMPETITION

The magnitude of Apple's goal of convincing first-time computer buyers and PC owners to consider the iMac was mammoth. According to Investor's Business Daily, 85 percent of the desktop-computer market consisted of Windows-based PCs. The leading computer manufacturer was Compaq, which in 1994 overtook IBM to become the market leader. Compaq was no stranger to consumer-oriented advertising campaigns. In 1995 Compaq debuted "Has It Changed Your Life Yet?," which was created by the ad agency Ammirati Puris Lintas. The commercials were intended to show how Compaq PCs "change[d] . . . lives in small but important ways for the better," an Ammirati spokesperson told Marketing Computers. One spot showed a delighted child receiving a Compaq for Christmas. In 1998 Compaq doubled its ad spending for its Presario computer, which was its primary consumer-oriented machine. In February 1999 Compaq inaugurated a worldwide branding campaign. As of October 1998 Compaq maintained a 13.7 percent share of the worldwide computer market.

AN INTERNATIONAL CAMPAIGN

The "iMac" campaign was truly a global marketing effort. Half of the $100 million ad budget was used in the United States, but the remaining sum brought the message of the iMac's simplicity to Europe, Japan, and other international markets. The campaign was released in these regions on August 29, 1998.

IBM devoted a massive advertising budget to reaching home-computer users. In the early 1990s IBM came under attack for being an unwieldy behemoth in the increasingly nimble computer industry. In an effort to revamp its image IBM began its "Solutions for a Small Planet" campaign in 1995. Although many of these Ogilvy & Mather spots directly addressed businesses, the overall goal of the campaign was to bolster the IBM brand. In February 1998 IBM specifically sought to reach consumers when it spent $50 million on an Olympics ad campaign. The print ads and television spots celebrated little-known athletes whose personal accomplishments embodied the spirit of the Olympic Games. As Advertising Age explained, IBM planned to "make viewers feel better about IBM and better about IBM technology." In addition to airing the campaign during Olympics broadcasts on CBS and TNT, print pieces appeared in Sports Illustrated, Time, the Wall Street Journal, and USA Today. IBM had an 8.6 percent share of the market in October 1998.

Another rival, Hewlett-Packard, teamed up with agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners in 1997 to produce "Expanding Possibilities," a $40 million consumer campaign. Other competitors, such as Microsoft, Intel, and Dell, also engaged in brand-building campaigns during the period.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To reach the diverse audience comprising its three target markets, Apple unleashed the "iMac" campaign with a media blitz. "It is easily our most far-reaching, coordinated use of the media," a company spokesperson told the San Francisco Chronicle. Television commercials played a central role in communicating the campaign's message to a vast number of consumers. While many rival computer companies focused heavily on trade publications, Apple aggressively pursued consumers where they lived. "Determining the media mix was complicated," an Apple executive told Editor & Publisher. "iMac is targeted toward a variety of different markets, [and buyers] don't necessarily need to be technologically savvy." After the campaign's launch on The Wonderful World of Disney, iMac spots aired on popular network shows that garnered a mainstream audience, such as Home Improvement, Spin City, Just Shoot Me, Friends, and 20/20. Apple also used national cable channels, such as Comedy Central, FX, and MSNBC. To ensure that its base of Apple users knew of the iMac and its updated features, the company also bought local air time in its top 10 markets: Boston, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Seattle, Minneapolis, and Denver.

The television commercials relied on humor to convey the iMac's qualities. A spot called "Simplicity Shootout" featured "Adam Taggert, 26, Brown University graduate, Class of 1994" competing against a 7-year-old boy and his dog in a duel to set up their respective new computers. Taggert, who had selected a PC, fumbled with cables and manuals for quite a while, while the youngster had his iMac up and running in five minutes. Later television spots portrayed actor Jeff Goldblum (who had provided the voice-over on earlier iMac commercials) talking frankly and calmly about the iMac. Still others concentrated on the visual vividness of the machine. In January 1999, after Apple launched five additional iMac colors (tangerine, lime, strawberry, blueberry, and grape), TBWA\Chiat\Day created a commercial that pictured the five bright iMacs spinning artfully to the Rolling Stones' song "She's a Rainbow."

Apple used other media as well. The colorful print "iMac" pieces were published in a number of consumer magazines, including ESPN, Time, Entertainment Weekly, Wired, Vanity Fair, Elle, and Metropolitan Home. Moreover, the company engaged in a major saturation effort in its top 10 markets. Billboard versions of the ads (showing the iMac and containing a single tagline, such as "Mental Floss"), bus ads, and radio spots all played an important role. Apple also broadcast "countdown to iMac" radio pieces in these markets during the days prior to the iMac's introduction. In addition, it sponsored radio promotions in which an iMac was given away every day. The company even went so far as to install 20-foot inflatable iMacs atop some computer stores. "Apple is acting more like a package[d]-good marketer than a technology company," exclaimed Advertising Age. An analyst for the magazine concurred: "They're creating an environment in which an awful lot of potential consumers are paying attention to them." Maintaining such a high profile was essential not only for Apple to sell more iMacs, but also "to reestablish the company's credibility," according to the San Francisco Chronicle.

OUTCOME

Despite a blockbuster launch of the iMac, many commentators predicted that the quirky machine would not convert PC users or lure first-time buyers. They were wrong. In its first weekend the iMac generated $25 million in sales. "It was the best-selling computer we ever had in a single day," a representative from CompUSA proclaimed to the New York Daily News. Nor was this a flash in the pan. At the close of 1998 Apple announced $309 million in profits, of which "sales of the iMac accounted for a good portion," said the San Jose Mercury News. The company's stock prices shot up, as did its market share, which reached 5 percent in October 1998. The following month the iMac was the best-selling desktop computer in the United States. And, as the San Jose Mercury News noted, the iMac "wooed not only Mac faithfuls but also first-time buyers and veteran users of other systems who were new to Mac." A consumer survey reported in Newsbytes News Network revealed that an estimated 40 percent of iMac buyers were new Apple buyers.

Apple remained committed to growth in the consumer sector. "Apple's future is in the consumer market," an ebullient Jobs told Fortune. In July 1999 the company debuted the iBook, a portable computer designed for consumer use. This laptop, like the iMac, featured bright colors and a unique design. Even though the campaign's exposure waned after 2000, the "iMac" campaign did not officially end until Apple released its 2002 "Switchers" campaign, which featured real-life people whose lives were improved after they switched to Apple computers.

FURTHER READING

Emert, Carol. "The Selling of Apple's iMac." San Francisco Chronicle, August 19, 1998.

Ha, K. Oanh. "Apple Computer Earnings Surpass Expectations." San Jose Mercury News, October 15, 1998.

Hines, Matt. "iMac Launches and Continues to Sell." Newsbytes News Network, August 17, 1998.

"iMac Ads Top $19 Million." Editor & Publisher, June 26, 1999.

Johnson, Bradley. "$100 Million iMac Blitz Is Tops in Home Computer History." Advertising Age, August 17, 1998.

Kallenberg, Gregory. "Candy Computers." Austin (TX) American-Statesman, April 13, 1999.

Kirkpatrick, David. "The Second Coming of Apple." Fortune, November 9, 1998.

Levy, Steve. "Hello Again. A New Computer, the iMac, from Apple Computer." Newsweek, May 18, 1998.

Li, Steve. "iMac Sales Add Polish." New York Daily News, August 18, 1998.

Piller, Charles. "Macintosh Mystique" Macworld, February 1, 1994.

Smith, Dawn. "Portrait of a Marriage" Marketing Computers, June 1, 1995

Swartz, Jon. "Big Apple Ad Blitz for iMac" San Francisco Chronicle, August 14, 1998.

Turner, Nick. "iMac Gives Apple Spotlight, but Can It Stay Center Stage?" Investor's Business Daily, August 17, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

SILHOUETTE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Released by Apple Computer, Inc., in November 2001, the iPod rapidly grew in sales and by 2005 had become the world's top-selling MP3 player. With a 1,000-song capacity, the first iPod worked only with Apple computers and retailed at $400. From 2003 to 2005, however, Apple ferociously promoted five new Windows-compatible iPod models, along with the company's digital music store, iTunes. In an attempt to define the fun associated with the iPod brand and to steer advertising away from the Apple computer, the company released its "Silhouette" campaign.

In October 2003 ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day (TBWA\C\D) introduced outdoor "Silhouette" ads in Los Angeles, followed by a nationwide print and television launch. All ads displayed black silhouettes of people listening to white iPods and dancing in front of radiant green, yellow, fuchsia, and pink backgrounds. The television spots were accompanied by upbeat music from bands like N.E.R.D. and the Black Eye Peas. The band U2 shocked fans and critics in 2004 by endorsing iPod through the release of a new single, "Vertigo." Shrugging off criticism, U2's front man, Bono, stated that the iPod was "the most beautiful object art in music culture since the electric guitar." Seventy-two hours after the U2 endorsement, Apple stock reached a 52-week high of $53.20 per share. Apple reportedly spent $49.6 million on the "Silhouette" campaign between January and August of 2004.

The iPod U2 Special Edition. © KIM KULISH/CORBIS.

Not only did "Silhouette" earn TBWA\C\D a Global Effie from the New York American Marketing Association and a Kelly Award from the Magazine Publishers of America, the agency was nominated as the U.S. Agency of the Year for 2004 by Adweek. Even though analysts' early forecasts for iPod sales were $400 million, product improvement and the "Silhouette" campaign helped Apple reach an incredible $1.2 billion in net sales during the first quarter of 2005 alone. Despite the fact that iPod's market share had dropped from 92 percent in October 2004 to 87 percent by March 2005, demand still overshadowed supply.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Led by CEO Steve Jobs, Apple held a meager 2.5 percent share of the worldwide computer market in 2001. Learning from its proprietary mistakes in the 1980s, the company released Windows-compatible iPods in 2002. Apple also allowed third-party companies like BMW, Bose Corporation, and Griffin Technology to create iPod accessories, which led to more than $100 million in sales in 2004. Apple even allowed Hewlett-Packard to release the Apple iPod from HP.

The first commercial for iPod, also created by TBWA\C\D, aired in 2001. It showed a bespectacled man huddled over an Apple iBook. At first the audience heard only the man's clicking keyboard, until music from Propellerheads's "Take California" grew louder. By the end of the spot it became apparent that the man was downloading music onto his iPod. Next TBWA\C\D shifted away from computer-centric ads to develop spots with people singing out loud while wearing iPods. One commercial, which featured a young boy singing Eminem's "Lose Yourself," resulted in a lawsuit by Eminem, but it was settled amicably.

Apple needed success from the "Silhouette" campaign. By 2002 the company still had only 5 percent of the computer market. "The history of Apple is a long, complicated business story with a lot of mistakes made," Lee Clow, worldwide chairman and chief creative officer of TBWA\C\D, told Advertising Age. "Particularly the decision to stick with a proprietary system for PCs which resulted in Microsoft's dominance." In 2004 iPod contributed 23 percent of Apple's earnings. Jobs said that iPod sales "should also help introduce Windows users to Apple's clever and stylish designs, thus encouraging more PC users to switch to Macintosh computers." Apple hoped that the fun-oriented, carefree format of the "Silhouette" ads would appeal to a more inclusive audience than past campaigns had. Instead of pitting itself against Microsoft or PCs, Apple wanted to focus solely on the fun associated with the iPod in order to solidify its position as the top-selling MP3 player.

TARGET MARKET

According to Beth Snyder Bulik of Advertising Age, iPod's target market "is wide, including current iPod owners looking for a second device; Gen X parents now willing to bankroll the $100 to placate their teens; and consumers with more modest income." Experts like Seth Godin, an author of marketing books, explained to the Dayton Daily News that the target demographic was much larger: "It's unusual for a product like this to cross all the gender and age lines right away, but iPod is doing both." U.S. President George W. Bush, singer and songwriter Tom Petty, Queen Elizabeth II, and even the late motion-picture star Marlon Brando all owned iPods. "The new ads do a terrific job of seducing and selling, of making the target turn on and want the product, now," Marian Salzman, executive vice president and chief strategy officer of Euro RSCG Worldwide, told USA Today. "Interestingly, the ads also transcend nationality and age. They are about an Apple state of mind."

Ad Track, USA Today 's weekly consumer survey, stated that across age groups the "Silhouette" campaign was most popular with 25- to 29-year-olds. For consumers between the ages of 50 and 64, 19 percent gave "Silhouette" ads the highest possible rating. The iPod's compatibility with illegally downloadable music drew criticism from some, however. Eric Garland, president of Big Champagne (a company that tracks Internet file

iPOD KNOCKOFFS

The iPod "Silhouette" campaign drew an outpouring of knockoffs. One came from a Fuse TV outdoor ad that showed a silhouetted Iraqi war prisoner next to a bomb resembling Apple's logo and with the copy "iRaq." Apple was reportedly infuriated by the ad. Fuse TV also produced an ad with a silhouetted stripper who pole danced next to the tagline "fuse music television. watch different."

sharing), told the Irish Times, "If anything, the illegal MP3 user base makes up a large part of the target market."

By using contemporary pop music, the "Silhouette" campaign directly targeted fans of N.E.R.D., the Caesars, Daft Punk, Jet, the Black Eye Peas, and, most famously, U2. This last group, notorious for turning down multi-million-dollar endorsements, not only gave Apple consent to use its music but actually released its single "Vertigo" in a 30-second "Silhouette" spot.

COMPETITION

South Korea's ReignCom Ltd., trying to move into an MP3 market dominated by iPod, which had 92 percent of sales in 2004, launched an outdoor, print, and Web campaign for its iRiver player; the campaign featured porn star Jenna Jameson. The iRiver PMC 140 boasted video capabilities but was priced $200 above Apple's iPod Photo. Earlier versions of iRiver MP3 players had featured radio tuners and voice recorders that were not available on iPods. For the promotion of iRiver's H10 model, print ads showed people listening to their MP3 players and biting into apples along with the tagline "Sweeter One." In 2005 iRiver ranked second in terms of market share.

By 2002 Sony Corporation, which had dominated the portable music market during the 1980s and 1990s, had lost considerable ground to the Apple iPod. In 2004 Sony released the Network Walkman, an MP3 player resembling the iPod in price and features and that was user-friendly. Sony's U.S. advertising, lead by Young & Rubicam, featured music by Macy Gray. Advertisements in Europe, however, used edgier music by bands like Teddy Bears STHLM. One commercial featured the painter Liam Yates listening to a Sony MP3 player and working on an image resembling a "Silhouette" ad. In 2005 Sony released its PlayStation Portable (PSP), a handheld gaming device that played MP3s. Early on industry analysts had forecast that the PSP would be an "iPod killer," but its release had little effect on iPod's market share.

MARKETING STRATEGY

TBWA\C\D introduced outdoor "Silhouette" ads in Los Angeles during the second week of September 2003, immediately after Apple had announced earnings of $2.15 billion for its third fiscal quarter. On September 15 TBWA\C\D launched "Silhouette" print ads in newspapers. In October "Silhouette" ads appeared in music, sports, and men's magazines. The campaign's first television spot, with Duncan Milner and Eric Gunbaum as creative directors, featured silhouettes of people wearing iPods and dancing to the Black Eyed Peas's "Hey, Mama."

The first three commercials were directed by Dave Myers, who, Milner told Adweek, "was great in that he knew the best choreographers, knew the dancers and knew a lot about the music." In fact, it was Myers who had originally suggested that TBWA\C\D use "Hey, Mama." In later television spots Myers used Jet's "Are You Gonna Be My Girl" and N.E.R.D.'s "Rock Star." "Silhouette" print ads used taglines such as "Welcome to the digital music revolution" and "More than 1 million iPods have been sold."

According to Advertising Age, Apple's U.S. advertising budget from January to August 2004 was $49.6 million. Later in 2004 Apple spent $20 million worldwide to promote its 30-second U2 "Silhouette" spot using "Vertigo," a single from the band's new album, How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb. The commercial starred U2, partially silhouetted against fuchsia, green, yellow, and blue backgrounds. In addition to the commercial, U2 cobranded with Apple by releasing the single exclusively on iTunes. Apple then released a special red and black iPod U2, with the band members' autographs engraved on the back casing.

The iPod U2 shipped with a $50 coupon toward the download of iTune's The Complete U2, a collection of 25 years of U2 albums. Explaining why U2 had chosen iPod for its first endorsement, Bono told the Chicago Tribune, "We looked at the iPod commercial as a rock video. We chose the director. We thought, how are we going to get our single off in the days when rock music is niche? When it's unlikely to get a three-minute punk-rock song on top of the radio? So we piggybacked this phenomenon to get ourselves to a new, younger audience, and we succeeded." The band was not paid for the "Vertigo" ad.

Apple continued using the "Silhouette" campaign well into 2005 to promote variations of the iPod, not only the iPod U2 but also the iPod Photo, iPod Mini,

EVEN THE PRESIDENT

Even U.S. President George W. Bush owned an iPod. A 2004 birthday gift from his daughters, Bush's 10,000-song-capacity iPod only held 250 songs when its existence became known in 2005. The president's iPod consisted of a song list predominantly made up of male artists. Busy with other things, Bush did not have time to set up the iPod himself, and he instructed an aide, Blake Gottesman, to purchase the songs from iTunes. Notable songs on the president's play list included "Fortunate Son" by Credence Clearwater Revival and "Don't Drink That Wine" by NWA. Joe Levy of Rolling Stone quipped, "One thing that's interesting is that the president likes artists who don't like him."

and iPod Shuffle, as well as its 99-cents-per-song online store, iTunes.

OUTCOME

Despite critics who accused Apple of overusing the campaign, "Silhouette" dramatically helped iPod move to the forefront of the market for portable music. The U2 spot alone bolstered Apple's stock to a 52-week high in 2004, which added $2 billion to Apple's overall market value. In 2004 sales of the iPod peaked, with 92 percent of the market share; this slipped to 87 percent by March 2005. Andrew Shafer, a writer for the Iowa State Daily, wrote, "[iPod's] popularity may be attributed, at least in part, to a simple dancing Silhouette. The Silhouette, although faceless and unidentifiable, has given an identity to the iPod." Despite losing ground to emerging MP3 players, in 2005 Apple reported its 16 millionth iPod sold, and iTunes was providing 82 percent of the world's legally downloadable songs. Accessories for the iPod alone yielded $100 million in 2004.

The "Silhouette" campaign earned TBWA\C\D a number of prizes, including the $100,000 Kelly Award, presented by Magazine Publishers of America for the best ad competition. It also helped TBWA\C\D earn Adweek 's honor as Agency of the Year in 2004 and a Grand Effie in 2005. "One can look at the iPod ads and easily see it's a very good campaign," Eric Einhorn, executive vice president and chief strategy officer at McCann Worldgroup, stated in the Iowa State Daily. "It really finds an iconic way to represent the musical freedom that the iPod delivers."

FURTHER READING

Amer, Suzie. "Moving with the Music." Print, May 1, 2005.

Anderson, Mae, and Parpis, Eleftheria. "The Best of '04 and the Worst." Adweek, January 3, 2005.

Avery, Simon. "How iPod Spawned Lucrative Spinoff Industry: 'Halo Effect' Already at $100-Million." Toronto Globe and Mail, January 5, 2005, p. B1.

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Apple: Look Back; 2003 Winner." Advertising Age, December 13, 2004, p. S10.

Johnson, Michelle. "iPod May Be a Bit Too Minimalist." Boston Globe, February 7, 2005, p. D2.

Kloer, Phil. "Me, Myself & iPod Music Lovers Gush about Pocket-Size Hip, Hot Jukebox." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, April 1, 2004, p. NW4.

Kot, Gret. "Bono on the Band: In a Frank Interview, U2's Lead Singer Tackles Big Questions about the Nature of Rock Music and Suggestions His Iconic Group Has Sold Its Soul." Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2005, p. B1.

Newman, Melinda. "Bombs Away! U2 Sets Sights on Top of Charts." Billboard, November 27, 2004, p. 3.

Newsday, Stephen Williams. "Tinseltown Tech Celebrities Give Gadgets Star Power." Fort Wayne Journal Gazette, June 5, 2005, p. 2D.

Pfanner, Eric. "Sony Wages Battle of the Brands." International Herald Tribune, October 25, 2004, p. 13.

Piccalo, Gina. "The Marketing Pitch You Won't See Coming." Los Angeles Times, November 17, 2005, p. F4.

Shafer, Andrew. "Three Years after the First Release of Apple's iPod, It Still Reigns Supreme as the Top MP3 Player on the Market." Iowa State Daily, March 10, 2005.

Kevin Teague

SWITCHERS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By June 2002, after 18 months of new products that included the eMac, OS X operating system, G4 processor, iPod, and new flat-screen monitor, Apple Computer, Inc., still held only 5 percent of the U.S. market and between 2 and 3 percent of the worldwide market in personal computers. Apple's proprietary lock on technology in the 1980s had forced hardware manufacturers like Dell, Gateway, and Compaq to avoid Apple software and to ship their PCs with Microsoft's operating system. Apple isolated itself from the masses even more with its 1997 "Think Different" campaign, which associated the brand with revolutionary figures like Mahatma Gandhi and John Lennon. It was to attract a broader range of computer users that Apple launched its "Switchers" campaign in 2002.

With the cost estimated at $75 million, the "Switchers" campaign was executed by Apple's longtime partner and marketing firm TBWA\Chiat\Day (TBWA\C\D). Using print, television, and the company's website, the "Switchers" campaign began with Apple's requests for testimonials from its loyal customer base. After receiving more than 1,000 submissions, TBWA\C\D hired the documentary filmmaker Errol Morris to create 32 television spots that featured people ad-libbing their reasons for switching from the Windows-based PC to Apple. Hoping to connect with a wide demographic, the "Switchers" spots starred common people like a network administrator, a lawyer, an illustrator, a small-business owner, a programmer, and a DJ. The first spot aired on June 10, 2002.

Early indicators led Apple to believe that the campaign was helping to capture business from the Windows market. In the second half of 2002, for example, 4 of 10 Mac purchases in Apple stores were made by first-time owners. Despite early successes and a few impressive ad accolades, including Adweek 's 2002 Campaign of the Year Award, there was little improvement in Apple's market share. Brandweek noted that the research firms Gartner Dataquest and IDC showed Apple's worldwide market share unchanged in October 2003, after the campaign had ended.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1997 Apple launched its $100 million "Think Different" campaign, which joined images of cultural icons like Bob Dylan, Albert Einstein, and Pablo Picasso to the Apple brand. The effort backfired on Apple, however, by pigeonholing the company as part of a small community of writers, photographers, educators, and graphic designers. By 2002 the tech industry's slump was also affecting Apple, which lost money in the first fiscal quarter of that year. Despite industry trends in 2002, Apple CEO Steve Jobs said that the company planned to "innovate our way through the downturn" by developing new hardware and software, along with opening 51 Apple stores throughout the United States.

In the weeks preceding the "Switchers" campaign Jobs told Adweek, "We're going after the ninety-five out of 100 people not using Macs." The opening of new Apple stores also was meant to play a major role in the forthcoming campaign by giving consumers a place to purchase Apple computers. Because of contractual disagreements between Apple and retailers, many Apple products were not available at larger stores. Apple supposedly stopped allowing Best Buy to sell iMacs, for example, after the company resisted stocking the regulated range of colors that Apple insisted upon. Sears and CompUSA had similar fallouts with Apple. Increasing the number of Apple stores would allow the company to sell its own products on its own terms.

"We've been giving people a ton of compelling reasons to switch to a Mac," Jobs told USA Today. "We've got 10,000 people writing to us to say, 'I've switched,' but people have lots of questions. We decided that to get people over their concerns, they should hear from people just like them."

TARGET MARKET

The 1997 "Think Different" Campaign was widely criticized for excluding the average computer user by targeting what Therese Poletti of the San Jose Mercury News called "radical thinkers such as Albert Einstein, John Lennon and other rebellious, creative types." It was for this reason that TBWA\C\D aimed the "Switchers" campaign at Windows users, the 95 percent of computer users who fell outside Apple's market share. It was also important, Jobs emphasized to TBWA\C\D, to target the Windows user who wanted a Mac but who feared that switching to one would discombobulate his or her digital life. "There are a lot more people out there that use Windows computers than no computers, so that's a very rich target for us," Jobs told the Wall Street Journal. "For those thinking of switching to the Mac, we'd like to help that process along."

For the ads TBWA\C\D and director Morris used mostly ordinary consumers who were accustomed to Windows, people such as a network administrator, an illustrator, a small-business owner, and a programmer. Jobs also wanted to dispel the myth that Apple was only for consumers who had never used a computer before. When USA Today 's Ad Track polled consumers on their reaction to the "Switchers" campaign, the most favorable response was from 30- to 39-year-olds, 23 percent of whom liked the ads. The worst response came from 18- to 24-year-olds, with 47 percent disliking them.

COMPETITION

In 2001 Microsoft, the antagonist of the "Switchers" campaign, was the biggest threat to Apple, with a staggering 93 percent of all operating systems for personal computers. Although some analysts favored the stability of the Mac's UNIX-based operating system, others valued the wider product selection offered by Microsoft. John Torro of the Saint Petersburg Times wrote, "Windows XP supports about 12,000 device and software drivers. The Mac? Probably a fraction of that. What that means is you have more flexibility if you want to upgrade or change your computer. The PC world is wide open; Apple dictates the Mac world." Apple did, however, outshine Microsoft in advertising. To counter the

INTERROTRON

Errol Morris, the director of the "Switchers" television spots, also worked with Michael Williams to create The Fog of War, which won the 2003 Academy Award as the best documentary feature. The film consisted of Morris asking Robert S. McNamara, former U.S. secretary of defense, candid questions about his involvement with the 1945 firebombing of Tokyo, the 1962 Cuban missile crisis, and the initial U.S. deployments in Vietnam. The well-crafted documentary allowed McNamara to explain his views on the morality of war through his "Eleven lessons from the life of Robert S. McNamara." For The Fog of War Morris used techniques similar to those of the "Switchers" commercials, including the patented Interrotron and the shouting of questions at the interviewee during the filming.

"Switchers" campaign, Microsoft's website featured stories and photos of "real people" who had left Macintosh for Windows. When it was later revealed that the Microsoft photos were stock images and that the stories had been written by a marketing team, Microsoft's antics were widely criticized.

In PC hardware Hewlett-Packard, after merging with Compaq, was the worldwide leader, with 16.1 percent of the market in 2002. The company's share was slipping, however, to Dell, which held 15.7 percent worldwide and an even greater percentage in the United States. Dell was praised by advertising aficionados for its clear vision of the product it was advertising. Mike Dell, founder and CEO, spent his efforts solely pushing Dell PCs and the company's "just-in-time" manufacturing. By 2005 Dell, with 16.9 percent of the worldwide market for PCs, had become the leader. "Dell has a lot of momentum. It grew at rates above 24 percent, year over year," said Loren Loverde, an analyst with IDC. "HP is doing well relative to its merger issues, and it also means that we could have a pretty close race . . . for a number of quarters."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Jobs attended the showing of Errol Morris's short film The Academy Awards Movie, which played at the 2002 Academy Awards. Later, in response to the film, Jobs was quoted as saying, "This guy has to do the new Apple campaign." But Apple had considered Morris to direct the "Switchers" campaign even before the 2002 Oscars.

Before Morris began work on the "Switchers" campaign, Apple requested stories, through Apple.com, from people who had switched from Windows to Apple. After selecting 60 replies from thousands of submissions, Morris and his team spent 10 days interviewing candidates in New York, Los Angeles, and Boston. Morris set the camera behind a half-silvered mirror, on which he projected his face. He called the invention, which allowed him to make eye contact with the person being interviewed, an Interrotron.

Looking into the camera lens "is the very opposite of conversation," Morris said in Adweek. "Interrotron is a way of having your cake and eating it too." During the filming TBWA\C\D representatives gave Morris details about each interviewee. None of the 32 commercials that were created were scripted. "Steve [Jobs] did much of the deciding; he was the impartial jury. The ones who made it were the most believable," Lee Clow, chief creative officer at TBWA\C\D, told Adweek. "We also made a conscious effort to avoid choosing [those who might be perceived as] 'Apple people.'"

In addition to the ordinary people featured in the "Switchers" ads, four celebrities—actor-comedian Will Ferrell, skateboarder Tony Hawk, musician Yo-Yo Ma, and surfer Kelly Slater—made appearances. Most of the ads, however, featured people like a programmer, lawyer, disc jockey, or software projects manager. One featured a student, Ellen Feiss, who stood before a white screen while she explained her frustrations with Windows: "I was writing a paper on the PC, and it was, like, beep, beep, beep, beep, beep. And then, like, half of my paper was gone. And I was, like . . . heh. It devoured my paper. It was a really good paper. And then I had to do it again and I had to do it fast so it wasn't as good. It's kind of a . . . bummer."

The "Switchers" spot with Aaron Adams, a Windows network administrator, which Adweek deemed the campaign's most poignant, helped TBWA\C\D earn the publication's honor as Best Campaign of 2002. In the spot Adams said, "I'm a Windows guy who's changed to Macintosh. I deal with Windows all day and when I'm tired of fighting with that, I come home to a Macintosh that works. I haven't found anything I can do with a PC that I cannot do with my Mac."

The "Switchers" spots first aired on June 10, 2002, on cable networks such as ESPN, CNBC, and Comedy Central and then appeared on ABC and NBC. Print ads appeared during the same month in magazines like Time and Newsweek. Even though Jobs denied animosity between Apple and Microsoft, "Switchers" ads in Newsweek, Rolling Stone, and the New Yorker boasted that Windows "has made a good business out of copying the innovative Mac." Both print and television advertisements directed the audience to Apple.com/Switch, where the company posted reasons for switching to the Mac, along with positive press reports to reinforce the message.

OUTCOME

The "Switchers" campaign did little to increase Apple's market share, which was its main objective. Over the lifetime of the campaign Apple's worldwide share remained at a meager 2 to 3 percent. Sales in Apple stores did, however, increase during the campaign, bringing in $163 million during the second half of 2002. According to USA Today, 4 of 10 of the buyers had never owned a Mac before. The "Switchers" campaign also earned awards from the ad industry, including Adweek's Campaign of the Year Award for 2002. The "Switchers" spot with Feiss was named Best Performance in Adweek 's 2003 Maddy Awards.

Part of the problem, according to analysts, was that, even though the "Switchers" stars were real people, their perceptions of Apple computers were false. Most "Switchers" spokespersons boasted of Mac's advantages over Windows, such as a more stable operating system and a more intuitive functionality. As Torro wrote in the Saint Petersburg Times, "If Mac users are going to tell you that their operating system never has problems, I have some land to sell you about 20 miles out in the gulf. I've heard many stories about Macs getting 'the bomb' (the Mac version of a Windows general protection fault)." Apple's PowerBook 5300 was earlier dubbed by some journalists as the "hindenbook" for its tendency to burst into flames.

When the "Switchers" campaign was launched in 2002, Apple still had enough capital to float through the industry slump of the decade's early years. In June 2002 Jobs stated, "Apple and Dell are the only two making money in the industry right now. It's a tough business now. But I'm an optimist. I think things will get better." By 2004 Apple had shifted its advertising priorities to the wildly successful iPod, which earned an incredible $1.2 billion during the first quarter of 2005 alone.

FURTHER READING

Azhar, Azeem. "The Fruit of Apple's Labour." Guardian, November 21, 2002, p. 2.

Dill, Mallorre. "Reality TV: Errol Morris Focuses His Interrotron on Apple and Cantor Fitzgerald." Adweek, June 24, 2002, p. 21.

Garcia, Sandra. "i-Advertising: TBWA\C\D, Morris Help Dispel the Mac Myth." Shoot, August 2, 2002, p. 18.

Hamm, Steve, Jay Greene, and Andy Reinhardt. "What's a Rival to Do Now? Getting Out of Microsoft's Way Becomes a Key Survival Skill." Business Week, November 18, 2002, p. 44.

Howard, Theresa. "Apple Ads Make Impression: Small Companies Prove Their Spots Can Rival Big Firms." USA Today, July 15, 2002, p. B6.

———. "PC Users Make the Switch in Mac Ads: Apple Launches $75M Campaign to Nab Some of Microsoft's Market." USA Today, June 11, 2002, p. B2.

Lippert, Barbara. "The Right Notes: Apple's Fun New Music Spots Are Not As Simple As They Look." Adweek, May 26, 2003, p. 28.

McCarthy, Michael. "Apple Takes Swipe at Partner Microsoft in Mac Ads: Spots Feature Users Who Rejected PCs." USA Today, December 16, 2002, p. B4.

Nudd, Tim. "The Burden of Truth: Will the Real Switchers Please Stand Up?" Adweek (eastern ed.), October 21, 2002, p. 9.

Poletti, Therese. "New Apple Advertising Campaign Aims to Convert PC Users." San Jose Mercury News, June 11, 2002.

Schwartz, John. "Apple's Quirky Ads Evoke Parodies of Themselves." New York Times, November 25, 2002, p. 4.

Tam, Pui-Wing. "New Apple Campaign Targets Windows User." Wall Street Journal, June 10, 2002, p. B1.

Wasserman, Todd. "Memo from the Front." Brandweek, October 13, 2003.

Kevin Teague

THINK DIFFERENT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The decision of Apple Computer, Inc., to make its technology proprietary had constricted the computer manufacturer's product growth in the 1980s and allowed computer-hardware manufacturers such as International Business Machines Corporation (IBM) and Compaq Computer Corporation to blossom by using Microsoft Corporation's operating systems. In early 1997 Apple was in danger of ending its second consecutive profitless year. In an attempt to salvage the Apple brand, Apple's board of directors invited the company's cofounder, Steve Jobs, to lead as CEO. The homecoming was bittersweet. More than a decade earlier the board of directors had asked Jobs to resign. After his return to leadership Jobs consolidated Apple's advertising account with one agency, reduced Apple's product line from 14 to 4, and hoped to build consumer confidence in the Apple brand with a campaign called "Think Different."

The $90 million "Think Different" campaign debuted on September 28, 1997, with a 60-second spot aired during the television network premiere of the animated film A Toy Story. The global campaign, which included television spots, print ads in newspapers and magazines, and outdoor displays on billboards, bus wraps, and wall coverings, featured stark black-and-white photographs of maverick thinkers such as Bob Dylan, Martin Luther King, Jr., Sir Richard Branson, and John Lennon. The first spot featured a voice-over by the actor Richard Dreyfuss and ended with the Apple logo and the tagline "Think Different." It was produced by the advertising agency TBWA\Chiat\Day, although the "Think Different" concept itself had emerged from a collaborative effort between the agency's worldwide creative director, Lee Clow, and Steve Jobs. The campaign ended in 2002.

"Think Different" improved Apple's bottom line. In April 1998 the company reported its second straight profitable quarter after nearly two years and $2 billion in losses. Although Apple increased its market share at the beginning of "Think Different," in early 2002 it was again posting profit losses. Some advertising analysts criticized "Think Different" for aiming Apple products at artists, writers, designers, and revolutionaries—all minorities in the computer-using community.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In August 1997 Jobs, who had cofounded Apple Computer in his garage 20 years earlier, returned to the company to become its interim chief executive officer. At that time Apple was in the midst of a crisis. Its share of the computer market had plummeted from a peak of 14 percent in 1993 to below 3 percent four years later. "The company was in a death spiral," its chief financial officer, Fred Anderson, told Newsweek in 1998. Jobs set out to address the problems. He believed that Apple's difficulties stemmed from the company's incoherent agenda, which consisted of efforts to move various products without a clearly defined purpose or method. Jobs attempted to redefine the company's strategy by concentrating on Apple's key markets: design and publishing, education, and consumers who purchased personal computers for use in the home. He also cut Apple's product line from 14 to 4.

Jobs took charge of Apple's image-making process as well. When he arrived back at the company, Apple was running more than 25 different advertising campaigns. The company's domestic and international sales offices advertised independently from, and were often not coordinated with, the campaigns conducted from Apple's headquarters in California. Apple's advertising agency during this period, BBDO, had opted to focus its advertisements on specific Apple products and the technological features of Apple computers. These efforts did nothing to allay consumers' fears that Apple's demise was imminent. "The talk of Apple going under was the worst thing for the company," said Jessica Schulman, the TBWA\Chiat\Day art director for the "Think Different" campaign. "People won't buy computer equipment that they think won't be around in the next year." Jobs replaced BBDO with TBWA\Chiat\Day and began to work with his friend Clow, the agency's creative director, on new advertising strategies. The two had collaborated in the past to forge an identity for Apple's Macintosh brand in the renowned "1984" commercial. In an effort to bring order to Apple's marketing chaos, the new campaign was to be a unified, worldwide effort overseen by TBWA\Chiat\Day's international and domestic offices.

TARGET MARKET

The "Think Different" ads reached out to what Apple termed its "installed base," those consumers who had purchased Apple computer equipment in the past. Apple consistently performed well in three core markets: designers and desktop publishers, educators and students, and home users. It was these groups that were most likely to have bought Apple products and who were keeping the company afloat during its downturn. But with the publicized record of Apple's financial troubles, many of them were not purchasing new Apple systems for fear that the company would soon fold, leaving them with obsolete machines. "Our number one priority was to make people realize that we were still here and still fighting for this brand," said Rhona Hamilton, a marketing representative for Apple.

In order to appeal to these users, the campaign stressed the creative roots of the Apple brand. The people who were selected to appear in the "Think Different" campaign were bold thinkers, men and women who were not merely great in a certain field but who were also innovative and independent and who had changed the worlds in which they moved. By aligning itself with the likes of Muhammad Ali, Bob Dylan, and Albert Einstein, Apple clearly strove to deliver a message about itself and its products. "After talking to a lot of consumers and Macintosh enthusiasts, our strategic direction was to stop acting like a computer company and start acting like a company dedicated to creative thinking," said Schulman. The "Think Different" ads stressed that Apple was an innovative company that, with its creative users, could change the world. With these images and themes, Apple hoped to appeal to its core markets, people who as artists, illustrators, designers, and students valued their own creativity and who viewed themselves as being somewhat outside the mainstream. As Brandweek noted, "'Think Different' [was] clear that it [was] not targeting its message to everyone."

GRAMMAR TAKES A HIT

The choice of the tagline "Think Different" rather than "Think Differently" was deliberate. Even though "Think Different" drew public flak for not being grammatically correct, Apple settled on the line because it "conveyed a total change in the whole body of what you think about," said Jessica Schulman, art director at TBWA\Chiat\Day, the agency that developed the campaign. "Instead of thinking in your everyday way, 'Think Different.'"

COMPETITION

As a manufacturer of both computers and operating systems, Apple was involved in two highly contested markets. Apple's line of computer hardware competed directly with that of other makers of personal computers, most notably Dell, Compaq, and IBM. Apple and Dell also vied for market share in the growing business of built-to-order computers. Apple, through its online Apple Store, and Dell, the fastest-growing major computer maker, both offered consumers the opportunity to customize their systems at the point of purchase.

Apple's operating system, Mac OS, faced its stiffest challenge from Microsoft's windows. The competition between Apple and Microsoft had been particularly difficult for Apple because Microsoft had succeeded in making its Windows system a near standard for business and commercial users. Particularly in light of Apple's financial difficulties and loss of consumer confidence before Jobs returned to the company, Apple was losing a great deal of ground to the Microsoft system. Apple's share of the personal computing market, which stood at 14 percent in 1993, had plummeted to 2.8 percent by 1997.

Apple was not alone in its advertising campaign. By 1998 its major competitors had all launched branding campaigns that were attempting to create favorable images of the companies rather than focus on individual products. IBM spent more than $140 million on its massive "Solutions for a Small Planet" branding campaign. In 1998 Dell set out on a $70 million "Be Direct" worldwide image campaign, which marked the first time the company had sought to target consumers outside of trade publications. Dell's TV spot, which featured a mouse blowing up a maze, rather than running through it, to obtain a chunk of cheese, aired during evening network news programs and on national cable channels such as CNN, FN, and CNBC; the print version appeared in mainstream magazines such as Newsweek, Time, and Forbes. Compaq spent an estimated $300 million annually on global campaigns and announced plans to double its U.S. consumer ad budget in 1998 to approximately $50 million. Microsoft had taken its "Where Do You Want to Go Today" campaign onto prime-time television and into national magazines. Intel, the manufacturer of the Pentium processors employed in most PCs, had also continued its ongoing and widely popular "Bunny People" campaign, which centered on disco-dancing Intel technicians.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Upon his return Jobs recognized immediately that Apple's public image needed to be reinvigorated if the company were to survive. Although Apple had long been viewed as making superior computing equipment, the company was in danger of going the way of Sony's ill-fated Betamax videotape system, for few people were willing to invest in a product from a company that was believed to be on the verge of extinction. To counter this perception, Jobs brought in TBWA\Chiat\Day and worked closely with Clow and others in the agency to develop the campaign that became "Think Different." The creators of the campaign realized that, because the company's image was so tarnished, Apple could not revitalize its brand by relying on ads touting its products. Instead the campaign sought to celebrate the creative genius of its subjects and to assert that Apple, too, had a unique role to play on the world stage by making the tools that allowed creative people to achieve extraordinary feats. "'Think Different' celebrates the soul of the Apple brand—that creative people with passion can change the world for the better," Jobs told the Wall Street Journal Europe in April 1998.

Apple wanted to kick off the campaign in dramatic fashion and decided that the first advertisement should run on television during the September 28, 1997, network television premiere of A Toy Story on ABC. Although difficulties in obtaining the rights to use and publish the photographs of the subjects of the campaign nearly caused Apple to miss its target, the 60-second spot aired as planned. The commercial consisted of the black-and-white images of the 12 visionary thinkers and the reading of a manifesto written in part by Jobs and read by actor Dreyfuss. "Here's to the crazy ones," began the voice-over. "The misfits. The rebels. The troublemakers. The round pegs in square holes. The ones who see things differently. They're not fond of rules. And they have no respect for the status quo. You can quote them, disagree with them, glorify or vilify them. About the only thing you can't do is ignore them. Because they change things. They push the human race forward. And while some may see them as the crazy ones, we see genius. Because the people who are crazy enough to think they can change the world are the ones who do.'' A shorter version was also produced. To reinforce the message of the television commercials, Apple conducted a brief second phase of the campaign and ran print ads in major newspapers, including the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal, that consisted of the text of the manifesto and some of the images from the television campaign.

After this initial burst Apple continued to run the television spots during such highly rated television programs as ER, Prime Time Live, Frasier, and Ally McBeal and soon followed with its first wave of magazine ads. Forgoing computer trade and industry publications, Apple instead placed its ads on the back covers of magazines such as BusinessWeek, Time, Newsweek, the New Yorker, Harper's Magazine, and the Atlantic Monthly and in advertising trade journals such as Advertising Age and Adweek. These ads, which incorporated new figures, such as choreographer Martha Graham and architect Frank Lloyd Wright into the campaign, consisted solely of a single black-and-white photograph of the subject. The only text was the phrase ''Think Different,'' the Apple logo, and the address of the company's website. In hopes of piquing audience interest all the more, the ads did not identify the subject in any way.

By its final year ''Think Different'' had transitioned into a print and billboard campaign. For example, billboards placed on the tower of the Pine Street Inn in Boston featured black-and-white images of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. The tagline ''Think Different'' and an image of Rosa Parks covered buses in New York City. Parks, an African-American, had become famous when she refused to sit at the back of a segregated bus in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1955. The campaign ended in mid-2002, but it briefly resurfaced on October 24, 2005, when Parks, the woman dubbed the ''Mother of the Modern-Day Civil Rights Movement,'' died. To pay homage to Parks, Apple placed her photo on its website's home page with the text ''Think Different'' in the image's upper-left corner.

OUTCOME

The ''Think Different'' campaign elicited an outpouring of opinions. Apple's headquarters was inundated with letters, faxes, phone calls, and E-mails commenting on the campaign. Some questioned the cast of innovative thinkers included in the ads, others were perplexed by the message, and still others were delighted with Apple's attempt to pay tribute to its heroes. People formed websites spontaneously, discussing who the individuals were, whether the phrase ''Think Different'' was grammatically correct, and why Apple's ad campaign would focus on a group of people who for the most part had never touched a computer. Apple and TBWA\Chiat\Day considered the attention paid to the campaign to be a sign of its impact.

At first the advertising industry praised the ''Think Different'' campaign. The December 15, 1997, edition of USA Today listed Apple's ''bolder'' ads as one of the year's best campaigns. As reported in the same article, ad agency creative directors ranked the campaign as the second best of the year. On May 18, 1998, Advertising Age also voiced its approval: ''The decision to celebrate the kind of independent thinking that has always typified Mac users seems now to make total sense.'' In fact, the article stated, ''the shots of heroes, geniuses, wildmen, and iconoclasts assembled here makes a strong emotional statement for Apple's underdog role.''

Not everyone loved ''Think Different,'' however. At first Apple had to contend with criticism for launching a ''campaign of dead people.'' Apple marketing representative Rhona Hamilton spoke of having to educate consumers about what the campaign was attempting to convey. CMP Techwire reported that the company was drawing bad press for undertaking an expensive marketing effort during a period of financial losses. A USA Today Ad Track survey revealed that consumers preferred Intel's ''Bunny People'' spots, which were ranked as the most popular technology-industry commercial of 1997.

The campaign had a positive effect on Apple's bottom line. In April 1998 Apple reported its second straight profitable quarter after nearly two years and $2 billion in losses. Apple attributed the increasing sales to the ''Think Different'' campaign. ''It let people know that we're still around and not going anywhere, so that they can feel good about buying the product,'' said Hamilton. Apple's market share rose to 4.1 percent. Unfortunately for Apple, the computer maker's American market share hovered at about 5 percent for the campaign's final four years. Advertising critics began discrediting ''Think Different'' for limiting the Apple brand to the small minority of ''revolutionaries'' that used computers. ''For years, the Apple brand has been associated with artists, writers and designers,'' Sandra Garcia wrote in the August 2, 2002, issue of Shoot, an ad-industry magazine. ''The so-called 'creative types' who seemingly belonged to this secret society of Mac users while the rest of the working public toiled in a clunky PC world.'' In 2002 Apple suffered with the majority of the technology industry and posted its first profit loss since 1997. In mid-2002 Apple officially replaced its ''Think Different'' campaign with one titled ''Switchers.''

FURTHER READING

"Apple Launches Brand Advertising Campaign Premiering This Sunday on Toy Story." PR Newswire, September 26, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "When Ads Get Creative, Some Click, Some Bomb." USA Today, December 15, 1997.

Judge, Michael. "Apple Should 'Think Different' about Asia." Wall Street Journal Europe, April 24, 1998.

Levy, Steven. "Hello Again: A New Computer, the iMac, from Apple Computer." Newsweek, May 18, 1998.

Mahoney, Jerry. "Dell Ads Tout Image Not Product." Austin American-Statesman, June 15, 1998.

Picarille, Lisa. "The Apple Report: Jobs in the Spotlight." CMP Techwire, October 17, 1997.

"Relationship Marketing." Brandweek, April 20, 1998.

"Slice-of-Life Truism a Bell-Ringer for Southwestern." Advertising Age, May 18, 1998.

Rebecca Stanfel

AT&T Inc.

175 E. Houston Street
San Antonio, Texas 78205-2233
USA
Telephone: (210) 821-4105
Fax: (210) 821-4105
Web site: www.att.com

■■■

CARROT TOP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1982 the U.S. government mandated the breakup of the vast network of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company (AT&T) into smaller regional companies, the so-called Baby Bells. The regional companies handled local telephone calls, while AT&T continued to offer long-distance service. One area in which the new AT&T decisively lagged behind its competitors was in collect calls. The AT&T brand, 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls, had an uphill battle to overtake the category leader, or at least to gain market share, in long-distance collect calls, an area that was itself dwindling.

In order to address the problem, AT&T initiated a national campaign in 2001 to win the hearts and minds of young callers. The campaign was the brainchild of AT&T's longtime advertising agency, Foote, Cone & Belding Worldwide of New York, but in October 2001 AT&T switched agencies, giving Young & Rubicam of New York all of its consumer advertising business. Young & Rubicam also inherited the latest ad campaign for 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls, which featured the brash young comic Carrot Top, the stage name of Scott Thompson. The integrated "Carrot Top" campaign consisted mainly of 15- and 30-second television spots, but it also included radio spots, print ads in newspapers and consumer magazines, outdoor signage, public relations work, ads shown in movie theaters, special events, and an online interactive component. The media expenditure for the campaign was in excess of $20 million.

By August 2003 the "Carrot Top" campaign had met or exceeded all of its goals, and in 2004 it received a Bronze EFFIE Award for its marketplace effectiveness. Not only did the brand become more recognizable to the target market, but market share and revenue increased over a period of more than two years.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The 1982 court ruling that broke up AT&T created numerous rivals in the telecommunications field. With the various regional Baby Bells providing local services, AT&T concentrated on long-distance services and ancillary businesses such as the sales of telephony hardware. At first this arrangement seemed to work well, but by the early twenty-first century the telecommunications landscape looked a lot different than it had 20 years earlier. In response, the leadership of AT&T decided to split the company into four units: AT&T Business, AT&T Wireless, AT&T Broadband, and AT&T Consumer. The consumer unit was responsible for most long-distance calling, including the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls brand. "Carrot Top" was not the brand's first advertising campaign, nor was Carrot Top its first spokesperson; he followed the actor David Arquette. Foote, Cone & Belding ostensibly had chosen the edgy comedian because of his appeal to young people, and Young & Rubicam seconded the choice when it took over the account.

Carrot Top (Scott Thompson), a spokesperson for AT&T. AP IMAGES.

TARGET MARKET

The majority of collect telephone calls were made by people between the ages of 16 and 24, and this was precisely the group for which Carrot Top held the highest appeal. He was well known as a comic on the college campus circuit and as someone who projected an anti-corporate image. This type of image was especially important in attracting people in the target age group, since in many cases the first instinct of such people was to question, or even reject out of hand, authority or corporate messages. Although collect calling was not something young people spent much time thinking about beforehand, Carrot Top was the type of celebrity with whom this audience could identify. A secondary target market consisted of people 25 to 34 years of age.

COMPETITION

AT&T faced a variety of competition in the collect calling marketplace. The competition ranged from store-bought calling cards to the Baby Bells, Sprint, and, most important, MCI, whose own collect calling brand, 1-800-COLLECT, was the industry leader. A different type of competition altogether was coming from cellular phone services. As more and more people within both the primary and the secondary target markets were becoming cell phone users, cell phones were cutting into the overall collect calling market. In fact, from the beginning of 1999 through the end of 2002 the collect calling market shrank approximately 68 percent. Likewise, cell phones were deemed responsible for the decline in the number of public pay telephones, obvious points of usage for collect callers.

Gaining ground on the enormous lead in market share enjoyed by MCI's 1-800-COLLECT was the priority of the "Carrot Top" campaign. MCI's 1-800-COLLECT advertising also used celebrity spokespeople, ranging from basketball superstar Michael Jordan to pop singer Britney Spears. In addition, as Young & Rubicam acknowledged in the EFFIE Awards Brief of Effectiveness, 1-800-COLLECT had become the generic name for the category, making it more or less the default number for collect callers, which presented a major obstacle to overcome. Two other obstacles acknowledged in the Brief of Effectiveness were the facts that there was no obvious benefit to callers to switch to 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls and that the brand was not part of a subscriber service. Thus, continual reinforcement was required to gain market share.

THE BREAKUP OF MA BELL

In 1974 the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) filed an antitrust suit against AT&T, seeking the breakup of the telecommunications giant popularly known as "Ma Bell." The suit did not come to trial until January 15, 1981, however. With Judge Harold Green presiding, the trial lasted until January 8, 1982, when both parties came to an agreement that called for the breakup of AT&T. The breakup took place on January 1, 1984. The regional phone companies, the "Baby Bells," took over local telephone service, while parent AT&T retained long-distance service. In effect, this was how things had stood when AT&T was formed in 1885. The nineteenth-century model, if that was what the DOJ was striving for, was turned on its head, however. Not only did AT&T have competition from other long-distance service providers, but through mergers some of the Baby Bells quickly became stronger than AT&T. In 2005 the one-time monopolistic corporation was taken over by SBC, a former Baby Bell.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Young & Rubicam identified four objectives for the "Carrot Top" campaign, with the achievement of each of the first three objectives leading to the next one. The first of the goals was to instill recall of the 1-800 Call ATT number in the target audience. It was believed that this would lead to achieving the second goal, which was to increase interest in the brand. Increased interest would, it was believed, then lead to the third goal, an increase in market share. The final goal of the campaign was to equal or exceed planned revenue.

Young & Rubicam, which took over the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls account from Foote, Cone & Belding in October 2001, retained Carrot Top in the advertising. The comedian had been AT&T's collect calling spokesperson since June 2001, and Foote, Cone & Belding deemed him able to deliver on the objectives of the campaign. The decision was not without controversy, however. Outside the target market Carrot Top was seen by some people as having an obnoxious persona. Media critics in particular seemed to enjoy reviling him, with at least one writer appearing to border on the libelous. In a Brandweek article by Todd Wasserman, Carol Eversen, general manager for 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls, responded to the Carrot Top criticism. "We've noticed it," she said. "He is noticed. [There are] no questions within the market we're targeting he's been a big success."

Carrot Top's success as a comedian was explained by his irreverent attitude, his sense of humor, and his in-your-face attitude. This was exactly what appealed to the target audience. Furthermore, within the spots he used catchy phrases that reinforced directly either the product or its benefits. These included turning the brand name into a rhythm—"C-A-L-L-A-T-T"—and by making it easy and cool to use the number—"Dial down the center." This phrase referred to the fact that the letters CALL ATT were positioned on the center numbers—2, 5 and 8—of the telephone keypad. Another pivotal phrase was "Free for you and cheap for them," bolstering the target market's argument for dialing 1-800 Call ATT, presumably to phone their parents.

Perhaps more than for most advertising campaigns, it was important that the "Carrot Top" spots be placed where they would have the highest visibility for the target market. The obvious choices, therefore, were music, sports, and sports entertainment, including professional-wrestling television programs. By 2003 "Carrot Top" spots were seen during telecasts of MTV and MTV2, VH1, Much Music, ESPN and ESPN2, and WWE professional wrestling. Not only did these shows attract a high percentage of the target market, but they also melded readily with Carrot Top's persona.

One interesting feature of the "Carrot Top" campaign evolved from a spot that was originally scheduled for theatrical release. Young & Rubicam hired the director Billy Jayne, who shot the spot with a Sony 24p high-definition camera. As Debra Kaufman reported in Millimeter, "[Young & Rubicam] producer Paisley McCaffery felt confident that the AT&T commercial could be shot 24p and then easily transferred back to film for big-screen theatrical exhibition. Eventually, the theatrical commercial evolved into a 14-spot national television campaign—all shot in 24p." Kaufman also quoted McCaffery on the switch to the less expensive digital high-definition: "Originally, when we inherited the account, it was a very simple commercial. Now we're telling bigger stories with multiple setups, and making it visually a lot more active and action-packed in the way we can tell the story. Working with the HD camera allows us to capture more when we're in an ad-lib situation, and it's affordable enough to allow us to use two cameras." The "Carrot Top" campaign became one of the earliest high-profile national campaigns to be shot with a Sony 24p high-definition camera.

In September 2003 Carrot Top himself alluded to the ad-lib situations in an interview with Gregory Solman published in Adweek: "We shoot what's approved, and we shoot what I come up with. Then they can choose." In the interview Carrot Top also discussed what Solman termed his "love/hate persona," something Young & Rubicam had played up in the spots: "As long as I'm part of the joke, I think it's great . . . I think it's great to make fun of myself."

That attitude and the evolving tone of the spots both came through when the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls brand was connected with a NASCAR promotion in which Carrot Top was teamed up with popular race car driver Rusty Wallace. Running during April 2002, the promotion used radio and print media as well as television. As Wasserman described it in Brandweek, "At the end of the TV spot Wallace exits with denim miniskirted model Angie Everhart . . . and gives a shove to Carrot Top, who doubles over." The object of the promotion was to encourage people to use the 1-800 Call ATT number by running a contest in which 20 randomly chosen people were matched with drivers for a specific race. The winners were those contestants whose drivers finished among the top three. Winners received two tickets to any future NASCAR race, $300 in spending money, three days in a hotel, and airfare. The hook was that the more a person used the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls service the better his or her chances were of being chosen.

In addition to the NASCAR promotion, other special events were used to reinforce the "Carrot Top" campaign message. These included advertising on MTV Spring Break, the MTV Video Music Awards, the National Basketball Association All-Star Game, the ESPN X Games, and WWE Wrestlemania. There also was an interactive website allied with the campaign.

OUTCOME

The "Carrot Top" campaign for the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls brand achieved all of its goals. The first goal was to increase the recall of the 1-800 Call ATT number by 7 points per year. Recall actually increased by slightly more than 28 points during the 18-month span from February 2002 to August 2003. The campaign also met its goal to increase interest in the brand by 5 points, and by August 2003, 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls had even exceeded rival 1-800 COLLECT. This allowed the brand to narrow the market share gap with 1-800 COLLECT from almost 16 points to 10 points by the end of 2002. Over a two-year period the AT&T brand increased its market share by 8 points, and by August 2003 revenue had exceeded the target by 12 percent. The "Carrot Top" campaign was also a success within the industry, winning a Bronze EFFIE Award in 2004.

While business was looking up for the 1-800 Call ATT for Collect Calls brand, the AT&T Consumer division as a whole did not fare as well. In the fourth quarter of 2003 AT&T had only 9 percent of all revenue in the telecommunications market, though it was still the long-distance leader, with a 28 percent share. In 2004, however, the company threw in the towel on its AT&T Consumer division to focus on business-to-business services. In a 2004 Brandweek article Wasserman speculated that the company's $50 million television and print business-to-business campaign "could be the swan song for the 119-year-old brand."

AT&T executives noted that approximately 80 percent of the company's revenues were linked to its business-to-business services, and most analysts felt that the decision to drop the consumer division was probably made to prepare the company for acquisition. Wasserman quoted Randy Ringer, a managing partner of the branding firm Verse Group in New York, who said, "I expect that the AT&T brand itself will disappear soon or will live on as a trademark that is licensed by others who will put it on phones, equipment and so on." This prediction of AT&T's future were correct, for in 2005 SBC acquired AT&T, and in the acquisition the AT&T name was retained. Ironically SBC had originally been Southwest Bell, one of the Baby Bells created by the breakup of AT&T in the 1980s.

FURTHER READING

"For the Record." Advertising Age, October 29, 2001.

Grimm, Matthew. "False Consciousness." Brandweek, September 3, 2001.

Kaufman, Debra. "Seeking HD Spots." Millimeter, March 1, 2003.

Norton, Justin M., and Andrew McMains. "AT&T Wireless Sends Feelers Out: Keeshan, Ex-Saatchi Exec, Is Overseeing $300–400 Mil. Search." Adweek, March 12, 2001.

"1-800 CALL ATT for Collect Calls: Carrot Top." EFFIE Awards Brief of Effectiveness, 2004.

Sheridan, Patricia. "Carrot Top." Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 11, 2002.

Solman, Gregory. "Carrot Top on the Spot." Adweek, September 8, 2003.

Wasserman, Todd. "Promotions: AT&T Redials Carrot Top, Hitches Ride with NASCAR." Brandweek, April 1, 2002.

———. "Strategy: AT&T: We're All About Business Now." Brandweek, August 9, 2004.

"Who/What/Wi-Fi." CFO: The Magazine for Senior Financial Executives, March, 2003.

Frank Caso

IT'S ALL WITHIN YOUR REACH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the 1990s the telecommunications giant AT&T found itself competing against new rivals. Telecommunications companies had expanded their products and services beyond long-distance telephone service and were offering cellular phones, Internet access, and cable television. Consumers were satisfied with the new low-priced choices available to them but were often overwhelmed by the number of companies entering the telecommunications marketplace. AT&T chose to address this increasing complexity by establishing an emotional connection with consumers in an advertising campaign tagged "It's All Within Your Reach."

Introduced in early 1997, "It's All Within Your Reach" did not address the nuts and bolts of AT&T's product offerings, nor did the campaign mention the pricing of its various services. Instead the TV spots that ran through 1998 depicted scenes in which communications technologies made customers' lives better in various ways. For instance, one spot showed a working mother who was able to field a conference call while entertaining her children at the beach. Another commercial showed a son visiting Vietnam in order to understand what his father experienced there as a soldier; during his trip the son made an emotional phone call to his father using an AT&T calling card. The campaign's budget was $53.3 million in its first year and $44.6 million in its second.

The campaign was well received by consumers and advertising-industry critics, and it won numerous awards, including a Gold EFFIE in 1998. Although AT&T continued to employ the campaign tagline in 1999 and 2000, it did virtually no corporate-image advertising in these years, and its brand image came under fire for its lack of focus and relevance.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The company name AT&T was at one time synonymous with long-distance phone service, but during the 1990s the telecommunications industry underwent dramatic changes. Competitors such as MCI and Sprint were steadily gaining market share at AT&T's expense. In the wake of deregulation, long-distance and local phone companies began dipping into each other's markets, offering the variety of services AT&T once had a unique hold on. New, smaller, and more aggressive competitors had also surfaced, offering "dial-around" services that gave consumers the ability to punch in an access code to circumvent their long-distance carrier. In addition, emerging technologies such as Internet access, electronic commerce, and wireless phones were changing the face of telecommunications and forcing AT&T to alter its business strategy.

In this fiercely competitive marketplace AT&T's growth had stalled, and its stock value was falling. The consumer division was losing customers more rapidly than the company had anticipated. In 1996 AT&T's consumer long-distance revenues grew only 1 percent, and its business-division revenues climbed just 5 percent. AT&T claimed 54 percent of the residential long-distance market in 1996 as opposed to 60 percent just one year earlier.

TARGET MARKET

"The telecommunications market had steadily become a commodity category. It was all about price," stated Elizabeth McKee, vice president and account director at Young & Rubicam Advertising. In the early 1990s AT&T was swept up in the price wars with other long-distance providers. In 1997 it recognized that, as a leader and the company with the most to lose, it needed to step above the price fray. Although separate advertising campaigns were used to promote specific products and services, AT&T sought to generate broad emotional resonance around its brand with the "It's All Within Your Reach" campaign—and to do so in a way that portrayed it as attuned to the changing telecommunications landscape.

CONFUSING, COMPETITIVE, AND DOWNRIGHT NASTY

Telecommunications commercials historically performed poorly in consumer polls that measured campaign popularity and effectiveness. Of more than 90 spots reviewed by USA Today 's Ad Track since 1995, telecommunications spots consistently ranked among the least popular and most disliked campaigns. Consumers complained that the commercials were often confusing, competitive, and mean-spirited.

The intended audience for the brand campaign was, accordingly, "primary active networkers," which AT&T defined as people who were balancing family and work and who actively communicated by traditional phone, wireless phone, or the Internet. AT&T was not alone in targeting this core market. The entire telecommunications category had begun shifting its focus from long-distance callers to the active networker. Technological innovations were rapidly providing consumers with multiple ways to communicate. In order to stay competitive, telecommunications companies needed to provide a full spectrum of these products and services. Some unusual corporate alliances formed in 1997 to take advantage of synergistic technologies. For instance, the Internet giant America Online (AOL) created a joint offering with Tel-Save, a long-distance provider. According to Wendy Brown, vice president of electronic commerce at AOL, online users tended to have higher than average incomes and higher than average monthly phone bills. While the average consumer spent about $22 each month on long distance, the average online user spent about $40.

Despite its declining long-distance market share, AT&T was well positioned to compete in this new marketplace in which companies sold a bundle of services not limited to long distance. A BusinessWeek article in 1996 noted that AT&T had all the right ingredients for success: an expansive cellular network, plans to offer local service in every state, a stake in pay-TV service, and an Internet strategy. In order to gain and keep the business of these active networkers, AT&T recognized that it would have to fulfill active networkers' needs in fresh ways. AT&T WorldNet president Dan Schulman told Advertising Age, "As we look into the future, we will start transitioning our customer care from 'fix it when it's broken' to 'help people with the new technology and enable them.'"

COMPETITION

In previous years the long-distance market was AT&T's stronghold. But in the face of so many new competitors, it found itself losing ground. According to the Yankee Consulting Group, AT&T's market share for long-distance phone services was chipped from 62.7 percent in 1995 down to 60.6 percent in 1996.

The breadth of telecommunications services had expanded to such an extent that simply defining AT&T's competitors was difficult. Two years earlier the so-called "Big Three"—AT&T, MCI, and Sprint—had controlled 90 percent of the long-distance calls in the United States. Suddenly smaller, more flexible rivals such as Telco Communications, Excel Communications, and Qwest were nipping at that market share. AT&T, as the market leader, took the hardest blows. In July 1996 AT&T reported a scant 5 percent growth in long-distance call volume compared with 15 percent for MCI and 19 percent for Sprint. Local phone companies also presented a challenge to AT&T when they began providing long-distance service. A Price Waterhouse survey in 1997 showed that 40 percent of those consumers polled preferred to get their telecommunications service from a local phone company, while only 21 percent wanted it from a long-distance carrier. "Dial-around" companies also bit into AT&T's market share. These services offered callers the ability to dial into a discount service on a call-by-call basis, circumventing their long-distance carrier. Prepaid calling cards presented another assault on AT&T's core business. These cards allowed callers to pay in advance for calling time with smaller, alternative carriers.

The advertising campaigns produced by AT&T's major competitors continued to fan the flames of the price war. MCI promoted the value of its long-standing Friends & Family calling plan and 1-800-COLLECT service, and Sprint commercials featured actress Candice Bergen explaining the company's low-cost calling plans. Advertising for the smaller telecommunications companies focused almost exclusively on their inexpensive rates.

In the emerging telecommunications category of Internet services, AT&T was up against large competitors such as AOL and Microsoft as well as local Internet service providers. This market represented tremendous future potential; once the glitches in Internet-voice-communication technology were resolved, the Internet promised to be a new source of long-distance and international calling. In the expanding arena of wireless services, AT&T's strongest competition came from NexTel Communications and Sprint. In April 1997 Jeff Kagan, president of Kagan Telecom Associates, a telecommunications consultancy group, summed up the competitive environment in a USA Today article. "AT&T has got to move quickly," Kagan said. "A year from now, it will either be on top of the world or eating dust. It won't be the same. The world is moving too fast."

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1997 AT&T worked with Young & Rubicam Advertising to develop a new marketing strategy. AT&T no longer wanted to compete solely on the basis of price. The new strategy would focus on building long-lasting relationships with customers, not simply selling specific services or products. "To move from being product-centered to being customer-focused is seismic, not insignificant," AT&T president John Walter told USA Today. "Every aspect of what we are doing is about the customer. That is a total reversal in our procedures and our strategic intent."

In order to heighten consumers' perceptions of AT&T as a brand, the commercials took what Burke Stinson, district manager of media relations at AT&T, called "an old-fashioned approach." He explained, "The approach was cinematic rather than commercial. The AT&T products on display are incidental to the central theme of people communicating." Each spot featured an emotional glimpse of life in the high-tech 1990s. Ted Bell, worldwide creative director at Young & Rubicam, told USA Today, "AT&T is not just a phone company. It's selling a lot of sophisticated high-tech services, and that can sometimes scare people. One of the best ways to offset the fear is to focus on the emotional needs that can be met by using AT&T's products."

The corporate branding account helmed by Young & Rubicam—one among numerous AT&T advertising assignments—was allotted $53.3 million of AT&T's nearly $1 billion total marketing budget in 1997. That year's spots included "Teen Date," in which a teenage girl came home from a date and continued her budding flirtations with the boy online. Another spot, "Beaches," depicted a working mother whose young daughters convinced her to play hooky from work and take them to the beach, where she was able to take an important conference call using her cellular phone. In a spot titled "Rocket Man" a husband traveling on business faxed his wife from the airplane, asking her to be on the porch to take his call that night. Each of the commercials featured classic pop or country songs that appealed to baby boomers' nostalgia. National print ads used the same tagline and similar imagery.

The same spots continued to run in 1998 and were supplemented by new ones, including a Super Bowl commercial that showed teenagers gossiping—via fax, E-mail, pager, and other new technologies—about a romance that was developing among their ranks. The most striking of the 1998 spots, however, had actually been filmed and slated to run in the campaign's first year. Set to the Crosby, Stills, and Nash song "Long Time Gone," the commercial recounted a young soldier's trip to contemporary Vietnam, where his father had fought a generation earlier. The journey's emotional resonance reached its dramatic peak when the son, using an AT&T calling card, phoned his father in America to tell him where he was. AT&T executives, fearful of offending people still sensitive to the unresolved issues surrounding the Vietnam War, had withheld their approval to run the spot for nearly a year before yielding to the pleas of Crosby, Stills, and Nash's David Crosby and Young & Rubicam's chairman and chief executive Edward H. Vick (a highly decorated Vietnam veteran), both of whom felt passionate about the spot. The budget for the campaign's second year was $44.6 million.

OUTCOME

In a field of telecommunications commercials that virtually shouted about low prices, AT&T's commercials were a welcome change to many television viewers. In recent years telecommunications advertising had become something that consumers endured rather than enjoyed. The AT&T campaign proved to be an exception. In fact, advertising critic Dottie Enrico of USA Today reported that "AT&T's latest corporate ad campaign has achieved the near-impossible in the telecommunications industry." She explained that almost one-third of the consumers questioned in an Ad Track poll conducted by the newspaper said that they liked the AT&T "All Within Your Reach" campaign. The ads were especially popular with women—41 percent of women and 19 percent of men said they liked the ads very much—and with consumers in the 18 to 24 age bracket—almost 40 percent said the campaign was effective, versus 24 percent of those polled in the 30 to 39 age range.

Advertising aficionados found plenty to like about the commercials, too. The campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award for its effectiveness in the category of corporate reputation, image, and identity. "Teen Date" was singled out by Adweek as one of the 50 best spots of the year. "Beaches" was a finalist for an International ANDY Award. In the American Advertising Awards (ADDYs) national competition, AT&T received an ADDY for the "Beaches," "Rocket Man," and "Teen Date" trio and also received citations for two individual commercials. At the District 2 ADDY Awards, AT&T took home three awards. A spot called "Father and Son" was a finalist in the prestigious One Show. At the New York Festival's International Television Advertising Competition, the campaign won Best of Show and Best Campaign for Telecommunications. At the same festival AT&T took home a silver for print executions of the campaign.

Despite these successes, 1999 saw AT&T virtually abandon the branding strategy introduced with "It's All Within Your Reach." The company's corporate-image advertising expenditures were slashed, accounting for a mere $8.9 million of its overall marketing budget that year. Although the "It's All Within Your Reach" tagline remained in place through 2000, AT&T focused its marketing resources on individual business segments as it continued searching for ways to update its overall brand. The most prominent AT&T campaigns in these years included one in which the actor Paul Reiser touted the company's long-distance rates and one in which the actor David Arquette pitched the dial-around service 1-800-CALL-ATT. A critical May 2000 report issued by the Boston market-research firm Yankee Group, titled "AT&T in the Brave New World of the Internet: A Brand Out of Time," suggested that AT&T had failed to create a consistent brand image and risked becoming irrelevant in the Internet age.

FURTHER READING

Comiteau, Jennifer. "New Branding Ads for AT&T." Adweek, March 3, 1997.

Elliott, Stuart. "AT&T Ad Filmed in Vietnam Was a Long Time Coming." New York Times, July 24, 1998.

Enrico, Dottie. "AT&T Makes Connection with Ad Campaign." USA Today, May 19, 1997, p. 06B.

Garfield, Bob. "AT&T Presses the Right High-Tech Buttons." Advertising Age, March 10, 1997.

Rosenbush, Steve. "Putting the Buzz Back into AT&T." USA Today, April 4, 1997, p. 01B.

Snyder, Beth. "Telcos, Internet Companies Team Up." Advertising Age, April 1998.

Verity, John W.. "AT&T Is Being Bitten on the Ankles." BusinessWeek, August 5, 1996.

Vranica, Suzanne,"AT&T to Use FCB, Y&R for Image Ads." Wall Street Journal, August 23, 2000.

Kim Kazemi
Mark Lane

PRIVACY MANAGER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Ameritech became AT&T Inc. The essay continues to refer to Ameritech, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

The first campaign for Ameritech from its new advertising agency, Ammirati Lintas Puris of New York, was launched on October 6, 1997, in an attempt to move customers from simply recognizing the brand to preferring it over other telecommunications companies. The following year's campaign took an even more aggressive stance, with the goal of creating "active preference" in consumers—in other words, that they not only prefer the Ameritech brand but actually switch to it from other brands or expand their existing Ameritech services.

The company provided firepower for such an ambitious goal. In an article by Sally Beatty in the Wall Street Journal, Richard Notebaert, CEO of Ameritech, was quoted as saying, "We have never had a product test this good." He was referring to the Privacy Manager system, a service that worked in conjunction with Caller ID, whereby Ameritech intercepted calls from unidentified callers and requested that they identify themselves. In test runs 7 out of 10 calls did not make it through this first screening process and ring through to the customers, and as with collect calls, those that did offered customers the option of accepting or rejecting the calls depending on the callers' recorded identification of themselves. With the rise in unsolicited telemarketing calls flooding into homes, Privacy Manager "satisfied a need that consumers have been pleading to have resolved," said Notebaert.

The 1997 campaign personalized Ameritech by presenting a number of its employees as profiled by their own relatives—a wife, a nephew, and a father—who discussed the Ameritech workers' commitment to providing outstanding service to customers. The 1998 campaign further personalized Ameritech's services by presenting vignettes of inviolable family moments, such as reading a story to the kids at bedtime and shampooing their hair at bath time. Beneath these serene scenes Ammirati superimposed text about the Privacy Manager: "Would you interrupt this moment for an aluminum siding deal? Introducing Privacy Manager, a new service from Ameritech. It stops unwanted, unidentified calls before your phone even rings. Interested? For availability in your area, call 1-800-PRIVACY." The understated simplicity of the spots won critical praise, and the launch of the Privacy Manager system was a business success.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In July 1997 Ameritech awarded the creative portion of its $100 million advertising account to Ammirati Puris Lintas, which beat out contender BBDO of New York, to end a four-month account review. The move consolidated Ameritech's corporate, small business, and residential advertising, which had been split between Fallon McElligott of Minneapolis, DDB Needham of Chicago, and Leo Burnett of Chicago. According to Joan Walker, Ameritech's senior vice president of corporate communications, as cited in an Adweek article by Alison Fahey, Ammirati won the account on the strength of its "strategic and creative insights." Ammirati creative director Tom Nelson explained, "Everybody came together and the creative department came through. Usually, we have great strategy and [fine tune] the creative later. This time it was a total lock." In order to service the account, Ammirati established an office in Chicago, where Ameritech was headquartered.

Ammirati revamped Ameritech's existing tag line—dating back to 1993 and revised in 1995 to become "Your Link to Better Communication"—changing it to read "In a World of Technology, People Make the Difference." The 1997 advertising campaign focused on three Ameritech people: repairman Ted, customer service representative Angela, and emergency relief worker Jack. But instead of portraying them telling their own stories, Ammirati shifted the focus to family members speaking about their dedication. This displacement maintained the humility of the workers while contributing to the atmosphere of the campaign, which sought to highlight Ameritech as a company that fostered lasting familial relationships with its customers.

According to Sean Horgan, writing in the Indianapolis Star, the strategy arose from in-depth research suggesting that "consumers always expect technological expertise and competitive prices, but make their final decisions based on which company is the most attentive to their needs." Ameritech thus sought to present itself as user-friendly and responsive to customers' needs. Lest these claims ring false, the company backed up its statements by spending as much as $1 billion over three years on substantive changes that included consolidated billing, employee and customer service training, and expanded products and services for small businesses. Above all, Ameritech sought to present its employees as attentive to the paramount importance of the telephone in modern life. "When you're doing telecommunications, you're doing something that makes a difference to the customer. The phone can be a lifeline. That makes our employees feel very important," said Karen Sheriff, Ameritech's director of corporate marketing and branding, in an Advertising Age article by Beth Snyder.

TARGET MARKET

By the time Ameritech hired Ammirati, the telecommunications corporation had achieved its goal of capturing consumer awareness, increasing brand recognition in its region from 8 percent in 1994 to 95 percent in 1997, or near complete saturation. Ameritech's brand message

AMERITECH IRONS OUT THE IRONY

Numerous commentators pointed out the irony of Ameritech offering its Privacy Manager system to residential customers to block out unsolicited telemarketing calls from even ringing into the home. After all, Ameritech's business included an arm devoted to telemarketing. Bob Garfield, the most acerbic of critics, commented in his Advertising Age review that "Ameritech protecting you from telemarketers is like R.J. Reynolds selling nicotine gum." Commentators who picked up on this irony were quick to add, however, that Ameritech's potential conflict of interest did not negate the benefits of the Privacy Manager system for consumers. Ameritech responded that it was simply answering consumer needs. "We have a variety of customers, some of whom have asked us for an intelligent way to manage calls into their home," said Ameritech representative Dave Onak in a 1998 Adweek article. "So we really see no irony in this." Furthermore, Ameritech maintained that "outbound" telemarketing, or calls into the home, represented a mere fraction of its overall business.

thus had to become more sophisticated, moving consumers from merely recognizing the brand to preferring it over competitors. "People are looking beyond technology for people who can help them," said Ameritech's Walker in an Adweek article by Trevor Jensen. Hence the "people-centered" campaign of 1997.

Ameritech did not, however, abandon technological innovation as a means of appealing to consumers and of distinguishing itself from competitors. At the time the hot telecommunications technology was Caller ID, which displayed the name and telephone number of the incoming caller. As of September 1997, 19 percent of households in the United States had Caller ID, whereas a year later some 31 percent of the country's households were using it. The Caller ID feature was not exclusive to Ameritech, however, and so the technology did not offer a clear point of distinction between Ameritech and the competition. Ameritech shrewdly extended the Caller ID concept into a more proactive system, gaining exclusivity with Privacy Manager. Ameritech applied for two patents to maintain the exclusivity and, in fact, intended to license the service to other telecommunications companies.

COMPETITION

Because the best means for growth for each company would be to carve into the other's regional strongholds, Bell Atlantic, which had merged with Nynex Corp., represented Ameritech's major competitor. According to Competitive Media Reporting, Bell Atlantic spent $160 million on advertising in 1996, compared to Ameritech's $73 million. Both companies launched new advertising campaigns in 1997. Whereas Ameritech's campaign leveraged family values and used fairly traditional techniques, Bell Atlantic attempted a more innovative strategy by riding the popular wave of animated advertising. Bell Atlantic did not abandon the past, however, as it retained the deep, resonating sound of James Earl Jones for its voice-overs. In addition, it used characters from Maurice Sendak's popular children's book Where the Wild Things Are, the first time Sendak had licensed the characters since his creation of them in 1963.

Bell Atlantic's ad agency—the Lord Group of New York—applied current advertising strategies to give its campaign a fully contemporary feel. The campaign commenced with unidentified teaser ads, a contemporary advertising technique for creating interest in a campaign by capturing consumers' attention and then further peaking their interest by leaving the identity of the advertiser a mystery. The teaser campaign started with outdoor advertising, including the 300-foot billboard adjacent to Manhattan's Grand Central Station, a hub of commuter traffic and hence a highly visible site. Fifteen-second commercials, which began running on October 13, 1997, followed up on the outdoor effort by depicting the approaching footfalls of a Sendak cartoon monster, who burst through a white television screen containing the message "Wild things are happening." The monster then pulled down a new screen containing the Bell Atlantic logo, like a history teacher pulling down a political map.

Two weeks later, on October 27, 1997, 30- and 60-second spots broke, accompanied by magazine and newspaper spreads, fully unveiling the campaign by extending the tag line to read, "Wild things are happening. Bell Atlantic. We'll see you there." The ads supported the theme by portraying the Sendak monsters guiding children through mazelike jungles. Snyder pointed out in her Advertising Age article that, according to Ray Smith, Bell Atlantic's CEO, the campaign, which continued into 1998, was intended to "establish Bell Atlantic as the friendly, gentle giant leading customers through the communications jungle."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Ammirati hired veteran director Bob Giraldi of bicoastal Giraldi Suarez Productions—known for what Advertising

Age critic Bob Garfield called "bombastic '80s-era music videos" —to direct a series of five spots that introduced consumers to the Privacy Manager system. Giraldi responded with commercials that went counter to his stereotype, employing understatement instead of pushing the product with a hard sell. Giraldi easily could have resorted to presenting the problem, probably to great comic or shocking effect, by depicting the most heinous of privacy invasions by telemarketers. Instead, Giraldi and the Ammirati team—which included creative directors Jon Moore and Tim Kane, art director Sharon Dershin, copywriter Jody Finver, and producer Mary Ann Marino—chose to focus on the solution, depicting the kinds of familial and intimate scenes that would not be interrupted by unwanted telemarketing calls in those households that employed Privacy Manager.

"Rubber Ducky," one of the most memorable and effective of the spots, portrayed a father shampooing his son, who sat in a bathtub singing his ABCs. Giraldi positioned the camera to view the scene from the next room, with the bathroom door framing the shot, as if to respect the sacred space of this communal moment between father and son. Similarly, in the spot entitled "Snooze," he angled the camera from the foot of the bed so that the audience focused on the father's feet sandwiched between the two sets of his daughters' feet. Even the book, which the father held open to their nighttime story, hid their faces, maintaining privacy. No voice-over interrupted the scenes. Instead, information about Privacy Manager scrolled unobtrusively across the bottom of the screen, further supporting the sense of respect for personal space.

The advertisers were so confident of the desirability of the Privacy Manager system that they limited their sales pitch to one word: "Interested?" "Hell yes, I'm interested," Garfield responded in his review of the ads. Ameritech had succeeded in tapping into a nearly universal revulsion to telemarketers. "People don't like telemarketers," explained Fred Voit, consumer communications analyst with the Boston-based market research firm Yankee Group. While Voit stopped short of predicting the demise of telemarketing, as not all consumers annoyed by telemarketers would pay the extra monthly charges for Privacy Manager on top of the charges for the necessary Caller ID, he did, nevertheless, expect there to be a demand for the service.

OUTCOME

Garfield, the tough ad critic for Advertising Age, gave the Ameritech Privacy Manager campaign a rating of 3 1/2 out of a possible 4 stars. He praised the marketing technique behind the five commercials in the campaign, which "dramatize the product benefits magnificently." He complimented director Giraldi for "turn[ing] out cinematic vignettes of surpassing tenderness." Describing the atmosphere of the spots, Garfield explained that the "mood, the moments are sublime." The Advertising Women of New York joined Garfield in praising the campaign by giving Giraldi a 1999 Addy Award in the category of best direction for his work on the campaign.

It was interesting that even the contingent that stood to lose the most from the innovation applauded it. The American Telemarketing Association released a press statement maintaining that the organization had "always supported consumer choice in receiving information on goods and services over the phone." The advent of the Privacy Manager sent the message to telemarketers that they needed to modify their strategies, since households were taking measures to protect themselves from existing telemarketing techniques. "I truly believe we're at the saturation level," commented telemarketing consultant Rudy Oetting of Oetting & Co. of New York. He saw the potential benefit of the Privacy Manager system to the telemarketing field in forcing it to improve techniques of targeting and reaching consumers who were truly interested in the services or products offered. Services such as Privacy Manager "will cause marketers who use the telephone channel to become more selective and creative in their approach so that people who do receive calls will be interested in what they're being called about," stated Oetting in Beatty's Wall Street Journal article.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally. "Ameritech's New Phone Service Aims to Keep Telemarketers at Bay." Wall Street Journal, September 23, 1998.

Fahey, Alison. "Ammirati Wins Ameritech's $100 Mil. Consolidated Account." Adweek, July 21, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Ameritech Connects with Its Privacy Pitch." Advertising Age, October 12, 1998.

Horgan, Sean. "Ameritech Launches a New Ad Campaign." Indianapolis Star, October 7, 1997.

Snyder, Beth. "Bell Atlantic, Ameritech Follow Different Ad Paths: Ameritech Tries Traditional, Bell Atlantic Going a Little Wild." Advertising Age, October 13, 1997.

William D. Baue

Audi of America, Inc.

3800 Hamlin Road
Auburn Hills, Michigan 48326
USA
Telephone: (248) 754-5000
Web site: www.audiusa.com

■■■

ART OF THE HEIST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The car maker Audi of America, Inc. (AoA), was the American arm of the German company Audi AG. The Michigan-based automaker's advertising changed drastically in fall 2004 when Stephen Berkov took control as marketing director. The first vehicle launched under Berkov's supervision was the new Audi A3, a luxury wagon that AoA planed to release in mid-2005. Berkov defined the A3's target market as 25- to 34-year-old upper-income males. Aware that this target disliked mainstream advertisements, Berkov oversaw the release of an atypical campaign titled "Art of the Heist."

Created by the ad agency McKinney & Silver and the production firm Chelsea Pictures/Campfire, "Art of the Heist" employed audience participation via the Internet and outside events to shape the campaign's narrative. Ad critics used the gaming phrase "alternate-reality game" (ARG) to describe the campaign's blend of reality, fiction, and audience participation. The $3 million to $4 million campaign began on March 31, 2005, three months before the A3 was available. The campaign first surfaced when an Audi A3 was reportedly "stolen" from the rotating display at the New York Auto Show. For the next three months McKinney & Silver used real events, along with integrated television, print, and online advertising, to tell the story of a thwarted art heist. The campaign's narrative featured the characters Nisha Roberts and Ian Yarbrough driving across America in an Audi A3 while being chased by hit men. The "Heist" actors made public appearances at the popular Coachella Music Festival and on the music TV channel VH1. Television spots and magazine ads posed as real alerts about the stolen A3 until the campaign ended in late June 2005.

Advertising critics credited "Art of the Heist" with being the auto industry's first ARG campaign. It garnered the Best in Show award at the 2005 MIXX Awards, an advertising-industry event sponsored by the Interactive Advertising Bureau and Adweek magazine. In 2005 sales of A3s surpassed AoA's original expectations. During May 2005 the automaker's website also registered 30 percent more visitors than it had in the previous May.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Audi of America was the U.S. branch of Audi AG, 99 percent of which was owned by Volkswagen AG in 1999. AoA's advertising shifted drastically when Stephen Berkov, who had previously headed advertising for the German-based Audi AG, was reassigned in 2004 as marketing director for AoA. To allocate more capital for advertising, the newly appointed director disbanded AoA's e-business team and reduced spending on the company's online infrastructure. Berkov also reduced AoA's dependency on multiple ad agencies and allocated more control to McKinney & Silver, which had done work for the company since 1993. Referring to AoA's advertising account, Berkov said to Advertising Age, "I wanted it integrated because it blurred the brand too much."

To advertise its all-new A4 model, in early 2005 AoA released its "Sum of All Parts Challenge" campaign. The campaign included the tagline "Never Follow," a slogan used for all AoA models. "We said, 'let's break out of just doing banners,'" said Dave Cook, group creative director at McKinney & Silver to Adweek. "Let's have people do something." Resembling an online scavenger hunt, the "Sum of All Parts Challenge" asked consumers to collect nine different banner ads touting A4 features. Ads were placed on websites relating to finance, lifestyle, and automotive interests. The challenge's winner was eligible for a two-year lease on a new A4. Other prizes included personal digital assistants (PDAs) and high-end stereos.

Even though the A3 would not be available until mid-2005, Berkov wanted to target 25- to 34-year-olds starting in March. He believed that traditional television spots and print ads would not appeal to the car's target, who, he explained to Advertising Age, did not appreciate commercials "shouting at them, telling them what to buy. They smell artificial messaging and lack of authenticity." Instead Berkov wanted McKinney & Silver to create a campaign that engaged consumers as an alternate-reality computer game would.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted an audience of video-game enthusiasts, also called gamers, who enjoyed playing alternate-reality games (ARGs) that blended fiction with reality and were ultimately controlled by the games' designers, or "puppeteers." This target market, which Berkov profiled in the News & Observer as 23- to 34-year-old males, typically disliked traditional advertising that told consumers what to purchase. Also, according to advertising analysts, gamers typically avoided pop-up Internet ads by installing pop-up blockers on their computers. Many skipped through television spots by using TiVo, a television accessory allowing audiences to fast-forward through commercial breaks. Instead of being told what to purchase, gamers preferred to discover products on their own. "Engaging consumers so they follow your brand is the new holy grail," Brad Brinegar, the CEO of McKinney & Silver, was quoted in BusinessWeek Online.

Some marketing analysts titled this tech-savvy demographic as Generation C; the C abbreviated the word "creative." Generation C, according to Trendwatching.com's director Reinier Evers, created most of the content of Internet forums, online blogs, and virtual bulletin boards. McKinney & Silver thus used such sites to make contact with its target market, releasing important details about the "Art of the Heist" storyline on the campaign's main website, LastResortRetrieval.com. Actors playing roles in the campaign even answered questions in Internet chat rooms. Subsequent fan sites materialized during "Art of the Heist," and the campaigns' outcome was debated in blogs and bulletin boards.

In an approach that was unusual for advertising campaigns, the target that the agency chose for the "Art of the Heist" represented a different demographic from the one that AoA executives believed would actually purchase the product advertised. The target market for the Audi A3 wagon, which carried a price tag of more than $26,000, was defined by Berkov in BusinessWeek Online as 25- to 34-year-old males that were college-educated and earned more than $125,000 annually. This group was somewhat older and typically more affluent than the 23- to 34-year-old gamers. Creatives at McKinney & Silver assumed that if enough trendsetting gamers approved of the "Art of the Heist," their opinions would persuade the more-affluent A3 target market.

COMPETITION

In March 2005 Volkswagen of America (VWoA,) the American branch of the German automaker Volkswagen AG, released print ads, radio spots, television spots, and other events heralding its newly designed A5 Jetta, which was larger and more expensive than its predecessors. The campaign, titled "All Grown Up. Sort Of," was created by the agency Arnold Worldwide of Boston. It targeted 20-something consumers transitioning into adulthood. The campaign's first commercial, "Airport," featured a young businessman using his A5 Jetta to shuttle an older, conservative colleague from the airport. When the tense older executive turned on the Jetta's radio to "check the scores," the speakers blared loud rock music. The spot ended with the tagline "The

AUGUST'S AUDI

August Horch founded the car manufacturer Auto Union in 1932. The German-based company featured four models of cars, including a touring car called Audi, which was a Latin translation of the founder's first name. The corporation later dropped the name "Auto Union" in favor of "Audi."

AUDI VICTIMS NETWORK

In the 1980s an American Audi owner named Alice Weinstein claimed that a brake malfunction had caused her Audi 5000 to unexplainably accelerate. After suffering an injury from the reported malfunction, Weinstein sued AoA dealerships and created the Audi Victims Network. The CBS program 60 Minutes even reported on the incident, which eventually sent AoA sales into a downward spiral. Fortunately for AoA, the New York courts favored the AoA dealerships in a 1986 settlement.

new Jetta. It's all grown up. Sort of.'' In addition, as part of the campaign Arnold representatives distributed wooden puzzles and coloring books depicting adults performing mundane tasks until their lives were enlivened by the new Jetta. The campaign also included a six-minute film titled The Check Up, which featured a man in his late 20s humorously being criticized for not behaving like an adult.

On February 14, 2005, the ad agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky released a campaign titled ''Counterfeit'' to increase awareness about the premium small car MINI Cooper, a brand owned by Bayerische Motoren-Werke AG (BMW). Similar to ''Art of the Heist,'' the ''Counterfeit'' campaign used a nontraditional narrative that blended fiction and realty. It featured one television spot that warned of ''counterfeiters'' selling dilapidated cars as MINI Coopers. In addition to the one commercial, Crispin Porter + Bogusky created a fictional watchdog organization to educate the public about counterfeit MINIs. The 10-minute DVD spoof ''Counterfeit MINI Cooper'' could also be purchased on the website www.CounterfeitMini.org.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Art of the Heist'' began on March 31, 2005, when AoA announced that its brand-new Audi A3 had been stolen from the New York Auto Show. To reinforce the claim, McKinney & Silver distributed handbills in 10 cities that announced the missing Audi. The A3's vehicle identification number (VIN) was listed on the handbills. People who spotted the car were asked to call a phone number or visit Audi's website. From the website visitors were led to a fictitious company called Last Resort Retrieval, which supposedly retrieved stolen art from high-profile thieves. LastResortRetrieval.com served as the hub for the campaign's narrative and introduced the characters Nisha Roberts and Ian Yarbrough. A ''glitch'' on the website offered a glimpse into Last Resort Retrieval's private intranet, which was loaded with clues such as tapped phone calls, surveillance videos, and puzzles.

Ian and Nisha discovered that an art thief had stolen the A3 and that memory cards with information about an art heist were hidden inside the car. Ian retrieved the A3 from a New Jersey chop shop. The act spurred the original car's thief and then the police to chase Ian from the East Coast to the West Coast. To lend further credibility to the story, phony ''ads'' announcing the services and contact information of Last Resort Retrieval were placed in issues of Wired, Esquire, and USA Today.

''What was certainly surprising to us was the importance and impact of good, old-fashioned traditional media in helping make ['Art of the Heist'] explode,'' Lee Newman, the AoA account director at McKinney & Silver, said to Adweek. In May 2005 a television spot featured interior and exterior images of the new A3. To relate the commercial to the campaign's narrative, copy appeared during the spot asking the public to report the missing Audi to audiusa.com. ''It was like a chemistry experiment,'' Newman continued. ''Adding a little bit of this, a little of that—you really sort of get an explosion.''

Public events were also announced on LastResortRetrieval.com. The campaign changed unexpectedly for its creators after the website reported that Ian and Nisha were appearing on May 1 at the Coachella Valley Music Festival. When AoA's tent was inundated with fans earlier than expected, Chelsea Pictures, which produced the online video for the campaign, was forced to suddenly change the script. ''One of our [fictional] characters was killed as a result of that,'' Jonathan Cude, group creative director at McKinney & Silver, said to the News & Observer.

Fortunately for AoA and its ad agency, fans following the campaign began creating websites that speculated about the game's outcome. Even websites such as VWVortex.com, an automotive website, tracked the story. The campaign ended in late June at E3, a video game convention held at the Los Angeles Convention Center. Attendees, unaware that they were observing a staged performance, watched Ian physically apprehend the art thief responsible for the A3 robbery.

OUTCOME

AoA partially assessed the campaign's success by measuring traffic to AoA's U.S. website and Audi AG's international website. Total traffic for both sites in April 2005 was double the amount recorded during the same month in 2004. AoA estimated that 500,000 people followed the ''Art of the Heist'' storyline until its completion in June. The car company also reported that 33 percent of the website's visitors further searched for extended A3 features, such as dealer locations and lease options; this was higher than the 25 percent who further researched AoA's A4 model. The campaign was credited with preselling 500 A3s before they were even available in North America. "'The Art of the Heist' represents a true innovation in the way Audi connects with its target consumer," Berkov was quoted in the PR Newswire news service. "The power of this program comes from our deep understanding of the A3 target audience," Berkov continued.

Advertising critics praised "Art of the Heist" for being the first ARG campaign within the auto industry. It garnered the Best in Show award at the 2005 MIXX Awards, along with gold awards for online integration and product launch and a silver award within the word-of-mouth category. AoA and McKinney & Silver considered "Art of the Heist" a success when AoA posted 5,389 A3s sold at the year's end, making 2005 one of AoA's best years in its 73-year legacy.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Marketers Lure Consumers with Involvement, but Are They Asking Too Much?" Adweek, August 22, 2005.

Chon, Gina. "Advertising: Car Makers Hone Their Pitch Online." Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2005, p. B4.

Halliday, Jean. "Exec Uses 'Acupuncture Approach' to Craft Uniform Marketing Theme." Advertising Age, August 22, 2005, p. 29.

Hiawatha, Bray. "Through a Hole, and into Hidden Worlds of Fun." Boston Globe, April 25, 2005, p. B8.

Hoxsey, Rich, and Maggie Kinser Hohle. "Stranger than Unfiction." Print: America's Graphic Design Magazine, July 1, 2005.

Iezzi, Teressa. "Marketers Tapping into the Magic of an Alternate Reality." Advertising Age, November 21, 2005, p. 15.

Kiley, David. "Advertising Of, By, and For the People." BusinessWeek, July 25, 2005, p. 63.

Lazare, Lewis. "Graffiti Ad Gets Graffiti Treatment." Chicago Sun-Times, June 16, 2005, p. 65.

Morrissey, Brian. "Locked Out of Prime Sites, Clients Try New Avenues." Adweek, October 10, 2005.

———. "Maturing Industry Feels Growing Pains." Adweek, October 3, 2005.

———. "McKinney + Silver Takes Top MIXX Honors." Adweek, September 28, 2005.

Ranii, David. "Car Theft Is an Ad." Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, June 25, 2005, p. D1.

Shortman, Melanie. "Chelsea Gathers around Campfire." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 2005, p. 48.

Wegert, Tessa. "Advertisers Reap Real-World Benefits from 'Alternate Realty.'" Toronto (ON) Globe and Mail, August 18, 2005, p. B9.

Westhead, Rick. "Web Clicks with Advertisers." Toronto (ON) Star, November 19, 2005, p. D01.

Kevin Teague

Barclays Global Investors

45 Fremont Street
San Francisco, California 94105
USA
Telephone: (415) 777-8389
Fax: (415) 597-2171
Web site: www.barclaysglobal.com

■■■

NEW SCHOOL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Barclays Global Investors (BGI), a subsidiary of the United Kingdom's Barclays PLC, was a little-known mutual-fund provider in the United States when in 1999 it developed a new investment product called iShares. It was essentially an index mutual fund that could be bought and sold like shares of stock. Such funds held shares of stock in every company listed on a particular index in order to enjoy the growth of the entire group, the winners more than offsetting the losers. It was not imaginative investing, but over time it proved to be a worthwhile strategy. Making the index funds tradable was an innovation, but given the abundance of mutual funds competing for investment dollars and BGI's limited marketing budget, it was difficult to bring iShares to the attention of investors. In 2004 BGI released the ''New School'' campaign, which targeted the top ranks of investment advisers rather than the general investing public.

The ''New School'' campaign consisted mostly of television spots and print ads. Airtime was limited to the high-profile financial cable channels CNBC and Bloomberg. Print ads were run in prestigious publications such as the Wall Street Journal and Barron's. The less-than-$5 million campaign ran from January 2004 through August 2004. The target of the advertising was younger financial advisers who were willing to entertain new ideas in investment. Many of the television spots depicted a financial adviser who, having decided he was ready to embrace a ''new school'' of thought and action, debated his mirror image, who was stuck in the past.

The ''New School'' campaign significantly improved awareness of iShares among financial advisers and greatly increased investments in iShares. During the course of the campaign, Barclays became the third-best-selling fund family. The campaign also won a pair of prestigious awards: a Midas and an EFFIE.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

BGI's U.S. predecessor, a Wells Fargo Bank unit, was a pioneer of the index fund—a mutual fund that mirrored a market index such as the S&P 500 (a list of the top 500 U.S. corporations ranked by their stock value). By holding shares in all companies of an index in proportion to their worth, an index fund achieved the same growth as the entire index. It was a passive form of investing but produced steady results and became a popular investment vehicle. In 1999 BGI unveiled a new index-investment product, iShares, but instead of taking the form of a mutual fund iShares were exchange-traded funds, which could be bought or sold just like shares of stock, even though they represented a large bundle of stocks. In addition to containing stocks, iShares funds would also be developed to collect baskets of bonds, currencies, and commodities.

BGI began marketing iShares in 2000 with a $10 million campaign developed by the ad agency Saatachi & Saatchi, San Francisco; it focused on wealthier, more sophisticated investors, taking what Adweek magazine's Justin M. Norton called a "buttoned-down approach." As BGI struggled to establish iShares in the marketplace, Saatchi closed its San Francisco office, and BGI's advertising account was put up for review. In a surprise outcome, a new advertising agency, Venables, Bell & Partners, founded by veterans of San Francisco's well-regarded Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, won the business. The new agency took a more lighthearted approach than its predecessor, focusing on the close relationship between investors and the financial advisers who handled their iShares account. In one of the television spots, for example, a man urged his adviser to don a helmet because of nearby construction projects, while in another spot a man mistook a car backfire for gunshots and reacted by knocking down and then shielding his adviser. The tagline was "Industrial Strength Investment Tools."

BGI was experiencing only modest success with iShares in the early 2000s, a result in large measure of the depressed state of the stock market. In 2003 Venables began looking for a new approach to promoting iShares. Because it lacked the hefty ad budgets of its competitors, BGI could not hope to target the general investing public. Instead Venables and BGI decided to target financial advisers. Agency personnel spent a month meeting with financial advisers to hone the new strategy. Out of this fieldwork emerged the "New School" campaign, which was released in 2004.

TARGET MARKET

The "New School" campaign was aimed at financial advisers, the people who could urge their clients to purchase iShares. Because of a limited advertising budget BGI narrowed its target to the top 200,000 financial advisers in the United States, who were responsible for placing the lion's share of the investments made by wealthy Americans. But after devoting a month to meet with many of these advisers for lunch, dinner, or drinks, the marketers came to recognize a major difference between older and younger advisers. The former clung to tried-and-true recommendations, such as traditional mutual funds, while the younger group was more open to new ideas like iShares. It was this insight that laid a foundation for the "New School" campaign and led to the narrowing of the target audience to younger advisers—and to the older ones who would respond positively to the challenge of fresh thinking.

DEEP ROOTS

Barclays Global Investors was originally a unit of the legendary Wells Fargo, founded in the early 1850s by Henry Wells and William Fargo, who had earlier established American Express. Wells Fargo was started in San Francisco to serve the stagecoach and banking needs created by the California gold rush, and as a sister company to American Express it handled the express shipping business west of the Mississippi River. What would become Barclays Global Investors was introduced in 1973 as Wells Fargo Investment Advisors. Barclays PLC acquired the operation in 1995 and merged it with other divisions to create Barclays Global Investors, which like its famous ancestor remained based in San Francisco.

COMPETITION

BGI's main competition for iShares came from mutual funds, especially the larger ones, such as those sold by the Vanguard Group, Fidelity Investments, and T. Rowe Price Group. Together they spent about $200 million on advertising each year, cast a wide net, and as a result had developed tremendous brand recognition. Fidelity itself spent nearly $100 million a year on ads, according to Adweek. While BGI was preparing its new marketing effort, Fidelity was pursuing its "Personally Invested" campaign, which targeted individual investors. Vanguard was spending another $40 to $50 million promoting its multitude of funds, and the marketing efforts of T. Rowe Price were estimated by Adweek to cost $35 million a year. With far less money at its disposal, BGI could not hope to compete directly with the major fund providers, hence the decision to focus on investment advisers rather than the general investing public. To further complicate the task, iShares also had to compete against scores of other fund providers, many of which—such as Dreyfuss, Oppenheimer, Janus, American Century, Franklin Templeton, and Nuveen—had been around for years and had built up their own level of brand recognition. In short, iShares faced a crowded marketplace, a situation that forced the narrow focus of the "New School" campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Venables set three campaign objectives. The first was to gain notice for iShares in the marketplace. Second was to drive traffic to a website where interested parties could learn more about the new product by downloading articles and accessing other information. Finally, and most importantly, the campaign wanted to drive the sale of iShares.

To reach the target audience of upper-tier financial advisers, BGI and its agency Venables concentrated their resources on select television programming and print media, including cable TV channels CNBC and Bloomberg, the Wall Street Journal, Investor's Business Daily, and Barron's, and smaller trade publications. In addition, the campaign promoted iShares in direct mailings, through online and interactive advertising, via public relations, and at tradeshows. To gain the most impact from the campaign's limited budget, television commercials were aired before and after stock-market trading hours. The campaign also involved tracking the Federal Open Market Committee Meetings, of which there were eight in 2004. At these meetings Alan Greenspan, chairman of as the Federal Reserve, announced the agency's short-term monetary policy. Believing that financial advisers were certain to pay closer attention to the media whenever Greenspan was scheduled to make a pronouncement, Venables pursued a strategy of running daytime television spots at these times. The day after each meeting, when financial advisers were likely to be reading news coverage, BGI spent money on newspaper ads promoting iShares.

The "New School" television spots first began airing in early 2004. One, titled "Clean Slate," showed a group of financial professionals trapped in a conference room by a flood. When the sun rose the next day, the spot offered the message: "Investment advisers: It's a new day. The new school of investing is here. iShares.com/newschool." Another set of commercials in the campaign featured text that read, "Say goodbye to the old you. Here's to the new smarter you." They included "Break Up," in which trick photography was used to show a financial adviser on a lunch date with himself; he explained to his chagrined former self, "This just isn't working for me . . . You're holding me back. I'm moving our clients in new directions with new investment strategies." In "Fired" a financial adviser called her double into her office to terminate her employment. Another spot, titled "Grave," portrayed a man digging a burial plot for his old self, while his identical image stood by and attempted to talk the man out of leaving the old ways behind: "Are you sure you want to do this? We had a pretty good run. Making trades, picking stocks . . ." The man cheerfully replied, "I'm sure . . . Get in the hole." Each spot ended with the tagline "iShares. This is the new school of investing."

The print ads of the "New School" campaign followed a similar approach to the television spots. In one ad a man stood on a sidewalk with a briefcase, a deflated version of himself at his feet, as if he had just shed his skin. In the corner appeared the text: "Eric White, Financial Adviser; 1965 born; 2005 evolved." Ironically, or not, this was also the campaign's target audience: white financial advisers around 40 years of age. Other print ads played up the simplicity of dealing in iShares. In one execution an adviser was shown drinking a cup of coffee, his feet propped up on his mahogany desk. In another a man in a cubicle environment was shown looking a little under the weather. The headline read: "Gentle Relief from Bond Ladder Discomfort Is Here." (A bond ladder was an investment strategy in which bonds or certificate of deposits were arranged to mature simultaneously).

OUTCOME

The "New School" campaign was successful on a number of levels. It increased recognition of iShares in the marketplace. According to a 2003 tracking study, 57 percent of financial advisers were aware of iShares without given any aid, and awareness of iShares among financial advisers totaled 98 percent. The campaign also drove increased traffic to the iShares website. From January until September 2004, visits increased 74 percent over the comparable period in 2003. Finally, during the campaign period, January through August 2004, iShares enjoyed a surge in cash investments (inflows), a 280 percent increase over the same period of time in 2003. Inflows increased from $6.37 billion to more than $24.25 billion. As a result, iShares became the number three fund family according to cash inflows during this period. The "New School" campaign also garnered advertising-industry awards for Venables. It won a Silver EFFIE in the Small Budgets category of the 2005 EFFIE Awards, a prestigious competition produced by the New York American Marketing Association, a trade organization for marketing professionals. In addition, the spot "Clean Slate" won a 2005 Midas Award for best special effects. The Midas Awards, produced by New York Festivals, honored marketing work in financial services.

FURTHER READING

"Barclays Launches New Funds." Global Investor, June 2000, p. 6.

" 'Clean Slate' Spot for New Ishares Campaign from Venables, Bell and Partners." All VF Magazine, April 2004. Available from <http://www.allvfx.com/news/article.asp?articleid=23>

Elliott, Stuart. "TV Commercials Adjust to a Shorter Attention Span." New York Times, April 8, 2005, p. C6.

Garcia, Sandra. "It Only Looked Risky." Shoot, May 3, 2002, p. 15.

Norton, Justin M. "Barclays Eyes Venables, Eleven." Adweek, September 10, 2001, p. 4.

———. "Saatchi Touts Barclays iShares." Adweek (eastern ed.), June 5, 2000, p. 5.

———. "VB&P Lightens Up Barclays' iShares Investment." Adweek, May 13, 2002, p. 8.

Steinberg, Brian. "Stay Tuned for the Next Commercial." Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2005, p B2.

Ed Dinger

The Basketball Club of Seattle, LLC

351 Elliot Ave. W, Ste. 500
Seattle, Washington 98119
USA
Telephone: (206) 281-5800
Fax: (206) 281-5828
Web site: www.nba.com/sonics

■■■

IN YOUR HOME CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Basketball Club of Seattle, LLC, owners of both the National Basketball Association's Seattle SuperSonics and the Women's National Basketball Association's Seattle Storm, had seen the Sonics through several successful seasons in the 1990s, but the organization wanted to prepare for a future that would doubtless include down years. Increasing fan loyalty, the franchise believed, was the only way to guarantee ticket sales and TV viewership during losing seasons as well as winning seasons. The team's front office set out to achieve this through a combination of enhanced free TV offerings and marketing. After moving Sonics games from pay-per-view TV to local TV stations preparatory to the 1997–98 season, the team's executives charged Seattle advertising agency WongDoody with the task of publicizing the new schedule of TV broadcasts in a way that would strengthen the bond between fans and their team.

WongDoody, allotted less than $500,000 for the entire campaign, arrived at the concept of sending actual Sonics stars on unannounced visits to the homes of ordinary Seattle residents. The idea gave the campaign its tagline, "In Your Home," which made direct reference to the newly expanded TV schedule for the team's games. The depiction of Sonics players interacting with ordinary Seattle residents also served the important purpose of humanizing the stars, which was particularly important given the fan cynicism of the time, a result of negative stereotypes then abounding about overpaid, misbehaving, out-of-touch players. For the first two weeks after its fall 1997 release, the campaign was aired heavily on regional stations during high-profile prime-time programming; it then continued on the local stations with which the team had partnered for the new game-broadcasting arrangement.

"In Your Home" was a success, achieving goals of increasing both TV ratings and interest in the team among Seattle residents. It also became one of the most awarded regional campaigns as well as one of the most awarded sports campaigns of its time, winning top honors at almost every major advertising festival. The campaign was extended for the 1998–99 basketball season, though it was updated to show players in public locations like grocery stores and bowling alleys rather than in residents' homes.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Seattle SuperSonics entered the NBA in 1967. Like many expansion teams (teams new to a professional sports league), the franchise struggled in its first few years of existence, not posting a winning record until its fifth full season of play. The late 1970s, however, saw the Sonics become one of the league's best teams; it reached the NBA finals at the end of the 1977–78 season and won the league championship in 1978–79. After experiencing winning seasons in the early 1980s the team slumped in the middle part of the decade. Though the Sonics rallied in the late 1980s, the team did not become a consistent winner again until the 1990s. After bringing in George Karl as head coach in 1992, the Sonics averaged 60 wins a season (out of a total of 82 regular season games) for six seasons in a row. They did not win a championship during this time, but they became one of the most elite franchises in the NBA.

The Sonics, accordingly, had little trouble generating fan loyalty in Seattle. In fact, home games almost always sold out. The team's front office, however, was looking to the franchise's future and knew that the Sonics would not always be able to count on a winning record to sell seats and generate revenue. Only fan loyalty could guarantee a healthy franchise.

Nurturing fan loyalty in the NBA of the late 1990s was a more difficult task than in previous eras. The gulf between fans and players had never been so wide; this was a result of the rise of free agency, which empowered players but did not encourage them to be loyal to their teams, and the corresponding phenomenon of exponentially increasing salaries. Occasional but highly publicized scandalous behavior on the part of players—such as Latrell Sprewell of the Golden State Warriors choking his coach, P.J. Carlesimo—further fueled the disconnect between fans and players, and rising ticket prices meant that many of the die-hard NBA fans of the past could no longer see their teams in person. Though a winning team could overcome the widespread fan cynicism of the time, the perception that players were only interested in money and inhabited a distant, impossibly privileged world was common among fans in all NBA markets.

THE FOLLOW-UP

After the monumental success of "In Your Home," which ran during the 1997–98 season, ad agency WongDoody's client, the Seattle SuperSonics, had no interest in changing marketing tactics for the 1998–99 season. This presented WongDoody with a new creative challenge. The initial year's spots had made such a splash partly because of the novelty of seeing Sonics stars showing up unannounced at people's homes. Having achieved such notoriety, however, the campaign could not possibly catch viewers off-guard through simply extending this concept. WongDoody thus opted to satisfy its client's demands for more of the same by showing Sonics players in other ordinary places: Gary Payton was shown shopping for groceries, Vin Baker was pictured bowling, and Olden Polynice was shown doing his laundry at a Laundromat. The campaign was well regarded, but it achieved nowhere near the acclaim of its predecessor. Rarely had a follow-up to a hugely acclaimed advertising campaign done so.

TARGET MARKET

"In Your Home" targeted exactly these formerly die-hard but now disenchanted NBA fans, many of whom could not afford to attend games in person. While such people tended to be more aware of the problems with the NBA than casual fans, they were also more likely to become enthusiastic about their team and the league if the right conditions were in place. These fans were typically males between the ages of 25 and 54.

The Sonics' larger strategy of bringing such fans back into the fold included, crucially, a change in policy regarding the local TV broadcasting of the team's games. In previous years, games had been broadcast primarily on pay-pay-view television—a situation that did not encourage those disenchanted with high ticket prices to tune in or feel loyalty toward the team—and ratings had been in decline for years. The 1997–98 season saw Sonics management address this issue to fans' benefit, reaching a new agreement with the three major local networks in Seattle that called for a substantially increased network-TV schedule. Of the 82 regular-season Sonics games in the 1997–98 season, 56 would be televised on local network stations. Fans whose loyalty had been tested by changes in the NBA would now be granted comprehensive access to the team, free of charge.

WongDoody thus had a concrete basis upon which to build the message that the Sonics were an integral part of the Seattle community. The idea of the Sonics being "In Your Home" arose directly from the new broadcasting arrangement, taking the premise to a logical extreme: players were shown arriving at the homes of ordinary Seattle residents. Not only did this concept provide a natural way of publicizing the new 56-game TV schedule, but by also showing individual players interacting with ordinary people, it suggested that the gap between players and fans was not as distinct as many fans feared.

COMPETITION

Though no NBA team produced a campaign as highly regarded as "In Your Home" during the 1990s or early 2000s, the Sonics were not the first franchise to build its marketing on the idea of humanizing its star players. A successful campaign touting the Indiana Pacers, for instance, began during the 1994–95 season. Attempting to leverage success on the court—the Pacers had posted their first promising season in recent memory only a year earlier, in 1993–94 –into ticket sales and enduring fan loyalty, the franchise decided to focus on player personalities. One TV spot introduced the "many faces of Dale Davis," an impassive Pacers forward who, the punch line went, showed one face to the camera despite the multiple scenarios posited in the voice-over. Another spot showed guard Reggie Miller addressing his abrasive on-the-court demeanor by arguing that he was misunderstood. Over the next two years full-season ticket sales for Pacers games grew by 25 percent, half-season sales grew by 69 percent, and 10-game ticket packages rose by 181 percent.

The Orlando Magic attempted to generate increased ticket sales via different means in a 2000–01 marketing campaign, and in the process the team's executives found a way to measure the success of emerging advertising platforms. After acquiring exciting players, including one of the league's star forwards, Grant Hill, as well as young players Tracy McGrady and Mike Miller, the team expected a bump in ticket sales. The franchise's front office attempted to generate further interest in the 2000–01 season by advertising a contest offering fans a chance to play one-on-one with Hill. Advertisements ran online and on radio and television, and those who entered the contest received a brochure promoting season-ticket sales. Half of the season-ticket brochures were sent via E-mail and half via regular mail. Season-ticket sales well outpaced those in previous years, and the Magic found that 16 percent of fans who received E-mailed brochures bought season tickets, compared with 1.5 percent of those who received print brochures.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The concept of showing real Sonics stars showing up unannounced at the homes of real Seattle residents accomplished the campaign's two primary goals at once: it humorously dramatized the news of the Sonics' increased TV presence, and it demonstrated that Sonics players, far from being prima donnas, were ordinary people when they were away from the court. To emphasize "real" behavior, the spots were unscripted, and the ordinary people whose residences the Sonics players visited were not given advance warning. This resulted in a narrative situation reminiscent of the well-known "Publishers Clearing House" commercials, in which the surprise of the individuals featured in the spots formed a major part of the story. The players' interactions with their hosts developed over time as they engaged in numerous and varied "ordinary" activities with the families and groups that they visited.

For instance, Sonics guard Gary Payton was shown entering the common room of a nursing home, to the delight and applause of residents. He was then pictured reacting to comments such as "I always thought you were awfully thin," learning how to knit, and taking a lead role in a heated game of Monopoly. Guard Nate McMillan, meanwhile, arrived unannounced at a suburban Tupperware party populated exclusively by middle-aged women; after the expected interval of surprised exclamations, he settled into the sofa and participated in the party. McMillan innocently wisecracked his way through the lead Tupperware promoter's spiel before being caught off-guard by a post-party question, "And you play quarterback, right?" Forward/center Sam Perkins showed up at the home of a family of five, whose three young boys immediately began monopolizing his attention. Perkins roughhoused with them around their backyard basketball goal, played video games with the smallest son sitting in his lap, and engaged in a pillow fight with them just before bedtime. Each of the commercials opened with text reading, "The Sonics are coming to your home." At the end of the player-fan interactions, on-screen text stated, "See them in your home," and then text appeared reading, "56 games on free TV."

WongDoody was allotted a relatively small budget of just under $500,000, though this was a workable amount of money given that regionally placed TV spots cost only a fraction of national placements on the same programs. WongDoody still sought to get the most possible mileage out of its budget by opening the campaign on prominent prime-time shows. The campaign broke during ABC's Monday Night Football, and for the first two weeks after its launch it ran in heavy rotation on such high-profile programs as Seinfeld and Friends, in addition to cable destinations popular with the male target, such as ESPN and Fox Sports Net. Additionally, WongDoody media planners negotiated airtime with the local networks that would be airing the Sonics games. The agency likewise informed the news teams of the three leading local TV networks, all of which ran stories on the campaign.

Print elements played a lesser role in the campaign. An initial three-page spread in regional editions of Sports Illustrated magazine's NBA preview issue helped publicize the new TV schedule, and small-space newspaper ads carrying the "In Your Home" theme ran adjacent to prime-time TV listings.

OUTCOME

Research conducted at the end of the 1997–98 season indicated a 51 percent jump in viewership over the previous year's pay-per-view numbers and judged community involvement with the Sonics to have substantially increased, especially compared with other NBA teams. Season-ticket renewals reached an all-time high. Harry Hutt, senior vice president of marketing for rival NBA team the Portland Trailblazers, called the "In Your Home" campaign "a brilliant example of what the right kind of campaign can do," a judgment that was echoed by his own team's adoption of a similar marketing concept a few years later.

"In Your Home" became one of the most acclaimed professional-sports campaigns of its time as well as one of the most acclaimed regional campaigns. It won the GRANDY, the top award bestowed at the ANDY Awards, in 1998, as well as both the Grand Prize (top prize among all campaigns) and the prize for best low-budget campaign at the 1998 London International Advertising Awards. It won four Clios that year, a Gold Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival, and a Gold EFFIE. USA Today placed the campaign among its top ads of the year, and Adweek included it in its "Best Ads of the '90s" list.

The overwhelming success of the campaign posed only one difficulty for the Sonics and WongDoody: the challenge of following up such a successful campaign the next year. After some debate, "In Your Home" was extended with a twist. Rather than showing Sonics players arriving unannounced at people's homes, the 1998–99 campaign placed the players in everyday locations, such as bowling alleys, grocery stores, and Laundromats.

FURTHER READING

"ANDY's Team." Adweek (western ed.), May 4, 1998.

Beatty, Sally. "There Are Award-Winning Ads that You're Unlikely to Ever See." Wall Street Journal (eastern ed.), June 2, 1998.

Berger, Warren. "Equal Sequels." Advertising Age's Creativity, May 1999.

Buyikian, Teresa. "WongDoody Tops in London." Adweek (western ed.), November 16, 1998.

Johnson, J. Douglas. "Ads that Worked." Indiana Business Magazine, April 1995.

Rauch, Maggie. "A Marketing Slam Dunk." Sales & Marketing Management, December 2000.

Mark Lane

Bayerische Motoren Werke AG

Petuelring 130
Munich, D-80788
Germany
Telephone: 49 8938224272
Fax: 49 8938224418
E-mail: bmwgroup.customerservice@bmwgroup.com
Web site: www.bmwgroup.com

■■■

COUNTERFEIT CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After the United States mandated collapsible steering wheels in 1967, the British Mini Cooper retreated back to the United Kingdom and was not sold stateside for 35 years. Reintroduced in 2002 after being purchased and then reengineered by Bayerische Motoren-Werke AG (BMW), the MINI Cooper, as it was later capitalized, began a long series of unorthodox advertising campaigns. Whether it was being strapped to the roofs of SUVs or parked in the bleachers of sports venues, the car rapidly gained traction within the premium-small-car sector. While Volkswagen AG's New Beetle and DaimlerChrysler AG's PT Cruiser sales suffered in 2005, the MINI Cooper flourished under the brand's "Let's Motor" tagline. Hoping to not only to entertain consumers but also to immerse them deeper within the MINI Cooper brand, BMW released its "Counterfeit" campaign on February 14, 2005.

With an estimated budget of $25 million, the advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky launched "Counterfeit" across television, DVD, Internet, and print mediums. Airing only on cable networks, the campaign's one TV commercial warned viewers of fictional counterfeiters who were supposedly selling counterfeit MINI Coopers on the black market. The commercial directed viewers to www.CounterfeitMini.org, a website created by the Counter Counterfeit Commission (CCC), an equally fictional watchdog organization that educated consumers about MINI Cooper counterfeits. If website visitors wanted to learn more, they could order a DVD containing the 10-minute spoof "Counterfeit MINI Cooper," which absurdly documented con artists converting junk cars into look-alike MINI Coopers.

For March 2005, MINI Cooper posted its highest sales month ever and surpassed the previous March by 44 percent. At the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 2005 the campaign garnered a Gold Lion as well as the only American-won Titanium Lion. The ceremony awarded four Titanium Lions to work that the judges considered to be innovative and that utilized several mediums.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Even though the British Mini Cooper was an extremely popular car throughout the United Kingdom, its American stint ended in 1967 after collapsible steering wheels were required on every new car sold. Sales of the Mini increasingly dropped after its 1960s heyday. Eventually the Mini brand and other British automobiles were managed by the Rover Group, which was purchased by BMW in 1994. At first BMW was unsure of how to reintroduce the tiny car to the United States. Even after engineers modernized the interior, upgraded the car with a 115-hp Chrysler engine, and increased the length by 20 inches, it was still the smallest car in the U.S. market. By 2001 consumer trends, including the burgeoning markets for SUVs and full-size trucks, suggested a daunting forecast for the MINI Cooper. "If we'd listened to the market research, we'd have never done the MINI Cooper," Jack Pitney, general manager of Mini USA, admitted to the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BMW's MINI Cooper. © REUTERS/CORBIS.

In 2002 Crispin Porter + Bogusky released what was the first of many innovative advertisements for the MINI Cooper. To promote the car's recreational qualities, MINI Coopers were welded onto the roofs of SUVs and driven cross-country. Crispin Porter + Bogusky parked MINI Coopers in the seating sections of sporting arenas. Supermarket tabloids warned about "mutant bat boy in MINI Cooper." Playboy magazine allowed a MINI Cooper to be featured as a centerfold in 2002. Worldwide sales for the MINI Cooper S skyrocketed 46 percent in 2003. As part of the "MINI Robots" campaign, in 2004 a booklet was inserted into consumer magazines such as Motor Trend, National Geographic, and Rolling Stone. The booklets were written by the fictional Roland Samuel, a journalist validating stories about robots made from MINI Cooper parts that prevented traffic accidents in Oxford, England.

Hoping to continue its string of innovative campaigns, creatives at Crispin Porter + Bogusky wanted to create a 2005 campaign with a "call to action," or advertising that motivated consumers to look someplace else for brand information. The ad agency reasoned that the more time a consumer invested with a brand, the more likely it was that he or she would tell others about it.

TARGET MARKET

"Counterfeit" targeted men 18 to 34 years old. The campaign's 60-second commercial did not air on network television, where advertising cost more, but rather across cable channels popular with men, such as ESPN, MTV, and Spike TV. "Cable offers many more opportunities than the broadcast TV networks, at lower prices," Jim Poh, media director of Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told Automotive News. "Cable is going to be a more effective use of your dollars. In a nutshell, the viewers of these channels have the MINI mindset."

One requirement for the "MINI mindset" was a sense of humor. The campaign's TV commercial, along with the website to which it directed viewers, www.CounterfeitMINI.org, facetiously showed junk cars painted to resemble MINI Coopers. "Mini customers appreciate the joke. They are a group that doesn't like being hit in the face with traditional advertising," Pitney told the Wall Street Journal. "They are very much into discovery. They like to come upon something in an interesting way and learn about it on their own terms."

COMPETITION

Volkswagen's Golf GTI and New Beetle were considered "premium small cars," the classification of high-quality, high-priced, petite cars like the MINI Cooper. To promote the 2005 Golf GTI, the ad agency DDB created a television spot that used computers to juxtapose actor Gene Kelly's face onto the body of a break-dancer. At the spot's beginning it appeared that Kelly was standing on the rainy street corner from his 1952 movie Singin' in the Rain. After a few notes from the movie's title song, the music escalated into an electronic-music rendition of "Singin' in the Rain" while Kelly began break-dancing. At the commercial's finale he appeared next to a parked Golf GTI.

Explaining why DDB used Kelly's likeness for the spot, Martin Loraine, the creative director at the agency, told the New Zealand Herald, "We looked for things which were icons. We thought about the Golf GTI when it came out. There are not many cars that invent a genre, which is what we thought was the most prominent thing about the GTI. It wasn't just a fast car or a nice car, it was an original, which is rare."

Starting in 1998 Arnold Worldwide advertised Volkswagen's New Beetle with its "Drivers Wanted" campaign. Television spots initially targeted nostalgic baby boomers with copy declaring "Less Flower. More Power" or "If you sold your soul in the '80s, here's your chance to buy it back." At first the New Beetle's popularity skyrocketed. More than 64,000 units were sold during its first year. By 2003, however, New Beetle sales began waning; critics referenced Volkswagen's problems to the quick boom-and-bust cycle that had haunted Chrysler's PT Cruiser after its 2000 release. In 2005 Volkswagen ended its contract with Arnold Worldwide and awarded

TOUGH LOVE

For the MINI Cooper "Counterfeit" campaign the advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky created a spoof website titled www.CounterfeitMini.org. The site supposedly warned consumers about counterfeit MINI Coopers flooding the car market. In one section of the website, titled "TOUGH LOVE," a visitor could use his or her mouse to slap a counterfeit MINI Cooper owner who had supposedly bought an antique car, fashioned with MINI Cooper fog lamps and racing stripes, thinking it was a MINI Cooper.

its $400 million advertising account to Crispin Porter + Bogusky.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Counterfeit" campaign displayed MINI Cooper's signature characteristics, such as the car's colorful graphics and performance capabilities, in a way that "entertains and engages people," Alex Bogusky, Crispin Porter + Bogusky's principal, told Adweek. "You can't just push things into enough eyeballs anymore," he said. "It has to be so much fun that it's worth their time, that you've entertained them and taught them about the product at the same time."

On February 14, 2005, a 60-second commercial began appearing across cable channels such as Spike TV, Speed Channel, Sci-Fi Channel, and Outdoor Life Network. The spot posed as a public-service announcement from the fictional Counter Counterfeit Commission (CCC). The CCC was supposedly alerting the public about a recent outbreak of counterfeit MINI Coopers. The spot first explained the counterfeiting of luxury watches, sunglasses, and most recently, MINI Coopers. Footage showed high-end watch and sunglass knockoffs in Brazil's Rio de Janeiro flea markets, followed by a dilapidated car that was decaled with racing stripes. The spot then announced the availability of a 10-minute DVD that educated consumers about fake MINI Coopers and included testimonials from previously defrauded consumers. A man with his face obscured and voice altered admitted, "I bought a MINI for $1,200 bucks. 'Let's Motor,' right?" To which the voice-over answered, "Wrong!" The commercial continued with additional humorous footage of counterfeit MINI Coopers, followed by beautiful images of the real thing. The commercial ended with voice-over explaining, "To order Counterfeit MINIs, visit CounterfeitMINI.org or send a self-addressed-stamped-envelop to the Counter Counterfeit Commission."

The DVD, which sold for $19.95, provided more tongue-in-cheek information about counterfeit MINI Coopers. Besides the campaign's main website, www.CounterfeitMini.org, which provided detailed informational about counterfeit and authentic MINI Coopers, another website was created that supposedly auctioned counterfeit MINI Coopers. Conveniently, the auctions had all been closed. Bryan Buckley directed the campaign's filming in Rio de Janeiro. The footage was later edited to compose the 60-second television spot, the DVD, and the additional footage that was posted on the website. Collectively, it offered "an hour's entertainment, maybe, and that's a good trade for your time and your attention," Bogusky told the Wall Street Journal. To further validate the CCC's warnings, a pop-up message on www.MINIUSA.com directed consumers to call the CCC hotline if counterfeit MINI Coopers were spotted. Fictional brochures were also inserted in consumer magazines to warn about counterfeit MINI Coopers.

One of the campaign's challenges was its limited $25 million budget. To compete against Volkswagen, which spent an estimated $400 million on advertising in 2005, Crispin Porter + Bogusky devised a campaign outside of traditional formats. "Given that there is not a lot of difference among products in any given category, advertising is the differentiator," Chuck Porter, chairman of Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told Television Week. "We believe that making a brand a part of pop culture [is more effective]."

Some analysts criticized the campaign's deceptive quality, which could leave its target audience feeling betrayed. Also, for consumers to experience the full breadth of the campaign, they needed to visit the website, an extra step that complicated the campaign's message. Many advertising agencies, fearful of the strategy's overall risk, avoided such "call to action" campaigns. Tim Mellors, who had executed "call to action" campaigns as chief creative officer of WPP Group's Grey Worldwide North America, explained the benefit of this strategy to the Wall Street Journal: "You know perfectly well that most people won't bother, but when you get it right, it's another stage of involvement that's never been there in the past."

OUTCOME

The "Counterfeit" campaign yielded success soon after its launch. In March 2005 MINI Cooper recorded its highest monthly sales posting ever and surpassed the previous March's earnings by 44 percent. Fairing well at award shows, the campaign won a Gold Lion Award at the Cannes International Advertising Festival in 2005 and also received a Titanium Lion. The latter was given to the four campaigns considered most effective at using multiple mediums. ''Counterfeit'' was the only American campaign to win a Titanium Lion in 2005.

Crispin Porter + Bogusky also noticed a surge of chatter in automotive blogs and MINI Cooper chat rooms regarding the ''Counterfeit'' ads. Alex Bogusky, serving as a guest writer for Advertising Age's Creativity, stated, ''I'm very happy to see the MINI 'Counterfeit' work getting recognized. It was a massive undertaking and a labor of joy for so many people at the agency, and it's the kind of work that gives us personally the greatest joy because the interaction with consumers, from the TV to the web, is so fun to watch. You actually get to see and read e-mails and blog entries from people who are being persuaded and entertained by MINI and the MINI brand. The relationship between brand and consumer is created so transparently and quickly, it's almost like creating advertising live on stage.''

FURTHER READING

Beaton, Alistair. ''Mini Cooper Model Stolen at Balmedie.'' Aberdeen Press & Journal, September 28, 2004, p. 3.

Bogusky, Alex. ''Awards: Why We Care.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, August 1, 2005, p. 6.

Connelly, Walt, Hal Riney, and Jon Soto. ''The Work.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, May 1, 2005, p. 24.

Convey, Eric. ''Motor Mouth; Fun Mini Cooper S Has Small Flaws.'' Boston Herald, April 30, 2005, p. C16.

Curry, Sheree R. ''Dump the:30 Spot and Embrace On-Demand.'' Television Week, July 25, 2005, p. 60.

Diaz, Ann-Christine. ''Top Directors.'' Advertising Age's Creativity, June 1, 2005, p. 40.

Fera, Rae Ann. ''Miami Agency Rules Online Space.'' Boards, August 1, 2005, p. 28.

Guyer, Lillie. ''Mini's Spoof Ads Warn of Knockoffs.'' Automotive News, May 16, 2005, p. 38B.

Matier, Phillip, and Andrew Ross. ''A Mini Cooper with Lights and Siren.'' San Francisco Chronicle, April 3, 2005, p. A21.

McAleer, Michael. ''Mini Cooper S Works.'' Irish Times (Dublin), August 3, 2005, p.8.

Steinberg, Brian. '''Call to Action' Ads Give Clients Results They Can Measure.'' Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2005, p. B1.

Wentz, Laurel. ''At Cannes, the Lions Say 'Grrr.' '' Advertising Age, June 27, 2005, p. 1.

Zagor, Karen. ''Road Test: 2005 MINI Cooper S: She Drives.'' Globe and Mail (Toronto), March 3, 2005, p. G15.

Kevin Teague

MINI ROBOTS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1967 a safety mandate forced the antiquated, cheaply made British Mini Cooper to discontinue sales in the United States. In 1994, when Bayerische Motoren Werke AG (BMW) attained control of the Mini Cooper brand, executives were perplexed about how to reintroduce their newly acquired microcar to the United States. Finally reappearing in the United States in 2002, followed by a prolific magazine, Web-based, and outdoor campaign, the MINI, as it had come to be spelled, was a screaming success. By 2004 MINI made up 11 percent of BMW's sales. Company executives were nervous, however, about the boom-and-bust pitfalls that haunted other trendy cars, like the New Beetle and PT Cruiser. It was for this reason that ''MINI Robots,'' formulated as a ''viral'' campaign, a term referring to advertising that relies on word-of-mouth contagiousness, was launched in March 2004.

With an estimated budget of $15 million, ''MINI Robots'' was developed by Miami-based ad agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky. First a site was developed on the Internet to herald a clandestine project that assembled robots from MINI parts. The project's mastermind, a fictional Dr. Mayhew, was a retired scientist who posted daily video clips of his experiments. Shortly afterward a second site was published, with sightings of robots slinking through the moonlit streets of Oxford, England, and preventing traffic accidents. Later Crispin Porter + Bogusky inserted a novelette, ''Men of Metal,'' into consumer magazines like National Geographic, Rolling Stone, Men's Health, and Men's Journal. The 40-page insert chronicled a journalist's quest to find Dr. Mayhew and the people rescued by his robots. To perpetuate the joke, Crispin Porter + Bogusky created websites for Dr. Mayhew, along with a home page for Casson, the fictitious publishing company of ''Men of Metal,'' and a personal site for the novelette's author.

According to an interview with Jack Pitney, vice president of MINI USA, in the Wall Street Journal, customers appreciated the joke: ''They like to come upon something in an interesting way and learn about it on their own terms.'' One week after the appearance of ''Men of Metal,'' more than 46 million hits were registered on the ''MINI Robots'' main website. Success reached BMW's bottom line as well. During the first year of ''MINI Robots,'' 36,000 MINIS were sold, surpassing the 34,000 units sold the previous year. By the end of 2004 MINI orders were outstripping supply, with a six-month waiting list for cars with some of the newer features.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Prompted by the Suez fuel crisis, Sir Alec Issigonis designed the Mini in 1959 to be Britain's first "classless" car. Meager but efficient, the tiny Mini was sold in the United States for only seven years, until collapsible steering wheels were mandated in 1967. In 1994 BMW acquired the Rover Group, which included the Mini brand. The German automakers initially were unsure about how to reawaken interest in the car, especially in the United States. Even after engineers had modernized the interior, upgraded the MINI with a 115-hp Chrysler engine, and increased the length by 20 inches, it was still the smallest car in the U.S. market. By 2001 consumer trends, including the burgeoning markets for SUVs and full-size trucks, suggested a daunting forecast for the MINI. "If we'd listened to the market research, we'd have never done the MINI," Pitney admitted to the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Crispin Porter + Bogusky oversaw the U.S. marketing launch for the MINI. At the start of 2002 the budget was a meager $15 million, with Crispin Porter + Bogusky introducing cost-effective magazine and outdoor advertisements that Brandweek called a series of "one-offs," individual ads that were not part of an integrated campaign. Playboy allowed MINI to "pose" for its June 2002 centerfold spread, complete with a list of likes and dislikes. "The end to a perfect day: A hand-washing with warm, sudsy water and a nice wax," the ad read. In 2003 MINI punch-out kits, which allowed people to construct their own paper models, could be found in consumer magazines. Ford Expeditions were driven across the United States with MINIs strapped to their roofs. "We have to be creative in our marketing and look for clever ways to have $1 seem like $2," Pitney told Autoweek. "Everything we do has to reflect the unique, fun, cheeky nature of the MINI brand in a holistic, 360-degree MINI way."

From 2001 to 2003 brand recognition for the MINI rose more than 400 percent in the United States. Despite consumers' inclination toward larger cars, MINI sales rose from 20,000 units in 2002 to more than 34,000 in 2003. Kerri Martin, manager for marketing communications at MINI USA, was quoted in the New York Times as saying, "We're constantly going left when everyone is going right." It was in this vein of unorthodox thinking that the "MINI Robots" campaign was created.

TARGET MARKET

MINI USA and Crispin Porter + Bogusky anticipated that "MINI Robots" would resonate with the 20- to 30-year-old demographic of mechanically minded males who were put off by women's praise of the car as "cute." This was also a group, as Pitney told the Wall Street Journal, that does not like "being hit in the face with traditional advertising."

In an interview with Shoot, Andrew Keller, a Crispin Porter + Bogusky creative director, said, "[Given] the nature of the car, its target audience is what I call a creative mindset. They are people that go to the Web, and believe the car is a means of self-expression—it is that sort of vibe. However, we had to zero in on a target at the beginning, and it is twenty- to thirty-year-old males." He added, "But that is more tactical than anything right now because ultimately, the MINI should be something that everybody wants. The queen drove one and a plumber can drive one, and that is what we want to maintain."

Although a variety of men's magazines featured the novelette "Men of Metal," the references to the story were placed on the Internet. Thus, passing over a lower-income audience, "MINI Robots" was aimed at a target market with access to a computer and an Internet connection.

THE ITALIAN JOB

BMW's MINI made cameo appearances in movies like Bourne Identity and Austin Powers, Goldmember, but the little car's biggest role was in the 2003 remake of The Italian Job. While British Motor Corporation had refused to supply cars for the 1969 version, with Michael Caine, BMW donated more than 30 MINIs for Paramount's remake.

COMPETITION

J.D. Power and Associates stated in 2002 that MINI USA had not only reintroduced the brand in the United States but also created a new automotive sector, the premium small car. Other critics found categorizing the MINI more difficult and usually compared it to Volkswagen's New Beetle or to Toyota's Scion. The New Beetle was introduced in 1998 with the tagline "Drivers Wanted," which was similar to MINI's "Let's Motor." Volkswagen's ad agency, Arnold Communications, initially catered to nostalgic baby boomers, with copy declaring "Less flower. More Power" or "If you sold your soul in the '80s, here's your chance to buy it back." After its launch in 1998 demand for the New Beetle skyrocketed, and according to the Financial Times, by October 1998 Volkswagen had sold 64,000 units. By 2003, however, sales of the New Beetle had slowed

THE BEATLES DROVE MINIS

Despite selling a mere 10,000 units in the United States during the 1960s, Mini still managed to surface in the American psyche via celebrities. As Out Motoring stated, "It is always the 1960s for which it will be remembered . . . These 10 years saw the Mini go from a 'housewives shopping car' to a must have fashion accessory." James Garner, Twiggy, the Beatles, Peter Sellers, and even Steve McQueen drove Minis.

drastically, and between 2001 and 2002 Volkswagen reduced production by 18 percent. "Volkswagen's New Beetle and Chrysler's PT Cruiser . . . often prove to be 'fashion statements' with relatively quick boom-and-bust cycles," wrote Paul Eisenstein in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

According to Forbes magazine, Toyota introduced the Scion in 2004 with substantial success. In its first year sales of the Scion matched those of the MINI. Compared to the MINI, however, Scion explicitly targeted a younger market, Generation Y, those born between the early 1980s and the late 1990s. In 2004 Toyota spent 70 percent of its Scion marketing budget on lifestyle events, including nightclubs and small-venue concerts. Scion even allowed consumers to accessorize the car over the Internet before stepping foot on a lot. Jim Farley, vice president of Scion, told Ward's Dealer Business that more than 50 percent of Scion customers had configured their vehicles online, adding an average of $1,200 in accessories.

MARKETING STRATEGY

According to an interview with Martin in the New York Times, the planning for the "MINI Robots" campaign began in late 2002 after Crispin Porter + Bogusky had requested a comic book or novel about robots. The campaign was developed over the following 18 months and launched in March 2004. "[The campaign] started as, 'Hey, let's build robots out of car parts,'" said Alex Bogusky, partner and executive creative director of the agency. It slowly morphed into a detailed campaign in the belief that, "if people are involved with it, they spend a lot of time with it, a good 45 minutes to an hour."

Beam, an outside company, assisted Crispin Porter + Bogusky with the "MINI Robots" main website, http://www.r50rd.co.uk. Zoic Studios supplied the video clips depicting Dr. Mayhew's daily experiments, including colossal MINI robots reaching down to grab SUVs before they plowed into test walls. Four additional websites were created by Crispin Porter + Bogusky. The first was a website for the fictional journalist Rowland Samuel. The second, for Samuel's fictitious publishing company, Casson, depicted mock upcoming releases about Bigfoot, Loch Ness, and alien crop circles. The last two were Geocities websites, on Yahoo, including a personal website for Dr. Mayhew and one posting the latest MINI robot sightings around Oxford.

After the websites were up, the 40-page insert "Men of Metal: Eyewitness Accounts of Humanoid Robots" appeared in such consumer magazines as Motor Trend, National Geographic, and Rolling Stone. The insert was written by the fictional Samuel, a freelance writer who bumped into an acquaintance at an Oxford party. The two began one-upping each other with urban legends, until Samuel's acquaintance claimed a friend had photographed a giant robot that saved a car from hydroplaning. Enticed by the story, Samuel probed others connected to the photograph in order to prove or disprove the story. Using testimonials and photos as evidence, "Men of Metal" duped a significant portion of its readers.

Ambiguity fueled the buzz over "MINI Robots." For the first two months of the campaign MINI logos and branding were omitted from the websites and the novelette. "We wanted people to experience it without us making a big announcement," Bogusky told the New York Times. The robots were not demystified until April, when Crispin Porter + Bogusky put up posters throughout New York City and Los Angeles featuring the MINI logo above the robot images. A "Robots" option appeared as well on the drop-down menu of the MINI USA website, allowing visitors to accessorize the robots with MINI-like features. Though "some people will be disappointed" after discovering the truth behind the "MINI Robots" campaign, Bogusky told the New York Times, "most people appreciate you doing something different."

OUTCOME

Public response to "MINI Robots" was almost immediate. Crispin Porter + Bogusky reported that a week after its introduction the "MINI Robots" main website had received more than 46 million hits. By October 2004 it had attracted more than 1 million visitors. MINI USA received E-mails from people who said that they enjoyed the campaign so much they were going to a dealer.

MINI seemed to be avoiding the boom-and-bust pitfalls that had haunted the New Beetle and the PT Cruiser. BMW projected selling only 25,000 MINIs in 2002–04, the first three years of its reintroduction in the United States, but in the first year alone more than 20,000 units were sold. This increased to 34,000 in 2003 and 36,000 in 2004, by which time the MINI was making up 11 percent of BMW's total sales. In 2004 sales of the MINI were still outstripping the supply, with a six-month waiting list for cars with certain features. Bogusky boasted about the success of "MINI Robots" to the New York Times: "I've never gotten e-mails about a billboard or a television commercial saying, 'I'm going to buy a car because of this.' Here, we've gotten several."

Many industry critics, as well as Crispin Porter + Bogusky and MINI USA, believed that the "MINI Robots" campaign had created a new model in the advertising industry. For example, other viral marketing campaigns appeared in 2004. To market its liquid-crystal Aquos television, Sharp disseminated rumors that $3 million was stashed in hidden urns that could be located by using its website. For Lee Jeans, Fallow created a blog and answering-machine message supposedly left by a 90-foot model. "MINI Robots," along with Sega's "Beta-7" campaign, created a paradigm that treated consumers as willing participants, not passive observers. "We're going from the Golden Age of advertising to the Information Age of advertising," Bogusky told Advertising Age's Creativity. "And it's not going to be as easy for this generation to judge the brilliance of this new age."

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Tall Tales: Advertising Steps into Interactive Fiction: Where the Buzz Is Real—Even When the Stories Aren't." Adweek, October 11, 2004, p. 28.

Eisenstein, Paul. "Will U.S. Drivers Pay Big to Think Small? Mini Cooper's Success Makes Automakers Rethink Strategy." Cleveland Plain Dealer, February 15, 2004, p. F1.

Elliot, Stuart. "Pursuing Marketing Buzz." New York Times, May 10, 2004, p. 8.

Granatstein, Lisa. "Crispin Porter + Bogusky: Spending between $10 Million and $25 Million: Best Use of Magazines." Adweek, June 23, 2003, p. SR6.

Greenberg, Karl. "A Year of Firsts in an Age of Belt Tightening." Brandweek, April 20, 2005.

Guyer, Lillie. "BMW Dares to Be Different with Mini Ads." Automotive News, August 4, 2003, p. 4M.

Halliday, Jean. "Scion Builds Buzz with Event Marketing." Advertising Age, November 8, 2004, p. 24H.

Hoag, Christina. "Coconut Grove, Fla., Advertising Agency Sweeps Top Awards." Miami Herald, June 30, 2003.

"The Others . . ." Advertising Age's Creativity, December 1, 2004, p. 30.

Steinberg, Brian. " 'Call to Action' Ads Give Clients Results They Can Measure." Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2005, p. B1.

Suydam, Margot. "Let's Motor: CP+B Taps Integrated Approach to Spread the Mini Cooper Message." Shoot, December 5, 2003, p. 19.

Twomey, Brian. "Original and the Best." Rear View Mirror, August 13, 2004, pp. 38–39.

Voight, Joan. "Mini's Wild Ride: How CP+B Crafted Its Award-Winning Work for BMW's Quirky Car." Adweek, June 2, 2003, p. 24.

Kevin Teague

THE HIRE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2000 Bayerische Motoren Werke AG (BMW) posted total sales of $33 billion, a slight decrease from its 1999 earnings of $34 billion. Afraid of further backsliding, the Bavarian automaker decided to reshape its advertising to better target the Internet-savvy BMW customer. Before 2001 the company's advertisements had typically consisted of product-driven campaigns with immaculate BMWs clinging to mountain roads. BMW asked its longtime advertising partner, Fallon Worldwide, to create something different. In 2001 five action-packed short films emerged under the campaign title "The Hire," which became one of the most acclaimed campaigns in advertising history.

After working with BMW to develop the idea of a James Bond-type hero who drove various BMWs, Fallon enlisted David Fincher's film-production company, Anonymous Content. Fincher then successfully wrangled some of Hollywood's biggest guns—including directors Guy Ritchie and John Frankenheimer and actors Madonna, Forrest Whittaker, and Mickey Rourke—to create the five short films. Three more films were created in 2002 to promote BMW's new Z4 roadster. All eight starred Clive Owen (Croupier, The Bourne Identity) as the "hired" driver who found himself driving a BMW in every spot. "The Hire" was promoted much like a feature film would have been, with movie trailers, print ads, and Web ads.

The five initial films cost an estimated $15 million, and the three made in 2002 cost about $10 million. "The Hire" catapulted BMW's exposure into film festivals, awards shows, and even an exclusive BMW DirecTV channel. By 2002 BMW sales were up 17 percent, while some of its competitors, such as Volkswagen and General Motors, floundered. By June 2003 more than 45 million people had viewed the films, overshooting the original goal of reaching 2 million viewers. "The Hire" garnered numerous ad industry awards. The campaign's final spot, "Beat the Devil," aired November 21, 2002.

BMW's Z4M. © SANDRO CAMPARDO/EPA/CORBIS.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

BMW, founded in Germany in 1913, awarded most of its advertising work to the Minneapolis-based agency Fallon in the mid-1990s. Three different BMW/Fallon campaigns preceding "The Hire" had mostly consisted of "hard-driving, product-focused efforts designed to show what it's like behind the wheel of a BMW," Jim McDowell, vice president of marketing at BMW North America, told Advertising Age. BMW and Fallon felt their campaigns' flavor had been so overused by competitors that the original uniqueness had washed out. Wanting to launch a more unprecedented campaign, BMW asked Fallon for something new, but Fallon's creatives felt confined within the restraints of traditional television spots. They wanted to show BMWs for longer periods of time and to truly push BMW's performance to the point of damaging the car, which was something unheard of for a car commercial. "In response to our plea," Bildsten said in an interview with Shoot, "[BMW] sent us this letter that was just amazing. They were telling us, 'Take off the gloves. Do whatever you want. We want you to really stretch.' "

After finishing a Timex campaign that included the use of video clips in Internet advertising, David Carter and Joe Sweet, two of Fallon's art directors, were eager to try different filming techniques. "One night I challenged [Carter and Sweet] to come up with something cinematic," Bildsten told Brandweek. "They came back the next morning with the whole idea almost completely worked out." When they took it to BMW, "it took us about 30 minutes to present and 10 seconds for them to give us a green light."

TARGET MARKET

"The Hire" largely arose from Fallon and BMW's growing concern that past campaigns had been missing the company's target audience: well-to-do, high-achieving males who usually researched purchases using the Internet and lacked the time to watch network television. Research showed that consumers inclined to purchase BMWs were also broadband-connected, tech-savvy males and that 85 percent of this population studied BMW's cars online before even stepping into a showroom. As far as whom the campaign would appeal to, McDowell explained to Advertising Age, "We would have guessed that our central tendency would have been 25-year-olds, but actually from our early measurements we got people older and more affluent than that." Knowing that the mature target audience was keener on the viewing experience than on the interactive experience, Fallon purposely avoided using gaming software on the campaign's website, http://www.bmwfilms.com.

To study the effectiveness of "The Hire," BMW and Fallon devised units of measurement called "BMW minutes," which calculated how much time viewers spent with the new Internet campaign compared to previous television campaigns. "We were astonished to discover that a major fraction of the total BMW minutes were

SUBPLOTS IN ''THE HIRE''

Short subplots, which loosely linked the campaign's first five storylines, were filmed quickly, and with a digital video camera, by Ben Younger and Director of Photography William Rexer. The filming of one scene, which looked like a real-life occurrence to most onlookers, involved a ''car thief'' slamming a ''hit man'' onto a car hood in New York. ''Some of the reactions I got from people who weren't real extras were so good that we had to hunt people down [to get permission to include them in the films],'' Younger said in an interview with Shoot magazine. ''I loved the reaction of one armored-car guy, so we paused the frame, took down the name on the side of the truck, and called the company to get a waiver from him.''

Internet minutes,'' McDowell told Advertising Age. Males made up 68 percent of the viewers, 42 percent of whom came from households with incomes greater than $75,000. The second suite of ''The Hire'' films featured BMW's new Z4 roadster, which aimed at a demographic that could hopefully afford them. In late 2002 BMW began running its eight films on an exclusive BMW channel for DirecTV. The channel, which was available for a limited time, interspersed the films with behind-the-scenes footage and special ''subplot'' spots.

COMPETITION

Mercedes-Benz, the German luxury arm of DaimlerChrysler, was the top-selling luxury brand in the United States in 1999, a position it maintained until losing ground to BMW and to Toyota's Lexus in 2002. For the same year's first 10 months Mercedes units sold dropped by 1,500, losing out to BMW's incredible 17 percent sales growth that year. ''Mercedes has been improving its quality but it hasn't been keeping pace with the rest of the U.S. industry,'' Brian Walters, director of quality research at J.D. Power and Associates, explained to Bloomberg News. In an attempt to reproduce BMW's campaign success, Mercedes's London-based ad agency, Campbell Doyle Dye, faked a movie trailer for a supposed upcoming film called Lucky Star. Never admitting to be just an advertisement, the movie ''trailer'' broke in U.K. movie theaters July 4, 2002. Lucky Star pretended to be the next release from producer Michael Mann (The Aviator, Collateral) and portrayed Benicio Del Toro as a man acting independently to clean up Chicago's commodities exchange. The spot periodically showed Del Toro masterfully speeding through Chicago in a $90,000 Mercedes 500 SL.

Toyota Motor Corp.'s Lexus luxury division rose up to be the luxury-car industry leader, selling more units than BMW or Mercedes in 2001. Besides the sales success, Lexus dominated as the most reliable in its industry; according to J.D. Power and Associates, Lexus cars had fewer than half of the problems, after four and five years, that the average cars and trucks had. In 2001 Lexus decreased its ad spending. By 2002 the carmaker's ad agency, California-based Team One Advertising, had focused its efforts on the remodeled ES300 sedan.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Initially, Fallon and BMW had decided to film one serialized 45-to-60-minute film featuring a suave hero who saved, kidnapped, and escorted people using different BMW models. Fallon approached production company Anonymous Content, headed by David Fincher (director of Se7en and Fight Club), to produce the film. Fincher recommended that the spots be broken into five different films in order to facilitate file downloading and allow more flexibility in attracting talent to work on the project.

Following Fincher's advice, Fallon developed scripts for five short films. In producing ''The Hire,'' Fincher and Fallon went so far as to create a dossier, complete with FBI and CIA files, just to flesh out the films' hero. Fincher then solicited some of Hollywood's top directors. The final list included Ang Lee (Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon), John Frankenheimer (The Manchurian Candidate), Wong Kar-Wai (Chungking Express), Guy Ritchie (Snatch), and Alejandro González Iñárritu (Amores Perros). The scripts, ranging from dark to hilarious, were distributed according to each director's style. Anonymous Content chairman Steve Golin told Shoot, ''The good news is that these weren't commercials. We had very few restrictions. The budgets were equivalent to [those of] high-end commercials.''

Fallon flipped the advertising equation upside down by spending 90 percent of its budget on production and only 10 percent on media. The reduced media expenditure was initially seen as a huge risk. According to Advertising Age's Creativity, a BMW rep warned Fallon, ''Either nobody will notice, or this will be a smashing success.''

For each of the six-to-seven-minute films, subplots were also created in an attempt to weave the film storylines together. British actor Clive Owen, whose character became the common thread for the entire campaign, always played the skillful hired driver. Frankenheimer's ''Ambush,'' the campaign's debut film, first became

MADONNA PLAYING THE SPOILED DIVA

The campaign's fourth film, "Star," featured a spoiled diva who received her comeuppance after whining and complaining about the slow speed of Clive Owen's driving. After smirking through a few minutes of her wrath, Owen slammed down the accelerator and ping-ponged the "star" in the backseat for a solid two minutes. Guy Ritchie, the director and cowriter of "Star," talked his wife, Madonna, into playing the part. "When he signed on, we didn't think she'd be along, we just desperately wanted him," Fallon's Bildsten told Shoot, adding that the actresses originally considered for the role "were a little more washed-up than her."

available for download on http://www.bmwfilms.com on April 26, 2001. It featured the hired driver saving a diamond smuggler from machine-gun toting assailants in a cargo van. Fallon released each of the following four spots every two weeks. Typical Hollywood methods, including broadcast spots, billboards, and free posters, were used to promote the films. Print ads ran in Hollywood trade magazines Vanity Fair, Entertainment Weekly, and Rolling Stone. The trailers for "The Hire," resembling regular movie trailers, aired on VH1, Bravo, and the Independent Film Channel. One of Fallon's biggest challenges was to pitch the films as entertainment but to still disclose BMW's involvement. "We wanted to avoid the 'microbrew syndrome,'" Bildsten explained to Brandweek, "like where you look down and see that [your beer] was actually made by Anheuser-Busch." "The Hire" was also uniquely filmed to fit computer screens. "No one had ever done an internet project of this magnitude, and we had a lot to learn," Fallon producer Robyn Boardman told Advertising Age's Creativity. "There are different things to keep in mind when shooting for the web. File size, for starters, and the fact that wide shots don't play well."

Due to overwhelming Web traffic, ad-industry praise, and BMW's bottom-line success in 2002, a "second season" consisting of three films began airing October 24, 2002. The second crop involved an equally renowned roster of names. Instead of Anonymous Content, all spots were produced by Ridley Scott (director of Blade Runner and Gladiator), who recruited directors Tony Scott (Top Gun), John Woo (Face/Off), and Joe Carnahan (Narc). The actors included Gary Oldman, James Brown, Don Cheadle, Ray Liotta, and of course, Clive Owen, returning to star in the final three films. The last of the films was released at the end of 2002. Even though BMW ended their 10-year relationship with Fallon in 2005, the eight films remained available on http://www.bmwfilms.com.

OUTCOME

"The Hire" raked in a plethora of advertising awards, including two Grand Clio Awards and a Grand Prix Cyber Lion at the International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France, along with Best of Show at the One Show Interactive competition. The campaign was praised not just by the ad industry; it earned kudos within the entertainment arena as well. "Hostage," from the second series of films, earned the award for Best Action Short during the Los Angeles International Short Film Festival in 2002. Entertainment magazines began reviewing the films. Even the New York Times gave the films a favorable review. Their entertainment value garnered media coverage not accessible to typical advertisement. "We'd hoped for a good response, but we never thought it would be as strong as it was," Bildsten told Shoot in 2001. "BMW recorded over eleven million film-views. And according to their research, it really worked. [The films] got people to not just pay attention, but to buy cars."

By June 2003 the films had been viewed more than 45 million times. BMW's sales rose 17.2 percent between 2001 and 2002, helping the automaker to outsell Mercedes and placing it second only to Lexus in the luxury-car market. From an ad industry perspective, the greatest pinnacle of "The Hire" may have been winning the first-ever Titanium Lion, the highest honor at the Cannes International Advertising Festival. The award recognized a campaign that caused "the industry to stop in its tracks and reconsider the way forward."

FURTHER READING

DeSalvo, Kathy. "BMW Weaves through the Web with Five Filmmakers." Shoot, May 11, 2001, p. 1.

Dill, Mallorre. "Movie Magic: Fallon's BMW Films Wins Top Honors at the One Show." Adweek (eastern ed.), May 13, 2002, p. 27.

Gaylin, Alison. "Drive On: BMW Breaks New Ground with Internet Series." Shoot, December 7, 2001, p. 30.

Hatfield, Stefano. "In BMW's Wake, Mercedes in U.K. Tries Its Own 'Movie.'" Advertising Age, July 22, 2002, p. 21.

Horn, Gabi. "Campaign of the Year: BMWfilms.com." Advertising Age's Creativity, December 1, 2001, p. 32.

Howe, Jeff. "BMWfilms.com." Brandweek, November 12, 2001, p. 5.

McCarthy, Michael. "BMW Cars to Star in Online Movie Sequel." USA Today, June 7, 2002, p. B3.

———. "BMW Drives into New Ad World: PC Mini-film." USA Today, June 6, 2001, p. B3.

McKissack, Fred. "Commercials Masquerade as TV Films." Capital Times, October 8, 2002, p. 1D.

Takaki, Millie. "Dirs. Scott, Woo, Carnahan Answer 'The Hire' Calling: RSA USA, Fallon Team on Three Web-Based Short Films for BMW." Shoot, August 16, 2002, p. 1.

Vagnoni, Anthony. "Behind the Wheel: BMW and Fallon's Web Films Widen Horizons for Entertaining Ways to Brand." Advertising Age, July 23, 2001, p. 12.

Wilcha, Kristin. "Short Route: BMW Tops One Show." Shoot, May 17, 2001, p. 1.

Kevin Teague

BC Dairy Foundation

3236 Beta Avenue
Burnaby, British Columbia V5G 4K4
Canada
Telephone: (604) 294-3775
Fax: (604) 294-8199
Web site: www.bcdairyfoundation.ca

■■■

DON'T TAKE YOUR BODY FOR GRANTED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The BC Dairy Foundation (BCDF) was established in 1974 to promote milk consumption in the Canadian province of British Columbia. Dividing its resources between in-school educational efforts and mainstream media campaigns, the organization, like most milk marketers in Canada, primarily targeted adults in its advertising. For much of the 1980s and 1990s, however, rates of milk consumption in British Columbia, as in other parts of North America and the world, declined substantially. In 2003, enlisting agency Palmer Jarvis DDB (later referred to as DDB Canada, Vancouver), BCDF changed its marketing strategy and targeted teens and young adults in a bold, risky campaign called "Don't Take Your Body for Granted."

Rather than preaching to young people about the nutritional virtues of milk, "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" instead took the idea of bodily neglect to an absurdly humorous extreme. In TV, film, print, and outdoor advertisements, bodiless humans—beings made of heads attached directly to feet—were shown in ordinary situations that, without a body, were extremely difficult. For instance, a TV/film spot showed an elderly bodiless woman attempting to walk her small dog but instead being dragged through the streets of her neighborhood, and print ads featured such scenarios as a terrified head being toyed with by a cat and a befuddled male head looking up at an impossibly high public-restroom urinal. A companion website allowed users to create their own scenarios using the bodiless humans from the commercials. Despite a having budget of only $3 million a year during its 2003–04 run, the campaign was able to break through to its target market by using bold humor and memorable imagery.

"Don't Take Your Body for Granted" attracted favorable media attention and won numerous advertising awards. Milk consumption rates, which had been declining for roughly 20 years in British Columbia, increased by 1 percent in 2003.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Though many consumers in the English-speaking world associated milk advertising with the "Got Milk?" campaign that in the 1990s began running in California and then throughout the United States, advertising on behalf of regional and national consortiums of North American dairy farmers was a well-established practice prior to that campaign. The concept of depicting celebrities wearing milk mustaches (associated with a well-known U.S. campaign of the 1990s), in fact, was first used in the 1970s in a Canadian campaign called "Wear a Moustache," crafted by the Toronto office of ad agency Ogilvy & Mather for the Ontario Milk Marketing Board. Likewise, the Milk Calendar, first produced in 1976 by Toronto agency Allard Johnson for the Dairy Farmers of Ontario (in partnership with the provincial milk boards of Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, and the Maritimes), featured milk-centric recipes and images of health and wellness and was distributed free to millions of daily-paper subscribers in Canada. The Milk Calendar became part of the fabric of Canadian culture, gaining the loyalty of multiple generations of Canadians and accounting for measurable increases in milk consumption upon its yearly release.

A still from "Dog Walker," the television campaign launched by BC Dairy Foundation for their "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign. PHOTO COURTESY OF DDB CANADA FOR BC DAIRY FOUNDATION. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

The BC Dairy Foundation (BCDF) was established in 1974 to serve as the public voice of British Columbia's dairy producers and processors. A nonprofit organization dedicated to increasing milk consumption in that Canadian province, BCDF pursued its goal in two primary ways: by partnering with the provincial school system to educate children about the nutritional benefits of drinking milk, and by marketing and promoting fluid milk and cream in the province.

For most of the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s Canadian milk advertising in all provinces targeted adults, while milk producers used educational programs to reach children in the schools. During this time declines in milk consumption became a seemingly permanent fact of North American life. When in 2002 BCDF embarked on an agency search for a new media campaign, it decided to change advertising tactics. The organization selected one of Canada's top advertising agencies, Palmer Jarvis DDB of Vancouver (later called DDB Canada, Vancouver), to craft a new campaign that would appeal to young people.

TARGET MARKET

BCDF and Palmer Jarvis DDB selected 16- to 24-year-old British Columbia residents as their target for the "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign. This group was notoriously fickle and difficult to reach, especially by advertising on behalf of milk, which, far from having any fashionable brand attributes, was not even a brand but a raw product fully lacking in properties that might be considered "cool." These teenagers and young adults, however, were particularly vital to the project of increasing milk consumption in the population at large, because the age of 16 or 17 marked the time in life when most people ceased consuming milk regularly.

Palmer Jarvis DDB enlisted its youth-marketing sibling shop, DDB Kid Think, to undertake substantial research on its target group, gleaning insights from interactions with high school and college students. Based on this research Palmer Jarvis DDB concluded that teens could be convinced to drink milk neither with a pitch suggesting that it was cool to do so nor with preachy messages about the health benefits of milk consumption. To substantially alter milk-consumption patterns among the target group, the agency felt, it had to do no less than make young people see milk in a new way. It thus began the search for a governing concept that was, according to Marketing Magazine, "unpredictable, slightly outrageous, and purposely non-adult."

SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST

The BC Dairy Foundation followed up its "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign with a similarly daring 2005 campaign tagged "It's Always Been Survival of the Fittest. Drink Milk." The campaign's TV spots were set in the Stone Age, which BCDF described in a press release as "a time when making nutritional food choices could have an immediate impact on survival." In the commercials cavemen were shown making poor beverage choices that resulted in their failure to survive. For instance, one spot showed a caveman who stumbled upon a soda can on a desert plain. While tilting the mostly empty can to try and get the remnants of the drink into his mouth, he was trampled by a dinosaur, who was shown trying to scrape the man from his foot at the end of the commercial.

COMPETITION

The other Canadian provinces each had individual organizations similar to BCDF. Rather than compete with one another, they each had the same goal of increasing milk consumption in their respective provinces. Several parallel milk advertising campaigns thus ran at once in Canada during this time, representing a variety of tactics and messages, while the most recognizable milk campaign of all time was airing in the United States.

One of the most lauded Canadian milk campaigns of the late 1990s and early 2000s was the work of the Quebec milk-producers group Fédération des producteurs de lait du Québec and its agency BBDO Montreal. Launched in 1998, the campaign targeted adults with the theme "Jamais sans mon lait" (never without my milk) and used French songs by classic recording artists such as Gilbert Bécaud, Charles Trenet, and Edith Piaf, together with sentimental, everyday scenes showing the defining presence of milk in the various stages of life. The immense popularity of the campaign led the milk federation to release The White Album, a CD compilation of the songs featured in the commercials. The album sold 250,000 copies. In 2001 an English-language segment of the campaign was unveiled for the benefit of the 800,000 Anglophones living in Quebec.

In the early 2000s the organizations representing dairy farmers in Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba pooled their resources and marketing skills for another noteworthy Canadian campaign, crafted by Vancouver's Cossette Communication-Marketing. These organizations targeted 9- to 17-year-olds, reasoning that children in this age group had more autonomy than in previous generations and therefore needed to be persuaded to make their own choice of milk over other beverage options. Like BCDF, these marketers understood that a pitch relying on the health benefits of milk would not be effective with young people. Using the tagline "Never Stop. Milk," individual TV spots employed images that dramatized such issues as first love, emotional loss, and the power of the imagination, all of which played on the idea of growth that never stopped. Milk was not featured explicitly in the commercials but rather was linked to physical and intellectual growth.

The best-known milk advertising campaign during this time—and of all time—was "Got Milk?" It was created by agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners for the California Milk Processor Board. "Got Milk?" began as a California campaign in 1993, ran nationally in the United States from 1995 to 1998, and continued to run in its state of origin through the early 2000s. It took as its conceptual basis scenes in which the lack of milk resulted in humorously serious predicaments. Although "Got Milk?" was associated with the well-known print and outdoor campaign featuring celebrities with milk mustaches, which ran nationally in the late 1990s and through the 2000s, the two were actually separate campaigns. The defining "Got Milk?" spot was called "Aaron Burr," and it featured a bookish history buff who could not provide the answer to a radio trivia contest—listeners were asked to name the person who shot Alexander Hamilton (the answer was Aaron Burr)—because his mouth was full of peanut butter and he had no milk. The celebrity milk-mustache campaign, created for the nationwide Milk Processor Education Program by agency Bozell (and based on a 1970s Canadian campaign), began its run with the tagline "Where's your mustache?" When it discovered that consumers already believed that "Got Milk?" was the mustache campaign's tagline, the Milk Processor Education Program purchased the usage rights to "Got Milk?" from the California Milk Processor Board. "Got Milk?" became one of the best-known ad slogans in recent memory as well as a brand in its own right. The California Milk Processor Board created a briskly selling line of retail products—baby clothes, toys, ice-cream scoops, and aprons among them—with the tagline imprinted on them.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In "Don't Take Your Body for Granted," which was launched in January 2003, Palmer Jarvis DDB attempted to satisfy its mandate of changing the way teens looked at milk with an absurdly humorous visual conceit: the campaign theme was dramatized through images of human beings who literally had no bodies. They instead consisted of normal heads attached directly to feet, and each of the campaign's many TV, cinema, print, and outdoor executions illustrated the difficulty of life without a body.

For instance, one TV/cinema spot, "Dogwalker," showed the bodiless head of a grandmotherly woman being dragged behind the poodle she was attempting to walk. Another spot, "Bus," centered on a public-bus driver who, because he consisted only of head and feet, could not effectively reach either the pedals or the steering wheel of the vehicle; meanwhile, his bodiless passengers rolled about on the bus's floorboards. These commercials generated substantial tension and drama as the bodiless humans struggled unsuccessfully to regain control of their respective situations—situations that would have been ordinary but that had become positively harrowing in the absence of bodies. At the conclusion of each suspenseful action sequence, a white screen appeared with the message "Don't take your body for granted" imprinted upon it. This screen was then replaced with a second white screen reading "Drink Milk."

Print and outdoor ads used the same concept, with the tagline printed along the bottom of each image. One print/outdoor ad, "Urinal," showed a bodiless man looking up at a public-restroom urinal, which towered over him and presented an obviously insurmountable challenge. In "Cat" a cat toyed with a fearful head instead of a nearby ball of yarn, and "Escalator" showed the upturned, high-heeled feet and panicked head of a bodiless woman whose hair was caught in the teeth of an escalator.

An online component of the campaign, accessible at the website http://www.drinkmilk.ca, supported the media placements by offering an interactive experience with the campaign's bodiless humans. Users were asked to create their own 3-D images—employing their choice of backgrounds, characters, objects, speech bubbles, and motion lines—illustrating the difficulties presented by the lack of a body.

One of the initial difficulties Palmer Jarvis DDB faced was selling its conservative client on the outrageous idea it was suggesting. It therefore made a highly unusual proposition: if BCDF was not satisfied with the results of "Don't Take Your Body for Granted," the ad agency would create another campaign for free. BCDF took Palmer Jarvis DDB up on its offer, deciding to risk its reputation on the innovative campaign. The agency's director of brand management, Bill Baker, told Strategy magazine that, faced with negative feedback from constituents in the organization, one board member responded by saying, "Listen, I'm not sure I entirely get this campaign either . . . . But my teen-aged kids love them. They laugh hysterically every time they see them, and that's what we're trying to do here."

The arresting nature of the campaign's individual executions was particularly necessary given another of Palmer Jarvis DDB's key obstacles: a budget of only 3 million Canadian dollars, which did not allow it to place the commercials with the frequency that was usually necessary to reach its target market effectively, and which did not remotely approach comparable ad spending on behalf of branded beverages. Palmer Jarvis DDB creative director Alan Russell told Boards, "Apart from being a strategically smart campaign, the ads will draw tremendous attention because of their originality. The concept, the story lines, the visual craziness and the surprising payoff are all so unexpected for the milk category that I can't imagine not recalling these commercials, even after one viewing."

OUTCOME

Creativity said of the "Don't Take Your Body for Granted" campaign, "The fact is, our neighbors to the north at Palmer Jarvis DDB have out-mooed 'Got Milk?' with a disembodied piece of genius youth marketing." The campaign won numerous Canadian and international awards, including a Bronze Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival for the TV spot "Dogwalker" and a Bronze Clio for the 2004 print campaign. Market research found that, despite the limited TV and cinema placement of the campaign's spots—an unavoidable result of its minimal budget—80 percent of young people in British Columbia saw at least one of the commercials in 2003, compared to the 56 percent norm for campaigns with the same budget. Ninety-two percent of the young people who had seen individual spots agreed with descriptions of them as unique and different, and 83 percent deemed the commercials enjoyable. British Columbia's milk consumption climbed by 1 percent in 2003, at a time when the dairy industry hoped at best for modestly declining—rather than rapidly declining—sales. The consumption of flavored milk by teens and young adults climbed by 11.5 percent in 2003 as well. The campaign ran through 2004.

FURTHER READING

"B.C. Dairy Searches Alone." Marketing Magazine, May 20, 2002.

"Campaign: B.C. Dairy." Creativity, April 2003.

Christie, Brendan. "They're at It Again." Boards Online, February 6, 2003. Available from http://www.boardsmag.com/articles/online/20030206/moo.html

Dobson, Sarah. "Moo Juice Marketers." Marketing Magazine, May 26, 2003.

Gray, Gary. "Sour Milk." Marketing Magazine, March 1, 2004.

Katz, Hélène. "Milking Nostalgia." Marketing Magazine, April 5, 2004.

Lazarus, Eve. "The Cool Appeal of Milk." Marketing Magazine, December 8, 2003.

Lepage, Florence. "BC Dairy Foundation." Marketing Magazine, April 21, 2003.

Loughlin, Katherine. "Peer Pressure." Marketing Magazine, March 8, 2004.

Vinakmens, Kristen. "In the Hands of a Good Doctor." Strategy Magazine, November 3, 2003. Available from <http://www.strategymag.com/articles/magazine/20031103/relations.html>

Voight, Joan. "Dairy's Queen." Adweek, April 14, 2003.

Mark Lane

Binney & Smith

1100 Church Lane
Easton, Pennsylvania 18044
USA
Telephone: (610) 253-6271
Fax: (610) 250-5768
Web site: www.binney-smith.com

■■■

MAKE PLAY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Crayola was the most recognized brand name in children's art products, but as the twenty-first century dawned, the company that made Crayola—Binney & Smith of Easton, Pennsylvania (founded in 1885, a subsidiary of Hallmark since 1984)—grew more and more concerned that brand perception had boxed it into a corner. The public saw that Crayola had only crayons and markers, and for that reason 90 percent of its sales came during the late summer, when children were preparing to return to school. Furthermore, most new Crayola products were so overshadowed by the brand's two main items that sales in other areas were poor. Lastly, many viewed the line as old-fashioned, as even art supplies had moved into the electronic age.

To correct this perception Binney & Smith turned to its advertising agency of record, Leo Burnett of Chicago. In response to the challenge, the agency devised an award-winning television campaign on a budget of less than $1 million. The campaign, which aired on television for three weeks in spring of 2003, was titled ''Make Play.'' Two ads, ''Night'' and ''Fin,'' highlighted the new Crayola products while showing that children could enjoy Crayola year-round.

The campaign was effective enough to garner a 2004 Silver EFFIE Award. It also set the tone for future Crayola campaigns that emphasized the product line as being more diverse than simply crayons and markers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Coincidentally or not, 2003 marked the centennial anniversary of the Crayola brand. For most of those 100 years the product held a secure place in the market—more than 120 billion crayons were sold worldwide—and therefore change came slowly to Crayola. Aside from expanding the number of colors (the 48-count box debuted in 1949, the 64-count box with sharpener in 1958) and occasionally renaming the colors (in 1962, for instance, ''flesh'' was renamed ''peach''), the Crayola brand pretty much adhered to its tried-and-true formula. In 1978 markers became part of the product line, and for the next 25 years the company was perceived in light of those two products, despite the fact that in 1976 Binney & Smith had bought the highly successful product Silly Putty.

Crayola periodically reinforced itself in the public mind for most of that quarter of a century with marketing efforts that encouraged people to come up with names for new colors or rename old colors. Research and development was not, however, dormant at Crayola. Among the newer Crayola products was Window Writers, color markers that enabled children to write on windows and that were easily wiped off. In 2002 Window Writers were given the seal of excellence by the Quebec Consumers Association, which tested toys with 199 children aged 6 months to 12 years. In June 2002 Binney & Smith took another tack in its effort to push its products beyond the once- or twice-a-year buying spurts. The company opened what was referred to as a "branded destination site" in Hanover, Maryland, a suburb of Baltimore. Leslie Kaufman of the New York Times described Crayola Works as "a hybrid store and creative arts studio."

© LWA-SHARIE KENNEDY/CORBIS

By 2003 Crayola's annual output was stupendous. According to Kathy Flanigan writing in the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, it amounted to 1.5 million bottles of paint, 9 million Silly Putty eggs, 110 million sticks of chalk, 465 million markers, 600 million colored pencils, and a staggering 3 billion crayons. Still, there remained the problem of overcoming the perception that Crayola was a once-a-year buy. Sales of paints, modeling compound, and activity kits had decreased to such an extent that in November 2002 Binney & Smith announced it was dropping the third shift of its plant in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The company also moved some production to Mexico.

TARGET MARKET

Part of the challenge of the "Make Play" campaign was to shift Crayola's traditional target market from parents (primarily mothers) to children aged six to nine. It was parental buying habits that contributed greatly to the notion of Crayola products as simply back-to-school items. In other words, what Crayola had to do was appeal directly to those people using its products—kids—in order to break a century-old, ingrained shopping habit. In the "brief of effectiveness" that it submitted for the EFFIE Awards, the Leo Burnett agency explained that, in order to fuel sales growth throughout the year, Crayola needed to make kids themselves excited about the products. Further, it stated, "The brand also needed to go beyond the same old basic school-supply crayons and markers and focus on innovative products to drive category enthusiasm with kids." In other words Crayola was going to appeal to its new target market, six to nine year olds, by offering products that might not be seen as school supplies.

COMPETITION

Crayola's competitors within the children's-arts-and-crafts category included Alex, Rose Art, Faber Castell, Imaginarium (the in-house brand for Toys "R" Us), and Newell Rubbermaid, Inc. A century of name recognition, however, made Crayola dominant in the field. In 2001 Crayola controlled about 75 percent of the market, with Rose Art a distant second at 13 percent. With regard to market share the competition was almost negligible, though in more upscale toy stores, brands such as Alex, Rose Art, and even Faber Castell sometimes predominated. The relative newcomer to the field was Newell Rubbermaid, which had acquired pencil-maker Sanford in 1992. In 2001 Newell Rubbermaid announced that it was reviving Sanford's Colorific brand and taking on Crayola's hegemony in the crayon-and-marker market, which was then valued at some $800 million. Newell's goal was to acquire a 10 percent market share by 2003.

THE CRAYOLA NAME

The name "Crayola" was devised in 1903 by Alice Binney, the wife of Edwin Binney (who, together with his cousin C. Harold Smith, had invented the crayons). She combined craie, the French word for chalk, with "ola," short for oleaginous or oily. Literally, "Crayola" meant "oily chalk." A survey conducted in 1999 indicated that 99 percent of Americans recognized the Crayola name.

Crayola faced stiffer competition for children's time from products outside the category of children's arts and crafts. First and perhaps foremost were television and its ancillary products, such as videos, DVDs, and video games. Competition was also provided by other children's toys specific to the age category of Crayola's target audience. Whether the competitors' toys (outside of the arts-and-crafts field) were electronic or not, they were still seen as year-round activities. Despite the fact that coloring was also a year-round activity, it was not seen as such with regard to consumer spending. Still, the Leo Burnett agency, in conjunction with Binney & Smith, believed that Crayola's newer items were enough of a basis upon which to build year-round demand, a demand that would center on the intrinsic value of the products.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Arts-and-crafts toys were essentially the opposite of electronic games and toys in that they stimulated a child's imagination rather than dulled it. The strategy of the "Make Play" ad campaign of 2003 was to reinforce this premise while focusing on new Crayola products, Twistables, a crayon created in response to the Glitz Stix put out under Sanford's Colorific brand; Click Em On Markers, which enabled a child to engage in two different activities, drawing and building; and Model Magic, a new type of modeling clay that dried overnight, allowing children more or less to create their own toys. These new products were to help achieve the campaign's goals of stimulating brand sales beyond the back-to-school period and expanding Crayola's already dominant market share of the children's-arts-and-crafts category.

Because the campaign's budget was limited to less than $600,000, television was the medium of choice. In fact, no other advertising medium was used to support the campaign. As reported in Leo Burnett's EFFIE Award brief for the campaign, "After evaluating a variety of media vehicles, TV ranked highest for the target's media consumption, affinity, mass reach, and ability to drive awareness of our product." The belief was that the television spots would ignite in the six- to nine-year-old target market what the agency dubbed "pester power"—children asking their parents to buy them something.

The television spots came out during the third week of April 2003, just prior to the Easter holiday. Traditionally this time of year was the third-heaviest period for children's advertisers (the top two were the back-to-school period and the weeks leading up to Christmas). The spots featured two commercials: "Night," which advertised Crayola Twistables, and "Fin," which showcased Click Em Ons. Lewis Lazare, an advertising critic for the Chicago Sun-Times, rated the former spot over the latter. He also stated, "the ads make clear that Crayola has moved beyond the simple crayon with the introduction of products aimed at today's sophisticated youngster, for whom simplicity isn't necessarily a virtue."

In discussing the Crayola spots Lazare wrote: "'Fin'... promotes Click Em Ons, a new marker that doubles as a set of sticks that click together to build things... The spot shows a boy using Click Em Ons to make [paper] shark fins that he places around his nearby pet dog. Then the boy snaps together the markers to build a protective cage for the pooch. The spot ably demonstrates how the product works." Lazare took exception, however, to the background music, arguing that it contributed to what he thought was a moody tone. As for the other spot, "Night," he said that it had "a lighter, more fanciful aura, as well as some lovely visuals." The commercial's first scene showed a boy playing with a glowing orb, pretending that it was a basketball. In the second scene the boy was at his desk looking through his window at his muse: a full moon. He was drawing with Twistables, a crayon designed so that the user did not have to peel paper to reveal more wax when the tip had worn down.

OUTCOME

In 2004 the "Make Play" campaign received a Silver EFFIE Award. EFFIEs were given in recognition of a campaign's effectiveness in the marketplace. The campaign, at least in the short term, accomplished both goals that had been set. Regarding stimulating sales beyond the back-to-school period, Model Magic experienced a 42.6 percent increase during the three-week advertising period. Subsequently sales tapered off, and for a number of weeks they remained at a plateau that was slightly higher than the pre-advertisement figures before settling to pre-advertisement levels in the summer of 2003.

The improvement in sales of Click Em On Markers was more dramatic. During the weeks of the "Make Play" campaign the markers experienced a 64 percent increase in sales compared to the six weeks prior to the campaign. Furthermore, in the week following the campaign's end, sales actually increased compared to the campaign's final week. In the second week after the campaign, sales were off only slightly from the campaign's final week. Both of these weeks represented substantial increases over the immediate pre-advertisement period. The campaign's second goal was to increase Crayola's share of the children's-arts-and-crafts market. To that end the campaign was also successful. Crayola gained 1.8 market share points over the same period in 2002.

Binney & Smith continued to find ways of maintaining Crayola products as items for year-round purchase, including expanding the product line. One lucrative strategy was to keep the Crayola brand name in people's minds through licensing. The Crayola brand had been licensed since the early 1990s, but in June 2003, soon after the "Make Play" campaign had run its course, Binney & Smith opted to maintain a booth at the Licensing Show (an annual trade event at which companies showcased their brands for prospective promotional partners) for the first time. As Amanda Burgess reported in the trade magazine KidScreen, Binney & Smith was attempting to expand its Crayola brand by creating a network of "A-list partners in toys, stationery/school supplies, apparel, accessories, bed, bath, home, publishing, and food."

In 2004 Binney & Smith ended its association with the Leo Burnett agency. That same year the company strengthened its grip on the arts-and-crafts category when the company started Big Yellow Box, a direct-sales venture that used independent representatives to market craft kits.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Binney & Smith Pulls Out of Burnett." Adweek, July 2, 2004.

Burgess, Amanda. "Crayola's Licensing Agenda Is Set to Get More Colorful." KidScreen, June 1, 2003.

Cornacchia, Cheryl. "Play Favourites: Lego and Crayola Markers among Top Toys Reviewed by Quebec Consumers Association." Gazette (Montreal), October 24, 2002.

"Crayola Is 100 Years Old. Orange You Tickled Pink?" Washington Post, October 7, 2003.

Flanigan, Kathy. "A Colorful Century from Crayola." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 3, 2003.

Gallun, Alby. "Newell's New Colors; Ends Acquisition Binge to Focus on Boosting Existing Brands." Crain's Chicago Business, June 4, 2001.

Garland, Susan B. "So Glad You Could Come. Can I Sell You Anything?" New York Times, December 19, 2004.

Kaufman, Leslie. "PBS Is Expanding Its Brand from the Television Screen to the Shopping Mall." New York Times, June 27, 2002.

"KGOY but Can Brand Owners Keep Up?" Brand Strategy, November 2, 2001.

Lazare, Lewis. "2 Spots Tout New Crayola Products." Chicago Sun-Times, April 23, 2003.

"MediaBin Software to Help Market Toys." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, April 17, 2002.

Frank Caso

The Body Shop International PLC

Watersmead
Littlehampton
West Sussex, BN17 6LS
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 1903 731500
Fax: 44 1903 726250
E-mail: info@bodyshop.co.uk
Web site: www.the-body-shop.com

■■■

RUBY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1976, when the cosmetics industry was making exaggerated claims about scientific advancements in skin care, Anita Roddick opened a store, The Body Shop, in a seaside town on the southern coast of England. Her product line, based on natural ingredients and age-old beauty secrets from Polynesia and the Amazon rainforest, was a vast departure from the patented laboratory-created, animal-tested products that promised to stop the aging process, eradicate dark circles under the eyes, and otherwise correct a woman's flaws. The products were plainly packaged, and they were not tested on animals and not promoted through extravagant advertising campaigns. In 1988 Roddick opened her first store in the United States, and by that time—through various social initiatives such as the "Stop the Burn" campaign to save the Brazilian rainforest (the source of many of the company's natural ingredients) and strong support of employee volunteerism—The Body Shop name had become synonymous with social activism and global preservation worldwide. The company had also become immensely profitable.

By the mid-1990s, however, The Body Shop faced growing competition, forcing it to begin its first major advertising initiative, the most prominent part of which was the "Ruby" campaign. The campaign was personified by Ruby, a doll with Rubenesque proportions who was perched on an antique couch and who looked quite pleased with herself and her plump frame. Randy Williamson, a spokesperson for The Body Shop, said, "Ruby is the fruit of our long-established practice of challenging the way the cosmetic industry talks to women. The Ruby campaign is designed to promote the idea that The Body Shop creates products designed to enhance features, moisturize, cleanse, and polish, not to correct 'flaws.' The Body Shop philosophy is that there is real beauty in everyone. We are not claiming that our products perform miracles."

The Ruby doll, a computer-generated image, appeared on posters, stickers, and T-shirts and in magazine ads. The campaign was launched in the United States in September 1997 following its successful introduction in several other countries.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Body Shop was founded in 1976 in Brighton, England. From her original shop, which offered a line of 25 different lotions, creams, and oils, Roddick became the first successful marketer of body care products that combined natural ingredients with ecologically-benign manufacturing processes. Her company's refusal to test products on animals, along with an insistence on nonexploitative labor practices among suppliers around the world, appealed especially to upscale, mainly middle-class women, who were and have continued to be the company's primary market.

Part of the secret of The Body Shop's early success was that it had created a market niche for itself. The company was not directly competing against the traditional cosmetics companies, which marketed their products as fashion accessories designed to cover up flaws and make women look more like the fashion models who appeared in their lavish ads. Instead, The Body Shop offered a line of products that promised benefits other than appearance—healthier skin, for instance—rather than simply a better-looking complexion.

During the 1980s, when The Body Shop dominated the niche it had created, it avoided the kinds of traditional marketing used by the more fashion-driven cosmetics companies. This "antimarketing" strategy defied conventional wisdom in several important ways: the company had no advertising agency, it did not hire fashion photographers to photograph beautiful women wearing its products, and it did not advertise in the usual women's magazines. Instead, it relied on in-store promotions, including posters and educational materials that targeted its own customers, who then passed the word to their friends. This word-of-mouth approach, often regarded as the most effective form of marketing thanks to its built-in credibility factor, was augmented by a huge amount of favorable publicity generated largely by Roddick herself.

Roddick was outspoken in her views on environmentalism and social justice, and in the 1980s her beliefs ran against the prevailing political and social climate in a way that appealed to her target market. One of the company's best-known stands was its hard-line opposition to animal testing for cosmetics. It also instituted a Community Trade Programme, which attempted to find the company's natural ingredients from grassroots cooperatives and other community-based groups, thus helping to ensure that the profits went to people in need rather than to exploitative subcontractors. The Eastern European Relief Drive, designed to fund orphanages in Romania, and the Brazilian Healthcare Project, which provided care for 28 villages in the Amazon, were other company projects having little to do with cosmetics and everything to do with building a positive image for its socially conscious customers.

These initiatives generated an ongoing stream of favorable press attention, and The Body Shop, along with the American ice cream maker Ben and Jerry's, was hailed as a new breed of green, or environmentally conscious, business. As sales boomed, even the conservative financial markets approved of The Body Shop's impressive profit picture, and a public stock offering in 1984 was successful. An expansion campaign followed. In 1988 the company entered the U.S. market by opening a store in New York City, and by 1997 the company boasted 1,500 stores, including franchises, in 47 countries. Antimarketing seemed to be smart marketing, at least as far as The Body Shop was concerned.

TARGET MARKET

With its emphasis on natural ingredients and ethical processes, The Body Shop made it clear from the beginning that it was creating products for women who cared not only about their health and appearance but also about the environment. The company's success, in fact, was built on its ability to blend a product line with an environmentally conscious philosophy, which was particularly attractive to the generation of women who grew up in the 1960s and '70s. These women saw the Body Shop as an ethical alternative to the beauty-at-any-price stance of the more fashion-driven cosmetics companies. But it was also an emotional appeal, one that promised customers that in buying its products they were doing something good for the planet. In its early years The Body Shop's customers tended to be young middle-class women who could afford the extra expense that high-quality natural ingredients often entailed but who also bridled at the high prices attached to designer cosmetics. Over the years, as these early customers aged, many retained their "global" sensibilities, and The Body Shop continued to be a reliable source of products they could believe in.

Beauty in the traditional sense as portrayed by other cosmetics companies was never a concern either in The Body Shop's products or in its marketing. Thus, the "Ruby" campaign, which questioned the ideal of a thin body for every woman, was consistent with the company's long-standing principles. The campaign was also in line with another of the company's beliefs—truth in advertising—which had strong appeal to its target market. If The Body Shop was not going to make exaggerated claims for its products, it certainly was not going to pretend that every woman could, or should, try to look like the extremely thin models that filled women's magazines.

COMPETITION

By the mid-1990s The Body Shop's once invincible hold on its market began to loosen. Competitors, including The Limited's Bath & Body Works, Crabtree & Evelyn, and Aveda, had launched their own lines of natural cosmetics, often through their own chains of stores. The resulting glut precipitated a market shakeout in which smaller, undercapitalized companies began to be forced out of business, and even the larger companies faced flattening growth curves.

NOT FOR WOMEN ONLY

In the 1990s The Body Shop attempted to extended its market to include men. Although they were slow to accept "cosmetics," men, especially those who had grown up in the 1960s and 1970s, were open to shaving lotions and suntan oils. As a result, The Body Shop introduced lines of men's lotions and oils made with natural and ethically produced ingredients.

In June 1997, prior to the "Ruby" campaign, The Body Shop displayed in its stores a poster that depicted a man with a bottle protruding from his bathing suit. The poster was advertising The Body Shop's self-tanning lotion. The poster offended some people, and in North Carolina there were protests. Unwilling to be pressured by what it perceived to be a double standard in sexual stereotyping, the company refused to remove the poster from its stores.

The Body Shop found that, especially in the United States, its antimarketing style was having difficulty in the face of much more aggressive efforts by its competitors. American consumers, long accustomed to being actively campaigned for by advertisers, were less loyal to brands than the English and were more apt to be tempted by new products, new brands, and new packaging. Gift giving—for Mother's Day, Valentine's Day, and other holidays—was important in the United States, but The Body Shop's European management was late in realizing how great an impact this could have. By 1995 its profits from U.S. sales were falling, and as share prices responded to the disappointing profit figures, The Body Shop's relationship with the financial community also became strained. In 1996, its 20th anniversary, the company faced a crisis that seemed to demand a new marketing strategy.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 1995 The Body Shop responded to its eroding market share by doubling its U.K. marketing budget while dramatically slowing the rate at which it was opening new stores in the United States. It also broke tradition by creating an in-house marketing department, something it had always resisted, and it named a marketing director and added marketing managers for individual product lines. In 1994 The Body Shop had hired the London office of the American advertising agency Chiat/Day (since renamed St. Lukes), though only in a "marketing consultancy" role, and by the following year the company was poised to regroup its marketing efforts.

At the same time The Body Shop was careful to back up its high, marketing profile with a series of initiatives aimed at convincing customers that the changes were more than just skin deep. These included a complete packaging redesign, a new hairstyling line, relaunches of the hair care and skin care lines, and several new fragrances. The company also announced a new direct home-shopping service and took its message directly to the American market with a 300-square-foot show truck that toured selected cities with product demonstrations. And for the first time the company began to entertain the possibility of direct advertising at the local level in the American market. Ads began to appear, though not in any orchestrated media campaign and mostly in smaller alternative publications such as Mother Jones.

With these initiatives starting to take effect throughout 1996, the company was planning its boldest marketing effort yet, the "Ruby" campaign. Part of a broader "Love Your Body" campaign, the "Ruby" campaign in the United States began with in-store posters and an ad in Self magazine. In keeping with The Body Shop's iconoclastic tradition, the company positioned itself squarely against an idea that had long dominated the fashion industry, the notion that there was an ideal beauty to which all women should aspire and that the ideal was decided by experts in Paris, New York, and London. The "Ruby" ad showed a redheaded, decidedly Rubenesque nude doll (hence the name Ruby) lounging luxuriously on a green velvet sofa. The headline had a blunt message: "There are 3 billion women who don't look like supermodels and only 8 who do."

The concept was created in-house by a team that included Roddick; her husband Gordon, who was the company's chairman; and Marina Galanti, the former international communications and media director for Benetton Group, the Italian clothing company known for its ads featuring social issues rather than clothes. In a U.S. interview with National Public Radio, Roddick described the setting of Ruby's creation: "The girls in [British fashion magazines] are exactly what the media wants . . . they have no bodies, they're too thin. They are passive. They are, you know, beaten up. So, we—three of us in my office—we came up with this broadsheet which was called 'Full Voice.' It was like a pamphlet on the body and self-esteem." While working on the pamphlet, they found a computer image of a doll they altered, blowing it up to an ever greater size until it became the Ruby of the campaign. The Body Shop placed the image in 400,000 newspaper inserts, and soon afterward the campaign took off.

It was notable that, like the Benetton campaigns, The Body Shop's new ad did not feature any products. It was satisfied to identify itself with a movement already well under way that held that a woman's sense of well-being, self-esteem, and beauty should arise from qualities such as health and happiness rather than from external ideals. A company statement at the time proclaimed, "As the personification of The Body Shop's commitment to self-esteem, Ruby is more than just an image; she's a state of mind—strong, independent and informed. She doesn't weigh her self-esteem against false standards. She loves her body and is true to herself."

Although this was an unusual message for a line of skin and hair care products, it came at a time when other companies were also making ads that questioned conventional images of beauty. In print ads for Freeman Cosmetics, for example, a woman was shown with her back to the camera. The caption asked, "How much do you need to see to know I'm beautiful?" An ad for Dove soap declared that its bar was "for the beauty that's already there." Even more blunt was a Canadian ad for Kellogg's Special K cereal. Featuring a very thin model, the ad asked, "If this is beauty, there's something wrong with the eye of the beholder." But among the advertising campaigns in this trend, the "Ruby" ad was among the most provocative because it not only questioned the ideal of an exceptionally thin body—which most women could not attain—but also promoted a nude "size 18" doll as an example of beauty.

Concurrent with the ad, The Body Shop produced Ruby stickers, postcards, and refrigerator magnets for sale in its stores and installed 40- by 60-foot banners of the doll in 289 selected stores in the United States. Though by far the most noted part of the company's new advertising initiative, "Ruby" was actually just one of a trilogy of issues-oriented campaigns that focused on body image, domestic violence, and aging. For the campaign on domestic violence, launched in October 1997, The Body Shop sold special whistles designed to call attention to what it had identified as another hot-button issue for women. The third issue, aging, with its natural tie-in to wrinkles and skin care, came closest to being a traditional product supporter.

These campaigns were supported by Full Voice, which, beginning as a broadsheet, was transformed into a company magazine. Produced in-house, the magazine was used to promote all of the company's ongoing environmental and social causes. Its reasoned explanations of emotionally resonant issues fit well within the company's overall strategy of appealing to the whole woman rather than just her body.

OUTCOME

The "Ruby" ad generated immediate attention both in the press and among the public. The New York Times and Good Morning America both ran stories, and the advertising press took note. Simon Green, creative partner at the advertising agency BDDH in London, wrote approvingly of the ad for the Independent: "Most women know that they are not supermodels, but there is no advertising out there that recognizes them for who they are without being condescending or patronising . . . I'm not even in the target audience, but even as a man it makes me have more empathy for The Body Shop." During the campaign the company reported a boost in sales in some of its markets, including a 12 percent sales increase in Australia and Switzerland.

Not everyone, though, was fond of the campaign. National Public Radio, which interviewed pedestrians passing by a Ruby poster in New York City, found mixed reactions. One person said, "I think it's too bitterly honest. It looks kind of degrading." Another pedestrian remarked, "It's representative, but they could have made her look more appealing . . . put a slip or something on her." Still another said, "It looks like a Barbie Doll that went wrong." But others in the interview were impressed. "It makes you feel better about yourself," a pedestrian said, reflecting one of the main goals of the campaign. The Body Shop, in fact, received thousands of calls and letters from women expressing gratitude for Ruby's realistic portrayal of beauty—gratitude, the company hoped, that would translate into increased sales for its products. But Sean Larkins, corporate public relations manager for The Body Shop, said, "We don't see profits as the be-all and end-all. We feel that business has a social responsibility to the self-esteem and well-being of its customers."

FURTHER READING

"The Body Shop Gets Real with Ruby." Household & Personal Products Industry, September 1997, p. 10.

Davis, Donald A. "Glut Indeed." Drug & Cosmetic Industry, November 1996, p. 22.

Elliott, Stuart. "The Body Shop's Campaign Offers Reality, Not Miracles." New York Times, August 26, 1997, p. C8.

Fallon, James. "Body Shop's American Agenda." Women's Wear Daily, May 12, 1995, p. S10.

Lee, Julian, and Patrick Barrett. "Body in Need of Reshaping." Marketing, April 4, 1996, p. 10.

Walker, Sophie. "Body Shop Barbie Ad Spawns New Campaign." Financial Express, September 4, 1997.

Patrick Hutchins

Borders Group, Inc.

100 Phoenix Drive
Ann Arbor, Michigan 48108
USA
Telephone: (734) 477-1100
Fax: (734) 477-1965
Web site: www.bordersgroupinc.com

■■■

THIS SEASON, IT'S THE ORIGINAL THOUGHT THAT COUNTS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Borders Group, Inc., the second-largest American book retailer after Barnes & Noble, Inc., adjusted to a trend of dwindling mall traffic by erecting more and more superstores, which tallied 435 by 2003. Hoping to dissuade consumers from shopping for books, CDs, and videos over the Internet, Borders strove to provide at each of its stores a customer-friendly setting equipped with cafés, furnished with comfortable seating, and set up so that customers could preview books and music before making a purchase. In April 2003 Borders ended its relationship with the Campbell-Ewald Company, the agency that had created Borders' "Find Out" campaign. Shifting away from price-oriented advertising and focusing instead on the meaningfulness of gift-giving, Borders released its "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" campaign for the 2003 holiday season.

Borders awarded Crispin Porter + Bogusky's Venice, California, office its first account, estimated at $15 million, in September 2003. On November 30 Crispin Porter + Bogusky launched "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" across print and outdoor advertising, with all advertising displaying the campaign's title as the tagline. The print ads, which appeared as inserts in newspapers nationwide during the weeks before Christmas, featured copy on one side that described the joys of receiving books as gifts. The insert's other side looked and felt like holiday wrapping paper. In addition to the book-themed newspaper inserts, DVD-themed wrapping paper was placed in Rolling Stone Magazine to suggest that movies made thoughtful gifts. With the same sentiment in mind, images of CD cases appeared in the New Yorker. All inserts could be removed and used to gift wrap a regular-size book, CD, or DVD.

The campaign garnered a plethora of ad-industry awards, including a Silver Pencil and a Best in Show recognition at 2004's ATHENA Awards competition, sponsored by the Newspaper Association of America. Borders saw a 3.78 percent sales growth in 2003, with 35 percent of its sales occurring during the quarter in which the campaign ran.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Prior to Crispin Porter + Bogusky's involvement, Borders had run a long campaign titled "Find Out," launched by Campbell-Ewald in the mid-1990s and lasting until April 2003. The campaign, which borrowed from earlier work done by ad agency Perich + Partners, focused on the experience of browsing in a bookstore. During the duration of ''Find Out,'' Borders held promotional events such as book readings, author signings, lectures, and local-musician showcases. By April 2003 the campaign only appeared across print.

The company also cross-promoted with Children's Books & Toys, Inc., the parent company of FAO Schwarz. Borders recommended and delivered its books, music, and movies to Children's Books & Toys stores. In return the toy stores provided products for Borders and Waldenbooks, a mall-based bookstore chain owned by the Borders Group. But Borders, along with other bookselling superstores, tended to lack strong advertising outside the stores themselves. Mike Spinozzi, chief marketing officer for Borders, explained in Adweek that the company's marketing had in the past depended largely on ''competitive square footage.'' He later referred to the approach as an ''if you build it, they will come'' model.

Hoping to build the emotional content of its brand, Borders hired the Zyman Group (consultants) in March of 2003. Spinozzi told Adweek that Borders assigned Zyman the task of defining the ''functional and emotional benefits of the brand.'' A few months later Borders settled on Crispin Porter + Bogusky to handle its advertising, largely based on the quality of the agency's advertising for IKEA and on its vision about how the Borders brand should be developed. Tim Roper, creative director at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, commented to Adweek that if America's two book-superstores were on a college campus, ''Barnes & Noble would be the law library, and Borders would be the smaller, funkier, cooler place.'' Roper, who also wrote copy for ''This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts,'' wanted to convey the idea that there was at least one item at Borders that was a perfect fit for everybody.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted holiday shoppers within all age, income, and cultural parameters. Roper explained that its goal was ''to intervene in the robotic buying patterns that usually result in catch-all gifts like sweaters, toasters or stainless-steel pen sets. We're talking to virtually anyone who aspires to give a gift that is truly meaningful and can be tailored to the individual recipients' personality and tastes.'' Borders hoped to connect gift-giving's meaningfulness to the Borders brand. To facilitate this connection, the ''This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts'' campaign associated wrapping paper with the Borders logo. Massive retailers such as Wal-Mart and Costco could offer CDs, DVDs, and books at lower prices than Borders, which meant that Borders could not target consumers from a price orientation. ''Borders has the opportunity to be a really cool brand,'' Roper told Adweek. ''They know the need for differentiation and identity. Why buy the Tom Clancy book there rather than 15 other places?''

Borders offered consumers an informed staff and information centers that provided insight into books, CDs, and DVDs. ''This is the beginning of our conversation with the consumer about the meaningfulness of content,'' Roper continued to explain to Adweek. He later pointed out that mass merchants did not offer much insight into products similar to those sold at Borders. He also remarked that the giant retailers sold music, movies, and books almost as an afterthought.

ECHO DEVELOPING DIGITAL TECHNOLOGY

In mid-2003 Borders became a member of Echo, a consortium working on the development of technology to regulate the licensing and retailing of digital music. Echo was founded in January 2003 by Best Buy Co., Hastings Entertainment, MTS, Incorporated (Tower Records), Trans World Entertainment Corporation, Virgin Entertainment Group, and Wherehouse Entertainment.

COMPETITION

Changing advertising agencies regularly, Barnes & Noble, the largest U.S. bookseller, contracted more than four different agencies to run ads between 1999 and 2005. Advertising that appeared during 2003, the same year as Borders' ''This Season'' campaign, was executed primarily in-house by Barnes & Noble. For 2002 the company spent a reported $6 million on advertising, undershooting what Borders spent the following year by $9 million. One print ad released in 2003 made the case that the company's superior size enabled it to provide a better selection. It showed a black-and-white illustration with two stacks of books, one stack grossly larger than the other, and text that boasted, ''Bigger means more, OK?''

The primary strategy Barnes & Noble employed to bolster sales was similar to that of Borders: to merely build more superstores, some topping out at 60,000 square feet. Hoping to compete with Amazon.com, Barnes & Noble sold a large percentage of its website business, barnesandnoble.com, to Bertelsmann AG, which owned, among other things, the publisher Random House, Inc. By 2003 Barnes & Noble was trying to regain control of its website by buying Bertelsmann's shares.

WALDENBOOKS' NAMESAKE

Waldenbooks, owned by the Borders Group, was founded in 1933. The bookstore was named after Walden Pond, the Massachusetts pond that inspired Henry David Thoreau to write his renowned transcendentalist work Walden.

The dilemma for both Borders and Barnes & Noble was twofold. One, as a result of waning mall traffic, both companies' smaller bookstores—Waldenbooks belonged to Borders, and Doubleday was owned by Barnes & Noble—were losing money. Second, even though both companies recorded sales growth quarter after quarter, they continuously needed to provide reasons for people to enter their stores. Many consumers enjoyed the experience of buying books online from Amazon.com. To attract consumers inside their doors, Barnes & Noble used promotions similar to those employed by Borders, such as readings, book signings, and lectures. Its stores also featured comfortable seating and in-store cafés. In 2003 Barnes & Noble's sales grew more than 11 percent, surpassing the 3.78 percent growth Borders experienced that year.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To maximize the campaign's limited budget, Crispin Porter + Bogusky wanted to create print ads that consumers could interact with. On November 30 "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" appeared in three different executions across print and outdoor mediums. Roper and David Steinke, the project's art director, were challenged to create spots that conveyed the meaningfulness of certain gifts, especially the kind sold at Borders. The campaign portrayed other kinds of presents, such as purely functional items, as involving less sentiment and as therefore less desirable. "Price and selection and convenience can only get you so far," Roper told Adweek. "You have to start with more of a brand perspective. If you think about the offerings in a place like [Borders], it's a far more personal statement or gift than a sweater or curling iron—if it's chosen right."

The first set of ads appeared in more than 40 newspapers nationwide, including the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Post. When discovered by the reader, the insert first appeared as folded wrapping paper embellished with reindeer. Once unfolded, the back of the wrapping paper displayed a life-size image of a book jacket. Copy appeared as review endorsements, such as, "Ever notice how when you gift wrap a book, everyone can always tell it's a book? They don't have to pick it up, shake it or put their ear to it. They look and they know." "Hmm, a book," appeared below in faded text. The insert was large enough to gift wrap most books.

The second execution, inserted in Rolling Stone magazine, was a snowflake-themed piece of wrapping paper with an actual-size photograph of a DVD case on the back. Consumers could place their DVDs directly onto the advertisement and gift wrap DVDs. Copy that mimicked the formatting seen on the back of most DVDs read, "A lot of other gifts, besides a DVD, can fit in this 5.5" × 7.5" rectangle. A small box of monogrammed handkerchiefs, for one. But after wrapping paper and ribbons have settled, nobody will curl up on the couch, belly stuffed with turkey sandwiches, to watch the climactic battle scene between a pair of designer socks." To the left of the photograph appeared the Borders logo and the campaign's tagline. Wrapping-paper inserts for gift wrapping a CD case were run in the New Yorker.

Outdoor ads appeared on mall kiosks and billboards, displaying copy such as, "If the pen is mightier than the sword, all original ideas can beat the you-know-what out of a toaster." Another image showed a woman catching snowflakes on her tongue, and each snowflake bore a title of a movie, book, or CD. The campaign ran through December of 2003.

OUTCOME

The "This Season" campaign made its mark in the advertising industry, collecting awards such as a silver at the One Show, a Bronze Lion award at the Cannes Advertising Festival, and a silver at the Clio Awards. The campaign's newspaper execution earned a Silver Pencil and won Best in Show at the 2004 ATHENA Awards competition. John E. Kimball, senior vice president and chief marketing officer for the Newspaper Association of America, remarked on ATHENA's website, "This year's Best in Show winner, in particular, demonstrates how a little 'outside-the-wrapper' thinking can have a tremendous impact."

For 2003 Borders posted a 3.78 percent growth in sales from the previous year, and 35 percent of the company's 2003 sales took place during the quarter that "This Season, It's the Original Thought That Counts" took place. The industry leader, Barnes & Noble, posted significantly higher growth: 11.62 percent. Borders struggled to define its brand in 2003 and to gain on Barnes & Noble; but as Candace Corlett, a partner at the marketing consultancy WSL Strategic Retail, told

Adweek, Crispin Porter + Bogusky's campaign was definitely "a step in the right direction."

FURTHER READING

Borst, Barbara. "Author! Author! Artist's Love of Books Led to Barnes & Noble Portraits." Pittsburgh (PA) Post-Gazette, November 25, 1997, p. D3.

Corrigan, Patricia. "Big Books, Little Prices." St. Louis Post, December 1, 2004, p. E1.

Elliot, Stuart. "Crispin Porter Moves Operations to Miami." New York Times, May 17, 2004, p. 10.

Fabrikant, Geraldine. "Top Honors Taken by Miami Agency." New York Times, September 23, 2004, p. 2.

Flass, Rebecca. "Borders to Consumers: 'It's the Thought That Counts': Toasters Get Snubbed in Crispin Porter + Bogusky's New Holiday Ads." Adweek, December 1, 2003, p. 9.

———. "Why Crispin Porter + Bogusky Decided to Bail on Building an L.A.-Area Agency." Adweek, May 24, 2004, p. 14.

Jensen, Trevor, and Rebecca Flass. "Crispin Porter + Bogusky Sees Borders as the 'Funkier, Cooler' Bookstore: L.A. Office Lands $15 Mil. Account as Client Refocuses on Image." Adweek, September 22, 2003, p. 10.

Mack, Ann M. "How Online Retailers Are Luring Holiday Shoppers." Adweek, December 6, 2004, p. 10.

Marcel, Joyce. "The Morrow Family and Manchester's Northshire Bookstore." Vermont Business Magazine, December 1, 2004, p. 15.

May, Jeff. "Booksellers Have a Read on What Customers Want: Big Stores." Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger, May 17, 2004, p. 24.

Milliot, Jim, and John Mutter. "Booksellers Anxious about Holiday '04 Prospects." Publishers Weekly, November 22, 2004, p. 5.

Saewitz, Mike. "Plaza Regaining Some of Past Glory." Sarasota (FL) Herald-Tribune, November 29, 2004, p. BS1.

Kevin Teague

Boston Beer Company, Inc.

75 Arlington St.
Boston, Massachusetts 02216
USA
Telephone: (617) 368-5000
Fax: (617) 368-5500
Web site: www.bostonbeer.com

■■■

IT'S WHAT'S INSIDE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In August 1998, after a two-month review, the Boston Beer Company, Inc. replaced its longtime ad agency, Carmichael Lynch, with Interpublic Group's McCann-Erickson. The New York-based agency's first work for the Samuel Adams Boston Lager brand retained the aspirational thrust of the final campaign from Carmichael Lynch but adopted a more straightforward approach that defined both the beer and its consumers. The resulting campaign, "It's What's Inside," was introduced later in the year and included both television and radio spots. Cofounder and CEO James Koch expressed confidence in the new tag line, which appeared to be borne out by the brand's performance in 1998.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Koch, who owned 27 percent of the Boston Beer Company, emerged from a long family line of brewers. His great-great-grandfather Louis once owned a brewery in St. Louis that operated in the shadow of Anheuser-Busch. His father, Charles Joseph, Jr., worked as a brewmaster at several breweries in Cincinnati. Koch himself gave up a promising career in business to pursue the family dream of owning and operating his own brewery. At the time, in the early 1980s, Americans' taste in mass-marketed beers had drifted toward light, pale brews like Budweiser. Koch proposed to buck the tide by marketing a more full-bodied lager made of choice ingredients, a connoisseur's beer brewed in the Old World tradition.

Koch founded the Boston Beer Company in 1984, raising $400,000 from friends and business associates and exhausting his personal savings of $100,000. For his recipe Koch retrieved his great-great-grandfather's old beer formula from his father's attic in Cincinnati. For the label of his flagship brand, Koch chose to honor Samuel Adams, the American Revolutionary hero who had once worked as a soaker and drier of barley (not a "brewer," as stated on the label).

The early days of the Boston Beer Company were difficult ones. Many Boston-area distributors doubted that consumers would pay $6 per six-pack for an American beer. And so Koch and his "sales staff" (consisting in its entirety of Koch's former secretary Rhonda Kallman), traveled from tavern to tavern hawking Samuel Adams in person. Koch also entered his beer in the Great American Beer Festival and won the consumer preference poll. He built his early advertising campaign around the award, saturating newspapers and radio waves with the tag line "The Best Beer in America." The ads stressed the idea that Samuel Adams beer was brewed in small batches by Yankee craftsmen. "I'd had no idea whether we'd find 100 customers or a million," Koch declared.

© DAVE BARTRUFF/CORBIS.

"I hoped to sell 5,000 barrels in five years, but we got to that goal in four months."

Once the company had posted those kinds of numbers, larger distributors began to show an interest. Samuel Adams beer became one of the first American specialty brews in decades to become a nationally distributed product. Annual sales of the Boston Beer Company grew at a 57 percent clip a year in the early 1990s. In 1996, 12 years after its launch, the company made $8.3 million in profits on sales of $214 million.

It was thus that the Boston Beer Company rose from obscurity to become one of America's leading craft brewers. The company eventually produced about 20 seasonal and year-round varieties of craft-brewed beers at its Boston and Cincinnati breweries, as well as through contracts with five others breweries across the United States. Each year nationwide it sold nearly 1.2 million barrels of lager (such as its flagship Samuel Adams Boston Lager), ales (in Oregon Original and Samuel Adams brands), and cider (Hard Core brand), and its brews were also distributed internationally.

In the mid-1990s, however, the market for craft brews began to slacken. Some analysts credited the slide to aggressive line and product extensions by companies like Boston Beer. Increased competition from the mass-market brewers, who marketed their own "craft brew" brands under names like Red Dog and Icehouse, also helped slow the growth of the segment. By this time even the best-known of the craft brews, Samuel Adams, had become a victim of diminishing investor expectations. Boston Beer's stock fell from a high of $32.50 in November 1995 to less than $10 in April 1998. The Samuel Adams advertising tag line, "All in due time," which attempted to equate the consumers and the beer, was criticized for being confusing. "We swung for the fences, and we missed," said one executive who worked on the campaign.

Koch initially laughed off some of the company's advertising miscues, saying, "If you brew a bad batch, you can drink your mistakes. In advertising, you suck it up in another way." In June 1998, however, after sales had continued to decline, Boston Beer initiated a two-month review of its advertising with the aim of replacing its longtime ad agency, Minneapolis-based Carmichael Lynch. New York's McCann-Erickson and Boston's Hill, Holliday, Connors, and Cosmopulos emerged as finalists in the competition, with McCann-Erickson named the winner of the estimated $12-$15 million account in August. The ad shop's first campaign for Samuel Adams lager, using the tag line "It's What's Inside," was unveiled in the autumn of 1998.

TARGET MARKET

The principal target market for Samuel Adams lager was young males. Beer industry research showed that 20 percent of American beer drinkers consumed about 80 percent of the beer produced domestically. Most of this 20 percent was composed of males aged 21 to 40. Craft beers like Samuel Adams were specifically targeted at a particular segment of this market, identified as "premium packaged lager trial lists." These consumers tried different brands but were not loyal to any particular one. Studies indicated that they made up about 12 percent of premium-packaged lager drinkers and accounted for 20 percent of volume. They were consumers who liked to keep up with the latest fashions in beer drinking and who believed that what they drank said a lot about them.

Boston Beer Company marketers also enjoyed success in the late 1990s at marketing their beer to women. In 1999 Samuel Adams became one of the first major beers to advertise during the television coverage of the NCAA women's basketball tournament. An ad aired during the telecasts of the final-four games represented a "major breakthrough" in beer advertising, according to Bill Greer, director of media services at Mintz and Hoke advertising. And although Samuel Adams had a completely different profile than Budweiser or Miller, he said that the ad suggested that advertisers recognized that not only women watched women's basketball. "I think it's an evolutionary thing," Greer said. "And next year, it may be a revolution."

COMPETITION

In 1998 players in the tiny but influential craft beer market all drafted campaigns calling for new images, new promotions, and new market focuses. They did so in response to the overcrowding of the segment with an attendant sales slump. "The differentiation game has begun in earnest," declared Jerome Chicvara, marketing director for Full Sail Brewing Company.

According to the Institute for Beer Studies, as of 1998 there were about 1,250 small brewers in the United States, up 14 percent from 1996. Craft brewers, however, faced significant challenges in promoting their brands because they lacked the huge marketing budgets of the major brewers. Boston Beer Company, for example, spent a meager $6.1 million on advertising in 1996, according to Competitive Media Reporting.

The number two player in the craft brew segment, Pete's Brewing Company, embarked upon a major marketing makeover in 1998. Past ads had trumpeted Pete's brands as party beers without touting their quality. The brewer suffered an $8.9 million operating loss through the third quarter of 1997, however, prompting it to halt all consumer advertising and reevaluate its approach. In 1998 Pete's opted to escalate its use of public relations, introduce a golden ale, and eliminate weaker beers from its portfolio.

Full Sail Brewing Company opted for a different tack to set it apart from the competition. The West Coast specialty brewer used its 1998 ads to hammer home the message that Full Sail brews were full-bodied "big beers." The company spent an estimated $100,000 on print advertising for 1998, a fourfold increase over the previous year.

A third major Boston Beer competitor, Pyramid Ales, introduced its first concerted consumer ad effort in 1998, after years of focusing on trade publications. The brewer launched a $250,000 campaign in the San Francisco and other key West Coast markets. "We're reacting to the fact that the market is so overcrowded that [trade] marketing strategies are canceling each other out," said CEO George Hancock.

While Pyramid was expanding its advertising effort, the Maryland-based Frederick Brewing Company was pulling back and trying to use money more wisely after launching its first consumer campaign in 1997. During

THE EMPIRE STRIKES BACK

The ability of craft brewers like the Boston Beer Company to put a dent in the sales of the major mass-market brewers did not go unnoticed in the halls of Anheuser-Busch. Over the years the giant St. Louis-based brewer had tried to persuade wholesalers, who were often dependent on Budweiser sales, to stop selling specialty brews. The company also challenged Boston Beer's trademark for its Winter Lager just before the statute of limitations had expired.

But perhaps Anheuser-Busch's most concerted assault came in the summer of 1996, when America's number one brewer filed a complaint with the government arguing that Samuel Adams's labels were misleading. Boston Beer was a contract brewer, which meant that it hired bigger companies to help make its beer, but its labels noted only that the beer was "Brewed by Boston Beer Company, Boston, MA, and Under Special Agreement, Pittsburgh, PA." (The second city was the location of the contract brewer.)

Undaunted, Boston Beer's CEO, Jim Koch, defended his policy of not mentioning the contract brewer by name, insisting that to do so would give consumers the impression that Samuel Adams beer made, for example, at a Stroh's brewery was a Stroh's product. To which Francine Katz, an Anheuser-Busch vice president, countered, "How can you logically argue against a labeling standard that simply requires honesty?" Perhaps recognizing the logic of Katz's argument, Lucy Shaum, a spokesman for Boston Beer, conceded to an interviewer for Beer and Beverage Monthly, "Sure, we're jerking people's chains, but that's what advertising is all about, isn't it?"

While most consumers remained oblivious to the labeling flap, the controversy did, nevertheless, cost Koch's company. After an NBC news program broadcast a segment in October 1996 criticizing Boston Beer's labeling, the company's stock price fell 20 percent, the start of a protracted slide. Even so, Koch, who had about 95 percent of his net worth wrapped up in the stock, remained unbowed. "You don't create a whole new national market in the beer business by being frightened," he said. "Anheuser-Busch's campaign just makes us the underdog again."

1998 Frederick Brewing opted to focus its ad efforts on its brands' core markets in and around the District of Columbia. It earlier had run a far-flung campaign that reached into weaker markets such as Atlanta. "We're taking advertising to markets where we have the distribution to warrant it," said CEO Marjorie A. McGinnis.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The media budget for Samuel Adams's "It's What's Inside" campaign was split evenly between television and radio. Two 30-second ads were unveiled on national television, with three radio spots targeted to 23- to 35-year-old men. The ads fell into the category of so-called aspirational advertising, that is, ads depicting the consumers as they would like to be. In this case the ads were designed to appeal to young males' desire to live lives of danger, adventure, and intrigue. The product, Samuel Adams lager, was then associated with these qualities and, by extension, so was the consumer.

One of the best-known spots in the campaign, "Destiny," opened in black and white and was shot from the interior of a car traveling along a desolate country road. "As you get closer, your eyes get wider. Your heart beats faster," a male voice-over intoned over a musical backdrop. As the car rounded a curve, a big-city skyline came into view. "This is not gonna beat you. Oh, it's loud. And it's dirty. And it's big. But so are your plans. Hey John Boy. You ain't in Kansas anymore. From here on in, every day's gonna be a test." The spot then cut to a long "pour shot" of the amber beverage: "Those who pass deserve a great beer. Sam Adams. It's what's inside." The tag line, "It's what's inside," was created to refer to both the lager and the consumers who drank it, according to Koch. "The fundamental idea feels right to me. It's about the beer and the drinker and it evokes where we came from," he said. "In 1984, all we had was what was inside those bottles and we believed in our ourselves. These ads talk very much about that."

OUTCOME

Led in part by the "It's What's Inside" campaign, the Boston Beer Company enjoyed success in 1998. For the year barrels sold and net sales were 1,227,000 and $183.5 million, respectively, compared to 1,352,000 and $183.8 million in 1997. The company's gross profit margin for 1998 was 51.3 percent, up marginally from 51.0 percent in 1997. A confident Koch declared victory in his end-of-year statement to shareholders. "Despite the turmoil in the craft segment of the beer market and a modest erosion in volume, our leading market position and aggressive programs combined to produce very satisfactory operating results in 1998," he explained. "This performance continues to validate our strong business proposition."

FURTHER READING

Hwang, Suein. "McCann Gets Sammy." Wall Street Journal, August 4, 1998.

Warner, Judy. "Soul Searching for Samuel Adams." Adweek, November 2, 1998.

Robert Schnakenberg

Boston Market Corp.

14103 Denver W Pkwy.
Golden, Colorado 80401-4086
USA
Telephone: (303) 278-9500
Fax: (303) 216-5678
Web site: www.bostonmarket.com

■■■

EAT SOMETHING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Boston Chicken Inc. changed its name to Boston Market Corp. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In the late 1990s Colorado-based Boston Chicken Inc. was one of the leaders in the burgeoning restaurant category of home meal replacement, or HMR. The term home meal replacement applied to restaurant-style food for taking home, including, of course, such traditional take-out options as pizza and burgers and fries. But many Americans began to draw the line at having that kind of meal too often. Consequently, a market emerged for more thoroughly prepared and nutritionally beneficent ''comfort foods.''

Boston Chicken, Inc. began franchising and operating retail food service stores under the brand name Boston Market. The restaurants, located in 38 states, offered home meal replacement in the form of comfort foods, which included rotisserie-roasted chicken, roast turkey, baked ham, and meat loaf, as well as fresh vegetables, salads, and other side dishes. By mid-1998 there were 1,149 Boston Market stores in 38 states and the District of Columbia, of which 936 were company owned. Boston Chicken also owned a majority interest in Einstein/Noah Bagel Corp., and its subsidiary company, Progressive Food Concepts, marketed a line of prepared foods via supermarkets.

Boston Market made its name in the home meal replacement category by offering dinner entrees. In January 1996, however, it expanded its line to attract the lunch crowd. It introduced a line of ''Carver'' sandwiches containing ham, turkey, or meat loaf. The next year saw the rollout of the Extreme Carver, a larger sandwich containing bacon and cheese in addition to meat. The marketing campaign for the Extreme Carver was accompanied by a coupon offer granting 20 or 25 percent off the new sandwiches. A series of television commercials was created by the Santa Monica, California, ad agency Suissa Miller. The new spots parodied commercials for other products, specifically the spare, artsy ads for Calvin Klein designer fragrances. Filmed in black and white, the spots starred the sardonic ESPN sports anchor Keith Olbermann (who appeared in color for comic effect). They were designed to capitalize on the sports maven's appeal among 18- to 29-year-old men, one of the key target markets for Extreme Carver sandwiches.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Boston Chicken was founded in 1988 by entrepreneur George Naddaff, one of the first men to see the potential of the burgeoning home food replacement industry. Brought up in Boston's South End by parents who emigrated from Lebanon, Naddaff was shining shoes at age 10 and went through the auto shop course at Brighton High School before learning that he was allergic to grease. He switched his career interests to sales, starting out peddling baby furniture to expectant parents in their homes and using leads provided by the manufacturer.

Naddaff began his franchising career in 1967, when he bought a regional franchise for Colonel Sanders' Kentucky Fried Chicken, opening 22 shops before selling the business in 1970. Having learned the fundamentals of business, he teamed with an early-childhood education specialist, Grace Mitchell, to start Living and Learning Centres Inc., a chain of child-care centers that grew to 48 locations in 10 years. They sold the chain in 1980 to Kinder-Care Learning Centers Inc. By that time Naddaff was involved with the start-up of VR Business Brokers Inc., which franchised local brokerages that listed small businesses for sale. Naddaff took the company public and sold 250 franchises, then sold the entire operation to a British group in 1987. The following year he used his venture capital connections to launch Boston Chicken, one of the first of the so-called home meal replacement franchises.

A spate of studies in the late 1990s confirmed that the home meal replacement trend that Naddaff foresaw was no fad. Consumers opted for a takeout dinner at home 61 percent more often than they did in the late 1980s, whereas they chose to eat dinner in a restaurant 4 percent less often, according to a 1995 NPD Group survey. "Time poverty" was the catalyst, and the underpinnings of the take-home trend seemed unlikely to change. In double-income families neither income earner had the time, energy, or desire to cook (or clean up after a meal). And while burger and pizza chains once satisfied Americans' need for carryout, fast-food ennui set in. Customers were seeking ever-changing variety and freshness for dinner.

Naddaff served as chairman and CEO of Boston Chicken from 1988 to 1992, when he sold the company to a group of executives from Blockbuster Entertainment. By 1996 the company had expanded to more than 1,000 stores across 38 states and was spending $90 million a year on advertising. Under a so-called "virtual advertising plan," the chain divided its creative work among three agencies, each commissioned to devise a campaign for individual Boston Market products. Suissa Miller was charged specifically with handling the ads for the Boston Carver sandwich line.

Suissa Miller's 1996 ad campaign "Don't Mess with Dinner" featured ordinary looking consumers searching for ways to feed their families home-cooked dinners with a minimum of fuss. In 1997, in order to target a more youthful crowd of sandwich enthusiasts, the company used wan models to spoof a popular series of Calvin Klein fragrance commercials. The campaign, called "Eat Something," proved successful in audience tests and with the targeted audience. "Don't Mess with Dinner" spots remained in use to promote the brand's line of Family Meals, but they increasingly took on the mocking tone of the "Eat Something" campaign. One such spot spoofed super hero television shows and movies. The commercial, called "Searchlight," features a harried mother trying to decide the best way to feed her family. She solves her problem only by flashing the giant image of a chicken into the night sky—much like Batman's "Bat Signal." Across town her husband picks up the signal and knows he must pick up Boston Market food for dinner.

TARGET MARKET

In general, Boston Market aimed to capture the business of time-pressed and cooking-shy consumers (many of whom had discretionary income to burn) who craved freshly prepared take-home meals that were a step up from traditional fast food. These consumers wanted the fruits of a chef's labor, but they wanted it without a wait. And they wanted to enjoy it in their own home.

With its line of Extreme Carver lunch sandwiches, introduced in 1997, Boston Market was specifically targeting young adult males, the most avid consumers of fast food. The accompanying ad campaign "Eat Something" was designed to appeal to this more cynical "Generation X" demographic through parody and the appearance of smart-aleck ESPN sports anchor Olbermann, who hosted the nightly Sportscenter sports highlight show.

COMPETITION

Boston Market in the late 1990s was one of the few restaurant chains catering to the home food replacement market. But that did not mean there was not vigorous competition to service harried consumers looking for home-cooked meals. Supermarkets were rushing in with expanded delis, packaged meals, rotisserie chicken, and sushi bars, blurring the lines separating fast-food emporiums, restaurants, and grocery stores. Feeding the trend further were specialty groceries and delis offering such items as tea-smoked duck, grilled portobello mushroom sandwiches on focaccia, and herb-roasted beef tenderloin with aioli.

Because many consumers wanted foods that they would cook themselves if they had the time, Boston

NEW MARKET MEANS NEW JARGON

Dinner patterns in America have changed rapidly. In the late 1990s people felt they had less and less time, and it seemed they did not want to spend lots of it making (or even planning for) dinner. As a result, many meals eaten at home were bought somewhere else, and food industry gurus have termed this practice "home meal replacement," or HMR. Not surprisingly, a whole litany of attendant marketing terms and acronyms began to spring up and have been flung across restaurant industry conference tables nationwide. They include: "Access Mode" (the way a consumer chooses to use a restaurant—dining in, delivery, takeout, and drive-through are access modes); "Center-of-the-Plate Protein" (the food portion that generally defines what is being eaten—mostly meat and poultry); "Daypart" (most consumers call this "lunch" if it occurs around noon, but the industry prefers calling it "afternoon daypart"); "QSR" (or quick-service restaurant, better known as a fast-food establishment); "HFFU" (pronounced hoofoo, the acronym stands for "heavy fast-food user," which tended to be young and male); and "Share of Stomach" (the ultimate goal of restaurant industry operators, this signified the portion of foods from restaurants and supermarkets that occupied a consumer's stomach).

Market's menu leaned heavily toward American comfort foods. But many industry observers expected the home meal replacement market to take a turn for the ethnic and adventurous in the first decade of the twenty-first century.

Newer home meal replacement players wanted to go beyond Boston Market-style carryout in hopes of stealing more grocery sales from supermarkets. Joining the category in Dallas was Eatzi's Market and Bakery, an 8,000-square-foot establishment that was a cross between a gourmet grocery store and take-home deli/restaurant. The Eatzi's experiment has attracted plenty of customers and attention.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Boston Market's "Eat Something" spots were part of a trend toward parody advertising that gained steam in the mid-1990s. Commercials such as Sprite's "Obey Your Thirst" drew their comic force from mocking the pomposity of other, more serious ads, usually for unrelated and noncompetitive products. These commercials attempted to place the mocking company or brand on the other side of the media "wall," commenting on the pretensions of advertising. They were primarily aimed at hip, young consumers who may have felt jaded or too media savvy to be fooled by commercials that erect a farcical image or pitch a product's miraculous effects. In the case of the "Eat Something" spots, the commercials poke fun at the pomposity of designer fragrance campaigns.

The first spot in this Boston Market campaign, "Eat Something," was filmed in black and white by director John Mastromonaco. The 30-second piece features stringy-haired, emaciated-looking young models affecting bored, vacant stares along a rocky shoreline. "Emptiness, emptiness," moans one such waif. "How can I fill this void of emptiness?" Emerging from out of nowhere, sports anchor Olbermann (who appears in full color) offers one possible answer: "Eat something!" What is the "burning from within" that the world-weary models feel? "It's called hunger," Olbermann quips. He then suggests that the models fatten up on the Extreme Carver sandwich, with its "ooey gooey" cheese sauce.

In another "Eat Something" commercial, entitled "Angst Band," a grunge rock band is shown rehearsing one of its downbeat songs. "I feel empty, nothing inside," the singer keens. Olbermann then enters, advising: "Hey Mozart, eat something!" Additional spots in this campaign spoof daytime soap operas and the relationship between professional athletes and their agents. All the spots rely on the element of surprise to turn consumer expectations upside down, while at the same time skewering the overly thin look that was prevalent among models.

The strategy was based on the premise that consumers tended to tune out straightforward advertising messages in an age of media overload. "Humorously portraying universally recognized cultural icons is an effective way to break through the intense media clutter in today's marketplace," said Bill McDonald, Boston Market's chief marketing officer. "Consumers relate to our having some fun with common images from popular culture." Having a laugh at other advertisers' expense was not, however, the only goal of the ads. Added McDonald: "Our new advertisements are humorous, but also deliver an important message to consumers that Boston Market stores offer quick, quality meal solutions for a variety of occasions." Trey Hall, Boston Market's vice president of marketing, stressed the importance of the ads in positioning Boston Market products as fun and enjoyable.

OUTCOME

Boston Market's ''Eat Something'' commercials proved fairly popular with consumers but were judged not to be very effective. A USA Today poll found that just over 25 percent of those polled liked the spots a lot. Only 14 percent deemed them ''effective.'' The ''Eat Something'' commercials did prove to be highly effective at sticking in the minds of consumers, however; audience testing elicited recall in 95 percent of viewers who saw the spots. Popularity was slightly higher among Boston Market's targeted group of consumers, males between 18 and 29 years old; 31 percent of those in this age range polled by USA Today reported they liked the ads a lot, compared with 26 percent among 30- to 49-year-old consumers.

Among industry observers and insiders, the spots were given credit for their humor but were generally faulted on strategic grounds. Writing in Advertising Age magazine, columnist Bob Garfield conceded the ads were very funny. ''Not since Marshall McLuhan popped out of the movie line in Annie Hall to deflate the academic blowhard has there been a more welcome intrusion into our suspension of disbelief,'' Garfield opined. He also found the casting of Olbermann inspired. Garfield, however, criticized the strategy behind the ads, calling ''Eat Something'' ''a very good commercial for a very bad marketing idea.'' ''Boston Market has neither the number nor the character of locations to compete with the sandwich slingers of the world,'' Garfield groused. ''So why, for the sake of whatever marginal growth they might enjoy by attracting a few hungry teenagers, dilute the brand meaning, brand message, and media budget?''

Competitors in the fast-food sector were no more kind. Scott Lippitt, an account manager at fast-food giant Arby's, cast doubt on the idea of spoofing products outside the comfort food category. ''What point is Boston Market trying to make,'' Lippitt complained to Shoot magazine, ''other than saying, 'We're relevant to this younger target [market]?' The last time I looked, people weren't deciding to make a choice between spending money on eating at Boston Market or buying perfume.''

FURTHER READING

Cuneo, Alice Z. ''Boston Market Shifts Billings to Suissa Miller.'' Advertising Age, July 28, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. ''Boston Market Spoofs Klein, 'Eat Something' Is Popular, if Not Effective Advice.'' USA Today, June 30, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. ''Boston Market Gets Laughs, Misses Point.'' Advertising Age, March, 1997.

Oberlag, Reginald. ''It's Spot vs. Spot as Commercials Cannibalize Their Own for Impact.'' Shoot, May 30, 1997.

Reidy, Chris. ''New Extreme Carver Ads Slice Up Calvin Klein Images.'' The Boston Globe, March 2, 1997.

Reuteman, Rob. ''Use of Coupons Cut Boston Chicken's Dinner Sales; Boston Chicken's Beck Blames Self for Laying an Egg.'' Rocky Mountain News, June 8, 1997.

Robert Schnakenberg

Brigham's, Inc.

30 Mill Street
Arlington, Massachusetts 02476
USA
Telephone: (781) 648-9000
Fax: (781) 646-0507
Web site: www.brighams.com

■■■

REVERSE THE CURSE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

At the beginning of the twenty-first century Brigham's, Inc., well known in New England for its ice cream and restaurants, looked to expand its product line to include the kinds of chunky ice cream flavors (with products such as candy bars mixed in) made popular by Ben & Jerry's. The first attempt was a flavor called ''The Big Dig,'' but three years passed before the company was ready for a second launch. In 2003, as part of a 90th-anniversary promotion, Brigham's sponsored a contest to name a new flavor. The winning entry, revealed in April 2004, was ''Reverse the Curse.'' The name was a reference to the supposed curse on the Boston Red Sox baseball team, which had not won the World Series since trading the legendary Babe Ruth to the New York Yankees.

The campaign to introduce the new flavor operated on a modest $250,000 budget and ran from April through late October 2004. It consisted of radio spots announced by a Red Sox player, print ads, a billboard, and in-store posters. The crux of the campaign, however, was a series of promotional events, which garnered a great deal of free media because the New England region that year was fascinated more than ever by the exploits of the Red Sox and anything associated with the club.

To the delight of Brigham's, the Red Sox won the World Series in 2004, and the curse was lifted. The ice cream was then renamed ''Curse Reversed.'' As a result of good fortune and strong marketing work, which was recognized by the dairy industry, Reverse the Curse became Brigham's most successful product launch.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Brigham's was a well-entrenched New England brand at the start of the twenty-first century. The company was known both for its chain of restaurants, which had served Brigham's-brand ice cream for decades, and for its premium supermarket ice cream, which debuted in 1983. At its peak in the mid-1980s Brigham's operated more than 100 restaurants, but prepacked supermarket ice cream increasingly became its main source of revenue. In addition, the Élan brand of frozen yogurt was acquired to bring the company in line with the tastes of modern consumers. More importantly, Roger Theriault, appointed CEO of Brigham's in the mid-1990s, was able to complete the turnaround and transform the company from one that was merely holding its own into one that was actually profitable.

Brigham's best-selling flavor of ice cream—and one that was very much a New England tradition—was vanilla; it accounted for about one-third of all sales. While Brigham's Vanilla Ice Cream remained a favorite, the marketplace since the mid-1980s had seen an influx of ice creams that came in flavors with unusual ingredients mixed in, a trend that was first popularized by the Vermont-based company Ben & Jerry's. To stay current Brigham's introduced Big Dig, a vanilla ice cream with brownie pieces, caramel swirls, and chocolate chunks mixed in; the name played on the nickname of Boston's long-term Central Artery highway project. The flavor enjoyed a successful launch, but Brigham's did not follow up with any new flavors, instead turning its attention to ice cream bars and the expansion of its geographic reach.

In fall 2003 the company was approaching its 90th birthday, and it commemorated the occasion by holding a contest to concoct and name a new ice cream flavor. A large number of entries paid tribute to the Boston Red Sox, New England's highly popular Major League Baseball team. It was also no surprise that many of these names referred to the legendary "Curse of the Bambino" that supposedly afflicted the Red Sox; the team had not won a World Series championship since 1918, when, as a star pitcher and part-time slugger, Babe Ruth (George Herman Ruth, also referred to as "the Bambino") played a prominent role. Strapped for cash, the team sold the Babe to the New York Yankees in the winter of 1919. Ruth gave up pitching except for a rare mound appearance and proceeded to revolutionize the sport as a home-run hitter and its biggest star. While the Red Sox lapsed into mediocrity, the Yankees, which before adding Ruth had played second fiddle to the New York Giants, became the dominant team in baseball for the rest of the century. To explain their team's fall from grace, Red Sox fans created the myth that the Boston team was cursed because of the sale of Babe Ruth to the Yankees, and many nourished a comforting sense of fatalism even as they cheered on their team. More than one entry to the Brigham's contest offered the name "Reverse the Curse." The company selected the best of the accompanying recipes: Brigham's vanilla ice cream mixed with chocolate-covered peanuts (representing baseballs), caramel cups (representing bases), and swirls of Brigham's popular fudge sauce. The selection was made in secret, and only those with a need to know were told, while a marketing campaign to launch the new flavor was developed.

NO, NO, HARRY!

The Boston Red Sox owner who sold baseball star Babe Ruth to the New York Yankees in 1919, thereby earning the eternal enmity of Boston fans, was theatrical agent Harry Frazee, best known for backing the musical No, No, Nanette (1925). He supposedly sold off his star players to cover his theatrical losses.

TARGET MARKET

Brigham's traditional target audience was mothers aged 24 to 54, because they were the people who did most of the grocery shopping and were likely to make the decision to purchase a Brigham's product. For the "Reverse the Curse" campaign the focus was broadened to include adults in general, although a baseball promotion was sure to attract the attention of children as well. Baseball in New England was followed by a wide range of people, from celebrities such as author Stephen King and actor Matt Damon to firemen and nurses. The ad agency aimed the campaign at a broad audience. The billboard that Brigham's rented near Fenway Park (the home ballpark of the Red Sox) off the Massachusetts Turnpike was seen by all demographics, and the radio spots were played on eight stations, each with a different format that appealed to every type of listener, from classical music to sports-talk radio. Brigham's was ultimately looking to reach anybody who liked ice cream, a market that cut across all demographics.

COMPETITION

As a premium brand that cost more than most ice creams, Brigham's faced direct competition from Ben & Jerry's and Breyers, but after 90 years in business it was well entrenched in its market. Brigham's did not directly compete with another venerable New England brand, Hood, which concentrated on selling high volumes of less-expensive ice cream. Brigham's did, however, see Hood as an impediment to forging a link with the Red Sox. Hood had a long-standing relationship with the team, including some ownership ties. Hood was the only ice cream sold at Fenway Park, where the Red Sox played home games, and Brigham's was prevented from advertising on the park's huge message board. Brigham's was not even allowed to offer samples within the several-block pedestrian zone that surrounded the ballpark. Nevertheless, by introducing Reverse the Curse, conducting baseball-related promotions, leasing a highway billboard outside Fenway Park, and hiring one of the Red Sox players to serve as the spokesperson, Brigham's was able to outflank Hood to reach the Red Sox audience. While the Brigham's campaign could have been interpreted as a direct challenge to Hood, according to Brigham's vice president of marketing, Darryln Leikauskas, the "Reverse the Curse" campaign took little note of the competition. "It wasn't about them, it was about us," she said in a 2006 interview.

MARKETING STRATEGY

An initial goal of the "Reverse the Curse" campaign was to build up interest by keeping the new flavor a secret until the campaign was launched in April 2004 with the start of the baseball season. While manufacturing plans were made to produce "Reverse the Curse," Leikauskas told only a handful of people about the contest winner. Because packaging had to be ordered in January, Brigham's had to share the secret with a Maryland vendor, but no one that far way was interested in leaking the news. Brigham's sent samples (using generic packaging) to a variety of New England–affiliated sports and entertainment celebrities, asking for their comments in exchange for a cash donation to their favorite charity. They included actors Ben Affleck and Matt Damon, comedians Jay Leno and Denis Leary, football player Doug Flutie, and basketball player Dave Cowens. The campaign also included print ads in yearbooks produced by minor league teams in Lowell, Massachusetts, and Pawtucket, Rhode Island. Because of production deadlines, ads had to be supplied before the announcement of the new flavor. For the first editions, therefore, the ad depicted a group of the company's "all-star" flavors. A blank silhouette where Reverse the Curse was to be located offered the caption "Future Hall-of-Famer."

The campaign elements included radio spots, print ads, a billboard, in-store posters, and promotional events. Given the limited budget of $250,000, the campaign relied heavily on the promotional events, which garnered free attention from newspapers and television. The campaign kicked off in April 2004, shortly after the start of the new baseball season. Shipments of the product were timed to begin April 27, the anniversary of Babe Ruth Day, when, in 1947, Ruth was celebrated in every baseball park in the United States and Japan. To play further on the Babe Ruth curse, Brigham's conducted another event on May 13, making the case that ritualists often attempted to break curses on the unlucky 13th. A pair of psychic advisers who several months earlier had performed a ceremony at Fenway Park to undo the curse were enlisted to do the same at the Brigham's ice cream plant. A public rally was held the same day at a Brigham's Restaurant in Arlington, Massachusetts, at which a Babe Ruth impersonator appeared and offered attendees the first complimentary samples of Reverse the Curse. Next, Brigham's held a contest that was launched on a popular morning radio show: die-hard Red Sox fans were asked to send E-mails describing what they were willing to do to help the team break the curse. The winner was a young woman, a strict vegetarian, who offered for the sake of the team to eat 86 hot dogs, representing the number of years since Boston's last World Series triumph. She fulfilled her pledge on the afternoon of September 26, before a critical game against the Yankees at end of the season. (She was ultimately helped by family, friends, and other supporters in eating the hot dogs.) During the baseball postseason Brigham's also hosted an elementary-school rally in Dedham, Massachusetts, which included a surprise Reverse the Curse ice cream party, an event that received a good deal of local media attention.

For the advertising portion of the campaign Brigham's hired Boston-area Rattle Advertising. Elements included in-store signage and radio, print, and outdoor advertisements. The biggest commitment was to radio, which also included the largest expense of the campaign: hiring a Red Sox player to serve as a spokesperson. Because of the small budget Brigham's settled on one of the team's support players, first baseman Kevin Millar, who was nevertheless very popular with fans. He recorded a 60-second spot that was also edited into a 10-second version. It played during June, July, and August on eight area stations that offered a wide variety of formats; for instance, WMJX played soft rock, WBMX offered contemporary hits, and WCRB was a classical music station. The station that received the most ad dollars, however, was WEEI, a sports-talk radio station. In addition Millar made some promotional appearances.

Print ads were limited to the yearbooks of the two minor league teams that Brigham's had already been sponsoring. An ad also appeared on the back of a widely distributed summer guide of local events as well as within the pages of programs for the concert series at the Tweeter Center for the Performing Arts in Boston and other entertainment events. The headline of the ads read, "The Ice Cream of the Eternal Optimist." The lone billboard of the campaign was leased for the month of June. In stores Brigham's hung posters touting Reverse the Curse and featuring a nostalgic baseball scene.

OUTCOME

With the Red Sox trailing the New York Yankees three games to zero in the best-of-seven American League Championship Series of 2004, it appeared that Boston fans would have to suffer with their curse for yet another season. Then, in a dramatic reversal of fortune, the team rebounded to win four straight games and vanquish its hated rivals; it was the first time in baseball history that a team had recovered from such a deficit. The Red Sox then won the World Series, ending the so-called curse. From the start of the "Reverse the Curse" campaign, Brigham's had promised to change the name of the ice cream when the curse was lifted. It now hastily put together another contest to rename the flavor. In the meantime large stickers were applied to the in-store posters, proclaiming "Curse Reversed." It also became the eventual winner, saving the company some money on redoing the signage.

In large part because of the Red Sox's dream season, Reverse the Curse became the best product launch in Brigham's history. For the year it ranked number five in package sales for the company, representing 6 percent of all Brigham's sales, despite being available for less than the entire year. The Big Dig, in contrast, ranked number eight during its first full year, with 4.4 percent of sales. There was no doubt that the team's success fed into the success of the ice cream, but the marketing campaign behind the product was also an important element. The work was recognized by the International Dairy Foods Association, which presented Brigham's with a pair of awards: Best Overall Public Relations Campaign for the entire 90th-anniversary effort and Best Overall Mixed Media Campaign for "Reverse the Curse" in particular.

The campaign also brought with it benefits that were not easily detected. According to Leikauskas, "Reverse the Curse" changed Brigham's image from a stodgy brand to one that was more fun and innovative, helping to pave the way for future product launches.

FURTHER READING

Bulkeley, William M., and Mark Maremont. "Reversal of Fortune." Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2004, p. A1.

Jewell, Mark. "Red Sox Title Reverses Marketing of Curse." Lawrence (KS) Journal-World, October 30, 2004.

"Pitching to the Red Sox Nation." BusinessWeek Online, October 4, 2004. Available from <http://www.businessweek.com/smallbiz/content/oct2005/sb20051004_642313.htm>

"Play Ball." Prepared Foods, July 2004, p. 67.

Robinson, Alan. "'Curse' Reversed!" Frozen Food Age, September 2005, p. 10.

Silverstein, Clara. "Ice Cream, Ale and More Let Sox Fans Savor Success." Boston Herald, May 26, 2004, p. 44.

Ed Dinger

Budget Rent A Car System, Inc.

6 Sylvan Way
Parsippany, New Jersey 07054
USA
Telephone: (973) 496-3500
Fax: (973) 496-7999
Web site: www.budget.com

■■■

UP YOUR BUDGET CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2005 Budget Rent A Car System, Inc., a key unit, with Avis, of the Cendant Car Rental Group, made its first foray into advertising on blogs (website digests typically maintained by one person or a small group of people). Blogs often focused on specific topics and thus attracted niche audiences, and they were known for their conversational tone and opinionated content. With a collective readership estimated at more than 30 million in 2005 and with extremely low advertising rates compared to TV, print, and traditional online placements, blogs represented an exciting, if relatively untested, opportunity for marketers. The Budget campaign, called "Up Your Budget," ran in October and November 2005 and represented one of the most notable marketing uses of this new medium to that date.

At the center of "Up Your Budget" was a series of treasure hunts in 16 American cities that took place during the campaign's four-week run. Information about the treasure hunts, each of which offered a cash prize of $10,000, was accessible only at the website www.upyourbudget.com, which took the form of a blog, and contest participants were enlisted in the further creation of the site's content. The event was advertised with flash-animation cartoons placed on 177 of the most popular blogs of the time; those placements cost approximately $20,000 to run, bringing the campaign's total budget to approximately $180,000. This amount was less than the cost of airing a single commercial on a top prime-time TV program. There was no off-line publicity of the event.

The campaign was well received within the realm of blogs (the so-called blogosphere), and www.upyourbudget.com drew more than 100,000 unique visitors over the four weeks that the contests ran. While the Budget campaign was believed to point the way toward the future of blog advertising, Cendant executives acknowledged the difficulty of judging whether a blog campaign was a marketing success or not, given the medium's newness and its dissimilarity to traditional marketing channels. Nevertheless, Budget planned to continue its blog-centered marketing efforts.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1958 as a car-rental agency targeting value-conscious travelers, Budget Rent A Car expanded rapidly over the next several decades. In the 1980s and 1990s the company changed hands twice, and in 2002 it was acquired by Cendant Corporation, a global group of companies concentrated in the travel and real-estate industries. Cendant also owned the car-rental company Avis, a key component, with Budget, of the Cendant Car Rental Group.

In the 1990s and 2000s the advertising industry found its primary communication models threatened by a convergence of trends that were reshaping consumers' relationships to media outlets. Among the most noticeable of these trends was the increasing importance of the Internet to consumers' business, personal, and social lives. The Internet both upset traditional notions of marketing and offered an abundance of new advertising possibilities. One promising new outlet for online advertising was the blogosphere, the collective world of online blogs. A blog (the word was short for Weblog) was a website typically created by one person or a small group of people as a forum for personal expression or discussion on a particular topic (e.g., U.S. politics, contemporary literature, or celebrity gossip), with frequently updated postings whose content was often derived from and/or linked to other websites. Because bloggers, as those who maintained blogs were called, were subject to few if any institutional restraints, blogs were often characterized by their opinionated and irreverent approach to topics treated more cautiously by the mainstream media.

Blogs' growing influence on American culture was initially felt most keenly in the realm of politics. A 2002 post on the blog Talking Points led the mainstream media to scrutinize racially problematic comments made by Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott at a private party; the scrutiny eventually resulted in Lott's resignation from the leadership post. For the 2004 U.S. presidential election, moreover, organizers of both major American parties blanketed political blogs with campaign advertisements, underscoring the wider marketing potential of the emerging media outlet. The interrelated system of links characteristic of blogs—bloggers typically offered links to their own favorite blogs, so that the most popular blogs could have hundreds of so-called "inbound" links—meant that the medium especially lent itself to viral marketing, or marketing that used social networks to spread messages in a way that recalled the spread of viruses. By the end of 2004 it was clear that blogs, though they were not individually organs of the mainstream media, had certainly arrived in the consciousness of mainstream America: dictionary publisher Merriam-Webster declared "blog" its "Word of the Year" for 2004 (based on the number of times it was looked up in its online database), and a study conducted in November 2004 by the Pew Internet & American Life Project predicted that, by the new year, more than 30 million Americans would be readers of blogs.

TARGET MARKET

"Up Your Budget" attempted to lure a cross-section of the blog-reading populace to www.upyourbudget.com, itself a blog that served as the home base for the 16-city treasure hunt that was the campaign's focal point. Ads directing blog readers to www.upyourbudget.com ran on 177 blogs, including blogs focused on new technology, celebrity gossip, media affairs, and life in specific urban centers. Though individual blogs had their own niche audiences, blogs in general tended to attract young, technology-savvy consumers, and Budget saw a blog-focused advertising campaign as a way of linking itself with attributes that might differentiate it in an industry not typically defined by fierce brand loyalty. "We really wanted to try something new and different for our brand," the Cendant Car Rental Group's executive vice president of marketing, Scott Deaver, explained to New Media Age (an ad-industry magazine focusing on new media). "We had heard about the power of viral marketing and wanted to see if this was a way to cut through the clutter and do something totally new."

The potential to imbue a brand with coolness via a blog-focused advertising campaign, however, did not come without substantial risk. Bloggers and blog readers could be a tough audience for the uninitiated. Not only were the proprietors of blogs themselves relatively uninhibited, but also blogs by definition solicited comments from readers. "It's very easy to mess up because the space is very vocal," Steve Hall of the advertising blog Adrants told New Media Age. "If you don't blog, it's very likely you'll look stupid entering the space without an in-depth knowledge of it. Anyone interested in doing something in the space should work with a blogger." Budget thus enlisted blogger, author, and consultant B.L. Ochman for the campaign. Ochman was responsible for selecting the blogs on which the ads appeared and, along with the Impax Marketing Group of Philadelphia, helping to craft the campaign's overall strategy and content.

COMPETITION

With 30 percent of the market at the top 180 airports in the world, the Hertz Corporation was the leading car-rental company by a wide margin as of 2004. Hertz was more expensive than most other car-rental companies, but it was also perceived as having superior services; during the late twentieth century, accordingly, it was the most popular rental-car brand among corporate travelers. Hertz advertising campaigns in the early 2000s, however, included efforts to appeal to those who traveled on behalf of small businesses and who tended to be more budget-conscious than their corporate counterparts. After becoming a wholly owned subsidiary of Ford Motor Company in 2001, Hertz advertising often promoted Ford cars. An agreement extending this practice through 2010, under the terms of which Ford supplied half of Hertz's advertising budget, was projected to continue

HOW MUCH DO THEY CHARGE?

Rates for ad space on blogs varied at the time that "Up Your Budget" ran. In general the rates depended not just on the number of readers a blog attracted but also on the degree to which specific target markets were drawn to particular blogs. For instance, a celebrity-gossip blog might have a daily readership of 200,000 or more but charge weekly prices for ad space of only a few hundred dollars because of the muddied demographics of its broad readership. A more tightly focused and lucrative target group, however, was worth much more to advertisers even if the blog's readership was only 10,000. That said, the most popular of all blogs (as measured by the number of inbound links driving readers from other blogs to their sites) were generally also the most sought-after spaces for advertisers. The technology-focused Boing Boing, for instance, averaged 1.7 million readers monthly as of early 2006 and charged $8,000 a week for premium ad space.

even as Ford divested itself of its Hertz holdings in late 2005.

Beginning in 2002 car-rental companies moved increasingly large amounts of money into Internet advertising. This trend was especially evident among Budget's most direct competitors, those companies catering to value-conscious consumers, such as Thrifty car rental, part of the Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group. In 2002 Thrifty directed 25 percent of its total $9.8 million budget to the Internet and increased that percentage substantially in the following year. "The [I]nternet caters at this point to the value shopper and our brands are very well suited to that," Scott Anderson, Dollar Thrifty's senior executive vice president for global marketing and franchising, told Advertising Age. Thrifty's website experienced traffic increases that outpaced those of the other major brands in 2003.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The centerpiece of "Up Your Budget" was a series of treasure hunts held in 16 American cities—4 cities per week over the course of four weeks—between mid-October and mid-November 2005. The prize for individual winners in each city was $10,000, for a total prize package of $160,000. To win the prize contestants logged onto www.upyourbudget.com for daily clues and videos that helped them identify first the individual cities in question and then a location within each city where a yellow sticker had been placed. The first contestant in each city to find the sticker, call a toll-free number printed on it, and provide video or photographic proof of the discovery was the winner. There was also a treasure-hunters' blog linked to the site, where participants could submit their own hints or ideas about the official clues as well as report on their experiences.

In addition to the $160,000 in prizes, Budget spent approximately $20,000 on advertising placed solely on blogs. The advertisements, meant to drive traffic to www.upyourbudget.com, were simple flash-animated cartoons created by one of the world's best-known bloggers, Hugh Macleod, whose own blog was called Gaping Void. The images were of semihuman figures making humorous gestures and faces, and they were paired with copy such as "The Adventure Begins etc. etc." or "Hunt the Treasure . . . like it was a Wild Animal."

The exceedingly low price of advertising on blogs relative to TV, print, and mainstream online sites—Budget's total spending on the campaign was less than the cost of a 30-second spot on a highly rated prime-time TV show—made them attractive to marketers, but the medium's capacity for effective brand communication was still largely speculative. Among the campaign's more obvious goals of driving sales and building the Budget brand was that of measuring blogs' capacity to rival traditional marketing. "I wanted to promote 'Up Your Budget' only through bloggers, advertise only on blogs and let it accelerate virally from there," B.L. Ochman explained to New Media Age. "I wanted to prove that we could operate entirely without traditional media and still build brand awareness with a campaign that wasn't overly commercial." Budget did not even announce the campaign with an official press release. News of the campaign was first reported by blogs, including Adrants, Boing Boing, and MarketingVox.

One of the defining risks of viral marketing was the relinquishing of control over the brand's message, and this was a new experience for Budget's marketers. Scott Deaver told New Media Age, "To be asked to sit back and let the viral do its job was a complete leap of faith for us." Not only was it impossible to control the specific nature of the messages being spread virally, but because of the uncensored nature of blogs, the brand also risked being linked to controversial content.

OUTCOME

"Up Your Budget" was well received in the blogosphere, generating hundreds of blog posts and more than 100,000 unique visits (Web visits made by users from different Web addresses, excluding repeat visitors and thereby giving a more accurate sense of audience size) to www.upyourbudget.com over the four weeks of the campaign. The blog pages on which ads for the treasure hunt appeared were viewed 19.9 million times, resulting in approximately 60,000 click-throughs to www.upyourbudget.com; this meant that in the field of blog advertising the campaign was one of the most successful at driving online traffic to an advertised site. Thousands of people signed up to participate in the contest and to create content for the Budget treasure-hunter's blog, an unprecedented feat for a commercial blog to that date. Nevertheless, Deaver expressed ambivalence about the approach in an interview with the New York Times. "[T]he jury's still out . . . I'd be lying if I said I know what to measure to determine success . . . the real determination is, what do we learn? Are we smarter when we do it next time?" At the conclusion of "Up Your Budget," Budget announced that it would hold another such contest in 2006.

FURTHER READING

"Ad Blogging: Blogging in the US: Budget Car Rental." New Media Age, February 2, 2006.

Beirne, Mike. "Budget Rent A Car Takes Detour into Blogosphere." Brandweek, November 28, 2005.

"Budget Launches Blog-Based, Sixteen City Treasure Hunt." Adrants, October 24, 2005. Available from <http://www.adrants.com/2005/10/budget-launches-blogbased-sixteen-city.php>

"Budget Rent A Car Launches Blog-Focused Treasure Hunt Campaign." MarketingVox, October 24, 2005. Available from <http://www.marketingvox.com/archives/2005/10/24/budget_rent_a_car_launches_blogfocused_treasure_hunt_campaign/index.php>

Elliott, Stuart. "Placing Ads in Some Surprising Spaces." New York Times, November 25, 2005.

Halliday, Jean. "Car Renters Flock to Internet." Advertising Age, October 27, 2003.

Thompson, Clive. "The Haves and Have-Nots of the Blogging Boom." New York Magazine, February 20, 2006.

Mark Lane

Bureau of Engraving and Printing

14th and C Streets SW
Washington, D.C. 20228
USA
Telephone: (202) 874-3019
Web site: www.moneyfactory.gov

■■■

THE NEW COLOR OF MONEY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

With the availability of digital technology such as scanners and high-quality color printers, the ability of counterfeiters to produce excellent facsimiles of U.S. currency forced the U.S. Treasury to introduce new note designs on a more regular basis. In addition, high-tech security measures had to be developed to counteract the advances made by counterfeiters. In 2003 a new $20 bill—featuring new colors and graphics as well as anticounterfeiting devices such as watermarks and embedded security strips—was ready to be introduced to the public. Public relations firm Burson-Marsteller was hired to take charge of a marketing campaign to unveil the new twenty and create a smooth transition when the notes entered the economy.

The $32 million campaign was a multipronged effort seeking to reach as many people in the United States as possible. In addition to using materials such as posters, brochures, and training videos aimed at alerting cashiers to the new security measures, "The New Color of Money" tried to reach a mass audience through entertainment channels, in particular television. The campaign included television spots, but it also relied on product placements, akin to the marketing of consumer goods. The new $20 bill was highlighted on television game shows as well as on prime-time dramas. It became the subject of conversations on morning news programming and of jokes by late-night comedians. The twenty also appeared on billboards, atop taxi cabs, in subway cars, and on Internet ads.

The "New Color of Money" campaign came to a close after the new $20 bill was formally unveiled in October 2002, accompanied by ceremonies staged across the country. The campaign achieved a great deal of recognition for the twenty with the general public. The transition was not without some bumps, however, nor did it lack critics who questioned the need to spend tax dollars on something people had no choice but to use.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The United States government had always taken steps to thwart forgery of its currency, in large measure to its experience in breaking away from the British; as part of its war effort Britain counterfeited the new Continental currency to make it worthless and wreck the economy of the fledgling republic. In about 1820, as an example of an early countermeasure, copper printing plates were replaced with steel ones because they produced uniform engravings and allowed for more complicated patterns on banknotes, thus complicating the task of counterfeiting. Nevertheless, counterfeiters continued to ply their trade, aided by the lack of a uniform currency. By the time of the Civil War some 1,600 state banks were issuing their own bills, resulting in about 7,000 varieties of notes, which made the task of determining real from fake all the more difficult. The Secret Service, today known for its role in protecting the president of the United States, was actually formed in 1865 to thwart counterfeiting. It was not until 30 years later that its agents began moonlighting as bodyguards for President Cleveland.

© Joseph Sohm; Visions of America/Corbis

A common way to deter counterfeiting in the twentieth century was to change the design of the notes regularly. Most countries altered patterns every 15 to 20 years, although the United States tended to wait longer. By the 1990s, however, new technology made the job of the counterfeiter much easier, forcing the U.S. government to begin changing the design of its notes on a regular basis, roughly every seven years. In 1996 new $100 notes were introduced, followed by $50 notes in 1997, $20 notes in 1998, and $5 and $10 notes in 2000. The U.S. Department of the Treasury hired public-relations firm Burson-Marsteller in 1996 to spearhead a worldwide public education campaign to introduce the newly designed currency.

In 2002 Burson-Marsteller was hired again, this time to introduce the new colorized $20 bill, which would be followed by other denominations. The most noticeable changes to the new $20 bill were cosmetic. According to Tara Ross, a Texas attorney writing for the American Enterprise, "Peach and blue colors appear on the bill, but they are subtle. Andrew Jackson remains, but without the oval that used to surround his portrait. A blue eagle now appears to his right and a smaller eagle to his left. Several dozen little yellow [20s] appear across the back on the bill." In addition to the first use since 1905 of colors beyond green and black, the new $20 bill included several new anticounterfeiting features, including color-shifting ink, so that colors changed as the note was tilted; a watermark pressed into the paper and visible from both sides when held up to the light; and a security thread (a plastic strip) embedded in the paper, that in small print spelled out the denomination of the bill.

Unlike the previous rollout of new currency, however, this time Burson-Marsteller was joined by the Hollywood talent agency William Morris Agency, which would endeavor to secure "bit parts" for the new $20 bill on television shows and in movies. Omnicom Group's Davie-Brown Entertainment was also engaged to help in the marketing effort. It was all part of the $32 million

MONEY MATTERS

Although hard currency remained highly important in the United States, at the time that the campaign "The New Color of Money" appeared, cash was used to make purchases less frequently than in the past. According to the Nielson Report, 25 percent of purchases made in the United States in 1990 involved cash. By 2002 that number had dropped to 19 percent. The share was expected to be just 10 percent by 2020.

"The New Color of Money, Safer. Smarter. More Secure" marketing campaign to introduce to the world the new $20 bill, which was set to begin distribution through commercial banks on October 9, 2003.

TARGET MARKET

While in a sense the target audience for the "New Color of Money" campaign was every person in the world who was old enough to spend money, the focus of the campaign was on the United States. (A global public education effort would follow, highly important because 60 percent of U.S. currency was held overseas.) The campaign's purpose was to ensure a smooth transition to the new $20 bill, making sure that the general public expected the change and understood that both old and new currency would be accepted. Perhaps of even more importance was making people who handled cash as part of their jobs, especially cashiers, aware of the new security measures. Richard I. Mintz, chairman of the public-affairs division of Burson-Marsteller, told Betsy Streisand of the New York Times that the goal of the campaign was relatively simple: "We want to build awareness—then we can begin to change behavior." Streisand added, "The behavior that he wants to change includes stuffing the $20 bill, the most frequently counterfeited in the United States, into a pocket or cash register before checking its authenticity by, say, holding it up to a light or feeling for the security thread."

COMPETITION

The main competition for the new $20 bill was fake $20 bills. The elaborate security measures incorporated in the new note came in response to readily available digital technology—scanners, color printers, and software—that gave rise to casual forgers, such as college students color-copying a $20 bill to fool the pizza-delivery person, and provided powerful new tools for criminal forgers. It was estimated that less than 1 percent of counterfeit notes uncovered in the United States in 1995 were digitally produced. By the time the new $20 bill was introduced, that number had ballooned to almost 40 percent. On another level the new twenty faced competition in the media, because its message had to vie with countless others for the attention of the public. It was for this reason that the William Morris Agency was hired; by placing the new note in a variety of different situations on television, the chances of reaching a mass audience were greatly increased.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "New Color of Money" campaign entailed the distribution of more than 37 million items of training materials, such as brochures, posters, training videos, and CD-ROMs, geared for cash-handling workers. There was also a website, www.moneyfactory.gov/newmoney, where people could learn more about the new anticounterfeit devices. A certain amount of coverage could also be expected from the news media. But in order to cast as wide a net as possible, the campaign also included television spots, promotional events, product placements, and joint marketing efforts. In addition, the new note even became fodder for late-night comedians. David Letterman commented that it looked like it had undergone a makeover from the guys on the hit show Queer Eye for the Straight Guy. It was not a surprising moment, given that representatives from the William Morris Agency had met weeks earlier with the writers for Letterman, The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, and other late-night programs to tell them about the new $20 bill. They did not care if the hosts poked fun at the bill, as long as they brought attention to it.

Other exposure through entertainment channels included appearances on the game shows Wheel of Fortune, Pepsi Play for a Billion, Who Wants to Be a Millionaire, and Jeopardy. Joint marketing deals were arranged with such partners as Wal-Mart and Pepperidge Farm. The latter put a picture of the new bill on its Goldfish cracker packages. The crackers themselves were colored to match the twenties, and the company also developed a contest around the new bill, offering a trip to Washington, D.C., as a prize. Like contemporary consumer products, the $20 bill was placed in movies and television shows, including CSI: Miami, The West Wing, and Law & Order. It was even electronically superimposed on the field during college football games on ESPN and during NFL games on Monday Night Football on ABC.

The campaign employed outdoor elements. A major billboard in New York City's Times Square was leased. Taxi toppers were procured in New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. Posters were put up in subways and bus shelters in such cities as Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., and San Francisco.

"The New Color of Money" also included a pair of television spots. In one a man withdrew money from an ATM and paused to inspect the new $20 bills that he received. While he displayed obvious pleasure in what he saw, an announcer commented, "You can see right away that things are different. We've added color and changed the portrait." The man then bought flowers from a vendor, who was equally impressed. After noting the security features and assuring the audience that both old and new twenties were legal tender, the announcer closed with the "safer, smarter, more secure" tagline. In the second spot, called "Sleight of Hand," a man in a music store received a new $20 bill in change after buying a CD. While the announcer listed the new features of the bill, accompanied by guitar riffs and record scratching, the man spun the bill on his finger and performed a number of other special-effects tricks, impressing the store clerk, who applauded at the end of the demonstration. A woman then stepped up to the counter and asked, "Can I get a new twenty?"

On the day the bill began distribution, the campaign organized a number of promotional events that received widespread news coverage. It was featured on NBC's Today Show, and cohost Katie Couric became the first New Yorker to purchase something—a cup of coffee at Dean & Deluca—with the new twenty. In Washington, D.C., the first of the new $20 bills was used by the head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to buy stamps from a vending machine. It was a calculated choice: in the 1990s the introduction of the new $20 bill was marred by problems with the same Post Office machines, which had not been properly prepared to accept the notes. More than 30 other similar events took place in cities across the country.

OUTCOME

The "New Color of Money" campaign succeeded in its core mission of garnering attention for the release of the new $20 bill. According to Burson-Marsteller, the campaign achieved an 82 percent awareness level for the twenty in the United States. The campaign also set the stage for the introduction of the new $50 note in 2004 and $10 note in 2005. But there were also problems. According to Ross of the American Enterprise, the campaign did not accomplish a smooth transition: "Several major grocery store chains received notice of the new [bills] mere weeks before they appeared on the market. As a result, self-checkout lanes across the country were not prepared to accept the new bills when they were introduced to the market."

Ross was one of a number of people critical of spending tax dollars on a marketing campaign for the new $20 note. She stated, "the Secret Service reported that $44.3 million in counterfeit notes were passed last year—not much compared to the cost of the marketing and all the upgrades to ATMs and other machines we now need. Rather than redesigning, marketing, and incorporating a new $20, $50, or $100 bill into our lives once every few years, it would be much cheaper and more effective to simply spend more time finding and prosecuting counterfeiters." Brandweek writer Philip Van Munching was even more caustic in his observations about the campaign, maintaining, "It isn't so much that our government thinks its constituents are stupid people; it's that the government is apparently comprised of stupid people, who naturally assume we're their intellectual equals—I don't question that the new $20 bills are different, but do we need to be sold on it?"

For its work on "The New Color of Money" Burson-Marsteller received advertising industry accolades. In 2004 it won top honors for Global Campaign of the Year at the PRWeek Awards, present by PRWeek, a trade publication serving the public-relations field. Moreover, the new $20 bill itself was named one of the "Best Products of 2003" by BusinessWeek and Fortune magazines.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Gordon T. "It's Real Money Now." CNN Money, October 10, 2003.

Atkinson, Claire. "New Hollywood Star: The $20 Bill." Advertising Age, September 15, 2003, p. 3.

Buncombe, Andrew. "A Peach of a Job." Independent (London), September 30, 2003, p. 14.

"The Color of Money." Wall Street Journal, May 16, 2003, p. W17.

Goldstein, Steve. "U.S. Spending Money to Advertise Newly Designed $20 Bill." Philadelphia Inquirer, October 14, 2003.

Ross, Tara. "The New Color of Money . . ." American Enterprise Online, December 4, 2003. Available from <http://www.taemag.com/printVersion/print_article.asp?articleID=17804>

Streisand, Betsy. "Need Change for a $20 Bill? Call Hollywood." New York Times, September 28, 2003, p 3.

Van Munching, Philip. "Don't Show Us the Money." Brandweek, November 10, 2003, p. 22.

Walker, Rob. "The Money Pitch." Slate, October 27, 2003.

Ed Dinger

Burger King Corp.

5505 Blue Lagoon Drive
Miami, Florida 33126
USA
Telephone: (305) 378-3000
Fax: (305) 378-7262
Web site: www.burgerking.com

■■■

LUNCH BREAK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Because of what appeared to be a revolving door in its executive suite, as well as a steady drop in customer traffic, which was blamed on inconsistent food quality and poor customer service, Burger King was in search of a way to reestablish its brand identity and to rebuild sales. According to Advertising Age, in January 2004 Burger King had at the helm its nineteenth chief executive in its 50-year history, and at the same time the fast-food chain was struggling with a 22 percent decline in customer traffic that had begun in the late 1990s. Adding to the company's problems was a lack of consistency in its advertising. As Advertising Age noted, ''Advertising has often been the scapegoat for sliding sales, with fours shops getting axed in the past four years.''

Although Kevin Keller, a marketing professor at Dartmouth College, told Advertising Age that Burger King had ''a brand problem, not an advertising problem,'' the company joined with the Miami-based advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky to help implement a turnaround. The agency reintroduced ''Have it your way,'' a popular tagline from the 1970s, and in February 2004 launched a marketing campaign, ''Lunch Break,'' designed to appeal to its target audience, 18- to 34-year-olds who ate fast food and many of whom worked in offices. A series of television spots, which resembled an abbreviated sitcom, featured a cast of office workers ordering lunch from Burger King.

Burger King's return to the ''Have it your way'' tagline and the new ''Lunch Break'' campaign seemed to achieve the company's goals of reconnecting with its target audience and rebuilding sales. According to Burger King, for 10 consecutive months following the launch of the campaign, sales increased. Same-store sales in November 2004 were up 8.6 percent in franchised restaurants and up 14.2 percent in company-owned restaurants. The campaign was also recognized with awards at the 2004 Cannes Lions and the Clios.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since opening its first restaurant in 1954, Burger King had grown to more than 11,200 restaurants in all 50 U.S. states and in 60 other countries, and it reported system-wide sales of $11.1 billion in the fiscal year ending June 30, 2003. The company aired its first television spot, ''Home of the Whopper,'' in 1958, and its first major advertising campaign, ''The Bigger the Burger the Better the Burger,'' was launched in 1968. Other campaigns followed, including the company's best-known and most successful, ''Have It Your Way,'' which was introduced in 1974.

Despite the success of ''Have It Your Way,'' the campaign was scrapped and replaced by what USA

© Roland Weihrauch/dpa/Corbis

Today described as ''forgettable themes,'' including ''Best Darn Burger'' in 1978, ''Burger King Town'' in 1986, and ''The Whopper Says'' in 2001. Burger King seemed constantly to be changing its ad campaigns, but the new themes failed to resonate with consumers. As Burger King's customer traffic continued to slip, it appeared that the number-three fast-food chain, Wendy's, was ready to push Burger King from its second-place position and to settle in behind the number-one chain, McDonald's. In an effort to draw its customers back and to rebuild sales, Burger King took action in 2004 by reintroducing the ''Have it your way'' tagline in the ''Lunch Break'' campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Crispin Porter + Bogusky's Steve Sapka said that the ''Lunch Break'' campaign targeted ''burger-craving Gen X and Gen Yers who demanded personalization and customization in every aspect of daily life. With much of that audience spending day after day at the office, BK knew that the relationships reflected in the 'Lunch Break' campaign would resonate well and get the brand message and product attributes out in an entertaining and relevant way.''

Reintroducing the ''Have it your way'' tagline also appealed to another market, baby boomers who were looking for products and symbols reminiscent of their childhoods. In a discussion of the retro trend in culture and of its influence on the ways in which companies were marketing their products, Schuyler Brown, managing director of trends for Euro RSCG, told USA Today, ''We're all nostalgic for the loss of our childhood. Kids are getting too old too fast. Adults are trying to hold on to their youth.''

Although an Ad Track survey by USA Today reported that ''consumers overall have mixed feelings about the return to 'Have it your way' . . . the ads score highest in likability and effectiveness with 18- to 24-year-olds.'' Russ Klein, the chief marketing officer of Burger King, told USA Today that it was all right that the survey results were skewed toward the young: ''Our core group is 18 to 34 years old. We understand it's more important to be provocative than pleasant with this group.''

COMPETITION

During an early ad campaign Burger King had referred to itself as ''America's Burger King,'' but over the years it remained firmly entrenched in second place behind the fast-food giant McDonald's and just ahead of the number-three chain, Wendy's. As the Evansville Courier & Press noted, ''McDonald's and Burger King have been going burger-to-burger for more than 30 years, with Wendy's and smaller companies also fighting for consumers' hearts and appetites . . . A price war between the two that stepped up in 2002 weakened profits and produced only mixed results, with Wendy's steering clear and picking up steady gains.''

To try to bounce back from weakened profits, McDonald's, according to USA Today, had reinvented itself ''as a place for the young and hip—not just for the Happy Meal set.'' In 2003 McDonald's introduced a new theme, ''I'm Lovin' It,'' and planned its first global ad campaign to coincide with the new marketing approach. Jurgen Krauss, the CEO of Heye & Partner, the agency based in Munich, Germany, that had created the new theme, said that his ''plan is to make McDonald's 'a lifestyle' not just a place to eat.'' USA Today reported that ''McDonald's has reason to crow'' about its marketing strategy, since the chain's same-store sales experienced the biggest increase in four years, with stock shares climbing close to a nine-month high.

While Wendy's sales grew during a Burger King-McDonald's price war in 2002, the death in that year of Dave Thomas, the company's founder and key spokesman, created new problems for the chain. Following Thomas's death, Wendy's struggled but failed to find an effective method to reach consumers, and according to Advertising Age, same-store sales for 2002 dropped in company-owned and franchised restaurants by 2.9 and 1.8 percent, respectively. In 2005, however, Wendy's changed its marketing strategy by ''shedding its folksy

BURGER KING RETURNS TO POP CULTURE TO LAUNCH NEW BURGER

With the success in using popular television shows like The Office and Seinfeld as the theme for its "Lunch Break" marketing campaign, which featured a sitcom-style cast of 20-something office workers ordering lunch from the fast-food restaurant, Burger King turned in 2005 to another pop-culture venue—reality TV—to launch a new product and to support its marketing campaign. For this campaign Burger King partnered with business mogul Donald Trump for the season premiere of his reality TV show, The Apprentice.

According to the company, the challenge for the two teams on Trump's show, called "Street Smarts" and "Book Smarts," was to "name, build, market, and sell a new menu item at Burger King restaurants." At the end of the episode the Street Smarts team had won, with its product—the Angus Steak Burger—available to customers for a limited time at Burger Kings nationwide. Russ Klein, the company's chief marketing officer, said of the project, "At Burger King, our have it your way philosophy puts our customers in charge. It's all about empowerment and getting what you want, when you want it. That's why we couldn't wait to take this burger from the boardroom to the lunchroom."

image and one-size-fits-all message," reported AdAge.com. Wendy's new theme, "Do What Tastes Right," was designed to set the company apart from the competition, reflect the flexibility of its menu, and appeal to three consumer groups: baby boomers, who were Wendy's core customers; young adults; and Generation Zers, that is, the teens who were the customers of the future. Much as Burger King turned back the clock by reintroducing the "Have it your way" tagline, Wendy's returned to its "square hamburger roots." The company also increased its marketing budget, and while it did not introduce a global ad campaign, as McDonald's had, it did venture into Internet advertising. Speaking of the new marketing strategy, Ian Rowden, Wendy's executive vice president and chief marketing officer, told AdAge.com, "We can leverage what we have to different groups. One message at one time broadly targeted for one group doesn't play anymore for Wendy's."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Burger King stated that its advertising campaigns had contributed to the company's success, and to keep that success going Brad Blum, the company's CEO in 2004, said in a January 2004 press release, "We must have groundbreaking, next-level, results-oriented, and innovative advertising that strongly connects with our core consumers." Greg Brenneman, who replaced Blum as CEO in 2005, told Newsweek that the company's core consumers were identified when he reviewed a market study "that showed hard-core fast foodies made up only 18 percent of the population but accounted for 49 percent of business." Brenneman's priority became providing food options that appealed to the target audience of 18- to 34-year-old men "who like football and are 'gray collar' workers, because their jobs aren't a bright spot in their lives." Burger King's Klein told USA Today that the return to "Have it your way," the tagline that had worked well in the past, was long overdue: "When you have an ad campaign that sticky, it's foolish to go against it," he said. Andrew Keller, creative director at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, added, "At a time when self-expression and mass customization are critical elements of culture, the line makes total sense."

In the "Lunch Break" spots a cast of sitcom-style characters known as the "Lunch Break gang" ordered from Burger King, competing to see who could concoct the most unusual Whopper. The competition between the 20-something office staffers heated up with each new commercial. In one spot two coworkers clashed when one "copied" the other's Whopper order, and in another spot a worker claimed the title as "champion" when he ordered his Whopper with "no lettuce, extra ketchup, double bacon, double mayo, and two extra beef patties." Crispin Porter + Bogusky's "Lunch Break" campaign aimed to achieve three goals. It reached the primary target audience of 18- to 34-year-old office workers, it restored Burger King's cultural relevance by bringing back the "Have it your way" tagline, and it reestablished brand identity.

According to the agency's Sapka, "With little room for personalization in the fast food experience, BK had the opportunity to own customization in the category, which was the campaign's intent." Sapka said that it was because the "Lunch Break" gang's unique sandwich orders were so effective at promoting Burger King and at returning the "Have it your way" mantra to pop culture that they returned at the end of 2004 in ads tied to the SpongeBob SquarePants movie. In 2005 they were back promoting the Angus Steak Burger, the Tendercrisp, and the Big Fish. Brian Gies, Burger King's vice president of marketing impact, told Chain Leader, "As long as it [the "Lunch Break" campaign] stays fresh and relevant, we'll continue to keep it in the mix.''

OUTCOME

The ''Lunch Break'' ads were believed to have had a strong influence on the resurgence of sales at Burger King. Gies told Chain Leader that the ads had been ''an important contributor to the brand's momentum. The campaign has done great things for brand recall, message recall, and likeability.''

WWD recognized two of the ''Lunch Break'' spots by including them on its list of the 10 most effective new TV commercials launched during the last week of February 2004, and Adweek included the campaign in its list of best spots. Adweek wrote that Burger King's campaign ''managed to create characters who, despite their oddball antics (or maybe because of them), feel familiar and almost always funny . . . The casting and dialogue are superb, and the spots also seem to spark stomach rumbling, so CP+B must be doing something right.'' ''Lunch Break'' campaign spots also won the Silver Award at the 2004 Cannes Lions and Bronze Awards at the Clios.

Not every review of the campaign was positive, however. Lewis Lazare, writing for the Chicago Sun-Times, called the ''Lunch Break'' spots ''a stylistic mish-mash if ever there were one.'' Lazare wrote that the ''story line and underlying message are confusing . . . And, sadly, the message about getting burgers done your way at Burger King seems to be diminished by all the silent sturm und drang.'' According to USA Today 's weekly poll, Ad Track, only 14 percent of those familiar with the ads liked them ''a lot'' and thought that they were ''very effective,'' while 30 percent were found to ''dislike'' the ads.

FURTHER READING

Begun, Bret. ''A Really Big Idea—Burger King's CEO Has Turned Around Chain with a Radical Notion: Give People What They Want.'' Newsweek, May 23, 2005.

Chapman, Mary Boltz. ''Cast of Characters: Burger King Hopes Fast-food Fans Will Relate to Its Lunch Break Campaign Evolution.'' Chain Leader, January 1, 2005.

Cummings, Betsy. ''On the Crest of the Wave: Agencies Try to Strike While Pop-culture Fads and Trends Are Hot.'' Adweek, September 13, 2004.

Elliott, Stuart. ''Burger King Takes a Product from TV to the Table.'' New York Times, January 21, 2005.

Horovitz, Bruce. ''McDonald's Lovin' Turnaround.'' USA Today, June 30, 2003.

Howard, Theresa. ''Burger King Appeals to Young Workers with 'Your Way' Ads.'' USA Today, April 10, 2004.

Johannes, Amy. ''Burger King Cooks Up a Winner.'' Promo, May 1, 2005.

Lazare, Lewis. ''Message Confusing in Burger King Ads.'' Chicago Sun-Times, March 3, 2004.

Macarthur, Kate. ''Wendy's Overhauls Marketing Strategies.'' May 19, 2005. Available from <http://www.AdAge.com>.

———. ''Wendy's Struggles to Serve Up Success: Hopes Hipper Image Helps in Post-Dave World.'' Advertising Age, February 21, 2005.

———. ''What's Eating Burger King: 'Brand Problem Not Ad Problem,' Experts Say, as Chain Calls In Crispin.'' Advertising Age, January 26, 2004.

McCarthy, Michael. ''Burger King Tries Old Slogan Again: 'Have It Your Way' Returns to Some Mixed Reviews in Kitschy New Ads.'' USA Today, May 23, 2005.

''McDonald's Widens Gap over Burger King in Fast-Food Wars.'' Evansville Courier Press, January 28, 2004.

Parpis, Eleftheria. ''Best of the Rest in 2004.'' Adweek, April 2004.

''TV Advertising Recognition: The 10 Most Effective New TV Commercials Launched between Feb. 16 and Feb. 29.'' WWD, December 13, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

SUBSERVIENT CHICKEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2004 Burger King's position as the second-largest hamburger company in the world was waning. With a worsening brand image and an unshakable image for poor food quality, the chain was forced to shut down hundreds of stores. Following a flurry of CEO and ad agency turnovers, Burger King awarded Miami-based ad agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky a $350 million advertising budget to reshape its image. ''We weren't a brand that suffered from lack of awareness,'' Russ Klein, Burger King's chief marketing officer, told Advertising Age, ''but we were a brand that suffered from a lack of emotional attachment.'' Crispin Porter + Bogusky resurrected Burger King's 1974 tagline ''Have it your way'' for ''Subservient Chicken,'' one of its first campaigns for the firm. The campaign was launched on April 8, 2004, immediately following Burger King's introduction of the Tendercrisp Chicken Sandwich.

The campaign began with E-mail messages that directed recipients to SubservientChicken.com. A week later three 30-second spots were aired on network television, followed by a print ad that also directed people to the website. The website, which served as the core of the campaign, featured a person wearing a chicken costume who acted out whatever command was typed into the command bar. More than 400 commands had been filmed by Crispin Porter + Bogusky beforehand to correspond to possible commands. The website had the feel of a webcam, suggesting that the chicken was standing inside an apartment just waiting to act out the visitor's next prompt.

Considered a bold approach when it first appeared, the "Subservient Chicken" campaign collected a number of creative awards, including Best in Show at the One Show Interactive, the Grand Clio, and the Yahoo Big Idea Chair Award. Within the first 24 hours the website had received more than a million hits, with this number soaring to an impressive 385 million hits by April 2005. Visitors spent an average of six minutes interacting with the site. Not only did the "Subservient Chicken" campaign see Burger King's 21-month sales decline stop, but sales actually improved so much that in 2004 Burger King's growth surpassed its principal competitor, McDonald's Corporation.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1954, Burger King had grown to include more than 11,000 fast-food restaurants, most privately owned franchises, by 2005. Early on, Burger King allowed franchisees to buy stores, which stimulated rapid expansion. Quality and consistency varied between stores, however, a flaw that had haunted Burger King for decades. From the beginning Burger King also used the "Have it your way" tagline to emphasize its restaurants' ability to prepare food to accommodate customers' tastes, a stab at the fixed menu of McDonald's. With the emergence in the late 1990s of restaurant chains touting healthier food, such as Starbucks Corporation and Jamba Juice Company, competition grew even fiercer among fast-food giants like Burger King, McDonald's, Wendy's, and Jack in the Box. To adjust to the emphasis on healthier eating, Burger King introduced low-carbohydrate options, including more salads. Brad Blum, CEO of Burger King in 2002, increased sales by adorning the menu with the Angus Steak Burger and Fire-Grilled Salads.

Burger King continued to fire agencies that created commercials with close-up shots of food, also known in the industry as "playing up the grill," a common technique used in McDonald's advertisements. Young & Rubicam, the agency that preceded Crispin Porter + Bogusky, had introduced Burger King's "Fire's Ready" campaign, but the agency was sacked after only 10 months. "There's a young guy product that basically all of the greatest advertising in the world is built around—that's beer. Here we have the exact same audience [as beer marketers]. Yet, in general, you have some of the worst advertising in the world," Alex Bogusky, a partner at Crispin Porter + Bogusky, told Brandweek. "Since they both have the same target there's no reason the fast food category has to be so lame. It's just gotten that way."

Until Wendy's released its own chicken sandwiches, Burger King's Original Chicken Sandwich had been the market leader in this food item. In response to Wendy's move, Burger King began using higher grade meat and other ingredients to create its new Tendercrisp Chicken Sandwich. A month after the sandwich was introduced, in March 2004, Crispin Porter + Bogusky launched the "Subservient Chicken" campaign. It was a time when Burger King was floundering. "It's not like you know you're getting the chance to work on a resurgent brand. You get a chance to work on a damaged brand. When we started on this, business was not too good [for Burger King]," Bogusky told Brandweek. "They were ready to take some risks."

TARGET MARKET

The "Subservient Chicken" campaign targeted 16- to 35-year-old males who were engaged with "online nontraditional" advertising. Crispin Porter + Bogusky hoped that the campaign would deviate from Burger King's traditional strategy, which was simply to mimic McDonald's advertising. Copying the strategy of the market leader, according to Crispin Porter + Bogusky, made Burger King seem to be just a smaller version, which was not something the public wanted. Crispin Porter + Bogusky attempted to make Burger King "popular" with its target market, believing that the popularity of the brand would then spread into other demographics. Jeff Hicks, Crispin Porter + Bogusky's president, told Brandweek, "We talk a lot about the 'cool uncle.' The voice of the brand is that cool uncle who may be closer to your age than your father's. He's the kind of guy who might say, 'Hey, take a year off from college and go travel.' He's got a little more of an adolescent voice than your parents but he's also got a little bit of experience. That's the voice we like for the brand."

Known for creating interactive, viral campaigns, that is, advertising spread by word of mouth, Crispin Porter + Bogusky began by steering away from traditional media. "What struck me was their holistic view," Klein told Advertising Age's Creativity. "They solve brand problems from the ground up. They don't necessarily gravitate to thirty-second TV commercials as a tonic for every marketing problem. They are not only a big believer but also a practitioner of word of mouth marketing—they understand what it takes to generate strong advocacy among the core customer." Neither Burger King nor Crispin Porter + Bogusky wanted a mass-market campaign, choosing instead to use a specific channel for reaching 16- to 35-year-old male Internet users. "If you are going to be targeted,'' Klein continued, ''you have to deliver something that is relevant to that target.''

CHICKEN GARTER BELT

The bizarre chicken outfit, spoofing other more salacious websites, came complete with a garter belt. The costume was designed by Stan Winston, the same designer involved in movies like Aliens, Terminator, and Jurassic Park.

COMPETITION

McDonald's, the giant of fast-food firms, was founded in 1948 and by 1962 had served its billionth hamburger. ''Billions served'' became the company's tagline, and by 2002 McDonald's was spending more than $600 million per year on advertising. By 2002 the company operated more than 30,000 stores, almost triple the number of Burger King's. Each McDonald's restaurant obtained food from an authorized supplier, ensuring that a Big Mac tasted the same in Miami, Florida, for example, as it did in Anchorage, Alaska. McDonald's advertising campaigns traditionally included cross-promotions that involved toys and movies, with Walt Disney Studio Entertainment being one of its longest-running partners. The McDonald's Teenie Beanie Babies giveaway of 1997, for example, proved to be one of the company's biggest successes. By 2005, however, McDonald's was aggressively fighting to retain its breakfast market. Between 1995 and 2005, 36 percent of its breakfast customers had left for retailers like Starbucks, which served higher-priced Arabica coffees. Research showed that coffee, unlike breakfast sandwiches, brought consumers back to the same store every day, and so McDonald's responded by introducing a richer Robusta blend titled ''Premium.'' An aggressive ad campaign followed, with one television spot showing a woman sipping McDonald's Premium coffee and enjoying a McGriddle sandwich while fantasizing, ''I fired my boss'' and ''I married a rock star.''

With more than 6,000 stores by 2002, Wendy's had gained the position of the third-largest fast-food chain in the world. Wendy's, which had a substantial menu that included alternatives to hamburgers, presented itself as a higher-quality alternative to McDonald's and Burger King. Dave Thomas, who had founded the company in 1969, often served as its spokesperson, and over the years he appeared in more than 800 commercials. The corporation's best-known ad campaign—''Where's the Beef?'' with actress Clara Peller—appeared in 1984, and Wendy's market share immediately jumped 12 percent. When Thomas died in 2002 Wendy's turned to more conventional advertising, however. By 2005 the corporation was suffering losses from the rising price of beef, the emergence of healthier fast-food alternatives, and a hoax by a woman who claimed that she had found a severed finger in her Wendy's chili.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To add a healthier chicken sandwich to its menu Burger King introduced the high-quality Tendercrisp Chicken Sandwich on March 19, 2004. It was while planning another spot for Burger King that Jeff Benjamin, Crispin Porter + Bogusky's interactive creative director, came up with the idea of the ''Subservient Chicken'' campaign. He instructed his crew to film an actor wearing a chicken costume that had been designed by the Stan Winston Studio. The actor was instructed to perform more than 400 short actions. The filming took place inside the apartment of a friend of Benjamin's that was furnished with only a modest lamp and two couches. ''Our approach has always been, 'Follow the work,' '' Crispin Porter + Bogusky's Jeff Steinhour told Fast Company. ''Meaning if ever you're in doubt about a decision, simply ask whether it's going to make the work better.''

Benjamin activated the campaign website, SubservientChicken.com, on April 9, 2004. Once a visitor had entered the website, the text ''Contacting the chicken'' appeared on a black background and with the Burger King logo. Below, in a command bar, visitors were prompted, ''Get chicken just the way you like it. Type in your command here.'' The chicken waited patiently, supposedly before a webcam, for the commands. Included in the chicken's repertoire were commands like ''Dance,'' ''Cluck,'' ''Play baseball,'' and ''Get into the Lotus position.'' If the chicken was asked to perform something inappropriate, impossible, or not on the list, it simply approached the camera and wagged its finger in admonishment. The overall effect was that the chicken seemed to be executing commands live.

As the project neared completion, on April 8, Benjamin E-mailed 20 people the website's URL. Without any serious promotion the website had registered more than one million hits by the end of the day. The following week three 30-second spots were aired on late-night network television. The spots featured scenes from the website, for example, the chicken acting out commands before young adults. In another spot a man commanded the chicken to try on different clothing. Only one print ad was released for the campaign. This

BURGER KING VS. A GIANT

To put the size of McDonald's into perspective, in 2002 it boasted over 30,000 stores, more than those of Wal-Mart, Carrefour SA, and Royal Ahold N.V. combined. McDonald's employed more people than Ford and General Motors. Because McDonald's owned the land beneath its restaurants, it also was the world's largest commercial holder of real estate.

ad, which featured a cutout of a chicken mask, appeared in an October issue of ESPN's magazine.

"I would describe what we're doing as making BK unique," Bogusky told Brandweek. "Sometimes that makes people uncomfortable. Viewers may look at the advertising and say, 'You can't talk that way' or 'That's kind of weird.' It's only weird because there's only been one voice [in the category] with any consistency and that's been McDonald's. So we're all conditioned to say, that's how fast food advertising should look, be and sound."

OUTCOME

Despite the low cost of the "Subservient Chicken" campaign, it garnered some of the advertising industry's foremost honors, including a Grand Clio, Best in Show at the One Show Interactive, and the Yahoo Big Idea Chair Award. After being online for only one month, the chicken had performed its millionth request. After one year the site had had approximately 14 million visitors and 396 million hits. Andy Bonaparte, a Burger King ad director, told Adweek that the campaign helped "sell a lot, a lot, a lot of chicken sandwiches." During the campaign Burger King's 21-month sales decline stopped and turned around. Burger King's sales growth was soon outperforming McDonald's. Sales of the Tendercrisp sandwich consistently increased at an average of 9 percent a week until it eventually sold more than the firm's other chicken offering, the Original Chicken Sandwich.

Matt Vescovo, one of the judges responsible for honoring the "Subservient Chicken" campaign with a gold during the Viral Awards show, was effusive in his praise of the campaign. He told Adweek, "To take that idea [that you can have chicken any way you like it] for something that really isn't that exciting—a chicken sandwich—and to so seamlessly put it into such an innovative use of technology, it just really hit so many sweet spots for me."

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "Out and About at the Clios: Ad Industry Luminaries from Around the Globe Mingled at the 43rd Annual Show." Adweek, June 13, 2005.

———. "Subservient Chicken Tunes In." Adweek, November 15, 2004, p. 26.

Creamer, Matthew. "Crispin Ups Ante: Widely Applauded Creative Shop Sheds Its 'Underdog' Label via BK Win; Shows Capability to Solve Problems on Mass Scale." Advertising Age, January 10, 2005, p. S1.

D'Innocenzo, Lisa. "Don't Be an Ass." Strategy, September 17, 2004, p. 8.

Howard, Theresa. "Burger King Promotes Tongue-in-Beak Chicken Fight: 15-Minute Main Event 'Ad' Airs Only on DirecTV." USA Today, November 5, 2004, p. B4.

Ives, Nat. "Crispin Porter Wins 12 Awards from One Club." New York Times, May 16, 2005, p. 11.

Lippert, Barbara. "A Royal Welcome: CP+B Is Dead-On with a Pair of Bizarre Burger King Spots." Adweek, September 27, 2004, p. 28.

Sanders, Holly. "Chicken Jerk & Alien Bees: 'Viral' Ads Create Buzz, but May Not Sell." New York Post, November 14, 2004, p. 34.

Story, Louise. "The Subservient Chicken and Other Award Winners." New York Times, June 13, 2005, p. 8.

Underwood, Ryan. "Like Just About Everything Crispin Porter + Bogusky Does, the Subservient Chicken Ad Campaign Is Risky and Extreme: It's Also Very, Very Smart." Fast Company, April 1, 2005, p. 70.

Wheaton, Ken. "Adages: Just Say No; The Subservient Chicken Does." Advertising Age, May 16, 2005, p. 56.

Wilker, Deborah. "Clio Spot-Light on Chicken 'n' Car." Hollywood Reporter, May 26, 2005.

Kevin Teague

WHEN YOU HAVE IT YOUR WAY, IT JUST TASTES BETTER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite its overall sales success, Burger King in 1998 embarked on what senior vice president of marketing James Watkins called an "aggressive evolution" of its brand. With industry leader McDonald'shaving taken steps to address a series of high-profile marketing missteps by rolling out a new cooking system designed to improve the taste of its products, Burger King responded with a marketing strategy that focused on the superior taste of its food. The chain's three-year-old "Get Your Burger's Worth" slogan was scrapped and replaced with a line that hit McDonald's in its self-acknowledged weak spot. "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better," boasted the new Burger King television campaign from Ammirati Puris Lintas. "We will stake Burger King's future on taste," said Paul Clayton, president of the company's North American operations.

Since the founding of Burger King in 1954, the Miami-based chain had made food customization, encapsulated by the "Have It Your Way" tag line, a hallmark of its competitive strategy. Burger King restaurants offered traditional fast-food fare in addition to Whopper and BK Broiler sandwiches. The company had grown to become the number two fast-food hamburger chain, with franchisees operating more than 9,800 restaurants in all 50 U.S. states and in 55 countries and territories around the world. Now a subsidiary of London-based Diageo, PLC, one of the world's leading consumer products businesses whose international portfolio of food and drink brands included Guinness, Pillsbury, Green Giant, Häagen-Dazs, Old El Paso, Progresso, Smirnoff Vodka, Bailey's Original Irish Creme, and J&B Rare Scotch Whisky, Burger King enjoyed systemwide sales of $10.3 billion in fiscal year 1998.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Burger King was founded by James McLamore and David Edgerton, both of whom had had extensive experience in the restaurant business. They founded the new restaurant around the simple concept of providing the customer with reasonably priced quality food that was served quickly in attractive, clean surroundings. Powered by America's postwar fast-food boom, the company grew briskly over the ensuing decade. By 1967, when the company was acquired by the Minneapolis-based Pillsbury Company, 8,000 employees were working in 274 different Burger King locations nationwide.

Burger King's success was predicated on its leadership in such areas as product development, decor, service, and advertising. The Whopper sandwich, introduced in 1957, proved an immediate hit and paved the way for future menu innovations. In the late 1990s the Whopper retained its place as one of the best-known hamburger sandwiches in the world, with more than 1.4 billion being sold annually.

Restaurant decor was a second pillar of Burger King's success. Burger King was the first fast-food chain to introduce dining rooms, allowing customers a chance to eat inside. Drive-through service, designed to satisfy customers on the go, was introduced in 1975 and as of 1999 accounted for approximately 50 percent of Burger King's business. The company developed a tradition of taking great care in the design and construction of its restaurants.

Burger King's advertising campaigns also contributed to the company's success. The company's first television ad ran on Miami's only VHF station in 1958. The year after Burger King became a Pillsbury subsidiary, in 1968, the company's first major promotion, "The Bigger the Burger the Better the Burger," debuted. In 1974 the landmark "Have It Your Way" campaign was created. Other memorable Burger King advertising campaigns included "America Loves Burgers and We're America's Burger King," "Make It Special, Make It Burger King," "Battle of the Burgers," "Burger King Town," "We Do It Like You'd Do It," "Sometimes You've Gotta Break the Rules," and "Your Way, Right Away."

The road to the "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" campaign began in late 1993, when Clayton, Burger King's president, and James B. Adamson, its chief executive officer, initiated an agency review. As a result New York-based Ammirati Puris Lintas was tapped to revive the chain's "Have It Your Way" theme. In 1996 Burger King executed the new strategy with ads focused on foods and set to popular music from the 1970s and '80s. The musical spots helped consumers make an emotional connection with Burger King. Two years later "Have It Your Way" returned as an integral part of the burger giant's advertising.

TARGET MARKET

The fast-food sector was one of the most highly developed in the restaurant industry, with the fast-food hamburger category being perhaps the most competitive. There seemed to be McDonald's, Wendy's, and Burger King outlets on every corner, and consumers were using increasingly sophisticated criteria to decide where and how to spend their money. In this environment gains in market share became critical. One way in which Burger King had traditionally differentiated itself from its competitors and gained market share was by appealing to customers on the issue of customization. The basic idea, embodied in the "Have It Your Way" slogan, was that consumers had individual needs and were best served by products that could be easily customized for them.

There was statistical evidence to indicate that there was a large market for customized products. For example, two-thirds of consumers in a poll done by the consulting firm of Kurt Salmon Associates reported difficulty in finding clothes that fit well. About 36 percent of the respondents said that they were willing to pay 12 to 14 percent more for custom clothes and shoes. It was felt that the same principal applied to other areas, including fast food. This was supported by the fact that in 1998 Burger King enjoyed sales gains when it offered a customized option in side dishes with its value meal items.

IF YOU REBUILD IT, THEY WILL COME

Burger King's "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" may have represented a throwback to the company's past, but in other areas the fast-food giant was striding boldly into the future. At the same time that the chain was revamping its national advertising, it was looking to boost performance by paying more attention to restaurant operations, new-product development, and broader marketing.

In 1998 the chain announced that it was embarking on a three-year initiative to spruce up tired stores. Slated for retirement was the tan-and-brick color scheme used in Burger King restaurants, to be supplanted by cobalt blue. Exteriors were to be made brighter with the addition of yellow and red stripes, while the inside walls would be painted a mustard yellow. Even the time-honored Burger King-in-a-bun logo was to be refurbished with a new style of lettering.

Other new features included an interactive "virtual fun center" designed for use by children, who were among Burger King's most important customer; a space-age drive-through in which patrons could access electronic screens showing them what they had ordered and how much it would cost; and a computer-controlled broiler chamber that could heat more slowly, allowing for thicker patties such as a planned half-pound burger, tentatively called the Great American.

For many Burger King customers the changes were long overdue. Patrons had complained for years about hard-to-read menu boards, crowded eating areas, and tables bolted to the floor. What was their overall impression of the chain? " 'Boring' would be the right word," cracked Jacqueline McCook, Burger King's head of strategic planning. "But they love the food." Consumers, McCook added, were sending Burger King a simple message: "If you make it a more pleasant environment, we'd come more often."

Paul Clayton, president of Burger King's North American operations, agreed with this assessment. "The best local-store marketing is a well-run restaurant," he told Advertising Age. "The better the restaurant delivers the brand, the better they will be. If we have a strong national marketing platform and execute it at the local level, it is a combination that can't be beat."

"Burger King has been customizing its sandwiches since the company was founded in 1954," said Rob Calderin, vice president of USA Marketing for Burger King, in announcing the program. "Now, we have taken this one step further. In addition to having great tasting food served just the way you like it, customers can have their choice of french fries or onion rings as part of their Value Meals."

COMPETITION

After world leader McDonald's Corp., Burger King was the number two hamburger fast-food chain. It had about 20 percent of the U.S. market, compared to 45 percent for McDonald's. In 1997, emboldened by a series of marketing missteps by McDonald's—including the ill-fated Arch Deluxe rollout and an abortive 55-cents pricing scheme—Burger King launched an all-out product war. In rapid succession it introduced a new burger, the Big King, and reformulated its french fries. Both were supported with major ad campaigns. According to figures from Competitive Media Reporting, McDonald's spent $578 million on advertising in 1997, 3.3 percent less than in 1996. At the same time Burger King boosted its ad spending 17.2 percent, to $423 million.

With consumer research consistently citing "better taste" as the basis for Burger King's appeal, McDonald's in 1998 took steps to improve the quality of its food. Costs to develop, install, and market a new high-tech cooking system were projected at $500 million, with franchise owners picking up at least $300 million of the tab. New toasters were designed to heat buns in just 10 seconds through a combination of radiant and convection heat, 14 seconds faster than the existing system. Holding cabinets with special moisture controls were installed to keep cooked beef and chicken patties hot for up to 20 minutes without drying. In addition, computer software was developed to more accurately project, often within seconds, what items would likely be ordered at specific times of the day.

To accompany the new approach, a new marketing slogan, "Made for You," was developed. It had echoes of Burger King's "Have It Your Way" slogan, something that did not go unnoticed at the headquarters of the number two chain. "We've offered 'Have It Your Way' since 1974," scoffed Burger King spokesperson Kim Miller. "What's the big deal?" Nevertheless, the renewed emphasis on food quality represented a sea change for McDonald's, which had long relied on heat lamps to keep precooked burgers warm.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Burger King had made customizing its sandwiches a hallmark of company philosophy since its founding in 1954 but only began fully promoting the "Have It Your Way" option in 1974. The tag line and its accompanying jingle became synonymous with Burger King in the minds of many consumers.

In 1998 Burger King revived the slogan with the rollout of what was called "the ultimate Have It Your Way meal" at its more than 7,600 restaurants in the United States. Beginning on October 19, Burger King customers could choose french fries or onion rings with any value meal at no extra charge. The side-order option was considered a logical extension of the "Have It Your Way" concept.

To emphasize the connection with the past, the burger giant assigned Matthew Berger, son of the original "Have It Your Way" jingle writer, Dennis Berger, to update the lyrics. "Value meals with rings or fries/Still cost the same with one great price," warbled singers in a new set of radio and television commercials. "You don't have to ask us twice to have it your way." To spearhead the new campaign, Burger King continued using popular ads that mixed food shots and classic rock and soul songs, while also adding more spots showing customers enjoying the chain's food.

As the campaign progressed, Burger King developed a series of new big-budget image- building television ads. In one a drill sergeant berated a group of recruits who must do everything the sergeant's way, except when it came to "having it their way" at Burger King. A second spot blended part of a 1973 ad with new footage to create a striking retro effect. A third ad took a more whimsical approach. Two men wearing 1970s leisure suits walked into a Burger King and ordered a Whopper without pickles. Three women emerged from behind the counter and began singing the "Have It Your Way" song. The ad then cut back to 1998, as the same two men, now balding and graying—but still clothed in polyester—ordered onion rings instead of fries and received the identical serenade.

An even more imaginative execution of the "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" theme was staged in time for the Fourth of July. On the holiday weekend Burger King for the first time aired brand image television spots directed exclusively to children that stressed the longevity and practical application of its customization process. "Burger King has been customizing burgers since being established in 1954 and we plan to pass that core equity message on to a new generation," said Calderin. "These advertisements send that message. As most parents would agree, kids can be fairly choosy eaters. The children's television spot in particular, lets them know they can have it their way at Burger King."

In addition to the television spot, on July 2 Burger King placed a full-page advertisement in USA Today saluting the Declaration of Independence and the Fourth of July. The ad playfully reminded readers that America's founding fathers were the first group to "have it their way." "Burger King and Independence Day have a lot in common," remarked Calderin. "We both adhere to the 'Have It Your Way' principle. This nation's founding fathers set the tone a long time ago by having it their way, and we've followed their lead."

OUTCOME

Burger King's new commercials reprising the "Have It Your Way" jingle may have scored points for nostalgia, but they did not prove popular with consumers. In a survey conducted by USA Today, only 17 percent of participants said that they liked the commercials "a lot." Of those surveyed, people with a household income of $25,000 to $35,000 a year responded most favorably to the ads. Thirty-three percent of African Americans said that they liked the commercials a lot, compared with 14 percent of whites. Perhaps more encouraging for Burger King was the response of young people, a key target for fast-food companies. Respondents between the ages of 25 and 29 were more enthusiastic than other age groups, with 26 percent of them reporting that they liked the commercials a lot. The commercials did receive higher scores for effectiveness, with 23 percent of respondents rating the commercials as "very effective."

Despite the lukewarm response in the survey, Burger King officials remained satisfied with the "When You Have It Your Way, It Just Tastes Better" theme. The company's ad director, Andy Bonaparte, reported that the commercials increased traffic in Burger King restaurants. "Response has been positive so far," he told USA Today. Many corporate image specialists agreed that the retro ads would prove to be a compelling platform for the chain. "'Have it your way' was the biggest idea Burger King ever had, and it's still very relevant today," claimed Allen Adamson of Landor Associates. "No one else has grabbed that positioning, so they're smart to bring that back."

FURTHER READING

Gibson, Richard. "Burger King Seeks New Sizzle." Wall Street Journal, April 14, 1999.

Horovitz, Bruce. "Re-inventing McDonald's." USA Today, February 20, 1998.

Wells, Melanie. "Not Their Way: Burger King Spots Lose with Consumers." USA Today, December 21, 1998.

Robert Schnakenberg

Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities

10 W. 18th St., 9th Fl.
New York, New York 10011
USA
Telephone: (212) 243-3416
Web site: www.sensiblepriorities.org

■■■

MOVE OUR MONEY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1997 Ben Cohen, cofounder of the superpremium ice cream company Ben & Jerry's Homemade Inc., was shocked to learn that Congress had decreased spending on social programs but had increased the Pentagon's defense budget. The following year Cohen founded Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities (BLSP), a nonprofit organization dedicated to transferring 15 percent of the $281 billion defense budget into educational funding. By 1999 he had mobilized more than 500 BLSP members, which included corporate executives, retired generals and admirals, and celebrities. Hoping to make education funding the key issue of the 2000 presidential elections and compel the next U.S. president to transfer money away from defense and into education, BLSP released its "Move Our Money" campaign.

The ad agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos Inc. worked pro bono to create one television spot, one radio spot, and four print ads for the campaign. The radio and television spots featured Jack Shanahan, a retired vice admiral of the U.S. Navy, who explained that even though America had enough nuclear weapons to destroy the world several times over, the U.S. government was still building more. Shanahan explained that the government could allocate a small fraction of its defense budget to help improve America's education system without compromising the country's defense. Print ads created by Hill, Holliday's creative directors Dave Gardiner and Joe Berkeley featured provocative copy, such as "No wonder our bombs are smarter than our students." The campaign ran from December 1999 to January 2000 to target the New Hampshire and Iowa primary elections. It resurfaced in September 2000 to target the general electorate before the presidential election.

The campaign garnered a plethora of ad industry accolades, winning, for example, the Newspaper category at the 2001 International ANDY Awards. According to BLSP, polls tracking public opinion in Des Moines, Iowa, showed that support for shifting 15 percent of the defense budget to education jumped from 45 percent to 72 percent by the Iowa primary's completion. Unfortunately for BLSP, George W. Bush, who won the 2000 presidential election, supported an increase in military spending.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Even though Cohen still served on Ben & Jerry's board of directors in the late 1990s, he was no longer responsible for the business's daily operations. The extra time allowed the entrepreneur to channel his energy into social issues. After he learned of Congress's plans to balance the national budget by cutting back on social programs to increase the Pentagon's defense budget, Cohen rallied support for shifting the country's spending priorities. "Congress had added nine billion more onto the military budget than the Pentagon had even requested," Cohen said in America's Graphic Design Magazine. "And they were going to slip it by in the middle of the night, at the very end of the legislative session."

Ben Cohen, co-founder of Ben & Jerry's ice cream. © SHAUN HEASLEY/REUTERS/CORBIS.

Cohen established BLSP to mobilize America's business leaders, celebrities, and retired military personnel to help shift 15 percent of the Pentagon's defense budget to education funding. In April 1999 BLSP launched a bus tour titled "U Slice the Pie," a campaign that used pie charts to illustrate the federal government's distribution of funds. Inflatable pie charts, cookies with pie charts in their frosting, and ballpoint pens with pie chart banners were dispensed at political rallies during the 20 months preceding the 2000 presidential election. BLSP was bipartisan and existed in a "pre-9/11 world," noted Berkeley.

Even the ex-Navy Republican presidential candidate John McCain, who ran for president in 2000, explained in the Boston Globe, "Look, we've been buying C-130s for 10 years" (referring to the C-130 Hercules, a military cargo plane). "We're going to have a C-130 in every schoolyard in America; there's no need for much of the equipment we are purchasing."

In 1999 Cohen asked Hill, Holliday to create a pro bono campaign for BLSP. "We talked about doing an emotional visual campaign illustrating school kids who were being cheated by shrinking school funding, but when Ben started giving us the facts about Pentagon spending versus education spending, we were astounded," explained Gardiner. "The Pentagon was still stockpiling arms and still spending at Cold War levels even though the Cold War had ended with the fall of the Berlin Wall. It made us think that if we could just find a way to present the facts provocatively, people would have the desired emotional reaction."

TARGET MARKET

According to Duane Peterson, the manager of BLSP, the December 1999 to January 2000 leg of "Move Our Money" targeted those living within the presidential primary election states of New Hampshire and Iowa. Republican and Democratic pollsters conducted a survey for BLSP, which determined that 45 percent of the Iowa electorate was willing to reduce defense spending by 15 percent. According to the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, when the same group was told that a 15 percent cut in defense spending would be used to improve education, health care, and other domestic causes, those supporting the defense cut jumped to 59 percent. The majority of those surveyed also agreed that U.S. allies should pay more for their own defense.

In 1999 Preston Daniels, mayor of Des Moines, told Reuters, "As a lifelong Iowan, I know that we do indeed support sensible priorities, given our state's populist spirit and unique role in the presidential election." He went on to state, "Iowans are patriotic, and I do believe we've got to stand behind our fighting troops."

Once "Move Our Money" rematerialized in September 2000 before the presidential election, its target extended to the entire electorate. Gardiner and Berkeley, the campaign's primary architects, designed the campaign to target people who thought about social issues but were misinformed about how the federal budget was distributed. Andrew Greenblatt, a spokesperson for BLSP, explained the general public's misconception in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. "The public agrees with us," Greenblatt said. "Give them a pie chart and ask them to cut it up the way they think reflects our actual spending, and they give a lot less to the military and a lot more to other pressing domestic needs, including education. When you show them the disparity between what we

PAUL NEWMAN

The actor Paul Newman was one of the celebrities to join Business Leaders for Sensible Priorities (BLSP), a nonprofit organization established in 1998 to decrease defense spending and increase educational funding. Explaining in NEA Today why he joined the organization, Newman stated, "For the cost of one F22 fighter plane—$188 million—we can build 20 new schools. For the $13 billion a year savings we'd gain by reducing nuclear weapons, we could enroll every eligible child in Head Start and cover every uninsured child in America."

and other nations spend on our military, and when you show them the disparity between what we spend on the military and what we spend on other needs, they can't believe it."

COMPETITION

The journalist Mark Weisbrot wrote in the Las Vegas Review-Journal that the Pentagon had historically posed two rationalizations for its exorbitant defense budget. First, defense spending bolstered overall employment and economic growth. Secondly, military research improved the innovation of other industries such as aerospace, computers, and electronics. John W. Douglass, president of the Aerospace Industries Association of America, disputed the "Move Our Money" campaign in the New York Times. "Just to try to say that Americans have two choices, education or Pentagon waste, is just an outrageous oversimplification and unfair statement," Douglass said.

Defense contractors such as the Boeing Company, the Northrop Grumman Corporation, and the Lockheed Martin Corporation never launched advertisement to discredit "Move Our Money." Peterson identified the campaign's main opposition as "latent support for authority, deference to the 'experts,' and the say-nothing approach of some candidates." Some critics blamed the politicians' blasé attitude on the source of their campaign funding. According to Iowa State University's U-Wire, defense contractors spent $32.3 million on political contributions between 1991 and 1997. The world's largest defense contractor, Lockheed Martin, posted more than $25 billion in sales for 2000, a year of relative global peace.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Along with Hill, Holliday's account executive Stever Aubrey, Berkeley and Gardiner developed the advertising strategy that "if we reduce Pentagon spending a little, we can improve education a lot," according to Gardiner. This concept was derived from information originally provided by Cohen. With a working precept for the campaign, Berkeley and Gardiner set out to create provocative black-and-white newspaper ads that would be ready before the January 2000 New Hampshire primary elections. One newspaper ad featured 1,000 tiny illustrations of nuclear bombs that were divided into 20 rows of 50. The ad's headline read, "The first row obliterates civilization. The rest destroy our schools." Another print ad featured a bar graph that displayed the Pentagon's $300 billion defense budget towering over the $33 billion education budget. The ad's headline read, "If only we could blow them away with our S.A.T. scores."

Berkeley, who wrote the campaign's copy, explained, "We wanted candidates to discuss real issues in the upcoming election instead of focusing on character assassination." The campaign's most awarded print ad, "Smarter Bombs," featured the copy "No wonder our bombs are smarter than our students" above the bar graph comparing the defense and education budgets. All print ads included the tagline "Move Our Money."

In late 1999 Cohen performed one of his BLSP demonstrations for the creatives at Hill, Holliday. Cohen dropped one ball bearing (BB) into a cup for every active U.S. nuclear warhead. Berkeley and Gardiner later cast Shanahan to use the same demonstration for a 60-second radio spot. Shanahan began the spot by stating, "I believe we can improve education in America without compromising our national security. To illustrate my point, I have some BBs here. Imagine each BB is a nuclear bomb." After one BB clinked into a metal cup, Shanahan continued, "[that] could destroy Hiroshima 15 times over." After five more clinks, Shanahan explained "[that] wipes out all of Russia. Now, after using those six bombs, this is how many the U.S. has left." The clinking of thousands of BBs followed. Shanahan concluded the spot saying, "By reducing our nuclear weapons, we could save billions of dollars. That money could be educating our kids. Let's get the politicians to talk about the real issues."

Gardiner conceived the campaign's only television spot from his childhood memory of the movie Patton, which starred the actor George C. Scott as General Patton. Berkeley explained, "When [Gardiner] was a kid, he went to see the movie Patton. He was late so the only seats available were in the front row (it was still the era of big movie screens). The movie opens with an extended monologue by General George S. Patton. He

DESTROYING THE WORLD'S CITIES × 10

In 1999 the United States spent 17 times more on defense than any potential adversary. It also maintained 12,000 nuclear warheads, enough to destroy every city in the world 10 times over. Its number of warheads was more than double the number of nuclear weapons maintained by China, Russia, Iran, Syria, North Korea, and Cuba combined. By maintaining a nuclear arsenal capable of destroying the world's cities only four times over, America could save $15 billion a year.

makes a speech to unseen troops. He stands on an enormous stage, dwarfed by a gigantic American flag behind him. It's the kind of image that sticks with you.'' Shanahan starred in the television spot, and much like Scott was in Patton, he was featured on a stage before a large screen. Shanahan then delivered a message that was similar to his radio spot's dialogue about the Pentagon's overstocking of nuclear warheads. Instead of using BBs to vivify America's stockpile of nuclear weapons, the screen behind Shanahan filled with hundreds of nuclear weapons. The commercial ended with the tagline ''Move Our Money.''

OUTCOME

The ''Move Our Money'' campaign created by Hill, Holliday collected a Gold and Bronze Pencil at the 2000 One Show Awards. One print ad earned a Bronze Lion at the 2001 Cannes Lions International Advertising Festival. It also garnered awards (two silver and one bronze) at the Clio Awards. At the 2001 International ANDY Awards, the print ad ''Smarter Bombs'' was the overall winner in the Newspaper category, one of the most prestigious awards in the advertising industry. Poles tracking public opinion in Des Moines, according to BLSP, showed that support for reallocating 15 percent of the defense budget to education jumped from 45 percent to 72 percent by the 2000 Iowa primary's completion.

Unfortunately for BLSP, President-Elect George W. Bush announced plans for increasing military funding before he acceded to office. The terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, propelled Congress to further increase the Pentagon's budget. In 2002 the Defense Department chose Lockheed Martin as the lead contractor for the Joint Strike Fighter program. The contract was worth an estimated value of $200 billion.

FURTHER READING

Borosage, Robert L. ''America Spends Billions Overseas—but Mainly in Military Aid, Not Development.'' Nation, May 8, 2000, p. 37.

Brown, Justin. ''How Many Weapons Is Too Many? The Pentagon, Defending a $300 Billion Budget, Argues That America's Military Superiority Remains Vulnerable.'' Christian Science Monitor, November 4, 1999, p. 1.

Cocco, Marie. ''Ice-Cream Man Asks Congress to Try New Flavor.'' Newsday, September 16, 1999, p. A51.

Isaacs, John. ''Fortifying Fortress America.'' Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, March 1, 1999, p. 24.

Killian, Larita J. ''The Ice Cream Man Cometh: Ben Cohen of Ben and Jerry's Fame Tries to Take a Scoop Out of the Defense Budget.'' Government Executive, July 1, 2000, p. 122.

Merina, Antia. ''Interview: Paul Newman—Working for New Priorities.'' NEA Today, February 1, 2000, p. 19.

Myers, Steven Lee. '' 'Pentagon Maverick' Sounds Alarm.'' New York Times, January 18, 1999, p. 15.

Nyhan, David. ''Bush Aims His Blunderbuss at the Wrong Target.'' Boston Globe, December 5, 1999, p. D4.

Quinones, Eric. ''Attacking Military Excess, from the Executive Office.'' New York Times, June 13, 1999, p. 4.

Rasberry, William. ''Big Guns? We Need Stronger Brains.'' Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 19, 1999, p. A13.

Reidy, Chris. ''Hill Holliday Winds Award.'' Boston Globe, May 13, 2000, p. C1.

Warner, Judy. ''Hill, Holliday Breaks Ads for Bipartisan Cause.'' Adweek, December 13, 1999, p. 5.

Weltman, Eric. ''Military Spending vs Everything Else.'' Dollars & Sense, January 1, 2000, p. 7.

Kevin Teague

Cadbury Adams USA LLC

389 Interpace Parkway
Parsippany, New Jersey 07054
USA
Telephone: (973) 909-2000
Fax: (973) 909-3051
Web site: www.cadburyadams.com

■■■

FOUR OUT OF FIVE DENTISTS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When pharmaceutical company Pfizer Inc. bought its competitor Warner-Lambert Company in 2000, it also acquired its Adams confectionary division and its gum brands Trident, Dentyne, and Chiclets. At the time, sugarless chewing-gum brands were taking the lead in retail gum sales as health-conscious consumers chose alternatives to sugary treats. In 2003 total sales of sugarless gum sales were $578.5 million, while sugared gum achieved $309.3 million in total sales. The top market position that year was held by Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company's brand Extra, with a 26 percent dollar share. Wrigley's Eclipse, with a 16 percent dollar share, held the number two spot. Number three was Pfizer's Trident, with sales of $82.6 million and a 14.8 percent dollar share.

To help Pfizer drive sales of Trident, ad agency J. Walter Thompson created a new marketing campaign for the brand that was based on Trident's 30-year-old claim that it was recommended by four out of five dentists to their patients who chewed gum. The campaign, which was limited to television, put a humorous spin on the answer to the question of why the fifth dentist did not recommend Trident. "Four Out of Five Dentists" spots began airing in January 2003. A month later Pfizer sold its Adams division, including the Trident brand, to London-based company Cadbury Schweppes. Cadbury Schweppes created an American subsidiary called Cadbury Adams and continued the "Four Out of Five Dentists" campaign through early 2005. Specific spending figures for the campaign were unavailable, but a report in Adweek noted that Cadbury spent approximately $5 to $10 million advertising the Trident brand in 2003.

The Trident television spot "Squirrel" earned accolades from the industry, including a mention on Adweek's Best Spots list. Not all comments about the Trident commercials were positive, however. An article in Advertising Age questioned whether consumers under 35 years old—the brand's target audience—would get the reference to the old slogan. Some consumers also complained that the "Ride" spot, which showed the fifth dentist falling off a roller coaster, was in bad taste.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1899 a collaboration between Thomas Adams, Edward Beeman, and William White resulted in the founding of the American Chicle Group and the creation of chewing-gum brands such as Chiclets. In 1916 the company introduced the first gum touted as having oral-hygiene benefits: Dentyne. Following concerns expressed by consumers about the effects of sugar on their dental health, the company introduced Trident, a sugarless

ORIGINATOR OF TRIDENT'S ''FOUR OUT OF FIVE DENTIST'' CLAIM DIES

Longtime advertising executive Henry Kornhauser died on September 14, 2005. He was 73 years old. While working as an account executive for the Trident sugarless gum brand in the mid-1960s, Kornhauser provided the information that led to Trident's marketing claim that ''Four Out of Five Dentists'' recommended the product to their patients who chewed gum. Kornhauser began his career in the mail room of New York–based Katz Agency and eventually became an executive at ad agencies that included the well-known Cunningham & Walsh. During the 1970s he served as president of Dusenberry Ruriani & Kornhauser and then of Clyne Dusenberry and Kornhauser & Calene. Another famous slogan he helped create was Black Flag Roach Motel's ''Roaches check in, but they don't check out.'' gum, in 1964. Warner-Lambert Company, a pharmaceutical manufacturer, acquired the American Chicle Group in 1962; three decades later Warner-Lambert changed the name of its U.S. confectionary division from American Chicle Group to Adams.

In 2000, following a three-month takeover battle, pharmaceutical giant Pfizer bought the Warner-Lambert Company for $90 billion. Referring to the Adams segment as a ''noncore'' business, Pfizer sold it to Cadbury Schweppes in February 2003 for $4.2 billion. Just weeks prior to the sale, Pfizer launched Trident gum's ''Four Out of Five Dentists'' campaign. After the acquisition Cadbury Adams USA LLC was created as a U.S. subsidiary of London-based Cadbury Schweppes. Among the new subsidiary's products were the gum brands Chiclets, Dentyne, and Trident, the mint brands Clorets and Certs, and Halls cough drops. Cadbury Adams also handled the historical gum brands that carried the names of American Chicle Group's founders Thomas Adams and Edward Beeman: Adams Blackjack and Beeman's. Despite the change in company ownership, the ''Four Out of Five Dentists'' campaign for Trident gum was continued by Cadbury Adams through March 2005.

TARGET MARKET

Trident gum's ''Four Out of Five Dentists'' campaign targeted consumers in the 18- to 34-year-old demographic. According to the company, this group linked Trident gum with dental-health benefits (because it was sugarless it did not cause cavities) but often did not associate it with other health issues. The purpose of the new campaign was to stress the relevance of Trident sugarless gum in consumers' lives, not only as a means of preventing cavities but also to help with other health concerns. Based on information released by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC), 44 million Americans were considered obese in 2001, and 16.7 million were diagnosed with diabetes that year. Further, in 2003 the National Center for Health Statistics reported that the rate of obesity in kids aged 6 to 11 years old had quadrupled in the past 25 years. Research indicated that increased consumption of sugar by Americans of all ages was a contributing factor to the rising rate of obesity and related health complications such as diabetes.

COMPETITION

Since the introduction of its Juicy Fruit chewing gum in 1893, the Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company had held the top spot in sales of gum in the United States. But the company had been slow to jump into the sugarless-gum market. That changed in 1984, when Wrigley introduced its first sugarless brand, Extra, which by 1989 had become the country's best-selling sugar-free gum. It added Eclipse sugarless gum to its U.S. product line in 1999. Playing on the success of Extra and the growing popularity of sugarless gum, in 2001 Wrigley introduced another such product, Orbit, to American consumers. In 2003 the Extra brand held the number one spot with U.S. sales of $141 million. That year Eclipse was the number two sugarless gum, and Orbit followed in the number five spot with sales of $60.9 million. To help boost Orbit's sales and push it closer to the number three brand, Cadbury Adams' Trident, Wrigley launched an advertising campaign that poked fun at its competitor. The campaign, which began in February 2003, compared Orbit to ''Brand T'' gum, a product that resembled competitor Trident. Orbit advertisements also made fun of Trident's ''Four out of five dentists recommend'' claim. The Orbit ads featured an attractive spokeswoman with a British accent who showed what happened when a construction worker switched from ''Brand T'' to Orbit. After giving the man a kiss, the spokeswoman said, ''Orbit cleans another dirty mouth. That's why four out of five construction workers prefer the good clean feeling of Orbit, no matter what.''

Although the Hershey Company was best known for chocolate confections, such as its famous Hershey's Kisses, in 2000 the iconic chocolatier joined the gum market with the acquisition of Nabisco Holdings Corp.'s gum and mint business. The $135 million deal included Nabisco's Ice Breaker sugarless gum. In 2002 it appeared that Hershey itself would be sold, with potential buyers that included competitors Cadbury Schweppes and Wrigley. In late 2002 Hershey rejected a $12 billion bid made by Wrigley, and changes to the controlling Hershey Trust Board membership resulted in the company no longer being for sale. To enhance its gum brand and reach a wider segment of consumers, in 2002 Hershey expanded its Ice Breaker brand to include Unleashed, which targeted Generation Y youths, or kids 16 to 24 years old. Ice Breaker added a breath-freshening flavor, Spearmint, in 2003. The brand was ranked number six in 2003, behind Wrigley's Orbit.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2003 Adams, owned at the time by pharmaceutical company Pfizer, decided to break into the club of Super Bowl advertisers with a commercial for its Trident brand chewing gum. The company's ad agency, J. Walter Thompson, created a television spot that would stand out among the Super Bowl commercials that promoted everything from beer and soft drinks to tax preparers and athletic shoes. J. Walter Thompson created a spot that played on Trident's long-running tagline, ''Four out of five dentists recommend.'' It used humor to answer the question that was raised by the tagline: Why did dentist number five not recommend the gum to his or her patients? The campaign was limited to television and included three spots.

The first of the three spots, which made its debut during Super Bowl XXXVII, was titled ''Squirrel.'' It depicted a panel of five dentists sitting at a table, while a voice-over asked, ''Four out of five dentists surveyed recommend Trident for patients who chew gum. But what about the fifth dentist?'' The camera focused on the first four dentists as each one responded, ''Yes.'' As the fifth dentist prepared to answer the question, a squirrel that had made its way into the room through an open window ran up the hapless dentist's pant leg. There was a loud crunching noise as the squirrel chomped onto one of the dentist's body parts, which was followed by the man screaming in pain, ''No.'' The voice-over concluded: ''One thing's for sure. Long-lasting Trident is good for teeth.''

A second television spot was released in mid-January as a follow-up to the Super Bowl spot. Titled ''Fly,'' it showed the panel of dentists again sitting at a table, but in front of each was a box with two buttons, one green and labeled ''Yes,'' and one red and labeled ''No.'' The voice-over asked the same question about the fifth dentist as in the ''Squirrel'' spot, but rather than verbally responding ''Yes'' to the question, each of the first four dentists pressed the green button, and the word ''Yes'' lit up. As the fifth dentist prepared to respond by pressing one of the buttons, a fly buzzed into the room and landed on his forehead. The dentist sitting beside him smacked the fly with a clipboard, knocking dentist number five unconscious; he fell forward, landing on the red button and lighting up the word ''No.'' The voice-over again concluded with the statement ''There are many theories, but one thing's for sure. Long-lasting Trident is good for teeth.''

The final spot, ''Ride,'' was created to support the launch of Trident's Cool Rush flavor variety, which was introduced in 2003. In this commercial the five dentists were shown riding a roller coaster at an amusement park. Following the same format used in the ''Squirrel'' and ''Fly'' commercials, before the unfortunate fifth dentist could respond to the question, the safety bar on his roller coaster car failed to swing all the way around, and he toppled out of the seat when the ride inverted.

OUTCOME

The humor of the spots, particularly ''Squirrel,'' appealed to both consumers and the advertising industry. The spot earned recognition as one of Adweek magazine's 50 Best Spots of 2003. Finally providing an answer to the long-running question of why the fifth dentist did not recommend Trident to patients who chewed gum added to the interest. In his ratings of the Super Bowl commercials, ESPN.com columnist Eric Neel gave the ''Squirrel'' spot an Honorable Mention. On the other hand, while*Advertising Age* columnist Bob Garfield described the spot as ''cute,'' he also voiced doubts about the effectiveness of the campaign's central joke: ''Will anyone under 35 remember the old 'four-out-of-five dentists' claim?'' Some consumers criticized the ''Ride'' spot, stating that it was in bad taste given the number of real amusement-park accidents related to roller coasters. The campaign's television spots ran through March 2005. In May of that year Trident launched a new campaign, ''Little Mouth,'' which featured a set of animated false teeth caught in dangerous situations, such as falling into a cup of coffee and nearly drowning. In each spot the teeth were rescued by a pack of Trident sugarless gum, and the new tagline stated, ''A mouth's best friend.''

FURTHER READING

''Adams Acquisition Gives Cadbury Schweppes New Muscle.'' MMR, February 10, 2003.

Anderson, Mae. ''JWT's Trident Smiles in Print, Not TV.'' Adweek, May 25, 2004.

Beirne, Mike. ''Category Wars: Showdown in Sugar-Free Gum.'' Adweek, October 27, 2003.

"Best Spots of the Year: 2003." Adweek, February 9, 2004.

Fuhrman, Elizabeth. "Sugar-Free Sizzles: Gums Find Success with Sugar-Free and Line Extensions." Candy Industry, October 1, 2003.

Garfield, Bob. "Garfield's Super Bowl Review: Ads that Sell? Super." Advertising Age, January 27, 2003.

"Gum Offers More than Chewing." MMR, May 31, 2004.

"Hershey to Acquire Nabisco's Gum, Mints Business." Professional Candy Buyer, November 1, 2000.

"Ice Breakers Unleashed." Confectioner, December 12, 2002.

Kirk, Jim. "Wrigley Rolls Out Red Gumball to Boost Blue Extra." Chicago Tribune, March 28, 2003.

———. "Wrigley's Orbit Ads Launch Jabs at Gum Rival." Chicago Tribune, February 27, 2003.

Pennington, Gail. "Animals Rule the Super Ads." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 26, 2003.

"Trident's 'Four Out of Five Dentists' Claim to Fame to Air on Super Bowl XXXVII." Business Wire, January 22, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages

5301 Legacy Drive
Plano, Texas 75024
USA
Telephone: (972) 673-7000
Fax: (972) 673-7980
Web site: www.cadburyschweppes.com www.snapple.com

■■■

BOTTLES PERSONIFIED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the 1990s Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages' subsidiary Snapple Beverage Corporation, long known for its quirky advertising, underwent a series of ownership changes that led to the brand losing its focus. In 2002 the company and its advertising agency, Deutsch New York, attempted to recapture the amateurish feel of the television commercials that had made Snapple a major success story of the early 1990s. Deutsch created the "Bottles Personified" television spots, in which Snapple bottles wearing wigs, clothes, and accessories were animated using the crudest of puppetry techniques.

The campaign, reported to be budgeted at $40 million, was introduced with six spots, including the well-regarded "House Party," in which a teenage Snapple-bottle daughter throwing a wild party was caught by her parents. Customers became involved by submitting their ideas for future commercials in the "What's Your Story" contest. The campaign was also supported by a mobile barbershop that gave out free haircuts in the styles worn by the Snapple-bottle stars. New TV spots, which featured Snapple employees introducing the animated bottles, followed in 2004.

The "Bottles Personified" campaign was popular enough to run for more than two years, but it never registered with the younger demographic to the extent that the marketers had hoped. Snapple underwent a marketing shakeup; different leadership was brought in, and Deutsch was replaced by a new ad agency in May 2004, at which point the "Bottles Personified" campaign came to an end.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Snapple, which essentially invented the alternative-beverage category, enjoyed explosive growth in the early 1990s, when it was the fastest-growing beverage company in the world. Much of its success was attributed to its quirky, almost amateurish advertising, which consumers found endearing. Beginning in 1991 Snapple commercials featured the spokesperson Wendy the Snapple Lady, a straight-talking native New Yorker. In 1994 Quaker Oats bought the brand for $1.7 billion, but it struggled under corporate ownership, and Snapple lost its edge. After three years Quaker Oats gave up on Snapple and unloaded it for just $300 million. The new owner, Triarc, reestablished the zaniness of the brand, bringing back the Snapple Lady in commercials. In three years Triarc was able to regain lost sales and cashed in by selling Snapple to Cadbury Schweppes for $1.45 billion.

Snapple's new corporate parent continued to fund the "Little Fruits" advertising campaign begun under Triarc. In these television spots Snapple bottles were dressed in fruit costumes. Their activities moved from innocent high jinks to more adult themes such as parent fruits trying to tell teen fruits about sex. According to Vivian Manning-Schaffel writing for Brandchannel.com, ''Snapple's research showed that the earlier 'Little Fruits' ads appealed to kids and folks in their 40s, but those in the in-between ages were more interested in the newer, racier spots. Taking this into consideration, the brand came up with an idea to raise the cool quotient of Snapple to teenagers through 34-year-olds by vamping up the brand image.'' The result was the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign, developed by ad agency Deutsch New York.

TARGET MARKET

While Snapple wanted to appeal to all potential customers, especially its core 25- to 44-year-old market, the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign was especially geared toward ''Generation Y,'' 18- to 24-year-olds who were not as familiar with Snapple's reputation as a pioneer of alternative beverages. It was also an important demographic because on a per-capita basis young people consumed more beverages than any other age group. Moreover, they could be persuaded to try a new product. Maura Mottolese, Snapple's vice president of marketing, told Kate MacArthur of Advertising Age, ''Young beverage consumers tend to be flavor explorers, so they're not as loyal as older consumers.'' In order to make the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign more appealing to this demographic, many of the television spots played on the theme of teenage rebellion. Snapple also partnered with Viacom, a media company that enjoyed a strong presence with the target age group. Viacom's MTV unit produced the first wave of spots, which were subsequently shown on Viacom television channels, including the UPN network and the cable channels MTX, MTV2, BET, VH1, Nick at Nite, CMT, and TNN. According to Steve Jarmon, Snapple's vice president of corporate communications, the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign engaged ''younger viewers without alienating our loyal customers. It seems to appeal to both older and younger Snapple drinkers.''

COMPETITION

Snapple had to contend with a crowded beverage category, with scores of companies spending millions to advertise their products. In the carbonated category the likes of Coca-Cola and Pepsi regularly introduced new products, such as Vanilla Coke and Pepsi Twist. Not only did Coke and Pepsi have hefty advertising budgets to support their products, but they also enjoyed the benefits of a far-flung distribution network to make their products ubiquitous in the marketplace. They were also able to leverage these advantages in noncarbonated beverages. In the water category Pepsi's Aquafina and Coca-Cola's Dasani occupied two of the top three spots. They also offered direct competition to Snapple, in particular in the form of Coke's Nestea product and Pepsi's Lipton Brisk, the latter the category leader in the iced-tea segment. Snapple battled with AriZona Beverages for second place among teas and vied for sales with a multitude of private-label iced-tea brands. Snapple's fruit drinks also faced competition from juice makers such as Ocean Spray Cranberries, Inc., and Minute Maid (which was owned by Coca-Cola).

BARTENDER, ANOTHER SNAPPLE

The Snapple brand was developed by Unadulterated Food Products, Inc., a company founded in Brooklyn in the early 1970s to sell pure fruit juices to area health-food stores. The company introduced a carbonated apple juice in 1978, calling it ''Snapple,'' after buying the rights to the name for $500. The product got off to a surprising start, with a number of distributors calling up to request the product. Only when tops started to pop off the bottles in the warehouse did the company realize that the juice had been fermenting and that it had been unintentionally selling hard cider.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Explaining the genesis of the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign (also referred to as ''Real Experiences'' in the early days of the campaign, ''Snapple was looking to go back to [the brand's original] quirky, homemade feeling,'' David Rosen, a Deutsch assistant creative director, told Sarah Woodward of Shoot, ''We wanted to make advertising that looked as if two guys who worked at Snapple had to create the campaign, and did it by cutting wigs off Barbie dolls and gluing them on the bottles.'' The six spots in the initial wave of the campaign were shot in three days at Occidental Studios, Hollywood, and edited into 5-, 10-, 15-, and 20-second versions, which the marketers hoped would help the spots stand out in a television landscape dominated by 30-second spots. In addition, they hoped that, by giving viewers less, they would make viewers eager to see more of the animated bottles. While the brevity of the spots made editing somewhat difficult, the use of the Snapple bottles as actors allowed the directors to focus on the story. Codirector Jonathan Dayton explained to Woodward, ''Every shot was a product shot. So we could just concentrate on the story and not worry about the gratuitous product placement.'' To enhance the amateur feel, the commercials were shot on digital video rather than film.

The first six spots were ''Skateboard,'' ''Boy Band,'' ''Shower,'' ''UFO,'' ''Breakdance,'' and ''House Party.'' Versions were also developed for print advertising. The spots began airing on April 15, 2002. Especially well received was ''House Party.'' In this commercial Snapple bottles that were dressed like parents—Dad wore a necktie, Mom a string of beads—returned home to find that their house had been trashed by their daughter's friends. The pigtail-wearing daughter was caught kissing a Snapple bottle outfitted as a punk. Crude puppetry made her appear to be quaking with fear when she saw her parents. Instead of Snapple's usual tagline, ''Made from the best stuff on earth,'' ''House Party'' and the other spots simply closed with the pop of a vacuum-sealed bottle being opened. Examples of other spots were ''Shower,'' in which a bottle dressed as a female gym teacher caught boy bottles peeping into the girls' shower, and ''Skateboard,'' which showed a Snapple-bottle skateboarder wiping out on a trick and ending up in the hospital.

Building on the successful launch of the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign, Snapple conducted the two-month, 13-city ''Dye Hard Snapple Tour,'' which was developed to reach the 18- to 24-year-old target audience. A mobile barbershop offered free alternative hairstyles, similar to the Mohawks and mullets adorning the Snapple bottles in the television spots. Dye jobs inspired by Snapple flavors were also available. Free bottles of Snapple's newest flavors were handed out along with T-shirts and bandanas. The tour was not only well received by consumers but also garnered a good deal of media attention, appearing on some 30 television programs and accounting for more than two hours of coverage.

Another supporting element of the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign was the ''What's Your Story?'' contest, which allowed customers to submit their ideas for a new commercial. Of the more than 1,400 entries, the one chosen, by UCLA freshman C.J. Yu, depicted a smoky concert venue where a Snapple bottle dove off the stage for some crowd surfing, only to land on the floor with a thud. The contest was held again throughout 2002, resulting in more than 25,000 entries.

In April 2003, a year after the campaign broke, Snapple offered six more television spots, including the grand prize winner of the ''What's Your Story'' promotion, ''Bouncing Car,'' which featured a hydraulic car that ejected the Snapple-bottle driver instead of impressing the Snapple girls on the sidewalk; ''Pamplona,'' in which Snapple bottles ran with the legendary bulls—really guinea pigs with horns; and ''Yard Sale,'' in which a Snapple bottle got in trouble with his mother when he tried to buy a stereo. The last spot also served as a springboard for a ''Yard Sale'' promotion, in which customers could exchange bottle caps for prizes at yard-sale-themed promotional events held in major cities. Other elements added to the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign included fortune-cookie messages, air banners flown over beaches and other summer spots, and advertisements on pizza boxes and deli bags.

The ''Bottles Personified'' campaign continued in 2004 with four 30-second television spots and two 15-second spots. In this execution, however, the dressed-up bottles were joined by employee costars who narrated the bottles' ''epics.'' For example, one spot supported the introduction of a new flavor, Super Sour Lemonade, with a bottle dressed up like a superhero. A part of this final phase of the campaign was a 12-week summer sweepstakes called Snaffle. During this time trivia was printed on the Snapple caps, and each week four winning caps were announced; holders of all four caps won a weekly grand prize.

OUTCOME

While Snapple rolled out the final spots in the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign, the company's marketing team was being restructured by Cadbury. Overall the commercials were well received. In April 2002 the influential advertising magazine Adweek named ''House Party'' one of its ''Best Spots.'' Often difficult to please, Advertising Age critic Bob Garfield called the spots ''delightful'' and ''hilarious.'' Snapple also saw sales improve in 2002, but a year later, at a time when noncarbonated beverages enjoyed a boom, Snapple experienced a 4 percent drop in sales.

In 2004 Snapple's vice president of marketing, Maura Mottolese, admitted to Kate MacArthur of Advertising Age that the ''Bottles Personified'' campaign had done a good job connecting with its core 25- to 44-year-old consumers but that Snapple was still ''trying to increase [its] relevance with 18- to 24-year-olds.'' Deutsch would run out of chances to address that problem, however. In May 2004 Cadbury replaced the agency, giving the Snapple account to Cliff Freeman and Partners. The newly appointed agency had previously worked with Randy Gier, the new chief marketing officer for Cadbury's American Beverages division, which included Snapple. A new campaign was soon developed that ditched the animated bottles for a reprise of Snapple's ''real people'' approach that had worked so well in the early 1990s, including the return of the popular spokesperson Wendy. Writing for Adweek, Kathleen Sampey and Kenneth Hein quoted one Snapple bottler who liked the new spots that were unveiled at a bottlers' meeting in October 2005. The writers added, ''The bottler was appreciative of the changes, saying the personified bottles work from Deutsch was expected to be 'our Budweiser frogs. They weren't.'"

FURTHER READING

"Creative Best Spots: April." Adweek, May 13, 2002, p. 28.

Flass, Rebecca. "Metal and Glass." Adweek (eastern ed.), June 3, 2004, p. 14.

Garfield, Bob. "New Snapple Ads Hold Genius, and a Lesson for Kevin Costner." Advertising Age, May 6, 2002, p. 63.

Hein, Kenneth. "Snapple to Drinkers: We Dye Harder." Brandweek, December 9, 2002, p. 18.

———. "Surging Snapple Orders $12M Refill for Bottle Ads." Brandweek, February 2, 2004, p. 5.

MacArthur, Kate. "Snapple Appeals to Gen Y to Boost Sales." Advertising Age, May 10, 2004, p. 4.

Manning-Schaffel, Vivian. "Snapple—The Best Stuff." Brandchannel.com, January 20, 2003. Available from <http://www.brandchannel.com/print_page.asp?ar_id=107&section=profile>

Sampey, Kathleen, and Kenneth Hein. "Cliff Freeman Brings Back Wendy the Snapple Lady." Adweek, October 25, 2004, p. 9.

Woodward, Sarah. "The Skateboarding Snapple Bottle, and Other Tales." Shoot, April 26, 2002, p. 16.

Ed Dinger

GO FOR ZERO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Royal Crown Company, which introduced Diet Rite in 1958, prided itself on being a pioneer of the soft-drink industry. Not only was Diet Rite the world's first diet carbonated soft drink (CSD), but it was also later the first CSD made with Splenda brand sweetener, a low-calorie sugar substitute extracted from sucrose. Diet Rite was purchased by Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages in 2000. Later that year a reformulated Diet Rite was released that had no carbohydrates, calories, caffeine, sugar, or sodium. The Coca-Cola Company's Diet Coke and PepsiCo, Inc.'s Diet Pepsi were Diet Rite's fiercest competitors, but neither offered a zero-calorie CSD made with Splenda, which was deemed a healthier sugar substitute than the commonly used sweetener aspartame. Hoping to increase its market share by 10 percent, Cadbury released its Diet Rite "Go For Zero" campaign.

The $8 million campaign was created by the advertising agency Brand Buzz and the public-relations firm Cohn & Wolfe. The first television commercial aired in August 2004. Other media included radio advertisements and a cross-promotion with the Zero Gravity Corporation (or ZERO-G), the world's first provider of flights that allowed the public to experience weightlessness. According to a Brand Buzz spokesperson the campaign was intended to brand Diet Rite on what the agency called a "zero messaging platform" by touting the drink's "zero carbs, zero calories, zero caffeine, zero sugar, and zero sodium" recipe. The campaign's first 30-second spot featured computer-generated zeros bubbling from each of Diet Rite's seven flavors.

Diet Rite's market share within diet CSDs increased by 46 percent during the campaign, and its entire CSD market share grew 59 percent. The campaign also garnered a Bronze EFFIE Award in the Beverages/Carbonated category in 2005. Nonalcoholic-beverage-industry critics praised the campaign for its ability to gain market share for the Diet Rite brand within an industry dominated by such titans as Coke and Pepsi, who spent $25 million to $50 million advertising their diet CSDs in 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The soft-drink industry changed forever after Royal Crown Company introduced the world's first diet CSD, Diet Rite, in 1958. Royal Crown had originally created Diet Rite as a specialty drink, but after it excelled in a small test market, the company released Diet Rite nationwide under the tagline "Feel All Right." In 1962 it was the fourth-highest-selling cola in America. The sales of Royal Crown brands, such as RC Cola and Diet Rite, receded over the following decades until Cadbury Schweppes, the owner of CSD brands Seven Up and Dr Pepper, purchased Royal Crown in 2000. Although Diet Rite was the first calorie-free soft drink to use Splenda, Cadbury ran little Diet Rite advertising prior to "Go For Zero." Diet Rite television commercials had not aired since 1996. Critics such as Stephanie Thompson of Advertising Age referred to Diet Rite as an "out-of-vogue" soft drink.

Diet Rite's outlook improved in 2003 after the main website for the Atkins diet, a low-carbohydrate, high-protein weight-loss program, suggested Diet Rite over other diet CSDs. Not only did the Atkins website suggest drinking Diet Rite, but it also recommended using Diet Rite in its chicken marinade recipes. According to Beverage Digest editor John Sicher, the Atkins endorsement helped Diet Rite's sales jump 21 percent while the entire soft drink industry only grew 0.6 percent.

The Atkins website recommended food products that used the sugar substitute Splenda, which was deemed healthier than aspartame, a chemical that some scientists believed incited brain cancer. John Stanton, professor of food marketing at Saint Joseph's University in Philadelphia, told Advertising Age that the success of the Atkins diet had made previously unpopular brands such as Diet Rite popular again and had opened a window of opportunity for all other products containing Splenda. As people on the Atkins diet turned to Diet Rite in 2003, Cadbury began formulating a campaign that would expand its burgeoning base of health-conscious consumers.

TARGET MARKET

"Go For Zero" targeted what Brand Buzz dubbed "Label-Reading Wellness Women" between the ages of 35 and 49. Brand Buzz understood this target as a health- and diet-conscious population of females who balanced work, family, and other responsibilities. Aware that many women read the labels on their diet soft drinks, Brand Buzz designed the campaign to tout Diet Rite as the only Splenda CSD without calories. Coca-Cola produced a Splenda soft drink titled C2, and Pepsi produced the Splenda drink Pepsi Edge, but both combined Splenda with sugar, which resulted in an estimated 70 calories per 12-ounce can. Diet Rite's "zero messaging platform" hoped to attract all women pursuing a healthier diet, whether it was "zero-sugar" for Diabetes, "zero-sodium" for high blood pressure, or "zero-calories" for weight loss.

"We know that now more than ever people are looking for products that meet their needs for a health-conscious lifestyle," Tony Jacobs, vice president of marketing for Diet Rite at the company's Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverage unit, was quoted in the Wall Street Journal. According to Jacobs, at the beginning of 2004 women made up 40 to 60 percent of Diet Rite's consumer base. Alongside the campaign's television spots, radio advertisements, and cross-promotion with ZERO-G, "Go For Zero" targeted "Label-Reading Wellness Women" by sponsoring Oprah Winfrey's Live Your Best Life Tour, a three-city event during which Winfrey hosted seminars about personal growth. Diet Rite also sponsored the American Diabetes Association and Speaking of Women's Health, an organization encouraging women to eat healthier and exercise more.

COMPETITION

C2, made by Coca-Cola, and Pepsi Edge were Diet Rite's largest competitors in mid-2004. Both combined Splenda with high-fructose corn syrup to create diet CSDs that tasted much like their non-diet counterparts, but with half the calories. In 2004 Coca-Cola launched a $50 million-plus marketing campaign to announce C2 with commercials featuring the Rolling Stones song "You Can't Always Get What You Want" and the Queen song "I Want to Break Free." Created by Berlin Cameron/Red Cell, an ad agency based in New York, the spots featured the tagline "Half the carbs. Half the cals. All the great taste." More than 12 million samples of C2 were distributed nationwide.

ASPARTAME

Many diet soft drinks, including Diet Coke and Diet Pepsi, contained a sugar-substitute called aspartame, a sweetener made from the combination of two building blocks of protein. Although the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approved aspartame in 1981, public-interest groups such as the Community Nutrition Institute and the Center for Science in the Public Interest petitioned the FDA for another ruling. John Olney of Washington University in Saint Louis fanned the controversy when he released a medical study in 1996 that showed that brain cancer rates had jumped 10 percent in the United States since aspartame's approved by the FDA. In an earlier study laboratory rats that were fed aspartame also formed a significantly higher number of brain tumors. Advocates for aspartame claimed that the sugar-substitute had been proven safe in more than 200 laboratory tests and that aspartame was safe because it was composed of chemicals commonly found in meat, fish, cheese, eggs, and milk.

The $25 million Pepsi Edge campaign was also released in 2004, under the tagline "With full flavor and 50 percent less sugar and carbs, why not?" The campaign was created by advertising agency BBDO New York. Commercials featured normal men completing tasks while sportscasters Stuart Scott of ESPN's show SportsCenter and Rich Eisen of the NFL Network commented on them. Humorous print ads congratulated people on such prosaic accomplishments as wearing socks. The print's copy stated, "This moment deserves a Pepsi Edge."

Pepsi and Coca-Cola walked a fine line with their advertising messages. They could not advertise Pepsi Edge or C2 as aspartame-free CSDs without degrading their aspartame-laden brands, such as Diet Pepsi and Diet Coke. The similar taglines for Pepsi and Coca-Cola drew criticism from analysts. "These companies are selling the same product. What are they doing to differentiate themselves?" Tom Pirko, president of BevMark, a beverage-industry consulting firm, said to Advertising Age. "They're virtually indistinguishable."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The underlying message behind Diet Rite's $8 million "Go For Zero" campaign was that Diet Rite tasted just as good as CSDs made with high-fructose corn syrup, but that only Diet Rite contained "zero carbs, zero calories, zero caffeine, zero sugar, and zero sodium." Initially the campaign aired one television spot, which featured effervescent zeros rising from Diet Rite's seven flavors: cola, white grape, tangerine, red raspberry, golden peach, black cherry, and kiwi strawberry. The commercial's computer-animated zeros were created by Digital Domain, a special-effects company that had worked on such movies as Apollo 13 and Titanic. Hoping to target "Label-Reading Wellness Women," Cadbury spent $2.7 million to air the commercial across cable networks such as TLC, Lifetime, HGTV, and the Food Network. These channels were selected based on their programming, which Brand Buzz believed resonated with the target's dietary and fitness interests. To reach a wider audience an additional $1.8 million was spent to release the commercial across network stations.

Cadbury expanded Diet Rite's "zero messaging platform" by partnering with ZERO-G, the world's first provider of zero-gravity flights for the public. In September 2004 Diet Rite and ZERO-G hosted "Go For Zero" promotions in Newark, Los Angeles, Dallas, Detroit, Atlanta, and Fort Lauderdale, where select consumers could experience weightlessness inside a modified Boeing 727-200. By descending at a speed that counteracted Earth's gravitational pull, the plane, called G-Force One, created a zero-gravity environment within its fuselage. ZERO-G typically charged $3,000 per flight, but consumers chosen for the promotion flew for free. ZERO-G's weightlessness technique was the same used by National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to prepare future astronauts for the weightlessness of space travel.

Cadbury hired the entertainment-marketing company EMCI to set up the ZERO-G promotion. "We believe this event will capture the imagination of America and break through all of the low carb clutter with a clear and powerful statement for Diet Rite," Jay Coleman, CEO of EMCI, told the PR Newswire. Spokespeople for Cadbury pushed the Diet Rite brand's "zero messaging platform" throughout the September event. Randy Gier, executive vice president and chief marketing officer of Cadbury Schweppes Americas Beverages, explained to the PR Newswire, "This new partnership with ZERO-G is a way for us to bring to the excitement of zero to life and to consumers around the country." Some critics frowned on ZERO-G's decision to endorse Diet Rite. Gary Ruskin, the head of Commercial Alert, a nonprofit watchdog group against intrusive advertisement, remarked in the New York Times about the partnership, "It's the creep of advertising into every nook and cranny of our lives and culture and even space."

OUTCOME

In 2005 "Go For Zero" earned Cadbury and Buzz Brand a Bronze EFFIE Award in the Carbonated Beverages category. During the campaign Diet Rite's market share catapulted 46 percent, far surpassing the original goal of a 10 percent increase. Amongst all CSDs, diet and non-diet, Diet Rite's market share increased 59 percent. Cadbury executives had also hoped "Go For Zero" would increase Diet Rite's baseline sales volume by 5 percent during the campaign's advertising period; it exceeded these expectations by increasing 11.4 percent even though the CSD industry was growing at a much slower rate.

Cadbury sales suggested that the success of "Go For Zero" did not just result from the endorsement from the Atkins diet. During the month of August, when the sole "Go For Zero" television spot aired, Diet Rite sold 10 percent more cases than the month before or the October afterward. Analysts attributed the success to Diet Rite's clear "zero messaging platform," while larger competitors such as C2 and Pepsi Edge fumbled with their advertising messages. Also, it became apparent that dieters wanted CSDs without any calories instead of CSDs with just half of the calories.

FURTHER READING

Berk, Christina Cheddar. "Cadbury Adds to Diet Rite Promotion." Wall Street Journal, July 14, 2004, p. B2C.

Elliott, Stuart. "Diet Rite's Promotion Shakes out Too Many Names for Promised Ad." USA Today, July 11, 1988, p. 2B.

Frank, John. "Diet Rite Reaches Out to Health Media." PR Week US, March 6, 2000, p. 9.

Fromm, Emily. "Soda-Pop Culture." Adweek (eastern ed.), February 21, 2000, p. 5.

Kirk, Jim. "Royal Crown Pops Top on New Diet Rite Recipe." Chicago Sun-Times, March 21, 1997, p. 49.

Kramer, Louise. "Healthy Cola? Diet Rite Tries Unusual Strategy." Advertising Age, October 25, 1999, p. 1.

MacArthur, Kate. "Pepsi's Edge, Coke's C2 Get Flat Reception; Brands Seen as 'Indistinguishable.'" Advertising Age, July 15, 2004, p. 3.

Schwartz, John. "Going to the Moon, Sponsored By M&M's." New York Times, October 10, 2004, p. 12.

Theodore, Sarah. "Diet Rite Goes Aspartame-Free." Beverage Industry, December 1, 1999, p. 19.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Low Carb Haute Cuisine." Advertising Age, July 12, 2004, p. 1.

Toops, Diane. "Old Favorite Diet Rite Reinvents Itself." Food Processing, March 1, 2003, p. 18.

Vaughn, Glenn. "The Incredible Rise and Fall of Diet Rite." Georgia Trend, June 1, 1995, p. 33.

Kevin Teague

California Department of Health Services, Tobacco Control Section

MS 7206
PO Box 997413
Sacramento, California 95899-7413
USA
Telephone: (916) 449-5000
Web site: www.dhs.ca.gov/tobacco

■■■

ANTITOBACCO CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

For decades tobacco manufacturers had glamorized smoking through widespread marketing campaigns and promotions, but as the negative health effects of such behavior grew increasingly clear toward the end of the twentieth century, health officials in the United States sought to educate the public about the ills of tobacco. California was the first to organize a statewide advertising and education effort, one that was funded by smokers themselves through a state-legislated cigarette tax. Between 1989, when the campaign first began, and 1997, California spent almost $116 million on antitobacco advertising. Although this was a significant amount, it paled in comparison to the ad budgets of leading tobacco makers, which spent several billion dollars a year on advertising.

In 1997 the California Department of Health Services (CDHS) stepped up its efforts in the antitobacco battle by launching an estimated $67 million, three-year advertising campaign designed to reduce and prevent smoking among youths and adults. The aggressive campaign, developed by Asher & Partners (Asher/Gould Advertising, Inc., until late 1997) of Los Angeles, consisted of television, radio, and print advertising, including billboard ads. Ads geared toward minorities and specific ethnic groups were also included in the campaign. These were created by specialty agencies Imada Wong Communications Group Inc., Valdes Zacky and Associates Inc., and Carol H. Williams Advertising.

The following year, in June 1998, the second phase of the three-year effort was launched. The approximately $22 million campaign again consisted of an extensive series of print, television, and radio ads that focused on bringing to light the manipulative marketing practices of the tobacco industry, the dangers of secondhand smoke, and the link between smoking and impotency. This last topic was the focus of one of the best-known television spots of the campaign, ''Gala Event,'' which suggested to the male audience that smoking could adversely affect their sex lives. The campaign also focused on the increasing popularity of cigars and on the smoke-free bar and restaurant policy that was implemented in the state at the beginning of 1998. Kim Belsh, the director of California's DHS, explained the overall goal of the campaign in an interview with Daniel Zwerdling of National Public Radio, stating that ''the whole focus of our media campaign is really to de-normalize tobacco use. And de-normalizing tobacco use means changing the perception of tobacco from something that is viewed as acceptable and even glamorous to a more realistic perception of tobacco as dangerous, addictive, and socially unacceptable."

The "Truth vs. Advertising" print ad from the "Antitobacco" campaign aimed at making cigarette smoking less glamorous.
CALIFORNIA DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH SERVICES. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1988 California voters passed Proposition 99, an initiative that increased the tax on tobacco by 25 cents per pack of cigarettes, with the revenue to be used to fund antitobacco programs and healthcare services for underprivileged residents. In that year about 26.7 percent of Californians were smokers. The percentage declined rapidly as the tax-funded media effort began churning out aggressive advertising, and by 1995 only 16.7 percent of Californians smoked. The rate began to rise, however, when the administration of California governor Pete Wilson diverted $67 million in antitobacco funds in 1994 to pay for failing healthcare projects. In addition, television spots with an anti-industry tone, including one that featured tobacco industry executives testifying before the U.S. Congress that nicotine was not addictive, were discontinued because of pressure from the tobacco industry. Although antitobacco efforts continued, they were toned down both in character and in number, and in 1996, 18.6 percent of California adults smoked. The change in advertising, reported a research team from the University of California at San Francisco, led to an increase in tobacco sales between 1994 and 1998 of more than $1 billion, or an additional 840 million packs of cigarettes. Also alarming were statistics for young smokers. In 1992, according to the DHS, 8.7 percent of Californians aged 12 to 17 smoked. In 1995 the percentage was up to 11.9 percent. A survey conducted by the tobacco research center at the University of California at San Diego found that the percentage of youths aged 17 who were addicted to cigarettes had risen from 9.9 percent in 1993 to 12 percent three years later.

The increase in the number of California smokers, though considerably less than the national population of adult smokers, which hovered around 25 percent, was still cause for alarm among antitobacco activists, and many criticized the Wilson administration. Alan C. Henderson of the American Cancer Society of California said in the Los Angeles Times, "The Legislature and the governor need to wake up and smell the secondhand smoke. This is an embarrassment to the state that has been the leader in fighting tobacco.'' In response, the Wilson administration established a three-year contract with Asher & Partners to produce a major media campaign. In 1997, after some delays, the CDHS launched its first new advertising campaign since 1995 as a part of plans to reinvigorate the fight against tobacco. Sandra Smoley, secretary of California's Health and Welfare Agency, announced in a press release, ''This advertising is some of the most aggressive, hard-hitting material that California's tobacco education media campaign has ever produced . . . These ads prove, once and for all, that this Administration is wholly committed to the anti-tobacco cause.''

A still from the "Gala Event" television ad aimed at desexualizing smoking. CALIFORNIA DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH SERVICES. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

TARGET MARKET

The CDHS aimed its antitobacco advertising toward a number of audiences, but the agency primarily hoped to sway youths, including those who smoked and those who were susceptible to starting. More than 100,000 youths, a study at the University of California at San Diego discovered, took up smoking each year, and one-third of them would die from smoking-related diseases such as heart disease, cancer, or emphysema. Other studies indicated that it would take most of the addicted youths 16 to 20 years to quit smoking, and that almost 90 percent of smokers picked up the habit before reaching the age of 18. If youths made it past 18 without smoking, chances were high that they would not start. The studies made it glaringly clear to the CDHS that it was necessary to try to prevent teen smoking.

To effectively address youths, who often felt invincible and were not easily persuaded by advertising, it was important, researchers found, to inform them that the tobacco industry was trying to control them. One 1997 ad, "Voicebox Smoker," featured Debi Austin, a woman who began smoking at the age of 13. The spot, shot when she was 46, showed a hole in her throat where her larynx had been cut out because of her smoking habit. Still, Austin had not quit smoking; she smoked through the hole. She explained in the commercial, "When I found out how bad smoking was, I tried to stop. Believe me. I wish I could. But I can't." Belsh, discussed the strategy behind the ad in USA Today, saying, "You need to push emotional buttons . . . You need to give kids real evidence that they're being manipulated by the tobacco industry."

The CDHS targeted adult smokers with its media campaign as well, with ads focusing not only on the harm inflicted upon the smoker but also on the damage caused to loved ones and others through secondhand smoke. For the 1998 campaign the CDHS tackled two new issues. Because all California bars and taverns became smoke-free at the beginning of 1998, ads were deemed necessary to convince disgruntled smokers that this was a positive policy. Another issue the CDHS hoped to spotlight was the link between smoking and impotence. This time the focus was on men between 18 and 30, an age group that had traditionally been resistant to altering smoking habits. As Belsh, explained in the Toronto Globe and Mail, "Our experience has demonstrated that warning these guys that smoking will affect their health later in life has not been a very effective inducement to quit . . . Maybe warning them about the effects on their sex lives will be more powerful." The problem was not one to be taken lightly, for numerous studies, including the Massachusetts Male Aging Study, had indicated a significant link between smoking and impotence.

COMPETITION

The most powerful adversary of the CDHS was the tobacco industry, which consisted of the biggest advertisers in the United States. Philip Morris Companies Inc., the parent company of number one tobacco maker Philip Morris U.S.A., was the third leading U.S. advertiser in 1996 and also in 1997, despite a 5 percent reduction in ad spending. Philip Morris U.S.A., which produced such brands as the top-selling Marlboro, Benson & Hedges, Virginia Slims, and Merit, supplied about half of all the nation's cigarette shipments. Others included R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. These powerful companies boasted immense advertising coffers and held the advantage of history. Tobacco companies had advertised and marketed their products for decades before the 1970 ban on radio and television cigarette advertising, making a strong and lasting impression among the public. Antitobacco awareness, on the other hand, was still in its infancy.

STARS AND SMOKES

Not only did the California Department of Health Services and other antitobacco forces have to contend with competition from tobacco manufacturers, but they also battled Hollywood. Many blockbuster movies, including Reality Bites and My Best Friend's Wedding, featured chain-smoking characters, portrayed by Winona Ryder and Julia Roberts, respectively. First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton criticized the movie industry for its focus on smoking, with the Los Angeles Daily News quoted her as commenting on Roberts's character: "This portrayal of a modern woman so reliant on cigarettes is particularly troubling given that more young women are taking up the deadly habit."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The 1998 antitobacco media campaign developed by Asher & Partners consisted of several dozen television, radio, and print/billboard ads, including some borrowed from the Massachusetts Tobacco Control Program's media campaign. Although the dangers of smoking were by then common knowledge in the United States, antitobacco messages were still a hard sell. As Bruce Dundore of Asher & Partners admitted in Adweek, "It is a very challenging account . . . It's tough to get people not to buy stuff, especially when it's a product equated with pleasure."

Ads that publicized the implementation of California's smoke-free policy for restaurants and bars began running in late 1997, and radio and television spots addressing the increased popularity of cigars began to air in the spring of 1998 while the full campaign continued to be developed. The cigar effort centered on the theme "Cigars, the big new trend in cancer," and the single television spot "How Many?" focused on the amount of nicotine in each cigar. A business suit-clad character named Chad relaxed with a cigar as the narrator questioned him about how many cigarettes he thought might equal the nicotine of one cigar. As he offered guesses, the corresponding number of cigarettes appeared in Chad's mouth. The narrator finally informed Chad that he would need to smoke more than 70 cigarettes to equal the nicotine in the cigar, and 70 cigarettes were seen stuffed into Chad's mouth. The spot ended with the narrator asking, "Need a light, Chad?"

In June 1998 the full CDHS campaign was launched. "Gala Event," the television spot that emphasized the link between smoking and impotence, was set at a festive affair. A handsome man in a tuxedo caught the eye of a beautiful woman across the bar, and the two exchanged long gazes as he suavely lit a cigarette. His cigarette suddenly went limp, and the woman was gone. The voice-over explained, "Now that medical researchers believe cigarettes are a leading cause of impotence, you're going to be looking at smoking a little differently." The spot then focused on three men smoking cigarettes. An attractive woman sauntered by, and the three men stared after her, only to find their cigarettes going limp. Embarrassed, the men covered their cigarettes or removed them from their mouths. The narrator then asked, "Cigarettes. Still think they're sexy?" "For decades, the tobacco industry has tried to link its deadly products with virility and sex appeal," explained Belsh, of the CDHS. "It's ironic that medical science shows smoking to be one of the leading causes of male impotence."

"Baby Smokers" focused on the problems of secondhand smoke and showed photos of young children and infants with lines such as "Nicholas Steele. Smoking since birth" and "Chris McDonald. Pack-a-week smoker" superimposed on the photos to emphasize how a parent's or guardian's habits could directly affect children. The tag line read, "Secondhand smoke is a first-rate killer." "Waitresses" featured various waitresses from restaurants and bars explaining the health hazards they experienced as a result of working in smoke-filled environments. They also voiced their support of the smoke-free restaurants and bars policy. "Ironic Quotes" showed a bedridden patient named Aaron. After quoting a tobacco industry executive, who claimed that people did not die from smoking, Aaron stated, "Let me clear things up for him. My doctor says I have less than one year to live." The tag line read, "The Tobacco Industry—They can bury the victims, but they can't bury the truth." A print ad, "Truth vs. Advertising," featured a circle of 20 cigarette print ads—ads that focused on the glamorous aspects of smoking and led consumers to believe that their lives would be enhanced by cigarettes—with the dates they ran. Printed alongside the ads were messages revealing what tobacco companies knew about cigarettes, for example, "The tobacco industry has known that nicotine is addictive since 1963. They denied any knowledge before Congress in 1994. Four years later they finally admitted it."

OUTCOME

The 1998 antitobacco campaign received considerable media attention, particularly "Gala Event," which brought to light a traditionally taboo subject. The number of smokers in California appeared to be on the decline as well, with the percentage of adult smokers dropping from 18.6 percent in 1996 to 18.2 percent in 1997. Smoking among youths also dropped, from 11.2 percent in 1996 to 10.9 percent in 1997. "I'm encouraged by the decline in smoking," announced Belsh, in a press release. "Smoking among youth in California has dropped for two years in a row, despite rising rates of youth smoking around the rest of the country. The adult smoking rate remains lower than any other state, with the exception of Utah." Also encouraging was the reduction in illegal sales of tobacco goods to minors in California, which dropped to 13.1 percent in 1998, an impressive 40 percent in one year.

Although the CDHS continued with its aggressive antitobacco media campaign in 1999, the word about the ills of smoking began to spread beyond a few select states such as California, Massachusetts, and Arizona. Out of the $206 billion settlement reached between tobacco companies and 39 states, which were suing to recoup the healthcare costs generated by tobacco-related illnesses, about $1.45 billion was tagged to pay for a five-year national antitobacco educational campaign. The newly formed National Tobacco Control Foundation was thus poised to launch the largest and most unified antitobacco advertising campaign ever developed, with an estimated $150 to $225 million marketing budget for 1999.

FURTHER READING

Morain, Dan. "New State TV Ads Link Smoking to Impotence in Men." Los Angeles Times, June 2, 1998, p. A3.

"New State Anti-Smoking Campaign Announced: California Department of Health Unveils $22 Million Advertising and Education Effort." Sacramento Observer, June 10, 1998, p. A9.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Up in Smoke: Kicking Butt." Adweek, October 13, 1997, p. 33.

Takaki, Millie. "California Sends Anti-Smoke Signal to Stogie Smokers." Shoot, April 17, 1998, p. 7.

———. "California Ups the Anti-Smoking Ante, Unveils 11 Spots." Shoot, June 12, 1998, p. 7.

Mariko Fujinaka

TOBACCO CONTROL SECTION MEDIA CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1988 California voters passed Proposition 99, a measure that imposed a tax hike on cigarettes and earmarked the revenues thereby generated for antismoking efforts, including statewide media campaigns. The Tobacco Control Section of the California Department of Health Services (CDHS) thus pioneered the high-profile, taxpayer-funded, big-budget antismoking advertising efforts that would ultimately become common across the United States. The California campaigns consistently attracted media attention and industry awards, but in 2000 CDHS decided on a change of course for its advertising. Hiring the Los Angeles–based agency Ground Zero, CDHS set itself the task of supplementing its ongoing educational, secondhand smoke, and cessation efforts with a more direct and confrontational assault on the integrity of tobacco companies and their personnel.

Budgeted at $125 million over five years, the Ground Zero work for CDHS first took the form of 2001 television spots as well as outdoor and print ads tagged, ''Do you smell smoke?'' The television spots featured a fictional tobacco executive named Ken Lane, who was shown disclosing despicable trade secrets in discussions with colleagues. In 2002 Ground Zero crafted a particularly powerful spot aimed at convincing current smokers to quit, and in 2004 the agency introduced its ''Undo'' theme, which used images of people blowing bubbles instead of smoking, among other arresting visual schemes, as a way of asking Californians to imagine a world without cigarettes.

California continued to post decreases in its adult smoking rates throughout the years that the Ground Zero–crafted antitobacco campaigns ran, building on the declines that had been initiated beginning with Proposition 99. Only Utah boasted fewer smokers per capita among its adult population.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Beginning in 1967, the Federal Communications Commission required television broadcasters to donate airtime to one antitobacco advertiser for every four tobacco commercials that appeared. The antitobacco spots produced in subsequent years by groups such as the American Cancer Society proved extremely effective, and cigarette consumption in America began dropping for the first time in the twentieth century. Tobacco companies thus supported a ban on the television advertising of their own products, since such a move would largely spell the end of donated airtime for antitobacco groups, and since these groups would find it difficult to buy their own time or otherwise place public service spots during peak viewing hours. After the eventual Congressional ban on the television advertising of tobacco products was enacted, and through most of the 1970s and 1980s, antismoking commercials were generally relegated to off-peak hours and were not considered effective. Tobacco companies, meanwhile, devoted their extensive resources to other media and to high-profile sponsorships. The smoking declines initiated in the late 1960s slowed.

The economics of antitobacco advertising began to change dramatically, however, when California voters passed Proposition 99, the California Tobacco Health Protection Act of 1988. The act introduced a new statewide cigarette tax of 25 cents per pack and allocated the resultant revenues to a group of complementary antismoking initiatives, including education programs in California schools, funding for tobacco-related research, and a media campaign. Among the media campaign's early efforts were spots that pointed out the moral bankruptcy of the tobacco industry; for instance, one commercial showed individual industry executives testifying in a congressional hearing that they did not believe tobacco was addictive. The best-known work in the first decade of California's media campaign was crafted by the Los Angeles advertising agency Asher/Gould (successively renamed Asher & Partners, Asher/Gal & Partners, and Italia/Gal). Among the agency's most lauded campaigns was a 1997 series of billboards featuring two cowboys on horseback in imagery that recalled the famous ''Marlboro Man'' ads. ''I miss my lung, Bob,'' read the text in one such billboard. ''Bob, I've got emphysema,'' read the text in another.

The California antismoking campaign was the first of its kind and scale in the world, and its success inspired Massachusetts, Florida, and Arizona, among other U.S. states, to embark on similar taxpayer-funded campaigns. CDHS's approach to antitobacco advertising, as well as its larger strategy for the denormalization of tobacco use, likewise served as a model for such organizations as the Centers for Disease Control and the World Health Organization. Between 1988 and 1999 adult smoking rates in California fell more than 32 percent, and California's declines in teen smoking well outpaced declines in other states.

TARGET MARKET

CDHS's 2000–05 antismoking media campaigns ran statewide in California, with the bulk of the messaging and budget devoted to a general market but with supplemental, language- and/or culture-specific commercials designed for Asians and Pacific Islanders, Latinos, African-Americans, and American Indians. CDHS placed great emphasis, through educational programs and other facets of its overall antismoking strategy, on a teenage audience, noting that 88 percent of smokers were introduced to cigarettes before age 18 and that the tobacco industry subtly continued to target teenagers despite legal rulings ordering it to cease doing so. The media campaign did not appeal strictly to teenagers, however. Part of the state's overall antismoking strategy was to denormalize tobacco use in the culture at large, which would presumably, in both the short and long term, make the activity less appealing to impressionable youngsters. It was especially necessary to spread an antitobacco message to a general audience, CDHS felt, given the tobacco companies' own concurrent efforts at normalizing their corporate images through court-ordered public-service advertising as well as voluntary image-crafting efforts. Many of the Ground Zero–crafted spots created between 2000 and 2005 focused on showing that tobacco companies, far from being normal businesses, were in fact morally reprehensible, villainous entities. The campaign also featured spots aimed at current smokers, which, in an effort to encourage them to quit, employed hard-hitting dramatizations of the dire health risks they were taking by engaging in the habit.

TARGETING CHILDREN

In a website companion to its media campaign, http://www.tobaccofreeca.com, the California Department of Health Services detailed ways in which tobacco companies continued to target minors despite the laws prohibiting them from doing so. CDHS pointed out, for instance, that images of the Marlboro Man, an icon specifically created to appeal to young people, was still, as of 2004, prominently featured in Philip Morris's advertising. The website cited a 2001 Stanford University study finding that almost half of California's convenience stores had tobacco advertising materials placed at a height of three feet or lower, at eye level with young children, and that in 23 percent of the state's convenience stores, cigarettes for sale were located less than six inches away from candy displays. In 2002, CDHS reported, R.J. Reynolds was caught advertising in youth-oriented publications. And in 2003 the Tobacco Enforcement Committee of the National Association of Attorneys General discovered that four different tobacco corporations had run ads in school editions of major U.S. newsweeklies.

COMPETITION

One of the first states to use the California model for battling the tobacco industry's influence was Massachusetts, whose Department of Health and Safety in 1994 increased taxes on cigarettes and invested the revenues in an ambitious marketing campaign crafted by the Boston advertising agency Houston Herstek Favat. Called "Truth," the campaign's television spots, like some of the early California commercials, sought to expose the tobacco companies' morally compromised business practices. Patrick Reynolds, a grandson of tobacco scion R.J. Reynolds, appeared in one spot providing information about the numerous harmful chemicals in cigarettes. "Why am I telling you this?" Reynolds asked. "I want my family to be on the right side for a change." Print ads attempted to generate public support for legislative measures aimed at reining in tobacco companies.

In 1998 the state of Florida likewise launched a marketing campaign funded by increased taxes on cigarettes. Created by Miami agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky and named "Truth" (like the Massachusetts campaign), the Florida campaign's highlights included spots pairing the congressional testimony of tobacco-industry executives with a sitcom laugh track, as well as spots showing teenagers who phoned tobacco corporations to ask pointed questions such as, "What is it about Lucky Strike cigarettes that's lucky? Is it that I might live?"

Following the 1998 master settlement agreement between four major tobacco companies and 46 U.S. states, which resolved lawsuits filed by state attorneys general, the tobacco companies were required to run their own antismoking advertising. Some critics, however, contended that these campaigns warned against smoking via methods that actually made smoking seem rebellious and therefore attractive to teens. Tobacco companies also took significant voluntary steps to recast their corporate images. Philip Morris Companies, for instance, changed its name to the comparatively nondescript Altria and markedly increased its food brand holdings.

Another noteworthy result of the 1998 tobacco settlement was the formation of a public advocacy group with national reach, the American Legacy Foundation (ALF), funded by $1.5 billion of the total $206 billion in settlement money. Beginning in 2000 ALF spent more than $150 million a year on nationwide, antismoking advertising cocreated by Boston's Arnold Worldwide (which had merged with Houston Herstek Favat) and Crispin Porter + Bogusky. The two agencies, leveraging their combined experience on the Massachusetts and Florida campaigns, had formed a team called the Alliance to bid for the ALF account. Unprecedented in scope and budget resources compared to previous antismoking projects, this campaign was, like its Massachusetts and Florida predecessors, also called "Truth," and it went to previously unexplored inflammatory lengths. One of the Alliance's first efforts involved filming activist teens piling body bags outside Philip Morris's corporate headquarters in New York. The resulting spots proved too controversial for the major television networks and were pulled off the air, along with another commercial shot at Philip Morris headquarters, after the tobacco companies involved in the 1999 settlement publicly complained.

MARKETING STRATEGY

CDHS's August 2000 hiring of Ground Zero for a five-year, $125 million advertising effort represented a change of direction for the state's antismoking campaigns. Like the nationwide "Truth" campaign then getting under way, the Ground Zero work focused more intensely than ever on overt vilification of tobacco companies. The campaign's television spots broke in early 2001 and ran during prime-time network programming like CBS's Survivor season finale and the NBC shows ER and The West Wing. Supporting outdoor, print, and online work reinforced the tagline "Do you smell smoke?" which, as Ground Zero's chairman Jim Smith told Adweek, referred to the premise that "the tobacco companies use smoke and mirrors, and we're suggesting maybe you smell smoke, and there's no smoke without fire."

The "Do You Smell Smoke?" television spots provided a documentary-like, fly-on-the-wall look inside the offices of a fictional tobacco company and centered on an amoral executive named Ken Lane, who explained ways in which the tobacco industry duped consumers. In "Lights," Lane was shown expounding on the fallacious perception that light cigarettes were better than regular cigarettes for one's health, explaining the manufacturing details that supposedly reduced tar and nicotine but in actuality did not, and marveling at the effectiveness of industry advertising that spread this misconception. A print ad running under the same tagline meanwhile pointed out the tobacco companies' alleged targeting of children despite the fact that the practice had been outlawed. Showing a young boy standing at a convenience store counter surrounded by numerous tobacco advertisements and transfixed by a large image of the Marlboro man at eye level, the ad's copy read, "Kid: 45 inches" and "Poster: 45 inches."

Ground Zero supplemented the anti-industry advertising with work that addressed the dangers of second-hand smoke and work that encouraged cessation. One 2002 television spot promoted the latter objective with particular force. Called "Echo," the spot featured a series of young, healthy-looking smokers who gave common excuses for why they could not quit smoking. Each statement in turn was juxtaposed with a statement from an overtly suffering, but not noticeably older, former smoker. A young man opened the commercial by noting with a smile that he could not "go more than a few hours without a cigarette," and his statement was followed by that of an emaciated man with tubes in his nose grimly saying, "I can't go more than a few feet without the oxygen tank." Similarly a healthy woman explained that she tried to quit smoking but gave up because she gained five pounds; her speech gave way to that of a female cancer patient saying, near tears, "I've lost twenty-five pounds." The spot closed with on-screen text that said, "Quitting is hard. Not quitting is harder."

No strategic changes were made to Ground Zero's CDHS work until 2004, when the theme "Undo" was applied to the campaign's television, print, outdoor, and online advertising as a means of asking consumers to visualize a world without smoking. One television spot used the tagline "Undo tobacco everywhere" and images of people in commonplace smoking locations and positions who instead of smoking were blowing bubbles. Another spot, tagged "Undo the exploitation," returned to the theme of tobacco-executive villainy by equating excellence in the business with a willingness to exploit the most vulnerable of all possible targets, young children. Another 2004 spot, "Growth," showed tobacco executives in a conference room who began uncontrollably birthing clones from their chests until suit-wearing clones covered the city streets outside the company offices. The image of irrepressible growth intentionally conflated tobacco-industry market gains and cancer, an idea underscored by on-screen text reading, "The more they grow, the more we die."

OUTCOME

The 2001 Ken Lane commercials so effectively impugned the integrity of tobacco-industry executives that the tobacco companies R.J. Reynolds and Lorillard filed a lawsuit alleging, as Adweek reported, that the spots "violated their constitutional rights and had a prejudicial effect on potential jurors in lawsuits related to smoking." The lawsuit was ultimately rejected. "Echo" was voted one of Adweek 's Best Spots of 2002. California's adult smoking rates remained lower than those in all other U.S. states except Utah: only 16.2 percent of the California population, as of 2003, were smokers, down from the 1988 rate of 22.8 percent. In 2004 the state's smoking rate reached a historic low of 15.4 percent, and state public health officer Dr. Richard J. Jackson announced, "Our messages about the dangers of tobacco use, secondhand smoke and the tobacco industry's misleading marketing practices are resonating with all Californians." Jackson further noted that California's smoking-related cancer rates were then declining three times faster than were rates among other Americans and declared that California would continue to spread its antitobacco message as long as tobacco products were sold.

FURTHER READING

Buyikian, Teresa. "Anti-Smoking Gets Personal." Adweek (western ed.), June 8, 1998.

Cooper, Ann. "Clearing the Smoke." Print, May/June 2001.

"Creative Best Spots 2002." Adweek, January 27, 2003.

Flass, Rebecca. "Ground Zero Takes Aim at Big-Tobacco Executives." Adweek (western ed.), April 30, 2001.

———. "Ground Zero Work Looks to 'Undo' Smoking in California." Adweek, February 9, 2004.

Lipin, David. "Ground Zero Nabs Anti-Smoking Biz." Adweek, August 28, 2000.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Up in Smoke: Kicking Butt." Adweek, October 13, 1997.

Takaki, Millie. "Growth." Shoot, July 5, 2004.

"United States: Just Say No." Economist, December 9, 2000.

Woodward, Sarah. "CDHS Campaign Exposes Big Tobacco Hypocrisy." Shoot, December 8, 2000.

Mark Lane

California Milk Advisory Board

400 Oyster Point Blvd., Ste. 220
San Francisco, California 94080
USA
Telephone: (650) 871-6455
Fax: (650) 583-7328
E-mail: askus@realcaliforniacheese.com
Web site: www.RealCaliforniaCheese.com

■■■

HAPPY COWS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In an effort to promote the state's dairy products and to deal with its growing milk surplus, the California Milk Advisory Board (CMAB) established the "Real California Cheese" campaign in 1982. With the creation of the "Real California Cheese" label, the active marketing of the state's cheese began. During the first campaign, which used the tagline "California cheese is great cheese," California surpassed Wisconsin as the leading U.S. dairy state and jumped into the number two spot in the production of cheese. In 1995 "It's the Cheese" was introduced as the new tagline. The "Real California Cheese" campaign continued to be extremely popular and helped California to close in further on Wisconsin as the national leader in cheese production. The tagline "Great cheese comes from Happy Cows. Happy Cows come from California" was introduced in 2000 with the clear intent to take over the number one spot.

Supported by a $33 million marketing budget, the "Happy Cows" campaign was created by the advertising agency Deutsch LA. Television advertisements first appeared on local stations and then, beginning in December 2003, appeared on national cable channels, where the "Happy Cows" campaign would eventually have an audience of more than 500 million viewers. The spots aired during the 2004 and 2005 Super Bowls were especially important. Using humor and a sense of fun to convey their message, the television spots portrayed the lives of California cows as being carefree. In "Ding Dong," for instance, a couple of cows broke into fits of giggles as they played the "ring-doorbell-and-run" trick on their farmer. In addition to television spots there also were radio commercials, ads for buses and bus shelters, and outdoor billboards.

The "Happy Cows" campaign met with incredible success. It was overwhelmingly popular with the public, and it won various advertising awards, including being named by Adweek to its list of Creative Best Spots. The campaign was accompanied by increased sales of California cheese as well as of California dairy products generally. Partly as a result of the campaign's success, California was able to narrow the gap in cheese production between itself and Wisconsin. In 2004 the production of cheese in California neared 2 billion pounds, which was an increase of 163 million pounds, or 8.9 percent, over 2003. Although cheese production in Wisconsin in 2004 was almost 2.5 billion pounds, the CMAB continued its campaign to help California eventually take the lead.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The CMAB was established in 1969 in an effort by the California Department of Food and Agriculture to promote the state's high-quality dairy products and to deal with the state's developing milk surplus. The state was producing 10.8 billion pounds of milk annually by 1975, and in the following years the amount increased dramatically. By 1982 it had become clear that California needed to face the problem of an ever-growing production of milk, which coincided with a declining rate of consumption. With the assistance of the Stanford Research Institute, the CMAB developed the idea that cheese might be a solution to the problem. Because 10 pounds of milk were generally needed to make 1 pound of cheese and because the nation's rate of cheese consumption was rising, this seemed to be a sensible solution. The "Real California Cheese" campaign was the result.

California Milk Advisory Board's Happy Cows. © 2006 CALIFORNIA MILK ADVISORY BOARD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Although the "Real California Cheese" campaign began somewhat cautiously, starting with local markets and only slowly expanding nationwide, it quickly gained success. Within a decade of its introduction the campaign had helped make California the biggest dairy state in the United States, surpassing Wisconsin and bringing tremendous revenue to the state. Initially the tagline for the campaign was simply "California cheese is great cheese." Targeted mostly toward California women between the ages of 25 and 54, the "Real California Cheese" campaign represented an attempt to create an emotional connection to products made in the state. To achieve their goals, the advertisements were marked by intelligence and sincerity, along with a sense of humor.

In 1995 the "Real California Cheese" campaign introduced a new tagline, "It's the Cheese." This series of popular ads played on the humorous claim that the real reason people traveled to California was for its cheese. The advertisements used a representation of the "Real California Cheese" seal with the tagline, "It's the Cheese," next to it. Even the words in the ads were made of cheese. Running from 1995 to 2000, these ads appeared everywhere—on television; in outdoor advertising, including billboards, buses, and bus shelters; in retail stores; and on coupons and other printed materials. The success of the campaign helped to pave the way for the "Happy Cows" campaign, which was introduced in 2000. Like its predecessors, this campaign relied on a combination of humor and love for the state in its marketing of California cheese.

TARGET MARKET

With some 60 makers producing more than 250 varieties of cheese, the target market of the "Happy Cows" campaign was diverse. In a breakdown of California cheese production that was done in 2004, the major types were identified as follows: 45 percent mozzarella, 27 percent

ARE THEY REALLY HAPPY?

When People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) sued the California Milk Advisory Board (CMAB) over its ''Happy Cows'' campaign, a superior court judge in 2003 sided with the defendant, but only on a technicality. PETA, arguing that the ads wrongfully idealized the lives of dairy cows as being pastoral and peaceful, had sued the CMAB for false advertising. The judge did not rule against PETA on the grounds that the cows were happy. Instead, he cited the fact that the government was exempt from the laws on false advertising that applied to private individuals.

cheddar, 15 percent Monterey Jack, 4 percent Hispanic-style, 3 percent Parmesan, 2 percent provolone, and 4 percent other. This wide variety, which included many higher-priced specialty cheeses, resulted from an extraordinarily diverse consumer base that ranged from ordinary families to individual connoisseurs.

Though the ''Happy Cows'' campaign, as well as previous campaigns, targeted any consumer of cheese, the primary focus was on women between the ages of 25 and 54. Women in this age range were thought to have slightly higher incomes than other women, and they were more likely to be mothers and, thus, often the grocery shoppers for a household. It was for this reason that television spots were aired more often during daytime programming than during the evening (60 percent versus 40 percent).

While the ''Real California Cheese'' campaign began by focusing on the local market, by the time of the ''Happy Cows'' campaign the marketing goals had been expanded, and the effort had become national. Thus, the ''Happy Cows'' campaign promoted California's cheese far beyond the state's borders.

COMPETITION

Although Wisconsin remained the number one producer of cheese in the United States, California appeared to be catching up. Wisconsin was working hard, however, to keep its number one spot. After California surpassed Wisconsin as the nation's top dairy producer in 1993, the Wisconsin dairy industry threw additional resources into its cheese industry, including $150 million for the expansion of production facilities. Under the guidance of the Wisconsin Milk Marketing Board, established in 1983, there were continuing efforts to maintain the state's leading position. Ventures such as the Chef Ambassadors Program, which published recipes calling for the use of various Wisconsin cheeses, were established for this purpose. Advertising campaigns such as ''Where It Comes from Matters,'' which was launched in 2005, got right to the point, asking customers, ''Why order your cheese from anyplace but Wisconsin?''

Cheese manufacturers located in other parts of the United States, such as the Tillamook County Creamery Association in Oregon and Agri-Mark, Inc., in New England, provided smaller-scale competition for California. Tillamook, a co-op owned by 150 Oregon dairy farmers, offered a range of dairy products, including milk, butter, ice cream, yogurt, sour cream, and dry whey. Still, Tillamook's focus was on cheese, in particular, cheddar, which accounted for 85 percent of the company's overall production. Agri-Mark, another privately owned co-op of farmers in Vermont, Massachusetts, and New York, had sold cheese since its startup in 1916. The co-op's cheese offerings included both the Cabot and the McCadam brands. Tillamook's sales in 2003 were $270 million, while Agri-Mark's were $600 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2000 ''Great cheese comes from Happy Cows. Happy Cows come from California'' was introduced as the campaign's new tagline. The tagline proclaimed that happy cows produced great cheese and that, because of the many things that made California great, California cows would, of course, be happy. The campaign, developed by the advertising agency Deutsch LA, began appearing in local television, radio, and print ads as well as in outdoor venues.

Several television spots were aired in rotation. Hailed as funny, clever, and cute, the commercials portrayed cows thinking and acting like humans. California loyalists, the cows affectionately revealed various aspects of life in the state, including the good weather, the beautiful scenery, and even earthquakes. ''Cloud,'' for example, showed cows fleeing in panic from a tiny cloud in the sky, calling attention to California's sunny climate. ''Race,'' which played on the carefree lifestyle of California, highlighted a race between cows, with a couple of bulls looking on. ''Keep your eye on Doris; she's a rocket out of the gate,'' said one bull to the other. When the race began, Doris took the lead. ''I'm winning!'' she exclaimed; ''I'm winning!'' But when a fresh patch of dandelions, as well as the other runners, distracted her, the race was over. ''We gotta move that finish line closer,'' said one of the bulls. The spot ended with the ''Great cheese comes from Happy Cows. Happy Cows comes from California'' tagline.

Although they started locally, the advertisements of the "Happy Cows" campaign appeared on national television beginning in December 2003, and they eventually reached the homes of more than 500 million viewers. As part of the national campaign, "Happy Cows" spots aired during both the 2004 and 2005 Super Bowls. There were further promotions in print and on the radio, and retail promotions included in-store coupons and a sampling program. There also were comprehensive public-relations and food-service promotions, as well as promotions through the "Real California Cheese" website, which covered the "Happy Cows" campaign in detail. The site even allowed visitors to view a selection of "Happy Cows" television commercials. The total annual budget for the campaign reached $33 million in 2004.

OUTCOME

The public loved the "Happy Cows" campaign. Consumers from around the United States submitted comments about the ads to the "Real California Cheese" website. One Idaho viewer said, "When your ads come on everything comes to a stop, people run in from different rooms just to watch because they are so wonderful . . . the sheep are adorable, they look just like ours! Too bad we didn't have you design an ad campaign for Idaho potatoes! Thank you again for giving us a few minutes of pure fun." The ads not only made the general public smile, but they also won numerous advertising awards, including being chosen by Adweek for its list of Creative Best Spots.

The "Happy Cows" campaign also seemed to spread the word about California cheese and to support the general "Real California Cheese" undertaking. By 1993 California had become the nation's largest supplier of milk and the largest dairy state overall. A decade later, after the debut of the "Happy Cows" campaign, milk production in California had increased by another 44 percent, to 36.4 billion pounds per year. Further, by 2004, through the efforts of the CMAB and the "Real California Cheese" program, California was selling 40 percent of its milk production—in the form of cheese, butter, and powdered milk—out of state. In addition, between 1983 and 2004 the production of cheese in California increased by an astonishing 609 percent, seven times the national growth rate. Over this period California had become the second-largest manufacturer and distributor of cheese in the United States.

Of course, the eventual goal of the CMAB was to replace longtime leader Wisconsin as the number one state in cheese production, and some strides toward this goal seemed to have been made. For example, in 2004 California was producing 25 percent of all mozzarella cheese in the United States. Being a top cheese producer and distributor had tremendous economic benefits for the state. In 2003 the U.S. cheese industry posted $40 billion in total sales. By 2002 the dairy industry in California was bringing in $35 billion year, approaching the income from the state's lucrative wine industry, which made $45 billion in that same year.

It appeared that California got into the right business at the right time, with a good product supported by an effective advertising campaign. The "Happy Cows" campaign and the remarkable success of "Real California Cheese" not only sparked the interest of cheese lovers across the United States but also gained the attention of academics. In 2005 Columbia University's Graduate School of Business published a case study of the CMAB's "Real California Cheese" campaign. The 34-page study, which was created as a teaching study at Columbia, was made available for use in business schools worldwide. As the case study's author, Michelle Greenwald, put it, "The growth of the California cheese industry over the past twenty-plus years is nothing short of a tremendous success story."

FURTHER READING

"Court Throws Out 'Happy Cows' Lawsuit." San Diego Union-Tribune, March 27, 2003.

Egelko, Bob. "Dairy Farms Can Keep Milking Their 'Happy Cows' Campaign." San Francisco Chronicle, January 12, 2005.

Emert, Carol. "California Looks to Expand Market." San Francisco Chronicle, January 30, 1999.

Fitzgerald, Tom. "Top of the Sixth." San Francisco Chronicle, January 8, 1998.

Fletcher, Janet. "Happy Cows Make a Better Cheese." San Francisco Chronicle, February 27, 2003.

Greenwald, Michelle. It's the Cheese—Real California Cheese. New York: Columbia University, School of Business, 2005.

"Happy Cows Make Better Lattes." Houston Chronicle, March 17, 2004.

Kirschenbaum, Carol. "What Does California's Bay Area Have that We Haven't Got? Glad You Asked." St. Petersburg (FL) Times, September 8, 1998.

Matier, Phillip, and Andrew Ross. "The Cheese Stands Alone." San Francisco Chronicle, May 19, 1996.

Parker, Penny. "Cheesy Campaign Comes to State: Move Over Wisconsin; California Claims to Be the Real 'Big Cheese.'" Denver Post, January 24, 1999.

"Real California Cheese: Tremendously Successful Long-Term Campaign." Cheese Reporter, April 8, 2005, p. 1.

Resler, Jerry. "California Takes a Cheesy Shot at Wisconsin: Tongue-in-Cheek Ads Play Off Friendly Dairy Competition." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 12, 1995.

Roberts, Alison. "Value Added." Sacramento Bee, July 17, 2003.

Weise, Elizabeth. "PETA: 'Happy Cows' Ad Is a Lie." USA Today, December 11, 2002.

Candice Mancini

California Milk Processor Board

1801A Fourth Street
Berkeley, California 94710
USA
Telephone: (510) 883-1085
Fax: (510) 883-1085
E-mail: press@gotmilk.com
Web site: www.gotmilk.com

■■■

GOT MILK? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the mid-1990s, with the emergence of new juices, fruit drinks, iced teas, coffee drinks, bottled waters, and soft drinks, Californians were drinking less milk every year. Milk consumption per capita in California had dropped 6 percent between 1987 and 1992. Before 1993 most of California's dairy advertising was funded either by the National Dairy Board (an organization of dairy farmers) or by the government-run California Milk Advisory Board. Together the two spent an estimated $13 million to promote the statewide consumption of dairy products. The budget was meager compared with those of other beverage companies. Dairy farmers could not compete with titans such as PepsiCo, Inc., and the Coca-Cola Company. The latter spent $100 million in 1992 to advertise just one of its brands, Coca-Cola Classic. Realizing that the dairy industry needed outside assistance, the California Department of Food and Agriculture formed the California Milk Processor Board (CMPB) in 1993. A few months later the CMPB released its "Got Milk?" campaign.

The ad agency Goodby, Silverstein and Partners (GS&P) created "Got Milk?" with the CMPB's $23 million annual budget. Previous campaigns had been aimed at people who did not consume milk, but the agency's research led it to target a different audience: people who were already milk drinkers. It concluded that "milk is usually consumed with something else, and that the only time people really think about milk is when they've run out of it." The print, television, radio, and billboard campaign debuted on October 29, 1993, with a television spot titled "Aaron Burr." The spot featured a history scholar who lost a radio trivia contest because his mouth was full of a peanut-butter sandwich and he was out of milk. "Got Milk?" continued for more than a decade and included television spots parodying steroid abuse in Major League Baseball and aliens that abducted cows for their milk.

Awards given to the first spot foretold the campaign's eminent success. "Aaron Burr" garnered three Gold Clios, the Grand Prix Clio for Commercial of the Year, one Gold EFFIE, and one Silver Lion at the 1994 Cannes International Advertising Festival. One year after the campaign began, milk sales in California had increased 7 percent.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

According to the California Milk Advisory Board, from 1980 to 1993 annual milk consumption in California dropped from 30 to 24.1 gallons of milk per person. Before the formation of the CMPB the two leading entities that advertised dairy products in California were the National Dairy Board, an organization of dairy farmers that spent an estimated $2 million annually on television commercials, and the California Milk Advisory Board, which was formed in 1969 by the California Department of Food and Agriculture to promote dairy products. In 1992 the latter spent an estimated $11 million to advertise milk and other dairy products. One of its most memorable campaigns was "Milk. It Does A Body Good," created by the ad agency McCann-Erickson in the 1980s. Despite such efforts, milk was losing business to larger beverage makers, and eventually the state intervened. The California Department of Food and Agriculture established the California Milk Processor Board in February 1993. The fledgling CMPB was allocated $23 million for an advertising campaign.

Jeff Goodby, the cochairman of the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, helped win CMPB's account by offering a compelling explanation for most consumers' need for milk. He suggested building a campaign around his theory that the only time consumers really wanted milk was when they had run out of it. Goodby then challenged his agency's creatives to develop stories of people who needed milk more than others. He suggested that, as a guideline, they use Steven Spielberg's 1971 thriller Duel, in which a malevolent truck driver hunted down a business commuter. "Imagine that truck was pursuing another semi, cutting it off and ramming it from behind," Goodby told his team, according to Adweek. "When the camera pulled back, you saw it was a cookie truck chasing a milk truck and the driver of the cookie truck had his mouth full of cookies and nothing to drink."

The guideline catalyzed a campaign titled "Got Milk?," in which actors were featured in humorous predicaments that resulted from their need to wash down food with milk. "We're going to jolt Californians out of their milk malaise," Jeff Manning, executive director of the CMPB, announced in the news service Business Wire days before the campaign was released. "Our focus is on action, not just attitude change. Increasing milk consumption at home is our only objective."

TARGET MARKET

GS&P market research used two key studies in different phases of this campaign: a 1993 MARC continuous telephone survey of a representative sample of the population in California, and a qualitative study of focus groups and one-on-one interviews led by GS&P. Other research included a national Nielsen household panel, from which California data were extracted. This study provided in-home scanner systems for participants to record their grocery buying from all kinds of food outlets. Additionally, Gallup conducted a tracking study based on daily telephone interviews designed to record milk consumption habits statewide. The Gallup study reported that three major reasons that people were drinking less milk were perceptions that milk was high in fat, that it was a children's drink, and that milk was boring compared with other drinks, especially sodas. The Gallup study also found that many Californians believed that they should drink more milk.

Previous campaigns had tried to stop the decline by portraying milk as cool, fun, and cutting-edge, much like advertising for sodas. As GS&P put it, campaigns for milk "had lively jingles, and healthy looking people with lustrous hair, perfect teeth and fine muscle definition [who] sang [about] it, jogged with it, and danced with it."

GS&P decided that previous advertising had been aimed at the wrong people. A CMPB study found that 70 percent of Californians used milk frequently. The agency concluded that most of the past advertisements had been targeted at the 30 percent of people who were not using any milk or who were using it less than the average person. GS&P decided to aim its campaign at the 70 percent who were ignored by the earlier campaigns, convincing them to use milk more frequently or to drink it in larger amounts. A representative of the ad agency explained, "persuading people who are not doing something to do it (whether again or for the first time) tends to be harder than persuading people who are already doing it to do it more often."

GS&P's research showed that 88 percent of milk was consumed at home. It was typically used as an accompaniment to food, and the food was frequently considered of more interest than the milk. Milk was rarely the center of attention, as previous ads had portrayed it. Backing up Jeff Goodby's original suggestion, the research concluded that "the only time people even think about milk at all is when they don't have any."

When focus-group participants (who had not had any milk for a week) got together, they reported that they usually did not think about milk at all but that "they had been painfully aware of it in its absence over the previous few days. And that absence had been all the more painful and frustrating in the context of certain foods," such as peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches, cereal, brownies, and chocolate-chip cookies. These foods were not the same without milk. One side effect of the research was that the participants experienced "powerful cravings" when they talked about the foods that went with milk. Some later said that on the way home from the focus groups they went shopping to buy some of the craved foods.

COMPETITION

In 1993 milk was competing against a beverage industry crowded with juices, fruit drinks, iced teas, bottled

IMITATION IS THE BEST FORM OF FLATTERY

Perhaps the best indicator of the campaign's effectiveness was Dairy Management, Inc.'s decision to take the California "Got Milk?" campaign nationwide in 1995, with an $80 million media spend. The organization, which promoted dairy products on behalf of America's dairy producers, paid the California Milk Processor Board (CMPB) to use the campaign, and the California group put the money back into media. SMI, Chicago, measured the national campaign and found that its success mirrored that of the CMPB.

waters, and soft drinks. One of milk's closest competitors was Snapple, a natural tea-based drink that was initially sold in health food stores. The brand was popular among consumers looking for healthier alternatives to soft drinks. Throughout the 1990s Snapple advertised its exotic flavors with its reoccurring spokeswoman the Snapple Lady, who was played by the company's own employee Wendy Kaufman. An illustration of Kaufman was featured on the bottle of Snapple Orange Tropic; it showed a reposed Snapple Lady wearing a floral dress against a tropical island backdrop. In many of the Snapple TV commercials the Snapple Lady simply answered the letters of real-life Snapple fans. The brand had a serious setback after being purchased by the cereal giant the Quaker Oats Company in December 1994. For two years Quaker Oats released high-budget commercials without the Snapple Lady, hoping to draw customers away from cola giants such as Coca-Cola and Pepsi. The strategy backfired, and advertising analysts lambasted Quaker Oats for misconstruing Snapple's brand identity. During Quaker Oats' two-year control of the brand Snapple sales declined 21 percent. Snapple was finally sold to Triarc Companies in 1997, and that year the Snapple Lady resurfaced as the brand's spokeswoman.

Throughout the 1990s the slogan "Got Milk?" grew more popular than slogans used by the competition. Pepsi advertised its flagship beverage, Pepsi, with a $500 million campaign titled "Generation Next," created by the ad agency BBDO New York in 1997. The world's largest soft-drink manufacturer, the Coca-Cola Company, spent $500 million on just its sporting-event advertisements in 1996. Despite the competition's deep pockets, "Got Milk?" proved more recognizable to consumers throughout the decade. According to the U.S. Newswire, 9 out of 10 Americans could identify the phrase in 2003.

MARKETING STRATEGY

There were three objectives to the "Got Milk?" campaign: to change the public's behavior regarding milk; to create the idea of "milk occasions" by associating the product with certain foods; and to curb the decline in sales by convincing people to buy milk more often and in larger quantities. Changing behavior, in addition to attitudes, was done with carefully placed media. A consumption strategy focused on coordinating the appropriate food with the time of day that a commercial was aired (for example, a cereal commercial in the morning or late at night), because most milk drinking occurred at home.

The campaign's first spots aired on October 29, 1993. "Aaron Burr," one of the 60-second debut spots, featured a man eating a peanut-butter sandwich and listening to a radio trivia contest. When the DJ asked, "Who shot Alexander Hamilton?" the man looked at the portrait on his wall that showed Burr and the bullet he had used to kill Hamilton. Because he was out of milk the history buff garbled, "Aaawwon Buuuhh," with a mouth full of peanut butter. The spot ended with the "Got Milk?" tagline. In 1997 the campaign included a series of black-and-white spots set in the fictional town of Drysville, where town officials had enforced a prohibition of milk. In 2002 the CMPB sparked media attention when the organization promised to donate heavily to the school board of the first Californian town that changed its name to "Got Milk?" None of the towns petitioned changed their names. The campaign then parodied Major League Baseball steroid abuse with a series of spots that featured athletes using milk as a performance-enhancement substance. After baseball authorities requested that the spots be stopped, "Got Milk?" advertised the high-calcium benefits of milk. In 2006 the campaign shifted into a humorous alien theme with spots featuring cows that had been abducted by aliens in search of milk.

GS&P intended to create a desire for the "complementary food item, then milk consumption would follow." The agency fashioned a kind of deprivation strategy, showing complementary food with no milk. Taking the milk away "provides the blow that links the action to a viewer's own refrigerator. The message is: go to the refrigerator, check the milk, make sure you have enough, if there isn't enough go and buy some, and maybe even have some right now." The ad agency heard focus-group anecdotes of eating complementary foods without milk to help them come up with creative ideas based on common, real-life experiences—"truths," as the creative team said, "that could then be dramatized to make them more impactful."

OUTCOME

According to the ad agency and the CMPB, the original objectives of the campaign were exceeded. Bruce Horowitz of the Los Angeles Times wrote in May 1994, ''Since the ad campaign began . . . it has developed a near-cult following.'' In the first three months the effort reached a 60 percent aided recall level. MARC reported that ''Got Milk?'' had overtaken the ''long-running 'Does a Body Good' campaign in top-of-mind awareness by mid-1994.''

The campaign objective to change behavior and increase milk consumption was also met. Nielsen panels found that household penetration had increased from 70 percent in 1993 to 74 percent in 1995. The Nielsen household panel results showed that, except for the first two months of the campaign, milk consumption in California increased over the previous year, while it declined nationally—the reverse of the situation before the campaign began.

By 1994 the sales decline reported by California milk processors in 1993 had been halted. According to Nielsen scanner data, California milk sales increased 7 percent from 1993 to 1994, while national sales figures were unchanged. A GS&P report noted that sales grew by 13.5 million gallons, or $34 million. The 3.5 percent decrease in 1993 sales, together with the 1994 percentages, represented ''a swing of 5.3 percent, or 40 million gallons, or $100 million dollars.'' The ''Got Milk?'' campaign made its mark in advertising by collecting nearly every industry award, including multiple Clio awards, several EFFIEs, a number of gold ADDY awards, a Silver Lion at the Cannes International Advertising Festival, and a David Ogilvy Research Award.

According to GS&P, a 1999 national survey revealed that awareness for the tagline ''Got Milk?'' was 12 times greater than the slogan for Pepsi, 6 times greater than the sports drink Gatorade's tagline ''Life's a sport. Drink it up,'' and 4 times greater than Coke's slogan ''Enjoy.'' Jeff Manning, executive director of the CMPB, explained in a 2003 issue of Brandweek, ''A brand's strength and power comes from the immovable belief that it will live forever. Start acting on that belief and every decision, every idea, every waking moment begins to take focus and direction. The same holds true for a campaign or a tagline. 'Got Milk?' will live forever because we, the dairy industry, will it so. Not very scientific, but true nonetheless.'' In 2003 the CMPB reported that the campaign had a 97 percent awareness rate in California.

FURTHER READING

Adelson, Andrea. ''Advertising.'' New York Times, June 14, 1994, p. D19.

''Beverages/Non-Carbonated: Calif. Fluid Milk Board.'' Brandweek, June 12, 1995, p. 12.

''Dairy Groups Reach 'Got Milk' Accord.'' New York Times, May 26, 1995, p. D4.

''Got Milk?'' Adweek (eastern ed.), August 5, 1996, Special Planning Section, p. 6.

Horovitz, Bruce. ''Meet the Milk Man.'' Los Angeles Times, May 27, 1994, p. E1.

Laue, Christine. ''Got a Catchy Ad?'' Omaha (NE) World-Herald, May 8, 2003, p. 1E.

Lazarus, George. ''Half 'n' Half Milk Promotion May Not Flow.'' Chicago Tribune, February 10, 1998, sect. 3, p. 3.

''Milk Campaign Expanding Markets.'' New York Times, November 3, 1994, p. D23.

Voight, Joan. ''Dairy's Queen.'' Adweek, April 14, 2003, p. 32.

———. ''Goodby Changes Tack on 'Got Milk?' '' Adweek (eastern ed.), September 1, 1997, p. 5.

Vranica, Suzanne, ''Advertising: Milk Campaign Drops Calcium Pitch,'' Wall Street Journal, October 12, 2005, p. B4.

Wynter, Leon E.. ''Business and Race: Group Finds Right Recipe for Milk Ads in Spanish.'' Wall Street Journal, March 6, 1996, p. B1.

Allison I. Porter
Kevin Teague

Calvin Klein Cosmetics Company

1325 Avenue of the Americas, 34th Fl.
New York, New York 10019
USA
Telephone: (212) 479-4300
Fax: (212) 479-4399
Web site: www.calvinklein.com

■■■

CK BE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Calvin Klein Cosmetics Company, a subsidiary of Coty, marketed fragrances under the name of Calvin Klein and cK. In August 1996 Paulanne Mancuso, CEO and president of Calvin Klein Cosmetics, announced the arrival of the latest cK unisex fragrance, cK be. The sequel to the company's extremely successful cK one, cK be was described as a "raceless, genderless, ageless, and shared statement." Each Calvin Klein ad campaign had its own characteristic image and its own particular target market. While the ads for cK one, Calvin Klein's first unisex fragrance, portrayed groups of young, multicultural, mostly androgynous urban men and women, the "cK be" campaign featured an intimate and raw close-up of the individuals within the cK one groups. According to Mancuso, "The 'cK be' campaign pulls you into these people's lives."

There were several similarities in the marketing of cK one and cK be, but the Calvin Klein marketers went further in launching cK be. The advertising of cK one involved images of sharing, groups, and similarities, whereas that of cK be was based on the idea of having the freedom to express oneself while living among a group and about the values and the lifestyles of the generation being portrayed. Whereas cK one was billed as "a fragrance for a man or a woman," cK be was described as "the new fragrance for people."

The ads, which were the creation of Calvin Klein's in-house advertising agency, CRK Advertising, were shot by the photographer Richard Avedon. He featured both well-known and unknown subjects in the commercials and black-and-white portraits. The portraits were paired with "be" statements such as "Be good. Be bad. Just be" and "Be shy. Be bold. Just be." Some magazines ran multipage ads in which the first page was all black with the statement "to be" printed in white. The next page or two contained only black-and-white portraits, while the last page, which also was black, had the words "or not be" printed in white. The last page was also accompanied by a portrait and a pull-apart scented tab.

Avedon took care to portray his models as real, imperfect people. He had the models look directly into the camera as if they were speaking revealingly and intimately about themselves. Most of the models were unusual looking, with many having tattoos and body piercings, and some appeared unkempt. In short, they did not fit the fashion industry's idea of all-American beauty, the type that usually graced slick magazine ads. Perhaps the most recognizable spokesperson for the "cK be" campaign was the model Kate Moss, who bared all of her blemishes and freckles while she also bared her soul. The photograph of Stacey McKenzie emphasized unforgettable lips, freckles, and hair. Other subjects included Theo Kogan, a member of the alternative band Lunachicks; Jason Olive, a popular African American model; and Vincent Gallo, a musician, actor, and writer and director.

The text of the ads was equally provocative. The guitarist Billy White announced, "I find whatever's in my mind is better kept up there. You know what I mean?" In one of the longer ads for cK be a young man told viewers, "You could get hurt. You could get sick. You could do all these things, and if you don't have intimate relationships that are strong, you're really alone. But alone is something I know how to do. Intimacy comes and goes. Alone is forever. Be single. Be plural. Just be." The androgynous female Felix N'Yeurt proclaimed, "I never have to wait in line for the bathroom."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Calvin Klein, president and chief executive of Calvin Klein, Inc., said that he first found a fragrance and then created an image to fit it—"It all starts with the scent." If a company wanted to develop and sell a new fragrance, it contacted several manufacturers. When the desired scent was formulated, a national campaign was introduced to create the image the company's marketing specialists believed would best sell the product. According to Rudy Detz, president of Creative Fragrances Manufacturing, "Without the images associated with brand recognition, the perfume that sells for $150 an ounce simply wouldn't." Detz added, "No one just goes shopping for perfume. They go as a response to the national ads and will ask specifically for a brand." A specific image had already been created with the campaign for cK one, and after the perfume had been on the market for a time, Calvin Klein Cosmetics was able to learn a great deal about the social values, attitudes, and consumer habits of Generation Xers. Marketers knew exactly what to do and where to go when it was time to launch cK be.

The cK be fragrance was developed by Givaudan-Roure, with Ann Gottliebas consultant. The fragrance was described by Klein as sensual, sexy, and personal. In the fragrance industry scents were defined by what were called top, middle, and bottom notes, which were wrapped in a "peace accord." cK be's top note included bergamot, juniper berry, mandarin, mint, and lavender; its middle note was a blend of light spices, magnolia, and peach; and its bottom note was sandalwood with opoponax and tonka bean. According to the company, "cK be contains an exclusive peace accord, made up of clean white musks, that travel throughout the fragrance, wrapping all three notes in sheer sensuality."

Many of Calvin Klein's ad campaigns were controversial. One of his most memorable featured the model Brooke Shields, who, while photographed in various poses wearing Calvin Klein jeans, stated that nothing came between her and her Calvin's. Some of the company's ads were even characterized as "kiddy porn" or as "heroin chic." In contrast, some Calvin Klein ad campaigns portrayed happier, wholesome types. Ads for the Calvin Klein fragrance Eternity portrayed a young family, and those for the men's fragrance Contradiction focused on a virile 26-year-old man with three children. The women's version of Contradiction used the clean-cut model Christie Turlington and the caption "She is always and never the same."

Those who criticized the cK image as one that promoted "skankiness" may not have realized that symbols of Generation Xers such as tattoos (other than the hearts and butterflies of the 1960s), body piercing (other than ears), and Dr. Martens had practically become mainstream. Advertisers knew how to seduce someone in their target market, and one did not have to be a practicing addict to look like one. It was all about image.

TARGET MARKET

People over age 40 tended to use classic fragrances or to use a fragrance they had been using for years, but people between 25 and 40 were more experimental and tended to buy a variety of fragrances. An even younger crowd, those between 18 and 25, tended to buy newer fragrances and spent most of their money on themselves. While cK one targeted this younger group, market research showed that the fragrance was purchased by people as young as 12 and as old as 50. The hip urban image was clearly attractive to a wide age group. Nonetheless, marketers narrowed the target group for cK be to those between 18 and 29 and tailored its ad campaign accordingly. According to Klein, "The whole idea of the cK fragrances stems from Generation X, or people who think that way, who have a young attitude."

Marketers knew that there were always groups of potential consumers outside a specific target market. Perhaps cK be would be attractive to those who were "earth-conscious," for example. The bottle was made of recyclable glass, aluminum, and plastic, and the exterior packaging was constructed of 100 percent recycled fibers. For those who were attracted to an androgynous image, the store displays were no-frill. In both the men's and women's cosmetic areas cK be was displayed on free-standing shelves, not behind a counter, making it highly accessible. Mimi Avins, fashion editor of the Los Angeles Times, suggested that the cK be image might be attractive to feminists and to former members of the counterculture, such as the hippies of the 1960s. Contrary to critics of cK images, Avins wrote, "Their subtext is the perfect antidote to the mendacity of the infuriatingly successful, The Rules: Time-Tested Secrets for Capturing the Heart of Mr. Right (Warner, 1996). If the lessons of that

ANTI-CALVIN KLEIN

Attacks on various aspects of Calvin Klein campaigns were not uncommon, with the charges often centering on the images used in the ads. There were even anti-Calvin Klein websites on the Internet. Nevertheless, his fragrances, fashion apparel, and home fashions remained among the most popular brands.

backward manual for mentally impaired Cosmo girls were distilled into cK be's haiku, it would read, 'Be fake. Be manipulative. Be gamey. Don't just be.' The Rules advises desperate women to hide behind a false image of perfection for as long as they can hold the pose. The cK be confessions champion honesty, an appropriate tack in this age of full disclosure . . . The generation that once didn't trust anyone over 30 is now skeptical of anyone who clings to an image that's too squeaky clean.''

COMPETITION

In 1995 Americans spent $5 billion on fragrances. Approximately 60 percent of the market was in women's fragrances, with the remaining in men's, but it was women who purchased the majority of all scents. It was estimated that more than a hundred new fragrances were introduced every year, with advertisers spending millions of dollars on a new scent before it ever hit the retail market. There were classic scents such as Chanel No. 5, Joy by Jean Patou, Arpege by Lanvin, and Shalimar by Geurlain, all of which had been around for years and did not need aggressive advertising. Some fragrances could be purchased only at certain exclusive retail stores, while other could be found at department stores and at duty-free shops. Still others were sold in drugstores, supermarkets, and discount stores. The points of purchase often reflected exclusivity, trendiness, and price.

cK be had an introductory budget of $20 million, compared to cK one's $17-18 million, which may have given it the largest budget for any of the so-called prestige fragrances introduced in 1996. The introductory budget for Elizabeth Taylor's Passion, for example, was between $4 million and $6 million. Other prestige fragrances introduced at the same time included Ocean Dream by Giorgio Beverly Hills and Cosby Estee Lauder. Some consumers may have been confused by the fact that, at the time cK be was launched, Bebe also introduced its new fragrance, called 2be. Like Calvin Klein, other clothing designers such as Ralph Lauren, Perry Ellis, and Tommy Hilfiger were also introducing fragrances for both men and women, often to go along with a line of apparel. Also riding on the designer fragrance bandwagon were apparel stores such as Gap, American Eagle, Abercrombie & Fitch, and even Eddie Bauer, all of which had introduced fragrances with their own particular images. What was new about the cK fragrance line was that the same scent was marketed for both men and women.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Even before cK be was in stores, teaser ads appeared on billboards, on the sides of buses, and on bus shelters. Other outdoor advertising included images projected onto a surface comprised of a thin mist of water (hydro-illumination) and the world's largest air banner, which was flown over selected beaches during the 1996 Labor Day weekend.

During the launch period cK be scent strips were put in a variety of magazines popular with young women, including Cosmopolitan, Vogue, YM, and W, and in magazines read mostly by men, including GQ and Playboy. The scent strips were also put in magazines like Vanity Fair, which had a balance of male and female readership, and in magazines like Spin, Vibe, Paper, and Ray Gun, which had a large young male and female readership. In total, cK be was advertised in 48 publications. About a month or so before the fragrance was due to be stocked in stores, full-page ads depicting the brand concepts of individuality and freedom began to appear in magazines. There were also 30-second radio spots, and billboards and posters appeared in some 15 markets. In September 1996 the Avedon commercials debuted during the season premieres of several television shows popular with the target market, including The X-Files, Friends, Melrose Place, and Suddenly Susan.

Perhaps the most significant marketing strategy was an innovative promotional deal between Calvin Klein Cosmetics and Ticketmaster. Calvin Klein's Mancuso thought that ''taking the scent to where these guys live'' was an effective way to reach their target market. Ads for cK be were printed on the backs of tickets and in Live, the Ticketmaster magazine. Both the tickets and their envelopes were scented with cK be, with 9 million tickets being been sold during September and October 1996 alone. Another innovative departure from the traditional scent strips found in magazines was the distribution of 4 million wristbands with resealable fragrance strips. In addition, 3 million sample vials of cK be were attached to magnets and distributed at various events, concerts, and stores. To attain additional direct contact with the target market, Calvin Klein Cosmetics helped sponsor, along with Tower Records and Rolling Stone magazine, a 15-day nationwide tour featuring three of Capitol Records' newest alternative bands—The Figgs, Smoking Popes, and Jimmy Eat World.

OUTCOME

cK be was the most successful of all fragrances launched in 1996, and it did well both in the U.S. and in global markets. It was expected to generate $30 million during the first season but actually generated $45 million. Further, cK be placed in the number 10 spot among all fragrance brands in 1996. In 1997, however, cK be ranked number 21 and by mid-1998 had dropped to number 51. In addition to having success in sales, the Calvin Klein marketers continued to impress the fragrance industry and consumers with their use of provocative advertising.

FURTHER READING

Albers Jackson, Barbara. "It's Time to Raise a Stink about That cK be Perfume Ad." Tennessean, October 24, 1996.

Avins, Mimi. "By Letting Be, Klein's Ads Break the Rules." St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 2, 1997.

Born, Pete. "Calvin's New Contradiction." Women's Wear Daily, June 12, 1998, p. 29.

———. "cK be: Chart Buster's Sequel." Women's Wear Daily, May 24, 1996, p. 6.

———. "An Industry with Be's in Its Bonnet." Women's Wear Daily, August 30, 1996, p. 4.

Do Re Be Women's Wear Daily, August 23, 1996.

Elliott, Stuart. "Campaign for New cK Emphasizes Youthful Look." Harrisburg Patriot, August 20, 1996.

———. "$20 Million Plus Ad Campaign Kicks Off New Klein Scent." Ottawa Citizen, September 12, 1996.

Kroh, Joseph. "The Sweet Smell of Success: Millions of Advertising Dollars Are Behind All Those High-Priced Colognes and Perfumes." Business First of Louisville, September 2, 1996.

Christine Miner Minderovic

Campbell Soup Company

1 Campbell Place
Camden, New Jersey 08103-1799
USA
Telephone: (856) 342-4800
Fax: (856) 342-3878
Web site: www.campbellsoup.com www.pepperidgefarm.com

■■■

GOLDFISH CRACKERS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Pepperidge Farm, Inc.'s Goldfish crackers, introduced in 1962, had by 2004 evolved into a megabrand available in more than 24 individual flavors and varieties, from the original cheddar to peanut-butter-filled sandwich crackers and crispy rounds. At the end of that year Goldfish sales in the United States were $168.5 million, making it the number two snack-cracker brand behind Nabisco's Ritz crackers. But despite its ranking the Goldfish brand was slipping; in 2004 sales of the crackers dipped 8.3 percent from the previous year.

To lift its iconic brand out of the doldrums, Pepperidge Farm, a division of the Campbell Soup Company, looked beyond its agency of record—Young & Rubicam Advertising in New York—for creative help. The company charged BrightHouseLive, a small Atlanta-based agency known for its unique approach to marketing and advertising, with developing a clever new marketing campaign for the Goldfish brand. BrightHouseLive created a television-focused campaign that featured an animated goldfish character named Finn. The campaign, which began in January 2005, also included in-store and online marketing and new packaging for the Goldfish crackers. A budget for the campaign was not announced, but according to TNS Media Intelligence/CMR, a unit of the United Kingdom–based market research firm Taylor Nelson Sofres, in 2003 Pepperidge Farm spent $16.3 million on advertising for its Goldfish brand, a figure that was almost unchanged from its spending in 2002.

The new campaign, as well as its spokescharacter, Finn, seemed to resonate with consumers and helped increase sales of Goldfish crackers by about 5 percent within several months of its launch. Media insiders also praised the campaign, using a variety of adjectives to describe Finn, from lovable and funny to spunky and irreverent. Additionally the Campbell Soup Company credited the campaign and its spokescharacter with boosting Pepperidge Farm's sales in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

According to its website, Pepperidge Farm's humble beginnings in 1937 were in the kitchen of Margaret Rudkin, the mother of three children. To ease the allergies of one of her children, the industrious mom began baking bread for her family that contained none of the preservatives or artificial ingredients found in commercially baked bread. Her efforts in the kitchen soon evolved into a small business named for the family farm in Connecticut: Pepperidge Farm. The first product, whole-wheat bread, gained in popularity with consumers and in the 1940s, as the business grew, the line was expanded to include oatmeal bread, dinner rolls, and stuffing mix. The peripatetic Rudkin also added to the product line by collecting recipes during her international travels, including European-style cookies that she discovered while traveling in Belgium in the 1950s. In 1961 the Campbell Soup Company acquired Pepperidge Farm. The following year Goldfish crackers were introduced after Rudkin discovered the snack cracker during a trip to Switzerland and returned with the recipe and permission to market it.

© ENVISION/CORBIS.

Ogilvy & Mather had served as the Pepperidge Farm ad agency for 40 years. In 1995 it resigned from the Pepperidge Farm and Goldfish crackers account, reportedly because of a business conflict, and agency Saatchi & Saatchi/New York took over the account. When a smiling face was added to the original goldfish in 1997, ''Smiley'' the Goldfish icon was born. Saatchi & Saatchi created the accompanying tagline, ''The snack that smiles back.'' In 1998, following a consolidation by the brand's parent company, Campbell Soup, Young & Rubicam Advertising in New York won the Goldfish account. The agency introduced a new campaign for Goldfish crackers in 2003 that included the theme song ''Jingle for Goldfish.'' The campaign, which targeted kids 8 to 12 years old, featured two scruffy, longhaired musicians playing acoustic guitars and singing the jingle. Television spots placed the singing duo in a variety of settings, including on a school bus and in a classroom. At the request of Pepperidge Farm, Atlanta-based BrightHouseLive joined the team in 2004. BrightHouseLive created an updated campaign for Goldfish crackers that featured a new animated spokes-character, Finn the goldfish. The campaign was released in January 2005.

TARGET MARKET

Any parent, babysitter, or other person who had ever quieted a fussy toddler with a cup of Goldfish crackers could appreciate the value of the tasty fish-shaped treat. But with the new campaign featuring Finn, a personable animated goldfish, the goal was to help create an even closer bond between the popular Pepperidge Farm brand and the children who enjoyed Goldfish crackers. As an added benefit, the clever spots connected with the adults who purchased the product. The animated Finn also was designed to continue Goldfish crackers' appeal to tweens—kids 8 to 12 years old—and teens who had been given the fish-shaped crackers as toddlers but had perhaps stopped eating them in favor of other snacks. To further reach its target market, Pepperidge Farm introduced a Goldfish website, www.pfgoldfish.com, that enabled older kids to go online and play games featuring Finn. The site also offered a variety of activities that parents or caregivers could play with kids aged three to five years old, such as determining how many goldfish crackers tall the child was. In addition, new packaging (the milk-carton box was replaced with a bag similar to what was used for other products in the line) added to the appeal of the brand for consumers of all ages.

GOLDFISH CRACKERS REPLACED WITH COOKIES ON BOOK COVER

Pepperidge Farm's Goldfish crackers could be found almost everywhere, from the lunch boxes of elementary school kids to strategic placement in the movie Christmas with the Kranks. But when the fish-shaped cracker appeared on the cover of a new novel, the waters got choppy. The book, Little Children by Tom Perrotta, was about what happened in a suburban neighborhood when a convicted child molester moved in. To the dismay of Pepperidge Farm, featured on the cover of the novel were Goldfish crackers. The book's publisher, St. Martin's Press, had failed to get permission to use the crackers on the cover, so the book cover got a makeover: the Goldfish crackers swimming across the front of the book were replaced with chocolate-chip cookies.

COMPETITION

In the snack-cracker wars, flavor, as always, was paramount, but in the early 2000s part of the battle was about the shape of the cracker. Pepperidge Farm's fish-shaped crackers were near the top of the list, with 98 percent of Americans surveyed saying that they recognized and were familiar with Goldfish crackers. Nabisco, which claimed one of the top spots in the snack-cracker market with its Ritz brand, went one step too far in its competition with Pepperidge Farm when it introduced its own fish-shaped crackers in 1998. Nabisco's new crackers were planned as a tie-in to the Nickelodeon television network's program CatDog. The new crackers resulted in a lawsuit, pitting Nabisco against Pepperidge Farm. The latter alleged that Nabisco's new crackers infringed on its Goldfish brand trademark. In 2000 a federal court upheld Pepperidge Farm's claim and ordered Nabisco to discontinue production of its fish-shaped cracker. Later in 2000 Kraft Foods acquired the Nabisco brand for $18.9 billion. While Nabisco's Ritz cracker brand claimed the number one spot in the snack-cracker market at the end of 2004, with $232.6 million in annual U.S. sales, the company was still looking for a niche in the shaped-cracker market. Nabisco introduced dinosaur-shaped puffed crackers under its Ritz brand in 2005. The new Ritz Dinosaur crackers were created in direct response to Pepperidge Farm's Goldfish crackers and targeted the same young consumers and their parents.

In 2005 the Kellogg Company introduced its own character-shaped cracker under its Keebler Sunshine cracker brand, Cheez-It. Rather than a fish or prehistoric creature, however, Keebler Sunshine's new crackers were shaped like the cartoon character SpongeBob SquarePants and directly targeted the kids who munched on Ritz Dinosaur and Pepperidge Farm Goldfish crackers. Targeting an older audience, in 2004 Kellogg introduced Twisterz, another variation on its Cheez-It crackers. The new shape, a twisted cylinder rather than the traditional square, was launched in time for the end of college basketball season and included combination flavors designed to please college-age consumers: Cheddar & More Cheddar, Hot Wings & Cheesy Blue, and Cool Ranch & Cheddar. The new product launch was supported by a marketing campaign created by Leo Burnett/Chicago and continued the brand's tagline, ''Get your own box.'' With $140.1 million in sales, the Cheez-It cracker brand ranked fourth in the snack-cracker market at the end of 2004.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Although New York–based Young & Rubicam Advertising remained the agency of record for Goldfish crackers and other Pepperidge Farm brands, in 2004, when Pepperidge Farm wanted to put a different spin on the advertising for the fish-shaped cracker and update the brand, it partnered with BrightHouseLive, an agency based in Atlanta, Georgia. BrightHouseLive had opened its doors in 2003 but had quickly earned a reputation for devising unusual advertising campaigns. The creative idea developed by the agency was a primarily television campaign that featured an animated goldfish named Finn. A specific budget for the campaign was unavailable, but according to a report in Adweek, in 2004 Pepperidge Farm spent approximately $14 million from January through September on advertising for the Goldfish cracker brand.

Prior to the creation of the campaign Pepperidge Farm devoted more than one year to conducting market research about Goldfish crackers. Included were interviews with mothers and children to determine what the brand meant to consumers. The company also worked with Character, a leading character-development agency within the film industry, to help establish the personality of the new spokescharacter, Finn.

For the campaign BrightHouseLive created a series of four 30-second and three 15-second television spots. The initial two 30-second spots, which were first aired in January 2005, highlighted Goldfish crackers' cheddar-flavored variety. Subsequent spots featured the brand's Flavor Blasted and Sandwich Snackers varieties. Each spot showed Finn interacting with other Goldfish crackers as he made plans to help protect them from being eaten by hungry humans reaching for a snack. Finn warned, ''To avoid being eaten, you've got to avoid the bowl, avoid the baggies. Cool?'' One spot had Finn's advice being ignored by the other Goldfish crackers. As the crackers laughed and jumped into a bowl on a kitchen counter, a person reached into the bowl and took a handful of the crackers. A voice-over stated: ''Tasty Goldfish crackers, baked with real cheddar cheese. It's a wonder they're not extinct.'' Finn sighed and returned to the package to try again to warn the remaining Goldfish crackers about how to avoid becoming a snack for humans. The spot ended with Finn exclaiming, ''So much for fish being brain food.''

In addition to television spots, the campaign included in-store advertising and Internet promotions on a new website for the product that featured games and activities for kids to play alone or with their parents. As part of a brand update, the company designed new packaging for the crackers. In an interview reported in Business Wire prior to the release of the campaign, Pepperidge Farm's vice president of youth snacks, Steve White, said that, by bringing to life the familiar goldfish as the spokescharacter Finn, ''we feel confident that kids of all ages are going to love the character as much as they love the snack.''

OUTCOME

At the time of the new campaign's 2005 launch, Pepperidge Farm's Goldfish crackers were among the world's most popular snack crackers, with American consumers devouring more than 85 billion Goldfish crackers annually. Within six months of the start of the campaign Pepperidge Farm reported that sales of Goldfish crackers were up more than 5 percent. Parent company Campbell Soup also noted the success of the campaign in its third-quarter report for the period that ended May 2005. The report stated, ''Sales of 'Pepperidge Farm Goldfish' snack crackers experienced good gains due to continued momentum of the base brand and the favorable impact of new advertising featuring the new animated character, 'Finn.' '' Besides resonating with consumers and spurring sales, the campaign was well received by media insiders. Writing in the Chicago Sun-Times, Lewis Lazare described Finn as a lovable advertising icon that was ''funny and irreverent'' with ''spunk and soul.''

FURTHER READING

''Alien Invaders Attack with a Vengeance.'' Snack Food & Wholesale Bakery, June 1, 2005.

Baar, Aaron. ''Jingle Backs Intro of Cheez-It Twisterz.'' Adweek, April 5, 2004.

Elliott, Stuart. ''Campbell Soup Is Looking Beyond Its Big Agency for Ideas to Pump Up the Sales of Goldfish.'' New York Times, November 24, 2004, p. 5.

Janoff, Barry. ''Pepperidge Farm Floats Fish Story.'' Adweek, January 18, 2005.

Jones, Malcolm. ''Fiction: New Snack Attack.'' Newsweek, May 24, 2004.

Lazare, Lewis. ''Hair-Brained Cartoon Ad a Disconnect.'' Chicago Sun-Times, January 11, 2005.

Lee, Richard. ''Norwalk, Conn.-Based Pepperidge Farm Places Goldfish in 'Kranks' Movie.'' Stamford (CT) Advocate, December 18, 2004.

Lovel, Jim. ''BHL Brings Goldfish Snack to Animated Life.'' Adweek, January 7, 2005.

Malovany, Dan. ''Snack Attack: Many Cracker Manufacturers Are Adding New Products, Promotions and Marketing Programs that Not-Too-Subtly Resembles the Successful Strategies Used by Traditional Salted Snack Producers.'' Snack Food & Wholesale Bakery, December 1, 2004.

McMains, Andrew. ''Pepperidge Farm Adds BrightHouse on Goldfish.'' Adweek, November 24, 2004.

''Pepperidge Farm Goldfish Character Brought to Life in New Advertising Campaign.'' Business Wire, January 10, 2005.

''Pepperidge Farm Hooks Animated Star.'' Brandweek, January 10, 2005.

Simon, Ellen. ''Nabisco, Pepperidge Farm Battle over Cheese-Cracker Rights.'' Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, January 19, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

MAKE IT CAMPBELL'S INSTEAD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Campbell Soup Company, long the dominant force in the American canned-soup market as well as a player in many other food and beverage categories, saw consistent sales losses in its all-important original Campbell's soup line throughout the 1990s and into the new millennium. These condensed soups still constituted the best-selling soup brand in the country and had one of the most recognizable labels in the world, the iconic red-and-white can, but condensed soup was being progressively upstaged by ready-to-eat brands (including Campbell's own Chunky soup) prized for their convenience. Having unsuccessfully tried numerous tactics in the attempt to revive its core business, Campbell's in 2003 hit on a combination of manufacturing, packaging, shelving, and communications tactics that positioned it to make an integrated bid, on behalf of all of its soup products, for consumers' attention. A major part of this effort was a decisive change in marketing tone, targeting, and strategy, embodied in the ''Make It Campbell's Instead'' campaign of 2003–4.

"Make It Campbell's Instead," crafted by Campbell's longtime ad agency BBDO New York, used an estimated $100 million budget and employed the conventions of reality television, which was extremely popular at the time, in a series of commercials designed to encourage the consideration of Campbell's full range of soups as replacements for a variety of meal types and snack foods. The spots were hosted by the pushy yet charming Gordon Elliott, the star of his own Food Network reality show, in which he stopped passersby and knocked on strangers' doors, asking them to try dishes that he himself cooked. The Campbell's commercials used this same premise—with Elliott intruding on ordinary families at mealtime, drivers of cars stopped at intersections, and the homes of celebrities—in order to suggest the consumption of a particular Campbell's soup variety.

"Make It Campbell's Instead" made a crucial contribution to the ongoing attempt to revitalize the Campbell Soup Company, an attempt that saw its first signs of success during the campaign's run. In 2004 the company's famed condensed-soup line saw its first sales gains since the 1980s, surprising analysts who had predicted the brand's continued decline.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Campbell's soup, long one of America's most recognizable packaged foods, fell precipitously out of favor with consumers in the 1990s and early 2000s. The demand for ever-more-convenient food products translated into the ascendance of ready-to-eat soups such as the Campbell Soup Company's own Chunky and Select brands and General Mills' Progresso. Such products took market share away from the Campbell's condensed varieties, which were sold in the famous red-and-white can—an ironic development considering the fact that a primary attribute of Campbell's condensed soups had always been the ease with which they could be prepared. Though Chunky and Select posted consistent sales gains, the core brand, condensed soup, accounted for approximately 70 percent of the company's soup operations and 35 percent of its profits, so Campbell remained committed to reviving it. In the 1990s and early 2000s the marketing strategy for Campbell's soup—with creative work chiefly crafted by ad agency BBDO New York—underwent drastic revision almost yearly, as did the roster of Campbell executives charged with reviving the brand. Industry observers characterized these changes as desperate attempts to update the product's image, and corporate analysts predicted that the declines in condensed-soup sales would continue indefinitely.

In 2002 Campbell launched a new product line, Soup at Hand, America's first "sippable" soup, which was packaged in a microwaveable container designed to fit in a person's hand for on-the-go consumption. This increase in portability, positioning soup to compete against snack and fast foods generally perceived as less wholesome and nutritious, translated into the company's most successful product launch since the introduction of the Chunky variety almost 30 years earlier. Meanwhile, the company's new president of U.S. soup, Jeremy Fingerman, encouraged innovation in Campbell's soup advertising. Long pitched to stay-at-home moms via wholesome TV imagery, the brand in late 2002 targeted college students with wry outdoor ads in select cities—Boston, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati—as a means of testing the core brand's ability to grow market share outside its traditional audience. In 2003 Campbell's attempt to assure consumers that soup was, as Fingerman put it in an interview with Advertising Age, "the superior simpler meal," gained further momentum. It included such measures as the reformulation of the condensed soups' recipes, the addition of pop-top lids to the condensed-soup cans, the introduction of new Soup at Hand flavors, the offering of Chunky and Select in microwaveable containers, and a renewed focus on supermarket shelving strategies.

TARGET MARKET

"Make It Campbell's Instead" was rooted in the company's attempt to convince consumers that soup was a better option for those seeking a simple and healthy meal. BBDO and Campbell used reality-based TV spots, some of which were scripted and some of which were not, to update the soup brands' images and make them seem relevant to "today's diverse consumer population," as president of Campbell North America, Larry McWilliams, said in a press release. The reality-based approach was, industry observers noted, a significant departure from Campbell's heritage as a traditional advertiser targeting stay-at-home moms with images of wholesome domesticity.

The commercials featured a single spokesperson, the Australian-born Gordon Elliott, star of the Food Network show Door Knock Dinners. Modeled on that program, in which the pushy but charismatic Elliott confronted people at home or on the street and asked them to eat a meal that he had prepared, the Campbell's spots showed Elliott urging strangers and celebrities to try Campbell's soup products in place of other snack or meal options. Individual commercials targeted different audiences, depending on the object of Elliott's attentions. While the spot that showed Elliott intruding on the home of TV personality and restaurateur B. Smith appealed to adult women, spots in which Elliott focused his antics on younger people were meant to appeal to

M'M! M'M! GOOD! TO GO

In early 2003, prior to the "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign, Campbell unveiled a marketing, packaging, and promotions platform uniting its portable lines of soups. Recasting the well-known Campbell's slogan, "M'm! M'm! Good!"—which dated from the 1930s—the "M'm! M'm! Good! To Go" initiative consisted of the introduction of single-serve microwaveable soups as well as the inclusion of the Campbell's Soup at Hand "sippable" brand under the new "To Go" banner. Packaging and in-store materials directed attention to the convenience-enhancing innovations of the "M'm! M'm! Good! To Go" products, and a significant portion of Campbell's overall advertising budget was devoted to spreading awareness about the new and repackaged products. The "M'm! M'm! Good! To Go" soups represented one of the most promising avenues for Campbell's growth, and their inclusion in the umbrella "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign increased the credibility of that broader effort's primary claim, which was that Campbell's products were a convenient and wholesome substitute for a wide range of meals and snacks.

kids. For instance, Elliott played basketball with the 16-year-old rapper Bow Wow in one commercial for Campbell's Chicken Noodle Soup. Other spots supported newly developed Soup at Hand varieties expressly developed for children, such as Pizza, Taco, and Mexican noodle flavors. The campaign marked Campbell's first sustained targeting of children.

COMPETITION

In addition to being an internally significant change in strategy, the fact that Campbell aimed its soup advertising at children was a noteworthy development in the intensifying competition with rival soup brand Progresso. Progresso's most successful recent advertising campaign, and its first to include national TV commercials, attempted to make the case that Campbell's was kids' fare but that Progresso—which was not condensed and claimed, for instance, such attributes as white meat and chunky vegetables in its chicken noodle variety—was worthy of adult palates. Launched in 1998, the Progresso campaign was called "Discover the Better Taste of Progresso," and it targeted women aged 25 to 54. One TV spot showed a male office worker eating Chicken & Stars soup from a bowl, which was positioned alongside a juvenile lunchbox and a can clearly meant to suggest Campbell's. A female coworker approached the man and said, "You know, Chicken & Stars used to be my favorite. Then I learned to ride a two-wheeler. Come on, you're an adult now. There's a better tasting soup." Print ads took the comparative concept even further, identifying Campbell's by name. Progresso sales climbed by 12 percent during the 1998–9 soup season—fall through spring—and research indicated that a large proportion of these sales increases could be attributed to the campaign. Progresso's gains were likewise in line with the industry-wide trend away from condensed soups. By 2003 Progresso's annual sales had climbed to $424 million, a marked improvement over its 1998 total of $258 million.

Progresso's most direct competitor was not Campbell's condensed lines, however, but Campbell's Chunky brand, which likewise employed messages of food quality and flourished at least partly at the expense of the original Campbell's brand. Chunky's most recent advertising retained the long-running tagline "The soup that eats like a meal" and featured professional football players being accosted by their mothers (usually played by actors), who used various humorous ruses to ensure that their sons were eating Chunky soup. Launched in 1997, the campaign ran for many years, corresponding with a period of enormous Chunky sales growth, despite the fact that industry critics typically disliked the spots' lack of subtlety and unsophisticated attempts at humor.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Make It Campbell's Instead," which ran on television during the 2003–4 soup season—fall through spring—at an estimated cost of $100 million, represented a sizable risk for Campbell, because it departed from the company's previous advertising in more ways than one. The tonal dissimilarity of the irreverent, reality-based TV spots to the emotional, family-oriented advertising of Campbell's more successful past was perhaps the most obvious change in the eyes of consumers, but the unification of Campbell's full line of soups under one advertising platform was an important strategic shift as well. Larry McWilliams stated in a press release, "[W]e're single-minded in our focus to change how people think about soup. A unified platform will maximize the impact and efficiency of both our message and our media buying . . . Our aim is to shake consumers up with a very different creative effort that will get them thinking about soup in new ways." The campaign also featured far more individual spots than a typical Campbell's campaign, which allowed the ad agency to use a variety of different pitches tailored to specific targets and products. This comparatively drastic rethinking of the company's advertising strategy was supported by the changes in product formulation, packaging, and shelving that had recently been announced.

The TV spots were shot on location with small crews using handheld video cameras instead of film, a strategy aimed at generating a look of immediacy that was in keeping with the reality TV shows of the time. The first spot was called "Anthem," and it showed host Elliott confronting a succession of ordinary people in an office setting and on a street, asking them to try the Campbell's products newly available in microwaveable containers. Other unscripted commercials showed Elliott barging into real families' homes during meals and arguing that they should "Make it Campbell's instead" and putting Soup at Hand containers in the hands of drivers stopped at street intersections. Reflecting on the usefulness of these encounters for the purposes of advertising, Elliott told Advertising Age, "Nothing works better than letting real people tell you what they think."

These commercials alternated with others featuring celebrities who were paired with specific brands in ways that leveraged the appeal each had among particular groups of TV viewers. Elliott arrived at the home of trendsetting New York restaurateur B. Smith in one commercial, with the suggestion that she try Campbell's Select Italian Wedding soup, one of the company's most popular upmarket offerings, rather than cold sandwiches. In another commercial Elliott traveled to the Indiana home of the Dilley sextuplets, where he demonstrated for the benefit of the six siblings and their parents various ways of creating interesting new meals by adding common household mixings and toppings to Campbell's Tomato Soup. In the spot featuring rapper Bow Wow, Elliott and the 16-year-old star squared off for a game of one-on-one basketball, with the winner to receive a meal of Campbell's Chicken Noodle Soup. In a slight twist on the other commercials' concept, one spot showed Sandra Lee, who had her own Food Network show and was the author of the best-selling cookbook Semi-Homemade Meals (in which she offered recipes that used ready-made products such as Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup), instructing Elliott in the preparation of Campbell's Seafood Tomato Alfredo.

The commercials depended, for much of their effectiveness, on Elliott's personality and his ability to generate off-the-cuff humor and enthusiasm for the brand. Leavening his brazen intrusiveness with charm and poise, Elliott was able to disarm participants in the unscripted spots, and he showed considerable personal magnetism onscreen. His behavior in the commercials was meant to seem a daring update of the long-established advertising practice of employing spokespeople.

OUTCOME

The "Make It Campbell's Instead" concept remained in place through 2004, and the company put particular emphasis on extending the appeals to children, preteens, and teens that had first been tested in the Elliott-helmed commercials. Campbell also adapted the "Make It Campbell's Instead" theme to its new Carb Request soups, aimed at low-carbohydrate dieters, and to a series of Soup at Hand efforts aimed at women who tended to skip or skimp on lunch. Overall Campbell's change in approach—from marketing within the soup category to marketing its products as the answer to a wide variety of snack and mealtime occasions—was credited with spurring the company's long-awaited turnaround, and this change was substantially driven by the "Make It Campbell's Instead" campaign. In 2004, for the first time since the 1980s, Campbell's core condensed-soup brand not only stabilized its losses but also showed sales gains, topping the $1 billion mark in total sales. Campbell's company-wide sales growth began outpacing analysts' predictions, and the company was finally credited with arriving at a workable model for generating sustained success in an evolving soup marketplace.

FURTHER READING

Atkinson, Claire. "Campbell Pits FCB, Roster Shops." Advertising Age, December 30, 2002.

Cassidy, Hilary. "Campbell Soup Hot for Sports; Mr. Phelps Accepts New Mission." Brandweek, December 8, 2003.

Ellison, Sarah, and Suzanne Vranica. "Campbell Warms Campaign to Heal Soup Sales—Reversal of Slide Is Vital as Restructuring Proceeds." Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2002.

Garfield, Bob. "Four Campaigns Demonstrate the True Meaning of Creative." Advertising Age, December 8, 2003.

Reyes, Sonia. "Campbell Soup Bolsters Ad Team." Adweek, November 10, 2003.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Campbell Bets $100 Million on Edgy Ad Effort." Advertising Age, August 4, 2003.

———. "Campbell Flagship Suffers Sales Slide." Advertising Age, September 16, 2002.

———. "Campbell Soup Chief Energizes Marketing." Advertising Age, January 27, 2003.

———. "Mobile Meals Gaining." Advertising Age, June 23, 2003.

———. "Souping Up a Classic." Advertising Age, May 2, 2005.

Mark Lane

Canadian Film Centre

Windfields
2489 Bayview Avenue
Toronto, Ontario M2L 1A8
Canada
Telephone: (416) 445-1446
Fax: (416) 445-9481
E-mail: info@cdnfilmcentre.com
Web site: www.cdnfilmcentre.com

■■■

2004 TORONTO WORLDWIDE SHORT FILM FESTIVAL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The 2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival was the tenth in this series of prestigious events. The festival was sponsored by the Canadian Film Centre, a nonprofit organization based in Toronto that was dedicated to preparing future generations of filmmakers. Because the festival relied on government and corporate funding for its survival, growth from year to year was important. It was also important that the festival develop and maintain an identity separate from that of the noted Toronto International Film Festival, which was dedicated to feature-length films. Although they shared a home city, the two festivals were not connected.

The Canadian Film Centre worked with Taxi, a Toronto-based agency, to develop a campaign promoting the 2004 festival. Taxi did the work pro bono, continuing a relationship between the festival and the agency that dated to 2000. The campaign was built around a series of humorous television spots, broadcast on Canadian cable stations, that were designed to draw in a wide audience of moviegoers. Because the spots were done on behalf of a nonprofit center, they were considered public-service announcements, and the airtime, estimated to be worth about $3 million, was donated by the stations. One group of commercials featured a character named Ian Heidegger, a pretentious acting-teacher who demonstrated various techniques, which were invariably absurd, for performing in short films. One spot, titled ''Special FX,'' featured Heidegger walking around with a cigarette stuck to his pants as a ''special effect'' for generating smoke. Taxi also created spots that underscored the fact that the festival was devoted to short films. At the same time, the spots cited aspects in common between short films and full-length features, such as special effects, to emphasize the similarity between the two mediums.

Like previous campaigns created by Taxi on the behalf of the festival, the 2004 spots were considered to be a success. Attendance continued to climb at a consistent pace—it had risen about 25 percent every year since Taxi began working with the festival—and submissions continued to come in from around the world. The campaign was also a hit with critics, and the ''Special FX'' spot won a 2005 Gold Clio Award. This was, however, the last campaign created by Taxi for the festival. In 2005, citing other commitments, the agency declined an offer to continue the relationship.

A scene from an Ian Heidegger commercial for the 2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival. PHOTO COURTESY OF TAXI CANADA.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival was sponsored by the Canadian Film Centre, based in Toronto. The center was founded in 1988 by Norman Jewison, a Canadian native who had achieved success in Hollywood. It offered hands-on instruction to young Canadians who wanted to make a career in the film industry. The center typically took about 85 residents per year, all of whom received training from veterans of the film industry. The center's residents also collaborated on short film projects.

The center's 2004 festival was held from May 11 through May 16. It was the tenth year for the festival, and it featured entrants from around the world. As with past festivals, the entrants were grouped in two separate competitions, one for Canadian filmmakers and another for international participants. Although the festival was primarily designed to celebrate short films, it also served to promote the center.

The festival included films that were not entered in the competition itself. In 2004, for example, there was a screening of a short film titled Destino, a joint creation of the surrealist artist Salvador Dali and the animation pioneer Walt Disney. The project was begun in 1946, but it had been abandoned soon after. The film was finally finished by the Walt Disney Company in 2003, using storyboards and animation that remained from the original effort. Both Dali and Disney, of course, had died several decades before the film's completion. The festival also featured special programs, which in 2004 included a focus on Mexican films and a spotlight on music videos.

The festival was important for the city of Toronto in a number of ways. Tourism had suffered after Toronto experienced a mild outbreak of sudden acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) in 2003, and the 2004 festival served to help boost tourism in the city. In addition, along with the Toronto International Film Festival, the festival of short films continued to build upon Toronto's reputation as a major city for the art of film.

TARGET MARKET

The campaign for the Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival was specifically targeted at moviegoers, especially those who were thought to be inclined to go to film festivals. At the same time the campaign was broad based, aimed at attracting as large an audience as possible. Maintaining a solid attendance at festival events was important, since the Canadian Film Centre operated strictly on a nonprofit basis. This meant that much of the funding for both the center and the festival came from government grants and corporate donations. One way to ensure that grants and donations continued was to keep the festival growing. In addition, because those who attended were charged admission, higher attendance helped fund the festival and the center. All money raised went back into the festival budget, meaning that higher attendance offered the opportunity to screen more films in future festivals.

COMPETITION

While there was no direct competition to the Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival, since it was the only major event of its kind in the city, it was important that the festival try to prevent being eclipsed by the Toronto International Film Festival. Run by the Toronto

NORMAN JEWISON: A NORTHERN STAR

The Canadian Film Centre was founded in 1986 by the noted director and producer Norman Jewison in an effort to foster the film community of his native Canada. Born in 1926, Jewison received his education at the University of Toronto before embarking on a career in Hollywood. He was especially interested in exploring racism and racial issues, inspired in part by a journey across the Deep South of the United States during the Jim Crow era.

Jewison's best-known film, In the Heat of the Night (1967), dealt with America's racial politics head-on. The film starred Sidney Poitier and Rod Steiger as police officers who had to work together to find a murderer. Poitier played Virgil Tibbs, a Philadelphia police detective who, while on vacation in the South, was accused of murder by a local police chief, played by Rod Steiger. Eventually, despite mutual distrust, the two learned to cooperate in order to find the real killer. Other Jewison movies, such as The Hurricane (1999), which starred Denzel Washington, had similar themes. In this film, based on the life of Rubin Carter, an African-American boxer was wrongly accused of murder.

Other well-known Jewison films included the screen adaptations of Fiddler on the Roof (1971) and Jesus Christ Superstar (1973), as well as the 1968 hit The Thomas Crown Affair, which starred Steve McQueen. In recognition of his contributions to American film, Jewison received the Irving G. Thalberg Memorial Award at the 1998 Academy Awards ceremony.

International Film Festival Group, this latter event, which had begun in 1976, had over the years become one of the most prestigious film festivals in the world. In 1999, for example, the noted film critic Roger Ebert claimed that the Toronto International Film Festival was even more influential than the festival held in Cannes, France.

While the Toronto International Film Festival was held in the fall, after the festival of short films, it always threatened to overshadow the earlier event. For one thing full-length films had a greater hold on the public's imagination. Although a short film like Destino, the Dali-Disney collaboration, might hold interest for filmmakers, it could never achieve the audience enjoyed by many full-length feature films. For example, the Chinese film Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon, which had its North American premiere in Toronto in 2001, went on to gross more than $128 million in the United States and Canada. Thus, campaigns for the Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival had to make the case for short films as an art form in their own right and help the festival define itself on its own terms.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Taxi, which had handled advertising for the Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival since 2000, was a Canadian-based advertising agency with offices in Toronto, Calgary, and Montreal, as well as in New York City. The festival was a nonprofit event, and Taxi offered its work pro bono. Because the festival was a nonprofit event and received government support, the advertising counted as public-service announcements. Hence, local cable stations donated airtime, which was estimated to be worth $3 million.

The main concern of Taxi was to show that short films were not all that different from longer features. In addition, the agency felt that the spots needed to be light in tone so as to project a sense of fun. The 2004 campaign included three 30-second television spots that featured the character Ian Heidegger, an acting teacher. They were titled "Special FX," "Love Scene," and "Good Cop, Bad Cop."

"Special FX" began with a shot of a classroom in which "Short film workshop–Special F/X" was written on the blackboard. As smoke gathered around him, teacher Ian Heidegger walked around the room. He discussed various ways of producing smoke and the different characters he could play. A shot then let the viewer know that the smoke was coming from a cigarette the teacher had attached to the front of his pants. The lesson continued as the teacher asked his students who he could be, "a gorilla in the mist" perhaps. He ended the lesson by declaring, "You're all wrong. It's me, Ian Heidegger. I'm acting. Magic," as his students looked on in consternation. The spot than concluded with the Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival logo, as Ian repeated his self-assessment: "Magic."

In "Love Scene" the Ian Heidegger character gave another lesson. Here "Short film actor's workshop–love scene" appeared on the blackboard. The spot began with the teacher, who this time was not named, standing at the front of the class with two students. After a moment he looked at them and gave the instruction, "Steve, John, make passionate love to each other." Confused by their teacher, the two students hugged awkwardly. He then interrupted them and told them to sit down. After reminding the class that they were learning about short films, he called another student, Ron, to the front of the class. The teacher then took off his shirt and told the class he would teach them how to make love in ''three seconds.'' The spot closed with the instructor running full bore at his terrified pupil. Again, the spot concluded with the festival logo.

A third Heidegger spot was titled ''Good Cop, Bad Cop.'' In this spot ''Short film workshop–Good Cop/Bad Cop'' appeared on the blackboard. Heidegger watched as three students enacted the Hollywood good cop/bad cop routine. In a scene reminiscent of a Hollywood action move, one ''cop'' was rude to the ''suspect,'' while another was friendlier. The teacher eventually interrupted and told the students that the scene was ''too long'' for a short film. He then showed them ''the Heidegger method'' for the good cop/bad cop routine. The teacher sat down next to the suspect and said, ''Confess, bitch. Nice hair.'' He nodded to the class, and the festival logo appeared.

The effect of the spots was to satirize pretentious Hollywood actors. The Ian Heidegger character was over-the-top in his mannerisms and voice, which served to make his special effect look even more ridiculous and his techniques seem all the more unhinged. Even his name, an echo of the noted twentieth-century philosopher Martin Heidegger, sounded pretentious. The tone of the spots was important to Taxi, which felt that humor would be more effective in getting people's attention.

Other commercials in the campaign centered on an imaginary short film titled Livid. These spots all made sport of how short the film was. A spot titled ''Score,'' for example, featured a performance of the film's sound track, which was three notes long. Another spot, ''Director,'' summed up the plot of the film in one sentence. Again, humor was the key to the success of the spots.

OUTCOME

The campaign for the 2004 Toronto Worldwide Short Film Festival was considered to be a success. Once again attendance rose, continuing a trend of roughly a 25 percent increase in every year between 2000 and 2004. The number of submissions also was up, with the festival in 2004 drawing more than double the number received in 2000.

The campaign, especially the Ian Heidegger spots, was also a hit creatively. ''Special FX'' was singled out for the 2005 Gold Clio Award in the television category. The 2004 campaign, however, was the last Taxi agreed to develop for the festival. In 2005, despite the Clio for their work on behalf of the 2004 festival, Taxi decided to stop offering pro bono work for the event. Because of an expanded client base, the agency felt that it could no longer give the attention the festival needed. Taxi continued, however, to do other projects for the Canadian Film Centre, including design work for its 2006 winter gala.

FURTHER READING

Ashenburg, Katherine. ''What's Doing in Toronto.'' New York Times, August 22, 2004.

Dixon, Guy. ''Short Films Have to Make Their Point Quickly.'' Toronto Globe and Mail, June 14, 2005.

Howell, Peter. Rare Disney Dalliance with Dali Opens Festival. Toronto Star, May 11, 2004.

Menon, Vinay. ''Some Quick Takes on Canadian Shorts.'' Toronto Star, January 28, 2004.

Rea, Peter W., and David K. Irving. Producing and Directing the Short Film and Video. 2nd ed. Woburn, MA: Focal Press, 2001.

Sanati, Maryam. ''Festival: Got 'Em by the Shorts.'' Toronto Globe and Mail, June 10, 2005.

Sheridan, Sherri. Developing Digital Short Films. Boston: New Riders, 2004.

Story, Louise. ''The Subservient Chicken and Other Award Winners.'' New York Times, June 13, 2005.

Thurlow, Clifford. Making Short Films: The Complete Guide from Script to Screen. New York: Berg, 2005.

Worldwide Short Film Festival website. <http://www.worldwideshortfilmfest.com>

Guy Patrick Cunningham

Canon U.S.A., Inc.

1 Canon Plaza
Lake Success, New York 11042-1198
USA
Telephone: (516) 328-5000
Fax: (516) 328-5069
Web site: www.usa.canon.com

■■■

85 SECOND PHOTO LAB CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 Canon U.S.A., Inc., a subsidiary of the Japanese printer, copier, and peripherals manufacturer Canon Inc., introduced a compact digital-photo printer, which offered speed and the convenience of being able to connect directly to a digital camera. The category was small but growing, prompting Canon in the fall of 2003 to launch the "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign, developed with New York's DCA Advertising. The goal was not only to support the launch of a new printer, the CP-300 Card Photo Printer, but also to bring energy to the category.

The $5 million "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign consisted of three television commercials, all of which demonstrated how a digital-camera user could quickly connect to a Canon Card Photo Printer and have a quality print in hand less than a minute and a half later. The television spots were supported by three print ads, which appeared in a variety of consumer magazines. They showed the Canon printer in typical picture-taking situations, such as at a child's soccer game, at a wedding, and at a vacation destination.

Ending in the early weeks of 2004, the campaign succeeded in boosting sales and brand awareness, and it set the stage for the launch of the next generation of Canon compact printers. It also won an EFFIE award, which singled out the campaign for creative achievement.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Canon's founders developed Japan's first 35-millimeter camera in 1934 and incorporated their business three years later. Canon gained a foothold in the U.S. market after World War II, when American servicemen returned home with the high-quality Japanese cameras they had bought at military base exchanges. The company branched into business machines in the 1960s, first with calculators and then with photocopiers, a market in which Canon became a serious challenger to Xerox. In addition to successfully diversifying its business, Canon proved to be a savvy marketer over the years. Although Nikon produced better quality cameras, Canon was able to surpass Nikon as Japan's top-selling camera brand in the early 1980s. In the United States, Canon also scored marketing triumphs with its EOS (electronic optical system) line of cameras in the late 1980s.

By the early 1990s only one-fifth of Canon's revenues came from camera sales, putting the company in a better position than Japanese rivals such as Minolta and Nikon, which suffered when camera sales dropped as a result of the market maturing. Canon was also less exposed than other camera companies as digital photography began to change the landscape at a rapid pace in the 1990s, and consumer electronics companies like Hewlett-Packard, Sony, and Nokia entered the field and used their marketing prowess to gain significant shares in the digital arena. Old-guard competitors such as Kodak, Polaroid, and Fuji miscalculated how rapidly digital technology would eclipse film, the sale of which had been highly profitable and difficult to give up.

But by the start of the 2000s there was no doubt that digital had arrived. It was also becoming clear that, just as control of the film market had been the key to the success of Kodak and Fuji, whoever was able to stake a claim to the output side of digital photography (that is, prints) would be better positioned for the long term, especially given that cameras were evolving into just another consumer electronics product, one from which it became increasingly difficult to squeeze out a profit. At first, buyers of digital cameras made far fewer prints than expected, but the industry believed that eventually consumers would grow tired of being limited to just seeing their digital pictures on their computers, which was where pictures ended up when transferred from cameras or received by E-mail. Photo labs made it increasingly easy to have prints developed from digital files, and a number of competitors developed self-service kiosks, which were widely distributed to drug stores and other retail outlets.

Canon, already in the printer business, offered inkjet printers capable of printing photographs, but it also launched a Card Photo Printer called the CP-10, a small portable unit that a camera could connect to directly, producing high-quality four-by-six-inch photos, with or without borders. The printer used dye-sublimation technology, which applied wax in layers of color to produce sharper snapshots, making the photos more durable and resistant to liquids. The digital-still-photography market was small but growing. By the summer of 2003 Canon had a 15 percent share of the $204 million market, second only to Sony's 18 percent. In the fall of 2003 Canon decided to relaunch the second-generation Card Photo Printer, the CP-100, while introducing the new CP-300 with more marketing muscle via the "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign.

TARGET MARKET

The "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign cast a wide net, essentially aiming to appeal to all consumer digital-camera owners. But within that large group there were specific audiences to target. The younger demographic, 25- to 35-year-olds, was especially attracted to the innovative technology as well as to the convenience of Canon's Card Photo Printers, particularly the less-expensive CP-100. One element of the campaign was a nine-college campus tour, developed in conjunction with Glamour magazine, during which the easy-to-use compact printers were demonstrated.

Another product demonstration effort was arranged with Saks Fifth Avenue, taking place at 55 of the department stores across the country. This facet was in keeping with another target of the campaign: middle-class women. According to research conducted by Kodak, about three-quarters of all family pictures were taken by women. Moreover it was wives and mothers who mostly maintained the family photo albums, for which they needed prints. An easy-to-use and fast printer was a perfect addition to a digital camera, but having already spent a lot of money on a camera, memory card, and other accessories, many consumers were not willing to shell out further for a Card Photo Printer, especially when photo labs, self-service kiosks, and online services could provide prints. Consequently the "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign also had to target consumers with a certain level of disposable income. Hence much of the advertising was tied to the kind of interests these people pursued, such as travel, music and entertainment, and home decorating.

COMPETITION

Canon's Card Photo Printers faced competition on a number of fronts. Because part of their appeal was speed and instant gratification, the company had to contend with Polaroid's instant cameras. Polaroid, still wedded to film, had been devastated by digital technology, but it continued to enjoy a measure of success selling to the teen market its line of small I-Zone and JoyCam cameras and the small adhesive-backed "sticky film" they used.

CANON FODDER

Canon was established as Precision Optical Company in Japan in 1937. That same year the company dubbed the 35-millimeter camera it had developed the Kwanon, the name of the Buddhist goddess of mercy. In 1947 the name "Kwanon" was dropped in favor of the similar sounding, and more universal, "Canon," which meant "precision" in Latin. The company changed its name as well, and Precision Optical became Canon Camera Company Limited. In 1966 Canon U.S.A., Inc., was formed, and three years later the parent company, which had successfully branched into office products by this time, shortened its name to Canon Inc.

One-hour photo labs offering cheap, high-quality prints were also serious competitors with Canon, as were online services and the self-service kiosks produced by a number of companies, including Kodak, Polaroid, Olympus, IBM, Mitsubishi, Sony, and other, smaller players.

In addition Canon's new printers competed with home ink-jet printers, which were offered by a host of companies, such as Epson, Hewlett-Packard, and Canon itself. Direct competition came from other makers of specialty printers. Kodak offered an easy-to-use printer dock (employing continuous-tone thermal dye-transfer technology), and it spent large sums to pitch it to women as a portable party printer. Other companies also made small printers that used dye-sublimation technology, including the Olympus Camedia P-200, the Sony DPP-MP1, the Sony DPP-SV88, and the Panasonic PV-PD2100. In addition there were compact printers that relied on other technologies. Fujifilm's NX-500 used a thermo-autochrome process, while Hewlett-Packard's PhotoSmart 100 Compact was the only printer in the category to rely on ink-jets.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In October 2003 Canon and DCA launched the $5 million "85 Second Photo Lab" television and print campaign to promote the new CP-300 digital photo printer as well as to relaunch the less expensive CP-100 printer. Rather than position the products as just printers, the marketers chose to portray them as part of the entire picture-taking experience. The television spots and print ads both employed a square neon sign that read, "85 Sec Photo Lab." The origins of the sign grew out of a personal experience. DCA creative director Rob Rosen told Adweek 's Deanna Zammit, "We passed these one-hour-photo-lab signs and we thought, 'That's a good icon.' . . . Once we had that little mnemonic, we were able to lend it to print and TV."

The television commercials were aired on national cable channels and in local television markets that were also high-volume digital-camera markets. The three television spots were "Italian Woman," "Half Pipe," and "Sea Monster." In the first, a 30-second spot, a sultry Italian woman dressed in red walked down a street, attracting the attention of a number of men (and a bulldog), including a young American tourist sitting at a sidewalk café table. He snapped a digital picture using a Canon camera, which he quickly connected to a Card Photo Printer to produce an instant picture. In the background could be heard the sounds of a car crash. The snapshot, held up to blend in with the scene of the village square, was removed to reveal the steaming car wreck, no doubt caused by the Italian woman. The spot's voice-over commented, "Canon's Card Photo Printer. Great prints easily. Anywhere you take pictures. The 85 second photo lab. Digital revolutionized photography. We revolutionize digital." The spot also incorporated the "85 Sec Photo Lab" neon sign in the background.

The 15-second "Half Pipe" spot featured a young woman taking a picture of a man performing a bicycle stunt at an extreme-sports half-pipe competition. As she quickly developed a print using her Canon Card Photo Printer, the sound of a siren could be heard. Once again the print was held up against the background, and when it was removed, the extreme bike rider was shown being loaded into an ambulance. The voice-over offered a variation of the "Italian Woman" text. The last of the three spots, the 15-second "Sea Monster," showed a young man taking a picture of an unseen subject. He held up the photo, which showed a sea monster against a watery background, but when he removed the picture there was nothing visible but a ring of bubbles. The voice-over text was similar to that of "Half Pipe."

Neither of the two 15-second spots used the neon-sign image, but the campaign's three print ads did. They also used Canon's corporate tagline, "Canon Know How." One ad showed a Card Photo Printer turning out a picture at a wedding reception. Another placed the printer next to a soccer goal with a game in progress. The final print ad showed a Canon Card Photo Printer on a wicker table in a tropical paradise setting. The subject matter of the ads reflected the audiences the campaign targeted: families and consumers with enough income to afford traveling. The ads appeared in a variety of travel and lifestyle magazines.

OUTCOME

The "85 Second Photo Lab" campaign continued into the spring of 2004 and succeeded in garnering recognition for Canon's compact photo printers. The campaign was also successful on a creative level. In 2005 the campaign won the prestigious gold EFFIE award in the Computer Peripherals for Business/Personal Purposes category, presented by the New York American Marketing Association to honor creative achievement in the advertising industry. The award also recognized the campaign for "the results it generated in terms of measurably increased sales, market and mind share," according to the press release announcing the selection. The campaign also set the stage for Canon in April and May 2004 to introduce the next generation of the line: the CP-220 and CP-330. Among the enhancements was adding the ability to print on four-by-eight-inch paper, which allowed users to create and print their own greeting cards. The upgraded printers were also able to print sequences from movie clips as thumbnail images on a four-by-six-inch card.

FURTHER READING

Blachere, Kristina. "Stylish Dye-Sub Printer for On-the-Go Photos." Computer Shopper, February 2004, p. 64.

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Sony, Kodak Lead U.S. Battle for Share in Digital Cameras." Advertising Age, May 31, 2004, p. 12.

"Canon's New Compact Photo Printers CP-200 and CP-330 Add Ease-of-Use, Flexibility and Style to Direct Photo Printing." Business Wire, March 31, 2004.

"Direct Photo Printer." Poptronics, July 2002, p. 6.

"Meet the IMA: Canon U.S.A., Inc." Incentive, May 2001, p. 54.

Morris, John. "Pint-Size Printers Deliver Big Results." Computer Shopper, May 2003, p. 38.

Portnoy, Sean, Stephen Bigelow, Kristina Blachere, Barbara Krasnoff, Chris Robertson, and Dong Van Ngo. "Photo Finish." Computer Shopper, April 2003, p. 114.

Sholik, Stan. "Specialty Printers Expand Photo Options." Petersen's Photographic, July 2002, p. 68.

Wasserman, Todd. "Kodak Focuses on Processing." Brandweek, May 24, 2004, p. 15.

Zammit, Deanna. "Canon on New Printer: You Can Take It with You." Adweek, October 20, 2003, p. 16.

Ed Dinger

CareerBuilder Inc.

8420 West Bryn Mawr Ave., Ste. 1000
Chicago, Illinois 60631
USA
Telephone: (773) 527-3600
Fax: (773) 399-6313
Web site: www.careerbuilder.com

■■■

TIME TO MOVE ON CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By the 1990s newspapers were facing increasing competition from Internet job sites. In 1995, in order to compete with online sites for advertising revenue, the Tribune Company newspaper chains (whose publications included Newsday, the Chicago Tribune, the Los Angeles Times, and the Baltimore Sun, and Knight Ridder, publisher of the Kansas City Star, the Miami Herald, and the Philadelphia Inquirer, among others) partnered to create their own online job site, which ultimately evolved into CareerBuilder.com. Their aim was to level the playing field with the online competition, which included Monster.com and HotJobs.com, and to win back help-wanted advertisers. In 2002 the Gannett Company, with publications that included Florida Today, the Arizona Republic, and the Fort Collins Coloradoan, became an equal partner with the Tribune Company and Knight Ridder in the online venture.

Visitors to CareerBuilder.com's site increased 50 percent from December 2002 to December 2003, helped in part by the marketing campaign ''Smarter Way to Find a Job,'' created by the company's Chicago-based ad agency, Cramer-Krasselt. CareerBuilder kicked off 2004 with a new campaign, titled ''Time to Move On.'' Also created by Cramer-Krasselt, this $17 million campaign was aimed at employed but unhappy workers.

The ''Time to Move On'' campaign, which was launched on January 5, 2004, and ran until the end of the year, was a success both with job seekers and with the marketing industry. Not only did it increase traffic to the website to 16.2 million unique visits in the weeks following its launch, up from 7.5 million visits for the same period in January 2003, but it also received EFFIE and Tempo awards, with one television spot, ''Bank Teller,'' being named an Adweek Best Spot.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

As the popularity of online career sites grew in the early 1990s, newspapers were feeling the threat from their Internet competitors. Revenues from print help-wanted ads were slipping, as companies shifted their advertising dollars to Internet sites like Monster.com and HotJobs.com. In an effort to compete in the dot-com marketplace and to win back its ad dollars, two of the country's top newspaper chains—the Chicago-based Tribune Company and Knight Ridder, based in San Jose, California—joined forces to create their own employment website. The fledgling company, which began in 1995 as NetStart, Inc., was renamed CareerBuilder Inc. in 1998. By offering access to 130 newspapers and 400 job sites, CareerBuilder.com soon was going head-to-head with online job site Monster.com and was pushing past HotJobs.com. In 2001 CareerBuilder.com reported more than 5.5 million unique monthly visits and 300,000 job listings. The Virginia-based Gannett Company joined the partnership in 2002, further increasing its reach online and giving CareerBuilder.com an edge over both Monster.com and HotJobs.com.

Cramer-Krasselt was hired in 2002 to help CareerBuilder with its marketing and advertising. In 2003 the company launched a national campaign designed to reach potential job seekers and to encourage them to visit its website, stating that this was "the smarter way to find a better job." The campaign was awarded a Gold EFFIE in 2004 for successfully changing the rules for how online job sites were advertised, including the decision to decline in joining Monster and HotJobs in buying advertising spots during the Super Bowl. In August 2004 CareerBuilder struck a blow at rival Monster when it won a five-year deal with Microsoft's MSN, valued at $150 million, a contract that had previously been held by Monster. Through the agreement, CareerBuilder was to provide the content for MSN's career channels. In addition, in a deal valued at $115 million over a four-year period, CareerBuilder replaced Monster in providing similar services to America Online (AOL). To maintain the momentum, the "Time to Move On" campaign was launched in 2004.

CAREERBUILDER JOINS RANKS OF SUPER BOWL ADVERTISERS

Based on the success of earlier marketing campaigns that had helped place CareerBuilder.com among the top three online job sites, the dot-com announced a national marketing blitz in 2005 to be launched during Super Bowl XXXIX. With its new campaign, CareerBuilder joined the ranks of online job sites Monster.com and HotJobs.com to run television spots during the annual football showdown. The campaign, with the tagline "A better job awaits," was the company's largest brand awareness effort since its inception in 1995. Besides the four Super Bowl spots, the campaign included additional television and radio spots and print and outdoor ads.

TARGET MARKET

At a time when online job sites typically targeted large companies in search of highly skilled technical workers, CareerBuilder looked at the statistics and the job market and realized that things were changing. Following the dot-com collapse, tech jobs had become scarce, and according to a report by the Associated Press, hourly workers—those in blue-collar and service professions—made up 60 percent of America's labor force. Adjusting to these changes, CareerBuilder added blue-collar and while-collar hourly workers to its target audience by introducing an effort in January 2003 to connect both unemployed skilled and unemployed hourly workers with employers.

Then, in December 2003, there appeared a report in HR Magazine indicating that a survey done by the Society for Human Resource Management and the Wall Street Journal 's CareerJournal.com had found that nearly two-thirds of all gainfully employed people were "extremely likely" to begin searching for new jobs within the coming year. Kirk Scott, Cramer-Krasselt's director of advertising for CareerBuilder, noted further that 85 percent of the people going online in search of jobs were already employed. "Given the way things in the economy have gone, there is an increased level of dissatisfaction of workers," Scott said. Although CareerBuilder's previous campaigns had targeted unemployed people looking for jobs, the company's 2004 campaign shifted its marketing focus toward employed people unhappy in their jobs, whether they were white-collar or blue-collar workers.

COMPETITION

The Internet division of Monster Worldwide, Inc. emerged in 1995 when the company acquired a recruitment firm that included an online job site designed to bring together job seekers and employers. The site, which became Monster.com, was a huge success. It primarily attracted high-tech job seekers, who could post their résumés online free of charge, and Fortune 1000 businesses willing to pay for access to the résumés and to post job positions that were open. Monster.com's revenues jumped from almost nothing in 1995 to $536 million in 2001, and by 2002 it had become the number one online job site, bumping HotJobs.com from the top spot. Monster.com began slipping, however, as competition from upstart CareerBuilder.com heated up. In 2003 the number of monthly visitors to Monster.com dropped 19 percent, to 15.3 million, from the previous year, and revenue dropped nearly 30 percent as well. As the job market changed and the site's former clients went the way of the burst dot-com bubble, they took their advertising money with them. In response, Monster.com followed the lead of CareerBuilder.com and began targeting health care, blue-collar, service, and other salaried workers. To emphasize the opportunities for skilled and hourly jobs on its website, Monster.com's marketing in 2003 included a television spot that showed an out-of-control, driverless semi racing down a road while an unemployed truck driver had a cup of coffee. Despite its efforts, however, Monster.com barely held its lead against the competition. In 2004 it reported 19.6 million visits, compared to CareerBuilder's 19.3 million. It then launched a new marketing campaign, ''Today's the Day,'' designed to encourage job seekers not to delay looking for a new job and to do their search on Monster.com.

HotJobs.com, Ltd., founded in 1997, was ranked at the top of the online job sites by 2001. In 2002 the company was voted the ''The Best General Purpose Job Board for Job Seekers,'' and it was ranked 14 on the Bloomberg Personal Finance Magazine 's Tech 100 list. It was already beginning to slip against the competition, however. The business was also on the sales block, with its closest competitor, Monster Worldwide, poised to buy it. Yahoo! landed the deal, however, and in February 2002 HotJobs.com became a wholly owned subsidiary of the Internet communications company. In an effort to turn around its declining site visits, the company launched a new campaign, titled ''Rainbow Connection,'' in 2003. The campaign, which kicked off with television spots during the Super Bowl, targeted underemployed workers and featured people in various job situations singing ''Rainbow Connection,'' the song made popular by Kermit the Frog in The Muppet Movie. Using the tagline ''Dreams found faster,'' it also promoted the benefits of searching for a better job online at HotJobs.com. Within 24 hours of the first broadcast of the spot, the company reported that site visits had jumped 40 percent and that submissions of new résumés had increased 53 percent over the same period in the previous week. Although the campaign was considered to be a success, by 2004 the company was firmly entrenched as the number three online job site, behind CareerBuilder.com and Monster.com.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The challenge of the Chicago-based agency Cramer-Krasselt was to develop a marketing campaign that would achieve CareerBuilder's goal of reaching people who were unhappy in their jobs. The new campaign also aimed to increase brand awareness among job seekers and to convince them that CareerBuilder.com was not only sympathetic to their plight but also could connect them with more employers than competing online job recruitment sites. The new $17 million campaign, ''Time to Move On,'' was launched nationwide in January 2004 with three television spots. It was supported with additional radio spots, as well as print and outdoor ads. Television spots appeared during early-morning news broadcasts, prime-time shows, and sports programs on network and cable channels. The print ads were published in newspapers owned by CareerBuilder's parent companies, the Tribune Company, Knight Ridder, and the Gannett Company.

The three kickoff TV spots featured dissatisfied employees fantasizing about how they could escape their wretched jobs. One spot showed a white-collar office worker being berated by perhaps the nastiest boss in the country. When the boss's tirade finally ended and he walked away, the suffering employee began eating lunch at his desk. Noticing a smear of ketchup on his lip, the employee pretended to be seriously injured, and an ambulance was called to take him to the hospital. At the first opportunity the unhappy employee jumped out of the ambulance and ran off. Another spot was set in a bank. An unhappily employed teller jumped onto the counter, pretending that the bank was being robbed. After telling everyone to get down, she leaped off the counter and quietly tiptoed out the door. The third spot portrayed a frustrated factory worker making his escape by crawling inside an oversized toy bear. In each spot the voice-over stated, ''There comes a time in some careers when you just need to move on. Plan your great escape at the only job-search engine with over 350 leading newspapers and professional organizations.'' The tagline, ''The smarter way to find a better job,'' was carried over from CareerBuilder.com's 2003 campaign.

Print ads pictured disgruntled employees in situations similar to those in the television spots. In one ad an employee neatly dressed in a trim skirt, sweater, and pumps was working in the stockroom of a men's clothing store. As she leaned over to sort through a cardboard box filled with folded dress shirts, a naked male mannequin behind her swung his foot and placed a swift kick on the unsuspecting woman's backside, as if to boot her out the door. The copy read, ''Maybe it's time to move on.'' Another ad showed a harried-looking man sitting at his desk. The photograph was taken through a half-filled water cooler, giving the impression that the man could not keep his head above water. The copy asked, ''Will you know when it's time to move on?''

OUTCOME

CareerBuilder.com's advertising struck a chord with frustrated employees everywhere who were contemplating job changes in the new year. Within one month of the launch of the campaign on January 5, 2004, the company had jumped to become the share leader in the online job search category, with a 117 percent increase in site visits. According to the company, more than 16 million individual visitors logged on to the site in January 2004, following the campaign's launch, compared to just 7.5 million visitors in January 2003.

In 2005 the "Time to Move On" campaign received a Gold EFFIE Award and two Tempo awards. The EFFIE honor recognized the campaign for successfully moving CareerBuilder.com from the number three online job site to number one by showing that the company understood job seekers and was sympathetic to their problems. The Tempo awards were presented by the Chicago Association of Direct Marketing to recognize leading marketing and creative programs, with "Time to Move On" winning in the broadcast category for both marketing (first place) and creativity (second place).

FURTHER READING

Bethany McLean. "A Scary Monster: Monster Worldwide Has a Cute Mascot, Memorable Super Bowl Ads, a Rising Stock Price—and a Host of Problems." Fortune, December 22, 2003.

"CareerBuilder.com to Tackle the Super Bowl in 2005." PR Newswire, June 15, 2004.

Hein, Kenneth. "CareerBuilder to Launch $17 Mil. Campaign." Editor & Publisher, December 15, 2003.

———. "Hunt for the Disgruntled." Editor & Publisher, December 15, 2003.

"HotJobs to Make a 'Rainbow Connection' with New Ad during Super Bowl: Consumers Offered Sneak Preview of New Spot on Yahoo! and HotJobs." Business Wire, January 24, 2003.

Jensen, Trevor. "CareerBuilder's New Tack: The Great Job Escape." Adweek, December 15, 2003.

"Monster and CareerBuilder Lead in Local Online Recruitment Revenue." PR Newswire, May 17, 2004.

"Monster.com Leads in 27 of 50 Top U.S. Job Markets, Newspapers Still Struggle to Understand Online Sales, according to Report by Classified Intelligence." Business Wire, April 22, 2004.

"New HotJobs Commercial Connects with Super Bowl Audience." Business Wire, February 5, 2003.

Oser, Kris. "CareerBuilder Looking to Do a Job on Monster: Site Gaining Visitors, Running Super Bowl Ad." Crain's Chicago Business, January 24, 2005.

Schramm, Jennifer. "Brace for Turnover." HR Magazine, December 1, 2003.

"Strategy: CareerBuilder.com Offers Online Options." Adweek, December 15, 2003.

Sylvester, David A. "Help Wanted Advertising Plummets Along with Jobs." Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service, April 1, 2003.

"U.S. Job Recovery Pushes 30 Percent Growth for Online Career Sites, according to Nielsen/NetRatings: Monster.com, CareerBuilder, and Yahoo! HotJobs Take Top Rankings." PR Newswire, July 16, 2004.

Rayna Bailey

Cargill, Inc.

15407 McGinty Road West
Wayzata, Minnesota 55391
USA
Telephone: (952) 742-7375
Fax: (952) 277-4455
Web site: www.cargill.com

■■■

COLLABORATE>CREATE> SUCCEED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

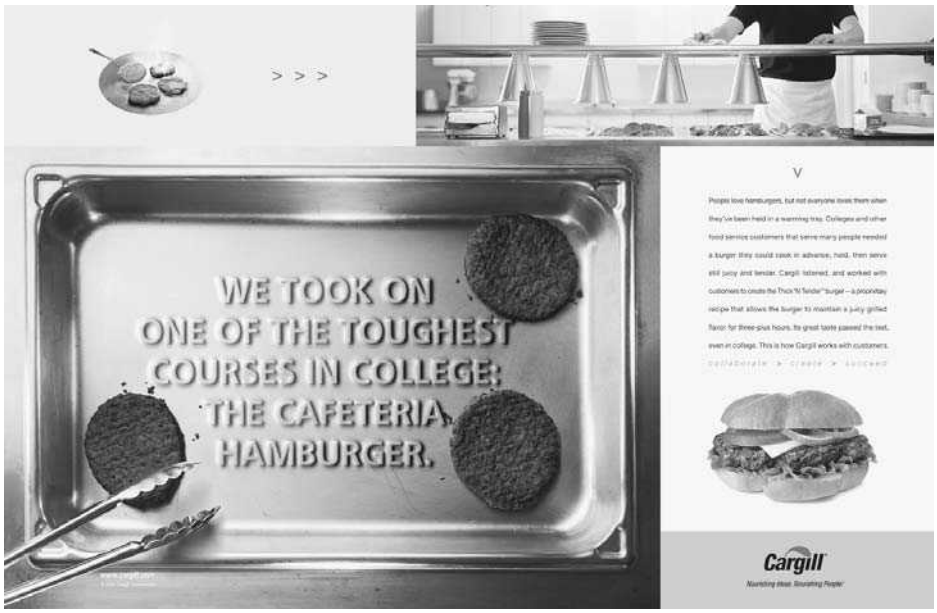
Cargill, Inc. decided at the end of the 1990s to recast its image as a staid commodities company to an innovative provider of solutions for its food industry customers. The company developed a 10-year plan to change the way it operated and was perceived in the world. A new logo was created to announce that change was under way at Cargill, and a fresh branding message was conceived. In the fall of 2003 an integrated marketing campaign dubbed ''Collaborate>Create>Succeed'' was launched to articulate Cargill's new vision.

The campaign's main target was director-level officers in food industry companies, the goal being to show them through concrete examples how Cargill could partner with them to solve problems and in the end help them make more money. The TV spots and print ads laid out a real-world problem and then revealed the Cargill solution that proved profitable to the customer. For example, one ad centered on Cargill's efforts to help confectioners develop a better-tasting, low-sugar chocolate. Similar ads also presented these same stories on the Internet.

The long-term campaign, the budget of which was not publicly disclosed by Cargill, succeeded in improving the company's image with the target audience, which also indicated that it was now willing to pay more for Cargill products and services. The ''Collaborate>Create> Succeed'' theme also galvanized the Cargill rank and file as they began taking to heart the concept of partnership with customers. One of the print ads in the campaign won a prestigious honor, awarded first place for the Best Single Advertisement in the American Business Media's Creative Excellence in Business Advertising (CEBA) competition.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

As the twentieth century came to a close, Cargill, the largest private corporation in the United States, with annual sales approaching $50 billion, found itself highly diversified yet typecast in the mind of its customers. The company was involved in virtually all aspects of the food-supply chain yet remained pigeonholed as a trading company and low-cost processor. Cargill's sheer size also worked against it, as customers had a difficult time associating such a behemoth with innovation, let alone possessing concern about the plight of the smaller companies it did business with. During the customer research phase of the ''Collaborate>Create>Succeed'' campaign, one respondent summed up an all-too-common opinion: ''When Cargill says its believes in a win/win, they mean Cargill wins twice.''



An ad from Cargill's "Collaborate>Create>Succeed." campaign.
PHOTO COURTESY OF MARTIN WILLIAMS, INC. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

In 1999 Cargill initiated a 10-year plan called Strategic Intent, to reorganize the company for the new century and change its image. The stated goal was "By 2010, Cargill will be the recognized global leader in providing agriculture and food chain customer solutions that enable them to succeed in their businesses." The achievement of this goal required a reorganization of the way Cargill did business, a communications effort to change the mind-set of its workforce, and a major marketing campaign to change the perception of Cargill with its customers. More importantly it wanted to make the case that Cargill was more than just commodities and that despite its size it wanted to partner with customers to help them solve their problems to the benefit of both parties. Cargill was restructured into 90 business units, thus allowing employees to focus on the needs of their customers. The company then began to reposition the Cargill brand, in 2001 setting up the Cargill Brand Council, comprising senior executives from the business units as well as public affairs and marketing people, to coordinate the introduction of a new logo and develop a new message. In essence Cargill became a master brand applied to a wide variety of products and services. The new logo was unveiled in February 2002, and in the autumn of that year Cargill began conducting customer research to flesh out the brand strategy. In May 2003 the new brand-positioning strategy was formulated, and in September 2003 the "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign was launched to articulate that message to current and potential customers on an international stage.

TARGET MARKET

While "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" tried to communicate to the world a new image of Cargill, it was primarily a business-to-business advertising campaign aimed at every level of the food industry, including processors, marketers, and retailers. But the ultimate target were primary decision makers, the C-suite, generally those executives with "chief" in their title (chief executive officer, chief financial officer, chief operating officer), who held the levers of power in the food-processing, food-service, and grocery retail industries. These were the people who established a company's strategy and determined how money was to be spent. While changing the perception of Cargill among the lower ranks was good public relations and might trickle up to influence the C-suite, the campaign sought to reach senior executives directly, change their perception of Cargill, and lead to new business opportunities. In this way the company would continue to move farther away from the commodities model, selling large quantities of raw substances at cheap prices, to become a provider of more profitable value-added services—becoming a partner rather than a mere supplier. The campaign also targeted Cargill's employees, making them more aware of the company's new mission and encouraging them to buy into the program and begin seeing customers as partners. In the end it was the rank and file that would have to make sure that the new campaign was a promise to fulfill and not mere puffery.

IOWA ROOTS

Minnesota-based Cargill, Inc., was established in 1865 by William Wallace Cargill when he bought his first grain business in Iowa. He was later joined by his younger brother Sam and in 1868 moved to Minnesota, where the company established its headquarters and began to take advantage of the post–Civil War western expansion of the railroad and agriculture.

COMPETITION

With close to 100 business units, Cargill competed against a multitude of companies in a wide range of fields and virtually everyone in the food-processing, grocery, and restaurant industries. One of its chief rivals on the global stage was Archer Daniels Midland Company, one of the largest processors of oilseeds, corn, and wheat in the world, generating about half the amount of revenue of Cargill. A somewhat smaller competitor, Bunge Ltd., focused on soybean, grain trading, and fertilizer. In terms of the "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign, however, Cargill's competition was not the chief concern. There were not competing messages in the marketplace to address. Rather, Cargill was in a sense competing against the prevailing image of itself. The message was not that Cargill was better than ADM or Bunge but that it had more to offer to customers than they realized, that Cargill was not a complacent giant but a vibrant and innovative company.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The task of the "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign was challenging because of Cargill's sheer size. "Cargill is quite a complicated company," Ann Ness, the company's director of advertising and brand management, told Nicole Garrison, writing for the Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal. "What we've found is that there is so much more that we offer that our customers don't know about. They might know us as an egg company, but not know us as a meat company. They might know us as a meat company, but not know us as a chocolate company." The last marketing campaign Cargill offered, almost three years earlier, promoted the idea that Cargill played a major role in "the world's diverse appetite for food." While it boosted the company's image, the advertising failed to tell the world what Cargill actually had to sell. "Collaborate>Create>Succeed," on the other hand, sought to provide concrete examples of what Cargill did. More importantly these examples were crafted into stories that followed the same pattern: if a customer had a need that could not be met in the general marketplace, then Cargill intervened to use its expertise to address that customer problem. Thus a major task for the marketing team was the selection of the case studies that would make the most compelling stories to illustrate the campaign's message. The case studies were categorized within three general challenges facing customers: how to grow new products; how to simplify a complex supply chain; and how to improve the health and nutrition of a product.

"Collaborate>Create>Succeed" was an integrated campaign with elements that included radio spots, online media, and a campaign microsite, but the anchors were 8 television spots, 12 print ads, 8 banner ads, and a website. An example of a success story told on television was the spot called "Better Beef," which juxtaposed images of cattle-driving cowboys and people pushing shopping carts on the range in search of a better cut of beef. The spot's voice-over explained how Cargill worked with supermarket chains to "round up" a line of high-quality hand-cut beef, followed by the tagline "This is how Cargill works with customers." Another spot, "Sugar-Free Chocolate," began with the problem facing people who loved chocolate but had to cut back on sugar. The solution was Cargill using its knowledge of sweeteners and sugar replacers to team up with candy makers to produce a new generation of better-tasting sugar-free chocolate.

Five of the six television spots had a corresponding print ad that made the same point but added some detail. In the "Better Beef" print execution, the cowboys were seen sitting on the railing of a supermarket parking lot "cart corral." The text made the point that Cargill focused on the "entire ranch to retail process." The "Sugar-Free Chocolate" print ad used a child for its image rather than a young woman, but the text made the same point about how Cargill used its expertise to help develop new better-tasting sugar-free chocolate. The print ads also relied on the tag "This is how Cargill works with customers." Other ads showed how Cargill helped Italian cheese makers increase the production of Parmesan cheese by providing a specialized feed for the cows supplying the milk; how Cargill established a culinary school for sales reps so they could better serve the needs of chefs and restaurant managers; how Cargill helped baking companies to develop a new "heart-healthy" bread; and how Cargill worked with food-service customers to create the Thick'n Tender hamburger, a proprietary recipe for a burger that could remain in a warming tray for extended periods of time without losing its taste. Because a major goal of the "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign was to educate the audience about the breadth of what Cargill had to offer, the print ads that touted success in one area of the food industry were run in a trade publication covering a different aspect. For people who wanted further information, the campaign's website offered details on the case studies that were the germ of the TV spots and print ads.

The media strategy of the campaign had to take into account the nature of the C-suite target audience. Hard working and pressed for time, they watched little television, aside from business programming. Hence the television spots were shown mostly on national cable news channels, including CNN, Fox News, and CNBC. Airtime was also purchased on certain sporting events, like golf and the Olympics. The target audience read a great deal, so the campaign's print ads ran in a range of publications, from trade publications to general business publications, such as Forbes and the Wall Street Journal. Ads also appeared on a number of websites, including WSJ Online, MarketWatch.com, and SmartBrief (a repository of daily food industry news). The online elements proved highly influential, as many executives increasingly turned to the Internet for up-to-the-moment information not available through other channels.

OUTCOME

The "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" campaign met its intended goals. An Annual Awareness and Attitude Study conducted by Cargill in 2005 demonstrated that as a result of the campaign, decision makers in the food industry were now more likely to see Cargill as a partner able to offer innovative solutions. Moreover they were willing to pay more for Cargill products and services. "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" generated a great deal of interest in Cargill, reflected by the more than 50,000 visits to the microsite during the first four months after the campaign broke. The balance sheet also showed improvement, as Cargill experienced double-digit sales and profit growth in each of the two years immediately after the campaign began in 2003.

"Collaborate>Create>Succeed" was also recognized by the advertising industry. In the autumn of 2005 one of the campaign's print ads, the "TNT Burger," won first place for Best Single Advertisement in the American Business Media's Creative Excellence in Business Advertising (CEBA) competition. But perhaps most important of all was the effect the campaign was having on the Cargill corporate culture. The "Collaborate>Create>Succeed" slogan was incorporated in almost all internal and external communications and became something of a rallying cry among employees—as the message and the behavior began to reinforce one another and play a major role in Cargill, making the goal of its 10-year plan a reality.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron. "Cargill Nourishes Brand Image." Adweek (midwest ed.), January 8, 2001.

———. "Martin/Williams Takes Charge of Cargill's Image." Adweek (midwest ed.), July 27, 1998, p. 3.

"Cargill, Inc." In International Directory of Company Histories, vol. 13. Farmington Hills, MI: St. James Press, 1996.

Coakley, Debbie. "Nourishing Ideas." Agri Marketing, November–December 2003, p. 26.

Garrison, Nicole. Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal, October 6, 2003.

Reinan, John. "Cargill Grows a Better Web Site." Star Tribune (Minneapolis), October 25, 2004, p. 7D.

Salvage, Bryan. "Creating a Deli $ensation." Meat & Deli Retailer, May 2004, p. 16.

Ed Dinger

Carl's Jr.

6307 Carpinteria Ave., Ste. A
Carpinteria, California 93013
USA
Telephone: (805) 745-7500
Fax: (714) 780-6315
Web site: www.carlsjr.com

■■■

SIX DOLLAR BURGER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

As Carl's Jr., one of the country's leading fast-food burger chains, prepared to celebrate its 60th anniversary in 2001, the brand was feeling the pains of an aging icon. Despite its reputation for serving quality burgers and for introducing innovative options not usually found at early fast-food establishments, such as self-serve beverage counters, the company was losing customers to a new niche: fast-casual restaurants. These restaurants had higher prices and better-quality food than found at fast-food places. Carl's Jr. was hurt further by the deep discounts on products that competing fast-food chains, such as Burger King and McDonald's, were offering customers. A Carl's Jr. press release stated that the company's practice of offering a small but quality selection of menu items and limiting discounts had contributed to a continuing weakness in same-store sales.

To remedy the situation, Carl's Jr. took a closer look at the fast-casual niche and saw it as an opportunity to expand its business. The business-lunch crowd was typically in a hurry but hungry for a quality meal. To entice these customers, Carl's Jr. began offering a new product, the Six Dollar Burger. The burger gave customers the best of both worlds: a restaurant-style burger that was as convenient as fast food. To support the burger's introduction, a campaign was created by Los Angeles–based Mendelsohn/Zein Advertising, at an estimated cost of $50 million. It kicked off with a series of television spots that not only praised the Six Dollar Burger but also spoofed casual-dining businesses such as T.G.I. Friday's. One TV commercial showed hapless customers who were forced to join the birthday celebration of a diner at a nearby table, and another showed an overenthusiastic waiter pushing dessert on diners before the main course was served. Radio spots also promoted the product.

Consumers ultimately bought the concept. The company reported that, following the launch of the "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, same-store sales took a positive turn and reversed the downward slide Carl's Jr. had experienced for the previous three periods. In addition the campaign won a bronze EFFIE award and was presented a Silver Skillet award by Restaurant Business magazine.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1941 Carl Karcher went into business for himself by setting up a hot-dog cart in Los Angeles. By 1946 his business had grown into a drive-in restaurant with hamburgers as one of the featured menu items. As Carl's Jr. continued to expand, it earned a reputation for serving delicious charbroiled hamburgers. In 1997 CKE Restaurants, owner of Carl's Jr., purchased a floundering

© KIM KULISH/CORBIS.

Midwestern burger chain, Hardee's. Rather than proceeding with CKE's initial plans to convert Hardee's to Carl's Jr. shops, the two sister chains maintained separate but similar identities and menus, which confused consumers. In addition, as the core customers of Carl's Jr.—baby boomers—aged, their tastes changed. Although these baby boomers had grown up with fast food, they also possessed significant disposable income and were looking for higher quality food like the kind served in casual-dining restaurants. Carl's Jr. went into a slump as customers fled to its high-end competitors and as sister chain Hardee's carried it along on its own downward spiral.

To win back its former customers and lure new customers, Carl's Jr. began carving out a new niche for itself as a fast-food chain serving restaurant-quality food. After experimenting with a variety of larger burgers and testing four prototypes with consumers, Carl's Jr. introduced the Six Dollar Burger in 2001. With its launch Carl's Jr. joined the ranks of other fast-food chains (such as Noodles & Co., Chipotle Mexican Grill, and Boston Market) competing with casual-dining restaurants by promoting their businesses as "fast-casual" dining establishments.

SIZZLE IS COMING FROM MORE THAN THE BURGERS IN NEW CARL'S JR. SPOTS

In 2001 Carl's Jr. introduced its successful Six Dollar Burger and an accompanying campaign. The burger, which cost $3.95 but was designed to replicate more pricey casual-dining fare, was a hit with consumers. To keep the momentum growing, the chain in November 2003 expanded its offerings to feature a full line of premium burgers. In an effort to reach its target audience of men 18 to 35 years old, Carl's Jr. simultaneously launched a new campaign of provocative TV spots starring Playboy founder Hugh Hefner and a bevy of Playboy bunnies.

The sizzling commercials may have been hot to the target audience, but they offended other consumer segments, including Thomas Aquinas College president Thomas Dillon. After the ads aired Dillon asked Andrew Puzder, president and chief executive officer of Carl's Jr. parent company CKE Restaurants, to resign his position on the college's board of governors. Prior to Puzder's resignation from the board, CKE issued a statement regarding the Hefner ad campaign, stating, "As a pop icon, Hefner appeals to our target audience and credibly communicates our message of variety."

TARGET MARKET

According to the Oklahoma City Journal Record, Carl's Jr. launched its Six Dollar Burger because it "[viewed] the fast casual niche market—the hybrid between quick service and casual dining—as offering a strong business opportunity, especially with the average lunch hour being just 36 minutes these days." While Carl's Jr. targeted its core customers who had left the chain in search of a quality dining experience, the new burger and marketing campaign also appealed to time-strapped office workers, especially women, by offering a casual-dining restaurant meal without the hassles and costs associated with eating in a midscale restaurant.

Carl's Jr. also did not alienate the consumer group most likely to eat fast food: young men aged 18 to 35. At $3.95 the Six Dollar Burger fit the budgets of most men in that demographic. Weighing in at almost one-half pound of beef, and with toppings that included two thick slices of cheese, the burger could also satisfy the appetites of most hungry young men. To make sure this group of consumers got the message that Carl's Jr. was the place to go for burgers, the "Six Dollar Burger" campaign eventually evolved to include commercials featuring attractive young women in provocative situations.

COMPETITION

For Carl's Jr. the key competitors were number one burger chain McDonald's Corporation and number two

CARL'S JR. JUMPS ON LOW-CARB BANDWAGON

With the influence of diet-conscious consumers helping to determine the menu offerings at many dining establishments, Carl's Jr. adjusted its product line in response to one of the latest diet crazes: low-carbohydrate meals. An estimated 32 million Americans at the time were on a low-carb diet. Starting in December 2003 burger lovers could get their favorite Six Dollar Burger with all the trimmings except one: the bun. To reduce the carbohydrate count of the half-pound burger from 61 grams to a skimpy 6 grams, Carl's Jr. wrapped the burger in iceberg lettuce, reduced the amount of ketchup, and switched from sweet to dill pickles.

chain Burger King Corporation. Both were also struggling icons trying to reach the time-strapped business-lunch crowd, and both launched new campaigns in the early 2000s. McDonald's and Burger King also took a cue from Carl's Jr. by giving consumers what they wanted: big, juicy burgers like those found in casual-dining restaurants but served up fast and at a good price.

Using a group of 20-something office workers known as the "Lunch Break Gang" as spokespersons, Burger King in 2004 began a campaign promoting its Whopper hamburger and reintroduced its well-known slogan "Have It Your Way." To further appeal to the casual-dining crowd, the chain began offering an upgraded burger made with Angus beef, which it called the Western Angus Steak Burger. The campaign was a success for the chain, which reported monthly sales increases in the 10 consecutive months following its launch.

In 2003 McDonald's launched a campaign with the slogan "I'm Lovin' It." The chain's advertising agency stated in an interview with Money magazine that the plan was "to make McDonald's a 'lifestyle,' not just a place to eat." The new campaign became the first that McDonald's had launched internationally. After the "I'm Lovin' It" campaign appeared, McDonald's was named "Marketer of the Year" by Advertising Age for the brand's "marketing achievements around the world."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Introducing the Six Dollar Burger when many other fast-food chains were discounting their burgers was something of a risky strategy for Carl's Jr. The company explained, however, that the "Six Dollar Burger" campaign was designed to create a marketing concept that would set the chain apart from the competition. It also hoped that, by positioning the product as the first restaurant-quality burger offered by a fast-food chain, it could win back its market share from high-end and midscale casual-dining restaurants.

The campaign's television and radio commercials, created by ad agency Mendelsohn/Zein, were designed to reach burger lovers who craved restaurant-quality burgers but wanted them without the annoyances or high prices of sit-down restaurants. Television spots that kicked off the campaign portrayed the traditional restaurant-dining experience as less than desirable. One commercial featured diners who were forced to listen to a neighboring customer being sung to on his birthday, while another showed a pushy waiter encouraging customers to order dessert before their main course was served. At the end of each spot a voice-over asked, "Wouldn't it be nice if you could just get one of those great $6 restaurant burgers . . . without the restaurant?" The radio ads employed a man-on-the-street format, with people sampling the Six Dollar Burger and then commenting on the product in their own words.

OUTCOME

Following the launch of the "Six Dollar Burger" campaign, the Orange County Register reported that sales at Carl's Jr. restaurants made a turnaround and that for 14 straight months CKE reported positive sales at Carl's Jr. restaurants open more than one year. Restaurant analyst Bob Sandelman noted that the campaign successfully reinforced the company's message that Carl's Jr. was at the high end of fast food. Noting the success of the Six Dollar Burger, sister chain Hardee's introduced a similar product, called the Thickburger, within months. Hardee's customers received the new burger with the same enthusiasm that Carl's Jr. customers had, which helped boost the chain's falling sales. Based on the popularity of the Six Dollar Burger and the success of the campaign, Carl's Jr. introduced in 2003 a complete line of Six Dollar Burgers with five flavor varieties and an expanded marketing campaign that featured sexy commercials designed to appeal to men 18 to 35 years of age.

In 2002 the "Six Dollar Burger" campaign won a bronze EFFIE award for achieving the company's goal of developing a unique marketing concept and setting the chain apart from the competition. In addition Carl's Jr. won a Silver Skillet award, which was presented by Restaurant Business magazine in recognition of "exceptional innovation in new food or beverage items and uniqueness in product and marketing strategy."

Although the campaign was a success for Carl's Jr., there was one negative outcome: Dallas-based casual-dining restaurant chain T.G.I. Friday's filed a lawsuit against Carl's Jr. parent company CKE, alleging false advertising. The suit, which was settled in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, according to Nation's Restaurant News, was related to one of the Carl's Jr. ads, which included the claim that its $3.95 Six Dollar Burger was "like the burger I just paid about $6.25 for at Friday's." Both companies declined to comment on the settlement or to divulge its terms.

FURTHER READING

"Burger Lovers: Carl's Jr. Has More of What You Want." PR Newswire, November 3, 2003.

"Carl's Jr. Celebrates 60th Anniversary." PR Newswire, July 12, 2001.

"CKE: Hardee's Sales Soar in '$6' Promotion." Nation's Restaurant News, February 11, 2002.

"Friday's, CKE Settle Suit over '$6 Burger' Ad Claim." Nation's Restaurant News, June 10, 2002.

Lansner, Jonathan. "You Hope Alan Greenspan's Been Hitting Some Drive-Through Windows." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, March 19, 2002.

"Marketing Magic." Restaurants & Institutions, August 1, 2001.

"McDonald's Named 'Marketer of the Year.'" PR Newswire, December 13, 2004.

Montgomery, Tiffany. "Bigger Burgers with Better Beef Boost Business at Carl's Jr., Hardee's Eateries." Santa Ana (CA) Orange County Register, August 19, 2004.

"New and Noteworthy." Los Angeles Daily News, July 4, 2001.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Best Spots of 2004." Adweek, June 6, 2005.

Peters, James. "CKE Slips despite Gains from '$6' Burger." Nation's Restaurant News, September 16, 2002.

"The Six Dollar Burger Sheds Its Buns and 55 Grams of Carbohydrates in Time for New Year's Resolutions." PR Newswire, December 15, 2003.

Spector, Amy. "On the Fast Track: QSR Chains Race to Adopt Casual Approach." Nation's Restaurant News, July 16, 2001.

"Targeting the Casual Niche." Oklahoma City Journal Record, August 22, 2001.

Zuber, Amy. "The Best of Both Worlds." Nation's Restaurant News, October 1, 2001.

Rayna Bailey

Carnival Corporation

3655 NW 87th Avenue
Miami, Florida 33178-2428
USA
Telephone: (305) 599-2600
Fax: (305) 599-2600
Web site: www.carnivalcorp.com

■■■

FUN SHIPS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Beginning in the mid-1980s Carnival Cruise Lines emerged as a leader in the global market, and within a decade the Miami-based carrier had become the world's leading cruise operator. With a total of more than 30 ships and a broad base of holdings, Carnival Cruise Lines had become Carnival Corporation in 1994. By that time it had long since established a winning ad campaign, with television spots featuring entertainment personality Kathie Lee Gifford. Beginning in early 1997, however, the company took a new approach, using animated figures—most notably dancing fish—in place of human performers, with Gifford retained for the voice-over.

The agency of record, HMS Partners, typically employed a budget of $20 million to present two spots per year for the campaign, which was loosely titled "Fun Ships" and ran through 2000. The individual commercials, featuring their respective "stars"—the computer-generated images—cavorting to a calypso beat while Gifford's voice-over touted Carnival, were part of a continued branding effort in which Carnival sought to present itself as the "Fun Ships" line. "We own fun," senior vice president of marketing Vicki Freed told Jeffery D. Zbar in the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel. "We've been investing in fun for 20 years now. All the research tells us that our brand is known for fun."

As a result of this campaign and other moves by Carnival—such as the purchase of rival lines, the construction of new ships, and innovative marketing methods—bookings on Carnival ships continued to grow in 1998, 1999, and 2000, as they had grown for many years preceding. With expanded fleet capacity and more ships slated to be finished in the early years of the new century, however, Carnival and other cruise lines were especially vulnerable to the downturn in the larger travel and tourism industry following the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1972 Ted Arison, a former executive with Norwegian Caribbean Lines, joined forces with Meshulam Riklis of American International Travel Service (AITS) to form Carnival Cruise Lines. The latter, an AITS subsidiary, launched its first ship, the Mardi Gras, shortly thereafter. Like some farcical version of the Titanic, the Mardi Gras ran aground on its maiden voyage. With this inauspicious start, the nascent line was soon heavily in debt, and in 1974 Arison bought out Riklis for almost nothing.

By 1975, however, Arison had turned a profit by careful positioning with regard to Carnival's target market. He added a second ship in 1976 and a third the following year. In the midst of a market depressed by high inflation during the late 1970s and early 1980s, Carnival prospered under the leadership of Arison and his son Micky, who became CEO in 1979. By 1987, when it went public, Carnival was the leading cruise operator in the world.

In the late 1980s Carnival diversified, adding short cruises to, and a gambling casino in, the Bahamas. There were also land tours, a hotel chain, and—following the 1989 purchase of Holland America Line—luxury cruises. By the mid-1990s the newly renamed Carnival Corporation had established a heavy presence in Europe that culminated with the early 1998 purchase of the upscale Cunard line of Great Britain for half a billion dollars.

TARGET MARKET

From the mid-1970s Ted Arison had shown an ability to recognize the target demographic of Carnival Cruise Lines, and more than 20 years later his son seemed to have inherited the trait. Furthermore, Micky Arison, with his family-controlled 45 percent of the company, continually worked to refine Carnival's focus on its target market.

The elder Arison recognized early that the cruise line's customer base was built around youngish middle-class adults, and he designed the shipboard entertainment—including discos, live music, and gambling—accordingly. Hence the focus on fun, evident in Freed's statement that the line had been "investing in fun" for two decades. The first two spots in the new campaign, released in 1997, featuring dancing fish and swaying palms respectively and included a voice-over by Gifford, saying, "I guess some vacations are just more fun than others." Gifford, whose contract with the cruise line continued until mid-1999, presented a somewhat longer, but still fun-oriented, tagline in the 1998 spots: "Looks like one vacation is just more fun. We guarantee it. Carnival. The most popular cruise line in the world."

Awareness of the target market motivated more than the company's attempts to associate fun with its image, however. Journalist Kitty Pilgrim, interviewing Micky Arison for Cable News Network Financial News (CNNfn) in 1998, noted the high numbers of Americans who would have reached "the prime cruising age" within a few years. According to one analyst, Pilgrim commented, by 2005 there would be 81 million Americans between the ages of 40 and 59. Arison, when asked if he expected an increase in ticket sales to coincide with this trend, not surprisingly said that business had long been good and was only going to get better; nonetheless, he conceded, "There is no question that the aging of the baby-boom generation is falling into really our prime target market for cruising."

To accommodate the aging baby-boom market, along with growing health concerns among the population, in November 1998 Carnival launched its first-ever smoke-free cruise ship, the Paradise. The latter would sail a seven-day route between Miami and the eastern or western reaches of the Caribbean. Arison explained to Pilgrim that surveys had shown a decline in the numbers of smokers among Carnival customers. At present, he said, no more than 22 percent of the company's passengers smoked, so it made sense to dedicate at least one ship to a completely smoke-free environment.

Carnival also used price as a means of drawing in the large numbers of Americans who had never taken a cruise before in their lives—92 percent of the U.S. public, according to a study referred to in Advertising Age in early 1997. The Cruise Line International Association reported that in 1996 fewer than 5 million Americans took cruises, leaving a market of more than 270 million untouched.

In addition, given trends in the market, the company could be expected to attract female travelers. According

TITANIC RESULTS?

Did the 1998 hit Titanic—a huge box-office success as well as the winner of several Academy Awards, including Best Picture—hurt ticket sales for cruise ships? One would assume that it would have: after all, the central event of the film was the sinking of an ocean liner. But that would be an incorrect assumption, according to Carnival Corporation CEO Micky Arison. "I think exposure to the industry is clearly positive," Arison told Kitty Pilgrim of Cable News Network Financial News (CNNfn), on the program In the Game in November 1998. "And while we weren't expecting a boost from Titanic . . . the reality is that it did show some of the glamour of cruising's past, and the first half of the movie . . . was pretty positive."

The first half of the film took place before the sinking of the majestic Titanic on the night of April 14, 1912. One scene in particular that seemed to have captured viewers' imaginations, Arison told Pilgrim, was the one in which star Leonardo Di Caprio climbed onto the bow, placing himself at the very front of the ship. Arison stated, "We do have people trying to get out on the bows to feel fresh air because of the movie . . . Captains are constantly complaining that they've got to take people down from the bows of the ship."

to a study conducted by About Women, a business research firm, in late 1996, women were more likely to take cruises than men, more likely to plan their vacations carefully, and more likely to spend a greater amount of money. One of the chief concerns of women travelers—both in the leisure as well as business segments—was security. They wanted to know they would be safe in their rooms, whether in a hotel or on board a ship. Uniglobe Travel senior vice president Michele Desreux gave Carnival high marks for its treatment of female customers: ''There are progressive suppliers,'' she told the Worcester Sunday Telegram, ''such as Hyatt Hotels and Resorts and Carnival Cruise Lines, that take special care with women travelers.''

COMPETITION

At the same time that Carnival brought out its first round of ''dancing fish'' spots in early 1997, archrival Royal Caribbean Cruises also broke new advertisements. With six television spots created by ad agency McKinney & Silver of Raleigh, North Carolina, the Royal Caribbean campaign centered on the tagline ''Like no vacation on earth.'' Royal Caribbean's commercials, like Carnival's, departed from existing industry standards, which tended to call for shipboard scenes; the competitor's spots used ''fly-by'' scenes of a ship cruising on the water.

As Zbar reported in Advertising Age, ''Other competitors ha[d] already charted new courses'' in their adverting as well. In September 1996 Celebrity Cruise Line introduced a new campaign using animated figures created by Korey, Kay & Partners of New York City. Norwegian Cruise Lines had, in 1995, presented a series of spots built around the tagline ''It's different out here''—advertising that used ''attractive models and provocative themes,'' in Zbar's words, to make a departure from typical cruise-ship advertising.

Pointing out the common denominators underlying these advertisements, Zbar reported that ''executives noted the merits of selling the emotional experience of cruising, as opposed to the rational approach''—i.e., selling the sizzle rather than the steak. He quoted Adam Goldstein, vice president of marketing for Royal Caribbean: ''We wanted to strike out in a new direction that gets people who historically might have been put off by yet more classic cruise imagery, to say that the kind of vacation we offer is connected with some of the most fundamental vacation and personal needs.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

For 12 years, starting in the mid-1980s, Carnival advertising had centered on celebrities, usually depicted on board a Carnival ship. Julie Weingarden in Adweek described the typical Carnival ad lineup as ''second-tier celebrities like Richard Simmons and Willard Scott rubbing elbows with perky ship hostess/spokesperson Kathie Lee Gifford.''

Then in January 1997 came the first in a new line of television spots, which Zbar described in Advertising Age: ''Realistic, computer-animated tropical fish and swaying palms replace longtime spokeswoman Kathie Lee Gifford—retained as voice-over talent—as the central characters. As the fish dance to an original mambo tune, a Carnival ship is seen plying the water's surface. And as palms sway to a calypso beat, a ship sails into view. 'I guess some vacations are just more fun than others,' says Ms. Gifford's voice-over.''

The new television campaign had emerged from a 1996 print campaign using the theme of fun, and whereas Carnival had spent $30 million on total advertising in the preceding year, in 1997 it intended to devote $20 million to the new campaign alone. The company certainly was not having to spend money on celebrity talent: the ''stars,'' as Weingarden called the main attractions in the commercials, were computer-generated. Behind the new spots was the work of Digital Domain, a computer production facility in Venice, California, that had also provided visuals for the film Titanic.

In 1998 the company proceeded with what Zbar called ''a continued shift from shipboard shots and toward branding its 'Fun Ships' concept.'' Again there were two spots that replaced their predecessors on national television in October, and again the theme of fun was built around the antics of images created with the help of a computer. In ''Starfish,'' a school of those multilegged sea creatures danced to a calypso beat, and the same musical backing appeared in ''Beach Chairs & Umbrellas''—a spot that showed yet more cavorting on the part of nonhuman actors. Both spots included Gifford's voice-over: ''Looks like one vacation is just more fun. We guarantee it. Carnival. The most popular cruise line in the world.'' The campaign continued with little alteration through 2000.

OUTCOME

Results for Carnival in the late 1990s seemed to indicate that the company's leadership was justified in straying from cruise-ship advertising tradition. In 1999 Wall Street analyst Brian Egger of Donaldson, Lufkin and Jenrette, a specialist in the cruise and gaming industries, described Carnival as ''extremely well positioned.'' According to Suzanne Koudsi of Leisure Travel News, Egger called Carnival his ''favorite company'' and noted, ''Carnival is best known for going after a customer that's never taken a cruise.''

The fall of 2000 saw Carnival depart even further from the celebrity-focused platform that had defined its advertising prior to 1997. The new campaign adopted the conventions of so-called "reality TV" as a means of updating Carnival's image and addressing negative stereotypes about the cruising experience. Amateur actors were sent on Carnival cruises and then interviewed after the fact; the hope was that the actors would appear to be disinterested, third-party endorsers. The first-time cruisers told stories of negative expectations overcome, and in the process they described highlights of their individual Carnival vacations. The previous tagline, "The most popular cruise line in the world," remained in place.

The booming cruise industry of the late 1990s had led Carnival, along with its competitors, to increase the size of its fleet dramatically. The consequences of such overbuilding were already cause for concern by 2000, but the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks turned the situation into a full-blown problem. The declines in travel and tourism following the attacks forced Carnival and its competitors to resort to deeply discounted fares in the scramble to fill what had become an overabundance of berths. Although the subsequent years were difficult ones for all cruise lines, the long-term outlook for the cruise industry remained strong, and Carnival was well positioned for future growth in the event of a rebound, thanks in no small part to its marketing-generated identity as the "fun" cruise line.

FURTHER READING

"Carnival Reports Revenue Hike in 1st Quarter." Travel Weekly, April 3, 1995, p. 39.

Determan, Wendy. "Carnival's New Line of Luxury." Leisure Travel News, April 12, 1999, p. 17.

Goetzl, David. "Cruising to Nowhere." Advertising Age (midwest ed.), November 12, 2001.

Koudsi, Suzanne. "Analysts Optimistic for Cruise Industry." Leisure Travel News, January 25, 1999, p. 21.

———. "The Cruise Buzz." Leisure Travel News, December 14, 1998, p. 598.

———. "Selling Cruises Made Easy?" Leisure Travel News, March 8, 1999, p. 4.

"Record Carnival Result." Lloyd's List, December 23, 1994, p. 2.

Scott, Diana. "Travel Is Up for Women of All Ages, but Survey Reveals a Troubling Note" Worcester (MA) Telegram & Gazette, January 26, 1997, p. F1.

Weingarden, Julie. "Carnival Cruise Turns to 'Toons to Show It's Still the 'Fun Ship,'" Adweek (southwest ed.), January 13, 1997, p. 5.

Zbar, Jeffery D.. "Carnival, Royal Caribbean Ads Depart from Tradition: Dancing Fish Bump Beaming Kathie Lee from Starring Role in Cruise-Ship Ads." Advertising Age, January 6, 1997, p. 6.

———. "Fun Ads for the 'Fun Ships': Carnival Sets Sail into World of Computer Animation." Fort Lauderdale (FL) Sun-Sentinel, October 3, 1998, p. 15C.

———. "Miami-Based Carnival Cruise Lines to Debut New 'Reality-Based' Television Ads." Fort Lauderdale (FL) Sun-Sentinel, November 8, 2000.

Judson Knight
Mark Lane

Cellco Partnership

180 Washington Valley Road
Bedminster, New Jersey 07921
USA
Telephone: (800) 214-3555
Fax: (908) 306-6927
Web site: www.verizonwireless.com

■■■

CAN YOU HEAR ME NOW? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Cellco Partnership, which operated under the name Verizon Wireless, was the largest mobile-phone service provider in America during 2002. Rated best by consumers in customer satisfaction, Verizon was spending an estimated $1 billion every 90 days to improve service quality and to expand its coverage "footprint" (the term given to a mobile-phone reception area). Although its smaller competitors, such as Sprint PCS Group and Cingular Wireless LLC, began price wars using lower-priced calling plans, their footprints and sustained-call rates were lacking. Subscribers using Cingular were four times more likely to drop (lose service during) a call than Verizon's customers. Avoiding the price wars completely and rebranding itself as a premium service provider, Verizon launched its "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign on January 14, 2002.

"Can You Hear Me Now?" was created by Bozell, a New York-based ad agency that operated as part of the Interpublic Group of Companies. The television spots starred actor Paul Marcarelli as a Verizon field tester who dropped in on locations ranging from the outlandish to the mundane. In each spot he asked, "Can you hear me now?" into a mobile phone. After hearing an affirmation, Testman, as Marcarelli's character was dubbed, replied, "Good!" By 2003 Verizon was spending $300 to $400 million annually on the "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, with an additional $700 to $800 million on direct mail and in-store promotions. Only 10 percent of the campaign's budget went into print advertising.

Although the "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign did not receive many advertising awards, it did help establish higher-ground branding for Verizon during intense industry competition. The number of Verizon subscribers increased from 32.5 million at the campaign's launch to 37.5 million in 2003. By the start of 2004 the number of subscribers was 43.8 million, which indicated that quality was indeed a strong selling point for cell-phone consumers. Verizon remained the number one wireless provider in America until February 2004, when Cingular purchased AT&T Wireless Services for $41 billion.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cellco Partnership, doing business under the name Verizon Wireless, formed in 2000 when Bell Atlantic merged with Vodafone, the world's largest mobile-phone service provider. Together the partnership had 32 million subscribers, making Verizon an overnight industry leader. Starting in August of 2000 Verizon Wireless began the largest renaming campaign in history. Print ads featured Verizon employees promising customers that they would receive the same dependable and reliable service they had experienced with Bell Atlantic and Vodafone. The campaign was created by four separate advertising agencies working together: the Lord Group, Burrell Communications, Temerlin McClain, and La Agencia de Orcí & Asociados.

© BRAD SWONETZ/ZEFA/CORBIS.

After conducting an analysis of its own quality and that of its competition, Verizon realized that its network provided the most dependable coverage in the industry. It quickly positioned itself as the reliable alternative and continued pouring capitol into improving its already reliable network. In 2003 the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) mandated "number portability," allowing subscribers to keep their phone numbers when they changed wireless providers. Soon afterward many new subscribers turned to Verizon.

"We're not the low-cost provider. We're not the most aggressive with promotional deals and headset giveaways," Marvin Davis, vice president of advertising for Verizon Wireless, told USA Today. "Our brand message is important, because the market recognizes it's a higher-quality service. People are willing to pay more to get more." $4 million was spent improving Verizon's network in 2004, and $5 million was spent in 2005. According to Consumers Union (a publisher of consumer reports), Verizon was receiving the least amount of customer complaints in the industry. Cingular, the market leader since 2004, garnered the most, with 289 complaints per million subscribers.

CONTAGIOUS QUESTIONS

With its "Can You Hear Me Now?" campaign, Verizon joined other advertising campaigns that had reached iconic status by asking questions not always meant to be answered. Wendy's International, Inc., achieved similar contagiousness with its "Where's the Beef?" campaign in the 1980s. Anheuser-Busch had everyone asking "Whassup?" after the 2000 Super Bowl. In 1997 the McDonald's Corporation also made ad history with its question, "Did somebody say McDonald's?"

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted 25- to 54-year-olds who treasured their phone's ability to place calls anytime and anyplace. To reach this target, every "Can You Hear Me Now?" spot featured 34-year-old actor Paul Marcarelli as a technician who was always validating Verizon's superior network. At the beginning of the campaign neither Verizon nor Bozell would identify the actor playing Testman. Verizon even denied the press interviews with Marcarelli. The reticence was an attempt to make the spokesman seem as if he lived only inside commercials and to encourage the target audience's perception of Testman as a one-dimensional character.

By 2003 half of all Americans owned cell phones. Price wars continued among most wireless providers besides Verizon, which held its stance on service quality. Verizon averaged $49 per month on calling plans, targeting users with higher incomes. USA Today surveyed the audience reaction to the "Can You Hear Me Now?" ads in its regular Ad Track feature. Results showed that 20 percent of viewers liked the ads "a lot." Although this was lower than Ad Track's average of 21 percent, the campaign scored higher than any other wireless ad for the two years prior.

COMPETITION

Cingular was formed in 2000 with the union of SBC Communications and BellSouth. Early ad efforts for Cingular focused on "Jack," the company's X-shaped, orange mascot, who never spoke yet stood for "self-expression." Using the tagline "Cingular fits you best," its campaign promoted services such as Family Talk and Rollover minutes. "We're seeing very strong results, and I think 'Cingular fits you best' is a big contributor," Daryl Evans, Cingular's vice president of advertising

CAMPAIGNING A CULTURAL ICON

Testman, the character constantly asking ''Can you hear me now?'' into his Verizon phone, appeared in more than 100 spots. Some featured him on the sets of TV shows Jeopardy and Fear Factor. References to the character and his tagline became widespread. Saturday Night Live used the slogan to lampoon President Bush, showing him asking Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, ''Can you hear me now?'' The Tonight Show got on board by depicting Alexander Graham Bell repeating the question into one of his earliest telephones. Verizon pushed the Testman craze so far as to stage a Testman look-alike contest in Wisconsin.

and marketing communications, told USA Today. ''Cingular recognizes that people use wireless in all kinds of different ways.''

By 2002 Cingular was spending $428 million on advertising. Two years later Cingular acquired AT&T, giving Cingular enough subscribers to emerge as the industry leader. AT&T's infrastructure allowed Cingular to increase its coverage ''footprint'' instantly. The new leader began targeting Verizon's market in October 2004 with its ''Raising the Bar'' campaign, which referred to the ''bars'' on a cell phone's signal-strength meter. Nevertheless, when the broadcast-monitoring group TNS Media Intelligence/CMR conducted customer-loyalty testing in early 2005, asking random cell-phone users to compare their service with that of an ideal wireless provider, Verizon customers proved to be the most loyal, followed by Sprint PCS and T-Mobile. Cingular ranked fourth, with four times as many service complaints as Verizon.

Sprint spent $481 million on advertising in 2002, with a campaign that starred a spokesman referred to as ''Sprint guy.'' In television spots ''Sprint guy,'' played by a tall, blue-eyed actor clad in a black trench coat, explained different Sprint services to people. One commercial featured him demonstrating Sprint's camera phone to a family on a beach. Another spot, hinging on deadpan humor, showed him consoling a support group of disgruntled wireless customers. ''Sprint guy'' appeared in more than 100 television spots, mostly promoting features such as no-roaming fees, Sprint's all-digital network, and high-speed wireless Internet service.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Before the ''Can You Hear Me Now?'' campaign began, Verizon discovered that consumers struggled to differentiate between wireless brands. The campaign's greatest challenge was to establish higher ground in an industry undergoing fierce price wars. Unable to lower subscriber fees, Verizon focused the campaign on Verizon's premium coverage. According to a statement released by Bozell, the campaign was intended ''to position Verizon Wireless as a superior wireless company that relentlessly strives to be the most reliable national wireless provider in the country.''

The campaign's first spot was launched on January 14, 2002. Over the course of the campaign more than 100 similarly themed ''Can You Hear Me Now?'' television spots were made. All featured the same spectacled man, dressed as a Verizon test engineer, traveling the country to validate Verizon's infrastructure. Testman, as his character was called, appeared in wheat fields, on snowy mountains, on the set of the TV show Jeopardy, and in airports. In most spots Testman quickly asked, ''Can you hear me now?'' After supposedly hearing an affirmation through his phone, he replied ''Good!'' Later spots varied. A 2004 commercial showed Testman standing nervously in an office-building lobby. A woman finally exited the women's restroom and handed Testman a mobile phone. ''Works fine,'' she said. A voice-over then stated, ''When you're testing the largest, most reliable network in the nation, you can't let anything stop you.'' The spot ended with Testman making one last call, asking, ''Can you hear me now?''

''Can You Hear Me Now?'' print ads (many, but not all of which featured Testman) appeared in magazines such as Entertainment Weekly, People, Sports Illustrated, and Rolling Stone. During the first year television spots were created by Bozell, but after Bozell merged with another Interpublic-affiliated agency, Lowe, in early 2003, the campaign was produced by Lowe & Partners Worldwide. It eventually moved into the hands of McCann-Erickson (also a division of Interpublic). One of Bozell's early challenges was casting the Testman character. ''We were looking for someone memorable. Something that would cut through the advertising clutter,'' Melanie Vandervalk, vice president of marketing and sales for Verizon Wireless, told the Washington Post. Verizon settled on Paul Marcarelli, a 34-year-old actor from New York. At the campaign's onset, Verizon restricted the press' access to Marcarelli. Verizon would not answer questions about his identity or allow interviews. ''He needs to stay one-dimensional and [Verizon] needs to control him. It turns from advertising to PR,'' Kristie Nordhielm, assistant professor of marketing at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management, explained to Advertising Age. "To expose him is a tradeoff between getting additional exposure for free and losing control of his image, but it's not because they don't want him to be an icon."

Some experts felt the campaign's tagline had been repeated ad nauseam. "'Can you hear me now?' [has become] annoying because of the repetition, but I think it drives home the point, and it works for that reason," Robin Hafitz, cochair of Mad Dogs & Englishmen, an advertising firm in New York, told the Washington Post. Verizon further catapulted Testman to the status of a cultural icon by sponsoring look-alike contests in Wisconsin. "I think the key to the Verizon [Wireless] guy is his understatement," Nordhielm continued in Advertising Age. "These things go in cycles and right now we seem to be in 'less is more' time with the Dell guy [Steven] being 'more is more.' To identify a cultural icon is like rolling the dice. It's the right place, right time, right icon."

OUTCOME

"Can You Hear Me Now?" was connected with some of Verizon's earliest and greatest successes, including reducing customer turnover to 1.8 percent, a 2.5 percent drop from 2000. "You can see that the commercials have really resonated with consumers," said Sue Marek, a former industry analyst who covered the wireless sector for Wireless Week, told the Baltimore Sun. "It's really paid off for them in a big way." While competitors had to drop prices to maintain market share, Verizon was able to maintain its average monthly service revenue per user at $49. During the first year of "Can You Hear Me Now?" Verizon sales grew 10 percent. Overall, Verizon achieved the campaign's two main goals: increasing the subscriber base and establishing itself as a premium service provider.

At the start of the campaign Verizon had 32.5 million subscribers; in 2003 it had 37.5 million, and at the beginning of 2004 Verizon subscribers numbered 43.8 million. The increases indicated that cell-phone consumers were just as concerned about quality as they were about price. Linda Barrabee of market research firm the Yankee Group said to USA Today, "If you only feed customers lower prices, that's all they are going to think of you as. If you give them something compelling, they'll consider staying with you."

FURTHER READING

Dill, Mallorre. "Keep On Testing." Adweek (eastern ed.), June 3, 2002, p. 20.

Elliott, Stuart. "In a Surprise Move, Verizon Wireless Stays with Interpublic." New York Times, April 28, 2004, p. 6.

Howard, Theresa. "'Can You Hear Me Now?' a Hit; Simple 'Testman' Ads Help Verizon Wireless Stay Strong." USA Today, February 23, 2004, p. B8.

———. "Wireless Ads to Tap into Services." USA Today, July 29, 2003, p. B3.

Jette, Julie. "HIGHWAYMAN; On-Road Testing Key to Cellular Success; Verizon Tracking of Dropped Calls a Marketing Tool." Quincy (MA) Patriot Ledger, March 10, 2005, p. 24.

McMains, Andrew, and Ann M. Mack. "Verizon to Hear New Ideas from 3 IPG Shops." Broadcasting & Cable, May 24, 2004, p. 26.

Noguchi, Yuki. "Wireless Gets the Priciest Plugs; Carriers' Megabuck Ads Flood Airwaves." Washington Post, October 31, 2003, p. E1.

Sabatini, Patricia. "Hear This: Testman Is No Nerd." Pittsburgh (PA) Post-Gazette, May 12, 2003, p. 1C.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Quick Turnaround for Verizon Spot." Adweek, May 3, 2004, p. 7.

Sanders, Lisa. "Breaking: Verizon Gets Testy: Bozell Campaign for Wireless Leader Features 'Testman.'" Advertising Age, January 14, 2002, p. 2.

Steinberg, Brian. "Advert Mailbox." Wall Street Journal, December 17, 2003, p. B4A.

York, Emily Bryson. "Verizon Keeps 'Testman' on Short Leash." Advertising Age, August 25, 2003, p. 7.

Kevin Teague

The Charles Schwab Corporation

101 Montgomery Street
San Francisco, California 94104
USA
Telephone: (415) 627-7000
Fax: (415) 636-5970
Web site: www.schwab.com

■■■

SMARTER INVESTOR CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Known as a discount broker in a world of traditional full-service investment firms, the Charles Schwab Corporation diversified during the 1980s and 1990s. In keeping with an industry-wide trend toward offering customers one-stop financial services, it expanded into banking, annuities, bond trading, and mutual funds. With the rise of the Internet, Schwab's core brokerage business evolved to allow trading on its website, making it America's leading online broker by the late 1990s. While a host of upstart, low-fee online trading services challenged Schwab from below, the company also needed to position itself against a wide range of consolidated financial-services companies. In response to these pressures, and amid an unprecedented bull market on Wall Street, Schwab rapidly increased its marketing profile at the end of the millennium, an effort that culminated with the well-received "Smarter Investor" campaign, which began in 1999 and ran through 2000.

Created by the New York office of Omnicom Group's BBDO agency for an estimated first-year price tag of $50 million, "Smarter Investor" began as a series of four television commercials featuring sports celebrities. According to the agency, the use of celebrities was meant to make Schwab seem accessible and good-natured, in touch with ordinary Americans' interests, and the athletes' humorously surprising grasp of the intricacies of investing terminology suggested that anyone, no matter what their previous level of financial expertise had been, could become a smarter investor with Schwab's help. Supporting print ads used the campaign's tagline, "Creating a world of smarter investors." Subsequent TV spots featured entertainment celebrities, and then the campaign evolved to shift the focus away from celebrities and onto Schwab's retirement-planning products and services.

The campaign attracted favorable industry attention and awards, but a sputtering stock market led Schwab to rethink the do-it-yourself ethos embodied by the "Smarter Investor" campaign. The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, dramatically heightened the investing public's already palpable anxiety, and Schwab further changed its advertising message, in the subsequent months and years, to suit a more anxious investing public.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Stanford graduate Charles Schwab founded his eponymous company (then Charles Schwab & Co.) as a full-service brokerage firm in 1971. When the Securities and Exchange Commission banned fixed brokers' commissions in 1975, Schwab's competitors responded by increasing commissions. Schwab instead lowered commissions and positioned itself as a no-frills alternative to traditional full-service brokers. Between 1977 and 1983 Schwab revenues grew by a factor of 30. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s Schwab diversified into banking, retirement, personal investment advising, mutual funds, and other products similar to those offered by its full-service rivals. But those rivals also diversified during this time, as did most other key players in the financial-services industry. Schwab had, however, built an unparalleled system of local branches over the course of its first three decades, along with a corresponding reputation for accessibility and value that distinguished it from its pricier rivals.

© JAMES LEYNSE/CORBIS.

In addition to competing against this wide range of financial-services giants, Schwab had to contend with new down-market rivals as well. The number of online investing services went from none in 1995 to 82 in 1998, and though Schwab was early to establish itself in the online brokerage wars, upstart companies continued to undercut one another (and Schwab) in pricing, with online transaction fees falling below $10, a significant difference from Schwab's fee of $29.95.

By 1998 more than 50 percent of Schwab's brokerage customers were trading online, and Schwab had almost 30 percent of the online trading market. To maintain its position atop the online investing industry, and to remain competitive with higher-priced rivals, Schwab embarked on its first concerted effort at brand-building (it had focused most of its previous advertising on specific products). When it hired BBDO in 1998, Schwab dramatically increased its advertising budget, setting out to unify its products and services under an umbrella concept and to define its image for the investing public. Initial BBDO spots included documentary-style branding work featuring ordinary Schwab customers praising the company.

TARGET MARKET

Though it continued to stress Schwab's accessibility and usefulness to a wide range of investors, the 1999 "Smarter Investor" campaign took Schwab beyond BBDO's initial ordinary-investor approach and into glitzier territory. As a broad corporate-image campaign, "Smarter Investor" did not focus on specific Schwab products or segments of investors but instead sought to communicate the firm's position amid the wide range of available financial-services companies.

According to BBDO's creative director, Jimmy Siegel, the agency wanted to play up Schwab's reputation for offering "a very down-to-earth, honest way to invest," and the use of celebrities underscored the firm's desire to seem affable and in tune with the interests of ordinary people. Each spot revolved around the humorous use of investing jargon by people who were well known for reasons other than their stock-market savvy, which sent the message that anyone, with Schwab's help, could become knowledgeable about investing. Poised between

FUNNY BUSINESS

Schwab's "Smarter Investor" campaign was a departure from much financial-services advertising in its reliance on humor, but "Smarter Investor" was not Schwab's first foray into the business of trying to be funny. In 1998, advertising shop BBDO's first year helming Schwab's corporate-image efforts, the agency came up with a series of spots employing the tagline "Ready to Move Up?" The ads featured such professionals as a plastic surgeon and an airline pilot who, because they had to spend so much time thinking about their finances, botched their primary, high-stakes jobs. Schwab pulled the campaign following complaints by organizations such as the American Medical Association, and BBDO went with a more palatable brand of humor in the ensuing "Smarter Investor" spots.

the world of conventional full-service brokers and that of discount, limited-service online brokers, Schwab wanted investors to see it as unique in that it did not charge exorbitant fees but still provided its customers with solid advice and market knowledge. The idea that Schwab was in the business of creating knowledgeable investors was, in the words of BBDO senior creative director Charlie Miesmer, "a compliment to investors and Schwab alike."

COMPETITION

E*TRADE Financial Corporation, second to Schwab in online-brokerage market share, spent more than a quarter of its 1998 revenues on the rollout of its new website. Targeting investors who used the web to research financial matters but who did not yet use it for trading, the E*TRADE push included direct-mail promotions offering $50 signing bonuses to select new customers. The company also ran text-heavy print ads detailing the site's features. TV spots were aired on cable television, and a significant portion of the advertising budget was devoted to online media.

Merrill Lynch & Co., the nation's largest brokerage firm at the time, was hardly immune to the challenges of the evolving financial-services marketplace. With its "Human Achievement" campaign it had positioned itself as a desirable, people-focused firm that was preferable to the electronic realm of online brokerages. Observers were surprised, therefore, when Merrill did an about-face in June of 2000, announcing that it would begin offering low-cost online trading. Merrill phased out the "Human Achievement" message and began the process of refining a marketing approach that could reconcile the company's full-service brokerage heritage with its new discount online offerings.

FMR Corp., also known as Fidelity Investments, was the world's leading mutual fund company in addition to offering a range of financial services, such as brokerage, life insurance, trust services, and securities clearing. Fidelity had in the preceding years been using a significant proportion of its marketing resources to spread the word about its capabilities beyond mutual funds, focusing on its brokerage business in particular. In 2000 the company launched the "See Yourself Succeeding" campaign, which showed Fidelity advisers teaching customers about new products or helping them find solutions to investment problems.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The factors that set Schwab apart from other companies—its heritage of no-nonsense investing capabilities and customer service provided via its comprehensive branch system—formed the basis of BBDO's vision for the "Smarter Investor" campaign. Additionally, the campaign's reliance on humor was a departure from traditional financial-services advertising, a contrast, in the words of BBDO co-CEO and chief creative officer Tedd Sann, to the "heavy and amorphous" marketing of competitors. Celebrities had the obvious advantage of attracting attention to the ads, and further, as Adweek columnist Barbara Lippert noted, the presentation of the celebrities as "knowing users of complicated information" was a refreshing departure from typical endorsement ads.

The first four spots in the campaign began running in late August 1999. They were featured during CBS's coverage of the U.S. Open tennis tournament as well as during tennis, golf, and football programming on both network and cable stations throughout that year. The professional athletes featured in the ads were tennis players Anna Kournikova and Mary Joe Fernandez, football players Shannon Sharpe and Jason Sehorn, skier Picabo Street, and basketball player Dikembe Mutombo. In each case an athlete showed an unexpectedly sophisticated grasp of financial matters while engaged in his or her acknowledged field of expertise. For example, in one spot Fernandez remarked about the Russian Kournikova (known for her attractive appearance as well as for her tennis playing), "I'm not really friends with Anna Kournikova. First of all, there's that whole language thing." The scene then shifted to Kournikova telling an umpire, "A P/E ratio is price divided by earnings," before she turned to a group of tennis students and asked, ''Can anyone say asset allocation?''

In another spot, called ''Trash Talk,'' New York Giants cornerback Jason Sehorn bemoaned the verbal abuse he had received from Denver Broncos tight end Shannon Sharpe. Sharpe was shown, at the line of scrimmage, bad-mouthing Sehorn with putdowns such as ''Your mama pays full commission!'' and ''I bet you pay transaction fees on your mutual funds!'' The ads used the voice-over line ''When we created a smarter kind of investment firm, we created a smarter kind of investor,'' and the primary campaign tagline was ''Creating a world of smarter investors.'' Print ads featuring the tagline alone ran in such publications as the Wall Street Journal, Forbes, and Fortune.

The second series of television spots featured non-sports celebrities and employed the same concept and tagline. In one ad, first aired during the 2000 Super Bowl, Beatles drummer Ringo Starr was shown rhyming various financial catchphrases with the word ''elation.'' Another spot depicted two lovers on a seaside balcony, with a female voice-over supplying their dialogue. The man asked, ''What's wrong?'' and the woman replied, ''My portfolio is totally unbalanced. My mutual funds are underperforming.'' The voice behind the dialogue was revealed to be that of romance writer Jackie Collins, supposedly reading from her new novel.

Schwab similarly featured celebrities in a humorous way to pitch its retirement-planning capabilities during and after the main campaign's run. In ''Retirement Home'' a group of sports superstars who had only recently passed their prime were gathered at a retirement home, variously napping, knitting, and playing bingo or shuffleboard. A voice-over stated, ''These days, it's never too early to think about retirement.'' Another spot featured baseball slugger Barry Bonds, who was then on the verge of breaking Hank Aaron's career home-run record, being subliminally encouraged by Aaron, via a stadium loudspeaker, to think about retiring.

OUTCOME

Schwab's ''Tennis Player'' ad, featuring Fernandez and Kournikova, was named an Adweek Best Spot of 1999. The ''Jackie Collins'' spot also garnered Adweek Best Spot honors in April 2000. ''Retirement Home'' won a Silver Lion at the 2000 International Advertising Festival in Cannes, France. Barbara Lippert called the campaign ''truly deft, delightful work, mostly because it's smartly written and well-executed.''

But as the stock market declined, Schwab began to phase in new messages and marketing approaches, beginning with spots featuring the company's founder, Charles Schwab, comforting anxious investors in a town-hall setting. During the September 11 terrorist attacks Schwab lost its World Trade Center headquarters, but all of its employees survived. The company was the first financial-services firm to launch a new campaign after the attacks, running spots that compared Schwab advisers to the most trustworthy people in investors' lives. Because the stock market had plunged and consumer trading had fallen dramatically, Schwab had to cut its advertising budget, and it dropped BBDO without a review in 2002. Instead it appointed GSD&M, the Austin, Texas shop that had been in charge of advertising for Schwab online, as its primary creative agency. Between 2000 and 2003 Schwab laid off more than a third of its workforce and struggled to return to the levels of profitability it had enjoyed in years prior.

FURTHER READING

Barney, Lee. ''Schwab and MassMutual Initiate Ad Campaigns to Remake Their Images.'' Mutual Fund Market News, September 13, 1999.

Buckman, Rebecca. ''On-Line Brokerage Firms Advertise Big as Volume of Stock Trading Skyrockets.'' Wall Street Journal, September 11, 1998.

Buckman, Rebecca, and Kathryn Kranhold. ''Schwab Serves Up Sports-Themed Ads.'' Wall Street Journal, August 30, 1999.

Cardona, Mercedes. ''Financial Firms Press On with Advertising Plans.'' Advertising Age, October 1, 2001.

Gasparino, Charles. ''Merrill Hopes New Ads Can Integrate Its Image as Full-Service Firm, Leading Online Broker.'' Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2000.

Gianatasio, David. ''A Solid Investment.'' Adweek, December 11, 2000.

Hein, Kenneth. ''Charles in Charge.'' Brandweek, March 19, 2001.

Linnett, Richard. ''Personality Plus.'' Adweek, August 30, 1999.

Lippert, Barbara. ''Star Power.'' Adweek, December 6, 1999.

Parpis, Eleftheria. ''Best Campaigns of 1999.'' Adweek (western ed.), January 24, 2000.

Petrecca, Laura, and James B. Arndorfer. ''Schwab Enlists BBDO for $50 Mil in Brand Ad Work.'' Advertising Age, June 26, 1998.

Warner, Bernhard. ''Taking Stock of the Web.'' Adweek (western ed.), September 21, 1998.

Woodward, Sarah. ''BBDO New York Puts Its Money Where the Mouth Is.'' Shoot, September 17, 1999.

Mark Lane

Chevron Corporation

6001 Bollinger Canyon Road
San Ramon, California 94583
USA
Telephone: (925) 842-1000
Fax: (925) 842-1000
Web site: www.chevron.com

■■■

A WORLD OF ENERGY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Texaco Inc. and Chevron Corporation merged. The essay continues to refer to the company's name as Texaco, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1997 Texaco was the fifth-largest marketer of crude oil, natural gas, and other related products. On the list of rival companies that were outperforming Texaco were the Exxon Corporation, the Royal Dutch/Shell Group, BP p.l.c., and Mobil Corporation. To boost its market share Texaco needed to increase sales, but the brand's image had been tarnished during the early 1990s. Texaco had been accused of polluting rainforests, overpricing its products, and institutionalizing racism in the workplace. Texaco executives calculated that improving their brand's image would help sales; it was with this goal in mind that Texaco introduced its "A World of Energy" campaign.

"A World of Energy" was the most expensive campaign in Texaco's 95-year history. The New York office of the BBDO Worldwide ad agency released the print and television campaign with $30 million, which was half of Texaco's annual marketing budget. Commercials debuted on Labor Day weekend in 1997. The actor Paul Newman provided the voice-over: "See Texaco run and develop, invent, visualize, hypothesize, explore, discover, and relentlessly search. Seek . . . and find the energy the world needs to run. Run world, run." As Newman said, "See the world run," the spot showed a baby gazing at a revolving toy complete with moving cars, planes, and trains. The scene shifted to quick shots of a helicopter taking flight, a nun operating a lawn mower, a line of Texaco's tanker trucks carrying fuel, and Texaco workers searching for oil under the sea and in rugged mountains. Honoring the Screen Actors Guild strike in 2000, Newman did not provide a voice-over for the campaign's last spots, which aired during the 2000 Summer Olympics. The campaign ended a few months later.

Texaco reported an annual revenue drop from $45.5 billion in 1996 down to $35.7 billion in 1999. According to ad critics, however, the campaign did help Texaco's image. Texaco improved its relationships with companies that were operated by minorities, and the government-appointed committee monitoring Texaco stated that the company had improved its ethics by diversifying its workforce.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Initially known as Texas Company, Texaco was founded in 1902 by Joseph "Buckskin" Cullinan and Arnold

Schlaet, who struck oil near Beaumont, Texas, in 1903. Texaco's first geophysical laboratory was established in 1919 to create durable seismic recorders for use in the fields where underground reservoirs of oil and natural gas were found. By the 1930s the firm was established throughout most of the United States, in addition to having ventures in numerous other countries, and it had begun marketing oil from the Middle East. In the 1950s and 1960s Texaco sold more gasoline than any other U.S. oil company, but its profits declined during the 1970s as the price of oil from the Middle East began to rise. American consumers responded by purchasing less gasoline, and Texaco closed many of its filling stations. After losing $10.3 billion in a lawsuit involving a merger dispute in 1985, Texaco filed for bankruptcy, from which it emerged in 1988. At the time, it was the largest firm in U.S. history to declare bankruptcy, and the legal judgment against it was the largest that had ever been awarded in a U.S. court, according to Time magazine. By 1998 Texaco ranked third among the nation's oil companies and was operating about two dozen refineries and 23,000 gas stations.

One of Texaco's most successful early marketing efforts was its sponsorship from 1948 to 1956 of the Texaco Star Theater, a television program with entertainer Milton Berle as the master of ceremonies. The show featured singing "men from Texaco . . . who work from Maine to Mexico." Another popular marketing campaign, "You Can Trust Your Car to the Man Who Wears the Star," was launched in 1962 and continued for more than two decades. It featured a memorable theme song and emphasized the bright red star-shaped logo that appeared on Texaco service stations throughout the country. In 1974 singer and comedian Bob Hope became "the man who wears the star," personifying the Texaco brand in a long series of commercials. In 1988 the "Star of the American Road" campaign was launched to depict Texaco as a modern business with an all-American heritage. Television commercials in the campaign featured a stirring jingle that said, "Wherever you are, trust the Texaco star. Up ahead it's there, shining bright." One spot showed a family driving through a storm, running low on gasoline, and finding a Texaco station thanks to the star shining in the gloom.

The "Star of the American Road" campaign was discontinued in 1995 when corporate advertisements to build the Texaco brand were introduced. The new "Add More Life to Your Car, Take It to the Star" campaign used humor, rock music, and special effects to create a more modern image for Texaco. In 1997 Texaco launched "A World of Energy," its largest corporate advertising and public-relations effort to date. Over the years the company had been accused of damaging the environment, conducting business in a racially biased manner, overpricing its products, and other unpopular practices. The new advertisements were intended to redefine the company's image, portraying Texaco as a widely diversified firm that provided energy that improved the lives of people around the world.

WORLDWIDE OPERATIONS

Texaco and its affiliates found, produced, and distributed oil and natural gas through a vast network of operations in more than 150 countries. The company conducted deepwater exploration primarily in the Gulf of Mexico, Latin America, and West Africa. Its major production facilities were located in the United States, the United Kingdom, the North Sea, the Middle East, and the Pacific Rim.

TARGET MARKET

Because gasoline, motor oil, and related products were not commodities that consumers saw or touched when they purchased them, the difference between various brands was not readily apparent. Therefore, packaging and brand image were paramount for an oil company trying to persuade people to buy its products instead of a competitor's. Texaco had been working to establish a strong global brand identity since the 1980s, when it had begun cultivating a new image with the Texaco star as a focal point. In 1996 the company decided to launch a bold campaign that would distinguish the Texaco brand from its competitors and emphasize the firm's worldwide operations and diverse, dedicated personnel. Most of Texaco's previous advertising had been geared toward selling gasoline and other products, but "A World of Energy" aimed to alter the general public's perception of Texaco as a corporation. The campaign specifically targeted opinion leaders, Texaco's shareholders, other companies that might someday form joint ventures with Texaco, and governments of foreign countries such as Indonesia and Angola where Texaco operated. It was thought that Texaco's stock price would rise and the company's reputation would improve as the brand image became stronger. The advertisements were also intended to boost morale among Texaco employees following a period in the early 1990s when the company had laid off large numbers of mid-level managers.

COMPETITION

The $850 billion petroleum industry included about 20 major oil producers and refiners with operations in the United States, about 40 global companies, and hundreds of smaller firms. According to CNNfn Online, Exxon led the overall U.S. petroleum industry at the end of 1998, Mobil was second, and the recently formed BP Amoco was third. Shell was the largest oil company in the world, followed by Exxon, BP Amoco, and Mobil. In 1998 Exxon had worldwide sales of $100.7 billion, Shell had $93.7 billion, BP Amoco had $68.3 billion, Mobil had $46.3 billion, Texaco had $31.7 billion, and Chevron Corporation had $26.2 billion.

The industry changed rapidly during the 1990s as rival companies entered into cooperative marketing arrangements or merged their businesses. Royal Dutch/Shell Group (a joint venture between Royal Dutch Petroleum and "Shell" Transport and Trading) operated 47,000 service stations around the world and owned or had interests in 1,700 companies, including its subsidiary Shell Oil Company. In 1998 Texaco formed joint ventures with Shell Oil and Saudi Refining, Inc., to combine certain refining, marketing, transportation, and lubricants operations in the United States. The two new companies, known as Equilon Enterprises LLC and Motiva Enterprises LLC, were estimated to be the nation's largest retailers of gasoline, controlling about 15 percent of the U.S. market. The joint ventures marketed products under both the Shell and Texaco brand names.

Texaco had formed other alliances with its competitors over the years. Its Caltex company—a joint refining and marketing venture with Chevron—had operated in Asia and other regions around the Pacific Rim since 1936. As other rivals consolidated their operations, Chevron and Texaco considered merging, but in June 1999 Texaco declined the proposal. In 1998 the U.S. leader, Exxon, acquired Mobil for $80.1 billion to form a huge conglomerate named Exxon Mobil Corporation. The merger gave the new company about 13 percent of U.S. gasoline sales. Another oil giant, BP Amoco, was formed near the end of 1998 when British Petroleum acquired Amoco Corporation for $48.2 million. BP Amoco had 10.5 percent of U.S. gasoline sales in 1998.

For many years Shell Oil had been known for its corporate advertising, including the "Come to Shell for Answers" and the subsequent "Answer Man" campaigns, which involved the insertion of informational booklets in magazines such as U.S. News & World Report and National Geographic. Exxon had applied most of its advertising budget in 1989 and 1990 toward revamping its tarnished reputation after its Valdez tanker ran aground and spilled millions of gallons of crude oil along the pristine shoreline of Alaska. Like Texaco, other oil companies sometimes ran ad campaigns to point out the petroleum industry's good deeds. In 1999 a magazine advertisement for Phillips Petroleum Company featured a large, beautiful photograph of migratory waterfowl in silhouette against a gold and purple sunset. The headline read, "Thanks to Phillips, weary travelers will always have a place to stop and refuel." The text said that the company had donated land to the Cactus Playa Lake Project in Texas, providing habitat for hundreds of thousands of birds that needed a place to rest during seasonal flights across the central United States. "It's yet another example of what it means to be The Performance Company," the ad concluded.

SPONSORSHIPS

In conjunction with "A World of Energy" advertising, Texaco improved its brand image by sponsoring the U.S. Olympic Team through the year 2004, the XIX Winter Olympic Games in Salt Lake City, the US Open Tennis Championship tournament, auto racing, and the Metropolitan Opera.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Texaco's corporate advertising campaign, "A World of Energy," was created by the New York office of the BBDO Worldwide advertising agency to strengthen the familiar Texaco brand and to set a unifying tone for the company's communications. The campaign emphasized that Texaco's diverse operations improved the lives of people all over the world by providing energy and other benefits. In a press release Peter I. Bijur, chairman and chief executive officer of Texaco, said, "Texaco plays an integral role in the global energy market, and our objective with this long-term campaign is to focus on the commitment of Texaco employees and their dedication to pursuing energy sources and delivering energy products to people around the globe. Our campaign embodies this idea, and illustrates the value we bring to the quality of life for people whose lives we touch through the exploration, production, refining, distribution and marketing of energy products, and as caretakers of our valuable resources."

Ted Sann of BBDO added, "This new campaign builds on, and burnishes, Texaco's strong brand heritage for a new era. We traveled the globe to capture the vision and dedication of Texaco workers and the innovative technologies they are using to keep the world running. We want to convey that the lives we enjoy are fueled, in great part, with Texaco energy, represented by both the people of the company and its products."

"A World of Energy" received $30 million of Texaco's annual advertising budget of more than $60 million. Television commercials in the campaign were launched on Labor Day weekend 1997 during Sunday morning programs and coverage of the US Open tennis tournament, National Football League games, and golf competitions. The commercials also ran during shows such as National Geographic Explorer on TBS, Fangs on the Discovery Channel, and Extreme Machines on the Learning Channel. A spot called "Anthem" showed a world in fast motion—British commuters hurrying to catch trains, a Michigan child stepping out of a school bus, airplanes flying above the port of Rio de Janeiro—juxtaposed with shots of Texaco's geologists, oil rig crews, and other workers of various races providing energy to keep the world's machines operating. "We're always going, to keep you coming. To keep your whole world running," said the lyrics to the commercial's powerful theme song, "Do You See the Star?" Another spot showed Texaco workers on an oil platform, in high-tech operations centers, in a laboratory, under the ocean, and on mountaintops. A narrator (Newman) said, "They go to the strangest places, work in the tightest quarters, and gladly keep the oddest hours. Who are they? Forever probing and prodding, digging and exploring. Who are these people? They are Texaco. And they do what they do to find the energy the world needs to keep on running."

In addition to television commercials the campaign included magazine advertisements and full-page ads in newspapers throughout the United States. An advertisement in Smithsonian magazine featured a large photograph of three barefoot children happily eating watermelon in the golden glow of sunbeams. The headline read, "One day while finding energy, we found a way to get water to watermelons." The text explained that, while drilling for oil, Texaco often found underground water reserves. The company channeled some of that water to farms in the arid Central Valley of California, where not only watermelons but apples, oranges, and many other crops were irrigated to feed people throughout the United States. The text concluded, "It's one more way our relentless pursuit of energy keeps the world running. Looks like that water made quite a splash." The red Texaco logo and the slogan "A World of Energy" were centered prominently at the bottom of the ad.

The campaign concluded after the 2000 Olympics, during which Texaco released three commercials that tied the Texaco brand to athletics. Because of a strike enforced by the Screen Actors Guild, Paul Newman did not provide a voice-over for the final spots, and ad critics believed that his absence hindered the campaign's effectiveness. One spot featured children improving their athleticism via trial and error. "Life on the playing field is not much different than life in the oil field," explained a voice-over. "Sometimes, when you wonder how you'll ever find the energy to go on, you just dig down a little deeper. And there it is." Another Texaco spot venerated the company's employees. The voice-over explained that many Texaco employees found time to volunteer as youth coaches, because "finding energy is their full-time job." Ironically, on October 16, 2000, Texaco and Chevron merged to create the world's fourth-largest oil company, and as a result 4,000 employees lost their jobs. The merged companies changed their name to Chevron Corporation in May 2005.

OUTCOME

The campaign's tagline, "A world of energy," became a general corporate signature and was used in other advertising campaigns during 1999, unifying the company's marketing efforts. To demonstrate Texaco's sensitivity to racial issues and its appreciation for its diverse customers and employees, two campaigns that targeted African-American and Hispanic consumers were developed by minority-owned ad agencies. The tagline was translated into Spanish as "Un mundo de energía" for use in markets such as Texas, California, Arizona, and Colorado and for publication in magazines such as Latina and Hispanic Business. In May 1999 Texaco launched a television campaign to publicize Havoline motor oil with the slogan "Add more life to your car." The commercials revolved around youth and aging. One spot starred Dick Clark, a celebrity who had been famous for decades but never seemed to age. In June 1999 the joint venture between Shell Oil and Texaco released a $40 million advertising effort consisting of separate campaigns for two types of consumers: the drivers who patronized Shell's full-service stations and the drivers who patronized Texaco for its "car friendly" gasoline. The Shell campaign featured the tagline "Count on Shell to keep you going." The Texaco campaign's tagline was "Get that 5th tank feeling," which referred to a claim by Texaco that its gasoline improved an engine's performance by the fifth tank. While a worldwide economic slowdown and an oversupply of oil and gasoline caused prices to plummet and created a significant slump in the industry, U.S. demand for gasoline actually increased by 2.4 percent in 1998. (The United States was home to 5 percent of the world's population but used 30 percent of all energy produced.) Texaco reported revenues of $45.5 billion in 1996, $46.7 billion in 1997, $31.7 billion in 1998, and $35.7 in 1999. From an ad-industry perspective the campaign received little praise. According to some critics the campaign did, however, improve Texaco's brand image, which had been marred during the early 1990s.

FURTHER READING

Beatty, Sally Goll. "Happy Faces Abound in Texaco's First Corporate Advertising Drive." Wall Street Journal (Marketing & Media-Advertising), August 29, 1997.

Castro, Janice. "Texaco's Star Has Fallen: Facing a $10 Billion Penalty, the Oil Company Chooses Bankruptcy." Time, April 20, 1987, p. 50.

Dill, Mallorre. "Olympic Energy." Adweek (eastern ed.), August 7, 2000, p. 44.

Elliott, Stuart. "Olympic TV Commercials Win Few Gold Medals." New York Times, October 3, 2000, p. 1.

Fest, Glen. "KJS Marketing Accents Texaco's Hispanic Message." Adweek (southeast ed.), October 27, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Texaco Gushes about Being 'Energy Giant,' " Advertising Age, September 8, 1997.

Green, Jeff. "All Pumped Up." Brandweek, May 24, 1999, p. 1.

Hill, Dee J. "Texaco Pumps Up Its Emotions." Adweek (southwest ed.), June 19, 2000, p. 6.

Lawrence, Jennifer. "Bankrupt Texaco to Polish Its Star." Advertising Age, April 20, 1987, p. 3.

Mack, Toni. "Can Texaco Catch Up?" Forbes, March 25, 1996, p. 60.

Solomon, Jolie. "Luke Lends His Cool Hand to Texaco." Newsweek, October 6, 1997, p. 52.

"Texaco Partners with Communications Group." National Petroleum News, January 1, 1999.

Susan Risland
Kevin Teague

Church & Dwight Company, Inc.

469 N. Harrison Street
Princeton, New Jersey 08543-5297
USA
Telephone: (609) 683-5900
Fax: (609) 683-5900
Web site: www.trojancondoms.com

■■■

TROJAN MAN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Until 2001 Carter Products Division, a division of Carter-Wallace, Inc., owned the world's largest condom brand, Trojan. Although the condom industry had enjoyed an increase in profits in the late 1980s and early 1990s, by the mid-1990s growth had stagnated. Carter Products hoped to regain customers and to attract new consumers for its Trojan brand with a humorous marketing approach. Public discussion of condoms had been discouraged because the subjects of sex and contraception were considered taboo, but Carter Products believed a lighthearted advertising touch would break through these barriers and make condoms accessible and acceptable. Hoping to make using condoms "cool" and eventually increase sales, Carter Products released its "Trojan Man" campaign.

Created by Carter Products' longtime ad agency, Bates USA, Inc., the "Trojan Man" campaign started with radio commercials in 1996 and expanded into the television arena in 1998. The campaign was financed with Carter Products' estimated $7 million annual advertising budget. In the commercials a superhero-like spokesperson known as Trojan Man showed up during intimate moments between couples or friends to offer Trojan condoms. The spots ended with the tagline "Trojan. America's #1 Condom. Trusted for over 80 years." The "Trojan Man" campaign began as a brand-enhancing endeavor, but in 1997 Carter Products geared it toward the introduction of new condom products. After Carter Products sold its Trojan brand to Church & Dwight Co. (the maker of Arm & Hammer baking soda) in 2001, similarly themed print, radio, Internet, and television advertisements featuring the horse-riding Trojan Man appeared until 2005. Hoping to appease networks that would in turn grant Trojan more airtime, Church & Dwight stopped using "Trojan Man" in favor of a more reverent campaign titled "Make a Difference."

Trojan condoms accounted for 74 percent of the condom market by 2004, far surpassing the 50 percent market share it held in 1998. Ad critics praised "Trojan Man" for reshaping attitudes that once held condom commercials to be catalysts for promiscuity. Instead, critics argued, the American public began to consider condoms as an alternative to unprotected sex.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Condoms had existed since at least the sixteenth century, but even into the 1990s they were not thought to be a suitable topic for open conversation or for television commercials. In fact the National Comstock Law of 1873 made the sale of condoms for contraceptive purposes illegal and disallowed the distribution of information regarding birth control. Laws also stated that condoms could only be marketed as products designed to protect people from sexually transmitted diseases (STDs). Advertising condoms as birth control devices was forbidden up to the 1970s, and this created some complications for condom manufacturers who wished to advertise their products.

Even as laws became less stringent, the public was deemed unready for televised condom advertisements. In 1975 a local television station in San Jose, California, ran the first commercial advertising condoms, a spot that promoted Trojan brand condoms. The station received numerous disapproving calls, and as a result it conducted a public poll during the evening news broadcast. Although the majority of the viewers found the commercial acceptable, the station chose to cease airing the spots for fear of public backlash.

The role of the condom in American society shifted with the rise of AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome) and HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) in the 1980s. A National Public Radio report noted that in 1987 the surgeon general endorsed the promotion of condoms when he declared on network television: "The threat of AIDS is so great that it overwhelms other considerations, and advertising, I think . . . is necessary in reference to condoms, and would have a positive public health benefit." Despite the surgeon general's statements, however, public service announcements televised on national networks in 1988 focused not on condoms but on increasing AIDS awareness. The networks still refused to air brand-specific condom commercials, but condom companies such as Carter Products did benefit from the publicity provided by AIDS-awareness campaigns. The Encyclopedia of Consumer Brands referred to findings by the Wall Street Journal that indicated 40 to 50 percent yearly growth in condom sales following the publication of the surgeon general's 1986 report declaring the usefulness of latex condoms in protecting people against HIV infection. The sales growth dropped considerably in the early 1990s, however, as American citizens grew weary of AIDS prevention messages.

Television networks continued to provide obstacles in the 1990s. When professional basketball player Magic Johnson publicly announced that he was HIV positive, Fox Broadcasting Company was the only national television network to reverse its policy against airing condom commercials. Carter Products took advantage of this policy change and created a spot focused on STD prevention, conforming to Fox's stipulation that the ads could not discuss contraception, only disease prevention. Other national television networks still considered advertising condoms too controversial. Entertainment Weekly in 1991 spoke with ABC's director of media relations, Janice Gretemeyer, who indicated, "We don't believe it's appropriate to take ads on controversial issues." NBC's manager of corporate communications, Richard Cutting, stated, "some segments of the public feel that advertising condoms would encourage promiscuity."

Carter Products and other condom manufacturers received a boost from the federal government when the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) attempted to counter the decline in condom sales with a marketing campaign in 1994 that promoted latex condoms as suitable protection against the AIDS virus. The initial 1988 CDC television ad campaign had not endorsed condom use because of pressure from political groups and television networks. The director for the CDC's national AIDS information and education program, Fred Kroger, in 1991 told Entertainment Weekly: "Many stations still won't accept them [public service announcements] if the focus is on condoms. It's one thing to talk about prevention, it's another to promote it." The CDC had thus created ads that described scientific facts regarding the disease, educating the public regarding the basics of AIDS. According to William DeYoung, a Harvard University health communications specialist who had worked with the CDC, the campaign's message had not gone far enough. He told National Public Radio that "once people are aware of the problem, they need to start thinking about how to deal with the problem, how to prevent the problem, and that's where the effort falls down." The 1994 campaign, on the other hand, openly discussed condoms and their effectiveness in providing protection against STDs, specifically HIV infection. The national networks had reservations, but most agreed to air the commercials during adult viewing hours.

The 1994 CDC advertising campaign may have set the stage for the loosening of network guidelines. More local television stations began allowing commercial condom advertisements, and in 1996 spots by Carter Products' competitor Ansell Consumer Products, the manufacturer of LifeStyles condoms, appeared on several network affiliate stations; the spots were limited to adult viewing hours or aired only after midnight. The rise of cable television stations such as MTV and Comedy Central provided a new arena for condom commercials as well. The major networks, however, still refused to show paid condom advertisements, and this in combination with network affiliate restrictions guaranteed the scarcity of televised condom spots.

TARGET MARKET

Trojan brand condoms' target market first consisted of young males, including teenagers. Carter Products discovered that this target group generally shunned condom use because condoms were considered unacceptable and not "cool." In a National Public Radio report Thomas Coates, a professor of medicine at the University of California in San Francisco, elaborated on reasons why some individuals did not use condoms: "We know that people don't use condoms because they are afraid of loss of sensation, we know that people don't use condoms because they're afraid their partners might object, they might think that they're loose or immoral or fast-living or in the fast lane. We know that women are reluctant to bring up condom use for fear that the man will reject her." Carter Products wished to address the concerns of its target group and change the negative perception of condoms.

By 1998 the campaign's target had expanded to include women. More female-centered styles of Trojan condoms had been made available since the campaign's launch in 1996. Richard Kline, vice president of marketing for Carter-Wallace, explained to Adweek (eastern edition) that women were beginning to purchase condoms. One spot that aired in 2001 featured two women chatting in a café. "I didn't sleep a wink," one boasted. Appearing off-camera, Trojan Man interrupted, "I guess everyone is enjoying new Extended Pleasure condoms from Trojan."

Carter Products was initially propelled by statistics concerning its core consumer market. The National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy reported in 1996: "One out of every three girls has had sexual intercourse by the age of 15, and one out of two by the age of 18"; in addition, "Three out of every four boys have had sexual intercourse by the age of 18." The American Social Health Association discovered in 1996 that "over 12 million people become infected with STDs . . . each year, with two-thirds occurring in people under the age of 25." Not only did Carter Products wish to reach consumers to increase sales, but the company also felt the need to educate them about STDs and pregnancy.

Carter Products chose to incorporate humor in the "Trojan Man" marketing campaign to maximize Trojan brand condoms' appeal and to influence its target market. The company's research had shown that humor appealed to teenagers and young adults and was ranked as the best approach for advertising. The "Trojan Man" campaign thus used humor to downplay the delicate nature of the subject matter, to attract the audience's attention, and to send a message about the importance of using condoms, particularly Trojan brand condoms. Carter Products hoped its target consumers would react positively to the campaign and that their perceptions regarding condoms would change—it wanted condom use to be considered not only responsible but also "cool."

WHERE ARE THE CONDOMS?

Condom sales were restricted to drugstores for many years. It was not until the 1990s that condoms began to appear for sale in supermarkets, vending machines, and discount stores. Condoms were also given away on high school and college campuses in conjunction with AIDS and STD awareness campaigns.

COMPETITION

In 1998 Carter Products manufactured deodorants, home pregnancy tests, hair-removal products, and tooth polish in addition to 23 varieties of condoms. According to the company, its Trojan brand condoms accounted for more than 50 percent of all retail sales of condoms in the United States and thus dominated the category. Carter Products' main U.S. competitors included Durex Consumer Products, a subsidiary of London International Group Plc (LIG) and manufacturer of Ramses, Sheik, Touch, Fourex, Avanti, Gold Circle Coin, and Saxon brand condoms; and Ansell, maker of LifeStyles brand condoms.

Carter Products ranked highest in U.S. sales and was second to LIG in the global condom market. The Market Share Reporter published data from Drug Topics Today that reported Trojan and Trojan-Enz condoms were the top contraceptive brands according to 1996 sales. The combined market share was 41.8 percent. LifeStyles condoms followed Carter Products with 10.5 percent, and Sheik had 5.2 percent. Also in Market Share Reporter a ranking of the best-selling condom brands in supermarkets taken from Supermarket Business indicated that Trojan and Trojan-Enz brands were the most popular. In 1996 Trojan brand condoms topped supermarket sales at 30.7 percent, followed by Trojan-Enz with 22.5 percent. LifeStyles came in a distant third with 14.1 percent, and Sheik Super possessed 4.6 percent of the market share.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Carter Products' concerns when planning the "Trojan Man" campaign involved the stagnation in U.S. condom sales and consumers' lack of interest in using condoms. Education about the importance of using a condom appeared not to interest the public; the Dallas Morning News cited industry reports declaring the decline of condom sales among those aged 25 and younger. The director of the Gay and Lesbian Latino AIDS Education Initiative, David Acosta, stated that educational programs had proved ineffective and explained: ''The whole idea that knowledge equals practice is bogus . . . People may know all the right things. They know about seat belts. They know about cigarettes.'' Though Trojan brand condoms' core consumer group understood the repercussions of not using condoms, it was not enough to instigate habitual condom use. Unease discussing the subject and the belief that condoms decreased sexual pleasure added to the abandonment of condoms. Carter Products sought to address all of these issues with the humorous ''Trojan Man'' campaign and hoped to sway the male target group while also appealing to those new to the category and the female market as well. Capturing the loyalty of customers to ensure long-term consumption was also an objective.

To accomplish its goals Carter Products and its advertising agency of more than 50 years, Bates USA, decided to launch a national radio campaign to enhance Trojan condoms' brand identity. The first batch of radio spots, therefore, focused not on a particular style of condom but on the Trojan brand. The five 60-second spots produced throughout 1996 all ended with the tagline ''Be a Trojan Man. Help reduce the risk with Trojan. America's #1 condom. Trusted for over 80 years.'' The spots also stated, ''more people trust Trojan condoms than all other brands combined,'' and ''Trojan latex condoms help provide the protection you need and the sensitivity you demand.''

In 1997 Carter Products shifted gears and produced two radio spots promoting a new product, Trojan Ultra Pleasure condoms. The 1996 campaign had established Trojan condoms' brand identity and introduced listeners to the comical Trojan Man character who appeared out of nowhere with his horse to provide Trojan brand condoms and straightforward advice. Laurel Dobalo, director of condom marketing for Carter Products, told Chain Drug Review, ''The messages are serious, but conveyed in a way to appeal to young people.'' The new spots ended with a slightly different tagline: ''New Trojan Ultra Pleasure. Trojan, America's #1 condom. Trusted for over 80 years.'' One spot, called ''My Pleasure,'' took place in an apartment and featured a couple getting ready for an evening out. They became distracted by romantic possibilities but were interrupted suddenly by Trojan Man, who was introduced by singers in the background singing, ''Trojan Man.'' The man asked, ''Trojan Man, what brings you here?''; Trojan Man responded, ''The stairs.'' Trojan Man provided the couple with Ultra Pleasure condoms and then departed. In the second spot, called ''Sailor,'' Trojan Man interrupted a couple on a boat. The man recognized Trojan Man and asked, ''Trojan Man. How'd you get here?''; Trojan Man answered, ''Australian crawl. It's my fastest stroke.'' He continued, ''I couldn't wait to tell you about new Trojan Ultra Pleasure latex condoms,'' and then explained the features of the condoms, not forgetting the important message about protection. Trojan Man and his horse then splashed into the water and swam away.

In addition to the radio campaign Carter Products launched an interactive website that provided free condoms, trivia games, product information, educational data regarding safe sex, and more. The company licensed the Trojan brand and began selling clothing and accessories that featured the Trojan name. Carter Products was also active in college and spring-break events and other promotional activities.

In August 1998 Carter Products released its first Trojan television commercials. One spot featured a couple enjoying a romantic dinner. When the man suggested that his date ''share some chocolate mousse,'' she replied, ''I'd share anything with you.'' The couple was abruptly interrupted by Trojan Man, who handed them a Trojan Shared Sensation condom and quipped, ''It looks like you're pretty close to dessert.'' The second spot featured Trojan Man interrupting an intimate couple rowing a boat across a moonlit lake. The commercials marked a shift in the campaign because they targeted both men and women. ''More and more women are also buying condoms to help provide protection in their intimate relationships,'' Kline of Carter-Wallace said to Adweek (eastern edition) in 1998.

Church & Dwight purchased the Trojan brand in 2001 and used the ad agency Bates Worldwide to continue the ''Trojan Man'' campaign. In July 2005 the company replaced the campaign with ''Make a Difference,'' a more somber campaign created by the ad agency Kaplan Thaler Group to warn consumers about the consequences of unprotected sex. Church & Dwight hoped the different tone would convince large networks such as Fox, CBS, and NBC to air Trojan commercials earlier than 9:00 p.m.

OUTCOME

The ''Trojan Man'' campaign met with positive results, according to Carter Products. Since 1996 Trojan brand's dollar market share rose more than six points to capture more than 60 percent of the U.S. condom market as measured by A.C. Nielsen. Carter Products referred to results of June 1998 Teen and Adult Omnibus studies that reported an improvement in Trojan brand's performance since 1996. Trojan brand awareness increased from 38 percent to 49 percent among adults and from 53 percent to 74 percent among teens. Gains in advertising awareness were even more impressive. Among adults who were aware of any category advertising, 45 percent recalled a Trojan ad in 1996 compared to 69 percent in 1998. In contrast only 9 percent of adults and 10 percent of teens recalled the advertising of the next most cited competitor.

"It can make a serious subject approachable," Kitty Ravenhall, senior vice president and management representative at Bates, told Adweek (western edition) in 2001. "[The Trojan Man] is a voice of authority and purveyor of a serious message, but he does it in a way that people can relate to." The campaign changed advertising trends across the condom industry. After "Trojan Man" debuted, condom makers' advertisements emphasized not only safety but also pleasure. In 1998, for instance, Durex released "Set Yourself Free," its first-ever campaign that did not caution consumers at all about unprotected sex.

During the campaign's last full year Trojan was not just leading the pack; it was setting a high-water mark for the industry. Trojan held an incredible 74 percent of the total condom market in 2004, surpassing the 50 percent market share it posted in 1998. Sales for Church & Dwight grew 8 percent in all channels in 2004, and Trojan sales generated $166.3 million in all outlets excluding Wal-Mart.

FURTHER READING

"Condom Ads Sneak on TV." Editor and Publisher, November 16, 1996, p. 38.

Hank, Kim. "Carter-Wallace." Adweek (eastern ed.), August 17, 1998, p. 25.

McCormick, Rachel. "Message of 'Hip-Hop' Condoms Questioned." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 27, 2004, p. 1E.

Meyers, Kate. "TV's Last Taboo. The Big Three TV Networks Still Say No to Running Condom Ads." Entertainment Weekly, November 22, 1991, p. 16.

Neff, Jack. "Trojan Takes Health Tack, Eyes Break into Prime Time." Advertising Age, February 14, 2005, p. 8.

O'Konowitz, Tom. "Condom Ads Primed for Prime Time." Arlington Heights (IL) Daily Herald, June 2, 2005, p. 1.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Risky Business." Adweek (western ed.), August 13, 2001, p. 18.

Wells, Melanie. "Sex May Sell, but as for Condoms, Networks Aren't Buying." USA Today, November 30, 1998, p. 09B.

Mariko Fujinaka
Kevin Teague

Church's Chicken

980 Hammond Dr. NE, Ste. 1100
Atlanta, Georgia 30328
USA
Telephone: (770) 350-3800
Fax: (770) 512-3920
Web site: www.churchs.com

■■■

FULL FLAVOR, FULL POCKETS, FULL LIFE/FULL FLAVOR, FULL POCKETS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Church's Chicken, owned by AFC Enterprises, had a reputation for serving traditional Southern-fried chicken as well as other Southern favorites, such as fried okra and biscuits with honey. But the chain was falling behind its competitors and had just a 6 percent market share in 2001. To reestablish brand identity and reconnect with consumers, the chain launched three marketing campaigns in as many years. Beginning in 2000 the company launched "Maybe It's Your Cooking," which was followed in 2001 by the reintroduction of one of its classic themes from the 1980s, "Big Pieces, Little Prices." When those campaigns failed to get the results the company wanted, it launched, in 2002, the "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" slogan and marketing campaign. Shortly after its launch the campaign was renamed "Full Flavor, Full Pockets."

Developed by the company and its Atlanta-based agency BaylessCronin, the campaign was described by AFC Enterprises as "the most powerful brand launch in its history." The $15 million campaign included television spots, radio, print, and billboard ads, and an interactive website tie-in. It also launched the company's new theme, "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life," and introduced the chain's cartoon mascots, named Full Flavor and Full Pockets. Church's chief marketing officer, Ann Stone, said of the characters, "Since they don't resemble anyone, they can be anyone, and our guests in market research validated that."

While the campaign was created to capture the brand's true essence and to resonate with consumers, it fell flat. Prior to the campaign's launch Church's sales were climbing; following its 2002 introduction sales began to fall, and customers failed to connect with the cartoon mascots. In 2003 the company shifted most of its creative work from BaylessCronin to Gecko Motion, an agency based in Johannesburg, South Africa, and the campaign was revamped. "Full Flavor, Full Pockets" was replaced in 2004 with a new campaign, "We Got the Crunch," aimed at the chain's multicultural, multiethnic, urban customers.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

From its beginnings in 1952 as a single restaurant serving only Southern-fried chicken and located across from the Alamo in San Antonio, Texas, Church's Chicken grew to the nation's number two chicken franchise business by the late 1980s. In 1989 Church's Chicken merged with the number three chain, Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits. Despite the merger the two operations remained separate, each offering its own distinct brand of fried chicken and menu offerings—Church's with a Southern style and Popeyes serving up Cajun. Three years later the two chains were acquired by AFC Enterprises, and change was soon in the air. Top on the agenda for parent AFC was reimaging the brands and upgrading the restaurants of both chains. In addition AFC began an expansion effort with Church's. By 2002 the chain had grown from 1,078 stores to 1,517, with locations in eight countries besides the United States.

To emphasize its quality food and reasonable prices, Church's in 2001 revived its successful ad campaign "Big Pieces, Little Prices," which had first been used in the mid-1980s. Created by Atlanta-based agency BaylessCronin, the tagline clearly identified the brand and struck a chord with many consumers, who remembered it from the first time it was used. Church's Chicken prepared to celebrate its 50th anniversary in 2002 with improved customer service, a redesigned kitchen concept, and plans to increase its product offerings. It also scrapped its reintroduced "Big Pieces, Little Prices" campaign and replaced it with "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life."

TARGET MARKET

According to the Food Institute Report, Church's Chicken identified two-thirds of its customers as African-American and Latino. The chain also had a high concentration of restaurants in older urban communities. But with sales lagging, the chain designed its "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign and the cartoon characters featured in the ads to reach a broader audience. The company described the target audience for the ads as consumers who lived full lives, had families, and were on a budget.

Full Flavor and Full Pockets, the campaign's cartoon mascots, had beige dots for heads and were voiceless and faceless. A spokesman for the company said that, based on market research, creating characters without faces made it possible for them to be anyone. "Customers will say, 'That could be me,' and identify with the product," he told the Atlanta Business Chronicle.

COMPETITION

The weak economy in 2001 and the terrorist attacks on September 11 had a negative impact on the bottom lines of many fast-food restaurants, including Church's Chicken and its top two competitors, KFC Corporation and Chick-fil-A, Inc. To help boost sales number one KFC and number two Chick-fil-A upgraded their restaurants, introduced new menu items, and launched new marketing campaigns at the end of the year.

AFC SELLS CHURCH'S CHICKEN CHAIN FOR $390 MILLION

In 1992 AFC Enterprises acquired the Church's Chicken fast-food chain and Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits (Church's and Popeyes had merged in 1989). After devoting 12 years to "reimaging," "upgrading," and "modernizing" the chains, according to the Nation's Restaurant News, AFC in 2004 sold the struggling Church's chain to Cajun Holding Company, an affiliate of Crescent Capital Investments, for $390 million. Quoted in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, Frank Belatti, AFC's chief executive officer, said the sale of Church's had completed "a process that began early last year to reshape our portfolio and focus on Popeyes as our growth vehicle for the future."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution described Belatti's comments when discussing the sale of the Church's chain as resembling those of a parent proud of a child finally stepping out on her own. But a statement included on the Church's website read as if the child had for some time been ready to take wing and fly: "After 12 years under the AFC umbrella, Church's Chicken declared December 26, 2004 their Independence Day." Under its new leadership Church's stated that it planned to go head-to-head with the competition by adding spicier offerings to its menu selections and that by 2010 it would expand to 2,500 restaurants worldwide, up from some 1,500.

True to its word, Church's in 2005—just months after its sale by AFC—introduced spicy chicken in the largest product launch in the company's history. Church's chief operating officer, Harsha V. Agadi, who replaced company president Hala Moddelmog after the chain's sale, told*Business Wire,* "We are going beak-to-beak with our competitors with this new product and we are going to make a huge impact on the market." Among the competitors was former sister chain Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits, known for its spicy Cajun-style chicken offerings. Agadi said, "Now we can compete head-on with Popeyes, as well as with KFC and Chick-fil-A, and I would strongly advise Popeyes to fasten its seat belt."

In 2001 KFC launched its "Hot and Fresh" program, which required stores to prepare menu items in smaller batches to assure customers were served the freshest food possible. KFC celebrated its 50th anniversary in 2002 by upgrading the interior design of its stores with sophisticated lighting, bistro-style tables, and lower booths not typically found in fast-food restaurants. The Nation's Restaurant News reported that the company also pursued "an aggressive strategy of multibranding its concepts" with other chains, such as teaming with A&W Restaurants in more than 80 restaurants. An ad campaign featuring Jason Alexander, best known for his role as George Costanza in the television series Seinfeld, was launched in 2002 as well.

Chick-fil-A's marketing campaign featuring a herd of clever cows that encouraged consumers to eat more chicken continued to be a hit in 2001, six years after its introduction, but the company also introduced a line of wrap sandwiches that were popular with fast foodies. According to the Nation's Restaurant News, the wraps were the first new product launched by the company since the mid-1990s. To further expand its reach in underserved markets such as Denver and Phoenix, the company announced plans to increase the number of restaurants in those cities from a total of 19 to 75 by 2007.

MARKETING STRATEGY

With the launch of Church's "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, the company's strategy was to expand its focus on offering good value to include spokescharacters that would be associated with the brand and establish a bond with customers. The campaign, which launched with TV spots featuring the cartoon mascots Full Flavor and Full Pockets, was the company's first nationwide television campaign. The company said that the new campaign was one of the most aggressive rebranding efforts in its history. Along with six TV spots the campaign included radio, print, and billboard ads.

The initial television spots portrayed the two mascots (bright yellow, chubby, faceless cartoon characters with beige dots for heads) in stressful situations seeking relief with Church's Chicken. One ad featured Full Flavor paying bills and deciding that eating a piece of Church's chicken topped with jalapeño juice would make the chore more pleasant. Another ad showed Full Pockets riding a motorcycle up to a Church's drive-through window to place an order and discovering the order was too large for him to carry. In each ad the characters wielded a magic marker that helped solve their problems. The bill-paying mascot used the marker to draw a cool drink to go with his spicy chicken; the motorcycle-riding mascot used his marker to draw a sidecar to carry his order. A company spokesman explained that the ads were meant to show busy consumers that Church's could help relieve the stress in their lives. Making the characters headless was intended to send the message that Full Flavor and Full Pockets were everyone. Their names also reinforced the brand's qualities: good food for reasonable prices.

To further connect with consumers and increase awareness of its new campaign, Church's launched an interactive website that featured the cartoon characters Full Pockets and Full Flavor. The site provided nutrition information for the products and a restaurant locator with details about in-store promotions. Consumers visiting the site also had access to the campaign's print ads and television and radio spots.

OUTCOME

Despite high expectations for the "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, following its launch the company reported that sales at stores open for at least one year dropped 5 percent in the first quarter. In addition the New York Times wrote that, prior to the introduction of the new theme, Church's sales had been increasing on a year-over-year basis, but after the campaign began, sales began dropping at stores that had been open for at least a year. Reluctant to call the campaign a failure, company president Hala Moddelmog said, "We thought the animation [used in the advertising] would stand out among the clutter better than it did at the end of the day."

Amid complaints from franchisees concerning falling sales and customer confusion about the campaign's message, Church's Chicken, within a year of launching the "Full Flavor, Full Pockets, Full Life" campaign, was rethinking its strategy. "I'm evaluating this campaign head to toe," Moddelmog told the New York Times. To begin addressing the problems associated with the campaign, the company revamped the ads to include real people interacting with the cartoon characters. The chubby mascots also seemed to send the message that eating Church's chicken was fattening, so the characters were slimmed down for the new ads.

In addition to revamping the campaign, the chain also switched most of its creative work from its agency BaylessCronin, which had created the campaign, to Gecko Motion. "I'm not quick to jump to change an agency when things aren't moving well, or change a campaign, but in this case I think it's called for," Frank Belatti, chief executive officer of parent company AFC, told the New York Times.

FURTHER READING

Cavanaugh, Bonnie Brewer. "Something to Cluck About: Church's, Popeyes Celebrate Milestones." Nation's Restaurant News, May 20, 2002.

Cebrzynski, Gregg. "Church's Breaks Its 'Most Powerful' Brand Promotion—Church's Chicken Launches Marketing Campaign." Nation's Restaurant News, July 22, 2002.

"Chicken Hawked." Restaurants & Institutions, August 8, 2002.

"Church's Chicken Brings Brand to Full Life with Most Powerful Brand Launch in Company History." QSR Online, July 9, 2002.

"Church's Chicken 'Full Life' Ads, Available on Redesigned Web Site." Nation's Restaurant News, January 6, 2003.

"Church's Chicken Gets Spicy; Spicy Chicken Launch Is the Largest in Company History." Business Wire, July 19, 2005.

"Church's Chicken Turns to Advertising to Take on Bigger Chains." Food Institute Report, July 15, 2002.

Frumkin, Paul. "Chicken Chains Hatch New Products, Marketing Campaigns to Boost Sales." Nation's Restaurant News, June 24, 2002.

Hayes, Jack. "Church's Adds Spice to Menu, Growth Plan Following Crescent's Acquisitions." Nation's Restaurant News, February 14, 2005.

MacArthur, Kate. "Yet Another AFC Exec Flies Coop: Church's Chicken CMO Resigns." Advertising Age, July 14, 2003.

Mehegan, Sean. "Church's Chicken Tried a New Approach and Disappointed Franchise Owners." New York Times, July 1, 2003.

Saporta, Maria. "When AFC Gives Church's Its Wings, Exec on Her Own." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 4, 2004.

Stafford, Leon. "Atlanta-Based Fast-Food Firm Completes Sale of Church's Chicken." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 30, 2004.

Woods, Walter. "Church's Turns 50 by Revamping Stores, Menu." Atlanta Business Chronicle, July 12, 2002.

Rayna Bailey

Cisco Systems, Inc.

170 W. Tasman Drive
San Jose, California 95134-1706
USA
Telephone: (408) 526-4000
Fax: (408) 526-4100
Web site: www.cisco.com

■■■

THE SELF-DEFENDING NETWORK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Cisco Systems, Inc., the world's largest producer of Internet switches and routers, released advertising prior to 2004 that simply encouraged people to use the Internet more. As Internet use increased, more Cisco hardware was needed to expand Internet networks. Between 2002 and 2004 Cisco acquired six Internet-security companies, including Protego Networks, Inc., for a combined price of $339 million. At first Cisco was incorporating Internet-security technologies into its own products only to boost consumers' confidence in the Internet's ability to stop destructive hackers, viruses, Trojans, and worms. Because Cisco's Internet security proved, however, to be more effective than actual Internet-security providers, Cisco decided to offer Internet security as a separate service from its switches and routers. To persuade information technology (IT) departments and their corporate officers to start purchasing Cisco's Internet security systems, Cisco launched its "The Self-Defending Network" campaign.

The advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather released the $20 million campaign across television, radio, print, direct mail, and the Internet in early 2004. Instead of showing Cisco's security systems protecting other technology, commercials featured Cisco security systems protecting people. In the spot "Sarah's Escapade," for example, an executive told his daughter, "I'll be right back, honey," just before leaving her unsupervised in his office. The bored girl began clicking on her father's computer mouse until a message popped up on his monitor stating, "Worm Detected." The young girl panicked. "Worm Isolated," was the computer's next message, followed by "Worm Destroyed." The girl threw up her arms in celebration. The spot ended with the voice-over, "Defending the network from human nature. This is the power of the network. Now."

Not only did the campaign garner a Gold EFFIE Award in the computer software category in 2005, but the industry-analysis firm Millward Brown showed a 950 percent increase in the business audience's willingness to use Cisco for IT security. Cisco's share in the security-provider market jumped seven points, and Cisco Systems totaled $175 million in sales for 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Besides being one of the Nasdaq's fastest-growing stocks during the late 1990s, Cisco was also the world's leading producer of switches and routers that directed traffic across the Internet. In 1998 Cisco released advertising that encouraged Internet usage, which in turn increased the demand for Cisco's hardware. Two years later Cisco's ad agency, Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Inc., introduced a $43.8 million campaign with the tagline "Empowering the Internet generation." The campaign's television spots, including one titled "Factory," featured Cisco's hardware increasing businesses' Internet usage, which indirectly boosted the businesses' profits.

After the technology sector plummeted in late 2000, Cisco did not release a campaign for almost three years. In June 2002 Cisco awarded its advertising account to DarkGrey, the technology unit of Grey Global Group. For its first few months doing business with Cisco, DarkGrey developed a campaign with the tagline "Advancing the human network." None of the DarkGrey advertisements were actually released, however. When Marilyn Mersereau became Cisco's new vice president for corporate marketing in late 2002, she turned Cisco's advertising account over to Ogilvy & Mather, an agency she had worked with as vice president of global advertising at International Business Machines Corporation (IBM).

In 2003 Ogilvy & Mather released the largest campaign in Cisco's history, the $10–$150 million "This is the power of the Network. Now" campaign. With the goal of positioning Cisco as a leader in networking technologies for businesses and individual consumers, the campaign focused on associating Cisco's brand with ingenuity. In a television spot titled "Olive," the CEO of an olive distributor was humorously shown reducing his company's costs by optioning for an Internet-based phone system. Another commercial featured a mischievous young girl using one of Cisco's home products, a Linksys router, to antagonize her older brother's new girlfriend.

From 2002 to 2004 Cisco purchased a total of six small Internet security businesses. In 2003 alone, security breaches had wreaked more than $17 billion in damage for U.S. businesses. After integrating a plethora of smaller security systems into its core products, Cisco believed it offered a holistic security solution unlike Cisco's competitors. To brand Cisco as a leader in Internet safeguarding, Cisco released its "The Self-Defending Network" campaign in February 2004.

TARGET MARKET

To become the world's largest supplier of Internet routers and switches, Cisco spent years forging relationships with data-networking experts who purchased hardware needed for Internet expansion. When Cisco began advertising itself as an Internet security provider in 2004, it focused on a new target: those in charge of purchasing firewalls (the systems protecting networks from hackers), spam filters (filters restricting unwanted E-mail), and virus scans (scans that removed unwanted software, such as viruses, Trojans, or worms, that was designed to damage or steal information.)

COMPUTER WORMS, TROJANS, AND VIRUSES

The term "computer virus" was first used in 1983 to describe computer software that had mutated inside a computer and had become destructive. By the late 1990s the term was used to describe unwanted software that was usually installed unknowingly by the computer's owner or operator.

Worms were a subclassification of the computer virus. They copied themselves without assistance or permission from their hosts and often spread via E-mail. Once it finished installation, a worm E-mailed itself to other unsuspecting recipients on the host's contact list. Trojans, also a subclassification of the computer virus, hid inside seemingly benign files, such as images or text documents, that consumers typically saved for extended periods of time. Although viruses, worms, and Trojans infected computer systems differently, their shared intent was to destroy or steal information. Hardware, such as the Internet routers and switches produced by Cisco Systems, were also susceptible to Viruses, worms, and Trojans.

Cisco separated its new target into two groups: "technology decision-makers" and "business decision-makers." The first group consisted of IT specialists involved in every step of a business' security purchasing. The second group, "business decision-makers," consisted of c-level (e.g., chief information officer, chief technology officer) executives concerned about the effects of corporate security on overall profit. Cisco hoped the campaign would appeal to executives complying with regulations that were implemented after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, such as the Anti-Money Laundering Act, which enforced tighter restrictions on electronic money transfers. Another post-9/11 regulation made CEOs personally liable for providing accurate information in their financial reports, a ruling partially responsible for an increase in executive jail sentences. Executives became increasingly protective of their businesses' internal networks where financial data was stored. Chief information officers were even required to report on the potential damage a network breach could render on their business.

Cisco felt that prior to the release of "The Self-Defending Network," "technology decision-makers" and "business decision-makers" considered Cisco products a satisfactory starting point for security, but not a comprehensive solution. The campaign aimed to adjust both groups' perception of Cisco's brand as a fully integrated security platform.

COMPETITION

Even though the security provider Barracuda Networks, Inc., was founded in 2002, by 2005 it dominated as the world's leading provider of security systems for enterprise-level business. Its clients included IBM, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), the US. Department of the Treasury, and Barnes & Noble. Dean Drako, the president, CEO, and cofounder of Barracuda Networks, attributed his company's success to the fact that it designed all the security systems in-house and did not rely on outside software applications. ''We did that because we didn't want to have to have any per-user fees,'' Drako told Computer Reseller News. ''That was important because we want to make it easy to buy. So instead of 45-page-long price lists, like some of our competitors have, our price list has five items on it—for the five models of Barracuda.''

Barracuda Networks also attributed its success to a channel distribution strategy, in which Barracuda relied on outside distributors to handle its marketing, sales, and distribution. The company signed a number of resell agreements with distributors such as SYNNEX Information Technologies, which outfitted companies with computer networks and security systems. ''We didn't want to have our own professional services organization. We are a product company. And we believe the channel is absolutely the best mechanism for delivering security, where customers are looking for people who know more than they do,'' Drako continued in Computer Reseller News.

One of Barracuda Networks' few marketing efforts involved creating podcasts, or digital audio files, that educated businesses about the dangers of spam, worms, Trojans, and viruses. By going to the website www.PodTech.net, consumers could download the free files and listen to them on MP3 players or computer music programs. Drako was the featured speaker for the podcasts.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cisco was the leading producer of Internet switches and routers, and Ogilvy & Mather hoped that titling its campaign ''The Self-Defending Network'' would suggest Cisco's additional leadership in the field of network security. Instead of focusing on the technical procedures of stopping spam, hackers, viruses, and worms, the campaign conveyed the human stories affected by such attacks. All television spots portrayed consumers who were, unbeknownst to them, victims of a security breach but protected by Cisco's security systems.

On February 30, 2004, the first two commercials aired across Sunday morning programming, including Meet the Press, This Week, Face the Nation, and CBS Market Watch. In the television spot titled ''Inside Job,'' an assistant told a chief financial officer (CFO) that their company's network had just been infiltrated. ''How could that happen?'' the CFO asked, just as his visiting daughter stepped from his office to brag about a new game she had downloaded onto his computer. The CFO's expression suggested that he had identified the unknowing culprit. The Sydney Morning Herald quoted Cisco's global marketing chief, James Richardson, as saying, ''If you're going after the business market, then you have to be pragmatic and deliver a value proposition. It's hard to introduce humor into that equation. But you can do that with issues close to the consumer, such as security and mobility.''

To reach a broader audience, television spots also aired across prime-time shows such as The West Wing, CSI, Law and Order, and 60 Minutes. The television spot titled ''Sarah's Escapade'' aired February 30 as well. It featured a girl who accidentally downloaded a worm onto her father's work computer. Luckily for her, Cisco's virus scan detected, isolated, and removed the worm before it caused any damage. The spot ended with a voice-over that said, ''Defending the network from human nature. This is the power of the network. Now.'' The commercial ''Silent Hero,'' which aired March 30, featured a dinner table of executives complaining about their networks crashing. A woman remarked to the only quiet man at the table, ''Jeff, you're awfully quiet.'' He replied, ''Our network didn't go down,'' referring to the stability offered by Cisco's product. Two final commercials, ''Espresso Time'' and ''New Glass,'' began airing on July 30.

The print ads ''Woman on Pillow'' and ''Little Girl'' appeared in newspapers such as the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post; they also appeared in business magazines such as Fortune, Forbes, and the Economist. Billboards announcing ''The Self-Defending Network'' were posted throughout the technology-laden communities of Silicon Valley and San Francisco. For the first time in advertising history, an advertisement was employed that temporarily filled a member's computer screen after he or she logged into his or her online Wall Street Journal account. The ad announced Cisco's ''The Self-Defending Network.'' Internet banner advertisements also ran across the tops of the Economist and BusinessWeek websites. E-mails about Cisco's security systems were sent to more than 46,000 individuals responsible for a business' IT-related decisions.

OUTCOME

Ogilvy & Mather and Cisco considered "The Self-Defending Network" a solid success. Not only did it snag a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005, the campaign also had a positive halo effect on Cisco's entire brand. According to Ameritest/Cy Research, a consumer test group, a survey conducted during March 2004 found that Cisco scored higher than average on brand leadership measures such as: "Is technically innovative," "Is a technology leader," and "Offers products that help your organization stay competitive." Across the Internet the campaign's growth could be measured by a 96 percent increase in traffic to www.Cisco.com's security pages. Cisco's share in the security-provider market jumped seven points in 2004. By the campaign's end analysis firm Millward Brown showed a 950 percent increase in the willingness of the business audience to use Cisco for IT security.

The Yankee Group, a market research firm, stated in 2004, "Cisco was the only IT networking firm to rank as one of the most trusted security providers, alongside other security specialists like Symantec and Verisign." VeriSign and Symantec Corp. were well known for providing secure telecommunications services, digital commerce, and consumer virus protection. "This survey result is really a testament to the power of Cisco's remarkable brand recognition," Phebe Waterfield, Yankee Group Security Solutions and Services analyst, was quoted in Business Wire.

FURTHER READING

Baker, David R. "New Ad Campaign for Cisco." San Francisco Chronicle, February 18, 2003, p. B1.

Bannon, Lisa. "EToys Readies $20 Million Blitz to Hit Homes for the Holidays." Wall Street Journal, September 27, 1999, p. B10.

Barns, Emma. "Cisco Appoints MBA to Develop Business Campaign in Europe." Campaign, August 6, 2004, p. 7.

Fahey, Alison. "21st Annual Agency Report Cards." Adweek, April 12, 2004, p. 25.

Garner, Rochelle. "Barracuda Networks." Computer Reseller News, August 22, 2005, p. 35.

Gordon, Andrew. "Cisco to Search for a Corp Agency of Record in the US." PR Week, June 6, 2003, p. 6.

Hwang, Suein L. "3Com to Kick Off Ad Campaign Tying Products to Internet Boom." Wall Street Journal, October 25, 1999, p. B14.

Kaplan, David, Justin M. Norton, and Kathleen Sampey. "Cisco, DarkGrey to Part Ways." Adweek (western ed.), September 16, 2002, p. 2.

Lee, Julian. "Cisco Injects Humor to Appeal to Consumers." Sydney Morning Herald, March 25, 2004, p. 30.

Madden, Normandy. "Northwest Uses Unusual Ad Platform." Advertising Age, August 1, 2005, p. 10.

Maddox, Kate. "Integration Spurs OgilvyOne Growth." B to B, October 10, 2005, p. 29.

———. "Ogilvy's Award-Winning Creative in 'Demand.'" B to B, March 8, 2004, p. 26.

O'Connell, Vanessa. "Cisco Says the Time Is Right to Roll Out a New Campaign." Wall Street Journal, February 18, 2003, p. B4.

Kevin Teague

Citibank

399 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10022
USA
Telephone: (212) 559-1000
Web site: www.citibank.com

■■■

IDENTITY THEFT SOLUTIONS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Note: Also see essay for Citigroup Inc.

In fall of 2003 Citibank, a subsidiary of Citigroup Inc., the world's largest financial services conglomerate, set out to bolster its consumer divisions' ''Live Richly'' umbrella campaign with a set of television, print, and outdoor advertisements that introduced its new Identity Theft Solutions service for credit-card holders. The service was a timely response to Americans' growing fears about the crime of identity theft and was intended to distinguish Citibank from its consumer-banking competitors and to thereby build on the people-friendly image cultivated in previous ''Live Richly'' spots.

The idea of identity theft was inherently terrifying, but Citibank and its main U.S. ad agency, Fallon Worldwide of Minneapolis, wanted to communicate the potential severity of the danger posed to consumers without resorting to scare tactics. The resulting series of four television ads, which cost an estimated $750,000 to produce, featured ordinary, sympathetic characters who channeled, via lip-synching, the voices of the sinister but humorously intriguing criminals who had victimized them. This technique directly dramatized the idea of someone assuming another person's identity, and the wild disparity between the characters' appearance and his or her dialogue was both comical and disturbing. Print and outdoor ads similarly employed pictures of innocent-looking people juxtaposed with copy indicating the out-of-character crimes or debts for which that person was supposedly responsible.

''Identity Theft Solutions'' was named Adweek's Best Campaign of 2003, and an individual campaign spot won a 2004 Emmy for Outstanding Commercial. Citibank's consumer divisions, and particularly its credit-card operations, sustained the parent company through extremely difficult financial times. The campaign ran through 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Citibank hired Fallon Worldwide's Minneapolis shop to take over the brand's U.S. advertising in 2000, a move widely seen as an attempt to humanize its faceless corporate image. Fallon, a rising star known for its quirkiness, promised to produce ads that were ''unbanklike,'' while still managing to live up to the challenge that, according to Adweek, Citibank had set: to ''unite the varied and various elements of its consumer division—including banking and credit cards.'' The company wanted to distance itself from the financial-services advertising of the 1990s, which concentrated on wealth for its own sake, and Fallon helped the company do so by creating an umbrella concept titled ''Live Richly,'' which focused on presenting financial well-being as a means to living fully rather than as the object of life.

© Alan Schein Photography/Corbis Reproduced by permission.

Though the message ''There's more to life than money'' struck some observers as disingenuous coming from a bank, the campaign's theme proved well suited to an historical moment characterized by the dot-com crash, the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and several high-profile corporate scandals. In this climate of widespread anxiety about the American economy and personal security, Citibank pinpointed a further danger to consumers—identity theft—and introduced a service to protect them from it.

As businesses relied more and more on computer technology, identity theft—the criminal use of an unwitting individual's private information to open false credit-card accounts, secure home and car loans, or commit other criminal acts—increasingly became an issue for Americans. Identity-theft complaints rose 73 percent between 2001 and 2002, and they continued to multiply in the years following. Further, the fear of terrorists using forged identities to commit crimes raised public awareness of the problem. Victims of the crime typically found themselves answerable for large sums of money owed, and criminal acts committed, in their names, and the process of rehabilitating their lives and credit histories was a daunting, months-long affair. Citibank accordingly inaugurated its Identity Theft Solutions service, a free benefit that provided customers with access to specialists who would, in cases of identity theft, help victims contact credit bureaus and police, help them monitor their credit reports, and otherwise be available for support and consultation until their individual cases were closed.

TARGET MARKET

''Identity Theft Solutions'' dovetailed with the larger ''Live Richly'' campaign, which targeted, in Citibank's words, ''balance seekers'' whose household incomes were between $60,000 and $100,000 a year. Fallon's Anne Bologna told Newsweek that Citibank defined balance seekers as ''people who have always believed that money is not the end, but the means to an end,'' and company executives estimated that 90 million Americans fit this description. The initial phases of the ''Live Richly'' campaign had appealed to this audience by de-emphasizing the importance of money with messages such as ''He who dies with the most toys is still dead'' and ''People make money. Not the other way around.''

With ''Identity Theft Solutions'' Citibank wanted to communicate the urgency of the danger that gave rise to their new service while maintaining the lighthearted tone of the ''Live Richly'' campaign. It was important, in the company's view, to let potential customers know that identity theft could happen to them without simply frightening them. By making consumers aware of the danger and showing that Citibank alone had an answer to it, the campaign ''was designed to be relevant, differentiating and a motivating factor for consumers to switch banks,'' as a company executive told Bank Systems & Technology Online.

Fallon's creative team satisfied its assignment using a simple, surprising, darkly funny vehicle: a drastic disconnect between a speaker's voice and his or her appearance. In television spots, for instance, a beer-drinking,

BEHIND THE SCENES

In addition to ordinary auditions for its "Identity Theft Solutions" spots, Fallon's creative team allowed itself some less traditional casting flourishes. For instance, a nosy neighbor kept pestering agency personnel on location during the New Jersey shoot for "Flaps," a commercial in which an elderly woman speaks in a gruff male voice about her fraudulent purchase of a pickup complete with "them mud flaps with the naked ladies on 'em." The filming crew responded by seamlessly incorporating the neighbor into the ad as the woman's husband. Unconventional casting had its hazards, however. When the team used a photograph of Fallon colleague Emily Frazee for print ads, some people in Frazee's hometown of Kahoka, Missouri, missed the point of the copy that stated that there were three warrants out for her arrest. About a dozen people became worried and called her parents, Frazee told Adweek. "Everybody thought I was in trouble."

middle-aged man sits in his easy chair while speaking, in the voice of a Valley girl, about a shopping binge during which he bought a $1,500 leather bustier that "lifts and separates." Showing a vividly real character inhabited by another fully developed character's voice served to illustrate with chilling but entertaining directness the phenomenon of identity theft. Print and outdoor ads used the same principle of juxtaposition, pitting a character's photographic portrait against drastically out-of-character copy.

COMPETITION

According to U.S. Banker, between 2000 and 2003 retail bank advertising expenditures grew at unprecedented rates, primarily as a response to consolidation at the corporate level. Consolidation made for bigger advertising budgets, but as was the case with Citibank, many large financial institutions wanted to avoid being seen as inhuman monoliths. Several banking companies—including American Express and Capital One—ran memorable campaigns contemporaneously with the "Identity Theft Solutions" spots.

American Express had a long-standing reputation for innovation in advertising, and it continued to push the envelope with an online campaign featuring Jerry Seinfeld and an animated Superman in "webisodes" that were several minutes long. In them Seinfeld and Superman acted much like Jerry and his friends had in the sitcom Seinfeld, and an American Express card was always woven into the plot. The interactive American Express website included behind-the-scenes footage and photos of Seinfeld and Superman, and in 2004 the webisodes were picked up by the TV stations NBC and TBS.

Morgan Stanley, meanwhile, used offbeat humor in a campaign that dramatized just how committed the firm's financial advisers were to its clients. In one spot, a woman was shown cheering enthusiastically at a children's soccer game. When asked which child was hers, she explained that she was the financial adviser of one of the children's parents.

Capital One continued to run its popular "What's in Your Wallet?" spots, which promoted its "No-Hassle Card" and raised brand awareness to 97 percent, according to Advertising Age. Bank One launched its "Individual Answers" campaign, which showcased the personalized features its customers could access and ended with montages of individual faces and the assertion that no two people were alike.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Fallon's Steve Driggs told Adweek that the concept for the "Identity Theft Solutions" was inspired by stories of real-life victims of identity theft. Voice-overs for the original four TV spots were recorded prior to shooting, and the actors lip-synched the dialogue. The precisely calibrated lip-synching vividly illustrated the idea of one person inhabiting another's identity. The visible characters in each spot were easy for viewers to sympathize with, and the villainous voices, as Barbara Lippert wrote in Adweek, "stay away from stereotypical criminal situations and the usual thug voices we're used to seeing and hearing in police dramas and anti-drug commercials." In "Geek," for instance, a hip young African-American woman channeled a nasal, laughing male voice: "Firewall? Like that could stop me! Once I got her account number, I couldn't spend it fast enough: 64-inch plasma-screen monitor, 10 4.2-megahertz wireless routers, and 20,000 bucks to complete my robot. My girl robot. This is gonna be the best prom ever!" An announcer then said, as the Citi logo appeared onscreen, "Help getting your life back—that's using your card wisely," a message that underscored the human touch that Citibank had been cultivating for years. The tagline "Live Richly" was included under the logo, linking the new spots to the previously established umbrella campaign.

Adweek reported that, in developing the print advertising, Fallon used an Episcopal church's directory to find faces that embodied the innocent look of someone whose identity had been stolen. Unable to secure the rights to use the actual directory photos, the creative team shot its own photos of one churchgoer, Jack Wiborg. The resulting image was of an affable, bespectacled, portly man with a double chin. Underneath the picture was copy that absurdly read, "I had $23,000 worth of liposuction." A Fallon colleague, Emily Frazee, was used as the model for the "innocent cheerleader" type Citibank had wanted for another print ad. The accompanying copy stated, "There are three warrants for my arrest. One of them involves smuggling."

In addition to being entertaining, the ads immediately "positioned Citi as an ally for cardholders in crisis," according to American Banker. The bank was not simply boasting about its size and status; it was offering a valuable service that distinguished it from other banks. The ads addressed a growing consumer fear and, in showing that Citibank cared about what was important to its customers, supported the "Live Richly" message.

A second series of three TV ads followed the initial set, introducing new characters and extending the lip-synching concept without substantial alteration. Other television ads used a different concept but a similar brand of humor in playing up the degree to which people had become afraid of giving out personal information. In one spot, a young couple in bed debated the merits of disclosing their names to one another, just before a nine-year-old boy leapt onto the mattress saying, "Hi Mommy. Hi Daddy."

OUTCOME

Citigroup's consumer operations sustained the conglomerate during the time that the "Identity Theft Solutions" campaign aired, a time when the company's capital-markets divisions were facing notably inhospitable conditions. Added to a sluggish investment-banking climate were Citigroup's difficulties stemming from its role in the Worldcom scandal and from its publicized regulatory violations in Japan. Citigroup's consumer divisions grew vigorously, however, led by Citibank's credit-card operations, which were the primary beneficiaries of the "Identity Theft Solutions" message.

Adweek named "Identity Theft Solutions" its campaign of the year for 2003, citing "those wickedly funny juxtapositions, Fallon's seamless production and its simple but entertaining way of conveying a difficult message." American Banker also called the Fallon campaign one of the industry's best for that year. U.S. Banker noted the influence that the Citibank spots had on industry insiders: "Ad execs, brand consultants, and bankers all give Citi and its agency, Fallon Worldwide, kudos for the piercing spots." The print campaign was a finalist in the Magazine Publishers of America's Kelly Awards in 2004, and the individual spot "Outfit," featuring the man speaking in a Valley-girl voice, won the 2004 Emmy Award for Outstanding Commercial. Boards magazine named Fallon its Agency of the Year for 2004, drawing particular attention to its "Identity Theft" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Anderson, Mae. "The Fine Print." Adweek, June 7, 2004.

Cardona, Mercedes M. "Capital One." Advertising Age, November 17, 2003.

Cardona, Mercedes M., and Hillary Chura. "Citibank Choice of Fallon Signals Edgier Approach." Advertising Age, August 7, 2000.

De Paula, Matthew. "In '04, Bank Ads Scored Big. Message Delivered." U.S. Banker, January 2005.

"Duly Noted." Creativity, October 2004.

Garfield, Bob. "Four Campaigns Demonstrate the True Meaning of Creative." Advertising Age, December 8, 2003.

"Lessons in Rich Living from the King of Wealth." Financial Services Marketing, February 4, 2002.

Lippert, Barbara. "Look Who's Talking." Adweek, November 24, 2003.

McGeer, Bonnie. "Memorable: Citi, Bank One, Citizens of R.I. Ads." American Banker, March 10, 2004.

Noonan, David. "Wall Street's New Pitch." Newsweek, March 12, 2001.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Campaign of the Year: Citibank." Adweek, February 9, 2004.

Pytlik, Mark. "Fallic Worship." Boards, January 1, 2005.

Schneider, Ivan. "Citibank ID Theft Campaign May Lead to Back-Office Efficiencies." Bank Systems & Technology Online, July 13, 2004. Available from <http://www.banktech.com/showArticle.jhtml?articleID=23900534>

Vines, Emily. "Citibank Shines Bright Spot on Identity Theft." Shoot, December 12, 2003.

Mark Lane

Citigroup Inc.

399 Park Avenue
New York, New York 10043
USA
Telephone: (212) 559-1000
Fax: (212) 793-3946
Web site: www.citigroup.com

■■■

LIVE RICHLY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Note: Also see essay for Citibank.

Citibank, a subsidiary of Citigroup Inc., the largest financial-services company in the world, offered consumer and corporate banking services through some 1,400 offices in more than 40 countries. In the early twenty-first century, amid a strong U.S. economy, Citibank initiated research for an advertising campaign to promote its personalized services, attract financially savvy consumers seeking options for investing their new wealth, and strengthen brand recognition. With the help of newly hired advertising agency Fallon Worldwide of Minneapolis, Citibank launched the "Live Richly" advertising campaign in 2001.

The rebranding campaign, with an estimated budget of $100 million, was built around the tagline "Live Richly." The television, print, and billboard campaign featured slogans such as "People with fat wallets are not necessarily more jolly," "Holding shares shouldn't be your only form of affection," and "He who dies with the most toys is still dead," emphasizing the importance of living life to the fullest while downplaying the focus on money. In addition to promoting the Citibank brand, the campaign sought to highlight Citibank's credit-card division as well as its retail bank operations.

Several of the "Live Richly" television commercials were named "Best Spots" by Adweek magazine. The campaign ran through 2004 and inspired such related campaigns as "Identify Theft Solutions," which promoted Citibank's security solutions for credit-card customers. "Live Richly" succeeded in raising interest in Citibank and its offerings: following the unveiling of ads for Citibank's new financial service Citipro, the number of information requests for Citipro at retail branches increased 47 percent.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1812 as the City Bank of New York, this urban merchant's bank continued to expand and diversify its services over the next century. The bank changed its name to Citibank, N.A. (National Association), in 1976, following its parent holding company's change to Citicorp. In 1998 Citicorp and the Travelers Group completed a $76 billion merger to form Citigroup, Inc. Citicorp was at the time the second-largest commercial bank, and Travelers Group was a leading international insurance/investment-banking firm. The Citicorp-Travelers merger thus represented a new era of horizontal expansion.

Citigroup then began an acquisition spree that included acquiring in 2002 Golden State Bancorp (the parent company of First Nationwide Mortgage and California Federal Bank), a move that added 352 branches and approximately 1.5 million new customers to Citigroup. By then the company was well on its way to having 3,000 bank branches and consumer-finance offices in the United States and Canada, plus an additional 1,500 locations worldwide.

The terrorist strikes of September 11, 2001, initiated changes in American opinions regarding finances. While Americans were left reordering their priorities to allow more time at home with family, Citibank was creating a "new standard" in consumer retail banking. "In a down economy people want to hear that money isn't important," said Al Ries, chairman of Ries & Ries, a marketing consultancy in Atlanta, Georgia. Though the market research for the "Live Richly" campaign had been completed prior to 9/11, Citibank, with its simple and reassuring ads, benefited from consumers' fears of corporate layoffs and the stock-market instabilities of a down economy.

"Live Richly" was Citibank's first major advertising campaign since "The Citi Never Sleeps," which ran in the 1980s and early 1990s. "The Citi Never Sleeps" was developed by ad agency Foote, Cone & Belding's Chicago division and promoted individual banking products. In 1996 agency J. Walter Thompson followed "The Citi Never Sleeps" with an international campaign designed to promote Citibank's international services, such as traveler's checks and a global ATM network. The campaign sported the tagline "Your Bank, Your Money, Your World."

In 1997 Citibank shocked the advertising world by hiring yet another new ad agency, Young & Rubicam, and giving the agency responsibility for all its advertising and direct-marketing needs, in total worth an estimated $500 to $700 million. Prior to 1997 Citibank had divided its marketing assignments among several major agencies, which were blindsided by Citibank's decision. In 2000 Citibank again shopped for a new agency. From seven contenders, Fallon Worldwide was selected.

NOT EVERYONE WAS LIVING RICHLY

Not everyone found Citibank's "Live Richly" advertising campaign to be charming and warmhearted. Some rejected as a ruse Citibank's message that there was more to life than money. In 2003 the Rainforest Action Network, an environmental organization, launched a contest calling for fake advertisements that highlighted Citibank's allegedly corrupt business practices and environmental and social destruction. Patterned after the "Live Richly" print ads, the submissions were posted on a website. Examples of fake ads included "Funny how nobody ever calls it forest destruction" and "Forest Destruction and Global Warming? We're banking on it!"

TARGET MARKET

In order for Citibank to reach its goal of becoming a global brand with one billion customers by 2010, it needed to appeal to a broad population. The campaign aimed to attract middle-income consumers, some 90 million Americans, and intended to accomplish this by convincing them that Citibank understood their values. Specifically, Fallon targeted what it defined as "balance seekers." Balance seekers were not driven by money but used it to fund parts of their lives that made them happy. According to Anne Bologna, director of planning at Fallon, the agency conducted more than 20 focus groups to better understand consumers' relationships with their money. Bologna explained, "We found more than 90 million adults in this country are looking for balance in their lives. They're not striving to become millionaires, and money isn't their end goal. They view money as a tool to help them attain balance and live their priorities."

In addition to luring middle-income balance seekers, Citibank targeted young urban consumers, including the segment of the population labeled Generation X (people born between 1965 and 1980). Members of Generation X had a reputation for avoiding all things stodgy. Known for seeking alternative approaches to life, Generation X consumers after 9/11 seemed to assiduously avoid the corporate norm, opted for flex time, and often worked from home. Citibank hoped to connect with these consumers through humor and "un-banklike" advertising. In a 2001 press release Fallon Minneapolis president and executive creative director David Lubars commented, "Citibank's new creative is a significant departure from advertising traditionally seen in this category. We've used humor and emotion in the ads to help Citibank connect with people on a more human level than is typically seen from a financial brand. The work establishes Citibank as a consumer ally and friend, not an institution."

COMPETITION

Citigroup reportedly reaped $47 million in net profits a day in 2004 and ruled the financial-services industry. Competitors, among them JPMorgan Chase, Bank of America, Merrill Lynch, and Morgan Stanley, worked to chip away at Citibank's market share. Though Bank of America fell behind Citigroup in the United States in terms of assets, it was the third-largest U.S. bank and boasted the country's most extensive branch network. In fall of 2000 Bank of America launched a one-year, $100 million advertising campaign. It included television, radio, and print advertising and was introduced during the 2000 Olympic Games. Designed to strengthen the Bank of America brand and send the message that Bank of America could help customers grow financially, the campaign focused on two themes, "Grow" and "Why Not?" Bank of America marketing executive Barbara Desoer stated in a 2000 press release, "... our goal is to build and sustain awareness of what Bank of America stands for—a customer-driven company that provides innovative financial solutions through a variety of channels."

In 2001 Chase Manhattan and JP Morgan & Company merged to form JPMorgan Chase. By 2002 it was the nation's second-largest financial services firm, and in 2004 it had sales of more than $56 billion. Also in 2004 JPMorgan Chase acquired Bank One, the sixth-largest bank in the United States. JPMorgan Chase's advertising consisted primarily of smaller, more targeted campaigns. In 2002, for instance, the firm unveiled a marketing campaign aimed at Hispanic consumers, and the following year its online investing arm, BrownCo, initiated a $10 to $12 million campaign to attract active traders.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Citibank committed itself to the "Live Richly" campaign in 2001 by bolstering its advertising budget, increasing it to some $100 million; in comparison, according to Competitive Media Reporting, Citibank's U.S. advertising budget for the first nine months of 2000 was only $14.6 million.

In creating the "Live Richly" campaign, Fallon Worldwide avoided typical bank stuffiness, and, according to Maggie Shea of Fallon, it also did not want to talk about consumers and their money in a "sappy way." Instead Fallon worked to create an "emotional connection that felt fresh, modern, sophisticated and reassuring," Shea explained to Adweek. Rather than focusing on milestone events such as buying a home, having children, or graduating college, this bank campaign focused on "the everyday role of money."

The six-week newspaper component, budgeted at just under $2 million, consisted of a series of simple and quirky ads. They appeared in 19 daily newspapers across the United States, including the New York Times, the Chicago Tribune, the Miami Herald, and El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language edition of the Miami Herald. Initial ads were placed in unexpected sections of newspapers, such as the movie section and the comics. Larger, more detailed ads then appeared in main sections of newspapers for five weeks. Though newspaper advertising was thought to be old-fashioned by some in the advertising industry, it proved to be a key element in the "Live Richly" campaign. Fallon believed that newspapers had a dedicated readership and appealed to a wide variety of consumers. The agency estimated that 30 million consumers were exposed to the campaign through newspaper ads alone.

The print ads sought to appeal to readers on a human level. Lisa Seward, Fallon's media director, noted in Adweek, "The banking category across the board is guilty, I think, of speaking to consumers as account numbers and not as people. So [with this campaign], we're trying very hard to acknowledge customers as human, with human motivations." One ad that ran in the comics section declared, "Sometimes wealth is having time to read these." Other ads stated, "Sometimes wealth is buying the $6 popcorn and not obsessing over the fact that you just paid $6 for popcorn," and "If you gave up your morning coffee for a year, you could make an extra mortgage payment. But man, you'd be grumpy." Seward explained that the ads were not intended as attention grabbers. "They did pop off the page, but [they] were small and charming, in a quiet voice."

The television component focused on three areas: boosting the Citibank brand, pushing Citibank's credit-card division, and promoting local branch business. Acclaimed documentary filmmaker Errol Morris directed the brand-building commercials, which starred non-actors. One spot featured snippets of everyday life along with appropriate phrases—a child was swung around in the air by the father, accompanied by the text "Count your blessings"; a teenager made silly faces, and the text on screen read, "Investments mature. You don't have to"; an older gentleman joyously played the trombone to the text, "Dirty, rotten, filthy, stinking happy." All spots ended with the tagline "Live Richly."

Brief Citibank messages were shown on billboards, phone kiosks, bus shelters, subway stations, and construction bridges across six different cities in the United States. The slogans included messages such as "Healthy credit is good, but keep an eye on your cholesterol, too," "Hugs are on a 52-week high," and "The word 'splurge' loses meaning if it becomes a regular daily event." In 2003, in order to fund $2 million in church restorations, the prominent Grace Church at Broadway and 10th Street in New York posted above its portico a huge billboard with the Citibank logo and its "Live Richly" slogan; the ad's text read, "If happiness is just around the corner, turn often."

OUTCOME

Fallon's Citibank advertising continued in this humorous and nonthreatening vein for the following five years. In this time the "Live Richly" umbrella campaign spawned other, more targeted campaigns, including "Identity Theft Solutions" and "Thank You." The former promoted Citibank's anti-identity theft services for its credit-card clientele, while the "Thank You" campaign introduced Citibank's Consumer Rewards Program, which was also for its credit-card customers.

The "Live Richly" campaign's "Tire Swing" commercial was named one of Adweek magazine's "Best Spots" of 2004. Analyst Paul Jamieson of Gomez Advisors believed that Citibank's "Live Richly" ads sent an attractive message to consumers, and he commented in Financial Services Marketing, "What they're really speaking to is what consumers desire these days, which has less to do with saving money and more to do with saving time. They're saying: 'Concentrate on the things that make life rewarding; we'll take care of the complicated stuff.' It's a great message." The advertising industry agreed, and "Live Richly" won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2002.

FURTHER READING

Beckett, Paul. "Citibank Unveils Advertising Campaign." Wall Street Journal, January 15, 2001.

Carvell, Tim. "Citi of Fear." Moneybox, July 31, 2002.

Case, Tony. "Fallon." Adweek, June 18, 2001.

Elliott, Stuart. "Citibank Consolidates, Stunning Madison Ave." New York Times, August 8, 1997.

Gordon, Joanne. "Do You Really Need That?" Forbes, March 19, 2001.

Hogue, Ilyse. "The Cost of Living Richly: Citigroup's Global Finance and Threats to the Environment." Multinational Monitor 23, no. 4 (April 2002).

Kapler, Bob. "Living Richly at Citibank Means There's More to Life than Money." Financial Services Marketing, March 20, 2001.

Lamport, Joseph. "Wake Up and Smell the Subterfuge." Salon.com, February 4, 2002.

"Off the Mark." Delaney Report, February 12, 2001.

Wasserman, Todd. "Banking on Upturn, but '01 Woes Add Up." Brandweek.com, April 11, 2005.

Bridget McGinniss Kerr

Clairol, Inc.

1 Blachley Road
Stamford, Connecticut 06922
USA
Telephone: (203) 357-5000
Fax: (203) 357-5000
Web site: www.clairol.com

■■■

TOTALLY ORGANIC CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Clairol, Inc.'s Herbal Essence was a top-ranked shampoo in the 1970s. Although it retained a following in California, by the 1990s it had dropped in popularity elsewhere. In 1994 Clairol introduced a new Herbal Essences brand that offered a variety of shampoos and conditioners made from organic materials. Other Herbal Essences hair-care products followed. Instead of imitating the marketing strategy of other shampoo brands, Clairol, a subsidiary of Bristol-Myers Squibb Company, wanted to advertise the sensual experience of washing hair, not how its shampoo made hair shiny or silky. Hoping to increase sales and make the Herbal Essences brand stand out against the noise of competing advertisers, Clairol introduced a campaign titled "Totally Organic."

The print, television, and radio campaign, created by the ad agency Wells Rich Greene BDDP in New York, was released in 1994. Adweek estimated its budget to be between $15 million and $20 million. The natural makeup of the new shampoos was a strong selling point, but it was advertisements using sexual humor that helped Herbal Essences gain recognition over other environmentally sound competitors. Commercials featured women who simulated sexual ecstasy while shampooing their hair, usually in a public setting such as a crowded supermarket. The campaign shifted its strategy in 2000, when pop singer Britney Spears recorded a song for Herbal Essences titled "I've Got the Urge to Herbal" and posed for print ads. Her contribution lowered the campaign's female target age range from 18 to 49 down to 16 to 49. Despite the brand's ownership changing hands and the campaign being transferred to a second ad agency, "Totally Organic" continued until 2004.

While using sex in advertising was a controversial, or in some views anachronistic, approach, incorporating humor made the Herbal Essences ads contemporary and effective. The "Totally Organic" campaign was considered a solid success by Clairol executives, and it inspired a relaunch of another Clairol standard, Nice 'n Easy hair color. "Totally Organic" helped the brand triple its market share between 1994 and 1999—making Herbal Essences the second-largest shampoo brand in America.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1994 Clairol, a division of Bristol-Myers Squibb, introduced Herbal Essences, a collection of four shampoos and four conditioners sold in 12-ounce bottles for $3.29. Marketing began in 1995 with approximately $20 million in print and television advertising. Styling products—gels, mousses, and spritzes—and body-wash products were added to the line in 1996, and in 1997 Herbal Essences products were introduced to the United Kingdom and other markets.

The new product traded on the name recognition of a previous Clairol product, Herbal Essence, which was ranked the number three shampoo in the early 1970s, with an 8 percent market share. That share had fallen to 0.1 percent by the 1990s, however. Herbal Essence was not a natural product, while the new Herbal Essences products were made almost exclusively of herbs, botanicals, and other plant ingredients derived from renewable resources. The formulas were biodegradable and not tested on animals, and the packaging material was made out of recyclable plastic.

Clairol said that the old Herbal Essence would be continued because it retained favor with Hispanic consumers. To avoid confusion between the two products, however, it would be merchandised separately from the new Herbal Essences line.

CONNECTIONS

Clairol advertised its reformulated Nice 'n Easy hair coloring during the final episode of the sitcom Seinfeld, on May 14, 1998. The spots starred comedian Kristen Johnston of the sitcom 3rd Rock from the Sun. Seinfeld star Julia Louis-Dreyfus had been a former spokeswoman for Nice 'n Easy.

TARGET MARKET

An association with nature was part of the original Herbal Essence shampoo's appeal, but the product's green credentials were more image than fact. "Consumer research has shown us that people remember Herbal Essence as a natural product, even though it really wasn't," said Jeanne Matson, Clairol's marketing director for hair care. The new Herbal Essences products, said to be 99 percent natural, were created and marketed with environmentally informed consumers in mind. "With companies like the Body Shop and Aveda introducing natural hair products in the specialty arena, it seemed like the perfect time to revive Herbal Essence and make it truly natural and environmentally sound," Matson said.

A trend toward upgrading shampoos for the mass market had resulted in a new niche. This new market was for hair-care products that offered salon-quality treatment—such as alpha hydroxy acid—or natural ingredients—such as those used in specialty shampoos from companies like the Body Shop or Aveda—at less than salon or specialty prices. At $3.29 for 12 ounces, a bottle of Herbal Essences shampoo was more expensive than the old Herbal Essence, which continued to be merchandised at $2.99 for a 14.5-ounce bottle, but it was still inexpensive.

The new Herbal Essences was first aimed at "women aged 18 to 49 who are interested in natural products and do not mind paying premium prices in order be environmentally sound," said Jane Owen, senior product manager. This demographic group apparently included fans of television shows like Seinfeld, programs noted not for their environmental stance but for pushing the envelope in questions of taste. A controversial but effective marketing strategy used by Clairol for its new Herbal Essences products sidestepped the environmental question altogether and instead focused on the sensual act of shampooing by playing the word "organic" off "orgasmic." After adding print and radio spots featuring 18-year-old singer Britney Spears in 2000, the campaign's target expanded to include women between the ages of 16 to 49.

COMPETITION

Clairol was the number one hair-products company in the United States. Procter & Gamble, however, dominated the shampoo market in 1997, with its leading product, Pantene. Nonetheless, Clairol's Herbal Essences was "making plenty of noise," as characterized by market reports. The company's shampoo sales rose 89.3 percent, to $52.8 million, for the year ending August 25, 1996, and conditioner sales were up 94 percent, to $31.8 million. The Body Shop and Aveda were the two competitors most commonly cited by the creators of Herbal Essences. These companies sold environmentally sound products at above-average but not exorbitant prices, and the Body Shop especially appealed to the global consciousness of consumers.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Competition, even within specific categories, was becoming increasingly intense in television advertising in the 1990s. Stock products had been done to death and without much originality, according to Judith Werme, group creative director at ad agency DDB Needham Chicago. "A blitzed-out population has become increasingly blasé," said Mark Crispin Miller, professor of media studies at New York University. "So there's an accelerating desperation to make an impression, to stand out."

Print copy for Clairol's Herbal Essences shampoos and conditioners stated that they contained a combination of natural organic herbs, botanicals, and springwater, giving users "a totally organic experience." Television commercials, however, turned this straightforward environmental description into a whole different story. A TV spot developed by Wells Rich Greene

EMPLOYEE COMMUTER PROGRAM

Clairol, Inc., based in Stamford, Connecticut, spruced up its Employee Commuter Program to reflect the images used to market environmentally friendly products such as Herbal Essences. The Clairol shuttle bus, which transported employees to and from the Stamford train station, was decorated with depictions of fresh herbs and flowers so as to resemble the design of the new shampoo bottles. The Clairol Employee Commuter Program provided the train-station shuttle, low-cost vanpooling, and emergency rides home for commuters who needed them. In 1995 Clairol won the Governor's Circle Transportation Award, presented annually to recognize individual and corporate contributions to alternative transportation that helped to improve Connecticut's air quality and reduce congestion on its highways.

BDDP, New York, showed a woman "really, really enjoying her shampoo," wrote Tom Soter for Shoot magazine. "In the piece, a woman shampooing her hair in the shower murmurs, 'Feels so good,' then progresses to 'yes, yes, yes,' until the spot ends with an orgasmic cry. The punchline is lifted straight out of the famous deli orgasm scene in When Harry Met Sally." A woman watching the commercial on television at home then said, "I want to get the shampoo she's using." Another version showed a woman who, to the puzzlement of the passengers overhearing her, moaned with pleasure as she shampooed with Clairol Herbal Essences in the restroom of an airplane.

The $15 million to $20 million campaign was an example of "shock advertising," which Bob Garfield, critic for Advertising Age, described as "calculatingly taking license to offend and inflame." But Linda Kaplan Thaler, who developed the Herbal Essences advertisements for Wells Rich Greene BDDP—and who soon after took the entire Clairol account to her new company, Kaplan Thaler Group—described the Herbal Essences "Totally Organic" campaign as based on "the theory of disruption." "If the convention in the shampoo category is to show the benefit of making hair shiny and healthy, we would go against that. Instead of finding some molecule of evidence that our product made hair slightly shinier, we thought we'd get more bang for the buck by doing something that everyone else isn't doing, but is equally as inviting. We said, 'Why not concentrate on the actual experience of washing hair rather than the end benefit? When you're cleaning yourself, it's a cathartic experience—you're naked, it's deeply sensual."

The commercials were developed within a climate of permissiveness in television in 1994, manifested in shows such as Seinfeld, Friends, and NYPD Blue as well as on MTV. "There is such an onslaught of wild, weird and wacky stuff on MTV," explained DDB Needham's Werme, "that in advertising, there's almost nothing you can't do." But programs such as Seinfeld and Friends, while pushing the boundaries for acceptable topics and language, also operated in a climate of sensitivity to women's rights and, perhaps, with ennui toward a sex-saturated medium. "It's not acceptable to have T&A in beer advertising anymore," commented Jeff Funicular, creative director at ad agency Leo Burnett, Toronto. "It's not acceptable to have women draped over the hood of a car." If sex was going to sell or even be noticed, it had to be self-deprecating and witty. "We decided a comedic experience would work best," said Kaplan Thaler about the Herbal Essences advertisements.

Other television spots that featured racy material with a high quotient of humor included those for Fruit of the Loom underwear, Westin Hotels, Coca-Cola, Mercedes-Benz, and the Bermuda Department of Tourism. "Television permissibility was clearly enjoying a renaissance," wrote Soter in Shoot, but humor was a key ingredient for success.

In late 1997 another disruption spot was created for Clairol by Kaplan Thaler to launch a new hair-care line called Daily Defense. The spot showed a fleet of stylists at a commercial shoot grooming the opulent blond tresses of a model. The scene was interrupted with images of a no-nonsense brunette explaining the benefits of Daily Defense, said to provide protection from damaging environmental effects, including pollution, solar radiation, and chlorine from swimming pools. "We're poking fun at what goes on behind the scenes at many [shampoo] commercials," said Kaplan Thaler. Research showed that many women were tired of seeing "unrealistic" females in ads, she added. A simple scientific look was planned for the product's packaging. "This is about a product that is high-tech," said Bill Decker, president of Clairol's retail division. "It is not a natural or sensory story."

In 1999 the ad agency Kaplan Thaler Group, New York, was awarded the Herbal Essences account. The all-female agency, helmed by the campaign's creator, Linda Kaplan Thaler, released new television spots and print ads with the expanded $30 million Herbal Essences ad budget. One courtroom-themed spot featured the sex therapist Dr. Ruth promoting the new Herbal Essences body wash while a female lawyer delved into a sensuous hair-washing daydream. Handsome men in the courtroom began singing, "She's got the urge to Herbal." Pop star Britney Spears recorded her own 60-second version of "She's Got the Urge to Herbal" for a 2000 radio spot. Her song was also used for a preconcert video presentation during Spears's 50-city summer concert tour, which was sponsored by Clairol. In addition Spears posed for Herbal Essences print ads, which appeared in youth-oriented magazines such as Teen People, Seventeen, and YM. Spears lowered the campaign's target age to girls as young as 16.

The Procter & Gamble Company purchased Clairol from Bristol-Myers Squibb in 2001 and renamed the company P&G-Clairol, Inc. In March 2001 members of the boy band 98 Degrees appeared in provocative print ads and television spots for Herbal Essences. In addition Herbal Essences sponsored the band's 2001 spring concert tour. In 2003 the campaign featured Sex and the City star Kim Cattrall, who provided spots with voice-overs. The blonde bombshell was shown moaning in a shower while shampooing her hair in one commercial—drawing a backlash from the watchdog group the American Family Association. In 2004 Herbal Essences put its 10-year-old "Totally Organic" campaign on hiatus in America, according to Advertising Age, in favor of a campaign that was less sexually charged.

OUTCOME

A USA Today Ad Track survey of 41 commercials in 1997 showed that only 8 percent of those questioned responded that they liked the Herbal Essences ads "a lot." A mere 14 percent rated the ads "very effective." Nonetheless, Clairol was pleased with the campaign. "This has been Clairol's most successful product launch in the history of the company," said Bill Susetka, senior vice president and general manager of Clairol U.S. "It has greatly exceeded our initial expectations."

In 1997 Clairol reported a 36 percent increase in sales, which was attributed to its Herbal Essences line. That year the line had a sales increase of 168 percent, to $351 million. Herbal Essences products were introduced or expanded in more than 40 countries. Clairol became a market leader in Peru and Puerto Rico in 1997, and in Asia Clairol's Herbal Essences product line "put it on the map," according to Steve Sadove, president of worldwide Beauty Care & Nutritional at Bristol-Myers Squibb (then the parent company of Clairol). "It's the most successful thing we've done at Clairol," Sadove added. "We believe Herbal Essences has the potential to be a mega brand spanning many different product categories."

During the first five years of "Totally Organic" Herbal Essences tripled its market share and eventually became the second-largest shampoo brand, behind Pantene. In 2003 its consumer-awareness scores were higher than that of any other shampoo, according to the newspaper the Hamilton Spectator. By 2004 some ad analysts had begun criticizing the campaign for its lack of fresh material. Such accusations were later validated by Herbal Essences' bottom line. In the campaign's final full year in the United States, the brand lost 1.9 market-share points in shampoo and 1.1 market-share points for conditioner.

FURTHER READING

Berkowitz, Harry. "Sex Sells in Latest TV Commercials: Even Cautious Mercedes Has Racy Run in New Ads." Newsday, May 10, 1996.

Elliott, Stuart. "A Vivid-Livid Divide: Madison Ave.'s New Explicitness Is Open to Debate." New York Times, June 19, 1998.

Enrico, Dottie. " 'Seinfeld' Finale Advertisers Put On Game Faces." USA Today, April 29, 1998.

"How the Ad Track Ads of 1997 Stack Up." USA Today, December 29, 1997.

Kagan, Cara. "Styling Products Take Shape for Clairol's Herbal Essence." Women's Wear Daily, February 9, 1996, p. 6.

Kim, Hank. "Kaplan Thaler Unveils TV Spot." Adweek (eastern ed.), December 8, 1997.

———. "2 Assignments For Kaplan Thaler." Adweek (eastern ed.), January 19, 1998.

Neff, Jack. "P&G Retains Clairol Planners." Advertising Age, March 18, 2002, p. 3.

Robb, Jay. "Ads You Can't Wash Out of Your Hair." Hamilton (ON) Spectator, December 9, 2003, p. G15.

Soter, Tom. "Sex-Smitten." Shoot, September 27, 1996.

Tode, Chantal. "Clairol's Daily Defense Strategy." Women's Wear Daily, July 18, 1997.

Megan McNamer
Kevin Teague

CNS, Inc.

7615 Smetana Lane
Eden Prairie, Minnesota 55344
USA
Telephone: (952) 229-1500
Fax: (952) 229-1700
Web site: www.cns.com

■■■

BACK IN THE SACK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

During the early 1990s Breathe Right nasal strips, manufactured and marketed by CNS, Inc., enjoyed a meteoric rise in sales. This success was largely attributed to the influence of certain prominent athletes, who wore the strip to enhance performance. It also succeeded to an extent as a cure for problem snorers but had difficulty breaking into the more crowded cold and allergy field. While the product gained brand recognition, it became typecast as a specialized product for star athletes. Sales peaked in the mid-1990s, as did the price of CNS stock, and the company launched several marketing efforts aimed at reaching a family audience. In particular, women were targeted because they bought most of the cold remedies in the house, and since a greater number of men than women had snoring problems, women were the ones most affected by snoring and more motivated to seek a product to curb the problem. In an attempt to appeal to married problem snorers, generally 50 years and older, CNS in 2004 introduced its "Back in the Sack" campaign, developed by ad agency Olson & Company. The strategy was to convince couples that Breathe Right nasal strips could ease the snoring that hurt so many relationships.

With a budget of less than $1 million, "Back in the Sack" was in essence a direct-response campaign. The goal was to convince consumers to request a six-night sample pack of nasal strips either by calling a toll-free telephone number or by registering at a dedicated website. CNS felt confident that if people tried the product they would become customers. The TV spots ran late at night or early in the morning, the times when the problem of snoring was most on the minds of consumers. Morning radio personalities who tried the strips to alleviate their own snoring and offered their own testimonials played a major role in the campaign, as did a print ad that ran in a Sunday newspaper coupon insert. The website also provided educational information and the chance to send a humorous Snore-O-Gram E-mail message to loved ones, urging them to give Breathe Right a chance to address their snoring problem.

Despite its limited budget the "Back in the Sack" campaign far exceeded its goals. The response rate to the sampling effort was five times the target, while sales increased at more than twice the anticipated rate. The campaign also won a prestigious EFFIE award in 2005 and continued to drive sampling and sales for CNS.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

After receiving Food and Drug Administration approval in late 1993, the Breathe Right adhesive nasal strip, used to keep nasal passages open, found a ready market not with chronic snorers but with athletes. The company that produced the product, CNS, Inc., mailed samples to National Football League trainers, people who were more likely than most to understand the biology behind the strips. The Philadelphia Eagles were the first to give the product a try, applying it to the nose of running back Herschel Walker, who at the time was suffering from a cold, before he rushed for 269 yards and scored a pair of touchdowns. Star San Francisco 49ers' wide receiver Jerry Rice then wore the strip for a Monday Night Football game, generating national attention for the Breathe Right brand and jump-starting its marketing campaign. A wide assortment of athletes used the product, many of them providing unpaid endorsements.

© MICHAEL KELLER/CORBIS. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Sales exploded for Breathe Right, peaking around $65 million in 1996 before beginning to slip. "The problem," according to Monte Hanson, writing for Finance and Commerce Daily Newspaper, "was that the strips marketed as a product worn by professional athletes to enhance performance and by men who had snoring problems had limited consumer appeal." A new president, former Pillsbury executive Marti Morfitt, was hired in March 1998 as the price of CNS stock began to plummet. He began an effort to break out Breathe Right beyond its athletic typecasting and position it as a product for the entire family, able to help people suffering from nasal congestion caused by colds or allergies. A product containing Vicks mentholated vapors as well as decorated nasal strips for kids were introduced. The 1999 "Breathe Right. All Night" campaign promoted the product as a way to relieve nighttime nasal congestion. One of the TV spots showed a woman using the strip to ease nasal congestion. The subsequent "On the Nose" campaign also attempted to target women, a market that CNS believed was untapped because it viewed Breathe Right as a product for athletes or men with snoring problems. Women were important because they were often the ones who bought the product for spouses with snoring problems and were generally the family member responsible for buying cold remedies. A major goal of the "On the Nose" campaign was to urge women to see Breathe Right as a product for themselves.

The "On the Nose" campaign, launched in January 2000, succeeded in raising consumer awareness and increased sales and even won a prestigious EFFIE award for CNS and its advertising agency, Campbell Mithun, but it did little to convince women to overcome their reluctance to wear an adhesive strip over their noses. Nevertheless CNS learned over the years that if it could persuade people to try the product, there was a good chance they would buy it. According to a 2003 study, people who tried the strip were seven times more likely to purchase it. The goal of the "Back in the Sack" campaign, developed by Olson & Company and launched in the summer of 2004 in a number of test markets, was to get as many nasal strips on the noses of potential customers as possible.

TARGET MARKET

The "Back in the Sack" campaign targeted married snorers, which already accounted for the bulk of Breathe

DESPERATION: THE MOTHER OF SOME INVENTIONS

The Breathe Right nasal strip was invented by Bruce Johnson, a man who suffered from allergies as well as a deviated septum. In his attempts to keep his nasal passages open, he resorted to such desperate measures as putting straws up his nose and even using paper clips to keep his nostrils open. His inspiration for Breathe Rights came one day when he drove past an archway at the University of Minnesota and he realized that he could pull open his nasal passages from the outside rather than from within. This insight led to his creation of an adhesive strip that could be applied over the nose.

Right sales, but because the budget was less than $1 million, the company could not effectively reach a wider family market. It was also a vast market, given that studies indicated more than half of U.S. households had a problem snorer. Typically, problem snorers were men who were not affected by their snoring and, thus, lacked the motivation to try Breathe Right strips. Their wives, however, were highly motivated, eager to find a product to alleviate their husbands' snoring, to get some sleep, and, in many cases, to save their relationships. Moreover problem snoring grew worse with age, providing older women with more motivation than younger women to take action. The campaign, as a result, targeted adults 50 years and older.

COMPETITION

As a product to relieve congestion, Breathe Right faced competition from well-established brands—the likes of Vicks, Claritin, and Benadryl—that had spent hundreds of millions of dollars to establish themselves in the marketplace. But they could not claim to eliminate or even alleviate snoring. It was this opening that CNS wanted to exploit, and once consumers had gained relief from snoring there was a good chance they would try Breathe Right for congestion. Competition in the snoring aid category was varied but limited. There were some 300 patented devices intended to solve problem snoring, as well as such homemade nostrums as sewing a sock with a tennis ball inside it to the pajama back to force the snorer to sleep on his side (because snoring grew worse from sleeping on the back). On the market consumers could find slumber sleep masks, contour pillows, an assortment of sprays and pills, as well as "Chin-Up" strips, which kept the mouth closed and forced a user to breathe through his nose. There were also competing nasal strips, the best known being Clear Passage, produced by giant pharmaceutical Schering-Plough. Additionally drugstore chains offered private-label nasal strips, but Breathe Right was the dominant brand in the category.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Since the introduction of Breathe Right a decade earlier, CNS had received hundreds of letters from satisfied customers offering their testimonials. A large portion of them said that Breathe Right not only alleviated a snoring problem but perhaps saved a relationship. Taking this cue, the marketers decided to focus on the emotional benefit of using Breathe Right to curb snoring: rekindling relationships and—in the language of the campaign—getting couples "back in the sack."

The campaign was a multifaceted, integrated effort to attract, and in some cases reattract, problem snorers. Media elements of the campaign included television, radio, newspaper, direct mail, public relations, and interactive/online. In order to make the message resonate, especially important given the limited budget, the direct-response television spots were aired at times when the problem of snoring was most on the minds of people affected by it: overnight and early in the morning. One spot showed a tattered half of a picture of a man on a bed pillow in the shadows of the night, his snoring heard in the background. The other half of the picture, that of his wife, was shown on the other pillow, with the sound of a ticking click representing her sleeplessness. After the voice-over made the case for Breathe Right strips, able to alleviate snoring in six nights, the halves of the picture were seen reunited. The direct response of the ad came at the close with a toll-free number people could call to receive a free six-night sample pack of the product. The pack itself served an educational purpose: consumers learned that the body needed to retrain itself in order to breathe differently and to stop snoring. Moreover the consumers were developing a nightly habit of applying the strip, a habit that would carry over once they experienced results and began to purchase the product.

Radio also proved effective in convincing people to request a product sample. Popular radio station morning "drive" personalities who themselves suffered from snoring were located. They were then given Breathe Right strips to use and, once they had success with the product, were enthusiastic in their praise of Breathe Right the next morning. The last major element in the campaign was the Sunday newspaper coupon inserts, which a large number of the target audience scoured for bargains before doing their grocery shopping. CNS ran a four-color front page ad on the SmartSource coupon inserts. All told, the campaign spent less than $500,000 on media.

NOT QUITE BRAIN SURGERY

When CNS, Inc., maker of Breathe Right strips, was founded in 1982 by a pair of neurologists, they had no intention of becoming involved in over-the-counter pharmacy items. The company's purpose was to develop brain-wave monitors for surgery. Because insurance companies were reluctant to cover the use of such technology, CNS switched its attention to making sleep-disorder diagnostic equipment. When the inventor of the Breathe Right nasal strip, Bruce Johnson, showed his prototype to CNS chairman Dr. Dan Cohen, he was not laughed out of the office, as had been the case in his previous company pitches. Instead, Cohen recognized the potential of the product and signed an exclusive deal to sell the strips.

The campaign's website, GetBackInTheSack.com, also played a major role. Not only could consumers sign up online for the sample pack, but the site also provided interactive educational material that showed how the strips worked. Many of the testimonials CNS had received from couples were posted online, lending credibility to the campaign's theme of Breathe Right saving relationships. The website also included whimsical Snore-O-Grams, E-mail messages that could be sent to loved ones to encourage them to do something about their snoring.

OUTCOME

One of the objectives of the "Back in the Sack" campaign was to double the response rate of prior sampling efforts, from 0.9 to 1.8 percent. A further goal was to increase sales by more than 8 percent over the same time period of the previous year. On both counts the campaign more than exceeded the target. The response rate to the sample offer was 9.12 percent, a 1,103 percent increase over the historic average and far beyond the 1.8 percent goal. This success then had an impact on sales, which grew 17 percent, a rate increase that more than doubled the campaign's goal. What started out as a trial effort was rolled out nationwide in 2005, and investors soon took note of the campaign's success. They bid up the price of CNS stock, which topped the $25 mark for the first time since the heady days of 1996. Then the stock would dip below the $5 mark within two years. This time, however, CNS had record revenues in fiscal 2005 to support the stock's price.

The "Back in the Sack" campaign was also recognized by the advertising industry. In 2005 it won the Gold in the Health Aids/Over-the-Counter Products category of the EFFIE Awards, presented annually by the New York American Marketing Association to honor outstanding advertising campaigns.

FURTHER READING

Anthony, Neal St. "CNS Investors Breathing Easier Again." Star Tribune, July 26, 2005, p. 1D.

Black, Sam. "CNS Targeting New Market with Product." CityBusiness (Minneapolis, MN), December 29, 2000, p. 2.

"CNS Launches Breathe Right National Advertising Campaign." Drug Store News, March 15, 1999, p. CP42.

"Creating a Brand—Out of Thin Air." Drug Stores News, December 14, 1998.

Groeneveld, Benno. "Take a Breath." CityBusiness (Minneapolis, MN), July 7, 2000, p. S10.

Hanson, Monte. "Shareholders of Nasal Strips Maker Call for Change." Finance and Commerce (Minnesota), August 9, 2001.

Ed Dinger

The Coca-Cola Company

1 Coca-Cola Plaza
Atlanta, Georgia 30313-2499
USA
Telephone: (404) 676-2121
Fax: (404) 676-6792
Web site: www.cocacola.com

■■■

KEEP PLAYING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although the Coca-Cola Company was well known for its carbonated-soft-drink brands, by the late 1980s a different type of beverage was attracting consumers and capturing a rapidly increasing market share: isotonic beverages, or sports drinks. In 1992 Coca-Cola jumped into the sports-drink arena with the introduction of PowerAde. Despite its marketing and promotion efforts, the brand struggled to gain a foothold with consumers. Five years after its launch in 1997, PowerAde had only managed to reach a 15.1 percent market share, far behind powerhouse brand Gatorade, which had a 73 percent share. In 1999 PowerAde eked out just $77 million in sales, while Gatorade claimed $631 million. Adding to Coca-Cola's woes was that, under pressure from its investors, in 2000 the company withdrew its $16 billion bid to acquire Gatorade and its parent Quaker Oats Company, only to see its competitor PepsiCo land the deal for $13.4 billion.

To boost Coca-Cola's struggling PowerAde brand, in 2000 ad agency McCann-Erickson New York created a new marketing campaign that used humorous television spots to send the message that athletes drank PowerAde before, during, and after the game or competition. The campaign featured athletes at all levels, from high school kids to pros, going through pregame rituals and superstitions as they prepared for competition. Each spot included the voice-over "Whatever you do to get up for the game, stay up," and the tagline "Keep playing." A specific budget for the campaign was unavailable, but a report in Adweek noted that Coca-Cola's media spending for PowerAde through November 2000 was $31.2 million.

The television spots were well received by consumers and the advertising industry. One spot, "Bus Ride," featuring high school basketball players on the team bus getting mentally pumped up for their looming game, earned an Adweek magazine Best Spot honor. But the campaign failed to increase PowerAde sales as planned. In 2001 Coca-Cola hired Wieden+Kennedy, a Portland, Oregon–based agency, to create a new campaign for PowerAde. The campaign had the tagline "Very real power," and it featured the Atlanta Falcons football team's quarterback Michael Vick in a series of television spots.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since its introduction in 1886 of a sparkling beverage sold at drugstore soda fountains, Coca-Cola was best known as a producer of carbonated soft drinks. Its brands included the flagship and eponymously named Coca-Cola (Coke) as well as a list of products added to the company's lines over the years, such as Sprite and Tab, added in the 1960s, and Mr. Pibb, added in the 1970s.

In 1967 isotonic drinks—sports beverages that were designed specifically for athletes to replace body fluids and some nutrients lost while exercising—appeared on the market with the introduction of Gatorade. The product quickly grew in popularity with elite athletes and eventually gained acceptance among health-conscious consumers who turned to Gatorade as the beverage of choice to recharge after exercising or playing sports. By 1989 some 40 different sports drinks were on the market, including PepsiCo's Mountain Dew Sport. Sales of sports drinks increased 17 percent from 1988 to 1989, with Gatorade earning the lion's share of the sales. Sports-drink sales hit the $500 million mark in 1990 and were growing quickly. At that time Coca-Cola introduced its own sports drink, a powder that the consumer mixed with water. The product, Max, failed to advance past test markets, but in 1992 Coca-Cola began selling PowerAde with greater success. The company supported the new product's launch with an ad campaign that included displays, posters, and television spots. In a Time magazine article Coca-Cola touted PowerAde as "a drink made for athletes and anyone who works up a sweat."

Winning market share from sports-drink giant Gatorade proved difficult for Coca-Cola's PowerAde. Sales of isotonic drinks hit $801 million in 1999, up 12.8 percent from $712 million in 1998, but PowerAde had captured just $77 million in sales in 1999, versus Gatorade's $631 million. By 2000 Coca-Cola was reevaluating its struggling PowerAde brand and was considering acquisition of Gatorade and the brand's parent, Quaker Oats Company. When it became known that Coca-Cola was considering a $16 billion stock offer that would involve exchanging 1.9 Coke shares for each share of Quaker Oats, investors fled Coca-Cola, sending its stock into a downward spiral. Coca-Cola executives abandoned the plan to buy Quaker Oats. Competitor PepsiCo acquired the company and its Gatorade brand in 2000 for $13.4 billion. With Gatorade under the banner of Coca-Cola's top competitor, PepsiCo, the company redirected its energies toward revamping and promoting PowerAde.

TARGET MARKET

Isotonic sports drinks first targeted serious athletes. But as the beverages became more familiar, athletes of all ages and at all skill levels were increasingly choosing them over carbonated beverages or drinks such as iced tea or plain water to recharge after a workout or competition. According to Coca-Cola, from the time of its introduction PowerAde's target audience had always been young men in the 18- to 30-year-old demographic. A Coca-Cola spokesman said that the company's consistent youth-focused target market was maintained with the "Keep Playing" marketing campaign. He added, however, that in addition to targeting PowerAde's traditional audience, the campaign also began shifting some of the focus to younger consumers and introduced a multiethnic approach to promoting the product.

POWERADE FEATURED DURING ESPN/ABC PROGRAMMING

Coca-Cola and ESPN/ABC entered a marketing partnership in 2000 that would give PowerAde, Coke's sports-drink brand, an increased presence on ESPN, a cable network owned by ABC. As part of the deal, "PowerAde Break" segments would be included during ESPN's popular show SportsCenter, and PowerAde was also featured during select ABC network sports programming. In addition to traditional television advertising, the deal provided an opportunity for Coke and ESPN/ABC to partner on nontraditional marketing efforts such as promoting their brands in high schools and movie theaters.

COMPETITION

PepsiCo joined the sports-drink market in 1994 with its new beverage All Sport. Although the brand, like other sports drinks, targeted athletes of all ages and ability levels, in 1998 the All Sport brand was expanded to include Body Quencher. The new product specifically targeted kids 6 to 15 years old and was offered in kid-friendly flavors such as Fruit Punch, Cherry Slam, and Raspberry Burst. But the All Sport brand failed to attract consumers, and in 1999 its sales slipped 22.4 percent to $31.1 million, or just 3.7 percent of the sports-drink market. By 2000 PepsiCo was reevaluating its role in the sports-drink arena, and the company was considering purchasing Quaker Oats Company and its Gatorade sports-drink brand. Quaker Oats rejected the initial offering of $14 billion that PepsiCo made in November 2000, but one month later Quaker Oats accepted PepsiCo's $13.4 billion offer that included assuming $750 million in debt. PepsiCo's addition of Gatorade to its product mix led the Federal Trade Commission to question whether it violated antitrust regulations, so in 2001 the company sold its All Sport sports-drink brands to Monarch Beverage Company, an Atlanta, Georgia–based company with a drink lineup that included Dad's Root Beer and Moxie, a cola-style carbonated beverage popular in America's New England states.

Gatorade, the original sports beverage, was the market leader in 1999, holding a 79 percent share of the sports-drink market with $631 million in sales. The beverage was developed in 1965 by the University of Florida to help its football players finish an entire game under the hot, humid conditions typical in Florida. The new drink was named Gatorade as a tribute to the school's mascot, the Gators, and in 1967 an agreement was reached with Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., to produce Gatorade. At the time Stokely-Van Camp produced canned vegetables and was best known for its canned pork and beans. During the 1967 Orange Bowl the sports drink burst onto the national scene with the Gators' victory over Georgia Tech; Georgia Tech's coach attributed the win in part to the Florida team's use of Gatorade during the game. Quaker Oats Company purchased Stokely-Van Camp, which included Gatorade, in 1983. Gatorade got another national boost in 1987 when Super Bowl fans watching the game saw New York Giants players pour a full cooler of Gatorade over their coach's head in celebration. In 1991 Gatorade signed on basketball legend Michael Jordan as spokesman and launched its "Be Like Mike" campaign. In a twist as tart as Gatorade's lemon-lime flavor, in the late 1980s Quaker Oats granted PepsiCo licensed manufacturing rights to Gatorade in select countries. About nine years later, in 1998, Quaker Oats sued PepsiCo for using Gatorade's secrets to develop its own sports drink, All Sport. Quaker Oats won the lawsuit but ultimately lost the battle when PepsiCo finalized its purchase of Quaker Oats and the Gatorade brand in 2000.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To promote Coca-Cola's sports drink PowerAde in 2000, the agency McCann-Erickson New York created a campaign that put a humorous spin on the efforts that athletes of all levels, from high school students to professionals, took to get psyched up to play the game. The campaign, which was limited to a series of television spots, focused on the unique superstitions of each athlete and how they worked through them before each game. No specific budget was available for the campaign, themed "Keep Playing," but according to information published in Adweek, Coca-Cola's marketing budget for PowerAde through November 2000 was $31.2 million.

In April a television spot titled "Bus Ride" aired. It showed a high school basketball team in a school bus on its way to play in a game. A screen graphic read: "Monroe H.S. basketball team 44 minutes before tipoff." The kids rhythmically beat on the backs of the bus seats with their fists, and a voice-over stated: "Whatever you do to get up for the game, stay up." The spot closed with the tagline "Keep Playing."

Subsequent television spots that aired through 2000 featured national and international athletes from a variety of sports. The spots included "Sheldon," "Wrestler," and "Garlic." The "Sheldon" spot depicted Buffalo Bills football player Sheldon Jackson sitting in the team locker room. Dressed only in his underwear and his football shoulder pads, Sheldon was shown painting his fingernails purple, a pregame routine that he had begun while playing college ball to help him focus on the upcoming competition. In "Wrestler" South African amateur wrestler Steven Van Eden was depicted standing in front of a mirror beating on himself before a match. Part of his ritual included tossing a threatening sneer at the mirror. The spot "Garlic" showed Flavio Davino, one of Argentina's top professional soccer players, rubbing garlic all over his body and inside his shin guards. This was a pregame ritual that Davino believed would ward off evil spirits. Another spot featured U.S. Olympic track star Maurice Green writing his goal race time on a piece of paper and putting it inside his running shoe. A spot that did not air on American television featured a Korean basketball team, not pounding on the backs of bus seats like the U.S. high school basketball team but chanting in front of an alter. Like the initial television spot, "Bus Ride," each commercial included the screen graphic "Whatever you do to get up for the game, stay up." Background music was by the 1960s garage-rock band the Monks.

OUTCOME

Adweek advertising critic Barbara Lippert described as "amusing" the PowerAde television spots showing athletes preparing to play by working through their various pregame superstitions. In 2000 the television spot "Bus Ride," which showed a bus full of high school basketball players on the way to a game, was named a Creative Best Spot by Adweek. At the end of 2000, however, despite the advertising effort by McCann-Erickson, PowerAde was still a struggling brand. In 2001 Coca-Cola introduced a new marketing campaign with the tagline "Very real power," created by Portland, Oregon–based agency Wieden+Kennedy. Serving as celebrity spokesman in the television spots was the Atlanta Falcons football team's quarterback Michael Vick.

FURTHER READING

"The Allure of Gatorade." CNN/Money, November 21, 2000.

"Creative: Best Spots of April." Adweek, May 22, 2000.

DeMasters, Karen. "Be Aggressive!" Supermarket News, February 21, 2000.

"Good Sports: Coke, Pepsi, Monarch and Quaker Sports Drinks Purchases." Prepared Foods, June 1, 2001.

Leith, Scott. "New Powerade Game Plan Afoot; Michael Vick Ads Part of Promotion." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 14, 2001.

Lippert, Barbara. "Powerade: Power Plays." Adweek, July 31, 2000.

"Marketing: Sports Drinks: Gotta Get That Gator." BusinessWeek, November 27, 2000.

Nellen, Christopher. "Enhancing Athletic Performance with Sports Drinks." Health Products Business, August 1, 2000.

"Pepsico-Quaker Oats Deal Changes Competitive Landscape for Coca-Cola." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, December 4, 2000.

Petrecca, Laura. "Coke Boosts ESPN/ABC Presence in $20 Mil Deal." Advertising Age, March 27, 2000.

Theodore, Sarah. "Sports Drinks Leave Room for Many Players." Beverage Industry, June 1, 2000.

Unger, Henry, and Scott Leith. "Coke Might Be Looking to Join Gatorade Dance." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 4, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

OBEY YOUR THIRST CAMPAIGN (1998)

OVERVIEW

First marketed in 1961 by the Coca-Cola Company, the lemon-lime soft drink Sprite was in the late 1990s one of the fastest growing carbonated soft drinks in the United States and around the world. As of mid-1998 Sprite was the number-three soft drink in the world and the number-five soft drink brand in the United States. From 1994 to 1998 the brand experienced global double-digit growth. This period of dramatic expansion coincided with the launch of the brand's ad campaign "Obey Your Thirst."

Introduced in 1994, the "Obey Your Thirst" campaign—created by Lowe & Partners/SMS of New York—established Sprite's distinct brand personality through humorous, tongue-in-cheek spots that reinforced the "trust your instincts" concept. The campaign aimed to speak directly to the drink's target market, teenagers, rather than talking down to them.

From its inception "Obey Your Thirst" relied on the power of a 1990s trend toward "anti-advertising." The commercials in this campaign parodied those for other products that used hype and image-building to appeal to consumers. "Consumers are jaded by advertising," declared Lee Garfinkel, cochairman and chief creative officer at Lowe & Partners/SMS. "In order to reach certain people, advertising that doesn't take advertising too seriously is appreciated by the consumer."

The "certain people" that Garfinkel had in mind were mostly teenagers, particularly inner city teenagers. To go along with its ads, Sprite marketers designed an aggressive marketing campaign to appeal to this demographic. Co-promotions with the National Basketball Association (NBA), including appearances by some of its emerging stars in Sprite commercials, helped erect an image for Sprite as the brand of hip, sometimes cynical young people everywhere.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Sprite started out in a niche category—lemon-lime soft drinks—but by the mid-1990s had clearly broken away and transcended into a mainstream brand. In 1994 Sprite passed the one-billion unit case mark worldwide—a significant milestone in terms of the size of the brand. An aggressive marketing strategy aimed at urban youth has been credited with Sprite's explosive growth. Since 1994 Sprite has been the official soft drink of the NBA, a growing worldwide sports property that has been particularly popular with youth. Adding to Sprite's appeal, its packaging was distinctive and attention getting; graphics introduced in 1994 added a crisp blue color to Sprite's traditional green.

In 1994 Sprite retired its upbeat ad campaign "I Like the Sprite in You" for an edgier approach designed to appeal to Generation X. The new tag line, in its full iteration, read: "Image is nothing. Thirst is everything. Obey your thirst." Among the first commercials in the campaign, targeted at teens and young adults, was one featuring basketball star Grant Hill in a parody of pretentious fashion commercials. Oddball humor, the use of basketball endorsers, and the appeal to youth culture were to remain staples of the "Obey Your Thirst" campaign.

By 1996 Coca-Cola USA was spending $55.7 million to advertise Sprite in the United States alone. The brand's innovative spots helped Sprite move $1.2 billion cases worldwide that year, and the beverage zoomed to the number-four position among U.S. soft drinks. Still, the parent company looked to increase its ad budget for 1997. "The more the brand grows, the more we spend," declared Sergio Zyman, Coca-Cola's chief marketing officer, in the pages of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. In a bid to spur even further growth, Coca-Cola ordered a tune-up of the Sprite advertising strategy. In April 1997 the company unveiled five new Sprite commercials under the "Obey Your Thirst" rubric. The new spots, created in partnership with Lowe & Partners/SMS, were said to mark a creative new direction for the brand.

MARKETING TO ''GEN X'' HAS ITS DOWNSIDE

Sprite has reaped much success from its ''Obey Your Thirst'' commercials playing to the cynical attitudes of 1990s youth. The ads gained their satirical punch from the debunking of other ads that relied on hype and image building. This approach was said to appeal to jaded Generation X consumers raised in an age of media manipulation. But playing to the apathy of the public has not always been successful. In fact, as Coca-Cola USA discovered when it tried to market the first Generation X soft drink, it can backfire spectacularly.

The concoction was called OK Soda and was the brainchild of Coca-Cola USA marketing chief Sergio Zyman (who would later develop the New Age beverage Fruitopia). Introduced in selected cities in mid-1994, OK Soda brandished matte-gray cans featuring downbeat drawings by underground comic book artists. The emblazoned slogans were equally doleful. ''What's the point of OK soda?'' read one representative caption. ''Well what's the point of anything?''

Advertising for the seemingly depressing drink was created by the prominent Portland ad house of Wieden & Kennedy. A 1-800-I-FEEL-OK hotline was offered, where callers could record comments, listen to the cynical (and agency-crafted) ramblings of others, and take a Generation X ''personality test.'' OK Soda's advertising message failed to overcome its reputed deficiencies of taste. The nine-city campaign failed, and the product was quietly withdrawn from circulation.

TARGET MARKET

By sharpening the focus and defining Sprite's personality—energetic, edgy, and straightforward—Sprite's marketers made the brand more relevant to its target audience. The goal of Sprite advertising in the 1990s seemed simple—to convey that Sprite was a thirst-quenching drink with an attitude that connected with teenagers. This approach proved to be very appealing to young people who did not want to be ''marketed to'' in the traditional sense. Sprite's commercials humorously poke fun at hard-sell tactics while focusing on one basic premise: Sprite may not make consumers more popular, more beautiful, or even NBA superstars, but it will quench their thirst.

Sprite's marketers designed this message to be pertinent around the world. The brand's ''edge'' and unpretentious attitude were crafted to speak to youth in all different cultures. According to official company press materials, ''Teens around the world share the desire to be able to express themselves and make their own choices. Sprite aims to encourage and represent this attitude.''

COMPETITION

Once considered a ''niche'' product, Sprite in the 1990s was no longer viewed as competing in the lemon-lime category but rather as competing against other mainstream soft drinks. In fact, Sprite sales surpassed those of its principal lemon-lime competitor, 7-Up, in 1993. But there still was one niche market that Sprite advertisers continued to try to capture: young people. With ''Obey Your Thirst,'' Coca-Cola USA aimed Sprite ads at specific age groups. At the same time, rival soda maker PepsiCo Inc. was turning away from this practice. It believed that trying to execute a niche strategy in the soft drink industry carried too many risks because companies invariably fail to reach any customers outside the target audience.

In 1996 the Sprite brand concluded one of its most spectacular years of market performance. Sales surged an impressive 17.6 percent, displacing venerable Diet Pepsi along with Mountain Dew and Dr. Pepper to become America's fourth-ranked soft drink. 7-Up, in eighth place, dropped 0.2 percent in volume. ''Sprite has been highly successful . . . much of it at the expense of 7-Up,'' observed Paine Webber analyst Emanuel Goldman in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. Sprite's strong performance, together with the robust sales of Coke and Diet Coke, gave Coca-Cola USA three of the four top soft drink brands for the first time since 1985.

In response to the challenge from Sprite, Dr. Pepper/Seven Up Inc. in 1997 announced plans to reformulate 7-Up, making it less sweet and giving it a crisper taste. Industry analysts expected the reformulation to make 7-Up taste more like Sprite. The company also planned to introduce new graphics for 7-Up packages as well as a new advertising campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In addition to relating a straightforward message that Sprite was a light, crisp, and refreshing beverage, Sprite marketers wanted to convey that Sprite was not pretentious. Since the introduction of the ''Obey Your Thirst'' campaign in 1994, the Sprite brand spoke to legitimacy and integrity, encouraging consumers to trust their instincts and, in a sense, saying to teenagers, ''Exercise your own judgment.'' The earliest ''Obey Your Thirst'' commercials parodied the pomposity and pretense of commercials for other products. Specifically in Sprite's crosshairs were spots for Canon cameras featuring tennis star Andre Agassi, in which the tennis star declares, "Image is everything." A series of humorous Sprite spots inverted this concept and those of similar commercials.

Coca-Cola USA's 1997 advertising strategy for Sprite retained the "Obey Your Thirst" tag line and the irreverent, icon-bashing tone of previous spots for the brand. The newer spots continued to poke fun at other company's ads. But they also took on an edgier tone, as Coca-Cola USA sought to meet its goal of capturing 50 percent of domestic market share by the turn of the century.

There were five new spots in all, all created by Lowe & Partners/SMS. Perhaps the most daring—and the most critically well-received—was a commercial that parodied Coca-Cola's own commercials from the 1980s by providing information on Jooky, a mythical new-fangled soft drink. A group of youthful party goers are shown living it up with their Jookies on the beach when the camera pans back to show two slack-jawed gawkers watching the "commercial" on television. When they pop the tops on their own Jookies, however, no party breaks out. "Oh, man," says one. "Mine's busted." The voice-over then instructs: "Trust your taste buds, not commercials."

The other spots in the campaign were similar in tone. One poked fun at product demonstrations. Another took aim at the venerable Budweiser frogs, showing a bear eating out of a tin can while a frog snacked on a slimy worm. In another, perennial "Obey Your Thirst" pitchman Grant Hill fends off offers from an agent to do television shows, books, and record albums. The spot was seen as an oblique parody of Pepsi commercials featuring basketball star Shaquille O'Neal. A third commercial told visitors to Hollywood to bring along their own Sprite because "a place this concerned with image just doesn't have any." This was a clear spoof of the popular Visa credit card commercials that urge viewers to "bring along your gold card" to various hot spots.

Accompanying the new ads was a packaging overhaul. The Sprite "dimple bottle" was designed to differentiate the brand from other beverage choices, particularly in the important single-serve segment. The proprietary plastic packaging, featuring vertical rows of "bubbles" indented on the bottle wall, was reminiscent of Sprite's familiar green glass bottles and was designed to reflect the brand's "cool, refreshing" personality. Sprite launched the new packaging in grocery and convenience stores with a flier announcing, "We're smiling so wide our dimples are showing."

Building a brand relevant to consumers sometimes involved more than traditional advertising tactics. Sprite endeavored to reflect its distinct, straightforward personality through a complete marketing mix in a way that was relevant to teenagers. Accordingly, a series of cross-promotions with youth-oriented enterprises was launched. Three popular NBA players—Kobe Bryant of the Los Angeles Lakers, Juwan Howard of the Washington Wizards, and number-one draft pick Tim Duncan of the San Antonio Spurs—all agreed to give away their team jerseys and basketball shoes to 150 winners of the Sprite "Own 'Em" contest. In addition, six grand prize winners got to drive away in a sport utility vehicle that had actually been driven by the players. Consumers could win instantly by looking under the cap of 20-ounce and one-liter bottles of Sprite or by checking the inside packs of Sprite 12-pack and 24-pack can wraps to reveal prizes. Launched in November 1997 to coincide with the start of the NBA season, the promotion ran through the end of March 1998.

Keeping with its basketball theme, Sprite marketers also launched the Sprite Playground at NBA Jam Session, an interactive attraction offering a wide variety of basketball activities for fans to test their skills, play out-of-the-ordinary games, and win prizes. The activities area, which traveled to various state fairs around the United States during the summer of 1997—was surrounded by NBA photos and life-size player images. The strong connection between Sprite and professional basketball was explained by Pina Sciarra, Sprite brand manager for Coca-Cola USA, in a company press release: "Sprite is the only soft drink that embodies the lifestyle and attitude of NBA players."

Other national "Obey Your Thirst" promotions also sought to appeal to urban youth. An under-the-cap promotion teamed Sprite with apparel manufacturers Fishpaw Industries and Shabazz Brothers Urbanwear, both of whose clothing lines appealed to inner-city youths as well as markets outside the urban boundaries. In this promotion consumers had a one in six chance of winning free products, or they could win apparel from Fishpaw and Shabazz by simply twisting off the cap and reading the message imprinted under the top of 16-ounce, 20-ounce, and one-liter bottles of Sprite. The Sprite "Under the Cap 'Obey Your Thirst' Promotion" began March 1, 1997, and ran through September 30, 1997.

In a promotion aimed more specifically at the African-American community, Coca-Cola USA signed on as a major advertiser and exclusive soft drink sponsor of the annual Soul Train Music Awards show on March 7, 1997, in Los Angeles's Shrine Auditorium. Soul Train was a popular, nationally syndicated television dance and music show founded by Don Cornelius. A "Sprite Nite" celebrity party was held on the eve of the Soul Train

Music Awards show and was televised live on Black Entertainment Television (BET). In addition to performances by rhythm-and-blues and hip-hop artists, the Sprite Image Breaker of the Year Award was presented. Coca-Cola USA aired commercials for Sprite and Coca-Cola Classic during the awards program.

OUTCOME

Measured in sales impact, "Obey Your Thirst" was a successful campaign. The "Obey Your Thirst" message helped Sprite secure 5.8 percent of the national soft drink market in 1996, up from 5.1 percent the previous year. In 1997 Sprite's global volume jumped by 13 percent while domestic volume increased 10 percent. Beverage industry analysts were impressed with Sprite's ability to create sustained growth in a competitive sector. "Coke's marketing of Sprite has been laser-like in its focus and very successful," John Sicher, the editor of Beverage Digest, told a writer for Newsday.

Some advertising critics, however, found the strategy behind the ads too cynical. "If image is nothing and taste is everything," asked Bob Garfield in Advertising Age magazine, "why is not one of the ads about taste? Why are none of the ads about anything intrinsic to Sprite? Why does the famous athlete send up use Grant Hill, a famous athlete?" The answer, according to Garfield, was because "as far as this advertising is concerned, image is not nothing. Image is everything."

FURTHER READING

Edwards, Jim. "Notes from Underground (Anti-Advertising Becoming Mainstream)." Adweek, August 18, 1997, p. 23.

Garfield, Bob. "Sprite Raps 'Image' While Embracing It." Advertising Age, April 21, 1997, p. 63.

Roush, Chris. "Sprite Ads Poke Fun at the Icons." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, April 15, 1997, p. B2.

———. "Sprite Moves Up in Rankings." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 5, 1997, p. C1.

Robert Schnakenberg

OBEY YOUR THIRST CAMPAIGN (2004)

OVERVIEW

In late 2003 the Coca-Cola Company's lemon-lime soft-drink brand, Sprite, reigned as America's fifth-best-selling soft drink and the highest-grossing lemon-lime soda in America. Even though Sprite appeared to be the clear leader over all lemon-lime soft drink brands, its market share was rapidly slipping to Sierra Mist, a lemon-lime soft drink sold by the Pepsi-Cola Company. Reusing its long-running tagline that was conceived by the ad agency Lowe & Partners in 1994, Sprite released a new variation of the "Obey Your Thirst" campaign to keep its product relevant to its 16- to 24-year-old target demographic.

The WPP Group's advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather released three television spots in February 2004 that introduced Sprite's new mascot, Miles Thirst, a 10-inch-tall puppet. Hoping to attract the youth of the hip-hop and basketball cultures, Miles Thirst's wardrobe consisted of flashy hip-hop garb. The wisecracking puppet proclaimed his love for Sprite in two television spots. In a third commercial, titled "LeBron," LeBron James, the National Basketball Association (NBA) all-star, gave Miles Thirst a tour of his decadent home. The puppet appeared unimpressed until James led him into his kitchen, which was equipped with a Sprite vending machine. The campaign's 2004 budget was estimated at $45 million. Besides the television spots, media included online advertisement, a Miles Thirst website, and the passing out of free posters, magnets, stickers, and T-shirts featuring Miles Thirst. The campaign and tagline ended in 2005 after Sprite dropped Ogilvy & Mather for the Miami-based advertising agency Crispin Porter + Bogusky.

Overall success for the 2004 campaign was mild. Besides collecting a Bronze One Show Award in the category of Promotional and Point of Purchase Posters in 2004, the campaign was also appreciated by a majority of its target market. "Obey Your Thirst" commercials were "liked a lot" by 18 to 24 year olds, according to the weekly consumer poll Ad Track, conducted by USA Today. Unfortunately for Sprite, sales fell 3 percent in 2004, and its overall 5.7 percent share of the soft-drink industry was dwindling.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

After Lowe & Partners created the "Obey Your Thirst" campaign in 1994, Sprite enjoyed strong market growth into the late 1990s. It was the fastest-growing Coca-Cola brand in 1997 and sold 6 percent more cases over the previous year. By 2001, however, sales had begun to wane, and Coca-Cola executives feared that Sprite and other Coca-Cola brands were falling out of style with the younger crowd. Hoping a different ad agency would reenergize its lemon-lime brand, Coca-Cola awarded its Sprite advertising account to Ogilvy & Mather in 2001. To bolster Sprite's image Coca-Cola also paid NBA superstar Kobe Bryant to endorse the lemon-lime soft drink. Bryant was featured in commercials that used the tagline "Obey your thirst," along with an additional tagline, "What's your thirst?" Tom Pirko, president of the beverage-industry consulting firm Bevmark, told Advertising Age, "Coke has been attacked as being dowdy and ultra-conservative, so they want to stay relevant." Sprite stopped airing commercials featuring Bryant in 2003 after a 19-year-old Colorado woman accused him of rape.

The 2003 television spot "Rikkia" was the first Sprite advertisement released by Ogilvy & Mather. It featured the race-car star Rikkia Miller speeding around the racetrack to music by the rock group the Donnas. Miller also provided a voice-over for "Rikkia" in which she explained her love for racing. Just before drinking a Sprite at the spot's conclusion, Miller looked into the camera and asked, "What's my thirst?"

Sprite's sales jumped 12 percent in the second quarter of 2003 after the brand released its new flavor Sprite Remix, a lemon-lime soda with a twist of tropical fruit "Sprite is a great brand, but it has been in decline for several years. It badly needs a shot in the arm," John Sicher, editor and publisher of Beverage Digest, an industry publication, told the Dow Jones News Service. "Remix will help, but additional aggressive steps are also necessary." That same year Sprite negotiated a $2 million-per-year endorsement contract with basketball all-star LeBron James. Hoping to regain relevance within its target market, Sprite in February 2004 released a version of "Obey Your Thirst" that featured James along with Sprite's new mascot, a puppet named Miles Thirst.

TARGET MARKET

"Obey Your Thirst" targeted 16 to 24 year olds. According to KPMG Consumer Markets Insider, a company that analyzed different industry trends, teenagers did not respond to advertisements in the same way as adults. Teenagers typically listened to "brand ambassadors," young celebrities or fellow teenagers that established credibility amongst their peers. To endorse the soft drink, Sprite hired NBA star LeBron James, who was only 20 years old during the 2004 leg of "Obey Your Thirst." The new Sprite mascot, Miles Thirst, a 10-inch puppet dressed in hip-hop clothing such as oversized watches, baggy pants, and gold chains, was also featured in Sprite advertisements in 2004 and 2005. "Thirst was the perfect choice for Sprite," John Carroll, group director for Sprite, told the PR Newswire. "Not only does Thirst represent everything Sprite stands for, he recognizes and represents the aspects of youth culture that are inherent to Sprite drinkers. Plus, you couldn't ask for a better last name."

Although Miles Thirst was an African-American puppet, the campaign did not solely target an African-American demographic. "Hip-hop is a $1 billion-a-year industry that could not survive on just black people," Shawn Prez, president of the urban-marketing group Power Moves, remarked in USA Today about Miles Thirst and his hip-hop appeal. "When you're making this kind of money, [hip-hop] has crossed gender, race and age groups. The white audience for hip-hop is much larger than the black audience at this point." In 2004 white, suburban teenage males spent more money on hip-hop products than any other group, according to USA Today.

LEBRON JAMES

Born on December 30, 1984, LeBron James was the youngest NBA basketball player to receive the Rookie of the Year award (2003–2004). The six-foot-eight-inch forward, who began endorsing the lemon-lime soft drink Sprite in 2003, was one of only three rookies in NBA history to average 20 points a game.

COMPETITION

Ranking third in soft-drink sales (behind Coca-Cola and PepsiCo, Inc.), Dr Pepper/Seven Up, Inc., struggled to bolster its own flagship lemon-lime brand, Seven Up, in 2004. Young & Rubicam Advertising had handled Seven Up's $25 to $45 million yearly advertising budget since 1995. Initial campaign taglines touted Seven Up as the "uncola," referencing the drink's lack of cola, an ingredient found in Pepsi and Coca-Cola soft drinks. Next, the "Are You an Un?" campaign was launched, but it was quickly discontinued in 1999 after its appeal to 12 to 24 year olds proved ineffective. The sales of Seven Up's 192-ounce cases dropped from 174 million sold in 2002 to 126 million sold in 2003. In 2004 Seven Up advertisements featured the tagline "Make 7Up Yours." The avoidance of using "un" or "cola" was an attempt by Young & Rubicam to make Seven Up appeal to younger consumers unfamiliar with the cola reference.

According to Gary A. Hemphill, senior vice president of the Beverage Marketing Corporation, which offered research and consulting services to the soft-drink industry, the drop in Seven Up sales resulted from the growing success of Sierra Mist, a lemon-lime soft drink sold by Pepsi under the tagline "shockingly refreshing." After the brand was introduced in early 2001, its sales climbed 89.3 percent between 2002 and 2003. The successful new competitor prompted Seven Up and Sprite to rethink their marketing strategies. Sprite created commercials with Miles Thirst. Hoping to regain its slipping market share, Seven Up approached several different advertising agencies outside of Young & Rubicam.

SOFT-DRINK EMPIRE

The Coca-Cola Company was the world's largest producer of soft drinks in 2004. With nearly 400 brands in more than 200 countries, the soft-drink mogul owned the lemon-lime brand Sprite, the citrus drink Squirt, Dasani water, the sport drink Powerade, and even the entire suite of Fanta brands.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2003 Sprite signed a $12 million dollar, six-year deal with the NBA Rookie of the Year LeBron James. Ogilvy & Mather also created a mascot for Sprite, Miles Thirst, a wisecracking puppet whose mouth remained closed while speaking. Reno Wilson, an actor who had frequently appeared on the hit television program The Cosby Show, provided Miles Thirst's voice. The puppet portion of "Obey Your Thirst" kicked off on February 14, 2004, when three commercial spots, "LeBron," "Two Sprites," and "What's Better Than Sprite?" aired during the NBA All-Star game. In all the spots Miles Thirst was shown in several different wardrobes reflecting hip-hop fashions. Ogilvy & Mather hoped the combination of James's endorsement and a humorous Sprite-loving puppet would compel 16 to 24 year olds to drink Sprite.

In the 30-second spot titled "LeBron," James gave Miles Thirst a tour of his luxurious home. The spot mimicked the MTV program Cribs, in which celebrities allowed MTV camera crews to tour their houses. During "LeBron," Miles Thirst appeared disinterested in James's furnishings, which included a king-size waterbed and a plasma television. The puppet became suddenly excited about the tour when he noticed a giant Sprite vending machine in James's kitchen. In the spot "Two Sprites," Miles Thirst explained to curious onlookers why he preferred to have two extra-large Sprites in the cup holders of his movie theater seat. "Never be too far away from the big, thirst-quenching taste of Sprite," the puppet explained The commercial's humor hinged on the beautiful women flanking Thirst at the spot's conclusion. The spot "What's Better than Sprite?" featured Thirst challenging his friends to name one thing better than Sprite. Suddenly two beautiful women passed, prompting Thirst to rephrase the challenge: "Alright! Name two!" Miles Thirst ended each spot by demanding, "Show me my motto." The screen then displayed the tagline "Obey your thirst."

Adweek magazine's Barbara Lippert wrote of the campaign, "The set-up—a sexualized vinyl doll spouting street lingo—could easily devolve into an obvious, annoying, pandering and even racist attempt to get-down-in-the-hood-with-the-bros. Instead, it's quick, funny and real enough." Other critics were not as pleased. The Rainbow/Push Coalition, a discrimination watchdog group founded by the Reverend Jesse Jackson, accused the puppet of propagating negative African-American stereotypes. "We've had some conversations with Coke about Miles. We let them know that we think the character is ill-advised," Janice Mathis, a Rainbow/Push vice president, told Brandweek.

The website www.milesthirst.com was created for the campaign. Miles Thirst also appeared on MTV as a guest, and 1,500 Miles Thirst dolls were mailed to "key trend influencers around the country," according to USA Today. In May 2004 Ogilvy & Mather released further commercials with Miles Thirst explaining Sprite's "Thirst Out" promotion, in which consumers could win video rentals, digital music downloads, and mobile-phone ring tones.

OUTCOME

Lisa Speakman, senior brand manager for Sprite at Coca-Cola, told Brandweek that the 2004 segment of "Obey Your Thirst" was the highest rated in recent Sprite history. "Our internal brand-health scores are increasing on the Sprite brand. This indicates the marketing is having its desired effect over time," she said in April 2004. The campaign also garnered a Bronze One Show Award for Promotional and Point of Purchase Posters in 2004. Despite higher ratings and an advertising-industry award, however, the campaign failed to halt Sprite's drop in sales. The soft-drink's sales dipped 3 percent in 2004, according to Beverage Digest, a publication covering the nonalcoholic-beverages industry.

Sprite was not the only lemon-lime soft drink to lose sales in 2004. Seven Up was knocked from the list of top-10 soda brands, a change that many analysts attributed to the rising popularity of Pepsi's Sierra Mist, a lemon-lime drink released in 2001. Sierra Mist sales grew 89.3 percent in 2003 compared with 2002. Sprite's 2005 sales slump prompted Coca-Cola to end Ogilvy & Mather's advertising for its Sprite brand and to discontinue its "Obey your thirst" tagline.

FURTHER READING

Delaney, Kathy. "The Work." Advertising Age's Creativity, September 1, 2002, p. 30.

Elliott, Stuart. "A Division of Cadbury Schweppes Solicits Ideas from Smaller Agencies on Ways to Market 7Up." New York Times, April 27, 2004, p. 12.

Erickson, Chris. "On the Bubble—Wizards of Fizz Aim New Sodas." New York Post, July 27, 2005, p. 44.

Garfield, Bob. "Sprite's Latest Won't Help It Escape Confines of Dorkville." Advertising Age, August 5, 2002, p. 41.

Hastings, Michael. "Coca-Cola Test-Marketing a Soda-Energy Drink." Winston-Salem (NC) Journal, August 24, 2005, p. 2.

Howard, Theresa. "Coke Creates Hip-Hop Figure to Inject Sprite with Attitude." USA Today, April 26, 2004, p. B.12.

Laborde, Errol. "The Cure." New Orleans Magazine, August 1, 2005, p. 8.

Lazare, Lewis. "Sprite to Put 'Thirst' out Front." Chicago Sun-Times, February 13, 2004, p. 75.

Leith, Scott. "Shine Is off Sprite's Star." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 29, 2001, p. G1.

Lippert, Barbara. "Sprite's Small Wonder." Adweek, February 23, 2004, p. 30.

Martin, Philip. "Spirits: A Pint of Pimm's Cup Is British Refreshment." Little Rock, Arkansas Democrat Gazette, October 7, 2005, p. 77.

McKay, Betsy, and Suzanne Vranica. "Coca-Cola Is in Talks to Consolidate Ad Accounts." Wall Street Journal, October 1, 2002, p. B12.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Fight for Sprite Will Include Newcomers." Adweek, July 21, 2003, p. 6.

Thomaselli, Rich. "Feat over Pepsi: James' Coke Deal Sets New Endorser Standard." Advertising Age, August 25, 2003, p. 3.

Kevin Teague

Courtney Cox Arquette and David Arquette in a still from Coca Cola's "Real" campaign. IMAGE COURTESY OF THE ADVERTISING ARCHIVE LTD. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

REAL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Despite being the top soft-drink company in the world, the Coca-Cola Company showed signs of struggle in the 1990s, when consumers worldwide started demonstrating a strong preference for healthier beverages. Coca-Cola's subsequent marketing efforts, including the 2003 "Real" campaign, reflected this change.

The multimillion-dollar "Real" campaign, which used a combination of music and celebrity presence to promote Coke Classic, was reminiscent of Coca-Cola ads from the 1960s to the '90s. The "Real" campaign's message itself, that Coke is the "Real" thing, was a reminder of the company's long heritage. The campaign's numerous television and radio spots, as well as print ads, were targeted toward a teen and young-adult market, just as Coke advertising had long been. It was with these consumers in mind that the company signed on such actors as Penelope Cruz and Courtney Cox Arquette, as well as musicians Common and Mya, to promote the product.

The campaign was attention grabbing, catching the eyes and ears of its target audience. Most consumers who were polled claimed to like the ads "a lot." The press seemed equally entertained by the campaign, raving about its advertising success, especially compared with the past three botched advertising attempts that Coke had recently endured. In fact, many ad critics thought the "Real" campaign marked the first Coke advertising success in a decade. The success, however, was not a financial one. Despite the campaign's popularity, sales of Coke products, especially Coke Classic, continued to dwindle. Coke Classic in 2003 experienced a disheartening 3 percent decrease in sales. "Real" ran until 2005, when it was replaced by "Make It Real," an extension of the previous campaign.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In May 1886 Jacobs' Pharmacy in Atlanta sold the first serving of Coca-Cola. Invented by John Pemberton (a Civil War veteran and pharmacist), the soft drink contained syrup, sugar, and carbonation, along with the caffeine-rich kola nut and the drug cocaine. The name Coca-Cola was invented by Pemberton's bookkeeper, Frank Robinson, who also wrote the distinct script that has been sprawled on all Coca-Cola products to date. The beverage was not an instant success. In its first year at Jacobs' Pharmacy, approximately nine servings were sold each day. Pemberton ended up with a $20 loss overall. But success, though not immediate, was right around the corner.

By the late 1890s Coca-Cola had become one of America's most popular fountain drinks. And soon thereafter it was being sold all across the United States and Canada. Advertising played a key role in Coca-Cola's early success, and for some time to come advertising would continue to contribute to its success. Its 1930s Santa advertising helped to create the modern image of Saint Nick, as well as an increased personal connection between consumers and Coke. In 1971 (while war persisted in Vietnam) a similar result was found with a television commercial showing young people gathered on a hilltop in Italy, singing, ''I'd like to buy the world a Coke.'' More than two decades later the ''Always Coca-Cola'' campaign, which introduced the very popular Coke-drinking polar bears, also ended with positive results. But advertising success would not come so easily in the future.

''Always Coca-Cola'' continued through 2000, when it was replaced by ''Coca-Cola. Enjoy.'' Neither campaign met with success. In 2001 Coca-Cola launched ''Life Tastes Good,'' but the campaign was pulled in the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Largely because of consumers' increasing preference for healthier beverages, sales of Coca-Cola were steadily declining. But perhaps consumers simply missed the polar bears and the entertaining campaign that featured them. With the thought that consumers might be won over by another successful advertising campaign, Coca-Cola threw millions into its 2003 ''Real'' advertising campaign.

NINETEENTH-CENTURY BIG-BUDGET ADVERTISING

In 1892, six years after Coca-Cola was first sold (for five cents a glass, in Atlanta's Jacobs' Pharmacy), the company had an advertising budget of $11,401 (accounting for inflation this would represent $234,006.49 in 2005). A budget of this size was highly unusual for the time. The advertising agenda included hiring salesmen to travel across the country to sell Coca-Cola to various businesses. To convince business owners to order the soda, the company often offered free merchandise (for instance, prescription scales and decorative clocks) that displayed the Coca-Cola logo. Another strategy involved the distribution of coupons, which allowed proprietors to try Coca-Cola for free. Lastly Coca-Cola began placing its name everywhere: on newspapers, outdoor posters, wall and barn signs, streetcar cards, and many other places. The combination of these efforts proved quite successful, and before long Coca-Cola had become a household name.

TARGET MARKET

Since the 1990s Coke Classic had experienced a decrease in market share and volume in the beverage industry, especially among its younger consumers. Largely as a result of a nationwide focus on obesity and other health issues, which resulted in healthier eating habits (especially among the young), tastes for beverages changed. According to Beverage Digest, during each year between 1996 and 2000, Coke Classic's sales either fell flat or reflected a decline. In 2000 there was a 0.1 percent increase. Younger people simply drank less cola than had earlier generations, preferring instead such beverages as bottled water, juices, and flavored sodas.

Coke's 2003 ''Real'' campaign targeted the younger generation the company felt it was losing. While many longtime consumers had remained loyal to Coke, most of these represented an aging population. Young adults, in contrast, had the potential to be targeted for years to come. Because of this Coke's ''Real'' campaign had a celebrity-heavy focus. Such big names as Cruz and Cox Arquette starred in new Coke commercials. The campaign premiered its first advertisement (the television commercial ''Real Compared to What'') during the 2003 American Music Awards, an event that typically drew a young audience.

COMPETITION

The Coca-Cola Company's three main competitors were PepsiCo, Cadbury Schweppes, and Nestlé. Presenting the most challenging competition for Coca-Cola was PepsiCo, which had also long ago branched out beyond cola. Coke had extended its reach far into the ''other beverages'' market with Fanta, Sprite, Barq's, Minute Maid, and Dasani water, among others, to a tune of some 400 drink brands in all, including coffees, juices, sports drinks, waters, and teas. PepsiCo had similarly expanded its ''other beverages'' market, having acquired, for example, Tropicana orange juice and Aquafina water (the top seller of bottled water in the United States). But PepsiCo also had gone beyond beverages by adding a number of nonbeverage food products, including Frito-Lay (the world's number one distributor of corn chips and potato chips) and Rold Gold Pretzels.

Although Cadbury Schweppes and Nestlé might have seemed the less-obvious competitors of Coke products, they each succeeded in taking market share from the world's leading soft-drink company. Largely associated with its chocolates, British-owned Cadbury, after merging with Schweppes in 1969, became a top competitor in the beverage business. With a long list of beverages offered (including 7 UP, A&W Root Beer, Canada Dry, Dr Pepper, and Hawaiian Punch), Cadbury Schweppes managed to place itself third among the world's top soft-drink providers. Nestlé, the top-selling food company in the world, became the world leader in coffee sales and one of the world's largest makers of bottled water.

Although Coca-Cola was the world's leading soft-drink distributor (with a 44 percent market share in 2003, a clear lead over second-place PepsiCo, at 31.8 percent), some of its competitors brought in significantly larger overall sales. In 2004, for instance, Nestlé's total sales exceeded $76 billion and PepsiCo's was in the neighborhood of $29 billion, while Coca-Cola's was less than $22 billion. (Cadbury Schweppes trailed the pack at approximately $13 billion.)

MARKETING STRATEGY

Coca-Cola wanted to remind consumers of its past, its authenticity, its "realness" in its 2003 "Real" campaign. Created by ad agency Berlin Cameron/Red Cell in New York, the new slogan played off Coca-Cola slogans of the past: "It's the real thing" and "Can't beat the real thing." (Initially the job of coming up with a new campaign was assigned to both Berlin and McCann-Erikson Worldwide Advertising in New York. With its "Real" idea Berlin took over the new campaign.)

Coca-Cola believed the "Real" campaign could return the company to a level of success that at least equaled what it had experienced during its "Always Coca-Cola" campaign years of 1996–98. (During that period the Coca-Cola Company had enjoyed an average 5 percent increase in volume change per year.) To achieve this goal Coke and Berlin relied heavily on a musical and celebrity presence. The campaign debuted with a 90-second "Real Compared to What" television commercial during the 2003 American Music Awards. In the commercial R&B singer Mya and hip-hop artist Common performed a remake of the 1960s jazz hit "Compared to What." The commercial's debut followed the duo's presentation of the Coca-Cola New Music Award to the top unsigned artist or band.

In another television commercial, "Penelope," Cruz walked into a restaurant, guzzled a Coke Classic, burped, and giggled. "The Arquettes" was filmed on a set that copied the real home of Cox Arquette and husband David Arquette. A motive of the commercials was to reveal celebrities during "real" moments in which they enjoyed a "real" soft drink. In all more than a dozen television spots were filmed for the campaign. They featured a variety of celebrities, including late-night talk-show host Craig Kilborn, cyclist Lance Armstrong, and members of Coke's NASCAR racing team.

The campaign also included a major tie-in with the 2003 NCAA basketball tournament and a summer promotion that awarded families trips to theme parks. And in addition to its television presence, "Real" advertising was found in print, online, and on the radio waves. As to the latter Coke went all out, introducing "Coke FM," in which 60-second spots featured well-known musicians. In all mediums the advertising efforts represented an attempt by Coca-Cola to return to the values of past campaigns. Coke wished to reveal its "real" values. As one consulting firm adviser pointed out, the "Real" campaign was something that easily could have been done in any decade since the 1960s. The question was, would consumers go for it?

OUTCOME

Consumers were positive in their ratings of the "Real" advertisements. For instance, shortly after the campaign debuted a Harris study revealed that 25 percent of respondents claimed to "like the ads a lot," while only 8 percent claimed to "dislike the ads." Of those who liked the ads "a lot," the largest presence was among 25- to 29-year-olds, followed by 18- to 24-year-olds. Thus Coke's target market had indeed been reached. Financially, though, the campaign did not measure so successfully. Coca-Cola finished 2003 with a small decline in volume, down 0.2 percent from 2002. The results for Coke Classic were far less desirable: a 3 percent decrease from 2002.

Regardless of the popularity of the "Real" campaign, which generated a multitude of positive press, there was not much hope to promote Coke Classic in a marketplace that was squeezing out sugary colas. Contrary to the campaign's message, consumers, who had been seeking healthier, lighter drinks, might actually have preferred the "unreal" thing. This could later be demonstrated by the notable success of Diet Coke with Lime (2004) and the introduction of other varieties of Diet Coke by 2005, including calorie-free Coca-Cola Zero (designed to taste more like Coke Classic than like Diet Coke).

Even as the "Real" campaign did not send consumers in droves to purchase Coke Classic, Coca-Cola hoped the campaign's popularity would have lasting effects, prompting consumers to purchase the Coca-Cola brand product that better suited their tastes. To launch the new, healthier version of the classic, the 2005 Coca-Cola Zero campaign ("Everybody Chill") took an approach similar to that of the "Real" campaign by reviving the 1971 "I'd Like to Buy the World a Coke" television spot. Thus "Everybody Chill" repeated the trend of looking to the past in the quest to find future customers.

FURTHER READING

Aitken, Lucy. "Analysis—Coca-Cola Review Speculation Grows after Changes at the Top." Campaign, July 30, 2004.

Bhatnagar, Parija. "Coke, Pepsi Losing the Fizz." CNN Money, March 8, 2005.

"The Coca-Cola Company Announces Launch of Coca-Cola C2: The Great Taste of Coca-Cola with Half the Sugar, Carbohydrates and Calories." Financial News, April 19, 2004.

"Coca-Cola to Launch New No-Calorie Drink." Financial News, March 21, 2005.

Day, Sherri, and Stuart Elliot. "The Media Business: Advertising—Coca-Cola Goes Back to Its" Real" Past in an Effort to Find Some New Fizz for Its Classic Brand." New York Times, January 10, 2003, p. C4.

Dobhal, Shailesh, Abir Pal, Amanpreet Singh, et al. "The Real Thing." Business Today, May 23, 2004.

Hays, Constance L. The Real Thing: Truth and Power at the Coca-Cola Company. New York: Random House, 2004.

Howard, Theresa. "Things Go Better for New Ad Campaign." USA Today, March 16, 2003.

"Iconic Ads: A Case of History Repeating." Marketing Week, June 23, 2005.

Leith, Scott. "Coca-Cola Zero Latest in Entry in Diet Derby." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 22, 2005.

Liu, Betty. "Palumbo Faces Fight to Put Fizz Back into Coca-Cola: The World's Most Valuable Brand Has Become One of the Hardest to Sell." Financial Times (London), July 7, 2003.

Pendergrast, Mark. For God, Country and Coca-Cola: The Definitive History of the Great American Soft Drink and the Company That Makes It, 2nd ed., revised and expanded. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

"Race Tightens in Carbonated Soft Drinks." Business and Industry MMR, June 28, 2004.

Watters, Pat. Coca-Cola: An Illustrated History. New York: Doubleday, 1978.

Candice Mancini

YOU ARE WHAT YOU DRINK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The marketing of diet products has been fraught with unique challenges because of their focus on physical appearance. Issues such as cultural ideals of beauty, physical health, gender roles, sexuality, and personal identity all hover implicitly or explicitly around the diet products phenomenon. Such concerns constituted only one minefield for the Coca-Cola Company in its advertising of Diet Coke. Another was the word "diet" itself, associated with self-denial. By the mid-1990s few foods or drinks other than diet sodas still carried the label. New products that had no negative "diet" connotations, such as iced teas and flavored waters, began to take market share. Yet Diet Coke's brand equity was entrenched and powerful. Diet Coke, along with regular Coke, was a flagship product for Coca-Cola. Thus, Coca-Cola needed to maintain and strengthen a positive association based on Diet Coke's already significant market share, as well as to maintain and increase that share.

In 1995 Coca-Cola dropped Diet Coke's longtime tag line "Just for the taste of it" and shifted focus from taste to the less direct, lifestyle-oriented benefits of drinking Diet Coke. The company tapped its agency, Lowe & Partners/SMS of New York, for an ad campaign estimated to cost $40 million and that comprised three television spots demonstrating the positive effects of drinking Diet Coke. Using the tag line "You are what you drink," the campaign opened in May 1997 and aired across the United States as well as in the United Kingdom, Canada, South Africa, and Australia. But the campaign's message and humor were misunderstood, negative feedback was received, and Lowe and Coca-Cola quickly retrenched with new spots. These problems occurred, in large part, because of the difficulty of navigating through the treacherous sea of issues attached to the marketing of products tagged "diet."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Diet colas had been on the market over 10 years when Coca-Cola introduced Diet Coke in 1982. In the 1960s and 1970s the R. C. Cola Company pioneered the diet cola product category. PepsiCo introduced Diet Pepsi in the 1970s as well. Diet Coke's launch was one of the most successful ever; it rapidly took the lead in market share for diet colas. Better taste was part of that success, as Diet Coke was the first diet cola to use the artificial sweetener NutraSweet. Hence, its first tag line "Just for the taste of it" promoted this benefit. The tag line was to be used on and off for a decade. By April 1988 Diet Coke held 10.1 percent of the $40 billion soft drink market based on supermarket sales, while Diet Pepsi held 6.9 percent.

The diet soft drink category hit its stride in the 1980s, expanding to 30 percent of the soft drink market. During that decade, diet colas drove the growth of the soft drink market, with consumption growing four to five times faster than for sugared sodas. This coincided with changes occurring among the baby boomers: they were aging, and they began exercising with a vengeance and watching calories. But they did not want to give up flavor. "Having it all," it seemed, included undiminishing beauty and fitness as well as enjoyment of food and drink. The tag "Just for the taste of it" fit this mind-set. The implication that the products' taste was good enough to be appreciated for its own sake neutralized the negative association of the word "diet."

The swift growth of the diet drink category stopped abruptly in the 1990s. Sales stayed relatively flat, while the growth of sugared sodas went up. In 1990 diet colas accounted for 21.3 percent of cola sales; this fell to 18.7 percent by 1996. According to USA Today, "both Coca-Cola and Pepsi saw their diet cola shares dip in retail stores two-tenths of a percentage point during the first half of 1997."

Several analysts identified key factors in the sluggish 1990s diet drink sales. John Sicher of Beverage Digest, speaking to USA Today, mentioned "the strong performances by bottled waters and the fact that many dieters now focus more on fat than calories." In the same article, Michael Bellas of Beverage Marketing noted that "health-conscious consumers also have some misgivings about artificial sweeteners and caffeine." Manny Goldman, a Paine Webber analyst speaking on National Public Radio's Morning Edition in May 1997, commented that in the 1990s "people were becoming a little more self-indulgent, and they were concerned with satisfying their own basal desires, like things that taste good. They were willing to take on some calories to do that." The baby boomers were actually mellowing out. The fight against the effects of time and gravity was ultimately unwinnable, so they chose to adapt. In the meantime, a new market, Generation X, was emerging, and their very different mind-set had to be addressed if Diet Coke was to maintain or improve market share.

As these forces played out, Senior Vice President of Marketing Sergio Zyman guided the company's marketing style. Often described as brilliant, mercurial, and temperamental, he was dubbed by Cynthia Mitchell of The Atlanta Journal and Constitution "one of the architects of contemporary advertising." Zyman became known as the person who launched Diet Coke, a huge and immediate success. This was followed in 1993 by the launch of New Coke, a huge and immediate failure. Acting as fall guy, Zyman left the company.

Zyman's approach to the marketing process was innovative and iconoclastic. For example, he increased Coke's agency network to over two dozen shops. Moreover, he rapidly changed the marketing of Diet Coke, a strategy complicated by the fact that the market for diet soft drinks was itself rapidly changing. "It is unpredictability that has confused diet Coke's message to consumers," concluded Benzera and Parpis of BrandWeek.

A summary of the major advertising campaigns of the 1990s illustrates this unpredictability and the resulting fragmentation of brand image. In January 1990 a series of 30-second Diet Coke ads featured celebrities saying goodbye to sugared Pepsi Cola in favor of Diet Coke. The campaign's theme was "The move is on." This was a clear effort to grab soft drink market share: Diet Coke was third overall with 8.9 percent, and Pepsi Cola was second with 18.3 percent. In January 1993 Diet Coke dropped the tag line "Just for the taste of it" and presented two new slogans: "One awesome calorie" and "Taste it all," splitting the message into two different directions. A famous—or infamous—1994 spot created by Lowe & Partners reversed stereotypical gender roles by having office women ogle a shirtless construction worker drinking a Diet Coke on his break.

In 1995 Zyman returned to Coca-Cola and resumed his marketing of Diet Coke. He was "charged with shaking up the company's marketing efforts," noted Mitchell. It is questionable whether the company needed shaking up as much as it needed focus. One relatively conceptual 1995 spot that received critical approval featured a swimming elephant; it was created by the Minneapolis agency Fallon McElligot. Although visually engaging, the spot failed to mesh thematically with other Diet Coke commercials. Another spot produced the same year took a decidedly nonesoteric approach, featuring supermodel Stephanie Seymour dismissing a male admirer at a lunch counter. Diet Coke did grow in 1995 by 3.6 percent, compared with less than 2 percent for other diet soft drinks, but the growth was less than that of Coca-Cola's other soft drinks. And given that the 1995 Diet Coke sales were flat in grocery stores, convenience stores, and gas stations, the miscellany of commercials was not working. Diet Coke's share of the soft drink market dropped three-tenths of a percent from 1991 to 1995.

In 1996 Coke spent $72 million on commercials for Diet Coke. A 1996 campaign from Lowe featured variations on the "Just for the taste of it" jingle, such as "Just for the fun of it." Diet Coke sponsored the Grammy Awards in 1996 and based an early 1997 promotion, "Diet Coke Untapped," on that sponsorship. Then in January 1997 Diet Coke started an $18 million-plus campaign featuring music stars and prizes.

The varied nature of the market required several types of ads. Yet the campaign needed an overarching plan allowing its impact to build over time. This would have required a disciplined strategic partnership between Coca-Cola and the primary agency, Lowe, with consistent direction provided by Coca-Cola as a foundation for the agency's sustained creative activity.

TARGET MARKET

Part of the difficulty of marketing Diet Coke resided in the diversity of its market, each segment of which had it own hot spots and red flags. Because by 1997 the taste

DIET COKE TAG LINES

"Just for the taste of it": 1982–1992, 1995–1997.
"One awesome calorie": 1993.
"Taste it all": 1992.
"This is refreshment": 1994.
"You are what you drink": 1997.

issue was no longer news, Coca-Cola needed to focus on the concerns of Diet Coke drinkers and potential drinkers. The company teamed with Lowe early that year to create three new television spots with the tag line "You are what you drink." The spots were based on the premise that the product helped people to look and feel their best.

Specifically, the effort was targeted at what Coca-Cola identified as three "attitudinal groups," distilled from the diverse Diet Coke market. The "fit and confidents" were the younger and hipper group, 20-something men and women who did not need to diet but feared gaining weight. The "reluctant dieters" were men and women in their 30s who wanted to look good without sacrificing taste. The "aggressive dieters" were women 35 and over who worked hard to stay fit. Coca-Cola intended this effort not only to spur greater usage of Diet Coke among current Diet Coke drinkers but also to bring back some lapsed users and pull in some drinkers of regular Coke as well.

COMPETITION

Although many diet sodas have tried to corner the market over the years, Diet Coke and Diet Pepsi have been locked in a head-to-head battle from the start, with Diet Coke gaining and holding the greater market share but Diet Pepsi always too close for comfort, particularly in terms of brand recognition and popularity among retail consumers. Together, Coca-Cola and Pepsi brands controlled 75 percent of the soft drink business by 1997, with their diet colas alone earning more than $10 billion in sales.

An incident occurring in the 1980s exemplifies the intensity of the Diet Coke-Diet Pepsi competition. Diet Coke at that point held 10.1 percent of the soft drink market and Diet Pepsi 6.9 percent. Pepsi produced a TV ad in which boxer Mike Tyson told reporters that Diet Pepsi "beat the taste of Diet Coke" in consumer taste tests. Tyson had just beaten Leon Spinks in a major match, which Pepsi had exclusively sponsored. Coke challenged the methodology behind the claim, demanded that Pepsi produce its research, and asked the networks to withdraw the ads (which they did not). Pepsi submitted documentation to the networks and challenged Coke's own testing methods. Another component of the $4.4 million campaign was a full-page ad in the New York Times showing Tyson holding a can of Diet Pepsi. The ad copy read, "After a couple of pops in the mouth, it was over. Diet Pepsi had won the title. In head-to-head taste tests, Diet Pepsi decisively beat the taste of Diet Coke."

The market share percentages of the two competitors shifted in the mid-1990s even more in Diet Coke's favor. In 1995 Diet Coke was third among all soft drinks in market share, with 8.8 percent, the same as the previous year. Diet Pepsi was fifth, the same place as in 1994, but lost 0.1 percent. By the last quarter of 1996 Diet Pepsi had fallen to seventh place, in spite of a 1.6 percent gain in sales volume. In its previous number four spot was Coca-Cola's soda Sprite. Just $243,000 was spent on advertising Diet Pepsi in 1996, but in early 1997 PepsiCo completely repositioned its strategy with a new $19 million campaign.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In the first half of 1997, Diet Coke kept its number three position in the soft drink lineup, diet sodas overall continued to lose market share, and Diet Pepsi launched its new campaign featuring the slogan "This is diet?" During that time Coca-Cola had performed extensive research and positioning studies that led to the articulation of a new strategy: "Diet Coke helps you look and feel your best." This was based in large part on the fact that, after all was said and done, there was nothing new, such as a better sweetener, on which to construct a more exciting message. Promoting taste alone was no longer an option. Moreover, Diet Pepsi had just launched its taste-oriented "This is diet?" ads. Lowe & Partners/SMS worked with Coca-Cola to produce three TV ads for the campaign, "Aunt Rosalina," "Blizzard," and "Queen." The campaign followed swiftly on the heels of an image revamp for the brand, executed by SBG Partners, San Francisco, which consisted of a silvery new package and new graphics for the drink. It was designed to align the brand with various consumer lifestyles and represented the first genuine strategy for the brand since 1994. Coke executives believed that "the repositioning would re-energize the static diet category," according to MediaWeek. The campaign broke on May 19, timed for the start of the summer season, and ran on network and cable.

The "Blizzard" spot showed two men commenting on women walking by who were bundled up against the cold. The women who drank Diet Cokes through their scarves were the ones the men favored. The "Queen" commercial showed a mirror telling a queen that she no longer was fair; rather, a girl drinking Diet Coke was.

"Aunt Rosalina," the most controversial spot in the series, was set in an Italian village. After watching a parade of beautiful, fit women who stroll by proudly holding cans of Diet Coke, a lovely little girl asks her old aunt, "If I drink Diet Coke, will I be beautiful too?" Aunt Rosalina replies, "I never had a Diet Coke, and look at me." The camera moves to reveal her to be an ugly hag. The ad was rotated with "Blizzard" and "Queen" and received far less weight—166 spots out of 844. Approximately 60 percent of the commercials were shown during primetime, 20 percent during the day, and 10 percent during late night.

The tag line for these commercials, "You are what you drink," was meant to be tongue-in-cheek and lighthearted while conveying the message that drinking Diet Coke could help the consumer look and feel good. In "Aunt Rosalina" this message was reinforced by the attractive women who were drinking Diet Coke. Intentionally they were caricatures rather than characters; the viewer was not expected to think she magically would look that way by drinking Diet Coke. In that sense the ad spoofed in a subtle way the goal of ideal physical beauty. Sergio Zyman, quoted in USA Today, explained that "this latest wave of advertising is less about well-recognized intrinsic attributes of the brand, such as taste and one-calorie refreshment. It is more about how someone feels and the self-confidence they project when they hold a Diet Coke." Zyman told The Wall Street Journal Europe that for Coke to continue to rely on the theme of "taste and one-calorie is kind of beating a dead horse" and that the aim now was to "broaden the definition of Diet Coke. I would like to see people walking around with Diet Coke." Or, as AdWeek 's Debrah Goldman put it, the real message of the campaign was "to establish Diet Coke as a fashion accessory, . . . la Evian."

OUTCOME

Consumer and critical reaction to the commercials was fast and harsh, and the airing of "Aunt Rosalina" ended on July 20, 1997, three months after it began. Coca-Cola received letters from customers criticizing its "sexist" approach. A nationwide poll reported in USA Today of 271 adults who had seen the Diet Coke commercials showed that 10 percent of all respondents liked the ads a lot, but this fell to only 3 percent for 18-to-24 year olds. Fully 21 percent of respondents disliked the spots. But a significant percentage, 16 percent, said the commercials were very effective, and almost two-thirds considered them somewhat effective, indicating conflict over the message. Responses of critics revealed that the intended playfulness of the commercials missed the mark. The milder commentary critiqued the spots for presumptuousness and lack of subtlety. Goldman of AdWeek wrote, "These spots are a classic case of a campaign with its briefs showing. Sure, Coca-Cola wants you to be what you drink, just as other advertisers hope you are what you wear or drive . . . . But an advertisement's job is to elicit that reaction, not to assume it, or, worse, to pretend that it already exists."

On National Public Radio's Morning Edition, Joshua Levs questioned Coca-Cola's Bob Bertini, who presented the rationale behind the commercials. Then Levs zeroed in: " 'You are what you drink'—who wants to be carbonated water, caramel color, aspartame, and potassium benzoate?" That he could even consider such a literal reading of the line—the very week the spot first aired—signaled serious problems with the commercial for Coke. Bob Garfield of Advertising Age opened his review of "Aunt Rosalina" with "This just in: Men are pigs." He interpreted the commercial as affirming that the value of women lies in their slenderness and attractiveness to men. He did not see or accept that the spot's humor actually poked fun at this attitude. The "troubling new spots," he wrote, "remind women how important Diet Coke is in their relentless pursuit of svelteness, men's attraction and self-esteem . . . . In the end, for all their tongue-in-cheek exaggeration, these spots don't lampoon the cult of beauty. They validate it."

The "feel your best" component of the message seemed to have evaporated. The media budget was reduced as a result of this negative response, and creative development was undertaken to rectify the situation. Lowe produced two commercials, "Big Wrestlers," which featured Sumo wrestlers who sincerely compliment each other's appearance despite their tremendous size, and "It's Him," centered on an invisible man who is admired by attractive women in a bar, presumably because of his confidence and demeanor. These new spots, however, were attempts to breathe life into positions consumers had already rejected; "look and feel your best" had died. They received little weight in the last quarter of 1997 and were shelved in early 1998.

Shortly after "Aunt Rosalina" flopped, Wieden & Kennedy of Portland, Oregon, was assigned six 30-second Diet Coke commercials in a last-ditch attempt to get some traction. This spurred media speculation that Wieden would become the new agency for the brand. The spots were not well received. After that Coca-Cola recognized the need to step back and undertake "extensive research . . . to determine a strategy and long-term direction for the brand." Two earlier spots produced by Lowe were aired then and continued to be aired through the summer of 1998.

In March 1998 Sergio Zyman resigned from Coca-Cola. The man who replaced Zyman, Charles S. Frenette, was Zyman's opposite in terms of personality and operations background. Frenette continued to work with Lowe & Partners. He indicated that he planned to take a longer-term strategic approach to the Coke-Lowe partnership, so critical for the marketing of Diet Coke during times of cultural and demographic upheaval.

FURTHER READING

Benezra, Karen. "Coke Ad Push to Give Diet Direction." BrandWeek, May 12, 1997, Part 4, p. 1.

Benezra, Karen and Eleftheria Parpis. "Chasing Sergio." BrandWeek, March 30, 1998, p. 30.

"Coke Tries to KO Diet Pepsi Ads Featuring Mike Tyson." Los Angeles Times, July 6, 1988, p. 1.

"Cola Wars Lite: Joshua Levs of Member Station WABE in Atlanta Reports Coca-Cola and Pepsi Are Launching New Offensive in the Ongoing Cola Wars." Morning Edition, National Public Radio, May 20, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Diet Coke Ads Unpopular but Effective." USA Today, September 29, 1997, p. 12B.

Garfield, Bob. "Diet Coke's Approach Quickly Wears Thin." Advertising Age, May 19, 1997, p. 85.

Goldman, Debrah. "It's the Bottle, Stupid." AdWeek, May 26, 1997, p. 38.

Mitchell, Cynthia. "Coke's New Attitude Ads with Women Ogling a Hunk Weren't Always Coca-Cola, but New Products and Revamped Marketing Signal Big Changes on North Avenue." Atlanta Journal and Constitution, April 10, 1994, p. H1.

Cynthia Tokumitsu

Columbia Sportswear Company

14375 NW Science Park Drive
Portland, Oregon 97229-5418
USA
Telephone: (800) 547-8066
Fax: (503) 985-5960
Web site: www.columbia.com

■■■

MOTHER BOYLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By 2005 the Portland, Oregon–based Columbia Sportswear Company was the largest seller of skiwear in the United States and an industry leader worldwide. Founded in 1938 by German immigrants Paul and Marie Lamfrom and their daughter Gert, the company grew into a billion-dollar-a-year enterprise by 2003. Much of Columbia's growth was attributed to the 1984 launch of its signature "Mother Boyle" advertising campaign, which placed Gert Boyle, who became the company's CEO in 1970, front and center as the company's spokesperson. The grandmother with the fake "Born to Nag" tattoo proved an instant success as the personification of Columbia Sportswear's no-nonsense durability.

Beginning in 1984 the print ads and television spots created by Columbia's advertising agency, Portland-based Borders Perrin Norrander, cemented the company's reputation for manufacturing coats, hats, and other cold-weather apparel that could stand up to the harshest weather conditions. The implication of the humorous advertising, especially the television spots in which Gert inflicted torture on her real-life son, Tim, the company's president and CEO since 1995, was that Columbia's products, particularly the heavy-duty parkas, were as tough as the "one tough mother" who ran the company. A typical television spot from 2000 featured Gert driving a Zamboni across an ice rink. When she passed over a drinking straw poking through the ice, viewers saw Tim embedded in the ice, using the straw to breathe. Presumably his Columbia parka made the frigid temperature bearable. As Columbia's primary marketing campaign, "Mother Boyle" received the lion's share of the company's advertising budget over the years, which in 2004 alone amounted to $15 million.

The success of the campaign was evident through its longevity. For more than 20 years Gert Boyle played the company's stone-faced matriarch, exposing her son to heinous conditions in the television spots and scolding readers in print ads. When the campaign began in 1984, Columbia Sportswear's annual sales were $13 million; by 1997 that number had reached $358 million. Most importantly the campaign gave the company a recognizable public face. Gert Boyle proved irresistible to reporters, who flocked to profile her, thereby giving the company free publicity in magazines such as Time and Forbes, a writer from which dubbed her "a Leona Helmsley with humor." In 2005 Boyle capitalized on her popularity by publishing her autobiography, One Tough Mother: Success in Life, Business, and Apple Pies.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Columbia's marketing strategy relied heavily on Boyle's rags-to-riches life story and her supersized personality.

The tale of a homemaker with three children who was thrust into the business world after her husband suddenly died was as American as apple pie. Having the moxie to stand up to the bankers and lawyers who wanted her to sell the company for pennies and persevering long enough to turn it into a major brand made her a hero in the business world. ''Early to bed, early to rise, work like hell and advertise'' was her oft-stated motto.

Columbia Sportswear hit its stride in the early 1980s when it introduced the Bugaboo ski jacket, a two-in-one system comprising a detachable liner and an outer shell, both of which could be worn separately. Apart from the product, the timing was right. People were beginning to spend more time outdoors and were also adopting a more casual approach to outerwear than in previous years. The fitness craze made outdoor sports, skiing in particular, more popular than ever before. The Bugaboo jacket became the company's signature product, selling millions of units over the next two decades.

Gert Boyle assumed the helm of the company in 1970 following the unexpected death of her husband, Neal Boyle, who had taken over from Gert's father several years earlier. Lawyers urged her to sell the struggling company, but she refused. For the paltry sum they were willing to pay her, she figured it made more sense for her to run the company into the ground herself.

Growth was slow. For several years Columbia Sportswear subsisted by selling its designs to other companies, such as Eddie Bauer and L.L. Bean. Then, as Tim Boyle explained to CNN/Money, the breakthrough came when he realized ''that brands are really all you have to sell, and products are just extensions of the brand.'' With that thought in mind Columbia Sportswear set out to redefine their image.

By 1983 executives from Columbia, along with representatives from Borders Perrin Norrander, decided the company needed to distinguish itself from the competition. ''Back in 1983,'' Gert told a writer for Inc. Magazine, ''our advertising was about how our products weren't just manufactured, they were engineered. The trouble was, everybody else in our industry was advertising the same way. So our advertising agency asked us, 'What's different about Columbia Sportswear?' '' The answer was Gert Boyle. Not everyone, however, was convinced that the self-described ''little old lady'' could win the brand loyalty of hard-core sportsmen and athletes. They gave it a shot anyhow. The first ad read, ''Before it passes Mother Nature, it has to pass Mother Boyle.'' A campaign was born.

ADVERTISING STRATEGY: BAWDY HUMOR

In 2002 Borders Perrin Norrander, Columbia Sportswear's longtime advertising agency, launched a print ad for the company's Jr. Fire Ridge Parka, a winter coat for children. The ad's copy offered the first of two major guffaws: ''You can freeze your sperm. You can freeze your embryos. But last we checked it was still illegal to freeze your children.'' Mother Boyle piped in at the bottom: ''Early signs of hypothermia include poor coordination and confusion. Two things best saved for puberty.''

TARGET MARKET

The campaign targeted sports aficionados. Columbia's print ads ran predominantly in sports-themed magazines, such as Outdoors, Hiking, Backpacker, and Sports Illustrated, and many of its television spots ran on niche cable channels, including ESPN, MTV, and Comedy Central. Though Columbia Sportswear products were readily available at high-end sports retailers, such as REI and Cabela's, they were often also available at many department stores and even in the company's own flagship stores in Portland, Oregon; London, England; and Paris, France. Indeed the ''Mother Boyle'' campaign proved to have international appeal. Gert Boyle told a reporter for CNN/Money that the campaign was well received in Australia. ''They have the same sense of humor as we do. You know, they all have mothers.''

Apart from targeting those interested in sports, the ''Mother Boyle'' campaign appealed to people who lived and worked in cold climates and relied on quality outerwear to get them through long, frigid winters. By emphasizing durability over style, the advertising zeroed in on those who valued a reasonably priced product that served its purpose season after season. With casual dress becoming the standard in almost every sector of the population, Columbia's advertising capitalized on the middle-class consumer who was driven more by comfort and price than style.

COMPETITION

In terms of sportswear, Columbia's closest competitors were Timberland and North Face, although it also competed with the apparel divisions of Reebok and Nike. Timberland's print and television advertising, including its catchphrase ''Make It Better,'' focused on the durability of the company's products and featured the same rugged outdoor terrain that could be found in Columbia's advertising. The message was similar to Columbia's ''Mother Boyle'' ads, minus the humor and

ONE TOUGH MOTHER: THE BOOK

In 2005 Gert Boyle published her autobiography, One Tough Mother: Success in Life, Business, and Apple Pies. The book's cover showed Boyle brandishing the "Born to Nag" tattoo featured in early ads for Columbia's "Mother Boyle" campaign.

the indelible image of a no-holds-barred woman running the show.

North Face, a high-performance outerwear manufacturer, offered expensive items that attempted to keep pace with fashion trends, a strategy eschewed by Columbia. Part of Gert Boyle's appeal was her dedication to practicality over style, as evidenced by the fact that the design of Columbia's Bugaboo jacket never changed in more than 17 years of production. North Face, by comparison, focused its advertising around the stars of "extreme" sports, such as Alpine mountain climbing, and marketed its product as a "prestige" brand, as opposed to Columbia's dedication to its practicality, durability, and functionality. This made North Face more vulnerable to the finicky marketplace, as the company found out in the 1990s when its sales plummeted.

"Everybody else's ads in the outdoor-clothing business are the same," Gert Boyle told Inc. Magazine. "There's always a young, firm body. Sometimes, with a little luck, there are two firm bodies intertwined with each other . . . But if you put your finger over the name of the people who are advertising, you couldn't tell whose ad it is. Well, ours are different."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Gert Boyle credited the originality of the "Mother Boyle" campaign for Columbia's success. "You can look at nine-tenths of the manufacturers of outerwear, skiwear, anything like that—they're all the same ads. All these gorgeous people who couldn't possibly do on skis what they're supposed to be doing. Then you've got the little old lady. That's what sets us apart. Not because we make better clothing, but because the advertising gets your attention," she told David Whitford of Fortune Small Business.

As Paul Swangard of the Warsaw Sports Marketing Center told Bryan Brumley of the Associated Press, corporate success "starts with leadership. And it starts with the company defining its brand through its ownership. Gert has been synonymous with the identity that one equates with Columbia." As the public face of Columbia, Boyle was an anomaly. "If you see any ad of an outdoor company, you see beautiful young people. What makes Columbia different—there is this little old lady," she told a reporter for the Financial Times. Yet her high profile was more than just vanity. Jack Peterson, of Borders Perrin Norrander, told a writer for Adweek that she also "embodies everything the brand is about—uncompromising quality, toughness."

In addition to toughness, the "Mother Boyle" ads occasionally employed ribald language that was unusual for the normally staid field of outerwear. "There's nothing motherly about mother nature," read the headline of a 2002 ad for Columbia's Boundary Peak Parka. "Except maybe her big mountainous breasts." Below that, Gert Boyle piped up, "I've got hot flashes to keep me warm. You'll need something that zips." For an industry typically consumed with testosterone-influenced machismo, this female-centric viewpoint was bold and funny. Peterson told Adweek that despite the controversial nature of the ads' text, research revealed 97 percent approval ratings for the campaign. The controversy also helped differentiate Columbia from marketing behemoths such as Nike. "It's always been a Columbia trademark to be a sharper nail rather than a heavier hammer," Peterson said.

The company's television spots for 2005 featured two new "Mother Boyle" ads. In one Gert Boyle operated a cement mixer, which excreted an assortment of odd objects down its trough. The last object was Tim Boyle, wearing a pristine Columbia parka. In the "Dart" spot Tim addressed a group of business associates in a conference room during a meeting. Mother Boyle took aim from the hallway and blew a dart into his neck. The next shot revealed Tim abandoned in a vast snowy wilderness as his mother departed in a helicopter.

Beyond Gert Boyle's charisma, the "Mother Boyle" television spots worked because of the dynamic between her and her son. Not many corporate CEOs would agree to be the punch line of a joke, but Tim Boyle was philosophical about it. "It's very effective, so I guess I have to suck it up," he told a reporter for CNN/Money.

OUTCOME

Over the years the "Mother Boyle" campaign not only increased Columbia Sportswear's sales but it also earned respect in the advertising business. Three of the ads were shortlisted for Clio Awards: 1998's print ad "Three Reasons to Own a Good Pair of Boots," 1998's "When You Are as Old as the Hills," and 2001's television spot "Sled Dogs."

Anchored by the "Mother Boyle" campaign, the company showed earnings in 2000 that had increased

70 percent over the previous year, with revenues surpassing $600 million. By 2005 sales had reached $1 billion. As Gert Boyle entered her 80s (in 2004), she left the company's daily business to her son but continued to star in television spots and retained her position as chairman of the board, with no plans to retire. As she wrote in Fortune Small Business, "They asked Tim once, 'What's going to happen to the ad when your mother dies?' He said, 'We'll have her stuffed.'"

FURTHER READING

Barron, Kelly. "Tough Mama." Forbes, December 25, 2000, p. 232.

Boyle, Gert, and Tim Boyle. "Our Company, Ourselves." Inc. Magazine, April 1998.

Boyle, Gert, and Kerry Tymchuk. One Tough Mother: Success in Life, Business, and Apple Pies. Portland, Oregon: Westwinds Press, 2005.

Boyle, Gert, and David Whitford. "How We Got Started." Fortune Small Business, September 8, 2003.

Boyle, Tim. "Executive Life: The Boss." New York Times, January 18, 2004.

Brumley, Bryan. "She's Mother of All Sportswear Firms." Deseret Morning News, April 7, 2005.

"Columbia Sportswear Ads Lay It on the Line: Tough Clothes Made by a Tough Lady." CNN/Money, October 9, 1998. Available from <http://money.cnn.com/1998/10/09/busunu/columbia_pkg>

Flass, Rebecca. "Columbia Sportswear Pushes Some More Buttons: Gert Boyle Again a Fixture of Irreverent $10 Mil. BPN Campaign." Adweek, September 23, 2002, p. 5.

Gert, Tim. "Return in Ads for Columbia Sportswear." Brandweek, September 19, 2005, p. 3.

Holmes, Stanley. "Gert Gets the Last Laugh." BusinessWeek, June 10, 2002, p. 100.

———. "Talking with One Tough Mother." BusinessWeek, April 7, 2005.

Jung, Helen. "Profits Tumble at Columbia Sportswear." Oregonian, July 29, 2005.

"Mother Boyle's Star Touch Keeps Columbia Shining." South China Morning Post, June 9, 2002.

Kathy Wilson Peacock

ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation

1 ConAgra Drive
Omaha, Nebraska 68102-5001
USA
Telephone: (800) 771-2303
E-mail: FeedingChildrenBetter@conagrafoods.com
Web site: www.feedingchildrenbetter.org

■■■

CHILD HUNGER CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

ConAgra Foods, the $14 billion packaged-food giant, created its Feeding Children Better program in 1999 in response to the growing problem of childhood hunger in the United States. In conjunction with the Advertising Council and America's Second Harvest, ConAgra's Feeding Children Better program launched a multitiered public service campaign to increase awareness and understanding of childhood hunger, which, at the time, affected approximately 14 million American children.

The "Child Hunger" public service campaign, which started in 2001, used television, print, radio, Web banners, and pamphlets, reaching 57.5 million people in its first year alone. Created by advertising agencies Bartle Bogle Hegarty of New York and Euro RSCG Tatham Partners of Chicago, both of whom volunteered their services free of charge, the ads conveyed to the public the realities of being poor and hungry. The first part of the campaign, conceived by Bartle Bogle Hegarty, used the tagline "The sooner you believe it, the sooner we can end it" and involved heartbreaking television spots drawn from real-life stories. In "Shared Food," for example, a girl prepared a meager meal for the younger children in her family but neglected to feed herself. Euro RSCG, which took over the account in 2002 and changed the tagline to "Hunger. A choice no one should have to make," created equally poignant TV commercials. "Rent or Food," "Heat or Food," and "Medicine or Food" were all created in an attempt to disclose the terrible choices many poor families had long had to make.

In the end the "Child Hunger" campaign was considered successful. More than $45 million of media was donated to promote the campaign, accomplishing ConAgra's goal of gaining free media exposure for the problem and thus making the other tasks more easily attained. There were 285,250 hits on Feeding Children Better's website (the URL was displayed in all advertising materials), there was an increased awareness that childhood hunger existed in America, and in response to the campaign the U.S. Department of Agriculture donated 9 million lunches to schools in the summer of 2001.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Feeding Children Better program was established in 1999 by ConAgra Foods, a leading packaged-food company offering such brands as ACT II, Healthy Choice, Kid Choice, Peter Pan, and Parkay. Feeding Children Better—which became the largest corporate-backed program to fight child hunger—was divided into three major components: Kids Cafe, Rapid Food Distribution System, and Public Awareness Campaign. In a combined effort the three divisions were able to donate food, to assist in its distribution to the hungry, and to raise awareness both of the organization and of child hunger in the United States.

To help run Feeding Children Better, ConAgra partnered with the national nonprofit group America's Second Harvest, the largest charitable domestic hunger-relief organization in the United States. America's Second Harvest had evolved into a network of more than 200 food banks, which, in total, dispensed food and grocery products to approximately 50,000 charitable hunger-relief agencies. The organization administered Feeding Children Better's Kids Cafes and Rapid Food Distribution System. To operate the Feeding Children Better program, ConAgra also teamed up with the Center on Hunger and Poverty, a research center based at Brandeis University that had long been dedicated to serving the needs of low-income Americans.

Feeding Children Better's "Child Hunger" campaign developed as a result of a hunger-awareness initiative conducted in 2001 by ConAgra Foods, the Advertising Council, and America's Second Harvest. In ConAgra's words (from the Feeding Children Better website), "By educating the public about child hunger, ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better program seeks to be a catalyst and encourage others to get involved in the fight against child hunger. The ultimate goal is to insure that American children have the capacity to grow, to learn in school and to reach their full potential."

TARGET MARKET

At the campaign's start 14 million American children had been classified by America's Second Harvest as "food insecure," meaning that they were hungry or at risk of hunger. In a country of great prosperity, this ever-growing problem went largely undetected. "Child Hunger" advertising directly targeted hungry children and their families, letting them know who to contact if they needed food assistance. ConAgra desired to bring attention to this group during the summer months, when the national free-lunch program would reach far fewer children than during the school year. Only about 2.2 million kids would be fed during the summer, compared with 14 million during the school year. For this reason the campaign was released during the summer.

Those who could directly benefit from food distribution were not the only ones targeted by the "Child Hunger" campaign. Raising awareness in all Americans was the goal. Thus the campaign directed viewers to the Feeding Children Better website, where they could become better educated about hunger and, in particular, about child hunger. Providing such information as "Every fourth person standing in a soup kitchen line is a child," "13 million kids live in households that do not have an adequate supply of food," and "One in five children in the U.S. is hungry or at the risk of hunger every year," ConAgra Foods and Feeding Children Better hoped to spread compassion for the poor and to find donors for the program.

"STOP THE WASTE!"

Results from a 2004 study revealed that nearly half of all the food in the United States went to waste. The University of Arizona study, led by anthropologist Timothy Jones, looked at food loss over a 10-year period and concluded that of all food ready for harvest, 40 to 50 percent never got eaten. Jones stated that if measures were made to diminish waste, each year tens of billions of dollars would be saved—money that, he suggested, could be used to fight hunger via contributions to such programs as America's Second Harvest.

COMPETITION

There had been a great many other hunger-prevention programs developed in the United States. The Food Research and Action Center (FRAC) was one such program. A national organization, FRAC was founded in 1970 as a public interest law firm and grew to be a key player in the fight to decrease hunger in America. Like Feeding Children Better, FRAC focused on child hunger. In particular the organization engaged in ongoing research to document national hunger and its effect on low-income families with children.

Share Our Strength (SOS), with the motto "It takes more than food to fight hunger," was another leading antihunger advocate. The program, founded in 1984 and based in Washington, D.C., had raised more than $180 million in the fight against hunger and poverty, both in the United States and worldwide. SOS's approach centered on teaching cooking and nutrition classes to low-income families. It also managed a number of corporate-backed campaigns, such as "Charge against Hunger," which operated from 1993 to 1996 and was sponsored by American Express. By donating three cents from every fourth-quarter transaction, the credit-card company raised $21 million for SOS.

Meanwhile ConAgra Foods (a top producer of food in the United States), which provided funding for Feeding Children Better and which in 2004 had sales exceeding $14 billion, faced steep competition in its sale of packaged foods. ConAgra's main competitors were Kraft Foods (with 2004 sales exceeding $32 billion) and Nestlé (with 2004 sales totaling more than $76 billion). Neither megacorporation had backed a major nonprofit in the specific way that ConAgra had with Feeding Children Better, although they had historically given to many charitable organizations, often in connection with nutrition. Kraft, for instance, created a ''Kraft Cares'' global philanthropy program, which focused on two main areas: hunger and healthy lifestyles. Still these efforts tended to be shorter term and promotion oriented, instead of long-term, nationwide commitments like the one ConAgra had made to Feeding Children Better. Further ConAgra was the only company to run a public service campaign specifically to fight childhood hunger in the United States.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The ''Child Hunger'' campaign aired in 2001 as a series of public service announcements, with advertisements created by volunteer ad agency Bartle Bogle Hegarty, based in New York City. The announcements' main objective was to raise awareness about hunger, especially child hunger, in the United States and to increase empathy toward parents of hungry children. With the ''Child Hunger'' campaign ConAgra, the Ad Council, and America's Second Harvest wanted to change the general perception of child hunger as being a result of a lazy parent not doing his or her job. The advertising was intended to reveal the difficult choices these parents had long had to make, such as deciding whether to spend money on rent or food. Further they aimed to expose the damaging physical and mental effects of hunger on children. Another objective was to provide opportunities for citizens to take action against childhood hunger. These would prove difficult tasks, because, in addition to the negative opinions the public had formed about hungry children and their parents, there was an inaccurate national perception that hunger barely existed in the United States.

Using the tagline ''The sooner you believe it, the sooner we can end it,'' the tragic television spots, directed by Joe Pytka of Bartle Bogle Hegarty, were drawn from real-life stories. In ''Ketchup Soup'' a mother scavenged ketchup packets from take-out restaurants in order to make ketchup-and-water soup for her young family. In ''Chicken Pox'' a young girl talked her brother into attending school when he had chicken pox just so he could receive his free lunch. Finally ''Shared Food'' portrayed a girl preparing a meager meal for her younger siblings. At the end of the spot the camera backed up to reveal that the older girl did not eat anything, leaving her portion for the others.

In 2002 Bartle Bogle Hegarty's contract ended, and Euro RSCG Tatham Partners continued the campaign, which took on a different tagline, ''Hunger. A choice no one should have to make.'' The agenda, however, remained the same: to spread the word about childhood hunger in the United States, with a focus on the terrible choices poor families continually have had to face. Additional TV spots were released. In one, titled ''Rent or Food,'' a mother, with her children listening nearby, tried to explain to her landlord that she could not pay the rent because she needed the money to feed her children. Other spots, including ''Heat or Food'' and ''Medicine or Food,'' depicted the same message.

In addition to television, the campaign appeared in various forms, including radio, print ads, Web banners, and pamphlets. Among the print ads was one about ''Julie,'' who was cold and suffered from what the ad called ''Chicken Skin.'' Every ad directed the audience to a toll-free number, 1-800-FEED-KIDS, as well as to a website, http://www.feedingchildrenbetter.org. All were made possible through donated media that exceeded $45 million in value. The campaign continued through 2003.

OUTCOME

The efforts of Bartle Bogle Hegarty and Euro RSCG Tatham Partners were met with accolades from the advertising industry. Among the campaign's many awards were an International Andy award and a silver EFFIE award, the latter of which judged campaigns on the basis of their results. More importantly the ad agencies and organizations behind the campaign considered it to have achieved its goals.

The campaign's first objective—gaining free media exposure—was exceedingly met. While in 2001 the average Ad Council campaign received $28.6 million in donated media, ''Child Hunger'' received $45.3 million. Second, the ads also successfully inspired action: from June through December of 2001, the campaign's 800 number received 2,677 calls, while its website received 285,250 hits. By the campaign's end the number of website hits had reached 507,400. Ninety percent of telephone calls had been inspired by the television and radio spots. Third, awareness of childhood hunger in America increased dramatically. In a public-opinion study run by the Ad Council, 50 percent of participants in 2001 said that they believed childhood hunger existed in the United States. In 2002 the number jumped to 87 percent. When participants were asked if they thought that the problem existed in their own community, only 10 percent in 2001 said yes. In 2002 the number increased to 39 percent. The campaign also achieved its goal of generating a collective concern and discussion so that the problem would no longer be hidden. As a direct result of the campaign, in the summer of 2001 the U.S. Department of Agriculture donated to schools 9 million lunches for children in need. On a wider scale the advertising reached more than 57.5 million people, who either read, watched or heard about the issue through means of the "Child Hunger" campaign.

FURTHER READING

Broder, David S. "No Recess for Hunger." Washington Post, June 4, 2003, p. A27.

Brunt, Cliff. "Companies, Workers Give Food, Clothes, Toys." Omaha (NE) World-Herald, December 25, 2002, p. 1B.

"ConAgra Foods' Feeding Children Better Foundation." PND News, February 25, 2003.

"ConAgra Foods, Minor League Clubs Team Up to Feed Kids." Progressive Grocer, June 16, 2005.

Cone, Carol L., Mark A. Feldman, and Alison T. DaSilva. "Align Your Brand with a Social Cause." Harvard Business Review, July 14, 2003.

Grace, Erin, Jeffrey Robb, et al. "ConAgra Donating Trucks to Food Banks." Omaha (NE) World-Herald, May 7, 2002, p. 2B.

Hauser, Andrea. "Web Site Fights Summer Hunger." Omaha (NE) World-Herald, June 13, 2001, p. 21.

Lazare, Lewis. "New Ad Campaign Targets Hunger." Chicago Sun-Times, August 8, 2002, p. 51.

Maki, Amos. "Bakers Have Recipe to Fight Child Hunger." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 10, 2003, p. 1JH.

Palmer, Jane. "Two Kids Cafes Open for Omaha Children." Omaha (NE) World-Herald, July 21, 2001, p. 61.

Riskind, Jonathan. "Hunger Grows in This Land of Prosperity." Columbus (OH) Dispatch, March 3, 2002, p. 3F.

Sarasohn, David. "Fighting the Battle on the Food Front." (Portland, OR) Oregonian, October 26, 2001, p. C11.

Candice Mancini

Conseco, Inc.

11825 N Pennsylvania St.
Carmel, Indiana 46032
USA
Telephone: (317) 817-6100
Fax: (317) 817-2847
Web site: www.conseco.com

■■■

PROTECT/CREATE WEALTH CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although Conseco, Inc., an insurance and financial services company, had become large and successful through acquisitions, it had little name recognition even among agents working for its various units. In order to establish the Conseco name as a brand, the company hired the advertising agency Fallon McElligott, Inc. to develop a print campaign to run in trade publications, followed by a $15 million television campaign, ''Protect/Create Wealth,'' targeted toward consumers with household incomes between $25,000 and $75,000 per year. The consumer campaign, Conseco's first-ever on television, began running in February 1998 on ESPN and during the CBS broadcast of the NCAA basketball tournament, after which it moved to cable television. In a departure from the warm, sentimental advertising of insurance companies in the past, the campaign used edgy humor to make the point that life did not always go as expected and that a person needed to be financially prepared for bad or good times, either by having insurance or a financial plan. The company followed up with a $5 million print campaign in April 1998. The ''Protect/Create Wealth'' campaign ended in December 1998.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Conseco was founded in 1979 as Security National of Indiana Corp. by Stephen C. Hilbert, a former encyclopedia salesman from Terre Haute. In 1982 the company made the first of many acquisitions that would be the key to its growth, and in 1983 the company changed its name to Conseco, Inc. According to the company's annual report filed with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on March 31, 1999, from 1982 through 1998 Conseco acquired 19 insurance groups. By January 1998 the company was a $36 billion entity that sold life and health insurance and annuities under 25 names, including Colonial Penn Life and Casualty, American Travellers Life, Bankers Life & Casualty, and Capitol American.

Despite the fact that Conseco had grown into one of the country's largest life and health insurance companies, few knew the company name. According to company spokesperson Jim Rosensteele, ''Our research showed that even agents currently doing business with a Conseco company have very low awareness of the Conseco name. For many years, we've been thought of as a collection of companies.'' The company thus decided to develop the Conseco name as a brand. At the same time Conseco decided to diversify beyond insurance into the realm of financial services, and in 1997 the company began to market its own over-the-counter mutual funds. The following year, Conseco spent $6.5 billion to acquire Green Tree Financial Corp., which added home loans, credit cards, and home equity loans to its offerings.

Another reason to seek name recognition was Conseco's need to begin growing from within by increasing the sales of the companies it had purchased. One market observer claimed that 1998 would be a "make-or-break year" for Conseco, noting, "So far, they've built [success] on the bodies of a number of companies without a lot of brand recognition. They're probably not going to have any significant acquisitions this year, so they've got to digest the acquisitions they've already made and show some internal growth."

Conseco was aware of the need to increase sales and in 1996 began to work on a new marketing plan. By January 1998 the company had a new logo, which featured a series of steps rising from the Conseco name, illustrating the company's focus on performance. Conseco hired advertising agency Fallon McElligott to create a print campaign targeted toward the nation's 190,000 independent insurance agents. The campaign emphasized Conseco's financial success. One advertisement read, "Q: What do you call an insurance company that has an unyielding grasp on the bottom line? A: Your friend." It went on to say, "We are unapologetically profitable . . . PERFORMANCE IS WHAT MATTERS." Conseco set aside $10 million for the agent campaign, which ran in the Wall Street Journal, Sports Illustrated, Newsweek, and Forbes, as well as in trade publications. The company then spent $15 million for a consumer campaign, its first-ever on television.

FALLON MCELLIGOTT: FROM MINNEAPOLIS TO THE BIG APPLE

Minneapolis advertising agency Fallon McElligott opened a branch in New York in April 1995, and by September 1997 it had $120 million in billings. One major reason for its success, according to an article in Shoot, was the agency's chairman, Andy Berlin, who had helped launch the San Francisco-based Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein in 1983.

In addition to Conseco, Fallon McElligott boasted a client list at the time that included Coca-Cola, Tidy Cat, the NBA, Conde Nast publications, the Washington Post, Metropolitan Health Care, the National Symphony Orchestra, the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, Bankers Trust Worldwide, and Bancomer, the largest bank in Mexico.

Berlin said that one thing setting the agency apart from others was that the creative people worked "unusually closely" with account planners while campaigns were being developed. According to Berlin, the agency was also structured with as few layers as possible and featured a very young and prolific group of creative talent.

Berlin believed that finding an "original voice" was the most important thing he contributed to Goodby, and he continued to hold that philosophy at Fallon McElligott. "The world doesn't need another Young & Rubicam or another Ogilvy & Mather," he said. "It needs fresh voices."

TARGET MARKET

Conseco's consumer-oriented campaign sought to establish the company's name as a brand for a diversity of services, including insurance and investments. In February 1999 American Banker described Conseco's target segment as American households that earned $30,000 to $70,000 per year, rather than the very rich, saying that it was a "long-neglected segment of U.S. consumers." Company founder Hilbert said that his goal was to make Conseco the "Wal-Mart of financial services."

The first spot ran on February 26, 1998, on ESPN and then ran on CBS during the NCAA basketball tournament in March 1998. "If you look at the crowd that watches college basketball, they are college-educated people. It's an excellent target audience to reach," said Sandy Deem, a spokesperson with First Union, a company that ran advertising during the 1999 tournament. College basketball viewers were reported to have higher salaries and more education than other sports fans. Conseco spokesperson Rosensteele said, "There's nothing like the NCAA tournament to really build exposure with the audience we're targeting. We really want to build brand awareness with both agents and consumers." Rosensteele also acknowledged that Conseco had a special connection with college basketball, which "is very big here in Indiana."

COMPETITION

According to an article in National Underwriter Life & Health on January 12, 1998, the insurance and financial services industries had just gone through a "watershed year—the year in which it became apparent that the life insurance industry was no longer able to stand apart from the fundamental restructuring occurring within the financial services industry." One major development was the "unprecedented level of merger and acquisition

MUTUAL FUNDS PARTNER WITH SPORTS FOR MARKETING ADVANTAGE

At one time the business and sports worlds had little to do with each other, at least from a marketing standpoint. During the 1990s, however, both mutual funds and sports became increasingly popular among men and women of all ages with money to invest. A marketing match was thus created.

According to a July 18, 1999, article in the Arizona Republic, in 1998 financial firms spent an estimated $850 million on global sports advertising. Among other things mutual fund companies became high-profile sponsors of professional sports teams and athletic events. Stadiums and sports arenas were being named after financial companies, despite occasional fan protests. Conseco Field House, home of the Indianapolis Pacers, was just one example, along with Safeco Field in Seattle and the Philadelphia 76ers' new venue, First Union Center.

"Financial-services firms have been increasingly turning to professional sports to raise brand-name recognition," according to Cerulli Associates, a Boston consulting firm. "Sports sponsorships offer a unique benefit over traditional advertising: consumers often form an emotional attachment to sports teams."

activity in the financial services industry." Significant mergers and acquisitions took place in the life and property/casualty markets, as well as in the managed care and brokerage segments. In the life insurance market companies were driven to consolidate by the desire to expand their scale, volume, products, distribution, and expertise. In addition to Conseco, other companies using acquisitions to stay competitive included Aegon N.V., American General Corp., ING Groep N.V., Jefferson-Pilot Corp., and Lincoln National Corp.

"From a fragmented industry composed of thousands of competitors we are being driven toward a concentrated financial services market with a few national-level players in each segment," National Underwriter Life & Health reported. "Insurance companies that once specialized in a single line or market now face hulking competitors like Travelers-Salomon Brothers, G.E. Capital, Zurich-Kemper, and Morgan Stanley-Dean Witter, along with the likes of American General, Aegon USA, and ING." Only three months later, in April 1998, Citicorp and Travelers Group Inc. announced that they were merging to form Citigroup Inc., "the world's first supermarket for banking, insurance and financial services," according to Reuters news service. The merger created a megacompany with $698 billion in assets.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Conseco's $15 million television campaign aimed at consumers was part of a long-term strategy to establish the company as a brand name in order to engender greater customer loyalty and to enhance sales. This would allow the company to grow without relying as heavily on acquisitions as it had in the past. As reported in February 1998 in Adweek, the television campaign was launched with five commercials—three 30-second spots and two 15-second spots—that used storytelling to make the point that Conseco could provide a variety of financial services.

The 30-second spots explored negative themes, but with an upbeat twist at the end. Fallon McElligott used edgy humor in the commercials in order to set Conseco apart from other companies, which had traditionally used sentimentality or warmer humor. In one 30-second spot, "Grim Reaper," a couple was relaxing at home when, unbeknownst to them, the Grim Reaper came to their front door. Before he could knock, a female Reaper appeared and lured him away by lifting her skirt to flash a bit of leg bone. The two ran off together, and the couple remained blissfully unaware of the close call. The voice-over said, "You never know when your number is going to be up. That's why you need protection against the unexpected." In another 30-second spot, "Italian Woman," a woman was told that her man had been seen with another woman in a jewelry store. As she stomped to the store with a rolling pin in hand and a crowd in tow, the voice-over said, "Sometimes you need health insurance. Sometimes you need life insurance." When she discovered that the "other woman" was actually a store clerk and that the man was buying her a ring, she dropped the rolling pin and the voice-over said, "And sometimes you need investments for the future." The third 30-second spot, "Boxer," explored similar bad news/good news themes, showing a young boxer being beaten up in the ring but telling the viewer that he had won a $2 million purse in the process. One of the 15-second spots simply showed a squirrel jumping from branch to branch in a tree, only to fall out of sight on his final leap. The narrator said, "You know the saying, 'Look before you leap?' Well, it's especially true when you make financial decisions. So, maybe you should be talking to Conseco." The tag line for the campaign was "Create wealth. Protect wealth. For life."

The campaign was designed to encourage consumers to use Conseco for a variety of financial services and to emphasize that things did not always go according to plan. "Life can go either way, and we want to show that Conseco is there," said account supervisor Mary Ann Harris. The company was also interested in standing out from the crowd, particularly since it was a relatively late arrival in consumer marketing. The company and the advertising agency believed that the edgy approach was a welcome change from the messages of the past, that people were tired of "warm and fuzzy advertising" and were "ready to hear a different message." Bill Schwab, a cocreator of the campaign with Fallon McElligott, remembered one member of a focus group member who said, "If I see one more insurance-company ad where some child is tugging at her mother's skirt, I'll throw up."

It was reported that Conseco planned to run 51 commercials on CBS during the NCAA tournament alone. In addition, the advertising appeared on such cable networks as ESPN, CNN, A&E, and the History Channel. Within weeks after the television advertising began, the Indianapolis Star reported that the Conseco name was gradually being used by the company's subsidiaries and added to products, part of the move to publicize Conseco as a brand name. In April a $5 million print campaign followed in financial and news magazines.

OUTCOME

According to Victor Kimble, the Conseco account supervisor at Fallon McElligott, the campaign succeeded in getting the Conseco message out in a nontraditional way. Kimble believed that it put Conseco "on the awareness map" and "gave them the buzz they needed" to get started. Conseco used Fallon McElligott for its next wave of national advertising, created for television and print and launched almost exactly one year after the 1998 campaign. Kimble said that the strategy was refined for the 1999 campaign, which featured commercials in which a bride and groom were forced to cater their own wedding and a man in a wet suit went snorkeling for coins in a fountain to fund his retirement. The latter spot won a Silver Lion at the Cannes Film Festival in the product category of "investment, insurance and property development."

Observers judged Conseco's marketing efforts to the lower-income segment to be well-timed. According to James Bell, a senior partner with New York corporate brand specialist Lippencott & Margulies, there has been "a hiatus" in effective advertising to this market, with most marketing aimed toward "slicked-back guys with wire-rimmed glasses getting on airplanes in first class."

Stewart Stockdale, Conseco's executive vice president of marketing and strategic planning, said in July 1999 that he was "very pleased" with the recognition Conseco advertising was getting. "We are even more pleased that our campaign to build a nationwide consumer brand focusing on financial services for middle America—households with $25,000 to $75,000 in annual income—is working. Awareness of Conseco has doubled in the past year. Even more importantly, we've seen healthy increases in overall preference for our brand, in consumer receptivity to purchase our products, and in the number of positive traits consumers associate with our brand. Brand-building is a long-term effort, but we're off to a great start."

FURTHER READING

Ambrose, Eileen. "Conseco, Finish Line Make Tourney Advertising Campaigns Designed to Create National Brand-Awareness." Indianapolis Star, March 17, 1998, p. B6.

Baar, Aaron. "Fallon Launches National TV Effort for Conseco." Adweek (Midwest Edition), February 23, 1998, p. 3.

"Breaking: Conseco: Dollars and Sense." Advertising Age, March 9, 1998, p. 51.

"Conseco to Launch New Tagline." Fund Marketing Alert, November 30, 1998, p. 5.

"Conseco TV Commercial Receives Top Award at Cannes Festival," Business Wire, July 13, 1999.

Koenig, Bill. "Conseco Reports Sharp Rise in Earnings." Indianapolis Star, February 26, 1998, p. D1.

McMains, Andrew. "A Simple Plan." Adweek (Eastern Edition), February 22, 1999, p. 28.

Palmer, Joel. "Silliness Sells Securities." Business Record, March 29, 1999, p. 14.

Pletz, John. "Conseco Planning $25 Million Ad Blitz." Indianapolis Business Journal, January 19, 1998, p. A3.

"Road to Final Four Gets New Billboards; NCAA Hoop Commercials Shift From Macho to Money." Hartford Courant, March 26, 1999, p. D1.

Scism, Leslie. "Conseco Takes a Light Approach to Sell Serious Insurance Products." Wall Street Journal (Eastern Edition), March 3, 1998, p. B8.

Timmons, Heather. "Conseco Bids to Make a Bundle Selling to People at the Low End." American Banker, February 24, 1999, p. 4.

Debbi Mack

Cunard Line Limited

24303 Town Center Dr., Ste. 200
Valencia, California 91355
USA
Telephone: (800) 728-6273
Fax: (661) 284-4748
Web site: www.cunard.com

■■■

CAN YOU WAIT? CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Cunard Line Limited boasted one of the cruise industry's most storied pasts, having carried the Royal Mail across the Atlantic for England before building one of the grandest and most respected fleets of passenger ships during the early twentieth century. The rise of passenger aircraft, however, all but eliminated the demand for transatlantic ocean travel, and by the turn of the millennium Cunard had a fleet of two ships, only one of which continued to travel the once-prominent route between North America and Great Britain. The world's largest cruise-ship company, Carnival Corporation, purchased Cunard in 1998; later that year Cunard announced its plan to construct what would be the largest and most luxurious passenger ship of its time, the Queen Mary 2. The ship was slated to make regular transatlantic voyages, which would be evocative of the golden age of ocean travel, as well as select Caribbean, South American, and New England cruises. To build awareness about the new ship preparatory to its January 2004 maiden voyage, Cunard enlisted the New York office of ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day to helm a marketing campaign for 2003.

The campaign, budgeted at an estimated $8 million, began in spring 2003, with the intent of helping Cunard achieve full booking of Queen Mary 2 's maiden voyage and 60 percent booking on the rest of the ship's 2004 trips. Because construction of the ship was still underway, TBWA\Chiat\Day could not showcase the product itself, so the campaign instead conveyed the idea that a Queen Mary 2 voyage was an event worthy of intense anticipation. Print ads used images of overdressed women in everyday situations, such as a stylish mother serving her children breakfast while wearing a ball gown, together with the "Can You Wait?" tagline. To enhance the ship's upscale allure, the brand names of luxury products and services to be featured on the Queen Mary 2 itself were included in the ads' copy.

The Queen Mary 2 sold out its berths by July 2003, approximately four months after the campaign began, and the occupancy goals for the ship's entire 2004 schedule of voyages were exceeded shortly thereafter. The campaign won a Gold EFFIE Award in 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Cunard Line was established in 1839 as a transatlantic carrier of the Royal Mail from Britain to Canada and the United States, and by the early twentieth century it had expanded to become one of the world's premier shipping lines. Cunard lost 22 ships during World War I, including the Lusitania, whose sinking by German U-boats while crossing from New York to Liverpool contributed to America's entrance into the conflict. Transatlantic shipping's golden age came in the 1920s and 1930s, and Cunard remained a major player in the industry, employing the well-known marketing tagline "Getting There Is Half the Fun" during those years. In 1934 Cunard's Queen Mary became the first vessel ever launched by a member of the British royal family, Her Majesty Queen Mary (wife of the then-reigning king, George V), and the Queen Elizabeth was unveiled in 1938, named for Queen Elizabeth, wife of King George VI, who had assumed the throne. Winston Churchill credited his country's enlistment of these ships during World War II with shortening the conflict by at least a year. By the 1950s Cunard carried one-third of all passengers crossing the Atlantic, but at the end of that decade commercial passenger jets began making the transatlantic journey. Thus began the steady erosion of transatlantic boat travel until, by the late twentieth century, the practice seemed part of history. Though Cunard's Queen Elizabeth 2, which was introduced in 1969, continued to make transatlantic voyages, the company went through several changes of ownership and struggled to reinvent itself for a new age. Cunard was purchased in 1998 by cruise-ship giant Carnival, which hoped to leverage the brand's rich legacy and reputation for luxury in a bid to return the venerable line to profitability.

Among the centerpieces of Carnival's attempt to revive Cunard was the building of the largest and most luxurious passenger ship in existence, the Queen Mary 2, to take over the Queen Elizabeth 2 's transatlantic route in addition to making Caribbean voyages. Slated to make its maiden voyage in late 2003, the Queen Mary 2 was intended to appeal to nostalgia for the golden age of transatlantic ship travel while also updating the experience to suit the expectations of modern luxury vacationers. Not only was the Queen Mary 2 being prepared, at great expense, to travel a route that was nearly obsolete, but its construction also coincided with a sharp downturn in luxury travel as a result of a slowing U.S. economy and fears regarding terrorism. Complicating Cunard's new agenda even further was the fact of serious overcapacity within the cruise industry. After years of consistent fleet enlargement (plans largely put into place before the economic downturn), in the early 2000s cruise lines found themselves forced to cut fares dramatically to attract passengers. This was not, however, an option for the Queen Mary 2, which was billed as the jewel not just of Cunard's fleet but of the entire cruise industry.

HOW BIG? HOW MUCH?

Upon entering service in January 2004, the Cunard Line's Queen Mary 2 was the largest cruise ship ever built. It was almost as long as four football fields laid end to end, and its above-water height (accommodating 17 passenger decks) was the approximate equivalent of a 23-story building. Unsurprisingly, the Queen Mary 2, whose construction costs reached $800 million, was also the most expensive ship ever built.

TARGET MARKET

Because the Queen Mary 2 represented an occupancy increase of 60 percent for the Cunard fleet (which consisted of two other ships at the time), it was imperative that with the new campaign TBWA\Chiat\Day expand Cunard's target market not just for the initial months after the ship's christening but also in the long run. The agency sought out these new customers among wealthy, status-conscious Americans who already owned and had experienced many of the things they wanted in life. Such people, the agency deduced, had traveled widely and frequently traveled outside the United States. Their travels were characterized by a need to take ever more exotic or impressive vacations, at least partly because of the bragging rights this gave them among others in their social class. Though jaded in many ways, this target group still sought out proximity to famous and prestigious people, brands, and experiences.

Thanks to its upscale legacy, the Cunard brand had the potential to satisfy the traveling desires of this market, and Cunard augmented its brand strength by partnering with other upscale names, including Veuve Clicquot (the makers of a renowned champagne), Canyon Ranch (a luxury spa company), and Todd English (a Boston-based celebrity chef). This gathering of upscale brands, mentioned in the ads' copy, was meant to work together with the idea of anticipation communicated by the ads' imagery and tagline to make a Queen Mary 2 cruise alluring to the status-conscious target.

Cunard mixed traditional and modern in its choice of brand partners as well as in its onboard amenities—for instance, the Queen Mary 2 had a grand staircase and furnishings evocative of the stately ships of an earlier age, and each cabin was outfitted with a high-speed Internet connection. This blend of classic and cutting-edge was a further reflection of the target market's desires and expectations. While Cunard specifically appealed to consumers' desire to step back in time to a supposedly more elegant and ceremonious age, these consumers did not want to sacrifice the comfort and convenience available to them in the present.

COMPETITION

Cunard's corporate parent, Carnival Corporation of Miami, owned many of the top cruise lines in American and European markets during this time, including Princess Cruises, the Holland America Line, and the world's most popular and profitable cruise brand, Carnival Cruise Lines. Of these brands, Carnival Cruise Lines, which marketed comparatively affordable cruises to a mainstream audience, had by far the highest marketing profile. For decades prior to the turn of the millennium, Carnival had cultivated a positioning as "The Fun Ships," and in 1985 it used this brand image in the first-ever cruise-industry spots to appear on network television. The commercials featured celebrity spokesperson Kathie Lee Gifford (then Kathie Lee Johnson) singing about the Carnival experience. After moving away from this strategy in the late 1990s, Carnival experimented with reality-based advertising in the 2000s before returning to an emphasis on its "Fun Ship" identity.

The world's second-largest cruise company, Miami-based Royal Caribbean Cruises Ltd., was responsible for perhaps the most noteworthy cruise-industry advertising campaign of the early 2000s. The company offered trips to the Caribbean as well as to Alaska, Europe, and elsewhere. Having indulged significantly in the fleet expansion characteristic of the cruise industry in the late 1990s, and with further expansion planned for the 2000s, Royal Caribbean's namesake line, Royal Caribbean International, addressed the inevitable need to expand its target market by crafting a new and more vibrant brand image in a long-running campaign tagged "Get Out There." In an attempt to change the popular notion that cruise vacations were for the elderly, the campaign's TV spots employed fast-paced cutting between images of adventurous off-ship activities together with the high-energy Iggy Pop rock song "Lust for Life." This repositioning was considered a success, and the average age of Royal Caribbean customers dropped substantially. The problem of industry overcapacity, however, remained.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Can You Wait?" was budgeted at approximately $8 million. The Queen Mary 2 's maiden voyage was firmly scheduled for January 2004 (the preliminary completion date of late 2003 having been revised during the ship's construction); the marketing campaign accordingly debuted in spring 2003. Its central goals were to generate sufficient awareness to sell out the maiden voyage and to sell 60 percent of the berths for the Queen Mary 2's entire 2004 schedule. In addition to the difficulties stemming from industry overcapacity and the waning taste for transatlantic ocean travel, TBWA\Chiat\Day faced the challenge of marketing a product that did not yet exist. Though the Queen Mary 2 promised to set an industry standard for grandeur and elegance, it was under construction during the campaign's run and so could not be used to supply visual examples of that grandeur and elegance.

TBWA\Chiat\Day thus settled on anticipation as the campaign's controlling theme. Building on the idea that vacationers enjoyed anticipating their travels as much as the travels themselves, the agency employed imagery and copy meant to stimulate desire for the experience of crossing the Atlantic on the Queen Mary 2 while allowing prospective travelers to imagine the exact nature of the experience for themselves. The resulting print ads ran in trade magazines as well as national consumer magazines owned by Condé Nast, including Gourmet, Vanity Fair, W, Bon Appétit, Architectural Digest, the New Yorker, and Condé Nast Traveler. The consumer ads each featured an image of a woman dramatically overdressed for her commonplace surroundings. One ad, for instance, showed a woman serving breakfast to her children while wearing a full-length ball gown. Another showed a husband and wife in bed, the husband shirtless under the bedcovers and the wife sleeping beside him in a ball gown and high heels. Copy included the "Can You Wait?" tagline, the brand names of Cunard's luxury-product partners, and the Cunard and Queen Mary 2 logos. Together—and especially as buzz began to build about the Queen Mary 2 —these elements suggested the idea that a voyage on the new ship was an event worthy of anticipation of the highest degree.

As part of the marketing agreement that resulted in the exclusive placement of Queen Mary 2 ads in Condé Nast magazines, TBWA\Chiat\Day and the publisher designed promotional events geared to the readership of each title. The campaign also included direct-mail and online components in keeping with the overall theme.

OUTCOME

By July 2003 Cunard had sold all 2,620 berths for the Queen Mary 2 's January 2004 maiden voyage. This represented the earliest sellout for any voyage in Cunard's long and storied history, as well as an industry-wide record for the number of berths sold before a ship's construction had been completed. Bookings for all of 2004 substantially exceeded Cunard's precampaign goals. Surveys involving readers of Architectural Digest, one of the publications in which the "Can You Wait?" ads ran, revealed that 69 percent of those surveyed recalled the Queen Mary 2 ads; according to the survey results the ads also ranked first among ads in the magazine for attracting and holding readers' attention. Cunard's own research supported these findings across the group of publications in which the ads ran. More than 50 percent of passengers booked for 2004 Queen Mary 2 vacations had not previously sailed on a Cunard ship. "Can You Wait?" was awarded a Gold EFFIE Award in 2004 in the Travel/Tourism/Destination category. The EFFIE Awards, one of the most prestigious events in the advertising industry, were hosted annually by the New York American Marketing Association.

FURTHER READING

Birmingham, Stephen. "Unflappable New York, Wide-Eyed at Last." New York Times, May 2, 2004.

Davidson, Carla. "Long Live the Queens." American Heritage, September 2005.

Elliott, Stuart. "Cunard Selects TBWA\Chiat\Day." New York Times, July 27, 2001.

Goetzl, David. "Cunard Sets Sight on a Bygone Era." Advertising Age, December 11, 2000.

Griswold, Alicia. "Carnival Calls Review for Cunard." Adweek, May 7, 2001.

Schama, Simon. "Sail Away." New Yorker, May 31, 2004.

Scull, Theode W. "Queen Mary 2." Cruise Travel, May/June 2004.

Wakin, Daniel J. "Restoring the Queens' Glamour." New York Times, August 19, 2001.

White, Randy Wayne. "Fine Liner." Outside, October 2004.

Young, Susan J. "Crowning a Queen." Travel Agent Magazine, March 24, 2003.

Mark Lane

CVS Corporation

One CVS Drive
Woonsocket, Rhode Island 02895
USA
Telephone: (401) 765-1500
Fax: (401) 766-2917
Web site: www.cvs.com

■■■

LIFE TO THE FULLEST CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 CVS Corporation's drugstore chain, CVS/pharmacy, was approaching its 40th anniversary, and as a result of steady growth it was nipping at the heels of the nation's number one drugstore chain, Walgreens. Although much of CVS's growth had been the result of acquisitions and was limited to specific regions of the United States, including New England and the Northeast, the drugstore chain was planning a push for national expansion. To reach consumers in markets where CVS was a new face as well as to enhance its brand image in areas where consumers were familiar with the chain, CVS turned to its advertising agency, Boston-based Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos (often called Hill Holliday).

The campaign Hill Holliday created, ''Life to the Fullest,'' was CVS's first national campaign. It was designed to enhance the company's brand image as well as shift its marketing focus from products to consumer lifestyles. A budget was unavailable, but CVS typically spent about $35 million a year on advertising. Included in the campaign were television spots that aired on cable and network channels that had a large female audience. Print ads also appeared in People magazine, which had a high female readership. Both print ads and TV spots featured people in environments such as a living room, a restaurant, and a public restroom, but with store-aisle markers hanging over their heads that listed each person's recent purchases and the benefits of buying the items at a CVS store.

While the campaign failed to garner any industry awards, it did capture the attention of consumers. Following its launch CVS reported an 8.7 percent increase in sales over the previous year and a 73 percent jump in net income for the same time period. Hill Holliday's efforts on behalf of the drugstore chain were recognized by the magazine Advertising Age, which named the company one of its Advertising Agencies of the Year for 2002. Praise for the campaign also came from Adweek. The magazine described one television spot as a refreshing change from the routine ''ho-hum'' advertising in the retail-beauty-products segment.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

When Ralph Hoagland and brothers Stanley and Sidney Goldstein opened the first CVS store in 1963 in Lowell, Massachusetts, the business offered busy consumers a one-stop shop for a variety of over-the-counter healthcare products and beauty aids. Four years later the company added prescription drugs to its product mix when it opened pharmacies in its stores. By 1970 the chain had 100 stores serving customers throughout the northeastern United States. Without abandoning the vision of its founders, which was focused on meeting the needs of customers, the company began expanding. At the end of 1989 the chain reported 789 stores and sales of $1.95 billion. In the 1990s acquisitions and consolidations of small regional chains—including in 1990 the Peoples Drug Stores with 500 stores, in 1997 the Revco chain with 2,552 stores, and in 1998 Arbor Drugs with 207 stores—boosted CVS to the United States' number two drugstore chain in outlets and sales, behind Walgreens. In 1996 the chain changed its name to CVS Corporation. CVS was originally the acronym of the stores' name, Consumer Value Stores, but as the business evolved, company executives said that the CVS stood for Customer, Value, and Service.

As CVS grew, it used a variety of marketing strategies to reach consumers in the markets where the chain was expanding. In 2000, working with the tagline "Care that touches everyone, one at a time," CVS promoted the idea that its business was based on customer service. A CVS in-house team created print advertising, from sales signs displayed in stores to newspaper ads and weekly circulars. Television and radio spots were created by the chain's advertising agency, New York–based Bates USA, which had signed on with CVS in 1997. CVS initiated its ExtraCare customer-loyalty-card program in 2001, supporting its introduction with a marketing campaign created by Boston-based agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos. The ExtraCare launch was successful, and as CVS planned a national expansion into new markets, it dropped Bates USA and shifted its advertising work to Hill Holliday. The chain's first national brand-image campaign, themed "Life to the Fullest," was released in 2002.

REDESIGNED CVS STORES TO ENHANCE WOMEN'S SHOPPING EXPERIENCE

Hoping to appeal to women, its core audience, CVS Corporation began a makeover of its drugstore chain in 2004. Among the planned changes were cheerful turquoise and magenta walls and short shelves that enabled a woman of average height (five feet four) to see all over the store in a quick glance. An open path at the entrance of each store was designed to allow busy moms to avoid having to traverse a cluttered maze of aisles. To further pamper busy women, remodeled stores would have a beauty counter staffed by trained cosmetics and skin-care consultants. The chain's newest marketing strategy was expected to help add to the more than three million customers who shopped at CVS stores each day.

TARGET MARKET

CVS conducted market research to help identify the target market for the chain's new advertising campaign. The research included reviewing data from 45 million members of the chain's ExtraCare loyalty-card program, for which advertising and marketing had been created by Boston advertising agency Hill Holliday in 2001. The ExtraCare program offered customers rebates on purchases while enabling CVS to track buying trends. The data identified three customer profiles: young moms in their 30s, working mothers in their 40s with older children living at home, and retired women in their 60s and older. Data also revealed income levels of the average shopper, how much they typically spent each time they visited a CVS store, and what nonprescription products they usually purchased. Based on the information, the "Life to the Fullest" campaign was designed to appeal to women in a variety of age groups and incomes, but it specifically targeted the chain's core customer, working mothers of all ages. The campaign was also intended to create an emotional link to the women it targeted and sought to reinforce the idea that CVS understood women and their shopping needs. Reporting for Drug Store News, Rob Eder noted that, although the ads emphasized the quickness and efficiency of shopping at CVS, they also strove to avoid making the shopping experience seem dull.

COMPETITION

Walgreens, founded in 1901, was the United States' number one drugstore chain based on sales. Although CVS, with $24.2 billion in annual sales in 2003, was closing in on Walgreens, the older chain clung to its top spot. At the end of 2003 Walgreens operated 4,291 drugstores and reported annual sales of $32.5 billion. To encourage customers to shop the stores' front end (an industry term for the part of the store that was not the pharmacy) for a wide variety of nonprescription items and to send the message that the chain was more than a place to pick up prescription medications, in 2002 Walgreens released a marketing campaign themed "Perfect." Created by Omnicom Group's Chicago-based division, Downtown Partners, the television spots sent the message that Walgreens offered shoppers convenience, good service, and large product selection. The spots were set in the mythical village of Perfect and showed a dreamy image of everyone doing things they were supposed to do and everything working out right.

At the end of the spots a voice-over noted, ''Of course, we don't live in Perfect, so we have Walgreens, where we can get what's needed for the real world.'' Not wanting to abandon its pharmacies, which accounted for about 64 percent of the chain's annual sales, Walgreens in 2002 introduced a second campaign that focused on the pharmacy aspect. The campaign was referred to as ''Rx Safety Net'' and was designed to differentiate Walgreens pharmacies from the competition and show the benefits of choosing Walgreens for prescription-drug services.

The number three drugstore chain, Rite Aid Corporation, owned 3,400 stores in 2003 and had annual sales of $16 billion. Despite falling in behind CVS and Walgreens, Rite Aid reported that its front-end business was one of the strongest in the chain-drugstore industry. One of Rite Aid's goals was to further build its pharmacy business by encouraging front-end shoppers to become pharmacy customers. John Learish, the chain's senior vice president of marketing, told Chain Drug Review, ''The brand starts with the pharmacy. It's the heart and soul of what we do.'' With that in mind, rather than devising marketing campaigns to drive pharmacy customers to shop the front ends of their stores, as CVS and Walgreens did, in 2003 Rite Aid took a different approach. The chain released a campaign themed ''With Us It's Personal,'' which focused on its pharmacy services and the relationship customers had with in-store pharmacists and sales associates. In addition, the campaign intentionally lacked a catchy tagline because, Learish noted, ''The customer is pretty savvy. A slogan alone won't do it.'' He added that the effort was more than an advertising campaign: ''It's a new approach to the way we do business.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

Before planning its new marketing campaign, CVS and its ad agency, Hill Holliday, invested time in market and consumer research to determine everything from who they should target to what products the consumer was shopping for during stops in CVS stores. Working with the data gathered, Hill Holliday created the ''Life to the Fullest'' campaign. It began in October 2002 with a series of six television spots and a dozen print ads. No budget was available, but a report in Adweek noted that the drugstore chain spent approximately $35 million annually on advertising.

Television spots aired in the morning during network news programs, including Good Morning America and Today. During prime time the spots were shown on cable networks with a large female audience, such as Lifetime, the Food Network, and Home and Garden Television, as well as during programs that attracted a younger female audience, including Survivor, The West Wing, and Gilmore Girls. Spots relied on visual techniques to show viewers how products available in CVS stores could enhance their lives and how shopping at the chain could save them time. Each spot placed a typical shopper in her normal environment, but with a CVS store-aisle marker over her head. On the aisle marker's left side was a list of the shopper's CVS purchases, and on its right side was a list of the benefits the person derived from shopping at the chain. In one spot a woman flirted with a handsome 20-something guy at a nightclub. The left side of the aisle marker above her head read, ''Calcium, Iron Supply, Haircolor,'' while the right side stated, with each phrase on a separate line, ''Still / Grooving / At 50.'' When the woman turned away from the man and toward the camera, it was evident she was no longer a 20-something. Another spot showed a woman ready to relax in a peaceful swimming pool. The left side of the aisle marker over her head stated, ''SunBlock, Lip Balm, and Skin Care,'' while the right side read, ''And Hubby / Has the / Kids.'' A spot targeting older women had a couple of senior ladies showing off a confident and playful attitude while primping in a public restroom with cosmetics purchased at a CVS store.

Print ads, which ran in People magazine, followed a format similar to the television spots. One ad featured a woman sitting on her living-room sofa while she gave herself a manicure and pedicure. The aisle marker over her head read, ''Cotton balls, nail polish, chocolate, extra bucks can be extra indulgent.'' Another print ad showed a couple sitting in the candlelit booth of a romantic restaurant. The woman was holding a present, and the aisle marker above her head stated, ''Greeting cards. Gift wrap. Chocolate. He's finally getting it.''

OUTCOME

Following the 2002 launch of the ''Life to the Fullest'' campaign, CVS reported a chainwide upswing in sales. According to a report in Chain Drug Review, in 2001 CVS had failed to meet its business goals, reaching just $413.2 million in net income. But in 2002 the company's net income increased 73.4 percent to $716.6 million. Further indication that the campaign was helping drive consumers into CVS/pharmacy stores was a jump in 2002 sales to $22.2 billion, an 8.7 percent increase over 2001 sales. In 2003 Advertising Age magazine named Hill Holliday one its Agencies of the Year, in part for its creative efforts on CVS's ''Life to the Fullest'' campaign. A report in Adweek praised the television spot that showed elderly women primping together in a public restroom with cosmetics purchased at a CVS drugstore for injecting life into what was typically a ''ho-hum retail segment.''

FURTHER READING

"Ads Tout Belief in Customer Service (CVS Corp. Advertising Strategy)." Chain Drug Review, December 11, 2000.

Aoki, Naomi. "CVS to Undergo Makeover; Drugstore Chain Redesigns Stores with Women in Mind." Boston Globe, May 2, 2004.

"CVS Makes Things Easy for Customers." Chain Drug Review, July 21, 2003.

"CVS Names Hill, Holliday as Lead Ad Agency." Business Wire, June 19, 2002.

Eder, Rob. "CVS Breaks New Lifestyle-Oriented Ads." Drug Store News, October 21, 2002.

Gatlin, Greg. "CVS Aims Ads at Busy Women." The Boston Herald, October 10, 2002.

Gianatasio, David. "CVS to Live 'Life to the Fullest'." Adweek, October 19, 2002.

"Hill, Holliday, CVS National Campaign: 'Life to the Fullest'." Adweek, October 14, 2002.

Kirk, Jim. "Chicago Tribune Marketing Column." Chicago Tribune, January 10, 2002.

"New Campaigns: Cleaning Up on Aisle Seven, Eight, Nine . . ." Brandweek, October 21, 2002.

"Rite Aid Aims to Break Out from the Pack (Building a New Rite Aid)." Chain Drug Review, October 27, 2003.

"Time-Starved People Need Good, Quick Service." Chain Drug Review, July 21, 2003.

"TV Spots Highlight Convenience." Chain Drug Review, April 29, 2002.

Rayna Bailey

Cyan Worlds Inc.

14617 Newport Hwy.
Mead, Washington 99021-9378
USA
Telephone: (509) 468-0807
Fax: (509) 467-2209
Web site: www.riven.com

■■■

RIVEN CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1999 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, the Riven product was acquired by Cyan Worlds Inc. The essay continues to refer to The Learning Company, as they owned Riven when the campaign was launched.

An advertising campaign that used spectacular screen shots from Riven: The Sequel to Myst helped make the product the leading computer game in the United States within two months of its release. Riven and its phenomenally successful predecessor, Myst, were the two most popular PC games in 1997, and they remained among the highest-ranked computer games throughout 1998. Like Myst, Riven was a nonviolent adventure game that involved the exploration of fabulous islands and the solving of puzzles to the accompaniment of an eerily beautiful sound track. Advertisements for Riven emphasized that it was a continuation of the mysterious story introduced in the first game. One television commercial began with a close-up of a book embellished with curious symbols that swept the audience into a world full of abandoned structures, towering cliffs, meandering pathways, and intriguing machines, all new but similar to the sights gamers had found on the islands of Myst. The campaign also included radio commercials, print ads, and a network of hyperlinks on the Internet. In addition, promotions for Riven had begun building anticipation a year before the game was released in October 1997. The campaign for Riven, which ran during 1997 and 1998, was developed by Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising. The game was designed by Cyan, Inc., was published by Brøderbund Software, Inc., and was marketed by Brøderbund's Red Orb Entertainment division.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Cyan was a software development company founded in 1988 in Spokane, Washington, by brothers Rand and Robyn Miller and a friend, Chris Brandkamp. Richard Vander Wendelater joined Cyan to help develop Riven. The firm's early successes included three games for children: Spelunx and the Caves of Mr. Seudo, Manhole, and Cosmic Osmo. The publisher of Myst and Riven, Brøderbund, was founded in 1980 by brothers Doug and Gary Carlston to market their computer games Galactic Empire and Galactic Trader. The firm soon became widely known for its imaginative games and for its interactive software for homes, schools, and small businesses. The company's most successful products included Family Tree Maker, Print Shop, Living Books, 3D Home Series, and an educational game named Carmen Sandiego. Brøderbund's Red Orb Entertainment division, formed in 1997, developed high-quality computer games, and it published and marketed entertainment software made by Cyan and other companies. Red Orb's most successful games included Warlords, The Journeyman Project, and Prince of Persia.

When Myst was launched in October 1993, it was among the first CD-ROM games with three-dimensional graphics. This technological breakthrough allowed consumers to enjoy realistic adventures on their personal computers. In addition to its groundbreaking animation, Myst featured a hauntingly beautiful sound track and an intriguing concept. The player was transported to five mystical islands complete with deserted buildings, a spaceship, a sailing ship, a lighthouse, and a tree with an elevator in it. By piecing together clues and using logic to operate generators and other equipment, the player solved a mystery involving the family that had built the structures. Although players felt a sense of suspense while exploring the islands, the game involved no violence. Myst was regarded as one of the most "immersive" games of its day, making players feel as if they had actually entered an alternate reality. At the time a computer game was considered successful if it sold a total of 100,000 copies, but Myst sold half a million copies in its first year. Also impressive was its continued success over time. It was the third most popular software of any kind in 1995, its sales surpassed only by Quicken and the program to upgrade Microsoft Windows. By the spring of 1998 consumers had purchased more than 4 million copies of Myst, making it the best selling CD-ROM entertainment title to date. By the fifth anniversary of its release approximately two copies of Myst had been sold for every minute the game was on the market. People who had enjoyed Myst waited with great excitement for the release of Riven: The Sequel to Myst in the fall of 1997.

RELATED PROMOTIONS

Other promotions ran in conjunction with the advertising campaign for Riven. Sound tracks to computer games were sometimes sold to generate publicity and additional revenues from consumers who did not own computers but who wanted to experience part of what the games had to offer. By February 1998, when Virgin Records and Cyan, Inc., released the sound track to Riven: The Sequel to Myst, consumers had already purchased 70,000 copies of the Myst sound track by mail order. The music of Myst was released for sale through retail outlets in April 1998. Only 300 units of the Riven sound track sold during the first week, but Cyan expected sales to increase over time, since games tended to remain popular for years. To commemorate the fifth anniversary of the release of Myst in October 1998, Red Orb Entertainment began marketing Ages of Myst, a software package that included Myst, Riven, a video that discussed the making of Riven, a dedication from the brothers who had created the titles, and a journal in which players could take notes to help them solve puzzles in the games. Ages of Myst was promoted with its own seven-figure advertising campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Traditionally marketed toward young males, many computer games were promoted with advertisements that emphasized violence, but the campaign for Riven emphasized the mystery and beauty of a surreal world. Although male consumers 18 to 45 years old were a primary market for Riven, Myst had also been unusually successful with a mainstream audience of women (who accounted for about a third of its sales), children, and older people. The campaign for Riven targeted the millions of people who had already purchased the first game, and it was designed to entice consumers who had heard about Myst but never played it. In fact, Riven was expected to attract a large number of people who seldom played computer games. It was designed for consumers with various skill levels and various reasons for playing. Some enjoyed exploring a realistic fantasy world as if they were experiencing an adventure vacation. Others were more interested in solving logical problems. Riven required little manual dexterity, only the ability to point and click with a computer mouse, and its lack of violence made it an appealing choice for families. Because of its complex puzzles, however, it was intended primarily for adults who liked to think.

COMPETITION

In 1997 North American retail sales of computer games reached $5.1 billion. During the first half of 1998 the computer gaming industry grew by about 30 percent. Sony Corporation's PlayStation and other console video games designed to be played on television sets had dominated the emerging industry for years, but as more consumers purchased personal computers with CD-ROM drives and other technological innovations, computer games became increasingly popular. By the late 1990s thousands of titles were available, including chess, flight simulators, games that mimicked football and other sports, adventures that used characters and settings from motion pictures, and games designed for small children. Some of the most popular titles involved graphic violence, while others revolved around such intellectual challenges as the building of cities and the solving of puzzles. In 1998 Scrabble, Monopoly Game, and Frogger—all marketed by Hasbro Interactive—were among the top 20 computer games. The leading title in 1998 was StarCraft, marketed by Havas Interactive, Inc., which also marketed the popular Diablo and Titanic: Adventure out of Time.

Riven and Myst were generally considered to be part of the strategy, action, and adventure segments of the industry, which included games that simulated wars and big-game hunting. Two of the most widely known titles in the segment were Doom and Quake (both made by id Software, Inc.), which required players to navigate mazes while gunning down enemies. Quake II ranked 16th out of the top 20 PC games in 1998. Another long-running favorite, Tomb Raider, was in 12th place in 1997 but dropped out of the top 20 in 1998. The game, marketed by Eidos Interactive, starred a scantily clad heroine with a flair for gunfights and gymnastics. Some action games featured battling knights, dragons, and other fantasy characters who fought with primitive weapons. ''Heft your broadsword and mete out punishment in a purely medieval manner!'' proclaimed the text in an advertisement for King's Quest, marketed by Sierra On-Line, Inc. In science fiction games the player was often pitted against futuristic weapons and gigantic robots in a fight to dominate entire worlds. ''The wreckage just doesn't stop!'' read the headline in a magazine advertisement for Total Annihilation, marketed by Cavedog Entertainment, a division of Humongous Entertainment, Inc. Two products related to the Star Wars series of motion pictures—Jedi Knight: Dark Forces II and X-Wing vs. TIE Fighter—were among the top 20 PC games of 1997. Both were marketed by LucasArts Entertainment Company, which also made the popular adventure game Grim Fandango.

Other adventure games more closely resembled Myst and Riven. Timelapse, marketed by Hammerhead Entertainment, a division of Barracuda, Inc., involved a search for a missing archaeologist and the discovery that ancient civilizations in Egypt and the Americas had been in contact with beings from another planet. An advertisement in Family PC magazine showed beautiful, colorful scenes from the game, including an artist's rendition of a technologically advanced Atlantis, a Mayan pyramid, and a boat docked beside an Egyptian temple. A game named Temujin, developed by SouthPeak Interactive, was launched in mid-October 1997, allowing its promoters to take advantage of the publicity surrounding the release of Riven two weeks later. Like Riven, Temujin was a nonviolent adventure with high-quality graphic art, a series of puzzles to solve, and no action figures. SouthPeak's $650,000 advertising campaign in print media and on the Internet, launched in March 1997, called attention to the similarities and differences between Temujin and Riven.

MARKETING STRATEGY

After four years of product development and one year of publicity to build anticipation, the advertising campaign for Riven broke late in the summer of 1997. The game itself was released on Halloween amid great excitement from consumers, who looked forward to purchasing the sequel to Myst. Although extensive advertising for a CD-ROM game was unusual, the promotional campaign from Saatchi & Saatchi included public relations support, network and cable television commercials, radio spots, and ads in Rolling Stone and other magazines for young adults. Brøderbund budgeted $10 million for the marketing effort, half for traditional advertising media and half for Internet promotions. On the World Wide Web a network of hyperlinks led consumers to numerous so-called immersive sites, where they could sample demonstration versions of the game. To generate suspense, these sites were launched in succession over a period of time. Other sites provided fans with background information about the worlds and characters in Riven, and they listed related merchandise such as daggers and costumes that consumers could purchase. The marketing plan included agreements with on-line gaming sites and search engines, including Excite, Webcrawler, and Yahoo!, to lead consumers to Riven promotions. In addition, Red Orb Entertainment formed a retail marketing partnership with Toshiba Corporation to make shoppers aware of Riven and to provide opportunities for the public to try a demonstration of the game. Early in 1998 consumers who purchased Riven also received a demonstration version of a new Brøderbund game named Journeyman Project 3: Legacy of Time. The retail promotions helped Riven compete for valuable display space in the 19,000 stores in which it was sold.

Television commercials used scenes from Riven to give consumers a quick, intriguing tour of an alternative reality full of water, cliffs, peculiar buildings, and sophisticated machinery. In one spot a narrator said, ''The grounds have been prepared, the paths raked. Everyone and everything is in place. All is in its final state of readiness. You may enter whenever you choose. Leaving, however, is another matter.'' The commercial opened by showing a book on a golden circle. To the sound of eerie music, the turning of pages, and water dripping in a vast cavern, the book opened to show a black rectangle in which a watery world suddenly materialized. The audience was swept inside, flying past the rocky shore of an island and along a walkway to a strange round structure. The scene shifted to a view from inside a dark cave, looking through a rickety gate. The camera moved outside and climbed a pathway meandering up a hill. A new scene showed a whalelike animal waving its fins in the air and then shifted to a narrow opening in another dark cave, looking out on sunbeams illuminating a ship's wooden deck and rigging. The camera seemed to drop as an elevator descended quickly, revealing glimpses of towering rock formations, blue sky, and mysterious shadows. The elevator stopped at a pathway leading to another curious structure. The scene switched back to the book, which slammed shut with a loud bang while mysterious music played. Fire and darkness gave way to a picture of the game's box and the words "Riven. The Sequel to Myst" on a black background with mist drifting across it.

OUTCOME

In 1997 Riven was the most popular game for both PC and Macintosh users, and Myst was the second most popular PC game. PC Data reported that, in the seven years the company had tracked software sales, Riven was the first entertainment title to reach number one in the category in just over two months. Consumers purchased more than 95,000 copies of Riven on its first day in stores, generating $4.4 million in sales. More than 474,000 copies of Riven were sold within the first month after its release in October 1997. By March 1998 sales of Riven had skyrocketed to approximately 1.5 million copies. By the end of 1998 Riven had dropped to 11th place on the computer game charts, and Myst had slipped to 3rd. At that time the average retail price for Myst had been discounted to $18 (down from $47 in 1996), while Riven's average price was $39. Riven was widely acclaimed and won a 1998 craft award for outstanding achievement in art and graphics from the Academy of Interactive Arts and Sciences. Cyan planned to recap the story line of the two games in novels and was considering a feature film.

Robyn Miller retained his position as co-owner of Cyan but also in 1998 founded Land of Point, a firm that developed computer-animated feature films with the same type of geographic and cultural detail as those found in Myst and Riven. In 1997 Cyan had an estimated $20 million in sales, up 33.3 percent over 1996. In 1998 Brøderbund's Red Orb Entertainment division introduced a new action game, Warbreeds, a combination of fantasy and science fiction that used real-time strategy and characters with complex backgrounds. Aimed primarily at adults, Warbreeds involved the building of structures and the harnessing of power, but unlike Riven, it included violent battles and interaction with alien creatures.

The success of Riven, supported by the continued demand for Myst, was the primary reason Brøderbund had revenues of $81.3 million during the first eight months the game was on the market, compared to $21.8 million for the same period in the previous year. Nevertheless, the company reported a net loss of $2.7 million for the financial quarter that ended on May 31, 1998. The cost of royalties for Riven and Myst contributed to the loss. In addition, the company had increased its sales and marketing budget by about 38 percent, including a 77 percent increase in its advertising budget. In September another software firm, the Learning Company, acquired Brøderbund with a stock swap valued at $420 million. The Learning Company moved Riven to its Mindscape Entertainment division, which marketed an assortment of action games. By the end of the year the Learning Company had become a division of Mattel, Inc., one of the largest firms in the toy industry.

FURTHER READING

Armstrong, Larry, and Steve Hamm. "CD-ROMs: The Giants Rule." Business Week, October 6, 1997, p. 156.

Browder, Seanna. "More Magic from the Makers of Myst?" Business Week, October 5, 1997, p. 160.

Gatland, Laura. "Big Game Hunting: 'Temujin' Fights 'Riven' for a Piece of the CD-ROM Game Market." Marketing News, January 5, 1998, p. 1.

Guttman, Monika. "Two Mavericks Become Moguls: The Miller Brothers Are Working Hard to Create a Sequel to 'Myst,' Their Bestselling CD-ROM Game." U.S. News & World Report, January 15, 1996, p. 48.

Kelly, Sean. "Rand Miller: Riven Driven." Computer Life, April 1997, p. 46.

Langberg, Mike. "'Riven' Succeeds Computer Game Sensation 'Myst,'" Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, November 4, 1997.

McCabe, Kathy. "Video Game Wars: Hasbro Interactive Fights for Share in Crowded Market." Boston Globe, June 2, 1999, p. D1.

Scally, Robert. "PC, Video Game Software Sales Hit Record High in 1997." Discount Store News, March 9, 1998, p. 65.

Shatz-Akin, Jim. "Not to Be Myst." Computer Life, January 1998, p. 121.

Thomas, Susan Gregory. "Good, Clean Adult Fun: Not Every Exciting PC Game Has to Involve Mayhem." U.S. News & World Report, November 24, 1997, p. 119.

Warner, Bernhard. "ROM Realm." Brandweek, February 17, 1997, p. 1.

White, Ron. "Adventure." PC/Computing, December 1997, p. 320.

Susan Risland

DaimlerChrysler Corp.

1000 Chrysler Dr.
Auburn Hills, Michigan 48326-2766
USA
Telephone: (248) 576-5741
Web site: www.daimlerchrysler.com

■■■

EMPLOYEE PRICING PLAN PLUS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Chrysler Group, based in Auburn Hills, Michigan, was the American subsidiary of DaimlerChrysler, responsible for the sales, marketing, and manufacturing of vehicles from the Dodge, Chrysler, and Jeep brands. In 2005 one of Chrysler's key competitors, the General Motors Corporation (GM), had planned a major sales initiative that combined price reductions with rebates and promised to make the price of GM vehicles extremely competitive. In an attempt to head off this move the Chrysler Group developed its own program, Employee Pricing Plan Plus, slated for June 2005. The initiative combined regular rebates (cash-back programs for consumers purchasing vehicles) with 4 to 5 percent discounts on the factory price. This led to price reductions of thousands of dollars for certain vehicles.

To spread the word about this new program the Chrysler Group asked its primary advertising agency, BBDO Detroit, to develop a campaign that would alert a wide audience to the steep discounts on Chrysler vehicles. BBDO decided to reach into the automaker's past and bring back Lee Iacocca to serve as the company's spokesperson. Iacocca, who from 1978 to 1992 served as president and then as chairman of Chrysler Group's predecessor, the Chrysler Corporation, had starred in a number of successful television spots on behalf of the automaker during the 1980s. The new spots, however, featured Iacocca in situations unfamiliar to those who remembered him from earlier campaigns. Instead of seriously addressing the camera, Iacocca informed consumers about the Employee Pricing Plan Plus through onscreen discussions with entertainers, his granddaughter (played by an actress), and a television set. One particularly memorable spot featured Iacocca playing golf with gangster-rap pioneer Snoop Dogg. The campaign also used print ads, which did not feature Iacocca.

The campaign was a success. July 2005 sales increased 32 percent over the same month in 2004, convincing Chrysler to extend the Employee Pricing Plan Plus until the end of the model year. Sales for the entire year were up about 5 percent.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Chrysler Group was a subsidiary of the Germany-based automaker DaimlerChrysler. Headquartered in Auburn Hills, Michigan, the Chrysler Group was responsible for selling vehicles in the Dodge, Chrysler, and Jeep brands. It was created following the 1998 merger between the Chrysler Corporation and Daimler-Benz. Daimler-Benz itself was formed in 1926 through the merger of two German automakers. While Chrysler had been struggling when it joined forces with Daimler-Benz, by 2004 the company was reporting solid sales growth. That year the Chrysler Group sold more than 2.2 million units of its Chrysler, Jeep, and Dodge vehicles, a 4 percent increase from the previous year. The best-selling Chrysler Group vehicle in 2004 was the Dodge Ram pickup, 426,000 of which were moved that year.

The Chrysler Corporation was founded in 1925 by Walter P. Chrysler. Along with the Ford Motor Company and the General Motors Corporation, Chrysler was known as one of the ''Big Three'' U.S. automobile manufacturers that dominated the international automotive industry through much of the twentieth century. By the 1970s, however, Chrysler was in serious trouble, and it reached near bankruptcy in 1980. The company was saved from bankruptcy in part by a 1980 bailout from the federal government that was engineered by Chrysler's new top executive, Lee Iacocca.

Iacocca became president of Chrysler in 1978 and chairman of the company one year later. In addition to securing federal support, he made substantial changes to how the company operated. He streamlined its management structure by removing many of the company's executives, and he cut costs by negotiating with the powerful United Auto Workers union to institute a reduction in wages and benefits.

By 1983 the company was making enough of a profit to repay all of the money the U.S. government had loaned it in 1980. The company introduced the first minivan in 1984, creating a new market that Chrysler continued to dominate through the beginning of the twenty-first century. Iacocca also became Chrysler's most visible spokesperson, appearing in a long string of television commercials in the 1980s. Most of those spots ended with the executive's famous catchphrase: ''If you can find a better car, buy it.'' He retired from the company in 1992.

In 1995, however, the former savior of the company alienated many at Chrysler when he joined investor Kirk Kerkorian's unsuccessful attempt to take over the company. As a result, relations between Iacocca and the Chrysler Corporation, which later became part of DaimlerChrysler, were strained for much of the next 10 years. The market pressures that Kerkorian's takeover bid exposed later helped push Chrysler to merge with Daimler-Benz.

LEE IACOCCA

During a career that lasted nearly five decades, Lee Iacocca built a reputation as one of the most successful executives in the automotive industry. Most of that time was spent at the Ford Motor Company, where he began his career in 1947. While at Ford, Iacocca helped develop the brand's signature Ford Mustang muscle car. He became president of the company in 1970 but was forced to leave that position in 1978 after a dispute with Henry Ford II, the son of the company's founder. Soon afterward Iacocca joined the Chrysler Corporation as that company's president. He became chairman the following year.

Chrysler's subsequent turnaround from near bankruptcy made Iacocca a major celebrity. His autobiography, Iacocca (published in 1984), topped the best-seller lists, and he became Chrysler's public face, starring in a series of commercials that ran throughout the 1980s. Iacocca's public reputation was so good that many people urged him to run for president of the United States in 1988. He declined. Instead Iacocca continued at Chrysler until his retirement in 1992. He angered many at Chrysler in 1995 by participating in billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian's unsuccessful bid to take control of the company; the situation led to years of acrimony between Iacocca and an organization that many credited him with saving. Chrysler and its onetime hero executive finally patched things up in 2005, when Iacocca became the company's spokesman once again.

TARGET MARKET

On July 9, 2005, Chrysler introduced its Employee Pricing Plan Plus program. It was a very competitive mix of reduced prices and consumer rebates (through which customers could earn cash back from vehicles purchased) meant to compete with parallel sales that rival automakers—particularly General Motors—were offering that summer. The program was aimed at all consumers who were often more price-conscious than other buyers and especially at those younger than 49 years of age.

COMPETITION

In 2005 the General Motors Corporation (GM) was offering a major price-incentive plan through its dealers, reducing the prices of most GM vehicles. At the time GM was the world's largest automaker as well as the top-selling automobile manufacturer in the United States. Using the tagline ''You pay what we pay,'' GM cut prices aggressively in an attempt to convince consumers that they would get a good deal on a GM car purchased in July 2005. This put the pressure on GM's rivals to match these low prices or get left behind.

To counter GM, the Chrysler Group developed an offer that it dubbed the Employee Pricing Plan Plus. The program covered most Chrysler Group vehicles, including the Chrysler PT Cruiser and the Dodge Ram pickup. Planned for July 2005, the program featured discounts of 4 to 5 percent off the dealer invoice. Any existing rebates would also continue to be honored. The effect was steep reductions in sales prices. For example, the price of the Dodge Durango SUV was cut by up to $9,000 with a rebate.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Chrysler Group decided to tout its Employee Pricing Plan Plus with a $75 million television campaign to run in July and August 2005. It enlisted advertising agency BBDO Detroit to develop the campaign. BBDO determined that the best way to introduce Chrysler's new pricing program was to turn to someone from the company's past. After a 20-year hiatus from television commercials, Lee Iacocca returned as the pitchman for Chrysler Group vehicles. Although he retired from the company in 1992, Iacocca was still closely identified with the automotive giant. He also maintained a high profile in his own right through his work with the Iacocca Foundation, a charitable organization that raised money for diabetes research. Iacocca had created the foundation in 1984, after the death of his wife. In 2005 he donated his entire paycheck from making the commercials to the foundation. In addition, the Chrysler Group agreed to become a partner of the Iacocca Foundation, pledging to help raise more than $6 million.

The campaign began with three 30-second television spots: "Desk," "Channel Surfing," and "Granddaughter." The first spot, "Desk," featured Iacocca discussing the new pricing plan with Jason Alexander, an actor widely known for his role as George on the hit sitcom Seinfeld. It aired beginning July 9. In the spot "Channel Surfing," Iacocca was shown watching a commercial for Chrysler's 2005 vehicle line. After the commercial for the vehicles ended, Iacocca pointed out that it had failed to mention the company's new Employee Pricing Plan Plus, which he than explained. The spot used Iacocca's outgoing, irreverent personality to connect with audiences.

The third spot, "Granddaughter," used a setup similar to that of "Desk," in which Iacocca was engaged in a conversation with someone about the new "Employee Pricing Plan Plus." This time it was a young girl, said to be his granddaughter (the girl was actually played by an actress). In August the final commercial, "Golfing Buddies," premiered. It depicted Iacocca golfing with famed rapper Snoop Dogg, who was one of the major innovators of the rough-edged "gangster rap" of the early 1990s. The spot's entertainment value came from the incongruousness of the sight of the hip-hop star golfing at a country club with the aging business icon. Adding to the humor was Iacocca's use of hip-hop slang during the spot. All of the commercials featured Iacocca's 1980s tagline, "If you can find a better car, buy it."

Even 13 years after his retirement, Lee Iacocca was a well-known figure who carried high name recognition with consumers. He also had the advantage of being known for his work in the automotive industry; indeed he was arguably the most acclaimed auto executive of his generation. This gave him an ability to connect with car buyers that few could match. Also, he was a proven success as a pitchman, having starred in a number of successful campaigns in the 1980s. The pairings with entertainers Snoop Dogg and Jason Alexander especially caught TV viewers' attention. Even those unswayed by Iacocca's reputation could still find humor in the scenario of the aging executive hanging out with irreverent pop-culture figures.

The Employee Pricing Plan Plus campaign also included a major three-page print spread in USA Today. Referring to the company's competitors, it featured the tagline "First, we beat them at the show. Now, we're taking it to the showroom." Similar print advertisements later ran in local publications throughout the United States. Iacocca was not depicted in the print ads.

OUTCOME

The television spots for Chrysler's Employee Pricing Plan Plus were immediately successful. Although only 15 percent of respondents to USA Today's Ad Track survey rated the spots favorably, the commercials produced strong bottom-line results. Sales in July 2005 improved 32 percent over July 2004: the Chrysler Group sold more than 240,000 units that month, a company record for monthly sales. Competitor GM's pricing program, however, generated even bigger sales gains; it moved 41 percent more units in July 2005 than in the previous year. Although the Employee Pricing Plan Plus program was originally slated for July 2005, because of its effectiveness it was extended through the rest of the summer. For the year Chrysler Group saw U.S. sales jump 5 percent, with more than 2.3 million units sold.

The spots worked best with the young driver they were meant to target. In the Ad Track survey 18 percent of consumers aged 25 to 49 stated that they liked the spots a lot, the best of any age group. Between 66 and 74 percent of these respondents recognized Iacocca (it varied depending on the particular commercial). Older viewers, however, were more aware of who Iacocca was. Between 82 percent and 91 percent of respondents aged 50 and over recognized the famed businessman when they saw the commercials.

FURTHER READING

Clanton, Brett. "Iacocca Back as Chrysler Voice." Detroit News, July 7, 2005.

Hakim, Danny. "As the Going Gets Tough, Chrysler Calls on Its Old Pitchman." New York Times, July 7, 2005.

———. "Hip-Hop Argot Meets Corporate Cant, All to Sell Chryslers." New York Times, August 5, 2005.

Howard, Theresa. "Iacocca Return: Win-Win Deal." USA Today, October 2, 2005.

Iacocca, Lee. Iacocca: An Autobiography. With William Novak. New York: Bantam Books, 1984.

———. Talking Straight. With Sonny Kleinfield. New York: Bantam Books, 1988.

Maynard, Micheline. "Openers: Suits; Generizzle, Fo' Shizzle." New York Times, November 13, 2005.

Peters, Jeremy W. " 'Employee Discounts' Push July Auto Sales to a Record." New York Times, August 3, 2005.

Vlasic, Bill, and Bradley A. Stertz. Taken for a Ride: How Daimler-Benz Drove Off with Chrysler. New York: W. Morrow, 2000.

Yates, Brock. The Critical Path: Inventing an Automobile and Reinventing a Corporation. Boston: Little, Brown, 1996.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

ENGINEERED TO BE GREAT CARS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Automobile advertising has historically constituted not only one of the most visible but also, in sheer dollar volume, one of the largest aspects of the marketing industry. Thus in the 1990s Chrysler, which in 1998 merged with German automaker Daimler-Benz to create DaimlerChrysler AG, had an advertising budget of $1 billion. This certainly dwarfed the budgets of most companies, but even the amount it dedicated to its Chrysler line in 1998—as opposed to other lines such as Plymouth or Jeep—was impressive at an estimated $200 million. Michigan agency Bozell, Southfield handled the entire account, which included television, radio, and print advertising, with an emphasis on television. The company's overall theme was "Great cars. Great trucks." As for the Chrysler brand itself, it replaced its 1997 campaign, "What's in Your World?," with the tag line "Engineered to be great cars."

Chrysler's 1998 advertising promoted models such as the Concorde and the LHS, the latter introduced in 1994. But the biggest news was the 300M, a semiluxury model whose design suggested earlier styles. And well it might, for the M in its name signified a return to the popular 300 "letter series" of the 1950s and 1960s. During that time Chrysler had produced a new model each year, identified by successive letters of the alphabet. The launch of the 300M also marked the return of a distinctive winged logo that Chrysler had not used for more than 60 years.

Advertising for the 300M and other lines emphasized luxury in an attempt to overcome negative images associated with the company's recent past. In the 1970s Chrysler had nearly gone bankrupt, and even under the leadership of the charismatic Lee Iacocca in the 1980s, it had been unable to shake the perception of its product as drab and utilitarian. Perhaps it was ironic then that Chrysler's 1998 advertising also stressed the theme of heritage. But in this case "heritage" suggested something much larger than the company's actual history; rather, the theme carried with it images of a luxurious past—and a prosperous future.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1920 the Maxwell Motor Car Company hired former General Motors (GM) vice president Walter Chrysler to turn around its failing enterprise. Chrysler became president of the revitalized company in 1923 and in the following year introduced the Chrysler model with a distinctive winged symbol as its trademark. A year later, in 1925, the company was renamed Chrysler, and in 1928 it purchased Dodge, a company that produced the Plymouth and DeSoto lines.

After a strong start, however, by mid century Chrysler began to slip. At a time when rivals GM and Ford, responding to postwar prosperity, regularly introduced new models, innovation at Chrysler came to a standstill. The company even dropped the winged symbol in the mid-1930s, adding to the impression of Chryslers as unexciting cars. Then, in the mid-1950s, the automaker showed that it still retained Walter Chrysler's ability—Chrysler himself had retired in 1935—to revive his company's fortunes.

"In 1955," wrote Jennifer Lach in American Demographics in 1998, "Chrysler needed a new icon. It had no [Chevrolet] Corvette, no [Ford] Thunderbird for young crew-cuts in blue jeans to drool over. That was the year the company found its muscle car: the C-300." Promoted as "America's most powerful car," the C-300 proved enormously popular, and during the next decade Chrysler introduced a new model every year, each with a letter attached to the end of the name. With the 300Lin 1965, however, the so-called letter series ended.

Chrysler itself fell on hard times in the 1960s and 1970s. First it introduced smaller models before the public was ready for them, and then it returned to larger vehicles just in time for the oil crisis of the 1970s. The company persisted in producing gas-guzzlers throughout the decade, and soon Chrysler was in so much trouble that it applied for and received $1.5 billion worth of loan guarantees from the federal government.

Iacocca, former Ford president, became head of Chrysler in 1978, launching yet another turnaround. During the 1980s the company paid off its government loans, beat its competitors by introducing the first minivan, and introduced a series of sturdy if unexciting vehicles called "K cars." Iacocca left the company in 1992, and in 1998 it was acquired by Daimler-Benz, a vast European auto manufacturer whose best-known product was the upscale Mercedes-Benz.

TARGET MARKET

With the Chrysler 300M sedan, launched in 1998, the company made a push for mature, prosperous buyers with a penchant for luxury. The target for the 300M model, according to Jean Halliday in Advertising Age, was people 35 years of age and older, with buyers expected to be about 40 percent female. For its LHS sedan, another luxury model first introduced in 1994, the company expected buyers to be 45 years old and older, with about 30 percent female. Its appeal was to what Lach in American Demographics called the "near-luxury" segment.

Hence the emphasis on heritage, certainly not a theme a company would apply in marketing to very young consumers, along with a program of marketing in a number of venues, many of them decidedly upscale. The first print ads for the 1998 line appeared in October 1997 in Coastal Living, Food and Wine, Vogue, GQ, Martha Stewart's Living, and a number of other publications, including the more broadly based Business Week and Sports Illustrated.

Television advertising ran the gamut, though again the thrust was toward more seasoned viewers. Hence the company placed spots on ABC's Nightline and NBC's Tonight Show, as well as on ABC and CBS telecasts of college football. Other television advertising in the 1998 campaign also placed an emphasis on mature viewers. Thus in January the company ran its "Wings" spot on the telecast of the Bob Hope Chrysler Classic golf tournament, the Golden Globes film awards, and the popular show ER. Meanwhile, Chrysler eyed the demographics of the future. Chrysler executive Steven Bruyn told Lach that the company already had its eye on the 2003 market, when it predicted that what were called "personal luxury cars"—that is, two-seater sports cars—would be all the rage. "Once the kids are gone" to college, an industry analyst suggested, "[baby] boomers are going to trade in their SUVs [sport utility vehicles] and indulge in a two-seater."

COMPETITION

On the one hand, Chrysler faced its traditional foes in the U.S. auto industry: Ford, whose Lincoln Continental line competed with Chrysler's luxury models, and GM, with its Buick Park Avenue and other models. On the other hand, there were the many upscale imports such as the Lexus and the BMW. But the theme that appeared again and again, as the advertising and automotive industries examined the "new" Chrysler—both the car and the company—was that of the company's own conflicts over image.

Indeed, image problems perhaps posed the greatest competition to Chrysler. "To some," wrote Robyn

GETTING INSIDE CONSUMERS' BRAINS

"At first glance," wrote Jeffrey Ball in the Wall Street Journal, "DaimlerChrysler AG's new PT Cruiser looks like a massive gamble. Set to go on sale starting at about $16,000 early next year [2000], it's part 1920s gangster car, part 1950s hot rod, and part London taxicab." Yet as Ball went on to relate, its creation was the product of a thorough and innovative new program in marketing research that would soon find imitators if it proved successful. Chrysler, which dubbed its new offering "a sure-fire 'segment buster,'" certainly believed so.

French-born medical anthropologist G. Clotaire Rapaille, who had first gained notoriety for his experiments with teaching language to children with severe autism, oversaw the studies. Using theories related to a "mental imprint," Rapaille set out to help Chrysler discover consumers' "reptilian hot button"—an instinctive, preverbal part of the brain that would show what they really wanted. The result was what Ball described as "a series of freewheeling, three-hour focus-group sessions in the U.S. and Europe."

Having shown participants a prototype of the vehicle, Rapaille presented them with questions such as "I'm from another planet and I don't even know what you do with that [vehicle]. What is the purpose of this thing?" In what Ball described as the "most bizarre—but also the most productive" part of the sessions, Rapaille "dimmed the lights, began playing tapes of soothing music, and told the group to relax their bodies." He then gave them pen and paper and asked them to write stories about the vehicle prototype. The stories revealed, in Rapaille's words, the view that "it's a jungle out there . . . People want to kill me, rape me. Give me a big thing like a tank."

Meredith in the Houston Chronicle in January 1998, ''the Chrysler name conjures the image not of a car but rather of a company that taxpayers bailed out of near-bankruptcy almost two decades ago.'' Tanya Gazdik and Teresa Buyikian noted in Adweek at the same time that ''Chrysler is hoping to change customers' perception of its brand with a new spot breaking on Jan. 11.'' Chrysler/Plymouth/Jeep division general manager Marty Levine admitted that ''consumers still see the 'K cars' of the 1980s when they think of the brand.''

With its new campaign, David Kiley wrote in Brandweek, Chrysler hoped to ''boost sales of Chrysler brand, which has underperformed expectations, and close the gap between what the company feels is the reality of Chrysler brand cars and the lingering perception of dullness left over from the brand's dowdy days in the 1970s and '80s.'' It faced what Meredith in the Houston Chronicle called ''an identify crisis, the root of which is the name the brand shares with its corporate parent.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

With its 1998 campaign, which first appeared in September 1997, Chrysler and Bozell sought to firmly imprint the company's brand image in consumers' minds with an emphasis on heritage and luxury. Its overall corporate theme remained the same: ''Great cars. Great trucks.'' But in place of Bozell's earlier tag line, ''What's in your world?,'' the new campaign was built around the phrase ''Engineered to be great cars.'' Advertising included television, radio, and print, but as was often the case with automobile advertising, TV led the way.

Television advertising prominently featured the ''new'' Chrysler winged logo—actually the old one, resurrected after a hiatus of more than 60 years. Jay Kuhnie, Chrysler-Plymouth communications manager, announced in a press release to accompany the launch that ''Chrysler's winged badge symbolizes the [company's] proud heritage of design and engineering while serving as a hallmark for the brand.'' Three of the four TV spots were entitled ''Badge,'' ''Decisions,'' and ''Sunbeam,'' and the initial launch also included six print ads. Both print and TV showed champagne-colored vehicles, which the company had selected because of their elegant appearance, and a print ad for Chrysler Town & Country announced that the car was ''what a penthouse looks like on the ground floor.'' In total Chrysler ran 17 electronic spots and 23 print ads for all lines, including Plymouth, Jeep, and Eagle.

The second salvo of advertising appeared on network television in January, during the National Football League play-offs leading up to the Super Bowl. According to Gazdik and Buyikian in Adweek, ''The spot, set to ethereal music, features a montage of winged objects, such as butterflies and airplanes, intertwined with champagne-colored Chryslers.'' This was the ''Wings'' spot, in which a voice-over announced, ''For ideas to take flight they must have wings.'' Soon afterward the company ran a number of TV spots and print ads for the Chrysler Concorde, advertising that a January 15 press release stated would ''develop the concept of 'ideas in flight.' ''

To promote the 300M in May, the company brought out perhaps the most distinctive of its television ads, one it had actually begun creating more than four decades before. ''Chrysler uncovered an old industrial film,'' wrote Halliday in Advertising Age, ''with Bob Roger, chief engineer on those cars [the letter series], and many of his comments from snippets of the film appear in three new 30-second spots for the entry-luxury 300M.'' The new spots added a tag line to go with ''Engineered to be great cars,'' announcing, ''The technology has changed. But the soul lives on.''

OUTCOME

''Bringing a car to market is a $1 billion to $4 billion investment,'' Bruyn told Lach in American Demographics. ''As a result, you like to be right.'' By the end of the year it appeared that Chrysler had been. According to information compiled by the Automotive News Data Center, in one month—August 1998—Chrysler sold nearly 4,500 of the new 300Ms. This was more than one-third of the car's total sales since it had appeared earlier in the year. Within the so-called near-luxury market, the 300M already had a 10.8 percent share, a figure exceeded only by the Volvo 70 series and the Lexus ES 300.

Chrysler appeared to be on the upswing, and increased sales spread to other models. Meanwhile, it prepared to launch its PT Cruiser, an unusual-looking entrant in the sport utility category that Jeffrey Ball of the Wall Street Journal described as ''part 1920s gangster car, part 1950s hot rod, and part London taxicab.'' The vehicle was the product of an innovative strategy in marketing research pioneered by French medical anthropologist G. Clotaire Rapaille. Rapaille's studies with language and his attempts to teach autistic children in Switzerland during the 1960s led him to the ideas that he believed would help researchers discover consumers' hidden and most instinctive desires. Whatever the results of the PT Cruiser, it was sure to live up to the promise of a Chrysler engineer, who told Ball, ''We didn't make a generic vehicle.''

The PT Cruiser's unusual design was a hallmark of Chrysler's strategy: melding the best of the past with the most prominent elements of the future. Wrote Lach, ''The egg-crate grille [of the 300M] harks back to earlier styles in the letter series, and simple analog dials dot the dashboard.'' Inside, however, the car suggested quite a different era, with plush leather seats, a climate-control system, and a nine-speaker stereo system. Given the company's interest in marketing to the future—which included changing demographics, with more and more baby boomers becoming empty nesters—Lach asked, "Is a 300 convertible on Chrysler's drawing board? Only time will tell."

FURTHER READING

Ball, Jeffrey. "But Does It Make You Feel?" Wall Street Journal, May 3, 1999, p. B1.

"Chrysler Brand to Launch All-New 1998 Chrysler Concorde Ad Campaign." PR Newswire, January 15, 1998.

"Chrysler Launches Campaign for Sedan." Adweek (Eastern Edition), May 4, 1998, p. 60.

"Chrysler/Plymouth/Jeep/Eagle Division Launches New 1998 Advertising." PR Newswire, September 15, 1997.

Gazdik, Tanya. "Bozell Gives Chrysler New Look: Bozell Worldwide to Handle Spot TV and Print Ads for the Automaker." Adweek (Midwest Edition), September 15, 1997, p. 2.

Gazdik, Tanya, and Teresa Buyikian. "3 Automakers Unveil New Campaigns for 1998." Adweek (Eastern Edition), January 5, 1998, p. 10.

Halliday, Jean. "Chrysler Moves into 'Great' '98 Model Advertising: New Ads Begin This Week as Part of Nearly $1 Bill in Ad Spending." Advertising Age, September 15, 1997, p. 4.

———. "New Chrysler Sedan Looks to Past for Ad Inspiration: Snippets from Old Film Used in New Campaign." Advertising Age, May 4, 1998, p. 8.

Kiley, David. "Chrysler Set to Break Flurry of Ads for Corporate, Chrysler, Plymouth; Launches a New Ad Campaign for Its Chrysler & Plymouth Brands." Brandweek, September 15, 1997, p. 7.

Lach, Jennifer. "Boomers on the Drawing Board." American Demographics, November 1, 1998, p. 48.

Meredith, Robyn. "Chrysler Rescue Effort Takes Wing in Big Way." Houston Chronicle, January 18, 1998, p. 9.

Washington, Frank S. "Chrysler Ads Stress Engineering, Power." Automotive News, September 15, 1997, p. 36.

Judson Knight

JEEP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, The Chrysler Corp. merged with German automaker Daimler-Benz to create DaimlerChrysler. The essay continues to refer to the company's former name, as that was the official name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In the 1990s Chrysler Corporation ran a prolonged branding campaign for its four-wheel-drive Jeeps. Although Jeep was one of the oldest and best-known sport utility brands in the United States, it had encountered intense competition as the popularity of four-wheel-drive automobiles (dubbed "sport utility vehicles," or SUVs) exploded among American consumers. In order to bolster the Jeep brand, Chrysler directed the advertising agency Bozell Worldwide, Inc. to create a television advertising campaign for Jeep's product line: the Jeep Wrangler, Jeep Cherokee, and Jeep Grand Cherokee. Three of the ads, "Snow Covered," "El Toro," and "Quicksand," were designed not only to elevate sales but also to distinguish Jeep from the 40-odd other models of SUVs that were flooding the market and vying for consumers' new car dollars.

To reach its upscale target market, Jeep chose to run its ads primarily during highly rated, prime-time network television shows and special events. "Snow Covered," "El Toro," and "Quicksand" each used a combination of humor and fantasy to catch viewers' attention, and each was an element of what Bozell's managing partner and creative director Bill Morden termed "the consistent, constant visual of building the brand." "Snow Covered," a 60-second spot that first aired during the 1994 Winter Olympics, had, according to USA Today, "one of the longest runs of any TV ad produced by a car company." The commercial featured a Jeep burrowing under a deep blanket of snow as an arresting way of conveying the power and tenacity of the vehicle. Interestingly, the ad did not picture an actual Jeep model. The 30-second "Quicksand," which debuted in September 1995, showed a Jeep Grand Cherokee trapped in a tropical landscape by a massive water buffalo that refuses to move out of the way. After the car sinks down into a mire of quicksand, the buffalo ambles away. The Jeep then drives itself up out of the muck and goes on its way. "El Toro," another 30-second spot, first aired in September 1996. It depicts the romantic attraction of two animals for a bright red Jeep Grand Cherokee. The car is first pursued by a bull and drives into a river to escape. As the car emerges, dirty, muddy, and dripping, it is chased by a smitten pig.

Although Jeep could not draw a direct correlation between the television commercials and its sales figures, it pronounced itself pleased with the results of the campaign. Jeep sales rose during the period the ads were being broadcast, and polls demonstrated their popularity with consumers. In addition, the ads won a number of advertising awards, generating further publicity for Jeep and its vehicles.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Jeep brand originated during World War II when the U.S. Army required a rugged vehicle that could master off-road terrain and the brutal conditions of battle. Partly because of Jeep's popularity among American GIs, the American Motor Corporation continued to produce the sturdy car after the war. Seemingly half-car and half-truck, the vehicle with its four-wheel-drive capacity had a reputation for being able to go anywhere. Jeep never lost the macho image it garnered during the war. It was a car for the outdoors, for the rugged individual, for the free spirit. In the 1980s, however, a growing market for "passenger-friendly" four-wheel-drive vehicles developed. Drivers wanted the robust look and image of a four-wheel drive outside but the comfort and smoothness of a sedan inside. Jeep responded by shifting its product line, discontinuing some models, and introducing new ones to conform to this trend.

Jeep Cherokee first came on the market in 1984 and quickly attained great popularity. Jeep Wrangler, a smaller and more economically-priced model, appeared in 1986. The following year Chrysler Corporation acquired the American Motor Corporation and incorporated Jeep into its new Jeep/Eagle division. In 1993 Chrysler launched the Jeep Grand Cherokee, a luxurious and premium-priced four-wheel-drive vehicle, with a slew of amenities. By the mid-1990s these three models made up the whole of Jeep's product line. The Wrangler, which in 1997 cost about $13,000, appealed to a younger market. The Cherokee, on the other hand, suited a slightly older consumer who might need more space for a growing family. Finally, the Grand Cherokee, with optional leather seats, was the four-wheel-drive vehicle for the affluent consumer who appreciated the luxury of the model but also sought the cachet of the Jeep brand.

Jeep's product line was evolving in tune with the American car market. By 1997 pickup trucks, SUVs, and minivans—all three were termed "light trucks"—accounted for one out of every two vehicles sold in the United States. Indeed, the sale of sport utility vehicles increased 74 percent in 1997 alone. According to the London Independent, analysts expected SUV sales to rise an additional 35 percent by 2006. Even more noteworthy was the fact that the fastest growing sector of this market was for the so-called luxury SUVs, which included the Jeep Grand Cherokee. The company's website explained the allure: "This vehicle is proof you can have a true off-road vehicle without giving up . . . luxuries and amenities."

TARGET MARKET

The higher-end sport utility vehicles appealed to a far different group of consumers than the early Jeep models: the average Jeep Grand Cherokee buyer was 44-years old. Advertising Age declared that the success of the car was "largely due to the acceptance of upscale SUVs by buyers in their forties." The vast majority of sport utility vehicle drivers no longer even took their cars off-road. Rather, the appeal of the SUVs was due more to the perception that they were safer than smaller, more fuel-efficient cars. Not only were SUVs a great deal larger and heavier (they weighed about 5,000 pounds) than the average car, they also afforded the driver a clearer view of the road because they were so tall. As The Fort Worth Star-Telegram asserted, "Sport utility vehicles appeal to an aging population desperately seeking security at a time of corporate downsizing, family breakups, and crime." Moreover, by providing more cargo and passenger space, SUVs were ideal for families.

But more than anything else, an SUV-like Jeep provided a crucial intangible factor—image. A spokesperson for Mercedes-Benz told the London Independent that SUVs were "an expression of individuality, lifestyle, and an active enjoyment of life." Both men and women enjoyed the sense of power and hearty individualism that Jeep seemed to convey.

Jeep's advertising sought to reinforce that image. "Snow Covered," which did not portray an actual Jeep model, was solely a brand-building campaign. "Quicksand" and "El Toro" specifically touted the Grand Cherokee, but Bozell's Morden emphasized that "every ad we do is a deposit in that brand equity bank." According to USA Today, the three spots used fantasy and humor "to appeal to the company's yuppie target."

The commercials reached out to their target not only through humor but also through their narrative structure. Unlike the "standard" car commercial, the Jeep spots were not catalogs of features. Instead, they told a story that was intended to captivate the audience and communicate to them the values and nature of the brand. Each of the three spots played on key themes: Jeep's ability to bring the driver into nature; to afford the driver the "reach" to go anywhere and do anything in a Jeep; and to give the driver the mastery and capability the brand promised. "Quicksand" and "El Toro" were specifically designed to remind the viewer that the Grand Cherokee was not just another luxury car. According to Morden, the commercials told their target audience that "underneath all the leather, it's still a Jeep."

COMPETITION

Jeep was not the only brand of sport utility vehicle trying to attract the wealthy yuppie with the soul of an adventurer. In fact, the SUV segment of the auto industry had become one of the most crowded. The number of SUV models surged from 21 in 1987 to nearly 50 ten years later. All told, by 1997 SUV sales accounted for 15 percent of total new car sales. "When we created

THE AMERICAN APPEAL

Jeep's rugged and outdoorsy image appealed to consumers outside of the American market, too. In England, where Jeep's most direct competition was Range Rover, ads for the Grand Cherokee played up the quintessential "Americanness" of the Jeep brand. Commercials featured shots of Western landscapes filled with sunsets, open spaces, and tough dirt roads. English consumers responded strongly to these images and to the Jeep mystique.

'Snow Covered' in 1994 we pretty much stood alone," said Bill Morden. "But now there are 60 or 70 commercials a week trying to do the same thing as us." Jeep's competition encroached on both the high and low ends of the SUV sector. Toyota's Land Cruiser and 4Runner, Chevrolet's Suburban, Land Rover, Range Rover, Mercedes-Benz's M-Class, Lexus's RX300, and Lincoln-Mercury's Mountaineer presented fierce competition for the more upscale new car buyer Jeep sought to attract to its Grand Cherokee. On the other end of the spectrum, Toyota's RAV4, Geo's Tracker, Suzuki's Samurai, and Mitsubishi's Montero threatened to encroach on the less affluent, younger crowd who had previously coveted the Jeep brand and purchased the more affordable Wrangler or Cherokee. By 1996 the Ford Explorer had risen to become the best-selling sport utility vehicle with an 18.8 percent market share. The Grand Cherokee was second, with 13 percent. Cherokee and Wrangler were fourth and ninth, respectively, with 6.9 percent and 3.8 percent.

Jeep's competitors also initiated their own big-budget campaigns. Lexus launched a campaign for its 1999 RX300 that used the tag line, "It's not just another sport utility. It's like no other vehicle on earth." Lexus, like Jeep's Grand Cherokee, targeted consumers in their early 40s. Both Ford and Mercury's marketing efforts for the Explorer and the Mountaineer stressed the versatility and practicality of the vehicles. Ford spent an estimated $44.3 million advertising the Explorer and Expedition in 1996, while Toyota devoted $37.7 million to the 4Runner. In an effort to prevail in this fiercely competitive market, however, Jeep outspent its competitors by a substantial margin. In 1996 Chrysler spent $76.3 million marketing the Grand Cherokee, as well as an additional $42.5 million on the Cherokee and $21.6 million on the Wrangler.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As the self-proclaimed leader in the SUV sector, Jeep shied away from overtly acknowledging its numerous competitors in the ads. "We seldom, if ever, compare ourselves specifically to other brands," Morden said. Instead, Bozell created commercials that attempted to connect consumers with the benefits of the brand on a more emotional level. "It's all personality," Gary Topolewski, executive creative director and managing partner at Bozell, told Adweek. "Cars are an emotional purchase. Bottom line, you want to feel good about the car you're driving." Few Jeep spots featured the aptly named "laundry list of features." Instead, Jeep used the narrative style ads in order to distinguish itself from other SUV campaigns.

Jeep chose to bring its message to a more "upscale, forward-thinking audience," said Morden. In order to do so, the company pinpointed select prime-time television shows to carry the ads. "Snow Covered" aired on such programs as the 1994 Winter Olympics and the 1997 Aloha Bowl. "Quicksand" was seen on shows such as ABC's 20/20 and NBC's National Geographic, as well as during Fox Network's broadcasts of the National Hockey League's conference semifinals and finals and NBC's airings of the National Basketball Association's play-off games. "El Toro" ran during popular shows like Mad About You, Murder One, and Star Trek Voyager, as well as on NBC's broadcasts of National Football League games.

OUTCOME

"Snow Covered," "Quicksand," and "El Toro" won the admiration of the advertising industry. In 1994 "Snow Covered" won the coveted Grand Prix Award at the Cannes Festival. Analysts lauded both Jeep and Bozell for the witty and innovative ads. Certainly the polished ads helped to bolster Jeep's image as the preeminent SUV on the market. As USA Today commented, "Innovative ads get noticed."

Although Bozell was quick to assert that drawing a direct correlation between sales figures and specific ads was difficult at best, Morden did assert that "these spots continued to fit Jeep products into the brand. People saw them as being very positive to the brand's identity." Jeep sales soared 13 percent the year Jeep took home the Grand Prix for the spot. In addition, USA Today 's Ad Track consumers survey revealed that it ranked as one of the ten best-liked ads of 1997; thereby proving its popularity.

FURTHER READING

Bradsher, Keith. "Power Trip. Yes, They're Safe. Yes, They Can Carry a Lot. But Sport-Utility Vehicles Also Offer the Allure of Control." The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 25, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Jeep Plows Winning Turf. Long Running Ads on Track With Critics and Viewers." USA Today, April 7, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Top Honors Help Ad Agencies Hype Themselves." USA Today, June 28, 1996.

Green, Gavin. "Motoring: More Leap onto the Off-Road Gravy Train." London Independent, October 18, 1997.

Horton, Cleveland. "Requires Artful Ad Buys and Attention to Segment Lifestyle." Advertising Age, April 1, 1996.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "New Directions." Adweek, January 27, 1997.

Rebecca Stanfel

THERE'S ONLY ONE CAMPAIGN

DaimlerChrysler's Jeep. © AARON HOROWITZ/CORBIS.

OVERVIEW

Jeep was a division of the Chrysler Group, a Detroit-based subsidiary of the DaimlerChrysler Corporation that was responsible for the manufacturing, sale, and marketing of the Chrysler, Jeep, and Dodge brands in the United States. The Grand Cherokee, which was introduced in 1992, was a major vehicle for Jeep. It had helped initiate the market for smooth-handling, road-friendly, midsize sport-utility vehicles (SUVs) in the 1990s and was still a leader in that category. Competition from other midsize vehicles, such as the Ford Explorer, combined with customer migration to both bigger and smaller SUVs meant that by 2000 the Grand Cherokee had to fight to hold onto its market share.

Jeep enlisted ad agency Foote Cone & Belding (FCB) to run a new campaign for model year 2001 that was intended to help Jeep stand out in a crowded field. The effort, titled "There's Only One," centered around "Shake," a humorous spot that featured a muddy Grand Cherokee shaking itself clean in the manner of a dog. First airing in the fall of 2000, it attempted to show consumers that, even though the Grand Cherokee was a luxury midsize SUV, it was still rugged and hard-nosed, just like Jeeps had always been. The campaign's tagline, "Jeep—There's Only One," subtly built on Jeep's name recognition and status as an originator of the off-road and SUV categories. The brand's greatest asset was its name; ever since the vehicle's wide use by the U.S. military during World War II, Jeep had been one of the most recognizable brands in the world. The company wanted to capitalize on this as much as it could.

The "Shake" spot was a big hit with critics and took home a Bronze Clio in 2001 in the television/film commercial category. It also helped the Grand Cherokee to be recognized—according to surveys conducted by automobile-industry data collectors R.L. Polk & Co.—as the midsize SUV with the highest degree of customer loyalty in 2001.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Jeep name originally referred to a military vehicle widely in use by the U.S. Army during World War II. Combining elements of a car, a truck, and an armored vehicle, its durability and ability to travel made it essential to the war effort. The Jeep was developed by the Willys-Overland company of Toledo, Ohio, though other manufacturers also built Jeeps during the war. After the conflict was over, Willys began to market the brand to civilians. The High Mobility Multipurpose Wheeled Vehicle (also called the Humvee, or Hummer), a larger, more heavily armored vehicle, later came to replace the Jeep for most military uses.

Jeep had a number of owners, including American Motors, before being scooped up by Chrysler in the late 1980s. Chrysler was one of Detroit's most profitable companies in the 1980s, but by the end of the following decade its fortunes had begun to fade. In 1998 the automaker merged with German car manufacturer Daimler-Benz (most famous for its Mercedes brand automobiles), creating the DaimlerChrysler Corporation/DaimlerChrysler AG. Jeep became a part of the Chrysler Group, a subsidiary of DaimlerChrysler that also handled the manufacture, sales, and marketing of the Chrysler and Dodge brands.

The Jeep Grand Cherokee was first introduced at the 1992 North American International Auto Show. It replaced the Grand Wagoneer as Jeep's midsize SUV. The vehicle was larger than the original Cherokee, which, along with the Wrangler, served as Jeep's touchtone vehicle. It helped create a new market for midsize, rugged SUVs. Despite its off-road capabilities, the vehicle proved popular with suburban and urban drivers, and it was one of the leading SUVs throughout the 1990s. It offered a roomier, more luxurious feel than many other midsize SUVs in the early 1990s.

In 1998 Jeep introduced the second generation of the Grand Cherokee, radically redesigning the car in the face of competition from the Ford Explorer and Chevrolet TrailBlazer. The new Grand Cherokee featured the Quadra-Drive system, which helped the driver maintain control of the vehicle even if only one wheel had traction. This improved the Grand Cherokee's off-road performance and made it safer in the snow. It also featured a powerful V-8 engine and a driver-side airbag. This second-generation model proved so successful that Jeep did not significantly alter the Grand Cherokee again until model year 2005.

Unfortunately, the SUV market was starting to get crowded. Smaller imports, such as the Honda Odyssey, had begun to make tentative inroads into the U.S. market. Also alarming from the Grand Cherokee's point of view was the rise of larger luxury SUVs, such as the Cadillac Escalade. With younger, lower-income SUV drivers buying smaller imports and wealthier buyers moving on to bigger vehicles, midsize SUVs felt a crunch. By 2001 these larger and smaller SUVs had seen their market shares rise 37 percent and 42 percent, respectively. Meanwhile the midsize category remained flat. This presented a challenge. Jeep had to distinguish itself and the Grand Cherokee from an ever-growing field of rivals within the SUV market.

THE JEEP EXHIBIT

In 2000 Jeep released its "There's Only One" campaign. The campaign's tagline underscored the Jeep's iconic status as an off-road vehicle; the Jeep was developed by the Willys-Overland Motors for use in World War II. But DaimlerChrysler wanted to recognize the iconic brand's history in a more direct way. In honor of Jeep's 60th anniversary, in 2001 the Walter P. Chrysler Museum, in Auburn Hills, Michigan, created an exhibit titled "The Mighty Jeep: A Legend Turns 60." It featured the original Jeep along with 26 other vehicles and prototypes. The Walter P. Chrysler Museum, which opened in 1999, was created by DaimlerChrysler to spotlight the history of its American vehicles. This served in part to offset the fact that Chrysler—one of the "Big Three" U.S. automakers—in 1998 came under the control of a European parent, DaimlerChrysler AG.

TARGET MARKET

The Grand Cherokee was a midsize SUV. These vehicles had proven particularly successful at connecting with image-conscious families who wanted a large vehicle to transport their children but did not want to buy a "stuffy" minivan. Also, the Grand Cherokee's size and Quadra-Drive system gave it a reputation among drivers as a safe car, one that would offer good handling in the snow and protect the driver in the event of a crash. The safety aspect appealed to suburban moms and dads. In addition, the Grand Cherokee was an imposing vehicle, and it had considerable off-road capabilities. This made it popular among males in their 20s and 30s who were looking for a rugged, fun car.

COMPETITION

Despite efforts by Toyota, Honda, and Nissan, the primary competition for the Grand Cherokee came from fellow American midsize SUVs, such as the Chevrolet TrailBlazer, Ford Explorer, and Dodge Durango. In fact, these four vehicles together commanded a whopping 72.9 percent of the midsize-SUV market share in the United States.

Though Chrysler Group stablemate the Dodge Durango also competed with the Grand Cherokee, GM's Chevrolet TrailBlazer and especially the highly successful Ford Explorer were considered to be the major competitors for Jeep. The Explorer, available in two- and four-door models, was the leading vehicle in the segment in terms of sales. In fact, the Explorer had been the top-selling vehicle in the segment every year since its introduction in 1991, and by 1998 Ford was selling more than 430,000 units of the vehicle in the United States alone. The Explorer especially appealed to families because of its smooth ride and attractive appearance. That helped the Explorer stand out in a crowded segment. Jeep wanted its new campaign to accomplish something similar for the Grand Cherokee.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Jeep sought a clever campaign that would emphasize the Grand Cherokee's reputation as a rugged vehicle that could be taken off-road, while also distinguishing the vehicle and the brand from the flood of SUVs on the market. To implement its new plan, Jeep turned to Foote Cone & Belding (FCB), a Southfield, Michigan–based subsidiary of True North Communications. FCB had a long history working with the brand, and Jeep was confident in the agency's abilities. The campaign would include billboards and print ads focusing on the vehicle's rugged appearance. The key to the campaign, however, was a new television spot called "Shake."

FCB hired Gerard de Thame Films, a production company based in London, to put the spot together. It was directed by Gerard de Thame, who had previously directed music videos for the famed British musician Sting. The commercial, which first aired in fall of 2000, began with a mud-coated Cherokee pulling into a suburban driveway. After a couple got out of the Cherokee and walked toward the house, the vehicle shook itself off in a quick back-and-forth motion reminiscent of a dog. Now mud was everywhere, including all over the couple who owned the car. A voice-over then said, "Even though the Jeep Grand Cherokee is more refined and civilized than ever, it still hasn't lost its animal instincts." The spot closed with the campaign's tagline, "Jeep—There's Only One." The humor of the spot allowed the company to spotlight Jeep's rugged reputation in a subtle way. By revealing a clean-cut suburban couple to be the drivers of the muddy Grand Cherokee, the spot implied that even Grand Cherokee drivers who lived in the suburbs had "messy" wild sides.

The campaign's tagline, "There's Only One," also called to mind the Jeep's storied past. The vehicle's ubiquity in the military during the massive mobilization for World War II injected it straight into popular culture. By 1942 the vehicle merited a mention in the film Holiday Inn, starring Fred Astaire. The Jeep, with its distinctive vertical front grille, quickly became an icon and would become synonymous with rugged, off-road vehicles. Even by 2000, with SUVs a major force in the U.S. auto market, many people still referred to every vehicle in the class as a "jeep." The "There's Only One" tagline was a subtle reminder that these "jeeps" were not the same thing as a real Jeep. It also underscored Jeep's position as the longtime leader in the SUV category.

OUTCOME

The campaign was a solid success, and the "Shake" commercial was awarded a Bronze Clio in the television/film category. A Clio was one of advertising's most prestigious awards. The Clio Awards originated in the late 1950s as a way to honor the best in advertising. Subsequent television spots continued to underscore what people loved about the Grand Cherokee. In October 2001 the Polk Automotive Loyalty Awards were announced, and the Grand Cherokee was ranked the number-one SUV for customer loyalty. The awards were given annually by the Michigan-based R.L. Polk & Co., a firm that collected and analyzed information about the automotive industry.

Despite Jeep's satisfaction with Foote Cone & Belding's work, the Chrysler Group dropped the agency in late 2000, in the interest of consolidating all of the company's advertising and marketing efforts with one firm. It awarded its account to Omnicom, an agency that had been working with other Chrysler brands. Later that year Foote Cone & Belding became a part of the New York–based Interpublic Group.

FURTHER READING

Bradsher, Keith. "Auto Sales Keep to Torrid Pace Even as Loan Costs Rise." New York Times, May 3, 2000.

Cobb, James G. "Carmakers Go Online and Off Road at Detroit Auto Show." New York Times, January 16, 2000.

Hakim, Danny. "A Buyer's Market for Autos Is a Tough Development for Chrysler." New York Times, October 11, 2001.

Healy, James R. "Chrysler Again Runs Low on Financial Fuel." USA Today, January 30, 2001.

Kurylko, Diana. "DaimlerChrysler Vehicles Reflect a New Game Plan." Automotive News, August 21, 2001.

Reuwee, Brian M. "Big 3 SUVs Dominate Market, J.D. Power Study Says." AutoWeek, November 30, 2001.

Statham, Steve. Jeep Color History. Osceola, WI: Motorbooks International, 1999.

Wald, Matthew L. "Preliminary Review Is Begun for Jeep Grand Cherokees." New York Times, July 5, 2001.

Wilson, Kevin. "Exhibit Traces Jeep Origins and Heritage." AutoWeek, December 3, 2001.

Guy Patrick Cunningham

Darden Restaurants, Inc.

5900 Lake Ellenor Drive
Orlando, Florida 32809
USA
Telephone: (407) 245-4000
Fax: (407) 245-4000
Web site: www.redlobster.com

■■■

LIFE ON LAND IS DRY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Darden Restaurants, the largest casual-dining restaurant group in the world, operated three distinct restaurant concepts: the Olive Garden, Bahama Breeze, and Red Lobster. With about 700 locations, Red Lobster was the nation's leading full-service seafood restaurant chain, offering fresh seafood at moderate prices. Red Lobster had a disappointing year in 1997, with same-store sales falling 3.9 percent on average unit sales of $2.6 million. Hoping to increase sales and revitalize the Red Lobster brand, Darden Restaurants released its "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign.

Created by the ad agency Euro RSCG Tatham, the $80 million radio and television campaign began in October 1997 and portrayed the seafood restaurant as an escape from life's dry daily routine. To reinforce the slogan, Euro RSCG Tatham created spots that contrasted images of dry, barren landscapes with images of couples and families frolicking at the seashore. The new campaign—which began with television spots during programs like the Major League Baseball playoffs and prime-time programs Friends and 3rd Rock from the Sun—carried the theme "Life on Land Is Dry." The commercials, together with ancillary marketing changes like new menus and the addition of an elevated bar to some restaurants, were designed to create a more energetic personality for the Red Lobster chain. The campaign ended in mid-2000.

"Life on Land Is Dry" marked a strategy shift for Red Lobster. The campaign promoted Red Lobster as a fun-loving restaurant instead of promoting the chain's prices, selection, or food quality. The strategy proved to be effective. During the campaign's second year Red Lobster reported double-digit gains in same-store sales for the first time in nearly a decade.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Red Lobster was a pioneer in television advertising among casual-dining chains, putting commercials on the public airwaves long before similar chains such as Chili's, Bennigan's, and T.G.I. Friday's joined the fray. For many years Red Lobster advertisements employed the tagline "Red Lobster for the Seafood Lover in You," developed by its longtime partner Grey Advertising, one of the world's largest ad agencies with billings of more than $5 billion. Grey Advertising's other accounts included Cover Girl makeup, Pantene shampoo, and Kool-Aid fruit drink.

Over time, however, casual-dining competition grew keener, with a host of clever ads vying for the attention of consumers. As Red Lobster's sales began to decline in the mid-1990s, Grey Advertising tried to come up with a new approach that would differentiate the seafood chain from its rivals. In 1997 the agency created a campaign for Red Lobster that provided more emphasis on fresh seafood. The slogan was "Prepared so fresh you can taste it." This campaign reflected Red Lobster's desire to expand its audience not only to those looking for lobster and shrimp but also to people who enjoyed fresh fish. It did not, however, resonate with consumers. "That wasn't the personality we were looking for," Red Lobster spokesman Andrew Dun said. "In today's restaurant world, having a fresh product isn't enough to be differentiated."

In the first quarter of 1997 Red Lobster sales of $475.3 million were about 1 percent below the same period a year earlier. Same-store sales, a measure that excluded new and closed outlets, were down 3.6 percent. The chain worked feverishly to combat the sales slump by introducing a new menu, lowering prices, and sinking more money into employee training to ensure that servers and managers understood the new menu.

None of this seemed to work, however, and in the summer of 1997 Darden Restaurants announced it would review its Red Lobster advertising and consider switching agencies. Prominent ad agencies were asked to submit proposals as part of the review process. Adweek, an industry trade publication, reported that campaigns Darden rejected early on included one by Saatchi & Saatchi that said, "Life is a beach. And we've got the food." The company also passed on a J. Walter Thompson proposal with the theme "Inside every Red Lobster there is a great little seafood place." After extensive review, incumbent Grey Advertising, New York–based Deutsch, and Euro RSCG Tatham, a Chicago ad agency with a strong consumer-products resume, emerged as finalists for the $90 million account. A test of the three agencies' ad strategies determined the winner.

In September Darden selected Euro RSCG Tatham to develop the new Red Lobster campaign. At the time Euro RSCG Tatham was the world's eighth-largest advertising agency, with billings of $7 billion. It had no significant restaurant accounts, although it was working with consumer-product and food companies promoting brands such as Sara Lee, Head & Shoulders, and Old Spice. Euro RSCG Tatham began work immediately on the estimated $80 million campaign. Its contract for the Red Lobster account was structured with an incentive. The more Red Lobster improved, the greater the revenue for the ad agency. Grey Advertising continued to handle Darden's Olive Garden business.

Tatham officials soon began dropping hints in the trade press about the direction of the new Red Lobster campaign. The agency said that it would continue advertising Red Lobster on television but that it would also look at more targeted advertising, such as direct mail and the Internet. New advertisements would include an emphasis on atmosphere as well as on food. "Red Lobster has more to sell than food on the plate," a Tatham official declared. "They have a place, an attitude, a feeling . . . all of which we will portray in the advertising." Tatham's new ads, featuring the tagline "Life on Land Is Dry," debuted on October 6, 1997.

TARGET MARKET

Red Lobster was a leading player in the market category known as casual dining, whose appeal was primarily to aging baby boomers. This was the group that came of age simultaneously with fast food. As they aged, analysts said, these customers would want full-service, sit-down dining. Although more receptive to ethnic influences on the menus, they still wanted familiar food at moderate prices. "The major challenge [in appealing to this market] would be the economy," said Ron Paul, president of the restaurant-industry consulting firm Technomic. "Casual dining is doing very, very well now because consumers are willing to spend the dollars it takes." But when the economy took a downturn, he noted, consumers traded down to fast food.

COMPETITION

The 1990s were a golden age for casual dining establishments. The restaurants' themes, or concepts, varied, but their menus did not stray far from mainstream tastes. Some companies stuck with one specialty, such as Uno Restaurant Corp. and its famous deep-dish pizza of Chicago. Many chains, however, developed several concepts. Darden Restaurants, for example, was able to establish the two dominant chains in casual dining—the Red Lobster seafood concept and the Olive Garden, which had an Italian theme.

With its focus on seafood, Red Lobster was in the enviable position of having no serious national competitors. Its closest rival, Landry's Seafood Restaurants, operated about 120 seafood restaurants in 26 states. The nation's number two operator of casual-dining seafood restaurants, Landry's operated four chains: Landry's Seafood Houses, the Crab House, Joe's Crab Shack, and Willie G's Oyster Bar. By contrast, steak chains such as Outback Steakhouse and Lone Star Steakhouse & Saloon were in a crowded field and struggled to trumpet points of differentiation.

MARKETING STRATEGY

"We're taking a brand that already has a lot of positive attributes and making it more casual, more energetic," said Wyman Roberts, executive vice president of marketing for Red Lobster, upon announcing the chain's new ad campaign. "Like all brands, we need to evolve into something appropriate for these times."

RESTAURANT MAKEOVERS—NEXT OPRAH!

What could be done when a restaurant's image had become stale, its identity out of step with the times? The same thing an individual would do in order to spruce up his or her personal appearance: get a makeover. "Re-imaging" was what restaurant industry analysts called it, and it worked wonders for a number of older chains, including Red Lobster. Some of the other operations that successfully reinvented themselves were:

- KFC. The old gray Colonel just ain't what he used to be. In June 1997 bearded Southern patriarch Harland Sanders (long since deceased in real life) saw his image reconfigured into an edgy "supergraphic" designed to attract younger customers. The restaurant formerly known as Kentucky Fried Chicken also added a host of nonfried items to its menu, including Rotisserie Gold roasted chicken, Chunky Chicken Pot Pie, and the Bacon Ranch Chicken Twister, KFC's take on the popular "wrap" sandwich.
- The Melting Pot. Fondue just did not have the same appeal it had in the 1970s. As a result, this Tampa, Florida–based chain of 43 fondue restaurants found itself in a prolonged sales slump. Market research indicated that the Melting Pot was perceived as a romantic, special-occasion restaurant that the average customer visited only once or twice a year. To combat this perception the chain unveiled a new logo, remodeled its interiors and exteriors, and launched a new ad campaign positioning itself as "an out-of-the-ordinary dining experience" suitable for any night of the week, not just special occasions.

In Red Lobster's judgment the times called for repositioning the restaurant as a welcome break from the otherwise dry world. The first two 30-second television spots, entitled "Escape" and "Pack Your Bags" and featuring the tagline "Life on Land Is Dry," began airing in October 1997 during prime-time programs such as Monday Night Football, Friends, 3rd Rock from the Sun, Home Improvement, and the Major League Baseball playoffs. The new commercials set footage of Americans of all ages enjoying fun on the beach to upbeat original music. The beach images, shot on both U.S. coasts, in Cape Cod and Los Angeles, were designed to associate the fun and excitement of water experiences with the freshness of Red Lobster fish and seafood. "By tapping into people's memories of great beach vacations and sunny days spent relaxing in backyard pools, we capture their passion for life by the water including their hunger for fresh fish and seafood," said Gary Epstein, managing partner of Tatham.

Subsequent spots in the campaign used contrast to make the same point. Scenes of people doing everyday, mundane tasks on land, using shots of the Los Angeles freeway and the deserts of Lancaster, California, were juxtaposed against the "escape" implied in Red Lobster seafood. "Research showed that our customers long for experiences that take them away from the grind of their everyday routines," Roberts observed. "With this understanding of our customers' needs, we hope to get them excited about seafood and the entire experience of dining at Red Lobster restaurants. In fact, this ad campaign is the first chapter in the larger story of efforts to restructure and rejuvenate Red Lobster."

The "Life on Land" campaign also included a number of beach-themed commercials featuring musical accompaniment from big names such as Rod Stewart and LeAnn Rimes. One spot launching a promotion for snow crab legs featured three older women cavorting across the sand while Rod Stewart's song "Hot Legs" played in the background. The promotion offered one pound of crab legs for $9.99. Another spot employed country-and-western prodigy Rimes's baleful rendition of "Blue" to promote a $14.99 Maine lobster dinner. "It's the story of the end of the season and a woman reflecting on the great summer and the experiences she's had at the seashore. Red Lobster is trying to do a good job of just tapping into that," said Roberts.

To complement its brand-building efforts on network TV, Red Lobster also released a $12 million radio campaign focusing on promotional messages. Radio stations in 60 markets across the country aired 60-second spots supporting the "Life on Land Is Dry" theme. The initiative, which doubled Red Lobster's annual radio spending without eating into TV buys, followed successful local tests that involved sponsorships of local disc jockeys.

In 1999 the campaign aired another beach-based commercial, titled "Wingtips," which featured a woman walking barefoot across a pristine beach. The spot's voice-over encouraged consumers to "Breathe. Smile. Eat. Make a mess. Make a memory." The spot deviated from the campaign's other commercials by ending with the tagline "Escape to Red Lobster." The "Life on Land Is Dry" campaign ended in mid-2000.

In addition to the multimedia advertising push, Red Lobster also made a number of cosmetic changes designed to improve the restaurant experience for both its patrons and employees. Dress-code changes for staff allowed servers to wear shorts and colorful shirts with fish motifs instead of the traditional black pants, white shirts, and ties. The company also eliminated its long-standing ban on beards for male workers. The changes were designed to improve morale in this notoriously high-turnover industry.

Significant additions were also made to the Red Lobster menu. More boldly flavored entrees like Louisiana Lacy's Catfish and Hickory Planked Salmon were added, together with a new seafood pasta line backed by TV commercials. "In the past, I think we were guilty of creating a menu that leaned toward the middle of the road," said Tim Rosendahl, the seafood chain's vice president of food and beverage. "Now our seafood gumbo, for example, is much more authentic. It's got a real kick."

Finally, Red Lobster announced a renewed effort to increase awareness of the restaurant's alcoholic beverage offerings. Elevated bars, akin to the ones seen in Bennigan's and T.G.I. Friday's outlets, were installed in select Red Lobster restaurants, while a teal-colored corrugated roof was designed to provide a tavern-on-the-beach feel. With this push the chain hoped to tap a potential new profit engine, since its alcohol sales were only about half the industry average. In the past, Roberts explained, "We did not really push or even acknowledge in our restaurants that it's OK to have a drink."

OUTCOME

Red Lobster's sales slump appeared to have bottomed out by the end of 1997. Sales of $417.8 million, with 49 fewer restaurants, were more than 4 percent below the prior year. Sales on a comparable store basis were down 0.2 percent. On the plus side, profit margins were substantially improved over 1996 because of lower cost of goods sold and reduced selling expenses. More importantly, the company was satisfied with the new course being charted by Euro RSCG Tatham. "Red Lobster has made great progress compared to one year ago and is in the midst of a refocusing on guest satisfaction similar to that successfully undertaken by [t]he Olive Garden," said Joe R. Lee, Darden Restaurants chairman and CEO. "While we celebrate the improvements, we realize we must maintain our focus on great food and great service in order to provide an outstanding dining experience every time."

The company continued to make progress through 1998. After nearly a decade of stagnating or declining fortunes, the chain saw double-digit gains in same-store sales in the third quarter of that year. The 11.6 percent increase marked the biggest such gain in eight years. Analysts credited much of the sales success to the revamped ad campaign. "It's a much classier campaign," observed Stacy Jamar, a restaurant analyst for Salomon Smith Barney. "It's a more appealing image than before." "They [Euro RSCG Tatham] have really done a good job with established brands," added Lehman Brothers analyst Mitchell Speiser. "It has taken a while to turn Red Lobster around because there was a negative perception that it was an old chain and not too relevant. They have done a great job of changing the perception and pruning the portfolio."

FURTHER READING

Howard, Theresa. "Red Lobster Goes Overboard for Diners." USA Today, May 7, 2001, p. B4.

Jensen, Trevor. "Red Lobster Keys on Food, Fun." Adweek (midwest ed.), November 6, 2000, p. 7.

Kramer, Louise. "Red Lobster Ads, Make-Over Seen Turning the Tide." Advertising Age, October 12, 1998.

"A Lobster Campaign." Oklahoma City Journal Record, October 15, 1997.

Mehegan, Sean. "Red Lobster Fights a Drop in Customers with a Campaign Inviting Diners to 'Share the Love.'" New York Times, July 7, 2003, p. 8.

Strother, Susan. "Red Lobster Goes Fishing in Ad Market." Orlando Sentinel, May 2, 1997.

Robert Schnakenberg
Kevin Teague

Davidson Development Inc.

101 E. Town Place, Ste. 200
Saint Augustine, Florida 32092
USA
Telephone: (904) 940-5050
Fax: (904) 940-5057
Web site: www.wgv.com

■■■

REPOSITIONING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

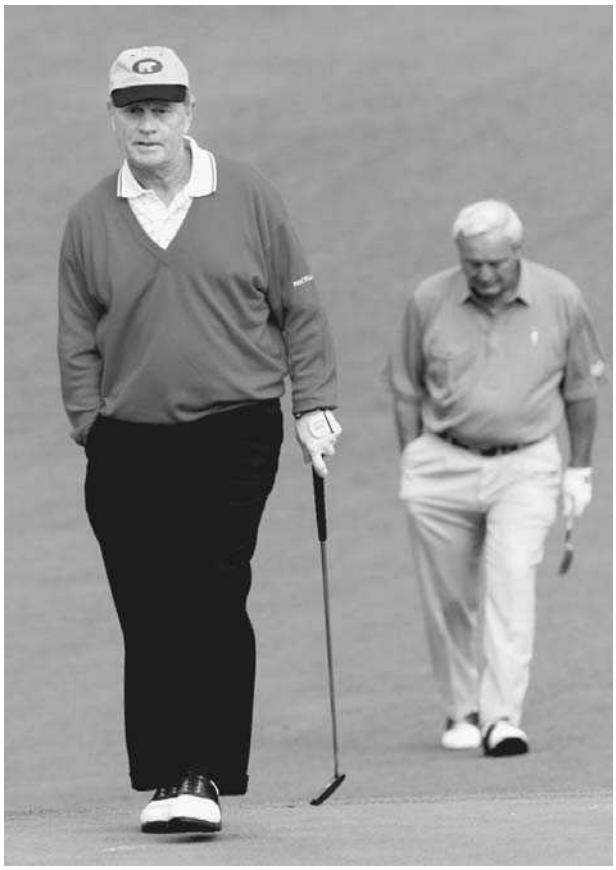
Davidson Development Inc. was the primary engine behind the project that came to be known as World Golf Village, an upscale development located between Jacksonville and Saint Augustine, Florida, combining residential, commercial, and recreational zones. The Village's centerpieces were the World Golf Hall of Fame and a course designed by legendary PGA (Professional Golfers' Association) champions Arnold Palmer and Jack Nicklaus, called King & Bear in honor of the two players' respective nicknames. Initial attempts at marketing the area to home buyers took golf purists as their target market, but after several years of lackluster sales in its Estates of World Golf Village subdivision, Davidson turned to Atlanta–based agency Cole Henderson Drake (CHD) for a marketing campaign that would remake the development's image.

The Estates of World Golf Village "Repositioning Campaign" made use of a $700,000 annual budget during its 2003–04 run. CHD sought to change consumer perception of World Golf Village by drawing attention to the opportunities for gracious living present in the development rather than focusing solely on the golfing amenities, and it calibrated its message not for male golfers but for baby-boomer women, who were believed to play a larger role than their husbands in making home-buying decisions. The campaign primarily consisted of a series of two-page print spreads, with black-and-white photos and copy emphasizing the elegance and inspirational nature of the Estates lifestyle.

The campaign coincided with a 170 percent sales growth of Estates properties, and Davidson's revenues far outpaced precampaign goals. A tracking study indicated, furthermore, that CHD had successfully recast World Golf Village's image. In 2005 the "Repositioning Campaign" won a Silver EFFIE Award in the Real Estate category.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The PGA Tour's World Golf Hall of Fame in Pinehurst, North Carolina, was opened in 1974, but in the 1980s the PGA began searching for a site on which to build a similar facility that would honor golfers not eligible for the World Golf Hall of Fame. In the early 1990s a location between Jacksonville and Saint Augustine, Florida, was donated to the cause, and a number of worldwide golf clubs and associations pledged their support. The PGA eventually decided to close its Pinehurst facility and combine operations with the Florida facility under the name World Golf Hall of Fame. Construction began in 1996, and the Hall opened in 1998, boasting the support of 26 golf organizations from around the world.



Jack Nicklaus (L) and Arnold Palmer, April 6, 2001.
© REUTERS/CORBIS.

World Golf Village was the name given to the multifaceted development surrounding the Hall of Fame. Conceived as a golfers' resort destination as well as an upscale residential area, the development featured two golf courses, the more notable of which was called King & Bear, named after its designers, the golf greats Arnold Palmer and Jack Nicklaus. The development mixed retail, commercial, residential, and resort amenities, but for a variety of reasons initial sales of the mostly high-end real estate did not meet expectations. The location itself (in a previously little-developed area) was faulted by some in the local real-estate industry, and a related lack of vehicle traffic made it difficult to create buzz in the community. Prospective buyers and members of adjacent communities did not have a clear understanding of the development's aims outside of serving as a site for the World Golf Hall of Fame, and the lack of inhabitants made potential homeowners question the vibrancy of the community into which they were being asked to buy. In many cases these criticisms were shared or propagated by important local opinion makers, including real-estate agents and the press. The lack of enthusiasm surrounding the project led to stalled plans for further development of the site as well as reductions in investment on behalf of the project's backers. If the development was to satisfy investors' initially grand visions, it needed an image makeover.

Previous marketing on behalf of World Golf Village had focused on the Hall of Fame and the golf courses in an attempt to appeal to a logical target market—golf-obsessed men—but this strategy had not so far resulted in a sufficiently attractive image to drive developers' and investors' sales goals. Davidson thus enlisted Atlanta agency Cole Henderson Drake (CHD) to create a print campaign for the Estates of World Golf Village, a community within the larger development featuring homes priced at $500,000 and higher. The agency needed to respond to the perceived shortcomings of the World Golf Village image while offering fresh strategic insights.

TARGET MARKET

CHD took the lackluster sales results so far posted by the Estates subdivision as evidence that previous advertising efforts had been wrongly conceived. Though the exclusive targeting of male golf enthusiasts was clearly a commonsense approach to the image-building project of a development featuring world-class golf courses and a shrine to the sport's greatest players, CHD observed that women tended to have the most influence in selecting a community and home. CHD particularly focused on women of the baby-boom generation with upscale habits and tastes—many of whom still had kids at home—rather than the retirees or empty-nesters who might also have been likely to have the financial resources to buy into the Estates neighborhood. These women, CHD believed, valued the emotional attributes of a potential home. The apparent lack of vibrancy in the World Golf Village community was thus a formidable barrier to these key home buyers, as was the idea that the development was strictly for golfers. Though the target group of women appreciated the amenities typically found in upscale golf communities, the golf attractions themselves were only tangential factors in their decision making. They primarily wanted assurance that the community they were choosing was healthy, balanced, and had a promising future.

CHD further decided to market the Estates beyond the local area, targeting affluent residents of the northeastern United States in addition to regional and local women. Prospects from outside the immediate area would not be affected by local perceptions and would be more accustomed to the premium prices of the homes in the Estates neighborhood. The Estates' affiliation with an entity as prestigious as the World Golf Hall of Fame,

INSIDE THE HALL OF FAME

The World Golf Hall of Fame, the centerpiece of the larger World Golf Village development, was the definitive storehouse of the sport's legacy and the officially sanctioned tribute to its heroes. The 72,000-square-foot structure housed exhibits tracing the story of golf's invention and development in Scotland all the way through the new millennium, and the 104 inductees admitted to the Hall's membership as of 2005 were honored with permanent exhibits throughout the building. A rotating series of exhibits focused on individual members, whose exploits and personalities were chronicled at greater length, and each member's story was further told in the Member Locker Room. The Member Locker Room devoted one locker apiece to each inductee, and each locker was filled with personal items that helped make golf lovers' heroes come more vividly to life. Another of the Hall's signature spaces was the Trophy Tower, which provided visitors with up-close views of some of the game's most fabled championship trophies.

as well as the fact that home sites were adjacent to a world-class golf course, made this a reasonable if ambitious expansion of the target.

COMPETITION

The years 2000–05, though they were marked by a struggling American economy in general, saw one of the country's most substantial real-estate booms in history. Real-estate companies of various sorts, flush with profits thanks to the boom, turned increasingly to the image-building power of advertising, which generally represented an attempt not just to spur sales but also to hedge against the ever-present threat of a market downturn.

Among real-estate agencies, several nationwide firms were actively engaged in brand-building efforts. Re/Max was the U.S. market leader, and it increased ad spending by 10 percent in 2002 before turning to Los Angeles agency davidandgoliath for a $30 million national campaign, which was released in 2004. Century 21 boosted ad spending by more than 60 percent in 2002, up to an annual ad budget of roughly $25 million. It ran a 2003 campaign tagged "Real estate for your world." Meanwhile, Coldwell Banker in 2003 launched a $14 million national campaign touting the realtor's "Concierge" program, which provided logistical aid to new home owners.

Some notable innovations in advertising were made by new-home developers during this time as well. Ryland Homes, a home builder with offices across the nation, worked with the media-sales firm WorldLink and a TV distributor to create an original syndicated TV program called America's Moving To . . . The show, which named Ryland as a sponsor and featured content specially designed to resonate with the company's target consumers, ran in local markets with a Ryland presence and highlighted housing choices in cities around the country. A group of developers of new-home subdivisions in the San Francisco Bay area turned to a similar concept in 2003, banding together to underwrite the show Bay Area New Home Living Featuring Sunset Magazine. The half-hour show featured two- to three-minute segments sponsored by and showcasing the developments of individual home builders. These segments were interspersed with decorating, architectural, and lifestyle content sponsored by Sunset Magazine.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The "Repositioning Campaign" ran during 2003 and 2004. It focused on print executions but also included outdoor ads, direct mail, public relations, and promotional tie-ins. Its yearly budget was a relatively minimal $700,000, and hence a premium was placed on effective selection of magazines rather than on blanket coverage. The ads were placed primarily in lifestyle magazines with editorial content that included travel, finance, and style. This was a departure from previous World Golf Village advertising, which had run mostly in local and regional newspapers. Not only did lifestyle magazines allow Davidson and the Estates to appeal to upscale consumers outside the region, but they also served as a more appropriate context for the new ads' elegantly understated visuals and two-page-spread formatting.

The core message that CHD sought to communicate with the series of print ads was that the people who lived at World Golf Village were as special as the golf opportunities that were available. In keeping with the target-market shift, the agency wanted to alter the image of World Golf Village from that of a golf purists' community to that of a fashionable, inspiring, exclusive, and yet approachable place to live. CHD took it for granted that consumers would understand the golf-centric elements of the development, and many ads used little golf imagery, focusing instead on the elegant lifestyle and prestige of the Estates in fashionable black-and-white photographs. Frequently these photographs were supported by nods to the prestige of the World Golf Hall of Fame and the King & Bear golf course, with logos appearing along with copy that detailed important information about the development. When an ad did focus explicitly on golf, that focus underscored the lifestyle pitch. For instance, one ad showed a man from behind, surveying a dramatic golf-course backdrop, and the accompanying copy stated, "Some refer to it as one of the top courses in the world. A lucky few refer to it as their backyard." Overall, the campaign was meant to create a much-needed persona for the development rather than emphasize the quality of the homes and golf amenities.

Along with the series of print ads, CHD used event-focused marketing of the Estates. Regular open houses spearheaded by the agency allowed local prospects to see the world-class development in their midst and resulted in a much-needed increase in traffic to the site. Out-of-town vacation packages, offered through direct mail, were also paired with tours of properties. Materials given to prospects after such tours and used by realtors carried messaging and images consistent with the print ads' theme. The World Golf Village was also the exclusive real-estate sponsor of the Bloomberg financial service's website.

OUTCOME

During the two years of the campaign's run, the Estates of World Golf Village saw its sales grow 170 percent, with sales revenues far outpacing Davidson's goals. Traffic to the development substantially increased, according to CHD, and the ratio of prospects to sales drastically improved. Before CHD released the "Repositioning Campaign," the ratio of prospects to purchasers of homes in the Estates neighborhood was greater than 1:100. By 2004 this ratio had narrowed to 1:10, well ahead of industry norms, which were approximately 1:20. CHD also pointed to strong evidence from a tracking study indicating that perceptions of World Golf Village were changing. Davidson vice president of marketing Alayna Kimball said in a press release, "We are very pleased with the campaign and its consistent message for the Estates. The ads were effective and instrumental in helping us exceed our sales goals." The campaign won a Silver EFFIE Award in the Real Estate category in 2005, a testament to its effectiveness in the marketplace.

FURTHER READING

Patton, Charlie. "Golf Village 'Awesome' but Often Idle." Jacksonville Florida Times-Union, February 6, 2002.

———. "World Golf Village Courts More Visitors." Jacksonville Florida Times-Union, March 20, 2002.

Smits, Gary. "Marketing a Shift in Strategy with a Massive Remodeling and Media Blitz, the World Golf Hall of Fame Is Being Given a New Image." Jacksonville Florida Times-Union, July 17, 2004.

Mark Lane

Dell Inc.

1 Dell Way
Round Rock, Texas 78682-2222
USA
Telephone: (512) 338-4400
Fax: (512) 283-6161
Web site: www.dell.com

■■■

DUDE, YOU'RE GETTING A DELL CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2002 Dell Inc. experienced its first-ever yearly decline in net revenue. In 2001 sales hit $31.9 billion, but the next year they fell to $31.2 billion. The drop in sales coincided with an overall decline in computer sales worldwide, and the mail-in computer giant was far from doomed. Still, it was at this time that Dell shifted its advertising approach, introducing its "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign in 2001. The advertisements starred Steven, a "surfer dude" teen, and were intended to attract high school and college students and their parents.

The Chicago office of ad agency DDB created the campaign, which consisted of approximately 20 television commercials that placed Steven in various scenarios in which he could promote the computer, using the ubiquitous tagline "Dude, you're getting a Dell." Such instances occurred during a high school graduation speech, in a college classroom, and during a computer-store sales pitch. Throughout the campaign Steven persistently promoted Dells in a way that appealed to teens and both charmed and annoyed adults. The "dude" became incredibly popular with TV viewers, prompting Dell, from 2000 through 2002, to spend a large portion of its $200 million annual advertising budget on the campaign.

Steven became an instant pop-culture icon. But sales, which had begun to decline in 2001, did not rebound in 2002, and some people at Dell wondered if the popular character was overshadowing the product. Dell and DDB therefore began preparations to move away from the "Dude" campaign by phasing Steven out in late 2002, replacing him with a group of fictional interns. "Dude" fans were outraged, but sales did not suffer. In fact Dell shipments increased by 25 percent in the quarter following the introduction of the intern ads. Sales continued to grow, and Dell more than rebounded from the losses it had experienced in 2002. By the end of 2003 annual revenue had grown past $40 billion, and it increased to nearly $50 billion the following year. Regardless of the effectiveness of the "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" campaign, however, the "dude" was regarded as one of the most memorable figures in the history of advertising.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Michael Dell began working with computers at age 15, when he took apart a brand-new Apple computer to see if he could rebuild it. He could. In the 1980s Dell began rebuilding and selling computers from his University of Texas at Austin dorm room, naming his company PCs

A still from Dell's "Dude. You're Getting A Dell" television campaign featuring Steven, the Dell "dude." DDB/NEEDHAM, CHICAGO. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

Limited. In 1985 the company developed its own computer, the Turbo PC, which was advertised for direct sale in national computer magazines. Consumers were attracted by the low prices, so much so that the company grossed $6 million in its first year of business. In 1987 PCs Limited changed its name to Dell Computer Corporation, and in 1992 Fortune magazine listed Dell as one of the world's 500 largest companies. Sales climbed dramatically, giving even the century-old IBM something to worry about. Within a decade Dell had become the largest seller of personal computers in the United States. It lost that spot to Hewlett-Packard in 2002 but regained it within a year. In subsequent years the two continued to battle for the number one spot.

Dell's concentration remained on direct sales even as it moved away from relying solely on its mail-order catalog to reach customers. During the shift Dell used larger and larger advertising campaigns to promote its products and its direct sales approach. Its $70 million "Be Direct" worldwide campaign of 1998 emphasized the advantages of Dell's direct-to-customer business philosophy. But the customer-service team that was then operating Dell's direct sales was often criticized by consumers. Complaints about unknowledgeable and rude sales representatives were made public. There were also accusations about cheap and undependable parts. In response Dell launched "Dell4me," a $30 million ad campaign that was accompanied by the theme "Your thoughts exactly." This campaign shifted the focus from Dell's technical specifications to the company's ability to help consumers get the most out of that technology. Although "Dell4me" represented an attempt to appeal more directly to individual consumers, it was not altogether personable in its approach. To improve Dell's image, a more upbeat advertising campaign was deemed necessary. Thus "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" was introduced in 2001.

TARGET MARKET

Prior to the "Dude" commercials, Dell had been known as a company that primarily targeted business accounts, a fact reflected in its advertising campaigns. The Steven character was intended to broaden the company's appeal to individual consumers. In particular Dell wished to target first-time computer buyers (and their parents). The company reasoned that these customers might be especially intimidated by the task of purchasing a computer that was not available in stores. Steven helped to make Dells seem far less daunting, thus bridging the gap between the computer company and customers.

According to Newsweek, in 1990 about 15 percent of U.S. households owned a computer. Within a decade the number jumped to 50 percent. Further a large percentage of homes with computers were occupied by teenagers. In 2001, when "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" was launched, an incredible 78 percent of American teens had computers and Internet access in their homes. Because many of these computers were purchased by parents, Dell's campaign had to simultaneously target teens and parents. Steven, played by actor Benjamin Curtis, who was 21 in 2001, was himself a representative of the lucrative young-adult demographic. In the "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" television commercials, Steven spoke most directly to parents who were purchasing computers for their high school and college-age kids. The character became a phenomenon among consumers in the 13-to-24 age bracket.

DUDE, YOU'RE UNDER ARREST

Benjamin Curtis, the actor who played Steven in the "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" commercials, was arrested on February 9, 2003, for buying a bag of marijuana. He was apprehended after a police officer witnessed him buying the drugs on a street in Manhattan. After spending a night in jail, Curtis was released, and the charges were later dismissed.

COMPETITION

Dell Inc. was not the only computer company experiencing rapid growth at the end of the twentieth century. Hewlett-Packard (HP), in particular, offered fierce competition for Dell. Since 1999 the two companies had been vying for the spot of number one seller of PCs in the United States and subsequently in the world. The rivalry was amplified by the two companies' battle for Compaq (in 1999 Dell took over Compaq; in 2002 Hewlett-Packard acquired the company). In 2002 Hewlett-Packard launched its "Everything Is Possible" campaign, which, inspired by HP customers' success stories, focused on the company's positive relationship with its customers. HP followed it with the "You + HP" campaign in 2003. "You + HP" won accolades, including being named Campaign of the Year by Adweek. With a wide range of products, including PCs, printers, and servers, as well as high sales (in 2004 sales approached $80 billion) and a soaring net income (in 2004 it was $3.5 billion, representing a one-year net income growth of 37.7 percent), the company gave Dell stiff competition.

Another computer giant, IBM, had long competed with Dell in the field of computer products. In 2004 its sales exceeded $96 billion, with a net income nearing $8.5 billion. The latter reflected an 11.2 percent growth since 2003. But while Dell was finding success with its "Dude" advertising, IBM was met with disdain for its 2001 "Peace, Love and Linux" campaign, which promoted the Linux operating system. For the campaign IBM hired ad agencies to spray-paint stenciled side-by-side images of a peace symbol, a heart, and a penguin (the Linux mascot) on sidewalks in Chicago and San Francisco. Local officials and business owners demanded that the images, which they considered vandalism, be removed.

Following the lead of its rival Dell, Gateway in 2004 closed down all of its computer stores but continued selling its merchandise by phone and through its website. Prior to the shift Gateway had been experiencing major financial difficulties. Its chain of stores was far from profitable, and from 2001 to 2003 the California-based company had lost money during most quarters. From 2002 to 2003 Gateway's revenue plunged from $4.2 billion to $3.4 billion. Even its long-standing and popular spotted-cow advertisements could not help. Closing the stores had some immediate positive results: by 2004 sales had improved nearly $2.5 billion.

In the field of network computing—including corporate networks and websites as well as workstation computers—Sun Microsystems offered challenging competition for Dell. Its sales and net income, though nowhere near Dell's, were admirable. In 2004 its sales exceeded $11 billion, and it had a net income nearing $400 million.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Dell had used the character of Steven prior to the "Dude" campaign. Two agencies, DDB New York and Lowe Lintas, created the character in earlier concepts. In the first Steven ad, which aired during the 2000 holiday season, actor Curtis played a teenage boy asking his parents for a Dell computer for Christmas. When DDB's Chicago office took over the campaign in 2001, it decided to play up the Steven character and gave him the "Dude" tagline.

The goal of the new campaign was to move away from the technology-focused ads that mostly appealed to businesses and the particularly computer-savvy individual. With Steven, Dell could better identify itself with consumers across the board in a personable and familiar way. The company spent a significant amount of money to promote Steven and his "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" slogan. For each year between 2000 and 2002, Dell spent approximately $200 million on advertising. A large chunk of this was used for the "Dude" TV commercials, which began airing in the spring of 2001.

In two years Curtis made approximately 20 commercials with Dell. The spots ran during both daytime and prime-time TV shows and appeared on all major networks.

The "Dude" commercials did not vary much from one to another. In each ad Steven, an annoying but somewhat lovable young guy, was seen relentlessly and enthusiastically pushing Dell computers at every opportunity. In one series of three commercials Steven, playing Santa's helper in an elf suit, told kids they wanted a Dell for Christmas. In another spot Steven was with a date in his father's car (trying to pass the car off as his own) when he advised a computer-seeking neighbor, Mr. Foster, to buy a Dell. Steven was also seen giving a speech at a high school graduation, throwing his sales pitch at the end; at a computer store, announcing his Dell pitch on the loudspeaker; and writing his tagline on a blackboard in a college classroom. During the two years that the "Dude" commercials ran, Steven's task seemed to be to connect with teens and annoy adults (such as a high school principal, a store manager, and a college professor). The spots, although not changing in theme, progressed with Steven's fictional life: he was depicted first in his messy bedroom in his parents' home and subsequently graduating from high school, working part-time jobs, and attending college.

OUTCOME

"I would choose a Dell over a Gateway because Steven is cuter than Gateway's cow," claimed one teen, referring to Gateway's long use of the cow in its advertisements. Steven became a cult figure in advertising akin to Clara Peller, star of Wendy's famous "Where's the Beef?" campaign of the 1980s. Steven fan sites popped up on the Internet, Steven fan mail was sent to Dell, and Curtis was recognized everywhere he went. The campaign's effectiveness in selling Dell products, however, was less clear.

From the third to the fourth quarter of 2000—after the holiday-season introduction of Steven—Dell sales rose 38 percent. But while some credited the "Dude" character for this, others linked the sales to the fact that Dell had lowered its prices. In 2001, when the first 10 or so "Dude" commercials were aired, net revenue actually declined slightly. Dell did not fare much better in 2002; even at $35.5 billion, revenue was down from 2001. By this time Dell was preparing to shift away from ads featuring the Steven character. In the fall of 2002, with plans to fade Steven out, the company introduced a new campaign involving a fictional group of young interns. One of the first three intern commercials ended with an appearance by Steven repeating his familiar tagline. In the other two the phrase "Dude, You're Getting a Dell" was spoken by a voice-over announcer who was not Steven.

Steven fans felt betrayed by Dell. Replacing the character, however, turned out to be perfect timing for the company. Soon after the change Curtis was arrested for possession of marijuana, a situation that would have presented Dell with a PR nightmare. The shift may have also resulted in significant monetary benefits. Dell shipments increased by 25 percent in the quarter following the launch of the intern commercials; the same period after the start of the "Dude" campaign had produced an increase of just 16 percent. The intern commercials were nowhere near as popular as the "Dude" spots. But as Dell's CEO and founder, Michael Dell, put it, "We're not running the Steven TV show." Still, regardless of whether the Steven character took attention away from the computers themselves and whether the "Dude" campaign was in fact responsible for an immediate skyrocket of sales, the campaign did significantly raise awareness of the brand.

FURTHER READING

"Dell Says Ads Helped Boost Bottom Line." Houston Chronicle, January 19, 2002, p. 2.

"Dell's Disappointing News Shakes US Further." Scotsman, November 11, 2000, p. 6.

Elliot, Stuart. "Agency to Quit the Dell Account." New York Times, April 6, 1999.

———. "Dell to Focus More on Consumers." New York Times, September 23, 1999.

Harrison, Crayton. "Dude from Dell Gives Sales a Lift." Seattle Times, December 26, 2001.

Howard, Theresa. "Dude! You've Been Replaced." USA Today, March 9, 2003.

Kessler, Michelle. "Dude, Dell's Service Has Slipped, but Company's Working on It." USA Today, April 29, 2002.

Lazare, Lewis. "Dell Campaign Starts Oct. 1." Chicago Sun-Times, September 21, 2001, p. 70.

Musgrove, Mike. "Gateway's Changes Yield Little Reward." Washington Post, January 11, 2003, p. E01.

O'Harrow, Robert. "Dell Sales Projection Sends Market Down; Vote Concern a Factor; Nasdaq at Low for Year." Washington Post, November 11, 2000, p. E01.

Ross, Barbara, Alice McQuillan, and Greg Gittrich. "Total Bummer for Dell Dude." Daily News, February 11, 2003, p. 5.

Scheiber, Dave. "Dude, You're Getting a Career." St. Petersburg Times, January 28, 2002.

Vranica, Suzanne, "Viewers Go Wild for Dell's Surfer Dude." Ottawa Citizen, January 11, 2002, p. F1.

"You're Gettin' New Ads, Dude! Dell Plans for Life without Steven." Ottawa Citizen, October 17, 2002, p. F8.

Candice Mancini

Delta Air Lines, Inc.

1030 Delta Boulevard
Atlanta, Georgia 30320-6001
USA
Telephone: (404) 715-2600
Fax: (404) 715-5042
Web site: www.delta.com

■■■

LET YOURSELF FLY CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Although Delta Air Lines, Inc., was the number three air-passenger carrier in the early 1990s, by 1996 it was feeling the pressures of low-cost carriers such as Southwest Airlines. Budget-conscious air travelers were embracing cheap tickets and willingly giving up first-class seating, onboard meals, and other frills offered by older carriers such as Delta, United Airlines, and American Airlines. When Southwest expanded service into the lucrative Florida leisure-traveler market in 1996, Delta realized that its customers were abandoning it for that airline. To compete with Southwest, in 1996 Delta unveiled a low-cost carrier called Delta Express. Although Delta Express was initially a success, discount fare wars and consumers' brand confusion, among other problems, caused the carrier to falter. In 2002 Delta announced plans to close Delta Express and introduce a new low-cost carrier, Song Airlines, in its place.

To assure that Song's launch was a success and to send the message that low cost did not have to mean low quality, Delta planned a major branding campaign with a budget estimated at $10 to $12 million. Working with its advertising agency, Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners, as well as the agency's units Media Kitchen (media strategy) and Lime (public relations), Delta developed a unique marketing strategy that included print ads, television spots, and outdoor efforts. Also part of the creative team were Andy Spade, who had served as creative director of various ad agencies, and Spade's wife, fashion designer Kate Spade, who was responsible for creating new uniforms for Song's customer-service staff and flight attendants.

Song's branding strategy was a resounding success. The company reported that, within five months of the "Let Yourself Fly" campaign's launch, brand awareness had jumped from zero to as much as 44 percent in key target markets. In early 2005 the original campaign was replaced with a new one, "Fly Your Own Song," created by Shepardson Stern & Kaminsky, New York. Later that year Song, along with its parent, Delta Air Lines, filed for bankruptcy. Delta reported that Song Airlines would be discontinued in 2006.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

After starting as a crop-duster service in 1924, Delta Air Lines' first passenger-carrying flight took off in 1929. The fledgling airline served customers traveling between Dallas, Texas, and Shreveport, Louisiana. Within one year Atlanta was among the destinations, along with Monroe, Louisiana, and Jackson, Mississippi. Through a series of mergers with other airlines—Northwest in 1972, Western in 1987, and Pan Am in 1991—Delta grew and expanded its routes to become a global carrier.

© LARRY DOWNING/REUTERS/CORBIS.

By the mid-1990s Delta was the number three air-passenger carrier, ranking behind number one American Airlines and number two United Airlines.

By the mid-1990s customers were abandoning the carrier for discounters such as Southwest Airlines, especially in the popular Florida leisure-travel market. To try and win back passengers, in 1996 Delta launched its own no-frills, low-cost airline, Delta Express. It was initially successful, but as other low-cost airlines—including JetBlue Airways—started up, Delta Express's business began slipping. In 2002 Delta announced plans to disband Delta Express and launch a new low-cost airline, Song. The new airline was planned to compete directly against other low-cost airlines that continued to win Delta's customers. Song's first target markets were those dominated by JetBlue's service: Orlando and Fort Lauderdale, Florida, and cities in the Northeast, including Boston and New York.

TARGET MARKET

According to the Travel Industry Association of America, in 2003 the core customers of most airlines were business travelers, although they accounted for just 28 percent of all air travel. The rest of air travel was leisure (59 percent) and combined business/leisure travel (13 percent). As Delta Air Lines prepared for the launch of its low-cost subsidiary, Song, the company had its eyes on a nontraditional target market: women. Tim Mapes, the new air carrier's managing director of marketing, told Adweek that, while most airlines targeted male business travelers, Song was the only airline "targeting female leisure and business travelers." The women that Song was trying to reach were described as sophisticated people with discerning taste who loved bargains and hated typical airline food. More specifically, Song's target market was any frequent traveler in the airline's primary markets, New York and Boston. Also targeted were those leisure travelers in Florida who had used Song's key competitor, JetBlue Airways.

COMPETITION

JetBlue Airways Corporation, based at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, was launched in February 2000 and set the standard for a new breed of low-cost air-passenger carriers. The airline offered only coach service, but it included first-class amenities such as additional legroom and wider leather seats, free snacks during flights, and video entertainment, including DirecTV, in every seat. More importantly, JetBlue's focus was on customer service. It offered the convenience of e-ticketing, toys in airport terminals to occupy children waiting for flights, and blue-corn tortilla chips onboard. The strategy seemed to work; the airline reported boarding its 500,000th passenger within eight months of its first flight. To promote its services and build brand identity, in September 2000 JetBlue released its first marketing campaign. Created by the Boston office of Arnold Communications, the $1 million campaign's initial advertisements were billboards that emphasized the frustration that air travelers felt as a result of high prices and poor service. Television spots followed in October. By 2003 JetBlue was serving customers, especially those traveling for leisure, in 20 cities in Florida, in the Northeast, and on the West Coast. Also in 2003 JetBlue introduced flights between Long Beach, California, and Atlanta, home of Delta Air Lines. The flights between Atlanta and Long Beach seemed to be a direct response to Delta's plans to introduce its low-cost carrier, Song, with flights between New York and Florida, JetBlue's primary market.

SONG AND NYC MEATPACKING DISTRICT ALLIANCE ANNOUNCED

In a unique effort to separate itself from the crowd of low-cost air carriers, Song Airlines, a subsidiary of Delta Air Lines, Inc., formed an alliance in late 2003 with the fashionable New York City neighborhood the Meatpacking District. According to the alliance, the Meatpacking District Initiative, an organization composed of businesses located in the neighborhood, would receive financial support from Song to increase awareness of the area's retail shops and restaurants. Song would benefit from the alliance by increasing its opportunities to reach the upscale customers who lived in the Meatpacking District or frequented the shops and restaurants there. Although Song officials planned no traditional signage or advertising in the neighborhood, the airline's logo appeared on a map of the area that was widely distributed to travel agents and New York City hotels.

United Airlines took on JetBlue and Delta's Song in November 2003 with the introduction of its own low-cost carrier, Ted. It made its first flight in February 2004. Described as an airline-within-an-airline, Ted—its name was derived from the last three letters of "United"—was based in Chicago and operated within the United brand. It offered passengers opportunities not typically provided by discount carriers, such as the ability to earn United's Mileage Plus miles and to upgrade from economy to economy plus (with more legroom at each seat). Ted also targeted leisure travelers, who accounted for 59 percent of all air travel, rather that the smaller business-traveler market. Once Ted was established, United planned to drop United service from its Denver hub to cities likely to be visited by leisure travelers—such as Las Vegas; New Orleans; Phoenix, Arizona; and Orlando, Florida—leaving those destinations to be covered by Ted. Passengers on Ted were served snacks (pretzels and biscotti) on morning flights and could buy more substantial snacks or light meals on longer flights. To support the launch of its new airline, United worked with agencies Fallon Worldwide, Minneapolis; Frankel, Chicago; and Pentagram, New York, to create a branding program, which Adweek said was "lighthearted" and "comfortable." But Ted's purpose was twofold. It took the place of United's original discount carrier, Shuttle by United, which operated for seven years until it was disbanded in 2001; and it was hoped the new low-cost carrier would attract customers, build business, and help the struggling United emerge from bankruptcy, for which it filed in 2002.

MARKETING STRATEGY

To guarantee that its spin-off airline, Song, would stand out from the crowd of discount airlines, Delta embarked on a major branding campaign for the new carrier that was intended to convince consumers it was offering more than just low-cost tickets. The effort involved every aspect of the new airline, from the uniforms of the customer-service agents and flight attendants to the food and entertainment provided on board. Marketing for the new airline supported the message that Song was unique and would provide customers an experience equal to air travel in the 1960s, when flying was an adventure in glamour and sophistication rather than simply a way to arrive at destination B from point A. In addition to the work of Delta's advertising agency, New York–based Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners, work on the project was provided by Andy Spade, former creative director at ad agency TBWA\Chiat\Day and husband of fashion designer Kate Spade, who developed Song's new uniforms. Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners divisions Media Kitchen and Lime worked on Song's media and public relations/promotions accounts.

Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners and Andy Spade partnered on Song's marketing campaign, with the agency handling outdoor advertising and Spade creating print ads. Television spots were also a part of the campaign. Print ads, which ran in publications such as InStyle, Travel & Leisure, Food & Wine, and the New York Times Magazine, were two- or three-page spreads, each depicting a Song customer who matched the specific publication's readers. The InStyle spread portrayed a 20-something woman dressed in jeans and a striped shirt, her red hair flying out behind her as she held onto a tree. The copy read: "Kate isn't afraid of flying, she's afraid of conformity." A spread that appeared in the New York Times Magazine featured an older woman with coiffed white hair. She was posed in front of rosebushes with her hands on her hips, and the copy read:

"Magdalena could fly in first, but she'd rather save $600 and not meet another CEO." The ads visually alluded to flying; for instance, the redhead's hair was flying behind her, and the older woman's arms on her hips hinted at the shape of wings. Ads also included the slogan, "Founded by optimists, built by believers," the tagline "Let Yourself Fly," and a list of Song's variety of product offerings.

Television spots for the campaign followed a format similar to the print ads, using imagery that evoked flight. The spots also used the theme and tagline of the campaign, "Let Yourself Fly." During an interview on PBS television's Frontline, Spade described the spots as "kind of a morph between a music video and a commercial." One commercial featured a small group of people laughing and running across a meadow while flying a kite in a crystal-blue sky. Text on the screen stated, "Now boarding happy people," followed by a list of Song's benefits (such as organic food and low fares) and the tagline "Song. Let yourself fly."

In addition to print ads and television spots, Song's marketing strategy included outdoor work by Kirshenbaum Bond + Partners' media-strategy division, Media Kitchen. One of the projects entailed hiring skywriters to fly over beaches on the East Coast, such as those on the Jersey shore, Martha's Vineyard, and Florida, writing in the sky the message "Wish you were here. Fly Song.com." The outdoor effort also featured signage that read, "Fifth Avenue style at Lower East Side prices," and that was placed in fashionable locations in New York City, such as the corner of Broadway and Houston Street. The agency's public-relations unit, Lime, opened a Song retail store in New York's SoHo neighborhood. The shop gave consumers an opportunity to try out Song's leather seats, sample its food, view the onboard entertainment options, and book a flight.

OUTCOME

With its initial "Let Yourself Fly" campaign, which created a brand identity for Song that established it as a stylish and fun way to travel and set it apart from other low-cost air carriers, Song emerged as one of the fastest-growing travel brands. In an interview with Adweek, Tim Mapes, the airline's managing director of marketing, noted that, five months after its launch, Song had established a brand awareness of 44 percent among consumers in target markets such as New York and Boston.

After a three-year run, in May 2005 Song replaced its "Let Yourself Fly" campaign with a new campaign titled "Fly Your Own Song." The effort was created by New York agency Shepardson Stern & Kaminsky and featured a series of print ads supported by outdoor and online advertising. The ads focused on Song's options that allowed passengers to personalize their travel experience. The campaign was released in select markets, including New York, Boston, and Los Angeles, before being expanded to other areas served by the airline.

Despite the success of its multimillion-dollar branding effort and of the follow-up campaign, in September 2005 Song Airlines filed for bankruptcy protection along with its parent Delta Air Lines. At the time Delta reported that Song would continue operation until 2006 and then would be absorbed back into its parent, Delta Air Lines. Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chief executive officer, told the Los Angeles Times that many of the best aspects of Song, such as additional legroom for passengers and high-tech entertainment options, would be incorporated into Delta as the airline continued to evolve as a more passenger-oriented carrier.

FURTHER READING

Baar, Aaron, and Deanna Zammit. "Roster Shake-Up at Delta." Adweek, May 28, 2003.

Beirne, Mike. "Are These the Little Airlines that Could?" Brandweek, March 29, 2004.

———. "Variety's the Spice Aboard Song." Adweek, April 25, 2005.

Bernstein, James. "Ted, Meet Song/Major Carriers Try to Make a Mark with Discount Airlines." Cincinnati Post, March 24, 2005.

Grantham, Russell. "Delta Tunes Up for New Song Low-Cost Airline to Take Off in Spring." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 29, 2003.

Howe, Peter J. "A Swan Song for an Airline Brand." Boston Globe, October 29, 2005.

Kesmodel, David. "United's Little Ted Gets Off to Flying Start Low-Fare Airline Fills 82 percent of Seats, Beats Expectations." Denver (CO) Rocky Mountain News, March 12, 2004.

Lippert, Barbara. "Song: Not So Catchy." Adweek, December 8, 2003.

Muskal, Michael. "Delta to Eliminate Discount Carrier Song." Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2005.

Rawls, Linda. "Kate Spade to Help Delta's Discount Airline Song Go for Stylish Look." Palm Beach (FL) Post, August 18, 2003.

Schmuckler, Eric. "The Media Kitchen." Adweek, June 21, 2004.

Thomaselli, Rich. "Song Sponsors NYC 'Hood." Advertising Age, November 24, 2003.

Tsui, Bonnie. "JetBlue Soars in First Months." Advertising Age, September 11, 2000.

"United Airlines Says Ted Is Good to Go." Brandweek, November 28, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

ON TOP OF THE WORLD CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

"Millions of reasons to fly today; only one that matters to you" was the central message of the "On Top of the World" campaign for Delta Air Lines, Inc. The campaign acknowledged that customers had individual reasons for flying, and it assured them that the airline would strive to meet their needs. To the accompaniment of ethereal music, some of the television commercials focused on individual passengers dreaming that they were being pampered by airline employees and then awakening to discover that the reality of a Delta flight was almost as pleasant as the dream. One woman was gently fanned by attendants as she slept on a bed of feathers. In another spot a man danced while an orchestra played just for him. Later spots showed people writing down their reasons for flying on Delta, attaching the pieces of paper to balloons, and watching them float into the air. Delta employees gathered the papers and placed them on airplane seats to indicate that they had assumed responsibility for ensuring that each customer's needs were met. The fantasy advertisements were intended to change the company's image and to portray the comfortable conditions in Delta's new transatlantic business-class seats. The "On Top of the World" campaign, which was created by Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, began in May 1997 and was scheduled to run through the fall of 1999 in various media.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Delta Air Lines was founded in 1924 as Huff Daland Dusters, the first business to offer aerial crop dusting. C.E. Woolman, B.R. Coad, and George Post were instrumental in the formation of the enterprise. A division of Huff Daland Manufacturing, a New York firm that made airplanes, the dusting company began operations in Macon, Georgia, and then moved to Monroe, Louisiana. In 1928 the enterprise was sold to a group of Louisiana businessmen, and its name was changed to Delta Air Service in honor of the Mississippi delta region where it operated. During the 1940s the company moved its headquarters to Atlanta, and its name was changed to Delta Air Lines, Inc. The company offered crop-dusting services in the United States until 1966. Meanwhile, the firm began transporting passengers and mail among cities throughout the South. Mergers with Chicago and Southern Air Lines (C&S) in 1953, Northeast Airlines in 1972, and Western Air Lines in 1987 expanded Delta's operations nationwide. By 1998 the airline was making more than 5,000 daily flights to 318 destinations in 41 countries.

Over the years Delta's advertising slogans included "Trunkline to sunshine," introduced in 1945; "Delta is ready when you are," used from 1968 to 1984; "We love to fly and it shows," introduced in 1987; and "You'll love the way we fly," introduced in 1994. The airline often emphasized passenger comfort and personal service in its marketing efforts. "We take the time and effort to make you feel comfortable and relaxed on each Delta flight. Because we care," said an advertisement in Sunset magazine in 1986. In 1996 the $20 million "Delta Marathon" campaign during the Olympic Games showed the worldwide travels of British actor Nigel Havers, who had appeared in the film "Chariots of Fire." The commercials were intended to enhance Delta's status as an international carrier by appealing to the general public but also to frequent business travelers, who were becoming increasingly important to airlines.

Before 1978, when the U.S. airline industry was deregulated, advertising campaigns for Delta and other carriers were typically designed to promote a brand image. During the chaotic competition of the 1980s and 1990s the emphasis shifted to affordable prices as airlines launched fare wars and incentives such as frequent-flier programs to build customer loyalty. The industry lost enormous amounts of money, and many new carriers went out of business. After surviving economic difficulties during the early 1990s, Delta embarked on a dramatic cost-cutting program called Leadership 7.5, which streamlined its operations and increased passenger traffic but lowered employee morale and customer service. By 1997 the company was moving away from Leadership 7.5 and adopting a bold new marketing strategy that would change the airline's image and strengthen the Delta brand.

TARGET MARKET

The "On Top of the World" campaign was aimed primarily at business travelers flying on expense accounts. Because corporate travelers tended to fly frequently, they valued comfort and service during their trips. Since their fares were being charged to a business, these passengers tended to be less concerned about price. Nevertheless, they often traveled in the moderately priced business-class section because their employers were not willing to pay for the more costly first class. Some customers paid for less expensive seats and then used their frequent-flier credits to move into first class, reducing the airline's profits from the first-class section. During 1997 Delta's business-class market increased four times as fast as its first-class market, and the airline adjusted to the changing times by introducing a new transatlantic business class. (International operations, particularly transatlantic flights, accounted for about 20 percent of the company's revenues.) In 1998 Delta reconfigured its first-class and business-class sections into one group of luxury seats known as BusinessElite, which offered passengers greater legroom and space to recline. One newspaper advertisement in the "On Top of the World" campaign called attention to the more spacious seating arrangement by stating, "Delta presents the last news today's hardened business executives would expect to hear from a company. 'We're upsizing.'" The campaign also emphasized the sincere, courteous service for which Delta had always been noted.

COMPETITION

In 1998 Delta transported 105 million passengers, more than any other airline in the world. According to Aviation Week & Space Technology, United Airlines, Inc., was in first place in the United States, with American Airlines second, Delta third, Continental Airlines, Inc., fourth, Northwest Airlines Corporation, fifth, and US Airways Group, Inc., sixth. During 1998 Delta considered a marketing and code-sharing alliance with United Airlines, since the two carriers served more than 200 destinations but competed in only 34 of them. The virtual merger, which would have given the two firms nearly 39 percent of all U.S. traffic, was opposed by government officials on antitrust grounds, and it was abandoned when Delta's pilots withdrew their support. In the same year Northwest and Continental began planning a similar alliance, which would control about 16 percent of U.S. traffic, but the partnership was delayed as the two companies awaited antitrust clearance from the U.S. Department of Justice. Meanwhile, American and US Airways considered a cooperative arrangement, which would control 25 percent of the market, but they ultimately converted the proposal into little more than a reciprocal frequent-flier plan. Because the three alliances would have created three gigantic airline blocs controlling 82 percent of the market, they were opposed by government regulators, consumer groups, and smaller airlines.

Like Delta, other airlines were using new advertising slogans in 1998. United, a subsidiary of UAL Corp., had abandoned its familiar "Come fly our friendly skies" tag line and in 1997 launched a candid campaign called "Rising," which admitted that air travel was not always pleasant. The campaign promised that United would rise to the challenge and improve its performance. One magazine advertisement said, "We figure by the time you reach the gate agent, you've had enough red tape." The text explained that the company had given its gate agents the power to resolve problems for customers without consulting a supervisor or asking the customer to wait. In one television commercial the narrator promised, "Air travel needs to be easier, more professional, especially for people who do it most. Now it will be, because, compared to the rest of the industry, United Airlines is headed in a different direction."

LIVING BILLBOARD

While competing for the Delta Air Lines, Inc., account, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising submitted an idea for a "living billboard" that would feature a 44-foot-long section of a Delta jet and actual people playing the roles of passengers and flight attendants. The billboard would showcase the appetizing food, individual movie screens, and comfortable conditions on the airline's new business-class flights to Europe. Saatchi & Saatchi expected Delta to commend the creative effort and then request a less unusual approach. Instead, Delta executives were so enthusiastic about the idea that they asked the agency to have the display completed within two months. The billboard was erected near the Port Authority Bus Terminal in Manhattan, where it was seen by an estimated 1.5 million people each day. Adweek estimated that Delta received more than $2 million worth of publicity, thanks in part to testimonials from the billboard's passengers and widespread coverage by print and broadcast media. The promotion, which lasted six days and cost $250,000, won a 1998 Mediaweek Plan of the Year Award.

Continental Airlines, a subsidiary of Continental Air Holdings, also had a new marketing slogan, "Work hard. Fly right." Like Delta, Continental advertised a business-class fare (known as BusinessFirst) that offered first-class perks to attract international fliers. The 1990s were a time of flux for Continental, which operated at a loss early in the decade and filed for bankruptcy protection, from which it emerged in 1993. By 1997 Continental was generating $7.2 billion in annual revenues and was growing faster than any other major U.S. carrier, but because one of its primary investors was attempting to withdraw from the company, Continental was viewed as a possible takeover target. Delta considered merging with Continental during 1997, and in January 1998 Continental received takeover proposals from both Delta and Northwest, but no agreement was reached during the year.

Northwest lost $224 million during the third quarter of 1998 because of a pilot strike that lasted from June to September. The company had revenues of $10.2 billion in 1997, and in 1998 it reported a profit of $71 million during the first quarter and $49 million during the second quarter. Northwest's marketing efforts in 1998 included a notable advertising campaign for the company's E-Ticket service, which allowed customers to purchase tickets electronically via the Internet. Northwest was also known for its popular ''What in the World'' advertisements in USA Today, which was based on interesting facts, for example, the number of glasses of milk a cow produced in its lifetime tied to the line ''Milk your vacation for all it's worth.''

Another top competitor, American Airlines, emphasized the familiarity of its brand during 1998. In its advertisements international travelers felt as if they were almost home when they saw the company's red, white, and blue emblem. American, a subsidiary of AMR Corporation, had led the U.S. airline industry in 1992, with a market share of 20.3 percent, compared to 19.3 percent for United and 16.8 percent for Delta. By the late 1990s American held the second largest market share in the United States but was generating more revenue than any other carrier in the world.

MARKETING STRATEGY

By 1997 Delta was ready to move away from the straightforward themes and simple melodies of its earlier advertisements and to try a daring new strategy to change its image. It hired a new agency, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, to design a consistent, multimedia ad campaign that would build the Delta brand. The campaign revolved around the message that Delta was a global carrier that treated customers as individuals and made them feel as if they were ''on top of the world.'' Gayle Bock, vice president for consumer marketing at Delta, explained, ''We all know the rational reasons for choosing an airline: schedule, convenience, frequent flier miles, and cost. However, to connect an airline brand with its customers, it is essential that we also understand their emotional needs. In this regard, Delta already has a long history of commitment to personal customer service. No courtesy is too small to extend to any customer, anywhere in the world. The new branding campaign demonstrates that Delta professionals recognize customers individually. It is who we are, and it is our competitive advantage.''

The surreal quality of the ''On Top of the World'' campaign was underscored by its chantlike theme music, a New Age song called ''Adiemus.'' The first five television commercials in the U.S. campaign, launched in the spring of 1997, looked a great deal alike and had the same overall tone. They showed passengers dreaming that airline chefs, flight attendants, and other personnel were catering to them as if there were no other travelers on the plane. When the passengers awoke, they discovered that Delta's transatlantic business class was almost as pleasant as their dreams. A second series of television commercials began airing in the fall of 1997 and ran through 1998.

POP MUSIC

''Adiemus,'' the unusual theme song in the ''On Top of the World'' campaign, had been used in European advertising for Delta Air Lines since 1994. The music was so successful that the London Philharmonic Orchestra recorded a longer version, which climbed the popular music charts to reach number 13 across Europe and number 8 in Italy. Consumers purchased more than 100,000 copies of a compact disc that featured the song.

Like the first spots in the campaign, they featured the song ''Adiemus'' and voice-over narration by actress Christine Lahti, star of the television series Chicago Hope. In the spots that aired during 1998 Lahti said, ''There are millions of reasons to fly today. Only one that matters to you. At Delta Air Lines, it is our pleasure to get you to the place you want to be.'' The fantasy television commercials depicted a wide range of passengers who wrote their reasons for flying on Delta Air Lines (using words such as ''success,'' ''fun,'' ''home,'' ''the deal,'' and ''the thrill'') on pieces of paper, attached them to balloons, and watched as the messages floated into the sky. Delta employees collected the pieces of paper and assumed responsibility for meeting the customer needs written on them.

The ''On Top of the World'' campaign was a global promotion initially launched in the United States and Europe. It included print and billboard advertisements, radio spots, and network television commercials aired during programs such as ER, Good Morning America, 20/20, and sportscasts. The campaign received a large percentage of Delta's estimated $100 million annual advertising budget. According to Competitive Media Reporting, Delta spent $30.8 million on all advertising during the first half of 1997, compared to $31.9 million for United Airlines and $28.6 million for American Airlines. In the previous year Delta had spent $70.2 million for advertising, United $71.2 million, and American $61.3 million.

OUTCOME

The ''On Top of the World'' campaign was acclaimed for its style and creativity. One of the television commercials in the European campaign, ''Synchronized Flying,'' which starred dolphins swimming together as if in a water ballet, won a Golden Kompass Award in 1995, and the public frequently called to learn when it would air so that they could tape it. "Adiemus" won a gold Clio in 1998 for original music.

Delta's research indicated that most consumers understood the central message of the promotion, but some people were mystified by the surreal advertisements. A new multimedia campaign promoting the airline's intercontinental BusinessElite service was launched in April 1999 with the tag line "Delta BusinessElite, outclassing business class."

In January 1999 Air Transport World named Delta the global airline of the year. In May 1999 Aviation Week & Space Technology named Delta the industry's best-managed major airline, citing the company's organizational strength and ability to compete in the global marketplace.

FURTHER READING

Beirne, Mike. "Delta Sets First Class Perks at Biz Price." Brandweek, December 14, 1998, p. 8.

Caranicas, Peter. "Something Special on the Air." Shoot, June 6, 1997, p. 4.

Martin, Ellen Rooney, and Michael McCarthy. "New Delta and United Ads Take Flight, Target Business Travelers." Adweek (Eastern Edition), May 5, 1997, p. 5.

Mundy, Alicia. "Paulette Stout." Adweek (Eastern Edition), December 7, 1998, p. 44.

Nelms, Douglas W. "Image Is (Nearly) Everything." Air Transport World, May 1995, p. 71.

"Pulling Delta Out of Its Dive." Fortune, December 7, 1998, p. 157.

Roush, Chris. "Ad Agency Resigns from Delta Air Lines Account." Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, March 7, 1997.

———. "Delta Air Lines Brings Out New Ads." Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, September 25, 1997.

———. "Saatchi & Saatchi to Give Delta Air Lines a New Look, Slogan." Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, March 14, 1997.

Walker, Karen. "US Alliances Face Scrutiny." Airline Business, July 1998, p. 10.

Woolsey, James P. "On Top of the World." Air Transport World, July 1997, p. 30.

Susan Risland

THE PASSENGER'S AIRLINE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Delta Air Lines was the number three air-passenger carrier in 1999, behind number one American Airlines and number two United Airlines. Delta's goal was to move up in the rankings to number one, at least in the eyes of its customers. But as consumer dissatisfaction with the airline industry overall continued to increase, Delta's main challenge was to convince people that air travel did not have to be a negative experience.

To reverse the negative perception consumers had of air travel, and to win over customers, Delta in 1999 replaced its longtime ad agency BBDO with the Leo Burnett Company. Leo Burnett created a branding and advertising campaign for Delta that began in March 2000. Titled "The Passenger's Airline," the campaign was unique in that it had no specific tagline, theme song, or celebrity spokesperson. Rather, the television spots, radio spots, and print ads focused on passengers, their needs, and how Delta was working to meet those needs.

The campaign reached its target audience, and in 2001 it received a Silver EFFIE Award for achieving its goal of mending the damaged relationship between Delta and its customers, particularly frequent business fliers. Following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States that included the hijacking and crashing of four commercial airliners, consumers fled from air travel. Because Delta's "The Passenger's Airline" campaign had resonated so well with the airline's customers, the Leo Burnett Company's team revamped it for the circumstances. With the title "Person to Person," the modified campaign remained passenger-focused and was designed to show how Delta could help bring people together.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1924 Huff Daland Dusters was founded as the world's first aerial crop-dusting company. The company quickly evolved to offer passenger service under the name Delta Air Service. Delta's first passenger flights began in 1929, carrying passengers from Dallas, Texas, to Shreveport, Louisiana, and from Monroe, Louisiana, to Jackson, Mississippi. In 1930 service was expanded to include Atlanta, Georgia, followed in 1934 with a name change to Delta Air Lines. In 1946 Delta's millionth passenger climbed on board. Delta Air Lines merged with Northwest Airlines in 1972, becoming a key carrier in the New York/Boston market. Delta continued to grow, merging with Western Airlines in 1987 and purchasing Pan Am's transatlantic routes in 1991 to become a global carrier. Air Transport World magazine named Delta the global airline of 1998.

To promote its flights between Chicago and Miami, Delta in 1945 hired the Montclair, New Jersey–based advertising agency Burke Dowling Adams (BDA) to create a marketing campaign. The $150,000 campaign had the tagline "Trunkline to Sunshine." BDA merged with another agency, BBDO of Atlanta, in 1964. In 1968 BBDO launched the campaign "Delta Is Ready When You Are," which was used by Delta for 16 years.

The "We Love to Fly and It Shows" campaign followed in 1987. In 1994 BBDO repositioned Delta's marketing to focus on the airline's customer service and introduced the slogan "You'll love the way we fly." But in 1997, after 51 years of serving as Delta's creative agency, BBDO resigned the airline's account when Delta opened the door to other ad agencies. According to a report in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, Delta's decision to pursue other agencies was based on the failure of BBDO's 1996 campaign, "Delta Marathon," which was designed to promote the Atlanta Olympics. At the time BBDO stated that it preferred not to compete with the three other agencies vying for Delta's account: Ogilvy & Mather, Ammirati Puris, and Saatchi & Saatchi. BBDO stated further that during the review process it came to believe that Delta had already removed the agency from consideration.

When the dust settled, Saatchi & Saatchi, an agency based in New York, was selected to handle Delta's $100 million advertising account. In September 1997 "You'll love the way we fly" was pulled, and Saatchi's new campaign for Delta, "On Top of the World," was launched. The agency's relationship with Delta did not have the staying power that BBDO's did, however. In 1999, amidst management upheaval at the airlines and complaints that the theme "On Top of the World" was obtuse and unsuccessful, Delta again looked for a new agency to handle its account. Besides Saatchi & Saatchi, in the running were the Leo Burnett Company, TBWA Worldwide, and Grey Advertising. Leo Burnett won the $100 million account and in March 2000 launched Delta's global campaign, "The Passenger's Airline."

AIRLINE ALLIANCE ADS PROMOTE CUSTOMER SERVICE

In 2000 SkyTeam, an alliance between Delta Air Lines and its partners Air France, AeroMexico, and Korean Air, introduced a new marketing campaign designed to promote the customer service and benefits the separate airlines offered consumers. Themed "Putting You Back in the Picture," the campaign included television spots and print ads. Delta and its partners formed the alliance in late 1999 to develop code-share agreements, which enabled the partners to sell seats on each other's planes. According to Delta, one year after forming a code-share agreement with Air France in 1998, it had generated some $400 million in extra sales. To benefit consumers the SkyTeam Alliance connected more than 6,000 flights daily and carried approximately 174 million passengers to 98 countries each year. Other such alliances and their partners included Star Alliance, led by United Airlines and Lufthansa, and Oneworld Alliance, led by American Airlines and British Airways.

TARGET MARKET

In 1999 Delta conducted a study of its customers, and the results revealed that, although the airline typically reported high ratings for customer satisfaction, it was experiencing the effects of a negative perception of the airline industry. Many business travelers had become distrustful of airlines and their broken promises of better service, shorter check-in and boarding lines, on-time departures and arrivals, and no lost luggage. Delta considered such travelers to be one of its key market demographics. According to a report submitted for consideration by the EFFIE Awards, the airline's primary target audience was "Road Warriors," that is, 25- to 54-year-old men who flew on more than six trips annually. Steve Crawford, executive vice president of client services at Leo Burnett, told Adweek that the "Passenger's Airline" campaign was designed to address a split between the airline and its customers. "There's a relationship between the business traveler and the airlines that's really important," Crawford said. Recognizing the importance of that relationship, Lisa Bennett, executive creative director at Leo Burnett, added that the two-phase campaign would focus on the passenger's experience of flying Delta Air Lines and on addressing customer concerns.

COMPETITION

As the skies became more crowded and passenger numbers inched up, reaching more than 700 million travelers boarding 9 million flights in 2000, complaints about airline service were also on the rise. A report by the National Institute for Aviation Research at Wichita State University found that, despite promises by airlines to improve their services in 2000, overall they had not. The U.S. Transportation Department reported that from 1999 to 2000 the number of complaints had risen 20 percent, to nearly 3 complaints for every 100,000 passengers. The number one airline, American Airlines, a subsidiary of AMR Corp., and low-fare upstart Southwest Airlines Company, were among the companies reviewing methods to attract passengers and to respond to complaints of everything from long lines in the terminals to cramped quarters on the planes.

American Airlines focused on making passengers more comfortable once they were on board. In 2000

American expanded the free space inside its planes by removing two rows of coach seats in each of its 700 jets. The project cost an estimated $70 million. To support the effort American launched what it described as an amusing advertising campaign themed "More Room throughout Coach." Developed by ad agency TLP-Dallas, it was specifically aimed at business travelers, those who fly most. The campaign was twofold: it promoted the additional legroom on the planes, and it responded to the question of what had happened to all the seats that had been removed. The "Great American Seat Take-Off" portion of the campaign gave people a chance to win two of the removed seats and two round-trip coach tickets to any American Airlines destination. Ads for the promotion ran in major daily newspapers across the United States. "More Roomobile," part two of the campaign, was a traveling trailer set up like the inside of a remodeled American jet. It toured to 27 cities and gave people along the route the opportunity to play games and win prizes such as American Airlines golf tees, baggage tags, and T-shirts.

Southwest Airlines targeted business travelers, typically men between 25- and 54-years-old. In 2000 the airline signed a four-year sponsorship deal with the National Hockey League that was designed to reach hockey fans who also fell into Southwest's target demographic. The agreement included a deal with ABC television that included broadcast commercials, sponsorship during hockey-game intermissions, and showing Southwest's logo on goal replays. Also in 2000 Southwest worked with its Austin, Texas–based agency GSD&M to launch a marketing campaign to promote its website. The campaign's tagline, "A symbol of e-freedom," was a variation on Southwest's familiar "A symbol of freedom" slogan. TV spots portrayed people in unpleasant daily situations adjacent to images of them enjoying pleasant vacations. The message was: "When the going gets tough, get going to southwest.com to book a quick getaway."

MARKETING STRATEGY

The Leo Burnett Company, which had created the successful "Fly the Friendly Skies" theme for United Airlines, was hired by Delta Air Lines in 1999 to develop a new global branding and advertising campaign for the air carrier. A report in the Cincinnati Post stated that, prior to developing the campaign, Leo Burnett's team interviewed thousands of the airline's passengers and employees. The interviews considered every aspect of a traveler's experience with the airline, from making phone reservations to gate announcements in the terminals and employee uniforms. Based on the information it gathered, Leo Burnett created Delta's "The Passenger's Airline" campaign.

The $100 million worldwide campaign did not sing Delta's praises with catchy taglines or songs, and there was not a celebrity spokesperson in sight. Rather, the campaign focused on strengthening Delta's business relationship with its passengers by promoting what Delta had to offer from the perspective of passengers. Included was a redesigned delta.com website, more casual uniforms for employees, and advertising with television and radio spots and print ads. Lisa Bennett, executive creative director for Leo Burnett, told Adweek, "We didn't want this campaign to come across as corporate in nature. Rather than Delta saying, 'This is who we are,' we wanted to sign off with the passenger point of view."

Kick-off television spots aired on CBS during the 2000 NCAA basketball tournament. The commercials featured a variety of air travelers, from backpackers looking for a bargain to a businessman dressed in a suit. In each spot a text bubble appeared over the passenger's head with thoughts such as "Wants a window seat" and "Nap" followed by a voice-over asking, "How do you want to fly?" Other spots entailed airport vignettes that focused on passengers' needs. One portrayed a passenger stopping in an airport terminal ice-cream shop and lingering over a cone. The message was that the passenger had time to enjoy the ice cream because he had used Delta's E-ticketing and avoided long lines at the airline's terminal counter. It concluded with the statement, "Check in at the curb and go straight to the plane." Some spots closed with shots of personalized luggage tags on which passengers wrote their desires. In one spot a group of passengers were shown waiting at a baggage carousel, and the tag read, "Fly . . . understood." Print ads, which appeared in major magazines, were similar to the TV spots. In one promoting Delta's BusinessElite international service, the baggage tag read "Fly . . . like an '80s bond trader."

OUTCOME

Despite the lack of a catchy tagline or theme song to resonate with consumers, "The Passenger's Airline" campaign achieved it goals. The campaign was presented a Silver EFFIE Award in 2001 for its success in reconnecting the airline with business travelers, for joining the company's complete roster of product offerings under one umbrella, and for increasing brand regard at a time when consumers had a deep distrust of airlines. But by the end of the year Delta was embroiled in disputes with its employee unions. In November 2000 the airline was forced to cancel 375 flights because of a pilot shortage, affecting thousands of its customers. Under threats of delayed or canceled flights, Delta was struggling to maintain the consumer confidence the campaign had helped build.

The terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001—in which four commercial airliners were hijacked and crashed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center in New York, the Pentagon, and a field in Pennsylvania—further eroded consumer confidence in air travel and in airlines as a whole. Delta was forced to take another look at its successful marketing campaign. Rather than abandon the campaign, however, the Leo Burnett agency modified it for the circumstances. Maintaining the same focus on customers that "The Passenger's Airline" had used, the revamped campaign introduced a new series of advertisements, themed "Person to Person," designed to reinforce the importance of people being together in person.

FURTHER READING

Barr, Aaron. "Delta Gets in Passengers' Heads." Adweek, March 13, 2000.

"Delta Air Lines Debuts 'Person-to-Person' Advertising." PR Newswire, November 6, 2001.

Fonti, Nancy. "Delta Ads to Focus on Longing to Connect with Friends, Family." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 6, 2001.

Frook, John Evan. "Southwest Hooks NHL Sponsorship; Four-Year Agreement Designed to Put Male Business Travelers on More Flights." B to B, September 11, 2000.

Goetzl, David. "Delta's New $100 Mil Push Signals Shift in Branding." Advertising Age, March 13, 2000.

Grantham, Russell. "Delta, Global 'Sky Team' Partners Launching Ad Campaign Today." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, June 23, 2000.

Herschel, Gordon Lewis. "Advertising's Confusion Factor—Delta Air Lines Advertising." Direct, November 15, 1999.

Knapp, Kevin. "Airlines Vie for Online Runway." Advertising Age, March 20, 2000.

Reed, Dan. "American Airlines to Give Coach-Class More Legroom." Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News, February 6, 2000.

Stammen, Ken. "Delta Parades Its Deluxe New Jet Comforts: PC Ports, Seats Made for Sleep." Cincinnati Post, March 28, 2000.

———. "Delta Unveils Ad Drive, Turns Focus to Passengers." Cincinnati Post, March 8, 2000.

Thurston, Scott. "CEO of Delta Air Lines Makes Progress toward Repairing Image of Company." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, April 20, 2000.

———. "Delta Airlines' New Advertising Campaign Highlights Simple Pleasures." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2000.

"TLP, Inc. Partners with American Airlines to Promote 'More Room throughout Coach' Campaign." Business Wire, August 16, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

DHL Holdings (USA), Inc.

1200 S. Pine Island Rd., Ste. 600
Plantation, Florida 33324
USA
Telephone: (954) 888-7000
Fax: (954) 888-7310
Web site: www.dhl-usa.com

■■■

COMPETITION. BAD FOR THEM. GREAT FOR YOU. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In June 2004 Plantation, Florida–based DHL Holdings (USA), Inc., a subsidiary of DHL, which was headquartered in Belgium and was itself a subsidiary of the privately owned German postal service Deutsche Post World Net, ended a more-than-20-year absence from the U.S. television advertising market with a three-spot campaign that announced increased competition in the U.S. express and ground parcel market. The company, which had gone through a number of changes in the years just prior to the campaign, hired Ogilvy & Mather of New York to produce the campaign.

The campaign sported the tagline "Competition. Bad for them. Great for you." It consisted of television spots as well as print and online advertising and outdoor signage. In addition to the campaign proper, Ogilvy PR Worldwide conducted a public-relations campaign to assist in reintroducing the brand. The cost of the campaign was approximately $150 million.

The "Competition" campaign not only reintroduced DHL to United States customers but also introduced new colors for the company and made consumers aware of a fourth option (after UPS, FedEx, and the United States Postal Service) in the U.S. express shipping market. The campaign ended in February 2005, but DHL's two subsequent U.S. advertising campaigns followed up on what "Competition" had achieved and further cemented the company's presence in the U.S. market. B to B named it the best integrated campaign of 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1969 by Adrian Dalsey, Larry Hillblom, and Robert Lynn (whose surname initials gave the company its name), DHL was originally an express-courier service that carried documents such as bills of lading between San Francisco and Honolulu. During the next two decades DHL focused on international express delivery. In the 1970s DHL first initiated service to Pacific Rim countries (except China) and followed this up with service to Europe, Latin America, the Middle East, and Africa. In the 1980s the company began air-express service to Eastern Europe and the People's Republic of China. A television ad campaign of the early 1980s was memorable for its visuals of flying company vans. During this period DHL was content to relinquish the U.S. express market to rivals United Parcel Service (UPS) and Federal Express (now FedEx). That attitude changed in the early years of the twenty-first century.

The new approach toward the U.S. express-shipping market came with a new owner. In 2002 the German company Deutsche Post World Net completed its acquisition of DHL (the process had begun in 1998). The following year DHL, in an effort to expand its ground-delivery capabilities, made a $1.1 billion offer to buy the ground-delivery service of Seattle-based Airborne Express. Airborne, initially an air-delivery company, had only recently begun its ground-package service in 2001. The deal was held up for five months while the U.S. Department of Transportation examined it closely. The department's two concerns were reduced competition and—because of the climate of heightened security following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001—foreign ownership. Ultimately the acquisition went through: the Airborne ground service was merged with DHL Americas, while Airborne's air operations became part of a new independent company called ABX Air, which was owned by Airborne stockholders. In this way the issues of foreign ownership and reduced competition were bypassed.

© THIERRY ROGE/REUTERS/CORBIS.

TARGET MARKET

The target market for the "Competition" campaign was the combined group of owners of small- and medium-sized U.S. businesses. Theresa Howard wrote in USA Today, "Historically both DHL and Airborne courted larger companies, overlooking the smaller businesses that generate 75 percent of new jobs and 52 percent of the gross domestic product, according to Inc. magazine." It was by tapping into this overlooked market that DHL in 2004 hoped to expand upon its meager share of the U.S. ground-express market while not overlooking its core customer base of larger companies.

In addition the humor of the spots was designed to grab the attention of customers under age 40, whether or not they were business owners. In this way DHL laid the groundwork for its future customer base. Finally, as at least one media critic, Barbara Lippert of Adweek, recognized, the spots were also intended to boost morale among DHL employees and solidify the company's effort to expand its share of the express- and ground-delivery market.

COMPETITION

While the United States Postal Service (USPS) competed with DHL, there was never any doubt about who the company was really focused on overtaking. UPS and FedEx held such larger percentages of the U.S. express- and ground-delivery market that DHL Americas CEO John Fellows referred to them as duopolists. In an article in South Florida CEO, Rochelle Broder-Singer quoted Fellows, who saw some advantage for the smaller DHL Americas. "Within the U.S., our competitors are very inflexible [because of their size] and often arrogant. We'll ensure that our brand is flexible." Flexible or not, UPS had effectively rebranded itself with its "What Can Brown Do for You?" campaign, which cost some $45 million. The campaign broke in February 2002, during the Winter Olympics. For its part FedEx responded in October 2003 with its $90 million, award-winning "Relax, it's FedEx" campaign.

That FedEx and UPS saw DHL as a potential threat was obvious from the roadblocks that they threw up

DEUTSCHE POST WORLD NET

While technically tracing its roots back to 1490 and the founding of the modern postal system in what later became Germany, Deutsche Post World Net itself came about in 1995, after the unification of Germany and following the second postal reform. Originally the company was called Deutsche Post AG, with the government as a majority stockholder. The company went public in 2000 and became the largest IPO (initial public offering) of the year in Germany, raising 6.6 billion euros. By the time of its 2002 acquisition of DHL, which became a wholly owned subsidiary, the company was known as Deutsche Post World Net. Its headquarters were in Bonn, Germany. In addition to the express delivery and logistics (i.e., managing a customer's specific transportation and warehousing needs) services provided by DHL, the company retained its original mail service and also offered financial services through its Deutsche Postbank division.

when the company sought to take over Airborne Express. Still, compared to them DHL was a very small player in the U.S. market. According to SJ Consulting, a Pennsylvania-based transportation-industry consulting firm, in 2004 UPS held 51 percent of the U.S. parcel market, FedEx had a 27 percent share, and the USPS captured 13 percent of the market. DHL trailed with 7 to 8 percent.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The strategy for the advertising campaign was twofold: to reintroduce the brand to customers and to position DHL as a serious alternative to UPS and FedEx in the United States. DHL executives felt that increasing the company's share of the U.S. market was crucial to the company's global positioning. In her USA Today article, Howard quoted Richard Metzler, then executive vice president of marketing for DHL Americas, who said, "There can't be a strong DHL globally without a strong DHL in the U.S."

The campaign was DHL's first U.S. advertising in two decades, and it used simple humor to get the point across, never leaving any doubt that the company was taking on the giants in the U.S. express market. In one television spot UPS and FedEx trucks waited on opposite sides of a railroad crossing while a long line of flatcars passed, each carrying DHL trucks. Another spot showed a FedEx truck and a DHL truck racing through a city trying to arrive first at the same destination. The race ended in a two-way tie for second place: a DHL driver was walking out of the building just as they arrived. The spots featured the tagline "Competition. Bad for them. Great for you." The passing-train spot particularly reinforced the new DHL colors, red and yellow. Previously DHL trucks had been painted white. The spots aired early in the morning, on prime-time broadcast and cable programs, and during late-night talk shows.

Metzler, who had worked in FedEx's marketing department prior to coming to DHL, also discussed the spots in a B to B article by Mary Ellen Podmolik. "We had to nail it on creative, and we did," he said. Podmolik noted that because of the lengthy gap between DHL's ad campaigns, "Metzler considered it critical to refer to FedEx and UPS by name so as to define [DHL's] own abilities in the express delivery market to U.S. customers."

In addition to the television commercials, print ads were run in leading business publications, ads were placed online, and billboards were installed in strategic locations around the United States. One of DHL's most prominent, and telling, billboard ads was located at the Memphis, Tennessee, airport, across from the FedEx hub. (FedEx was headquartered in Memphis.) As further proof that the "Competition" campaign was the first salvo in DHL's plan to become a major shipper in the U.S. market, the company announced in September 2004 that it had leased space in Memphis for a new sorting center, the third of a planned seven new hubs. The Commercial Appeal, a Memphis daily, quoted two DHL officials on the subject. Steve White, at the time the head of DHL's hub and gateway operations, explained, "Memphis will allow us to expand our overnight delivery to parts of Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Kentucky." Dan McDonald, then head of DHL network planning, had a more competitive take on the expansion into Memphis: "Memphis is geographically in the center of the country. FedEx found it works for them, and that we're in FedEx's backyard is just icing on the cake."

Ogilvy PR Worldwide complemented the ad campaign with a public-relations campaign that aimed, according to a June 2004 press release published in Business Wire, "to reintroduce the global express and logistics leader to core constituents and opinion leaders." In that same press release Metzler said, "Using a full 360-degree arsenal of marketing channels, we are showcasing the DHL brand's value message to current and potential customers across all points of contact."

DHL enhanced its ad campaign by signing a deal that made it the "Official Express Deliver and Logistics Provider" of the U.S. Olympic team for the 2004

Olympic Games, which were held in Athens. As such DHL also signed an exclusive U.S. broadcast agreement with NBC, the network that aired the Athens Olympics. The agreement locked out UPS and FedEx from national television advertising during the Olympics broadcast. This was not DHL's first sponsorships of a high-profile sporting event; in 2002 the company was one of the official sponsors of the British soccer team during the World Cup tournament.

OUTCOME

There was no doubt that the reintroduction of the DHL brand was successful, though, as expected, gaining a larger share of the market was less so. Nevertheless, in the USA Today weekly poll Ad Track, 23 percent of those familiar with the spots liked them "a lot." This was a slight increase over the Ad Track average of 21 percent. Among those polled in the 30-to-39 age group, 33 percent liked the spots "a lot," while 27 percent considered them "very effective." The Ad Track average for the latter was also 21 percent. Furthermore, as Howard noted in her November 2004 USA Today article, "tests of DHL's unaided consumer brand awareness show a 40-point climb." Because of the Airborne Express acquisition and the $1.2 billion expansion project, DHL's U.S. operations lost money in 2004 and 2005, though parent Deutsche Post World Net boasted that the company would reach the break-even point by 2006.

Being more or less the groundbreaker in the United States for the new DHL, the "Competition" campaign was bound to influence the company's subsequent campaigns. In early 2005 DHL launched a baseball-themed campaign as part of a sponsorship deal with Major League Baseball. DHL became the official delivery service for the league, the National Baseball Hall of Fame, the website MLB.com, and individual teams. One of the baseball spots featured Johnny Damon, who at the time was a star outfielder for the 2004 World Series champion team the Boston Red Sox. By associating the company with one of the touchstones of American culture, the baseball connection demonstrated DHL's commitment to increasing its share of the U.S. market. In September 2005 DHL introduced a new integrated campaign that emphasized customer service. "Last year we wanted people to understand that we were here and that we were a choice in . . . shipping," said Karen Jones, DHL vice president of brand, advertising, and promotions, in an Adweek article by Kenneth Hein. "Then the task was coming up with a unique and different message to tell the world why they should choose DHL."

FURTHER READING

Aufterbeck, Sigrid. "Airborne Express Shareholders Approve Sale to DHL." Seattle Times, August 15, 2003.

Broder-Singer, Rochelle. "Fighting the Duopoly." South Florida CEO, May, 2004.

Creamer, Matthew. "DHL Bets on Flexibility as It Moves on FedEx, UPS in U.S." Advertising Age, September 6, 2004.

"DHL Brings Competition and Choice to U.S. Delivery Business with New Campaign." Business Wire, June 14, 2004.

"DHL. Campaign Close-Up." Sales & Marketing Management, August 2004.

"DHL Joins U.S. Olympic Team." Brandweek, July 7, 2004.

"DHL Launches $150 Mil. Campaign." Adweek, June 21, 2004.

Gillie, John. "Seattle-Based Airborne Inc. in Talks to Sell Ground Delivery Unit." Tacoma (WA) News Tribune, March 25, 2003.

Hannon, David. "Small Package Market Changes Could Benefit Buyers." Purchasing Magazine Online, March 17, 2005. Available from <http://www.purchasing.com/article/CA510904.html?text=hannon>

Hein, Kenneth. "'Service Is Back' in New DHL Spots." Adweek, September 12, 2005.

Howard, Theresa. "DHL Dispatches Its Message to USA." USA Today, November 11, 2004.

Maddox, Kate. "Karen Jones, VP-Advertising, Brand and Promotions, DHL Express USA." B to B, July 11, 2005.

Roberts, Jane. "FedEx Rival to Open Sorting Hub in Memphis, Tenn., 'Backyard.'" Memphis (TN) Commercial Appeal, September 17, 2004.

Frank Caso

Diageo plc

8 Henrietta Place
London, WIG OMD
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 20 79275200
Fax: 44 20 79274600
Web site: www.diageo.co.uk

■■■

KEEP WALKING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Diageo plc's Johnnie Walker was one of the world's top scotch brands in the late 1990s and early 2000s, but blended scotch as a category was in long-term decline. Among distilled spirits, meanwhile, vodka was booming, largely as a result of effective youth-oriented marketing. Trying to shed a perception that scotch drinkers were stodgy, suit-wearing business types, Johnnie Walker in 1999 unveiled a global branding campaign called ''Keep Walking'' that continued to associate scotch drinking with success while widening the definition of success to appeal to young drinkers. The U.S. version of this campaign, which began in 2001, celebrated the maverick entrepreneurial ideas of the 1990s, but its message fell prey to changing perceptions of exactly such entrepreneurs following the dot-com crash and successive corporate scandals. In 2003 Johnnie Walker's U.S. agency, Bartle Bogle Hegarty (BBH) of New York, set out to update ''Keep Walking'' to accommodate yet another definition of success.

The new installment of ''Keep Walking,'' which had a budget of approximately $15 million, focused on life as a journey and offered Johnnie Walker as a product that helped people navigate the uncertainties of that journey. The Striding Man logo, an image of an aristocratically dressed man in midstride, had been used in the campaign's prior incarnations to represent the idea of personal progress; now the logo was used to suggest the determination required to weather the many obstacles and strange turns one encountered in life. The campaign's print ads paired the Striding Man and the ''Keep Walking'' tagline with stories of individual career paths that had taken unpredictable turns, while outdoor executions featured the Striding Man as their central character, who was shown having emerged from difficulties represented by simple visual symbols, such as walls, rainclouds, and stock-market graphs.

BBH exceeded its goals of drawing attention to the Johnnie Walker brand and to the Striding Man as a brand icon. The update of ''Keep Walking'' won a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005. The concept behind the outdoor component of the campaign was extended in a subsequent series of print and outdoor ads launched in late 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Blended scotch whiskey fell drastically out of favor among American consumers during the 1980s and 1990s, losing more than 20 percent of its sales volume as young people in particular turned to clear liquors. While vodka brands such as Absolut and, later, Grey Goose built up-to-date, premium product images that appealed to people in their twenties and thirties—high-volume consumers essential to the long-term health of any alcohol brand—scotch advertising on the whole did not keep pace with the times.

Predictable appeals, such as using stereotypical Scottish imagery or connecting traditional ideas of business success with scotch drinking, were ineffective in communicating with young people.

Diageo's Johnnie Walker attempted to remedy this image problem by turning, in 1999, to a global branding platform called "Keep Walking," crafted by Bartle Bogle Hegarty of London. Featuring the Striding Man logo—an image of a walking man decked out in a top hat, boots, and cane, which made its first appearance on the Johnnie Walker bottle in 1909—"Keep Walking" was meant to suggest the idea of personal progress; the perpetually walking figure signified the determination necessary to realize one's dreams and goals. In print ads as well as TV spots such figures as Abraham Lincoln and the actor Harvey Keitel, as well as artists and philosophers, were employed to stress the long-established connection between success and scotch-drinking, but the campaign effectively broadened the definition of success to encapsulate worlds beyond the country clubs and private libraries of macho businessmen.

A U.S.-specific campaign running under the "Keep Walking" umbrella was launched in early 2001, at the height of enthusiasm regarding the so-called "new economy." Print ads assuring consumers that "A simple idea can change the world" depicted napkins on which the big entrepreneurial ideas of the 1990s—like selling coffee for $4.95 or opening an online bookstore—were shown in embryonic form, sketched on cocktail napkins, matchbooks, and other scraps of paper. A corresponding online promotion offered entrepreneurs a shot at $500,000 in grant money to realize their own business dreams. In the wake of the dot-com crash, the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and a wave of corporate scandals, however, the limitations of this inspirational, shoot-for-the-moon message became clear. Diageo enlisted its U.S. agency, the New York office of Bartle Bogle Hegarty, to further recast the "Keep Walking" idea in 2003.

TARGET MARKET

Urban men aged 25 to 34 were Johnnie Walker's primary target, but the 2003 update of the "Keep Walking" concept marked a key shift in the brand's approach to this group. Previous installments of the campaign had been aimed at stimulating demand among the target group regardless of whether they already drank Johnnie Walker or, for that matter, scotch in general. The new version of "Keep Walking," by contrast, was aimed at scotch drinkers who were already familiar with the brand. BBH New York sought to take advantage of the fact that most people chose their alcohol brands based on social factors; the agency felt that if those who occasionally drank Johnnie Walker could be encouraged to drink it regularly, then they would serve, ultimately, as brand representatives among their friends and acquaintances. By strategically narrowing the target market in this way, moreover, BBH was able to make better use of a limited advertising budget.

BBH believed that in a scandal-ridden, recession-era business world, it did not make sense to emphasize material riches exclusively. The agency found poll numbers suggesting that a large majority of young men would, if given the choice, prefer two extra weeks of vacation to a 10 percent raise in pay. The new installment of "Keep Walking," then, emphasized life as a journey and offered models of success that were much more down-to-earth than those presented in the prerecession campaign of 2001. Gone were references to simple, world-altering ideas; in their place there appeared profiles of accomplished men, complete with references to the setbacks, humiliations, and unpredictable turns that characterized their paths to success. The Striding Man logo was transformed into a symbol of endurance rather than of simple inspiration.

COMPETITION

"Keep Walking" supported Johnnie Walker's two blended scotches, its Red Label and Black Label products. Johnnie Walker Red was the more affordable and more popular of the two and was America's second-leading scotch brand, behind Dewar's. Johnnie Walker Black, the fourth-best-selling scotch in the United States at the time of the campaign's launch, was a rival to premium brand Chivas Regal, then the country's number five scotch.

Dewar's, like Johnnie Walker, was at this time attempting to update its image and appeal to a younger audience. In 2000 the brand changed its approach to print marketing, entering into advertising partnerships with a few strategically selected publications, rather than continuing to run ads in as many as 20 magazines at a time. One prominent Dewar's partnership, with Men's Journal, resulted in a 2003 project called "Conquer the Highlands," an adventure story of two young men on an "extreme" tour of Scotland, which ran as a print insert described as an "advertorial," meaning it was intentionally similar to the magazine's content. This blurring of the boundaries between editorial and advertising content tested magazine-publishing conventions of the time. The theme was also adapted into a cable-television program, a one-hour adventure show that likewise mixed the two young men's adventures with product placement.

Rather than continuing to compete with vodka and other clear spirits for the youth market, Chivas Regal in 2003 instead began repositioning itself to appeal to an older male market. In a global ad campaign called "The Chivas Life," the brand made no apologies for its luxury roots, celebrating bold life choices such as going ice fishing in Alaska, "crossing the room like you own it," and

THE LABELS

Johnnie Walker brands included not just its consistent top sellers, Johnnie Walker Red Label and Johnnie Walker Black Label, but also Blue Label and Gold Label versions. All of Johnnie Walker's products were blended scotches, as opposed to single malts, with the difference in label color (and purchase price) indicating a difference, primarily, in the age, rarity, and quality of each individual whiskey in the Johnnie Walker blend. Red Label was considered a smooth scotch suitable for everyday drinking, whereas Black Label, consisting of more than 40 whiskeys, each of which was at least 12 years old, was intended for more luxurious times and settings. Blue Label was comprised of rarer whiskeys still and was intended to hearken back to the blending style of the company's namesake. The component whiskeys in Gold Label were each at least 18 years old. Johnnie Walker suggested that Gold Label be served frozen, in a chilled glass, with a snack of bitter chocolate.

embarking on a sailing trip, the destination of which was decided by throwing a dart.

Vodka, meanwhile, was the distilled-spirits industry's fastest-growing market segment and one in which consumers' purchasing choices, according to many observers, were almost exclusively tied to marketing and brand image. In the 1980s and 1990s Absolut vodka had risen from obscurity to become one of the hippest brands in the world and, ultimately, the number three distilled spirits brand in America, thanks to a long-running advertising campaign that turned the product's bottle into an iconic, fashionable emblem. In the first few years of the new millennium, however, Absolut's yearly sales growth could not keep pace with the vodka market at large, which was growing rapidly because of new designer brands such as Grey Goose. Using a taste-test platform whose findings were called into question from the start, together with aggressive marketing to bar owners, the Grey Goose brand grew faster, between 2000 and 2004, than any alcohol product in recent memory, becoming the vodka of choice for urban consumers of pricey specialty cocktails.

MARKETING STRATEGY

The new "Keep Walking" campaign had an estimated budget of $15 million and involved distinct print and outdoor components meant to accomplish different tasks. The "Journeys" print series, which featured profiles of men who had achieved success in unconventional ways, was meant to connect with consumers by making them evaluate their own conceptions of personal progress and by showing them that Johnnie Walker understood their lives. The outdoor portion of the campaign, called "Icons," was less personal and more overt in its branding, showing the Striding Man continuing to move forward despite difficulties, which were represented by simple but suggestive graphics against a black background.

The "Journeys" ads included "Bar," which showed a young man standing behind the bar of his own cutting-edge drinking establishment. A horizontal yellow timeline cut across the image, with copy reading, chronologically across the page, "First Business Loan," "Second Mortgage," "Third Migraine," and "Fourth Location." Similarly, "Cave" summarized an unconventional career path, showing a rear view of a man who was standing at the mouth of a cave that opened on to the ocean. The copy keyed to the various stages of the timeline graphic read, "Discover Caving," "Discover Perfect Cave," "Discover Others Will Pay to Be Guided There," and "Discover Perfect Job." "Producer" depicted a preoccupied man sitting in front of an enormous audio-mastering console. The story of his career path, as told via the accompanying timeline, was, "Terrible Guitarist," "Incompetent Drummer," "Laughable Lead Singer," and "Double-Platinum Producer." In each ad the Striding Man logo appeared above the "Keep Walking" tag at the far right end of the time line, suggesting the pictured individual's determination.

The "Icons" ads sent similar messages, but through symbolic images rather than via individual profiles. For instance, the Striding Man was shown emerging from the precipitous valley of a stock market graph and climbing a slope indicating an upswing, a clear reference to the recent economic woes that had affected many among the Johnnie Walker target market. "Wall" depicted the Striding Man on the other side of a wall he had just walked through, and "Cloud" showed him continuing to walk after having weathered a rainstorm.

In addition to point-of-service promotions, which linked imagery from the national campaign to retail displays of the product, the campaign included a less traditional element called a "Mentorship" program. The program involved sending E-mail invitations that directed Johnnie Walker drinkers to a website where they could register for social gatherings staged by the brand. These gatherings put the "mentors" in a position to spread their brand enthusiasm to Johnnie Walker neophytes.

OUTCOME

BBH exceeded many of its goals for attracting attention to the Johnnie Walker brand. The agency met its goal of increasing awareness of the Striding Man as brand logo. Whereas only 22 percent of consumers were aware of the logo's connection to Johnnie Walker before the campaign ran, 50 percent made the connection after the ads had been running for three months. While BBH had not staked the value of its campaign, which was more concerned with building brand equity and identity, on its capacity to generate immediate sales increases, a comparison of sales figures from the same three-month period the previous year showed a dollar-sales increase of 3.7 percent and a volume-sales increase of 3 percent. The campaign was awarded a Silver EFFIE Award in 2005.

The concept behind the "Icons" outdoor ads was extended in a print and outdoor campaign that was launched in late 2004, in which the Striding Man was shown, as before, against a black background, having successfully endured an obstacle represented by symbolic graphics. More than 50 such ads were generated, and each was tailored to its medium, the timing of its appearance, or (in the case of outdoor placements) its physical location. The "Keep Walking" tagline and the Striding Man logo remained Johnnie Walker's controlling umbrella concepts in subsequent advertising both globally and in the United States.

FURTHER READING

Beck, Ernest. "Johnnie Walker Scotch Tries a New Tack." Wall Street Journal, November 16, 1999.

Branch, Shelly. "Johnnie Walker Targets a Younger Market." Wall Street Journal, February 7, 2001.

Elliott, Stuart. "Chivas Regal and Johnnie Walker Start Preaching to the Choir in Campaigns Aimed at Scotch Lovers." New York Times, October 3, 2003.

"International Brand Development." Marketing, June 12, 2001.

Mason, Tania. "Johnnie Walker Plans 'Keep Walking' Shows." Marketing, July 5, 2001.

McCoy-Pinderhughes, Paula. "Anything's Possible." Black Enterprise, June 2001.

McMains, Andres. "Johnnie Walker Celebrates Ideas." Adweek, January 22, 2001.

"Stride Right." Creativity, December 2004.

Mark Lane

NOT EVERYTHING IN BLACK AND WHITE MAKES SENSE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

NOTE: Since the initial appearance of this essay in the 1998 edition of Major Marketing Campaigns Annual, Guinness was acquired by Diageo. The essay continues to refer to Guinness, as that was the name of the organization when the campaign was launched.

In 1996 Guinness initiated a new advertising campaign for its famous stout beer. With a history dating back to 18th-century Ireland, the brand had a venerable image. Not only was the black-colored beer the best-selling stout in the United Kingdom and Ireland but it was also exported to 150 different countries. Abroad, Guinness was able to capitalize on its association with all things Irish to drive sales. But at home in the British Isles, Guinness found that newer Irish stout beers such as Bass and Murphy's were threatening to encroach on Guinness's domination of the declining stout category. Most importantly, Guinness had not captured the younger generation of 18 to 34 year olds. For the most part these younger drinkers considered the dark brew to be more their parents' beer of choice than their own.

The "Not Everything in Black and White Makes Sense" campaign was conceived to reposition the Guinness brand to appeal to younger drinkers. The surrealistic-style commercials created by advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather attempted to make people reconsider Guinness. The campaign set out to do so in two ways. Not only were the commercials creative, humorous, and eye-catching but they also presented implausible situations that encouraged viewers to form their own opinions—about the spots and about Guinness itself. The intent was to enable viewers to drop their preconceptions about Guinness, including common notions that the beer was too bitter, fattening, or not chic enough. "We decided we had to more or less revamp the brand and everything it stood for—re-invent it as it had re-invented itself many times already, and reconnect it to the new Ireland," Guinness marketing director Tim Kelly told the Sunday Business Post.

The launch spots of the campaign—"Bicycle" and "Old Man"—were both directed by Tony Kaye and encouraged viewers to take a new look at Guinness. "Bicycle," which was filmed in a style reminiscent of 1940s movies, depicts a world without men. Against a backdrop of the song "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Out of My Hair," the commercial portrays women in jobs traditionally held by blue-collar men. After these women drink beer, arm wrestle, and shoot pool, the commercial moves to a scene of a starkly empty maternity ward. Gloria Steinem's famous quote, "A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle," flashes on the screen. What follows is the image of a fish riding a bicycle and the campaign's tag line, "Not everything in black and white makes sense." "Old Man" similarly set out to shock the viewer with its surprising ending. The commercial sets out with the sad scene of an old man dressing alone in his apartment. Singer Pete Townshend's quote appears on screen: "I hope I die before I grow old." It turns out, though, that the old man is donning his formal wear to marry a heavily pregnant buxom blonde.

While Guinness's sales rose over the life of the campaign, the company was not entirely pleased with Ogilvy & Mather's efforts. Two spots in particular sparked firestorms of controversy, which were not the sort of notoriety Guinness was hoping to achieve with its advertising. One, involving sadomasochistic practices, was decried as a reference to the death by hanging of a conservative member of Parliament that was rumored to have had sexual undertones. The other, which never actually ran, featured two gay men enjoying a tranquil breakfast. Tabloid newspapers, which got wind of the proposed commercial, chastised Guinness for condoning homosexual behavior. When the company responded by denying that it ever intended to do so and that it never would in the future, the gay community was outraged. Ultimately, Guinness fired Ogilvy & Mather and shifted its advertising business to Abbott Mead Vickers. That agency's first campaign for the stout giant featured more traditional advertising focusing on the quality of the beer.

© JOEY NIGH/CORBIS.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Guinness beer was founded under near-mythic circumstances in 1759, when Arthur Guinness took over an abandoned brewery at St. James Gate in Dublin, Ireland, and began producing a dark beer called porter. In later years the company named one of its strongest brews Guinness Extra Stout Porter. The porter appellation was in time dropped, and thus the stout category of beer was born. Guinness's distinctive black color derived from the fact that some of the barley used in the production was roasted, rather like coffee beans. The darkness of the beer contrasted with the "blonde" foam that resulted from the beer being poured or "pulled" from the tap.

The company also had a venerable history of advertising. Beginning in the 1930s the SH Benson ad agency coined the slogan "Guinness is good for you." At the same time the "My Goodness, My Guinness" poster ads, which featured a balding zookeeper whose Guinness was perpetually stolen by larcenous animals, received critical and popular acclaim. Even as early as the 1930s, however, the company used advertising to reposition the brand. The Guardian newspaper has explained that, for example, the "Guinness for Strength" campaign of that decade, which portrayed an archetypal workman in the midst of his labor, was designed to give the beer "a more masculine, macho image." Nearly 40 years later the company sought to again reposition itself. In order to appeal to women and to soften the brand's primary association with working-class men, Guinness designed glossy, stylish ads that appeared in British fashion magazines.

In the 1980s Guinness again shifted its image through its advertising campaign. The seven commercials of the "Guinnless" campaign targeted 24- to 34-year-old men by depicting humorous scenarios of Guinness drinkers who were deprived of their coveted brew. In the late 1980s Guinness signed on with ad agency Ogilvy & Mather and released the "Man with the Guinness" campaign, which once more deliberately tried to reposition the brand—this time "as a drink for strong, confident individuals," according to The Guardian.

Yet by the mid-1990s the cultural world of which Guinness was a part had again shifted. Not only had other Irish stout beers entered the market with their own distinctive advertising campaigns, but stout beers as a whole were losing British drinkers. Guinness became convinced that viewers had become too comfortable with the overwhelmingly popular seven-year "Man with the Guinness" campaign. To reinvigorate its marketing, the company went back to the drawing board with Ogilvy & Mather and nearly two years later released the first two "Black and White" commercials.

TARGET MARKET

The target of Guinness's new campaign revealed once more a strategic repositioning of the brand. As of 1996 the stout sector of the beer market was in decline. Although 79 percent of British drinkers over the age of 55 drank stout, only 35 percent of young adults consumed it. Thus, while Guinness held more than 80 percent of the draught stout market, the company's growth could not be fueled by gaining more within the segment. Instead Guinness had to focus on winning over younger drinkers to its distinctive stout beer. As a result, the brewing titan targeted its new campaign to 18- to 34-year old males. "Guinness need[ed] . . . consumers to rethink their choice of beers," reported Advertising Age International. The goal, in short, was to appeal to the target market to "rethink stubbornness when making up one's mind."

In order to reach out to its target, the campaign sought to reflect the values of young adults in the 1990s. In an era dominated by postmodern philosophy that posited the ultimate relativity of all things including truth, the campaign resonated perfectly with the abundant insecurity and introspection of the times. "Research shows people today are more inwardly focused," said the Independent-London. "The current message is: think again about life, your inner self, Guinness. All is not how it appears at first glance." Each of the commercials opened with a statement that appeared to be categorical, but as the commercial progressed the assertion became more tenuous and open to debate.

Moreover, the look of the campaign was crafted to reach out to its target audience. It was stylish enough to appeal to a segment of the population that was raised with television and advertising. And it did not resort to the exclusivity that was the hallmark of other beer advertising. "Bicycle" was decidedly non-sexist and attempted to challenge the viewer with issues of gender. Ogilvy & Mather even produced a commercial that featured two gay men together at the breakfast table engaging in a decidedly normal kiss. The spot was leaked to tabloid newspapers before its release, however, and in the ensuing ruckus Guinness chose not to release the commercial.

COMPETITION

While other stout beer producers were not challenging social mores in quite the same way, Guinness did begin to feel pressure from stout brands that challenged Guinness's hegemony. Irish brands, including Murphy's Irish Stout, Caffrey's, Beamish, and Bass Ale, were expanding their market share at Guinness's expense. Many of these brands laid claim to an Irish heritage through their advertising. These Gaelic ties were significant because, as the largest minority group in Britain, the Irish wielded considerable spending power. More importantly, however, was the fact that both in Britain and abroad (especially in the United States), the love of Irish culture had exploded in the 1990s to the point that all things of Ireland were trendy. Murphy's sought to capitalize on this dynamic with the "Vincent Murphy" campaign. In one spot the quintessentially Irish Vincent Murphy sips his beer while he observes a ranting old man at the pub. As the man complains, Murphy quips, "Unlike the Murphy's, he's very bitter." This underhanded dig at Guinness's supposed bitter taste also subtly conveyed Murphy's "genuine" Irish heritage. Caffrey's ads, on the other hand, focused on the "New Ireland." "There's warmth and lyricism mixed with cosmopolitan and contemporary appeal," a spokesperson for the company told the Independent-London. Beamish trumpeted its status as the "only brand that brews only in Ireland."

According to The Guardian, the "Black and White" campaign served to reassert "Guinness's superiority in a marketplace that had suddenly become saturated with Irish stouts." On the one hand, the explicit premise of the campaign—that not everything was as it appeared or claimed to be—addressed Guinness's rival's claims of cultural integrity as well as the competitors' snipes at Guinness itself. The campaign also sought to reflect Guinness's clout in the market. Controlling nearly 80 percent of the stout sector and 4.4 percent of total beer consumption in Great Britain, Guinness was, without question, the dominant beer in its category. The creativity and quality of the "Black and White" commercials sought to highlight the status of the beer itself.

A FROTHING GOOD IDEA

One of the distinctive features of Guinness was the light head atop the dark body when a pint was poured from the tap. Guinness wanted to be able to offer that signature look in its line of canned beer as well. To do so, the company invested five years and better than $7.5 million in an effort to come up with an in-can system that could replicate the pint pour. After investigating such methods as pouring the beer through nylon stockings and sandpaper-lined cans, Guinness's engineers came up with the widget. This device, a plastic chamber with a small hole placed at the bottom of the can, generated enough pressure when the can was opened to create the desired head.

MARKETING STRATEGY

As the definitive leader in its category, Guinness could not count on converting drinkers of rival stout brands as a means of continuing to expanding the brand. Instead, it had to win the loyalty of those who did not drink stout beer or had never tasted the black ale. In short, the campaign had to convince consumers to reevaluate their choice of beers. According to the Sunday Business Post, the goal of the "Black and White" campaign "was three-fold: to bring non-draught Guinness drinkers into the brand, to make Guinness a regular choice for occasional drinkers, and to dissuade regular drinkers from switching to competitive stouts."

Part of this agenda involved "updating" the brand's image among younger British consumers. The campaign set out to accomplish this goal through daring commercials that clearly reached beyond Guinness's solid, middle-age base. One of the more infamous spots of the "Black and White" campaign portrayed a sadomasochistic man hanging by chains from the ceiling (in a leather straightjacket) beneath a picture of British Prime Minister John Major. Other commercials in the campaign displayed similar moxie. A series of print ads featuring a satanic priest and an overweight nudist appealed to a more youthful audience. The company not only used mainstream publications to display the campaign's ads but also selected smaller magazines that directly reached the campaign's target. The sadomasochistic ad, for instance, ran solely in FHM, a publication with a circulation of only about 500,000 readers, most of whom, however, were young men drawn to the magazine's glossy coverage of "fashion, football, and women," according to the London Sunday Telegraph.

Guinness strove to reposition itself outside the realm of television and print also. The company sponsored the Cheltenham festival in Britain as well as the Fleadh Irish Music Festival in New York. By aligning the brand with international rock stars such as Sinead O'Connor, Van Morrison, and Shane MacGowan, Guinness sought to increase its allure with a younger and more cosmopolitan segment of the British population.

OUTCOME

The Guinness "Black and White" campaign was deemed a success from the outset. According to the company's marketing department, the brand achieved its highest-ever share of the beer market—5.2 percent—after the campaign broke. The November 1997 Adwatch survey revealed a 56 percent recall among consumers across socioeconomic and gender lines. The survey also emphasized that the commercials performed especially well among the target audience. The campaign garnered industry accolades as well. Bob Garfield acknowledged the spots in Advertising Age International.

In March 1998, however, Guinness indicated in a bold fashion that it was not entirely pleased with the high-profile "Black and White" campaign when it left Ogilvy & Mather and placed its advertising account with Abbott Mead Vickers instead. Officially the company stated to the Times of London that "part of the Guinness ethos has always been to move on before we have to" and that "Ogilvy & Mather's work cannot be delivered any further." Yet the rift between Guinness and Ogilvy & Mather ran deeper. The spot featuring the two gay men (which never ran) unleashed a storm of protest from conservative viewers and shareholders. After Guinness furiously backpedaled in response, claiming that "at no time, did we set out to make a so-called 'gay' ad, nor will we be screening one," the gay community became outraged. Later the spot picturing the hanging sadomasochistic man drew another round of criticism, especially from Tory politicians who insisted the ad was a reference to the death by hanging of Tory Member of Parliament Stephen Milligan.

Furthermore, Guinness hinted that the "Black and White" campaign was "elitist" and inaccessible to younger consumers. Analysts speculated that the commercials had not touted the brand's essential "Irishness" enough or that they had cultivated too serious an image for the beer. Guinness followed "Black and White" with Abbot Mead Vickers's "Good Things Come to Those Who Wait." These new commercials were decidedly non-surreal and lacked the "artistic" feel of the grainy "Black and White" spots. One spot portrays an elderly swimmer attempting to cross the village bay before his pint of Guinness, poured by his bartender brother, has settled. The old-fashioned style of the commercial contrasted with "Black and White's" postmodern style.

FURTHER READING

"The Big Pint Is Not Going Down Too Well, But That's the Point, Says Guinness." Sunday Business Post, April 13, 1997.

"Campaign of the Week: Guinness." Marketing, November 6, 1997.

Carter, Meg. "The Miracle of St. Patrick." Independent-London, March 17, 1997.

Davies, Jim. "Marketing: Potting the Black. A New Ad Campaign on the Way This Friday." The Guardian, May 11, 1998.

"A Fish on a Bike? Must Be a Guinness Ad." Sunday Business Post, March 10, 1996.

Garfield, Bob. "Shades of Grey Emerge in Rethinking Guinness." Advertising Age International, February 17, 1997.

Hatfield, Stefano. "Les Boys Removed from the Black Stuff." Times of London, November 14, 1997.

Rivlin, Richard, and James Hardy. "Tories Rage over 'Perverted' Guinness Advert." London Sunday Telegraph, January 5, 1997.

Rebecca Stanfel

Dial-A-Mattress

31-10 48th Ave.
Long Island City, New York 11101
USA
Telephone: (718) 472-1200
Fax: (718) 482-6561
Web site: www.mattress.com

■■■

ALWAYS OUT THERE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

By repositioning Dial-A-Mattress, a seemingly fly-by-night operation with B-grade commercials, as a company on the cutting edge of so-called anti-advertising, the "Always Out There" campaign demonstrated the importance of taking chances. Dial-A-Mattress first took a chance by hiring Dweck & Campbell in New York, a young agency with a penchant for guerilla marketing, such as spray painting brand names on Manhattan sidewalks, to handle most aspects of the makeover. Dweck, in turn, took a chance by selecting 30-year-old John O'Hagan to direct the three introductory commercials in the campaign. Hagen, a 1996 graduate of New York University Film School, had directed an award-winning documentary for his thesis but no television spots. Dweck, which had very strong creative people but no staff producer, according to 31-one-year-old producer Larry Shanet, took a further chance by hiring Shanet to produce the spots, his first freelance assignment after working for four years at Siquis Ltd. in Baltimore.

This willingness to take risks culminated in a series of three 30-second television spots described as "very odd" and even "demented," terms that translated into compliments in the contemporary advertising lexicon. Dweck mirrored the atmosphere of the commercials with oddball marketing tactics, such as advertising on carry-out pizza boxes and Chinese take-home cartons. The campaign also initiated a number of changes that transformed the face that Dial-A-Mattress presented to the public, including a script for its customer service representatives to use when fielding orders over the telephone, new uniforms for its delivery people, and a redesigned company logo that was painted on the sideboards of its truck fleet.

The commercials introduced these changes by following the misadventures of two imperturbable deliverymen as they deposited mattresses in the households of customers who revealed themselves to be very strange. "Arctic Ground Squirrel" featured a man in a squirrel costume who intended to hibernate all winter in his basement; "Wrestlers" featured a husband-and-wife team re-creating the antics of pro wrestlers; and "Wannabe" featured a uniform freak who dressed up in a Dial-A-Mattress uniform. The spots generated humor by focusing on the contrast between the eccentricity of the customers and the unflappability of the deliverymen, who seemed to have seen it all.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Dweck & Campbell president Michael Dweck described his client Dial-A-Mattress succinctly: "It's the FedEx of mattress companies." More precisely, Dial-A-Mattress amounted to a marriage of a phone-order catalog company and an overnight delivery service. Customers phoned in an order to Dial-A-Mattress, and then one of the company's delivery trucks, which were on the road 24 hours a day, arrived at the customer's home with a choice of three mattresses to compare. The ultimate resting place of the product—the customer's own bedroom—thus served, quite appropriately, as the showroom.

In 1999 an article in Advertising Age pointed out that "prior to [the 'Always Out There'] campaign, Dial-A-Mattress was known in the New York area for painfully bad TV spots." In fact, the constraints of advertising budgets across the bedding category created a genre of advertising so uniformly awful that it generated a subgenre of ads that parodied the stereotypical bedding commercials. So Dial-A-Mattress was well positioned to use parody in its advertising, provided it could find an agency attuned to the subtleties of irony but willing to work on a low-budget, regional account.

Dweck & Campbell fit the bill perfectly—the start-up shop's first account in 1992 revitalized New Jersey-based Giant Carpet with a series of 30-second commercials, aired on Saturday Night Live, that cost about $1,000 each to produce. Mining the same vein of presidential mockery as SNL cast member Dana Carvey's impersonation of George Bush, the commercials recast the cut-rate carpet retailer from cheesy to hip. By 1997 the agency, founded by Dweck and vice president/creative director Lori Campbell, collected billings estimated at $20 million from clients such as Pepsi, Time Warner, and Seagram's. Servicing these staid names earned Dweck inflated clout and budgets, but the shop maintained its cutting-edge reputation by continuing to take risks.

After seeing the story boards for the Dial-A-Mattress campaign, about 150 directors sent in reels from respected companies such as bicoastal Harmony Pictures and the bicoastal/international firm Propaganda. From these Dweck chose O'Hagan on the endorsement of Bryan Buckley, a partner at Hungry Man production company, which was in the process of signing the young director. Buckley backed the rookie by agreeing to codirect the spots; while Buckley showed up on the sets daily, he allowed the young director to take the reins of the production. Even without Buckley's recommendation, O'Hagan's work spoke for itself, as his student film Wonderland, which documented the eccentric inhabitants of Levittown, New York, had won the 1997 Cable Ace Award as well as a nomination for O'Hagan as the best director at the DGA Awards.

O'Hagan, a Brown University graduate who was born in Dublin, Ireland, but grew up in a Maryland suburb of Washington, D.C., listed photographers Diane Arbus, Robert Frank, and Bill Owens as well as fiction-writer Flannery O'Connor as his prime artistic influences. "They all have a way of capturing the absurd and the poetic in the everyday," O'Hagan said in an article by Scott Jones in a 1998 issue of Shoot. Dweck sought a director who could similarly capture the absurd and the poetic in the everyday, hence the choice to chance a newcomer. O'Hagan captured the absurdity of the everyday by allowing his actors enough room to spontaneously create genuine moments where they were guided less by the script or the director's instructions than by their own intuition of the natural flow of the situation. "I don't tell [the actors] how they have to say it or that they have to hit all the words on the line," O'Hagan commented in Jones's article. "They can put their spin on it, direct it, keeping it as real and spontaneous as possible." The key was to get his actors "to a place where they try things, where they aren't just saying things they think you want them to say," O'Hagan continued.

TARGET MARKET

Consumers in the regional area targeted by Dial-A-Mattress were familiar with the name of the company, but they were not aware of its unique selling process. "With Dial-A-Mattress, we did studies and found out that people who didn't buy from them knew the company well—through 10 years of advertising—but didn't know where the mattresses came from," said Dweck in a 1998 Shoot article by Richard Linnett. "They didn't see any outlets, no salesmen," he continued. Part of Dweck's challenge consisted of educating the consumers about the process, so the commercials portrayed it, focusing on the deliverymen who visited customers' homes with the products. The spots also featured exaggerated versions of the target audience. By depicting customers who were unusual, Dial-A-Mattress identified its customers as individualistic. By exaggerating the quirkiness of the portrayals, the spots set consumers' minds at ease by assuring them that the deliverymen would not consider them weird, as they had probably seen even stranger behavior.

COMPETITION

The "Always Out There" campaign was a direct reaction to a decline in sales at Dial-A-Mattress as a result of increased competition from Sleepy's, another regional bedding retailer that followed the traditional strategy of wooing customers into showrooms. Dial-A-Mattress also competed against department stores, which maintained showroom displays that captured the attention of customers who were not even shopping specifically for bedding. Dial-A-Mattress distinguished itself, however, as the only retailer that delivered the bed to its future setting as a part of the selling process, allowing for a purchasing experience tailored to the individual.

ONE MAD SQUIRREL

Director John O'Hagan of Hungry Man production company harnessed some of the energy generated by conditions on the set of the "Arctic Ground Squirrel" shoot for Dweck & Campbell client Dial-A-Mattress. The actor portraying the squirrel got hotter and hotter in his costume, so he vented some of his frustration in his performance. As well, some of O'Hagan's directives proved frustrating, according to an article in Shoot. "And there was the point when [the squirrel was] down in the basement, in his hibernating room with the mattress men," O'Hagan recalled. "I wanted him to look up at the ceiling, like he's yelling at his wife, but every time he tilted back to look up, the squirrel head would fall off."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Dweck & Campbell took on the responsibility for a complete overhaul of Dial-A-Mattress with the understanding that greater visibility with a revamped image would require changes in the company itself. Market research revealed that consumers were wary of a retailer with no showroom and no tangible structure upon which to pin an image. "We had to build trust," recounted Dweck in Linnett's article. "So we said, let's redesign the trust. What [Dial-A-Mattress operators] say when customers call, how they say it, how [customers are] treated after the purchase—we'll control that whole cycle. And then there's radio ads, there's outdoor; we're creating wardrobe, too, [and] we designed their uniforms."

The "Wannabe" spot highlighted the new uniforms, as the commercial centered around a customer with a uniform fetish. In an odd twist, the customer greeted the deliverymen dressed exactly as they were, and the wanna-be joined them in unloading the mattress. While displaying the screwball humor of the other ads in the campaign, this spot also paved the way for the shift to new uniforms. "Of course, we don't want people to think this is a weird transition, an overnight transformation, like if the post office suddenly showed up with bright orange trucks," Dweck observed. "You'd say, 'What's up? What'd you do with my mail?' We want to make the transition nice and smooth, but fast, too." Dweck & Campbell used existing ad space as well to support the transition. Dial-A-Mattress maintained a fleet of "50 trucks that are always out there," Campbell pointed out. "So we are using them as billboards and a way of introducing their new logo—'Always Out There.' "

The new logo highlighted not only the pervasiveness of Dial-A-Mattress delivery trucks and the availability of its telephone operators but also the "out there" quirkiness of the new campaign and the company's attitude more generally. The two other spots accentuated this message. "Wrestlers" featured a suburban couple garbed in outlandish wrestling outfits. "Honey, it's here," the husband announced as the deliverymen appeared with the mattress. The wife proceeded to pin her husband on the mat and then kick him in the groin. "What's wrong?" she inquired lovingly, before continuing to thrash him. The two deliverymen shrugged off the couple's actions as commonplace, everyday behavior.

"Arctic Ground Squirrel" exaggerated the absurdity of the situation. In this spot, a man greeted the deliverymen in a squirrel costume, acting out his identification with the rodent who wanted to hibernate, although he had not yet been able to do so because he was too busy cleaning the gutters and roof. The costumed man escorted the deliverymen to his den in the basement and informed them that "Anybody with half a brain knows an Arctic ground squirrel is down by now." The spot hinted at the reason behind his desire to burrow into the ground when his wife upstairs began loudly berating him through basement ceiling. The man tried to enlist the sympathy of the deliverymen, but all they offered was a clipboard to sign for his delivery. The impassive demeanor of the deliverymen provided both the humor and the sales pitch: these guys did not deliver therapy or interpretation or even reaction—all they delivered were mattresses.

OUTCOME

Dweck & Campbell believed in the maxim that word-of-mouth advertising worked best of all. So they targeted their advertising at triggering discussion from its audience. It pleased O'Hagan to overhear random strangers quoting his spots, confirming that the commercial had made a memorable impression on them. "Right after ['Arctic Ground Squirrel'] came out, I overheard some guys on the subway telling each other to 'Shut your piehole!' " O'Hagan recalled in Jones's article in Shoot. "It felt good to do something that people were responding to," he continued. O'Hagan designed his films to elicit responses from his audience by leaving them open to interpretation, by not spelling out the meaning of his message: "If you're just shoving things down people's throats, there's nothing for them to talk about . . . I like to give the audience more credit than that. People do pick up on the subtleties. They enjoy them." The "Always Out There" campaign generated much talk value in these terms.

Shoot magazine's Linnett called the "Arctic Ground Squirrel" spot "magnificently absurd." He expressed reservations about the "Wrestlers" spot after viewing a rough cut at MacKenzie Cutler, a postproduction boutique in the revitalized Flatiron district of Manhattan, where Dave Coza edited the films. "Although it's a funny concept, the piece at this stage begs less fight and more personality," stated Linnett. The addition of the wife's fleeting concern for her husband injected personality into the spot. "That one plaintive moment captures her character and gives the entire spot a sense of texture and personality," Linnett pronounced.

Advertising Age, in its May 31, 1999, ad review, called the "Arctic Ground Squirrel" spot a success. "The unexpected nature of the spot and others in the campaign, along with the genuinely funny executions, helped drive Dial sales up significantly." "Arctic Ground Squirrel" won a coveted Gold Lion in the retail category at the 1998 Cannes International Advertising Festival. A year later the spot picked up a Gold Clio in the Home Furnishings/Appliances category and a bronze medal in the Consumer Television under $50,000 Budget category at the twenty-third annual One Show Awards held in New York City's Lincoln Center. In August 1998, however, Dweck & Campbell resigned the $5 million account, even though the agency was producing award-winning work on the campaign. Dweck explained in an article in Advertising Age that "philosophical differences over direction" forced him to resign the account. Although the "Always Out There" campaign was short-lived, it gained attention from the critical community of the advertising field as well as the attention of everyday consumers.

FURTHER READING

"Jack in the Box's Dick Sittig Deserving of a Bigger Canvas: Retail." Advertising Age, May 31, 1999.

Jones, Scott. "John O'Hagan: Rookie Walks Away with a Big Gold trophy." Shoot, October 16, 1998.

Krol, Carol. "Dweck Resigns 1-800-Mattress: Differences over Direction Cited as Agency Drops $5 Mil Account." Advertising Age, August 31, 1998.

Linnett, Richard. "X Marks the Spot: On the Town with an Indie Producer and Alternative Agency Types." Shoot, February 13, 1998.

William D. Baue

The Dial Corporation

15501 N. Dial Boulevard
Scottsdale, Arizona 85260
USA
Telephone: (480) 754-3425
Fax: (480) 754-1098
Web site: www.dialcorp.com

■■■

YOU'RE NOT AS CLEAN AS YOU THINK CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2001 Dial, the Dial Corporation's mainstay brand in the soap market for more than 50 years, was the only brand with an all-antibacterial line of products. The challenge in promoting it was that focus-group research showed that many consumers did not think they needed their soap to be antibacterial. In its maiden voyage as Dial's ad agency, Austin, Texas–based GSD&M came up with a high-impact national TV campaign called "You're Not as Clean as You Think." With the goal of increasing sales by reinvigorating the public's interest in the brand's soaps and body washes, the campaign was released in January 2002.

GSD&M created two television commercials to kick off the campaign, which had a budget of somewhere between $18 and $25 million. The effort not only used the tagline "You're not as clean as you think," but also resurrected the slogan "Aren't you glad you use Dial?" One spot began with a close-up, from a toilet bowl's point of view, of a thirsty dog lapping up a drink of toilet water. The dog's owner then arrived home to have her face licked enthusiastically by the pooch. This spot, as well as a second one that took place in a gym locker room and featured an inadvertently shared towel, employed gross-out humor. They were, however, constructed carefully to keep the message up front and offense to a minimum.

The campaign hit its mark. Sales of Dial-brand products increased 5 percent in the first half of 2003, placing the company more solidly in the number two position behind Dove's Unilever. USA Today's Ad Track polls in 2003 showed good numbers for the Dial commercials, particularly with regard to women, an audience Dial had hoped to woo. Dial retained the "You're Not as Clean as You Think" theme in 2004, using it in a cross-promotion with the movie Shrek 2, a partnership that the company described as successful.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The Dial Corporation's signature brand was established in the mid-1940s, when meatpacker Armour & Company developed an unlikely new product, deodorant soap. It named the new soap "Dial" to underscore claims that the product supplied 24-hour protection from odors caused by bacteria. The soap was introduced in 1948 with a full-page advertisement in the Chicago Tribune that featured a unique attention-getting element: it was printed with scented ink. Dial soap was an instant hit, and by the 1950s it had become the best-selling deodorant soap in the United States. In 1953 the company's famous advertising slogan, "Aren't you glad you use Dial? Don't you wish everybody did?" was born.

The Dial brand was expanded beyond soap to include other deodorant products and shaving creams. In 1970 the brand was passed from one unusual corporate parent to another when Canadian bus company Greyhound bought Armour and moved the company to a new headquarters in Phoenix, Arizona, under the moniker Armour-Dial. In 1987 the bus line was sold off. Two years later Liquid Dial soap, the first antibacterial soap of its kind, was introduced. The product was so well received that it spawned many imitators. In 1991 the company took the name of its best-known brand and became the Dial Corporation.

The Dial Corporation struggled in the 1990s, as competition increased and sales flattened. In the late 1990s it employed a campaign themed "Doesn't That Feel Better." The TV spots were created by agency DDB Worldwide, a subsidiary of the advertising conglomerate the Omnicom Group. Set to Judy Garland's rendition of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow," the spot was composed of black-and-white images of a child washing with the bar soap. The voice-over said, "You can get there and feel clean, healthy, restored," and then followed with the tagline "Doesn't that feel better?" The campaign garnered little attention and failed to make any sales breakthroughs. When Herb Baum, formerly of Hasbro and Quaker State, took the reigns as CEO of Dial in fall 2000, his task was to streamline the operation in preparation for a change of ownership that was planned to take place in 2004, when Dial would become a subsidiary of the German consumer-products company Henkel KGaA. Austin, Texas–based agency GSD&M Advertising, which, like DDB, was part of the Omnicom Group, won the $18 to $25 million Dial Corp. account in June 2001. The maverick agency developed a campaign that made consumers and industry observers take notice and that in the process even managed to reinvigorate the old slogan "Aren't you glad you use Dial?"

AGENCY THRIVES IN AUSTIN

In 1971 the fact that Chicago and New York had been centers of the advertising industry almost since there was an ad industry did not phase the six University of Texas graduates who started GSD&M Advertising as a way to stay and work in their beloved Austin. The agency's revenues grew in a little more than 30 years to $1.5 billion. GSD&M won some of the country's most sought-after clients, including the king of the discount retailers, Wal-Mart. The company eventually included a Chicago office. GSD&M became part of media giant the Omnicom Group in 1998.

TARGET MARKET

Young mothers and other young bacteria-conscious consumers were the focus of the new "You're Not as Clean as You Think" campaign. "We have a 40-plus group that has been very loyal," explained Steve Tooker, general manager of Dial's personal care division, in a 2003 USA Today article. "They grew up with 'Aren't you glad you use Dial?' What we were missing along the way was picking up the younger group and the younger mom." GSD&M's memorable TV spots had to walk a fine line between funny and too gross. Male audiences would appreciate the bathroom humor, but the commercials also needed to avoid offending young female household buyers, in whom Dial wanted to instill concern regarding unseen dirt and bacteria.

Focus groups revealed that the widely recognized gold bar of Dial soap was often thought of as a masculine product. The company felt that the TV spots' shock factor communicated the idea that their soap was essential for cleaning as well as protection and would resonate with mothers in particular. Although Dial asserted that it was not trying to make the brand more youthful, in 2004 it chose a kids' movie, Shrek 2, the sequel to the hugely successful animated feature about an ogre named Shrek, for the brand's first movie promotion. TV spots featured the characters from the film demonstrating the theme "You're Not as Clean as You Think." These spots may have been aimed at moms and tots alike, but the packaging, which included a limited-edition ogre-shaped dispenser, was clearly meant to appeal to children's purchasing influence on their parents.

COMPETITION

According to global research firm Mintel, from 2000 to 2003 more than 250 antibacterial products were available for sale in the North American market. Dial may have invented the antibacterial segment, but by 2002 it was running second in the $950 million bar-soap category as a whole. At 16 percent it was well behind the 25 percent share boasted by Unilever's Dove soap. Those figures, compiled by market-information firm Information Resources, Inc., omitted Wal-Mart, a significant Dial retailer, but there was still cause for concern. Research company TNS CMR reported that Dove was outspending Dial as well. In the first nine months of 2001 Dove's media spending was $29 million, compared to $11.5 million for Dial.

A number of other soap manufacturers served as challengers to Dial's variety of personal-cleansing products. Colgate-Palmolive's Irish Spring bar and Softsoap liquid were top sellers in the late 1990s and the first few years of the new millennium. With longstanding loyalty among consumers, conglomerate Procter & Gamble's Ivory and Safeguard brands were formidable competitors as well. By 2001 the glut of competitors had forced the midsize Dial Corp. to set itself apart by getting creative in a normally unexciting advertising category.

MARKETING STRATEGY

In 2001 Dial was unique in that it was the only brand with an all-antibacterial line, but research showed that many consumers did not think that they needed their soap to be antibacterial. Rich Tlapek, a vice president and group creative director at GSD&M, described the dilemma in a 2002 issue of Advertising Age. "In focus groups, people would all say they thought they were clean or clean enough. That left us in a difficult situation of how do we increase the relevance [of the antibacterial position] if people think they're already clean?" GSD&M won the Dial account in 2001 with a plan to use high-impact TV spots that would remind consumers just how germ-ridden they might be on any given day. The budget for "You're Not as Clean as You Think" was reported to be between $18 million and $25 million, with almost half of it spent on testing the campaign in order to ensure efficacy once it was released in January 2002.

Two 30-second TV commercials ran on prime-time network and cable channels, primarily during sitcoms but also during some morning shows. The first spot opened with a close-up of a thirsty dog enjoying a drink from a toilet. Upon hearing the arrival of his owner, the dog ran downstairs to greet her with an enthusiastic face licking. The second spot took place in a gym locker room. A sweaty man wiped not only his armpits but also his privates with a towel and then replaced it where he had found it. A second man, who had just come from the sauna, took the same towel to dry his face. Both spots were capped off with a voice-over saying, "You're not as clean as you think," which was then followed by Dial's old slogan, "Aren't you glad you use Dial?"

Dial and GSD&M were aware that they ran the risk of turning people off. "We definitely don't want to be in the fear-mongering business," said Bill Puentes, director of marketing at Dial, to Advertising Age. "That's why we took a humorous approach." The goals of the campaign were to grab consumers' attention, communicate why people needed Dial products, and reinforce the brand's national presence. The spots were designed to hook viewers with likable yet cutting-edge content while also maximizing brand recognition by drawing upon Dial's advertising heritage.

Other spots followed in 2003, expanding on the same theme. In one a man in a pool heard the boy swimming next to him tell his mother that he no longer needed to use the restroom. Another spot showed a bus that had been transporting nudists to a retreat; after it dropped them off, it changed its sign and took on riders for a garden tour—without a cleaning in between. Bolstered by the success of the campaign, Dial undertook its first movie cross-promotion, forging an affiliation with the 2004 animated film Shrek 2. TV spots featured the lovable but not-too-tidy cartoon ogre Shrek extracting wax from his ear; the substance was later mistaken by his friend, Donkey, for hair gel. The tagline remained essentially the same: "You're not as clean as you think you are." During the movie's highly successful run Dial sold Shrek-themed products, including bottles of Liquid Dial featuring pumps shaped like Shrek and Donkey and ogre-apple scented body wash.

OUTCOME

The Dial Corporation and GSD&M had a winner with "You're Not as Clean as You Think." Brand sales grew 5 percent in the first half of 2003, and the company gained ground on market-share leader Unilever. The campaign received positive press from both ad-industry publications and the mainstream media, and consumer brand awareness increased. USA Today 's Ad Track poll reported good numbers for the commercials in 2003. The newspaper surveyed those familiar with the campaign, and 25 percent of these respondents said that they liked the spots "a lot," which was above the Ad Track average of 21 percent. Perhaps more important was the fact that 26 percent of women, a key target of the campaign, liked the commercials "a lot." In an August 2004 issue of USA Today, Tom Ennis, Dial's director of marketing, said that the Shrek 2 cross-promotion was good for the movie studio as well as Dial, stating that the promotion had "overachieved its sales estimates."

FURTHER READING

Bittar, Christine. "Cranking Up the Dial." Brandweek, March 24, 2003, p. 24.

———. "Dial Continues to Shower Attention on 'Dirty' and Germ-Ridden Locales." Brandweek, March 31, 2003, p. 8.

Howard, Theresa. "Dial's Glad Viewers Like Its New Ads." USA Today, September 19, 2003. Available from <http://www.usatoday.com/money/advertising/adtrack/2003-09-15-dial_x.htm>

———. "Shrek and Donkey's Waxy—Uh, Wacky—Ad Dials Up Winner." USA Today, August 2, 2004. Available from <http://www.usatoday.com/money/advertising/adtrack/2004-08-01-track-dial_x.htm>

Kleinman, Marty. "A New Generation of Hand Soaps." Global Cosmetic Industry, April 2002, p. 28.

MacArthur, Kate. "Dialing for Dollars Is a Dirty Business." Advertising Age, January 14, 2002, p. 3.

McCarthy, Michael. "P&G Hopes to Clean Up with Liquid Soap Sequel." Adweek, February 10, 1992, p. 5.

Parker-Pope, Tara. "Dial Soap Campaign Aims to Calm Fears of a Germ-Ridden World." Wall Street Journal, January 20, 1998, p. 1.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "Some Like It Hot." Adweek, October 7, 2002, p. 18

Robertson, Anne. "Brand New." Business Journal of Phoenix, May 31, 2002, p. 1.

Van Arnum, Patricia. "Did Dial Take Henkel to the Cleaners?" Chemical Market Reporter, January 26, 2004, p. FR3.

Weintraub, Arlene. "Wish Everyone Used Dial? Dial Does; The Soapmaker's Profits Are Going Down the Drain." BusinessWeek, September 25, 2000, p. 132.

Simone Samano

Diamond Foods, Inc.

1050 South Diamond Street
Stockton, California 95205-7087
USA
Telephone: (209) 467-6000
Fax: (209) 461-7309
Web site: www.diamondnuts.com

■■■

EMERALD NUTS MARKETING CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 2004 Diamond Foods, Inc., a company known for producing culinary nuts, created a high-quality selection of snack nuts called Emerald Nuts, which came in packaging that fit automobile cup-holders. The canister lids measured out 1.5-ounce servings. To create national brand recognition and to move away from its image as making nuts that were only for cooking, Diamond released its ''Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign'' in early 2004.

The ''Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign,'' created by Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, appeared in print, Internet, and television formats. The agency created 15 television commercials that all played on the initials ''E.N.'' The first two spots, ''Encouraging Norwegians'' and ''Exercising Newscasters,'' aired in Northern California markets during the 2004 Super Bowl. ''Encouraging Norwegians'' showed a portly Norwegian man standing next to a bull's-eye target while someone off camera fired arrows at it. The man gave encouragement, such as ''Good shot,'' while snacking on Emerald Nuts. The spot ended with a voice-over stating, ''Encouraging Norwegians love Emerald Nuts.'' Diamond spent an estimated $9.9 million on advertising during the first 10 months of 2004.

The campaign's bottom-line success was measured in July 2004, when Diamond reported an annual net revenue of $350 million, which was $50 million above the previous year. In a daring move Diamond gambled almost the entirety of its advertising budget to air a 30-second spot (which diverged from the ''E.N.'' theme) during the 2005 Super Bowl. ''We can buy one spot, and we can make one ad for that one spot,'' Sandra McBride, Emerald's vice president of marketing, told the Boston Globe. The gamble paid off when Diamond sales grew 56.3 percent during the three months following the game. The ''Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign'' also garnered a gold EFFIE in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Diamond, an established brand in California since 1912, was owned by more than 1,800 growers at the start of 2004. This farmers' cooperative, doing business as Diamond, led the world in culinary walnut production and in-shell walnuts. Diamond paid nut growers 3.5 cents a pound over the industry average, which was 1.8 cents a pound. In January 2004 the cooperative took a stab at the burgeoning snack-nut market by creating Emerald Nuts, a brand that offered nuts in exotic flavors, curvy containers, and larger sizes, with fewer peanuts in the assorted packages. The snack-nut sector only had one major player, Planters Nuts, one of the many brands owned by Kraft Foods. Besides taking advantage of a sector with only one main competitor, Emerald Nuts were intended to capitalize on the popularity of the Atkins diet, a high-protein and low-carbohydrate weight-loss plan that encouraged nut consumption. Further, the nut sector reported 12.7 percent growth in 2004. Analysts attributed this sharp rise to a heightened demand for high-protein foods and to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's announcement that nuts reduced heart disease.

Photo courtesy of Diamond Foods, Inc. Reproduced by permission.

"What we're doing with Emerald Nuts is building a new consumer franchise over in the snack-nut aisle," McBride told the Stockton Record Previously Diamond products had been located solely in supermarkets' baking aisles. One of the greatest challenges for the "Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign" was successfully introducing the public to an unheard-of brand. "It does cost somewhere between 20 and 30 million dollars to build a brand name," Suzanne Walchli, an assistant professor of marketing at University of the Pacific, explained to the Record. "It's rather difficult to break even on a brand in the first year."

The advertising climate during the period between the 2004 and the 2005 Super Bowls welcomed the innocent silliness of Emerald Nuts' branding. When Janet Jackson's wardrobe "malfunctioned" during the 2004 Super Bowl halftime show and exposed her breast, more than 500,000 complaints poured into the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). In response the FCC instituted massive censorship restrictions across most media channels. Therefore the climate for 2005's Super Bowl, the one that Diamond poured a majority of its Emerald Nuts advertising budget into, was increasingly sensitive. "Everybody was paying more attention this year," McBride told the Record. "That attention was good for Emerald."

TARGET MARKET

The "Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign" targeted 25- to 45-year-old males and females. Surveys showed that faster-paced Americans were drifting away from traditional sit-down meals. "In a survey last month, we found that more than 62 percent of adults polled admit to replacing a meal with a snack at least once per week," Michael J. Mendes, Diamond's president, said in an interview with Business Wire. "We want to convey the message to general consumers, and professional or armchair Olympic athletes, that not all nuts are created equal. Emerald sets a higher standard in snacking, providing a quality alternative to less healthy snacking options."

Sports enthusiasts were continuously targeted during the 2004 leg of the campaign. After the 2004 Super Bowl, 15-second television spots were shown during the Athens Summer Olympics and then during the World Series. The 30-second spot that aired during the 2005 Super Bowl was viewed by 89.2 million people and ranked as one of the campaign's greatest expenditures. "Even at a rate of $2.4 million for 30 seconds of air time, advertisers said, the Super Bowl is among the cheapest advertising available when you factor in the cost per eyeball," according to Naomi Aoki, a writer for the Boston Globe. A survey conducted by Penn, Schoen &

THE ANGRY LEPRECHAUN

In an attempt to increase the staying power of its 2005 Super Bowl commercial, Diamond continued the 30-second spot's storyline by creating a side website, http://www.angryleprechaun.com, that featured a leprechaun character who was angry about being cut from the final commercial. The spot, which Diamond spent a majority of its 2005 advertising budget on, featured a father who avoided sharing his Emerald Nuts with his young daughter by telling her that if she ate Emerald Nuts, unicorns would disappear forever. Magically, a unicorn, Santa Claus, and the Easter Bunny sequentially appeared in the living room to challenge the father's lie. A leprechaun character was filmed for the spot as well but was cut in the commercial's final edit. The agitated leprechaun, Finnegan O'Reilly, had purportedly created the website to urge visitors to E-mail Emerald Nuts and demand the leprechaun spot be added and an extended commercial be aired.

Berland Associates, a strategic communications firm, determined that the majority of Super Bowl viewers would rather miss the actual game than the Super Bowl's commercials.

COMPETITION

Nabisco Holdings Corp. owned Planters Nuts until Kraft purchased Nabisco in 2000. Up until 2004 Planters was the only nationally branded snack nut and dominated supermarket's snack-nut aisles. ''Planters is like the Big Brother of salty snacks. We had to come up with creative that stood out, was fun and that just sticks with you beyond 15 seconds,'' Jeff Goodby, the Goodby, Silverstein & Partners cochairman who helped formulate the Emerald Nuts campaign, explained to Brandweek.

In 2003 ad agency Foote Cone & Belding created commercials for Planters that depicted the brand's mascot, Mr. Peanut, dancing to disco music in one spot and break-dancing in another. Using computer-generated imagery, other Mr. Peanut commercials showed Mr. Peanut's life as a young legume. Baby Mr. Peanut was shown receiving his first monocle, despite being an infant, followed by his first hat and cane. The spot was an attempt to ''contemporize'' the brand and spin the mythology behind Mr. Peanut. Commercials released closer to Christmas showed Mr. Peanut with Santa Claus and a reindeer.

Up until 2004 Planters had packaged its nuts inside cans and bags. A few months after Emerald Nuts introduced its sleekly packaged nuts, however, Planters released its own range of multiflavored peanuts called Nutcases, which came sealed in reusable, brightly colored pots. Flavors included sour cream and jalapeño. Rob Woodall, marketing director at Trigon Foods, the primary manufacturer of Planters products, told Brand Republic, ''The opportunity was to create a lighter-eating nut-snack, which would appeal to a younger audience.''

MARKETING STRATEGY

Two 15-second television spots, ''Encouraging Norwegians'' and ''Exercising Newscasters,'' kicked off the ''Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign'' during the 2004 Super Bowl. The first containers of Emerald Nuts had been released only a few weeks prior, and only in Northern California supermarkets. Because of the brand's limited availability, the Super Bowl spots only aired in Northern California. After Diamond increased the range of Emerald Nuts' distribution, nationwide spots began airing during the Athens Summer Olympics. A total of 15 spots, each 15 seconds in length, were created, all with nonsensical titles, such as ''Entangled Nine-Year-Olds'' and ''Extreme Nurses.'' The spots depicted their amusingly named groups just long enough for the viewer to understand the title. One spot, ''Envious Nomads,'' showed two dusty, travel-worn nomads standing with a camel on a sidewalk. The out-of-place male nomad snacked on Emerald Nuts while admiring a typical suburban house and yard. The voice-over ending the spot explained that ''Envious Nomads love Emerald Nuts.''

To compensate for the campaign's limited budget, Goodby, Silverstein & Partners purposely created short television spots. They were then placed as ''bookends'' on commercial breaks, with one spot airing at the beginning and one at the end of the break. ''As a result, we get tickled by the first spot and afterward, given a minute or two to ponder it, we're hit with a second spot straight away to cement the brand name in our minds,'' ad critic Seth Stevenson explained on National Public Radio.

The television spots primarily focused on brand awareness, and Diamond was criticized for not explaining why consumers should pick their nuts over Planters'. Diamond executives, however, boasted positive results after the campaign's 2004 beginning. ''We saw an active response at shelf level and we just had a flood of consumer e-mail that showed a very, very strong response to the campaign and the product,'' McBride told the Record.

The campaign's boldest move occurred in early 2005, when Diamond placed a majority of its budget into one 30-second nationwide television commercial to be aired during the Super Bowl. The spot deviated from the previous "E.N." format, showing a father snacking on Emerald Nuts next to his daughter. When the daughter asked, "Daddy, can I have some Emerald Nuts?" her father replied, "Honey, if you eat an Emerald Nut, unicorns will disappear forever." A talking unicorn, Santa Claus, and even the Easter Bunny sequentially appeared to admonish the father for lying. The spot ended with the text, "They're kind of hard to share."

According to a Diamond spokesperson, the Super Bowl spot was discounted from $2.4 million to $2 million because of its fourth-quarter game placement. Diamond scored, however, when the fourth quarter became the second-most-watched segment of the game as the losing team rallied during the final minutes. Most of the campaign's television spots, along with deleted scenes, were posted on the brand's website, http://www.emeraldnuts.com.

OUTCOME

The primary objective of the "Emerald Nuts Marketing Campaign" was to establish brand awareness of Emerald Nuts at a national level. Diamond quickly met with success at the local level. Just a few months after the campaign launched, an early campaign survey showed that 77 percent of Northern Californians recognized the Emerald Nuts brand. By July sales for Diamond were $50 million above the previous financial year's sales.

The company took a big risk by sinking a majority of its 2005 advertising budget into one 30-second Super Bowl commercial. Grant Pace, creative director at ad agency Conover Tuttle Pace, which created Budweiser's "Bud Bowl" Super Bowl campaign, approved of the strategy, saying to the Boston Globe, "People aren't going to think hard about it . . . What you want is for people to see you in the store and think, 'I saw these guys on Super Bowl. It must be pretty decent stuff.' " Diamond was pleased with the results of its Super Bowl advertising. The Monday after the game, the Emerald Nuts website reported 24,308 unique visitors, significantly more than the 1,182 average-per-day reported during the previous October. Sales after the Super Bowl increased 56.3 percent between February and April.

FURTHER READING

Aoki, Naomi. "Taking a Shot at the Big Time." Boston Globe, February 4, 2005, p. D1.

De Marco, Donna. "Ad-stravaganza: Companies Being 'Super' Careful during This Year's Game." Washington Times, February 3, 2005, p. C8.

Elliot, Stuart. "Ad Reaction Claims Super Bowl Casualty." New York Times, February 3, 2005, p. 1.

———. "Ameriquest Mortgage Spots Emerge as Surprise Winners in Super Bowl Competition." New York Times, February 9, 2005, p. 7.

Fahey, Alison. "21st Annual Agency Report Cards." Adweek, April 12, 2004, p. 25.

Fonte, Diwata. "Walnut Growers Will Go Public." Fresno (CA) Bee, July 2, 2005, p. C1.

Lippert, Barbara. "A Star Is Born: Planters' Mini-Mr. Peanut Is a Sweet Antidote to the Snow- and Santa-Filled Clichés of the Season." Adweek, December 15, 2003, p. 30.

Niedt, Bob. "Convenience on Display." Syracuse (NY) Post Standard/Herald-Journal, March 9, 2005, p. 51.

Palazzo, Suzanne. "Nuts for On-the-Go Snackers." Grocery Headquarters, May 1, 2005, p. 72.

Parpis, Eleftheria. "January (Creative Best Spots)." Adweek, February 16, 2004, p. 18.

Stafford, Leon. "Last to First: CIBA Moves Super Bowl Ad—Lens Maker Opts for Costlier Spot in Game." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 4, 2005, p. F1.

Turcsik, Richard. "Ones for the Heart." Progressive Grocer, April 15, 2004, p. 56.

Kevin Teague

The Diamond Trading Company

17 Charterhouse St.
London, EC1N 6RA
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 20 74044444
Fax: 44 20 74303022
Web site: www.dtc.com

■■■

RAISE YOUR RIGHT HAND CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

The Diamond Trading Company (DTC), the London-based marketing subsidiary of the international diamond company De Beers SA, had earned a reputation for its success at creating buzz for diamond jewelry and reaching untapped consumer niches to help expand the sale of diamonds. With its promotion of eternity rings, diamond tennis bracelets, and three-stone anniversary jewelry, DTC's advertising resonated in particular with American consumers. According to the trade organization Jewelers of America, in 2000 retail sales of diamonds in the United States reached record levels, accounting for more that half of the $57.5 billion in retail diamond sales worldwide. Always watching for ways to introduce classic diamond jewelry to new market niches, in 2003 DTC introduced the right-hand ring.

With the support of its longtime advertising agency, New York–based J. Walter Thompson, the right-hand ring was introduced with a multimillion-dollar campaign that sent the message that diamond rings were no longer just for engagements and weddings. Themed ''Raise Your Right Hand,'' the campaign featured print ads in fashion magazines and targeted baby-boomer women with annual household incomes of $100,000 or more. Ads included photos of fashion models dressed in evening clothes showing off the rings; the copy declared, ''Your left hand says 'we.' Your right hand says 'me.' '' Women were encouraged to change their way of thinking about diamond rings. Not only could women wear them to express their individual style, but they could buy the rings for themselves rather than waiting to get a diamond as a token of a man's love.

The campaign was a success. It was awarded a Gold EFFIE Award in 2005 for, among other things, achieving 39 percent awareness of the right-hand ring in the year following the introduction of the campaign. In addition, the campaign helped boost diamond-ring sales in the nonbridal categories by 15 percent in the year after its launch. In 2005 the ads were revamped to depict ''women next door'' wearing the rings, and the Diamond Trading Company's U.S. marketing arm, Diamond Promotion Service, partnered with the Internet retailer Jewelry.com to promote October as ''Right-Hand-Ring Month.''

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Since its beginnings in 1888 as a South African diamond-mining operation developed by the Oppenheimer family, De Beers SA had grown to a conglomerate as multi-faceted as the gems it mined. To establish a market and build social status for the diamonds it was mining, in the 1930s De Beers turned to Hollywood, draping stars and starlets in diamond jewelry for photo opportunities. Also at that time De Beers created the Diamond Trading Company to serve as its London-based sales and marketing arm. By the 1940s the company was emphasizing the link between diamonds and romance. Its advertisements encouraged men to shower their significant others with diamonds set in rings, necklaces, and other jewelry as a symbol of their undying love. In 1947 De Beers's ad agency introduced "A diamond is forever," a slogan that lasted for almost 60 years.

To promote the diamond engagement ring in Brazil, Germany, and Japan, in 1967 De Beers hired New York–based advertising agency J. Walter Thompson to develop an ad campaign. The campaign, which portrayed the diamond ring as a symbol of love, was only moderately successful in Brazil and Germany, but it was a hit in Japan. By 1981 more than 60 percent of the brides in Japan were receiving a diamond ring as a symbol of engagement. The professional relationship between De Beers and the J. Walter Thompson advertising agency was a success, too. The Diamond Trading Company's U.S. marketing arm, Diamond Promotion Service, was a division of J. Walter Thompson, and its public-relations side, the Diamond Information Center, maintained an office in J. Walter Thompson's New York offices.

De Beers created new outlets for its diamonds and joined the list of diamond retailers in late 2000 when it joined forces with luxury-goods company LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton to create a new retail jewelry brand. Women's Wear Daily reported that the two companies planned to invest $400 million over a five-year period in the venture, with the first store, named De Beers, to open in London. At that time the De Beers name became the sole property of LVMH; all subsequent generic diamond advertising by De Beers would feature the company's new "Forever" trademark, and marketing would fall under the banner of the Diamond Trading Company.

TARGET MARKET

Since stepping in as the sales and marketing arm of De Beers SA in 2000, the Diamond Trading Company (DTC) had shown a flair for building interest in and driving sales of fine diamond jewelry. In early 2001 the DTC told upscale women that a diamond tennis bracelet, a classic design in which a single line of diamonds encircled the wrist, was the perfect piece of jewelry to complete any fashionable outfit, and women listened. Following the terrorist attacks on September 11 of that year, fashion jewelry such as diamond tennis bracelets fell from favor, but the DTC reintroduced the three-stone diamond anniversary ring in a two-part campaign. The first part targeted men, encouraging them to buy the rings as symbols of the past, present, and future of a relationship. The second, aimed at women, promoted three-stone diamond earrings and necklaces as a way for a woman to celebrate life with her significant other.

The challenge of bringing back to the fashion forefront the outdated cocktail rings buried at the bottom of women's jewelry boxes led to creation of the so-called "right-hand ring." But the right-hand ring also provided an opportunity to reach a previously untargeted niche of nearly 77 million people: 45- to 65-year-old professional women, both married and single, with household incomes of $100,000 and up. "This woman knows herself, she's proud. . . . She reflects her confident style through a luxury purchase," Lynn Diamond told Israel Diamonds magazine. Diamond, the managing director of Diamond Promotion Services, the United States division of the DTC, said that the right-hand ring created a category for, and gave meaning to, diamond rings not classified as engagement, bridal, or anniversary jewelry and encouraged women to buy the rings for themselves as a way to express their personal style.

COMPETITION

Although De Beers supplied more than half of the market's rough diamonds, two other companies vied with De Beers for market share: BHP Billiton, with headquarters in Melbourne, Australia (BHP Billiton Limited), and London (BHP Billiton Plc); and Aber Diamond Corp. of Toronto, Ontario. Both companies produced diamonds in the rough, and both also pursued relationships with high-end retailers to create branding, marketing, and consumer sales outlets for their gems.

Aber directly supplied diamonds to high-end jewelry retailer Tiffany & Company Then in a twist, in 1999 Tiffany purchased almost 15 percent of Aber at a cost of $71 million in order to assure a steady supply of quality diamonds for its jewelry. According to Jewelers Circular Keystone, while it was not uncommon for miners like Aber and De Beer to turn retailer, Tiffany's acquisition of a percentage of Aber was the first time a jewelry retailer had turned miner. In what was considered more the norm, in 2004 Aber acquired 51 percent of jeweler Harry Winston for $85 million. With its purchase of a share of Harry Winston, one of the leading retail jewelers to the rich and famous since 1932, Aber developed a broader presence in the diamond industry, eliminated the middleman for its diamond sales, and gained a foothold in the profitable U.S. market.

BHP Billiton, the largest diversified natural-resources business in the world, reported that diamonds were both its smallest business unit and its fastest-growing one. Following the 2001 merger of Australia-based BHP Limited and London-based Billiton Plc, the company seemed to be on a mission to increase its diamond assets and involvement in the diamond industry. The heart of the company's diamond business was the Ekati mine in Canada, which accounted for approximately 6 percent of

NEW DTC CAMPAIGN HOPES TO CHANGE WEDDING ANNIVERSARIES

The Diamond Trading Company (DTC) was always on the lookout for new ways to market diamonds. In 2001 the DTC convinced many women that a casual outfit was not complete without a diamond tennis bracelet, then it later assured women that they could have a diamond ring without an engagement and that it could be worn on their right hand as well as their left. In 2005 the DTC took on wedding anniversaries. According to the company's research, 65 percent of women interviewed reported that they would like to receive diamond jewelry from their husband as an anniversary gift; however, only 6 percent actually got diamonds. To help get the message across to men that diamonds could be a wife's best friend, the DTC launched a marketing campaign designed to encourage men to commemorate their wedding anniversary with a gift of diamonds. The campaign hoped to replace the phrase "happy anniversary" with the tagline "I forever do," a combination of "I do" and "Diamonds are forever." Its goal also was to increase diamond sales. Based on DTC estimates, if just 10 percent of married women received a piece of diamond jewelry on their anniversary, the market would jump $3.2 billion.

the world's rough diamond production in 2000. To brand polished diamonds from Ekati, in 2000 the company created Aurius Diamonds, a marketing division based in Australia. By 2001, following the introduction of Aurius, sales had doubled monthly in Australia, producing $393 million in sales. In 2003 BHP Billiton announced plans to offer the Aurius brand in retail stores in the United States, Canada, and Singapore in addition to Australia.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Following the success of its three-stone-jewelry campaign, which promoted rings, earrings, and necklaces as symbols of love and enduring relationships, in 2003 the Diamond Trading Company launched a new campaign to sell not just diamond rings, but an idea. Working with its ad agency, J. Walter Thompson, DTC introduced the right-hand ring and through clever marketing launched a fashion trend. Additionally, the campaign reached a previously unmarketed-to demographic: independent, financially well-off, older women. Unlike previous campaigns that portrayed the diamond ring as a symbol of love, the "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign promoted the diamond ring as a badge of individual style. Claudia Rose, director of marketing strategy at J. Walter Thompson, said that the right-hand ring campaign was different because it linked diamond rings to fashion rather than romance. "This gives women another message," Rose said. "Diamonds also can represent a woman's unique style and be expressive as something like their favorite leather goods."

For the multimillion-dollar campaign, J. Walter Thompson developed a series of print ads that ran in fashion magazines, including Elle, Vogue, and In Style. Ads also appeared in publications likely to be read by the target demographic—upper-middle-class women 45 to 65 years old—such as Condé Nast Traveler and Town and Country. In developing the ads J. Walter Thompson used fashion models younger than the women being targeted. Explaining the strategy, Diamond Promotion Service, De Beers's U.S. marketing arm and a division of the J. Walter Thompson agency, said that regardless of their own ages, women identified more readily with younger women in print ads. The ads had edgy, evening-wear-clad fashion models showing off right-hand rings Each ad also featured a significant message to distinguish the right-hand ring from the engagement and wedding ring worn on the left hand. Among the statements were: "Your left hand says 'we.' Your right hand says 'me,'" "Your left hand likes to be held. Your right likes to be held high," "Your left hand is your heart. Your right hand is your voice," and "Your left hand lives for love. Your right hand lives for the moment." Each ad included the tagline "Women of the world, raise your right hand." By the end of the year the print campaign was expanded to include television spots.

Jewelry designers were encouraged to develop rings that matched De Beers's prototype right-hand rings, which were trendy and fashion-conscious To avoid being confused with traditional diamond engagement and wedding rings or with the popular three-stone anniversary rings, right-hand rings had one diamond of 20 points or larger and as many additional smaller diamonds as desired as long as it was not limited to three. A report in Israel Diamonds noted that more than 300 designs were submitted by manufacturers hoping to be a part of the campaign. From the original submittals, 10 ring designs were selected. An additional 6 ring designs were commissioned by Diamond Promotion Services, resulting in the 16 rings that were featured in the ads.

OUTCOME

The "Raise Your Right Hand" campaign was a marketing success for the Diamond Trading Company. Prior to the campaign's launch, diamond-ring sales were at the low end of the diamond-jewelry market, representing 28 percent of diamond jewelry, or $3.3 billion in sales, in 2003. Following the introduction of "Raise Your Right Hand," in 2004 nonbridal ring sales increased 15 percent. The campaign also created a cultural phenomenon by convincing single women that they could have a diamond ring without an engagement or in addition to a bridal set. And while the campaign originally targeted women with household incomes of $100,000 or more, right-hand rings soon were available at stores from Costco and Wal-Mart to Tiffany & Company and ranged in price from a couple hundred dollars to several thousand. Besides appearing on the right hands of stars such as Cameron Diaz, Charlize Theron, Halle Berry, and the female cast members of Sex and the City, women in all income brackets were soon sporting the rings. Clothing designers such as Betsey Johnson and Zac Posen, recognizing a growing trend, paired right-hand rings with their 2004 spring ready-to-wear styles.

In 2005 the campaign garnered a Gold EFFIE Award from the New York American Marketing Association for "exceeding its objectives of bringing ring growth into line with total diamond jewelry growth." The campaign was also recognized for pushing single women into the diamond-jewelry-buying market and achieving 39 percent product awareness among consumers in the year following its launch. Also in 2005 the DTC revamped the campaign, introducing new ads that were similar to the original but with a softer and less fashion-forward tone, replacing hard-edged fashion models with women dressed in cardigans. The right-hand ring category was broadened as well to include almost any ring that allowed women to express their individual identities. To further encourage women to raise their suitably adorned right hands, Diamond Promotion Services, the DTC's U.S. marketing arm, partnered with Jewelry.com, the premiere Internet jewelry site, and named October "Right-Hand Ring Month."

FURTHER READING

Bates, Rob. "Can These Three Words 'I Forever Do' Change the Anniversary?" Jewelers Circular Keystone, March 1, 2005.

———. "DPS Claims Campaign's 'a Success': Get Ready for a 'Broader' Right-Hand Ring Campaign." Jewelers Circular Keystone, June 1, 2005.

———. "Tiffany's New Setting: How the Famed Jeweler Became the World's First Retailer-Turned-Miner." Jewelers Circular Keystone, September 1, 2003.

Benson, Steven. "A Giant Moves In." Israel Diamonds, October 1, 2001.

"BHP Takes Shine to De Beers' Game." Australasian Business Intelligence, September 5, 2001.

"De Beers Touts Right-Hand Rings." Jewelers Circular Keystone, April 1, 2003.

Johnson, Marylin. "Style: On the Other Hand Diamonds (and Other Gems) are an Independent Girl's New Best Friend in Chic Right-Hand Rings." Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 23, 2003.

Kletter, Melanie. "Rings Reflects Women's Rights." Women's Wear Daily, October 20, 2003.

"Looking Downstream." Israel Diamonds, June 1, 2001.

"Mining Company to Buy Winston." Women's Wear Daily, December 1, 2003.

Overholt, Alison. "The Right-Hand Ring Craze." Cosmopolitan, October 1, 2004.

Payne, Melanie. "Diamond Sellers Launch Marketing Campaign for 'Right-Hand Rings' for Women." Sacramento Bee, December 2, 2003.

"Right-Hand Rings. The Next Big Thing." Israel Diamonds, August 1, 2003.

"Women of the World Raise Your Right Hand." Business Wire, June 3, 2005.

Yee, Blythe. "Diamond Merchants Dub 'Right-Hand Ring' Next Big Thing." Chicago Sun-Times, August 15, 2003.

Rayna Bailey

DirecTV Group, Inc.

2230 East Imperial Hwy.
El Segundo, California 90245
USA
Telephone: (310) 535-5225
Web site: www.directv.com

■■■

CELEBRITIES READ FAN MAIL TO DIRECTV (BECOME A DIRECTV FAN NOW) CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In June 2003 the DirecTV Group, Inc., provider of satellite television, launched a new marketing campaign featuring commercials with A-list Hollywood actors giving dramatic readings of actual fan letters received by the client. The use of celebrities was intended to help elevate DirecTV above its competition: cable television providers and direct-broadcast satellite rival Dish Network, both of which had begun imitating DirecTV's successful commercials featuring Dan the installer.

Developed by ad agency Deutsch/LA, the new $100 million-plus campaign consisted primarily of TV spots, which included such actors as Joan Cusack, Danny DeVito, Robert Duvall, Laurence Fishburne, and Andy Garcia. Comedian Dennis Miller anchored radio spots, and a print ad was introduced featuring a picture of actor Dennis Hopper. The TV spots were shot against a bare background with nothing more than a stool. What made them powerful was the enthusiasm of the customers' letters and the ability of veteran actors to read the letters with equal conviction. The atmosphere was kept lighthearted, resulting in impromptu remarks that found their way into the commercials. In one, for example, DeVito, following his rant called "Lies," asked the crew in a joking manner, "Did I capture the guy's anger?"

"Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV (Become a DirecTV Fan Now)" lasted little more than a year, ending in July 2004. While it proved a boon to DirecTV, which enjoyed four straight quarters of increased subscribers, the same could not be said of Deutsch. Despite its good work and excellent relationship with DirecTV's marketing people, the agency lost the account even before the campaign closed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Deutsch/LA established its relationship with DirecTV in 2000 when it won a creative project for Sunday Ticket, the exclusive National Football League package of Sunday games. Deutsch won the entire creative account later in the year when DirecTV put up its business for review. With just under 9 million subscribers, DirecTV was the dominant player in its category but, after a solid run of several years, it had become engaged in a fight for survival, threatened on one side by rival satellite providers and on the other by digital cable. In the fall of 2000 DirecTV ran the first television commercials developed by Deutsch. Centered around Dan the DirecTV installer, these commercials became the focal point of DirecTV's marketing campaign for the next year and a half. While successful, the installer campaign led some viewers to mistake DirecTV for a hardware company. The installer concept grew even less attractive when Dish Network and cable companies began using installers in their own ads.

With the installer becoming everybody's spokesperson of the moment, DirecTV felt that the waters had been muddied and its brand diminished in the process. The company believed it was imperative that DirecTV launch a new marketing campaign that would not only reinforce its position as an entertainment company but also reassert its leadership position and restore some luster to the brand.

TARGET MARKET

In the campaign that would succeed Dan the installer, DirecTV targeted existing customers, hoping to keep them on board. The company also wanted to appeal to potential new subscribers, especially ones with higher levels of disposable income, people who were not only attracted to premium brands but also likely to purchase DirecTV's higher-end programming combinations, pay-per-view events, and high-margin sports packages. To achieve that end DirecTV asked Deutsch/LA to create a campaign that leveraged the influence of celebrities.

COMPETITION

DirecTV faced entrenched competition from cable television systems (whether mom-and-pop operations or larger systems) around the country, but none could match the number of channels and digital picture and sound quality that DirecTV had to offer. Early on DirecTV faced satellite competition from PrimeStar, but after DirecTV swallowed PrimeStar's 2.2 million subscribers in 1999, that left only Echostar's Dish Network. Because the satellite dish and receivers were manufactured by Echostar, Dish Network was able to offer lower programming costs as well as lower equipment prices, making it a formidable foe.

By 2000 DirecTV and Dish Network battled each other but also received stiffer competition from cable operators, who began rolling out their own digital packages that not only rivaled the quantity of channels found on direct broadcast satellite systems but also offered movies on demand, high-speed Internet access, and Internet phone service as well. And on the horizon was another satellite provider, VOOM (owned by a subsidiary of Cablevision Systems Corporation), slated for a 2004 launch. VOOM eventually positioned itself as a high-definition television service, but it never caught on and ceased operations in April 2005. Nevertheless, in the early 2000s VOOM, backed by Cablevision's deep pockets, was not a venture DirecTV could afford to take lightly.

ON THE CUTTING-ROOM FLOOR

It should not have come as a surprise that, when DirecTV hired A-list Hollywood actors to give dramatic readings of actual customer letters, some quality material would be left out. According to Deutsch/LA associate creative director Michael Bryce, Robert Duvall's best performance was not used in the DirecTV campaign. Given a letter written by a Southern minister, Duvall put on a white suit and then, adopting the evangelical preacher persona he used so convincingly in the film The Apostle, sang the praises of DirecTV and issued a fire-and-brimstone denunciation of cable. Although everyone involved considered it a brilliant performance, the film The Passion of the Christ was controversial at the time, and DirecTV thought better of airing a commercial that might generate negative publicity.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Since taking over the DirecTV account, the Deutsch/LA creative team had become aware of the client's unusual fan mail—mostly handwritten, usually quirky, generally humorous, and incessantly enthusiastic about DirecTV's service, especially when compared to cable, which the writers skewered with a passion. In fact, DirecTV executives adorned their walls with their favorite letters. After DirecTV requested a campaign that featured celebrities, the Deutsch team began sampling the letters, which the agency had already used in a small way on the DirecTV website in promoting Sunday Ticket. Although the team was attempting only to get a feel for DirecTV subscribers, it soon became apparent that the fan letters were a treasure trove of material. "It was stuff you couldn't make up," Mark Musto, a Deutsch creative director, told Shoot. "We kept saying to ourselves, 'If there is a way we can get this passion and emotion into our TV commercials, we'd be in a great place.' So then we started kicking around the notion of getting big Hollywood actors to present these letters."

The creative team selected a pool of letters, all of which possessed "that special something that set the letter apart—whether it was a quirkiness or a passion or something that was real human that you could hang your hat on," Musto recalled. Then the team began the laborious task of tracking down the letter writers and securing permissions. People who agreed to allow their letters to

NO WAY!

All the actors hired to dramatize DirecTV fan mail were initially dubious about the unabashed enthusiasm of the letters. In fact they suspected that the letters had actually been written by the agency.

be read were given a $500 thank-you. In several cases, however, a favorite letter had to be discarded when the writer balked. While the agency secured the permissions, a director, Baker Smith of Harvest Productions, was hired.

The team had no interest in simply impressing consumers with how big a name it could buy to endorse DirecTV. Rather, the goal was to match the material to a specific actor, to deal with emotions that everyone could connect with while hopefully establishing a relationship between the audience and the celebrity. Securing the kind of A-list Hollywood talent DirecTV and Deutsch had in mind presented a challenge, however. While actors at this level might lend their voices to commercials or accept a paycheck for pitching a product in Japan, they avoided showing themselves in U.S. television commercials in the belief that overexposure might tarnish their star power. A wish list of actors was developed, and feelers were made through their agents—but only with money on the table. The first group of actors to sign on were DeVito, Fishburne, and Garcia. Another element in the campaign, a kicker, was that the actors were also DirecTV customers, although, in truth, DirecTV was ready to make them customers if necessary.

Initially the commercials were to be shot on an ornate set in the Culver Studios in Culver City, California. As the day of production neared, however, the soundstage was stripped down, finally consisting of nothing more than a glossy black floor, a blue background, a stool, and a simple spotlight. The creative team began to worry that by taking such a minimalist approach the commercials might fail to engage the audience. But as soon as the actors stepped into the spotlight and began performing the letters—quickly demonstrating to everyone assembled why they became stars in the first place—it became apparent that in terms of production value less was definitely more. The sparse set actually accentuated the power of the actor and the passion of the letter writer.

Each actor was given three letters for filming, one of which was in keeping with a familiar persona and others that might even go against type. Smith intentionally kept the atmosphere loose to make the crew into a ready audience to help draw out a performance. As a result the actors were willing to take chances and try out a number of deliveries. Smith told Boards Magazine about his experience directing Fishburne: "I didn't know Laurence from a hole in the ground, but I'd give him simple suggestions like, 'Try reading the letter as if you're a 17-year-old surfer dude,' and this 40-year-old black guy turned into a 17-year-old white surfer. I watched the transformation. Then we read like Shakespeare and Orson Welles, got way fucking serious, and again the body language changed." In the end Fishburne used a Shakespearean delivery for a letter that read, "Dear DirecTV, This morning I turned on the telly and all I can say is jumpin' ja hos se fat! Yee haw!"

For his spot DeVito performed a letter the team called "Lies," in which he delivered a passionate screed: "Dear DirecTV, Cable says reception quality is poor with satellite TV. Lies! My reception is way better with DirecTV than it ever was with cable!" Garcia's spot, "Even Greater Than Greatest," was intense but a shade quieter than the others: "Dear DirecTV, There's not a word to describe how great DirecTV is. It's not great. It's not greater than great. It's even greater than greatest." The convivial atmosphere on the set also elicited some off-the-cuff remarks from the actors as they slipped out of character, such as DeVito quipping, "Did I capture the guy's anger?"; Fishburne wondering, "How was that? Was that too over the top?"; and Garcia remarking to the letter writer, "I think I'm going to have you write my next review." These comments then served as taglines to close the commercials.

The first three 30-second commercials began airing in June 2003, presented in letterbox format with the name of the actor and writer appearing in subtitles. "Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV" also included radio and print elements. The radio spot used Miller, who read a letter from a customer expressing her joy about calling her former cable company to say, "Please disconnect my cable." The print ad showed 21 faces of DirecTV customers and fans, one of which was Hopper. Joining the campaign in September 2003, actor John Goodman cut a television commercial to promote Sunday Ticket. He read a letter from a satisfied Indianapolis Colts fan.

In March 2004 DirecTV and Deutsch launched a second phase of the campaign, which ran until July 2004. It featured television commercials by Cusack and Duvall. Cusack offered a screwball interpretation of a letter written by a fan in love with the word "great." Duvall, adopting the tone of a proper Southern gentleman, pondered the qualities of a DirecTV customer service representative that he longed to see in his wife.

OUTCOME

"Celebrities Read Fan Mail to DirecTV" was considered a success by DirecTV, which signed up new customers at a healthy pace during the course of the campaign. But even before the second leg kicked off, DirecTV elected to sever its relationship with Deutsch/LA. The company hired a new executive vice president of marketing, Neal Tiles, who decided to consolidate the DirecTV account with agencies owned by Omnicom Group, including BBDO Worldwide, which took over the Deutsch business. BBDO had recently hired executive creative director Eric Silver, who had previously worked with Tiles. Deutsch managing partner Eric Hirshberg told Adweek, "I look back on our four years with DirecTV as a satisfying client-agency relationship . . . It was a good run."

FURTHER READING

Champagne, Christine. "Baker Smith Opens DirecTV Mailbag for Deutsch LA." Shoot, July 4, 2003, p. 7.

Davis, Wendy. "DirecTV Breaks $20 Mil Effort from Deutsch." Advertising Age, January 22, 2001, p. C2.

Deutsch, Claudia H. "DirecTV Makes an Unexpected Move." New York Times, February 27, 2004, p. C2.

Flass, Rebecca. "$100M Dish for DirecTV." Brandweek, June 16, 2003, p. 20.

———. "To Keep Its Edge, DirecTV Picks Celebs over Installer." Adweek, June 16, 2001, p. 9.

Howard, Theresa. "DirecTV Enlists A-Team of Stars to Sing Its Praises." USA Today, October 5, 2003.

Sampey, Kathleen. "Ties Bind BBDO to DirecTV Business." Adweek, March 1, 2004, p. 7.

Solman, Gregory. "Deutsch Releases Final Spots for DirecTV." Adweek (western ed.), March 1, 2004.

Wakelin, Simon. "A Mighty Wind." Boards Magazine, December 1, 2003, p. 45.

Ed Dinger

Discovery Communications, Inc.

One Discovery Place
Silver Spring, Maryland 20910
USA
Telephone: (240) 662-2000
Fax: (240) 662-1868
Web site: www.discovery.com

■■■

TWO GUYS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In September 1995 Discovery Communications, Inc., made the move to the World Wide Web when it invested $10 million to launch Discovery Channel Online (Discovery.com). The new website featured news, nonfiction articles, options such as online shopping, and information about Discovery Channel's programming. At the time of its launch, Greg Moyer, president and chief operating officer of Discovery Networks, said the company was "extremely bullish" about the fast-growing online medium. Within five years of its launch, 4 million users each month were logging on to Discovery.com. In February 2000 the company made the decision to take advantage of the dot-com surge and combine its Internet and other media assets into a new business unit at an investment of $500 million spread over a five-year period.

To promote its new and improved website, Discovery.com (a subsidiary of Discovery Communications) and its agency, Publicis & Hal Riney, San Francisco, launched a national marketing campaign themed "Two Guys" with the tagline "Discover something new every day." The campaign, part of Discovery.com's $70 million consumer advertising budget for the year, included print ads, Web elements, and television spots that ran on the Discovery Channel and sister networks Animal Planet and the Travel Channel. The advertising featured two middle-aged men poorly disguised as a variety of characters, from mosquitoes to meteors, discussing things they had learned on the Discovery.com website just before meeting an untimely and unusual demise. In a TV spot one of the mosquito men gets swatted by his victim, and in another the meteor guys both burst into flames.

The campaign was a hit with consumers. Following its June 2000 launch the number of users visiting the Discovery.com website increased one percentage point (based on the number of people using the Internet at any particular moment). Although the ads resonated with consumers, in August, at the end of its preplanned summer run and without comment from Discovery.com, the campaign was canceled.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Discovery Communications launched the cable network Discovery Channel in June 1985 with 156,000 subscribers. As it grew Discovery Communications continued to add networks and subscribers, and in 2000 the company listed Animal Planet, the Travel Channel, BBC America, and the Learning Channel among its cable network holdings. In addition the company had begun to expand internationally into countries that included Latin America and Asia. Total subscribers for its combined networks had reached 269 million households by 2000.

As part of its expansion, Discovery Communications in 1995 invested $10 million in a new venture and launched its website, Discovery.com. In 2000 the company expanded the Discovery.com website and developed it as a new wholly owned subsidiary with a planned financial investment of $500 million spread over a five-year period. While the investment in the project seemed huge, Gary Alden, principal analyst of Arlen Communications, told Broadcasting & Cable, "Five hundred million is not that much money in Internet terms. It's a traditional media company in the era of Time Warner–AOL doing what it has to do to launch new kinds of businesses."

The reinvented website combined the resources of all of Discovery Communications' networks into one location on the Internet. It also offered users E-mail and messaging features and included plans to add options such as "Discovery Be-There Adventures" using advanced video technology. The company described Discovery.com as a "super-vertical" website that offered users information about travel, lifestyle, health, animals, kids, and other topics. Discovery Communications chairman and chief executive officer John Hendricks said of the new venture, "We're layering on a very successful online service," and he explained various possible options to help finance the project, including an IPO or existing shareholders' investments.

To promote Discovery.com and to encourage people browsing the Internet to visit the site, Discovery Communications planned to increase the site's on-air advertising by 200 percent. Shortly after the upgraded website's introduction, Discovery Communications launched its "Two Guys" marketing campaign.

TARGET MARKET

Discovery Communications had built a following of 180 million total subscribers familiar with its offerings of "nonfiction entertainment" from nature documentaries to informational programming airing on its various networks. The mission of the "Two Guys" campaign was to attract Discovery's traditional viewers to its upgraded and relaunched website and to encourage younger audiences connected to the Internet to visit the site when searching for information on a broad range of topics from travel destinations to health-care questions. Using over-the-top humor and what PR Newswire described as a "hip, pop-savvy attitude," the campaign was designed to reach consumers across all age demographics and show them they could find information relevant to their day-to-day lives on Discovery.com in each of seven categories: health, discoveries, lifestyle, travel, school, animals, and kids. According to Adweek Western Advertising News, Discovery.com executives explained, "The campaign is built on the traditional Discovery brand, but tries to play to a younger consumer with an offbeat sense of humor."

REDESIGNED DISCOVERY WEBSITE SUFFERS DOT-COM WOES

Discovery Communications' Internet business unit, Discovery.com, took a hit in late 2000 after the bubble burst in the dot-com industry. By November of that year, citing lower-than-expected e-commerce and advertising revenues, Discovery.com executives announced a sweeping reorganization of the company. As part of the changes, Discovery.com laid off 45 percent of its full-time staff, eliminated some 150 contract jobs, and refocused its plans for the online division. Its website was redesigned in 2001 to shift the focus from original content to promoting Discovery Communications' 200 retail outlets, including the Nature Company stores, and 11 cable networks, including Animal Planet, the Travel Channel, and the Learning Channel. The strategy, however, failed. Emily Meehan, a senior analyst with the Yankee Group, told Multichannel News, "When you think about the myriad of travel, learning, and health destination sites already out on the Web, Discovery's notoriety in these categories becomes diluted in the Web world."

COMPETITION

In 2000 the National Geographic Society was an icon more than 100 years old. Besides publishing its namesake magazine, through its wholly owned subsidiary National Geographic Ventures, the society had established a presence on television with its cable network, National Geographic Channel US, listing 25 million households as subscribers, and on the Internet with its website, nationalgeographic.com. As Discovery.com was making changes to its website, National Geographic announced efforts to expand its presence on the Internet as well, but rather than revamping its existing site the company formed alliances with two existing companies having websites: Novica.com and iExplore.com.

Novica.com was an online marketplace that specialized in selling handcrafted works from artisans in developing countries. According to a report in Business Wire, the terms of the alliance gave National Geographic a 19 percent share in the dot-com, with rights to increase that to almost 30 percent. Rick Allen, president and chief executive officer of National Geographic Ventures, told Business Wire, "For more than a century National Geographic has enabled hundreds of millions of people to travel to the far corners of the globe—at least from their armchairs. Novica makes it easy for individuals to experience another culture through its art.''

For those who preferred to leave their armchairs at home, National Geographic in 2000 also acquired a 30 percent share in iExplore.com, an online resource for adventure travel. National Geographic added iExplore.com's database of some 5,000 trips to 152 countries to its website, and iExplore.com added National Geographic Expeditions to it site.

A&E Television Networks, with 80 million total subscriber households in 2000, also announced plans to increase its Internet offerings. In addition to having websites (including AandE.com, historychannel.com, and biography.com) tied to its various cable channels, one proposed site (wildlifestories.com) was developed to compete directly with Discovery Communications' website, Discovery.com, according to Todd Tarpley, vice president of A&E's interactive unit, as reported in Multichannel News. Additionally the company launched an updated version of its most popular site, historychannel.com, which attracted more than one-third of the combined 1.1 million people using the company's six sites.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Cable subscribers who regularly tuned in to the Discovery Channel were familiar with the network's unique documentaries that included up-close-and-personal views of wildlife, from the common to the rare, as well as other nonfiction programming on a variety of topics. Discovery Communications' challenge was attracting those television viewers to its upgraded and relaunched website, Discovery.com. To encourage its viewing audience to join the 4 million people visiting its site each month, Discovery.com and its agency, Publicis & Hal Riney, San Francisco, launched the ''Two Guys'' campaign with the tagline ''Discover something new every day.''

The national campaign, part of Discovery.com's overall $70 million advertising budget, kicked off in June and included print ads in magazines and newspapers, television spots running on Discovery Communications' various cable networks, and Web elements. Tim Maleeny, senior vice president and account director with Publicis & Hal Riney, San Francisco, described the campaign as raw, bold, and edgy. ''We thought it was time to use humor to present the Discovery brand from a different perspective,'' he told Adweek Western Advertising News.

Television spots featured shots of bugs, animals, and other things found in nature that Discovery Channel viewers expected but with a twist: the parts were played by two guys in bad disguises. One ad showed the guys, dressed as mosquitoes, land on someone's arm. The mosquito men discuss Discovery.com's many positive qualities while sucking up the victim's blood through straws. In true mosquito fashion, one of the insects is squashed by a well-placed smack from the victim. Another spot had the two guys dressed as meteors sharing information they found on Discovery.com. Just as one meteor guy comments that he learned meteors burn up in the earth's atmosphere, the camera zooms in to show the two guys burst into flames.

OUTCOME

The ''Two Guys'' campaign was a success if measured by consumer response. According to Broadcasting & Cable, Discovery.com's user traffic, which was estimated at 4 million online visits per month prior to the campaign, increased by a full percentage point based on the percentage of all people using the Internet at any point in time. Despite the campaign's popularity with consumers and the increased site visits generated by the television spots and print ads, Discovery.com, without comment, canceled the entire campaign at the end of its preplanned summer-only run.

FURTHER READING

''Adventure in Partnership.'' TravelAge West, September 4, 2000.

''A Wrap for Fish.'' Broadcasting & Cable, August 28, 2000.

''The Big Push: Fact and Friction from Discovery.com.'' Advertising Age, June 12, 2000, p. 76.

Cole, Richard. ''Discovery Puts Previews on Web Site.'' Cable World, December 18, 2000.

DeMarco, Donna. ''National Ad Campaign Is Invitation to Discovery on Line.'' Washington Times, June 12, 2000.

''Discovery.com Launches New Advertising Campaign, Inviting Consumers to 'Discover Something New Every Day.' '' PR Newswire, June 6, 2000.

Donohue, Steve. ''A&E Bulks Up Web Sites.'' Multichannel News, March 6, 2000.

Granger, Rod. ''Discovery Commits $10M for Online Venture.'' Multichannel News, July 3, 1995.

Moss, Linda. ''Different Bites of the Same Apple.'' Multichannel News, October 16, 2000, p. 20A.

''National Geographic and Novica.com Announce Strategic Alliance: 112-Year-Old Organization Sees Synergy with Young Web Site.'' Business Wire, December 12, 2000.

Norton, Justin M. ''Discovery.com Debuts 'Two Guys.' '' Adweek Western Advertising News, June 19, 2000, p. 7.

Stump, Matt. ''Discovery.com Takes Hit, Slashes Staff.'' Multichannel News, November 20, 2000.

Tedesco, Richard. ''Discovery Sets Big Net Play.'' Broadcasting & Cable, February 7, 2000.

Rayna Bailey

Doctor's Associates Inc.

325 Bic Drive
Milford, Connecticut 06460
USA
Telephone: (203) 877-4281
Fax: (203) 876-6674
Web site: www.subway.com

■■■

JARED FOGLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the late 1990s, despite being the leader in the submarine sandwich fast-food niche with an estimated 27 percent market share, Subway sandwich shops' sales were flat and showed no signs of improving. That changed, however, when one of the chain's loyal customers, an overweight Indiana University senior named Jared Fogle, took the chain's promise of serving healthy, low-fat sandwiches to heart and went on a diet of Subway sandwiches. The "Subway Diet" was a success—Fogle lost 245 pounds eating the chain's sandwiches twice a day—and Subway had a new spokesman to attract diet-conscious consumers to its restaurants.

On the advice of its advertising agency, Hal Riney & Partners, Subway hired Fogle to pitch its low-fat menu options. Using Fogle's weight-loss success story as its theme, Subway launched a $75 million advertising campaign in 2000. The first television commercial featuring him was a 30-second spot that opened by showing the pre-diet, 425-pound Fogle, followed by the trimmed-down Fogle ordering a Subway sandwich and eating it while seated on a park bench. An announcer stated, "We're not saying this diet is right for you. You should talk to your doctor first. But it's food for thought."

The campaign resonated with people looking for healthy, high-quality, low-fat alternatives to the typical fast-food choices of greasy burgers and fries. The company was careful to avoid responsibility for promoting a diet plan, however. A Subway spokeswoman told the Cincinnati Post, "We're pleased that our low-fat sandwiches could fit into [Jared's] meal plan, but it's not a diet that we endorse by any means." Commenting on the success of the "Jared" campaign, Subway said that, following Fogle's 2000 appearance in a television advertising spot for the chain, his weight-loss success story had captured the attention and imagination of millions consumers and television viewers. Fogle subsequently starred in eight additional commercials for Subway and was the featured speaker at hundreds of public appearances.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1964 people craving a submarine sandwich either made it at home or went to a local sandwich shop or Italian restaurant. That changed in 1965, when recent high school graduate Fred DeLuca, worried about finding money to pay his college tuition, talked with his family's friend, Peter Buck. Rather than offering to pay DeLuca's tuition, Buck had a different suggestion: he would loan the money for Fred to open a sub sandwich shop. Ten years later there were 16 Subway shops in business and one goal on DeLuca's mind: expansion. By 2004 the chain had grown to more than 21,000 stores in 75 countries. Commenting on the growth during an interview with Advertising Age, Subway's director of development, Don Fertman, said, ''Goal-setting has always been important. Besides being No. 1 in every market we serve worldwide, our main goal was to look at what the possibilities can [lead to].''

Beginning as early as 1989 Subway was using its menu of sandwiches made with fresh-baked bread, fresh ingredients, and low-fat meats such as turkey-based cold cuts, to promote itself as the restaurant choice for people wanting to eat healthy. In 1992 Subway added veggie and cheese and roast chicken breast sandwiches to its menu selection, further strengthening its image as the low-fat fast-food chain. Subway promoted itself through various marketing campaigns as the healthy alternative to greasy fast food. It launched its first national television campaign, ''Subway—It's My Way,'' in 1990, and the theme ''The Way a Sandwich Should Be'' was introduced in 1996. The chain's 1998 ''Eat Smarter'' marketing included television spots portraying overweight people in various situations, such as a clearly heavy man floating in the water behind a motorboat waiting to be towed on his skis. When his friend revved the boat's engine the boat would not move. The camera panned to a partially eaten burger and fries while a voice-over said, ''Eat less fat.'' It was not until the 2000 campaign featuring Jared Fogle, however, that the chain's low-fat options finally captured the attention of consumers. April Y. Pennington wrote in Advertising Age, ''You can lose weight eating Subway sandwiches! everyone cried, and the rest was history.''

REAL MEN WANT RED MEAT, AND SUBWAY RESPONDS WITH STEAKBURGERS

Typical Subway customers were women and men working in white-collar jobs who headed to the chain's restaurants during lunch breaks to enjoy its healthy selection of low-fat sandwiches. Research revealed, however, that 12- to 34-year-old males, many working in blue-collar jobs, were not concerned about fat or calorie content and wanted juicy burgers and other red-meat options not available at Subway. In response to that unfilled niche, Subway introduced the Steakburger, a sandwich made with a chopped-beef patty. At nine grams of fat but with a selection of cheeses, fresh vegetables, and condiments as toppers, the burger fit within Subway's commitment to provide consumers healthy options, but it fell just outside the chain's goal of offering menu items with less than 350 calories and 6 grams of fat.

The company introduced the Steakburger with television ads featuring a 30-something construction worker demanding, ''Gimme a Subway Steakburger.'' Although originally planned as a short-term product offering, the success of the ''Hot News for Burger Lovers'' campaign had franchise owners asking that it be added to the permanent menu.

TARGET MARKET

As the new millennium approached, obesity in the United States was a growing problem. According to research conducted in 2000 by the American Obesity Association, 30 percent of children aged 6 to 11 years old were overweight, and 15 percent were considered obese. The numbers for adolescents aged 12 to 19 were similar. Further, 127 million American adults were considered overweight, and 60 million were obese. One factor blamed for these statistics was high-fat, high-calorie fast food. From the mid-1980s Subway began reaching out to consumers of all ages by promoting itself as an alternative to hamburgers and fries. With Fogle as the poster boy for thin people everywhere trapped in overweight bodies, the new Subway ads focused on attracting consumers wanting to lose weight and make healthier eating choices while still having a fast meal.

COMPETITION

To help build a brand identity and lure customers away from the top two chains, Subway and Blimpie, the number three sub sandwich chain, Quiznos, launched a marketing campaign that featured the company's cofounder, Jimmy Lambatos. ''Chef Jimmy'' used quirkiness and a grandfather-next-door approach to establish an image of quality for Quiznos. In the television ads he smiled and waved, stressing the importance of fresh, high-quality ingredients when making a good sandwich. ''Chef Jimmy'' was so passionate about making a perfect sandwich that he forgot to put on his pants. During an interview with Kelly Pate of the Denver Post, Quiznos's chief executive officer, Rick Schaden, said that the company was counting on the personality of ''Chef Jimmy'' to drive sales and help push the restaurant into the fast-casual niche, defined as restaurants with higher-quality food than typical fast-food places. ''Our next step is to take everything we do and make sure it's in line with that,'' Schaden explained.

Despite its distinction of being the oldest sub sandwich chain—it was founded in 1964—Blimpie International had been pushed by Quiznos from its number two spot by 2004. As the company prepared to celebrate its 40th birthday, it was struggling to reinvigorate its brand. Blimpie chief marketing officer Mark Mears said to PR Newswire that the company's new plan was consumer focused and encouraged restaurant franchisees to treat customers "The Blimpie Way." Mears explained that the new slogan "permeates all levels of the Blimpie system and will serve as the foundation for revitalizing a brand that until recently stood still and resisted change while our competitors adapted to meet the needs of today's consumers." He added, "We also plan to 'take off the gloves' in a new, aggressive marketing campaign."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Promo's Peter Breen noted that, while Subway was a 15,000-restaurant chain worldwide with an estimated $3.2 billion in sales, it lacked the advertising budget to compete with chains like McDonald's and Taco Bell. But he noted that Subway was "fairly confident they can compete with the big boys when it comes to offering healthier food and better service." A limited budget was not enough to prevent Subway from moving ahead with the "Jared" campaign. Breen wrote that the chain's marketing team was taking its healthy-alternative theme in a different direction with the introduction of an upgraded menu, a more appealing service plan, and a $75 million advertising campaign. As part of the campaign Subway dropped its four-year-old tagline, "The way a sandwich should be," and replaced it with the slogan "Eat fresh." The campaign included television spots featuring weight-loss champion Jared Fogle as well as Billy Blanks, the creator of Tae Bo, a workout program that combined elements of karate, aerobics, boxing, and dance.

While Blanks's message reached consumers who were already exercising and living a healthy lifestyle, Jared Fogle and his weight-loss success story resonated with consumers fighting the battle of the bulge. Fogle was a student at Indiana University in 1998 when he saw Subway's commercials promoting the chain's "Seven under Six" low-fat sandwiches. Believing the promise of eating healthier food suggested in the Subway ads, Fogle, who weighed more than 400 pounds, put himself on a diet in which he ate nothing every day but a cup of coffee for breakfast, a Subway six-inch turkey sub for lunch, and a foot-long veggie sub for dinner. He also had a bag of chips and diet soda with each sandwich. One year later, helped by his diet of Subway low-fat sandwiches and a daily exercise regimen, Fogle had dropped almost half his body weight and had become Subway's unexpected champion.

When Fogle's weight-loss story made its way into an article in the Indiana Daily Student newspaper, word quickly spread and appeared in the national news. From there the story was picked up by Subway officials, who asked him to star in a commercial. The initial television spot portrayed the 425-pound Fogle and then switched to a shot of him, 245 pounds leaner, ordering a Subway sandwich and eating it while sitting on a park bench. Blanks became the chain's first celebrity spokesman when his spot aired. It featured Blanks leading a Tae Bo class in a series of kicking and punching moves and telling students to head to Subway after the class for a healthy lunch. The spot included an offer giving away coupons for Blanks's workout videos with Subway sandwich purchases. William Schettini, Subway's chief marketing officer, told Breen, "Blanks and Fogle gave Subway a one-two kick, so to speak, with Blanks appealing to the already health-conscious and Fogle inspiring those who want to be health-conscious."

Chris Carroll, director of marketing for the Subway Franchisee Advertising Fund Trust, said in an interview with Promo that Subway's marketing ultimately had to show how the chain's products benefited the customer. He explained, "What we've decided to do, at least over the next 12 to 18 months, is to have our promotional message be about our products. Every piece of creative will have a promotional theme to it, but in our case, we've got these new sauces, we've got these new breads, and that becomes the promotional message, the incentive to try us out."

OUTCOME

The health-focused campaign was so successful that the company delayed the launch of a new $75 million branding campaign in 2000 in order to continue running the Jared Fogle and Billy Blanks spots. Subway, which had believed the low-fat theme had lost its appeal, reportedly was surprised by the success of the campaign. Carroll told Advertising Age, "We've been doing low-fat for 3 1/2 years and did well, but driving the business 15 percent to 20 percent is unbelievable." And although Subway had grown steadily since its opening in the early 1960s, the chain experienced a rapid boom following the introduction of Jared Fogle as spokesman, growing to 17,700 U.S. locations, versus 13,000 for McDonald's by 2004. Also in 2004 Subway launched a new campaign themed "F.R.E.S.H. Steps," which took aim at childhood obesity. Designed to encourage kids to strive toward a healthier lifestyle, the campaign included 11 commercials featuring Fogle and three non-actor children talking about how their lives had been changed by eating healthy food. Based on the success Fogle had connecting with consumers, both adults and children, the chain signed him on for additional advertising that was planned to continue into 2005.

FURTHER READING

Berry, Kate. "Big Mac Attack: McDonald's Prepares to Challenge Subway's Dominance." Los Angeles Business Journal, November 29, 2004.

"Blimpie International." Franchising World, October 1, 2004.

Breen, Peter. "Companies; A Cut Above." Promo, August 1, 2000.

Buss, Dale. "Catching the Diet Craze." Chief Executive, December 1, 2003.

Garfield, Bob. "Subway Ads Are Lean on Laughs and Overstuffed with Laziness." Advertising Age, September 29, 2003.

Kaelble, Steve. "Ask Jared: Great Gig: TV Viewers Can't Get Enough of Hoosier Subway Spokesman." Indiana Business Magazine, November 1, 2003.

Kung, Howard. "Jared and Jim: Subway's Conflicting Posterboys." Charlottesville (VA) Cavalier Daily, September 4, 2001.

MacArthur, Kate. "Subway Heats Up in Fighting Off Underdog Quizno's." Advertising Age, June 14, 2004.

———. "Subway Sales So Strong Marketer Delays New Ads; Tae Bo's Blanks, Man Who Has Lost 245 Pounds Sparks a Surprise." Advertising Age, June 19, 2000.

———. "Subway's Tasteful Theme Shifts Low-Fat Positioning." Advertising Age, April 3, 2000.

Pate, Kelly. "Owners Hope to Distinguish Quizno's Sub Shops with Fast-Casual Approach." Denver Post, February 2, 2003.

Pennington, April Y. "Neck and Neck: Being Number 1 in the Franchise Race Has Its Advantages, but There Will Always Be Others Nipping at Your Heels." Entrepreneur, January 1, 2004.

Thompson, Stephanie. "Subway Burger Targets Working-class Men; Sandwich Fits Chain's Ongoing Health Profile." Advertising Age, March 6, 2000.

Wessel, Harry. "Sub Shops Battle for Business." Orlando (FL) Sentinel, April 25, 2005.

Rayna Bailey

Dr. Martens Airwair USA LLC

10 NW 10th Ave.
Portland, Oregon 97209
USA
Telephone: (800) 460-3885
Web site: www.drmartens.com

■■■

BELIEFS CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In May 1997 Airwair Ltd. assigned the creative portion of its Dr. Martens advertising account to the Dallas-based agency Pyro. Dr. Martens was a brand of work boots and shoes known for their industrial outer appearance. The boots already had an antiestablishment and youth-culture image; Pyro was asked to create a branding campaign that would continue to define that image. Pyro responded with a series of four print ads—none of which contained a product shot—that appeared in consumer magazines and as in-store posters. The expression of the Dr. Martens brand through unconventional images and messages maintained consistency with the company's reputation for nontraditional marketing strategies. Television advertising developed by the British agency Harrison Carloss followed up on the print campaign, which continued into 1998. This U.S. campaign also extended into an international campaign.

Concurrent with this campaign, Dr. Martens extended its brand name by producing and distributing alternative music compilations that complemented its brash image. Then, in 1998, it launched the Dr. Martens record label to continue this marketing strategy by promoting shoe sales through CD giveaways. The move tied into the brand's historical connection to alternative musical trends, from the days of the British invasion in the 1960s to the eruption of punk in the 1970s to the breaking of new wave in the 1980s to the grunge movement of the 1990s. Dr. Martens sought to use its brand recognition as a means of leveraging publicity for up-and-coming bands while at the same time benefiting itself by adding a further compulsion to the consumer's purchase decision. Dr. Martens also tied into the World Cup soccer tournament in 1998 with a series of boots featuring national flags countries competing in the event.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Dr. Klaus Maertens, a German M.D., teamed up with Dr. Herbert Funk, an engineer, to design shoes to relieve the sore feet of Munich women in the wake of World War II. The shoes also provided relief to Maertens himself after he suffered a skiing accident. The secret to the design was the process of heat-sealing the sole so as to create a pocket of air that cushioned footfalls. In 1959 Maertens transferred production to Britain, licensing the brand to the Benjamin Griggs and Septimus Jones Company (later known as R. Griggs Group), manufacturers of industrial footwear since 1901. The anglicization of the name to Dr. Martens occurred in this transition, simplifying the spelling for the purpose of exporting the shoes to new markets. The Griggs company produced its first Dr. Martens boot on the first of April, 1960, naming the model 1460 after this date.

Guitarist Pete Townshend initiated Dr. Martens' connection to rock and roll. He wore 1460s on stage because the boots proved solid enough for stomping on smashed guitars when his band, the Who, took to destroying its equipment during distortion-filled encores. The gesture of youthful rebellion became embodied in the shoes, which were too bulky to be fashionable but turned into a fashion statement anyway. Subsequent generations of rebels wore them as an expression of their angst. This earned DMs, as the boots were dubbed, an underground following in the skinhead, punk, and new-wave movements. The Dr. Martens World Wide Web site asserted that ''classic punk bands such as The Clash, the Stranglers, the Damned and Buzzcocks [wore] the boots almost religiously.''

In 1995 Dr. Martens tied into this connection with the alternative music scene by releasing a compilation CD entitled Unlaced (playing off the popularity of MTV's live acoustic series Unplugged) featuring the music of Blur, New Order, and Suede. Music & Media Partnership, a company specializing in connecting branded businesses with record companies, orchestrated this strategy. The CD was a success, reaching the top 20 on the charts with sales of more than 100,000. Dr. Martens followed up with more compilations, shifting from over-the-counter sales to purchase-incentive gifts. One such compilation, released through Warner Brothers, moved 450,000 CDs (and shoes) in a month. ''There's no way we would have shifted nearly half a million pairs of shoes in the space of a few weeks but for the promotion of that shoe,'' said Dr. Martens music strategist Karl Nielsen in York Membry's Music Week article.

Subsequent compilations did not move quite so well. Shoe Pie, by the label 4AD and featuring Lush, Throwing Muses, and the Breeders, sold only 200,000 copies in the United States and 80,000 in the United Kingdom. Nielsen stressed that moving product was not necessarily the primary objective of the promotions—Dr. Martens was ''not just in it to buy market share quickly. The Dr. Martens philosophy is to be supportive of youth culture, especially through music, but not overtly commercial,'' said Nielsen in Membry's article. Dr. Martens supported the music of youth culture in multiple ways. It sponsored stages at the Phoenix and Reading festivals in 1996. In 1998 it sponsored the Glastonbury Festival and sponsored a stage during the Lollapalooza U.S. tour. Dr. Martens also supported individual bands, sponsoring Soul Coughing on its 1998 U.K. tour and sponsoring a live recording of Logical Progression III during Christmas 1997.

TARGET MARKET

''Music is a great way for a brand such as Dr. Martens to reach its target market,'' said Rick Blaskey of Music & Media Partnership, who helped seal the deal with Dr. Martens. That target market consisted primarily of youths aged 13 through 25. This connection to youth culture both honored the roots of the brand's success while also generating future success by hooking in devotees early on. Arkady Ostrovsky profiled Dr. Martens's ''dream customer'' in his 1998 Pittsburgh Post-Gazette article, introducing her simply as Ann, a 26-year-old native of San Francisco working in New Zealand. ''I have been wearing DMs since I was 13. First at school, then at university. My boyfriend was a punk and he had red hair and 20-eyelet boots.'' Her current boyfriend, by contrast, was a derivatives trader, and she bought him a jumper from DM's limited clothing line. Dr. Martens thus became the item that nonconformists could carry with them to symbolize their latent rebellious spirit as their lives conformed more to the norm.

Ostrovsky commenced his article by quoting a joking Stephen Griggs, chairman of the R. Griggs Group, his family's company, which had been manufacturing Dr. Martens since 1960. ''We had Madonna and the Pope wearing DMs, but my mom does not get on too well with them. She thinks they are too clumpy.'' Though Dr. Martens did not have plans of targeting older mothers of corporate executives, the brand did aspire to expand its target market. However, demographic growth would prove more challenging than geographic growth, so Griggs thought more in terms of expanding distribution, not expanding marketing. ''I am very uncomfortable about the U.S. being 60 percent of our sales. Obviously, I do not want our American sales to drop, but I want to increase the share of other markets to counter the U.S.,'' Griggs stated in Ostrovsky's article. Specifically Griggs envisioned China and Latin America as the brand's biggest potential growth markets.

COMPETITION

Dr. Martens advertising did not position the product as a work boot, but rather as a fashion statement identifying the wearer with youth culture. The brand therefore competed against other brands that identified themselves with youth culture, especially those growing out of the rebellious skateboard movement, such as Vans, Air Walk, and Caterpillar. Dr. Martens held an advantage, though, as most of these brands produced sneakers, whereas no other boot held sway over youth fashion as did Dr. Martens. In this sense Dr. Martens had successfully carved its own niche in the youth market without any threatening competition. Dr. Martens's main challenge, then, became growing its own market without commercializing its image, which would appear to its antiestablishment target market as selling out. ''We have to convince people that DM shoes are still the same; it is

THE DR. MARTENS-HARLEY-DAVIDSON CONNECTION

Dr. Martens marketing maintained several affinities with Harley-Davidson marketing. Both brands appealed to consumers at opposite ends of the spectrum, but both brands hyped the fact that their loyalists existed outside the mainstream. While this tactic risked segmenting the target market into a small niche, both companies remained true to their devotees, trusting that the genuine nature of their fans' rebelliousness would gain respect from the mainstream. Both companies supported their nonconformist brand image through brand extensions, or brand stretching. Harley-Davidson developed a comprehensive merchandising and licensing program that proliferated the Harley logo as well as the Harley attitude pervasively.

Dr. Martens achieved a similar proliferation of its brand image through alternative music, eventually launching its own record label. While some critics questioned the move as a mere marketing ploy, Dr. Martens's marketing strategist Simon Mills said the strategy was more of a commitment to the youth culture and alternative music culture that supported DM for so long. "We have a genuine desire to support new British bands and that is why we're [launching the Dr. Martens record label]," Mills said in a 1997 article in The Independent. "It's not just a marketing ploy. Our brand is big enough for us not to have to spend on conventional advertising, so we are able to support other avenues and not seek too much recognition for doing it."

just now we are making more of them," said Griggs in Ostrovsky's article.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Pyro's product-free campaign, which marked the return of Dr. Martens advertising after a year-long hiatus, commenced with a series of four print ads that ran in consumer magazines such as Rolling Stone and Details, as well as those with a more alternative edge, such as Bikini, Raygun, and Spin. Thematically, the ads advanced the notion of individualism, inherently suggesting that wearing Dr. Martens expressed individualism. One headline read, "The mainstream is polluted," while another ran: "You start out and end up just like everyone else. What happens in between is up to you." The ink from one headline—which read: "The world is full of generic, mass-produced, homogenized products. Don't become one" —bled into the shape of a bar code, punctuating the message of the text. In Steve Krajewski's 1997 Adweek article Pyro creative director Todd Tilford explained the rationale behind the product-free message ads. "What the client liked about our work is that we try to blur the line between advertising and 'brand art.' "

Following up on its success with CD compilations, Dr. Martens created its own eponymous record label, launching the project by releasing a compilation entitled Generation To Generation, which tied together different periods of the music listened to by Dr. Martens wearers. Alternative bands of the '90s such as Box Office Poison and Lynus covered '60s anthems "Louie Louie" and "My Generation," respectively, as a means of tying together the first wave of DM music to the current crop of DM music. The collection also included tracks from '80s bands such as the Lambrettas and the Untouchables. The long-term goal for the label was to "push young British talent to an audience who wouldn't otherwise hear them" by running promotional giveaways throughout all the areas covered by Dr. Martens distribution, according to Dr. Martens marketing strategist Simon Mills.

The painted-boots tie-in with World Cup soccer in 1998 was an idea that originated with the Norwegian distributor of the brand to celebrate his home team's qualification for the tournament. The distributor ordered 40,000 pairs of boots with the Norwegian flag in hopes of catching the wave of his country's nationalistic fervor. Similarly Dr. Martens sought to capture the patriotism of soccer fans with the Stars and Stripes, the Union Jack, and St. Andrews flags.

Dr. Martens also ventured into broadcast ads in 1998 with the campaign created by Harrison Carloss of Newcastle-under-Lyme. It ran concurrently with the Pyro campaign. In the United Kingdom the ads ran exclusively in cinemas, while France and the United States added television to the media mix. Print ads also ran in fringe magazine titles such as Loaded, FHM, Maxim, ID, The Face, Arena, Dazed & Confused, Frank, Sugar, and Bliss.

OUTCOME

Between 1980 and 1998 Dr. Martens sales increased tenfold, reaching $395.2 million in 1998, as the brand sold 12 million pairs of boots and shoes globally. In 1997, when Pyro began creating advertising for DM, the brand racked up pre-tax profits of $54.56 million, a significant increase over the figure of $35.2 million in pre-tax profits for 1996. At the conclusion of 1998

Airwair began making preparations for the 40th anniversary of Dr. Martens by shopping for an ad agency that could handle a global account. In April 1999 Airwair awarded the $10 million account to the British agency TBWA GGT Simons Palmer, London, thus consolidating the brand's advertising at one agency to create a cohesive global campaign, targeting the core markets of Britain, France, Italy, Germany, the Benelux countries, and the United States. TBWA creative director Trevor Beattie reacted to the announcement with enthusiasm, calling Dr. Martens "a great name, a cult brand and a fabulous creative challenge. People are fighting to work on the account."

FURTHER READING

"Dr. Martens Flags New Boots for World Cup." Marketing Week, February 12, 1998.

Krajewski, Steve. "Unseen 'Doc Martens' Reappear in U.S. Ads." Adweek, October 6, 1997.

Membry, York. "Dr. Martens Kicks In." Music Week, March 7, 1998.

Ostrovsky, Arkady. "Dr. Martens Steps Up Its Growth." Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, August 21, 1998.

"These Boots Are Made For Your CD Player." The Independent, March 2, 1997.

William D. Baue

Dr Pepper/Seven Up, Inc.

5301 Legacy Drive
Plano, Texas 75024
USA
Telephone: (972) 673-7000
Fax: (972) 673-7000
Web site: www.dpsu.com

■■■

THIS IS THE TASTE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After an upturn in its fortunes in the highly competitive soft-drink industry, in 1997 Dr Pepper/Seven Up Inc., a subsidiary of Cadbury Schweppes, reigned as the leading noncola soft-drink business in North America. Its spicy beverage Dr Pepper was the third-best-selling noncola soft drink in America and was outsold only by PepsiCo's Mountain Dew and the Coca-Cola Company's Sprite. Analysts within the soft-drink industry attributed Dr Pepper's success partly to its unrivaled position as the leading spicy soft drink. In contrast, Dr Pepper's sister brand 7 UP was competing against other successful lemon-lime soft drinks, such as Sprite. Dr Pepper had been advertising with the cumbersome tagline "Now Is the Time. This Is the Place. Dr Pepper, This Is the Taste." In an effort to continue its sales growth and streamline its previous tagline, Dr Pepper/Seven Up released a campaign called "This Is the Taste."

The ad agency Young & Rubicam created "This Is the Taste" with Dr Pepper's estimated $55 million advertising budget. The campaign, which consisted of print ads and television spots, debuted on January 1, 1998, with four commercials that emphasized the unique flavor of Dr Pepper. Young & Rubicam conceived commercials that attempted to "deliver [this] hard-hitting claim in a humorous way," John Swan, an agency partner, explained to Adweek. One of the spots depicted John Madden, a former National Football League (NFL) coach, searching a deserted stadium trying to find the elusive meaning of the game. His journey ended in success at a Dr Pepper vending machine. The campaign continued into 1999 with soccer-themed commercials featuring American and Mexican athletes. All spots closed with the "This Is the Taste" slogan. The campaign ended January 1, 2000.

"This Is the Taste" was proclaimed a success by both Dr Pepper and industry experts. In 1999 Dr Pepper's sales grew at a faster rate than that of the overall soft-drink industry. The campaign's final year marked the 15th consecutive year of sales growth for Dr Pepper.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Founded in 1885, Dr Pepper was the oldest of the major soft-drink brands in the United States. But despite its distinctive taste, the beverage had never achieved the mass acceptance of Coca-Cola or Pepsi. For most of its history Dr Pepper's advertising had tried to make a virtue of this outsider image. After billing itself as the "most original soft drink ever" for much of the 1970s, the company switched to the funky and popular "Be a Pepper" campaign in 1977. Following the conclusion of its "Hold Out for Out-Of-the-Ordinary" campaign in 1987, Dr Pepper was the fifth-best-selling soft drink in the country. "We're pretty comfortable with the idea that consumers know we're different," a company spokesperson told USA Today.

Dr Pepper's uniqueness was again to be a significant asset during the 1990s. Beginning in 1990 Americans' love affair with colas began to wane. According to the Wall Street Journal, the combined share of colas in the United States dropped from 72 percent in 1990 to 64 percent in 1996. In place of colas, consumers swilled ever greater amounts of so-called noncolas—primarily Dr Pepper, Mountain Dew, and Sprite. By 1995 Dr Pepper was the fourth most popular soft drink in the country, and its year-end sales were up 6.9 percent, far surpassing the remainder of the industry, which grew by only 3 percent. Despite this remarkable growth spurt, however, its two noncola counterparts, Sprite and Mountain Dew, outpaced Dr Pepper. After a year of record-breaking sales, Sprite displaced Dr Pepper as the leading noncola beverage in 1996, when its sales volume jumped 12 percent from 1995. Mountain Dew also performed well. In response, Dr Pepper created "Now Is the Time. This Is the Place. Dr Pepper, This Is the Taste," to add momentum to the Dr Pepper brand. Nevertheless, while 1997 proved to be another growth year for Dr Pepper, Sprite and Mountain Dew continued to sell better. Prior to its inauguration of the 1998 "This Is the Taste" commercials, Dr Pepper possessed 5.8 percent of the domestic soft-drink market, while Mountain Dew and Sprite respectively controlled 6.3 percent and 6.2 shares. "We will only be content when Dr Pepper is growing at a faster rate than any other major soft drink," promised Jack Kilduff, the company's president, when he announced the marketing agenda for 1998.

TARGET MARKET

To reach its ambitious goals, Dr Pepper needed to capture an essential demographic group. John Clarke, Dr Pepper's chief advertising officer, told Adweek that the new spots targeted 12- to 34-year-olds. Especially important was the narrower market of teenagers within this broad group. Part of their significance lay in their sheer numbers. As the progeny of the massive baby-boomer generation, these members of the so-called Generation Y (or "echo-boomers") accounted for 28 percent of the American population. Moreover, these consumers, who were between the ages of 10 and 18, were rapacious soft-drink guzzlers. For example, in 1993 alone teens spent $3 billion of their own money on soda, reported the newsweekly Time. Marketing a product to these echo-boomers was a difficult proposition, however. They were, Time explained, "inoculated against pitches from having grown up with television jingles at breakfast." Members of Generation Y not only commanded a greater spending power than any prior generation but also recognized that "their main area of [authority was] as a consumer," said Time.

According to the Daily News Record, the most effective way to address this audience was to "under promise;" that is, to avoid the typical strategy of touting an inanimate product as the path to happiness or popularity. Generation Y-ers were far too media savvy to succumb to this questionable logic. Consequently, "This Is the Taste" avoided scenes of gorgeous young adults drinking Dr Pepper and suddenly enjoying newfound prowess or popularity. Instead the commercials focused on Dr Pepper's taste and, as Brandweek noted, on "consumers' undying devotion to the product." Moreover, "This Is the Taste" retained the spirit of Dr Pepper's long-standing quirky image advertising. This decision was grounded in the tendency of teens to rebel against the conventional and accepted. Dr Pepper's spots did show people going to extreme lengths for a swig of the beverage, but these folks were presented as unique and unconventional, quite unlike the portraits of everyday, hardworking Americans who were the mainstay of many Coca-Cola campaigns.

Of course, while it assiduously courted Generation Y, Dr Pepper did not want to alienate consumers over the age of 20. Unlike Pepsi's campaigns, which had long sought to position that soft drink primarily as a youth brand, "This Is the Taste" strove to achieve a cross-generational appeal. No scenes of screaming teens or smart-talking kids were used. Instead "This Is the Taste" relied on a tongue-in-cheek humor, catchy story lines, and an ensemble of characters that catered to adults as well as teens. For instance, John Madden's presence provided the campaign with a means to connect with older consumers, as did a commercial released in December 1998 featuring the notoriously intense Bill Cowher, coach of the Pittsburgh Steelers NFL team. Because they did not resort to doling out the heavy-handed cynicism and obvious antiadvertising stance that was supposed to be popular among teenagers and their Generation X counterparts, "This Is the Taste" commercials had to be "more creative than ever to effectively convey our message," Dr Pepper's Clarke told Adweek.

COMPETITION

Sprite and Mountain Dew, Dr Pepper's foremost competitors, also strove to appeal to a youth market. Unlike Dr Pepper, though, both these brands more directly and unabashedly targeted Generation Y consumers. Sprite's 1998 marketing effort stemmed from its parent company's 1993 decision to end "I Like the Sprite in You," a peppy campaign that mainly attempted to differentiate Sprite from its fellow lemon-lime beverage 7 UP. In its place Sprite and its ad agency, Lowe & Partners/SMS,

GOING GLOBAL

In addition to being Dr Pepper's most expensive campaign, "This Is the Taste" led to the company's first-ever television commercial for international markets. Shot in Buenos Aires, Argentina, this spot portrayed an assortment of rural and urban images in an attempt to establish a global look for the brand. Dr Pepper's John Clarke declared the spot "a real masterpiece" and explained that its goal was to prompt international consumers to try the beverage. "With a name like Dr Pepper and a truly unique taste, some people might be reluctant to try it, but when they do, they love it," he added.

developed "Image Is Nothing. Taste Is Everything. Obey Your Thirst," a campaign that set its sights directly on Dr Pepper and Mountain Dew. As Lee Garfinkle, the chairman of Lowe & Partners, told Adweek on November 6, 1995, "the challenge was . . . to make Sprite relate to today's kids and bring it into the '90s." The way that "Obey Your Thirst" accomplished this aim was to ridicule the styles and fluffy messages of traditional soft-drink commercials and instead cultivate a pronounced antiadvertising stance. The commercials used cutting-edge hip-hop music and scenes of teens skateboarding, skiing, and playing basketball. Although "Obey Your Thirst" incorporated celebrities, such as National Basketball Association (NBA) star Grant Hill, the spots derided the entire notion of using a celebrity endorser. One component commercial depicted Grant Hill stylishly dunking the ball on the court and then pausing to take a sip of Sprite. As a young boy watched him and followed his example, the voice-over declared, "If you want to make the NBA, practice. If you want a refreshing drink, obey your thirst. Sprite." A company spokesperson explained the campaign's strategy to Advertising Age in 1998: "The approach is that we're not talking down to our audience. We know teens are smart enough. We know they know we're selling them a product." The brand's sales increased immediately after the campaign's launch. After becoming the fastest-growing soft drink in 1996, Advertising Age proclaimed that Sprite had "transcended the lemon-lime category to become a mainstream soft drink." Its successes continued in 1997 as it garnered a 6.2 percent share of the soft-drink market.

Mountain Dew reaped similar rewards from its strategy of targeting teenage boys. Created by BBDO Worldwide, its fast-paced commercials resembled music videos more than advertisements. Extreme athletes—representing sports that were tremendously popular with the echo-boomers, such as skateboarding and snowboarding—were a staple of Mountain Dew's advertising. In one 1999 spot skateboarders raced along the tops of New York skyscrapers. In another spot scenes of extreme athletes crashing and falling off their skateboards, surfboards, and snowboards were set to the old folk tune "Dem Bones." Mountain Dew aired a Super Bowl commercial in 1999 and was a prominent sponsor of the X-Games, an extreme sport extravaganza broadcast by ESPN. Like Sprite, Mountain Dew often adopted a more jaded outlook in its advertisements. Mountain Dew's 1997 performance was even more outstanding than Sprite's. It gained the distinction of being the fourth most popular soft drink that year and triumphed in "clever brand differentiation," noted Advertising Age.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Dr Pepper had described its goal for "This Is the Taste" as that of "position[ing the brand] more as a leading soft drink rather than simply as the leading noncola soft drink," Dr Pepper's Clarke explained to the Dallas Morning News. The company viewed the campaign as its vehicle into the mainstream cola market. Although Dr Pepper was far less interested in claiming converts from Pepsi and Coke's flagship colas, it did feel that by not billing itself exclusively as a fringe drink, it could cannibalize Sprite and Mountain Dew's share of the market. Therefore, "This Is the Taste" was "more aggressive and more of a call to action," said Clarke to the News. "We believe we're as much of an icon to consumers as Coke or Pepsi."

Dr Pepper realized that establishing its brand in the mainstream of the soft-drink market would require a concentrated marketing push. Both in 1997 and 1998 Dr Pepper budgeted more to promote itself than it did in any prior advertising campaigns. The outlay in 1998, in fact, was 50 percent higher than in 1997. "This increased marketing investment will ensure greater consumer exposure to Dr Pepper in 1998 than ever before," predicted Dr Pepper/Seven Up's president. The company built upon the solid foundation laid in 1997 with "This Is the Taste" ads—which had appeared during high-profile events such as the NFL conference championships games. In 1998 Dr Pepper branched out and ran its commercials during new programming as well. Along with big-ticket sporting events, "This Is the Taste" spots ran during the Golden Globe Awards and Rosie O'Donnell's talk show. In addition to its television spots, Dr Pepper used print ads. These did not share the images from the commercials but instead touted their own message. The company also sponsored a car in the NASCAR circuit in a bid to raise its visibility. "We've pulled together all the elements needed to propel Dr Pepper into the number one noncola soft drink position in the U.S.," raved the company's president at a bottler's convention.

The campaign continued into 1999 with a January release of three 30-second TV commercials. Titled "Anthem," "Latin," and "Halftime," they featured Americans and Mexicans playing soccer. The decision to tie Dr Pepper in with soccer melded with the agency's decision in 1999 to advertise Dr Pepper's international appeal. Although it was not the most popular sport in America, soccer was internationally referred to as "The World's Favorite Pastime."

The campaign officially ended on January 1, 2000, when Young & Rubicam released the subsequent campaign, "Dr Pepper Makes the World Taste Better." Clarke explained in the PR Newswire news service that the 2000 campaign made sense as the next step for Dr Pepper's advertising. "Now, we're going to provide the answer to the logical question, 'Why is Dr Pepper the taste,'" Clarke said. "Because no matter where you are, and no matter what you're doing—a Dr Pepper will make life taste better. In fact, as our new tagline declares, 'Dr Pepper Makes the World Taste Better.'"

OUTCOME

The noncola category of the soft-drink industry had another banner year in 1998. Dr Pepper sales rose 5.8 percent during the year. Nevertheless, Dr Pepper could not match the gains its rivals made. Mountain Dew catapulted past Diet Coke to become the third-best-selling soft drink, with its sales growing a stunning 9.9 percent in 1998. Sprite held onto its position as the number five beverage in the category, while Dr Pepper remained lodged in sixth place. In significant ways the company was hindered by its bottling and distribution systems. Because Dr Pepper/Seven Up owned no private bottling plants, it was dependent on independent operations or those controlled by Coca-Cola or Pepsi to perform this crucial step of moving the beverage from production to market. Moreover, its giant competitors had better distribution systems and more clout with retail and fast-food chains. Indeed, Dr Pepper/Seven Up was "in a tooth-and-nail struggle with larger rivals Coke and Pepsi for every inch of space it now occupies in supermarkets, convenience stores, soda fountains, and vending machines," Brandweek asserted.

Despite these liabilities, Dr Pepper's future looked bright. The noncola sector showed no signs of slowing, and the brand had a loyal following of consumers. In 1999 Cadbury Schweppes sold its non-U.S. DrÊPepper business and several other brands to the Coca-Cola Company. Cadbury Schweppes also decided to merge its bottling plant, the Dr Pepper Bottling Company, with the Carlyle Group's bottling plant American Bottling to form the consolidated Dr Pepper/Seven Up Bottling Group.

Dr Pepper executives attributed the brand's increased sales growth to the "This Is the Taste" campaign along with the improved bottling. Dr Pepper sold 5 percent more cases than in the previous year—marking its 15th consecutive year of sales growth. The brand's achievement was praised as "a phenomenon" by John Sicher, the publisher and editor of the industry newsletter Beverage Digest. Because of Dr Pepper's lack of competitors, Sicher referred to the drink as "an unstoppable freight train." Dr Pepper was the third-fastest-growing U.S. soft-drink brand in 1999, surpassed only by Mountain Dew and Sprite. Unfortunately for Dr Pepper/Seven Up, the company's second-largest brand, 7 UP, recorded a 3 percent sales decline the same year.

FURTHER READING

Benezra, Karen. "Dr Pepper/7-Up Beat Marketing Drums, But Is Pepsi Alliance in Offing?" Brandweek, September 22, 1997.

Cooper, Ann. "The Genie Inside the Bottle." Adweek, November 6, 1995.

Cox, James. "Sinatra Sings for a Winner." USA Today, June 1, 1987.

Deogun, Nikhil. "Coca-Cola May Purchase Orangina." Wall Street Journal, December 22, 1997.

Garfield, Bob. "Bob Garfield's Ad Review." Advertising Age, April 21, 1997.

Gladfelter, Elizabeth. "A Consultant Says that Gen X, Gen Y, and Boomers Have Starkly Different Characteristics, and Marketers Should Proceed with Caution." Daily News Record, November 9, 1998.

Gleason, Mark. "Sprite Leads the Pack in Soft Drink Growth." Advertising Age, February 12, 1996.

Greenwald, John. "Will Teens Buy It?" Time, May 30, 1994.

Howard, Andrew, and Theresa McMains. "Humor Softens Y&R's Dr Pepper Sell." Adweek, October 5, 1998.

Howard, Theresa, "7Up's New Jingle." Brandweek, August 23, 1999, p. 1.

Zimmerman, Martin. "Dr Pepper Changes Taste in Advertising." Dallas Morning News, October 26, 1996.

Rebecca Stanfel
Kevin Teague

Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings, Inc.

5929 College Avenue
Oakland, California 94618
USA
Telephone: (510) 652-8187
Fax: (510) 450-4592
Web site: www.dreyersinc.com

■■■

UNBELIEVABLE CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

To herald the launch of not just a new product line but also an entirely new manufacturing process, Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Holdings, Inc., initiated in May 2004 what was to become the largest and most aggressive marketing campaign in the company's history. Founded in 1928 as a partnership between William Dreyer and Joseph Edy, Dreyer's (which was known as Edy's east of the Rockies in the United States to avoid confusion with rival Breyers) rose to become the largest ice-cream maker in the United States by 2005. After five years of research and development Dreyer's had come up with a proprietary new way to blend its ice cream that resulted in a richer-tasting but lower-fat version of its traditional product. The San Francisco–based agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners created an ad campaign that was intended to attract consumers to this new product by building on the established brand name Dreyer's Grand Light yet giving ice-cream buyers a new reason to reach for a product that many felt was inferior to the "real" thing.

The comprehensive campaign, named "Unbelievable," featured four prime-time television spots, backed by print, billboard, and radio advertising. Dreyer's spent $20 million on the campaign. The theme of the TV spots was imitative of classic spy-thriller films, with various people expressing absolute incredulity that the new ice cream could possibly be lower in fat and calories than the original and accusing a fictitious Dreyer's executive of fraud and deceit.

The campaign was both a critical and financial success, winning a Gold EFFIE Award for the ad agency and boosting 2004 sales of Dreyer's Grand Light by 68 percent and overall sales of the company's products by 49 percent over the previous year. "Unbelievable" ran from May through November 2004.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Ice cream had reached a household penetration level of 90 percent by 2004. This meant that almost everyone in America bought ice cream; those who were apt to buy it already had it in their freezers, and those who did not would be difficult to persuade to put it there. As a result, the ice-cream manufacturing industry relied heavily on slight tweaks of established products (such as new shapes, sizes, or flavors) to boost sales. As was often case with mature products, there had been little innovation in the industry for decades. Whether on a stick, on a cone, dipped in chocolate, cut into bite-sized pieces, spread between two cookies, or blended with nuts and caramel, the product remained what it had always been: a frozen concoction made from sugar and cream. In 2004 the per capita consumption of ice cream in the United States was 44 pints per year, the highest in the world. Trying to convince consumers to buy even more of the product was also dicey, because few people thought that ice cream was a healthy food choice to begin with.

The ice-cream industry was not immune to trends, and because of their product's market saturation the manufacturers were quick to capitalize on shifts in consumer attitudes in the hope of increasing sales. In the mid-1980s, when low-fat diets reached a national fever pitch, the ice-cream industry was stymied. People were being told to eat a low-fat diet. Ice cream, as the very name implied, relied on milk fat to produce its rich, creamy taste. Sales of ice cream dropped as Americans turned to lower-fat alternatives. After a few years of both product and market research, in 1987 Dreyer's introduced its Grand Light line of lower-fat ice creams. Sales were initially strong but quickly stagnated as customers found the taste not rich or smooth enough, according to the company's internal research. It seemed that people would rather cut calories and fat in other parts of their diet and eat traditionally fattening ice cream if they ate it at all.

Diets fads came and went, and by the late 1990s the new trend of low-carbohydrate diets was leading the pack. While elimination of fats from consumers' plates was no longer the dietary thrust, reducing refined sugars and calories was, and again ice-cream sales took a hit. Most manufacturers of ice cream jumped the trend by using artificial sweeteners to reduce the sugar and calories in their products or by using fat substitutes to make their ice creams healthier. Unfortunately, "low fat," "low carbohydrate," and "healthy" were synonyms for "tastes bad" in many consumers' minds. For this reason Dreyer's took the innovative step of formulating not new ingredients but a new processing method to produce a version of their traditional ice cream that was lower in fat and calories but much closer in taste to the original.

The end result of a five-year and $100 million investment (in research and development, marketing, and infrastructure improvements) was a proprietary new "slow-churned" process of making ice cream. By employing a significantly lower temperature and higher pressure than traditional methods, the new churning method broke up and flattened the fat molecules in the cream, thereby increasing the number of molecules and their collective surface area while distributing them more evenly throughout the product, resulting in a richer and creamier texture. The manufacturing process took three times longer than with regular ice cream, hence the term "slow churned." One serving of traditional ice cream had 11 grams of fat and 175 calories, while the new product had only 3.5 grams of fat and 100 calories. Dreyer's had great hopes that this new product line, absent artificial or substitute ingredients, would revitalize the static "good-for-you" segment of the ice-cream market and find a welcome reception from health-conscious consumers or those who just wanted to reduce the guilt in an age-old guilty pleasure.

TARGET MARKET

With more than 60 percent of Americans classified as overweight, and with organic, natural, and lower-calorie foods seeing brisk sales going into 2004, Dreyer's aimed to sell its new product across a wide spectrum of consumers, but it intended specifically to target women—traditionally the grocery shoppers in most families—in the hopes that once inside the household the new ice cream would catch on with all members of the family. Research suggested that women were more likely to reach for a healthy alternative to regular ice cream, while men and children were more resistant to anything other than the real thing. In addition, the aim of the campaign was to attract lapsed buyers of "light" ice cream who had abandoned the category on the basis of poor taste as well as people who avoided eating ice cream in general because of its unhealthy nutritional profile.

COMPETITION

Dreyer's was acquired by Nestlé in 2003, making the combined company the world leader in ice-cream production and sales, followed by Unilever PLC, maker of the Breyers and Ben & Jerry's brands. In 2004, however, the Breyers brand had total annual U.S. sales of $529.1 million, whereas the Dreyer's brand's U.S. sales topped out at $422.2 million. Dreyer's had for years distributed the Ben & Jerry's brand of ice creams through its own distribution channels. Moving a competitor's product into the marketplace might seem counterproductive, but Dreyer's CEO Gary Rogers explained in an interview with CNN that, with an enormous fleet of its own freezer trucks, Dreyer's had the only direct-to-store distribution network in the United States. Because the Dreyer's distribution business accounted for more than half of its annual profits, it made fiscal sense to extract additional profit from a competitor even if that company's products ultimately sat next to the Dreyer's products on supermarket shelves.

While Dreyer's was the first to market with its new lower-fat ice creams, Unilever was close behind, introducing a "double-churned" version of its Breyers line in 2005. It used a similar process to create a more flavorful and creamy-textured ice cream with less fat and fewer calories. In a widespread TV and print campaign Breyers used the tagline "At Breyers, we believe good things get better . . . when they're doubled!" and paired it with soothing images from nature of "doubles," such as a double rainbow and a two-pronged waterfall. The advertisements then explained the "double-churned" process.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

In 2004, when Dreyer's introduced a new slow-churned version of its original low-fat ice cream, Dreyer's Grand Light (introduced in 1987), it hyped the new technology used to produce the ice cream but kept the same name for the product, not wanting to confuse consumers and hoping to rebuild the stagnant light-ice-cream category on the back of its established brand name. Despite a $20 million media campaign to promote the new product, however, Dreyer's came to learn that the name itself, Grand Light, was an impediment to sales because a certain segment of the population was resistant to anything describing itself as healthy or "light." Halfway through the campaign Dreyer's retooled its packaging to de-emphasize the "light" aspect of the ice cream and to promote its slow-churned manufacturing process more forcefully. Advertising the new ice cream by its process instead of its low-fat and low-calorie content helped boost sales further. From that point on, the packaging featured a larger version of the words "Slow Churned" and a deemphasized "Light" name, so that it effectively read "Dreyer's Slow Churned."

MARKETING STRATEGY

What Dreyer's determined from its exhaustive research was that most people had an aversion to low-fat or healthy products, believing them to taste significantly worse than foods full of fat and calories. Rather than promote its slow-churned ice cream as a healthy alternative to regular ice cream, Dreyer's, in conjunction with ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, chose to tackle the problem of skepticism head-on: the crux of the campaign was to tout the incredulous fact that the new ice cream tasted almost as good as the real thing. In fact, in preliminary national blind taste tests, 8 out of 10 people thought that they were eating a full-fat premium ice cream rather than a "light" version. Bolstered by this research, Dreyer's embarked on a $20 million national media campaign, the largest in company history. It featured TV spots, print ads, billboards, radio spots, and commercials that aired in movie theaters prior to feature films.

The company was ambitious in its goal for the campaign, which was to increase stagnant sales of its light ice creams in 2004 by at least 50 percent over the previous year. Considering that the product was not rolled out until May, this amounted to a target increase of 50 percent for only seven months of the year (a period that would, however, include the ice-cream "selling season," which corresponded to the hottest months of the year, May through September). Dreyer's also hoped to create a "halo effect" in the sales of its traditional ice-cream lines as well. Even though no advertising was planned for its regular Grand Ice Cream line in 2004, Dreyer's was counting on its increased media presence to draw customers to all of its products, not just the advertised Dreyer's Grand Light line.

Four TV spots provided the backbone of the campaign. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners' approach was to build on and play off of the skepticism most consumers had about any sort of reduced-calorie dessert product. Rather than try to educate people about the technological innovations of the new product, the ad agency set out to forestall the viewer's incredulity by acknowledging it and taking it a step further. Using a classic-film-noir approach, each of the four spots featured a fictitious Dreyer's executive named Jim who was approached in sinister or underhanded ways by other employees who were so skeptical about the low-fat content of the new slow-churned ice cream that they accused him of passing off real ice cream as the new "light" product. In one spot Jim got into his car in the company parking lot after hours only to have a fellow employee lean forward out of the shadowed back seat and claim, "I know what you're up to." In another commercial Jim was approached by a woman at a company picnic who told him, "It's just not right, what you're doing." In a third Jim was accosted by a security guard who threatened to expose his secret unless Jim provided five gallons of ice cream per week to keep him quiet. The spots were utterly serious in tone, shot in high-contrast filmic style. The deadpan tone belied the silly message, but the point was driven home that this ice cream must be good enough to fool people, even people who worked for Dreyer's. These three spots were edited into one additional commercial that ran like a movie trailer, with fast edits and a voice-over saying, "A man stands alone, accused of a terrible crime." This commercial was played on television and in movie theaters in the advertising time before a feature film.

The print campaign took a similar approach, highlighting the "unbelievable" claim that the new light ice cream was, in fact, a reduced-fat product. One billboard featured a photo of a half-gallon container of the ice cream with the tagline "Introducing New Dreyer's Grand Light." The ad was then made to look as though it had been defaced by graffiti, with the words "no way this is" inserted between the words "Grand" and "Light," resulting in an ad that effectively read: "Introducing New Dreyer's Grand 'no way this is' Light." The radio spots resembled public service announcements, with a deadpan male voice stating, "This message is a public service announcement from Dreyer's Corporation," and then explaining that consumers may have been confused as to whether they had purchased a "light" or regular ice cream because the taste was so similar.

OUTCOME

Dreyer's more than met its goals with the campaign. Sales of the Grand Light ice creams rose 83 percent during the campaign's run and 68 percent for the year. Sales of all Dreyer's products increased $429 million, or 49 percent for the year. Clearly the "halo effect" approach had worked as hoped. Even the competition could not deny Dreyer's successful innovation and reinvigoration of the light-ice-cream category. John Cutter, CEO of Friendly Ice Cream Corporation, stated in a 2004 earnings conference call, "One thing that Dreyer's has done very effectively is they've come out with some very good 'better-for-you' products. They have a slow churned ice cream that is very good."

Goodby, Silverstein & Partners won a Gold EFFIE Award (Packaged Food, Diet/Health/Light category) for the campaign; the EFFIEs, held annually by the New York American Marketing Association, was one of the most prestigious award programs in the advertising industry. The campaign also generated a significant amount of press. In addition to numerous write-ups in food-industry magazines, Newsweek ran a piece on the new manufacturing process, CEO Rogers was interviewed on CNN, and the product was taste-tested by the anchors of The Today Show during a food segment.

Dreyer's was ultimately able to jump-start sales in a category that had seen flat sales for the previous three years, and it inspired just about every other major competitor to follow suit. More than 100 "low-carb" ice creams were introduced in 2004, versus only 19 in 2003 and zero in 2000. By positioning itself soundly in the marketplace with its sweeping ad campaign, Dreyer's achieved its goals and put itself ahead of an industry-wide trend.

FURTHER READING

Clancy, Maureen. "Matters of Taste." San Diego Union-Tribune, July 27, 2005, p. E1.

Funderburg, Anne Cooper. Chocolate, Strawberry, and Vanilla: A History of American Ice Cream. Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1995.

Horovitz, Bruce. "Makers Put Fattening Ice Cream on a Diet; Tasty Fat, Sugar, Carbs Get Pinched to Curb Melting Retail Sales." USA Today, June 21, 2004, p. A1.

Phillips, David. "Looking for a Churn Around: Sales Have Softened in the Past Year, But Ice Cream Makers Have Rolled Out A Slew of Better (for You) Products Designed to Resurrect the Category." Dairy Foods, March 1, 2004, p. 44.

———. "Surf's Up for Lighter Ice Cream: The Food Industry Is Moving toward the Center with Products that Offer True Nutritional Balance." Dairy Foods, March 1, 2005, p. 22.

Reyes, Sonia. "New Products Dreyer's Has the Scoop to Please Ice Cream Skeptics; Keeping the Taste while Losing the Fat Is Key to New $20M Effort." Brandweek, May 10, 2004, p. 3.

Riell, Howard. "Indulging In Health; Health Concerns Continue to Drive a Lot of New Product Development in Ice Cream and Frozen Novelties, but Indulgence Remains the Rule of the Day." Frozen Food Age, May 1, 2004, p. 33.

Setoodeh, Ramin. "Corporate Last Licks; Can Dreyer's, the Largest U.S. Ice Cream Maker, Figure Out How to Market Its Newfangled Low-Fat Product?" Newsweek, May 9, 2005, p. 36.

Wellman, David. "Cool Treats, Hot Formulations: New Manufacturing Process and Formulations Play a Key Role in the Latest Round of Entries." Frozen Food Age, February 1, 2004, p. 28.

Wherry, Rob. "Who They Kidding? Ice Cream Wars." Forbes Global, April 14, 2005, p. 17A.

Jonathan Kolstad

drugstore.com, inc.

411 108th Ave. NE, Ste. 1400
Bellevue, Washington 98004
USA
Telephone: (425) 372-3200
Fax: (425) 372-3800
Web site: www.drugstore.com

■■■

A VERY HEALTHY WAY TO SHOP CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

When drugstore.com launched its website in 1999, the competitors in the online-drugstore segment were primarily a site introduced that year by CVS, a traditional ''brick-and-mortar'' drugstore, as well as several ''pure-play'' Internet retailers (those with online stores only), including PlanetRx.com and Rx.com. By 2000 PlanetRx.com and Rx.com had closed their sites, drugstore giant Walgreens had introduced an online presence, and drugstore.com was growing, with reported revenues of $34.8 million its first year and nearly 724,000 unique visitors to its site in one month (February 2000). To drive business during its first year, drugstore.com spent $28.5 million on advertising created by ad agency McCann-Erickson. Despite its marketing efforts and growing consumer interest in the site, however, drugstore.com lost $115.8 million in 1999. Pushed by its partners—General Nutrition Center (GNC) and Rite Aid drugstores—drugstore.com dropped McCann-Erickson and signed on Fallon McElligott as its new agency in August 1999 (the agency shortened its name to Fallon in 2000).

To help establish drugstore.com as a force on the Internet as well as a solid alternative to traditional drugstores, to further increase brand identity, and to drive shoppers to drugstore.com's website, Fallon created a new marketing campaign for the e-tailer that began in March 2000. The $30 million campaign targeted drugstore.com's core customers, women aged 25 to 54. It included television and radio spots, print ads, and online advertising, all with the theme ''A Very Healthy Way to Shop.''

The campaign won a 2001 Bronze EFFIE Award and achieved its goals, increasing overall brand awareness by 48 percent and pushing the number of weekly visits to the site up 18 percent. Sales also increased, jumping to $110 million in 2000. But drugstore.com continued to operate in the red, losing more than $193 million in 2000. As part of its budget-cutting measures, drugstore.com canceled its campaign and eliminated all off-line media spending.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Drugstore.com hung out its virtual shingle in 1999 with the goal of providing consumers with first-rate pharmacy services and a wide selection of health, wellness, and beauty products not often available at traditional brick-and-mortar drugstores because of space limitations. Coupled with the variety of products was convenience; busy consumers could shop for what the company described as ''drugstore stuff'' from the comfort of their own home or office simply by logging onto the Internet.

Partnerships with companies such as General Nutrition Center (GNC) and the Rite Aid drugstore chain helped drugstore.com expand its market reach. Within 13 months of drugstore.com's introduction the company announced that its one-millionth customer had shopped at the site. Chain Drug Review reported that, according to Peter Neupert, drugstore.com's CEO, by May 2000 more than two million Internet users were visiting drugstore.com's site each week.

Helping drive consumers to the new website was an advertising campaign created by the agency McCann-Erickson, Seattle. San Francisco–based Left Field Advertising, which had been responsible for all of drugstore.com's advertising prior to McCann-Erickson taking over off-line efforts, continued to handle drugstore.com's online advertising. Shortly after drugstore.com began its partnership with GNC and Rite Aid, McCann-Erickson lost the drugstore.com account based on complaints by the two chains that the advertising strategy touted online shopping at the expense of brick-and-mortar stores. Also, at the end of 1999 Left Field dropped the drugstore.com account. Drugstore.com moved quickly to find a new agency. After a four-week review the company named Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott its new agency, with McCann-Erickson to be assigned work on a by-project basis.

Drugstore.com stipulated that Fallon McElligott (which became simply Fallon in 2000) needed to create the new branding campaign quickly, but the agency's president and creative director, David Lubars, said that Fallon was up to the speedy challenge the job posed. During an interview with Adweek, Lubars said, ''All of these [dot-com] companies want to go fast. It's good for us as an agency to move quickly.'' And move quickly Fallon did. The agency was hired by drugstore.com in August 1999, and its first work for the online business—television spots with the tagline ''Let the drugstore come to you''—broke that November. In March 2000 Fallon released a new campaign for the e-tailer themed ''A Very Healthy Way to Shop.''

THE CHARITABLE WING OF DRUGSTORE.COM

Founded in 1999, drugstore.com used 200,000 shares of its initial public offering (IPO) to create a nonprofit charitable organization, the drugstore.com Foundation. According to drugstore.com, the foundation ''funds programs that facilitate emotional and economic self-sufficiency and improve the health, dignity and well-being of people in need.'' Its focus is on communities where drugstore.com has physical facilities.

The drugstore.com Foundation has donated money to numerous organizations, including Washington Women in Need, the AIDS Coalition of New Jersey, the American Red Cross, and National Meals on Wheels. Donations are selected by drugstore.com employees. For example, in 2001 an employee committee at drugstore.com's southern New Jersey distribution center donated $25,000 to three nonprofit organizations in the state: the Visually Impaired Co-Partners of Gloucester County, the Emmanuel Cancer Foundation, and the AIDS Coalition of Southern New Jersey.

TARGET MARKET

Drugstore.com's director of communications, Erik Moris, succinctly stated the company's target market during an interview with Advertising Age. ''We're building this company around women,'' he said. Moris noted that even the use of a bathtub as the focal point of the marketing campaign specifically targeted women, because men took showers and not baths. Women 25 to 54 years old were drugstore.com's core audience. Additional studies identified head-of-household women, known as the family's gatekeeper, as a key target because they were the consumers who made decisions about what products to buy and where to shop for them. The campaign was designed as a way to show busy, working women how drugstore.com could help simplify their lives and give them more time for the things they enjoyed, including spending time with family and friends and simple pleasures such as bubble baths. The campaign also drove home the point that by shopping for their various non-grocery purchases, from prescriptions to cosmetics, on the drugstore.com website, they could reduce the number of weekly trips they made to a bricks-and-mortar drugstore.

COMPETITION

Since 1901, when pharmacist Charles R. Walgreen, Sr., opened his drugstore in Chicago, his business goal was always to provide customers what they needed at a good price. By 1910 Walgreen had two stores and a growing customer base. The business continued to expand and had reached 525 stores by 1929. Recognizing the value of advertising to reach customers, Walgreens (as the chain became known) relied on newspapers to carry its ads, but in 1931 the company launched the largest marketing campaign in its history. The effort cost $75,000 and included both print and broadcast advertising. In 2001

Walgreens was the number one drugstore chain in the United States, with $21.1 billion in sales. The company had 3,300 stores and projected opening a total of 425 new stores annually. The company was slow to become an e-tailer, however, falling behind the competition on the Internet. That changed when Walgreens went online in 2000. The launch of the new website, walgreens.com, was supported by a national marketing campaign designed to introduce consumers to Walgreens' new service and build online brand awareness. The campaign was created by Euro RSCG Tatham, Chicago, and included four television spots.

CVS opened its first store in Lowell, Massachusetts, in 1963, offering customers a selection of beauty items and over-the-counter health products. Pharmacies were added to the stores in 1963. By 1970 the chain had grown to 100 stores serving customers in the Northeast. The drugstore chain continued its expansion, and beginning in 1990 growth was driven by acquisitions. In 1990 CVS acquired the 500-store People Drug, which served the Mid-Atlantic states; in 1997 the Revco chain was purchased, adding an additional 2,552 stores in the Midwest and Southeast; and in 1998 Arbor Drugs, with 207 stores in Michigan, was acquired. In 1999 CVS paved the Internet highway for other brick-and-mortar drugstores when the chain became the first fully integrated online pharmacy in the United States. To help promote the new service, CVS signed a multimillion-dollar sponsorship agreement with Microsoft Corp.'s MSN.com. As part of the deal CVS agreed to advertise through the online company's network and to sponsor the MSN Health Channel, MSN WomenCentral's Health, and MSN Hotmail's Pharmacy Quicklink. In return, the Health & Wellness Channel of MSN's e-commerce site, eShop, offered links to CVS.com's various sections. Other marketing for CVS included newspaper circulars and television and radio spots with the tagline "Care that touches everyone, one at a time." The New York office of ad agency Bates USA was responsible for the company's television and radio spots, while print ads were created in-house by a CVS team.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Fallon's "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign for drugstore.com quickly followed the agency's first effort for the health and beauty e-tailer, "Let the Drugstore Come to You," which was a series of television spots that broke during the 1999 holiday season. "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" was an expansion on drugstore.com's effort to establish brand identity, to position the online-only business as a preferred alternative to brick-and-mortar drugstores, and to drive consumers to shop at the site. The campaign began in March 2000 with television and radio spots, special sales promotions, and online advertising. The budget was estimated to be $30 million.

Precampaign research by Fallon identified key markets based on consumers' income, education level, and access to the Internet. Eight metropolitan areas where the campaign would be released were targeted: Boston, New York, Chicago, Denver, Seattle, San Francisco, Austin (Texas), and Washington, D.C. Research also noted that many women with an extra hour in their day would spend it taking a bath, which led to a continuation of Fallon's earlier work for drugstore.com that featured a woman soaking in a bathtub.

Television spots for the new campaign had the busy career woman back in her tub, where she made decisions, helped family and friends, and ordered health and beauty items from drugstore.com while she soaked in a bubble bath. In the first spot the woman was shown running a business meeting from her bathtub and helping one of her staff members by ordering necessary items from drugstore.com via her laptop computer, which was securely resting on a tray across the middle of the tub. A follow-up spot showed the woman chatting with her upset preteen daughter and again turning to her laptop to order products that would make her daughter feel better. The third spot in the series featured the woman hosting a cocktail party from the foamy comfort of her bathtub. The spots aired for the first time during the broadcast of the Academy Awards. Additional network programming during which spots aired included ratings giants Friends, ER, The West Wing, and The Late Show with David Letterman.

Radio spots followed a similar format and aired in the target cities on news/talk stations and on stations that played music ranging from adult contemporary to oldies, jazz, and classic country. Integrated online and off-line efforts included an alliance with Discovery Health Media, a multimedia company consisting of a health-information website (http://health.discovery.com) and the Discovery Health Channel, a new cable channel run by Discovery Communications. The agreement entailed placing drugstore.com advertisements on the Discovery Health website and running television spots not only on the Discovery Health Channel but also on other Discovery cable networks, such as the Learning Channel and the Travel Channel.

OUTCOME

Although drugstore.com's marketing campaign was funded with a limited budget, the effort successfully achieved the goals of increasing brand awareness, reaching its target consumers, and driving business to drugstore.com's website. According to Fallon, in the markets where radio and television spots aired, brand awareness was 52 percent higher than in markets where drugstore.com had not been promoted. Further, brand awareness overall increased to 48 percent in less than one year. Visits to drugstore.com's website increased significantly following the start of the campaign. Just over one year after opening its online business and within one month of the campaign's introduction, drugstore.com reported that it had reached its one-millionth unique paying customer. A review of online health and beauty retailers by Drug Store News noted that visits to drugstore.com's site increased 24 percent through June 2001 compared to the same period the previous year. In 2001 the "A Very Healthy Way to Shop" campaign won a Bronze EFFIE Award in the General Retail/Etail category. Despite the campaign's success and rapidly increasing sales, the company was losing money. In response to the mounting deficit, all off-line media spending was eliminated in July 2000, four months after the campaign began, cutting the total media expenditure to less than $20 million.

FURTHER READING

"Ads Tout Belief in Customer Service (CVS Corp. Advertising Strategy)." Chain Drug Review, December 11, 2000.

Baar, Aaron. "Drugstore.com a Balm for Women in Fallon Ads." Adweek, March 20, 2000.

———. "Online Pharmacy Picks Fallon." Adweek, August 23, 1999.

"CVS.com Complements Brick-and-Mortar Units (CVS Corp. Web Site)." Chain Drug News, December 11, 2000.

"Drugstore.com Achieves One Million Online Shoppers; Passes 'Paying-Customer' Milestone Faster than Key Online Players." Business Wire, April 4, 2000.

"Drugstore.com Donates $25,000 to Charities." Drug Store News, August 6, 2001.

"Drugstore.com Gives Consumers Options." Chain Drug Review, May 1, 2000.

"Drugstore.com Launches Consumer Advertising Campaign Featuring 'Life in the Tub'." Business Wire, March 20, 2000.

Goetzl, David. "Drugstore.com Hunts Supermoms." Advertising Age, March 20, 2000.

Kelly, Jane Irene. "Left Field Drops Amazon, Drugstore.com." Adweek, August 30, 1999.

Kirk, Jim. "Chicago Tribune Marketing Column." Chicago Tribune, February 9, 2001.

Parks, Liz. "Chains Utilize Web Sites as an Aid, Rather than Business Model." Drug Store News, July 23, 2001.

———. "Soft Economy Has Yet to Deter Online Shoppers Completely." Drug Store News, September 24, 2001.

"Walgreens Launches First Marketing Campaign for Walgreens.com." Advertising Age, February 8, 2001.

Rayna Bailey

Dyson Ltd.

Tetbury Hill
Malmesbury, Wiltshire SN16 0RP
United Kingdom
Telephone: 44 870 5275104
Web site: www.dyson.com

■■■

DOESN'T LOSE SUCTION CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

After experiencing years of success in Europe, the high-priced, British-made Dyson vacuum began appearing in the United States in 2002 during a time of recession and a waning U.S. vacuum industry. Nevertheless James Dyson—the vacuum's creator and Dyson Ltd.'s president and spokesman—stood resolute that his filterless, bagless vacuum would succeed stateside. Awarded Dyson's advertising budget in 2002, the ad agency Fallon Worldwide launched the "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign to tote Dyson's superior technology in an industry that, according to Dyson, needed improvement.

With a $14.4 million budget, Fallon released "Doesn't Lose Suction" across television and print during the second week of October 2003. James Dyson appeared in some 30-second television spots while only providing the voice-overs for others. In the first spot James Dyson soberly explained the shortcomings of traditional vacuums, specifically, the clogging of their filters and bags. He then admitted to spending 14 years developing a vacuum that used centrifuge technology to spin the dirt out of air at 100,000 times the force of gravity. Dyson vacuums were easy to empty, never clogged, and boasted more suction power than traditional vacuums. The spot ended with a black-background shot of the new Dyson vacuum.

Soon after the campaign's release Dyson vaulted past its competitors and went from a zero percent market share to being America's top-selling vacuum in 2005. The success of Dyson vacuums, which retailed between $399 and $550, actually increased the entire vacuum industry's price tags, which had previously averaged $95 to $125. "Our goal is to completely change the way vacuums are marketed in the U.S.," Doug Kellam, president of Dyson, Chicago (the company's U.S. headquarters), told Advertising Age. Dyson's marketing involved blatantly stating its technical advantages over the competition and then unflinchingly attaching an exorbitant price tag. Besides increasing Dyson's sales the campaign also snagged a silver EFFIE advertising award in 2005.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1970, while studying at the Royal College of Art, the inventor and designer James Dyson released his first creation, the Sea Truck. His subsequent inventions included a wheelbarrow and a boat ramp that used inflatable balls instead of wheels. He started working on a bagless vacuum cleaner in 1978. Before Dyson decided to market the revolutionary vacuum himself, he approached the Hoover Company in the 1980s with his bagless, filterless vacuum idea. "Hoover wouldn't give it the time of day. They said: 'Bags are best. Bags will always be best.' Then they copied it," the inventor said in The Story of Dyson, a booklet included with every Dyson vacuum.

James Dyson spent 14 years perfecting his vacuum. It used centrifugal force to keep dirt spinning along the inner cylinder's insides while the suction chamber remained unobstructed. The effect was similar to that of a tornado. The first Dyson model, the Dyson Cyclone, was released in the United Kingdom in 1993. The company put almost all profit back into development over the next 12 years, expanding Dyson's team from 3 scientists to 350. In an interview with Advertising Age, Dyson's global marketing director, Clare Mullin, reiterated the company's commitment to development, saying, "We're an engineering-led company, not a marketing-led company." Most of Dyson's European success was attributed to word of mouth.

Many analysts believed Dyson vacuums would flop in America. When the product arrived in 2002, the United States was in a recession, and analysts doubted that consumers would be able to justify spending $429.99 on a vacuum. James Dyson disagreed. Speaking to the Times of London, he explained, "Vacuum cleaners are quite recession-proof because people retrench back into the home. If you look back historically, the sales don't drop at the time of recession." As evidence he mentioned Dyson's strong sales during the United Kingdom's recession in 1993.

According to the Times of London, the company decided to use Fallon as its ad agency because, in the words of James Dyson, "We liked the style, they are educational." Believing that Americans would be drawn to Dyson's technology, Fallon crafted Dyson spots to be instructive. Dyson further explained, "Our ads are never funny, they are almost boring. I think vacuuming is serious and I don't think it's something to joke about." By mid-2005 Dyson and Fallon, citing strategic differences, had discontinued their relationship.

TARGET MARKET

"Doesn't Lose Suction" targeted 30- to 40-year-olds along with a subgroup of allergy sufferers and pet owners. With the latter in mind, Dyson promoted its vacuums at dog and cat shows. One of the product's technological advantages over bag or filter vacuums was its ability to collect fine dust and ash without the particles affecting vacuum suction. "Suction to consumers is very important, and Dyson as a marketer claimed something that resonated with consumers," Bill McLaughlin, executive editor at HomeWorld Business Magazine, told Advertising Age.

Dyson had reportedly spent very little on advertising in Europe, where raves about the vacuum's advantages were spread by word of mouth. But the company took a different approach to America because, as the Times of London stated, "the US is too big a place to rely on conversations over the garden fence." At the end of 2003 Dyson aired television spots across major American network and cable channels. "It's mad for us not to have been here. If we are just half as successful as we have been in Britain, we'll be selling 3.5 million vacuum cleaners," James Dyson told the Times of London.

Before Americans could even buy the vacuum, skeptics claimed that Dyson's price tag would deter consumers. "Dyson is a leading brand in Europe at those high prices, but the American consumer's mentality is price, price, price," Gerry Beatty, a senior editor at Home Furnishings News, told Advertising Age. Dyson vacuums arrived first in American specialty stores and then in Target stores. As the brand's popularity blossomed, its vacuums were sold by Best Buy, Home Depot, and Linens 'N Things. Reflecting upon Dyson's success, Norman Axelrod, chairman and CEO of Linens 'N Things, explained to Advertising Age, "[The Dyson vacuum] becomes our best seller simply because there is something new and something exciting about it, so there is not a resistance to price points."

COMPETITION

When Dyson vacuums first appeared in America in 2002, the Hoover brand, owned by the Maytag Corporation, was leading the American vacuum industry with a 25 percent market share. After an incredible two-year spurt, Dyson knocked Hoover down to a 16 percent market share and claimed 21 percent. Hoover tried scrambling back by releasing vacuums outfitted with the Fusion Cyclonic Filtration System, a technology modeled after Dyson's vacuums. By 2005 Hoover was spending

DYSON'S WASHING MACHINE

James Dyson set out to improve another household appliance: the washing machine. "A lot of the things I used every day irritated me," James Dyson told the Providence Journal. "I wanted to have a go with them." In 1996 James Dyson asked his research team to investigate all factors that might enhance the performance of washing machines. Researchers experimented with detergents, water temperatures, and washing motions. After four months a remarkable fact was uncovered: clothes that were washed by hand for 15 minutes were cleaner than clothes washed inside a washing machine for 67 minutes. The discovery prompted Dyson engineers to design a two-chambered washing machine, later dubbed the CR01, that simulated hand washing.

$47 million on advertising with its new, Dyson-like tagline, "No Loss of Suction." Hoover also released a vacuum model, called WindTunnel, that boasted 56 percent more suction than Dyson. The claim appeared in Hoover's television spots, which were created by Element 79 Partners.

The Louisiana-based Oreck Corporation, manufacturer of upright and canister vacuums, took Dyson to court in 2005 after claiming Dyson's "Doesn't Lose Suction" tagline was "literally false." Dyson countersued with a similar accusation about Oreck's tagline "Maintains Suction Power." Oreck's main advertising push used infomercials and direct mailers, but the company occasionally aired television spots starring David Oreck, the company's founder and spokesperson, on cable and broadcast TV. One 30-second spot in 2005 showed him outfitted as a magician, asking, "Want to make your pet hair magically disappear?" The spot then cut to David Oreck promising that an Oreck vacuum could "clean every rug in your home," while his toupee fluttered from vacuum suction. The spot ended with an owl clinging to the end of his Oreck XL broom. Advertising Age reported that David Oreck venomously attributed Dyson's success to the "superior advertising of an inferior machine."

MARKETING STRATEGY

"Doesn't Lose Suction" spots first aired in October 2003 on network and cable channels such as A&E, Lifetime, HGTV, and TLC. To reach the company's 30- to 40-year-old target market, print ads appeared in conscientious magazines such as Metropolitan Home, Parenting, and O: The Oprah Magazine. Print ads, like the television spots, dwelled on product innovation. One ad read, "While everyone else was fiddling with headlights or stiffer bristles, someone went and reinvented the whole machine."

Initial television spots for the campaign featured either James Dyson or his voice-over convincingly explaining his vacuum's advantages. The campaign's second spot started with the camera panning across sad-looking vacuums from the competition. James Dyson's steady British voice began, "Ever since the vacuum cleaner was invented, it's had a basic design flaw. Bags, filters: they all clog with dust and then lose suction. The technology simply doesn't work." The camera then stopped on Dyson standing, literally, behind his product. He continued, "So I spent 14 years developing one that does. The Dyson Cyclones create 100,000 times the force of gravity to spin the dirt out of the air. So nothing gets clogged—ever."

The "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign employed promotions outside traditional vacuum-industry mediums. Dyson's DC11 canister vacuum appeared in a window display at the upscale department store Barney's New York. As part of Fallon's strategy to target pet owners, Dyson vacuums were given away in competitors' goody bags at the Westminster Dog Show. Similar to what Dyson's brand had experienced in Europe, people in the United States were talking about their Dyson vacuums. Mullin told Advertising Age that all economic groups were "buying it literally because of the performance of the vacuum cleaner." The clear shell and different shape of the Dyson vacuum warranted its exhibit at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art, the Science Museum in London, and the Pompidou Centre in Paris.

In developing the campaign Fallon was challenged to deviate outside traditional vacuum advertising, which included direct mailers and huckster-style television spots. "We knew from the beginning what we didn't want," Michael Hart, copywriter and group creative director at Fallon, told Brandweek. "No dancing moms vacuuming. No long-haired cats shedding in the background. No bowling balls being sucked up. Just the vacuum, the man who invented it and why it's better."

Dyson increased measured media spending from $755,200 in 2002 to $14.4 million by 2003. In 2004 Dyson continued increasing its advertising budget, bringing the sum to $16.1 million in the first seven months. During the "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign Dyson released new models, such as the DC15, a machine that employed an inflatable ball for a more agile wheelbase. James Dyson continued providing the voice-overs for the DC15 spots. "James does a very good job of being himself on camera," Mike Gibbs, group creative director at Fallon, told Advertising Age.

OUTCOME

Defying industry analysts, excelling from zero U.S. market share to U.S. market leader in three years, and revolutionizing one of the world's most popular appliances, Dyson underwent an incredible amount of growth during its "Doesn't Lose Suction" campaign. "They have a radically different thing going . . . It's a great new brand," David Lubars, president and executive creative director at Fallon, told Adweek. The campaign also earned a silver EFFIE award in the Household Furnishings and Appliances category in 2005.

Many critics praised the campaign for its frank, confident delivery, which portrayed James Dyson as a man so moved by his own invention that he himself believed Americans would be compelled to buy it after hearing his explanation. The approach, according to Dyson, not only worked but also prodded the entire vacuum industry to improve hardware and advertising. David Oreck, the founder of Dyson's fierce competitor Oreck, agreed with this assessment, telling Advertising Age that Dyson's strategy of focusing on its vacuums' technology instead of on price points had helped America's vacuum industry to undergo a "constructive" change.

FURTHER READING

Arditi, Lynn. "Filling a Vacuum—Inventor Brings Good Design Home." Providence (RI) Journal, May 6, 2005, p. F1.

Baar, Aaron. "Fallon to Bow Dyson." Adweek, July 22, 2002, p. 6.

Cuneo, Alice. "Dyson Takes On Vacuum Giants: $15M Push for High-Priced Cleaner." Advertising Age, October 13, 2003, p. 6.

———. "No. 2 in Market Share: Dyson Hoovers Up Vacuum Business." Advertising Age, December 4, 2004, p. 1.

Elliot, Stuart. "And Now, the Awards for the Best and Worst Commercials during the Oscar Broadcast." New York Times, March 2, 2005, p. 5.

Frazier, Mya. "You Suck: Dyson, Hoover and Oreck Trade Accusations in Court, on TV as Brit Upstart Leaves Rivals in Dust." Advertising Age, July 25, 2005, p. 1.

Garfield, Bob. "Dyson Ad Succeeds by Saying Precisely How Product Sucks." Advertising Age, December 6, 2004, p. 37.

———. "10 Ads I Loved." Advertising Age, December 20, 2004, p. 14.

Gemperlein, Joyce. "Vacuums, Sweeping Us Away: Eager Consumers Get Sucked Up in the Marketing Frenzy." Washington Post, August 7, 2005, p. 5.

Homan, Becky. "A Minute of Your Time: Trends, Tidbits." Akron (OH) Beacon Journal, July 9, 2005, p. 15.

Palmer, Camilla. "MCBD Resigns Dyson after Creative Clashes." Campaign, November 15, 2002, p. 5.

Rayner, Abigail. "Dyson Prepares to Clean Up as He Enters American Vacuum." Times (London), October 4, 2002, p. 29.

Reinan, John. "Fallon Agency Snags Several Effie Awards." (Minneapolis, MN) Star-Tribune, June 8, 2005, p. 2D.

Kevin Teague

Eastman Kodak Company

343 State Street
Rochester, New York 14650-0002
USA
Telephone: (800) 698-3324
Telephone: (585) 724-4000
Fax: (585) 724-1089
Web site: www.kodak.com

■■■

ADVANTIX CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

Eastman Kodak Company ran one of the largest advertising campaigns in its history to publicize the Advanced Photo System (APS), a new type of camera, film, and related products developed jointly by Kodak and a number of competitors. Kodak's APS cameras were designed primarily to make photography easier for the snapshooter, the consumer who took pictures to remember birthdays and other such occasions.

Because the public was still confused about APS after an initial marketing campaign in 1996, the company hired ad agency Ogilvy & Mather of New York to design new advertising for 1997 to explain the advantages of APS products. These commercials ran until they were replaced by the next phase of APS promotions, which began in the summer of 1998. Kodak spent far more than its competitors to promote APS, which helped consumers equate APS with Advantix, the Kodak brand of APS products.

The 1997 "Advantix" television campaign ran in two stages. The first was a spot that asked, "Can your camera do this?" and then explained three of an Advantix camera's innovative features; drop-in film loading, choice of three picture sizes, and an index print. The second stage consisted of three humorous scenarios, one for each special feature of the Advantix system, which showed photographers experiencing problems they could have avoided if they had used APS. One spot, for example, showed an elderly woman who had fulfilled her lifelong dream of having her picture taken in front of the Eiffel Tower. When she had the pictures developed, she was horrified to see that the photographer had cropped off most of her head so that the tower would fit into the picture. The ad concluded, "She should've had a Kodak Advantix camera with three picture sizes for better pictures."

The campaign also included print advertisements that illustrated the three distinctive features of APS products. Each ad displayed color photographs against a Kodak yellow background and was accompanied by a brief explanation of one of the features and of Kodak's general corporate signature, "Take Pictures. Further."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In helping to develop the Advanced Photo System to make photography easier for the average consumer, Kodak was staying true to its roots. The company had been founded in 1888 on the slogan "You push the button, we do the rest." Kodak had a history of introducing new products, including photographic equipment and supplies, projectors, and copiers. In 1997 Kodak was a multinational corporation with nearly 100,000 employees, one of the 25 largest companies in the United States.

The "Tall Tales" commercials ran in the same year as the first ads to promote the new Advantix camera. The initial campaign, launched in February 1996, was designed by J. Walter Thompson, which had been Kodak's primary ad agency for more than 60 years. The commercials opened with the customary Kodak moment, as when a bearded hippie admired a spectacular mountain vista and commented, "Some people see mountains. I see personalities." After the point had been made that every photographer captured pictures from a unique point of view, the voice-over said, "Now Kodak introduces a new technology that will let you take those pictures further than you've ever imagined." The commercial concluded by summarizing the three innovative features of APS cameras and film.

In 1997, when J. Walter Thompson was replaced by Ogilvy & Mather, the "Advantix" campaign began. Kodak had invested a great deal of money in researching and developing APS, and it allocated $100 million to promote Advantix products worldwide.

SPILLOVER EFFECTS

Although the "Advantix" campaign focused on just one of Kodak's products, it helped increase overall sales. One reason for the company's success was its family orientation and reputation for trustworthiness. Its advertising traditionally revolved around the "Kodak moment," an emotional portrait of a consumer capturing a heartwarming experience on film. This had helped Kodak cultivate a wholesome image, but research showed that the company was not particularly appealing to younger consumers. In 1996 Ogilvy & Mather tried a new angle with its humorous "Tall Tales" commercials that portrayed unconventional uses for various Kodak products. For instance, one ad featured a consumer using Kodak's Image Magic digital enhancement station to disguise the dents in a Gremlin automobile. The campaign was well received, particularly among young adults.

TARGET MARKET

Kodak believed that its core customers would take more pictures of a broader range of subjects if they were provided with cameras, film, and other merchandise that would make photography easier. The company wanted to attract new customers but was primarily interested in appealing to those who were already familiar with its products. A large percentage of Kodak's customers were mothers who took pictures during birthday parties, holiday celebrations, vacations, and other family occasions. Kodak's previous advertising had focused on this type of situation, but as its customers became more adept at photography, the company's commercials featured a wider variety of possibilities.

Although many customers had learned how to use the more complex 35-mm equipment that had been their best option before the advent of the Advanced Photo System, they were not particularly interested in creating professional-looking photographs. Instead, they wanted convenient equipment that was easy to use and would produce pictures of good quality. It was thought that they would appreciate the compact size of the Advantix cameras, the "foolproof" drop-in loading that would help them avoid frustrating mechanical problems, and the choice of three picture sizes for each shot. In addition, they would welcome the index print, which, like a proof sheet, showed miniature replicas of each shot on the roll of film. The index print would allow users to see what they were getting when they ordered reprints without having to deal with negatives. The marketing campaign pointed out each of these advantages in a simple way that could be grasped by watching a 30-second television commercial or by reading a few sentences in a print ad.

COMPETITION

Each of the five companies—Kodak, Canon U.S.A., Minolta, Nikon, and Fuji Photo Film U.S.A.—that cooperated in developing the Advanced Photo System had its own brand of APS products, and they were designed to meet the needs of somewhat different target markets. In general, all provided the three basic APS features, and Fuji also introduced a line of APS film. Kodak's Advantix camera tended to be slightly less expensive than some of the other APS brands and was generally easier for snapshooters to use. Consumers did not have the option of changing lenses with the Advantix camera, but it did have a built-in zoom lens.

In contrast, one of Canon's four APS cameras, the EOS IX, was designed to accept more than 50 lenses and hundreds of accessories. The company also introduced the credit card-size ELPH, the world's smallest shutter camera with a 2x zoom lens. The ELPH had several sophisticated features, including an active autofocusing mode that used an infrared emitter and sensor and a passive mode that could discern variations in contrast. Another model, the Canon ELPH 490Z, featured a 4x zoom lens. In television commercials a woman with an elfin air about her inquired, "Have you seen the ELPH?" as a series of ultracompact cameras floated past. The ads ended with the tag line "It's so advanced . . . it's simple." Another Canon slogan said, "ELPH: the big name in the Advanced Photo System."

During 1997 Fuji offered rebates of up to $15 to develop and print a roll of its Fujicolor SmartFilm when customers purchased certain Fujifilm Endeavor APS cameras. To publicize the rebates, the company ran a full-page ad in USA Today and other ads in 15 key markets. The campaign was launched in September 1997 to coincide with holidays such as Thanksgiving and Christmas. In addition to promotional efforts for its APS films, Fuji expanded its network of photographic laboratories in Europe and the United States and offered digital imaging services. Fuji's net sales increased 12 percent in 1997.

Minolta and Nikon also advertised their cameras and accessories, but Kodak spent far more to publicize APS than did all the other companies combined. In addition to its "Advantix" campaigns, Kodak participated in co-op ads with the other companies to educate the public about APS.

Kodak's $100 million budget to advertise Advantix products amounted to about 85 percent of the total all five companies spent to publicize APS products in 1997. Fuji initially allocated about $13 million, twice its previous ad budget, to promote its SmartFilm brand. Minolta allocated $10 million, about 150 percent of its previous ad budget, to promote its Vectis brand of APS products. Kodak's total spending on advertising in 1994, just before APS was introduced, was $65.4 million. In 1997 the company budgeted about $60 million for advertising Advantix in the United States alone.

MARKETING STRATEGY

At the end of the 1996 campaign introducing the Advanced Photo System equipment and film, consumers still seem confused. As a result, Ogilvy & Mather introduced the "Can Your Camera Do This?" spot. The 1997 round of ads was intended primarily to promote the Advantix brand and only secondarily APS. The challenge was to communicate the basics of a new, complex technology in print ads and television commercials.

In April 1997 Kodak began airing television ads that asked, "Can your camera do this?" They stressed the three features of Advantix cameras—drop-in film loading, the choice of three picture sizes, and an index print. This first phase of the campaign was designed to explain the functional benefits of APS.

The next series of television ads were humorous, depicting common problems that photographers could eliminate by using Advantix products. The print ads gave more details. For example, one television spot showed a couple who were having a reprint made so that they could enter the photo in a cute-baby contest but who chose the wrong negative and inadvertently submitted a picture of a chubby grown-up. The commercial ended with the line "They should've had the Kodak Advantix system with an index print so you can see what you're ordering." The corresponding print ad showed an example of an index print and included explanatory text: "Choosing your favorite smile is a lot easier when you can actually see the smile. When Kodak Advantix film is processed, your pictures come back with the negatives in their original film cassette and with an index print that gives you a miniature version of every shot. Ordering reprints is easy, and you can get them in any of the three sizes. So no more squinting at negatives, trying to tell a grimace from a grin."

The broadcast ads were aired on network, cable, and syndicated television programs, particularly during the Academy Awards and the coverage of the Winter Olympics in Nagano, Japan. In addition to the United States, they ran in the United Kingdom and in other countries. In non-U.S. markets the "Can your camera do this?" spots were shown more often than the humorous ads. The print ads ran primarily in consumer magazines in the United States. Some appeared in publications that focused on new parents and travel so as to reach readers who were likely to be taking more than the average number of photographs. The ads also appeared in general-interest magazines and in various other publications.

The ads highlighting the three features of the Advantix camera ran into the summer of 1998, when the next stage of the promotion began. Kodak's promotion of Advantix products and APS had been designed to encompass several years, allowing the company to expand gradually on the basic message.

OUTCOME

Kodak and Ogilvy & Mather analyzed the public's reaction to the campaign and found that it scored high on every positive indicator. When asked to tell what they recalled about the advertisements, people were able to repeat the words almost exactly. One of the spots was included on Adweek's list of the best ads of 1997. During 1997 Kodak saw strong growth for its other merchandise as well, in part because of the promotion of such products as Max film and Goldfilm.

FURTHER READING

Cardona, Mercedes M. "Kodak Media-Buying Biz Follows Creative to O&M." Advertising Age, June 23, 1997.

Enrico, Dottie. "Kodak Campaign Clicks, Develops Tech-Savvy Image." USA Today, September 16, 1996.

Garfield, Bob. "Kodak's Split Image Lights Up Advantix." Advertising Age, February 1, 1996.

"Kodak Ends an Era, Calls It Quits with JWT." Advertising Age, June 17, 1997.

Wilke, Michael. "Kodak, JWT Snap Closer with Advantix Push." Advertising Age, February 5, 1996.

———. "Kodak Tries Humorous Tack in $60 Mil Advantix Effort: Ads Strive to Create Human Attachment to New Tech." Advertising Age, June 9, 1997.

Susan Risland

THE BEST PART OF PHOTOGRAPHY IS THE PRINTS CAMPAIGN

A still from "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign. EASTMAN KODAK. REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION.

OVERVIEW

One of the most successful brands in the history of the United States, Eastman Kodak Company, whose founder had invented popular photography in the 1880s, was slipping as it entered the twenty-first century. Although it was a pioneer in the development of digital photography, Kodak had continued to focus on its highly profitable film products, conceding much of the digital-photography market to a host of competitors. Realizing it was falling behind, the company in 2003 decided to concentrate on its digital lines. To promote Kodak's easy-to-use printing systems—which were available through either self-service kiosks or camera docks that connected to a personal computer—Kodak and its advertising agency, Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, launched a campaign in 2004 titled "The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints."

The campaign's print and television advertisements played off the question "Where are my pictures?"—touching upon the frustrations many digital-camera users encountered when trying to get hard copies of the photos they had taken. The commercials targeted women, who, according to market research, took the vast majority of family pictures and maintained the family photo albums.

The "Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign won a 2005 EFFIE award and helped Kodak to increase the sales of its digital lines. But as the sale of traditional film products eroded further, the company continued to struggle financially. In the hopes of reestablishing its prominent position in the shifting photography marketplace, the company in 2005 replaced the campaign with a new marketing effort promoting Kodak's cutting-edge digital cameras.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Kodak had essentially invented the amateur photography industry in the 1880s, when bank clerk George Eastman founded the Eastman Dry Plate and Film Company and introduced the first Kodak brand camera. From the start the company proved to be a savvy marketer, as evidenced by its initial slogan, "You press the button—we do the rest." While Kodak made money from the sale of cameras and especially from its film, over the decades the company wisely associated itself with the picture-taking process and lifestyle rather than with the merchandise—which included many innovative items, such as the $1 Brownie camera in 1900 (with film costing 15 cents a roll), the world's first true color negative film in 1942, and the Instamatic camera in 1963. Kodak embraced television advertising early on, establishing fruitful relationships with television stars such as Ozzie and Harriet Nelson, variety show host Ed Sullivan, and sitcom actor Dick Van Dyke. The company later employed campaigns urging consumers to put "open me first" cards on Christmas presents containing Kodak cameras so that pictures could be taken when the rest of the presents were opened. Kodak's marketing triumphs peaked in the early 1990s, when it tapped into the vernacular phrase "Kodak moment" to promote its cameras and film. But with the rise of digital photography people began to seriously question whether Kodak's moment had come and gone.

Ironically, although Kodak was a pioneer in digital camera technology, garnering a number of key patents, the general public was mostly unaware of these accomplishments. The company, failing to anticipate how quickly digital technology would surpass traditional cameras and film, allowed a number of companies, some with no association with cameras at all, to stake significant claims in the growing new market.

In the mid-1990s Kodak dropped its longtime advertising agency, J. Walter Thompson Company, in favor of Ogilvy & Mather and attempted a corporate makeover to appeal to younger consumers. But Kodak still gave short shrift to digital photography by continuing to emphasize traditional photography and film, especially in China and in developing countries in Eastern Europe. Revenues began to erode, declining four years in a row by 2003, and the price of Kodak stock followed suit. The company found itself at a crossroads: it could either remain in the high-profit-margin film business or fully commit to digital technology, where margins were lower and, like those of all high-tech electronics, dropping. To complicate matters, Kodak lacked the reputation in digital it had enjoyed for so many years in traditional photography.

In September 2003 the company announced it was casting its lot with digital technology. Money that had gone to promoting the film business in developed markets would instead be directed toward selling such technologies as ink-jet printers and high-end digital printing. A large number of digital-camera users were not making prints of their photographs, but Kodak believed that eventually they would see the value of having hard copies. Sensing an opportunity, the company decided to emphasize its kiosk printers and home-printing camera docks, which became the focal point of the campaign, titled ''The Best Part of Photography Is the Prints.'' In a larger sense, however, Kodak wanted to position itself as a player in the entire digital process, from capturing the image to outputting it.

DON'T MESS WITH THE CLOTHES

The founder of the Eastman Kodak Company, George Eastman, was a frugal bank bookkeeper whose only extravagance was photographic equipment, which at the time included heavy glass plates and chemicals. According to lore, during a vacation he made the mistake of packing the chemicals along with his clothes, which were ruined by a leak. Disgruntled by the wet-plate process that had cost him part of his wardrobe, he examined the new dry-plate process—which had emerged only a few years earlier—and soon perfected a longer-lasting version. Eastman next eliminated the glass altogether, coating paper with gelatin and photographic emulsion and rolling it on a spool. He then invented a simple camera to use the film. He called it the Kodak, a word without meaning but one that quickly became associated with popular photography.

TARGET MARKET

While in general Kodak's ''Best Part of Photography Is the Prints'' campaign was aimed at all digital-camera users, the company had a more specific target in mind: wives and mothers. Kodak research had revealed that 70 to 80 percent of family pictures were taken by women. Moreover women were generally the keepers of family memories and maintained the photo albums. It was with women in mind that the company had earlier introduced its EasyShare system, which included a camera, software, and an easy-to-use dock for transferring pictures to a computer. Later it offered an EasyShare printer dock, which allowed photos to be printed straight from a camera, without using a computer. The company said that women generally placed the printer dock in the kitchen and often took it with them as a party printer. But as Carl E. Gustin, Jr., Kodak's chief marketing officer, explained to Claudia H. Deutsch of the New York Times, the company also realized that the target customer would want a printing option that did not involve owning a home ink-jet printer. He stated, ''So if digital photography and printing is going to be a truly mass phenomenon, then self-service retail has to be a big part of it.'' Thus promoting Kodak's kiosks at retail stores was also a priority for the company and the new marketing campaign.

According to Beth Snyder Bulik, writing for Advertising Age, the target audience was ''women, ranging from teens to grandmothers.'' Because consumers in the younger demographic tended to E-mail pictures to one another and to view Kodak as a stodgy brand, the company had decided not to pursue this group aggressively. Nevertheless Kodak also hoped to begin connecting with young people by promoting its cutting-edge technology. For example, Kodak possessed high-definition OLED (organic light-emitting diode) display technology, which allowed for thinner cameras and mobile phones with picture-taking capabilities. The company was optimistic that when tech-savvy members of the younger generation began to realize the implications of this and other Kodak innovations, they would begin to change their view of the brand.

COMPETITION

Kodak faced competition in the digital arena on a number of fronts. Its digital cameras competed against established camera companies, such as Canon, Fuji, Minolta, and Olympus, but also against newcomers, such as Hewlett-Packard, LG Electronics, Nokia, Samsung, and Sony. All of the latter group had arrived in the photography market via their successes in digital technology and had the deep pockets to support aggressive marketing campaigns. On the home-printing front Kodak's main competitor was market leader Hewlett-Packard (although Kodak led in the sale of the ink-jet paper on which digital photos were printed).

Digital pictures that were saved on memory cards and CDs could also be dropped off like film rolls at a local photo shop or drugstore counter for processing, but increasingly consumers were turning to do-it-yourself digital-photo kiosks where pictures could be selected, edited, and printed on the spot. It was in this category that Kodak was able to leverage its brand to establish itself as a major player in the digital-photography industry. It forged alliances with drugstore chains, such as CVS in the United States and Boots in the United Kingdom, and with superstores, such as Wal-Mart and Target. Nevertheless kiosks remained a competitive sector, the direct competition coming from the likes of Polaroid, Olympus, PMI/KIS, IBM, Mitsubishi, Sony, and a host of smaller companies.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Kodak continued to follow its century-long strategy of playing up the lifestyle of taking pictures rather than the cameras or film themselves. The difference was that digital products were made the priority, and Kodak allocated the necessary resources to promote them. According to TNS Media Intelligence, out of the $109 million Kodak spent in 2004 on measured media (that is, TV, radio, and print), $71 million was devoted to digital cameras, home-printing solutions, and self-service kiosks. The thrust of the "Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign, composed of both television and print elements, was on ease of use, in particular in printing digital photos. This was a market, unlike digital cameras, where Kodak could truly use the strength of its brand to its advantage. In a three-month companion campaign developed by HSR Business to Business, Cincinnati, the Kodak Professional unit promoted its line of digital-photo printers through print ads aimed at professional photographers.

Nicola Bell, worldwide executive group director at Ogilvy & Mather, told Claudia H. Deutsch of the New York Times, "Our research shows that even people who love their digital cameras are still frustrated about how to get prints." The strategy of the new television spots was relatively straightforward. "We have to position the kiosks as friendly little machines that guarantee good, long-lived pictures," Bell explained.

Writing for Advertising Age, Beth Snyder Bulik maintained that the strategy of the new campaign could be encapsulated in the question asked in each ad: "Where are my pictures?" She interviewed Pierre Schaeffer, Kodak's vice president and director of business strategy and marketing services, who said that many people could relate to the catchphrase, adding, "There has been a brainwashing in digital cameras that suggests you need to be a computer expert. We try to break that image . . .' You press a button, we do the rest. We're the experts in photography, you don't have to be.' "

The "Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign broke in late May 2004. In the new TV spots Kodak customers talked about how they loved digital photography but lamented the fact that they never actually got their photos printed. One commercial featured the EasyShare digital camera and printer dock. Another promoted the picture maker kiosk. In the International Herald Tribune, Deutsch described the commercials as featuring "a panoply of people—young and old, male and female, black and white and Asian—professing love for their digital cameras. Then it pans to one young man crying plaintively, 'Where are my pictures?' The answer, of course, is readily at hand—if he would only go to his local self-service kiosk and make them." Other TV spots focused on consumers using the EasyShare printer dock at home.

The campaign's print ads also divided their focus between the self-service kiosks and the easy-to-use home printer dock. Other aspects of the campaign included monthly educational E-mail newsletters, a holiday mailing, and booths at NASCAR races.

OUTCOME

Kodak's Schaeffer told Advertising Age that the different elements of the company's "Best Part of Photography Is the Prints" campaign "all paid off big-time." Kodak gained U.S. market share on Sony, improving from 15.3 to 18.3 percent in the first half of 2004. On the kiosk side of the business, Kodak was enjoying tremendous growth, due in large measure to advertising and to the distribution of Kodak kiosks throughout the marketplace. Not to be discounted, however, was the quality of the product, which ranked at or near the top of the three different categories defined by the Digital Imaging Marketing Association: stand-alone units, kiosks linked to remote printing equipment, and combination kiosks that could either print locally or send files to a remote digital-photo minilab for development. Also of great importance was that an increasing number of people were turning to kiosks for their prints. According to market research about 39 percent of digital-camera users tried kiosks in 2004 compared with 28 percent in 2003. The campaign also garnered recognition for Ogilvy & Mather, which won a bronze in the Consumer Electronics category at the 2005 EFFIE Awards, given out annually by the New York American Marketing Association in recognition of the year's most effective advertising campaigns.

Kodak made strides in positioning itself in the digital marketplace in 2004, and its digital sales were growing at a strong clip, but the traditional film business was slipping even faster than expected, putting additional pressure on Kodak's marketers to promote the digital lines to make up for shrinking film sales. In the first quarter of 2005 Kodak generated sales of $2.83 billion, down from the $2.92 billion it had reported for the same period a year earlier. In the second quarter the company suffered a net loss of $143 million. Ogilvy & Mather's next major market effort, launched in 2005, pursued the theme "Keep it forever. Keep it Kodak," another attempt to retain Kodak's connection to the past while portraying the company as an innovator. In addition Kodak was undergoing a large makeover that ranged from revamping product design and styling to updating operating systems.

FURTHER READING

Bulik, Beth Snyder. "Kodak EasyShare." Advertising Age, November 2004, p. S2.

———. "Kodak Scores with Digital Cameras but Film-Biz Losses Cloud Big Pictures." Advertising Age, April 25, 2005, p. 4.

———. "Sony, Kodak Lead U.S. Battle for Share in Digital Cameras." Advertising Age, May 31, 2004, p. 12.

Denn, Rebekah. "Digital Photo Kiosks Are Dandy, but Not All Are Created Equal." Seattle Post-Intelligence, November 30, 2004.

Deutsch, Claudia H. "Get the Pictures?" International Herald Tribune, July 21, 2004, p. 16.

———. "The Post-film Photo Industry Promotes Kiosks for Turning Digital Images into Print." New York Times, July 20, 2004, p. C9.

Howard, Theresa. "Kodak Ads Build Up Its Digital Image." USA Today, August 18, 2005.

Jardine, Alexandra. "Is This a Kodak Moment?" Marketing, October 13, 2004, p. 28.

Wasserman, Todd. "Kodak Focuses on Processing." Brandweek, May 24, 2004, p. 15.

Ed Dinger

TAKE PICTURES. FURTHER. CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the mid-1990s the Eastman Kodak Company was not just the leading manufacturer of photographic film, paper, and chemicals; it was listed as one of the top companies in America. In both 1996 and 1997 the stock-market researcher EquiTrend selected Kodak as the number one brand for quality in the United States. At that time digital photography had not yet reached critical mass, and Kodak wanted to promote its new Kodak Advantix Photo System. Advantix was pitched as an "error-free, drop-in film" that allowed consumers to download film images onto a computer. At the same time camera makers such as Canon Inc. and Sony Corporation were developing digital cameras. Hoping to brand Kodak for a younger market and promote Advantix, Kodak released its "Take Pictures. Further" campaign.

The television, radio, outdoor, and print campaign was funded by Kodak's $100 million marketing budget and debuted in April 1996. Created by the ad agency Ogilvy & Mather of New York, the campaign was separated into different executions. "Anthem" consisted of five 60- and 30-second spots with the actor Luke Perry repeatedly answering the question "What can a picture be?" The second execution, titled "Tall Tales," featured two 60-second commercials that each told a story through images. Campaign spots that were not connected to "Anthem" or "Tall Tales" aired later. The headline in an advertisement in People magazine asked, "Isn't it time you had a new box to keep your pictures in?" A second magazine ad featured a photograph of workers mining vivid yellow sulfur on a steaming volcano. The text explained that Kodak Ektachrome Elite II amateur slide film could capture vibrant, pure colors under varying light conditions. The campaign officially ended in March 2001.

"Take Pictures. Further" began just as digital photography was entering the mainstream culture. Advantix was not as popular as Kodak had expected. From 1999 to 2001 the company's sales dropped from $14.1 billion to $13.2 billion. Because the campaign branded Kodak with film technologies instead of emerging digital technologies, the advertising community blamed it for outdating the Kodak brand while digital photography blossomed.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Kodak traced its roots to Eastman Dry Plate Company, founded in 1880 by George Eastman and Henry Strong. Dry plates represented a significant improvement over the chemically treated wet plates of glass that photographers had previously used to expose one picture at a time in their cameras, a procedure that required considerable expertise. In 1884 the company patented the first roll film, a long strip of paper coated with emulsion that was sensitive to light. In 1888 Eastman began marketing the Kodak, a portable box camera that cost $25 and was loaded with enough film for 100 pictures. The invention of this type of camera and film was important in the growth of the motion-picture industry, and it opened the field of photography to amateurs.

Emphasizing that its new cameras were simple enough for the average consumer to use, Eastman Company advertised with the slogan "You push the button, we do the rest." At the turn of the century the firm increased its mass-market appeal by introducing a small Kodak camera called the Brownie at the inexpensive price of $1. By that time the enterprise was known as Eastman Kodak Company. Among its many noteworthy innovations were the introduction of color film in 1935 and the launch of the Kodak Instamatic camera in 1963. Ease of use remained a primary theme in the company's marketing efforts. "Kodak Instamatic Cameras load instantly! Automatically shoot and take sharp, clear pictures time after time!" said an advertisement in Good Housekeeping. "No threading. No fumbling. No rewinding."

With a market share that averaged 60 to 70 percent, Kodak led the industry for decades. By 1997 it was one of the 25 largest companies in the United States. Its products included photography equipment and supplies, film, projectors, and copiers. Units such as Sterling Drug had been acquired over the years but were divested in the early 1990s as part of a general overhaul that focused the company on imaging products. During the late 1990s the firm kept up with changing technology by rapidly expanding and improving its digital equipment and services. These innovations allowed consumers to store their photographs on compact or floppy disks, view them and alter them on computer screens, and transmit them over the Internet. Kodak offered numerous state-of-the-art products and services, and it formed marketing alliances with companies such as America Online and Intel Corporation to encourage customers to use their photographs in new ways.

Over the years Kodak had cultivated a family-oriented image with advertising that revolved around the "Kodak moment," a portrait of a consumer capturing a heartwarming experience on film. Many people were not aware, however, that Kodak offered more than film and cameras. In addition, research showed that consumers thought the company was old-fashioned. In 1996 Kodak released the "Take Pictures. Further" campaign to change its image and to publicize its many products along with the possibilities they offered to consumers.

TARGET MARKET

Kodak had cultivated a loyal following among consumers at least 35 years old, but it was not particularly appealing to most younger people. The new corporate-image campaign was intended to retain Kodak's traditional customers while reaching teenagers and young adults, with a particular emphasis on consumers who were interested in mastering the most recent technologies. The first advertisements to use the "Take Pictures. Further" theme were aimed at the parents (ages 25 to 55) of school-age children, at young adults who used computers and had a college education (ages 18 to 34), and at business managers and department heads (ages 35 to 64). These ads promoted products such as Image Magic service, which allowed consumers to crop and enlarge their photographs using Advantix, and the Fun Saver, a camera designed to be used only one time. Later advertisements also showcased innovative products. "Introducing the easiest way to get your pictures into your PC. The new Kodak Advantix film drive," said a magazine ad that ran in 1998.

Some advertisements targeted the company's core clientele of snap shooters 25 to 54 years old, primarily women, who took pictures to remember events such as birthday parties and family vacations. Kodak had become the industry leader by making it easy for people to take good photographs, and as the company introduced digital cameras and other innovations, its advertising assured consumers that photography would still be easy and more fun than ever. One advertisement in Travel & Leisure promoted Kodak Max film with the headline "I don't care about f-stops. I don't care about shutter speeds. I just want to take a picture." The ad showed three badly exposed photographs labeled "Before Kodak Max" and three correctly exposed photographs labeled "After Kodak Max."

By showing new ways for people to enjoy their photographs, Kodak encouraged its customers to do more with their pictures than toss them in a drawer or file them away in a photo album. Of the 70 to 80 billion photographs that Americans snapped each year, only 2 percent were reprinted or enlarged. The "Take Pictures. Further" campaign urged consumers to use new technology such as E-mail to share photographs with their families and friends, to incorporate more photographs into documents created on their computers, and to improve photographs by altering their appearance. In addition to promoting Kodak's digital products and services, the campaign was intended to revive interest in traditional film and cameras by explaining the many ways that average people could work with visual images.

KODAK.COM

Kodak's home page on the Internet (http://www.kodak.com) was redesigned in 1998 with easier navigation and expanded content. It included a new section called "Further," which targeted consumers who were adept at using the latest technology. It was one of the few marketing efforts by Kodak in 1998 that connected Kodak's brand to digital photography. The website section explained how consumers could use digital photography, animation, and other innovations. Kodak.com also contained articles for general audiences. The site had been launched in 1995, received more than 66 million page views in 1997, and consisted of more than 25,000 pages by 1998.

COMPETITION

One of Kodak's primary rivals was a company with headquarters in Japan, Fuji Photo Film U.S.A. Both Kodak and Fuji made film and photographic papers for professionals and amateurs, both firms had acquired large film processing companies nationwide to increase their share of the photo-finishing market, and both had begun manufacturing products such as digital cameras to compete in the emerging field of digital technology. Fuji had earned a reputation for low prices and high quality. In the spring of 1997 it suddenly slashed the price of its film, saying that one of its largest distributors had switched to Kodak and left Fuji with 2.5 million rolls of excess film to sell. During that summer Kodak's film sometimes cost as much as 30 percent more than Fuji's. According to Brandweek, Kodak's share of the $3 billion U.S. film market slipped from 85 percent in 1988 to about 70 percent by the summer of 1997 and 65 percent by June 1998. Fuji had about 15 percent of the film market in 1998, up from 10 percent in 1996, and it also controlled about 15 percent of the photo-finishing market. Lacking the brand loyalty that Kodak had cultivated over the years, Fuji attempted to strengthen its corporate brand image in 1998 with an advertising campaign that used bright colors, surreal scenes, and the slogan "You can see the future from here."

Kodak also competed with companies that made cameras and related products. In 1998 Canon U.S.A. promoted its Advanced Photo System camera, the ELPH, with the tagline "So advanced . . . it's simple." The company's "Wildlife as Canon Sees It" series of magazine ads featured large, beautiful photographs of wildlife above text that characterized each animal and mentioned Canon's efforts to protect endangered species. Each ad included a small photograph and description of a Canon product. Another camera maker, Pentax Corporation, asked, "Aren't your pictures worth a Pentax?" The campaign showed customers explaining that they had been able to take spectacular photographs thanks to certain features on their Pentax cameras. Minolta Corporation continued its "Only from the Mind of Minolta" campaign, while Olympus America Inc. used the slogan "Focus on Life."

MARKETING STRATEGY

Kodak had been using 200 advertising agencies worldwide but reduced that number to 4 during a general restructuring of its marketing program in 1994 and 1995. The company then increased its advertising expenditures for film, cameras, and its first image campaign. Kodak's U.S. advertising budget was $65.4 million in 1994, $82 million in 1995, and about $100 million from 1996 through 1998. Each of the four agencies (Ogilvy & Mather, J. Walter Thompson, Uniworld, and Saatchi & Saatchi) promoted a specific group of products, with the separate advertising campaigns all using the new slogan "Take Pictures. Further." Ogilvy & Mather was responsible for the overall corporate-image effort. Kodak's trademark yellow served as the dominant color in the advertisements, helping to unify the brand message. In print ads the tagline was positioned beside or below the red and yellow Kodak logo, often near the address of the company's home page on the Internet, which was also designed around the "Take Pictures. Further" theme.

OUTDOOR ADVERTISING

The "Take Pictures. Further" theme was used in the Kodak Image Expo at the 1996 Olympic Games and on kiosks and signs at Turner Field, the ballpark of the Atlanta Braves professional baseball team.

The tagline first appeared in advertisements designed by J. Walter Thompson to publicize Kodak's new Advantix camera and accessories, which were launched in April 1996. Ogilvy & Mather handled the Advantix campaign in 1997 and 1998, still using the "Take Pictures. Further" slogan. Ads for Advantix products explained that the camera could take pictures in three sizes, that it featured drop-in film loading, and that the consumer received an index print when the film was developed. In 1997 Kodak spent about $60 million to advertise the Advantix brand in the United States. Ogilvy & Mather also created the "Tall Tales" execution, which had a budget of $20 to $40 million and ran during 1996 and 1997. These humorous scenarios, which aired on television and at movie theaters, showed people using products and services such as Kodak Gold and Max films and Kodak premium processing. One spot showed a young man accidentally photographing a flying saucer, then being pursued by government agents and rescued by space aliens. In another spot a consumer used Kodak's Image Magic digital enhancement station to hide the dents in a photograph of a Gremlin automobile.

Many executions in the "Take Pictures. Further" campaign emphasized Kodak's digital products. A two-page ad in Reader's Digest in 1998 featured a photograph of three boys playing soccer. The headline read, "Your son was a blur as he raced down the field. But every detail will be crystal clear when you print out your pictures." The opposite page showed a digital camera with text explaining that the product allowed consumers to preview pictures, delete whatever they disliked, store the digital images on a picture card, use a computer to E-mail them to family and friends, and print them on high-quality paper. An ad in People magazine in 1998 also showed boys playing soccer next to the headline "This kick went clear across the country." A coupon was included, inviting consumers to try Kodak PhotoNet (an online service for E-mailing photographs, ordering reprints, and purchasing gifts via the Internet) or Kodak Picture disk (a floppy disk that allowed consumers to view photographs on their computer monitors and incorporate pictures into documents).

Kodak continued to use the slogan in new advertising campaigns during the late 1990s to promote three digital-imaging products that allowed amateurs to enlarge or crop their photographs, remove the red that flash photography sometimes caused in a subject's eyes, add messages to the image, and place decorative borders around their pictures. Noting an increase in the number of teenage consumers, Kodak began slanting more of its U.S. advertising toward teenage girls. One spot, titled "Tattoo," featured a girl who wanted a tattoo. Adhering to her mother's advice to "shoot your friends' tattoos, and we'll look at the options," she used an Advantix camera to photograph four different tattoos she liked. After having a nightmare in which the phrase "Viva Macarena" was tattooed across her forehead, the teen decided against getting a tattoo.

Unifying its global advertisements, the company launched its first worldwide image campaign in 1999. The effort built on the earlier campaign's "Tall Tales" commercials and featured more fantastic stories told through photographs taken with Kodak products.

OUTCOME

During the six-year span of "Take Pictures. Further," Kodak's uncontested dominance over the photography industry began to wane. The enterprise lost business not to other film companies but to the skyrocketing popularity of digital photography. According to Kodak executives and advertising analysts, the problem with "Take Pictures. Further" was that it failed to promote Kodak's own advancements in digital technology. In 1996 Kodak was one of the first companies to introduce a range of pocket-size digital cameras. Instead of marketing the digital cameras, however, Kodak promoted Advantix, which did not offer as many features as digital photography and cost more for consumers to develop. Belinda Parmar, an Ogilvy & Mather representative who worked on the campaign, told Marketing that Kodak's greatest problem was that "[i]t may have promising digital technology, but it has failed to communicate this effectively and convince consumers that Kodak is a digital brand."

Sales for Kodak steadily declined during the campaign's final three years. Kodak released several digital cameras throughout this period, but technology critics believed that digital Kodak cameras lacked the functionality and form of cameras made by Sony and Canon. In 2001 Kodak also made a late entry into online photo development with its launch of www.Ofoto.com, a website onto which consumers could upload their digital images and later receive the printed images in the mail. Kodak was offering digital products, but its campaign pushed the more expensive and less popular film products. "Kodak is well placed to become a success in home printing, particularly as the sector moves from high-end to mass market," Parmar continued in Marketing. "But first," she said, "it must focus its marketing communication on why, rather than how, people print out digital."

FURTHER READING

Crain, Rance. "Capturing the Kodak Moment Fast Becoming a Sad Memory." Advertising Age, November 24, 1997, p. 25.

Desmond, Edward W. "What's Ailing Kodak?." Fortune, October 27, 1997, p. 185.

Freeman, Laurie. "Shooting for Share." Supermarket Business, February 1999, p. 47.

Gelsi, Steve. "Putting the Big Picture Back in Focus: Kodak, Revamping Staff and Budget, Takes an Edgy Tack to Get Back on the Growth Track." Brandweek, November 25, 1996, p. 18.

Jardine, Alexandra. "Kodak: Is This a Kodak Moment?" Marketing, October 13, 2004, p. 28.

Kim, Hank. "Ogilvy Helming Global Kodak Effort." Adweek (eastern ed.), November 23, 1998, p. 5.

"Momentous Shifts." Brandweek, June 1, 1998, p. 26.

Panczyk, Tania D. "HSR Set to Push Kodak to Pros." Adweek, November 25, 2002.

Street, Rita. "Making Pretty Pictures Hip." Shoot, October 18, 1996, p. 25.

Susan Risland
Kevin Teague

TALL TALES CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In the early 1990s Kodak, the venerable photo products company, found itself in increasing difficulties. Despite a long history of pioneering products and dominating the market, the company was up against strong competition, and it also faced rapidly changing new technology. In trying to keep up, Kodak had ventured unsuccessfully outside its core market of imaging, which for Kodak included photography, digital imaging, color management systems, and image and document storage systems.

In this digital age most consumers were unaware that Kodak had digital products; rather, Kodak was seen as the "yellow box" company. By 1993 Kodak posted a $1.5 million loss. The company still dominated in film sales, but it was perceived as old-fashioned and out of touch with younger consumers.

The company took several steps to revitalize its image. It created the tag line "Take Pictures. Further" for all of its advertising in order to show consumers the many possibilities available to them in taking and developing their photos. Kodak also turned to the New York advertising agency Ogilvy & Mather to create the "Tall Tales" corporate brand campaign for television, the first such effort for Kodak. The campaign had a twofold objective: to establish the Kodak brand as one offering a multitude of possibilities for pictures and to make the company more relevant to potential new customers in the generation X age group.

"Tall Tales" was made up of two series of spots, each minimovies of 60 seconds, which ran during 1996 and 1997 on television and at movie theaters. The 1996 series was highly successful, winning a Gold Effie and a number of other awards. In 1997 Kodak followed with a second set of "Tall Tales."

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Kodak was founded in 1881 by George Eastman and became a household name and market leader with the introduction of the Brownie camera in 1900, color film in 1935 and, above all, the Kodak Instamatic camera in 1963. Eastman believed in reaching ordinary people, and his mission was to make photography, then a cumbersome procedure, something anybody could do and enjoy. "You push the button, we do the rest" was the Kodak slogan, and it was a tremendous success. It made Kodak far and away the market leader for a century, maintaining a 60-70 percent market share.

When CEO George Fisher took over the reins at Kodak at the end of 1993, his goal was to refocus Kodak on what it does best. He was in a sense returning to the vision of George Eastman but placing his efforts firmly in the context of digital technology—meaning the use of computers and other digital media to create, manipulate, send, and store images. Fisher began selling off the new ventures that had led the company off its path—which had included Sterling Drug, L&F Products (makers of Lysol and related products), and the Clinical Diagnostics division—and refocused the company on imaging.

Kodak's marketing dilemma was that it had failed to position itself as a digital imaging innovator. Surveys showed that few consumers were even aware that Kodak had digital products. Indeed, as the magazine Sales and Marketing Management reported in early 1997, only very technology-savvy consumers were aware of the range of possibilities for enhancing photographs. During the 1990s, of the 60 million photos that were taken annually around the world, fewer than 2 percent were enlarged, manipulated, hung for display, or used commercially. Most went into a photo album or shoe box.

To resolve this dilemma Fisher created the new position of Chief Marketing Officer and in 1995 appointed Carl Gustin to fill it. Gustin left a position with the computer giant Apple to join Kodak and had also worked for a number of prestigious marketing agencies. Thus, he embodied exactly the talents Fisher sought to position Kodak for the digital age. The marketing department led by Gustin sat atop the business units and created centralized corporate branding and strategic planning. The new system was a dramatic change for Kodak. Whereas formerly each business division had carried out single-product advertising, Kodak changed to system advertising, which was planned through the corporate marketing division.

"Our goal is to go beyond 'You push the button' and take customers toward a future where they 'Take pictures. Further'," Fisher told Sales and Marketing Management. "But we'll do this in a way that makes it just as easy to take pictures further as it was to push the button. We want our imaging technology to be easy to use. Consumers want more and better pictures, not technology for its own sake."

TARGET MARKET

The "Tall Tales" campaign was directed at three separate and distinct groups. It focused first on parents of school-age children. More specifically, this group, generally 25 to 55 years old, was college-educated, used a PC at home, often subscribed to an on-line service, and took pictures. The group was also thought to influence the technology decisions of mainstream Kodak consumers who were less comfortable with technology.

A second major focus group was the "wired generation," adults 18 to 34 years old who were college-educated and PC and Internet users. It was thought that this group influenced other young consumers, as well as technology providers. Finally, the campaign focused on business managers and department heads, aged 35 to 64, who might have been part of the decision-making process for technology purchases in medium and large businesses. This group was likely to influence the technology considerations of fellow business executives, managers, and employees. All three groups were considered influential in the "Information Age."

KODAK OUT OF THE PICTURE IN JAPAN

In 1995 Kodak filed a petition with the United States government (under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974) asking the government to investigate and remedy what it saw as anti-competitive trade practices in the Japanese market for consumer photographic film and paper. Japan was the second-largest market for consumer photographic products in the world, but Kodak's share of the film market there was less than 10 percent. The company had a much higher market share in other industrialized nations, including other Asian countries. The company said that its market research had shown that Japanese consumers were aware of the Kodak brand but cited "lack of availability" as their primary reason for not trying Kodak products.

Kodak's position in the conflict was strengthened in mid-1996, when an investigation by the U.S. trade representative confirmed the existence of trade barriers to imports of photographic film and paper in Japan. In February 1997 the U.S. government filed suit against Japan with the World Trade Organization (WTO) in Geneva, charging the government of Japan with preventing foreign importers from gaining a meaningful share of the Japanese market for consumer photographic products. The WTO ruled against Kodak later that year, but in early 1998 the U.S. government announced that it would hold the government of Japan to market access commitments it had made during the course of the dispute.

COMPETITION

For much of its history Kodak had been without serious competition. However, the company met with new threats to its market position, during the 1970s and 1980s. Companies like Fuji and Konica successfully entered the film business and companies like Microsoft, Apple, Sony, and Hewlett Packard became leaders in the arena of new technologies. Because Kodak initially failed to position itself as a player in the digital age, it posed little threat to key digital competitors. Few consumers saw Kodak as a forward-thinking and innovative company; many did not even know of Kodak's digital products and services. But Kodak retained strong brand recognition. In 1996, for example, branding expert Interbrand Schechter Inc. called it the world's fourth strongest brand, surpassed only by McDonald's, Coca-Cola, and Disney.

Kodak saw Fuji as a particularly strong competitor in the film business. The two companies engaged in a protracted dispute over Kodak's share in the Japanese film market during the 1990s, with Kodak asserting that it had been denied a fair chance to reach out to Japanese consumers. Although Kodak lost the battle legally, it had the backing of the U.S. government and was able to wring some concessions from the Japanese government.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Prior to the "Tall Tales" campaign, Kodak had used single-product advertising, parceling out its $300 million advertising budget among some 200 agencies worldwide. By 1996 Gustin had consolidated these 200 agencies to four: Ogilvy & Mather, J. Walter Thompson, Uniworld, and Saatchi & Saatchi, assigning each to focus on specific products worldwide. In a further consolidation, Ogilvy & Mather became the sole agency for the "Tall Tales" executions, which combined product and image advertising in Kodak's first-ever corporate brand campaign.

The campaign had very specific goals. It sought to position Kodak as a digital technology innovator among those most influential in the Information Age; to develop Kodak brand awareness among the young wired generation, a good number of whom did not own cameras; and to increase awareness that Kodak had digital imaging products for both home and business uses.

The point of the campaign, which cost between $20 million and $40 million, was to convince the target groups that Kodak could best help them unleash the power of pictures. Kodak's products were perceived by consumers as being both reliable and of high quality, and evoked images of family values. On the other hand, consumers also saw Kodak as an old-fashioned and stodgy company that mostly made little yellow boxes of film to capture "Kodak moments." The campaign sought to draw on the long-held positive values to reposition Kodak as an innovative company more focused on the future than on treasured moments of the past. At the same time, Kodak was concerned that it not alienate its core group of older consumers. In other words, the campaign needed to promise the digital future without abandoning a long and worthy heritage.

During the first phase of the "Tall Tales" campaign, buses at the 1996 Olympic Games in Atlanta carried Kodak advertising, and a CD-ROM containing video clips and company materials was distributed to selected members of the press. The campaign included Internet marketing as well. The Kodak website was redesigned around the "Take Pictures. Further" theme for both 1996 and 1997.

The 1997 series consisted of three "60-second movies" that linked life events with Kodak products. Among the products and services the campaign showcased were the Funsaver single-use camera, Kodak premium processing, Kodak Gold film with color sharp technology, Gold Max film, and Image Magic cropping and enlarging features.

In the first television spot, "Tattoo," a teenager desires a tattoo. Rather than prohibiting it outright, her mother proposes a compromise: she can photograph her friends' tattoos, and they will study the results together. The girl uses a Kodak camera to take snapshots of her friends' tattoos: Mickey's bulldog, Rachel's rose, Daphne's lizard, and Uncle Leo's faded and indecipherable "something." That night she awakens screaming from a nightmare in which "Viva Macarena" is tattooed onto her forehead. To her mother's visible relief, she announces the next day that she has decided to forego the entire project. In another spot, called "Saturday," a bouncy teenager takes pictures of scenes from an ordinary suburban day. Her bright and colorful pictures of feet, socks, a dog, and a bowl of cereal are fun and offbeat, and unexpectedly a museum curator offers the young photographer $100,000 to exhibit them. She accepts eagerly and basks in the spotlight of instant fame. Finally, in "Stacy" a young man sweeps his girlfriend off her feet with a digitally enhanced Kodak photo, paving the way for the couple's dreams of marriage and a long life together.

Specific network, cable, and syndicated programs made up the television media plan. The airings were planned to reach viewers of lighter television shows and those with an interest in technology and innovation. "Tattoo" had its prime-time debut on the Drew Carey Show on March 12, 1997; "Saturday" made its first appearance also on March 12 on the Fox Network; and "Stacy" premiered on The Simpsons on March 9. "Saturday" was also shown during the Academy Awards on March 24. The broadcast schedule ran May through July 1996 and during March 1997.

OUTCOME

Kodak executives viewed the "Tall Tales" campaign of 1996 and 1997 a success, declaring that the campaign had effectively redefined Kodak as a serious player in the Information Age. A 16-country tracking study showed a 3 percent gain in brand equity (or confidence in the brand), which the company attributed to "re-energizing, rather than abandoning a focus on memories," as CEO Fisher expressed it in a letter to the magazine Advertising Age. The campaign's commercials of 1996, which won a Gold Effie, registered an "enjoyability" score higher than 97 percent of all spots ever tested by Millward Brown International (MBI). In the category "uniqueness," "Tall Tales" received the best MBI score ever. Post campaign ad surveys by MBI Ad Trackers found that target consumers had changed their brand perceptions and that Kodak was seen as a more forward-thinking technological innovator after the campaign.

The wired generation also found more relevance in the Kodak brand. MBI found that the perception of the Kodak brand as "contemporary," "cool," and, above all, relevant rose by 25 percent in this group. Looking at the target audience as a whole, MBI found increased awareness that Kodak offered a variety of products for home and business users and that Kodak was more than just the "yellow box" company.

The campaign also had an immediate short-term effect on film sales for the second quarter of 1997. Still, despite the positive outlook, many financial experts felt it was too soon to judge the success of the "Tall Tales" campaign and questioned whether customers had truly accepted the company as a digital leader. "Kodak is in the midst of a long-term transition," Tom Graves of Standard & Poors told Sales & Marketing Management. "But if Kodak offers innovative, affordable products, it can be accepted as a leader in digital technologies."

FURTHER READING

Conlon, Ginger. "Getting into Focus: Carl Gustin is Leading Kodak's Effort to Reinvent Itself for the Future." Sales & Marketing Management January 1, 1997.

Gelsi, Steve. "Kodak Eyes Edgier Ads via Creative Consortium." Brandweek October 28, 1996.

Nelson, Emily, and Sally Goll Beatty. "Eastman Kodak Takes Thompson out of Picture, Focuses on Ogilvy." The Wall Street Journal June 17, 1997.

Wilke, Michael. "Kodak Studies 'Low' Interest by Kids: Working toward Global Ad Effort, Using Saatchi's Kid Connection." Advertising Age, April 14, 1997.

Susan M. Steiner

eBay Inc.

2145 Hamilton Avenue
San Jose, California 95125
USA
Telephone: (408) 376-7400
Fax: (408) 369-4855
Web site: www.ebay.com

■■■

ABBREVIATED CAMPAIGN

OVERVIEW

In 1995 eBay Inc. was founded in San Jose, California. It was an online site, located at www.ebay.com, that enabled users to buy and sell items from other users. Rather than sell items itself, eBay made money by charging fees on completed transactions and by charging for advertisements on its website. In 2003 more than 900 million items were posted for sale on eBay. These items included automobiles. Because of their relatively high prices, automobile sales generated larger fees than many other kinds of sales. In the arena of used-car sales, however, the company faced competition from online search engines such as Google and Yahoo! as well as from traditional newspaper advertisements.

EBay charged the ad agency Goodby, Silverstein & Partners, based in nearby San Francisco, with developing a radio spot that would inform consumers of the benefits of using eBay to sell automobiles. The result was a humorous 60-second spot called ''Abbreviated.'' The spot featured a narrator using an ''abbreviated'' language culled from newspaper classified ads. Rather than just telling listeners that classified ads did not provide enough space to adequately describe an automobile, the narrator demonstrated this through his own speech. Then he touted the benefits of selling cars on eBay.

The spot was a hit with critics. In 2005 it won a Silver Lion at the International Advertising Festival, a 2005 Bronze Clio Award, and the top prize at the annual Radio Mercury Awards. These awards, however, came after eBay's decision in March 2005 to part ways with Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The company elected to work with BBDO on future campaigns. EBay felt that the larger New York–based agency was better equipped to handle integrated campaigns that combined online, televised, and radio elements. Both agencies were part of the larger communications company the Omnicom Group.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The San Jose–based eBay was created to capitalize on the increasing expansion of the Internet into everyday life in the United States and around the world. The company provided sellers and consumers a platform where they could find each other and conduct transactions. Sellers offered a wide range of goods via the eBay website, www.ebay.com, including sneakers, automobiles, furniture, clothing, and collectibles. The site was best known for the online auctions that it enabled. Sellers posted an item on www.ebay.com, and buyers could view the item and bid on it. The highest bidder purchased the item.

As the Internet became more popular, eBay was able to expand quickly, and the company set up companion sites around the world. Soon eBay began describing itself as "The World's Online Marketplace." The company's profits came via fees it collected on each transaction as well as from advertising it sold on its assorted websites. The approach was largely successful, and in 2003 alone more than 900 million items were listed on eBay. By 2004 eBay was offering the PayPal service, which enabled buyers to pay sellers through their credit cards or via secure account transfers. There were several subsections to the eBay site, including one for automobile sales, labeled "eBay Motors." Consumers could search cars by make and model or by price. Because higher-priced items generated higher fees, the company made more money from automobile sales than it did from many other items sold via www.ebay.com.

At the outset eBay relied on word of mouth to promote its business. As the company became more successful, it branched out into print and radio advertising. In 2002 eBay conducted its first television campaign, "Do It eBay," which was developed by Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. The San Francisco–based agency had been responsible for all of the company's radio advertising through 2004 as well. Goodby, Silverstein & Partners was best known for its award-winning "Got Milk" campaign on behalf of the California Milk Processor Board. The agency was founded in 1983 by Jeff Goodby and Rich Silverstein, who had previously worked together at the Ogilvy & Mather agency.

TARGET MARKET

EBay usually aimed for a very large target market. The company wanted to be the destination of choice for anyone shopping online. The website had always been especially popular with collectors, who used the site to track down rare and hard-to-find items, such as out-of-print records or idiosyncratic household goods.

The site listed many types of items for sale, however, and it was also a major attraction for bargain shoppers and consumers who were comfortable doing their shopping online. The company also allowed people to sell automobiles on the site. These were expensive items, which meant that the company collected higher fees on such transactions. The kind of shopper that bought an automobile on eBay was a typical used-car shopper: younger and on a budget. The company saw automobile sales as a prime candidate for growth.

COMPETITION

The most serious competitor for eBay, especially for big-ticket items such as automobiles, was the search engine Google. Like eBay, Google did not sell anything itself. Instead, consumers used Google's website to search for items online. For example, a used-car dealer or an individual would post on a website the vehicles they had for sale, and buyers would find the site via Google. Other search engines, such as Yahoo!, offered similar services. In fact, Yahoo! even allowed sellers to post ads that would appear in the Yahoo! Autos section of the search engine's website, www.yahoo.com. Although neither of these companies provided online auction services, they competed with eBay by providing an alternative way for consumers to buy automobiles online.

The company was even more concerned, however, about its off-line competitors. While certain products, such as music files, collectibles, or books, seemed to attract online buyers easily, most consumers were accustomed to buying automobiles through off-line means, such as classified advertisements in newspapers. To grow its automobile-selling business eBay needed to lure more of these people into buying (and selling) automobiles on ebay.com.

MARKETING STRATEGY

Goodby, Silverstein & Partners was the agency of record on the 2004 radio campaign, which consisted of a

ONLINE AUCTIONS

The most common type of transaction on eBay's website was an auction. To list an item for auction, a seller was required to register with eBay. Then he or she chose whether or not to offer a "Buy It Now" option for the item. This was a feature that allowed a buyer to purchase the item outright, bypassing the auction. After setting a "Buy It Now" price, the seller posted a minimum bid for the item. Then the seller determined how long the auction should last and set a minimum bid increment. A minimum bid increment was the minimum amount over the current bid a buyer was allowed to offer. For example, if someone bid $5 for an item, and the minimum bid was $1, then the minimum for the next bid was $6.

Buyers bid by entering into the site the maximum amount they were willing to pay. Their bid appeared as the minimum allowed at that time, and then it moved up as more people bid. For example, in the above scenario, if the buyer chose to bid $10 instead of just $6, his or her bid first appeared as $6 and then rose as new bids were made. If someone else saw the item and bid $7, the first buyer's bid moved up to $8. Bidders were allowed to increase their maximum bids. The person with the highest bid when the auction ended won the item.

60-second spot titled ''Abbreviated.'' It was part of the $250 million in U.S. advertising that eBay purchased in 2004. Later that year eBay augmented its radio efforts with a television campaign, also engineered by Goodby, Silverstein & Partners. This campaign, which carried the tagline ''The Power of All of Us,'' ran in the fall and winter shopping season. It did not focus on automobiles.

The ''Abbreviated'' radio spot was fairly straightforward. It featured a man speaking directly to the audience, without any music or sound effects. In the ad the speaker communicated in short, abbreviated words, like those used in a typical classified ad in a local newspaper. He explained to consumers—especially potential sellers—that the abbreviated language used in newspaper classifieds was too unclear to give potential buyers an idea of what the car was actually like. In contrast, eBay allowed sellers a chance to post more detailed text and pictures, so buyers knew just what they were getting.

